Housing scene brightens co-ed residences planned

By LAURENCE REDMAN

Relief may be in sight for the thousands of University of Toronto students looking for accommodation in the university area.

Within the next few years the critical housing shortage may be alleviated by the completion of different projects now in the tentative planning or construction stages.

"I think that this is the worst year we will ever have," said Mary Jaffary, director of the University housing service.

Already under construction are Rochdale College and the women's residence for New College. In the late planning stages are the married students quarters initiated by the Ontario Student Housing Corporation.

The Students' Administrative Council is entering into the housing race with plans for a 16-storey co-ed project at Madison and Bloor Streets.

The university has recently purchased the apartment building at the south-east corner of St. George and Bloor St., to be turned into a graduate student residence.

Rochdale College will be completed in another year and a half with room for 850 students and staff.

"I think that the ultimate solution to the financial problem facing students in housing rests with the government and all we can do now is to provide room for students as cheaply as we can," says SAC Vice-President John Treleaven (SGS).

Campus residences now provide space for about 3,000 students with more than twice that number applying for accommodation.

But the problems of finding suitable housing and the cost still remains with the students this fall.

"I am of the impression that Toronto's housing costs are the most inflated on the continent," said Mrs. Jaffary.

Furnished rooms this year usually cost between $12 and $16.

Older and graduate students usually want the greater privacy afforded them by flats and apartments.

But flats are almost impossible to find and usually come with shared bathrooms and a price tag of $75 to $100 for a single person.

"I am usually pessimistic about flats," said Mrs. Jaffary.

If rents are not out of the question in the new high rise apartments sprouting up around the campus, their

The Students Administrative Council will consider Wednesday whether to charter a train to Montreal for McGill Weekend.

The excursion, to be held Nov. 10-12 has often been the object of vigorous criticism, especially by Canadian National Railways officials who have billed SAC for damage to train cars.

Before the student body can apply for the train, it must agree in advance to a set of rules laid down by Canadian National at a recent meeting with SAC representatives.

The CNR's conditions include the searching of passengers for alcohol, the refusal of passage to any inebriated and the prohibition of alcoholic consumption on railway property.

In addition, CN wants train vestibules clear at all times, is determined to see the punishment of offenders, and has promised that any unauthorized interference with the operation of the train will lead to the train being rerouted to its point of origin.

The railway company also wants SAC to supply uniformed University of Toronto police, and to pay for uniformed CN police who will accompany the train.

SAC finance commissioner Jan Duinker (SGS) said the proposed conditions were prompted by the behaviour of students on the SAC-chartered train used for last year's McGill Weekend.

Last year, 1,300 students took part and CN estimated damage at $2,200. CN finally settled with SAC for $826.29

Duinker said CN representatives were particularly angered by the abuse students gave officials and delays to other trains and passengers caused by pranksters who pulled the stopcord.

CN suggested a $5 surcharge on each ticket, refundable only if no damage occurs during the trip. Last year, return tickets were $13.90 each and SAC made a net profit, after damages, of about $700.00.

Duinker is optimistic about this year.

"There are a couple of U of T grads with CN," he said, "so I'm pretty sure we'll get a train.

"And probably what will happen then is that the rules will be broken all over again."

SAC and Varsity will break ties: Committee favours recommendation

The committee appointed last year to investigate the relationship between the Students Administrative Council and The Varsity has proposed that formal connections be ended in favor of an all-campus board of directors.

The committee — composed of former Varsity editor Harvey Shepherd, former SAC president Mary Brewin Lewis and former SAC member Alan Bowker — recommends that The Varsity operate under an 11-man board.

The board would include three members named by SAC, one named by the president of the university, two named by the Association of Teaching Staff, the editor, a member named by the preceding year's editor and three members named by the board.

The 20-page report also recommends that The Varsity be incorporated to help establish its separate identity and to prevent board members from being personally liable in any legal action against the paper.

With formal links with the SAC ended, The Varsity would receive no subsidy from council and would operate with advertising revenue as its means of income.

The report says that "The Varsity must continue to be considered a responsible part of the university community; that it can never be a completely 'independent' private enterprise."

However it finds disadvantages in SAC governing the paper — since The Varsity comments on SAC it is awkward to have SAC holding ultimate publishing control.

Membership on the proposed board of directors would not be restricted to persons formally connected with the different constituencies.

In a discussion of full-time staff, the report endorses a Varsity proposal from last spring to have Bob Parkins, last year's managing editor, as full-time general manager.

SAC approval of the general manager's post came at council's summer meeting and Parkins takes up his duties effective today. The report emphasizes that he is to do considerable work in establishing the new Varsity structure.

Elsewhere, the report recommends that another newspaper might be started by SAC at some point after SAC is freed of all responsibility for The Varsity.

The report must be considered by SAC's communications commission before it goes before a general meeting of council. It is expected to come before council Oct. 4.

Bissell's absence sparks changes

President Claude Bissell's year-long leave of absence at Harvard University has sparked changes in the administration hierarchy of the University of Toronto.

John H. Sword has been appointed acting president. His assistants are members of the executive who have taken over many of Dr. Bissell's duties.

Dr. Moffatt Woodside, vice-president and provost, has taken over Dr. Bissell's chairmanship of the Senate, president's council and council of the faculty of arts and science.

Alex G. Rankin, executive vice-president, has overall responsibility for non-academic operations.

The vice-president for administration Frank R. Stone and vice-president for health sciences is Dr. John Hamilton. Robin Ross has been appointed vice-president and registrar.

Dr. Gilbert B. Robinson is the new vice-president for research administration while Professor Donald F. Forster will succeed Mr. Sword as vice-provost.

N.S.C. Dickinson, registrar of Scarborough College becomes assistant to the president.

Ernest Sirluck, dean of graduate studies, will deal with William Davis, minister of university affairs.

Prof. Tuzo Wilson is the new principal of Erindale College.

University TV centre established

The television council of the committee of presidents of Ontario universities has announced the establishment of an educational television centre to serve provincially-assisted universities.

The initial location of the centre will be at Scarborough College of the University of Toronto. From there it will move to different Ontario universities.

The new centre will coordinate equipment, collect information on technical and programming developments and establish liason with the department of education in its development of an educational television network in Ontario.

Dr. Lewis Miller, assistant to the dean for education communications at Scarborough College, will supervise the centre.

U of T's youngest campus opens

The youngest campus of the University of Toronto opened this morning with 150-200 students already registered in General Arts and Science.

Actual operation of the campus began Friday morning when the students and staff met with Principal Tuzo Wilson. After hearing from Principal Wilson and Registrar Dr. J. J. Rae, the students were treated to a free lunch in the new cafeteria.

Prof. S.J. Coleman, dean of Erindale College, followed a group of students as they toured the campus.

"We are already establishing an intimate feeling here," he commented. "I think it bodes extremely well for the future. The students were very enthusiastic about the campus."

The intimate feeling stems largely from the fact that there are over 30 staff members, who are already calling their students by name.

The campus is in almost full operation. A library of 50,000 volumes opened on Friday under Librarian Mr. H. L. Smith.

In addition to the fact that the buildings are completed in just 11 months, the campus is fully landscaped. Set in a woodland area, it is easily U. of T's most beautiful campus.

Since the students are all new to the school no student government exists as yet.

"After the students have had a few weeks to get to know each other, they will set up their own government," Principal Wilson said. "It will take whatever form the students choose to give it."

The faculty will belong to a Faculty Council, which has been in existence for several years. A principal's council will also be set up to bring students and the faculty together on matters of mutual interest.

The council will consist of members of the faculty elected by the Faculty Council, and students elected by the Student Council.

The council is Principal Wilson's solution to the problem of drawing students into the administration of the campus.

"Instead of having a student sitting on the Faculty Council and a faculty member sitting on the Students Council, there will be this third council to encompass areas of mutual interest," explained Dr. Wilson.

Erindale College will be an integral part of the University of Toronto. Graduate students and professors will commute regularly between the St. George and Erindale campuses.

Buses will run every two hours to connect the two campuses. Dr. Wilson himself will teach several classes on the St. George campus.

Students have the added convenience of a bus system which will pick them up at their homes and from the GO train each morning and return them in the evening.

Better deal from POSAP this year

Ontario students now have a better chance of obtaining financial aid from the Province of Ontario Student Awards Plan which has been altered in response to criticism directed against it last year.

A $7,000,000 increase in money available will improve the loan-grant ratio, giving students a larger grant.

The application form has been simplified and university officials have been given more autonomy in handling loans and bursaries.

Residence fees rise across campus

By KATHERINE BARCZA

Most colleges in the University of Toronto have increased residence fees between $50 and $75, and the worst is yet to come.

J. P. Mahoney, chief Accountant at St. Michael's College, said Friday, annual increases will probably be the trend at all colleges.

University College residences, Sir Daniel Wilson and Whitney Hall, as well as Devonshire House and the New College residence—all working on a centralized University budget—were subjected to an increase of $50.

Cost of a semi-private or private room in Whitney Hall rose to $783 this year from $733. Men at Sir Daniel Wilson's paid $805, $50 more than last year.

Fees at New College vary with the length of the various faculties' terms. The rate for an arts and science student, for example, has increased to $820 from $770.

A spokesman for Devonshire House blamed the increase on a rise in general running costs.

Dean David Stager of New College said the six-per-cent increase in university residence fees is less than the rise in labor costs.

Dean Stager said a sub-committee of the president's advisory committee on the policy and administration of residences will report on the situation, probably before Christmas.

The denominational colleges function independently of the joint university budget and of each other.

At Trinity, men's and women's fees increased $75 to $850. Women's fees rose to $825 from $750.

G.A.B. Watson, dean of residence at Trinity, said the decision for the increase was made only after a careful study of the residence situation, by a Committee partially composed of elected student representatives.

At SMC the cost for a semi-private room for men is $775 this year, compared to $700 last year.

St. Michael's dean of men, Rev. James Jordan, said the matter was handled through the accounting office and the decision authorized by the college's Board of Governors.

He said the fees increase had nothing to do with the college's building program which includes a new student centre.

Father Jordan attributed the late publication of the fees increase to an attempt on the part of the college to conform to university policy on academic fees.

Mr. Mahoney blamed the over-all rise in the cost of living for increased residence fees. He pointed out the extreme difficulty of maintaining fees at the same level for several years under today's greatly accelerated rate of cost increases.

St. Joseph's College residence for women at Saint Michael's College, which last year charged $700 for a semi-private room and $750 for a private, is asking $750 for all rooms this year.

Sister St. Stephan, the dean of women, blamed increases in food, maintenance and labor costs.

Victoria College fees for the first term remained the same as last year in both men's and women's residences.

The second instalment will be decided later this fall by a committee of the college's Board of Regents, meeting with representatives of the residence student governments.

Hart House

HART HOUSE

In this column will be announced regular and special events occurring in Hart House during the academic year. All male students at the University of Toronto are members of the House. Make a point, therefore, of watching this column so that you may take advantage of the facilities which are yours to enjoy.

MUSIC

The first concert, among the series held each year by the Music Committee, will be the Sunday Evening Concert, October 1. Programme to be announced.

GLEE CLUB

New members are required each year for this outstanding Glee Club. Auditions will be in the Music Room on Thursday, September 21, and Monday, September 25, from 4-6 p.m. All members of Hart House, both graduate and undergraduate, are welcome; freshmen are especially invited to audition. The ability to read music is an advantage but is not essential. Rehearsals take place every Tuesday from 7-9:30 p.m. in the Great Hall and on Thursdays from 5:15-6:30 p.m. in the Music Room.

RECORD ROOMS

One record room houses an excellent classical library and the other a collection of jazz, folk-song and spoken word records. A short class must be attended to receive proper instruction for the use of the equipment. Watch the "Varsity" for announcements of times for instruction, or the notice boards in the rotunda.

STEINWAY GRAND PIANOS

Any member of Hart House who has Grade 8 or above standing may use the Steinway Grand pianos after receiving a card from the Undergraduate Office. There are two upright pianos for the use of other members.

SQUASH

The Squash Racquets Committee of Hart House controls the use of the Squash courts in the basement. Periods to play squash may be reserved one day prior to play by calling the Hall Porter at 928-2452.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR BEGINNERS: Novices interested in Squash Instruction, should fill in a form on the Freshman Information Board in the rotunda of Hart House.

LIBRARY

The Library of Hart House on the second floor, houses about 10,000 volumes for the leisure reading of the Hart House members. The Library Committee always appreciates receiving suggestions of new purchases.

HOUSE COMMITTEE — FALL DANCES

The first event to be organized by the House Committee will be the Hart House Fall Dances on Saturday, September 23 and Saturday September 30. Tickets, 1.00 per person, will be available from the Hall Porter. Stag or Drag.

DEBATES

The Hart House Debates provide a forum for parliamentary debate. All members are welcome to attend and to speak from the floor. The first debate will be held on September 28th on the topic: "Violence is the only language the White Man Understands" with Austin Clarke as Honorary Visitor.

Peter Warrian elected CUS president

LONDON, Ont. (CUP)—Peter Warrian of the University of Waterloo was elected president of the Canadian Union of Students for 1968-69 at the recent CUS congress at the University of Western Ontario.

Warrian, a former member of the national executive of the Student Union for Peace Action, supported a more active role for students in education and society.

He defeated Stephen Bigsby of the University of Victoria. Two other candidates, Peter Larson of the University of Waterloo and John Cleveland of Kings College, withdrew before the vote was taken.

Warrian said his priorities were quality of education, social action and world affairs.

Teaching methods, curriculum and professor-student relations are crucial issues in the educational field, he said.

Don Mitchell of the University of Saskatchewan was elected vice-president for 1968-69. Peter Simmie of the University of Manitoba was elected finance commissioner for 1967-68 and Bob Baldwin of UWO was elected 1967-68 program commissioner.

"The student not only expect to be instructed in what men have discovered about the nature of things; they positively demand to be endowed with a sense of direction and a conviction that life is worthwhile, all served up with an intimate personal friendliness rarely found even among blood relatives."

—W. S. Morrison, Introduction to Contemporary University: U.S.A.

freshmen you are not welcome

Well freshmen, it's your first day at the big university and you're groping around settling into courses and wondering just what goes on around here.

You may have noticed that the administration, the Students Administrative Council, your deans and others are just oozing with words of welcoming introduction.

The Community of Scholars concept must be ringing in your ears by now and will be repeated during acting president J. H. Sword's speech this afternoon.

But notice: the letters are all mimeographed products produced on a machine somewhere by some nameless person.

What to make of that? Well, you might think, that's all right. There are many students arriving here each year. Even the greetings have to be mass-produced assembly-line stuff at the beginning.

What really matters is that you're here, out of the assembly-line education purveyed by the high schools. Academic ambitions can be satisfied with close contact with the great scholars, the men who do the thinking at an unhurried pace.

Don't delude yourself and get it straight right at the beginning that few people are really welcoming you here. The assembly line hasn't stopped yet — you're just moving up to another step in the process.

In recent years, the term multiversity has come into vogue to describe the factory you are entering.

You see, the system is against you if you really have hopes of developing a personal rapport with the academics. Your lectures are huge and crowded. Someone steps into the room, tells you something for 50 minutes and then goes off to do his other thing.

Your tutorials, which are supposed to bring closer contact with the professors, don't really help much either. Most of you won't even get a professor leading the tutorial and when you do, they'll be so busy they won't have much time for you.

They ask questions and you answer them. Most of them will be able to pinpoint the exact book from which you get your opinions, but it's an answer and that's all that's expected. And so the whole thing becomes a big game.

The leader may try to start a discussion among you, but likely as not he won't be successful. By the time you graduate, you will come to realize that very few people really know how to talk freely in a group, throwing ideas back and forth easily.

For the professor, it's a job — one that gets mighty boring much of the time. But he will probably accept it because he, like you, will think there's no other way. There are just too many of you, and too few of them and too little time to do anything else.

The world out there is crying for educated young people. There are jobs to fill that require educated persons. These people must be drawn into society to keep it going properly.

There are about 20,000 students on their way through here at any one time.

Thus the world gets its university-educated young people in a never-ending flow. But meanwhile what happens to you?

Chances are you won't really become educated here. You'll satisfy the system — pass exams and say a few words in some tutorials to show you're still alive. Not much more.

You may justify this whole absurdity by convincing yourself that your function is to follow the system and then contribute to society in the future.

Others will go through because they think, well, it's the only way to get ahead in today's complicated world.

Some of you will become disillusioned along the way somewhere. Some won't make it and some will even suffer mentally because of their disillusionment.

In short, if you're really aware of your surroundings, you'll see the University of Toronto isn't what you have been led to believe. No one really misled you, but somehow you expected more.

Well, now is the time to start thinking about that, not two years from now. Come to realize as soon as possible that just because you are here, is no reason to suppress the question why are you here?

Are you really doing what you want to do or is something outside yourself (and therefore irrelevant to you) pushing you here?

What exactly brought you here? Your parents and what they expect of you? Society's demands on you? Are you happy with the state of the society you're trying so hard to progress in?

Are you happy at the almost fanatical stress society puts on the need for a university education? Are you really university material?

The forces that push you here, do they really care about your welfare or only about the welfare of the society or the country?

Are you stepping up inside society to satisfy your own craving for importance and security?

People may have told you already that if you delay one minute you'll be left behind and ruin your life. Is that a true?

Bah, don't believe it. There's always time, especially to stop and think. And it is important that you think about the process by which society teaches its young. Change for the better isn't about to be legislated; only you can improve your own state.

Is the university merely a supplier of trained recruits for industry and commerce? And the teaching profession? How does it affect you? Does it drag you into something you won't find meaningful?

Do you really want to become a doctor or a lawyer? Do you really want to be an electrical engineer in which business you'll be working with mathematics all your life?

Is history your thing or would you rather be a sociologist? What about anthropology? The field is not considered glamorous, but has it attracted you?

What about after university? Are you going to be confined all your life as a teacher? Many teachers aren't interested in what they are doing. What effect does that have on a young child's mind?

What effect does an uninterested university teacher have on the students' minds?

Think about these things now before you get too involved in your courses, dances, drugs, dates—whatever you're going into this year.

Recognise the personal power you have in yourself — power to direct your life, even power to educate yourself.

Then do whatever you want to do. Don't step on anybody's toes but push away anyone stepping on yours.

Take your professors' opinions and instructions with a grain of salt. Professors' opinions are all too often fossilized. They've resolved their arguments many years ago and don't want to bother opening the issues again.

We'll discuss many of the university's problems this year, but for you we have no answers. We'll point out some questions to ask yourselves and tell you what we think. After that it's your life.

we haven't been asked, but...

Campus social activities are the first concern for some freshmen when they arrive and at least a partial concern for most everybody.

At the University of Toronto, the Blue and White is the central body in charge of all such matters. This body is a social planning and organizing wing of the students' council, rarely striving for anything more than the dance committee found in any high school.

But that's fine. There's room for this type of organization. People want to go to dances and someone has to plan them.

The problem is that the Blue and White in recent years has been rather dull and tired. Fresh ideas have eluded them.

Winter Carnival, which used to be the main function here in February, was scrapped last year simply because it had overlived its usefulness.

This year there are, the B & W keeps suggesting, some radical new plans that will delight everyone here. There are reported to involve a series of festivals including a blues festival starring soul singer Otis Redding.

The details, the Blue and White haven't bothered to reveal to us.

The festival ideas however, is stolen from the University College student council, the Literary and Athletic Society, which ran two very successful ones on pop art and on psychedelics.

In short the Blue and White has been left behind with their old ideas.

So now is the time for the B & W to update itself. It has no business living in the so-called Now Generation and thinking in Back Then terms.

Our proposal: that the Blue and White organize a huge rock dance-light show in Varsity Arena as the central event of their year.

The total environment dances are THE big thing in New York and San Francisco and have spread to other cities, included Vancouver and Detroit, by wily promoters who have seen a good thing and sold it.

Toronto saw one example when the Jefferson Airplane played at O'Keefe Centre this summer.

The Airplane is a big-name group that costs a lot of money to hire, but there are others, less well-known but equally good.

The new groups from the U.S. west coast are playing intelligent and creative music and still having fun at it. They come with strange names: Big Brother and the Holding Company, The Grateful Dead, Country Joe and the Fish.

The best one so far is Country Joe, whose group is not well-known enough yet to cost too much, but released possibly the finest rock album this summer.

Joe, a couple of other bands and a good light-show outfit from the west coast could make for the most exiting dance of the year and set the right direction for B&W thinkings.

CUS members demand stronger student voice

By ANDREW SZENDE

The Canadian Union of Students, representing 140,000 post-secondary students from coast to coast, including all the students at the University of Toronto, is launching a major offensive this year to gain for students a larger voice in the running of their educational institutions.

The program for this effort was worked out at a week-long congress of the union held in London earlier this month. Student leaders from 40 universities gathered to plan this year's course of action for the union and its members. The largest delegation was from Toronto, with 10 official delegates and at times as many as seven unofficial observers.

Headed by Students Administrative Council president Tom Faulkner, the Toronto group fought hard to get the union to accept some of its stands. Thanks to Faulkner's personal reputation and debating skill (he is the only council president in the country to serve either as full time president or a second term in the office), the U of T group succeeded on most issues.

INTERNATIONAL STATUS STANDS

The only notable rebuke for Faulkner and his group was the reversal at the plenary session of a move backed by Toronto to sever the union's ties with the two largest international student unions, the International Union of Students, the International Student Conference.

IUS is based in Prague, Czechoslovakia, with unions from the Communist block, the Arab countries and Latin America. It receives much of its aid from the Communist governments.

ISC has its headquarters in The Hague, Holland, and its members include most of the Western European student unions. Last winter it was disclosed that some of its finances came from the United States Central Intelligence Agency.

Toronto wanted CUS to leave both organizations because of their political ties. As Faulkner explained, "The IUS and ISC are both playing the cold war game and we don't want to be part of it."

At present CUS is an associate member of ISC and has an application pending for similar status in the IUS.

Injected into the debate was the Quebec students' union, the 66,000-member Union General des Etudiants de Quebec, which threatened to break off relations with CUS if it left the international organizations.

UGEQ's secretary for international affairs, Victor Rabinovitch said: "CUS is taking an isolationist stand."

Although Toronto lost this fight by a vote of 70 per cent to 30, it didn't lose too many others during the congress and in at least one other, it proved to be the deciding voice.

ELECTION TURMOIL

This was the election of the president for the year 1968-69 (CUS is always a year ahead in electing its top official to give him time to prepare himself for the job. The incoming president, Hugh Armstrong, 24, of Carleton university was elected at the previous congress in Halifax last September.)

There were four candidates for the position: Peter Warrian of the University of Waterloo, Stephen Bigsby of the University of Victoria, John Cleveland, a member of the CUS secretariat, and Peter Larson, president of the students council at the University of Western Ontario.

An unofficial poll of delegates on the eve of the voting showed that despite the declared candidates, the congress was willing to vote overwhelmingly for Faulkner. The day before the voting took place, undoubtedly with this knowledge, the Toronto delegation went into caucus for about four hours to decide on a course of action.

Faulkner was faced with the dilemma of offering his services to a union which seemed to want him and gaining more fame as a young student leader, something he would undoubtedly enjoy but in return having to give up another year of his studies, as the CUS presidency is also a full-time position.

A graduate in political science and economics of Victoria College, Faulkner holds a fellowship to an American university to study theology. He won it for this year but had it deferred for a year to serve as SAC president.

When the caucus was over, Faulkner emerged from his smoke-filled room in one of the residences at the University of Western Ontario and announced that the Toronto delegation had decided to support Waterloo's Warrian.

As the word spread through the congress that Toronto was backing Warrian, it was becoming

The Canadian Union of Students

The Canadian Union of Students is a national union of English speaking university and post secondary students with about 140,000 members at 40 institutions and headquarters in Ottawa.

It has grown out of the National Federation of Canadian University Students (NFCUS), which was founded in 1926.

Students at U of T are automatically members of the union and pay dues of 75 cents out of their compulsory $8 annual Students Administrative Council fees.

The union is involved in two kinds of programs: social action and service.

It has various programs to reform the post secondary education system and to make sure anybody can get to university, regardless of his family, cultural or financial background.

CUS also publishes a great many papers on matters of student interest, such as housing and human rights which are available in the SAC office. It also sponsors various travel and exchange programs involving Canadian students from all parts of the country.

an accepted fact that he had won the presidency. Larson and Cleveland both withdrew from the race.

On election night, the last Friday of the congress, after the two remaining candidates had been duly nominated and given their campaign speeches, the congress was thrown into total chaos for about 15 minutes in what was the most exciting, if least productive debate of all the sessions.

Officials were about banding out ballots to the more than 180 delegates when George Anderson, 22, of Queen's University, jumped up to stall the proceedings with a procedural motion. Although nominations had closed a day earlier, Anderson wanted to reopen them at this stage and run a new candidate, by suspending the constitution.

A MYSTERY CANDIDATE

Apparently Anderson was not happy with the candidates in the race, so he had been searching all day for a substitute. He found him in a Honey Dew restaurant in Toronto late that afternoon and drove him to London, all the while trying to persuade him to accept a nomination, if it could be made somehow.

After Anderson moved to postpone the voting for at least one hour, a parliamentary battle developed between him and almost all the other delegates. Most people didn't know who the mystery candidate was, but they were opposed to the improper procedure anyway. As tempers were rising in the jammed, hot old gymnasium that served as the plenary hall for the congress, suddenly, a tall blond young man in a corduroy suit jumped up from among the spectators.

ENTER HUNTER

"Mr. Chairman, point of order!" he yelled. This was strange since he was neither a delegate nor one of the 70 or so people who had been attending the congress all week and, of course, he did not have speaking privileges at the meeting. At this point Faulkner jumped up in his seat and yelled into the deafening silence that followed the previous outburst:

"Mr. Chairman, Toronto requests that the congress recognize Mr. David Hunter."

EXIT HUNTER

The tall blond man in the corduroy suit then spoke out, obviously shaken and very excited. He disclaimed any interest in the presidency of CUS or any part in the attempt to hold up the voting.

"If I had any interest in the position, I would have been here all week. I think my nomination now would be highly unfair to the candidates who have campaigned hard through the week and who deserve your support now. I suggest that you go on with the voting immediately."

Hunter, 24, is a graduate sociology student at U of T and a former vice-president of SAC. He said later that Anderson invited him to come and watch the proceedings at the closing session of the congress but he never thought anything like this would happen.

Anderson was quite upset and when the voting was over, he launched into a 20-minute tirade about the lack of leadership at the congress and the fact that he only wanted to do what he thought would be best for the union. Warrian was elected by two-to-one margin.

Whatever merit there was in Anderson's charges, the congress did evolve a fairly coherent philosophy of what a student is and what his part in the educational process should be. Starting with a new declaration of the Canadian student, delegates went to pass a detailed and extensive program to help remould Canadian universities.

Students taking the University of Toronto's three-year course on art as applied to medicine now will earn a degree rather than a diploma.

U of T is the sixth university in North America to offer such a course. Five students are expected to receive the first degrees in 1969.

Candidates must have 2½ years of formal art education. The course comprises medical and dental anatomy and specialized art training.

Teach-In will improve Arena acoustics

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

The organizers of the International Teach-In are making a determined effort to eliminate acoustics problems that have plagued the event in Varsity Arena for the last two years.

In 1965 and 1966 the addresses of Vietnam strategists and China watchers were garbled in the sound system rigged for the Teach-Ins — on Revolution and Response, and China: Coexistence or Containment.

Varsity Arena acoustics have been one of the few major black marks against the Teach-In operation. The gigantic intellectuals' workshop has been lauded by all three Toronto daily newspapers.

Between $1,000 and $3,000 will be spent on an improved sound system for the Varsity Arena Teach-In sessions on Oct. 20, 21 and 22, say the organizers.

Teach-In publicity co-ordinator John Pepperell (IV Trin) said arena officials, a CBC sound technician, radio station CJRT which was responsible for last year's sound) and a professional acoustics agency are discussing the problem.

"Last year the cluster of speakers was placed too high to fill the arena and the floor speakers interfered with the cluster," Pepperell said.

"This year we will remove the floor speakers and lower the cluster."

The Teach-In will have two opportunities to test their new sound ideas before the weekend sessions, he said.

"If there is excessive echo, we will place blanketing around the outside walls or open the windows if it is warm enough.

"If that isn't good enough, we will put up baffles . . . we are going to guarantee that everyone can hear this year."

The Teach-In theme this year is Religion and International Affairs.

Teach-In co-chairman Mike Ignatieff (III Trin) explains: "This isn't about theology and the problems of a few monks around the world.

"We're doing a dangerous and exciting thing — we want to analyse what the human conscience is made of."

Ignatieff hopes Religion and International Affairs will ask questions relevant to everyone:

—Can a man fight for his country?

—When should he fight in a revolution?

—What can he do for people?

—How is it possible to hate a man of another religion?

Ignatieff says he can't predict the outcome of the Teach-In sessions.

"We may even discover that religion doesn't matter," he said.

Pre-Teach-In activities include panel discussions and lectures, all free.

A drama and film festival that is part of the Teach-In Program will be held Oct. 10-14.

Paddy Chayefsky's Gideon and Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot, various noon-hour productions and about a dozen films will be presented free of charge.

Tickets for the weekend sessions will go on sale in early October at $2 for students and $5 for non-students.

Teach-In preparations go into high gear this week. Several students have been working on them all summer.

Any students interested in working for the Teach-In can volunteer at the ITI office at 91 St. George St.

Ryersonians complain about transfer rules

LONDON, Ont. (Special)—Delegates of Ryerson Polytechnical Institute to the recent Canadian Union of Students congress attacked the perennial problem of non-transferability from Ryerson to universities.

In a brief, the delegates called for special make-up courses to facilitate transfer.

Many Ryerson students are able to do university work, they said. But they are judged only on the number of transferable credits — and Ryerson and community college credits are not recognized as equivalent to university ones.

The students said that although the department of education holds that students can transfer, community colleges and institutes of technology offer no general courses to form a basis for switching.

The brief also said high school students in technical or commercial courses are facing the same dilemma. Because of poor guidance the student often enters a stream of education which can lead only to such institutes as Ryerson.

The Varsity Review, the weekly supplement which examines the arts, politics and pretty well anything which crosses its collective mind, hereby summons all Review staffers to a meeting.

This meeting of the minds is formally set for 1 p.m. today on the third floor at 91 St. George St., just above Harbord. However in the best Review tradition staffers are cordially asked to drop in anytime during the afternoon, Trente.

Housing crisis alarms officials

The shortage of accommodation at Canadian universities has alarmed students and university officials.

The crisis is most severe in Montreal where three universities will compete with Expo for accommodation until the end of October.

Sir George Williams University in downtown Montreal must find living quarters for 2,000 out-of-town students without a single residence of its own. Nearby McGill University has only 1,300 residence beds to offer 4,000 out-of-town students and the University of Montreal also has limited space.

For immediate relief Simon Fraser University has provided trailers for residences.

Students at the University of Waterloo are living several miles away in Kitchener and commuting to classes.

Only 600 of 7,000 out-of-town students at the University of Saskatchewan can be accommodated in residences. At the University of Guelph 4,300 students are competing for 1,300 places.

The main cause of the crisis is that academic facilities have expanded without a corresponding increase in residence space.

A study of the student housing situation across the country has been initiated by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada to help universities solve the problem.

SAC raises $4,000,000 to finance new campus centre

By PAUL CARSON

The Students Administrative Council has raised the $4,000,000 required to cover the capital and construction costs of the long-awaited student centre.

Sources of the money are the Ontario government's department of university affairs — $2,000,000; the Bank of Montreal, by way of a long-term leasing arrangement — $1,837,500; and the building and development funds of the university — $162,500.

The Student Centre will be located on the south west corner of Russell and St. George streets. Tenders are expected to be called in March, 1968, and construction should be completed by May, 1969.

Details of the financing and acceptance of the final architectural drawings were approved at a special SAC meeting held in early August.

The crucial area in the financial negotiations was the amount of money SAC could obtain from a chartered bank or trust company.

Although there are 12 such institutions in Ontario, SAC was able to attract only two serious offers for consideration at the special meeting.

After a short debate, council accepted a proposal from the Bank of Montreal which included $1,837,000 as prepayment on a 50 year lease on 8,500 square feet of commercial space spread over three levels of the Centre.

The bank also demanded a monopoly on the construction of bank branches located within the confines of the St. George campus.

SAC President Tom Faulkner said the Bank of Montreal offer represented almost four times as much as the University of British Columbia was able to raise last year for its student centre.

The council rejected an offer from the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce calling for prepayment of $760,000 plus a loan of $1,000,000 to be repaid over 25 years.

In addition to the capital costs, SAC faces an estimated annual operating deficit of $17,000 on the Centre.

A portion of this amount will be offset by rentals from other commercial facilities (barber shop, drug store, beauty salon) included in the building.

SAC has already agreed in principle that the remaining operating deficit should be covered by an increase in the $8 a student SAC fee.

Raising the capital funds leaves one obstacle preventing the calling of tenders — approval of the plans by the board of governors.

However, Faulkner expects little if any delay from the university administration.

"We're all very happy that the Centre project is rapidly becoming a reality."

SAC commission reports on bookstore

The perennial confrontation between students and the University of Toronto bookstore may be greatly modified this year as a result of a report written by two Students Administrative Council members.

David Nitkin of the services commission, and Larry Moncik, the bookstore representative, spent the summer collecting and organizing detailed information from the eight major Canadian publishers, every Canadian campus, and all the Co-op bookstores across the country.

By comparing the operation of the other bookstores with that of U of T's, in terms of ownership, profit margin and services offered, Nitkin and Moncik hope to answer the question: "In comparison, do we have a good bookstore, or don't we?"

Nitkin said that in some areas the U of T operation "leads the country," but in others it lags far behind.

However, judging by the "very approachable" attitude of the director of the U of T

Press, Marsh Jeanneret, Nitkin feels that any concrete suggestions from the students through SAC will be taken seriously.

The report, to be tabled at the SAC meeting Oct. 4, will present three well-documented alternatives to the representatives — to maintain the status quo, to obtain a government subsidy in the form of a greater portion of the university's grants or to start a co-operative operation.

Nitkin stresses the importance of "student involvement" in the bookstore issue and urges students with ideas concerning reform of the bookstore to contact him through the SAC office.

He hopes that the course SAC chooses will lead to "significant steps" forward which he feels the entire student body wants.

Housing

long term leases and security deposits are.

"The great, great problem is for married students and young faculty couples, especially those with kids," said Mrs. Jaffary.

These couples have a difficult time finding accommodation and when they do it is generally beyond their finances.

The planned married-students' quarters is the first effort made by the university and the government to alleviate the problem.

Mrs. Jaffary and two others work full time at the housing service and in the summers are joined by three student assistants.

They attempt to provide a comprehensive list of all available space near the university.

During the past week new listings amounted to only half the students registering with the housing service.

"You have to be on the spot to get accommodation because people don't want to hold even security deposits on empty rooms," said Mrs. Jaffary.

Seven people have refused not to discriminate on the basis of race or religion so far this month and have been taken off the housing list in accordance with the pledge that they will not refuse admission on the basis of race, creed or colour.

"People just aren't listed if they discriminate," said Mrs. Jaffary.

"I am not able to inspect all the accommodation by any matter. We remove from the list not because of the type of accommodation but because of ethical practices.

"If the accommodation is horrible, tell us."

RPI approves Eyeopener

Ryerson Polytechnical Institute last week voted approval for a second campus newspaper there.

Tom Thorne was appointed editor of the new paper, The Eyeopener. Annual publishing costs were estimated at $4,500, to be paid by the council.

Thorne condemned The Ryersonian for its "censorship" and said, "The Eyeopener will protect itself from censorship by running two opinions on all subjects where it is possible to do so."

CUS redefines educational goals; demands equality of opportunity

LONDON, Ont. (Special) — The main result of the Canadian Union of Students Congress held earlier this month was a redefinition of the goals of education in a democratic society.

Delegates approved a program for universal accessibility to universities. Material, economic and social barriers to equality of education opportunity would be removed by:

- creating educational alternatives at all levels through free universities and free and intensive criticism of education;
- adoption of a system of student stipends;
- programs to reform the quality of education;
- increased financial support for higher education by all governmental levels.

Lobbies will aim at abolition of tuition fees and bursary means tests.

CUS had its own budget problems this year.

Due to an error in the budget, an allotment of $26,000 was spent twice. The profits of $18,000 from CUS' Expo hostels and a budget saving of $11,000 saved the day.

Finance committee chairman Dave Hays, of the University of British Columbia, said a fee levy increase to 75 from 65 cents a student is required for the coming year.

Four members—UBC, Saskatoon, York University, and St. Patrick's College — said they would leave if fees went up.

This threat prompted an amendment to the constitution to give members one year to pay fee increases, provided such members paid fees at the previous year's level.

A resolution was passed binding members to either withdraw before the second day of a national congress or stay until the next congress.

Student governments were encouraged to seek reform of the structures of university government so all the members of the academic community — student, faculty, administration and employees — fully participate in decision making.

The resolution also calls on students to refuse to participate in decision-making bodies "which routinely follow a policy of secret decision making."

Members of the congress also agreed to create programs for high school students.

A resolution suggests such programs take the form of newspaper workshops, inter-council meetings, and seminars.

It urges members to work to establish the unity of high school students in the formation of regional unions "which may choose as a federation to affiliate with the Canadian Union of Students."

The congress moved to withdraw support of a study of student housing undertaken by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

The study was criticized for not including student and faculty representatives. The congress also objected to the terms of reference of the study, which, they said, implies that "students need to be housed as zoo animals need care and feeding."

Delegates decided that CUS will participate in the founding of the Canadian Housing Foundation which will examine public housing in Canada, also conducting their own survey geared at securing recognition of housing priorities by university administrations and lobbying governments to give capital grants for residences.

A resolution supporting an active student role in Indian Affairs was passed.

The resolution seeks solutions to "lack of freedom of the Indian in terms of his legal position and the refusal of the Canadian government to accept the Indian community as a full part of society."

To implement the program CUS will work primarily with young Indians.

The issue of membership in the International Student Conference and the International Union of Students was discussed, but the motion for isolation was finally defeated.

The ISC has been steadily losing members and prestige since it was revealed as a CIA fund repository earlier this year.

CUS has associate status in the ISC, which it now will retain pending an investigation of the ISC's attempts to free itself from the CIA.

Those who supported the isolationist motion contended that the international unions were cold war tools detrimental to the development of a co-operative student community.

The congress called for cessation of American bombing in Vietnam and the surrounding countries and total withdrawal from the area.

It urged the Canadian government to openly advocate American disengagement, and to drop its policy of "quiet diplomacy."

CUS also voted to aid draft objector organizations in the U.S. by providing them with communication and technical support.

The motion also calls for support for blood drives and fund drives for victims of the Vietnam war on both sides.

The program is to be accompanied with participation in the "International Week of Support for Vietnam" organized on a global basis by the IUS.

Quebec announces student aid changes

QUEBEC (VNS) — Several changes in the Quebec government's program of student aid were announced Sept. 2.

Jerome Proulx, chairman of the parliamentary committee on education announced that the government would recognize the needs of married students.

Tax exemptions of 20 per cent will be granted to students at the college level and exemptions of 50 per cent to students at university level.

Mr. Proulx said that working mothers would receive a $1,500 exemption and that tuition fees will be reduced for students at teacher's college whose academic grades warrant it.

UGEQ elects English-speaking member

QUEBEC (VNS) — Victor Rabinovitch of McGill University has been elected international vice-president of the Union Generale des Etudiants du Quebec.

He is the first English speaking student to sit on the executive of the Quebec student union, whose official language is French.

Rabinovitch, 21, was a leader of the join-UGEQ movement at McGill campus last year. He was also a founder of the Students for a Democratic University, which advocates university reform.

Estonians finance Tartu college

The combined forces of the Students Administrative Council, Toronto's Estonian community and the Campus Co-op are working to construct a unique 16-story residence at the corner of Madison and Bloor St.

The top 15 floors of the proposed residence, Tartu College, will be divided into apartments containing single rooms with a common kitchen, a washroom, storage space and a large living room.

The ground floor will have an area set aside for a restaurant in compliance with city zoning laws. The basement will be divided into various large common eating areas.

The apartments will be fully furnished including kitchen equipment.

Although still in the planning stages the residence is sure of a $200,000 grant from the Estonian community.

The rest is to come from Central Mortgage and Housing Corp.

Originally called International House, the building has been re-named Tartu College after a famous university town in Estonia. The name has special significance to Estonians since the Treaty of Tartu in 1920 recognized Estonia's national independence from Russia.

Advisors from Campus Co-op say that foreign students would be attracted to the single-room-plus-kitchen arrangement and that the price would be within the range foreign students could afford.

SAC has found, however, that foreign students like to live as cheaply as possible during the school year so they can travel in the summer.

Most applicants to the housing service want rooms at $11 to $12 a week.

First plans for Tartu College called for a rate of $65 a month but changes in floor plans to make better use of floor space will allow more people on each floor and will lower the rent.

The prices for these apartments are also expected to be more stable than those for residences and increase at a slower rate since the only variable will be increasing land taxes.

"Tartu College is not designed to provide really low-cost housing," said SAC Vice-President John Treleaven in his summer report to council.

"But it will be slightly below university residence costs and offer a type of accommodation to the student which is unique.

"SAC will probably become rental agents for the building and develop the necessary governing structure, gradually relinquishing its control to the members of the house."

Although they are contributing approximately 10 per cent, the Estonians are not interested in exercising control over the structure.

Their only request has been that their campus club be given priority on reserving one of the basement common areas.

"The date when construction will begin is still indefinite but the building is expected to be finished two years from now," said SAC President Tom Faulkner.

New commission appointed by Davis

Education Minister William Davis has appointed a government commission to define the role of all post-secondary institutions in the province.

One student representative will work on the commission. He will be one of 12 part-time members assisting the three permanent members of the commission.

Mr. Davis intends the commission to "clarify ... once and for all that no able student in this province will ever be denied the opportunity to proceed to higher education if he has the desire and the ability to do so."

The commission is to report back to the government within 18 months.

Engineers feeling job squeeze

Engineers, scientists and executives this year are having a tougher time finding jobs than they did last year.

The Technical Service Council, a non-profit placement service, says many firms have been laying off architects, civil engineers and draftsmen. Small numbers have been laid off in the food, appliance, automotive and electronics industries.

Reduced capital expenditures on factories, tight money, uncertainty about business prospects and increasing professional salaries have prompted the layoffs, the report says.

CUS passes student declaration

LONDON, Ont. (Special)—The recent congress of the Canadian Union of Students declared top priority for implementation of its "declaration of the Canadian student."

The declaration, passed Sept. 6, calls education a "contributive social process aimed at expanding man's social and natural environment."

Students have the right to establish free student associations, the declaration says. The student can make his own basic decisions about his intellectual activity and the goals of institutions he attends.

The student "has the right to be free," the declaration says, "to continue his education without any material, economic, social or psychological barriers created by the absence of real equality of essential condition."

Faulkner charges ridings closed

Bad timing of the issuing of writs for the Oct. 17 provincial election may prevent students from voting in ridings on campus, students council president Tom Faulkner charged yesterday.

Places on campus where students are now living were enumerated before the students returned for classes.

The result—students must fill out applications to vote in their on-campus ridings and then present the applications in person to a revising officer.

As many as 2,000 students could be affected by this procedure, a campaign manager for a St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding candidate said.

St. Andrew-St. Patrick, extending south of Dupont St. and west of University Ave., is the riding in which most student voters find themselves.

Revising officers will be available Oct 2, 3 and 4 at restricted times, Faulkner said.

Faulkner said that nowhere in the election rules does it say voters wishing to change ridings must appear before a revising officer.

He hopes SAC will be able to provide lawyers to notarize statements for students filling out the change-of-riding applications so they don't have to appear before the revising officers.

Otherwise, line-ups and inconvenience could be problems for voting students, Faulkner said.

The change-of-riding applications are available at the SAC office.

SAC urges: Make education an issue

The Students Administrative Council will encourage students to make education an issue in the Oct. 17 provincial election.

SAC president Tom Faulkner said last night that he wants students to go to political meetings and "fire questions on education" at the candidates.

"Too often candidates call for lower taxes and pledge more services and leave it that."

Faulkner is urging students to attend a meeting at 4 p.m. Thursday in the East Hall of University College to discuss student participation in the election in the following areas:

—Programs to get candidates and party leaders to speak on campus, possibly with all parties represented at the same time;

—Workshops to discuss the policies of candidates, particularly education;

—The organization of a clipping service to provide students with information on issues before they attend political meetings;

—The organization and transportation of teams of students to attend political meetings throughout Metropolitan Toronto.

Faulkner said SAC will not endorse a slate of candidates.

But, he said, "SAC not only wants students to vote, we want them to vote progressively."

The Ontario Union of Students has made plans to publish a booklet about the candidates and the issues so that students will be able to vote intelligently, Faulkner said.

Macpherson committee mum on report

A veil of secrecy has descended upon the forthcoming report of the Macpherson committee on the faculty of arts and science. "Our recommendations shall not be for public consumption until the report has been approved by the president," committee member Professor Ramsay Cook said last night.

Other committee members insisted they didn't know when the report would be published, and all refused to divulge its contents.

The Macpherson committee, under the chairmanship of C. B. Macpherson, a political economy professor, was formed last year to investigate teaching procedures and course content in the faculty of arts and science.

Profr. Macpherson is currently on sabbatical leave in England.

SAC President Tom Faulkner said he intends to write today to acting University President J. H. Sword for information as to the release date and distribution arrangements for the report.

Faulkner said he expects the report, currently in the hands of the University of Toronto Press, to be available within two weeks.

"I have heard that it will be sold by the bookstore at a nominal price to cover printing costs," he said.

The report must be approved in principle by President Claude Bissell and undergo a thorough review from the more than 30 departments which comprise the faculty.

Stats show intramural sports activity down

The academic year 1966-67, the first for non-compulsory freshman physical education, proved to be a mixed success for the Department of Intramural Athletics.

Officials of the Department were pleased with the use by freshmen of Hart House facilities. They did not note any significant decrease in participation in the Varsity Sports and Fitness Program.

In the larger field of intramural athletics however, there was a marked decline in participation. Statistics indicate that while total male registration rose by 800, there was a decline of 10 per cent in overall participation. This figure includes a drop of four per cent in freshman intramural activity.

With the ingrained mathematical ability so common in Varsity Sportsies, we were able to reduce the raw figures and calculate (using logs) the awards for best and worst performance by a college or faculty, living or dead. Ignoring P.H.E. (or obvious reasons) our prize for greatest participation goes to the hardy woodsmen of Forestry who, out of a registration of 83 males, participated a total of 144 times (try that one, you math geni).

Our Fitness Award this year goes once again to the athletes of University College, who had less than 25 per cent of their population involved in intramural sports.

For the benefit of any freshmen who may not yet be aware of the facilities at Hart House, the Varsity Sports and Fitness Program, including such activities as weight lifting, fencing and boxing, begins the week of October 16.

To join a team in Intramural Sports, freshmen should report to their own college or faculty athletic association. All general inquiries should be made at the Intramural Office, room 106, in Hart House.

Help wanted now for undermanned sportsies

Men. Are you interested in women, and sports? Is your idol the Fugs or Johnny Bower? Or are you just looking for an excuse to skip classes?

If you have any or all of these qualifications then you are a prime candidate for enshrinement as a Varsity sportsie.

Women. Are you dying to meet those handsome football players? Do you want to see your name in print? Or are you just interested in impressing your boyfriend?

Then you too are destined to become a Varsity sportsie.

If you have any of the above qualifications, i.e., you are male, female, illiterate, and can drink and you have some interest in sports, the Varsity sports section needs you. (Young ladies, you are always welcome in the Varsity sports office).

Therefore, there will be an operational meeting at 1:15 p.m. to-day on the second floor of 91 St. George, the Media building just around the corner from Hoskin Ave. Freshies, please note: don't be alarmed by the ugly, uncouth demeanor of the clods in the news office. Ignore them and walk straight into the gleaming new sports office facing St. George.

Hockey and football ducats on sale Friday

Student coupon books for home football and hockey games will go on sale beginning Friday, September 22, in the lobby of the Main Library. These books will also be sold on Wednesday, September 27, and Friday, October 6.

Football books will sell for $2.50 each while the hockey ducats are $1.50 a book. The cost of each book represents an increase of fifty cents to handle rising expenses.

Each A.T.L. card-toting student will be entitled to purchase one book for each sport as well as a guest book for a friend.

The books will admit holders to four football games, including one exhibition match and eight league hockey games.

The tickets in these books admit students to special student sections at the Stadium and the Arena.

Prices for playoff games, if any, are established by Intercollegiate agreement. Tickets for any playoff games are not included in the coupon books.

Future looks bright as injuries few for Blues

The Gods have smiled so far on this year's Varsity Blues football team. Although the rookies and quarterback candidates have been working out since September 1, and the vets have been slogging twice daily since the 7th, the infirmary has seen very little action.

Apart from injuries to a few rookies, the only ailment of note is a twisted ankle suffered by quarterback Pete Raham. Though not serious, it has kept him on the sidelines for the past few days, forcing him to miss Saturday's scrimmage session.

Quarterback, of course, is the big question mark for Blues this season as Coach Ron Murphy must fill the huge gap left by the departure of All-star, Bryce Taylor. Currently battling for the spot are holdovers Raham, Vic Alboini, and newcomer Bob Amer. Amer was the first draft choice of Montreal Alouettes after a brilliant tenure at Carleton University.

Also missing from last year's Yates Cup finalists are guards Ranny Parker, Jim McMahon, Don Holmes, Larry Gibson, Bill Laverty, and Bob Pampe. All the tackles are back except for Gary Clipperton, and centre Laird Elliott is no longer with the team.

The defensive backfield, led by veteran Riivo Ilves, is intact with the exception of Ian Kirkpatrick, while Halfback Andy Szandier and end Wayne Parsons are further absentees.

So, overall, Blues have not lost too heavily. The rookie camp produced some good prospects such as Victoria Park's Wolfgang Kut, and linebacker Bill Bennett from Guelph. Field goal specialist Bill Stankovic has moved over from McMaster to handle kicking chores left vacant by Taylor.

MONTEITH'S GONE

Henry to Wings, Steve to Nats

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity's illustrious Monteith brothers, Henry and Steve, have apparently played their last hockey game wearing Blues' uniforms. Joint winners of the T. R. Loudon Award in 1966-67, both were enticed to far off fields during the summer, Henry to the Detroit Red Wings of the National Hockey League and elder brother Steve to the Canadian Nationals in Winnipeg.

The loss of the two speedsters will certainly leave a gap in Blues potent scoring attack. Henry scored 80 goals and had 90 assists in his four year career with the Blue and White while Steve totalled 91 goals and 127 assists in his six years at Toronto.

Neither Steve or Henry were strangers to Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League all-star teams during the past few years.

Steve was picked to the 'dream team' five times in six years, missing only in 1965-66 when he was sidelined for the first part of the season with mononucleosis. Henry was an all-star in each of his four seasons at U. of T.

Records held by the Stratford pair include most goals in one season—27, and most points in a year—60 by Steve while the seasonal assist record of 34 was set by Henry.

Steve's move to Winnipeg came as no surprise as Nationals have long been interested in the rightwinger's puck talents. His quick-breaking style could well compliment top centre Gary Dineen's playmaking ability. Detroit's inking of Henry last month ended any speculation that he would also move out west. Wings' scarcity of leftwingers prompted coach Sid Abel to cough up $30,000 plus for Henry's services during the next two seasons.

AROUND THE NET—Other Blues in the news include defenceman Peter Speyer who is presently working out at the camp of the Montreal Canadians ... Goaltender John Whigley recently left Los Angeles Kings' training camp in Guelph ... Blues open their schedule with an exhibition game against Laurentian University Voyageurs in Sudbury ... Blues whipped Voyageurs 16-2 in the Canadian finals in Alberta last March.

For frosh only

— ROD MICKLEBURGH

*Gather round freshmen wherever you roam,
And admit that the numbers around you have flown.
You're reduced to a digit, a card and a phone.
For the bureaucracy's a-stifling.*

DEAR FRESHMEN

A scant three months ago you waltzed proudly through shiny high school corridors, head high (note clever use of hippy dialogue enshrouded in lousy alliteration), surrounded by grovelling gradesters and swooning sweethearts. Teachers' hailed you by a first name, the boss-man was always quick with a cordial nod, the whole school catered to you and your fellow Grade 13 students. You were it, man.

Now, as a freshman, all that familiarity and prestige, carefully accumulated in five years of high school attendance, counts for a big zero. Suddenly you're the lowest of the low, browbeaten by smug sophomores, herded around on innumerable tours, cajoled and taunted, beanied and bagled, etc. For a while, it's sort of a drag.

And, of course, as the ultimate sign of your newly-acquired insignificance, no longer are you Boris Bollard or Okrete Thornloe; you become (courtesy of IBM) 67B565348.

All this makes it a bit difficult to retain even a tattered shred of individuality. You have to fight hard, and the road to nirvana (chuckle chuckle) is littered with the mangled corpses of those who fell victim to the terrifying beasts, Apathy and Resignation.

LIBERAL CLUB?

In the past students have struggled to avoid their void (clever, huh?) by joining various campus clubs, only to find them a mere temporary and effete respite from Apathy's gruesome jaws.

(Even the prestigious Hart House Clubs are not immune from bumble-ness. I once overheard the following conversation while browsing around upstairs: Bridge Club member (impatiently): "Deal the cards, deal the cards!"

Chess Club member (aghast): "We're playing chess, you fool!"

Bridge Club member (shaken): "Hm, I thought the cards looked kind of funny!"

FEAR NOT

But fear not, loyal freshman reader. There is a weapon against which dreaded Apathy becomes a cowering, whimpering mass. That powerful weapon is (surprise, surprise) Athletics.

Active participation in athletics while at university should be striven for by every freshman (and freshette). Whether the sport is squash or squamish, while competing you are bursting out of your academic slot and asserting individuality.

On the field, in the gym, in the pool, you are not graded with a cold, unfeeling letter based on a professor's whim, you are not known as 67B565348, there is no danger of failing because of bureaucratic stodginess.

The word failure is unknown in sport. As you play and are active you are winning. Not winning in the sense of bettering someone else, but in bettering yourself.

As Magnus the Great once said (or should have said if he didn't), "Mens sana in corpore sano", which, brilliantly translated, gives us that old but just as important cliché, "A sound mind in a sound body".

Even if your co-ordination is such that excludes excellence in team sports or the well-known individual sports, there is nothing to stop you (yes you, bespectacled first class student who has always scorned athletics) from jogging a weekly number of laps on the Hart House indoor track or swimming regularly in the pool. There is also weight-training to keep the old biceps bulging.

For the Joe-hero types there's the intramural program which boasted nearly 4,000 participants last year. There were even a few from UC.

So, frosh, get the lead out and participate. Do you want to be 67B565348 for four years?

HOUSING DISCRIMINATION CHARGED AT UNIVERSITY OF MANITOBA

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Chris Westdal, president of the University of Manitoba student union, charged yesterday that the university is "participating in discrimination against non-white students."

University authorities denied the charge, made by Westdal in an open letter to University President Hugh H. Saunderson.

Westdal said: "It has come to the attention of the University of Manitoba Student Union that the university maintains discriminatory off-campus residence lists.

"In other words, the university lists accommodation that is available to all students, regardless of their race or colour, and maintains a second list of accommodation for white students only."

Westdal said the university "must not be a party to discriminatory practices.

"It saddens me to think that an institution such as the university which, by definition, cannot subscribe to any practice of racial discrimination has stooped to accommodate the racial prejudice of others in our community."

The letter was released to all local newspapers and television and radio stations.

In a written reply, Dr. Saunderson said the two lists maintained by the university differentiated between people who preferred to take in overseas students and people who had not expressed such a preference.

Dr. Saunderson said the university does not practice any discrimination in any housing — see MANITOBA page 3

Voting students inconvenienced

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Students council efforts to expedite student voting registration for the Oct. 17 election have apparently been sunk by the provincial election board.

Judge Ian MacDonnell, chairman of the board, has ruled that students wishing to change their riding for the election must have their applications approved in the presence of a revising officer.

About 2,000 students living on campus were not enumerated Sept. 5 when the writs were issued. To vote in the campus ridings they must fill out the change-of-riding applications available at the SAC office.

SAC President Tom Faulkner said last night "we think a notarized statement is sufficient."

The Election Act does not require that persons changing their riding appear in person, but Judge MacDonnell has insisted on this condition, Faulkner said.

SAC is planning to send a lawyer to the residences of students living on campus to notarize their applications.

This would eliminate the necessity of appearing in person before a revising officer on Oct. 3 or 4.

Faulkner has commended the efforts of Len Shifrin, Liberal candidate for St. Andrew-St. Patrick, the riding in which most campus student voters are located.

Through Liberal leader Robert Nixon, Mr. Shifrin last year introduced an amendment to the election act to help student voters but the Conservatives defeated it.

When SAC, the Ontario Region of the Canadian Union of Students, and the three major campus political clubs endorsed Mr. Shifrin's proposal and OXCUS lobbied at Queen's Park, the government effected a change this June.

Tomorrow SAC plans to organize student interest in the election at 4 p.m. in the East Hall of University College.

Committees will be formed to bring candidates on campus and efforts will be made to send students to all riding meetings to question the candidates, Faulkner said.

"We're going to put all the politicians on the spot, especially over education policy."

U of T Meds' centre granted $19 million

The University of Toronto has received a grant of $18,883,178 from the federal government for its new medical sciences centre.

Most of the grant comes from the federal government's health resources fund. The rest will come from the province and other private sources.

The new medical building, already under construction, will be the largest medical sciences building at any Canadian university. When completed in 1970 it will house about 2,000 undergraduates, including 500 medical students, 400 dentistry students, 250 pharmacy students and 130 nursing.

In making the announcement Monday, Health Minister Allan MacEachen said annual medical enrollment would be increased to 250 from 175.

He said that, while it was unlikely Canada would ever reach the stage where it was producing enough trained personnel, the increased domestic output and the immigration of doctors to Canada "will go a long way in meeting the personnel problem."

Sober frosh slither into Sword's scintillating sheath

By INGRID VABALIS

Through the looking glass the freshmen came — into the world of the big university and their first welcome from Acting President John H. Sword.

The organist played impressive peals of sound. Stately Convocation Hall was packed with sober, freshly-scrubbed faces looking like they belonged in church or Sunday school.

These 2,200 faces belonged for the most part to freshmen — the new, invigorating life-blood of our university. They were waiting expectantly to catch their first glimpse and hear the words of Mr. Sword.

The audience was conspicuously lacking in the long-haired, bearded and barefoot of the university community.

The pomp and pageantry of this occasion was not for the cynic or unbeliever.

As the show opened an excited capped-and-gowned girl rushed to front and centre, making upward motions with her arms. Mass rising.

After the usual shuffling a hushed silence pervaded the alcoves. They waited with bated breath for the next happening.

The music rose to a thundering crescendo as three stately grey gentlemen complete with caps and gowns marched in. The leader carried a massive golden mace.

After the gold mace was settled in its place of honor, the VIP's sat down. Then everybody sat down.

But somebody obviously got their cue cards mixed because then everybody stood up as the strains of God Save the Queen hung in the air. A few brave voices sang while the rest looked on with scorn.

And the pageantry went on. O. M. Solandt, chancellor of the university came to the fore. He appeared to be a friendly bear-like individual with grizzly grey hair.

With a growl he cleared his throat and introduced himself, clearing the bewildered looks on the scrubbed faces.

He told them their job here was to get a degree and then introduced the star of the show — Mr. Sword.

The applause was not deafening. Somehow the freshies caught the atmosphere of cynicism that pervaded the ivy walls. They looked to their neighbours who looked to the grey suits in the front row.

Mr. Sword was not disillusioned. But he did seem oh-so-slightly ill at ease before the community of scholars.

At a brisk pace he read his speech. The time has come, he said, to speak of many things — of students and self-consciousness and sealing wax, of administration and rules and why students riot and whether pigs have wings.

Applause, applause. And then the sonorous organ did its thing and played O Canada.

No prompting now to stand. They all did and sang. The atmosphere of cynicism and shuffling abated for just a moment.

Maybe this was what it was all about. True patriot love in all thy sons command.

Faulkner expects reaction to meters

Parking at the University of Toronto has become even more of a headache with the installation of parking meters on St. George St. and Devonshire Place.

Parking will be limited to one hour on St. George and to two hours on Devonshire Place.

In reply to a protest letter from students council President Tom Faulkner, R. M. Bremner, Toronto's commissioner of public works, explained the reasons for the installation of the meters.

Meters are recommended where traffic surveys reveal that:

—Curb parking is permitted and does not interfere with the efficient movement of traffic;

—the demand for curb parking exceeds the number of available parking spaces;

—most spaces are occupied by vehicles that remain longer than permitted;

—a need exists for short-term parking;

—many vehicles are parked illegally on the street at locations where parking is prohibited.

"Since surveys showed that the criteria were met for St. George St. and Devonshire Place, the meters were installed," Mr. Bremner said yesterday.

Faulkner disagreed. "The need for short-term parking is not as great as that for long-term parking," he said yesterday.

"Not enough consideration has been given to professors and students with two-hour seminars and three-hour labs.

"There is a city by-law that restricts parking to less than four hours on city streets and it is very hard to get all-day parking."

Mr. Bremner placed the onus on the university to "vigorously pursue its planned program of providing off-street parking facilities."

Faulkner says: "The University could do something about it and there are plans for several underground garages.

"But they all depend on the construction of the Spadina Expressway."

Faulkner recalled an incident at Queen's University where the installation of parking meters resulted in a night raid by a group who cut off the heads of all the meters and threw them into Lake Ontario.

"I expect a very strong student reaction but I would like to head it off before any such violent action is taken," he said.

Mr. Bremner said he did not consider that any other parking meters resulted in a would be necessary in the University area "at the present time or in the foreseeable future."

The letter from Mr. Bremner has been handed on to the SAC service commission which will try to remedy the situation.

Aerospace Institute will study flying saucers

The University of Toronto institute for aerospace studies will take part in a U.S.-Canadian investigation of unidentified flying objects, it was announced yesterday.

Dr. Gordon Patterson, institute director, said the study would complement a U.S. Air Force investigation directed by Dr. Edward U. Condon of the University of Colorado.

The USAF study is intended to counter accusations that the U.S. government is suppressing information about UFO's. It will cost $313,000.

"The USAF has in the past adopted the attitude that unexplained sightings were all products of hoaxes, hallucinations or misinterpretations of data," Mr. Patterson said.

"I do not feel that all such sightings can be explained away in this fashion."

However, he said, too often sighting data is suppressed from fear of ridicule, or is incomplete.

Mr. Patterson said the institute would attempt to develop manoeuvres to be performed by persons sighting UFO's that would provide scientifically-useful information.

The institute will hold a seminar today to determine the scale of the study.

ing which it provides. However, since campus residences can accommodate only 1,300 students, it is necessary to rely on downtown accommodation for several thousand more students who come here from outside the Winnipeg area.

"We have a great deal of difficulty in finding enough homes to accommodate this number of students.

"We rarely get enough places to meet the entire need. If we would refuse to list those people who express a preference for women or men, for older students or for freshmen, or for overseas students or Manitobans, we would have to shorten our already too short lists.

"If a homeowner tells us that he or she is prepared to take any student and then refuses any category, we strike that name from the list."

..... in which our hero looks for a room

Student housing, that perennial problem, is upon us worse than ever this year. But those of you still looking for suitable accommodation, have heart. Relief is in sight—next year maybe.

You may now bed down at night in a dingy and depressing room whose only aid to your studies is that it makes you feel like getting out every morning. No lounging around in bed for you.

You may be at the mercy of a greedy landlord who doesn't care about education, your welfare or any of that. For him the situation is clear: there are too few places to rent and too many people wanting them. That means he can charge high for minimal accommodation.

Don't despair, though. The university has been thinking about people like you and has even done studies on the feasibility of helping you out.

Already results have been produced by this dynamic planning policy. A women's residence for New College is under construction and may open next year. A high-rise apartment building for married graduate students is under construction at St. Charles and Yonge Streets.

The university has also bought a small apartment building at St. George and Bloor. This is to be turned into a graduate student residence.

But to us it is clear that the university has been dreadfully wrong in its planning policy regarding student housing. Not only have the planners not created nearly enough new residence space, but they have even removed some of the housing space that used to be available for students.

Many houses on the fringes of the campus have been expropriated. Some have been turned into offices for U of T staff; others have been torn down to provide parking space for the U of T staff.

The end result has been that a good deal of housing has been taken off the market.

To be fair though, university planners are up against a tough problem. The university is expanding too fast to keep up with the housing demand.

The need for graduates is great and the university has to supply them. In this, U of T is being hurried along by the Ontario government, which has to answer when the graduates don't appear.

Therefore the needs of the individual students are the last ones to be met. Society at large is more important.

Students don't have much pull anyway. They cannot exert much pressure on the government; that's reserved for business and organized pressure groups.

The demands of society are so powerful that U of T has to grow and what does it matter how it grows?

The housing problem is also made acute by the general housing crisis evident all through Toronto. High-rise apartment building has taken much cheap housing off the market and replaced it with sterile, conforming apartment living that is out of reach of most students — out of reach of much of Toronto's non-student population, in fact.

With this general situation, who is going to bother about a few thousand students? These students are in a privileged class anyway. The hardships they endure now are merely an investment in the better and higher-paid life they will achieve later.

This suffering-as-a-student view of our life has never appealed to us very much. The age is past when anyone should be expected to endure unnecessary hardship for the better life said to be coming.

When donors give money to the university, they like to give for impressive projects: laboratories, classrooms and the like. The need for residences is not seen, and we doubt if the university makes an effort to talk about it.

Thus we get such ludicrous situations as R. S. McLaughlin's $1,000,000 gift to build a planetarium, which as far as we can see is little more than a monument to his own ego. And the university accepts it.

It is apparent that students themselves have done much more to help alleviate the housing situation than the university has. Rochdale College, a 19-storey building under construction on Bloor St., is entirely student planned and executed. The Students Administrative Council has jumped in with plans for a 16-storey co-ed residence across the street from Rochdale.

The campus Co-operative Residences Incorporated, another all-student body, has been providing some cheap housing. The waiting list, however, has several hundred persons whose needs can't be met.

Some members of the U of T administration want the university to enter into some sort of co-operative housing arrangement.

a disappointing, disturbing debut

Based on Monday's evidence, the performance of acting president John H. Sword is both disappointing and disturbing.

The traditional opening address, which Mr. Sword delivered in Convocation Hall, was merely a collection of public relations platitudes.

The assembled freshmen wanted to hear about the challenges facing them in the new and strange university environment. They wanted to hear about the academic and personal problems they will have to solve during the next three or four years. They wanted to hear something constructive and meaningful.

And what did they get?

Well, they got some nice things about Expo, a list of the latest additions to William Davis' seemingly endless array of committees, a resume of the university's building program, a promise to improve the parking facilities on campus (no doubt this means more one-armed bandits on St. George), and the stunning disclosure that Sidney Smith Hall is overcrowded.

However, in fairness to Mr. Sword, we must recognize that he was subjected to a certain degree of pressure as Monday's effort was his first major speech as acting president. And he is a shy, reticent man anyway.

Unfortunately, the same fairness compels us to realize that the few matters of substance sprinkled through the speech possess implications that are profoundly disturbing.

Simcoe Hall action on the Macpherson Committee Report will be postponed for a long, long time, perhaps forever.

Student activists, Sword implies, are in for a rude reception unless they conform their demands to the ancient historical traditions valued so highly by the university administration.

Students and faculty are making serious demands for a voice in university government.

The administration, says Sword, "has moved with despatch and dignity". What he meant to say was the administration will effect needed reforms only after some face-saving method can be discovered. Until then, forget it.

And let us not forget the resounding conclusion, a masterpiece of bureaucratic circumlocution.

"Let our interacting assertiveness be lucid and meaningful communication." In other words, let the charade of intersecting monologues continue, and students, fear not, we know what's best for you.

A sterile speech, revealing a bureaucracy ignorant of the student mood and determined to resist all change from without.

The weaknesses in Mr. Sword's speech become even more apparent when compared to the opening address, also delivered Monday, by Escott Reid, Principal of Glendon College at York University.

While stressing that he "will not abdicate

But they rest their inaction on the statement that the U of T is not structured for that sort of thing.

The University office should immediately look into all possible ways to better the situation; try to convince government and private donors to provide money for residences. A co-operative housing scheme run by the university shouldn't be prevented by red tape and the administration's natural conservatism.

More money should be allocated for the housing service to better advertise their facilities and thereby get more landlords to list their accommodations.

The SAC should set up a Student Housing Association to help students find accommodation and to back them up in disputes with landlords.

either the responsibility or the authority" of his office, Principal Reid firmly recognized the validity of student claims to a voice in the operation of university government.

"I will not agree," Reid stated, "to any increases in fees or charges or any reduction of customary services unless the proposed change has been adequately discussed with the student body through the representatives appointed by the student body for this purpose."

Principal Reid insisted, quite properly, that the right of students to be consulted does not bestow on them a veto over unpopular administrative decisions.

This, however, is not the point at issue. The York administration has officially recognized the two basic claims of student activism — the right of students to a role in university government and their ability to make valuable contributions to the formation of university policy.

Judging from Mr. Sword's collection of ambiguous platitudes, it appears the Toronto administration still clings to the utopian belief that student activism will somehow run its course and die a quiet, uneventful death.

It won't.

Does an Opening Address have to be dull?

Freshmen need an inspiring and relevant welcome to this university. When he spoke Monday, Acting President J. H. Sword was only dull.

To fill this pressing need, The Varsity here reprints excerpts from ESCOTT REID'S welcome to his Glendon College students at York University. Reid more accurately reflects the mood of the modern university campus.

Glendon College is a college oriented towards public affairs, towards public service. If it does not have among its students more than the normal number of social activists, it is failing in its task.

You have become members of a college where students, faculty and administration are experimenting. We are experimenting with new ideas about curriculum. We are experimenting with new ideas about the relations between students, faculty and administration in the management of college affairs.

We are going to try to find answers to the problems we are confronted with. We know it is going to be extremely difficult — probably impossible — to find for all our problems, answers on which we all agree. But we have already found some answers to some problems and that gives up hope

STUDENTS HEARD WEEKLY

We know, for example, that a library committee, which includes student representatives as full members is a much better library committee than one composed only of representatives of the faculty and administration. We have found that the same is true of a committee on medical and psychological services and a committee on the books.

We know that there is a good deal of value in having the president of the Residence Council and the editor of the student newspaper meet informally for half an hour in my office every week with the Dean of the College, the Dean of Residence, the Senior Administrator and myself to exchange information and ideas.

We know that the whole college will benefit from the response you Student Council has made to my request that the Council make recommendations to me on every aspect of the College calendar from typography to curriculum.

BOUND TO BE TENSION

There is, I am sure, none of us who is so naive as to believe that the existence of this kind of organized collaboration between students, faculty and administration, will eliminate all tension at Glendon College. If there were no tension there would be something wrong with the College.

There is bound to be tension. But there will not, as long as I am Principal, be an explosion because the students have not been adequately consulted on matters which, in my opinion, are of direct concern to them.

Thus I have made clear to all concerned — administration, faculty and students — that I will not agree, on behalf of Glendon College, to any increases in fees or charges or any reduction of customary services unless the proposed change has been adequately discussed with the student body through the representatives appointed by the student body for this purpose.

Similarly, I will not agree to any change in residence regulations without adequate consultation with the students through the committees set up for this purpose. The right of the student body to be consulted does not, of course, mean a right to veto.

REVOLT OF THE YOUNG

I recognize that the causes of the revolt of the young against all forms of organized society are deeper than they have ever been before. I know that this means that those in positions of authority in universities face greater difficulty now in exercising their authority than ever before. The moral bases of their authority have been eroded.

But I have accepted a post of authority in this college and this university. I am prepared to share my responsibility with the student body of the college. I will not abdicate either the responsibility or the authority. I hope that through our consultative committees and in other ways we can reach agreement on our problems — particularly problems of rules and regulations governing student behaviour and the enforcement of those rules and regulations.

I have said that Glendon College has a place for student activists, for student reformers, even for student anarchists. It has a place for other kinds of non-conformists.

Glendon College has a place for the student of marked intelligence who decides that he will be satisfied just to get a safe pass in his official studies and who devotes his surplus energies to such activities as music, art, reading novels, taking part in plays, writing novels or plays or poetry, taking part in politics.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. The last thing I want is for you to decide that you are of marked intelligence and that you are going to spend only as much time on your academic work as is required to scrape through your examinations and that you will revel in cultural, creative and political activities of your own choice.

COMMUNITY OF SCHOLARS

Since Glendon College is a community of scholars and students, the central opportunity for significant activity which it must provide its students with is the opportunity for distinguished academic performance. And by distinction in academic performance I do not mean merely an ability to crain for written final examinations.

It is important to realize that there are degrees of value in the extra-curricular activities of students. The student body cannot escape being concerned with the financing of the college dance and with the quality of the food in the dining hall but this kind of concern with the housekeeping problems of college life should be of a different order from the kind of passionate concern which is appropriate to such matters as the tragedy of Vietnam, the position of Quebec in Canada, the growing gap between China and the rest of the world, the absence of real equality of educational opportunity in Canada, the abolition of racial discrimination.

B & W presents year of festivals

For the University of Toronto's Blue and White Society, this is the year of the festival.

The Society is planning a medical festival, a communications festival and a blues festival.

The medical festival, planned in conjunction with the Medical Students' Society, will feature lectures on LSD and birth control, scientific experiments for guests and exhibits from Expo and medical companies.

The communications festival will feature author Eric McLuhan, author and son of Marshall McLuhan, communications expert.

The blues festival show will feature soul music star

Otis Redding and six groups, and will include workshops where students can learn guitar-playing or songwriting.

The emphasis this year will be on self-entertainment.

"Last year we decided dances and shows are fine but kids nowadays like to entertain themselves rather than be entertained," Marty Low, the society's president, said yesterday.

There will be more street dances because "they create the right casual atmosphere," he said.

Also planned are a film series, ski trip, Hart House dances, dances after football games and post-hockey skating parties.

Bank loans guaranteed by the federal government under the Canada Student Loans Plan totalled $41,165,078 for 1966-67, the finance department announced Monday.

University students in the Atlantic and western provinces have more than doubled their borrowing since the plan began three years ago. They accounted for almost two-thirds of the money distributed last year. Ontario students received 35 per cent of the total last year compared to 53 per cent in the first year of the plan's operation.

In three years the plan has distributed $103,860,167. This does not include the separate Quebec scheme which the government supports through direct cash payments to the province.

Meds complex vexed by wage strike

The deadline for completion of the University of Toronto's $36,000,000 medical sciences complex may be extended at least six months by the ironworker's strike, now in its fourth month.

The ironworkers walked out May 19 in a wage dispute.

Project manager Harvey Stone said yesterday that the strike has halted construction on the $1,500,000 steel framework with only 1.5 of the five block complex completed. The summer months, when steel work proceeds most quickly were lost and it will take from six to eight months to catch up.

However Mr. Stone said some teaching facilities should be ready for next September, the original date of completion for the project.

Jack Tressadore, an executive of the striking union, said that although negotiations have continued throughout the strike, very little progress has been made towards settlement.

Sword warns students to avoid impulsive, superficial demands

By ELEANOR COULTER

John H. Sword made his first speech as acting president of the University of Toronto Monday warning against the impulsive demands of student "pressure groups".

Mr. Sword gave the annual opening address at Convocation Hall Monday in place of President Claude Bissell who is on a year's leave of absence at Harvard University.

"Some of you will undoubtedly identify yourselves with the dissidents who see shortcomings in the working of the institution and want a part in righting these wrongs," he said to an audience made up largely of freshmen.

PRESSURE GROUPS

"The university has not been and is not interested in responding to clamors for change that reflect the superficial, the opportunistic or the imitative inclinations of pressure groups."

However, he said the university has moved and will continue to move "with despatch and dignity."

Mr. Sword noted an air of "self-consciousness and assertiveness" in Ontario universities. U of T is already an independent and progressive university, as is shown by the many new buildings on the campus.

The independence of U of T, he said, has never been hampered by its federal or provincial affiliations.

"There are a few examples of systems of federation and affiliation being made to work by good will or necessity," he said.

INDEPENDENCE

To strengthen the institution's independence, federal funds are funnelled to the provincial governments within a system which does not interfere "with the internal affairs of any university."

The university is naturally encountering many problems, Mr. Sword said in its accelerating expansion and attempts to achieve its enrolment goals.

RESOURCES

"But goals there must be, and this university will be engaged shortly in the exercise of developing a comprehensive approach to coordinating financial, physical and human resources."

It is in a thoughtful atmosphere that the self-consciousness of the university meets with the staff, students and administration, he said.

"The inter-relationships of these three groups are matters of interest, concern and even controversy on campuses everywhere," he said.

DECISION MAKING

Mr. Sword said changes are being made or considered to give "appropriately increased parts in decision-making to each of these two essential components of a university."

U of T is keeping a close check on the rights of both students and administration, he said. It is making certain that the strengths of both groups will be put to proper use.

Sword urged patience for students who experience this self-consciousness, which he compared to the "exuberant and exaggerated impatience of youth."

TUSCA first volunteer tent to rise on U of T campus

It's volunteer time again and the first tent to be set up on the campus belongs to the Toronto University Students Community Action group.

TUSCA was started this year by students council the Social Planning Council.

The Social Planning Council is an agency which supplies volunteers to organizations such as hospitals, nurseries and youth clubs.

President Tom Faulkner as a recruiting committee for

Last year about 400 University students joined the SPC program. This year, with the help of TUSCA, the Council hopes to enlist 900 volunteers.

An SPC volunteer works with youth groups, children in day-care centres, and mentally or physically-handicapped children.

Each volunteer is asked to contribute three hours once a week.

The tent will remain in front of Hart House until Sept. 22. After then, volunteers can contact the central volunteer bureau, Social Planning Council, at 363-4971 or at 55 York St.

College called "fall-out shelter"

Scarborough College is "one of the most expensive government-supported fall-out shelters in North America," says the assistant research co-ordinator for the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Dr. David Abbey, addressing a recent conference on community college design at Scarborough College, said that while the college is featured in architectural magazines all over the world, very few students are enthusiastic about the building.

"In my own attempt to measure students' reactions, I believe the final score lay somewhere between apathy and hostility."

SKULEMEN AVERT FRESHMEN

C O N S P I R A C Y

By ROD RITCHIE

Can this be true? Will super-dynamic sophomores succumb to this sacrilegious sabotage? Will they fall prey to the indignity of this freshman wolfpack cloaked in leather and spiked boots, and sporting the perpetual sneer?

No, gentle reader, it cannot be true.

"Skuleman will save all artsie sophs from the freshman conspiracy," an engineering leader proclaimed last night.

"Every able-bodied member of the Brute Force Committee has taken an oath to preserve the dignity of the down-trodden super-artsman," said Robert MacCallum.

"This will be Skule's finest hour — the ultimate sacrifice."

MacCallum is concerned about engineering freshmen who "have no respect for age unless it's bottled."

During Skule's initiations, his solution was to "defrock and humiliate" one of the ringleaders, leaving him to roam throughout the wilds of Hart House farm, dressed in nothing but an engineering jacket.

The cause of the freshmen menace, he says, is a "vile wench" at Whitney Hall, a women's residence at University College.

Last Saturday the engineers forced her to submit at 8 a.m.

"She threw down her undergarment in total expiation," MacCallum claims. "The other girls cheered us on quite loudly."

This week nursing frosh dressed in white consoled those who had been clubbed or harrassed by Skule's BFC.

"Every nurse was instructed to approach 15 males," says Joanne Houghton (II Nurs).

"And every nurse was ordered to take the male's pulse, name and age so that we can check up on him later. It's a sign of things to come."

Elsewhere on campus last week, UC freshmen were seen parading Communist banners and chanting "Frosh Power — great is our chairman."

the battle of the redguard

The avowed cause of these "Red and White Guards" was to "smash the new counter-attack launched by the bourgeois reactionaries of the engineering line financed by the Trinity imperialists," says Chairman Hersh Ezrin (IV UC), their self-appointed and bearded leader.

There seems to be some dispute as to how Ezrin was elected shepherd of the UC Guards.

Says one freshman, "When he asks you to vote for him and for good government, he's actually asking you to vote twice."

Innis College tried to placate the hostile forces with a love-in.

"We wanted to start things off with a bang," says Ken Stone (IV INN).

Innis couples who were married off with the mist of incense were later "blown out of their minds" with a psychedelic dance.

Departing from the avant-garde, Victoria College maintained its time-honored snake dance and torch-light rituals.

"Vic frosh were harmless," says Glen Brownlee (IV VIC), "although their skits at Bolton camp were a bit gross."

Behind the veneer of subversion and psychedelics, the campus also witnessed a "deadly serious attempt to make the frosh our friends," says Richard Reoch (II Trin).

"We'd rather start things off with a consult-in than a midnight riot."

Traditionally-serious Trinity held guidance classes earlier in the month where professors delivered 25-minute lectures on the purposes of their courses.

At St. Michael's College, sophomore "volunteers" even became "buddies" with freshmen in their own disciplines.

Other faculties staged "social hours" with professors and sophomores. Information centers and interviews with registrars and professors were intensified all across the board.

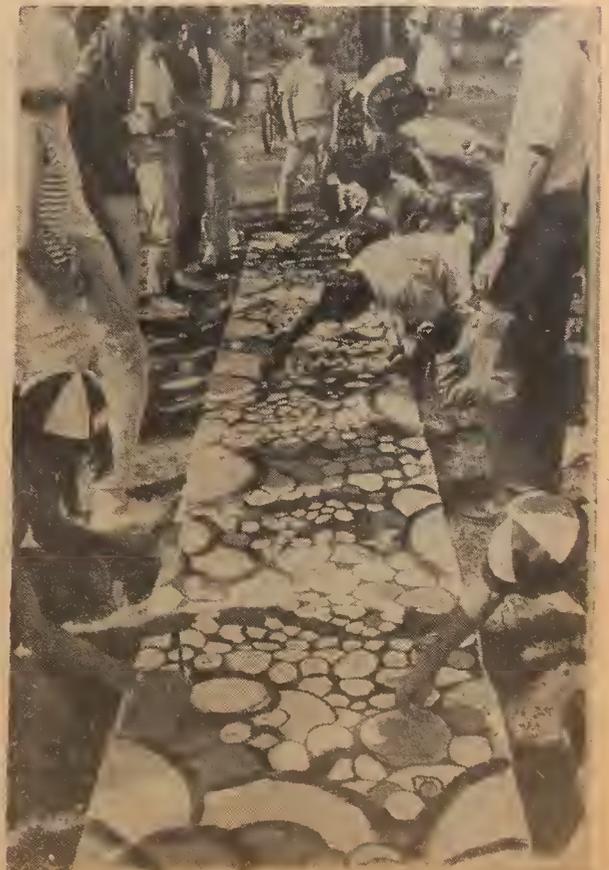

Forestry freshmen are rumored to have gone a step further — true to form, a small band of woodsmen was seen planting tubed seedlings on a mission to beautify U of T.

Rochdale co-op experiment begins

By SUE HELWIG

The Rochdale College experiment has begun.

Eighty student residents have moved into temporary quarters next door to the University of Toronto campus to live and work together as they will next September when the building opens at the corner of Bloor and Huron Streets.

Dennis Lee, a former lecturer at Victoria College, says: "Things have gone fairly well, but the whole process has to prove itself or be a failure."

Rochdale College is Canada's first co-operative residential college. Rejecting such established structures as curriculum, examinations, diplomas and degrees, the college members will create and accept responsibility for their own educational programs.

Rochdale takes its name from a town in England where in 1844 a group of weavers founded the first co-operative, a grocery store.

The college's aim is to build a community where the ideals and problems of education are the ties between students.

John Jordan, co-ordinator in charge of building and development of Rochdale, says that within such a community, "it is the group which performs the critical role of a staff member at a university.

"During this next year the challenge we face is to work out and develop patterns and structures which allow and encourage people to develop freely and take responsibility."

Mr. Lee envisages an institution "that stays open enough to permit a doctrinaire group working within without dominating and controlling other members."

In forming its educational projects Rochdale must overcome the problems of physical isolation of its six houses. It must also find a way to co-ordinate the activities of both residential and external members.

These problems must be met before next September when membership will expand from an estimated this year's 200 to at least 800 as Rochdale moves into its new building.

Mr. Lee and Mr. Jordan both stress the responsibility which students at Rochdale are going to face.

In financial terms alone they are in charge of a $6,000,000, 18 storey building. A young group, ranging in age from 18 to 25, they must face the responsibility of making important decisions without experience and proven competence.

Mr. Jordan sees the real danger as the fear of responsibility itself.

Although it is an autonomous organization, Rochdale College has close ties with the Campus Co-operatives.

Rochdale was first planned as a large residence to be owned and operated by the Co-Op. An educational committee was established as part of the planning council for the residence.

Gradually the members of this committee, working together in a seminar on the problems of education, formulated the concept of the role which Rochdale could play as an alternative to the present system of university education.

Rochdale also has ties with the Company of Young Canadians. Two of its "resource people" John McKenzie and Mr. Lee, are CYC research consultants.

The CYC is interested in Rochdale as an example of a developing experimental community.

The majority of Rochdale's present population of 80 are either students or faculty members on the main campus.

The relationship between the two institutions may be solidified soon if the University of Toronto library grants a request by Rochdale for library privileges.

The war against war will continue

University of Toronto students are opposing the conflict in Vietnam through two independent organizations—the Committee to End the War in Vietnam and the Student Association to End the War in Vietnam.

Toronto committees of both groups are planning to present the campus this fall with a barrage of films, speeches and demonstrations.

They also plan to send representatives to a proposed massive anti-war demonstration Oct. 21 in Washington.

Both groups are working to place the question of student approval of the war on ballots for this year's student council elections.

The CEWW is an affiliation of university and high-school committees across Canada. The SAEWW is a loose federation of committees on the national level.

New book exchange uses airplanes

Airplanes and station-wagons will be used in a new inter-university book exchange.

The Ontario Council of University Librarians has initiated this system to permit graduate students and faculty members to use the resources of 14 provincially assisted university libraries.

The airplanes will be used to carry library materials to Lakehead and Laurentian Universities. The station-wagons will service the southern Ontario region.

Each university will contribute $5,000 toward this service's estimated annual operating cost of $75,000.

SAC ponders residence fee rise

By KATHERINE BARCZA

Student and administrative committees are pondering the problem of rapidly increasing residence fees.

Professor Donald F. Forster, vice-provost of the University of Toronto, said Monday the solution lies with the provincial government. The problem has been placed in the hands of the provincial committee of university presidents, which will probably make representations to the government.

The University College Literary and Athletic Society, faced with petitions from residence students protesting the $50 residence fee increase last May, approached the Students Administrative Council with the problem.

In collaboration with the Lit, SAC set up a committee to investigate the problem during the summer.

The committee concluded that the university's official residences can take only about 15 per cent of the student body. Another 15 per cent must take what they can get off campus.

Hersh Ezrin, president of the Lit and a member of the committee, explained that the government gives more money for the construction of academic buildings than for residences.

A modification of the grant proportion is needed, he says.

Ezrin said that residences are self-supporting and must pay their own operating costs. The basic question is whether the inevitable rise in costs will price residences out of many students' reach.

A policy statement evolved at the committees summer meeting said that since residences perform a definite educational function, the university should strive to make official residence space available for all who want it.

To do this the committee decided that SAC should involve itself more directly in the student housing problem.

Nothing is definite yet, but committee members say they are planning action for this fall.

SAC President Tom Faulkner said the committee was considering a day of protest over the residence situation to coincide with the Ontario election campaign.

Ezrin said the committee hoped to "dramatically emphasize the appalling lack of residence space available on campus."

In this way, he said, enough pressure might be created by the public media and in government circles to force residence construction.

EnSoc supports Weekend

The engineering society yesterday voted unanimous support of this year's McGill Weekend but deplored "malicious damage" which has marred outings in recent years.

The society did not take a stand on the consumption of alcoholic beverages on the weekend.

It voted approval of a Canadian National Railways statement that train officials will use visual, rather than physical, methods to detect bulging bottles.

pend on the pass option."

Though he was angry, Mr. Duinker did agree that his professor was justified in failing him.

Professor J. G. Slater, a spokesman for the philosophy department, said his department felt the religious option ought to be abandoned.

He said the committee in charge of Mr. Duinker's marks should have been quick to notice how this A student was doing and gone to the Philosophy department to inquire about the poor results.

If this had been done, Duinker might have received his degree in June with all the other graduates, Prof. Slater said.

Duinker wrote a supplemental exam during the summer and will be awarded his degree at a later date.

Student fails option - misses degree

By SUSAN REISLER

Failure to pass his one-hour option almost cost Jan Duinker, student council finance commissioner, his degree last year.

Duinker (SGS) who stood first in his mathematics, physics and chemistry course, failed his philosophy option.

"The exams for the options are a poor judge of one's ability to learn and write," he said in an interview Monday.

"How can one teach 300 years of philosophy in the few weeks assigned to the course and then expect students to write a worthwhile exam in one hour?"

Duinker recommended that pass options be abolished. If they must exist, oral exams ought to replace the written ones.

"The degree should not de-

University a major election issue

Ontario student leaders are planning an active campaign to make university affairs a major issue in the Oct. 17 provincial election.

Monique Ouellette, president of the Ontario Union of Students, said earlier this month at the congress of the Canadian Union of Students that her group will publish a pamphlet for students outlining some of the stands on education issues taken by Ontario's Progressive Conservative government and the two opposition parties.

She said several student unions will send representatives to election meetings to ask questions raised in the non-partisan pamphlet.

Major issues include the Ontario student award program and the legislature's refusal to let a student have a seat on the University of Western Ontario board of governors.

This will be the first election in which students living in university residences will be allowed to vote in the riding of their residence. Previously, students could vote only in their home ridings.

Laser will change life: Townes

By BRIAN JOHNSON

The laser may revolutionize virtually every aspect of human life, a Nobel Prize-winning physicist said Monday.

Professor C. H. Townes, an expert in the new field of quantum electronics from the University of California at Berkeley, spoke in Convocation Hall as part of the university's Centennial program.

Prof. Townes helped develop the MASER (Microwave amplification by stimulated emission of radiation) in 1954, and the LASER (light amplification by stimulated emission of radiation) in 1958.

The laser and maser are basically devices to amplify and intensify electromagnetic waves by passing them through certain types of matter, he explained.

Prof. Townes described a multitude of uses for lasers and masers, including a clock in which the oscillation of molecules replaces a pendulum motion. The clock loses only one-hundredth of a second in 2,000 years.

Lasers can be used for eye surgery and in the destruction of bacteria, or provide a perfectly straight line for survey work.

Lasers could develop into a $1,000,000,000 industry with more uses than electronics and light combined, Prof. Towners predicted.

Fordham, not state pays McLuhan

ALBANY (Special) — New York Attorney-General Louis J. Lefkowitz last week ruled unconstitutional the $100,000 Schweitzer professorship at Fordham University, held this year by Marshall McLuhan, the University of Toronto's celebrated communications theorist.

In a Sept. 13 ruling, Mr. Lefkowitz voided the state grant to the university which was to have covered the contract because, he said, the grant to the Roman Catholic institution violated the state constitution's ban on aid to sectarian schools.

Fordham President Rev. Leo McLaughlin labelled the decision an "act of religious discrimination" and repeated his statement that Fordham will provide the $100,000 for the professorship from its own funds so that Dr. McLuhan can begin his work this year as planned.

The university also said it would appeal the ruling in the courts.

Of the $100,000 for the Fordham chair, $30,000 was salary for Dr. McLuhan and the rest was to pay for staff salaries, research costs and other expenses.

Dr. McLuhan, who has just moved his family from Toronto to New York and is scheduled begin his classes at Fordham next week, dismissed the Lefkowitz move as an exercise in "legal technicalities."

"So while the legal minds play with these details, all of us at Fordham will be getting involved with problems of the real world."

Clouding the legal issue is the fact that the constitutional convention now remodeling the state's basic charter has voted to repeal the constitution's ban on aid to sectarian schools.

Nobel Prize winner dies at 70

Sir John was the first man to split the atom and won the 1951 Nobel Prize for physics.

Born and educated in England, he came to Canada in 1944. As director of Canada's first atomic energy laboratory he was responsible for building the atomic energy plant at Chalk River, Ont.

Sir John returned to England in 1946 to head Britain's atomic laboratory at Harwell.

He was at the University of Toronto last October to deliver lectures on the founding of Churchill College at Cambridge University, science policy in Britain and the technology of developing countries.

At the time of his death Sir John was master of Churchill College, an institution for scientific and technological studies.

Watson urges Carleton to revolt

OTTAWA (CUP) — Patrick Watson, co-host of the controversial This Hour Has Seven Days TV show, last week urged Carleton University freshmen to revolt against the administration and faculty.

He told them to work through their student association to gain a bigger say in the administration of their university. He attacked professors who believe that to impart knowledge they need only stand before a class and give the same lecture they have given for years.

The time is gone when student government's major role is organizing dances and football games, he said. "Now they are working for political reform within the university."

U of S Board approves new residences

SASKATOON (Special) — Student residences which will approximately double present accommodations have been approved for the Saskatoon campus of the University of Saskatchewan.

The project was approved by the board of Governors on the recommendation of a committee on housing including representatives of faculty, students, and university administration.

The project will comprise town houses, apartment accommodation and residential houses.

The project should be fully completed by January, 1969.

Sword rejects appeal for more participation

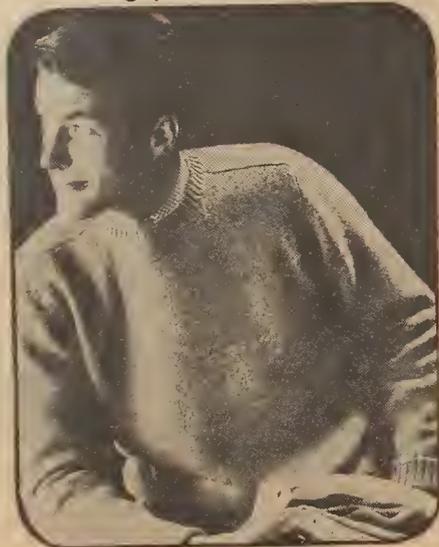

Acting President John Sword has rejected an appeal by the Innis College administrative council for greater student participation in the administration of the college.

Last spring the council unanimously passed a resolution which would give voting powers to the five students and three administrative assistants on the council.

Only faculty members can vote now.

In a letter to Innis Principal Robin Harris, President Sword said that due to the lack of precedent in matters of this sort he did not want to bring the request before the board of governors for a ruling.

We may just have outdone ourselves this year with our fall collection of sweaters. For one thing, we have the sweater shown... and that's pretty impressive. To us it is because it's by a company in Scotland called Lyle & Scott. They have been making the most beautiful Shetlands for over 100 years. We have a whole lot of these at $13.95. Not bad? But we didn't stop with Lyle & Scott sweaters. We bought them from Austria, England, Italy, and have many knitted for us right here. Wait till you see the new yarn mixtures. # PHE defends Reed Trophy

By JIM MORRISON

The annual race for the T. A. Reed trophy begins Tuesday, September 26, with the interfaculty tennis tournament. The Reed Trophy, the most important prize in interfaculty sports, is awarded to the college or faculty with the highest point total in interfac competition.

Defending champion Physical and Health Education head this year's competitors in Division I. Victories in rugby, soccer, and volleyball were the chief reasons for PHE's success. The surprise of the year was the poor showing of 1965-66 champion Trinity College, which slipped to fifth place overall.

The other members of Division I, in their order of finish last year, were Victoria, Engineering, Medicine, Trinity College St. Mike's and University College.

The Division II championship for 1966-67 went for the very first time to nearly-new Innis College, which made a spectacular improvement on their sixth place finish the year before. Innis had a cushion of more than 3200 points over Dentistry and New College, their closest rivals.

The other Division II contenders, again in order of finish, are Law, Knox, Forestry, Pharmacy, Architecture, Wycliffe and Emmanuel.

Rugger Blues open with victory

By DOUG WOODS

The Blues rugger squad opened its season on Saturday with a 13-0 exhibition win over Wanderers Seconds, a Toronto team.

The game, played on the Ontario Rugger Union fields at Victoria Square, was highlighted by the fine play of the University forwards who managed to win almost all the line-outs and easily 80 per cent of the set-scrams. 6' 6" Andy Bethell was a standout in the pack as were Joe Donohue and Pete Hand.

The backs play is much improved over last year. Passing was faster and more accurate and the line's ability to link well and reverse the direction of attack were effective and exciting to watch.

Tries were scored by Al Major (prop-forward), Hayden Richardson (scrumhalf), and Doug Woods (wing 3). Paul Henry converted two of the tries.

There are several new recruits this year, among them ex-footballers Doug Phibbs and Pete Sutherland. Chris Compton and freshman Bill Imrie also look very promising.

The Blues have an excellent coach in Jim Hamilton, past-president of the Ontario Rugger Union. Jim is at present choosing an Ontario side to play the visiting British National Team. He is an expert in all facets of the game and is especially interested in introducing new players to the game of English Rugby.

The University of Toronto fields two teams in intercollegiate leagues and there are many positions still open. Newcomers are encouraged to come out to practices Monday to Thursday 5 to 7 p.m. on the back campus.

SAC blotter has wrong schedules

By UNCLE CHARLIE

Many years ago when I was a humble, innocent and unsuspecting freshman, the ambitious, grasping power hungry child politicians who at the time comprised the Students Administrative Council printed an innocuous little handbill on registration day.

It was, as I recall, a rather inconsequential item, just a brief list of the various athletic and social activities for the next six months.

Imbued with my first surge of Varsity spirit (and imbued with other spirits as well), I joined several thousand of my fellow frosh at Varsity Stadium where we expected to witness our glorious rugby (sorry, football) twelve slaughter the selected victims for that afternoon, a rather pitiful squad from Queens.

Game time came and game time went and nary a football player did we see.

We checked those itty bitty SAC handbills and there it was... "Rugby, Saturday, 2 pm... Queens at Varsity". Queens and good of Varsity did play that Saturday afternoon... in Kingston.

Wandering about the old campus yesterday, I was again reminded of that tragic Saturday many years ago.

I notice that you frosh still have a SAC and it still publishes a list of campus activities. Sure, its bigger and bluer than in my day, but it's still just as inaccurate as in those good old days.

Take an example—that magnificent Varsity ice hockey squad is not going to beat the h—out of those peasoupers from Laval on January 19. They're going to do it on December 15. Sort of a Christmas present.

And those separatists from Montreal are not going to foul our pure English air on January 26. I see that they've managed to postpone that sacrilege until February 4 (a Sunday, by the way).

And what ever happened to the intercollegiate rassing championships? As I recall, those farmers up at Guelph are playing hosts for this event sometime in late February.

And what about our fantastic swimming and diving teams who are going to win the intercollegiate championships right here in Hart House on February 23? I didn't see that on the blotter.

Frosh, heed this advice from kindly Uncle Charlie: never believe what you read especially, if it's on a SAC blotter.

Returning veterans ensure strong defensive alignment

By BOB CLARK

The success of a football team often depends on its defence.

A good defensive unit can frequently mean the difference between a win or loss for a team with a mediocre offence. Even a sensational offence, however, cannot overcome another team if the opposition is consistently pounding a weak defence.

Despite the loss of several key personnel to last year's Blues' defence, Varsity coach Ron Murphy has again been able to fill the gaps.

"We had a few openings, but we had more than enough to replace them," Murphy said yesterday. "If anything, the team is stronger than it was last year."

Linebackers Ranny Parker, last year's defensive captain, and veterans Bill Laverty and Don Holmes have all departed, as well as defensive tackles Laird Elliott and Gary Clipperton.

However, several veterans are returning to pick up the slack. Glen Markle, who was sidelined for the entire regular season last year by a pre-season exhibition injury, has returned to active duty. Pete Broadhurst, a former fullback with Queen's Golden Gaels, sidelined because of academic ineligibility last year, and Dave Church, a veteran of last year's intercollegiate wars are moving into the regular linebacking slots.

Included in those bolstering the defensive line will be Ylo Korgemagi, Jim Bennett, from Phys Ed's interface team, Bill Bennett, from Guelph Redmen of the Ontario Intercollegiate, Doug Bucknam from McMaster, Stu Lietch from Engineering, and last year Blue veterans Arnie Carefoot, Jim Kellam, Alex Squires, Alex Topp and Ron Wakelin.

Murphy's worry this year again points to Blues' pass defence. Going last year with a number of rookies, the pass defence unit surprisingly led the league in interceptions after a couple of games, but injuries soon created a shaky situation.

GLEN MARKLE

Varsity Soccer Blues rated best team yet

Varsity Soccer Blues are expected to have their strongest team in history this year. Of last year's unbeaten championship team, twelve players are returning, including captain and M.V.P. Tom Johnston, as well as scoring leader Frank Soppelsa. Also Jim Lefkos, a top scorer with Blues three years ago is making a comeback.

Several outstanding rookies have shown signs of dis-

"The pass defence can't help but be better," coach Murphy said. "It was largely made up of rookies who now have had a year of experience."

Back for the Blues will be Chris Hicks, who, in his first year with the senior squad last year, led the league in pass interceptions until a concussion at McGill during Varsity's third regular season game knocked him from the lineup.

Other returnees for the pass defence will be John Gordon, Larry DeRocher and Paul McKay, all with at least one year's experience.

While confident that these veterans will do the job, coach Murphy admitted that a little more work had to be done to smooth out the rough edges of the aerial defence.

All in all, the Blues' offence shouldn't have to worry about their defence being pushed around. They should be every bit as tough as the hard reputation gained by last year's defenders.

lodging last year's regulars, among them Ron Muir and Mario Palermo.

"Many good players are going to be cut this year," says coach Ernie Glass. "That should be an indication of how strong we are."

All Blues have to do now is prove they are the best collegiate side in Canada on the field. They've done it on paper.

BRYCE TAYLOR
Big shoes . . . 66

QB or not QB

ROD MICKLEBURGH

TAYLOR GONE

Despite a reputation as a persistent and incurable optimist, Varsity head football coach, Ron Murphy, was not the happiest of gentlemen as he surveyed prospects for 1967, following Blues' humiliating defeat last year in the Yates Cup playoff.

His chief worry was a huge, gaping hole left at quarterback. For the first time in five years, the Varsity field general would not be Bryce Taylor.

Taylor's absence was no little cause for alarm. Possibly the finest passer ever to don a Blues' uniform, Taylor left several records in his wake, including most career points by an SIFL competitor, while leading Toronto to national collegiate supremacy in 1965 and runner-up, nationally, in 1966.

To add to the coach's concern, his second quarterback, Vic Wozniuk, an adequate fill-in for Taylor when he was hurt near the end of the season, will also be in the stands for the coming year. This left Murphy rummaging around near the bottom of his quarterback bag for two helmsmen. Vic Alboini and Peter Raham, both rookies last year.

BOB AMER

Then a ray of sunshine burst through the clouds, and Murphy learned that Bob Amer, just released by the Montreal Alouettes, would be coming to Toronto. Amer was a good catch. A perennial all-star while at Carleton University, the six foot two, 180 lb. Earl Haig graduate, possessed of an excellent arm, seemed to be tailor-made (no pun intended) for Blues' offense with such sound receivers as Jim Ware and Mike Eben floating around. Says Murphy of Amer: "He's a good football man, there's no doubt about it. With his big hands he handles the ball well, and holds it nice and high before passing."

However, Amer's competition for the number one spot has not rolled over and died by any means. With Pete Raham unfortunately sidelined for a while by an ankle injury, the spotlight has shifted directly onto Vic Alboini. Despite seeing only limited action last year (he completed 2 out of 4 passes), Alboini is making an inspired bid to seat Amer on the bench.

SMALL BUT GOOD

Though small (5'10", 170 lb.), Alboini is a gritty and speedy runner, a big plus over his rival who is a bit slow afoot. Says fullback Mike Raham: "Don't underestimate his running ability. He's a good little runner." And, so far at least, his passing has stood up well.

Amer is quick to acknowledge Alboini's worth: "Vic's a very quick, good ball handler, and he sure throws a good ball." In spite of a tinge of chagrin at what he calls a relatively slow start, Amer is enjoying the tussle and is very happy to be with Blues. He finds the overall calibre of SIFL players better than in his former conference, but loyally asserts that there is not that much difference between the best of either league.

At this early date, with Blues' first exhibition game coming up Saturday against McMaster, the successor to Bryce Taylor is still to be chosen.

VIC ALBOINI
Can he fill them?

Tuna fishermen finish seventh

Varsity's fishing crew ran into some bow-wows at the 12th Intercollegiate Game Fish Fishing Match at Wedgeport, N.S. held Aug. 30—Sept. 2. The bow-wows are actually a local word for a species of shark known as dogfish. For close to half an hour U. of T.'s best anglers were swamped with more dogfish than they could hook on their lines. That might sound like a fisherman's dream but unfortunately dogfish are not recognized as point-getting catches in international fish competitions.

Casting their lines into the Atlantic for Varsity were Manny Tward (coach), Don Maylotte (captain), Doug Lavors, George Tabisz, Mike Horn, and Bill McReynolds.

Although Toronto fared not as well as last year, finishing in seventh position, Canada swept the overall point total against the U.S. and a Japanese Team and captured the Schaefer Trophy. The top team, winning the Hulman Cup for total pounds of fish caught was St. Francis-Xavier.

Lit votes support, money to draft-dodger group

By LAWRENCE BRICE

The UC Literary and Athletic Society voted last night to support American draft dodgers coming to Toronto.

After considerable debate the Lit voted 11 to 5 in favour of a four part motion presented by Mark Freiman, who called for:

—Support by the Lit for the Draft Resistance Program in Toronto, a non-partisan humanitarian group to help draft dodgers adjust to Canada;

—A contribution of $150 to the organization;

—A petition to the Students Council for support of the Draft Resistance Program in Toronto materially, financially and vocally;

—Further support from individual Lit members.

A second motion by Freiman increased the amount to be given the Resistance Program to a provisional $250. It passed 8 to 6.

The Lit invited executive members of the Draft Resistance Program in Toronto to the meeting to present an appeal for University College support.

A motion to give support to the Toronto Anti-Draft Committee will be debated at the next SAC meeting Oct. 4.

At that time Mark Satin, director of the program, will ask council to approve his program in principle and ask for a SAC contribution.

The representatives of the Resistance Program, all professors at U of T, included A. M. Wall of the psychology department, Prof. Paul Hoch physics, and E. E. Rose, history.

Prof. Hoch told the Lit that five to ten Americans normally 25 years of age come to their Toronto office each day.

On reaching Canada they need initial financial help, information, legal help and a placement service.

Prof. Wall called these people, who he has accommodated in his own home, "lonely, frightened people who want to succeed very much in their new life. They are assimilated quickly into Canada."

The representatives stressed that the Draft Resistance Program was not politically aligned with SUPA or any other group, although welcoming their support.

Prof. Wall said: "We are trying to make this an independent thing. We are not taking sides with those who have a political axe to grind by stressing the humanitarian aspect."

Speaking against the motion, Lit member Artbur Kaell said the Draft Resistance Program had unsavoury political connotations whether council liked it or not. He urged council to defeat the motion on grounds that members could not represent the College in this matter.

Member Irv Weisdorf concluded deliberations calling for a "humanitarian approach to those leaving the U.S."

SAC draws government attention by backing birth control committee

Attorney-General Arthur Wishart said yesterday he will investigate support by the Students Administrative Council for a campus birth control program.

SAC voted support Wednesday for a committee headed by Laurel Limpus (SGS) which will make birth control information available to co-eds.

Mr. Wishart said yesterday he will obtain a copy of the resolution adopted by SAC.

"There are going to be changes in the law on these matters," he said. "But I'd like to know exactly what they're going to do."

Section 150 of the Criminal Code makes it an offence to sell or dispose of any instructions "intended or represented as a method of preventing conception."

Mr. Wishart's comments came less than 24 hours after SAC president Tom Faulkner told council that "there is a remote chance that I could go to jail over this, but it is very remote, and I'm prepared to risk it."

Faulkner said yesterday that he still doubts charges will be laid—"the Planned Parenthood Association has been doing this sort of thing for seven years, and nobody's prosecuted them."

The U of T committee will help students get in touch with the Planned Parenthood Association.

Main opponent to SAC support of the committee Wednesday came from John Carlisle (III Meds), who approved the general idea of birth control advice but pointed that dissemination of contraceptive advice or devices is a felony.

It would be "irresponsible," he said, for SAC to support an illegal act while it is seeking wider recognition as a responsible body.

"It's a bad law, but it's not up to us to change it."

Faulkner replied that such "irresponsible" support also came from such groups as the United Church of Canada.

Tuition problems transcended by Dan the acid man

STAFF REPORTER

All you poor penniless students, working your way through university, taking boring summer jobs and selling your soul to the Ontario Government for a POSAP loan — take heed.

One University of Toronto student earned about $1,150 in five weeks this summer and his job was most stimulating — he imported LSD and sold it for profit.

With sporadic part-time work wages he will have enough to pay for his tuition, books and living expenses for the entire 1967-68 academic term. In addition he has supplied himself and close friends with enough psychedelic chemicals to blow minds for months. This is one of the bonuses of the acid business.

Here are some of the details of how Dan, the acid man, (not his real name) made his fortune:

Early August — Dan hitchhikes to the hippies' Mecca, San Francisco, U.S.A. Dan "crashed" into hippy homes in the Haight-Ashbury district (crashed means to be invited to live free in hippy homes). He "copped" (bought) 140 tablets of acid for $250 Canadian.

He returned to Canada and sold about $500 worth of the acid. He also gave away a lot, traded some for grass (marijuana) and dropped (used) a lot of it himself.

"Man, I used to drop two and three tabs at a time," Dan said.

Because Dan was "crashing" — his living expenses were nil and the profits of his first excursion were $250.

Dan also made a lot of friends turning people on at cut-rate prices. But more important he collected capital for his second and much bigger business deal with the Haight-Ashbury flower children.

Dan decided to play it cool in late August and send a friend down instead of himself to make the deal.

Dan's friend Pete, the pusher, (not his real name) managed to cop 380 tabs of acid for $650 Canadian. Pete flew back and paid another person $50 to take the acid across the border.

Pete's expenses for the excursion were about $150 but that included an ounce of Acapulco Gold, a very high grade of marijuana, which he brought back with him.

Dan smoked some of the Acapulco Gold and said it was great.

"That Gold is so beautiful, so out of sight . . .

and there are no seeds, just leaves and stems," Dan said.

Dan paid Pete a pound of grass for his work arranging the deal.

Dan sold about 340 tabs of the acid for about $1,800 just before school started.

"I had no trouble putting it out," he said.

If you tally Dan's costs and subtract them from the $1,800 and then add the $250 he made on the first shipment — the final result is approximately $1,150 profit.

Although the money seems quick and easy, Dan has gone out of business.

"You do this sort of thing so you don't have to conform to society and be a businessman. But after all the hassles — the contacts, the appointments, the hours of waiting for a deal to come through — you soon realize that pushing is in the same bag the businessman is in," Dan said.

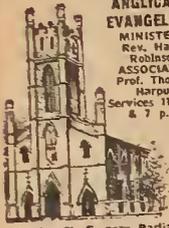

Dan, like many pushers, has had enough of the hassles and the persistent paranoia that the narcs (RCMP) are going to bust you (arrest you) and put you away for up to seven years.

Dan is glad it is over and he can join the ranks of university students and surface at last from the underground.

Money problems hit first festival

The Students Administrative Council expressed apprehension Wednesday night at the Blue and White Society's first effort in this year's festival program.

Finance commissioner Jan Duinker (SGS) was asked about the cost of the society's planned Oct. 15 rhythm and blues festival.

The Blue and White, the group that co-ordinates social activities across campus, shared responsibility evenly with Record World, a Toronto shop, for a seven-band show featuring Otis Redding, American rhythm and blues specialist.

inally booked Varsity Arena for Oct. 14, but plans were changed and the society thought they had reserved the arena for Oct. 15. An Italian song group had the arena for that night but the society didn't find out until four weeks ago.

Plans now call for the festival to be held off-campus, at the west annex of the Canadian National Exhibition Coliseum.

Total cost of the production is $6,000 says Mike Lais of Record World. Redding's bill is $2,400. Sam and Bill, The Bar-Kays, E. G. Smith and the Power, The Mission Review, The Soul Society,

The New Breed, The Six and Stones and Duke Noble and the Local Soul Dealers complete the entertainment.

Blue and White Society President Marty Low (I Law) said the Coliseum can hold 10,000 people and dancing will be permitted. Coliseum acoustics are better than those of Varsity Arena, he added.

Duinker said the society has a budget of $3,500 for their festivals this year and if they blow it all on one there'll be no more money from SAC.

Tickets go on sale next week at $3.50 for non-students and $1.75 for students.

ITI will use fluorescent buttons

Fluorescent purple and green International Teach-In buttons will be available within two weeks, Jeff Rose, Teach-In co-chairman, said last night.

About 3,500 buttons are being made and will be ditributed free to promote interest in the Teach-In which takes place Oct. 20-22 in Varsity Arena.

Rose expects at least 5,000 people to attend this year's forum, on Religion and International Affairs.

He said this year's ITI budget is about $46,000, 50 per cent higher than the last year's.

When asked to define a teach-in, co-chairman Mike Ignatieff (III Trin) called it "one big public forum where the ordinary person is educated."

He said a teach-in is different from a conference: "A conference is a soher relaxed, often leisurely gathering for the experts in a field."

"A teach-in seeks to educate everyone—faculty, students, the general public—in the crucial issues in international affairs."

"While the emphasis is on drama and excitement, it is not a protest meeting."

The Teach-In organizers are very enthusiastic about this year's ambitious efforts. They say they are doing twice as much work as last year to interest the general public about the upcoming intellectual confrontation.

SAC asks Sword to issue free copies of Macpherson report to students

The Students Administrative Council is asking Acting President John Sword to issue free copies of the forthcoming Macpherson report to all 8,300 students in the faculty of arts and science.

The report, supervised by political science professor C. B. Macpherson is to probe all aspects of the faculty. It is expected to number 200 pages.

All professors in the faculty are receiving the report free of charge and SAC Vice-President John Treleaven (SGS) demanded the same privilege for students. SAC President Tom Faulkner felt the university could bear the cost of sending the report to all arts students.

"The availability of funds should not be taken into consideration. The university has already gone to great expense to compile this report."

Faulkner said that the report will be ready at the end of September and that it will be sent to all organizations that submitted briefs to the Macpherson commission.

The report will also be on sale at the bookstore for $1.50.

SAC investigates housing

An independent committee has been set up by the students Administrative Council to investigate the housing situation on and off the university campus.

"The purpose of the committee," said chairman Edmund Clark (III UC) "is to put residence expenditure in a broader perspective of university expenditures."

"We want to see whether the residences are receiving a just proportion from the university budget."

The committee, to report by Christmas, will check the finances of university residences co-ops, and off-campus housing services.

Help! Cartoonists

Bookstore tries new selling style: Streamlining speeds up process

By KATHERINE BARCZA

University of Toronto students, used to sweating it out in seemingly endless lines at the university bookstore, are buying books in a fraction of previous years' times.

The man responsible for the improvement is Charles Fanning, manager of the bookstore.

"We are trying to relate to students, we are hoping they will relate to us," Fanning said Thursday.

EFFICIENCY

Fanning has stream-lined bookstore operations. There are 14 cash registers working full-time, nine more than last year.

With students finding the books they want themselves instead of waiting at a counter, service is faster. And the number of bookstore employees has been reduced.

Charge-account plates are produced more efficiently. Only a number is impressed and the plates are pre-numbered so that a student can get his card in two minutes.

This year the bookstore has five times more space than had two years ago.

Mr. Fanning said many people had difficulty last year trying to find the books.

NEW FORMAT

This year red arrows pointing to the bookstore are all over the campus and eight colorful balloons are tied to the roof of the building.

Popular music plays continuously at the bookstore's entrance. Employees wear badges saying "We try harder" in 20 languages. Colorful prints and posters decorate the walls.

Pretty co-eds have replaced the Commissionaires in charge of crowd control.

These innovations seem to have been successful. In the first four days of this term the bookstore has sold more material than it did in the first month of last year, says Mr. Fanning.

And the new look in the bookstore has not significantly affected the budget.

MORE PAY

Employees are being paid more this year but the staff is smaller. Attractive carrying bags have been bought in such quantity that they are cheaper than last year's plain brown bags.

The sound system for the entrance has been set up by employees and many of the records belong to Fanning himself. Buttons are free, courtesy of Avis.

PRICES SAME

Unfortunately, there has been no drop in prices. However, Fanning said, this is not the bookstore's responsibility.

The bookstore gets a 20 per cent discount on retail price as compared to the usual merchandising discount of 50 per cent on most consumer goods. A further 5 per cent is given to the students on cloth-bound books.

Also, prints in the bookstore are sold cheaper than anywhere else in the city and records are one cent cheaper than at Sam's.

Professors were asked to send their booklists early in April. Only 60 per cent had complied by Aug. 15.

Since shipments from the U.S. take six weeks and European orders at least three months, the bookstore was caught short during the annual rush.

Students in vote squeeze: Faulkner Candidates squabble for campus vote

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Students in the university riding, St. Andrew-St. Patrick will be discouraged from voting in the Oct. 17 provincial election, Students Council President Tom Faulkner charged yesterday.

The times when students living in the area bounded by Palmerston, College, Bloor and University Ave. can change ridings were announced yesterday as 11 a.m. to noon, 3 p.m. to 4 p.m., and 8 p.m. to 9 p.m.

The place is 37 Borden St., four blocks west of Spadina near College.

Up to 2,000 students in this riding must file change-of-riding applications in person before revising officers at 37 Borden St. at these times. Most places where students are living were enumerated Sept. 5 before the students returned for classes.

"The election officers have underestimated the number of students who will have to change their ridings," Faulkner said.

"Two things can happen that will discourage students from voting—a lot of students will turn out and the revising officers won't be able to handle them or students will look at all the trouble they must go through and will not bother."

Len Shifrin, St. Andrew-St. Patrick liberal candidate, compared the trouble students must go through to vote to Negro voting registration in Mississippi.

Mr. Shifrin charged that Allan Grossman, Progressive Conservative, MPP for the riding, arranged for the places of revision to be as far as possible off campus because "he is going to get clobbered on campus."

However Mr. Grossman denied the allegation saying he has absolutely no right to influence places of revision and the election officials are completely independent of the government.

Grossman said he asked the returning officer's clerk to advise the returning officer that he felt "the possibility of additional facilities should be considered for students changing their riding."

Grossman predicted he would carry the student vote in this riding.

Following the page story in Wednesday's Varsity that says Faulkner had commended Shifrin's efforts to allow students to vote on campus, Conservative and New Democratic spokesmen have levelled charges of partisanship at the SAC president.

Faulkner denied such charges at Wednesday night's SAC meeting.

In a letter to The Varsity, Adam Fucrstenberg, NDP candidate in St. Andrew-St. Patrick, said the NDP, not just the Liberals and Shifrin, has been working hard to get students the franchise on campus.

University Conservative club officials said Wednesday Mr. Shifrin's efforts were not necessary because there was already provision in the Election Act for students to change their riding when they return to school during an election.

They also said the U of T Conservatives did not endorse Shifrin's proposal to change the act.

Few U of T students attempt suicide

Several University of Toronto students tried to commit suicide during the last year and at least three succeeded, says the 1966-67 report of the university health service.

However, overall student health remains "excellent," says Dr. G. E. A. Delehouse head of the service.

The report also says: —sixty-one students of a "larger men's residence" suffered from an outbreak of moderately severe stomach flu;

—the chest X-ray survey uncovered eight cases of tuberculosis, two of them active;

—the service gave sex education and counselling to students who asked the Planned Parenthood Association.

"If the woman's periods are irregular, the safe and unsafe days will also be irregular. Illness, shock, or other changes (such as entering university) can also disturb the menstrual cycle and upset the calculation of the time of ovulation. Because of these problems, the rhythm method is not effective for most women. Many tragedies have occurred, because of rhythm method miscalculations." —from a leaflet by the University of Toronto Committee on Birth Control Information.

of birth control, draft dodgers and hippies

Presumably a priest himself would know better than anyone else what effect marriage would have on his relationship to God.

And presumably a hippie can judge better than anyone else whether it's even necessary for him to go through the formality of marriage.

Yet there are people who try to exert an influence over both these people's lives as if they were public business.

For instance, New College during its first year of operation already had a "custom" that male residents do not have women sleep in their rooms overnight.

Customs surely don't arise that fast. Some authority has obviously assembled them to work the same way as rules — they confine the individual.

Governments and other organized bodies try to regulate such personal issues as if they have the right to control the happiness of one individual.

And the resulting laws, regulations and customs, then, only stand in the way. For the sake of his own personal integrity, the individual must question them, and if necessary deny they have any jurisdiction over him.

Please everybody?

It seems to be much easier to pass restrictions than relaxations of rules. When you try to relax, there are special interest groups that have to be satisfied.

When it's impossible to satisfy everyone, it seems easier to stand still and do nothing.

That's why it's so encouraging that the Students Administrative Council, not unknown for lethargy, took what seemed to be an uncompromising step forward Wednesday in endorsing a birth control program.

That's why it's so encouraging that the University College Literary and Athletic Society, which has been known to move a little faster and with more determination than the SAC, endorsed a draft-dodger program last night.

And that's why it is so disturbing that the Toronto Board of Control, which lately has been the scene of much fury but little or no action, refused to give a sympathetic ear to the hippies.

A program in which girls will dispense birth control information to U of T co-eds passed through the SAC machinery without much dissent.

The law, that outmoded whipping-boy for the stand-pat faction, was cited but gained little sympathy.

It seems that even our junior politicians see that Sec. 150 (2) (c) of the Criminal Code, which disallows the practise or the dispensation of birth control information is outdated. Not surprisingly, since society in general seems to have accepted that fact long ago.

That revolution

That revolution has been won and it is now up to each individual girl to see it has been won for her, and not let society, parents or the law govern her actions.

The Lit, meanwhile, in endorsing a program to aid draft dodgers from the United States, is sure to lead to more controversy than birth control did. The question should reach SAC in two weeks when that larger body will be asked to make a similar endorsement and to vote money.

The Lit's stand is not only commendable but moral. Surely we can all realize that dissent from the war the U.S. is carrying on is much harder than participation.

To charge that a draft-dodger is a coward is ludicrous.

What right has a government to coerce young men to fight a controversial war against their own better judgement — that is the issue and the only one. The only issue — just as in the birth control question there is really only one issue: should anyone have the power to force their morality or rules on an individual's personal affairs?

The Hippie issue

To jump further, to the hippie issue, the issue is again similar. When a person dissents as flagrantly as the hippie who wears sandals, beads, long hair and unconventional clothes and tops it off with pulling out of the normal rat race altogether, should government bodies or society have the power to exert any influence at all to bring them back into their mainstream?

Board of Control, led by Alan Lampport, seems to think so. Mr. Lampport's statements to the effect that hippies are general no-goodniks are well-reported and widely-known.

Lampy, who should know better since he is a lawyer, has even been named in a contempt of court action for his statements earlier this year.

What is highly disturbing, though, is the Board's unwillingness to hear well-founded grievances from hippies. No matter what issues the hippies come to discuss, Lampy and the others seem to turn the talk to cleanliness, the inherent virtue of work, patriotism and the respect for authority.

Wednesday, the issue was police brutality because some of the hippies had been the victims of the most blatant example of police violence in many years.

A peaceful sit-in on Yorkville calling for the closing of the street was broken up by the riot squad, a group specializing in adult violence. These cops are used to soccer-game violence, crowd control in Allan Gardens and so on.

Stomp and kick

A 200-pound detective does not have to march into a crowd of hippies and stomp a teen-age girl in the stomach. Nor does any cop have to kick a hippie in the head.

No one should have to come away from an incident like that having to pay a $27 bill for X-rays. The scars, bruises, and broken bones that resulted from that incident during the summer, should never have happened.

But Board of Control has refused to call for a judicial inquiry, which is the most fence-sitting position anyone can take on the matter. A judicial inquiry, after all, merely looks into allegations.

The police, meanwhile, are left free to force their brand of conservatism, and conformity on the hippies and the hippie-haters support them.

For some time now, it has been necessary to ponder the nature of the allegiance you should be giving to laws and authority of any kind.

Government, we know, tends to lag behind society in general. That's understandable. But the little girl who is afraid to make up her own mind on an issue such as birth control until the law allows her to, is not going to be commended in these pages.

Birth control is merely one issue, however.

the writing on the wall

Leftward ho, said Peter Warrian, and the wagon which is the vehicle for one hundred and forty thousand Canadian university students lurched off towards what may be a rising sun.

Earlier this month the Canadian Union of Students named Warrian as the man to follow Hugh Armstrong in the president's chair as it took some encouraging steps beyond the fringe of narrow educational issues.

The union has been cautiously venturing beyond the field of education for a few years, but the recent conference at London where Warrian was elected after making clear his connection with the Student Union for Peace Action was a definitive milestone in CUS history.

The talk in caucuses, at lunch tables or within residence rooms at 5 a.m. was involved with the relation of society's problems to education.

At formal plenary sessions, those in Warrian's camp managed to run roughshod over some cliché-ridden protests about CUS' right to represent students and about the general political trend of the union.

That's what made it sound so militant, of course. The left-right conflict caught headlines and took up more time than it should have at plenaries.

But the action that counted wasn't at the plenary. It was in little conference rooms across the University of Western Ontario campus—and more important, it was in the minds of delegates at the CUS Congress.

There was little of the old line salute to classical democracy; student leaders grasped a bit of the message that responsible government as practised now is barely better than a benevolent despotism.

There was little of the years-old fuss about free tuition; universal accessibility was approached largely in the context of the relationship of the formal education structure to the social structure.

There was little of the traditional crisis meeting over services-versus-action; delegates were keyed for action when they arrived.

Not that it was all that smooth, of course. CUS as a political body is far too closely modelled on all-embracing party structures to do that much that easily.

The University of Alberta hung in the background and muttered about the conservative services-oriented union it was going to form.

The University of British Columbia and the University of Calgary bucked the trend with greater or less fervor throughout.

And even Toronto's zeal went by the boards over the international question when the congress supported associate status in the International Student Conference and the International Union of Students.

That doesn't really matter. Even those who fought the trend were forced to think the way the congress' militant leaders were thinking.

It will—hopefully—mean that more and more students will consider the problems raised by an organization which is more and more conscious of the need for total community action, for an end to isolating issues, for listening, for example, to the words of Peter Warriars.

Those words may be confusing—semantics becomes a bigger problem when you realize that the language isn't equipped with the words to approach a utopian society—but they're up there.

We should hear a lot of them.

MEL BRADSHAW

Before diving into current attractions, a look at some of the things that have happened over the summer would not be amiss. To start with the most spectacular, Expo has not only provided wide opportunities for experiment with film but has brought the results, not to an underground or an art house audience, but to the public at large. It is significant to note that while up to this time almost all developments in movies have aimed at making them more realistic—sound, colour, cinerama, 3-D, aromarama—the films at Expo have by and large (Telephone Pavilion excluded) taken a more fanciful turn. Labyrinth, for example, while at times using the floor screen coordinated with the wall screen for realism, more often uses the two independently, not to deceive the senses but to stimulate the imagination. This is true a fortiori for its second five-screen movie and for almost every other multi-screened effort at the fair.

At the same time, another trend was making itself felt at the Montreal International Film Festival: that of documentary realism. Outstanding examples shown were Allan King's Warrendale and Don Pennebaker's Don't Look Back, which covers Bob Dylan's tour of Great Britain. Both these normal-width, black and white pictures gave the impression, not of a reality unfolding before you, but that of a scrupulously exact newsreel.

These opposing tendencies both contain certain dangers. Many of the gimmicky film techniques developed for specific pavilions are too cumbersome for our local theatres. Furthermore, since these movies shun realism, frequently tell no story, and occasionally are viewed only casually as part of a pavilion's decor, they risk incoherence (the one complaint I have heard against Chris Chapman's fine Ontario film A Place To Stand.)

On the other hand, the documentaries which enthroned fact risk sacrificing everything for the sake of truth, and finally missing that too. In such films, poor technique is considered a virtue, any hint of style a defect. All they pretend to do is inform us, but here we must be wary. For since film is already such a realistic medium, yet one can lie most effectively with it. These documentaries are a form of journalism which escapes the scrutiny we bestow on the printed word; we must therefore be very careful about how we use the information they provide.

Both trends seem to be away from a fictional storyline—towards poetry (albeit technical) on the one hand and reportage on the other. I do not mean to suggest by this that plot is dead. One of the finest offerings at the Montreal Festival was Jan Troell's Here's Your Life which admirably incorporated lyrical color passages and black and white documentary elements into its tale of a young Swede growing up during World War I.

This summer has also witnessed great progress in Canada's film industry. While no native movie was deemed worthy of a prize last year, all four feature length works shown at the Canadian Film Festival in August were hailed as outstanding (an achievement more to the credit of French than English Canada since three of the four were by Quebecers). In addition, the NFB's first two feature films for the commercial market, Waiting for Caroline, and Don Owen's The Ernie Game are soon to be released following November television premieres.

A word in closing about coming attractions: as usual this year many film societies in and around campus are showing a number of excellent films at reasonable prices. Some, the U of T cineclub and the Toronto Film Society include, unfortunately offer package deals only and even the best programs are likely to contain some fillers. A new club, that of St. Michael's College, seems to have found the best solution. They offer their full series of twelve films for $6, or any six for $4, or singles at 75c each plus $1 membership. Among their attractions are Truffaut's La Peau Douce, Godard's Alphaville, and La Femme Mariée, Antonioni's La Notte, an early Fellini Il Bidone, as well as an underground film, Echoes of Silence by Peter Goldman. A New Film Society based at La Maison Doré also offers single tickets at $1 to the eight movies it plans to show before Christmas, or a subscription at $5. On its program are D. W. Griffith's Intolerance, Cacoyannis' Electra, Beckett and The Pawnbroker.

Madness and the failure of words

By DAVID PAPE

I saw Persona to satisfy my interest in Bergman, there was no interest then in writing about the film, yet I feel impelled to do so. I think this is the best of his films and the most important we will see for some time.

As with other Bergman films, we come away from Persona with the feeling that what we have seen was beating on shores just removed from our conscious frame of reference; yet in every scene are overtones, threats of tremendous passions about to break upon us; the terrors of madness we are forever fighting to hold off.

In my opinion, Bergman's last stir: The Silence, was a failure. Again we had immense themes: the subtle effect of time, the imminence of death, the differing egotisms of sex and age, the fierceness of frustration and the despair at alienation and loneliness. But there, the metaphors of the film did not grow organically. All was quite real, but spread like oil, oozing amorphously.

In Persona, the important relationships are fused into one. There are no flat characters introduced — no distractions. The husband who briefly appears is only a comment on the love-hatred-jealousy that has developed between nurse and patient.

The film is about a mental patient who is mute. A great actress, she went silent suddenly in the middle of Antigone, and is now cared for by a nurse, Bibi Andersson. The two of them leave the hospital and go to a seaside retreat. The dialogue is entirely handled by the nurse. Her monologue becomes a kind of confession of increasing intimacy.

The nurse's name is Alma, the soul; and the relationship between these two people may be interpreted as a coming together of inner and outer: spirit and social role. The superficial persona is destroyed by the soul. The mask is abandoned by the sea shore. The fragmentation is overcome, and a beautiful unity emerges.

This however was not my reaction to the film when I saw it. But it is a point of view that is worth considering in seeing the film.

The film has amazing compression and derives its power from this. We are conveyed with the nurse, unavoidably, into a world that we do not wish to enter.

I must express my great appreciation to the marvellous acting of Bibi Andersson and Liv Ullmann. Bibi Andersson has played such a variety of roles for Bergman; she is always exciting. Here, she is a virtuoso. Miss Ullmann on the other hand, is a powerful listener, drawing both her nurse and her audience into the silent world of her illness. Just as the nurse's awareness of herself, her identity, crumbles before the silent passivity of the patient; so are our own personalities shaken up, and we too are tempted to evade the problems of the film, and retreat ourselves into a simple world, unqualified by words which impinge on existence.

The quality of the work should not elude you. There is no pleasure in seeing in film. It is important to see because it implicates you immediately in the world of a person who has opted out of life. It is unpleasant, disconcerting, disturbing. It cuts you out from love, and self-reliance; the things you accept and rely on to stabilize your life. And I think you must eventually react against these things — or cast yourself into a world as calm as the stars, and as dehumanized.

The film is marvellous and thoroughly enjoyable. Only a masochist could enjoy himself.

That, in fact, is what the film is about. Take the situation of the actress. She is living in a world where she is an interpreter of emotion — especially pain. Her instrument are words. Now, in reality, great suffering more often brings silence than poetry. Yet actors must find "in themselves" the emotional resources to portray the struggle of (let us say) Antigone to bury her brother.

The greatest paradox in an actor's life is that one role leads to another and not back to life from art. The more you act, the more you distance yourself from life and the more you become skilled in your art. The basic tools of your craft become more technical as memory distances itself further in the past. Finally a point may be reached where your own emotion turns off even while you portray the most distressing pain.

Like a memory that haunts a peaceful life, the agony of tragic art becomes far out of proportion to the experience of the artist.

Not only that, but our media batter us with unredities. What can it mean to us to see Detroit burning; or a Buddhist monk? There is something as remote about such "facts" as there is about pie-in-the-face comedy.

For the actress, this disproportion builds and builds. The suffering which is her work as an actress is so much greater than the context of carefree unreality which is its medium, that finally she must, she is forced to put violence into her life so that it will tally with her roles. Like the pawnbroker, she is haunted by pain which is not a part of her active life. She is filled with pity and terror and she must skewer her hand. She must become a masochist.

Or else remove all pain from her life. That is the escape. To muteness. The actress capable of any role resorts to playing. To being an outsider.

The film's intricacy depicts how the nurse is caught in this world and cannot escape. In a dream-like sequence she sees her face as the patient's face, or both together making one. She becomes a patient and an undefined female; she loses hold of her strength as nurse and woman.

Now, it is a paradox to reason about the film. Its statement is so direct that the film is really its own commentary. It is almost a documentary.

If we are to think about the film, however, we must use words. They are all we have even if they do take us away from the experience of the film.

But a major movement of the film leads us to a total distrust of words. After all, the outcome of the film is silence.

We admit readily the inadequacy of our words. They can only approximate meaningful experience. Their value, as Pound has implied, is only "for an instant of time". Furthermore they condition our minds; they brainwash us. Our vocabulary ceases to grow, but we must use it to think with. Unless its meanings are constantly refreshed, we are forced to interpret experience with stale empty clichés. We evaluate things over and over again in the same words. Meanwhile the mystic presents us with loves, influences, time relationships, moods, tones, variables of experience that our impoverished vocabularies have closed off to us.

We can escape; deny words, their validity, the relationships that depend on them. Reassert the mysteries encompassed in the shadow at our feet. Dismiss words, their inconsistencies, their boredom, their inadequacy. Be silent.

In the film, however, I do not see that

GODDARD ON MUSIC

Bearded Leader (you will be able to recognize him instantly: tall, emaciated, embittered, desperately unpleasant, perhaps masturbative—we know all the signs) exhorted, "Tell it like it is, boy." What? "You know ... music in Toronto. It's better for them to be vicimized by knowledge than succored by ignorance. Tell them," he whispered.

So added to the academic albatross already swinging about my neck, are my duties to this cranky, quirk-some rag.

But despite much malignment from questionable critics and a tenuous disrepute among habitués of Toronto Life circles, the musical milieu in the city, if not in a perfect state of health, survives.

While Glen Gould broods in recording studios, the Canadian Opera Company suffers, not from a surfeit of ideas, but from a paucity of talent. For both in serving the dream they prevent the deed.

My job: to avoid spreading the fatal critical disease, a kind of schizophrenia, in which the intellect ignores what the imagination pictures; and the imagination disregards what the intellect knows.

At this time "the ear favours no particular point of view," McLuhan points out. "We are envelopped by sound. It forms a seamless web around us. We say, 'Music shall fill the air.' We never say, 'Music shall fill a particular segment of the air.'"

Thirteenth century monodic rondelli, Rachmaninov's Second Piano Concerto, Ravi Shankar's Morning Ragas, all are now part of the listener's experience. We accept the one because it is quaint, another as it seems Camp, another because it is current. But we accept them all.

When Bob Dylan says:
*my poems are written in a rhythm of unpoetic distortion divided by pierced ears.
false eyelashes subtracted by people constantly torturing each other with a melodic purring line of descriptive hollowness—seen at times thru dark sunglasses and other form of psychic explosion, a song is anything that can walk by itself.
i am called a songwriter, a poem is a naked person ... some people say i am a poet.*

Or John Cage writes: "My intention has been, often, to say what I has to say in a way that would exemplify it; that would, conceivably, permit the listener to experience what I has to say rather than just hear about it." They are both emphasising the content as well as style.

Writes Kenneth Tynan: "Nothing is more crucially stupid than to dismiss the artistic achievements of a social class because one deplores its historical record." There are fewer and fewer distinctions between classical, pop, rock and jazz—the representative musics of Canada's vertical cultural, and class mosaic.

As Ned Rorem, an accomplished art-song composer, and critic, says of the Beatles; "They are colleagues of mine with different accents."

The negation of meaning and the denial of content are the latest fashion in literary and music criticism these days. If one believes that not only art, but life itself is absurd, the search for meaning must seem the ultimate inanity. Since the content of music in Canada, notably in that of the mass media, is too often one step removed from complete drivel, the Canadian intellectual balms his conscience with Marshall McLuhan; and like Salinger's Frannie, chooses the catchiest phrase to repeat over and over again—in this instance "The medium is the message."

If style is everything, one does not have to be concerned with meanings and content, and even mass-produced ephemera can be accepted as having some legitimate function to perform.

In the past my dealings with music have been from varied vantage points: in the raucous Yorkville netherworld exemplified by The Penny Farthing, The Riverboat, and Boris' Red Gas Room; over Canadian Club and Seven-Up at the Colonial, Towne and Coq d'Or Taverns; in the soporific confines of the Edward Johnson Bldg's Concert Hall, and MacMillan Theatres, from orchestra-seats at the O'Keefe Center, from behind pillars at Massey Hall.

That is to say, with the successes, trials absurdities and occasional acts of madness (vide: the string section of the Toronto Symphony) that confronted or affronted my critical sense.

My criticism has tried to consider the object, the musical work itself (whether by The Kensington Market, Gene Krupa or Dimitri Kabalevsky) as an entity, and has tried to explain what I can about its life. The second aim has been subsidiary; the relation of the work to the rest of the repertoire.

But while the construction of music-criticism and sundry aesthetic theories and theories and their comparison was a desirable cultural exercise, the theories themselves are unlikely to spread far or to hinder or help.

A more practical activity for such criticism has been the attempted sensitive dissection of particular works and performances. Not of what the composer and/or performer hoped to do, but what he did do. What means did he employ, subconscious or conscious? Did he succeed, and if his success was partial, where did he fail?

In such a dissection, the critical tools have broken as

The strange story of Art the Farmer

The owner of that multi-colored truck splattered in a psychedelic wash of colors from headlights to tailpipe, parked along St. George and Hoskin most afternoons, is none other than Art the Farmer, a third year psychology student from Victoria College. It seems that Art's vehicle has become the centre of attention for a number of Metro policemen this past week; so intrigued are they by the pretty colors that Art is now the unwilling recipient of a number of summonses for faulty brakes, horn, etc. One of Toronto's finest was so upset by the garish car that he was about to give Art a ticket for the indecent exposure of a private vehicle until he was reminded that this particular offence was not covered in the traffic by-laws.

All this is a minor preamble to Art's real hassle, for being the kind of freak that he is, he lives by the maxim that it is in the nature of a freak to freak; hassles are as common to Art the Farmer as flies are to his prize winning hogs on his farm in the easterly limits of the city. An acid wit and a buoyant mind are his means of coping with the hassles when they get somewhat rough. Indeed they are often consciously created by Art, especially when he finds himself dealing with a machine—as he did these last few days when he tried to pay his tuition fees.

A conscientious student, Art took some time from his farming chores to return to the hallowed halls. Concerned about the fact that tuition fees are still a tiresome necessity, Art decided to lodge his own personal protest against this iniquitous system—after all, what would happen if his crops failed? A farmer lives off the land and if the land doesn't produce . . . no bread, no tuition fees. Determined to freak the machine on principle and sort of hoping that those employed by the machine would enjoy the idea, Art the Farmer walked into the Bursar's office at Victoria College and announced to the clerk at the desk "I've come to pay my fees", and plopped down two huge money bags which contained more than three hundred dollars in quarters.

What followed, from the astonished and angry reaction of the clerk, to the interview with the college principal are beyond the scope of my powers or intent. In brief the machine burped and zapped in anger rather than good natured humor; a high official in the Bursar's office called him childish — Art asked him what he had against children; the registrar was friendly but non-committal; the principal seemed amused—perhaps sympathetic—but unyielding. Finally a phone call to a lawyer settled the matter temporarily—the college was not bound by law to accept payment in this outrageous form.

Outrageous? Perhaps. But any more outrageous than the fact that they have to be paid? Besides, Art the Farmer reasoned, he hoped to break the monotony of the office game by doing his thing there. They were not, it is clear, amused; it seems that flower people have little in common with power people. A confrontation of personal insanity with institutionalized insanity has resulted in the fact that Art the Farmer has not yet been accepted by the community of scholars.

The story continues however; Art has since considered the fact that cheques have been written out and accepted as legal tender regardless of the material they are written on. He is thinking perhaps of approaching the Bursar's office with a cheque written on a log, or the side of a hog . . . or . . .

Keep in touch; look for the concluding (or continuing) chapters of the story of Art the Farmer in these pages. Comes the new year and it's time to render into Caesar the second instalment of fees, maybe we could all get childish . . .

Norman Snider is alive in . . .

Some of you may remember the hassle last year involving the University College Literary Athletic Society and its publication the Gargoyle magazine. At that time the editor was castigated and roundly condemned by upset individuals who felt that the Gargoyle was obscene, pornographic and highly irresponsible. Others showed their distate by selfconsciously yawning at the material saying that the material was rather worthless and was not worth getting upset about but agreed that his literary judgment had little merit. Professors of English and top English students were called upon to support the contention that there was no literary merit in the Gargoyle. Happily, the Lit did not suspend editor Norman Snider and the Gargoyle continued to publish. Those same individuals (on both sides) might be interested to know that Snider is now the happy recipient of a $2,000 Canada Council grant to aid him in his writing.

The Art of the Lie . . .

One of the most brilliant and controversial journalistic put-ons of recent years occurred a few issues back in The Realist. The article in question was billed by the editor Paul Krassner as a reproduction of a photostatic copy of the original manuscript of William Manchester's book The Death of a President (i.e. the parts that were left out). The article, beginning in a fairly straightforward manner, credible and competent, subtly progressed to a macabre description of Lyndon Johnson's ascension to the Presidential seat immediately after the assassination of Kennedy. Many of Krassner's friends feared for his personal safety after the publication of the article; havoc ensued in the newspapers as reviewers and columnists alternately praised and condemned Krassner for his audacity; others argued in academic terms as to the veracity of the report and prided themselves on their conclusions.

Anyhow, the latest issue of The Realist contains an equally admirable sequel to the Manchester article and Tells it All; the decision to publish, his feelings of what is and what is not permissible in the cause of satire and humor are all lucidly and honestly set forth. The two articles together are a masterpiece of journalistic integrity and humor and I highly recommend both to your attention. They're available at The Book Cellar on Bay St. just below Bloor.

What men like Krassner have done to journalism and literature is described in an article in the August issue of The Evergreen Review. (Also available at the Book Cellar.) In a piece that ought to be required reading for all journalists (and journalist-haters), Seymour Krull explains, among other things, why Jimmy Breslin is an artist and a craftsman ranking with Hemingway, why realistic fiction (like Hemingway's) has given way to realistic journalism like Breslin's, Tom Wolfe's, Gay Talese's, Ralph Gleason's, etc.—New Journalism. The great impact of fiction now is in the libellous satire and marvellous absurdity of Joseph Heller (Catch 22), John Barth (The Sot-Weed Factor) — and, we could add, Paul Krassner.

this works. And because I wish to talk about the film, I implicitly reject such a standard.

For the actress, words cannot shut out love, or responsibility (to her husband, son, and the nurse who becomes dependent on her). She writes a letter in which she shows herself to be a cynical spectator — and the reaction of the nurse to this involves the patient in emotions of fear, hatred, rage, pride, and pain far greater than anything she has previously experienced. Even without words she has implicated herself in crimes which she cannot handle.

This is a hopeless picture. Her son knows his mother only as a flat screen-blowup. She has alienated her husband. Her work in mentally disastrous. Her apathy can only delay the increasingly torturous pain she must endure.

Bergman has never been so difficult to stomach. His presentation of the problem of identity is so pertinent that it is difficult to bear.

I recommend that you see it. You are the subject. But come out of it — well just come out. That's enough.

SO HERE WE GO

It has been a very violent summer. Violence of a frustrating, rackingly inconclusive variety; violence that ranged from Detroit and Plainville to Da Nang and the Syrian Hills. (Our precision is intentional; each spot mentioned reflects a much greater vision and conflict of visions than the sniping, bombing or screaming that occurred in those specific places).

However, the incidents that occurred this summer were much, much more than the annual outbursts that have created that editorial Huntley-Brinkley litany of Another Long Hot Summer. This summer, we have all had to stop dead, and re-think — or, as President Johnson suggested, pray.

As Canadians, after seeing Alan King's film Warrendale, hearing General de Gaulle (and then François Aquin and now René Levesque), watching John Diefenbaker and Robert Stanfield, absorbing Expo, — we've all had to take a position, if only at the rather superficial level of Being Canadian, And What It Means.

On the wider level, of us as human beings rather than as Canadians, and here on the Review, as thinking, feeling, writing people putting out a weekly supplement, there has been just too much that has happened, too many assaults upon our senses, feelings, and preconceived ideas to simply carry on and report on some of the distracting things there are to do this weekend.

WRITING IT DOWN

Writing is essentially a very one-dimensional thing, particularly "critical" journalism; trying to convey feelings as elusive, complex, and easily bastardized as outrage, sympathy or insight is not only superficial, but necessarily limited and unsatisfactory. The idea of sitting before a typewriter, turning the pink or green copy-paper into the Underwood roller and presuming to "criticize" works like Ingmar Bergman's Persona or Peter Watkins' The War Game (or, for that matter, Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts' Club Band, or a performance by Thelonius Monk, or a litho by Jack Nichol, or a painting by Jean Paul Lemieux, or a book by Jacques Ellul, or—) is at best humbling and totally insufficient, at worst fatuous and impertinent.

Often the only solution is to try and articulate our own — shall we say "sympathetic vibrations" with the artist; to attempt to put into words something of our experience in the presence of what seems, all too loosely, to be labelled "art", more simply just another person's experience of reality.

For really, that is what we are concerned with. Not "art," not "entertainment," not "criticism," — although these things will probably form a part of most of what we do — but rather (and this is the kind of dream-eyed ideal that can only be spoken aloud late at night, before we have actually published anything) a grasping, a putting-into-words, a solidifying and articulating of how we feel about the images and emotions and pressures and ideologies and thoughts that happen all around us all the time.

By GRAHAM
FRASER

CONFRONTING MADNESS

All this is much of what Ingmar Bergman's latest film Persona deals with: the limitations of cerebral 'understanding', the dishonesty of words, the near-impossibility of people understanding each other and communicating.

David Pape talks about this problem in his review of the film (see Films) — a masterpiece which is so powerful that one almost regrets that inescapably people will consider it in the context of Bergman's other work. David says that only a masochist can enjoy this film; I disagree, but only insofar that I feel it is impossible not to have a kind of exultation in seeing a man confront the mystic realities of human beings, as spiritual forces, in such stark, unsparring directness. Madness challenges our passive acceptance of everyday necessities, daily trivia, and the natural acceptance of the people around us as fairly normal "things" that operate in a pretty nice world as nothing else does. There are too many daily horrors, brutalities and beauties around us for us not to feel a wince of shame at our own insensitivity to the humanity of existence when we see something like Persona.

THE LIFE GAME

Moving from the specific to the general (or, as our English Department buddies would say, "from the Microcosm to the Macrocosm"), the most damning, accusing statement of the cold, logical insanity of the world we all live with and accept that I have ever seen or heard of is Peter Watkins' BBC film, The War Game. (Now showing at Cinecity, Yonge and Charles.)

The War Game traces the hypothetical — and very logical and believable — outbreak of nuclear war. Remember when we were more concerned with that than with The Flag, Centennial, and General de Gaulle? Remember "brinkmanship"? Remember the Bomarc's? Remember the model backyard bomb-shelter at College and University? Our vague forgetfulness of that period of excitement that we recall as rather foolish and hysterical proves Watkins' point: that there has been a consistent avoidance in the press, television and film of any discussion of what the threat of nuclear war means. Additional proof, if any was needed, was shown in the BBC's refusal to show the film. It now appears to be restricted to "the art film circuit".

The War, as Watkins shows it, starts almost as by the Americans?); the U.S. threatens use of "tactical nuclear weapons"; the Communist bloc cuts off access to West Berlin to show solidarity; NATO forces advance to free Berlin, with Honest John rockets armed with "small" (Hiroshima-sized) warheads, which, when the NATO forces are that: a game. A macabre, completely believable game of chess. China invades South Vietnam (in retaliation for border bombings repulsed, they release in the heat of battle. In retaliation, the USSR releases a "limited", "tactical" nuclear attack on Britain. The film then sketches the effects of these "small" (Hiroshima-sized) bombs on the English civilian population.

I suppose that there is no point in recounting the effects. Before seeing the film, I had a rough idea of what these were; probably so do you, now. To do so would merely create a rather meaningless litany that you (and I) would glance over, and ignore.

What shocked me most during the film was not the believability of the "plot", or the burned children (burns that I had only seen before in the pictures of the napalm-bombed children in Vietnam), or the irony of the "limited bombing" that had taken place; but the sudden realization that what they were describing had happened before. Not only at Hiroshima and Nagasaki, but at Hamburg and Dresden.

"The survivors will envy the dead", Bertrand Russell once said: and one sees in a flash the totalitarian unity that exists between Hiroshima and Auschwitz. Those who survive attempted genocide, whether by nuclear bomb, gas chamber or napalm, emerge less than human; the society that awaits them less than bearable.

THE FOCUS THIS SUMMER

The problems of war, or rather, of incomprehension, conflict and violence, became particularly evident and crucial this summer. The war in Israel suddenly forced the spectre of genocide, international morality and The Just War upon us again — just as the arguments over Vietnam had become locked into a horrifying conflict of incomprehending visions. Ideologically, we were all caught off guard. There was no easy solution.

Similarly, the Old Arguments collapsed in the riots in the U.S. When the army moved into Detroit (always considered a model of racial harmony and civic liberalism) and when the National Congress on New Politics (the New Left) met in Chicago, it became apparent that liberals and radicals alike have found their basic assumptions about "dealing with the Negro" profoundly shaken.

OUR PLANS

These are some of the things that I hope The Review can try and come to grips with this year. In the issues to come, we hope to have feature articles on The Israel War — by someone who spent the war in Jerusalem; Frantz Fanon, the theorist of Black Revolution in Africa who has deeply influenced Black Nationalism in Africa, the West Indies and the United States; Expo, Montreal and what is happening in Quebec, and, as they say, Much More.

In the final analysis, though, these are the thoughts and impressions of an editor yet to see his first issue go to press. I hope that all the preceding does not commit us to humorlessness, exclusiveness, or taking ourselves too seriously. Dogmatism is tiresome; earnestness becomes tedious. For all the feelings that Varsity and Review people may have of the misguided irrelevance of much that goes on here, we did decide to come back. And we've got an issue to put out each week. What we want to do and what we actually produce may be quite different — and will certainly have variety. We have some good — and very different — people. Anyone who has something to say is welcome. It might simplify things if I said that I am an enthusiastic reader of Paul Krassner in The Realist, of Ramparts, The New York Review of Books, and Le Nouvel Observateur; that my favourite musicians are Glen Gould and The Beatles; that my favourite politician is (still) René Lévesque. All that, however, is irrelevant to the fact that there are half a dozen other people here who may have very different ideas — and who will be responsible for getting articles and reviews of music, theatre, art, film and books.

A publication of this kind naturally reflects some of the collective concerns of the university. Taking education seriously is a very demanding thing — which, to my mind, involves an intellectual and moral obligation to come to grips with what is happening around us.

With luck — and a little skill and effort — this kind of writing (I was going to call it 'reporting', which may be the better word) can be very worth while, and can be honest, informative, and readable.

Robert Fulford once wrote that the last thing one wants from a critic is his opinion; I would add that what one does want from a critic, and from The Review, is perception and consciousness.

Coffey - Great

...but not good

By PETER GODDARD

"Ginger Coffey: A Bad Brew." — The Telegram
"What the borrower must do, however, is use his cup of sugar to bake a new cake." — The Toronto Daily Star "... be a good fellow and bugger off!"
from The Luck of Ginger Coffey

Much critical ink has been spilt carping over the opera, The Luck of Ginger Coffey, specially commissioned by the Canadian Opera Company, and produced for the first time last Friday at the O'Keefe with the financial assistance of Ontario Council for the Arts.

For as a centennial premiere, Ginger Coffey had in abundance all the attributes of a great opera, without the basic quality necessary to be a good one.

The music registered volleys of composer Raymond Pannell's youthful imagination; jagged, desiccated percussive effects evocative of journalism's tools—typewriters and frenetic reporters; luxuriant, Ravelian themes, notably in Veronica's lament at the conclusion of Act I; eruptive, angular rhythmic patterns reminiscent of the score for TV's Naked City; and several flaccid jazz and rock 'n' roll passages.

All of which created a paradox. Writing in a 20th-century, French idiom (Impressionistic chords, emphasis on orchestral color) Pannell's ideas for the psychological underscoring of the libretto were Wagnerian. Every staged action or mood was illuminated by a comparable—and predictable—musical setting.

In this attempt at drama per music, both elements were consequently weakened.

Librettist Ronald Hambleton had left only the naked edges of Brian Moore's book intact. "To serve my contention that the musical events in an opera should express the idea of 'simultaneous happening'," Hambleton said, "I have written two or three simultaneous scenes, expressing separate dramatic ideas, involving characters, but played on the stage at the same time."

And what was left was a libretto having at its core a character, who like Joyce's Stephen Dedalus, Fitzgerald's Dick Diver or Thurber's Walter Mitty, lives through self-deception. Through James Francis ("Ginger") Coffey's poetic gift for concocting success-fantasies he strives to overcome his inadequacies of being an immigrant in Montreal, the constant nagging of his wife Veronica, the reality that his post-pubescent daughter, Paulie, is beginning to conjure fantasies—mostly Freudian—of her own, and his inability to get, much less retain, a job.

As Coffey, Harry Theyard padded ferally and optimistically through the debris of his life, wearing that almost poetic look which seems to go with acid indigestion. With his red moustache, Tyrolean hat, fur-lined coat and deer-skin gauntlets, mouth grinning, back-slapping, he gave the impression of a character, like Cole-ridge, beset by a combination of hyper-sensitivity and insecurity, his only outlet being through fantasy.

Mignon Dunn, gave a sentimental, frank, but unchivalrous performance as Coffey's wife, whose fundamental loyalty had been ravaged by the frustration of too many half-alive years. Mercurial in personality, passionate in performance, Dunn's acting was matched by the dark forboding tones of her voice.

Of the members of the leading quartet, she was the only actor-singer to resolve the two elements and still maintain a semblance of reality.

William Pickett's Gerry Grosvenor (Coffey's 'friend' and Veronica's lover), though well sung in a rich baritone, dramatically lapsed into a semaphore, half articulated style. He seemed to grope through his part in a distracted, unavailing attempt to communicate nuance. Paulie, sung by Doreen Millman, fluttered around in a stereotyped teenage fury. Nubile, and prococious, her characterization nevertheless remained two-dimensional; more gestured than acted, more proclaimed than sung.

Most of the lesser characters were played competently but without distinction. Some never rose out of this directed obscurity for want of adequate music to sing as in Act I, Scene V—a prolonged, dramatically unessential, ensemble harrange depicting the offices of the Montreal Tribune.

Others, with the libretto's mock-profundity, as:

That's the end, Paddy

The end is a dime.

With enough dimes, you can buy a bottle.

would welcome their anonymity.

Looking through the glass of self-deception darkly Coffey's progress is from the blinding lights of the fluorescent tubing in sleazy bars and hotel lounges to the inner light of self-knowledge. The epiphany comes when Coffey is on trial for indigent exposure. ("A fait

ALAN GORDON

The question most frequently heard around the Review office is an indignant, "Who do you think you are?" in response to some report which didn't jibe with the questioner's opinion of a production. That question is usually followed with, "Well, I enjoyed it!"

What this piece proposes to do is to tell you who the reviewer thinks he is, and some of the ideas that guide his thinking.

The reviewer is a member of the audience. That's all. As a member of the audience, whether he is there by the good graces of the production's publicity department or not, he is entitled to be able to formulate his opinion on what the author was trying to say in his play. It is the author, not the star or director, who is the most important man in the theatre that night, and it is the role of the producers and the production team to do him homage, to ensure that his particular world view is presented faithfully, clearly and imaginatively.

The assumption made by the reviewer is that the author knows what he is about, and that he chose his style and method of presentation with care. There are reasons for Walt a Mlinim not being as funny or cerebral as Second City, for there being no mother-in-law jokes in Oedipus Rex, and it is the job of the director to keep inappropriate material out of the show.

Ideally, the audience member would be able to discuss character, imagery and philosophical import of the piece on the assumption that what he saw that evening was exactly what the author intended him to see.

This is of course, rarely the case. The star actor may decide that Cervantes had the insensitivity of an egomaniacal ham actor, or that the way to get laughs is to talk quickly and unintelligibly, throwing sense to the winds. Or, the director may feel that activity for the sake of activity on stage is the only way to stage a comedy, following the axiom established by Richard Lester and Blake Edwards, that Fast is Funny. Or, the designer may see that the answer to a warm Russian interior would be to play it against a stark blue cyclorama.

It is these lapses in judgment that the reviewer must report (as well, of course, as of the production's successes) and of which the audience must be aware . . . not to be picky, but for their own, and the author's protection.

Fun at the Poor Alex

By DAVID PAPE

Not many people ever go to the Poor Alex on Brunswick at Bloor. It is a small theatre with a rattling old air conditioner and reasonable prices. Specials for students. The location isn't exactly in the heart of the theatre-land; but what is in this city?

Mainly, people don't go because the Poor Alex is the sure place in Toronto to see enthusiasts. Amateurs, or starving Canadians use that small stage again and again. Unflinching, they produce steadily, while theatres close, amalgamate, try to sell to the city, all around them. Much of what is put on is poorly managed; but most productions, despite everything, have great energy.

For a Wednesday night, the Poor Alex was quite full. The laughter echoed against the air conditioner. In the audience the feeling of gaiety grew steadily, and at coffee-break (yes, they serve you free coffee at intermission) it was obvious that people were enjoying themselves. It was obvious because they were all saying so aloud.

They were enjoying a play by Dean Taylor from Toronto — but they hadn't heard of him either. And they were enjoying a well acted and well directed performance by other people they probably hadn't heard of.

To get the atmosphere of the play, No Park in the Fountain, imagine seventy minutes of Richard Needham type jokes—only with fewer characters and clearer outlines. Or imagine N. F. Simpson's Resounding Tinkie with the tempo stepped up two speeds.

The story is about three aspiring bums and one honest-to-godness hobo. The three are rich and by great good fortune keep getting richer (that's fortune as in fate, not as in money). They all envy the innocent and impoverished John whose only stumbling block is his sense of inadequacy about his name. The play's reversal leaves everyone poor and John their beneficiary; after he receives the "Dear John" letter with the bad news that he is a billionaire, he is gently ostracized.

It could all be banal were it not that Mr. Taylor's delightful facility with language keeps everything fresh and playful. "Aw, John, have a bite of Angela's banangela." So we end up with a fast moving spoof on everything, rather than a dull T.D. us social polemic. Rah.

It starts off empty. Not slowly, empty. After a pasty-faced introduction by the park clown (a man of great ambitions, especially to be a fireman of Gulliver's school) and a listless dialogue about what time it is, I thought I was in for it. Both John and Eric, the principle hoboes seemed too refined and fatuous; yet within a few minutes, I had been swept up (to strain the garbage metaphor slightly) and disposed of. The banter, the excellent pacing, the oh so corny humour, and what solid, uncluttered performances by Robert Galbraith as John, Murray Ellis as Eric, and Diane Grant as Angela, all was quickly established. At times, Ellis was physically rather weak and foppish, and facially unsubtle. Little Angela was a great foil for both hoboes and gave a wonderful performance. Marius Goldfarb, as well, playing the near-get-poor Mr. Butter, had a well managed characterization: well-spoken, well-timed, and perfectly believable. Robert Galbraith, an actor and designer, carried his leading role with versatility, good diction, and movement. Save his tendency to rely on the pout of confusion, he is constantly original.

The sets are colourful, light-hearted, and simply workable.

For those who do bother to go to Poor Alex shows, this is a must.

Irrelevant, nostalgic, nice

By SYD USPRICH

The local version of Beyond the Fringe, currently on view Upstairs at Old Angelo's, owes its acclaim to the gap it only partially fills rather than to any great merit in the show itself.

Like almost all the revues that have played the local taverns in the past few years, the show is doing extremely well. The night I saw it — a Tuesday in mid-August — the house was packed and it has received, I am told, generally good notices. In short, it's an entrepreneur's dream — a success financially and critically.

Yet under an objective analysis the show itself is only mildly entertaining. The material, mainly that of the British revue genre so much in vogue some years ago, seems rather beside the point in today's post-Beatles, post-McLuhan, post-Caucasian, post-Leary — the list is endless — world. It twits its share of the old obligatory targets — homosexuality, royalty, class distinctions, etc., but the middle-aged blandness of it all is only occasionally dispelled by a shaft of real wit.

These flashes of genuine humor — an adroitly turned phrase, a piercing insight, a touch of black comedy — sparkle from time to time but hardly provide a rousing evening. The corrosive satire of, say, The Establishment, or the social insight of The Second City or Feiffer are the standards we've grown accustomed to and beside them, this version of Beyond the Fringe remains largely irrelevant.

It is a low-key show whose slow unravelling contains few glimmering threads. Still, given the proper manic air and crisp, bubbling performance (as in its original incarnation), the show could yet metamorphose into a lively romp. Unfortunately, that is not the case here.

Barry Baldaro, puckish and irrelevant, and the gaunt, funereal Don Cullen are talents familiar to Toronto audiences for their fine work in countless Village Revues. They are accomplished performers, always worth watching, but rise to no great heights this time.

Another familiar face is that of Roy Wordsworth, who makes a more valuable contribution. With his pixieish look and put-upon air, he is a delight. Though new to me as a revue performer, Mr. Wordsworth has that appealing quality that makes him perfect for the genre — and a welcome addition to it.

Stuart Hamilton, the weakest of the group, is responsible also for the show's four musical numbers. Carrying on at the piano like a cross between Jerry Lewis and Liberace, his frantic and flamboyant mugging gets some laughs, but if that's the only measure he could fall off the piano stool and accomplish the same result. In fact, except for the Kurt Weill take-off, the cleverness of which is obscured by his grimacing, he'd be better off doing so.

Despite all this, however, the show partially fills a two-fold gap in the local entertainment scene. Therein lies the secret of its success. Currently, there are few worthwhile theatrical alternatives and first-rate revues are always scarce. More important, the cabaret setting provides a conducive atmosphere and a refreshing change to the usual evening out. That's the real secret. With my beautiful blonde companion on one side and cool gin-enriched drink on the other, I'll admit I had a not unpleasant evening. But with those two prerequisites, re-runs of the Late Show are similarly enjoyable.

I could have danced the whole night through

You could have, too. Only why did the dance have to be at that particular time of month? Funny how the most important events in your life so often happen on the wrong days of the month. But there's no need to worry about that any longer. With Tampax tampons you feel poised and confident. Worn internally, they let you fully enjoy whatever you do. When you do it. It's the easier way. With the dainty, hygienic applicator your hands never need touch the tampon, and both applicator and tampon can be readily flushed away. Tampax tampons...the feminine way. For a more feminine you.

Love, knowledge and pity

By DON WATERFALL

The Autobiography of Bertrand Russell 1872 — 1914. McClelland & Stewart; $7.95.

Russell writes in the Prologue of his book, "Three passions, simple but overwhelmingly strong, have governed my life: the longing for love, the search for knowledge, and unhearable pity for the suffering of mankind." In a discussion that occasionally seems to wander but is always written with wit and economy, he traces these themes until his forty-second year. The first is the story of his often turbulent emotional life; the second concerns his intellectual development; and the third expresses itself in his ethical and political attitudes. They are set against the background of Victorian and Edwardian England, aristocratic, imperial, proud, teeming with intellectual and political controversy.

Russell was born into the upper reaches of England's ruling class. Both his parents were dead by the time he was four, and from 1876 on he was raised at Pemroke Lodge, the home of his aged grandfather, Lord John Russell, who had been one of Victoria's prime ministers. Lady Russell, twenty-odd years younger than he husband, was responsible for the greater part of that upbringing. Bertrand's mother had held a salon, attended by England's philosophers "from Mill downwards". Liberal Prime Minister Gladstone was a constant visitor in his home. Accordingly, Russell was heir to a tradition which, in good ways and bad, shaped his character, outlook, and interests. It gave him moral beliefs which obstructed his attempt to find love, and an intellectual and political milieu in which to seek knowledge and serve mankind.

Reverence for learning was a habit deeply ingrained in Russell's class from the Renaissance. On the one hand, it produced a stunning list of scientific, literary, and political achievements. On the other, it glorified the abstract, disciplined personality at the expense of natural emotions and become associated with moral rigidity. This combination had the curious effect of turning children prematurely into old men — J. S. Mill and Alexander Pope spring to mind as other examples — and Russell fell victim to this curse. He recounts his loneliness as an adolescent growing up in a house full of old people, some of them mad, the shame he felt at his sexual interests, his thoughts of suicide, and the release of his energies into Romantic contemplation of nature and into metaphysics. In an appendix consisting of private notes he made in 1888, he expounds a not very exceptional doctrine of God as first cause and mechanical determinism, and concludes, "It is difficult not to become reckless and commit suicide, which I believe I should do but for my people."

Cambridge, where Russell went on a scholarship in 1890, was one of the focal points of English learning. If Mill and Herbert Spencer were vaguely in his background and if private tutoring introduced him to his ancient and English predecessors in literature and science, Cambridge brought him into contact with the intellectual and cultural lights of his own day. Whitehead was his teacher and friend. Their long collaboration resulted, in 1910, in Principia Mathematica. Ellis McTaggart, the idealist, G. E. Moore, Lytton Strachey, J. M. Keynes, Gilbert Murray, the Trevelyan brothers, and a host of future diplomats were his companions. He corresponded with F. H. Bradley, William James, Santayana, Georg Cantor, and others. His brilliance in the philosophy of mathematics brought him to the attention of Coutourat and Peano, and from the latter he learned the notation which he used in the logical system of the Principia. In 1913 began a close friendship with the novelist, Joseph Conrad.

However, Russell's hook is by no means an intellectual autobiography. He says little of the doctrines before his mind. All through this period, he was growing and changing emotionally. In 1894 he married Alys Smith, an American five years older than he, and she and Cambridge settled him for a time. His need for Alys proved to be only temporary: older, stable, and sexually naive, she afforded him the security he required to work his way from under the cloak of guilt that he wore from childhood. The climax of the volume involves an intense emotional experience which assailed Russell in 1901. As he watched Mrs. Whitehead undergoing severe pain, he was overcome by an apprehension of the loneliness and isolation of every person. For the first time he was confronted by his own loneliness and the superficiality of the love he and Alys shared. Soon afterward he realized he no longer loved her, and, though they continued to live together till about 1911, he began to seek deeper relationships elsewhere.

The experience had a revolutionary effect on his politics. Like his family, Russell was a Liberal imperialist in the 1890's. He had never been far from a radical tradition, however, and, like his parents, he absorbed an interest in the rights of woman and in birth control from Mill. He flirted with the Webbs, Sidney and Beatrice, the intellectual founders of English socialism. But his experience of 1901 overwhelmed him with the pity he speaks of in his Prologue. He writes of his experience, "...I went through some such reflections as the following: the loneliness of the human soul is unendurable; nothing can penetrate it except the highest intensity of... love....; it follows that war is wrong, that a public school education is abominable, that the use of force is to be deprecated, and that in human relations one should penetrate to the core of loneliness in each person and speak to that." Russell worked tirelessly in the suffragist movement, even standing unsuccessfully for Parliament and went to jail in World War I for his pacifist beliefs.

The preceding remarks already have given an idea of the orderliness of Russell's book. It is a first class work of literature. At the end of each chapter he appends a number of letters relating to the time. Accordingly, they do not interrupt the flow of the narrative, while, at the same time, they offer documentation interesting in its own right. Russell is here as in all his writings an elegant stylist. Its patrician nature, simplicity, and clarity lead his reader to compare him to his younger contemporaries in English letters, Forster, Huxley, and Waugh. Like them, he gives a concise and penetrating portrait of his class, of its glory and of its decay. His character sketches are arresting and finely drawn. His remarks about Keynes provide an example: "Keynes's intellect was the sharpest and clearest that I have ever known. When I argued with him, I felt that I took my life in my hands, and I seldom emerged without feeling something of a fool. I was sometimes inclined to feel that so much cleverness must be incompatible with depth, but I do not think this feeling was justified." Russell's skill in this department reminds one of Samuel Johnson and Pope.

It is a shock to realize that Russell was already a middle-aged man in 1914, when our parents' era was just beginning. This voice, speaking to us out of a remote past, permeated with hundreds of years of intellectual tradition, once exercised in behalf of women's votes, when the Boer War was a raging issue, is the same voice that has spoke out on the threat of nuclear warfare to a generation he will not live to see reach adulthood. A picture of a man begins to emerge in the strange setting, a picture still incomplete but not without unity and design. We are left with the hope that its artist has enough years remaining to finish it.

Coffey — cont'd

pisser juste dans la grande/porte du Royal Family Hotel").

Exposure, of any kind, is what Coffey fears, and needs, most. When he and his wife accept things as they are, and not as they might be, the trial, and the opera, are over.

Throughout, Lawrence Schafer's sparse, symmetrical stage sets and projections were imaginative in concept but not particularly effective in performance. With all the action taking place from stage-left to stage-right any attempt at depth was lost. The night-club set, with its winking strobe-light, and fluorescent pallor, was an exception, however, as Wallace Russell's lighting, in effect, turned the entire auditorium into a dumpy discotheque.

Traditionally the exacting circumstances of an opera libretto has been the means by which a composer has launched himself out into a new world of sound. The subject of Electra and Tristan and Isolde objectified and validated Strauss' and Wagner's emancipated dissonance: they could be at first understood through the drama, then comprehended musically.

Opera is above all a musical art. And while Hamblen's libretto was, at best, adequate, Pannell's music had to supply the flesh for the dramatic skeleton. Being more responsible for the work's success Pannell is all the more responsible for its failure.

We may just have outdone ourselves this year with our fall collection of sweaters. For one thing, we have the sweater shown . . . and that's pretty impressive. To us it is because it's by a company in Scotland called Lyle & Scott. They have been making the most beautiful Shetlands for over 100 years. We have a whole lot of these at $13.95. Not bad? But we didn't stop with Lyle & Scott sweaters. We bought them from Austria, England, Italy, and have many knitted for us right here. Wait till you see the new yarn mixtures. Bulkies, V Necks, Crew or Turtle Necks. We wish we had more space to tell you of all the fall goodies we have managed to pack into Studio 267. All we can say when we look around at it all is we are eminently ready for fall season. Besides, judging from the way things have been going — prices may not be lower in the next 100 years.

In the future, this page will be The Bagpage; reserved for the section editors to briefly say what's happening this weekend. Unfortunately, this week proved to be complete chaos; no free backpage, no photos, missed deadlines . . . you name it. Hopefully, this page, in quickly and breezily informing us What's On, will liberate the rest of The Review to deal in greater depth with some of the more interesting things that are happening, without trying to compete with the daily papers. We won't set out to Cover Everything; hopefully, we will be able to be thoughtful and imaginative about what we do cover. For all Review staff, and anyone interested, there will be a meeting today in the Review office at 1:00 o'clock.

MUSIC—from Review 4

soon as they encountered living tissue. The apparatus is nothing, the specimen all.

* * *

In the search for the mysterious element of 'contact' in a work or production, it is traditional for musical soothsayers to inspect the entrails of each new season's production for auguries of the future. To make predictions is rash, but in the case of Canadian Opera Company's present productions, unavoidable.

After hearing three of the productions presented so far—The Luck of Gigger Coffey, Il Trovatore, The Barber of Seville—it seems that the onus put upon the company has been overbearing. Like the drama at Stratford, the COC has engendered a style. Each production has been an experiencing of expectations; the only element of apprehension introduced is in the wonderment of how many notes the coloratura will fluff.

Techniques change, but themes do not. The stature of a performance will depend upon a company's honesty and skill but its cornerstone is already laid. It is severe understatement when this company's general director, Herman Geiger-Torel states, "The Canadian Opera Company has of necessity been somewhat conservative in the past..."

The COC style is an amalgam of tempestuous, wood-ed-legged tenors, who like Francisco Lazaro's Manrico, in Trovatore, and to a lesser degree Perry Price as Count Almaviva in Rossini's Barber, gesticulate rather than act; of coy sopranos who flounce rather than flounce around stage in coquettish courtiere ribbons and cast asides as if they were intended to be heard on TV's Petticoat Junc tion (as Colette Boky's Rosina, in last Monday's Barber) or shift awkwardly between the stage-pieces leaving all dramatic import, unfortunately to their voices (as in Jeannine Crader's portrayal of Leonora in Saturday's Trovatore).

Or the style may be construed to sloppy, monochromatic lighting techniques, monolithic somber sets that unchivalrously wobble at the slightest stage action. This uniformity of method even precipitated in the English translations of The Barber's Italian text. Thus Almaviva's line.

Hhi di casa? buona gente? Hhi di casa? Niuno mi sente, sounded, "Wassa matter? Doncha hear me?"

Sensuous, funny, verbally luxuriant, prone to immersion into period slapstick, The Barber of Seville was conceived of by director Irving Guttman as an eighteenth-century Spanish rocco Beverly Hillbillies. Heavy-handed buffoonery quashed the work's light-weight wit.

Artistic director, Rex Harrower's Il Trovatore received artistic resuscitation from Verdi's stream of melodies, and a dramatically lean, but musically exciting performance of Count di Luna by Victor Bruan.

But Bruan's portrayal was not only matched but surpassed by that of Mignola Dunn as the guarrulous gypsy matron, Azucena. Her performance was fiercely lucid, and she beautifully welded the old woman's madness, maternal love and passionate vindictiveness into a welded, interlocking performance of surprising depth and sudden excitement.

Twenty more Dunn's, Braun's and outlandish comics as Jan Rubes, and the Canadian Opera Company's style would be that demanded by the various operas and not of a brain-washed public and idea-tossed directors.

GO train may reduce student fare

Southern Ontario students may soon benefit from a reduced students fare of the government of Ontario transit system, says a Progressive Conservative MPP.

Alan Lawrence, member for Toronto-St. George, which encompasses the Victoria College and St. Michael's College residences, said Wednesday he expected a statement soon from the government on such a scheme.

Mr. Lawrence told the campus PC club the John Roberts government has created a "shattering precedent" by allowing out-of-town students to vote in ridings in which they are located during the student year.

PC club President Ernie McCullough (IV Vic) said the club will hold a think-in on the technological society in January.

Film will replace U Thant at IM

A filmed speech by U Thant, secretary-general of the United Nations, will be shown at this year's International Teach-In.

Thant was asked to speak at the Oct. 20-22 forum on Religion and International Affairs but suggested a movie when his crowded schedule precluded his coming to Toronto.

Two former presidents of the UN General Assembly, Dr. Alex Quaison-Sackey of Ghana and Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan of Pakistan, are among the 11 speakers who will attend the Teach-In.

Former Rhodesian Prime Minister Garfield Todd, a strong critic of Ian Smith's breakaway government, also will speak if he is allowed to leave his home by Rhodesian authorities.

FROM THE HINTERLANDS

Queens students occupy Kingston hotel

KINGSTON (CUP) — Ninety Queen's University students are living in a downtown Kingston hotel due to an overflow from Queen's residences.

The La Salle Hotel, home for the students, has long been associated with Queen's. When the hotel's management heard of the housing difficulties at Queen's, it offered to help.

Forty-five rooms were rented to the university for the academic year. Students rent them from the university at standard residence fees. The students are reported to be happy with the arrangement.

University officials say the same arrangements might be necessary next year if residence projects are not completed on schedule.

U of T prof. appointed to Trent

PETERBOROUGH (VNS)—A University of Toronto professor has been appointed the first principal of Lady Eaton College in Trent University.

Professor Marjory Seeley will take up her post July 1, 1968, President T. H. B. Symons announced yesterday.

Prof. Seeley now is assistant professor at U of T's school of social work.

Lady Eaton College, first women's college on the campus, is the fourth residential and teaching college to be built at Trent.

UBC officials make housing appeal

VANCOUVER (CUP)—Faced by a critical shortage of housing, University of British Columbia authorities have issued an urgent appeal for housing accommodation.

An appeal was issued by the housing committee to landlords and householders to register any rooms or suites or houses available anywhere in the Vancouver area.

Trueman appointed chancellor of UWO

LONDON, ONT. (VNS)—Dr. Albert W. Trueman of Ottawa has been appointed chancellor of the University of Western Ontario for a four-year term, it was announced last week.

Dr. Trueman, 65, retired in June as dean of UWO's University College.

Blues' Austris Liepa in action against embattled opponent.

Blues face tough debut

The Soccer Blues will face their first and perhaps stiffest opposition Saturday at 11 o'clock on the back campus when they play an exhibition game against the Toronto and District Soccer Coaches' eleven.

This team boasts in its lineup, noted professionals such as Alex Marshall, Bobby Nichol, and Alan Harvey, all of whom played for Toronto City in the now defunct Eastern Canada Professional Soccer League.

Blues, nevertheless, do not lack talent and in the opinion of their coach, could surprise the visitors. They will have to come up with a sharp, fast-passing game to overcome experience, but they are capable of it.

Blues are, in fact, so talented this year, coach Ernie Glass has had to postpone choosing the team till after their first two exhibition games.

In the starting lineup for tomorrow's game will be goalies Erwin Stach (I Law), Stan Bogucki (SMC I); full-backs Alan Cragg (IV APSC) and Bill Nepoliuk (III PHE); half-backs Ormond Mendes (III SMC), Eric Sereda (IV PHE), Tom Johnston (SGS) and Dwight Taylor (II UC); Ron Muir (I Food Science), Austris Liepa (IV APSC), Frank Soppelsa (IV SMC), Jim Lefkos (III PHE), Graham Shiels (SGS), Jim Laverty (II Scar.), and John Gero (II UC).

Swimmers prepare to defend tank crowns

By DAVE POWELL

The University of Toronto swim team begins training next Monday in preparation for defense of their OQAA and Canadian Intercollegiate swimming titles. Coach Juri Daniel wants the team to have a good two months of solid practice behind them before their first exhibition meet against Ryerson and York on November 18.

Blues will be without three of the stars who have been instrumental in the team's success of recent years. Graeme Barber, Peter Richardson, and Mike Chapelle have all left the squad through graduation. Returning to the team will be stars Theo van Ryn and Gaye Stratten, who sared top honours at the Canadian Intercollegiate championships last spring. Veterans Rod Campbell, Chris Fisher, Alan Pyle, Cliff Gentle, Steve Gering, and Chris McNaught will be back as well as sophomores Gord Porter, Doug McIntosh, Paul Fisher, Bob Heatley, Klaus Koch, and Bob Watt. Promising newcomers to the squad are Terry Bryant, who specializes in the freestyle, butterfly, and individual medley, and breast-stroker George Goldsmith.

Pool Patter . . . Van Ryn and Stratten represented Canada at the World Student Games in Tokyo this past summer, and fared well against the world's best swimmers . . . the OQAA championships will be held in Toronto this spring, and the Canadian Intercollegiate meet will be staged at McMaster University.

Zimmerman seeks first net title

Mike Zimmerman, three time runnerup in the interfaculty tennis tournament, is first seeded for this year's championship as the 1967-68 intermural sports program swings into action.

Zimmerman, beaten by Peter Burwash, last year's OQAA singles champion, heads a list of more than fifty racquetmen in the chase for the coveted MacEachern Cup.

Other seeds in order of placement are Paul Kent, a member of last year's Varsity team, freshmen Tom Borecky, Don Steele, a ranking Canadian junior, and Gord Gibbins, Frank Blyth, Dick Levy, and Harvey Derrington.

First matches are scheduled for Tuesday morning at the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club with the finals planned for the start of the following week.

A team championship will also be up for grabs with the Victoria Tennis Club Cup the top prize. New College is defending champion.

Blues on boob tube

Varsity Blues football fans who prefer to watch their heroes in the comfort of their own beer-stocked pads, are in for a 'happy' season.

Courtesy of CHCH-TV in Hamilton, boob tube worshippers will be able to take in all but one of Blues' regular season games via the scan line route.

Sportscaster Norm Marshall and crew will telecast all of Blues' home games from Varsity Stadium as well as two away games — at Western and at Queen's. Only Blues' final game at McGill will not be seen on TV. It seems Channel 11 officials refuse to let their employees and equipment on the McGill Weekend train.

To-morrow's game against McMaster in Hamilton will not be televised, nor will next week's home exhibition match with Western.

Colour addicts can put away their degaussers for this season as all games will be shown in black and white.

(Pre-season Game)

Blues' first test against Mac

By BOB CLARK

Tomorrow, Varsity Blues get their first test of the 1967 football season.

Coach Ron Murphy's charges travel to the steel city in their first pre-season exhibition game, against McMaster University Marauders. Last year, college sports fans were rather shaken, as it took Blues two desperation touchdown passes in the last 44 seconds to eke out a 26-20 win against the supposedly weaker Ontario Intercollegiate team.

This year, however, coach Murphy intends to change his strategy. In last year's exhibition, Murphy substituted whole units, some of which were made up almost entirely of raw rookies who would see little or no action in the regular season. But Murphy wanted to take a good look at all of his recruits.

This year, the Blues' coach intends to start with his first stringers — or "Blue unit," and substitute individuals rather than entire units.

Another innovation will be increased emphasis on a ground attack rather than the pass.

"I think we passed too much," coach Murphy said. "This year I want about 70 per cent running and 30 per cent passing."

Instead of the traditional "T" formation, Murphy intends to use the "I" formation throughout the season. The "I" lends itself a little more readily to a running game. Instead of two halfbacks, a fullback and an end, the "I" incorporates three backs, one of which lines up directly behind the centre and the quarterback, and a flanker, whose position varies with the direction of play.

While the defence of Blues seems as strong as last year, Varsity's offence appears to lack the depth and experience of its predecessor.

Bryce Taylor was an almost irreparable loss to the offence. Without Taylor's passing and quarterbacking experience, Blues appear weaker at this spot, and this might be the reason Murphy is concentrating more on a running game.

Bob Amer, despite his years of experience at Carleton, appears to lack good running ability, and although Vic Alboini is a good play caller, he may be hampered by his small size.

Blues have also lost an invaluable element in guard Bob Pampe, as well as linemen experience with the departures of Wayne Parsons and Don Gibson.

Moving up to the line will be Gord Whitaker and Tom Reed, who were stand-bys for Blues last year but did not see action. Another new face will be Jack Rosati, a rookie freshman from St. Michael's College School.

In the backfield, regular halfback Andy Szandtner is gone, but the situation seems as strong as ever. Bill Stankovic, a recruit from McMaster who also handles field goals, will add considerable strength to go with last year's leading rusher and co-holder of the scoring crown, Mike Raham. Halfback Curtis McQuire, another former stand-by who is attempting to crack the starting lineup may not see action because of injury problems.

For this reason, Murphy may have to go with defensive backs Glen Markle or Pete Broadhurst, who, if they show well enough, could be moved permanently to the offensive unit.

But there are still many other veterans that could move into the offensive backfield. Nick Di Giuseppe, a regular halfback last year until a pulled hamstring took him from the lineup for much of the latter part of the season, has returned. Any of veterans Dave Church, Riivo Ilves or Mike Wright could switch from defensive positions to add extra depth. And newcomer Ron Kishimoto is not without experience, having played for Lakeshore last year.

The incomparable Mike Eben, pass-catching acrobat extraordinaire will continue to cause headaches for the opposition. Senior intercollegiate teams have double-teamed Eben almost since his first step in college ball. McMaster didn't last year, and it cost them the ball game, for it was Eben who caught both Taylor passes in the last 44 seconds to give Blues the win.

While there are many question marks in Blues' offence this year, most will be settled in the pre-season game tomorrow at Mac, and at Varsity Stadium next week against Western. PROGNOSTICATIONS: Despite rumours of imported strength from the Mac camp, and an astounding 35-0 win by Mac over University of Saskatchewan, Blues should win by at least 10 points.

More than an exhibition?

— ROD MICKLEBURGH

"Saturday's game is officially termed an 'exhibition'. Are you treating it as such?"

"Hell no!" immediately retorted Mac coach, Jack Kennedy with an air of genial belligerence.

"This game is an exhibition, and we would be foolish to play it any other way," said Varsity Blues' mentor Ron Murphy.

This readily-apparent contrast between Murphy and Kennedy makes tomorrow afternoon's contest in Hamilton an interesting spectacle for the armchair quarterback.

Last year, with the teams clashing in Varsity Stadium, the same thinking prevailed. After that game, which Blues won in ridiculous last-second fashion, 26-20, some criticism flowed Murphy's way for using rookie units as much as he did. The result was dull, uninspired football on behalf of Blues until the final five minutes when the vets came on to vanquish the visitors with three touchdowns.

Murphy answered the cowering critics with, for him, a veritable oration: "Sure we made a helluva lot of mistakes. That's what exhibition games are for. When they see the movies of those mistakes, it's worth a billion words. Most of the game the rookies were out, but it's the only way to give them the experience. I'd prefer the mistakes made now, rather than in the regular season."

But for a team like McMaster, relegated to the inferior Ontario Intercollegiate League, a game against Toronto is practically the highlight of the season. One need only have glimpsed the incredible ecstasy exhibited by Mac players last year when they frolicked to a 20-7 third-quarter lead, and then, their deep-seated, glowering gloom after the final whistle.

Marauders cannot afford the luxury of raw cookies on the field. Elaborated Kennedy: "This is always a big game for us. Toronto represents an image to the team which has to be knocked off. The guys remember last year, and we're really looking forward to playing Toronto at home. You can bet our boys, both offensively and defensively, will be giving a hundred per cent out there at all times."

Murphy has modified strategy to some extent from last year (he will substitute individuals rather than complete units), but he resolutely determines to use all 44 players on the roster during the game. Kennedy almost certainly will go exclusively with his best.

And Marauders' "best" is rather imposing this year. They could be very tough meat for Blues to chew through. Because this is the last year McMaster will be offering its special one-year phys-ed course, hordes of brawny specimens are flocking to Hamilton's intellectual hotspot. Many of them are seasoned football players.

Prize catch for Kennedy is Dick Waring. For the past three years, Waring was the regular quarterback for Bowling Green University in Ohio, earning Little All-America mention in his final season. He will be ably backed by sophomore Pete Quinlan, who has improved immensely from 1966, and Jim Chiarelli, an old quarterbacking foe of Blues' Bob Amer, from University of Ottawa.

At fullback is John Watson from Waterloo Lutheran, son of Whipper. Other backs include 200 lb. Jim Handson from Toronto, local yokel Jay Graydon (99 in the hundred), all-star wingback Johnny Krawczyk, and Cass Quinn, fresh from three years of ball-toting at Loyola. A pair of 6'3" ends, sophomore Mike Brierly, and Lutheran's Tom Allan, who also punts, bind a smooth offensive line, built around SIFL all-star centre last year, Don Brescacin.

Defensively, Kennedy claims to be even stronger. Bolstered by such stalwarts as Vern Lucyk, who served brilliantly at Western for many years, Mark Timpany, last season's regular quarterback, and Todd Reynolds, a tough, tough 150 lb. package of nails from the Maritimes, the Mac defense has allowed a mere eleven points in its two games to date. So Blues may have trouble moving the ball, especially handicapped as they are by relative unfamiliarity with the new I-formation.

On paper Mac looks great. Kennedy will use all of his 'imports' in a tremendous bid to upset the Hogtown rivals. His rookies and lesser lights will warm the warps of the bench. Next season when Mac moves into the SIFL there will be none of these brilliant 'imports' around. Who will play then, Mr. Kennedy? Exhibition games should be played for future success, not immediate transient glory.

Give the 'rooks' a chance, Jack.

Impressive veterans give scullers good chance for rowing championship

By JIM MORRISON

If early workouts are any indication, the Varsity rowing team for 1966-67 should be one of the strongest yet. Although there was a big turnover last year, a hard core of remaining veterans should ensure success.

So far, two eights are practising, and it is hoped that another two can be filled by freshmen and other interested newcomers.

Prominent among the lightweight scullers now in workouts are Paul Heron, Jack Gibbons, Terry Skrien and Bill Allison. All four looked good with the Toronto Argonaut Rowing Club at the Canadian Henley Regatta in St. Catharines.

Skrien and Heron improved on this performance as members of the winning lightweight cox four at the American Henley in Philadelphia.

Other Toronto Argos out with Blues are George Sandala and D. Schiener, a heavyweight oarsman.

Geoff Wright, another heavyweight, had an outstanding summer, representing Canada at the Pan-American Games in Winnipeg.

The only weakness evident among the scullers is in the coxswain department. Tim Sheffield, still another Argo, is the only experienced cox to turn out. However Blues hope that a former Cornell coxswain now at Toronto will join the team.

The League final in rowing is on November 4. The member universities, McMaster, Ryerson, Western, York, and always tough Brock University, will join Toronto in four preliminary regattas as preparation for the final.

FRAT SAVES SWEDE AS HOUSING CRISIS EASES

By SHERRY BRYDSON
and SUE HELWIG

With most students registered in their courses and the university settling into another academic year, the housing crisis has calmed to a dull roar.

Mary Jaffary, head of the University housing service, is still swamped with students and faculty looking for accommodation.

However, most of the people who desperately needed accommodation were able to find at least temporary quarters, the housing service reports.

There are still a number of unfortunates. One student arrived 10 days ago from Stockholm and if it had not been for the kindness of a fraternity he would likely be spending tonight in Queen's Park.

He has spent the last 10 days and all of his money, looking for a room and kitchen relatively close to campus.

His main problems seem to be prices and his sex.

"I can't pay $20 a week for a room, and most of the places said they wanted girls only," he said.

He had $3 to last him until his bank draft arrived from Sweden when the fraternity befriended him.

Most colored students report they have had few problems. The housing service will not list a landlord who discriminates on any basis.

A West Indian who has had past experience with room-hunting said, "I always phone beforehand and tell them that I am colored."

"It is always best to let the landlord know what to expect."

Ten Chilean couples who arrived last week found apartments within several days with the help of the International Student Centre. However, one couple had a child and their experiences with Toronto landlords led the husband to comment, "In this country, children are equal to dogs."

One graduate student in civil engineering reports that it took him one week, 40 phone calls and 10 personal visits to find suitable accommodation.

He wanted a room but "they were all too far away or too expensive." He found that many of the rooms were dirty and that kitchen and bathroom facilities were below par.

At least one engineer does not believe that a housing problem exists. In 10 minutes he found three furnished rooms within walking distance of campus.

UWO Tent-in protest

LONDON, Ont. (Special) —University of Western Ontario students yesterday staged a "tent-in" to draw attention to the student housing crisis in the London area.

Students have pitched five tents on the front lawn of University College and say they are prepared to stay until tomorrow night.

The protest is being organized by the 15-man Housing Research Committee formed nearly two weeks ago in response to a challenge by students council president Peter Lawson.

Committee chairman Kel Sherkin says housing conditions are so bad that:

Only 56 students have been able to find accommodation;

300 students are dissatisfied with the accommodations they do have;

One student has been forced to sleep at a railway station.

The University housing service, however, claims there is "still plenty of accommodation" in city areas farthest away from the university.

An official at the housing bureau blames the landlords who have "sent prices soaring because they know how desperate the demand is."

OUS accuses hypocrisy, attempts to draw education into Oct. 17 election

By SUE HELWIG

The Ontario Union of Students has published a 33-page booklet dealing with the problems of post-secondary education in an attempt to inject the education issue into the campaign for the Oct. 17 provincial election.

Entitled, "Mr. Politician, please tell me..." the booklet offers a critical examination of government policy on university government, student aid programs and community colleges.

OUS hopes that the booklet will serve students "as a starting reference point for asking themselves and their political representatives questions about our educational system and our society in Ontario."

On the question of university government, the booklet asks whether support for a university's board of governors and president instead of the academic community is the established policy.

This seems to have been the case in the recent failure of the student council and faculty association at the University of Western Ontario to win direct representation on the board of governors, the booklet says.

William Davis, minister of education has said the booklet says, that "there is great merit in having the university community itself endeavour... to come up with solutions as to what the role of the student in university government should be."

Yet, in the Western case the solution offered by the students and faculty was overruled by a joint committee of the senate and board of governors of the university.

OUS accuses the Conservative government of hypocrisy in its student award plan.

The awards program, says a government brochure, "has been developed to ensure that every person with the ability and desire to pursue a program of education beyond the secondary school level will have sufficient funds."

The brochure then says the responsibility for removing financial barriers to post-secondary education

Freshie undergoes Skule dance, lives to tell the tale...

By SUSAN HODGSON

I, an unsuspecting, innocent young freshie, went to the Skule dance Thursday night—and lived!

The Varsity city editor leered as he told me that the annual engineering frosh dance at the Drill Hall was a must for the freshman girl wanting to meet a man.

He promised hundreds of love-starved engineers drooling to make my acquaintance. Reluctantly I agreed and trotted off pen in hand, to the Drill Hall.

Sure enough, there were the love-starved engineers — about 200 of them. Unfortunately for me, the girls hadn't yet arrived and my entrance was greeted with wild enthusiasm.

Several frosh descended on me and attempted to drag me off in several directions at once.

Fortunately the entrance of the Brute Force Committee distracted their attentions momentarily, and I was able to retreat to the washroom to await the arrival of more females.

When I re-entered the room about 15 minutes later, the girls were a little better represented — now about 20 girls facing 400 boys. But no one was dancing as the band was not scheduled to appear until 9:30.

Meanwhile the girls chatted in groups and the engineers stood around en masse.

When the band finally appeared the seniors began bellowing instructions to the frosh, threatening push-ups if they weren't all dancing within five minutes.

A few people began to dance — but not many were frosh.

I had long since decided that this dance was not all it had been made out to be.

I squirmed through the front door — strictly a one-way doorway as far as girls were concerned — and made my way back to my home for an exciting night's sleep.

LSD as safe as aspirin: Hoffer

Dr. Abram Hoffer, a noted authority on LSD, claimed Friday the drug is no more dangerous than aspirin.

Dr. Hoffer, who was among the first to find therapeutic uses for LSD, was appearing on Pierre Berton's program Under Attack, being filmed at Convocation Hall.

"The headlines," Dr. Hoffer told a panel, "scream when a child takes a sugar cube coated with LSD by mistake.

"Yet the child who is killed by an overdose of aspirin rates only a back-page story.

"I find it hard to see why we are so disturbed about a certain chemical. A scalpel in the hands of the wrong man can be much more dangerous."

Dr. Hoffer said only two per cent of 500 cases he has studied had any prolonged side-effects. None were very serious.

Alan Kamin (III UC) said: "LSD is dangerous, but for me the destination justifies the hazard of the voyage."

Kamin, co-chairman of UC's psychedelic festival this February, appeared on the panel as a user of LSD. He stressed that his experiences with the drug did not take place on the University of Toronto campus.

Kashtan hopes for Communist control

William Kashtan, the general secretary of the Canadian Communist Party, said Thursday he hoped to form a government in Canada without violent overthrow.

Speaking at the taping of the television show "Under Attack", at Convocation Hall, Mr. Kashtan said he was a communist because there was a "need to express the aspirations of the people".

Continually harassed by the student panel comprised of Pete Szekely (III UC), Arthur English (IV APSC) and Paul Fromm (II SMC), he tried to explain the Communist party program for Canada.

He said he had hoped for a more tolerant hearing from the small audience, which included a hanna-waving contingent from the rightist Edmund Burke Society.

His program included the acceptance of the two-nation policy and the nationalization of American industries in Canada, he said.

SAC renames Education commission

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday endorsed changing the name of the education commission to the cultural affairs commission.

D'Arcy Martin, new cultural affairs commissioner, said he wasn't necessarily changing his interests to cultural affairs, but merely thought the new commission would include education in a wider context.

SAC will maintain an active education committee, it was learned later from council members.

Bob Bossin (III Inn) said at the meeting: "This university lags behind others in the study of educational matters and theory."

Porter calls for exercise of power

Gary Porter, president of the campus Young Socialist Club, last week called on students to exercise their power on campus.

In a speech Wednesday, he supported the rights of student representation on the board of governors and attacked Dr. Escott Reid, president of York University, for his speech denying the student power of veto.

Porter said students should fight "for democracy and education". Socialists must gain greater influence in politics through the workers, "the heavy battalion of labor" and student power.

SAC by-elections held next week

Students Administrative Council by-elections will be held Oct. 6 at Victoria College, New College, the School of Graduate Studies, Health and Physical Education, the Ontario College of Education and the faculty of library science.

Nominations open tomorrow and close Friday with campaigning between Saturday and Oct. 5.

Frosh obscene!!! debaters scream

Freshmen were urged Thursday to cast off the puritan straight jacket of anti-obscenity, at this year's first Hart House noon-hour debate.

"Anti-obscenities are suspected of hormonal imbalance. They're homosexuals," declared Stephen Luxton (III New).

The resolution Freshmen should be obscene and not absurd was narrowly defeated 9-8.

Arms outflung, Luxton, champion for the ayes, urged the speaker to utter, before the adoring eyes of the freshmen present... an obscenity.

"fff... fuh... fuhooy" came the explosive reply.

A real-life demonstration of a real, live obscene man followed as Luxton laid down a sacrificial thumb... and struck it with a hammer.

The resulting obscenities were masked in effusive horn-honking.

The Noes declined Luxton's offer to test their virility by the same method.

Ideal mates of both sexes Luxton said, should be familiar with obscenity. Freshmen should begin NOW.

"Consider how many cannibals or couples... would be saved if..." Slightly confounded, he immediately apologized for the Freudian slip.

Rob Mills (III Trin) said obscenity has had its day" and exhorted the audience to remember the fate of Sodom and Gomorah.

The frosh is absurd because his environment (the U of T) is absurd. He should be a Sartre — manly, disdainful, above life!

John Tomlinson (III Law) up for the Ayes, refused to utter obscenities because ladies were present. This shortened his speech considerably — from 12 minutes to 12 seconds.

Absurd he defined as the speech given by the opposition.

"The greatest men of our country," he said, "have been obscene."

Disparaging the Ayes' position stand, Tony Whittingham (II Trin) said disdainfully "An obscene Freshman would be as rare as rocking-horse manure."

OUS calls for policy clarification

OUS calls on all three political parties to clarify their policies on the community college system which went into full operation this month.

"Considering the impact of these colleges on our educational system none of the three political parties have satisfactorily outlined how they would plan and run these colleges, or why they would criticize the present system."

The booklet criticizes the government for making no provision for student representation on boards of governors of these colleges and for failing to plan for residence space necessitated by the fact that the colleges offer specialized courses.

OUS asks if a plan for transfer from these colleges to other institutions will be worked out.

The booklet raises the issue of the autonomy of the university community.

"To what extent can the academic community expect to be autonomous when the greatest part of its revenues are government funded?"

The government-appointed committee of university affairs comes under fire as being inadequate for its role as interpreter of the educational needs of both the universities and of society.

Sitting on this committee are three members of the business community, former Premier Leslie Frost and four university representatives.

Since in the next five years most of the student housing for the next 50 years will be constructed, OUS says students must to take action now to ensure well-designed buildings.

Residences built by the Ontario Student Housing Corporation, which now is responsible for the construction of residences, are going to be only slightly less cheap than existing residences, says the booklet.

Three students win Inco scholarships

Three Sudbury-area students have won $5,000 International Nickel Co. scholarships to study at the University of Toronto.

Winners were classics student Loretta Chaperon of Garson; Vikki Mitchell of Copper Cliff High School, a modern languages student; and Christopher Tuore of Levack, who is studying mathematics, physics and chemistry.

In addition to tuition, each scholarship provides $300 to the recipient and $500 to the University. Only children of Inco employees were eligible for the awards.

How to beat a landlord & get a roof...

The secret of finding housing seems to be perseverance combined with full use of all available sources: the housing service, want-ads, bulletin-boards, hearsay and pounding the pavement. Especially pounding the pavement.

After talking to many, many room-hunters, The Varsity offers the following hints:

—Phone first. The room may already be rented. The housing service has lots of phones for the students' use.

—While on the phone, explain any peculiarities you may have. Dogs, children, a penchant for cleanliness, your marital status or even your sex may be considered undesirable by some landlords.

—Be wary of little old ladies who make comments about tenants who do not keep their rooms neat. This type often "inspects" her tenants' rooms daily, including the tenants' dresser drawers.

—Don't give a landlord a deposit unless you get a receipt marked, "deductible from first week's (month's) rent," or "to be returned in full upon departure of tenant." It seems some landlords in the university area are making a fortune out of deposits which are never returned.

—Bathe, comb your hair and dress neatly before you go hunting. Incredible as it may seem, there are landlords who will rent only to clean students.

—If you see a place you like, don't hesitate — grab it. Even if you are not 100 per cent certain, you can always move later. Mrs. Joffary listens to sob stories every day from those who hesitated — and lost.

—Demand a key at once. You are within your rights to demand that the landlord provide a lock and certainly you are paying for privacy. Be suspicious if the landlord does not produce a key promptly. He may be unreliable in other areas as well.

—Amalgamate. People generally expect too much for too little. If the name of the game is economy, remember that two (or three, or four) can live far more cheaply than one.

—Lie a little. Mauv landlords, especially those in apartment buildings, don't want students and their reasons are as wild as Bob Dylan's hair. Rather than argue with them, simply tell them you're not a student. Better still, don't tell them what you do.

—Get married. It seems that the grubbier married couple can rent without difficulty, while the cleanest single student has doors slammed in his face right and left.

"Given that one of the main purposes of the lecture should be to let students see how the more experienced mind of the professor operates... it seems reasonable to suggest that one of the main purposes of the tutorial should be to encourage and enable the students to develop their own abilities..."

—from Chpt. II, Macpherson Commission report on the U of T Faculty of Arts and Sciences.

... and why can't you answer, young lady?

Freshmen will get their first taste this week of that curious academic animal, the tutorial. Chances are they will privately laugh at it before too long.

Tutorials in most departments start today, in some departments with major changes implemented for the first time in anticipation of the recommendations soon to be published under the title Report of the Macpherson Commission.

That body, under the leadership of political scientist C. B. Macpherson, has been looking into all aspects of undergraduate instruction in the arts faculty. Its findings are to be published in a week.

On the matter of tutorials, Macpherson and his colleagues seems to have taken the same stand as everyone before. They have seen that lectures are not the best means of creating a community in which student scholars learn to think for themselves.

They therefore recommend fewer classroom hours for all students. No more than one lecture a week should be given in any course. Every course should have a tutorial. This is a general outline of what the report is expected to recommend.

And again, in general, it's a fine step forward — as far as it goes. Strangely enough, the hours of classroom instruction have little to do with the development of a student. Macpherson saw to that when he wrote his report last July.

But like all before, Macpherson seems to have decided that the answer is to provide more tutorials, where students have closer contact with an educated person and can actually voice their own opinions.

With that cue, several departments, including the History and English departments, have made an effort to provide tutorials.

History has always been proud of its system. Before this year, all courses had one tutorial hour a week anyway. In fourth year, there have been seminar courses with no lectures at all.

With the changes, however, third-year students will be able to take some seminar courses (even though this means that fourth year is robbed of some).

Other than that, the department rests on its laurels and talks about its tutorial system.

But as anyone who has gone through that system can tell you — and as freshmen will see starting this week — tutorials as they are run at present aren't the answer either.

Whether Macpherson deliberated on the character of tutorials we don't know, but surely if tutorials don't do what they are supposed to do, they should be analysed too.

Tutorials are supposed to be small discussion groups under the direction of the leader, be he a professor, a graduate student or what. He is to see that meat of whatever weighty problem at hand is fully discussed and to act as a resource person when the talk hits a snag.

That's fine, except for one thing. It rarely works.

Few tutorial leaders are competent enough to start a good discussion and too often they run their tutorial with too much structure.

One student gives a presentation (usually his essay) while the others sit quietly, either taking notes to fill in their own knowledge or just acting invisible.

When that's done, most of the 50 minutes is over too. A good deal of time, you see, will have already been spent waiting for stragglers to arrive, talking about essay topics, and working out other organizational problems.

When it's time for a discussion to start, one or two people will know anything about the topic and dominate the talk. The others wait for the time to pass, hoping the leader won't make an attempt to include them in the discussion.

If confronted with a question, the answer is usually straight out of lecture notes or from what little work the student has done to prepare for the tutorial.

In short, it's far too easy for any student to hide himself even in the small tutorial group. Whether this is what Claude Bissell means when he tells us to rejoice in the anonymity possible in the multiversity, as in the Secular City, we don't know.

We do know there must be a better way.

Why are some tutorials no more than miniature lectures? Why are some tutorials dotted with embarrassing silences? Why do students regurgitate someone else's opinions when asked for their own?

It's easy to blame all these problems on the students themselves. They simply don't do enough work, we know that. But that's too easy an explanation.

There are many who want to work, even besides the others who are involved in other interests and are content to scrape through. But the great mass of the students are in between. They would like to work but somehow miss becoming inspired.

The tutorial system is as much at fault as the students are. The students, after all, are the shiny, newly-diplomaed products of the Ontario high school system which never encourages anyone to think his own thoughts about anything.

It therefore becomes the university's duty to draw the students' natural ability out. And in this regard, the modern university has been failing.

Macpherson's answer, that every student should take five tutorials a week, misses the heart of the problem. What about the tutorials themselves?

For one thing, they should all be two hours long. Take the suggestion to a history professor and he will probably tell you: "Why that's a seminar. You'll get that in fourth year".

pink like us

Sir:

I would like to protest the biased publicity that you gave the Canadian Union of Students (CUS) in Monday's Varsity. One would imagine that in the luxury of verbiage lavished on this institution in no less than four articles on the subject, you might have mentioned how unfair CUS really is to the majority of students.

First of all, CUS membership is compulsory. Each of us students has a dollar doctored from our U of T fees. This by an organization which is presently demanding greater democracy in university administration and greater student participation.

Since the individual student has no say in whether he wants CUS to represent him or not, it seems only just that CUS in an effort to be fair, would stay clear of partisan politics, where it cannot possibly represent the opinions of a majority of its captive student members. But what does CUS do? It is a member of a communist-dominated student federation. A glance at the Marxist booth and the few interested people there at the booth rally on Friday would have convinced even the most fatuous that an overwhelming majority of students have no interest in communism. Similar disinterest in the booths of the Young Socialists and the Committee to the End the War in Vietnam indicates that the radical "pink" platforms of CUS calling for aid to draft dodgers and unilateral American capitulation in Vietnam are most unrepresentative of student opinion.

I for one do not want a single cent of my dollar spent on encouraging leftist troublemakers and draft dodgers. I am sure that many students do not want a Vietnick extremist and a member of the far left Student Union for Peace Action (SUPA) such as Peter Warrlian heading an organization which is supposed to speak for them.

I am inclined to agree with a pamphlet being circulated by the Edmund Burke society on campus to the effect that U of T withdraw from CUS. Wouldn't it be interesting if the shoe were on the other foot and CUS were to endorse Governor Wallace for President and issue a blanket support for apartheid in South Africa?

F. Paul Fromm (II SMC)

In other words, work along with the system now. Things will get better in fourth year, or graduate school or...

Have faith children, this too will pass.

At Queen's University, history is taught in three-hour seminars. Students cannot get by without a major contribution to the discussion and therefore have to do their work. A student has the innate ability to hide himself for 50 minutes, but even his powers are taxed too heavily in a three-hour session.

But the strange thing is the students enjoy themselves so much they actually want to do their work. The talk is lively and the students actually get involved in it.

Tutorials should also be more informal. Why can't some be held in someone's apartment near the campus instead of someone's office on the campus.

Wouldn't you rather talk about Chinese history or poetry while sipping coffee in someone's living room, than around a grey table in Room 2069, Sidney Smith Hall?

How about holding some tutorials in the informal atmosphere of a pub? There are after all various ways to loosen up students to talk freely. A little bit of friendliness never hurt any group no matter how academic its purposes.

Less structure in the tutorial is necessary. Students should be involved in a discussion right from the beginning and not have to listen to Miss What's-her-name's essay.

A professor should also realize that students are not necessarily as interested in the particular subject at hand as he is. Therefore they do not have time to read all the books he has read and still do all the reading for other courses.

Short well-chosen readings should be assigned. You can read all the books ever written and still not be able to discuss the world's problems.

Intelligence is not synonymous with reading ability.

What's better than a transvestite pharmacist?

By BOB BOSSIN

Beanies and worm ties for the scum freshmen are the traditional trappings of university initiations. At the University of Western Ontario this year, the upperclassmen tried something new.

Bob Bossin was there to watch and describes the scene in this article.

The transvestite pharmacists seen wandering about campus last week are part of the annual freshmen humiliation ceremonies performed by many of the University of Toronto's colleges and faculties. Worm ties, bows and kiddies beanies have always been accepted as a standard part of initiation.

However, we might ask to what is the paint-spattered Trinity type or the effeminate pharmacist being initiated?

When ever these traditional methods of initiation have been examined they have been justified with the argument that the special dress and hazing drive the Freshmen class together, thus building up a group spirit. But, this argument ignores the fact that not all Freshmen desire to be driven together.

As the role of students in the university and the community has changed in the last few years—witness the demise of U of T Carnival, the declining attendance at football games and conversely the success of the Teach-ins and the UC festivals—some re-evaluation has been given to the initiation rites, and some minor reforms such as greater academic content are being introduced.

THE FIRST DEPARTURE

However, the first radical departure has come this year, and from a most unlikely source—the University of Western Ontario—seemingly the last place to look for the vanguard of any revolution.

"Our old system of initiations was typified by the slogan Beanie, Badge and Be on Time!" says Ruth Slee, chairman of the Western Orientation Committee.

"The poor freshman has been told what to do and what to think all his life by parents, school and TV.

"No sooner is he free from the tyranny of his high school principal than we substitute the tyranny of the upper classmen."

Her committee's belief is that the function of the university is not to produce trained automatons, designed to fit into a role—be it doctor, businessman or leftist intellectual—but to encourage the growth of free thinking individuals.

"The compulsory activities of the old initiations just encourage the new student from the outset to be a parasite—rather than start thinking for himself. The orientation program should not be to give the freshmen information, but to give him the resources to find out for himself."

Last week's "planned" Freshmen activities at Western were as a whole ordinary; there were the usual parties, sample lectures, dances, course discussions and concerts. However, the approach was different: nothing was compulsory. The new student had to make his own decisions.

BIGGER BROTHER

The main vehicle of the program was a re-vamped "big brother" scheme. No longer an authority figure, the big brother became a "group leader." His purpose was to put his group of freshman at ease; to draw out rather than supply opinions.

The four—and-a-half day training session for group leaders cost the student government $3,000.

The training program was totally unstructured. There were no lectures, courses or planned meetings. There were no restrictions on liquor. Men and women were housed on the same floor of the same residence. The resources were merely the people themselves and their ideas. The program became whatever the participants did.

This seemingly lax situation proved completely disorienting and confusing to some group leaders who found for the first time they had to direct their own actions.

At first there were strong recriminations directed at the planning committee. The trainees turned anywhere looking for someone in authority.

When no authority-figure appeared, most of the 150 group leaders broke into informal groups and seriously began discussing what was happening to them. Education, love, communications and beanies were analysed.

FIRST COMMUNICATION

Many group leaders said they found themselves understanding and communicating with other people for the first time; many did much serious soul searching.

This is not the author. It is, however, the subject of Mr. Bossin's comment article.

Others insisted that the program was a completely disorganized waste of time and money.

After the session, each group leader left to apply his experience to his group of 15 freshmen.

There is no measurement of how successful the experiment will be. It is apparent that some group leaders would encourage the freshmen to buy beanies, and to play dead horse. Other groups would find themselves discussing why they are at university and why they do many of the things they have always done.

"We have had a lot of slip-ups and difficulties," said Bob Baldwin, University Student Council Academic Affairs Commissioner. "Many of those who are group leaders applied because they liked the old system. The Purple Spur (Western's equivalent to the Blue and White Society) wasn't happy when we told them that in previous years we had delegated the authority for the initiations program to them, and this year we were taking it back.

"Some of the colleges and residences are continuing their enforced hazing policies—but then it will all be worth it if some freshmen start turning on their upper classmen and saying 'NO—it's stupid!'"

Native accomodation: with outhouses in the Arctic?

You're sitting in a smoke-filled bar, watching a drunken brawl and thinking how much it looks like something out of a Hollywood western.

But Hollywood is just a name about 2,600 miles due south of you, for you're sitting in The Zoo (that's right: The Zoo) — bar par excellence of Inuvik, N.W.T., where the August sun shines 21 hours a day, and where beer costs 60 cents a bottle.

You're one of 74 medical students, including 12 women, chosen from medical faculties all across Canada (partly on the basis of your essay, "Why I want to go to Inuvik") to participate in a three-and-one-half-week, $100,000 program entitled CAMSI Centennial Exchange.

Jerry Friedman (III Meds) and Peter Newman (IV Meds) were there. So were Bill Fitzgerald and Bruce Mutter (II Meds), and Joyce Dunnison, Hartley Garfield and Bill McKay, all IV Meds (though not necessarily in The Zoo).

The programme, just over its second year of operation (last summer, Canadian medical students visited the tropics), flew the students via Edmonton to Inuvik, on the Mackenzie delta 50 miles from the Arctic Ocean, for 10 days of lectures and orientation. Then the students were split into small groups of five or six and taken by Otter seaplanes to small northern villages, where they spent the next eight or nine days at frontier nursing stations.

Finally they were given four days for evaluation and recuperation at the University of Alberta in Edmonton. The Toronto students reached home on Labor Day.

Each participant paid a token $50. for the trip, the rest of the cost being borne by the Centennial Commission ("That's why they called it the Centennial Exchange," explained Friedman), the department of national health and welfare, the Ontario Medical Association and the Ciba Co. Ltd., a drug firm. The Canadian Association of Medical Students and Interns (CAMSI) organized the project.

At Inuvik the students made the rounds at the relatively large government hospital, listened to lectures on the medical problems of the area (tuberculosis, malnutrition, diabetes, eye and ear diseases), and received information on the social problems, culture and heritage of the natives, as well as on various aspects of the North.

GOVERNMENT VERSION UNREALISTIC

"Actually," reports Friedman, "we got a very bland version of things from the government people; the realities we discovered on our own."

And the realities he discovered left much to be desired. Every northern town and village has a "government white" side and a native side. The government buildings are usually serviced with $200-a-foot utilidors, providing hot and cold water and sewage disposal; the Arctic natives use outhouses.

Into this clash of cultures are thrown the youngsters. Since it is impractical to set up complete educational systems in the small villages, the department of northern affairs has built at larger towns centralized schools, one of which is located in Inuvik. Here children are brought to board for 10 months of the year. Catholics and Protestants are segregated until grade 9.

Friedman termed Inuvik's curriculum "Southern white", and pointed out that one of the history textbooks being used, The Great Adventure, had a chapter dealing with what the white man owes to the Indians. Its prime example: the fact that Indians had given up their lands without a fight.

GENERATIONAL GAP

More significant than this, however, is the fact that the youngsters' centralized schooling leads to an acute generational gap between them and their elders. For 10 months they live a life totally different from that which their parents have adopted.

And because the schools are conducted in English, many native children, two or three grades behind, become discouraged and drop out at grade 9 or 10, having acquired neither the wilderness skills of their parents, nor the more sophisticated skills of the whites. They have rejected their former life, yet are unsuited for their new one. "In short," said Friedman, "they are in limbo."

He found that the school system indirectly led to other problems: many native parents were drawn into Inuvik because their children were there. The government town of 3,500 provides little opportunity for hunting and fishing, but its economy can support these people in the summertime. Winter, however, is another story: employment drops considerably, and welfare is available, so many natives lean on government support and many turn to alcohol. In The Zoo one evening, someone pointed out to Friedman three of the community's five-member Alcoholics Anonymous.

THE SECOND PHASE

Things were somewhat different at Fort Franklin, some 500 miles south of Inuvik on Great Bear Lake — the village where Friedman and four other students completed their second phase of the Centennial Exchange. The village is populated by 300 non-English-speaking Slave (slay-vee) Indians, all of whom live in log cabins (The modern ones, says Friedman, made quite good accommodation), and who were just then witnessing the advent of electricity.

The village's economy, based on hunting, trapping, fishing, guiding and a handicraft co-op, left nobody on welfare. The village's scholastic pride was a 19-year-old girl in grade 11 at Fort Smith. Drinking had disappeared under the influence of a venerable and venerated Indian called The Prophet, and the people were being kept on the wagon by tapes of religious meetings from Fort Rae.

Peter Newman, who had been assigned to Fort Rae, on the north arm of Great Slave Lake, reported that, one year previously, that town of 1,200 Dogrib Indians had been a "rip-roaring, wide-open" place where drinking was as common as in any frontier community. However, several inhabitants of the town died indirectly from the injudicious use of alcohol (e.g., exposure to cold) and the fear that followed induced two of the community to travel to a town in northern Alberta where The Prophet lived.

One Canadian in limbo.

THE PROPHET SPEAKS

This "Prophet", believed by the natives to possess supernatural powers, came up to Fort Franklin, and in personal interviews with Friedman and the other students of the town ("They lined up in 50-below-zero weather," said Newman), convinced them to stop drinking. Friedman, the place is almost completely alcohol-free. Friedman found that this religiously-inspired teacher was the only effective weapon against alcohol.

The government-supported Fort Franklin health centre, where Friedman's group of students worked, was typical of those in small northern communities: "excellent" facilities, a small clinic and a dispensary. Built at a cost of $250,000, it was staffed by a native "community health worker" and four nurses and conducted public health education.

A typical day at the village would see Friedman and his group of students at the clinic by 8 a.m. and into the clinic by 9 a.m., where they would examine as many as 35 people until noon. Afternoons would be spent on home visits with the nurse, or on fishing, picture-snapping, talking, playing cards, or visiting the Hudson's Bay store. Evenings were spent in arranging appointments for the next day. One student went out to play with the Indians, and came back $30 poorer.

MEDICAL RESULTS

Of the 125 Fort Franklin natives (that's right, 125) examined, 30 per cent needed glasses. Another 30 per cent had been that way three years previously, but this was discovered, and the meds also found. Several cases requiring further medical attention were referred to the Hospital at Inuvik.

Friedman described the children as "kids" often with bad teeth. A dentist was assigned to the village a year. Although the health knowledge was limited, Friedman found they had a good understanding of medical personnel at the nursing station.

At the time the students were in the village, the weather was fairly good: snow flurries the first few days, then temperatures the rest of the time. The insects had departed by then, but the huskies were accustomed to the presence of huskies. Sometimes the dogs howled all night at the sleepers awake.

Isolation was no problem: Although the village is limited to a few films, and no radio broadcasts, there is plenty of local television. At Fort Franklin, where even this is limited, Friedman found they had a good understanding of medical personnel at the nursing station. The use of the local grade-school for a meeting with the native young people. And there were no meetings.

THE FUTURE

Some of these people left Friedman with a pessimistic view for the future. One of them was Chief Ukiok, a trapper from Fort MacPherson, who, along with other native leaders, had stood ground when the government made the chiefs report back from their villages about a reconsideration of 1921 treaties. The natives had ceded large tracts of land to the government, but a native to leave home for a meeting was like asking a student to attend a coffee house. The government will now meet with them in 1968.

Another native leader, Victor Aklo, a trappers' association which uses traps to provide winter employment by staking out traps, had driven them and their families out of Inuvik. A trapper can make $700 to $800 a month. In 1967, 15 families took part last winter, the first in 10 years.

Medically speaking, the trip introduced a new type of medicine as practised in a totally alien environment. Friedman learned the techniques of talking through the use of personal gestures and warmth. The natives' fear of strangers. One purpose of the trip was to interest medical students in northern communities. Two or three of them signed up.

Socially speaking, Friedman at least learned a lesson. "I saw some bright people sensitive to their own needs and trying to do something," he said. "They had a conscious sense of optimism, and with a determination to deal with these peoples' problems."

Newman, however, was not so sure. "I was less sure of it," he admitted.

"After two days, I had answers for the problems. After two weeks, things appeared more and more

On campus riding change granted

A court of revision for students wishing to change their riding for the Oct. 17 provincial election will be held for the St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding next Monday in Hart House.

Tom Faulkner, students council president, and SAC member Rick Seppala (IV APSC) met Friday with election board chairman Judge Ian Macdonnell and were granted this decision.

Courts of revision will be held off campus on Oct. 3 and 4, as announced previously.

A fifth revision district, bounded by Bloor, College, Spadina and University streets, has been set up to facilitate student registration.

Times for registration at Hart House next Monday are: noon to 2 p.m. and 4:30 to 5:30 p.m.

Times for registration Tuesday and Wednesday in the districts are 11 a.m. to noon, 3 p.m. to 4 p.m. and 8 p.m. to 9 p.m.

Allan Grossman, minister of reform institutions, said Friday arrangements would be made to allow students to register for voting, if demand warranted it.

Mr. Grossman said he was "battered" by the voting situation on campus, and concurred that a rule change permitting students to vote in their campus residences would still leave students disenfranchised.

Judge Macdonnell ruled earlier that more courts of revision would be set up, and kept open for longer hours if a need were indicated.

Adam Fuerstenberg, NDP candidate for St. Andrew-St. Patrick, objected to Tom Faulkner's commendation of Liberal candidate Len Shifrin, as the force behind the enfranchisement of students.

The "implied suggestion" that Mr. Shifrin alone was responsible for electoral reform is, says Mr. Fuerstenberg "ludicrous and completely unfounded."

In a letter to The Varsity, he pointed out that as early as Feb. 7, 1967, Ken Bryden, NDP member, outlined to the house electoral reform proposals which included special provision for students.

Mr. Fuerstenberg charged that in praising Mr. Shifrin for action which was advocated by all candidates, Faulkner was "abusing his position as president of SAC." He challenged Faulkner "to produce written evidence in support of his exclusive claims for Mr. Shifrin, or apologize for this abuse."

Faulkner said Sunday that he was unaware of NDP support for student electoral reform. His praise for Mr. Shifrin, he said, was in response to the fact that Shifrin had done more to help register student voters than the other candidates.

Faulkner stressed the fact that his commendation did not constitute a personal endorsement.

"At the moment" he said, "I see no great difference between the parties".

Weir cleared on Communist charge

A motion of confidence in Ryerson students council president Janet Weir passed overwhelmingly Wednesday night.

The motion climaxed a week of controversy which followed two resignations from SAC.

The uproar resulted from Miss Weir's statement in caucus at a Canadian Union of Students' congress in London, Ont. early this month, that she was a communist.

When Miss Weir spoke in favour of a classless society she was accused of being a communist.

Her reply was: "If you want to call classless society communism, then I'm for it."

She said later she was expressing her own opinion and not speaking as SAC president at the time.

Miss Weir is not a member of the Communist party, she says, but her political views are leftist.

Some SAC members defended Miss Weir's right to make the statement on the grounds that it was as a private opinion, not that of a representative of Ryerson.

Derek Nelson, representative for the journalism faculty, said: "Her statement doesn't show good political judgment, and from a leader we should expect good political judgment."

"The issue is not whether or not she is a communist, but whether or not she is a responsible leader."

After the meeting, Jack Rellinger, who resigned earlier Wednesday over Miss Weir's statement, issued a statement calling upon all students dissatisfied with the present state of student government "to take positive, progressive steps by running for SAC."

Expo hosts will tour U of T campus

About 100 young people from various countries, all hosts and hostesses at Expo 67, will visit the University of Toronto campus as part of a whirlwind one-day tour of Toronto early next month.

The trip is being arranged by Kim Graybiel (II New), who worked this summer as a host in the Ontario pavilion at Expo. He is chairman of the 2,000-member Expo Host-Hostess Club.

The participants will pay for their own transportation to Toronto. Graybiel hopes to have meals and sightseeing at least partially subsidized by the Ontario and Montreal departments of tourism who have been helping with arrangements.

Choose your pass option

Once more this fall, the world (and harassed registrars) watched breathlessly while thousands of U of T students struggled to determine a little of their future studies.

Freshies carefully analyzed the relative merits of Buddhism and The Baroque; sophomores judiciously weighed the pros and cons of Astronomy vs. those of Hebrew Literature, and senior students strove to choose among Renaissance art, social tensions, the beginnings of Western music, etc., etc., etc., etc., and etc.

In short, students in honor courses once again plunged into that annual guessing game: Choose Your Pass Option.

Pass options are, in my opinion, intolerable. They have earned widespread disrespect among the student populace; they are viewed by many as silly hangovers from the Methodist past, as penalties for not taking Religious Knowledge. Often they are dry and dusty — more annoying than born ig.

What bugs me most about these "options" is, however, the fact that they are not optional: students obliged to take them are stuck with them, like it or not.

The fact that a wide range of pass options is usually available is immaterial. These "options" are predicated on the assumption that students must not be allowed to degenerate into little cubes of specialized knowledge, that students must be protected from their quest for one discipline to the exclusion of all others.

Now that may very well be a laudable ideal. You, and the guy next to you, and all your classmates and all your profs may be agreed that super-specialization is bad. But if Joe Blow decides that he wants to achieve Nirvana in the pursuit of Islamic Studies, who are you to tell him otherwise? What right has Simcoe Hall to foist these nasty little options on us, in order to protect us from our lusts for specialized learning?

Pass options should be made truly optional; there should be no hint whatsoever of coercion. Perhaps, if that were the case, the option classes would evaporate for want of interested students, but even if this were to occur, students who wished to enlarge their interests would need not be disturbed.

Construction here and there and...

By year's end the University of Toronto will have four construction projects with a total cost of $86,000,000 underway.

U of T's spending is leading the way in Ontario where the 14 provincially-supported universities are expected to spend a minimum of $750,000,000 on construction during the next four years.

The biggest spenders behind the U of T are McMaster in Hamilton, Guelph, York and Waterloo.

U OF T

But most projects, like U of T's $36,000,000 medical complex are behind schedule because of labor troubles.

The women's residence for New College is to cost $6,000,000; the planetarium, $2,000,000 and a $42,000,000 library complex is on the drawing boards.

Other projects planned but not expected to start this year include a permanent Innis College building; and a $3,000,000 student centre (financed by students).

YORK

York university has $46 million in projects slated to be completed before the fall of 1968. Those near completion are a new college, a residence for graduate and undergraduate students, a library, a social science and humanities building, a skating rink, and the new home of Osgoode Hall law school.

McMASTER

McMaster University plans a medical health centre ($65 million), an expansion to its boiler plant ($3.48 million), two more humanity and social science buildings to be completed in 1969 for $5.76 million. A maintenance building and a nuclear science building will cost $5 million.

WESTERN

Western will have a new $35 million teaching hospital built in co-operation with the London Health Association, a $7 million library, a dental sciences building, and an addition to the school of business.

OTHERS

Fourteen projects at the University of Waterloo to be completed by 1968 will cost $27.3 million.

Guelph University has completed the first of four residences, with a total price tag of $33 million. Some $18 million is allocated for other projects now planned. At the University of Windsor, $9 million in construction is underway or planned.

Laurentian University at Sudbury has one project, a science building, under construction. Trent University at Peterborough is breaking ground for $12 million in construction projects; Carleton at Ottawa, $12 million; Lakehead University, $23 million over the next three years; Queen's $4.5 million; and Brock University at St. Catharines, $10 million.

Ticket fiasco angers students

Hart House organization hit an all-time low Friday asordes of bitter, angry students tried to snare their coveted tickets for the football and hockey seasons. The library was filled with milling students for more than two hours in the morning before Financial Secretary J. P. Loosemore bowed to total chaos and closed the sale at 11:30 leaving many students a bit "pissed off", to quote an enraged Vic student who had been shoved around since 9:00 o'clock without acquiring anything. At 1:30 someone with sense opened the sale at Varsity Stadium and order came to reign of lost.

Stellar old boys return for exhibition

By DOUG WOODS

Paul Wilson, (remember him?) is perhaps the best of a team of Varsity rugger old boys who are returning for a match against the present Blues on Thursday night at 8 o'clock in Varsity Stadium.

Wilson was the captain of the 1962 team which won the Gilbert Turner Trophy for the fourth year in a row, tying Queen's 3-3, and beating McGill 17-0 and 9-0, O.A.C. 34-3 and 36-3, and defeating Queen's 18-8 to clinch the championship.

In that year Wilson, the "golden toe", kicked 30 field goals on his way to scoring 89 of the team's 193 points for on offence. He plays in the centre position.

Also returning from the '62 team are second rower

Jim Humphries, wing forward Bobby Dodds, scrum-half Terry Picton, and fly-half Dick Hayman.

Picton and Hayman both played for the Blues last year. Picton is a classic performer at the scrum base; Hayman has good speed and moves that would make Andy Szandtner jealous. Bobby Dodds' tackling has to be seen to be believed. Past editors of the Varsity referred to him as the "bone-crushing wing-forward."

With players such as these, the old boys team will be formidable opposition. Whether they are in condition, however, is an important consideration. The Blues have been practising for three weeks and they have already had one game. Though they have lost several players because of injuries, the Blues have a good deal of depth, especially in their running attack. The old boys have experience and ability; the Blues have stamina and ability. The big question for Thursday's game is whether the Blues' stamina will make up for the edge in experience enjoyed by the older players.

In Wednesday's Varsity there will be an article explaining the game of rugger tators and evaluating this year's team. Rugger is an exciting sport to watch and Thursday's game should be more exciting than most. The match will take about an hour and a half. Admission is free.

Western's pass attack not enough to win

University of Western coach John Metras this year has stated that his team would be attempting to establish a passing game this season. However, so far Mustangs have not been able to mount an kind of attack as they dropped their second straight exhibition game this season, a 30-26 decision to University of Waterloo Warriors.

Warriors jumped into a 14-0 lead before two minutes had elapsed in the opening quarter of play. Halfback Brian Irvine was the big man in the Waterloo attack as he counted both majors while kicker Al Hahn converted both scores.

Following the opening let-down, Mustangs came on strong as Jeff Hilton, Carl Lindros, and Bill Hendershot all scored touchdowns. However Waterloo, not to be denied, countered with a safety touch and a Tom Holmes TD to take a 23-20 halftime lead.

In the third quarter, Western regained the lead as Hendershot scored his second major of the afternoon on a 91-yard run.

The see-saw battle finally came to an end in the last fifteen minutes of the game as Warrior quarterback L McKillop hit end Don Mahan on an 82-yard pass and run play.

Waterloo's victory was the third for an Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association team in the past two weeks. Waterloo Lutheran defeated Western last week while McMaster University edged Varsity Blues 17-15 on Saturday.

Western will try to get on the winning track when they play Blues this Saturday at Varsity Stadium.

Mac reaches Nirvana: humble Blues

Most spectacular play of the game is caught through the lens of Len Gildray as Blues' Nick DiGiuseppe (28) latches onto a 34 yd. aerial by Bob Amer, despite instantaneous uplifting from the shoulder of Mac's Vern Lucyk (also 28). Jim Handson (31) approaches cautiously.

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Varsity Sports Editor

True, as coach Ron Murphy pointed out, Saturday's game counted nil in the final standings True, as well, that Mac had already played two games out west before initiating Blues to combat. And true, the officiating stunk. But it is also true, and quite obviously, following Toronto's 17-15 loss to Marauders, that Blues are in trouble.

Even taking into account the not inconsiderable difficulties associated with the inauguration of a new offensive alignment, Blues' execution of the I-formation on Saturday had all the confusion and awkwardness of a Casey Stengel monologue.

There was no cohesion at all to the running game (longest jaunt for Blues was only 12 yards), as blockers failed miserably in their attempts to coalesce with the chap who happened to be carrying the ball. And through the air, the 30 per cent completion record tells an equally dismal tale of ineptness.

Certainly, of Saturday's game in Hamilton, Murphy faces a long session at the ironing board to emasculate the many kinks that showed up on Saturday before he can hope to field a smooth offensive unit.

Not the least of these is the quarterback slot where the awesome shadow of Bryce Taylor continues to loom large. Neither Vic Alboini nor Bob Amer, prime candidates for the job, displayed any of the frenetic flair for which Taylor was noted. Alboini did direct one 35 yard touchdown march while Amer displayed some surprising running ability (23 yards in 3 carries), but never at any time did the club really catch fire under their direction.

Of course it was just an exhibition game, despite Mac coach Mack Kennedy's raucous jubilation at its con-game against Western.

Blues opened the scoring in true Frank Merriwell fashion as Mike Raham calmly rambled 88 yards down the sidelines to score on the opening kickoff. Ex-Marauder Bill Stankovic side-wheeled the ball through the uprights, and Blues led 7-0 after fifteen seconds.

McMaster refused to be stunned and under the cool, sophisticated leadership of Dick Waring, marched all over the field a few times before John Watson dove across the hallowed line from two yards out. The convert knotted the score 7-7. Waring was a 'beautiful person' throughout the match, leading Mac to 21 first downs and completing 9 out of 13 passes as he showed 'how it's done' to everyone in attendance.

Blues battled back to take the lead on Mike Raham's second touchdown, and the first string defense managed to halt a Mac drive on the five yard line, so Blues were actually leading at the half, 14-7.

Vern Lucyk soon shattered any illusions that Blues might steal the game despite their shoddy display by duplicating Raham's feat of the first half. He took the kickoff 92 yards to score. On the ensuing kickoff, Mike Eben fumbled, enabling Mac's Cass Quinn to boost the winning three points between the posts from the 35 yard line.

Paul McKay, who kicked tremendously throughout the game, completed the scoring with a 69 yd. single.

The 17-15 score was extremely flattering to Blues who managed only eight first downs to Mac's 21.

Mike Wright, Arnie Carefoote, and Pete Broadhurst, along with Raham and McKay, managed to play superb football for Blues during the afternoon.

Mac fans went nuts after the game.

conclusion, and Blues have two weeks to co-ordinate themselves. Yet, and this is why the future may be bleak, there simply didn't seem to be any potential in the attack. Except for Mike Raham, there was no one who showed flashes of brilliance which could be consummated in the future.

But perhaps we're getting a bit panicky when we say that. At any rate, we'll know a lot more after next week's

Soccer runaway as Lefkos nets five

The Soccer Blues walloped the Toronto and District Soccer Coaches team 8-1 on the back campus Saturday morning. The result came as a shock to most people including Blues' players, who expected an uphill battle all the way. But disillusioned they were. The Coaches, missing a couple of their players, played a lacklustre, unimaginative game, while Blues ran them off the field.

The scoring star of the game was Jim Lefkos who scored five goals. Other goal scorers were Tom Johnston, Frank Soppelsa and Jim Laverty for Blues, and Bob Nichol for the Coaches.

The game started on an unusual note as Lefkos scored in twenty seconds cashing in on a miscue by the opposing centre-half. The Coaches fought back, however, and dominated play for the next few minutes. But Blues' sturdy defence did not give them opportunities to score. Then, another defensive miscue, and Lefkos picked a corner, making the score 2-0.

The game became a dull midfield battle till the 25th minute when Blues were awarded a penalty shot. Johnston's hard drive found a corner and the game was all but over. In rapid succession Soppelsa scored a quick left-foot boomer and Lefkos added two more goals from close in to make the half-time score 6-0.

Play in the second half started fairly evenly, but Blues slowly got on top again and missed a few good chances. The Coaches in turn took over, led by Bobby Nichol (their outstanding player) and Alec Lawrie and caused anxious moments around Blues' net. Suddenly Blues counterattacked and Lefkos got his fifth on a beautiful shot to a top corner of the net. Nichol got that one back for the Coaches a minute later from close in, and Jim Laverty, who came on in the last twenty minutes, closed the scoring with a booming shot from eight yards out.

Summarizing, Blues forward line was devastating, its defence solid, and its half-line domineering. Blues suffered no injuries and will probably go into Tuesday's game against Ryerson as heavy favorites. That exhibition match is on the front campus at 4 o'clock tomorrow.

Murphy sees red as flags drop all over

By HOWIE FLUXGOLD

HAMILTON—Ron Murphy, Varsity Blues' football coach, was seeing red after Blues' 17-15 loss to McMaster Marauders.

It wasn't that Murphy's eyes were bloodshot, or that he had suffered a severe case of eye strain after watching his team perform.

It was the red handkerchiefs which were constantly blowing in the wind Saturday afternoon. According to Blues' chief of staff, the referees were afflicted with a severe case of dropsie causing the field to be littered with red handkerchiefs at the most inopportune moments.

He also felt they didn't drop them at the most opportune moments.

"You can certainly tell which town they were from," he said. "I don't mind if they're bad for both sides but they'd call one thing on us and not call it on them."

Murphy especially disliked the call or lack of it on Blues' last offensive play. It was third down and 20 at mid-field with the play a screen pass to Mike Raham. "Raham was held all the way across the field," claimed Murphy. "We did the same thing and were called for holding, but they weren't."

As a result Vic Alboini was forced to run and was caught one yard behind the line of scrimmage.

While the stars in stripes did call 105 yards in penalties against Blues compared to 60 against Mac, Murphy did not allow them to cloud his assessment of his team.

"Our timing was bad even considering it was our first game," he stated.

Mac coach Jack Kennedy, former Varsity hockey coach, saw the game differently. "We handled them physically, that was the difference," said the jubilant coach.

"I'm sorry I can't help you more but I'm so excited I don't know what to say."

Kennedy didn't have to say much more. If the eight millimeter color movies Mac took of the game prove him right, Saturday afterwards could be the longest of the week.

We were disturbed by the evidence that a significant proportion of the lectures offered to undergraduates are simply bad, whether because the lecturer is inaudible, insufficiently articulate, obviously uninterested, or merely unaware of his faults.

MACPHERSON REPORT FAVORS SWEEPING CHANGES

- Fewer Lectures and Labs
- No Exams in Second Year
- Elected Students on Arts Council

By VOLKMAR RICHTER
and PAUL CARSON

Classroom hours and the use of examinations should be drastically reduced, The University of Toronto has been told.

Students should be included in many policy-making bodies including the council of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

No course should have more than one lecture a week.

Students should not have to write any examinations in second year. But, if they fail the term-work, they should be able to write an exam in August.

The emphasis on examinations in all years should be reduced. Term work should count for 50 per cent of a student's mark.

The general and honor courses should both be split into generalist and specialist courses of either three or four years.

These are the main recommendations of a report on the arts faculty written by political scientist C. B. Macpherson.

His report is not expected to be published until Oct. 1 but will be on sale in the bookstore after that.

President Claude Bissell has seen it but few people in the administration or the faculty have.

Macpherson and his nine-man Presidential Advisory Committee on Undergraduate Instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science deliberated for a year to prepare the report.

They heard submissions from both students and staff but Macpherson stressed in his introduction the committee did not confine its discussions to what was heard in open meetings.

Everyone expected him to recommend the reduction in classes and exams but other suggestions are sure to be bombshells.

He recommended that all college teaching departments should be converted to university departments. Colleges should assemble their faculties by making cross appointments with these departments.

The effect of all this, Macpherson says, would be to enable the federated and constituent colleges to give first-year tutorials in most subjects and first-year lectures in many of the more popular subjects.

The report also recommends a complete overhaul of the financial arrangements between the university and the colleges.

The one-hour pass option should be eliminated. Macpherson suggested that colleges wishing to retain courses in religious knowledge, should offer them as non-compulsory, non-credit options.

A revamped course structure would create two new degrees. The Honors degree would be given to all students completing the four-year program, whether specialist or generalist.

Professor C.B. Macpherson (standing) and some of his committee which investigated the quality of teaching and other problems in the Faculty of Arts and Science. The controversial Report is expected to be officially released in early October.

Students completing three years of specialist or general work would get an Ordinary degree.

After third year, students would be able to claim an Ordinary degree without taking extra make-up courses.

Fourth year should be open only to students who obtain first or second class standing in the revised third-year examinations.

Students whose overall average is below 60 per cent should be required to repeat the year. (See Macpherson, page 3)

c. brough macpherson

C. Brough Macpherson, Chairman of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Undergraduate Instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science, has been acclaimed as one of the most profound scholars of political theory in the English speaking world and assailed as a thinly disguised Marxist who is subtly converting his students to the "party line."

The 55-year-old professor of Political Economy graduated with honors and many scholarships from Varsity in 1933. He became a lecturer in political science two years later and following several promotions was named a full professor in 1956.

Prof. Macpherson is a past president of the Co-nadian Political Science Association and is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Canada.

His study of Hobbes and Locke, The Political Theory of Possessive Individualism, is regarded as the definitive treatment of those philosophers.

His other books include Democracy in Alberta plus contributions to The Culture of Contemporary Canada, Design for Learning, and The Future of Canadian Federalism.

Like President Claude Bissell, Prof. Macpherson won't be on campus to defend the controversial report when it is officially released.

He's currently in England thanks to an Overseas Fellowship at Churchill College, Cambridge.

Election candidates meet at U of T

St. Andrew-St. Patrick provincial election contenders will meet next Wednesday head-on in a combined debate and question session in Convocation Hall, the Students Administrative Council announced yesterday.

The meeting of Allan Grossman, Progressive Conservative incumbent, Liberal candidate Len Shifrin, and Adam Fuerstenberg, NDP challenger will be a high point of SAC's campaign to promote student interest in the Oct. 17 election.

SAC members have been visiting lunchrooms and informing students on voting registration procedure and raising issues like student loans, students' housing and the University of Western Ontario Act.

"Once or twice they've even applauded. They ask questions . . . the students aren't indifferent," SAC President Tom Faulkner said.

Paper power flyers, posters, a phone campaign and a recruit rally round out the SAC program to involve students in the election.

Last Thursday a meeting to promote student participation in the election attracted more SAC organizers than students.

However Faulkner is more optimistic about a meeting next Monday that will organize students to attend meetings and put the candidates on the spot over crucial issues.

The meeting, at 5 p.m. in the Hart House Music Room may feature Vince Kelly, a former SAC president who was defeated twice in election attempts.

Two hundred copies of the Ontario Union of Students' pamphlet, Mr. Politician, Please Tell Me, will be distributed, according to Bob James (II Vic), a meeting organizer.

The meeting's leaders hope to recruit students to go to the ridings of Riverdale and High Park to "put the candidates in the hot seat."

Scarborough College is handling Scarborough East riding.

Defeat meant end of Jews: Weisel

The defeat of Israel during the recent Arab-Israeli conflict could have meant the end of the Jewish people, Elie Weisel told a meeting of Hillel, Sunday.

Mr. Weisel, journalist and author, said the war revived a "nationalistic and religious spirit among North American Jews as they rallied to the aid of Israel.

"Jews were no longer a people without a country."

While they have often taken passive stoic roles in the past, the Jews under the catalyst of the June war suddenly became active and militant, Weisel said.

Folk fluent in exotic tongues needed

Professor J. D. Kaye of the University of Toronto anthropology department, is looking for people in Toronto who are fluent in such exotic languages as Tibetan and Burmese.

They will receive $5 an hour to speak their particular language to graduate anthropology students taking a field method course.

The course trains future field workers to get specific information from natives of an area.

One language a term is studied. This fall it is Ottawa, a Canadian Indian dialect.

So far Prof. Kaye has listed persons speaking two Canadian Indian languages, and three languages from Sierra Leone, Africa.

Music announces eight appointments

Eight appointments were announced last week in the University of Toronto's faculty of music.

Ronald Chandler now is an assistant professor; Natalie Kuzmich, lecturer; Robert Falck, lecturer; Peter Schenkman, cello teacher; Derek Holman, lecturer; Greta Kraus, lecturer; Doreen Hall, lecturer; Elmer Iseler, lecturer.

Vic holds by-elections Thursday

Fall by-elections for the Victoria College Council will be held next Thursday.

Three councillors-at-large will be selected. Two Blue and White representatives and a president for the Girls' Athletic Association will also be chosen.

The same day there will be a Students Administrative Council by-election to fill two positions.

Macpherson Report could be bombshell

erage is below 60 per cent should not be permitted to write supplemental examinations in August, the report recommends.

Students with an average of 60 to 65 per cent would be allowed to write one supplemental exam; those averaging above 65 per cent would be allowed access to the supplemental exams.

Honor students should be allowed to write supps, Macpherson recommends.

The main part of his report deals with lectures, tutorials and examinations. Tutorials should get the main emphasis, he suggests, as the importance of lectures is reduced.

But tutorials should not be used to fill in time vacated by the reduced lecture schedule. "As a general rule no undergraduate should have more than 10 classroom hours a week, apart from laboratories, of which no more than five should be lectures," is recommendation number four.

The Report contains 96 recommendations in all.

Macpherson toyed with the idea of asking for the elimination of examinations in all years but then decided to "start from the assumption that some kind of examination is necessary so long as society expects the university to certify some measure of intellectual competence."

Third year should retain exams to grade students for the benefit of the graduate school. Fourth year, as has been done in some courses already, should be encouraged to replace separate exams with one comprehensive examination.

First year has to have examinations, he argued, to weed out the lazy and incompetent students who might otherwise be allowed to hang around the university for another year.

The committee considered the plight of "late-adjusters" who should not be forced out by these examinations. The decision was that throwing out the lazy ones is much more important than saving the "late adjusters."

Tutorials should be small groups, no larger than 10 or 12 people, but students shouldn't have to attend more than five a week.

The committee received 431 briefs, 317 of them from students. It held 15 public meetings from the time its members were announced on March 21 1966 to the end of its discussions last July.

Besides chairman Macpherson, the group included: Frank Buck, a graduate student; Associate History Professor Ramsay Cook; Zoology Professor W. G. Friend; J. R. deJ. Jackson, an assistant English professor at Victoria College; Chemistry Professor S. C. Nyberg; H. S. Harris, a Philosophy professor at York University; and Greek professor R. M. H. Shepherd, registrar of University College.

Dr. Paul Hoeh, a post-doctoral fellow in Physics was "co-opted" and served almost as a full member, Macpherson writes.

For science students, laboratory work should be cut by half and restructured into problem classes in which a student may leave any time after his work is done.

The committee spent some time on the quality of teaching but produced few recommendations. Teaching instruction for lecturers was rejected. Instead Department members were encouraged to instruct their new lecturers themselves.

Money should be available for a lecturer to have his performance video-taped so that he can see himself in action.

The committee seemed shocked by the many submissions they heard criticizing bad lectures and lecturers.

The problem of appraisal was left to student course critiques, which the Students Administrative Council published for the first time this year.

Macpherson's report shied away from the matter of appraisal. Student or department appraisal should only be applied to juniors in the department.

Some small recommendations under the general heading, The Undergraduate and his Environment, included:

—longer registration periods to better counsel incoming students;

—counselling from department officials;

—advice on what's available given long before registration (maybe at reading week, the previous spring);

—a more lucid and descriptive calendar.

To get more students (especially first-year students) into residences, Macpherson suggested cutting residence fees by 20 per cent. More residences should be built, he also recommended.

The library should provide more study space and a better orientation program and the bookstore should study the possibility of giving all students a discount on books.

Rhythm and Blues Festival postponed

By RICK SALVADOR and BRIAN CRUCHLEY

The proposed Blue and White Society Rhythm and Blues festival has been postponed, society chairman Marty Low (1 Law) announced last night.

The $6,000 production at the Canadian National Exhibition Coliseum was to feature Otis Redding and six rock groups.

Low said the society was postponing the Oct. 15 festival until early November because Redding had not signed the contract.

Don Hewson, former Blue and White chairman, hinted that Redding might be holding out for a bigger slice of the festival revenue.

Hewson said: "it's a matter of getting too big with too small a budget".

Redding first quoted a price of $3,900, but then upped it to $4,200," festivals chairman Greg Parker said.

"We're in the same position as we were last year with the Mamas and Papas . . . three weeks to go and no contract," Low said.

Last year, a week before the Homecoming Show that was to feature the Mamas and Papas, the Blue and White cancelled the show because the contract had not been signed.

Some Students Administrative Council members were worried that the society was going to blow their whole festival budget on the Rhythm and Blues show. The SAC budget allows them $3,500 to put on weekend festivals instead of the traditional annual Homecoming and Winter Carnival Weekend shows.

The Blue and White is planning a communications festival later in the academic year.

The apprehension of some SAC members was generated when the society had to hold the Rhythm and Blues festival in the CNE Coliseum instead of Varsity Arena.

A booking mix-up caused the festival planners to shift their production from Varsity (which rents at $100) to the Coliseum (which rents at $1,200).

This is an $1,100 loss already, although the cost and profits of the festival were being shared by the society and Mike Lais of Record World.

Lais was supposedly getting Redding, the rock groups and publicity for the festival at cut rate prices.

Lais said the production would cost $2,000 to $3,000 less than it would normally because of his connections in the entertainment world.

The Blue and White is anxious to set up successful productions this year after last year's disasters. The Winter Carnival Show featuring the Cyrkle and the Brothers-In-Law lost $3,000 in a $4,000 production.

At that time Blue and White members were suggesting that their shows should feature bigger, more expensive entertainment that would attract larger crowds.

"We start from the assumption that some kind of examination is necessary so long as society expects the university to certify some measure of intellectual competence."
—Macpherson Report, Chapter II.

the macpherson report: what's there and what's missing

As a smooth and pragmatic attempt to patch up some of the inadequacies of undergraduate education at the U of T, the Macpherson Report has much to commend itself. Most students and staff will applaud the drastic reduction of lectures, the exam-free second year, the increased student participation in academic decision-making, and the loosening up of the rigid course structure that are recommended in the Report.

However, as a contribution to the educational atmosphere of the campus and the level of consciousness of its inhabitants, both the Report and the method by which it was arrived at leave a lot to be desired.

First of all, the Report was written in an atmosphere of almost total secrecy without the participation of any member of the undergraduate student body. For this reason, the issues dealt with aroused the interest of only a small minority of the students, and many of the brightest were turned off by this unnecessarily secretive procedure.

Unfortunately too, is the fact that the Report includes virtually no discussion of the philosophical basis of higher education, of the underlying rationale of the Honor and General Courses, of the relation between the university and society and the university's self-appointed role as a certifying body.

The Report also gives no justification whatever for the departmental organization of the Faculty of Arts and Science, and no discussion of the adequacy of such a set-up to programs of generalist education.

Similarly the Report includes virtually no discussion of the effects of the rapid growth of the Graduate School on undergraduate instruction.

Missing too is a concrete rationale for the compartmentalized groupings of knowledge called courses and the general principles by which these are ultimately to be assembled into things called course structures and programs.

The Committee's discussion of ways to improve the quality of teaching strikes us as totally inadequate. The Report specifically rejects any system of inspection for the teaching of "established staff members," and also any sort of course for lecturers in teaching methods.

In the final analysis, the Committee relies on student course critiques, relatively minor inspections of junior faculty, and the pious statement that "teaching should be taken into account" at promotion time; presumably these are supposed to result in great improvements in lecturing.

However, the Report implies that the student course critiques should not be published, and in fact be given only to the Chairman of the department involved, in addition to the lecturer. This, of course, would do nothing to improve the stifling teaching atmosphere of the campus—in which all-too-often teaching is not valued at all; and therefore we cannot see how this would result in any appreciable gains in the quality of teaching.

The Committee's discussion of the Structure of Degree Courses at the U of T was probably sabotaged more than anything else by the stifling tradition of rigidity characteristic of the U of T Honor course system.

The Report spends about 80 per cent of its time in this chapter taking about relatively minor changes in the first year offerings of some of the Honor courses, and barely gets around to any concrete discussion of the inadequacies of the General courses.

Throughout this chapter, the presumption persists that the only thing wrong with courses in the General programs is that they are not specialized enough—i.e. that they are not Honor courses.

The fact that something qualitatively different is implied in a general education than in a specialist education did not seem to occur to the Committee; and there is no discussion whatever of interdisciplinary courses, "project-oriented" as opposed to discipline-oriented courses, and of the general problem of integrating the maze of watered-down, low level courses that now make up the General Course.

The Committee's chapter on the reorganization of the colleges is, in a sense, written in a vacuum, since the Report takes virtually no note whatever of the religious splits among the colleges and the disastrous effects this could have on attempts to orient more of the first year teaching around the colleges.

Since friendships formed in first year tend to set the pattern for those of the later years, the reorganizations advocated in the Report could actually deepen the cleavages along religious lines that now exist, unless a method is arrived at of ensuring that each college embraces as heterogeneous a student body as possible, including substantial numbers of students from all backgrounds and persuasions.

On the issue of student participation in academic decision making, the Committee took several notable steps forward—first by advocating student memberships on the Faculty Council and its committees; secondly by ambiguously calling for a student voice in departmental decisions of concern to students, and more especially of departmental curriculum committees; finally the Committee also expressed its hope that students would be given full membership on the Library Council.

However, the Committee's recommendations about a student voice in departmental curriculum are very hazy indeed: no mention is made of whether the student-staff curriculum committee is to be advisory to a staff curriculum committee (as happened last year in the physics department), which might then be advisory to a departmental executive committee, which might then be advisory to a departmental meeting of the department's entire staff.

Even more important, no mention is made of whether students should or should not be members of Faculty committees considering Promotions and Tenure—the inclusion of student member of such committees (charged with gathering evidence of the teaching competence of the staff member being considered) would probably do more to improve the quality of teaching at this University than any other single step.

Furthermore, the Report makes no mention of the question of student representation on the Board of Governors, the Senate, the College Councils, or any of the important Committees of these bodies.

Because of the numerous gaps and omissions in the Macpherson Report, we think it is quite clear that students can no longer depend on nine "good guys" to bring them the Millenia. From here on in, the students will have to organize themselves into vocal groups to demand the education improvements that are their right.

Staff tokenism is no substitute for student responsibility and student power.

another failure noted

It became official yesterday. The Blue and White has failed again.

Last year the Mamas and the Papas were advertised as appearing here. No contract had been signed though. It never did get signed as it turned out and the group never came.

That was an attempt to update the type of entertainment the B & W gives us each year. In previous years we had folksingers when the hootenanny age had gone out.

So, the B & W tried a currently popular and less commercial folksinger.

Fine, except the go-go age was upon us at the time and the crowds never did get excited by the show.

In other words, B & W planning is usually a year behind the times.

It's also unrealistic.

Otis Redding is a fine performer but in Toronto he is not a mass-appeal performer. In fact, he is definitely a minority-appeal performer.

He's the best soul singer around but that type of music doesn't have a large enough audience in Toronto yet. And it certainly doesn't seem to have a large enough audience at U of T, for which the B & W is, after all, supposed to be planning.

Anyway, it's all failed through now and it's more worthwhile to think of what can be done to replace it.

We go back to our suggestion for a huge, light-show dance in Varsity Arena, with Country Joe and the Fish or some other new group.

The B & W can still go back to their festival idea by hiring several groups—the ones that don't cost too much yet.

The Jimi Henrix Experience is fine; so is Big Brother and the Holding Company. How about The Paupers, local group that hit the big time and all that. Or maybe all of them.

It's fun to dream anyway even when—given the character of our Blue and White—these dreams are pretty idle.

Country Joe would probably love to play here if someone convinced him the B & W is groovy.

SUPA disbands... admits stagnation

By SUE HELWIG

The Student Union for Peace Action, a left-wing organization born of the protest movement of the early 1960's, has voted to disband.

The decision was made at a Goderich, Ont. conference early this month.

The 40 members who attended faced the fact that for the past year SUPA has been "stagnating."

Harvey Shepherd, former editor of The Varsity and a SUPA member, described the move in an interview as the rationalization of a situation which already existed—that SUPA consisted only of its newsletter and its publications bureau.

These operations will be taken over by a 12-member New Left Committee elected by the conference to be responsible to itself and to further the development of the New Left in Canada.

In its eight-year lifespan SUPA evolved from a group interested in community organizing. But the movement never developed a clear understanding of its own goals or its relationship to Canadian society.

In a paper outlining the history of the organization, Tony Hyde, former employee of the national office, says SUPA was "a small number of individuals engaged in specific activities around a variety of goals."

The Combined Universities Committee for Nuclear Disarmament, the forerunner of SUPA, was formed as a protest group aimed at keeping nuclear arms out of Canada.

Hyde's paper says this group "grew because of an upsurge of moral indignation." Members felt that society was not living up to its rhetoric and "were enraged at the hypocrisy."

SUPA was formed in 1964 after Canada had accepted nuclear arms. By this time CUCND members had expanded their interests to include a program organized around economic and social issues.

The following summer a community project in Kingston and a project working with underprivileged Negroes in Halifax were started by SUPA members working on their own initiative.

The Neestow Partnership project involving Indians in northern Saskatchewan was associated with, but not formally connected with, SUPA. Other groups worked at La Macaza, Que., site of a Bomarc base and with the Doukhobors sect in British Columbia.

SUPA also attempted to establish experimental educational projects.

The most important concept for these projects, Hyde says, was "participatory democracy, linked to the idea that a possible agent for social change was the dispossessed"

By the end of 1965 this concept proved illusory when SUPA failed to produce concrete plans for the future.

The organization never recovered from the resulting demoralization of members who had made a personal commitment to SUPA projects, says Hyde. Members proved unable to work as a co-ordinated group in Canada-Vietnam Week, SUPA's only other major undertaking.

Since then, many SUPA members joined projects initiated by the Company of Young Canadians. Only a research, information, and publications project continued to operate from SUPA headquarters.

A few of SUPA's individual projects are still in operation, some being run by the CYC. Last week the draft-dodger association which had found a home with SUPA moved toward independence.

"From the beginning," says Shepherd "it was decided that independence from SUPA would facilitate the operation of such projects.

"As far as material support is concerned, SUPA didn't do a hell of a lot for them anyway."

Shepherd describes SUPA as an organization which failed in its search for a

"raison d'être."

But Peggy Morton, member of the New Left Committee, says the organization is not really dead.

"If people are not doing things that are tangible, this doesn't mean that they have dropped out."

UWO degree in Nursing to be ended in 1970; grad courses remain

LONDON, Ont. (VNS) — The University of Western Ontario School of Nursing is terminating in 1970 its programs leading to the BSc in nursing degree.

However, there will be two graduate nursing programs leading to either a MSc in nursing education or MSc in nursing administration.

An application for admission to these two-year courses requires an undergraduate degree in nursing, arts or science. An applicant must also be a graduate of a hospital school of nursing and hold a diploma covering one academic year in a nursing specialty at a university school of nursing.

Dr. Paul Hoch speaks at UC

Dr. Paul Hoch will be guest speaker at a meeting called by the Students Administrative Council for the formation of curriculum clubs, tonight at 7.30 in the Junior Common Room.

The curriculum clubs will help formulate questions and standards for the assessment of the value of a course.

The clubs will provide a focal point for many different kinds of activities relating to individual courses. They will provide an important method of student representation to the faculty.

The committee formed to study the Macpherson Report will attempt to help in the establishment of the curriculum clubs, but the initiative must come from the students, says Chairman Hersh Ezrin (IV UC).

SUPA may be in the garbage can, but doors are still open for prospective draft dodgers.

End of education thought, not war

Education must lead to thought, rather than "garbage, soot and war," says Dr. James Ham, dean of the faculty of applied science and engineering.

Speaking Monday at the International Electronics Conference, Dr. Ham said laboratory experience and person-to-person instruction will be the dominating element in education and will not be determined by industrial demands.

Education has been affected by an explosion in knowledge which is communicated to the masses through the media of newspapers and television, he said in an interview.

"No longer do we have an elite which controls knowledge."

Because of this mass communication the student needs to be selective and attain an individuality through developing technology, he said.

"The student of the future will extend laboratory experience by selecting film clips of diverse forms which animate scientific and operational principles."

Vote on CUS Resolutions asked

Sir:

What right does the Canadian Union of Students have to pass resolutions on controversial political issues?

The CUS constitution defines its scope of activities as the understanding cooperation and advancement of the legitimate interests of Canadian students.

In the last few years it seems that CUS has been intent on doing just the opposite as evidenced by the many resignations of member universities.

The elected executives of CUS were never given a mandate to appropriate the policies of the now faltering Student Union for Peace Action.

They did not win on a platform pressuring the Americans to withdraw from all Southeast Asia, adding draft objector organizations in the United States, supporting the Vietnamese by blood and fund drives and participating in the communist-oriented International Union of Students' drive for an "International week of support for Vietnam."

In view of this I demand a separate campus vote on each or all of the issues I mentioned.

This is all the more important because every student on this campus pays a compulsory fee to CUS.

I certainly do not want my money to help any communist front organizations and I am sure that there are many more who feel the same way.

Biology club misrepresented

Sir:

I was disappointed and annoyed to read the description of the Biology Club in the club's section of this year's Student Handbook.

In a tone which reflects the general irresponsibility of this publication, we are informed that: "The sole meeting of the club held last year was to plan an evening of presentations to high school students underscoring the various activities of the Biology Club at the university. This year it plans to hear guest speakers discuss current biological topics and associated subjects."

Although undoubtedly those who had hoped to glean some useful information from the handbook abandoned the cause long before reaching the clubs section, there may be some who have been misled.

In hopes of repairing some of the damage which has been done to the club, I would like to emphasize the following corrections:

First, the meetings held last year numbered not one, but many, these being held every three weeks of term and featuring guest speakers, informal discussion and films on a variety of biological topics.

In addition club members went on several outings including two week-ends in Algonquin Park.

The "evening of presentations" was in actuality a three-day open house which attracted an estimated attendance of over 6,000 students, teachers and members of the public at large.

Organized by the Biology Club in conjunction with the department of zoology it involved the participation of approximately 100 students and many staff members.

Its purpose was to increase awareness of biology and to stimulate interest in the many aspects of this dynamic science.

This effort was publicized by Toronto radio, television and newspapers, although it received very little campus coverage. Incidentally, this club project has traditionally been undertaken every two years; another open house is planned for 1969.

As for this year's activities, in addition to the proposed guest speakers mentioned the club also plans several tours of scientific centres, film evenings and, of course, our traditional weekend outings in Algonquin Park.

Any students with an interest in biology and in particular, those in biology courses, would find club participation enjoyable.

Hopefully, most students will recognize the unreliable nature of the handbook, and will not permit themselves to be prejudiced by it.

In future, SAC might be well advised to get information from someone who really knows.

About 2,000 university students will be eligible to vote in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding to elect a representative to Queen's Park.

But most eligible students have not yet been registered as voters. If they are registered, students could be the deciding factor in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick contest.

Allan Grossman, Progressive Conservative incumbent, Leonard Shifrin, Liberal candidate and Adam Fuerstenberg, NDP challenger, are concerned with their images on campus.

In the riding bounded by Palmerson, University, Dupont and St. Clair Streets and the waterfront, Anglo-Saxons form a one-third minority while ethnic groups such as Italians, Hungarians, West Indians, Greeks and Chinese are unusually large.

2000 U of T students considered decisive

NDP - Adam Fuerstenberg

LIBERAL - Leonard Shifrin

"We agree that education is the key to our future, but we never do anything about it," says NDP candidate Adam Fuerstenberg, summarizing his attack on the present government policies on education in Ontario.

Mr. Fuerstenberg is a young political challenger. At 28, he is only a few years out of University of Buffalo where he did his graduate work.

He supports the little man — the low income worker who has a home ripe for expropriation and university-age students that will have to find money for their education without parental assistance.

Mr. Fuerstenberg is an English lecturer at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute and presently his timetable problems are more critical than those of his students.

He's campaigning every waking hour while trying to get his courses off the ground.

Free tuition and expanded programs of bursaries, scholarships and loans for out-of-town students lead off Mr. Fuerstenberg's plans for improving the lot of university students.

He feels the university is a typical part of a vertical social mosaic when he says "80 per cent of Ontario university students come from the families in the upper 20 per cent of income groups".

He feels the community college concept in Canada is "baloney" and doesn't prepare students for further education in universities as do the junior colleges in the United States.

As an undergraduate at Sir George Williams University in Montreal, Adam Fuerstenberg was a radical in marching on Ottawa in 1959 with the Canadian University Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. He was also vice-president of the Social Democratic Club and features editor of The Georgian, the university's weekly newspaper.

But in the cosmopolitan riding of St. Andrew - St. Patrick there are more down-to-earth issues to pursue like the housing crisis.

Mr. Fuerstenberg wants to protect homeowners from expropriation and give apartment dwellers a bill of rights to protect them from powerful landlords.

He also advocates a price review board to protect the consumer, especially in the supermarket, from unreasonable price increases.

Liberal candidate Leonard Shifrin is the St. Andrew - St. Patrick contender who is most responsible in students council president Tom Faulkner's eyes for the move to allow students to vote in this riding.

Having graduated from U of T law school in 1965, Mr. Shifrin still has one foot in the university and seems more aware of student problems than either of the other candidates.

St. Andrew - St. Patrick is a predominantly Liberal and Conservative riding, judging from the 1963 election results. If Mr. Grossman falls, Mr. Shifrin will likely be the man to succeed him.

"Equality of opportunity" is his slogan for educational reform in this riding. Mr. Shifrin admits it is a cliched concept but most relevant in a riding where two-thirds of the electorate could be classified as ethnic.

He wants pre-school equality programs to begin at age 3 because the large number of children in this riding grow up in "culturally deprived environments".

Quoting reports of American studies in education, Mr. Shifrin says the IQ of an adult from a culturally deprived environment is 20 points lower than that of an adult that grew up in a more affluent middle class background.

More ambitious pre-school programs are needed to eliminate this IQ gap, Shifrin said.

He also feels that the child from a

☆☆☆☆ Vietnam elections reveal an A

Tran Van Dinh, 44, fought against the French during the Resistance War. He later joined the South Vietnamese foreign service and has served in several Asian and Latin American countries. His last post was chargé d'affairs and acting ambassador of South Vietnam to the United States.

He now lives in Washington, where he is a correspondent for the Saigon Post. He says, however, that his dispatches are rarely published, as they are usually censored by the Saigon government.

The opinions expressed are not necessarily those of The Varsity.

By TRAN VAN DINH

Politics in South Vietnam in recent years have always had elements of a tragi-comedy.

As the main theme of the play is democracy", and the interested audience "American", the actors have to wear a mask to suit the purpose. The mask is "elections". Balloting would take place — over 80 per cent of the people would vote. Washington would call it a success until the stage collapsed, leaving dead bodies and broken furniture on the scene.

For the seventh time (two Presidential elections in 1955 and 1961; four legislature elections in 1956, 1959, 1963 and 1966) since Vietnam was divided temporarily by the 1954 Geneva Agreements, the tired people of South Vietnam went to the polls.

On Sept. 3, from 7 a.m. to 4 p.m., 83 per cent of 5,853,251 voters proceeded to 8,824 polling places to cast their votes to elect a president, a vice-president and 60 senators. The number of registered voters had jumped from 5,553,251 in one month to the present 5,853,251.

"We are prolific in Vietnam but not that prolific," said Tran Van Huong, a civilian candidate who finished fourth. Replied General Nguyen Van Thieu, the head of state and military candidate, "Some soldiers have been given two voting cards".

The voter was given ballots, one for each presidential ticket (consisting of two names, president and vice president, with one symbol) and then 48 other ballots, one for each senatorial slate (10 names on each). He had gone over 502 names (22 presidential, 480 for senatorial).

He could hardly be that fast a reader, but he did not care. He looked at the familiar policeman who would be around in his locality long after the election day.

POLICE PROTECT VOTERS

General Nguyen Ngoc Loan, the chief of police, had declared Aug. 22: "National policemen will be stationed inside and outside booths all over the country. As the national police are the people in closest contact with the lowest echelon, there will be police telling them where to vote, how to vote and when to vote". (Saigon Post, Aug. 23, 1967.)

The Vietnamese voter was a captive voter: the police stamped his registration card and anyone subsequently searched (a routine in South Vietnam) and found without the election day stamp on his card was in danger of automatic classification as a Viet Cong and subjected to prison or death.

Even with these precautions the military junta was not sure. Dictators everywhere and at all times are afraid of their own people.

On the eve of election day, two dailies in Saigon, the Than Chung (Sacred Bell) and the Sang (Light), were closed. Three weeks earlier, another daily, the Dan Chung (People), was shut down. All these despite the facts that officially censorship was abolished and that the Constitution guarantees freedom of the press.

Several officers, among them Brigadier-General Phan Trong Chinh (commander of the 25th division near Saigon) and Colonel Pham Van Lieu (former chief of police), were put under house arrest.

Several students (mostly Buddhists) disappeared from their homes, some imprisoned, some liquidated.

LBJ gives thumbs-up success

Declared General Thieu when asked the closure of the newspapers: "In a democracy, one has the right to newspapers that aid one's enemies." Echoed Chief of Police Loan: "Discipline is fine for the politicians, but not national discipline." (Washington Post, Sept. 3, 1967.)

HOW FREE IS FREE

General Ky much earlier had been specific on "democracy" and had might respond militarily if a civilian policies he disagreed with won the "In any democratic country, you have the right to disagree with the views of the majority." (New York Times, May 14, 1967.)

And on July 27, 1967, General Ky said: "If any opposition ticket in South Vietnam presidential elections should win, we will overthrow it."

Who else in South Vietnam would have threatened the junta itself? General Thieu came at the time when, at the height of the military committee was serving as a kitchen cabinet for the military government if the Thieu-Ky ticket won. In the most likely case of losing, the committee would serve to throw the civilian elected as President. All these unnecessary precautions

P.C. - Allan Grossman

Although Mr. Grossman is the minister for reform institutions, he stepped out of his portfolio last week to make a few comments on education.

In an education-conscious riding with up to 2,000 university students voting for the first time and Mr. Grossman's plurality at about 1,600 (the combined Conservative plurality for the old ridings of St. Andrew and St. Patrick), it is proper that Mr. Grossman should have some views on education.

An interesting observation here is that the combined age of Mr. Grossman's NDP and Liberal challengers is the same as Mr. Grossman's—56.

The effect of the age gap could be a decisive factor in Mr. Grossman's re-election or defeat. Since university students generally identify more readily with young candidates advocating changes rather than older more complacent government members, Mr. Shifrin and Mr. Fuerstenberg should do better on campus than Mr. Grossman.

On the other hand, the Progressive Conservative club at U of T is a well-oiled political vehicle of the national party and projects a solid image on campus (although at times the older Tories have denounced them as radical subversives).

But if students don't register for the election — many of them must change their riding by signing affidavits, appear before revising officers and present certificates when they vote — speculation about Mr. Gross-man's popularity on campus is pointless.

Mr. Grossman feels he will win on campus but so do the other two candidates.

Replying to questions on government improvements in education Mr. Grossman said the active awareness some students are taking in the election is a tribute to effective educational programs in the province.

"The questions students are asking today, the opinions they are giving are evidence, in my mind, that the educational system is a damn good one," he said.

Mr. Grossman points to educational breakthroughs in the use of special electronic equipment for teaching in public schools like Ogden School, King Edward and Lord Lansdowne.

With regard to the housing crisis, Mr. Grossman says Ontario's wealth and success is responsible. Mr. Grossman apparently means that present government has promoted the wealth and success of the province.

"Everybody wants to come to Ontario — this creates high prices and competition in the housing market."

Mr. Grossman looks toward the Home Ownership Made Easy Plan and Alexander Park project as government solutions to the problem.

Rides on Two Wheels

In 1964, in Ontario, there were 867 accidents involving motorcycles. For 1966, the figure shot up to 3795. Today, a motorcyclist's chances of being killed are roughly five times greater than those of an automobile driver! A timely article in October Reader's Digest tells the 3 Key Steps that are needed to control what surgeons call the "new epidemic". It's hard to imagine, but did you know that many motorcyclists don't want to wear helmets? This article reveals why 24 percent of the accident victims are passengers... and lists safety devices recommended by experts. If you are the parent of a motorcyclist, don't miss this important article in October Reader's Digest, now on sale.

American tragic-comedy

Sign to onlookers over Viet-nam election results.

taken even when possible competitors were excluded in advance from the race. General Duong Van Minh (Big Minh), former chief of state, and Dr. Au Truong Thanh, former minister of economy and finance, who planned to run on a peace platform, were banned from running.

ALL VIET NAM A STAGE

So the stage was all set for the Sept. 3 show. Washington added the final touch by sending a 22-man Presidential mission guided by former Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, who had openly favoured military regimes in South Vietnam. The mission members, feted by the Saigon government and the U.S. Embassy, escorted by government agents, and communicating with the people through government interpreters, toured half a dozen polling stations (of a total 8,824) and passed its verdict: good show. "Good, orderly, wholesome," declared Ambassador Lodge.

The results of the elections, 83 per cent of the people voted (exactly as predicted by the U.S. Embassy in Saigon), and the Thieu-Ky military ticket won with 35 per cent of the votes. Already seven out of 10 civilian candidates have lodged protests of fraud with the Constituent Assembly which will have until Oct. 2 to certify the validity of the elections. Dr. Phan Khac Suu, the civilian candidate who finished third and who is also the chairman of the Constituent Assembly complained that in many areas, his workers had estimated the turnout at only 10 per cent.

PEACE VOTE SECOND

One development which surprised Washington was the fact that a Saigon lawyer, Truong Dinh Dzu, who campaigned on the platform of peace and anti-militarism in the clearest terms possible, finished second with 17 per cent of the votes.

Of all the 11 candidates, only one advocated war. Even General Thieu talked about peace and negotiations. But the Vietnamese have no voice in this war. Lamented columnist Joseph Kraft from Saigon:

"But as long as Saigon thinks victory, it is very hard for Washington to move toward settlement. And thus the present outlook, despite the new setting created by the elections, remains barren."

Washington and Saigon think not just victory; they expect "representative democratic government" to emerge even with the old cast. But the Sept. 3 election is only the first act of the show.

More will come: There will be in ensuing weeks a deadly struggle between President Thieu and Vice-Air Marshall Ky, now to become the number two man in the government. I think Ky will not willingly accept the figurehead position as vice-president, and, as a vice-president should, give up both the premiership and the air command with the profits and powers these two functions provide. But Thieu, cunning and less talkative, may strike first.

There will be organized opposition which logically will join the Buddhists who are preparing for their coming struggle against the illegal, unjust Buddhist Charter imposed on them by the junta July 18.

In the final act of the show, there will be a lone actor: the U.S. and its suffocating military might against a background of dead bodies and burned villages in a deserted Vietnam.

Nixon foresees no tuition in 10 years

By DAVID FRANK

Robert Nixon, leader of the Ontario Liberal party, yesterday carried his election campaign to the campus, predicting that university tuition will be free within 10 years.

"But for the present," he said, "we Liberals have set tax reform in the financing of elementary and secondary education as our priority."

Mr. Nixon was accompanied by the St. Andrew-St. Patrick candidate, Len Shifrin, and about 20 placard-bearing campus Liberals as he made his whirlwind tour.

Mr. Nixon said that "most of the students at universities come from well-to-do families" and that both the federal and provincial Liberal parties are pledged to eliminate this situation.

Although he met few students who were of voting age, Mr. Nixon stopped frequently to introduce himself and answer questions.

Mr. Nixon said he "saw nothing wrong" with the Students Administrative Council's supporting the distribution of birth-control information on campus.

He pointed out that several birth-control clinics are in operation in spite of federal law.

Mr. Nixon criticized POSAP, the provincial plan which provides loans and grants to students.

"The grant part of this program must be emphasized," he said. "It is through this program that we can work towards the elimination of tuition fees."

Mr. Nixon rejected what he called Premier John Robarts' attitude that the necessity of "paying tuition fees builds up the moral fibre of youth."

The Liberal accent is on youth said Mr. Shifrin, 28, who called Mr. Nixon the only political leader "who, when you refer to the post-war years, knows you are talking about the Second World War."

Robert Nixon, leader of the Ontario Liberal Party

SAC rep opposes draft dodger aid

A member of the Students Administrative Council has his own draft dodger proposal for next Wednesday's SAC meeting.

Shelley Goodman (III

APSC) has drawn up a resolution opposing proposals that SAC supply financial aid to American draft dodgers coming to Canada.

The resolution says:

"Whereas the Students Administrative Council has always interfered with the internal politics of friendly "And since one of these friendly powers, namely the United States, is now engaged in a costly war, it is unable to satisfactorily enforce its federal laws through lack of funds;

"This council therefore desires to donate $500 to the federal government of the United States to be used to apprehend and prosecute draft dodgers."

"It is none of SAC's business to interfere with United States' policy," Goodman said in an interview.

"If SAC wants to spend the money, then send medical supplies to North Vietnam. The draft dodgers are not our problem. Don't solicit them."

Intellectuals are compulsive: Feuer

Intellectuals should not be allowed to gain political power, says Professor Lewis Feuer of the sociology department.

Prof. Feuer told a Hillel meeting Monday that many dictators are intellectuals, such as Mao Tse Tung and Wwame Nkrumah.

"Intellectuals are men driven by compulsions and they take naturally to totalitarian politics," he said.

"This means people who disagree with them may be labelled anti-scientific and liquidated."

Prof. Feuer said the liberal's best friend is the middle class which does not mind people who are different.

He described the New Left as a generational revolt with nothing to revolt against and few real challenges to meet.

A "New Right" could form if leftists use violent means to attain their non-existent ends, he warned.

U of M begins point grade system

WINNIPEG (Special) — A new grade-point system replaces the old percentage system at the University of Manitoba this fall.

Designed to produce greater uniformity of marking standards among courses, the system involves grade points ranging from 0 to 4.5, which represent grades of F to A plus.

A greater emphasis will be placed on viewing the student's curriculum as a whole, so that failure in one area will not assume as much importance.

In a three-year course, the student will be allowed to write 23 examinations, of which he must pass 15 with a total of 30 grade points.

This system will eliminate supplementary exams and failing out early because of freshman carelessness.

Sex in kindergarten

Sex education should start at the kindergarten level, says Barry Lowes, Metropolitan Toronto school chairman.

Mr. Lowes criticized the Ontario Department of Education for timidity toward sex during an address to 2,500 doctors, clergymen and educators.

"Kindergarten is late, but it is here we must start."

U of W holds race relations talk

WATERLOO (VNS) — The federation of students of the University of Waterloo will hold a six-day seminar on the future of race relations in Ontario.

The seminar, to be held Oct. 17-22, is sponsored by the Native Canadian Affairs Committee at the University of Waterloo and the Canadian Indian Youth Council. It is restricted to Indians and to Ontario students.

A leaflet announcing the seminar says: "The white society must be willing to offer its assistance to these young (Indian) leaders. The young Indians must reserve the right to reject such suggestions as are made.

Therefore, the relationship must be one which has for its background an understanding of each other's culture and heritage, a knowledge and respect for each other as humans and equals."

"The present seminar is an attempt to construct an atmosphere in which this relationship can be examined and re-examined, in which Indian and non-Indian youth can get to know each other's ideas."

No nominees for new UBC senate seats

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Students at the University of British Columbia seem reluctant to make use of their new seats on the university's senate.

After years of lobbying by students and proponents of academic reform, the senate decided last May to allow student representation on the university's highest academic body. But so far no nominations for student senators have appeared.

Nominations have been open since the first day of registration, with elections planned for some time before Oct. 31. A candidate must have attained second-class standing in a full program of studies in the winter session preceding his election.

There will be separate ballots for graduate and undergraduate students.

Three senators will be elected by the undergraduates. The candidate polling the most votes will serve for two years and the next two will retain office for one year.

NLF reps will tour Canadian campuses

MONTREAL (CUP) — Three representatives of the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam arrived in Montreal yesterday to begin a tour of Canadian campuses.

The visit is sponsored jointly by the Student Christian Movement and the Canadian Union of Students, so Canadian students can become "acquainted first-hand with the position of the NLF in that war, and may personally question the rationale behind the NLF's actions in the war."

During the 31st CUS Congress a motion was passed proposing a program of Vietnam awareness.

The NLF representatives are scheduled to visit the University of Waterloo and the University of Calgary, and arrangements now are being made to visit other campuses.

They are scheduled to stay in Canada for about two weeks.

Greece holds trial for prisoners

ATHENS (Special) — Greece's military government has decided to put on trial some of the estimated 2,400 political prisoners, many of them youth and student leaders, arrested since the junta took power five months ago.

The Athens military court last month passed sentence on 34 members of the youth wing of the banned Centre Union party. They were charged with disobeying military orders, insulting authorities and spreading false information.

Four of the group were heavily fined and sentenced to nine years in prison.

Youth and students are under constant government surveillance to ensure conformity to strict regulations on conduct, clothing and the expression of opinion.

The secretariat of the World University Service at Geneva has expressed concern "for the welfare of students detained by the regime in concentration camps on the Aegean Islands" and has sought to make official contact with the Greek government "in order to obtain information about the conditions and the needs of these detained students."

A two-man mission sent to Greece by the World Assembly of Youth at Brussels reported "there is a considerable uncertainty about what might happen when the schools and universities are scheduled to reopen in the fall."

The government has announced its intention of suspending teachers who do not meet its "loyalty" standards and of closely controlling textbooks and curricula.

CCF leader promises free tuition

SASKATOON (CUP) — W. S. Lloyd, leader of the Saskatchewan CCF, promises free tuition if he is victorious in the Oct. 11 provincial election.

Making a strong bid for the support of the young people, he has presented a plan calling for technical and financial aid to ease the serious housing situation.

He proposed a Saskatchewan Youth Council to enable young people to have a voice in programs, policies and curricula of high schools and universities.

Among other functions of the council would be "Youth Centres," a "Youth Safety Council," and a "summer job bank to provide summer employment for students."

He said the Council "would advise the government on all programs concerning young people."

Lakehead now offers grad programs

PORT ARTHUR (VNS) — Lakehead University this fall is offering its first graduate programs, President W. G. Tamblin has announced.

The programs, leading to degrees in English, physics, psychology and mathematics, will be assessed in the light of their importance to northwestern Ontario.

The university Senate has delayed institution of a graduate program until certain of the adequacy of faculty and research facilities.

Library Instruction for Graduate Students

The Reference Department of the University Library is offering instruction to graduate students in the use of reference materials. Separate talks will be available for Humanities and for Social Sciences. Apply in the Reference Department to sign for a class as soon as possible.

TECHNICAL AND CLERICAL EMPLOYEES

Why should you be left out?

Other groups of employees of the University of Toronto share their employment problems. The professors, for instance, have their own association and the maintenance and service staffs belong to a union. You are the only groups which have no representation.

Why not get with it? Join The Civil Service Association of Ontario (Inc.), 15 St. Mary Street, Toronto 5, Ontario. 927-6950.

We can help you out!

Soccer opens Interfac year

University of Toronto's intramural athletics programme swings into its 85th season as tennis, outdoor track, and organization meetings for team sports are under way.

The programme, recognized as one of the best of its kind on the North American continent, features a total of twenty-five individual and team competitions during the school term.

Soccer kicks off team interfaculty competition on October 4 with PHE and Dentistry out to protect their first and second division titles. The Arts Faculty Trophy is the cherished prize in this sport.

In football, Victoria College will be after their tenth straight Mulock Cup when the schedule opens on October 10.

The only other outdoor sport of the fall term—seven-a-side rugger—begins its schedule October 16, as Nankeville Cup winners, PHE A, will attempt to continue as champions.

Indoors, Law Lords will be shooting for their third straight Division One lacrosse title and the accompanying Dr. W. A. Dafoe Cup. Innis College are reigning box-la champions in the second division as all competition in this sport will resume on October 10.

Volleyball and squash teams get underway on October 17 and November 7 respectively.

Victoria Staff Cup winners Senior Engineering and intermediate league champions PHE head the list of volleyballers while Trinity A will be looking for another Boake Cup victory.

Hockey, basketball, and water polo schedules will commence during the latter part of this year and the early weeks of the new year.

Several interfaculty meets will also be held during the 1967-68 season. Swimmers will hold two meets, in late November and February, while indoor track competitions are scheduled (one per week) between January 16 and March 5.

The spring term will feature a wrestling meet as well as a tournament in each of gymnastics and fencing.

TENNIS

In the interfaculty tennis championship, Don Steele and Rudy Knoblauch moved into the flight finals in group I with impressive wins.

Steele, seeded number four, defeated Elmer Hara and Paul Prochazka while Knoblauch, a newcomer from Switzerland, upset fifth-seeded Gord Gibbins 6-3, 6-4.

In group II, Harvey Der- rington, eighth seeded, will meet Terry McNally and first seed Mike Zimmerman will face Ken Brown.

Experienced harrier team for Little Cup competition

Athletic coach Fred Foot is optimistic about the 1967 edition of the Varsity harrier team. Returning from last year's O.Q.A.A. championship contingent are Dave Bailey, Brian Richards, Bob Cairns, Rich Pins Pyne, Bruce Thompson, Dave Tong and Bob Armstrong. Only Doug Macdougall will not be back as he transferred to McMaster and will probably run for Mac this year.

However, with most of the team bringing plenty of experience and running ability from previous seasons under Foot's tutelage, this should be another good year for Varsity.

The harriers first test will be at Canisius College in Buffalo on Oct. 28. By that time the squad should be ready to defend the Little Cup against McMaster and Waterloo who finished one-two behind Blues last year. The O.Q.A.A. meet will be held at Queen's in Kingston.

The strongest showing for Varsity will probably be the excellent running of Dave Bailey. Last year Bailey demonstrated early in the year that he would be hard to beat. At the McMaster track meet Bailey was the only Toronto athlete to garner a first place ribbon. Bailey will be a strong favourite to repeat his excellent showing at McMaster this weekend.

Single veteran returns to Canadian finalists' lineup

By MIKE McGARRY

Varsity's Volleyball Blues began workouts for the 1967 season at Hart House yesterday under the mentorship of coach Taimo Pallandi.

Last year the Blues went all the way to the Canadian Intercollegiate championships in Calgary where U. B. C. Thunderbirds won the Second Century Week title. That made it two years in a row that Blues dominated the Intercollegiate teams that compete in a tournament held in early December.

Coach Pallandi has only one returning veteran from last year's champs and is still looking for potential spikers. Blues play only exhibition games before this season's tournament at Western on Dec. 7. These opponents, including Balmy Beach, Canadian champions, should give Blues plenty of experience and Pallandi a chance to size up his charges and make adjustments.

McMaster, Guelph, Western, and Montreal will be out to dethrone Varsity this winter. Indications are that Guelph and Mac will offer the stiffest competition due to their acquisition of several fine high school players. Guelph in particular should pose a real threat to Varsity with several players from the 1966-67 high school championship team on their squad.

Meanwhile Blues have a month to prepare for what will be undoubtedly one of their hardest schedules. Practices will take place each Tuesday and Thursday at 8:00 a.m. in the main gym at Hart House.

Top rugger on view Thursday

For those many hordes of students who have yet to see their first rugger match, an excellent opportunity comes Thursday night at Varsity Stadium when Varsity Old-Boys, including the illustrious Paul Wilson, take on the present Varsity Blues. This will be rugger at its best and most exciting. Experience pitted against youth. Don't underestimate the Old-Boys!

Following is a precise explanation of how the game is played by our rugger specialist, Doug Woods.

HOW IT'S PLAYED

As a game, rugger stands midway between soccer and American football. It has similarities to both games. As in the American game, the emphasis in rugger is on scoring touchdowns — with the difference that in rugger the player must actually touch the ball down in the endzone. This is called a try and it is worth 3 points. The conversion adds 2 points. It must be taken from any point on an imaginary line drawn perpendicularly from the spot where the ball was actually touched down.

Also as in the American game, the player carries the ball in his arms and it is up to the players on the opposing team to tackle him. In rugger however, the player may pass the ball, provided the pass goes behind him, or kick it before he is tackled. He must not die with the ball if he can avoid it.

In rugger the action is virtually continuous, stopping only when the ball goes out of bounds or when the ball is passed in a forward direction. This continuous action lasts for two 45 minute halves. No substitutes are allowed. If a player is injured his team plays a man short until he can return.

As in soccer, most of the rules in rugger revolve around the problem of getting the ball back into play after it has gone out of bounds or there has been an infraction.

A LINE-OUT

If the ball has gone out of

bounds it is returned to play by means of a line-out. The forwards of each team line up perpendicular to the sideline at the point where the ball went out. The ball is thrown high in the air between the two lines and the forwards try to catch it and pass it out to the runners.

If there has been an infraction on the field, for instance if a player has thrown a forward pass, the ball is returned to play through a scrum. The scrum is composed of eight players from each team who link arms and shoulders in such a way as to form a tunnel into which the scrum-half puts the ball. The forwards then try to roll the ball between their feet back to the scrum-half who has moved around behind them. As soon as he gets the ball he throws it out to the runners and the game is on again.

THE BACKS

It is the job of the backs or runners to run with the ball and score tries. In effect everyone gets to run the ball and score tries but it is primarily the backs' duty. The back line is composed of six players who stand about 5 yards apart at a 45 degree angle behind the scrum. The first person to receive the ball is the fly-half. As does any other player who has the ball, he has the option of running, passing, or kicking. Usually he passes to the next back who is the in-centre. He in turn passes to the player outside him, the out-centre, who in his turn passes to the winger.

This, then, is the basic format of the game: the forwards who make up the scrum and the line-outs, and the backs who run with the ball and do most of the scoring. This format provides not only for the big, bruising, football-lineman type of athlete but also for the smaller man whose main asset is his speed. Regardless of their size, however, all the players must be good at running, tackling, and kicking. Rugger does not provide for specialists. All the players must be versatile. They must all be tough and in excellent physical condition. Rugger is 90 minutes of hard play without armour of any sort. There is no room for the player without lots of guts.

BE THERE

The game on Thursday, at 8 o'clock in Varsity stadium against the Old Boys, should be an excellent test for the Blues. But it will also be an excellent chance for those who have never seen the game played to get out and watch a first-class match.

The scrum-half (#9) has just put the ball into the scrum, and the blue forwards are heeling the ball.

Rough play and referee Mar Blues' 1-0 victory

The front campus was the scene of one of the dirtiest soccer exhibitions in years yesterday, as Blues managed to eke out a 1-0 decision over Ryerson. To make matters worse, the refereeing was incompetent at best, and ridiculous most of the time. Tempers flared long and often but the game official chose to ignore everything that went on, having on many occasions turned his back to the play.

Let's not take anything away from Ryerson, however. Their team, consisting mainly of players inferior to Varsity's, managed to make Blues lose their temper and forget all about basic soccer. One player on Blues who shall remain nameless said after the game, "We got trapped into playing their kind of game and that hurt us, baby." As a result, Blues were their own worst enemies.

As soon as the game got under way, Ryerson found themselves hemmed in and in trouble. Before the five minute mark, Graham Shields had scored on a low, hard shot to the opposite post that beat Ryerson goalie Jerry Haley cleanly, and Blues seemed to be well on their way to another one-sided victory. But that was Blues' finest hour.

Ryerson started to kick and push Blues, and Blues started to kick and push Ryerson, while the referee watched another game. Most of the hacking was taking place in the Ryerson hall of the field which would indicate that Blues were in command.

For the first ten minutes of the second half the teams did play soccer and Blues missed golden opportunities, Austris Liepa and John Gero being the culprits. Then the rough play began again as the teams traded kicks and punches, and forgot about the game. Mercifully the fellow with the whistle decided after some more unexciting soccer that enough was enough and ended the sad affair. "We are lucky to get out of a game like that with no serious injuries" philosophised Blues' coach Ernie Glass and he added, "it's hard to believe how terrible we look sometimes."

Alan Cragg, on defense, Dwight Taylor, at halfback and Jim Lefkos in the forward line were the pick for Blues, but their sporadic attempts were throttled by their team-mates. Well, Blues will have to get better before they get worse

DeRocher only serious casualty As Blues prepare for Mustangs

Confronted in his Stadium office, Varsity football coach Ron Murphy barely had time to blurt out terse, "We played lousy football," before dashing off to address his players at a team meeting.

He really didn't have to say much more about last Saturday's 17-15 loss to McMaster as Blues' performance was uniquely uninspired. Blocks were missed, tackles were sloppy, play execution was erratic, and even reliable Mike Eben let a pair of passes trickie through his gluey paws. Someone reported overhearing Murphy lament, "Only the team manager was organized."

Mac gave Blues a physical pounding as well as statistically with the aid of more than a few mis-directed elbows, but only third year man Larry DeRocher has reported on the limp. DeRocher will miss Saturday's home game against Western, but Murphy hopes to have him back in time for the league opener on October 7.

Although Blues were disappointing even for an exhibition game, it must still be remembered that Mac coach, Jack Kennedy, went first string all the way while Murphy stuck to his promise of using everyone on the bench. And you can ask Leo Cahill whether exhibition games are a good indication of how a team will do during the season. Blues still seem a solid bet for at least second place in this year's SIFL.

Coch Murphy introduced a few new plays to the players last night destined to add a bit more zing to the attack. Mac's fullback, John Watson, gained more yards along the ground than the entire Varsity team so any innovations are hardly superfluous.

BLUENOTES: Glen Markle has not fully recovered from his ankle injury of last week, nor are the bruised ribs of veteran end Jim Ware healthy enough to permit his participation in workouts. . . Quarterback Bob Amer missed Monday's practice because of 'flu. . . Mike Wright's rugged tackling caused two fumbles on Saturday and a near-fracas at the end of the game. . . Eben wore contact lenses for the first time against Mac.

Students launch mass offensive for Mac report

By ROD RITCHIE

A do-or-die drive will be launched immediately to win the confidence of students and faculty activists in a bid to ram the Macpherson report past the "vested interests" in the arts and science faculty who might try to bury it in committee.

More than 100 student leaders and onlookers engineered the plan Wednesday night at a packed meeting in the Junior Common Room of University College.

The students say they have organized the campaign to combat possible opposition from:

—powerful businessmen on the board of governors whose prime concern is "putting across a good public relations image and balancing the books, and who have "stifled" reform for the past 25 years.

—department heads who have a vested interest in research and graduate studies to the detriment of the undergraduates.

—students who are "content with spoonfeeding or who believe in yielding to authority."

Hersch Ezrin (IV UC), chairman of the JCR meeting and chairman of the SAC summer committee on the report, says opposition could kick the report to death on the grounds that it lacks "authenticity".

—first, because the report avoided mentioning any fundamental philosophy behind the proposed changes;

—second, because the report lists few statistical proofs that the majority of students support the recommendations.

"President John Sword will probably delay any announcement on the report until Christmas," says Ezrin.

"From now until December we've got to lay on the action or else the vested interests will step in with their own version of what students want from the report.

"If we don't mobilize now when they're asking for reforms, then how can we expect to criticize the report later when it's being implemented?"

A list of the priorities in the student campaign might go something like this.

Today and for the next two weeks, student leaders who attended the JCR meeting are going to stand up in the lecture halls and seminars and demand curriculum clubs be set up for the course being taught.

These clubs will elect members to sit on student-faculty committees that will study the report, air grievances, write alternate courses if need be, and distribute questionnaires to students in the course.

Student leaders will approach the board of Governors, presently dominated by businessmen, and press for more faculty representation.

"This will be difficult," Ezrin says, "because the business interests will not surrender power willingly."

"It will be important, because the board controls the university and has the power to squash Macpherson recommendations."

At the same time, the students will press for representation in the 800-man council of the arts faculty.

There they will be aiming at getting on the council's committee on undergraduate studies and on promotion and tenure of professors.

They will demand that promotions be based on the ability to teach rather than the ability to publish and the size of the research grant.

Throughout these manoeuvres the leaders will also drum up student enthusiasm with a teach-in on the report, with informal meetings in residences and across campus, with a written manifesto on the report and with slogans such as "Student Participation Equals Student Power" and "Reform Without Restructuring Equals Zero."

"The purpose of the teach-in," says students Council President Tom Faulkner, "will be to turn students on.

"We don't want them to get hepped up, send petitions to the Board, and then call it quits. They've got to get informed and active all down the line."

"The Mac report was written for the faculty," Ezrin says. "Our Manifesto will be written for the students."

Some dissenting students, however, have already thrown a damper on the campaign.

Says Ian Morrison (SGS): "The students won't mobilize. They're interested in getting that piece of paper. You're going to frighten them with talk of new responsibility and independent learning."

Norman Seachar (II Meds) seconds this claim.

"You'll get support only if the recommendations affect students personally and immediately. You're going to have to get them idealistically motivated."

Skule stages Mr. Clean scene Offers virgin to unwashed hippies

By BOB BOSSIN

Undaunted by Thursday's rain, 250 engineers herded together for the first "Skule caper" of the year.

Under the auspices of the Brute Force Committee, the Skulemen marched on Yorkville for the "first international wash-in". They carried with them a bathtub, containing a washboard and Diane Longbottom (II APSC), one of the few girls registered in engineering.

Several of the crowd carried placards bearing slogans such as Help Clean Up Yorkville, Lower Student Drinking Age and Yorkville, the Newfie Valhalla.

Led by the Lady Godiva Band, the engineers sang the Mickey Mouse Club song at Trinity College and the Red Cap song, with thumbs raised, outside the Park Plaza Hotel.

Once in Yorkville, the group chanted "Wash, wash, wash" until a police cruiser arrived, and the chant was changed to "Car wash, car wash, car wash," and then to "We love cops".

Meanwhile the BFC had captured a hippie and gave him the Lady Godiva Memorial Bath to the accompaniment of the Skule cannon.

"We are celebrating the passing of a way of life," said LGMB leader John Pullam (SGS), "Lampy's asylum".

He then began to look for a virgin for the annual deflowering ceremony dating back one year to last fall's first prank: the sacrifice of a virgin to the Archer statue at City Hall.

In the confusion, however, Miss Longbottom had disappeared, so Jack Aluin (III APSC), a trumpet player for the LGMB, served as the virgin and was ceremoniously dunked.

"The caper came off very smoothly," said Pullam, "The Mongolian horde obeyed the BFC chief and even waited twice for green traffic lights.

"We did have a little bit of difficulty getting the bathtub up the stairs at the end of Philosopher's Walk."

"Right now it's cool," said hippie Barry Jones, "but if everybody has to start running for their houses, it could be a real drag. I already had a bath today".

"I guess it's okay, if that's their bag," said another Yorkville native.

GSU wants no executive; tries to impeach Bradford

By BRIAN CAWFIELD

If 44 graduate chemistry students have their way today the Graduate Student Union will be without an executive.

The 44 students have signed a petition to "impeach" GSU President John Bradford a doctoral student in psychology for alleged misuse of graduate student funds.

And the entire executive says it will resign if Bradford is censured.

No provision is made in the GSU constitution for the impeachment of a president. However, a meeting may be called by at least 25 students who sign a petition.

The chemistry students led by Anthony Pitts and Steve Fieldhouse, say the Executive has made unnecessary departures from precedent in the expenditure of funds during the summer months.

President Bradford defends the executive's actions, saying no precedents have been unnecessarily broken.

He will explain the summer expenditures to graduate students at today's meeting.

The GSU operates on an annual budget of $28,000. In the past its services to graduate students have been mostly in the recreational and social fields.

Vietnam extension course in spring

The war in Vietnam will come to the campus this spring as part of an extension course being called the Anatomy of Peace.

The course is organized by Hart House warden Carmen Guild at the suggestion of the Canadian Peace Research and Education Association.

Mr. Guild says the intention of the course is "to give a student an appreciation of the part which scientific method can play in the understanding and control of international relations."

The course, which begins Monday, will comprise 18 lectures and discussion sessions, each presided over by an expert on the subject being discussed. Among the lecturers are John Holmes, director general of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs; Norman Alcock, director of the Canadian Peace Research Institute; and George Ignatieff, the permanent representative of Canada to the United Nations.

The first seven lectures will concern problem areas such as the Middle East, China and Rhodesia to allow the student to relate theoretical and analytical work to practical problems.

The course will conclude March 10 with a two-day simulation of the Vietnam war developed by Professor Jerome Laulich. The students will be given an opportunity to find out if they can find a solution to this escalating problem.

Anyone interested in taking the course should contact the Division of University Extension immediately.

Thursday's heavy rain brought about a record sale of Hart House umbrellas.

The previous record for a single day's sale of umbrellas was 106, established one Thursday last year.

The most popular model, Mr. Arthurs said, was the trigger-loaded one which pops up "like Mary Poppins."

Will new curriculum face 1971 frosh?

By PAUL CARSON

Put yourself in the position of high-school graduate planning to enter this university, let's say in September 1971.

You want to enrol in the faculty of arts and science, and all recommendations of the Macpherson committee have been implemented.

Just how will the courses be arranged and what options will you be allowed to take?

Well, to begin with, to gain admission to the St. George campus, you will require the equivalent of a 66 per cent Grade 13 average regardless of what course of study you wish to pursue.

(At present, an unannounced but strictly enforced regulation demands a 65 per cent average in most cases for admission to the St. George campus).

The old honor and general courses will have disappeared. In their place will be the generalist program and the specialist program.

Both programs will last four years.

The general course in science, as presently set up, will no longer exist.

If you successfully complete all four years in either the specialist or generalist program, you will receive an honor degree.

At the end of third year you may choose not to proceed to fourth year. In that case, you will receive an ordinary degree regardless of whether you were a specialist or a generalist.

Under these new arrangements, the degree will reflect the number of years completed, not the number of courses or extent of specialization.

There's only one catch: students with less than second-class standing on the third-year exams will not be allowed to enter fourth year.

The courses offered by the faculty of arts will be divided into three broad groups—humanities; social sciences; mathematics, physical sciences and life sciences. These will replace the existing four divisions of languages, social sciences, natural sciences and physical sciences.

Upon entering first year, you will choose any five courses covering at least two of the three divisions.

Virtually all courses will be available to you as Grade 13 prerequisites will be retained "only where experience shows them to be necessary." This means chiefly languages, advanced mathematics and sciences.

Each arts department will offer a basic course available to all freshmen, specialist as well as generalist.

Moreover, each department will offer additional courses for students who wish to concentrate in a subject right from the start.

There will also be two new combined courses—physical science (physics and chemistry) and biological science (botany and zoology).

The basic, additional and combined courses will be taught at the level of the present honor courses.

The departments of English and mathematics will offer collateral courses designed for students who are concentrating in other subject areas but wish to have some English or mathematics as background knowledge.

All one-hour pass options will be eliminated.

If you wish to take religious knowledge, it will be available from the federated colleges as a one hour non-credit option.

A sample choice of subjects in this new common first year could be: basic English, basic French, basic history, basic economics and basic chemistry.

Or, if you wished to concentrate in first year: basic English, basic history, additional history, basic political science and basic geology.

In calculating your final standing, all courses (whether basic or additional) will be weighted equally.

Should you somehow fail one or more courses, you will be permitted to write one supplement if your overall average was between 60 and 65 per cent. If your average was above 65 per cent you will be permitted two supps.

If your average is below 60 per cent or you fail more than two courses, you're out of luck.

Transferring from generalist to specialist or visa versa will be much easier under the new course structure.

In most cases, you will require nothing more than standing in at least one course of your intended speciality. And if you don't want to specialize any longer, there shouldn't be any unusual problems at all.

Compared to the present, there will be fewer exams in all years and, of courses, no final exams at all in second year assuming you've passed your term work. In all years, term marks will count for at least 50 per cent of the final mark in all courses.

After first year, you will take a maximum of five courses a year. If your average is sufficiently high, you will be permitted to take a sixth course of your choice.

Of the five regular courses, one will be an option of your choice with no departmental restrictions to influence your decision.

The emphasis will be on common courses, no preferential teaching for specialists, easier transfers, except for some languages and sciences, and more freedom of choice for the student.

UWO students tent-in successfully

LONDON (VNS) — Students at the University of Western Ontario packed up their tents Tuesday after a successful "tent-in."

Elwin Moore, spokesman for the UWO's newspaper, The Gazette, says the purpose of the demonstration—to attract attention to the housing crisis—was achieved through press and television coverage. As a result, 20 private householders offered students accommodation.

Members of the Housing Research Committee who organized the protest, now are trying to meet with the London transportation commission.

If bus service can be extended or improved students could live in the cheaper suburban areas and still have access to the campus.

There has also been talk of increased residences on campus, but nothing has been done at the city level to lower housing costs.

Will Windsor U. leave CUS?

WINDSOR, Ont. (CUP) — The Students Council of Windsor University voted Tuesday for a referendum Oct. 13 to decide on their membership in the Canadian Union of Students.

The question of CUS membership was raised Tuesday by Bob Somers, minister for external affairs, who claimed CUS was a leftist organization that does not represent the majority of students throughout Canada.

Somers felt he had seven out of nine council votes in favor of his motion. But the tide turned when Hugh Armstrong, CUS President and Monique Ouillete, president of the Ontario Union of Students, showed up at the council meeting.

Commenting Thursday on the Windsor council decision in Ottawa, Armstrong said, "I am glad their council decided not to withdraw from consideration of the problems of education."

"I am confident that if the students at Windsor who are in favor of retention of CUS membership are able to get in contact with the main body off the campus, then they will vote to remain in CUS."

Redding WILL appear in Blues show

The Blue and White Society has washed its hands of the whole affair, but the rhythm and blues show will go on.

The Oct. 12 show was postponed earlier this week by the Blue and White when main attraction Otis Redding had not yet signed a contract.

But Mike Lais, proprietor of a Toronto record shop, confirmed the contract and now will handle the project entirely by himself.

The Society will not suffer any financial loss as a result of the venture.

"... with an increase such as we have recommended in the proportion of teaching time spent in tutorial groups, performance in the tutorials could be made the basis of all or most of the term-mark. But this would have two significant disadvantages. It would inhibit the tutor-student relation. And it would unjustifiably penalize the student who preferred to work and was capable of working independently, by forcing him to conform to a set tutorial scheme."

—Macpherson Report, Chapter II, page 29

Macpherson report: what's there, what's not

Acting president J. H. Sword has called the Macpherson Commission Report on the arts faculty "revolutionary." Actual-but-absent president C. T. Bissell has called it "radical." In their terms it may be.

But they are looking at it as administrators. From our view the report is little more than a collection of recommendations that attack a wide range of problems in a scatter-gun approach.

Simcoe Hall will love it, of course, because it is pragmatic, doesn't rock too many boats and is argued with smooth and impeccable logic. Its recommendations on the federal structure of the university are bound to meet much opposition, but the rest of the report is pretty mild stuff. A little more audacious idealism would have been welcome.

Not surprising for a student of political theory, Macpherson was quick to point out his methods. Rules, methods and traditions tend to become institutionalized and "maintain their own momentum, regardless of their continued adequacy," he wrote. They should therefore be questioned from time to time.

Proceeding logically from evidence submitted to the committee would be inadequate in itself; forming a philosophy of undergraduate instruction and proceeding logically from there, too vague. Therefore Macpherson wrote: "We have tried to set out our assumptions and to reason from there, in light of the factual evidence, to our assumptions."

That's a valid way of proceeding, of course. What has happened along the way, though, does not live up to these great aims.

EXAMS CORRUPT

Throughout the entire first chapter, one gets the impression that Macpherson would have loved to do away with examinations altogether. They don't do what they are supposed to do; they take up a too-large part of the teaching year; they take up the professor's time; they corrupt the working of the entire educational system at the university. Students tend to work toward what they need to pass them instead of developing their own intellectual abilities.

It seems to us this should be enough reason to do away with exams, but not to Macpherson's committee. Instead, they pulled out on assumption from their hats, "that some kind of examination is necessary so long as society expects the university to certify some measure of intellectual competence." Once that is stated, of course, further discussion becomes invalid.

Yet the assumption remains unquestioned in the report. It is not arrived at logically. Just why society can expect the university to certify is never discussed. And the problem of certifying "intellectual capabilities" is a debatable-enough subject itself.

Macpherson notes that exams are one major reason for the faults evident in the lecture system. Students and professors work towards them because they are inevitable.

Lectures should allow students to see a genuine academic in intellectual action and not just dispense information, Macpherson says. Yet most lecturers tend to "cave" the course and students use lectures as an easy way to get facts.

A vicious circle operates. Students, knowing the final examinations will be based on the lectures, take down everything, compartmentalize the facts, then hand them back on the finals.

EXAMS AND LECTURES

Professors (or lecturers) set exams based directly on their lectures. "For why should a professor who has spent 50-75 hours trying to fill the student's mind with such material examine anything else but his ability to absorb and retrieve it? He must assume that what he was doing all year was worthwhile" Macpherson says that and we might add that if the professor started setting exams not closely associated with lectures, most students would fail.

Macpherson also notes: "The more the lectures are being employed to 'cover' the whole course on which the student is to be examined, the less time he need spend outside the lectures." Not only NEED spend but CAN spend.

Therefore the recommendations, following logically at all times, say change both the lecture and examination system.

We welcome Macpherson's suggestions to reduce classroom hours to 10 a week (half of those tutorial hours). We also applaud his suggestion that lecturers rethink the purpose of lectures — make them less a vehicle to "cave" a course and more to stimulate and explain. Yet Macpherson found himself unable to suggest that this be made general faculty policy.

In considering examinations, Macpherson states, the committee considered it Utopian to try and improve the character of examinations because there is no way to ensure that individual professors follow such recommendations.

We don't believe that. What we do believe is that Macpherson shied away from suggesting ways to ensure that professors improve their methods. Thus the committee settled back "seeking to reduce their (the exams) evil."

BEATING THE SYSTEM

Macpherson reached a dilemma in his discussion of the students' tendency to work to pass exams and little more. He found that students find little intellectual activity in lectures, talk of beating the system — i.e. passing the exams and getting the degree without the expected work. They became disillusioned, he writes in this section.

So he called on his assumption that exams are necessary to pull him out. After that, he proceeded along several different lines. Exams should be dissociated from lectures, perhaps with comprehensive examinations. Yet Macpherson makes no specific recommendations on this point and even invalidates his suggestions by saying that even comprehensive exams don't work.

Perhaps by not letting students get a taste to exams we can avoid their worst features, Macpherson argues. But given that exams are necessary, what to do? Perhaps an exam-free year will help.

Macpherson seems to assume that students given just one year without exams will forget all about them and become scholars. This is questionable in itself but positively invalidated by Macpherson's solution.

First, he decided that first year has to include exams to weed out the lazy and incompetent students who managed to slip through Grade 13 examinations with high enough marks to be admitted to U of T. Third year also requires exams, he wrote, to grade a student for the world if he's in a graduating year, for the graduate school if he's going on.

In fourth year, examinations should be minimized but not fully eliminated because the student may have some way to "register his achievement," Macpherson wrote. He suggested that a fourth-year thesis might work just as well but used that argument to justify examinations too.

EXAM-FREE YEAR?

Thus second year is the beneficiary of the no-exam plum. But careful, the gift has strings attached. Third year examinations, you see will, under this scheme, test students on their knowledge of both second and third years' work. In other words, a border examination to eliminate the problems caused by examinations. This seems unrealistic and yet the committee suggested it with nary a giggle.

Macpherson then goes on to consider alternative methods of evaluating a student's performance. He hopes that with the reduced emphasis on lectures, the tutorials would receive new emphasis and students would take them more seriously. Students, he hopes, will also then be judged more closely on their term work.

But to base evaluation solely on term work, Macpherson writes, is unrealistic because it would penalize the student who prefers to work at his own pace and would "inhibit the tutor-student relation." Meaningless! And the report does not explain what the committee meant by this.

Macpherson passes over these issues with a few small recommendations: at least 50 per cent of a student's mark should be based on term work; tutorials should be emphasized and restricted to 10 or 12 persons in size and should not be allowed to degenerate into miniature lectures. His naive assumption that this will do the trick and patch up the whole system is alarming.

ONE SOLUTION?

Therefore, he leaves us the mild recommendation that all departments consider the possibility of giving very small tutorials. He notes that Psychology has considered tutorials of only three students.

Alternative evaluation, therefore, does not get full treatment in this report. And yet essays, thesis, class reports and class discussions are a much better tool of evaluation than examinations. Not to mention that their academic character is surely much higher than the scribbled, half-remembered or all-memorized answer written at the examination table.

One solution that we see feasible (and beneficial) is to replace exams with orals in all years. Professors would not have to mark those boring papers and would be better able to gauge a student's competence. At the same time he would be able to notice right away if the student is ill at ease because of tension, emotional problems or whatever.

The way we see it, though, these orals should not be seen as examinations. They should be occasional individual tutorials, used by the professor to teach and to evaluate.

In principle Macpherson accepted such an idea. He also deplored the time wasted when professors have to mark exams. Yet, Macpherson didn't draw the ends of his own discussion together.

A look at the problems and solutions

Just how well will students fare if the Macpherson report is accepted by the Arts & Science faculty and administration? Will they get what they asked for?

From The Varsity archives we have reproduced extracts from student briefs to the Macpherson committee describing the problems facing the university and Macpherson's answer to students' suggested remedies.

By ROD RITCHIE

The problem

• Lectures

For too long too few students have dared to question the ougust legislators who determine the curriculum in distont faculty offices. The student becomes the loser in a monologue between the lecturer and o passive note-taking oudience

• Examinations

In courses where year-end exominations determine success, students walk around like a bunch of dehumanized zombies under medieval torture. Exams are nothing more than mass feed-back and puzzle-solving exercises. Some students can beat them, others can't.

• Honor and general courses

General arts and science students are second-rate citizens academically because their courses are understuffed and shoddily taught.

The faculty has maintained high standards for honors courses while they have let the general courses slide.

This has discouraged honors students w h o would have liked o more general education from entering the general course. As it is, honors students have been troined for one speciolty ond little else.

• Colleges

The federoted colleges have abdicated their chief responsibility to educate and are sinking rapidly to the level of social clubs.

The problem is that the colleges ore teaching too few subjects or that too few students are enrolled in certain courses to make them viable.

If this continues the colleges will have to be scrapped.

Student recommendations

Lectures should be reduced in number, restricted to a synopsis of the course and taught with the aid of the latest techniques.

Stress would be placed on tutorials and seminars where students could pursue practical projects.

Curriculum should be determined by student-staff committees. At the very least, there should be more staff counselling in personal and academic problems of the student.

Teaching teams should circulate in different classes to evaluate the lecturer who would then be reworded or penalized.

Final exams should count for no more than 50 per cent of the final mark. The number of take-home exams should be stepped up.

There should be one good make-up year for deserving students. All students should have the right to appeal their marks — whether they have passed or failed — with written comments on the appeal.

Enrol all arts students in the general course for the first two years; after that they could pursue their own specialty.

Make the general and honors courses of the same standards and length.

Provide easier transfers for general students into honors courses.

Institute pedagogical training for graduate students planning to teach.

Some subjects, or at least courses in those subjects should be removed from the faculty departments and put into the colleges.

More departmental professors should be cross-appointed to the colleges.

Macpherson recommendations

There should be no more than 10 classroom hours a week of which no more than five would be devoted to lectures. No course would have more than one lecture a week.

The other five classroom hours would be devoted to tutorials having no more than 10 or 12 persons.

For science students, lab work would be cut by half and restructured into problem classes where a student may leave any time after work is done.

Students should be included in many of the policy making bodies, including the council of the faculty of arts and science.

The matter of teaching lecturers how to teach will be left up to the individual departments.

A professor's teaching might be appraised by: (a) himself. He should be given money to pay for a video-tape of his lecture so he can see himself in action; (b) Students. Course critiques like the one published last year by the SAC should be encouraged; (c) His department. This should apply only to juniors in the department.

Examinations should account for 50 per cent of the final mark.

There should be no exams in second year. There will be exams in first to weed out the lazy and incompetent, and in third and fourth years for the benefit of the graduate school. In fourth year, separate exams should be replaced by one comprehensive exam.

Students who get below 60 per cent on their final exam will not be allowed to write supplemental exams. But all those who are in honors courses, or who got between 60 and 65 per cent will be allowed to write supps.

The general and honors courses should be split into specialist or generalist courses of either three or four years each.

Generalists or specialists completing the four-year program would qualify for the honors degree, while those completing the three-year course would qualify for the ordinary degree. After third year, students would be able to claim the ordinary degree without taking make-up courses.

All college teaching departments should be converted to university departments. College faculties, as such, would consist of professors cross-appointed to the university departments.

The colleges would then be able to give first-year tutorials in most subjects and first-year lectures in many of the more popular subjects.

Eliminate the one hour pass option. Colleges wishing to retain courses in religious knowledge should offer them as non-compulsory, non-credit options.

General administrative approval for report

University administrators generally reacted favorably to the recommendations of the Macpherson Committee report released Wednesday

President Claude Bissell, now at Harvard University, termed the report "radical." It was Bissell who commissioned the report in March 1966.

He said he held reservations about the recommendations dealing with relations between the colleges.

However, he added, he was "generally in sympathy" with most of the 98 recommendations, but he said it would take at least two years to implement any changes.

No action will be taken until President Bissell returns to the university in the spring.

John H. Sword, Acting President of University of Toronto, termed the Macpherson Report "revolutionary" and said that it is "likely to rank as one of the most important documents in the recent history of the university."

While Mr. Sword declined to comment on any of the 98 proposals at this time, he said that the document deserves widespread discussion before the machinery for implementing any of its recommendations is established.

SAC president Tom Faulkner approved of the reduction in lecture hours. "It means more individual effort and less spoonfeeding," he said.

He felt that more student representation on the Faculty Council was good, bringing a "recognition of real student power."

Overall, he felt the report was progressive, but it had no unifying philosophy about the student and his education.

Professor R. S. Harris, Principal of Innis College, found the report "admirable, related, and coherent." Since it was not too far a departure from the present university program, it was "not revolutionary, but evolutionary", and thus, "encouraging."

New College Principal D. G. Ivey said the report was "well-written and readable." However, he felt the students would not be prepared to accept the decrease in hours.

Professor Ivey believes that the suggested changes in the university's formal structure could lead to a change in the attitude towards education.

For instance, many students now go to university for higher paying jobs and not for a good education.

Professor D. V. LePan, Principal of University College said he was unprepared to comment but he said he thought the report was "impressive and valuable."

Rev. A. B. Moore, Principal of Victoria College, was delighted with the report's praise of the collegiate system and the college's strength within a multiversity.

He disagreed with the report's recommendation that less teaching should be done within the colleges. The transferral of the focus of some departments from the colleges to the university would inevitably weaken the college as academic communities, he said.

He also disagreed with the Macpherson recommendations on religious knowledge. They amounted, he said, to an "abolition of religious knowledge teaching on campus." This was contrary to the policies of universities such as Princeton, McGill and U.B.C. Dr. Moore emphatically stressed the value of religious knowledge as a "humane discipline in university curricula."

Dean S. J. Colman, Erindale College, was distressed with the situation revealed by the Macpherson Report. "It is a sobering reminder for Faculty, Students and S.A.C. on the need for University reorganization," he said.

He thought that courses would be improved with fewer lectures and more tutorials. "The extra tutorials should be given by professors and not graduate students," he said. "At present, undergraduates do not receive enough personal guidance from their professors."

Dean Colman thought the inferiority attributed to the general courses must be eliminated if U of T is to be a true "community of scholars."

Undergraduates have a distinctive contribution for University administration. He found their contribution in Erindale to be "interesting and stimulating." He favours the refinement and expansion of the Course Critiques to provide a constant assessment of undergraduate opinion.

Is Scarborough a costly fall-out shelter?

By LINDA WALDMAN

Scarborough college may be criticized for resembling a fall-out shelter, but most of the students aren't complaining.

In fact, most wouldn't trade it for the St. George campus.

The college was described recently as "the most expensive fall-out shelter in North America" by Dr. David Abbey, co-ordinator for the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education.

Dr. Abbey said he found student reaction to the college ranged "somewhere between apathy and hostility."

Many Scarborough students interviewed agreed the building does resemble a fall-out shelter, but others compared it to a Mayan temple or a nuclear power plant.

One second-year student said he was told by John Andrews, architect for the college:

"It is a fall-out shelter — that's what it was created for."

"If the bomb did drop, it would be great," said Ken Lauder (III Scar).

"Miles and miles of unfinished concrete walls, an absence of windows, rooms that slant inwards and a science wing that is an endless low-ceilinged corridor do give one an eerie impression," another student said.

"It takes a lot of getting used to," admits Professor A. M. Leggatt of the English department.

"A first it's very disturbing, like something the Germans left after the war. But once you get used to it, the humanities wing is marvelously eccentric and a most exciting place to work."

"It grows on you," said Dauphne Brown (II Scar). "You don't like it at first but then you really appreciate it."

"It's terrific. There's nothing wrong with it once you get used to it," said another student. "People from all over the world come to see it so why shouldn't we think it's terrific?"

"I like it here," said Art Stein (I Scar).

"It's friendlier, it's smaller, and the concrete walls are decorative in a way, like a concrete piece of art. I wouldn't go downtown."

All students agreed they prefer Scarborough College to the St. George campus.

"It's got it all over downtown," said Jim Gilroy (III Scar).

"From the point of view of free parking, smaller classes, a friendlier atmosphere and mobility, Scarborough is far superior."

"Can you go tobogganing in your back yard on cafeteria trays?" one student asked. "Can you go fox hunting?"

But there were criticisms. Most said a dash of color would make the place more cheerful. The college also lacks an athletic building, and some felt a pub would add spirit.

"Why aren't students on the main campus coming to one of the most fantastic architectural feats in North America today?" asks Wendy Tranter (II Scar).

"They really should come down here and form their own opinions."

MUSIC

Louis Riel

By PETER GODDARD

There is a certain type of movie-addict who sits in front row center, leans forward and lets the film wash over him like the rush of wind past his ears, his face aglow from the light of the screen. There is no distance for him, no attempt to push back the perspective. It was the same with the spinning sounds of the world premiere of Harry Somer's opera Louis Riel; no distance, no perspective, only that caught on the run, the imp of meaning, the wisp of nuance, the tactile heart, the shifting surfaces of sound.

The four stylistic approaches employed in the score—original folk material made indigenous to the whole fabric of the work, thinly scored abstract atonal writing, simple diatonic writing in a late nineteenth century style, and the constant amalgamation of these types—permeated the libretto with a fusion of modernity and timelessness.

While the opera Ginger Coffey was all middle, Louis Riel was all beginning, all end; as the former seemed all development, the latter became all theme and recapitulation.

While the characters in Coffey seemed to be aimlessly bickering, clowning and constantly quarreling in order to, as one of Beckett's tramps suggest "to give us the impression that we exist" those in Louis Riel were as finely sketched as Ayn Rand's John Galt.

Ironically as Coffey represented a unified process of personal (mental) development, its music was intended to be and remained a stylistic pastiche. The drama of Riel, presented by Murray Laufer and Marie Day's almost surreal amalgam of stylized sets and costumes and Currier & Ives-like projections on screens had the more organically unified score.

Lowell Cross' electronic music interpolations emitted from four loudspeakers located at the four corners of the hall induced a new dimension on the work. The listener lost his sense of place, his sense of passiveness, as the opera score took on a different perspective depending on where the listener sat.

By this element the work took on the bleak black and whiteness of a Kafka-ish nightmare, a chilling night-walk through a Rorchaschian landscape of ideas.

What brought vitality to Mavor Moore's (with the collaboration of Jacques Languirand on the French text) and prevented the drama from being locked in a historical deep-freeze—less of a play than a pageant—was the writers' instance on the isolation of his characters.

Each of the protagonists' portrayals echoed (perhaps incongruously) a line from a Tennessee Williams play: "We're all of us sentenced to solitary confinement inside our own skins."

Throughout most of the work the words and music existed as separate entities, fused, occasionally, by the acting; yet at moments of climax there came a melding, as the libretto became more lyrical, the music more prosaic.

All deeply introspective feeling is an anti-social act; for characters to communicate they must cut themselves off from communication with the rest of their environment; in this there is something always a little paradoxical, a little mad.

This madness is at the core of the opera Louis Riel. As Prime Minister Macdonald is mad and maddening in his attempts to make an honest woman out of a nation living common-law with the infant United States, so to Riel, who as librettist Moore explained, is "the idealist driven mad by continued betrayal by ruthless idealists in who he mistakenly trusts."

Riel, in Moore's conception, became paralyzed by the Hamlet syndrome—a thinker anaesthetized by his own thinking; a schizophrenic Metis, a half-breed belonging to no-one; the single-minded revolutionary, a nineteenth century Che Guevara leading a small colony away from the inexorable path of progress.

Bernard Turgeon sung Riel as a man whose ability at smelling falseness extended to himself. Physically he was one long tremendous sulk. On him the right sadness sat and lethargy crawled; he could freeze a word with an irrevocable irony at once damning and deadly.

Riel became aware of the fate he had trapped himself in early in the opera. In justifying his little nation's sovereignty he had executed Orangeman Thomas Scott with the words;

*I cannot let one foolish man
Stand in the way of a whole nation.*

Fifteen years later Macdonald had Riel hung on the same grounds, on behalf of Canada.

As the Prime Minister echoing Riel's earliest words intoned:

con'd from R-2

Stand in the way of a whole nation*

the words doled out like the mournful peeling of a bell. The opera, which covered the circumstances linking these two events had gone full circle. But the circle was not of perfection, but of a Gordian Knot. And Turgeon's Riel became a man who sensed its tightening about his neck, and plunged and struggled, bursting with will and intelligence to escape it.

In one of the most indelible moments, not just of this performance, nor of this season, but of all opera presented in Toronto, Turgeon depicted Riel's transformation from marauder to messiah at the conclusion of Act I. Echoing a comparable process in Joyce's Stephen Dedalus (who simultaneously saw himself as God and Christ) Riel knelt and intoned "Je vous aime, Seigneur, O ma force . . ." and from supplication to apocalyptic frenzy, in wild frustrated spasms, Riel began to envision himself as David:

*Seigneur . . . vous avez manifesté votre
bonté envers celui qui vous est consacré Envers David . . .*

*. . . envers David
. . . et sa postérité pour toujours
. . . Je l'ai vu . . . Lui . . .
Mère! Mère Je l'ai vu Je m'appelle . . . David!*

In this scene, its cadence falling from raging climax to sacrificial tenderness, Turgeon transfixed the opera's meaning on stage. It started as a five finger exercise performed into an unforgettable concerto.

With the exception of the lullaby of Riel's Indian wife, Marguerite (Roxolana Roslack) at the beginning of Act III, the above scene served as a watershed for the rest of the drama. With a flat, quivering voice, Roslack intoned her sadness as Riel had belched his passion, over the baby's crib. These two arias became perfect foils.

Sir John A. Macdonald fit less in with the other characters than with the scenery. Librettis Moore left Cornelis Ophthof less with a character, than caricatured to perform; two-dimensional, Ophthof's Macdonald surfaced as a droll, drunken lobbyist, comically corrupted.

To underline this superficiality even further the singer had to semi-sing Gilbert and Sullivan-esque lines as:

*Sugar is the oil for political machines;
without it all the gears would never mesh.
A man must have a weakness for a certain kind of sweetness be it soothing to the spirit or the flesh*

over a coy, John Phillip Sousa-like brass accompaniment. But instead of anguish made comic, Ophthof brought forth a type of political lunacy in a character attempting to "lead his horse into confederation."

In his portrayal Ophthof left something for everybody but not enough to satisfy anybody.

Soppy Butterfly

By PAUL DARBY

The charm and pathos of Puccini's Madama Butterfly makes it one of his most popular operas. The story is direct and uncomplicated and the music translated with grace and simplicity the words and emotions of an innocently trusting oriental girl, casually married and casually deserted by Lieutenant Pinkerton, U.S.N.

Messrs. Barbini and Geiger-Torel of the C.O.C. seem to have produced this touching opera as a breathing spell between Riel and Coffey and as a sop for sentimentalists. For it is pretty much in the same shape we last saw it, barring the touch of authenticity Nagisa Kai gives to the lead role.

But generally this production is little more than a re-issue. Even the plastic flowers looked used.

Nonetheless I found the performance enjoyable, particularly because of the simplicity and lack of pretention with which it was presented. The sets were reduced to a minimum the backdrop was simply the outline of some unrecognizable mountain. The lighting was mostly white and overhead. The movement of the characters on the stage was natural rather than dramatic. Hypercriticism would call this amateurish.

But the effectiveness of such unelaborate production techniques was found in the contrasting emphasis of the human element. The characterization of Madama Butterfly, in voice and the subtle drama of movement, was free to attract the empathy of the audience, unhindered by embellishment.

And there were moments when the listener became participant. That there were not many such instances was the fault of the musicians.

Maestro Barbini is a reputedly fine music director, but in this effort his command of the orchestra and coordination of stage and pit was somewhat unsteady.

At times the orchestra, as opera ensembles are wont to do, overshadowed the soloists. But more inexcusable was the tendency of the orchestra to lead the singers.

Nagisa Kai, as Madama Butterfly, has a sweet enough voice to impart a winningly naive personality to her nineteenth century countrywoman. But her voice is not strong. At times she seemed to overcome this obstacle and with clarity and precision held a clear command of the stage, but just as often her voice was wafted away with the cherry blossoms.

Harry Theard as Pinkerton had for me an acceptably lyrical voice, and though his naval counterpart was sketched as an insincere rambler, still, both his singing and his acting had an unnecessary kinship with his starved "whites."

Suzuchi, Madama Butterfly's servant and vamp, played by Nancy Greenwood though constantly being knocked about in a most stickban-like fashion, has a voice with body and projection.

TV'ing (or —is a prune a vegetable?)

By ALLAN KAMIN

Two weeks ago I was approached by the leg-woman for Pierre Berton's new one-hour TV show, "Under Attack." They were taping four full shows at Convocation Hall, said she, and were very interested in having me on one show, along with two others who have had past experience with LSD, to form a panel to interrogate Dr. Abram Hoffer, one of the world's pioneer LSD researchers. Dr. Hoffer, an M.D. and therefore sensible, would take, they were confident, an extreme anti-LSD position, and the stage would be set for a fun-filled hour of hate-sparks.

Concerned about being a mere statistic? Forget it. At least statistics comprehend their limitations. But what about words? What about the army of greedy professors and newsmen who, eager to possess us, rob us of our essence, hold us down with their labels, and generally enslave our minds in ivory chambers?

The roof fell in when Dr. Hoffer disclosed by phone to the "Under Attack" people his attitudes as regards LSD. Actually he thinks that LSD can be beneficial, and that the dangers are exaggerated? That would never do. But, it being too late to obtain a more reasonable doctor, it was needed, if sparks were to happen, to bring on to the panel with me two other persons who, not having used LSD, would be prepared to challenge his every contention.

CBS television recently did a one-hour special, purportedly on the hippies, but for the main part on the horrors of LSD. Its cameras roamed the psychiatric wards of the land. One frightening scene focused on a teen-aged boy who was hospitalized as the result of an LSD-induced "psychotic reaction." A rough summary follows:

Interviewer: Why are you in this hospital?

Boy: I saw God while I was on a trip, and afterwards went around telling my family that God was real.

Interviewer: Do you regret what you did?

Boy: I realize I shouldn't have tried to explain God to other people, because they wouldn't understand. (The camera now switches to the boy's grim-faced mother)

Grim-faced mother: Yes, that's right, he went around saying that he'd seen God. I tried to reason with him, to explain to him that you don't see God until after you die, but he wouldn't listen.

OK, boys, here's some background papers on Hoffer and LSD which our research staff has prepared: the Post Article (roundly condemned by researchers, described by one as "an atrocity, a complete distortion of the results"), the Look article (perhaps as bad) and relevant quotes like: "LSD is the most dangerous drug to come down the pipe in years."

Pierre Berton, to Mahishi Mahesh Yogi (he of Transcendental Meditation) in a recent TV interview:

"In other words, you are teaching not a religion, but a way of life!"

Exercise A: Draw a square containing 16 smaller squares (4 x 4). Write a different name in each square. Select the most beautiful name and the ugliest name on the chart, cut these names out in their boxes, and chew the two squares of paper. If the cumulative effect makes you too high for safety, go to see your registrar, who will be glad to help you get down.

Paul Krassner wonders about Truth... Psychiatric report on Stokely Carmichael: definitely psychopathic as niggers go, Mr. President, but there is no evidence to suggest that he would be inclined to violate the late President's corpse.

Panelist: Will there be any plants in the audience?

Producer: Sure; cabbages, prunes, ...

Panelist: No, I mean, are you planting people to ask questions?

Producer: Yes, it's necessary if we're to have an interesting program (Stupid kids, you three panelists are plants.) As a matter of fact, our research staff has prepared a list of questions that you might like to ask Dr. Hoffer.

Exercise B: (i) Define hippy operationally in terms of number of marijuana joints smoked per week.

(ii) Where does Acapulco Gold enter into this?

From a TV interview last year—

Pierre Berton: Do you mean to say that Protestantism and Hinduism are one and the same?

Timothy Leary: Yes, Pierre, that's right.

Pierre Berton: Protestants would certainly disagree.

Timothy Leary: I know, but the Hindus wouldn't.

From the list of questions prepared by "Under Attack's" research staff for the use of panelists:

7) Dr. Hoffer, you equate the fatal risks of LSD in your article with those of bobsledding. You scoff at the current public outcry against LSD and ask why "Parliament does not meet to ban bobsledding" Do you honestly feel that the taking of LSD and bobsledding can be equated? Bobsledding can lead to severe physical injury or death. But we already know this positively. But we don't as yet know ALL the potential dangers inherent in LSD.

The truth is, of course, that LSD makes you beautiful and flowerly and you love everybody and know everything and it's right good for hay fever.

Someone once told me that you do not understand something if you cannot communicate it. But he didn't understand.

Who have you appointed to be YOUR brain police?

"Under Attack" - Under Attack

By GRAHAM FRASER

Sometime next month, Channel 11 will present another in what seems like an endless stream of irrelevant, inconsequential series in the tough-ol', bad-ol' tradition of bad interviews which extends from the worst of Seven Days to the worst of Sunday to its culmination in the whole structure and format of Pierre Berton's Under Attack. A hokey "here-you-are, kiddies!" announcer, his voice ringing in tones reminiscent of the Lone Ranger and the Howdy Doody Show, will tell the Berton fans that tonight, in Convocation Hall, faced by three bright students from the University of Toronto, Mr. X. (William Kashtan, president of the Canadian Communist Party, Dr. Abram Hoffer, and David Susskind—one show apiece) is UNDER ATTACK!

The result, (though I can speak only for the Hoffer and Susskind shows) was possibly the most artificial, unimaginative, misguided, and just plain bad television I've ever seen. There were virtually no redeeming features.

Unfortunately, it became apparent from the outset that the show was less than sensitive. In the general discussion of the show, to which some eight or ten students, including myself, were invited, it was clear that the producers of the show were obsessed with conflict. (After the discussion, the majority of those present politely declined to appear on a panel.)

The producer of the show, a short aggressive, dark-haired woman in brightly-coloured clothes was pushing for conflict: sharp, heated hopefully angry conflict. Talking to two students who had been asked to go on the LSD panel "attacking" Dr. Hoffer, jutting her chin forward and jabbing her finger, she snapped: "You people

High Park

By JOAN MURRAY

It's a little late to be reviewing the High Park sculpture, especially now that the pieces inside the main building have been dispersed, among them what many sculptors thought to be the best work in the exhibition — the piece by Jason Seeley. However, one can argue that not much attention was given to criticism of the works of sculpture in High Park. Most critics gave the area the old rara, 'get out and see the sculpture whirl'. They then complimented Gerald Gladstone for his conception of the program, as well as for his faithful attentiveness to the sculptors' needs, beefs, temper tantrums, drinking bouts and thoughts.

It's true that Gladstone deserves compliments. He did a tremendous job. Especially noteworthy was his ability to raise funds for others, an unusual trait in an artist. ....But it's also true that the sculptures deserve criticism.

There is only one bad work in High Park: Bernard Schottlander's "Centennial Pyramid". Its concept is trite, its execution sloppy.

Most of the other completed works are medium good. For instance Bill Koochin's hands in belt "Hippy" with 'Love' button and too-tight pants, dark glasses, and long hairdo is a cute piece of work, skillfully set into scale between two trees. It is guaranteed to make your dog bark (mine fell over himself) and it's a good work beside which to get your photo taken. It is not great sculpture.

"Midsummer Night's Dream" by Wessel Couzijn (Amsterdam, Holland), a Surrealistic analysis of two dreamers is also well-sited. The birches on either side of it are just the right trees for the moody quality of the work. But the metal sexual parts and the metal brain are disturbing to the texture of the whole. Furthermore, as muddy rain water and autumn leaves fill the gap between the two squirring, sexy, sleeping forms, the imagery becomes unfortunate.

The "Polar Bear and Seal" by Pauta (Cape Dorset, N. W. Territories, Can.) is like a ferocious Eskimo carving blown up to a full piece of sculpture. It will please traditionalists and lovers of fantasy. I found the relationship between the two animals, murderer and victim, seeming mother and child, peculiar and after a while, vacuous.

The only really good piece of sculpture in the show as it now stands is Hubert Dalwood's "Temple." This artist from London, England, has created a clean, orderly mystery, an enticing hieroglyph of an emotional state. His work is a profound paradox, and his juxtaposition of ancient theme and modern materials is unique.

Mirasha Karishman's "In Suspense" is also an interesting sculpture, playing with concepts of suspension and release. I found the two "Flower Powers" by Mark di Suevo (New York) a little disappointing because of their bad composition but possibly they will look better when they are fully set up.

Among the other sculpture still being constructed, Vaillancourt's looks the most interesting. Even his present melee of scrap iron, pig iron, wood, moulds, coal, huge equipment and numerous workmen is a happening in itself. It's clear that Vaillancourt just didn't feel ready to embark on the next step while all this was going on.

The afternoon I was last there however the artist confessed that they were at last ready to "set it up." This may be a disappointment to the faithful people who like to munch their lunch in front of Vaillancourt's piece and stare at the "happenings" on.

Just think what women had to go through every month before there were Tampax tampons.

Actually, every feature of Tampax tampons was designed to eliminate at least one drawback of the pin-pad-belt contraptions women once had to use:

- Tampax tampons don't show when they're properly in place, so women now can wear their most attractive clothing any time.
- Odor can't form when you use Tampax tampons.

THE CITY OF GOLD...

By
TAMAR NEWMAN

When I left Canada to spend a year in Israel in July of 1966, a friend wondered if I wouldn't be scared living on the border in Jerusalem. I laughed. As far as I was concerned, Jerusalem was as safe as Los Angeles or Montreal, if not safer. Borders are really very ordinary; of interest only to excitable lady tourists.

I had come to Israel partly because I was restless; I wanted to get out of a rut; I wanted to be independent. More than that, I had a conflict of feelings that I felt I could resolve. I had been given a good Jewish background, and although I had rejected formal Judaism, a strong feeling of "being Jewish" still remained with me. Every Jew, in one way or another, must come to terms personally with the existence of a Jewish state. I went to Israel because it was there.

I settled in Jerusalem to study at the Hebrew University. Students come to Jerusalem from all over Israel, and many, as I did, come to love this quiet city. "In Jerusalem", we would say, "even the air is different."

My roommates at the university were both former members of kibbutzim. Although Sara was always glad to throw cold water on my bookish ideas about the glories of communal living, she still looked at problems in a very kibbutz-like way. She felt strongly that all Jews should live in Israel. No argument could sway her.

By May, I knew Israel; I had camped throughout the country, I had made friends and had good times. But looking back now, the year has divided into two distinct periods; the period of about ten months before the crisis, and the three months during and after it. During the crisis, both borders and philosophy, forgotten during the year, became important again.

The Middle Eastern crisis affected me more strongly than anything before. Even now, memories come back unexpectedly, and give my present life as a student in Canada an air of unreality or triviality. I hope I can recreate and communicate something of the atmosphere of Jerusalem in June 1967. It is important to me.

By definition, a crisis occurs quickly. Monday, May 15th was the nineteenth Independence Day of the State of Israel. We celebrated with street dancing, all-night parties and fireworks. It was the gayest holiday year in spite of the very real problems which were plaguing the country. Nineteen years after independence, the Zionist dream was starting to tarnish. The morale of the people, sapped by economic depression and the long series of terrorist raids was at its lowest point since 1948. Immigration, once non-existent was becoming a serious problem.

A small article mentioning troop manoeuvres on the Sinai Desert appeared in Tuesday's paper but who had read or remembered it?

Friday President Nasser requested that U.N. troops pull out of Gaza. Saturday morning, coming home from a party in Herzliya, my date pointed out trucks moving south along the coastal road. "Army," he said, "if we don't go to the movies tomorrow, you'll know my tank unit has been mobilized. It's a precautionary measure. Don't worry."

I wrote a reassuring letter to parents. This had happened before. In Jerusalem, lectures and seminars continued as usual. The bus service was slow and the coffee-talk was political. But border incidents and threats occur quite regularly in Israel and are not to be taken too seriously.

When Nasser closed the Straits of Tiran a "tense situation" turned into a crisis. My roommates still remembered the Sinai campaign in 1956. The issue had been the same. How could Israel not go to war. Only this time there was a complicating factor, the Russians. Israel was and is scared of active Russian support of the Arabs.

Lectures filled the time between hourly news broadcasts. Huddled around a transistor radio, professors, students and cleaning ladies forgot about social distance. My seminars on 19th century nationalism were more of the twentieth century Arab variety. Israelis felt that their country had been plunged into a farcical situation, a result of chance error and misunderstanding. They were not in control of the situation as the decision for peace or war rested with the Americans and the Russians. The diplomats talked on. As the chances of peaceful settlement dimmed, feelings of frustration with the governments' diplomatic initiative mounted. Why sit here waiting to be attacked? Let us do something. Victory, the Israelis knew, would not come as easily as it had in the Sinai campaign. Arabs on three frontiers were united.

... a Friday night when some of the soldiers were home on leave, I could forget about tomorrow and the tension it generated. Things seemed almost normal.

It is said that a Hasidic rabbi addressed his followers who were visiting the holy land to remain. "Israel," he said, "is the land of miracles and therefore the safest place in the world." My parents apparently had not heard the story and like all other foreign students, I too received my "Come Home" telegram. The same day the consulate absolved itself of all responsibility for Canadians who had decided to remain in Israel. Did I have a right to stay, perhaps even risk my life for a country which was, after all, not my own? Was my decision to stay more than just an emotional one based on the excitement and glamour created by a dangerous situation? I loved Israel and Jerusalem but had some loyalty to my parents as well. Was it right to cause them all this worry? Did I really know "why" I was staying on was it even important to have a "reason" to remain. To leave Israel at that point looked like cowardice. I did and do believe that a Jewish state is vital to all Jews not just those who happen to live in Israel. Even today, I can't explain why I ignored my parents request. I felt fear aside, that Israel was where I ought to be... I stayed. I would do it again.

When Moshe Dayan joined the government as security minister on June first we all knew that the army would act. When?

Arab propaganda was getting worse.

"Eskol take advantage of your young wife, Miriam now."

"Zionists we have this to say to you, unlawful stealers of land — bang, bang!"

It was funny but frightening at the same time to hear such candid unabashed hatred directed at you personally. For the first time, I too hated. Let's demolish the bastards. In a war situation issues are simplified as emotion takes over.

By Monday, June 5th, the tension was more easily borne and so often happens, beginning to be boring. For safety's sake we started to dismantle Chagall's stained glass windows. Again, it was work that had to be done but certainly not very comforting or pleasant work. Our boss kept muttering that he hoped he, and not some Egyptian officer would have the honour of replacing them. We never finished. A siren screeched. In the distance a cloud of smoke started to rise and that day I heard the guns for the first time. In the bomb shelter a kind lady tried to reassure me by telling stories of the last siege in Jerusalem in 1948.

Even there, in the hot, stuffy shelter, people amused themselves. Some ladies gossiped. Two men played chess. In one corner a mother nursed a baby, only two days old and in another corner a bearded old man prayed. Radio Cairo was confident of victory. Kol Yisrael only broadcast news of shell- ed settlements. Every place meant something. In Nahal I had a friend. I had camp- ed on the loan of Kujjat Haandrem. My relatives lived in Natanya. At night there was no sleep. In total darkness, my roommates and I lay on the hard floor waiting for the shells to fall, gauging their distance by the noise they made when they exploded. The flares blazed as they slowly descended through the night. If we hadn't been scared we would have found them quite beautiful.

For the first time, I was worried about my own life, not my parents' anxieties. My friends who were fighting nearby were momentarily unimportant. Death, which up until then had been a concept, abstract to be discussed on any basis was now a real possibility. I was afraid.

Then at 2 a.m. Tuesday, we heard that the air force had destroyed 400 Egyptian planes. The news was so fantastic that I didn't believe it. Then Sara said that we had won. The rest was merely a mop-up operation. The rest of the week is blur. Jerusalemites sat in shelters for three days. Each day the news was better. It was not only the military victory but the reports of the reaction of world-Jewry to the crisis which increased morale so much.

Sara had insisted all year that American Jewry only sent handouts and money to Israel to salvage their guilty consciences. Then, they forgot about Israel which meant nothing to them. She didn't know what to make of this new identification with Israel and was very impressed. For her, Jewish identification was voluntary outside Israel; I too was proud, of the new demonstration of the unity of Jews everywhere but for me, the reaction was natural and appropriate. Any other reaction would have been "un-Jewish" and wrong.

Wednesday we found out unofficially that Jerusalem was in Jewish hands. The next day we passed through the religious quarter. The soldiers, smiling reservists eager to go home, very unwarlike were pelted with flowers and confetti. With each returning truck, the citizens eager to see the wailing wall from which they had been barred for nineteen years broke into fresh applause. My war was over. Life in Jerusalem was returning to pre-crisis normalcy. Stores opened. The philharmonic orchestra gave a concert—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Some of the soldiers came home on leave.

But in the North, the paratroopers, tired from their battle in Jerusalem were still fighting. The Syrians, the root of the whole problem in many eyes, had to be settled once and for all. Even now the joy was restrained for the casualties were being announced. My roommates and I went around to the hospitals checking to see if friends or relatives were there hoping they were not and frightened of finding someone. Reading the newspaper, was a frightening experience. Seven hundred and eighty-two men were listed as dead at the latest counting. Some of my friends were killed defending Jerusalem, the city where I had studied and lived. Perhaps it is easier to bear, the ache of their death knowing that they fought and died for a country they loved and an ideal they believed in. Peace in the Middle East is elusive. For twenty years pride, egotism and a misguided sense of priorities have prevented its establishment. But somehow, this time, there must be peace if the bravery and the sacrifice of this mess is to be more than a valiant but useless gesture that must be repeated every ten years. Without peace, the western wall of our temple is fittingly named the Wailing Wall.

DEEPER QUESTIONS

At times, as a paragon WASP, I have a deeply sorrowful, quite inarticulate feeling that—that I have no song to sing; no poetic oral tradition, little heritage. I have felt this reading Andre Schwartz-Bart, watching a group of old men reciting the rosary before a friend was taken to the morgue, listening to men like Gilles Vigneault. I felt it perhaps more acutely than ever last Sunday night, listening to Elie Wiesel author of The Gates of the Forest, and The Jews of Silence, talk to Hillel. Wiesel is a story-teller, a tall, intense man with his thinning hair rumped; his soft rich voice disguises the tension and passion he feels, —and yet draws his listeners hypnotically into his vision.

He was billed as speaking on "The Meaning of the Holocaust"—but began by saying that he wouldn't; partly because he hadn't known, and didn't know enough to speak on it, partly because he felt that to speak on the holocaust in that way was a blasphemy: that the words 'meaning' and 'holocaust' simply didn't fit.

He talked of the war—and told stories; stories that had no punch-lines, stories that opened rather than closed at the end, stories filled with questions—all in the rich, sad, warm voice that seemed to fill the room, and draw us all close together. I sensed an almost mystic tension that made me feel that he was leading us farther than words could take; that he would lift his voice and sing, and all would join in some old Hasidic tune.

Last year, Rachelle Rosenberg wrote an article on Wiesel for Random, which was sub-titled "the madman who refused to forget." The article only partly explained Rachelle's strong emotional reaction; the power of the man only fully struck me while listening to him. But what she wrote explains a lot. "At Auschwitz he swallowed a bowl of soup on Yom Kippur the solemn Day of Atonement, a day of fast. Defiantly. And his heart was a great void. He shrieked that he would never forget the flames which had consumed his faith forever; never would he forget that nocturnal silence which deprived him for all eternity of the desire for love."

But, from the nothingness of Auschwitz, and the negation of meaning and life that it was, Wiesel emerged: "With his weapons of song and laughter he can stand up to God, he need fear no night. At last, Elie can recite the Kaddish."

For Wiesel, The Holocaust had no meaning. Auschwitz was the denial of meaning. However, The War had great meaning. As a correspondent at the United Nations, he saw a repetition of the cries and slogans of thirty years ago; the same chanting and screaming to annihilate the Jews, the same passivity and "neutrality" of the Western Powers, ready to "let events take their course."

As a non-Jew, I was torn—just as I was torn in June, watching friends preparing, if necessary, to leave Canada and fight for Israel. Like most non-Jews, I did little—and was morally rescued by the Israeli victory.

After Wiesel finished, it was announced that "Mr. Wiesel has kindly consented to answer questions"—and half a dozen earnest hands shot up. They were earnest, intense questioners—who somehow missed the point. Elie Wiesel has no simple, easily articulated "answers." As he said, the problem is not to find answers, but to deepen the questions.

Anne of Green Gables

By ALAN GORDON

Anne of Green Gables is a patchwork quilt of a musical. It seems to have been embroidered on a sampler by a Maritime ladies sewing circle and produced for the folks in the church auditorium.

Simple lines get peals of laughter as the audience recognizes the types of people they remember as being "just like that back home", as the musical spews forth unabashed sentiment corn and saccharine at an audience that, on Monday night seemed to have had a remarkably high sugar-tolerance.

Millions of things were fighting the success of the show. Alan Lund's dance sequences had no real reason for being there, except perhaps to remind us of how eclectic Mr. Lund is. The Ice-Cream number (particularly sweet and coy) brought back images of Michael Kidd's Sadie Hawkins Dance for L'il Abner as well as any of the pedestrian dance numbers that the C.B.C. foisted on unsuspecting viewers.

The lyrics and music of the show were, at best, adequate; at worst, they descended into the "moon, June, croon" type of rhyme in which a particularly touching moment was severely wounded by the rhyming of "I adored him/God reward him" finishing off a catalogue of three other words rhyming with, but not including, "bored".

The scenery, by Murray Laufer, had all the style and panache of a C.B.C. remote unit set that they put up in supermarkets, and the costumes by Mary Day while effectively preventing nudity, did little to help the show along.

Like I said, millions of things were fighting the shows success. Yet, it worked. Somehow the puppets of the first act became people in the second, the self-conscious posturing of the first act becomes truthful acting in the second. Some performers of course, do not make the change at all. Jamie Ray as Anne seems to have researched her role by watching Shirley Temple movies, and by taking a course in eye-popping. Susan Anderson, as Diana Barry has matched her friend eye for an eye. But Peter Mews as Matthew and Barbara Hamilton etch excellent portraits as the lonely bachelor couple, straining against their WASP restraint.

The show, despite the myriad production miscues and misjudgements still exudes a warm, honest feeling that manages to avoid sentimentality in favor of sentiment.

Krupa, Sad and Tired

By JACK McCAFFREY

More than a quarter of a century ago, reacting to the feverish excitement caused by the Benny Goodman band, sparked by Gene Krupa, the teenage "jitterbugs" danced in the aisles of the Paramount Theatre in New York.

This week, at the Colonial Tavern in Toronto, mildly drunk businessmen now in their 50's leapt to their feet and shouted "Go, Gene, go!". Anyone listening without the benefit of reinforcements like nostalgia and booze must have wondered what all the fuss was about.

For, although he is one of the few musicians from the Swing Era who still makes a good living from his music, Gene Krupa seems to have lost the sense of excitement he once had. Krupa was at his best in big bands; now he fronts a rather sad, tired quartet. Furthermore Krupa has tried to "modernize" his conception of jazz drumming; but he has not succeeded. Consequently he sounds merely uncomfortable and awkward.

In the good old days, it was "Sing, Sing, Sing" that whipped the crowd into a frenzy and made the sweat pour from the drummer's forehead. But the other night, without the roaring big band of Benny Goodman to give real substance to the music, Krupa's old-fashioned tom-tom solo sounded merely camp. Using the same old rhythmic patterns, Krupa played several solos that showed no sense of structural development. Instead, they featured rudiments played in the military style, and a lot of superfluous movement (ie., "showmanship").

Eddie Shu's solos on tenor sax and clarinet featured his poor intonation and unattractive sound. Between the solos of his sidemen, Krupa interspersed boring, pointless drum interludes. None of the musicians showed much taste or imagination at any point in the set; consequently, their attempt to recreate the excitement of the past was dimly unsuccessful and rather pathetic.

Unlike Krupa, Sonny Stitt is able to bring new life to an old tradition; for, although the bop era is dead, Stitt continues to use the language created by Charlie Parker but in a meaningful way in contemporary modes. Working within the framework of simple 32-bar song forms, Stitt develops long melodic lines, of great rhythmic variety and density, based not on the theme, but on the chord progressions.

And now, after all these years, Stitt has gotten out from under the shadow of Charlie Parker by using new sounds to reinvigorate the old language. On both alto and tenor saxophones, Stitt uses a new device which not only amplifies the natural sound of the horn but also makes possible new sounds. For instance, there is the octomatic control, which adds a unison line an octave below what Stitt is actually playing.

With the support of Don Patterson, a musician with taste and ideas who may be the best jazz organist playing today, and Billy James, a drummer who really listens to the other musicians and complements what they are doing, Stitt has all kinds of possibilities for combinations of different sounds which never existed before in a group this size. Consequently, he can take different approaches to traditional bop tunes like "Scrapple from the Apple" and all those other things based on the blues and "I Got Rhythm".

The difference between Krupa at the Colonial and Stitt at the Town is in the way that they use their respective traditions of swing and bop. Since Krupa has not been able to bring imagination and new ideas to the problems of playing what is essentially an outmoded idiom, it is impossible that he should create music of real vitality and of interest for the modern listener. On the other hand, Stitt is capable of using the traditional language of bop in new ways, thereby making his music sound fresh and contemporary.

Only a musician who has imagination as well as emotional commitment like Stitt, can bring new life to old forms.

Unenigmatic Idyll

By STEPHEN KATZ

Leaving the theatre after seeing Young Aphrodites I heard someone remark to his date, "I don't get it." He spoke as if the picture were some sort of riddle which needed unravelling, or a puzzle which needed to be answered. This is not the case.

Young Aphrodites is a simple picture. It is simple like the Iliad or Romeo and Juliet: it has a story to tell, and it tells it. There is nothing to get. Yet this picture obviously presented problems for at least one member of the audience, and probably for another score who left before the end. They were clearly not satisfied with a picture which was, despite their reaction, a powerful and poetic work of art.

Possibly it is the very simplicity of such a film which makes it so difficult for an audience today, nourished on the complex symbolism of Antonioni and the psychological fantasy of Fellini. Watching the work of these directors, one is aware that their films are meaningful. Minds set to work at once identifying the symbols, and decoding the allegory. What do the masked revellers playing tennis with no ball stand for? What is the meaning of A sani sama sa? Anyone who would suggest that Suzy is only Gulietta's neighbour, or that the propeller from the antique store represents nothing more than a propeller, would be considered hopelessly naive.

And so it goes with art films. Ingmar Bergman has introduced the game of counting Christ-figures. All serious Bergman films have at least one, and sometimes several. Audiences have learned to play the game with frightening ease, and have introduced many new rules of their own: any picture made in color is probably psychedelic; anyone walking alone is alienated; anything which cannot be understood represents the Absurd. Lack of communication and Comments on society can be read into almost any film. If this fails, there is always Existentialism.

Audiences have come to expect films in which they are allowed to participate actively, reading into them all their own problems and circumstances. Interpretation is wholly subjective. One of the comforting things about an obscure film is that it can be interpreted to mean pretty well whatever one wants with little danger of contradiction. The audience is right in there running neck and neck with the actors and director.

Such an audience is bound to be disappointed with Young Aphrodites in which the director has already cast all the parts.

All Review staffers are requested to check their box downstairs AND their basket upstairs this afternoon. Find therein instructions and hopes designed to preserve the sanity and mental stability of all involved.

The audience is relegated to the role of an audience.

This movie, based loosely on the legend of Daphnis and Chloë, and writings by Theocritus, shows no influence of the Symbolist School. It is a sensitive and simple love story set two thousand years in the past, and has no pretensions of being anything else.

A band of shepherds are forced to make their way down from the mountains to the sea with their flocks because of drought. On the shore they meet a community of women whose menfolk are all at sea fishing. A young shepherd falls in love with one of the girls of the tribe. Both are too young to really understand love.

The story of their relationship unrolls slowly and almost silently against a background of rocks, water, and sunlight. The picture is dominated by the rhythm of nature; the alternation of day and night, and the flow of the tide. The people too are forced to regulate their lives by this rhythm; the fishermen set to sea with the wind; the shepherds return to the mountains with the coming of the first rain.

This film conveys a striking sense of period. The characters are believable; these Greek shepherds are Greek shepherds, primitive and unsophisticated, not twentieth century men thinly disguised as Thomas Becket or Thomas More. There is no attempt to express contemporary ideas in exotic trappings here.

The camera work is superb, never tricky or obtrusive, yet presenting beautiful clear images, capturing the heat of the sun on the rocky shore, the desolation of the landscapes, and the overgrown ruins. There are memorable sequences such as the dances of the shepherds, the fisherman's wife stretching nets in the grove to capture birds, and the boy exploring the shore with his pet fox, but none of these detract from the story.

The acting is of uniform excellence, and so naturalistic that one frequently forgets that one is watching actors. The entire picture, in fact, is so artless and so unselfconscious that one forgets that one is watching a painstakingly detailed piece of work. The background music, scored for only two flutes, is sparse and haunting.

This picture draws response which is emotional rather than intellectual. It is a film of striking beauty and sensitivity, but those looking for an evening of cinematography which will provide them with literary fuel would be better off seeing Persona. If they go to Young Aphrodites they will not get it.

Hang down your head John Bradford

There's gonna be a lynchin. This afternoon in Convocation Hall students from the School of Graduate Studies will gather to decide the fate of John Bradford, President of the GSU. From the talk circulating in clouds of Dutch tobacco and over the froth of English ale, there seems to be little doubt as to the outcome of the meeting which will likely adjourn around a scaffold beneath the hung body of Bradford.

It seems that Bradford has incurred the wrath of a number of Graduate students for policies and actions which, his opponents claim, violate their new constitution and do not represent the wishes of the Graduate students.

Although the conflict seems to center around the fact that Bradford is operating by the old constitution rather than the new one (recently ratified by the GSU but not yet ratified by the Caput), Bradford feels that the main reason a lot of students are losing sleep is because of his so-called radical ideas of education.

He is given to dropping such phrases as "The Graduate School is an association of professional voyeurs and they are essentially tinkers in life . . ." He ran on a policy of educational reform and was elected by some 100 of the 4,000 Graduate students who even bothered to show up for the election.

He has since hired an educational consultant (Eric Antilla), bought a Gestetner machine, given money to the Village Hippie bail fund, financially supported the SUPA anti draft programme, and has shown a heretical interest in that infamous house of ill-repute, Rochdale College; these are just a few of the policies which his opponents have decided are irrelevant and uncricket in the sleeping towers.

Bradford says that if a vote is taken which calls for his resignation, he will tender it although the meeting has no power of impeachment. He is counting on a large turnout of uncommitted Graduate students who will not have pre-judged the issue beforehand; He remains, however, unenthusiastic as he feels that sentiment is already overwhelmingly against him. A number of people are bringing ropes.

The Specter of Sexter

David Sexter is an experience in pure insanity, sent by The Little People to wreck havoc and confusion in orderly well kept lives. People have a saying about the antics and accomplishments of this young Canadian film maker "I just don't believe it! I just don't bele. . .". Often as not the tone is as pejorative as it is praiseworthy. After Winter Kept Us Warm was made against all better judgement and impossible odds, he followed this formidable accomplishment with The Offering and acted as if the critics never existed when they had a field day tearing it to shreds.

Everyone disagrees about Sexter; they all know he has a talent for, for, . . . something, but they never agree on just quite what it is. Another common saying among film buff's begins with "David Sexter should really be doing. . ."

But he goes on making films; the olds against him are still formidable although one suspects that he rather enjoys the image of the impossible struggle, yet he avows that his goal is, of course, to make an artistically satisfying film with commercial appeal.

The insanity is still there, however; this week at Ryerson theatre we are confronted with . . . a DAVID SECTER FILM FESTIVAL. It is audacious insanity at its best, and must be admired for its panache. I think I would go and see the new play Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are Dead for the sheer brilliance of the title; equally brilliant is to make two feature length films, show them together and call it a David Sexter Film Festival; outrageous and a lot of fun. It's on tonight and Saturday at Ryerson theatre at 5 and 8 p.m. (complete shows) Students admission is $1.

Don't Buy Scab Grapes

There are so many sounds and vibrations emanating from California these days that some of the less potent and sensational ones tend to be overlooked in lieu of White Rabbits, motorcycles, Watts and Big Sur sunsets. For years now (remember the Woody Guthrie songs), the migrant seasonal farm workers of California have been patiently organizing to build a union to represent the interests of Mexican, Filipino, Puerto Rican and Anglo farm workers, who toil in sub-human conditions on large fruit plantations in a master-slave relationship akin to that of the Mississippi Delta.

The United Farm Workers AFL-CIO have met with considerable success in recent years in organizing the workers and have won contracts with such large firms as Schenleys, through consumer boycotts and strikes.

A short while ago the union began organizing in the Delano district against Guimarra Corporation. In Toronto to organize a consumer boycott against stores selling Guimarra grapes is Marion Moses from the Farm Workers.

All the major food chains in Toronto have agreed not to carry the brands until the strike is settled. Guimarra nevertheless sells a large percentage of the product in Toronto and now relies on small grocery stores to sell the grapes which include ARRA, GVC, BEST BET, HONEYBUNCH BLUEJAY, UPTOWN, HI LIFE and GRAPE KING.

Pickets and protests will continue against stores carrying these brands until the strike is settled. If you wish to help Miss Moses or wish any further information you may contact her at UAW, 480 Lawrence Ave. West or phone 363-0115 (days), 363-4765 (evenings).

Go ask Alice

My old friend Alice O'Gorman dropped me a line yesterday which I thought you might be interested in.

"Dear Henry,
Hooray, hooray deese Country Joe and the Fish is killin' me Charlie and the Kid. How you taking the Leaside Bridge down there—we hear about you, and how Country Joe the masked marauder McDonald is doing his thing in your blue and white rig. Be watchful over him or what he's been rapping about down here in the Evergreen review—somebody asked him what his political program was; He said, thinking awhile, "free music in the park"; about the social organization of the society he said snapping back "fuck it" — will be a big dirty on your Queen's park lawn.

"Just thought you might like to keep that in mind before you take your revolution onto the streets. Besides, the boy has the cleanest organ on the coast and you might run into problems with him in Varsity Arena for that teachin gathering about that magic tella you were telling me about.

"Say, little Charlee wants to say that he's been eatin' enough to keep him stoned till Joe and the Fish crash — the Kid too wants to make it if he'll stop freakin in the garden. "I find it fabulous to believe old Joe is really a CIA cusp so I'm reading it aloud, also looking that file over as fast as I write my gift certificates. You did mention their validation with Snooks Eaglin?"

Don't stop diggin the truth,

just take LSD as a crutch!" No reaction; the two guys shrugged; one said, no, in a reflective kind of way, and she said disappointedly "Fight back! Fight back!" As one of them said, what's the point? What minor triumph would anyone get over a show was clearly an attempt at not-very-sophisticated bear-baiting?

The artificiality of the taping, and the uncomfortable, ill-at-ease feeling that the panelists conveyed at being asked to "attack" Dr. Hoffer or David Susskind became quite apparent. The great flaw in the "Attack! Attack!" philosophy is that if the man under attack is at all reasonable (as both Hoffer and Susskind were), that the panelists, whose sole purpose is to attack, begin to feel rather foolish—and rather used.

Hoffer spoiled the approach by being neither completely for or completely against use of LSD—he feels that LSD should be used as a psychiatric tool, and as little more. That made the attackers feel a little foolish.

Susskind, however, was much "worse." As glib, slick and polished as ol' Pierre himself, he made preposterous statements about Woman as Emasculator—which he used as a show-biz patina over some quite accurate comments about the state of sexual relations on this continent. Since the panelists later admitted that they were in fundamental agreement with his observations, the hour was a pretty painful one for them.

The result seemed to show that students are fair game to be used by sensation-obsessed TV producers.

One of those nights that makes you wonder if it's worth it. Things just seemed not to happen in a Review kind of way. Fraser on the point of departure to meet Satan's Choice — and the National Liberation Front visitors in Quebec. WHICH NLF, we asked. Barbara arriving, horrified at the contusion; Henry tidying; Peter looking for lost copy, convinced that George Harrison is alive in Louis Riel; Mel and Joan patient and efficient; Kathy found. Moral support from Drache and Pape; immoral attacks on morale by Parkins. And for the rest, — later, baby; that's showbiz. Salut!

Let us not speak well of it either.

MAGAZINES

Fraser

The October issue of Ramparts just hit the stands—which proves again that it is the most exciting, most relevant magazine published in North America, if not in the English language.

It is a cliché to say that dissent and the left in the U.S. are in a state of disorganization and despair; that nothing is happening and little is thinking. Ramparts is the great exception.

The really exceptional thing that Ramparts is doing is to present to our liberalized, propaganda-proof eyes the relevance of revolution. Not Hyde Park Corner revolution, not Kooky Professor revolution, or the revolution of obscure theses and magazines on pulp paper — but the immediate, desperate tension of revolution where it means something. The present issue, with the last issue, presents Che Guevara and Regis Debray; names that have been casually tossed around by Time enough that they mean less than little to most of us.

The cover-story this issue is on Richard Lester's latest film How I Won The War, starring pop-mystic John Lennon. Novelist Scheck writes a graphic preview-report on what sounds like the ultimate in anti-war films.

Random is due out soon — with what is rumoured to be a harsh attack on the course evaluation, and articles on the disastrous effects of 'Our Eskimo Policy, the Ontario election, an interview with actress Terry Tweed, and, as the saying goes, much more. Sounds impressive.

MUSIC

Goddard

The Canadian Opera Company has finally premiered all its season's works, and it seems that the production of two original operas has drained the energy out of the others. But while waiting for the TS season to (perhaps) once again destroy our concept of violin-playing there are several other openings to go to. This Sunday at Hart House, Mary Simmons will give a recital; a new blues band will be at the Riverboat on Tuesday and Ravi Shankar will give one concert at Massey Hall (this Saturday, at 8 p.m.). Indian ragas have passed in popularity from ethnomusicologists, to classicists, to folkknicks and, inevitably, to the hippies. Ironically the freedom the latter see in the music results from a lifetime of rigid, almost ascetic training. Hari Krishna, a sitarist with an even purer sound than Shankar's is also coming to Toronto soon.

FILM

Brodshew

The David Secter Festival continues at Ryerson today and tomorrow, featuring the premiere of his short Love with the Proper Guppy. At its 5:30 sandwich show Cinecity is presenting Hiroshima mon Amour. This picture has become the archetype of the art film, partly because of its innovations in temporal sequence, largely because of the critical stir it raised. It also established the reputation of Alain Resnais who has since made Last Year at Marienbad, Muriel, and La Guerre est fini. Bonnie and Clyde, a highly amusing comedy based on the premise that violence can be fun, and Roman (Repulsion) Polanski's black comedy Cul de Sac both open today. Warmest congrats to Joe Medjuck, organizer of U of T and SMC film societies, both excellent, and to the Elektra repertory cinema which opens a new season Monday with the not-to-be-missed Russian Hamlet.

THEATRE

Gordon

The Association of Canadian Universities and Colleges' Centennial project has come and gone, after two one-night stands at Hart House and at York; sorry we missed it.

Anne of Green Gables is on tonight and tomorrow at the Royal Alex, and then off for a week as The Fantastiks move in for a one-week stand. Gables is then back for a week from Oct. 9th till Oct. 14th.

The Long, the Short and the Tall opened this week at the Poor Alex, and should be good.

The Moscow Circus opened this week at Maple Leaf Gardens — which is always great fun. It stays till Monday.

Coming soon (specifically, October 10th to 14th), as part of the International Teach-In's Pre-Teach-In: Henry Tarvainen's production of Beckett's Waiting for Godot, with Howard Cronis, Ralph Macpherson, Chris Golding and Andrew McKenzie. Watch the Varsity for times.

A Fly-In: 8:00 a.m. tomorrow at the Island Airport with Waterloo and the U of T.

A Trade-In: The Canadian Academy of Comic Book Collectors will hold a trade-in, planning session and open discussion at Poor Edward's Gardens, Markham St. Village, Sunday 2-5 p.m. Fail thee not to remember: ye, skeptics and varlets. Great men — Alain Resnais, Jean Luc Goddard, John Clute and Mike Walsh — are comic book collectors.

Debaters battle at Soldiers tower

By EVELYN ROTENBERG

What began Wednesday as an orderly debate on the war in Vietnam rapidly turned into a wild-shouting free-for-all.

The debate at Soldier's Tower featured spokesmen from the campus Liberal Club, the Young Socialists, the Committee to End the War in Vietnam, and the Edmund Burke Society.

The speaker for the Liberal Club, Graeme Mount, said that although American involvement was "a result of misguided altruism on the part of John Foster Dulles, withdrawal of the United States at this time might cause the world to mistrust all American commitments."

But the war is a "very great financial drain" and the threat of a war with China looms large, he said.

Bill Johnson, of the campus Committee to End the War in Vietnam, demanded the immediate withdrawal of all American presence in Vietnam — military, political, and economic — so that the Vietnamese people could "achieve their desire for self-determination."

He also called for an "end to Canadian complicity in the war effort."

The Canadian government, he said, should put an end to quiet diplomacy and effect an "open diplomatic break" with the United States.

Johnson also stressed that Vietnam is a single country. He argued that the real indication of where the Vietnamese people stand is the fact that guerrilla warfare cannot be waged successfully without the aid of the peasants.

When asked about accusations of Viet Cong atrocities, he replied, "It's ludicrous for a movement whose support rests with the people to go out and kill them. You can't massively kill people and get them to fight for you."

Gord Doctorow of the Young Socialists said the majority of the Vietnamese people are opposed to the American presence in their country.

He also demanded a "complete and unconditional withdrawal" of the United States.

The Edmund Burke Society had a somewhat different viewpoint. Paul Fromm warned the others, "Communism must be stopped in Vietnam or it will spread to India, Japan and Australia."

The U.S. is not waging the war effectively, he said. To lessen the loss of life among the Vietnamese people, Fromm urged that the U.S. practise "unrestricted bombing" of industrial and military targets.

If this does not terminate the war then the U.S. should threaten "another Nagasaki, then proceed to bomb North Vietnam with nuclear weapons."

Mount, who saw the Edmund Burke Society in action for the first time, was not impressed by "these advocates of genocide," while Johnson called the group "a dangerous form of psychomasturbation."

Students from NLF booted in Montreal

MONTREAL (CUP)—Three students representing the National Liberation Front of Vietnam were roundly hissed and booed down as they attempted to address a crowd of 900 rowdy students in Montreal yesterday.

Sponsored by the Union Generale des Etudiants du Quebec on a two-week speaking tour of Quebec, the students made their first public appearance before an overflow crowd at Sir George Williams University.

The crowd was antagonistic from the moment the student speakers entered the hall.

After unsuccessfully trying to explain their view of the war the trio were forced to cancel a scheduled question period.

At a Wednesday press conference at Dorval Airport, Lyuan Sou, the group spokesman, said their primary purpose in coming to Quebec was to explain the situation in Vietnam.

But the Sir George crowd wouldn't listen.

Lyuan Sou said, "We are a small country, smaller than the state of Florida and no bigger than Vancouver Island.

"For 4,000 years we have been in constant struggle. We have waged wars against invaders to defend our rights to peace and freedom and happiness."

He explained that in recent years the wars have involved first the French, then the Americans, and he offered a catalogue of the atrocities of the war in Vietnam.

"We are just a small people who are being killed by bombs, whose women are being violated, and whose homes are being destroyed. We

Student aids in arrest for theft

Quick thinking by a graduate student led to the arrest of a man charged with stealing $85 from the Lash Miller building Tuesday.

The graduate student Robert G. MacDonald, says he was working in the building when he saw a well-dressed man reach into a cash register filled with money collected from the sale of lab coats.

When questioned by Macdonald, the man said that he was collecting the money for the university and that this would be verified by a person at New College.

MacDonald the accompanied the man to New College.

When the man tried to escape, MacDonald brought him back to Lash Miller and called for the U of T Police.

Donald W. Sanders is charged with petty theft.

"I am ashamed."

"Long live the friendships of our people."

Freedom of speech is a basic right in a democratic society. Students at Sir George have denied that right in the name of democracy.

UQEO President Pierre Le-Francois said Quebec students support the struggle of the NLF.

Sir George External Vice-President Jean Sicotte said of the disturbances created by the students:

"I am ashamed."

Students rally for evicted residents

Two former University of Toronto students have appealed for student support for four homeowners who face eviction by the City of Toronto.

John Sewell and Woife Erlichman of the Toronto Community Union project want students to join others at a rally at 3 p.m. Sunday near the four houses in the Don Mount urban renewal area, east of the Don River.

Organizers of the rally say compensation being offered the homeowners for their expropriated homes is inadequate. They say the city should provide a comparable house, or enough money to buy one, when it expropriates.

The rally will support homeowners who have refused to move from the area although all the houses surrounding theirs have been torn down.

The TCUP members say city expropriation is also in the cards for the Trefann Court urban renewal area, bounded by Queen, Parliament, Shuter and River Streets, the Don Vale area around Parliament and Carleton Streets, and about 15 other areas of the city.

"As in Don Mount, the people in Trefann Court and Don Vale have protested loudly," says a leaflet announcing the rally.

"Every possible step within the present political set-up has been taken in order to try to get proper compensation and to try to stop the eviction of these people until they get fairer offers from the city.

"The city has offered loans... thus admitting that its payments are inadequate without alleviating the problem of the debt incurred by the expropriated owner.

"The city now offers extra payments if the owner meets certain requirements. This is nothing other than a means test which refuses to admit that the problem is not capable of being solved on a piecemeal basis."

The rally is to take place at Dundas Street East and Munro Street, two blocks east of the Don River. It is sponsored by the remaining Don Mount residents, MPP James Renwick, NDP member for the area and the Trefann Court Residents Association, with which TCUP co-operates.

Love-in dies in cold Waterloo wind

WATERLOO (Special) — The first love-in ever staged at Waterloo flopped Sunday when cold winds cancelled most of the program.

The sponsors, Waterloo Student Council and the Kitchener-Waterloo Peace Movement had planned for poetry reading and entertainment to begin at 1 p.m. but the crowd stayed in their parked cars until 3 p.m. when two flower-bedecked guitarists showed up with Waterloo's poet-in-residence, Earle Birney, to strum their guitars while Birney read his poetry.

SAC and Varsity charged; P.C.'s claim bogus issues

Ernest McCullough (IV Vic), President of the campus Progressive Conservative club, charged Wednesday that "bogus issues" were being raised by the Students' Administrative Council and the Varsity in the provincial election campaign.

McCullough said the intervention of Leonard Shifrin the Liberal candidate in St. Andrew-St. Patrick, to help register students in residences was unnecessary.

"The Election Act makes adequate provisions for the problems of voting students," said McCullough.

McCullough accused SAC President Tom Faulkner of a bias in favor of Mr. Shifrin.

Referring to Wednesday's Varsity, McCullough charged that the assessments of the Liberal and NDP candidates had been unduly favorable.

"No mention was made of Mr. Grossman's 12 year's parliamentary experience," he said.

Alan Grossman, the Conservative incumbent, is the minister of reform institutions.

WUS tries to end apathy

The World University Service this year will attempt to counteract the annual sag in interest that follows its SHARE and Treasure Van campaigns each year.

Donald Smith, the new chairman of WUS, hopes to work out an effective educational program with the International Students Centre.

Smith also would like to see each college and faculty develop its own project for this year's SHARE campaign.

The campaign will run from Oct. 16 to Oct. 20 with an objective of $15,000.

Bradford was project consultant to CYC

But President Bradford campaigned this year on the platform of educational reform in graduate studies based on the principle of self-determination for students in the educational and social systems.

Accordingly, he recommended to the executive that an educational consultant be hired to investigate higher education at the University of Toronto, and to help graduate students in their educational problems.

The executive unanimously voted to hire Eric Anttila as a consultant. Bradford did not vote because he had known Mr. Anttila for about a week before his appointment, and the two lived in the same house.

Anttila has a bachelor's degree in mathematics from the University of Waterloo, where he was President of the student co-operative. He was also a project consultant to the Company of Young Canadians and was on the editorial staff of the This Magazine Is About Schools.

He now is on the board of directors and is director of the admissions committee at Rochdale College. He is also a special assistant to students in research at the school of social work in the University of Toronto.

Bradford is also being criticized for the purchase of a duplicating machine. This expenditure was to provide some form of written communication among the 4,000 graduate students on campus who are enrolled in 37 different faculties.

Previously the only facility for mimeographing was an old ditto machine which was operated by hand. The result was that there was no written communication to graduate students on GSU activities.

The chemistry students charge that this new duplicating machine was used for the reproduction of the Rochdale College Bulletin, of which Bradford was editor.

Bradford replies that it was another duplicating machine, being tried out by the Executive, on which the Bulletin was run off. Further, he says, it was Rochdale College which supplied the paper and ink, not the GSU.

Another source of dissatisfaction is $250 of GSU funds that was loaned to the Digging group of Yorkville, for use toward the "hippie bail fund" set up after Yorkville hippies were arrested in August for sit-in activities. Some of the money has been paid back.

A further $225.25 of GSU funds was made to the Student Union for Peace Action for assistance in their draft dodger program.

Both of these grants were passed by a quorum of the executive.

The GSU executive comprises Vice-President Fay Martin and Treasurer Jon Thompson, along with Bradford.

Secretary Roy McCullogh has recently resigned. Past President Robert Dempster has surrendered his honorary status on the executive.

President Bradford promises that he will make repeated efforts to make the representation of the GSU more representative, if he is given a mandate to continue his duties today.

His worst fears, he says, are that today's hearing may turn into a "kangaroo court."

The meeting is in Convocation Hall at 2 p.m.

New Democratic Youth initiate new activist policy

A new activist policy involving increased agitation and educational programs on the issues of free education, student power and the political role of students has been initiated by the federal New Democratic Youth.

The organization's federal council decided to abandon participation in campus mock parliaments in favor of direct action on student and social issues.

"We've got to get away from ritualistic role-playing as self-important junior politicians," said NDY president Ken Nowakowski.

Former international secretary of the Canadian Union of Students, Rolli Cacchioni, was hired to do the bulk of the field work which will consist of organizing students and young workers.

The NDY council also decided to suspend relations with the International Union of Socialist Youth, which was implicated in last year's Central Intelligence Agency scandal. They also gave active support to the Oct. 21 International Day of Protest against the war in Vietnam.

Harry Edel, newly-elected permanent secretary of the NDY says: "There is even a possibility that in the near future the federal NDY may run candidates for various positions in student government on an NDY activist platform.

"The move is very important to co-ordinate the experience of young radicals across the country, and to bring this experience to bear on the student political scene.

"The idea is to co-ordinate, and not impose upon the campus political scene."

SAC committees organize voting

The Students Administrative Council has set up three committees to organize students voting in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding.

One committee will concentrate on getting students to vote. The second plans to bring in the three university riding candidates to speak to students.

The third will encourage students to attend political meetings in three ridings—High Park, Riverdale and St. Andrew-St. Patrick—armed with pointed questions.

A phone campaign will begin Sunday and run through Monday to get eligible students to register.

Monday at 5 p.m. an organizational meeting for students going into the ridings will be held in the Hart House Music Room.

SAC nominations end

Nominations for Students Administrative Council fall elections close at 5 p.m. today.

Anyone wishing to run can pick up nomination forms and election rules at the SAC office until that time.

The Faculty of Library Science, Ontario College of Education, Physical Education, New College and School of Graduate Studies will hold their elections between 9 a.m. and 3:15 p.m. Wednesday, Oct. 4. The campaign will run from tomorrow until Tuesday.

Victoria College will hold its elections Thursday, from 9 a.m. until 4:10 p.m. There will be campaigning on the two days preceding the elections.

Yates Cup seems slated for Gaels

By ROD MICKLEBURGH
Varsity Sports Editor

TEAM NAME: Queen's University Golden Gaels.
COLORS: Blue, Red and Gold (Nickname "The Tricolor")

HEAD COACH: Frank Tindall.

ASSISTANT COACHES: Al Lenard, Hal McCarney, Frank Arment.

HOME FIELD: George Richardson Memorial Stadium, Kingston, Ont.

SEATING CAPACITY: 11,000.

1965 SIFL RECORD: 5 victories, one defeat.

PLAYOFF RECORD: Won title with 50-7 victory over Varsity Blues.

1966 REVIEW

Queen's Golden Gaels headed into 1966 surrounded by a dense cloud of uncertainty. They faced the same problem confronting Varsity Blues this season—departure of an all-star quarterback. Gone was never-to-be-forgotten Cal Connor, possibly the finest quarterback ever to carve his niche in SIFL archives. However, Connor's unsung back-up man, Don Bayne, in the spotlight after so many years lurking in obscurity, came through to consummate coach Frank Tindall's fondest dreams as he led Queen's to the Yates Cup in his first year at the pivot.

Gaels opened the season with an inauspicious 28-16 win over everybody's favorite patsies, McGill Redmen. Then it was "next year" in Toronto as Blues roared into Kingston and came out with their first victory there in seven years, a solid 28-19 lacing over the hometown Gaels.

Undismayed by this defeat, Tindall's men tuned up for the vital return match by trouncing Western Mustangs in succession, 24-9 and 33-0. Momentum was building as Bayne gathered new poise at quarterback, and Toronto took the full brunt in Varsity Stadium going down heavily, 23-15, to Tindall's re-invigorated troops.

When the season ended, both Toronto and Queen's had identical 5-1 records necessitating a playoff for the second straight year. The playoff was simply no contest as Gaels turned on the power to throttle Blues 50-7, presenting coach Frank Tindall with his sixth SIFL championship. Seven Gaels found the limelight as all-star selections. Offensively, guard Brian Parmega and halfback Jamie Johnston were chosen. Defense, of course, was Queen's forte last season, and they placed end Frank Arment, inside linebacker Carl DiGiacoma, corner linebacker Larry Ferguson, plus defensive halfbacks Bayne Norris and Guy Potvin on the laud-squad. It was a very good year.

QUEEN'S GOLDEN GAELS

1967 PREVIEW

Says coach Tindall, "It will be difficult to replace the excellent players who are graduating, but among the forty returnees we retain the nucleus for another good team." Tindall is guilty of slight understatement for Queen's have lost only lightly. Ferguson, who also handled the team punting, has departed along with all-star defensive end Arment, now an assistant coach. Guard Brian Parmega is the only other all-star missing. John Latham, who led the league in interceptions, has also graduated, but Queen's awesome depth makes his absence barely noticeable. Tackle John Crouchman will not return nor will linebacker Russ Payson.

Absentees are thus isolated positionally, and in the offensive backfield the entire unit is returning. Returning quarterback Don Bayne is complemented by flanker Larry Plankce (15 receptions for 3 T.D.'s), halfbacks Jamie Johnston (6.2 average) and Doug Cowan (5.5 avg.), and charging fullback Ron Clark (4.9 avg.). The offensive line remains strong despite Parmega's graduation.

Traditionally, Queen's have the best defense in the league, and no exception appears on the horizon this year. Although four players are not back, Tindall has too much bench strength returning from 1966 to make a great deal of difference. Last year Gaels allowed only 11.3 points a game.

OUTLOOK

There seems to be no way the Queen's juggernaut will be stopped in 1967. Their offense, which didn't peak until the final game of the season, should be even better than last year's while the defense seems just as strong. So far this season, Golden Gaels have rolled over Loyola 45-13 and Ottawa U. 19-6.

On paper, Tindall has the league powerhouse playing for him. His players should prove it on the field. The rest of the league can only hope for second place.

(This is the first of a four-part series).

Rain forces tennis haltage

By MIKE MCGARRY

Action in the interfaculty tennis tournament being held at Toronto Lawn Tennis Club was postponed due to inclement weather yesterday.

Wednesday's results showed few surprises.

Second seeded Paul Kent defeated Len Turnbull 7-5, 6-2 to advance to the flight final. Other competitors among the top seeds also continued to move toward the semi-finals and finals.

Third seeded Tom Burekci swept past Martin Middlestadt 6-1 and 2-0. Middlestadt conceded the second set and the match after rain interrupted play.

Frank Blythe, seeded seventh, whipped Don Evans 6-2 and 6-0. Rich Levy ousted John Holmes 6-2, 6-1. Levy will meet Les Primer in the semifinal match today. Primer had to rally under the fierce assault of Rod Mickleburgh in order to carry Tuesday 4-6, 6-0, and 6-3. Mickleburgh refused comment on the match.

If the weather co-operates, the tournament should conclude with the final matches on Friday afternoon.

McMaster invitational provides trackmen with first opportunity to show mettle

By RICH PYNE

The 1967 version of Blues' track team pray for sunshine as they embark for their first taste of fall competition at the MacMaster Invitational track meet, scheduled for this afternoon in Hamilton.

Last year a somewhat defeated Varsity contingent managed only a single first and two seconds as Dave Bailey edged Mac's Jim Smith in the three-mile and Bill Watts was runner-up in the javelin and discus.

With no previous glimpse at the other schools it is difficult to predict any improvement in Blues' performance, especially since several veterans are passing up the exhibition.

U of T's best chance for a victory, provided Waterloo's Bob Finlay doesn't show up, is at three miles when sophomores Brian Armstrong and Bob Cairns' take to the track.

Also with an excellent chance at winning is Toronto's excellent half miler John Loaring who will double his distance and take on the best Mac has to offer, probably in the persons of Jim Smith and Bruce Woods. Competing with Loaring will be Phil Davis who may double with Ron Field at 880 yards.

Rounding out track performers will be a large contingent in the quarter mile consisting of John Huether, Aris Birze, Matt Duncan and Larry Bobbett.

On the infield Blues should show well, particularly in the weight where Bill Watts, Gord Homer and Dave Arnold will flex their muscles. Homer is particularly versatile as shown by his second place finish last year in the high jump at the OQAA championships.

John Hilliard is scheduled to compete for Blues in the three jumping events and, judging from his third place finish at last year's championships, should do quite well. Unknown quantities Brian Penny and Dave Brown will join Hilliard in the jumps while Peter Wells takes a shot at the pole vault.

The results of the McMaster meet should be a good indication of whether or not Blues will be able to recapture the Tait Mackenzie Trophy, representative of OQAA track supremacy. Before last season, when a defeated U of T squad finished third. The Mackenzie had rested five successive years among the Hart House silverware.

Amer to start home opener

By BOB CLARK

Tomorrow afternoon at Varsity Stadium, U of T football fanatics get their first opportunity to bury or to praise the 1967 Varsity Blues.

As an added attraction, when Western Mustangs come calling at 2 p.m., home fans will get their initial glimpse at quarterback Bob Amer, veteran play caller from Carleton University, as he pilots Blues for the first time in a starting role.

"I started Alboini against McMaster because he is from Hamilton, with the idea of starting Amer this week because he is from Toronto," coach Ron Murphy said yesterday.

Glen Markle, sidelined most of last season with a pre-season injury, is scheduled to start at fullback, with Nick Di Giuseppe and Mike Raham supporting him at halfback.

Di Giuseppe, out for much of last season with a hamstring ailment, was plagued in rookie camp with the same problem. However, the "whirlpool champ", as he was known by the rookies, has bounced back, and, according to Murphy, has been running well.

Mike Ehen, the SIFL's reigning pass-catching champ, will start at wing back, with veterans Jim Ware and Brent Morris at end.

Only four players, veteran Larry DeRoche, and rookies Keith Johnson, Ernie Jardine and Richard Christie are not scheduled to dress because of injuries.

Timing has been given extra attention during practice this week. Coach Murphy, still planning to stick with the "I" formation, feels that Blues' were hurt most by bad timing in last week's loss.

"Mac was good, but we helped a lot," Murphy said. "I'm going to substitute individuals. Last week I started a different unit in the second half, and I think that hurt us too."

Western is a question mark this year, with little information leaking out from London. Last year's top rusher and scorer for Western, Dave Garland, is gone, which might have prompted Mus-

Both Mustang quarterback backs have returned. Bob Israel, who appeared capable of directing a sound running game, has never been noted as a prolific passer. Joe Cipparone, on the other hand, appeared to be a better passer, but saw only limited action in Metras' ground-oriented attack.

Two factors loom large in Blues' efforts to overhaul Mustangs tomorrow. The offence did not adjust well to the new "I" formation last week, and unless timing and execution have improved, the famed "explosiveness" of past Varsity offences may get bogged down in sporadic sputtering.

Pass defence is the other key. With Mustangs concentrating on the aerial route, the defensive backfield will have to tighten up.

"The pass defence gave good coverage, but were slow to react when the ball was in the air. Instead of knocking the ball down, they were getting there after the ball was caught," Murphy said, referring to the McMaster game.

GLEN MARKLE

tangs' coach John Metros' decision to concentrate on a passing game this year.

Western's offence has stuck mainly to the ground, in the past with only minimal passing.

This year, however, Metras seems to have reversed the trend. In last week's 30-26 loss to University of Waterloo, Mustangs' offence exceeded 470 yards. While this is a remarkable total for a loser in itself, more significant was the fact that better than 370 yards were gained through the air. This is a complete about face for a Metras-coached team.

BLUENOTES: Coach Ron Murphy plans use all 44 players scheduled to dress ... Although Larry DeRoche will not dress tomorrow, coach Murphy is confident that he will be ready for the league opener in Toronto against McGill on Oct. 7 ... Student season football books will be on sale at Varsity stadium, gate 8, starting at 10 a.m. tomorrow. Game time is 2 p.m.

PROGNOSTICATIONS: The coach had only one comment: "we're gonna win!" If Mustangs can't beat Waterloo Warriors, they shouldn't beat Blues. Varsity by 11

And you know something is happening but you don't know what it is, do you, SIFL?

Sorry about that Dylan boy. Anyway, something is happening on the pigskin panorama this year which is leaving a great many SIFL die-hards perturbably perplexed.

What's happening is simply this: SIFL teams, supposedly the cream of the Canadian college crop, are losing football games to teams of an "inferior" league. Varsity Blues lost to McMaster by a flatteringly close 17-15. And Western Mustangs have been shockingly submarined twice, 30-21 by Waterloo Lutheran, 30-26 by University of Waterloo Warriors. Even power-laden Queen's Golden Gaels could manage only a miniscule 19-6 margin over Ottawa University, a team packed with rookies. A scant 11 y a three years, Queen's was mindlessly masterminding McMaster, 63-6.

These results would seem to bear out Mac coach, Jack Kennedy, when he claimed there was a distinct levelling trend going on in Canadian college football. No longer are SIFL squads the best in the country by acclamation.

Schools like Waterloo and McMaster are hammering hard and with justice to be allowed inside the SIFL's prestigious chambers. Their perennial persistence has finally forced a firm foot in the door. Starting next year, the SIFL will expand to six teams by adding two schools on a provisional two year basis. If Mac and Waterloo show they belong, the change will be cemented permanently in league schedules.

Waterloo Lutheran has also applied for admission but according to coach Dave Knight, their drawing American import, "Old tradition and a few diehards like Toronto have kept us out." Knight is quite bitter about the sway SIFL officials have over college football. "They won't admit that teams across Canada are pretty equal. With this sort of attitude they are definitely slowing down the progress of Canadian college football."

Although Knight acknowledges Queen's supremacy ("they're a little stronger"), he is gleeful that his team has finally had a shot at an SIFL team and decisively beaten it. He scorns anyone who would dismiss it as "just an exhibition game". And, surprisingly, he finds a strong supporter in Mustangs' embattled coach, John Metras.

Metras made no excuses for his defeats. "They played very good football. I have never coached a football team that has not gone all-out to win, and these two games were no exception for us." Metras has always fought hard for league expansion, and now that it appears to be a reality, he gruffly warned, "Don't sell them short. They'll be a big addition to the league."

Varsity coach Ron Murphy pooh-poohs all this new attention to teams outside the present SIFL. "I don't think they're significant (their victories) at all. You must remember that the other teams are using first-string players all the way. SIFL teams are playing them just like exhibition games, and giving everyone a chance on the field." He is looking forward to next year in eager anticipation of thumping victories by the senior circuit mainstays.

Next year will be very interesting indeed. More than a few coaches will be eating their words, and I've a hunch you may be one of them, Murph.

Blues beat Oldies in rain

By DOUG WOODS

Those 25 brave souls who managed to live through driving wind and rain squalls last night in Varsity Stadium were treated to a fine display of ruggar talent, as the University of Toronto Blues defeated a team of old boys 10 to 3.

The score does not really indicate the train of play. For most of the game the old boys managed to keep the Blues in their quarter of the field. They just didn't seem to be able to score.

At one point Paul Wilson of the old boys placed an excellent kick-through on the Blues 10 yard line, but the wind blew the ball along the wet grass into the end-zone and Blues full-back, Jeff Wall touched it down. Blues were awarded a kick-out from the 20 yard line. It was that kind of a game.

Paul Wilson opened the scoring with a 25 yard field-goal, just before the end of the first half. At the 10 minute mark of the second half Varsity's Andy Gibson dribbled the ball into the end-zone and fell on the ball to score. Bill Kyle got the convert.

A few minutes later, centre George Wraw duplicated Gibson's effort and Kyle again, tallied the extra 2 points. A fine tackle by Peter Hand was instrumental.

Soccer Blues host Scarborough juniors

Varsity's Soccer Blues will play their third exhibition game within a week Saturday morning at 11 o'clock on the back campus.

Their opponents will be a young, but talented Scarborough team that played in the Ontario Junior 'A' League and reached the playoff finals.

Playing for Scarborough will be two of Blues' players, John Gero and Jim Laverty who were formerly with the Junior 'A' team before joining Varsity.

Both Laverty and Gero admit that Blues have an edge in experience but they were not ready to concede defeat.

Coaching the Scarborough team will be Bill Brown and Bob Crookston. The latter played for Rangers in Scotland before injuries shortened his professional career.

Blues' coach Ernie Glass, is looking for a wide-open but clean game. He hopes his team will come back from the fiasco against Rye-son and show their true potential.

Varsity did not suffer any serious injuries against Ryerson, but they are suffering from minor ailments.

Dwight Taylor, Ormond Menoés, and Tom Johnston were missing from practice yesterday while Frank Soppelsa and Eric Sereda were considerably slowed down. All, however, are expected to play Saturday.

Starting in goal for Blues will be Edwin Stach (Law I), who played three seasons with Weston before coming to Toronto this year. Analyzing the two teams, Stach said, "There is no comparison. At Western, we practiced only two night per week, while here we are out almost every day. Also, I'm sure that if the coach at Western had the players that Blues cut this season, he would be mighty happy."

The results of the past three years seem to support

Stach's conclusion. Blues have won all six games played against Western by 2-1, 7-0, 5-1, 7-2, 4-1, and 5-1—an impressive record indeed!

The only players that haven't had any previous intercollegiate experience are Ron Muir, John Gero, and Jim Laverty. The trio, all forwards, are giving the veterans quite a fight for their first-string positions. The veterans had better produce tomorrow.

Devotees of intercollegiate football who annually marvel at the confusion of the league's referees will have company this season—even the refs are confused.

Source of the trouble is the roughing the kicker rule. The league has issued three interpretations already, and each one was different.

We don't specialize in being nice to referees but it will save a lot of arguing if no kickers get clobbered tomorrow.

Actually the Mosked Phantom had other things on his mind than the empty inspiration he holds. For further colorful details see Pg. 3. The football game? (see Pg. 12)—We won.

GSU PRES. VINDICATED IMPEACHMENT BEATEN

John Bradford, president of the Graduate Students Union and his policies were vindicated 78 to 56 after a long turbulent meeting Friday.

A dissident faction of students had forced the meeting in an attempt to impeach Bradford for alleged misuse of union funds.

The controversy centred on the executive's hiring this summer of an educational consultant, and giving financial aid to Yorkville hippies and the Student Union for Peace Action.

The qualifications of the educational consultant, Eric Anttila, a friend of Bradford, were severely questioned in view of the fact that his $7,000 salary and $2,000 expense allowance account for nearly half the union's budget.

Anttila said that he had no formal education in his field, but that his deep concern about the state of education today qualified him for the job.

The dissident students raised strong objections to the executive loan of $250 to the hippie bail fund, and a donation of $225 to SUPA.

"The great unwashed of Yorkville have nothing to do with our interests," said student David MacRae. He and several others felt that financial aid indicated active support of the radical groups.

However, Bradford said all executive policies were detailed in his election platform, in which he promised to try and turn the GSU into a student action group.

He admitted he had been sloppy and unorthodox in some of his methods but stood firm behind the principles underlying his policies.

LGMB stunned by offer - Asked to play at Expo

You are musical director for Expo 67. Who is the last band you would hire?

However, Expo is noted for unpredictability, and accordingly the Lady Godiva Memorial Band will play at the fair Oct. 14 and 15.

"This is the first time we've ever been invited anywhere," said stunned LGMB leader John Pullam (SGS).

"I hope it doesn't take all the fun out of it."

Last year, when the engineers' band "officially" opened the Montreal subway, they were the only ones who knew it was official.

The LGMB applied to Expo early in the summer, enclosing tapes of several numbers from their centennial long-playing album, The Lady Godiva Memorial Band Blows.

"We sent them cuts that were in slightly better taste than our usual material," says Pullam.

"We left out God save DeGaulle and The Man with the Golden - - - ."

Denis Ste Denise, the entertainment co-ordinator of the fair said that the LGMB was one of the best bands that applied, reports John Morris, engineering Society president, "although Denise' comments were in French and my translation may not be exact.

"When I told them what the band was really like, they were quite enthusiastic and suggested that, as well as at the bandshell, we play in a Viking boat touring the canals, or on the minirail.

The engineering society is planning to charter several buses for any interested "fellow travellers."

"Any resemblance between this and McGill weekend," said one engineer, "is purely coincidental."

LSD no injury to mental powers say users

By INGRID VABALIS

Two University of Toronto students reported amazement last night at reports that LSD is directly responsible for a decline in intelligence and memory.

Sidney Katz, a Star reporter, discussed in a recent article some of the "dark possibilities" of the drug.

Experiments on animals, Katz reported, showed an alarming decline in their ability to learn and remember.

Many young people drop out of school because they're no longer able to absorb what they're being taught, a Washington Federal Drug Administration official said.

The U of T students, who called themselves Paul and Sam, found the opposite.

Both had fairly good marks throughout high school and university. But in last year's examinations Sam, in his fourth year of an honors course, stood 1:1 in his class. Paul stood 1:2 in his course.

Both had taken LSD within four months of their final examinations.

Paul, who took LSD twice during the last half of the school year, said it "helped take the anxiety out of exams."

"Most important" he said, "it gave me a perspective which is a vital part of learning."

He added that he wasn't using the drug to improve his grades. This was just a side effect. He said he wouldn't try studying or writing exams under LSD.

Sam had taken LSD about five times before writing exams. Afterwards he found his courses trivial so he found he could relax while studying.

Sam had always been a good student but, like Paul, he was "part of the Western success ethic." He felt he had to pass exams to prove himself. His anxiety level at exam time was extremely high.

Now, he said, he could understand why someone would panic but failure wouldn't affect him as a person.

He reported that he didn't do as much work as before.

"It wasn't easier doing the reading, but it was much easier to see what was important and what wasn't."

From the results of some animal experiments, a theory has been advanced that it would take a man six months to recover his normal intellectual functioning after a few LSD trips.

Harvard University students have recently been advised not to make any major decisions for three months after a trip.

The U of T students seemed to feel that their intellectual functioning had increased rather than declined.

They repeated several times how anxiety-free they had been during exams and how much better they felt as individuals now.

Referring to his trips, Paul said: "It helped me as a person and this in turn reflected on my academic activities."

Both men say they have no intention of dropping out of school. They still want to succeed in their careers but Paul commented "LSD took the neurotic element out of ambition."

"I'm impressed with the changes that have taken place", Sam commented, "I don't think they would have happened without LSD."

Asked about the dangers of LSD, Sam replied that Columbus was in danger of falling off the edge of the world when he set out on his voyage. These were the chances you have to take.

SAC nominations confirmed today

All nominations for Wednesday's Students Administrative Council fall elections will not be confirmed until 10 a.m. today, although nominations closed at 5 p.m. Friday.

Nominations confirmed by last night were:

Victoria College (two positions open) — John Mathany (II Vic), Ulrich Wischniewski (III Vic);

School of Graduate Studies (three positions open) — Peter Brigg, Cathy Horne, Brent Robinson.

Physical and Health Education (one position open) — Susan Maki (IV PHE), Barbara Tayler (III PHE).

Ontario College of Education (two positions open) — Marjorie Carter, Gordon Hunter, William Cavan;

New (one position open) — Leslie Gary (III New), Gwen Davis (I New), Charles Berritt (II New), Don Short (II New).

No nominations have been confirmed from the school of library science.

Three unconfirmed nominees are: Wayne Hawkey (SGS), Al Bowker (SGS) and Maureen Welsh (OCE).

Tartu College doubles planned size

Extra land has been bought to double the planned size of Tartu College, the residence to be built at Madison and Bloor Streets.

The 16-floor building now will house 525 students and cost $4,000,000.

The residence will provide apartment units containing six single rooms with a common kitchen, bathroom, and living room at a monthly cost of $50 to $55 a student.

Toronto's Estonian community has doubled its grant to $400,000.

Campus Co-op and the Students Administrative Council will each contribute to the project and Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corp. will finance the rest.

"A committee is being set up this week to discuss the education program of the college," says Jan Duinker, SAC finance commissioner.

The educational program at the project will be similar to that of Rochdale, U of T's first co-operative residence.

Radio Varsity begins broadcasts

University of Toronto's Radio Varsity began this year's broadcasting on campus at 8 a.m. today.

The radio has expanded its campus coverage to 40 outlets in 21 buildings, 34 more than last year. Its broadcasting hours have increased to 86 hours a week from 50.

Radio Varsity's schedule for today includes a satire on the university, The Best of Yesterday's World of Tomorrow Today '66, at 9:15 a.m. and 9:15 p.m.; a feature on Albert Einstein from Radio Prague at 10:15 a.m., followed by questions on the lecture from Radio Moscow at 11:45 a.m.

Expo Beat comes from Radio McGill at 2:15 p.m. Canada's Role in World Affairs, a public affairs talk by George Ignatieff, Canadian ambassador to the UN will be heard at 7 p.m.

New weapons against disease revealed

Researchers at the campus institute of biomedical electronics have revealed two new weapons in the fight against diabetes and brain disease.

The first uses mathematical analysis to help recognize pre-diabetic conditions and to eliminate the use of highly sophisticated indirect techniques that usually involve radioactive materials.

The second is an electronic probe that aids surgeons in mapping and removing tumors in the brain.

Bookstore will communicate better

Representatives of the university bookstore and the Students Administrative Council decided last week to improve relations.

The meeting discussed improving relations and communications, maintaining services such as the special ordering service, and reducing book prices.

Dave Nitkin (III New) said, "It was a very co-operative and fruitful meeting and we both agreed to provide information that the other party wished to have."

He also announced that a SAC report on bookstore operations will be available Oct. 18.

A Non-violent race powerless: Clarke

By INGRID VABALIS and DAVID FRANK

Whenever he has confronted the black man, the white man has always tried to change or kill him, Toronto novelist Austin C. Clarke said last week.

"We are here to judge white people," Mr. Clarke, a native of the Barbados, told a Hart House debate on the resolution — Violence is the only language the white man understands.

"We cannot afford to use such terms as the human race," said Clarke. "We should talk of the black race and the white race. Violence has taught us to do this.

"A non-violent people is a powerless people," he declared.

"It has been repeated here that I represent an inferior race," said Clarke.

"When we were performing operations on the human eye in the 13th century, your ancestors, Mr. Speaker, were going through the Dark Ages.

"The white man has had only one taste of black violence. It was in Haiti, and the black man licked the hell out of the white man."

For the Ayes, David Nathanson (II Law) said "Violence is the only language the white man understands because it is the only language he speaks.

"The white man's entire way of life is violent."

But Stan Emerson (III Law) argued that "money is the language the white man best understands.

"If he used his economic weapons more effectively, the black man could achieve more."

"Let's smile at the cruel paradox of the white man," Dan Webster (II Law) said.

"Instead of brotherhood we brought the black man bigotry."

Speaking from the floor Bob Bossin (III Innis) said "I don't understand statistics, but I do understand the violence and carnage in Newark and Detroit.

"I may fear what Rap Brown says and does, but I understand it."

After the debate a student approached Clarke saying, "I admit the crimes committed against the black people, but they are not mine."

And Clarke replied, "All white men are guilty."

"But Mr. Clarke, what the hell am I supposed to do?"

"That's your problem baby."

Destroy China's nuclear power: Fromm

By EVELYN ROTENBURG

The United States must destroy the nuclear potential of China before China destroys the West, says F. Paul Fromm, chairman of the campus Edmund Burke Society.

And to end the Vietnam war quickly Fromm (II SMC) advocates all-out bombing to close Haiphong Harbour.

Not surprisingly, the newly-formed Society is ultra-conservative, named after the crusty 18th-century politician regarded as the father of modern conservatism.

Burke, says Fromm, stood for order, individual rights and a religious as opposed to a secular society.

Fromm's organization is intended to show Canadians of a conservative bent that leadership for their sentiments exists.

"In this way we can mobilize to fight socialism and communism," he says.

Fromm believes that even though the Russians are "liars and cheats," they now have too much material wealth to risk losing it in a war.

But, he says, China must expand to accommodate her growing population. Since her leaders are "grossly irresponsible," the West must attack now before it is too late.

Fromm says the basic difference between left and right-wing ideologies is that the left believes man has an unlimited potential for progress, while the right accepts man's imperfections.

"The Edmund Burke society accepts the fact that man is incapable of achieving a Utopia and works from there."

The Edmund Burke Society objects strongly to "creeping socialism" because, says Fromm, a government that wants to control the nation's economy assumes that the "average individual is a fool."

He described nationalization of industry as theft—"legalized looting".

He said he recognized the need for welfare in some cases but adds that if a man is not too proud to accept welfare, then he is surely not too proud to accept a means test.

All citizens receiving welfare must enroll in a job retraining programs or be forced to engage in public clean-up projects because "we shouldn't be forced to support bums." Although the society makes no stand on religious or racial issues, Fromm says he does not support forced integration because, "each individual has a right to administer his property as he sees fit as long as he does not jeopardize the rights of others."

The society plans a teach-in on Rhodesia Nov. 11, Fromm said. He claimed the blacks are providing "solid backbone behind Ian Smith's Rhodesian regime.

"Look, there hasn't been a rebellion yet. And the blacks are definitely against the terrorists and communist mercenaries sent in from Zambia."

The society has invited a white hunter, a Rhodesian businessman and a nurse to speak at the event, Fromm said.

Scheduled for January is an address by the well-known American right-wing politician William F. Buckley.

supa: what it accomplished

What with the hippies, the whale drug scene and the Negroes taking the freedom movement into their own hands, the so-called New Left has dwindled into a murky background and is today stirred by little but its own internal squabbles.

Canada's New Left chapter, The Student Union for Peace Action, has voted to disband, leaving behind its admirable publications wing and a 12-man committee to carry on its work.

Of course, SUPA's decline comes as no surprise because it has been not much more than an office staff, a newsletter and an idea far over a year now.

Even before that, though, SUPA was a victim of its own myths, at first gaining inspiration from them, later falling apart inside them.

SUPA was never more than a loose collection of radicals brought together by similar ideas and a desire to do something — no one ever came up with the perfect idea — to show their dissatisfaction with the present state of society.

Yet the news media and others glorified the movement as the vanguard of a new youth revolution that seemed to have the right combination of dedication and gall to point to a better way.

SUPA never reflected the opinions of a majority of youth but historians researching years from now just might get that impression from the articles, radio and TV shows of two years ago.

And that's what SUPA couldn't live up to. When it widened the horizons of the ban-the-bomb movement to look at social issues in general SUPA was on the right track. But its members went off on several different tracks.

There was the civil rights movement to support. Vietnam followed, but here the issues weren't that clear.

SUPA decided to stimulate Berkeley-type confrontations on campuses across the country. It was tried in a few places, but although administrations were terrified, there was little to fear.

SUPA never lived up to its potential. U of T's campus chapter was unable to focus its abilities.

Other SUPA members went off into community organizing binges — to Saskatchewan among Indians and Metis; to Kingston with slum dwellers and so on.

Most of the young radicals came back from those experiments disillusioned. They found they couldn't so easily leave their affluent backgrounds and live among poverty cultures.

Toronto's federal SUPA office looked like a bureaucracy to chapters elsewhere in the country and conflicts between them became shattering. Personality conflicts, as often happens in groups whose members are together voluntarily, added little troubles that increased the friction.

New members were slow in joining because of these troubles — that is if they came to SUPA's meetings at all. The press reports had glorified the movement but had also given it a measure of notoriety.

So last month SUPA officially recognized its stagnation and disbanded. It's interesting to note that this happened at a meeting called to recruit new members.

All this is not to say that SUPA's activities and discussions have been a failure — far from that SUPA was among the first groups to point out the immorality of the war in Vietnam and the downright lies the American government has used to justify its involvement.

SUPA therein helped change the thinking of many students and pointed out the questions for society to ask.

One of its main achievements has been to bring moral considerations back into international affairs. Vietnam isn't just an anti-or pro-Communist issue, not when innocent women and children are being burned; young Americans are being forced to participate in the fighting and the government tells lies to its own people.

SUPA members went beyond moral considerations themselves and started talking about power structures and the like. Its community-organizing beginnings inspired the formation of the Company of Young Canadians and initiatives for new types of approaches within the Indian Affairs Department.

And SUPA questions about the state of society can even be traced to the hippies, who felt the pressures of society so strongly that they decided to hell with it, and dropped out.

The questions need asking more than ever today, and hopefully enough people outside SUPA have the courage to ask them.

macpherson on teachers

On page 37 of the Macpherson Report we discover that "a significant proportion of the lectures offered to undergraduates are simply bad . . ."

Starting from this none-too-novel truism, the report deftly proceeds to entangle the all-too-serious problem of inadequate instruction in a rambling series of feeble recommendations for improvements.

Granted the premise that this university is full of lecturers who can't or won't deliver an effective lecture. The obvious deduction is: "improve their lecturing ability by the most professional methods available.

Logical? Not according to the Macpherson committee.

The report is firmly opposed to the idea of hiring a team of professional pedagogues to train the hundreds of bad lecturers on this campus.

Mind you, it's not that the professionals won't succeed.

According to Macpherson, professional instructors would tend to concentrate on improving only a secondary aspect of lecturing, that is, "the mere transmission of information which the student has to know."

Moreover, says the report, any university insisting on courses of teacher training "would soon lose its competitive power to attract scholars and potential scholars.

If the committee's rather backward logic is correct, it is possible for a lecturer to impart to his students theories, methodology, insight, scholarly interpretations, enthusiasm for the subject and a zeal for learning despite an inability to transmit information they are expected to know.

What information does such a lecturer transmit? Information his students are supposed to forget.

Is it irrational for this university, or any university for that matter, to expect potential lecturers to have some measure of lecturing ability?

The most brilliant scholar in the world is wasted in the lecture hall if he is unable to communicate with his students.

The university can easily maintain its hallowed "competitive position" by hiring scholars with the condition that they do not teach. Let them do their pure research. Let those who can lecture effectively do the lecturing.

The lecture halls of this university are too often occupied by brilliant research scholars whose powers of communication are less than a third-class freshman.

Macpherson concentrates on improving the lecturing ability of junior staff members.

They will receive advice from their senior colleagues, they will have videotape facilities, they will be given incentives to improve as lecturing ability will be of added importance in making promotions.

But what of the senior staff member who can't lecture? Who will give him advice? What incentives can be offered to a full professor.

Macpherson says nothing. Perhaps he assumes that all senior staff members are adequate lecturers.

To our sorrow, we know better. Student surveys of lecturing ability are a good thing, Macpherson says, so long as they remain private. Can't criticize a lecturer in public, you know. Bad for the reputation of the university.

And that, come to think of it, is what this report is all about.

Gotta let the faculty salve the problem of rotten lecturers.

Let the blind lead the blind.
It's all a question of reputation

Draft dodger programme irresponsible

By ALAN RUBIN

Alan Rubin, a third-year Political Science and Economics student, is a SAC representative for University College. The opinions he expresses are not necessarily those of The Varsity.

This Wednesday, the S.A.C. will decide on a proposal to endorse and support a Toronto-based organization, set up to help American draft-dodgers.

Its aims are twofold: to help financially draft-dodgers who arrive here, and to disseminate pamphlets on campuses all across the U.S., offering Canada as an attractive alternative to the draft, and outlining the steps that a would be draft-dodger must take.

This is the type of activity that is very appealing at first glance. Yet before we follow the U.C. Lit. in playfully endorsing and supporting this programme, I think the full extent of its irresponsibility and bad faith should be outlined.

LIKE DEGAULLE?

One cannot ignore the striking example of another man, who recently came to preach disloyalty to the citizens of a country other than his.

When he urged a "Quebec Libre", who among us, (over those favouring greater independence for Quebec), was not indignant? Can we expect fair-minded Americans to react any differently when we come into their country, urging them to "flee the draft"?

To run off to Canada is to irrevocably forfeit one's birthright. It is to cut one's ties with family, friends, and community forever.

In the turbulent, rebellious mood on American campuses today, there is little doubt that any publicizing of Canada as an easy alternative to the draft will bring a flood of would be draft-dodgers. But by simplifying, even institutionalizing draft-dodgers, we will have blinded these young Americans to the horrendous break they are, in fact, making.

When the war is over and the danger past, will they thank us? On the contrary, their homelessness will hit them, and they will hate us for having urged them on so glibly. I will not take the responsibility for thousands of lives so ruined.

WHY THEM?

There are 200,000 immigrants coming to Canada yearly, many of them from societies far more oppressive, and military situations far more unpleasant than American.

Moreover, the great proportion of these don't speak the language, don't have the education, don't understand the North American immigrants are last-priority. And if some of them are really in need, let the government help them in the normal and proper way. Why this sudden "humanitarianism" on the part of SAC.

In my opinion, this humanitarianism is a smoke-screen to obscure the real reason for helping American draft-dodgers—opposition to the War in Vietnam. Yet the real fight against the war can no more be won in Canada, than can the war itself be won in North Vietnam. Only those who remain in the U.S. — who write, march, organize — only these men are doing their part against the war.

Let the draft-dodger come — but let him come fully aware of his decision, under his own steam, and most important, let him not be a mere instrument for a nose-thumbing exercise.

iTi Teach-In Preview

This is the first in a continuing series of articles about the principle speakers in the forthcoming Teach-In.

Garfield Todd, prime minister of Southern Rhodesia from 1953 to 1958, is marked in history for his struggle to remove his country's color bar.

As he met increasing resistance from within his party during 1958 in his fight for Negro rights, a massive cabinet resignation robbed Todd of the leadership.

Todd helped form the Central Africa Party the following year, demanding "massive and immediate action to remove the colour bar".

Rhodesian police swooped on his African Nationalist Party office creating rioting which resulted in 500 arrests and a number of deaths.

As he was about to leave to participate in a 1965 teach-in at Edinburgh University, he was arrested and restricted to his ranch for a year.

This summer an article appeared in a Rhodesian daily reporting a statement by Lardner Bryke, Minister of law and order, that "Garfield was definitely a threat to the country and for that reason he was restricted.

"If he again becomes a threat to authority he will again be restricted."

The former prime minister, also a minister of the Churches of Christ, will be featured in the Teach-In topic, "Religious Faith and Revolution."

Professor Richard Schaul was a missionary and university administrator in Brazil for 20 years. Now with Princeton Theological Seminary, he helped organize the World Council of Churches study on rapid social change last year.

Co-author of Encounter with Revolution: Containment and Change, Prof. Schaul will speak on the topic, "Religious Faith and Ideology."

IS CANADA REALLY AN ESCAPE FR

By SUE HELWIG

American draft resisters are being given a helping hand by Mark Satin, permanent secretary of the Toronto Draft Resistance Program.

Satin is in charge of a 23-page booklet entitled "Escape from Freedom: Immigration to Canada as an alternative to the draft." This booklet provides many resisters with their first contact with Canada.

Since May, Satin and his organization have answered about 2,500 mail enquiries and have helped more than 1,000 immigrants from the program headquarters at Spadina.

"We tell them how to come, giving as much help as is legally possible," he said in an interview, "and we help them adjust to life in Canada when they come.

"We are not a political group. The only criterion for aid is a desire to resist the draft."

The Escape from Freedom booklet is distributed by college students in the 400 Anti-Draft Unions on U.S. campuses. There is also some distribution of the literature in Toronto.

Students face grave injustices in housing hunts

By SHERRY BRYDSON

Two University of Toronto students say they have been cheated by landlords, and the housing service seems powerless to help them.

An American girl, Jeanne Lance (SGS), arrived in Toronto before her apartment was ready. She then took a room on a temporary basis at 195 Spadina Road.

Miss Lance paid the manager — Cecil — $16 for a week's rent and gave him a "security deposit" of $20, which Cecil said would be refunded when she left.

Jeanne made it clear to Cecil that she would be staying for two weeks at the most, and Cecil assured her she would get her deposit back when she left.

She rented the room on a Tuesday, but Cecil said that his rental week ran from Saturday to Saturday, and that she would have to pay a whole week's rent for the portion of the week that was left.

Cecil did not give Jeanne a key to her room — he said he couldn't find it. Later he told her that someone would be bringing it around. Jeanne never saw her key.

"Sometimes I had to crawl through a window to get in."

Jeanne's original apartment became available two days after she had moved into 195 Spadina Road. She advised the manager that she was moving out and asked for her security deposit.

Cecil said he had to contact the owner, and asked Jeanne to return later. When she returned, Cecil gave her a "somewhat confused" story about having to rent the room before the deposit could be returned.

Jeanne then asked for the owner's name and telephone number. Cecil identified the owner as Arnold Blundell, of 5 Shorncliffe Ave.

The phone number which Cecil gave Jeanne proved to be incorrect. Further, she discovered that Blundell had an unlisted phone number.

By sheer coincidence, Jeanne met someone who had rented a room from Blundell and was able to give her his number.

Although she phoned Blundell on three successive nights, Jeanne was unable to get satisfaction.

The first night a voice which identified itself as that of Blundell said it would "look into the matter." The second night the same voice said it was the answering service and would take a message. The third night the voice hung up when Jeanne identified herself.

At this point Jeanne got in touch with Mary Jaffary of the U of T Housing Service and registered a complaint.

When Mrs. Jaffary phoned, a male voice that answered Jeanne's description of Blundell's voice took the message and said it would get in touch with Mrs. Jaffary. She has not heard from him.

Repeated attempts to reach Blundell at his unlisted number failed. A Varsity reporter went to 195 Spadina to talk to Cecil, who was unavailable on two occasions. There was no "for rent" sign on the house.

Even more blatant than Jeanne's case is that of Sandra Gung (II Mus).

Sandra requested a room in the University Women's Residence on St. George St. She was put on the waiting list and when she hadn't been accepted by early September, she went house-hunting.

Through the housing service, Sandra found a room at $40 a month. She says she gave the landlady, Mrs. M. A. Treadgold of 291 Eglinton Ave. E., $40 for the first month's rent and received a receipt marked, "plus $20 security deposit to follow."

Sandra subsequently got a room in the University Women's Residence and her aunt phoned Mrs. Treadgold to tell her that Sandra no longer needed the room. Mrs. Treadgold gave her a story about a landlord's rights and mentioned something about a "verbal contract," that she said was binding.

Sandra says she made a special trip by bus from her home in Coldwater, Ont. to see Mrs. Treadgold and "to apologize for the inconvenience I caused her."

Mrs. Treadgold slammed the door in Sandra's face and threatened to call the police if she didn't go away.

Without a key, Sandra couldn't even use the room for the month.

The Housing Service refuses to list Mrs. Treadgold's apartment because of her attitude.

"If I hear one more word from Sandra, I won't give her money back and I don't have to. You talk to your superiors and get the story from them."

"It took me two weeks to earn that money this summer," Sandra told us. "I could use it right now to buy some of my books."

The Housing Service has no power to require landlords to clean up their premises. Mrs. Jaffary does, however, try to see the places personally and to make recommendations to the landlords.

Mrs. Jaffary says she called one landlady about her dirty halls. "The accommodation was good, so I listed it," said Mrs. Jaffary, "but it was so very dirty."

The landlady asked Mrs. Jaffary, "Can I help it if they live like pigs?" When Mrs. Jaffary said she was referring to the halls and not to the state of the tenants' rooms, the landlady replied:

"You need me, darling more than I need you."

Mrs. Jaffary said that cases such as these are not unique. Landlords take advantage of the students position all the time.

As for the housing service, "They use us as they find it convenient."

The shocking sequel to Mrs. Jaffary's story is the fact that she refused to disclose the name of the landlady with the dirty halls.

"Her space is too good, and too close," she said.

"I don't want to do anything to prejudice her against students. We can't afford to lose that space."

that if they had known how smooth the transition would be their decision would have been that much easier.

The average educational standard of the Toronto resister is 3.3 years of university.

With such qualifications to start from, says Satin, they are not making a sacrifice in terms of what this country has to offer them.

For the past two weeks, Naomi Wall, wife of U of T psychology professor Martin Wall, has been running an informal employment agency for draft resisters. Working out of her own home, she has been able to help about 10 people, most of whom were interested in teaching.

"So far there have been no problems with potential employees," she said in an interview. "But my service is for a small minority, most resisters look for work on their own."

The resistance program has made arrangements with the history department to run a series of seminars on Canada for American immigrants.

History prof. Ken McNaught, who is in charge of the series, said the seminars would "provide information and discussion about the structure of Canadian society to orient a recent immigrant.

"These seminars are still in the planning stage, but they will begin within a month."

Draft resisters already in Canada will receive a news-letter from the Spadina office for the first time this month. The purpose of the letter, says Satin, is to keep them informed of their legal status and let them know what Americans are saying about them.

The resistance program is financed by private dona-tions. Approximately half of the funds come from sym-pathetic Canadians and half from settled resisters. There has been little support from the business community, but church and other groups have given aid.

Mark and his volunteer assistants are responsible to an eight-member committee of townspeople and to the supporters of the program.

I couldn't begin to thank the Toronto Draft Resistance Program. It gave me immigration information and the real psychological support.

I like the innovative atmosphere of education here and I'd like to stay even if I didn't have to.

Even if I'd been accepted as a CO, I'd have had to serve two years' non-militaristic service or go to jail. If the war escalated I might have been inducted anyway.

I think the 2-S deferment for college students is an instrument of social control. You've got to do well or else you're in Southeast Asia. Not everybody wants to continue his education.

Even though I've left the States it was the hardest choice I've had to make. First there's the close friends you'll never see again. Then there's the parents who rather have you go to jail or even Vietnam than have you object.

For some draft resisters the pressure is too great. Letters from heart-broken mothers send them packing for home.

Personally I have no real regrets except that I upset my mother.

Don Mount residents try to save homes:

U of T grads organize protest of homeowner evictions

Defiance was the keynote of a rally held yesterday at Dundas and Monro Streets to protest the planned eviction of four homeowners from the Don Mount area.

The rally, organized by University of Toronto graduates John Sewell and Wolfe Erlichman, community workers in the area, supported the stand of the four home-owners remaining in the Don Mount re-development district who have refused to leave their homes until they are given satisfactory accomodation.

The gathering, led by Se-well, decided to keep volun-teers inside and outside the houses to be expropriated at all times, since sheriffs have been known to come for evictions at all hours.

They also decided to de-monstrate on Dundas Street from 4 to 7 p.m. each day and to send telegrams protesting the evictions to Prime Mini-ster Lester Pearson and Pre-mier John Robarts.

Flanked by remaining four houses and the barren dig-gings of the already-vacated homes, the meeting had an atmosphere of despair and determination.

War protesters may be most active

The University of Toronto Committee to End the War in Vietnam may be the most active group on campus.

During registration week they gave out 5,000 pamph-lets describing who they are and what they stand for.

And in the last two weeks they have distributed thous-ands of other pamphlets from their booth in Sidney Smith Hall.

President Marlie Ritchie (III Vic) calls the committee the largest of its kind in Ca-nada. It has more than 500 supporters.

"We have added more than 250 new names to our mailing list already," she said.

The committee said it was receiving much more sup-port than antagonism from U of T students who pass the booth.

"Some people come by and call us commies," says Miss Ritchie. "But there is much enthusiasm.

"The problem is that the majority of students are apa-thetic. They don't care or haven't made up their minds about the war. We are trying to bring them to a deci-sion."

The group is planning a Vietnam Week at the univer-sity two weeks from now. At that time a massive de-monstration of supporters from all over the province is expected to converge on To-ronto.

The committee is expect-ing some 5,000 persons from Ottawa, Hamilton and other Ontario cities to take part in a meeting at Queen's Park Oct. 21.

"A parade with floats and banners will march from Queen's Park to City Hall," Miss Ritchie said.

FROM THE HINTERLANDS

New library transit system begins

WINDSOR (CUP) — Library resources of all 14 provincially assisted Ontario universities and those of the National Library and the National Science Library will be available this year to any graduate student or faculty member.

The first of these co-operative ventures, the inter-university library transit system, was launched this week.

Headquarters at York University are supervised by T. F. O'Connell, York's director of libraries.

A fleet of five station-wagons will visit 12 of the 14 universities five days a week, collecting and delivering requested library materials. The two most northerly universities, Lakehead at Port Arthur and Laurentian at Sudbury, will participate by air freight.

Under the new system, requests for library materials will normally be filled in 24 hours or less.

Estimated annual operating cost of the venture is $75,000, or just more than $5,000 a university.

In addition to greatly speeding up exchange of material, the new system will save staff time taken to process requests and wrap and deliver parcels to campus postal centres, as well as postage and Telex costs.

Provinces plan education council

REGINA (VNS) — Provincial education ministers met last week in Regina to set up the mechanism for the planned Canada-wide education council.

The new council, to be called the Canadian Council of Ministers of Education, was approved to principle last June.

It will work for interprovincial co-operation in educational planning and development research, teacher exchanges, educational television and economic studies.

The estimated annual expense of $600,000 is to be paid by the provinces with Ontario bearing the largest share.

Two Winnipeg students get posts

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Negotiations carried on over the summer have resulted in two students being placed on the policy-steering committee of the board of regents at the University of Winnipeg.

The steering committee recommends policy to the board of regents.

The students will join representatives from the board and from the faculty.

Alan Godard, treasurer of the student association, welcomed the decision as "a move towards open decision making with regards to the University's plans for expansion."

Another French university proposed

MONTREAL (CUP) — A call for the institution of a second French-language university in Montreal has been made by delegates to a seminar sponsored by the Quebec Chamber of Commerce.

This follows similar demands by the Union Generale des Etudiants du Quebec, which protested the slowness of the Quebec government.

The delegates agreed that although a new university was urgently needed now, the earliest time it could possibly open would be 1970.

Macpherson wants new college system

By PAUL CARSON

While admitting the existing college system is potentially "an extremely valuable asset in this University", the Macpherson report charges that the St. George campus colleges "are not, for most of the students enrolled in them, academic communities in any effective sense."

The present system of four separate college departments, says the report, prevents the colleges from serving most of their undergraduates as true academic communities and results in "a misallocation of the total intellectual resources of the faculty (of arts and science)."

Professor C. B. Macpherson writes that the central problem his committee had to solve was the restoration of "the reality of the old colleges as academic communities serving all their students."

This he proposes to do by having the colleges handle most of the lectures and tutorials in the proposed common courses for freshmen.

In what is undoubtedly the most controversial section of the report, Prof. Macpherson urges the merging of the existing college faculties into university departments.

The colleges would then arrange their staff by making cross-appointments from this single central pool of academic talent.

The colleges would appoint both senior and junior faculty members, thereby ensuring the creation of a balanced staff.

Faculty members appointed to the colleges would be paid by the university and would teach university as well as college courses.

According to the report, implementation of these recommendations would rejuvenate the college system, as each college would be conducting a significant amount of the teaching of almost all of its students.

In the process, the report concedes, the colleges "will have to relinquish to the university some of the teaching they now do, and some of their faculty who now do it."

COLLEGE SYSTEM INAPPROPRIATE

In making its suggestions, the Macpherson Committee argued that the college system, devised almost eighty years ago, had become inefficient and inappropriate.

When it was instituted, says the report, most arts students took a "substantial number" of college subjects (mainly languages and philosophy). However, as most students today take university subjects, the existence of four separate departments to teach the relatively few students taking college subjects is difficult to justify.

In order to eliminate the present " needless duplication", the most popular of the proposed "Basic Courses" would be sectioned among the various colleges.

In addition, the report expects each college will assemble a staff specializing in several fields of interest in order to attract students in second, third and fourth years.

Macpherson takes note of the pooling of college departments and number of cross-appointments already made by the federated colleges but concludes they are not adequate to solve the central problem: which, in his opinion, is the increase in the number of non-college subjects to be taught by the colleges.

LIMIT TO COLLEGE ENROLMENT

The report also recommends that the enrolment in all colleges on the St. George campus be limited to 1,500 undergraduates.

During the 1966-67 academic year, enrolment in the colleges concerned was: University 2,057; Trinity 699; New 1,072; Innis 413; St. Michael's 1,679; Victoria 2,403.

The report mentions that several years ago, officials of Victoria College attempted to form a second federated college under United Church auspices to counteract the rapid increase in student enrolment at Victoria.

However, their plans were vetoed by the university administration.

In formulating its recommendations, the Macpherson committee borrows heavily from a memorandum prepared in 1959 by Moffat Woodside, Vice-president and provost.

At the time of the memorandum, Prof.

Woodside was principal of University College.

He wrote, "the present system is imperceptibly forcing the colleges to devote more and more attention and more and more rivalry to important adjuncts of the community of scholars."

He added that most student contacts with the colleges were purely social because the existing system deprived the colleges of "the solid core of intellectual community."

NEED 'FINANCIAL INCENTIVES'

Macpherson admits the colleges may be hesitant to relinquish their traditional "freedoms"; therefore, he suggests, "some financial incentive to a redistribution of teaching seems to be required."

Under existing arrangements, the federated colleges (Victoria, St. Michael's, Trinity) retain, with a few exceptions, all undergraduate tuition fees plus 40 per cent of their federal government grants.

The constituent colleges (University, New, Innis) obtain no revenue from student fees and their teaching budgets are provided by the university.

Noting that the tuition revenues of the federated colleges do not depend on how much teaching they provide for their undergraduates, the report argues that a re-evaluation of the financial aspects of federation may be necessary.

Prof. Macpherson suggests the university administration should receive all revenues accruing from undergraduate enrolment (tuition plus government grants) in the faculty of arts.

The federated and constituent colleges would then receive funds from the university proportional to the willingness of the college to provide instruction for all of its students.

IMPLIED FINANCIAL THREATS

The implication seems to be that if a college refused to alter its teaching arrangements, the university should be able to impose financial pressures.

The report also suggests that the university could persuade the colleges to agree to a redistribution of the teaching arrangements by threatening to withdraw the regulation which forces undergraduates in the faculty of arts to enroll in one of the six St. George campus colleges.

Because Scarborough and Erindale Colleges do all the teaching for all their students, the report does not include them in its section on revamping the college system.

If the existing financial relations were maintained, the report indicated, the colleges would lose most of their students, and, therefore, most of their current revenue.

OBJECTIONS ARE OVERRULED

Macpherson says the committee considered several possible objections to its suggestions for reorganizing the college system but decided that the objections were not unanswerable.

Cross-appointments might seriously weaken the cohesiveness of the larger departments, but the committee decided that cohesiveness is much more than mere "physical proximity" and could be maintained.

The sectioning of large courses among several colleges would lessen the "mixing of students" from different backgrounds. However, the committee believed that such "mixing" as now takes place is more social than intellectual, and should not be overestimated.

College faculties would experience the "psychic cost of dislocation" as the new arrangements were instituted, but this would be a temporary problem of little long range significance.

The report admits that the cross-appointment of lecturers in the natural sciences can amount to little more than changing the location of lecture rooms.

The colleges cannot afford the cost of establishing complete laboratories, Macpherson realizes, but this minor weakness should not seriously affect the overall program of cross-appointments which is central to his proposed readjustment of the college system.

The Book Selection Department in the University Library requires a part-time student assistant. The following qualifications are necessary:

(1) A good knowledge of one or more of the following languages:

A. ARABIC
B. PERSIAN

C. TURKISH
D. URDU

(2) The ability to translate into English and (for A, B and D) to transliterate from the Arabic/Persian/Urdu script into the western alphabet accurately and quickly. A knowledge of the spoken language only is not sufficient.

New SUPER WHEAT

In the October Reader's Digest you can now learn how Canadian scientists have created an amazing new plant to help feed the world's hungry masses. It's straight out of science fiction . . . a strange giant plant with a head twice as large as that of a normal wheat plant. Called Triticale, it's actually the first crop species that man has ever created! Read how this Canadian hunger-fighter produced from wheat and rye is now being tested in India, Egypt, Ecuador and Guatemala . . . and how, by 1970, it is hoped that at least one variety of Triticale will be ready for commercial distribution and for a hungry world. Read all about it now in the October Digest.

Soccerites edge strong Scarboro team

The soccer Blues defeated a tough and gritty team from Scarboro on the back campus Saturday morning. The Scarboro team, an unknown quantity to Blues, proved to be worthy opponents as Varsity could only muster a 3-1 victory in front of their hardy fans.

Blues were surprised from the opening whistle by the determination and ability of the visitors. Even though the Scarboro team is made up of players of junior age, they showed poise and ability beyond their years and had Blues shocked for the first ten minutes of the game. Scarboro was on top and only a couple of excellent saves by Erwin Stach on Jim Laverty and John Gero prevented them from taking an early lead.

But Blues began to show their experience and slowly took over control of the game. At about the 25 minute mark, Frank Soppelsa laid a square pass at the feet of Austril Siepa, who scored with a low shot from twenty yards out.

That seemed to settle Blues down. Now they would show their potential. Erratic finishing around the Scarboro net, however, handicapped the team and the half ended with Varsity in front only 1-0.

The second half started as a rather sloppy display, but the tempo of the game soon picked up. Blues had a slight edge, especially at midfield, where Dwight Taylor and Tom Johnston were doing an excellent job of controlling the ball. Probably Blues' best move of the game came at around the fifteen minute mark when they moved swiftly down the field, Soppelsa culminating a beautiful five-way passing play with a hard shot to the top left-hand corner of the net.

Soon after that, Liepa scored his second and Blues' third goal by clearly beating the Scarboro goalie from fifteen yards out. Blues were on top, and only poor finishing by usually deadly Jim Lefkos, who even missed on a penalty kick, prevented Blues from making it a runaway at that point.

But Blues did not possess the killer instinct, and allowed Scarboro to come to life and take a slight mid-field advantage. John Gero made good on a miscue by Blues' defence and scored from a scramble in front of the net. From then on, the game became a hard mid-field battle featuring good passing plays, but little excitement around the nets.

The two Blues who played for Scarboro, John Gero and Jim Laverty showed extremely well, particularly Gero, who gave Blues centre-half Eric Sereda nothing but headaches. Gero also counted Scarboro's only goal.

The game did prove that Blues are deficient in one aspect i.e. that they play at only one speed—slow. Players usually hold on to the ball too long, leaving their teammates out of position.

Also, Blues seem to hunch together too much, often getting in each others' way. This will hopefully be corrected by Wednesday when they start playing for the marbles.

Strong squash team seeks to regain OQAA crown

University of Toronto Squash Blues open a new season Monday determined to capture the intercollegiate squash crown won by McGill the past two years.

Blues, who last won the crown three years ago, have their first nine players returning from last season.

Pre-Christmas matches include the Canadian Centennial and Ontario Club tournaments as well as a trip to the United States for top class college competition. Blues will play, Yale, Wesleyan, Williams, Amherst and Harvard.

Blues have already chosen their executive committee for the coming year. It is President Emeritus and Captain Emeritus, Mike Gardner; President and Captain, Gary Miller; Vice-President Emeritus and "B"-Team Captain Emeritus, D'Arcy Martin; Vice-President, "B"-Team Captain and Publicity Director, Howie Fluxgold; Secretary and Social Director, Dave Gunn; Wardrobe Director, Mike Zimmerman.

Other members of the first nine returning are Frank Buck seeded No. 1 last year, Vic Harding, the fifth ranking junior in the province and No. 6 seed, Terry Swinton.

Coach Ralph Rimmer plans to field a team of 15 or 16 players and urges anyone wishing to try out to be at the squash courts Monday, at 4:20 p.m.

Alboini sparks 16-7 win over Stangs

Varsity Sports Editor

Best easy, pigskin pessimists. There's life in 'them thar' Blues.

Trailing 7-1 after an abominable first half, Varsity Blues became a smooth, well-oiled football team for the final thirty minutes as they came from behind to trounce Western Mustangs, 16-7, in Saturday's exhibition game at Varsity Stadium.

The spark for Blues' second-half conflagration came from tiny quarterback, Vic Alboini, who succeeded Bob Amer at the 3:00 mark of the third quarter. Under his licentious leadership, Blues rolled for 12 first downs and 250 yards total offense, as well as their two touchdowns. A third scoring drive bogged down on the one-yard line.

Alboini masterminded Blues with all the aplomb of a veteran signal-caller as he synchronized an offence which had sputtered despairingly throughout the first half (only 4 first downs). He dove one yard for Toronto's first touchdown of the day and whisked a 28-yd. pass to Jim Ware for the other. Overall, Alboini completed 7 out of 10 passes for a very impressive 117 yards.

However, in spite of all this, Blues would have been nowhere, man, without those hard-nosed, voracious vagabonds playing defense. Led by defensive captain Mike Wright, surely the SIFL's version of Angelo Mosca, they stifled Western's 'vaunted' passing attack with the fiercest rush since Dick Burton went after Elizabeth Taylor. Given, on the average, only about two seconds to find a receiver before being eagerly engulfed by Messrs. Wright, Bennett, etc., Mustang quarterbacks, Israel and Cipparone, could manage only four completions for fifteen yards.

As mentioned, the first half of football was atrocious, due possibly to an incessant drizzle which annoyed even the LGMB. Paul McKay opened the scoring for Varsity with a 63-yd. single, but Blues could do nothing else. Bob Amer once again failed to fire the club although he was victimized more by greasy-fingered receivers than any general incompetence on his own part.

Mustangs scored their lone touchdown early in the second quarter after a nifty punt return by Bruce Hough left them in possession on Varsity's 30. Six plays later, Israel lofted a two yard pass to Bill Hendershot who was all by his lonesome in the end zone. Ottavio Colosimo added the convert.

Snores filled the air as the dreary first half ended, before Alboini, with the substantial aid of Ware, rookie Wolfgang Gut, and ever-competent Mike Raham, came on to enliven proceedings.

Alboini's one-yard scoring dive came after Blues had moved from their own 45 in 9 well-executed plays. Stankovic's convert gave Toronto the lead, 8-7.

Ware's fourth-quarter touchdown, Stankovic's convert, and another single by McKay completed the scoring.

Western never threatened in the second half as Blues' defense was magnificent.

Metras blames line for poor passing

By HOWIE FLUXGOLD

Thank heavens for the Lady Godiva Memorial Band and the Western cheerleaders. The men with the yellow hats and the Red Cap flag, and the lovely ladies from Western kept the crowd awake while the Varsity Blues and Western Mustangs scrounged around in the mud.

This was a real sleeper in every sense of the word. For almost three quarters it was one big yawn as Blues attempted to crank up their slow-moving offense and 'Stangs played their usual three-yards-and-a-cloud-of-dust football.

Coach John "The Bull" Metras had led us to believe that his Mustangs would be throwing the ball much more than in previous seasons. But then The Bull's been saying that for the past 30 years.

Metras' quarterbacks tried exactly seven passes completing four for a grand total of 15 yards. He had some choice, unprintable words for his guards whom he blamed for not protecting his quarterbacks and therefore ruining his passing attack.

But that statement brings on a rather peculiar odor. Mustangs had no intention of throwing the ball once they had gained the lead in the middle of the second quarter.

'Stangs decided they'd spend the rest of Saturday afternoon ramming the ball up the middle from their flashy "I" formation. A call was immediately sent out for a large supply of "No Doze."

It wasn't until Vic Alboini scored at the end of the third quarter to give Blues an 8-7 lead that Mustangs decided to throw the ball.

However, linebacker Mike Wright, rookie Bill Bennett and the rest of Blues' defensive line usually got to the passer before he could release the ball.

"We're improving. We'll surprise a few people before the season's over," said Metras analyzing his team's 16-7 defeat.

But Mustangs have already surprised a few people by losing exhibition games to University of Waterloo and Waterloo Lutheran.

BLUENOTES: Despite Alboini's sparkling performance, Varsity coach, Ron Murphy, has not nominated him to start next week's opener against McGill. Murphy says he'll wait to see the films before deciding on his quarterback... Western fullback Dave Farmer proved impressive through the middle, grinding out 74 yards in 15 carries... Joe Cipparone replaced Bob Israel at quarterback for Western after Israel was shaken up in the third quarter. He ate a lot of pigskin... Varsity punter, Paul McKay, averaged more than 40 yards a hoof for the second successive game... Gut appears to have won a starting berth in Blues' offensive backfield with his superlative performance. He rushed for 54 yards, had one punt return for 51 yards, and returned two kickoffs for 46 yards. He looked good... Jim Ware caught three passes for 77 yards... Officials again had a field day littering the ground with their red hankies... Mike Raham continues to uphold his reputation as best runner in the SIFL. He was running through tacklers all day... Arnie Carefoote had another good day for Blues... Western may be in real trouble this year. Metras' club looked particularly bad in the second half when they managed only 50 yards total offense.

Saturday's drizzle had its effect on play as here Blues' halfback Nick DiGiuseppe (28) fails to grasp the slippery football.

Rally a must for students: Faulkner

Students can forget about a voice in housing and student aid if they don't show up for today's election debate at Convocation Hall, says Students Council President Tom Faulkner.

Faulkner is urging students to attend the debate today at 1 p.m., because "every politician in Ontario will be watching U of T's big election meeting to see what happens.

"They won't listen if we don't show up at Convocation Hall."

The three St. Andrew-St. Patrick candidates, Allan Grossman, Leonard Shifrin and Adam Fuerstenberg will give speeches and answer questions from students.

For the last two weeks SAC has been marshalling interest among students in the election and urging them to put politicians on the spot, especially over education.

A court of revision for students living on campus wishing to change their riding to St. Andrew-St. Patrick was held Monday in Hart House.

Election officials reported that 247 students turned up to file the affidavit. Many students were enumerated before they returned to campus, and now must go back to their summer riding if they wish to vote Oct. 17.

However if they had planned to visit a court of revision today, yesterday or Monday they could vote in the on campus riding in which they live.

Faulkner wasn't discouraged by the light turnout Monday at Hart House.

"The revising officers were so busy they had to bring in an extra one," he said.

He also said a lack of strong issues from the politicians has dampened student interest in the election.

Elsewhere in Hart House Monday a mock election meeting was held.

Some 50 persons were present in the Music Room to hear Hersh Ezrin (IV UC) play the part of a Liberal, John Treleaven (SGS) give his premiere performance as a Conservative and Vince Kelly, a former Queen's Park candidate, express the aspirations of the NDP.

Bob James (II Vic), meeting organizer, was pleased with the questions the student audience asked.

"Most of them asked question off the top of their head without referring to the Ontario Union of Students election booklet we gave them," he said.

A lone member of the Toronto Junior Board of Trade shouted "last chance to vote on campus" Monday in front of Sidney Smith Hall.

He handed out a flyer with a map of the Metropolitan Toronto ridings, their candidates and the riding election board phone numbers.

He said he had nothing to do with SAC efforts to involve students in the election.

Faulkner said he didn't know anything about the Junior Board of Trade member's solo crusade, but said he had the right idea.

ROTP SCRAPPED

Programs for training students as reserve officers while they attend university will be scrapped, the federal government announced yesterday.

Speaking for defense minister Leo Cadieux, transport minister Paul Hellyer said the training programs were not producing enough reserve officers to make the cost worthwhile.

The university programs will be replaced over a two year period by new arrangements for training officers off-campus, and by chairs of military studies in some universities.

Students enrolled in the Regular Officer Training Plan in which officer cadets are put through university will not be affected by the change.

Liberation Front students—here in November

By ROD RITCHIE

A delegation of students from the National Liberation Front will be sent to the University of Toronto in November to help remold Canadian thinking, Hugh Armstrong, president of the Canadian Union of Students told The Varsity last night.

"They will come to plot strategy with the more progressive elements of society," Armstrong said, "and if the immigration officials give them trouble, we'll give them something they'll never forget."

The visit to be sponsored by CUS was confirmed yesterday in a letter from the head of the National Liberation Front in Moscow.

Armstrong says he received a mandate from "several enthusiastic members in CUS" to request the NLF visit.

At least one student group on the U of T campus, however is disenchanted with the whole idea.

"CUS is engaged in a dubious venture when it tries to foist its own politics on the student body," says F. Paul Fromm (II SMC), president of the rightist Edmund Burke Society.

"A hawkish speaker like Richard Nixon should have been invited to present the other side's point of view."

Originally CUS had an opportunity to bring an NLF group to the U of T and other campuses early this month—and blew it.

The three Vietnamese who now are limited to a tour of Quebec were also supposed to see the rest of Canada.

Armstrong explains the mix-up this way:

Earlier this year both CUS and the Quebec student union (UGEQ) sent separate requests to the Liberation Front.

The NLF, however, thought that both CUS and UGEQ were the same organization and sent only one delegation. So UGEQ got first call because they sent their invitations first.

This week Dauphne Kelgart, associate secretary of CUS, tried to persuade UGEQ to lend the English-speaking campuses at least the one Vietnamese student who speaks English fluently.

UGEQ offered to send this delegate to U of T for October 9—Thanksgiving—while the other two continued their Quebec tour.

At this point both CUS and the U of T Students' Council decided to call the whole thing off.

Some U of T spokesmen feel that UGEQ's refusal to send a Liberation Front student "gross insult to CUS ... a power play against English Canadians."

But to Armstrong this is "a lot of balderdash."

"If there was any power play against CUS," he says, "I would have been in there fighting."

Draft-dodging vote

The Engineering Society last night voted to take a referendum of engineering students regarding draft-dodgers.

The referendum will ask if students are in favor of an organization which invites draft dodgers into Canada, and if they favor allocating students funds to such an organization.

Dents frolic with shaving cream to raise United Appeal money

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Dentistry students doused themselves with water and shaving cream yesterday at City Hall. But the fun and foolishness was not in vain—they raised $200 for the United Appeal.

Cigarettes, lifesavers and shoeshines were sold with pleading smiles and earned the dentistry and dental hygiene freshmen $194.25 in less than 90 minutes.

Moving in groups of about 30, the frosh roamed around Queen, Bay and Yonge Streets dressed in lab coats, pyjamas, rubber boots, cardboard bow ties and war paint.

At stop lights they took advantage of halted street cars and washed the windows. Old ladies contributed money from their seats.

The annual faculty of dentistry initiations are probably the best example on campus of the old style rah-rah College hazings.

Well-organized and with a high degree of participation among frosh and sophomores, they contribute significantly to the unity of a part of the university hidden among the giant office buildings on University Ave.

Barry Chapnick (II Dents), initiation organizer, said about 100 of the 130 first-year dentistry students turned out for the festivities. Leshe Harris (II Dental Hygiene) said 30 of the 48 freshies in her course participated.

After roaming the street the initiated returned to the dentistry building for a dance and money-counting.

When the figure of $194.25 was announced they threw silver at the money counters until they were satisfied they had $200.

One dentistry freshman who collected about $15 made fruitless attempts to solicit a contribution from a disgruntled businessman.

After several rebuffs, the student gave up. "Good day," he said. "I hope your teeth fall out."

CRAP protests at SMC debating club

CRAP descended on the Senate debating club of St. Michael's College Monday night.
CRAP — Canadians Resenting American Proliferation — staged a demonstration to protest American domination of the club.

The nine-member club has only one Canadian debater and incoming members are chosen by an exclusively American executive.

Twenty CRAP members sang O Canada and Mike Dobmeier (III SMC), one of two American demonstrators, swept the floor with an American flag.

F. Paul Fromm (II SMC), president of the campus Edmund Burke Society, delivered a scathing denunciation of senate policies and led the little band away. "The demonstration was short," explained Fromm, "because we Canadian work hard."

Vincent McEwan (I SMC) summed up the situation: "We want CRAP in the Senate."

"At St. Mike's 22 per cent of the are students American because St. Mike's is the only college that offers a make-up of Grade 13," said Don Heeley (IV SMC), president of the SMC students council.

Does this indicate that CRAP must always exist? Says spokesman Fromm, "Yes, CRAP will be here as long as we are."

Hillel won't support draft resistance

A motion to support the Toronto Draft Resistance Program was defeated 29-22 yesterday by the Hillel Foundation in open membership meeting.

Prior to the vote, physics professor Dr. Paul Hoch told the assembly the program in "independent of any anti-war organization," and that it takes "no official stand against the Vietnam war."

He said that the agencies in the U.S. do no soliciting of potential draft-dodgers, and that they merely provide information on request.

This claim was contested by Abie Pesses (III UC), who said he had information to prove his point.

Jeff Goldman (II Law), opposed the motion, saying that to aid draft dodgers was abetting a criminal act in a foreign country.

Joey Steiner (IV UC), said that Goldman's contention carries no weight in a moral issue and cited the opposition to the Spanish legal regime as a reasonable parallel.

Jewish New Year changes SAC meeting

Tonight's Students Administrative Council meeting has been postponed until next week because it falls on Roshashona, the Jewish New Year.

"We just found this out on Monday," said SAC President Tom Faulkner.

He said it would be impossible to discuss important issues such as Tartu College, the draft-dodger resolution and the CUS referendum without a full assembly.

Medsmen want more say in course plans

By ROY HORI

Medical students sought a greater voice in the planning, content and evaluation of their curriculum in an Ontario Medical Association-sponsored conference at Scarboro College last weekend.

Students asked questions of a panel of five staff members. Then discussion on these questions was held during afternoon seminars in which the students actively participated.

Staff and the students disagreed most on the question of electives. The students wanted a system in which they would not only be offered certain options, but also the choice between special additional options and free time.

Dr G. E. Connell, head of the department of biochemistry, said electives place a great responsibility on the students to use their time effectively and to the best advantage.

He said he did not think the students were intellectually or educationally mature enough to benefit from such a system.

The students were also opposed when they urged that a syllabus in the form of printed sheets be given out to students before each lecture.

Most members of the panel thought such a syllabus would be in direct contradiction to the mobility and currentness demanded by students of their lecturers.

The students were also critical of the scanty time for staff-student contact.

They complained that staff members spend only a few hours a week with students, usually in very formal surroundings.

The solution lay in smaller teaching groups, said Dr. J. W. Steiner. But as this was often impossible, he urged his fellows to make a greater effort to reach students.

The staff panel in turn criticized students for their inability to educate themselves and for their incessant demands to be "spoon-fed."

Free the academic faculty: NDP plea

By DAVE FRANK

The cry of "academic freedom" is being misused, says James Renwick, national NDP president and MPP for Riverdale.

"It is being used to preserve the present encrusted bureaucratic control of Ontario universities," he told about 25 campus NDP supporters yesterday.

"Over the last 15 years there has been an almost illegitimate transferring of control from the boards of governors to the administrative branches.

"We need a re-structuring of university government to place the authority in the hands of the academic community, the faculty and students."

Mr. Renwick also called for a "politics of confrontation" rather than the "whipped cream politics of consensus."

"We are forced to deal with important but marginal issues," he said, referring to the attempt to put a student representative on the University of Western Ontario Board of Governors.

He said this particular issue was "practically irrelevant" and distracted from the fundamental problems of bureaucracy.

Mr. Renwick said that at the recent Conservative convention, a young Stanfield supporter told him "You have to understand, little people don't have rights."

The basic problem in the provincial election was "how to make the apparatus of democracy responsive to the people of society," he said.

!Ti Buddhist monk favours peace tours !Ti

By LAWRENCE BRICE

Thich Nhat Hanh is one South Vietnamese Buddhist monk who has not set fire to himself in declaring his cause before the world.

Rather, he favours lecture tours and visits with world leaders to voice his pleas for peace in Vietnam.

In 1966 Thich Nhat Hanh toured the U.S. and Europe for three months, speaking to world leaders including Pope Paul.

"With all my heart, I beg His Holiness to help us in this difficult moment," he told the Pontiff.

The essence of his message to the United States is:

"The longer you continue to do what you are doing now, the more Communists you will create — not only in Vietnam but all over Asia, Africa and Latin America.

"Be worried in time. Or is it already too late?"

Hanh is the founder of the Buddhist University in Saigon, and has written 10 books. His works include Vietnam: Lotus in a Sea of Fire, an impassioned plea for peace and self-determination in Vietnam, and a best-selling book of poems, which was suppressed by the Ky government in 1965.

The Teach-In has invited Thich Nhat Hanh to speak in the Religious Faith and Peace session.

Rev. Gustavo Ramirez will participate in the Teach-in topic Religious Faith and Revolution.

The Catholic priest holds a PhD in both theology and sociology from the university of Louvain, Belgium.

He is founder and director-general of the Colombian Institute for Social Development, a group trying to alleviate social backwardness in Colombia through action and research.

Father Ramirez has been recognized as an activist in the move for revitalization of the Roman Catholic church.

"They're trying to impeach John Bradford. That's too bad. He's such a good guy."
—David DePoe, Sept. 29

graduate students union and the 1960s

One of those old and tiresome political issues reared its head again last week when John Bradford, president of the Graduate Student Union, had to face a meeting of his constituents and explain why he should not be impeached. A bloc of nearly 50 graduate chemistry students had forced the meeting and were doing their best to get rid of the bearded and radical Bradford.

The issue again was the proper place in the university for a student union, or council, or whatever you call it. Bradford had won his position on a platform designed to bring the GSU into the 1960s. He wants the GSU to discuss and act on relevant social and education issues. In the past it has been closer in character to a high school student council, running dances, card parties, teas and lectures.

There is a place for that kind of activity, of course. But when that's all a student government does, it is not realizing its potential.

Acting on the students' behalf to confront current problems head on would seem to us a necessary part of a student union's job. Yet, in the past few years, we understand, the GSU has been subordinating itself to Ernest Sirluk, head of the graduate school.

In other circles, that sort of subordination has developed the term Uncle Tomism. So, this year, Bradford went ahead — he hired an educational consultant, Eric Antilla, who advises the Company of Young Canadians and has been working with Rockdale College.

Bradford was criticized for that move with the issue of expense. Antilla is being paid a $7,000 salary and allowed a $2,000 expense budget. This totals more than half the GSU's annual budget.

Bradford bought a mimeograph machine, to foster better communications among graduate students, but was criticized again for the expense. He also faced general criticism that he wasn't communicating with the student body enough.

Bradford's executive also donated $250 to a bail fund for Yorkville hippies and $225.25 to a draft-dodger assistance program run by draft-dodgers out of the SUPA office on Spadina. These expenses were criticized by people who don't like draft-dodgers, SUPA or hippies.

That Bradford's policies were vindicated in a 78-56 vote is good news. That a sizeable group of students are opposed to his conception of the GSU as a body wielding political power is not.

Bradford, as we see him, is somewhat politically naive, but his naivete is of that kind found among many New Leftists. It has no relation to the realism espoused by the compromise-hardened politician.

Bradford seems to work by consensus not compromise. You talk out all the problems until you reach agreement—you don't give in your principles to the timid.

His knowledge or respect for parliamentary procedure is small, but this again is because of his idealism. Parliamentary procedure, after all, can look pretty absurd in action.

Bradford isn't concerned with these things because he's out to lead the GSU out of its timidity. He's not worried about its image, as those slick types in the little grey building in front of Hart House are.

He's more worried about having a clear conscience than making it look clear to all his constituents. Friction usually develops with that kind of operating procedure, but it's one way of working. It puts the onus on the students to go and find out for themselves what he's doing.

At the meeting Friday, some strong resentment was voiced by some students against the type of education they get at this university, the treatment they get from the graduate faculty, and their own role in the education process.

It seems that Bradford's style of radicalism has a place in GSU. He might try to be a bit more diplomatic, but if that's not his way of operating, that is fine too — as long as he keeps operating.

support the viet cong?

Today, three students from the Student Union for the Liberation of South Vietnam (a part of the National Liberation Front — or, if you insist, Viet Cong) are speaking to Laval students in Quebec City. Last week, they spoke to Sir George Williams and McGill students, and, in closed sessions, to members of Quebec left-wing groups, and Montreal professors who signed a petition against the war.

Their reception has been mixed. Small groups of supporters of American policy of Sir George and McGill tried with varying success to shout them down. (Witnesses of both meetings claim that press reports of the reaction at Sir George were exaggerated).

The majority of the eight hundred-odd students who packed a hall at McGill to hear them listened quietly — with what seems to have been rather ambivalent sympathy.

Over the weekend, one of the Vietnamese asked a Canadian student why, despite the official statement of welcome, so few people had expressed an outright feeling of sympathy or hostility to the NLF cause.

Like that particular student, we found the question an awkward one. For all our opposition to the war, the NLF perturbs most of us. We don't know what to think of it. For all our contempt of TIME magazine, of the G.I.'s term of "Charlie," or "Gook," the spectre of terrorism, Communism and The Yellow Peril springs to the backs of most of our minds when TIME has a yellow, slant-eyed, crafty-looking figure on the cover for a lead story on "the Viet Cong."

More specifically, however, the emotional commitment required for us, as Canadians, to be "against the war" is very different from that of being solidly for the NLF.

A Canadian who is "against the war" means emotionally, we suspect that if he were an American, we would not fight in Vietnam. For him to be solidly for the NLF, would similarly imply that he would be prepared to fight against the Americans.

Few of us, we suspect, are so emotionally detached from the Americans that we'd do this. Few of us, when thinking soberly, would seriously consider burning ourselves, as Norman Morrison did, to express our revulsion and disgust at what the Americans are doing in Vietnam.

Wisely, the Vietnamese students did not even imply this kind of commitment from Canadians, let alone demand it. In fact, they expressed faith in the progressive and humanitarian tradition in America to reverse the policy of the present Administration.

This may have been mere oratory; many of those listening to them did not have the same kind of faith in the power of the American humanitarian tradition.

In fact the Vietnamese students remind us more of fighters of the French Resistance movement than of orators, ideologists or terrorists. The comparison between the Ky government and the Vichy government is, of course, not an exact one; perhaps a better one exists between the NLF in Vietnam and Algeria before Independence.

As in Algeria, there is terrorism on both sides; there is no absolute good opposing absolute evil. The fact remains that there is American aggression, as there was French oppression.

We can only hope that the Vietnamese faith in American humanitarianism is justified, and that the solution to the Vietnam war will be similar to the solution in Algeria.

Despite our hesitation in committing our emotional support to everything the NLF may want, or may have done, there can be no question of whose side we are on.

seems not so good. But let us not fight. A spirit of rebellion breaks down the platform of sincere communication.
P. Jonker (UC)

benches

Why can't SAC use some of our money to put up benches at strategic points on the campus? During the fall and spring, when the weather is balmy, many students would like to escape the confines of the libraries and common rooms, and sit outside to talk and eat, or just read and rest.

The grassy areas outside the Sidney Smith Hall, near UC's flower beds, and south of Hart House are just a few of the many locations around this campus which are ideal for bench-supported loitering.

Perhaps the SAC financiers could even figure out a scheme whereby advertising revenue might be extracted from the backs of these benches.

So how about it, Faulkner et al? Give us some good, unsophisticated fresh air!

rebellion

Sir:

It is discouraging to see the prevalence of a rebellious spirit in our university atmosphere. I refer, as an example, to the write-up in Friday's Varsity entitled, "The Macpherson Report: what's there and what's not." Throughout the presentation the author takes the stand of an 'opposition party'. In this rebellious spirit he reads treachery into the various recommendations of the report, and furthermore lays this treachery or this subtle deceit on Prof. Macpherson's back. Although I would not like to see Prof. Macpherson drop his concern for the student problems (for the report is, after all, stimulated by the students) yet he would not be entirely unjustified if he did so. Is this a token of thanks? To think suspiciously about those who devote their time and effort to our benefit? It is more like a slap in the face. Let us approach this report from another angle. Let us look for that which is good. Let us discuss that which

What will happen to it?

With this article, Varsity Executive Editor Paul Carson begins a special series analysing the recommendations contained in the Macpherson Report and estimating their chances of implementation.

By PAUL CARSON

In many respects, the current status of the Macpherson report clearly resembles that of a typical report of any typical royal commission.

The long-awaited and slightly overdue report on conditions in the faculty of arts has been released with all attendant fanfare by the university administration (albeit a few days earlier than planned).

The news media have collected numerous predictable opinions on the report from people in authority; the report receives the usual platitudes spiced with a few mild criticisms.

But what happens next? Will the Macpherson report suffer the fate of so many Royal Commissions? Will it be discussed and studied and studied and filed and forgotten?

Discussing the report in his opening address, Acting President J. H. Sword commented, "This important document deserves widespread discussion, and it is intended to provide that opportunity before machinery for implementing any of its recommendations is established."

TO BE BURIED?

Some observers wise in the intriguing ways of the administration have interpreted this sentence as an indication that Simcoe Hall intends to talk the report to death, then quietly bury it in the files.

However, it's apparent that the Macpherson report is very much alive and will continue to remain so.

University president Claude Bissell is already on record as being "generally in sympathy" with most of the report's 98 so-called "radical" recommendations.

Obviously, the university administration can do nothing official with the report until President Bissell returns from Harvard next summer.

Consequently, little or no action can be expected at present on the major recommendations dealing with the proposed new degrees, the exam-free second year and the restructuring of honor and general courses.

However, Bissell's absence does not imply that the entire report is to be put in cold storage until his return.

ALREADY STARTED

The university administration has already instructed every Arts department to make a thorough study of the report and unofficially implement many of its recommendations on the departmental level.

As a result, students can expect improvements in lectures, in more effective tutorials, in more available options, in more course surveys, and in greater student-staff consultations at the departmental level.

These changes may be realized this year and most certainly will be in effect by next September.

Some of the larger departments anticipated the report and have already instituted some of Macpherson's recommendations.

The physics department has given its students a voice in determining course content in many subjects.

The history department has drastically increased the number of available options and instituted a program of faculty advisors for second and third year students.

The political economy department, Professor Macpherson's base of operations, has sectioned its most populous first year courses among several of the federated colleges and has a well-organized system of student-staff consultation.

FACULTY MEETING

As the faculty of arts Council met on Monday, it's even possible that the recommendation for student representatives on the Council may already be a fait accompli.

The university appears to have chosen this method of unofficial implementation at the departmental level for two main reasons.

First, the improvements, if instituted, will be chosen by the departments concerned and not imposed from above.

Second, the university administration will not be immediately placed in the position of issuing official and public declarations reversing existing university policies.

The university wants to implement most of Macpherson's recommendations prudently and privately.

The last thing Simcoe Hall wants is a series of public admissions that some existing policies, which it approved, are inadequate.

Keep the dissent within the family.

It is likely that no extensive changes will result from Macpherson's strong recommendations for the realignment of the college system.

THE COLLEGES

Macpherson's personal hostility towards the federated colleges has long been known in faculty circles.

Accordingly, college officials, while no doubt angered, were not especially surprised by his recommendations for the abolishment of college teaching departments as such.

The Macpherson report reflects the attitude of some university administrators who are openly jealous of the freedom enjoyed by the federated colleges.

On their part, the colleges have made it quite clear that they have no intention of surrendering their control over college faculties and the structure of college courses.

Victoria Principal Rev. A. B. B. Moore has insisted the religious knowledge option be continued.

Some college officials suggest that Macpherson's recommendations stem more from his own prejudices than a detailed examination of the operation of the college system.

One St. Michael's professor thought it amusing that Macpherson wants to transfer control of college teaching staffs to the Simcoe Hall administrators "in the interests of efficiency" when Simcoe Hall is widely regarded as "the most inefficient administration in the entire university."

THE LIBRARY

Changes in the operation of the Library will depend on the attitude of Chief Librarian R. H. Blackburn.

In the past, Blackburn has suggested that the students' role in the library is to study, not to oversee his policies.

Macpherson recommends an investigation into the possibility of student discounts on all books sold by the University Bookstore.

This depends on the decisions of the Board of Governors, and in any case, spokesmen for the bookstore have stated repeatedly that complete discounts are impossible at the present time.

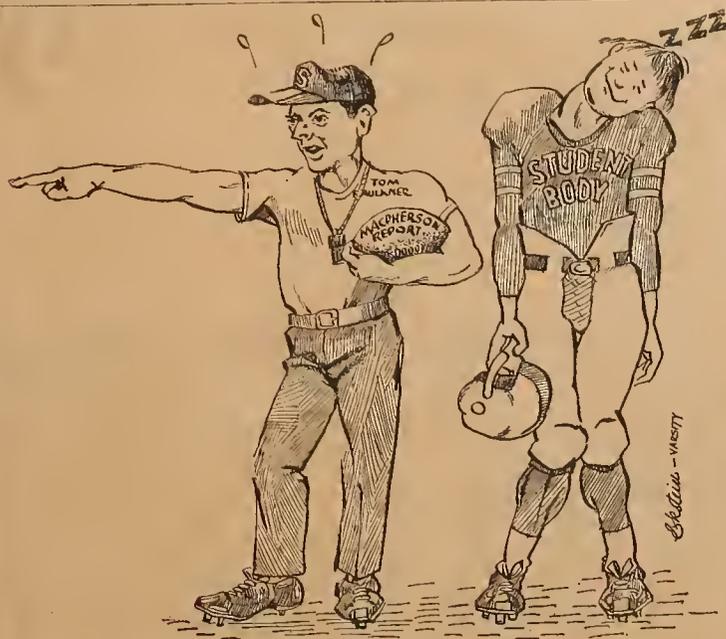

In summary, students can expect little official action this year, but many recommendations may be implemented on the departmental level.

Top-level committees will be formed next summer and major changes may be in the works for September 1970, or more likely, 1971.

The fundamental realignment of the college system proposed in the report will not occur.

Of course, a vigorous program of organized student pressure could significantly affect the timetable envisioned by the university administration.

Funds needed for computing facilities

A computer lag could "seriously jeopardize Canada's future," three University of Toronto professors have warned.

"There can be no doubt that Canada will fall far behind in many fields of research unless there is a massive injection of funds for university computing facilities in the years immediately ahead," they say in a special brief to the Science Council of Canada released yesterday.

Authors of the report are Dr. Arthur Porter, head of the department of industrial engineering, Dr. D. G. Hartle of the department of political economy and the institute for the quantitative analysis of social and economic policy; and Dr. T. E. Hull, professor of mathematics and of computer science.

The group says "the best and the richest" universities in the U.S. are now spending $60 an undergraduate and $350 a graduate student.

The corresponding figures for Canadian universities are $12 and $130, they say.

Computing facilities in Canadian universities now cost $9,000,000 a year, the report says.

"Conservative estimates suggest that in seven years this amount should rise to about $68,000,000 a year."

But, "additional financing of university computing facilities on an unprecedented scale is required.

"Canada occupies a unique position in the computer world, because of her pioneering contribution to computer technology and science. It is well recognized that the early promise of excellence in the computer field has been maintained.

"It is essential that Canada capitalize on this asset. Failure to do so will seriously jeopardize her future."

The report recommends: —a substantial increase in government assistance to help meet the immediate problem;

—a study of the future computing requirements of Canadian universities by the Science Council, and another study for Canada as a whole;

—financial support for summer institutes or workshops for faculty and graduate students in Canadian universities.

"The benefits accruing would be out of all proportion to the costs," the report says.

Who will win new Triple Crown award?

KINGSTON (CUP) — A rather dubious students award plan won acceptance unanimously at last weekend's Ontario Union of students conference here.

The awards will be given annually by the OUS executive to prospective recipients, who will be three of the pro-vince's "post-secondary" institutions. The prizes are:

—the Vincent W. Bladen Memorial award for the highest tuition fee in Ontario;

—the Col. B.D. Weldon Memorial award for the largest number of corporations represented on the board of governors or equivalent body;

—the Conrad Hilton Memorial award for the highest residence fee in Ontario.

The University of Toronto delegation which proposed the resolutions, urged their acceptance as soon as possible as they wanted "to take a swing at the triple crown."

When asked what the award was to be, John Burgess, chairman, replied, "a free ticket to the CUS congress, or something of equal value."

NDP candidate calls POSAP chicanery

The Province of Ontario Student Aid Plan is "political expediency and chicanery," says Adam Fuerstenberg, NDP candidate in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding.

Mr. Fuerstenberg told campaign workers last weekend free education is the only answer. POSAP sidesteps the financial needs of students, burdens them with debt and does not encourage further education.

Student agitation at the University of Western Ontario and other institutions is welcomed by the NDP as a sign that students want greater participatory democracy, Fuerstenberg said.

He called for increased student and faculty voice on boards of governors to break what he said was the traditional hold of the corporate elite.

Gospel: festival focus

The Gospel According to St. Matthew, a feature-length film, will highlight the pre-Teach-In film festival.

Admission is free to three other features and four short films, to be held from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. Oct 10-13 in East Hall, University College.

Productions of Waiting For Godot, by Samuel Beckett; Gideon, by Paddy Chayefsky, and Endor, by Howard Nemerov, constitute the Teach-In drama festival.

Admission to Gideon is 25 cents for students, at the Central Library Theatre, 8 p.m. Oct. 10, 11, 12 and 14. Waiting For Godot, in Cartwright Hall, and Endor, in Brennan Hall, are both free.

Emotions flare over election issues

KINGSTON (CUP)—Emotions flared at last week-end's meeting of the Ontario Union of Students over student awareness of the candidates and issues in the forthcoming provincial election.

Members argued the merits of a "negative" approach, presented by York and Carleton Universities' representatives. They proposed to "indicate dissatisfaction with recent Ontario party politics."

This and another resolution, which derided "the demeaning attitude of candidates" to the electorate, drew varied criticisms.

Terry Sulyma, former member, of the CUS secretariat said it was time for "action now." He suggested using leaflets to make the public aware of the "kind of garbage the politicians are talking."

Delegates from York University disagreed with his approach. In a directive to help make students more aware, they outlined how to set up meetings with candidates and how to prepare and respond to a hostile audience.

The meeting discussed the Union's support of a candidate representing a student-oriented stand. Don Posluns of McMaster University thought the only party to support was the NDP, but Colin McKinnon of Ottawa disagreed, saying the party was doomed to failure and would lessen the chance of communication with the new government.

The only part of the resolution receiving majority approval was the document Mr. Politician—Tell Me Please, which contained the responses of leading candidates to student questions.

McGill may restructure government

MONTREAL (Special)—A committee report demanding wholesale restructuring of the McGill University government, has been laid before the McGill students council.

It asks the council to note that existing structures are "paternalistic and undemocratic," condemns the "evasion of the basic issues by the University government," and demands administration action to democratize these structures.

The report contained these policy motions:

- representatives on the Board of Governors of the "different influential socio-economic groups" that the University serves;
- officially bilingual board meetings with simultaneous translation;
- open meetings of legislative decision-making bodies and reasons given for in-camera meetings;
- direct students council appointment of "any and all" student representatives on these bodies.

Students form "dump Johnson" groups

WASHINGTON (CUP-CPS)—There is no national student "dump Johnson" movement at the present time, despite the fact that hundreds of college student presidents and editors signed anti-Johnson petitions this summer.

The group most likely to form such a movement is the Alternative Candidate Taskforce, known as ACT '68. It got its start at last month's National Student Association Congress, when 500 delegates signed an anti-LBJ petition. It was hoped that the effort would become a national campaign.

Sam Brown, leader of ACT '68, says that his group is not a national movement.

"We have decided that the shape action will take has to be determined in the individual states," says Brown.

First year pilot project at UBC

VANCOUVER (VNS) — University of British Columbia faculty members Father Gerald McGuigan and Dr. Ian Ross are leading a new first-year course, designed to avoid fragmentation of knowledge, combat alienation and give students greater individual freedom.

The pilot project, with an enrolment of 243, runs for three years. Students and faculty members volunteer for each session of the program.

Students are placed in groups of 25 under the guidance of six faculty members. Dr. Ross said each student "will be called on to collect and assess information, develop ideas and arguments and foster the powers of his imagination."

U of T security net traps lab-coated thieves, earrings and piles of books

Since January of this year, over $8,000 in cash and articles—equipment, coats, radios, typewriters — has disappeared from the U of T campus via 112 thefts.

"Ninety-nine per cent of this loss is attributable to just plain negligence," says Mr. Thomas Lawson, U of T's Assistant Safety and Security Officer.

The red-moustached security chief, in an exclusive Varsity interview, emphasized that the campus is "plagued with itinerants who lift things.

"It isn't hard to dress like a student," he added. "There are people walking around here in lab coats with stethoscopes hanging out of their pockets, and others with brooms, making like cleaners, who have nothing whatever to do with the university."

When students and staff are a little careless, these people pounce.

"Hart House is a prime example," said Lawson. "Fellows go in for a little relaxation, and leave their coats hanging around with wallets in the pockets. When they come back, the wallets are gone. The same thing happens outside lecture halls."

Some people, he said, lose even their coats that way. Others walk into washrooms to wash, and then leave the watches behind them. He spoke of an American who was attending a symposium here a few weeks ago and who did that very thing. This time, the watch was a $500 Omega, but fortunately, a caretaker was the first person to spot it, and the watch and its owner were reunited. The story could easily have had a different ending.

UNIVERSITY NOT IMMUNE

"People think," said Lawson, "that just because this is a university, we're somehow immune to theft. That's just not so."

Secretaries go off for coffee-breaks, and leave their offices wide open, with purses on the desks. Students working in laboratories take a break, and leave valuable equipment unguarded.

Residence students go home on weekends and leave their windows open. "In some cases," said the security head, "they leave the doors open. They return to find their typewriters, tape recorders and personal possessions missing."

One one wall of Lawson's tenth-floor office is a big map of the university, with pins marking the locations of all of this year's thefts. There are big clusters of pins at Sidney Smith Hall, Devonshire House, and the chemistry building. Other smaller clusters mark the MacLennan Lab Building, the Electrical and Mechanical Building, and the Edward Johnson Building.

The same method is used to pinpoint a theft's time of day and day of the week. 11 a.m. to noon, and 2 to 4 p.m. are the most popular hours for the thieves. And, curiously, "Thursday's a very happy day for crime."

Just last week, a man was apprehended while helping himself to the contents of an unguarded cash register in the Lash Miller building. He subsequently admitted to 16 wallet thefts. And the night before the interview, a microscope was reported stolen from the Pharmacy building. Thieves had already made off with eight other microscopes from the Botany building earlier.

SERIAL NUMBERS IMPORTANT

Lawson urged U of T personnel—students and staff — to keep the serial numbers of their typewriters, microscopes, cameras, etc. in a safe place. "It's incredible how these things pop up," he said. Some turn up in city pawn-shops; one Erindale college typewriter was discovered in Montreal.

Lawson told of a "minister" who was picked up "by sheer fluke" in Montreal. The reverend had some Devonshire House books in his possession, as well as a key to the place.

The security chief, who learned his trade in the British colonial service in Africa and India, produced an identification card similar to the U of T library cards. He said that every employee of the Physical Plant Department has an ID card like it, producible on demand at any time while the employee is in the building. Each card has an individual number, and no two cards with the same number are ever issued.

"This way," said Lawson, "if someone sees a suspicious-looking character walking around with a pipe over his shoulder, he can quickly verify the stranger's right to be there."

At present, the wheels are in motion to see that every member of the university staff has a card like this.

BOOKS, BOOKS, BOOKS

During the interview, Lawson pointed to three hardcover textbooks which had been found and turned in to his office. They were all in good condition, and had list prices totalling about $20.

"In the police office, we have nearly a thousand more," he said. "It's getting to seem like we're in competition with the library. We also have briefcases, umbrellas by the hundred, galoshes, rings, earrings, rain-coats — you name it, we've got it.

"We pick up 25 to 30 books a week, yet no one ever reports a stolen book. One guy had his name in the book. We called his place three or four times and left a message. He never showed.

"We kept one set of five excellent Astronomy books for 18 months. Finally we gave them to Dr. MacRae for his library. We never get any claimants for these things."

He said that students who lose their books or other valuables should go to the police lost-and-found in the Borden Building at 563 Spadina and report the loss. "It's cluttering the place up," he cried desperately.

Valuables are handed over to Metro police for safe keeping, and Lawson pointed out that the finder of any unclaimed valuable is entitled to a sizeable percentage of the receipt when the item is sold at a public auction.

As for book stealing, none has been reported this fall by the Bookstore, though there was quite a bit of it when summer school opened. Lawson has given up on the library: "There's not much we can do; the numbers are too great."

There have been no night break-ins on campus this year. Burglar alarms are in use where valuable equipment is installed. Scarborough College, too, is "very quiet. It's one building, and much easier to control. Here, some buildings have six entrances."

OTHER CRIME

Last year, an unknown person who had access to the names of students receiving grants phoned some of them, asking for the number of their grant and the bank they were using. Some foolish ones gave him the information, and he was able to draw substantial sums of money from a couple of accounts. He was nearly caught at a bank counter, but managed to escape in time.

Last winter, too, a girl was attacked on St. George St. as she was walking home to Whitney Hall. Her handbag was ripped from her hand, but a suspect was nabbed near Bloor St. The U of T police increased the numbers on their evening shift after that.

Lawson acknowledged that the campus is "not terribly well lit" at night, but pointed out that there is no necessity for women to walk home alone. "They can walk in pairs or in groups," he said.

He said also that there have been some cases of indecent exposure near women's residences, but that policing here is hampered by the girls' reluctance to report.

He returned to the more prevalent campus crime, theft: "We're fortunate, really, in that we don't lose more.

"And we wouldn't even lose as much as we do if people—students and staff—would just look after their personal possessions."

BLUES DEFEND DEFOE

McMaster here for crucial season opener

McMaster Marauders invade the back campus this afternoon at 5 o'clock for a soccer match that can already be called crucial. For the past three years Marauders have finished as runners-up to Blues—a situation they would dearly love to remedy.

Varsity have always had their problems against Mac, but they have usually managed to tie or eke out a slim victory. Blues' good fortune, however, can't go on forever, and unless they produce up to their ability against Mac, they could get themselves in trouble.

Losing this opener would put Varsity in a hole. McMaster is sure to beat Western and Guelph, and Waterloo is an unknown force, being a first year member of the league. Blues could end up in the unenviable position of going to Hamilton in November having to win by a wide margin to retain possession of the Bill Dafoe trophy.

But that is looking too far ahead. Let's look at this afternoon.

Blues will field essentially the same team that defeated Scarborough on Saturday. Also, they will have their rookies John Gero and Jim Laverty playing for and not against them. The lineup offers no obvious weaknesses and, indeed, coach Glass has had troubles deciding which eleven to start.

So, on paper, Blues should be considered favourites, not only to win this afternoon's game, but also to win the league championship. And yet, having the better team on paper means nothing, as Chicago and Montreal found out in last year's Stanley Cup playoffs. Heart and desire won. You have been warned, Blues!

Korner Kicks

Blues have an impressive total of 25 years of intercollegiate experience among them, more than likely a high in the league.

Rugger teams win and tie in Michigan

Varsity's rugger firsts whipped the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor 9-3 on Saturday. Blues were led by the fine kicking of Bill Kyle who notched two field goals and the equally splendid footwork of Andy Gibson.

Gibson booted a running drop kick from thirty yards in front of the Wolverines' goal. Such a feat is comparable to a home-run in baseball.

Despite their long bus trip Blues dominated most of the play in the first and second halves. They built up a 9-0 lead before Michigan recovered their poise and counted their only score, a field goal. Blues might have widened their margin but for the tiring bus trip. They lost momentum late in the last half to permit Michigan to get on the scoreboard.

The Toronto-Michigan affair had been an annual event except for the past two years. Previous matches have always been marked by tough tackling and rusbust passing.

This year Toronto benefited in the scrum from their excellent hooking. With this win behind their backs Varsity should gain new confidence in their quest for the Turner Trophy, currently held by the University of Western Ontario. Observers were particularly impressed by the tackling of Paul Henry. This along with Gibson's and Kyle's kicking should provide a strong basis for this year's side.

In other action at Ann Arbor, Varsity seconds tied Michigan seconds 3-3. Bobby Noble supplied an unconverted try to gain the deadlock.

This season Toronto will enter two teams into intercollegiate competition. In the West Division, Toronto meets York, McMaster, Western, and Guelph. The season begins today at York.

The firsts will compete in the East Division against RMC, McGill and Queens. First game is here on Saturday against McGill Redmen.

Zimmerman wins marathon

The steady tennis of Mike Zimmerman finally brought him a long-sought victory in the interfac finals yesterday afternoon. Perennial bridesmaid Zimmerman needed all his resources, however, in a three hour Donnybrook with Paul Kent, finally triumphing 4-6, 4-6, 6-3, 7-5, 6-0.

Kent's impressive net game had his opponent off balance for the first two sets, but with the score 3-2 in the third, Zimmerman began to prevail and took the set 6-3.

Kent made what proved to be his last stand in the fourth set, surging to leads of 2-0 and 4-2 before Zimmerman once again resumed control and slipped past his adversary 7-5.

The pace of the match took its toll in the fifth set, as the weary Kent's game fell apart completely. It was strictly no contest with the still-fresh Zimmerman winning 6-0 to take his first net title.

Zimmerman qualified for the final by defeating unseeded Rudy Knobloch 8-6, 6-1, while Kent squeaked by sixth seed Frank Blyth 7-5, 7-5.

Quarter-final action saw Blyth over third seed Tom Burecky 2-6, 6-0, 6-3, and Knobloch over fourth seed Don Steele. Paul Kent took Les Primer 6-1, 6-2, and Mike Zimmerman defeated Harvey Derrington handily 6-2, 6-2.

This year's Varsity tennis team will be made up of the two finalists, plus two others selected through the challenge matches also held yesterday. Frank Blyth beat Don Steele to take one berth on the team, while the fourth position will be filled from among Rudy Knobloch, Tom Borecky and Harvey Derrington.

VOLLEYBALL ROUND ROBIN TOURNAMENT - Wed. Oct. 11: 5:00 to 7:00 p.m. For teams wishing to try out for the Interfaculty League.

Buchanan wins

New arrival Don Buchanan (SGS) almost lost the interfac golf crown by arriving late for his match at the Oakdale Golf and Country Club. Hastily joining his party on the links the former member of the Royal and Ancient at St. Andrew's Scotland, went on to record a 36 hole score of 153, to take number one spot on the Varsity team. Other members of the team are Brian Houston (PHE) who recorded a 156, George Scott (Vic), with a 158 and Rick Luscombe (Eng), 159.

Murphy worries about McGill Redmen

Varsity Blues continue to provoke the smile of 'Lady Luck' this season, as they have yet to suffer a serious injury. Only halfback John Gordon with a pinched nerve, and impressive rookie lineman Larry Lukas with a badly bruised hip failed to survive the Western game in healthy condition. Neither are expected to miss more than a game, if that.

Despite the prospect of an easy victory in the home opener against McGill Redmen, coach Ron Murphy is not completely wreathed in smiles. He remembers too well what happened last year.

Although they scored two relatively relaxing victories on the scoreboard, Blues were mauled physically by the well-conditioned Redmen. All their momentum was knocked out, and they squeaked home only a shadow of the team that began the season by whalloping Queen's and Western.

Redmen coach, Tom Mooney, is a stickler on toughness and conditioning. His team may lose, but the opposition usually feel the pangs of combat for some time afterward.

"They'll be a tough ciub," warns Murphy. "They're quite capable of leaving a few bruises behind them."

Although they may be tough, Redmen certainly aren't dangerous. Last year, their offense was weak; this year it is worse, with all-stars Pete Howlett and Al Schriber missing plus quarterback Robin McNeil. On Saturday, McGill dropped a 7-2 decision to lowly St. Mary's College.

Murphy was pleased with Blues' second half showing against Western, crediting it to halftime adjustments, and mainly to the simple fact "they got angry." The offensive line, led by Arnie Carefoote and Don Rogers, became crisp with their blocking for the first time this season, and backs, Mike Raham and Wolfgang Gut, began to eat up the yardage. Blues ended with 175 yards rushing.

Blues' starting lineup will not be announced until Thursday night. Meanwhile says Murphy, "I think we need improvement in all departments. Our defense was good Saturday but it still allowed too many yards along the ground."

BLUENOTES: Glen Markie is still limping from a nagging ankle injury.

rod mickleburgh

The following 'piece-de-resistance' was received by my humble self in mysterious circumstances which I dare not reveal on pain of Cards losing in four straight.

Hockey? What about baseball? This is the question that is gnawing into my red-blooded American guts. My heart aches for a fist-swinging, purple-veined semi-melee over the basic questions of human reality. Was Sandy Koufax the greatest pitcher of all time? Are the Cincinnati Reds a communist front organization? Was Babe Ruth really a sissy?

Oh — I know you have a real live farm club here in Toronto — but — baseball isn't number one here. In fact, a very reliable Armenian gypsy gave me the inside scoop. As far as popularity in Canada goes, baseball is tied for 133rd place with submarine race watching in the back seats of Volkswagens.

I've yet to meet a real baseball fan; someone who is having surgery done on his larynx so he can sound like Casey Stengel, has tattooed the blueprint of Yankee Stadium deeply into his chest (covering his ex-girl's name), and has traded his kid sister for an autographed picture of Stan Musial's barber.

Now — don't say I'm just a bigoted Yank who knows baseball and nothing else. I'm a hockey fan too. I even heard about Montreal winning the Stanfield Cup in your World Series. And I even know about your great Toronto scorer — Benny Hull — or is it Hall? Americans are not totally ignorant of hockey. If you look carefully enough into the sports sections of our newspapers you can find NHL scores: 4-2, 1-0, 3-1, although they don't always mention the team that played.

Who understands my plight? Do we have enough baseball nuts to start an underground? I'll be walking around town in a uniform I stripped off the St. Louis Cardinal bat-boy during a mild riot at an exhibition game. Just plant your feet and swing an imaginary bat into the smog-filled air. I'll take that as a sign you're interested in joining — or else that you need psychiatric care. In either case, you're the man I'm looking for.

Well — I have to break off now. The Mets are playing a big game in their battle to capture last place. It all starts in two hours and I want to make sure my radio is warmed up.

Dennis Chorioma

Well now, that's a right fine thing, Dennis m'boy, belongs in Cooperstown, I'd say. Sorta seems appropriate too, what with St. Louis and the no-way Bosox fencing off in today's inaugural of baseball's autumn classic. (As a card-carrying member of the Cliche Club of Canada and a unanimous choice for its illustrious Hall of Hackney, the phrase 'W-r-d S-r-i-s' must never trimmer from my lips nor dribble from my pen. Forever and forever, amen, it shall be deeply intoned "autumn classic".)

As it happens, I'm a baseball bug from way back. Ever since Podres and the loveable Bums murdered the proud Yankees in '55 I've watched games, accumulated stats, played pepper, and carried out faithfully all the further fanaticisms of a true fool follower. I even wrote to Harmon Killebrew, and participated in APBA. (By the way, first person to tell me what APBA is will receive a pair of ducats gratis to the McGill game.)

So while it may not be part of the Varsity beat, (anyway the Review writes reams of rhetoric on off-campus topics, why not the sportsies?) I'd like to take the opportunity to call Cardinals in the 'autumn classic' in five games. Anyone wishing to argue, please call Wednesday or Thursday night. But not during the afternoon. Once the game starts, my body methodically manufactures an immense "Do Not Disturb" sign which is rigidly enforced to the point of insanity. Go away, you here.

Tight track meet shapes up

By RICH PYNE

After fairly even showings by several schools at the McMaster Invitational track meet, the only means left by which to forecast the outcome of the upcoming OQAA meeting is a good old ouijé board.

Blues picked up three firsts, one on the track and two on the field as John Loaring coasted to victory in a 4:22 mile, Gord Homer lobbied around pretty hard by Blues. Only along the ground did they show any ability at all, and Blues cut that off in the second half as there was no threat through the air to take the pressure off the rushing game.

Both Queen's and Blues will probably move the ball at will against Stangs game but inexperienced defense.

Western should have enough to edge out McGill for third place, but that's as high as they can hope to go. Next year, when the horde of rookies have had a year under their belt, Western will be tough.

(This is the second of a four-part series.)

Field was third in the mile with 4:33 while defending OQAA champion Bill Watts hurled the javelin a fourth place 174'.

Elsewhere on the track Waterloo's Pan-Am member Bob Finlay eased to victory with a 14:14 three mile.

In the half-mile Queen's Dave Ellis had no trouble winning in 1:57.

Varsity's only other competitors were a pair of high jumpers, Brian Penney and John Hilliard who both made it over 5'8" for a fifth place finish.

PIGSKIN PREVIEW

WESTERN MUSTANGS

Mustangs face tough rebuilding job

By ROD MICKLEBURGH
Varsity Sports Editor

TEAM NAME: University of Western Ontario Mustangs.
COLORS: Purple and White
HEAD COACH: John P. Metras
ASSISTANT COACHES: Jerry Gosner, Garry Smith
HOME FIELD: J. W. Little Memorial Stadium, London, Ontario.
SEATING CAPACITY: 10,000
1966 SIFL RECORD: 2 victories, 4 defeats (3rd place).

1966 REVIEW

Western Mustangs headed into the 1966 season determined to wreak revenge on University of Toronto Blues for marring their first place finish the year before. Mustangs had finished first with a 5-1 record but their one loss was to Blues, forcing a playoff for the Yates Cup which Varsity won 21-16.

But Stangs late season lapse of the year before seemed to continue throughout 1966. They moved into Toronto for the league opener steeped with the scent of (exhibition) victory. They left bearing the ignominious aroma of humiliation, losing to Blues 45-7.

Munificent McGill Redmen kindly donated the next game to the stumbling Stangs, 24-8, but Queen's came the following week to sch crunch the Western waffle 24-9. And the return match at Kingston was simply no contest as Gaels rolled and rolled over Metras' dispirited horsemen until the game ended at 33-0.

Western salvaged some satisfaction in their next two games. But overall, Mustangs' performance was a definite disappointment to their old mentor, John Metras.

1967 PREVIEW

It's a rebuilding year for coach Metras. Gone from Western are no less than 21 lettermen. Affected most is the offensive backfield where only quarterback Bob Israel remains. Metras is faced with replacing such illustrious ball players as fullback Dave Garland, half-back Robbie Campbell, Art Froese, and Larry Burridge.

Last Saturday against Blues, he seemed to have an adequate replacement in rookie fullback Dave Farmer, but there didn't seem to be anyone else of note. Despite Metras' protestations, passing seems to be the main weakness in the attack. Israel has yet to show competence through the air, and a weak offensive line affords him little protection.

Also gone to Mac is defensive halfback Vern Lucyk who specialized in kickoff and punt returns, always a Metras team strong point. In fact, Western will probably threaten more this year running back kicks than from the line of scrimmage.

Defensively the club appears porous especially on pass defense. All-star lineman John Tasker has graduated along with Lucyk, Dave Oswald, and Robin Wearing in the defensive backfield, and linemen Doug Mitchell, Mike Armstrong and Bill Brodbrooke.

Dennis Walker is back as the team's punter while veteran Colosimo takes over the field goal and convert chores from Froese and Mitchell.

OUTLOOK

With very few experienced football players on his team this year, Coach Metras can hope for nothing better than a third place finish. In Saturday's exhibition game, Mustangs were knocked around pretty hard by Blues. Only along the ground did they show any ability at all, and Blues cut that off in the second half as there was no threat through the air to take the pressure off the rushing game.

Both Queen's and Blues will probably move the ball at will against Stangs game but inexperienced defense.

Western should have enough to edge out McGill for third place, but that's as high as they can hope to go. Next year, when the horde of rookies have had a year under their belt, Western will be tough.

Student power approved by Arts faculty council

By VOLKMAR RICHTER

Students are to be given a say in the decision of the arts and science faculty.

This was approved in principle at a closed meeting of the arts faculty council Monday and confirmed by arts Dean A. D. Allen yesterday.

The matter has been referred to another committee for further study, but Dean Allen hopes for some concrete action next month.

He stressed the council's move was not directly related to recommendations in the Macpherson committee's report, which called for direct student participation and membership on the council.

Under the accepted principle, students are to be invited as members on the faculty's six course clubs: general arts, general science, humanities, social, physical and life Sciences.

These committees are about half-way up the power structure in the faculty but Assistant Dean W. T. Foulds pointed out membership there gives students real power in the structure.

"I think I have to be frank with you, and say the further on you go the less likely it is that recommendations are turned down," he said.

"The most important decisions on course content are made at the departmental level. The departments' recommendations are then passed on to these committees."

The committees' recommendations then pass on to the council's undergraduate studies committee, which includes representatives of all departments and acts as the council's executive.

Final approval has to be gained in a meeting of the council, which has a membership of 855—all arts faculty members of professorial rank.

Its meetings are secret but indications are that the proposal to invite students as members on the committees passed with no objections.

A sub-committee of the undergraduate studies committee is to be formed to study the proposal and make recommendations on what type of membership students should have—observers, ex officio members or full voting members.

Dean Allen is to appoint this committee. He hopes it will make its report at the next council meeting. These meetings are scheduled on the Monday preceding the first Friday of every month.

"Dean Allen wrote to all departments last spring asking them to be prepared for this kind of thing," Mr. Foulds said. "And I suppose it would be fair to say it is because of the climate generated by representations to the Macpherson commission.

"But the report has not been discussed yet," he said.

The Macpherson report, released last week, recommended that directly-elected student representatives should be made full members of the council of the faculty of arts and science and most of its committees."

SAC birth-control efforts opposed

By SHERRY BRYDSON

An attempt by members of the Students Administrative Council to distribute birth control literature in campus residences has met with official opposition this week.

SAC last week voted support for efforts to distribute contraceptive information on the campus.

SAC member Laurel Limpus (SGS) said she had been officially requested not to hold meetings in a women's residence in St. Michael's College.

"Other deans of women were not receptive to the idea," Miss Limpus said.

"All I wanted to do was hold informal talks with the girls in their common rooms. I wanted to speak to the girls who are too timid to go to a doctor or to the university health service."

She said she was appalled by the general ignorance on campus about birth control. "Many girls come from oppressive homes," she said.

"Often they are embarrassed even to contact the Planned Parenthood Association. I wanted to hold quiet discussions with interested girls, and give them the names of sympathetic doctors if they requested them."

Charity Grant, University College dean of women, said in an interview she would ask the Whitney Hall students council if they wished to have Miss Limpus visit the residence. Whitney Hall already has a birth control information program, Miss Grant pointed out.

"I'm not going to push birth control down their throats," she declared.

"On the other hand, I'm not going to prevent it. I can't tell them to have Laurel Limpus in—I'm going to let them decide."

Sister Maria, dean of residence at SMC's Loretto College, sent Miss Limpus a letter saying she could not sanction a visit by the SAC group.

However, Sister Maria had no objection to her girls having birth-control information.

"If necessary, Laurel could go from room to room and talk to the girls," she said. "Or she could give the literature to a dozen girls and ask them to hand it one."

"But I can't sanction a meeting here."

SAC member Laurel Sefton (III SMC) said last night that she had spoken to Sister St. Stephen of St. Joseph's, another SMC residence.

"She was very receptive," Miss Sefton said, "but she hasn't given me her answer yet."

SAC member Phyllis Lowther (IV Trin) began an informal program of her own in Trinity's St. Hilda's residence. She distributed literature and had talk with girls who expressed interest.

However, when Miss Lowther requested permission for Miss Limpus to visit St. Hilda's, she was told that if there was enough interest Planned Parenthood would be asked to give the lecture. Miss Limpus said her original idea had been to visit the residences on an informal basis.

"I wasn't aware that I would have to ask permission. It's almost becoming a free speech issue."

Miss Lowther said: "I don't think we're taking a stand for sex. All this is irrelevant to morality as such."

Miss Limpus said she suspected that officials were afraid of bad publicity for the university.

"The general attitude seems to be that having sex is more damaging than a pregnancy."

Hippies help student power: DePoe

By LAWRENCE BRICE

Student power is the result of hippie political action, says David DePoe, a controversial member of the Company of Young Canadians.

"Two years ago student power in the university just wasn't possible, but today it is. This is because of hippie involvement."

Former University of Toronto student DePoe led this summer's hippie sit downs and demonstrations in Yorkville in which more than 60 were arrested.

"Students on the Board of Governors in universities are soon turned into house niggers," he declared.

"And universities like this one are only good models of large corporations."

DePoe said the "two-way process of education" had completely broken down.

"Students at university don't have any power to define their half of the educational process.

"Professors are only interested in inculcating their own values and morality."

Twenty-three-year-old DePoe left a second-year political science and economics course to become a volunteer CYC worker in Yorkville. In a years time he has become both an archetype of, and an articulate spokesman for, Toronto's hippies.

He called Yorkville a "sterile stretch of plastic bohemia."

"The real content of Yorkville is a minority of about 40 per cent who seek a new community of new relationships."

DePoe said of Mayor William Dennison: "It just blows the mayor's mind when we go in and sit on the edge of his desk. It really breaks down the authority thing—he really gets up tight when we redefine him."

When asked what he would do if Prime Minister Lester Pearson tried to kill the CYC because of the image DePoe had given it, he replied:

"If the only way to save the CYC was for me to cop out, then it should be killed!"

QUAKERISM TODAY

Quakers are known to be active in today's world, yet they are often thought, by those who do not know them well, to be old-fashioned in their beliefs. Yet there is no Quaker creed to become out-dated; only a demanding conviction of the need to search continually and to act on what the search reveals of purpose for the present.

B & W will help sponsor Redding

The Blue and White Society will partially sponsor the Otis Redding concert Oct. 15, contrary to a report in last week's Varsity.

Greg Parker (II SMC) a Blue and White member, said the society is investing $1,500 in the four-hour spectacular. Student tickets are being sold at the Students Administrative Council office on an unreserved-seat basis. Free transportation will be provided to the Canadian National Exhibition Coliseum.

A & A Record Bar is selling tickets to the public at $3.50.

Mike Lais, proprietor of Record World, is picking up the remainder of the $5,500 tab for the show.

The ticket sales are good, but not as good as I hoped," Lais said.

About 150 student tickets have been sold. The show will be a financial loss to the Blue and White Society unless another 550 are sold, Parker said.

Lais reduced ticket costs by persuading the government's Hospital Tax Branch that "the show could be exempted from the 10 percent hospital tax on the grounds that it was a dance."

Buses chartered for LGMB concert

Art McIlwain (II APSC) is chartering buses to take students to Montreal for the appearance next weekend of the Lady Godiva Memorial Band. The $15 tickets are available at the Engineering Stores.

McGill prof sees no change in Quebec

Continuing deadlock is the most optimistic prospect for Quebec politics, Professor Charles Taylor of McGill University said Wednesday.

Prof. Taylor, a member of the national NDP executive, said he was neither alarmist or optimistic.

"The Quebec situation remains always the same," he said. "We are waiting for the radical change which does not come."

"The majority of voters do not have an opinion on such questions and they do not want to make up their minds."

The popularity of separatism among students can be explained in part as a conflict between generations, Prof. Taylor asserted.

"They are rebelling against their parents' concept of confederation as a kind of safety insurance. Their attitude may be described as a rejection of over-security."

Prof. Taylor was invited to speak by the Canadian-Canadian Committee, a group of students interested in promoting better relations between French and English-speaking students.

Computers will count Eng Soc votes

If all goes well for the Engineering Society fall elections, votes will be tabulated by computer.

Ray Carnovale (IV APSC), chief returning officer for the Oct. 13 elections, told an Engineering Society meeting Tuesday night that students will be given "porta-punch" computer cards to cast their votes.

Voters will receive instruction sheets and computer cards when they come to vote. They will indicate their choices and the order of preference by punching out holes in the cards.

The computer will take between 10 to 20 minutes to determine who won and will print out the candidate's names with their totals. In the past manual counting has taken five to ten hours.

Radiation sign removal has ended

The annual autumn hazard owing to students removing Danger: Radiation signs has abated this year, says W. H. Ridge, the radiation protection surveyor of the campus safety and security Division.

The main danger in removing these signs, he said, is that emergency personnel may go into a radiation area unaware of its presence. There are 40 of these areas on campus in the various science laboratories.

In a number of these areas a person could receive the minimal allowable radiation dosage in less than an hour.

The signs are also a warning to the general public. Mr. Ridge said that it was a serious matter to remove these signs and that disciplinary action would follow if any student were caught taking them.

Grossman gets jeers at election debate

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Many of the 200 students assembled in Convocation Hall jeered at Allan Grossman, the Progressive Conservative incumbent in the St. Andrew-St. Patrick riding at Wednesday's election debate.

Laughter rolled through the aisles as Mr. Grossman reviewed the record of the John Robarts government.

Liberal Len Shiffrin and NDP Adam Fuerstenberg, candidates in the university riding, joined Grossman in delivering 10-minute speeches and answering questions from the floor.

But they were better received than Mr. Grossman.

When Mr. Grossman asked the audience to look at his record as reform institutions minister, the audience shouted back, "Ask the people who have been there."

But the seasoned politician Mr. Grossman was always able to reach into his bag of tricks.

When someone in the audience tried to interrupt his speech he retorted: "One fool at a time, please."

Mr. Fuerstenberg commended the Students Administrative Council for calling the election meeting.

"It is a valid attempt to fight the apathy surrounding the election, apathy that has been shrewdly exploited by the government."

Mr. Fuerstenberg, an English lecturer at Ryerson, called for improved housing conditions, air pollution controls and universal accessibility to higher education.

Mr. Shiffrin outlined his "equality of opportunity" program in education, stressing the importance of pre-school teaching, and giving the "culturally - disadvantaged child" the same opportunity as the middle - class child.

He blasted the grading systems of schools, saying grades merely expedite matters for the administration.

"Is the school system demanded for administrators?" he asked.

Mr. Shiffrin said more money for education could be found by a redistribution of taxes.

"The first priority on education expenditures in a Liberal government would be to shift 80 per cent of the cost of education to the province," Mr. Shiffrin said.

Property taxes now pay for most educational costs. By shifting the tax burden from property to income tax, the low-income homeowner would be ahead, he said.

Mr. Fuerstenberg also had taxation suggestions.

He preferred the federal Carter report to the provincial Smith report because Carter taxed all income, including capital gains.

The NDP candidate, who was supported in the Convocation Hall rally by numerous Fuerstenberg signs, said taxes like the sales tax hit those making less than $8,000 the hardest.

Mr. Grossman, the last speaker, said the Progressive Conservatives do not support free university tuition. The other candidates called for free tuition.

"If taxpayers pay the whole shot, they will begin to tell you what courses to take and what university to attend," he said.

A student pointed out that the government already pays three-quarters of tuition fees and the taxpayer has little control in determining the nature of university education.

UBC holds talk on CUS membership

VANCOUVER (CUP)—The students council of the University of British Columbia voted this week to hold a campus-wide referendum on UBC membership in the Canadian Union of Students.

The council decided to hold the referendum Nov. 1, reversing an endorsement last week of CUS membership.

Lynn Spraggs, engineering president, who raised the motion, said, "It's their (the students') money and we should let them vote on it"

"The discussion is quite futile," said Alma Mater society President Shaun Sullivan. "I think this is a matter where council has to exercise its leadership authority."

"Students don't give a damn for CUS—all they care for are the policies proposed by CUS and carried out on campus. They're happy if they can deduct fees from their income tax."

Results of SAC by-elections

Following are the names of students elected in Wednesday's Students Administrative Council by-elections:

Barbara Taylor (III PHE), Leslie Gary (III New), Marjorie Carter (I OCE) and Gordon Hunter (I Vic).

John Mathany (I Vic) and Ulrich Wischenewski (III Vic) won by acclamation.

Dave Joffman, chief returning officer, declared the school of graduate studies election void as polling clerks were not in full-time attendance.

Stone wants student say

councils were also encouraged to accept student representation.

At Innis College, Students Council President Ken Stone pressed for representation on the college council during the summer.

Recently, Acting President J. H. Sword told Stone he was holding back his answer until other requests—which he expects—come in.

Indications are that Mr. Sword is prepared to recommend such representation but wants to tell Innis Principal Robin Harris first as a courtesy.

The matter has to go before the U of T board of governors Mr. Sword explained yesterday, because the Innis council is a creation of the board.

College councils include all teaching staff of professional rank, or other teachers appointed by the president.

Innis asked that the membership restriction be eased to allow two new categories: senior administrative officers and students.

a rational view of the marijuana controversy

It seems, in the daily papers at least, that high school students are being corrupted by that insidious weed, marijuana. Use of this plant as a mind-blowing agent has risen 50 and maybe 75 per cent in Toronto during the last year, people, who say they know, are saying.

Toronto school Board Chairman, William Ross, self-styled leader of this, "I know what's going on faction," has been especially aroused.

Unfortunately (for the sake of truth, anyway) Ross talks more like a politician than a man genuinely worried about his own situation. There are, after all, many political plumbs to be grabbed by a man who makes a moral name for himself, even if he doesn't know much.

Ross' actions show perfectly how many such public issues become clouded by the politicians. The issues become blown up all out of proportion and that puts increased pressure on the police to do something. In this case, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police — the federal government's protector of private morals in narcotics cases—must act to appease the public.

Those dastardly pushers who hook our daughters (does anybody ever hook sons?) to dope and then force them into a life of crime and personal degradation will be driven out of the highschool halls. We can all rest confident. Or can we?

What does all this mean to the university? For one thing it could mean that the big narcotics crackdown so long predicted for U of T will come soon. (See Henry Tarvainen's column, Review 9, for a discussion of this situation). Rumors are already flying that the RCMP undercover men and/or informers have been watching and buying and are all ready to go.

The usual method for the RCMP is to watch someone selling marijuana or some other illegal substance to get leads on users. Then when they have a batch of these people under surveillance, they swoop down and arrest them all at once. It looks as if they have the situation under control and are cleaning out these criminals.

What this all means is that just because you haven't been busted yet, doesn't mean you're safe. Obviously, it is absolutely imperative that you do not keep your marijuana in your room or apartment. Yet, you'd be surprised how many regular users aren't careful.

Even the ashes from burnt marijuana can be used in evidence against you. The smell of marijuana has tipped off many a Mountie.

As for the law itself, it was well pointed out at Perception '67 last year that marijuana was put on the narcotics schedule during a scare just like the one the highschools are going through now.

Only back then the scare involved Chinese immigrants, and opium dens and fears that cocaine and marijuana users are going to lead (or rape) your daughters into sin. Everybody hated the Chinese back then, only for different reasons than they do now.

The country was full of the propaganda that marijuana is a killer weed that inflames the brain to a passion that leads only to immorality or violence. These people go insane, you see. They don't know what they're doing. They're hooked on a narcotic that will ruin their life.

Except, it ain't like that at all. Medical opinion has been documenting the real facts in recent years, but the damage done back then, when the doctors didn't speak up, is hard to reverse.

The Alcohol and Drug Addiction Research Foundation has confirmed that marijuana is not addictive, and the one complete study on marijuana in the U.S., done by a mayor's committee in New York, cleared up the "marijuana leads to heroin" issue.

That committee found that while many heroin users did start off with marijuana, the reverse is not necessarily true. Marijuana smoking does not often lead to heroin shooting.

Think of marijuana as you might candy. People take it because they like it. They don't become physically addicted but come back for more because it's nice.

Oh yes, but people become psychologically addicted to marijuana, and that may be worse than physical addiction, the apologists for the present laws say. If people overdo their use of marijuana (or candy) it's not the candy's (marijuana's) fault. Their own emotional problems are the cause.

Arrest and imprisonment won't help them at all. Legal circles have been seeing this point in relation to the arrest of alcoholics, recently (nothing's been done, but they see the point). Few people admit the same logic applies to marijuana use.

Yet, in other respects people who don't know what they're talking about, think of marijuana in the same terms as liquor. People, they know, get drunk for social reasons. Liquor lubricates their relations with other people. It loosens them up; makes them more human. For some drinking is a way to a euphoric state that makes them forget their troubles. They may even lose their faculties.

But marijuana users, on the whole, don't use pot to forget about their troubles. They participate in an almost-intellectual experience in which their mind becomes more active, as do all their senses.

People high on marijuana like to read, listen to music, walk in the park, watch movies. Ever see a drunk do that?

Liquor as a social lubricant can be ugly. Ever see an undergraduate at Sir Daniel Wilson Residence boast that he drank 24 bottles of beer and then run off to vomit up all his achievement?

Ever have your boyfriend hung over your shoulder while dancing? Ever jump into bed with your boyfriend after a night of drinking only to find he can't get a proper erection? Things are different with marijuana.

Also notice that marijuana users just love to share their stuff with their friends. An act of pure sharing is uncommon enough in our society. At a pot party everybody gets the joint passed to him. Ever compare university parties where people hide their bottles under the sink, behind curtains, in their inside pockets, behind the record player?

Another side of the question is, what do the present laws actually do? They are not effective, or else how do all those high school kids get the stuff. Why is use of the weed growing so fast, if the police have it under control?

Yet, people who commit no worse a crime than the social drinker of a cocktail party are being put away for up to seven years. (First offenders usually get a suspended sentence, but it's still a sentence and carries a criminal record).

This at a time when criminologists are worried about the lack of respect for the law and police cars and taxis carry Respect the Law bumper stickers in an almost pathetic attempt at education. But laws have to earn respect.

The present laws actually lead to heroin addiction. After all when both marijuana and heroin are on the narcotics schedule, it is no more a crime to step up to the hard drug. It is also no more a crime to sell heroin: when you've sold marijuana.

It's all a matter of an ill though out law, passed during a time of high emotion, that is still being used — and defended today. However, it's very hard for a legislator to stand up in an assembly and argue for repeal of the law. What can he say? Well, Mr. Speaker it is a rather nicer intoxicant than liquor and gives visions of great clarity, and so on.

Elected bodies have to keep up their puritan delusions of stout (and clear) heart, mind and body. This and the difficulty of repealing such legislation applies to LSD as much as marijuana and will be discussed in a later editorial.

But meanwhile, we have a law that is being violated with increasing frequency. That can cause far worse problems than those the laws are trying to prevent. The situation is roughly analogous to the rise of crime during the 1920s and early 30s.

Prohibition of liquor wasn't workable. When it was tried, the law suffered. And were did our distillers and brewers get all their money? They sold alcohol to the U.S. gangsters during Prohibition. The U.S. government complained, of course, but crime can easily be overlooked, even by governments.

It seems clear to us that marijuana should be taken off the narcotics schedule and legalized. The present law does more harm than good and is unenforceable in any case.

IS PREMARITAL MURDER MORE POPULAR THAN PREMARITAL SEX?

FILM

penn - manship

By KEN DANCYGER

Arthur Penn is a stage and film director, 40 years old and a veteran of five film features (The Left-Handed Gun, The Miracle Worker, Mickey One, The Chase, and Bonnie and Clyde). He is the avant-garde of a new wave of American film-makers. He is a social critic rather than an espouser of the American way of life (virginity and Doris Day all the way) or a fast fading dream merchant such as Ross Hunter via Julie Andrews. His films are an uneasy blend of reality and entertainment; the United States is almost ready for them.

In his earlier films, Penn preferred unorthodox story lines dealing with human conflict. In The Left-Handed Gun, Billy the Kid (Paul Newman) is depicted as a disturbed young man in search of a father figure rather than as a wronged Henry Fonda. This downbeat premise motivates this man's life and in the end, results in his death. He kills initially in retaliation for the murder of a rancher who was kind to him. He is killed by his often sympathetic patron, Pat Garrett.

The Miracle Worker is the story of a teacher and her attempts to communicate with her blind and mute student, Helen Keller. It is engrossing to watch Penn peel off layer after layer of their emotions, defense, aggression and eventually love. At the end Helen has learned only one word but the elation one feels at that one word is overwhelming. The film is very much an ode to human strength as much as to the importance of communication at all levels, in our society.

Penn struck out at society generally in Mickey One. Mickey One (Warren Beatty) is a nightclub comedian who owes money to the Chicago mob, runs away and feels he is constantly being pursued. Since Penn's films lend themselves to allegory we might speculate that Beatty, having rejected its values, is running away from society as represented by the mob. When asked why he is running away, Beatty says "I'm guilty of not being innocent." He rejects the materialism offered to re-enter the system, i.e. the enticement by club owner Hurd Hatfield: "Al Jolson had 150 coats in his closet when he died."

Although the film fails because it doesn't clearly define its purpose, Mickey One is the most stylish of Penn's films. He indulges in symbolism and allegory through a combination of quick cuts and long fade-outs, giving the film a sense of surrealism. The music, improvised by Stan Getz, compounds this effect. Dream-like music accompanies a brawl in which Beatty is badly beaten. Suspense arises through an absence of music rather than the usual resonances of the Philadelphia Philharmonic.

Penn's next film, The Chase, has since been disclaimed by him because of the "Hollywood cut" of the film. It remains, however, a brutal reflection on Southern bigotry.

Penn's interest in the American south is reflected in his latest film, Bonnie and Clyde. This is his most controlled and best effort. It has the best script, photography, acting and direction of any film this year (and this has been a good year). So much has been said about the film (its all true), additional praise would be redundant.

Bonnie Parker (Faye Dunaway) and Clyde Barrow (Warren Beatty) are in love and they do kill people. Incongruous as it may seem, we laugh when they rob banks and cry when they die.

Values become reversed in the context of the Great Depression in the American southwest. Clyde brags about his profession; he is proud he robs banks. People look up to him. But a rigid perverse morality is maintained. A member of the Barrow gang arrives home with Bonnie and Clyde. Rather than asking him why he has killed and robbed, his father chastises him for a vulgar tattoo on his chest and for not getting his name in the paper along with that of Bonnie and Clyde.

There are no Al Capones in this film. Using guns and robbing banks are the only ways Clyde can prove his manliness. Robbery becomes a highly sexual act for Bonnie and Clyde. The pleasure is in their eyes. Clyde walks into a bank and with boyish glee says "This is the Barrow gang, we rob banks."

The robberies themselves are very comical. A strict Pavlovian, Penn is setting us up for bigger things. Get them to like the characters and then take them away via violent death. All the more effective.

Men don't die easily in Penn films. There are no clean deaths, no Audie Murphy eulogies here. Clyde's brother Buck takes hours to die, painfully, full of fear. Horrifying. Bonnie's and Clyde's departures are orchestrated, in similar detail.

One might ask at this point what all this talk about morality and violence has to do with Arthur Penn as a social critic. He has captured the feeling of the period, a time of social upheaval, changing values and increasing violence; a description that might well fit America at the present moment.

But there is more. For too long Hollywood has glorified gangsters. They have money, women and power, and at ten minute intervals they have clean submachine gun battles with the police. In the end they die from a clean bullet in the heart or are pushed over a cliff by their colleagues.

Penn strips this away. Bonnie and Clyde are always running. Their only home is a car. And the growing fear is impending death. And death when it comes . . .

I admit that Penn, as he intended, has turned me off with all his violence. No more the subtlety of Strangelove. Blatant, bloody death. It's enough to turn one to a bland diet of Doris Day comedies. Penn makes his point. But people will still flock to see this picture and relish all that gore.

the trip

By PETER GODDARD

Following the vicissitudes of American culture as a hawk would track a lame rabbit, producer Roger Corman once again has slain what could potentially have been a fertile subject for film-making. This time the victim is psychedelia; the movie, The Trip.

Using modish Richard Lester film-splicing techniques with none of this director's humour or sense of pace, Corman has created a pill and thrill variant on the sand'n'surf Beach Party of the early sixties. And although Corman announced publicly that he tried LSD before making the film, its characters react expectedly like the confectionary dreams of Hollywood doyens, transported with a hack's notion of Freudian anxiety and wish fulfilment.

At the vortex of this montage of visual sensations is Peter Fonda. As a tight-lipped, foppish ad-man, he seeks inspiration from the muse hidden in the mind. Creativity has become the new cant; the latest con-game. Retiring to a hippy spa that is just a few degrees less opulent than the one depicted in Last Year at Marienbad, Fonda turns on and slowly slips from reality.

But does he? Like Fellini's 8½, The Trip makes reality appear more unreal than the imaginary. Fluttering diaphanously around California's Big Sur, Fonda has all the facial mobility and dramatic sense of a Byzantine icon. Dressed in a starched Timothy Leary-like manta, the hero has become a symbol of everyone who has ever gone on a trip.

The screen becomes saturated with images: erotic love-scenes with his ex-wife (Susan Strasberg) which, incidentally, were similarly conceived and more tastefully executed in John Hofsess' Redpath 25; phallic symbols (candles, etc.) christian symbols (crosses), and everpresent seductresses; bucolic romps in poppy fields; sideshow freaks at a surreal circus; nightmare deaths; and pop warnings stolen bodily from Jean-Luc Godard's Breathless such as "Watch Out ... Go Slow."

It is either too much or too little.

Similar to some writers using stream of consciousness in the novel where one gorges on Joyce's words or slims on Beckett's, Corman has chosen neither course, and has jammed onto the screen just enough sex, sadism and psychedelic sight to make the picture sell. Because Fonda's pre-trip character is only faintly sketched the wanderings of his mind, like the entire movie, seem aimless.

The Trip exploits a gimmick while throwing a moralizing sop at the beginning to warn of the potential dangers in the drug. Several possibly humorous scenes (Fonda, still high and having escaped the hippy airport, wanders into a laundermat) were passed up in favour of photographic pyrotechniques.

As a movie it started nowhere, went nowhere, and meant little in transit. Not too ironically, the same may be said of Roger Corman's and Peter Fonda's careers.

in the heat of the night

BY DAVID PAPE

In The Heat of the Night without any doubt is a very poor film with lots of good stuck in. Commercially, it is successful, and has been playing for about two month.

It has a great sound track by Ray Charles.

It has a good editor who paced the dislocated script well enough to keep things moving fast. For a murder mystery, there is the minimum of suspense required, and the retinue of small town oddballs that allow for character acting. The atmosphere of the south is created in the first seconds of the film: you can smell the night, hear the silence, feel the heat.

But all this success won't touch you. The film could be a nice diversion, except that Rod Steiger is in it. It could be a meaningless TV type film, except that Rod Steiger is in it. You could walk out at any time, except that Rod Steiger is in it. His characterization as the new town sherriff, unpopular but resigned, grudgingly coming to admire Poitier, is superb.

A friend of mine said, "He is the only actor in Hollywood whose door I would knock on and say 'Teach me to act.'"

Steiger's transformation from The Pawnbroker is astounding. He is a southern sherriff. He moves, speaks, times his actions beautifully. He is the Master of the telling gesture: the drop of his jaw a second before speaking. The way he carries his motivations from one scene to another, constantly referring you back, is always surprising; it creates the real life of the movie.

Poitier is lucky to have such a foil. It may win him another Oscar. While Poitier is playing his straight role, Steiger is undercutting the cliches of the script with great acting.

Poitier's case is a strange one. It seems he has to be a loser. For the Negro, he must seem an Uncle Tom, even though it is equally ludicrous that he should have to play a poor man to be believable.

After all he is believable, save for the strange context we always find him in: the lone Negro in an all-white society. He is become a token of integrated tolerance, and wins Oscars for it. Yet he must always be the Pero, the good guy, the Negro John Wayne.

And he is a strong actor. (Happily Steiger plays with him, not to overshadow him.) When he slaps the local rich white man, the scene is tense and interesting. Steiger's reaction as sherriff caps it off. But, in the light of this or any other summer, slapping a white man is awfully tame.

It is strangely frustrating to see Steiger so marvellous in a film so trite. In The Heat of the Night bears a close resemblance to Hurry Sundown; the format of both could have come from a handbook on How to Make Films for a Northern Audience with a Voyeur View to the Deep South.

In both films we have: (1) a town economically dependent on the coming of a northern factory, (2) police trouble caused by a bad whitey but implicating a Negro, (3) a gang of white trash who have a fight with the good guy, (4) sexual overindulgence by a white girl, (5) an energetic, intelligent, independent and wholly honourable Negro hero, (6) one or more local Negro "characters", (7) town officials who show prejudice and a pretence of tolerance, (8) one or more reluctant but dignified white men who overcome a basic venner of prejudice, (9) a white and a black hero who seem to grow up a bit, (10) a dislocated script.

The difference between the two films is that Rod Steiger could salvage his movie and Michael Caine couldn't.

When Negroes are directing their own films, or directors stop pandering to civil rights salesmanship, we'll get somewhere.

THEATRE

the mirror man

THE MIRROR MAN by Brian Way: Drama for the Child, at The Colonnade.

By GERRY BARTRAM

The scene is a toyshop, and a fussy toymaker is showing us his most ambitious creation: a life-sized doll that walks and talks. "I've called her Beauty", she says, "a beautiful name for a beautiful doll. Will you help me make her walk? If we all say pom pom pom she'll walk". So all of us, the children and the toymaker say "pom pom pom" and Beauty (who is very beautiful) moves jerkily about in time to our rhythm. A truly horrifying witch appears on the balcony, about to seize the magic book. A couple of the young children scream, but the mirror-man shouts "wish everybody, wish as hard as you can!" and we all wish wish wish with tremendous concentration: our power overcomes the witch and she turns away, for the moment defeated. For a moment there is no audience, there are no actors, no stage, and our collective power works.

Together, we can work magic; apart there is none. The theatre, any theatre, is a magic place for the child within us all, but we must be together if we are to create the magic, we must do away with actors, audience, script and stage: together there is magic, apart there is none. On the Stratford stage (theatre in the round) magic is only an illusion: those are the actors, that is the stage, and we sitting here are the ones who watch. The play would go on if I were not here; I am only a spectator, and they need me in ways I do not like to consider too much. Relationships based on need alone are not enough. If by a word I could change the course of the entire play; if by our words together we could shoot the rapids, skim deftly past the whirlpool, confound the ever-vigilant Scylla many-headed, and come to rest at last in cool, tranquil waters: that would be magic; indeed that would be revolution. Real theatre, real creation, is always revolution).

Mr. Way and his associates have worked this kind of revolution in British classrooms, but unfortunately, perhaps necessarily, The Mirror Man is not this kind of play. We remain an audience except at moments when we help the play along to its forgone conclusion.

The magic is only partial, but there is still magic there: The Mirror Man now at the Colonnade, is a very good play. It does as it claims "delight and involve young children in the nicest possible way". It is well and simply designed (Marjorie Swindells), well directed (Dan MacDonald and Margaret Faulkes), and acted with a good deal of energy and spontaneity.

The witch (Dan MacDonald) comes off very well, a broad, gruesome part, dressed and handled as it should be. The other characters are engaging, but the Mirror-Man (William Haslett) has a special problem in the script, a mercurial character who is not mercurial. He is, I think, essentially a voice and not a character at all. Haslett moves very well, is very witty (and at the end, sad) in the sections mimed behind the mirror, conveys mood with glances, but he has too much to say that must for the sake of the plot be said. His place in the plot is mechanical more than magical, a difficult sort of role.

The play does slightly lose control of its audience. Now some of this loss can be attributed to children not perhaps understanding the play, like the perverse spirits who insist on helping the witch: "It's in the trunk" they call when she's looking for the book and threatening Beauty. Dan MacDonald ignores this kind of contribution — could he do otherwise? Some again in due to their conception of the "stage": if you think of the stage more as a place for showing off than for creating (playing) with others you may forget the play and play your own game on its edge — as one little boy did. Yet: once or twice I felt that too much was happening too fast and too loud, a lack of directive control which generates in the audience a loose kind of excitement alien to the play. I saw the first performance and these moments are probably smoother now; the "pom's" and the hums likewise more decisively terminated.

The themes of the play are age-old and important, and children too young to follow the talk must respond to the pattern. The pattern is certainly there, and though not of our choosing, we are bound up in it. Without us nothing could happen; together with us, magic The Mirror Man, a dramatic experience for children — and for grown-ups interested in truly dynamic theatre. At the Colonnade Saturdays and Sundays, until Christmas ## the fantasticks now and then...

By VOLKMAR RICHTER

I first saw the Fantasticks back in 1963 — November 22 in fact. I had an important date and bought tickets far in advance; well, how was I to know that President Kennedy would be killed that afternoon.

It wasn't the right day to see a lovely little off-Broadway musical comedy, but then tickets cost money and shouldn't be wasted. The show was playing at the Central Library Theatre.

In the subways people were quiet and sort of banging from their bones. At the theatre the patrons that night showed the same dreary faces, also regretting, I guess, that they had to go out that night.

But, you know, within 15 minutes that show made them all forget about the news; it was that enjoyable and involving. It was an escape of course, but escape by the sheer quality of the production and the show.

The show was back this week playing until tomorrow night at the Royal Alexandra Theatre in a relatively disappointing version.

Intimacy is important to this happy-serious, friendly little musical. Its effect is diluted in the Royal.

tand's Les Romanesques, the Fantasticks deal with a love affair between a girl (Constance Moffit) who wants to become a princess, and a boy (Ty McConnell) who says: "I'm nearly 20 years old. I've studied biology. I've been educated. I know how things are."

Their respective fathers (Wayne Martens and Donald Babcock) want the romance to lead to marriage, but are taking no chances. They use reverse psychology and build a high wall between their bones and the romance.

So, they hire a bandit, El Gallo, a sort of cross between Zorro and Dracula, to stage a rape from which the boy can rescue the girl. Gallo, played by John Cunningham, is too weak on stage and too cleanly played. Bruno Gerussi did the Toronto original. Now there was an El Gallo, powerful and strong.

Gallo brings along two helpers, a bungling Shakespearean actor, played with fine pathos and humour by Hugh Alexander and a cockney-accented Indian, Justin Morley, to help. A mute James Cook rounds out the cast to supply props, sound and special effects and what That's all. Eight people. One set. And a few props. Budgets may have been low in the original production and that calls for imaginative staging.

The romance, of course, works out for a while. Gallo says, "Life never ends with the moon at night." Boy realizes, "She's only the girl next door." Girl says, "He looks different in the daylight. Somehow I thought he was taller." The second act tells the story of their loss of innocence, she by a tour guided by Gallo; he, by world travel. There are pretty songs and lots of wit along the way and a good deal of accurate characterization in the interplay of these personalities.

The current production is not as tight as it could be and never reaches the excitement and power of the 1963 version, but then comparisons are academic, aren't they? What is here and now is what matters.

It's a good show, fun on one level, making some valid points about growing up on others. The quality of the book comes through the particular production we have here, to touch each member of the audience personally—

MUSIC

from ragas to riches

By PETER GODDARD

When writing a review of any art-form in Toronto, be it theatre, ballet, pop or classical music, it has become fashionable to mention the Beatles' influence on the genre. They have, in effect, become the most expensive radar apparatus in history. Each hair on their collective heads is regarded as antenna, finding, exploring and giving the definitive statement on l'art nouveau.

By recording the song Norwegian Wood with a sitar on the Rubber Soul album, these arbiters of teen taste touched off the popular oriental mystique. And after being named by George Harrison as his personal mentor, sitarist Ravi Shankar found himself as one of the underground's pivotal figures.

Now the hippies want Buddhahood at 33 rpm's, Taoism on tap, his master's voice on RCA nirvana. Or at least so it seemed after Shankar's concert last Saturday at Massey Hall.

"I do not play folk or primitive songs," he has said. "This is classical music." His evening ragas (some of the 700 or so melodic patterns Indian music is based upon—between 90 and 95% is improvised) had a sinuous, placid quality that one often hears in Mozartian slow movements.

As western, popular, and folk musics have concentrated on the harmonic aspects of music, the vertical relationships of sound, the Indian counterparts are based on the intricacies of melody and rhythm, horizontal sound in moving space.

Cradling the long necked multi-stringed sitar in his crossed legs, his bare feet tapping the wooden platform in rhythm, Shankar seduced soft moans, thin, high-pitched pings and an inexhaustible series of musical ideas from the instrument. Other than nodding occasionally to Tabla (the most popular two-drum piece in India) player Alla Rakha to establish a stong beat, or leaning backwards to tune Kamala Chakravarty's five-stringed, drone producing Tamboura, the sitarist stared intently into his mind.

Each raga became a link with the primitive, with a timelessness of wind vibrating the first string. As Sandy Pearlman wrote in the January issue of Crawdaddy: "It can become a sort of universe, since you can encompass all of it, that is, that which encompasses everything. And the activity of listening, then, becomes an activity of recreation. The listener's active concentration on the raga means that he is weaving the moment's texture anew in his head. To follow that pattern's development is to recreate it."

The McLuhanistic 'hot' rushed in to fill in the 'cool'.

For the hippies it has become a new sort of meaning, a new type of expression. Unfortunately most of what is heard from western sources of raga music is aesthetically awful and artistically awkward.

The raga fad is closely linked with the psychedelic sadness. But as it takes most classically trained Indian musicians up to twenty years of ascetic training before he is fully prepared, it seems unlikely that some rock-and-roll guru is going to be able pick up a sitar or a sarod and play one raga or ragini no matter how deep an illusion of omniscience his DMT or LSD may be giving him.

"I have met a number of people who have been studying or indulging in that field (acid)", said Shankar. "They are absolutely sure I am high whenever I play. I have never had any drug experience. I can only say, through the use of discipline and yoga, drugs are not needed."

Hare Krishna, Hare profit. The record industry has put itself in the moral position of dope pushing. Columbia has a record on the market called Psychedelic Psoul. Pstupid Mercury has one by "Friar Tuck and his Psychedelic Guitar.." Vanguard has a disc called Rainy Day Raga by a guitarist named Peter Walker, Timothy Leary's 'music director'. The link between rock, ragas and the drugged drop-out is so strong that Leary is a frequent source of linear notes.

Ragas have made inroads into jazz and western classical music as well. On Impulse, Gabor Szabo (now appearing at the Colonial Tavern) has recorded Jazz Raga.

Szabo uses a jazz rhythm section and certain rock touches under his guitar; but inevitably when playing the sitar, he makes the ragas sound western. The most recent amalgam has been violinist Yehudi Menuhin and Ravi Shankar. But as a friend explained, "I don't really know what's going on. It's not much, musically, but it is quiet and soothing. What else do you want?"

To hear what ragas should sound like turn to the connoisseur Society Album by Afi Akbar Khan, the master sarod player. Suddenly you are far from the acid heads and their superficial modish orientalism. You are in the clear, cool mountain of the intellect; into the rarefaction not of the chemically high but of a gigantic tradition and immense intellect.

Paradoxically, the record reaches an incredible peak of excitement, but never loses the quality of serene detachment.

"The worlds of jazz, folk and electronic music have all been influenced by our music," said Shankar, "they found something they didn't already have. But western music hasn't influenced me at all. We are so very much richer."

Were you one of the lucky ones? Did you see Oswald killed - live - on your living-room TV. Or did you have to watch the replay?

But is was fantastic live, wasn't it? Remember how excited you were, how your adrenalin flowed, what you did to your girlfriend on the living room rug right after. Too bad things like that don't happen on TV all the time.

But why shouldn't they? Why not have a TV show called The Murder of the Week? Start off fairly simple — have a white cop shoot a black man, live, of course. The next week have a really repulsive skid row wino, unshaven, wrinkled greasy clothes, rotten teeth, strangle 3 or 4 little girls. The week after, have 20 juiced up hippies stone a clean-cut GI just back from Vietnam, only the GI has a machine gun, so he manages to kill 15 of them before they succeed in stoning him to death. Then present the Detroit riot as live theatre. The end of the 32 week series would be a program in which all the nuclear weapons in the world explode simultaneously, televised live, of course.

you hear about the University of Saskatchewan who had a race: to see which one of three could smash a piano to pieces and pass all the through a hula hoop the fastest. The winning took 3 minutes.

Some of the people in the audience were quite moving. A girl even cried at the senselessness of the death. But that was the whole point.

The function of any art form is to have some effect on the audience. Any effect. If the only way you can get someone to cry is to smash a piano to pieces, then that is what you have to do.

The categories of beauty and appreciation that have been inherited from the Renaissance are irrelevant to a modern audience.

At a ballet. How many people are really turned on? I mean really moved by it. And why shouldn't you? Two burly truck drivers smashing a concert as legitimate a form of dance as Margot and Rudi. A pas de deux for an audience of dilettantes and butterflies. And if the sight of the truck drivers smashing that piano to bits makes a member of the audience revulsed, then good. If the strongest response is to get from a brutalized and insensitive audience is to then get it and get it good.

There's not a new TV show based on a combination of an American Bandstand and the team race? Have two teams of engineering students and two cows, big and gentle cows with big brown eyes and dependent on each other and then have the teams compete to see who can disembowel his cow first. Then have a group of young, misinformed teenie-boppers rush on to the stage and slaughter around in the blood and gore and then do the spasm dance to the Fugs song "Disembowelment" with their legs wrapped round your body.

There's a show that would turn on all you people who were turned on by The War Game, who yawn at the replay of the movie about the murder, who thought Bonnie and Clyde was a masterpiece movie. But I'm being unfair. You're not as all that.

They followed avidly the headline replay of the Steven Seagal case, because you wanted to see justice done. You were filled with fascinated horror about Richard Speck and Charles Whitman, because you wanted to see . . .

There's an Indian girl who was raped by three white men and then flung nude with a broken neck into a garbage can. You wanted . . .

Do you ever have the feeling that you are living in a violent world? Do you ever have the feeling that the media are dwelling on stories of death, disaster and that you have the feeling that artists are unnecessary with violence?

Do you blame the poor souls? They are as much a part of this violent and destructive world as we are. And if there is a supply, then there must be a demand. What about the artists? Surely they have a duty to seek a better world, to try to make the world a better place? Maybe they are by trying to destroy an old and morally bankrupt world.

Recently, I read a comment by an art critic deploring the modern art of destruction and violence. He felt it was a dilettantish copy of the Dada movement of the 20's. He felt that the destruction and violence of Dada was legitimate then because after all they were living in the chaotic aftermath of the First World War. But things have changed. Dada and violence and destruction, he says, are no longer legitimate expressions of artistic sensibility. And he's right. Things have changed. Since the 20's we've had Hitler and the Second World War and the death camps and the bombing of Dresden and the atomic bomb and Hiroshima and the population explosion and the war in Vietnam and napalm and . . .

And movies like Bonnie and Clyde. It's really a good movie. Because it gets its audience really involved. Like when that impotent guy shoots a bank clerk and then almost makes it with the blonde. Or when he finally does and she says "you were just perfect" and he says "Yeah, I guess I was, wasn't I", and the whole audience kind of squirmed and giggled with pleasure and they were really moved, and then 5 minutes later Bonnie and Clyde are machine-gunned to death by a cop who is really glad to get them. And you walk out of the theatre feeling really depressed and you feel depressed for three days.

And you wonder what Arthur Penn is trying to tell you about the world. If only you could figure out what exactly he is trying to say then you would probably feel a lot better. But maybe that's just how it is. Maybe when people finally fall in love with each other they are machine-gunned to death by a jealous, vindictive, and competitive society. I bet you even that explanation makes you feel better. You can feel philosophical about the whole thing now. You can think of Bonnie and Clyde, not as individual human beings very much like you, but as abstract expressions of a general truth about life. But are there any truths about life except death?

So you try to make a pillow of words for your head. And then you read the Story of O. Its sort of a kinky thing to read, especially if you're into the S-M bag. But then you get the sneaking feeling that maybe this is an allegory for our time, and then you're in trouble again. And maybe these artists whom you thought were obsessed with violence are actually trying to do something about it. Like destroy it.

And do you know why it has to get worse? Because the old world has to be destroyed. Completely destroyed. Until there is nothing left of the world of cut-throat competition and finite success in a finite world, and a home in the suburbs and 14 cars and 24 kids.

The world of the monastery of the Middle Ages was completely destroyed by the Renaissance. It took a while, a few centuries, and bits of renaissance started appearing before there was any Renaissance to support them, and the monastery fought a hard battle and even succeeded in taking a few of the new types with them, and the same thing is happening all over again. Get ready, kiddies, cause we're heading into a new life style.

In the past, most inventions of man were machines that were basically extensions of his body. But lately we have invented machines which are extensions of our minds. Like radio and TV and computers. And we're heading into a new mind-oriented, communication-oriented, instant feedback world.

Leonardo was one of the first men to dissect the human body. Imagine how exciting it must have been for him, and how frightening. Freud started dissecting the mind, and we're still just at the beginning. The atomic bomb is like an extension of our fist. Imagine if we could get at the energy of our minds that way, that powerfully.

The old Renaissance thing of the ego of man as the centre of the universe has to be destroyed. The world of competition, of passing or failing, of being the best, having the most power, the biggest army, the most bombs, fighting for your country has to be destroyed. The new thing is a mind thing. And we all know what that means.

And that's why the artists are destroying. Dada was the conceptual start of a new kind of artistic sensibility. Lebel, the French artist who creates all those funky happenings, says that it doesn't matter if a thing is beautiful or ugly, all that matters is that you feel it in your deepness.

Museums are fine, but they must be treated as the homes of dead feelings. How can I look at the Mona Lisa and feel anything but a pre-programmed response. It's famous. I've seen it a million times before I actually see it, so I can never really see it. When the Metropolitan in New York bought the two million dollar Rembrandt, people flocked to see it — because it was the most expensive painting ever.

So maybe a sculpture which shows the family car as a wreck is a more valid experience for today. Maybe "I hate it, it's junk" is the best reaction you can get from a suburbanite. But, of course, the suburbanites of the world have to be destroyed along with competitiveness. There's no way they can survive in the new world, and there's no way to find the words to make the new thing comprehensible to them. They are dinosaurs.

And the new art will come out of the destruction and violence. And we will have new kinds of aesthetic experiences. Instead of looking at a painting on a wall, we will be the painting. We will hook ourselves up to each other with electrodes to get instant feedback and we will be the theatre. We'll just turn each other on through direct mind impulse exchange. I hope you have beautiful thoughts.

ART

centennial art exhibition

By JOAN MURRAY

The Ontario Centennial Art Exhibition now showing at the Art Gallery of Ontario is a show you must see, even if it is disturbing.

The trouble with the exhibit lies in the selection of the works, which was done by Bryan Robertson, Director of the Whitechapel Art Gallery, London, England — a man knowledgeable in modern art. He was given $100,000 to spend as he saw fit in the modern Canadian field. For this reason, the show is an important step in "tastemaking". A lot of people are going to be buying what Bryan Robertson has singled out for attention.

For this reason too, the show is extremely dangerous. The taste displayed is of a very narrow sort. Favored among the pictures chosen is the school of modern Abstract Hardedge work, like that of Roy Kiyooka and Marcel Barbeau. Second favorite is Op Art, like that we find (in a modified and delicate form) in Francois Thepot.

However, there is scarcely any Pop Art, unless we count the suave renditions of Les Levine or perhaps Greg Curnoe. Nor is there much of the school of Magic Realism, a school which is especially popular in Canada and which counts among its outstanding members an artist like Gary Slipper. Of course, one finds Gerard Clakers and Tony Urquhart in the show but they are not really "realists". Furthermore, although some Surrealists appear, like Louis de Niverville, Louise Scott, and Cathy Senitt-Harblison, the examples are few and of a rather poor quality. Thus, the show is not at all representative of Canadian art — or Ontario art — at the present moment.

It can be argued that Bryan Robertson did not try to make his choice representative. But even within the field from which he largely did select, the Hardedge — Optical school, his examples are surprisingly unrepresentative and often downright bad. One wonders why Mr. Robertson did not buy any paintings by Gordaneer — he certainly is an artist important enough to be included in this show. Cheap too, from what I see. The French Canadians, the most exciting group in Canadian modern art, also seem to be badly represented. Where is Hurtubise? Where is Richard Lacroix? And if the show has a great deal, perhaps even too much Comtois sculpture, why is there no Rita Lentredre? Has her divorce from Comtois meant the sudden demise of her paintings? And incidentally, where oh where is Harold Town?

In the chosen field of selection then, the representation seems to me bad. So are many of the pictures. But for kindness sake, a short review of the good pictures in the show may be helpful.

The top two pictures in the show are Jack Bush's "Granberry Green", a superbly loose and yet controlled and powerful painting, and Greg Curnoe's "Family Painting Number Three", a work of a completely different sort — charming and intimate, more like a frozen Bonnard interior (without the super sweetness of the French painter). The Curnoe painting has two interesting characters — Owen 3 (remember the painting is No. 3) and Samatha, the cat, whose behind we see. All in all, this is a very happy work, "Poppy" and gay. There are also two very fine drawings by Curnoe, one of which "Sheila and her foot" I found intensely satisfying and also quite amusing.

Among the second rank of paintings I would place Peter Deutch's "Grand Tour" top on the list. It looks technically clean in a room full of messy works. I think Graham Coughtry's "Revolve" belongs in this rating too. It's quite an exciting, glowing picture. However, his "Tryptich No. 1", where gold figures hugging themselves run through mauve seemed to me unintentionally humorous. The third picture in the show by Coughtry — "Two Figure Series II" — seemed to me bad because it was poorly composed and had an unfortunate colour range.

One work that was very good was a Sarah H. Gerovitz etching, "Entr'Acte". Of all the etchings in the show, this used the medium best. The composition is exquisite and it was quite touching to see such fine craftsmanship for a change.

Among the sculpture, Walter Redinger's "Composition Vertical" was outstanding. A very intense, macabre piece, it showed a white nude male boxed into an area in an alarming way. The theme is old, the presentation is novel.

One of the side-effects of a show like this is that some less well-known figures gain display of their work. Marcel Jean's sculptures were new to me and I found them witty and compellingly done.

Finally then, go to the Art Gallery show but watch out for its bias.

peter paranoid and the friendly stranger

A few days ago a friend of mine in one of the university men's residences informed me that one of the cleaning ladies had seen two RCMP plainclothesmen wandering through the halls—sniffing the air with their finely tuned noses no doubt. The same day another friend told me that someone from the department of justice had contacted the father of a friend of his and informed him that his son's name was on a list and to please be careful—please son. Some time before the final examinations last May, a few students in residence were informed by a dean concerned about the possible use of LSD in the residence, that such use was forbidden and if they wished to remain in residence they had better conduct themselves accordingly.

David DePoe of David DePoe fame was visiting the campus this week and said that the word from the Village was that a large bust on the university campus was imminent; indeed, the Big Bust seems to be awaited with what resembles eager anticipation, judging by the conversation from the tiny groups sitting around burning incense sticks on the campus grass these sunny afternoons.

They will Rape! Kill...

Innuendo? Idle rumor? Perhaps not. Peter Paranoid does come around from time to time to instigate groundless panic among the dealers (your neighborhood Friendly Strangers who sell marijuana), and the many thousands of heads in this city. In their endless battle against crime the RCMP Narcotics squad (herein after known as Narks) wages a zealous campaign to protect the young people of this country from becoming addicted to the Killer Weed and Insaniously Causing LSD, thereby turning to Prostitution, Heroin, Thievery Sexual Immorality and Uncontrollable Violence; so concerned are they, that they will often tear the house apart, beat you up and hassle you for month in order to get you busted—for your own good.

Despite a growing opposition by lawyers, medical men, researchers and a significant minority of informed journalists against the harshness of laws dealing with LSD and marijuana — especially marijuana (see Volkmar Richter's editorial on pg 4 of this issue of the Varsity) — the Narks seem determined to put an End to it All. Their task is indeed difficult; add to the informed opposition to their tactics and ends, the fact that pot has become not the enclave and luxury of the hippies, but has spread at an alarming (refreshing?) rate into the middle classes—including, of course, the leaders of tomorrow in our universities and high schools. (A recent Newsweek article describes at length the Middle Class pot scene). It's enough to make a Nark freak out.

The Scholastic Heads

Which brings us to the nasty rumors which have been disturbing the fine autumnal peace of our Alma Mater these past few weeks. Will there be a Bust on the U of T campus in the near future (this weekend as many are suggesting)?

For the past four or five years the pot scene on campus has existed in significant numbers; until last year however, with the UC psychedelic festival and its attendant publicity, the campus was relatively undisturbed by busts and hassles from the Narks. During this same period of time, however, the jails were accommodating a growing number of hippies and other unemployed potheads.

It seems that during this time the impartial arm of law and order was ignoring the scene on campus — which has not been any more secret or underground than anywhere else. It is suggested that there are perhaps close to two thousand people at U of T, graduate and undergraduate, who smoke marijuana with some degree of regularity, as well as a fairly large number on the faculty; and the numbers are growing.

Yet there have been no busts to speak of on the U of T campus.

It is not readily clear why, but it has been suggested that the Narks are not all that anxious to point out the many thousands of criminals in the schools, professions and suburbs who violate a federal law every time they get high on grass. Worse yet, it suggests that these many thousands reveal a flagrant chaotic anarchy, as they mock the law of the land.

As marijuana becomes less and less underground, and as more and more chemistry students conduct funny experiments in their labs, the Narks are faced with a serious dilemma: who to bust? The jails couldn't possibly hold all the people who now smoke the Killer Weed.

Yet we seem to have reached a point of national hysteria, concerning psychedelic drugs; we have just lived through the summer of 1967, a freak out summer with new music, mass migrations of the tribes to Frisco, Sergeant Pepper—in short, a summer when many young people got stoned; most of them are now back in school. Needless to say administrators in the colleges and high-schools are beginning to share the concern of the Narks. What to do! what to do! ... Arghhh!

The Nark as Student...

It is highly likely that the peace will be shattered, if not this week-end then in the near future, with a number of busts and attempted busts by the horsemen; they will certainly not put an end to the pot or acid scene on campus, nor does it seem likely that they think they will. But they have set Peter Paranoid on the loose in an attempt to control things for awhile — if we are to believe the rumors of undercover agents (students) operating on campus.

It seems like a contradiction in terms to turn on with someone who isn't a friend, or to take a trip with someone who you don't trust; yet that is part of their fear psychology; they want you looking over your shoulder at your friend, and suspicious of the girl you're sleeping with. Nasty business.

Per Ardua Ad Astra...

So be prepared — but not too uptight. These are indeed difficult times and many will suffer and be hurt by those who don't want young people to smoke funny cigarettes or taste the nice little white, blue, and pink tabs.

If busted — and we hope not — insist on your rights (lawyer, phone call, don't answer any questions, etc.), and be reasonably co-operative with the police during the process. It is an unpleasant prospect but only temporarily, as the laws are probably going to be more lenient in the future; at the rate pot and acid are spreading throughout society at the present time, a criminal record (if that's your concern) for pot or acid will not mean as much in five to ten years.

More important, I suppose, is the guilt feeling many young people associate with a criminal record and being busted—a hassle which can only be resolved by oneself.

Because you like to get high, are you as guilty as those who drop napalm who rough up hippies, drunks, and people they don't like generally? as guilty as the judge who refuses to be lenient in your case because you have long hair and thinks a short stay in jail will mend your ways? How come you're wandering around scott free anyway, son?

Have a nice Thanksgiving, enjoy your turkey and see to it that there's nothing but raisins in the dressing.

The Story of O

By KATHERINE COLLINS

Story of O by Pauline Réage — Grove Press.

Story of O has been called many things: the most extraordinary underground classic, an ironic fable of unfreedom, much more poetic than de Sade's Justine, a significant work of literature, etc. To me it was initially only strange and unbelievable, an unpleasant experience of negative value. O might have stood for Outlandish and even for Ordure.

The French author, Pauline Réage, has kept her identity a secret from the public. Small preoccupations with dress and make-up in the story definitely suggest a woman, as does the mindless logic of the heroine O, who acts out of an inner necessity that appears superficially irrational.

The world Réage has created is weird, mysterious, Bosch-like. The sexual perversions and tortures are described as calmly as a cherry orchard in Anne of Green Gables. The lucid style is flawless; the story, masterfully unravelled; the tale it tells, unbelievably sick.

Story of O begins with O being taken by her lover René to a chateau called Roissy. Here she, along with others, is converted effectively into a useful chattel for the 'lovers of Roissy', figures of a weird Gothic warp who rape her or whip her at will to the immense delight of René. This same lover can hardly bear to hear her scream when she is whipped, his ecstasy is so great.

O submits to all this because she 'loves' René. After she leaves Roissy wearing an iron ring to symbolize her slavery, René hands her over totally to Sir Stephen, his English half-brother (an international gesture?) who suddenly appears on the scene. He surpasses René in sadism; the next chapter explains how he has O marked with branding irons. In "The Owl", the last chapter, we move into the final perversion—Sir Stephen publicly exposes the marked body of O at a party, masked in the anonymity of an owl's head. The book stops here in a climax of final debasement although a note at the end says there is a second ending in which O commits suicide.

The clarity and intimacy with which this world is described convince one of the author's familiarity with perversion. No wonder, as her translator claims, "To this day no one knows who Pauline Réage is." The bestiality of the men who use O; the sadism of the torture-scenes, and O's masochism which she admits: "... she liked the idea of torture... she was happy to have gone through it, happier still if it had been especially cruel and prolonged" all suggest that Pauline is a pervert.

There is, however, a deeper level on which to approach this book than that of mere eroticism and perversion. Behind the Story of O is the motif of sacrifice, or so it seems.

In an almost religious surrender O gives her body for love of René to whomever and whatever he wishes.

Nevertheless, as the story of prostitution, lesbianism, and masochism progresses, we realize that it is not a real sacrifice because O abandons herself for purely selfish reasons. Near the centre of the book her "love" for René dies, and she attaches it to Sir Stephen who uses her yet more cruelly and obscenely. O's 'sacrifice' is a blind and sub-conscious desire for annihilation of the self in a complete abandonment to sensual feeling, whether pleasure or pain. She does not ascend towards love but rather descends towards hate in an ecstasy of anti-being. In this sense one agrees with de Mandiargues in his preface: "Story of O... is indeed a mystic book!" O's passion to surrender, her amazing passivity, her final slavery are all symptoms of her desire to abdicate all responsibility of self, to achieve an intensity in which she no longer exists, to reach a blank unconsciousness akin to death. The movement towards darkness throughout the book culminates with the final darkness of death in the second ending.

The psychology here has a woman's unreason in it, but O herself does not have a woman's full personality. Her obsession is negative and demonic; the concept of woman as earth-mother is as alien to Story of O as the humour of a Charles Schulz; as in the Bower of Bliss in Spenser's Faerie Queene, there is no fecundity here, no fruitfulness in the relationships.

Rather it is the impotent pleasure-dream of a play-boy-world where all is in glossy full-colour but sterile.

D. H. Lawrence's writings about sex can be wildly beautiful at times because he has integrated it into a mystical whole; Réage's Story of O is too narrow, too bestial, too cruel to come anywhere near beauty. It is a slyly fantasized revolving around the passive heroine, a nightmare of non-life from which one might wake up screaming...

accident etc.

By KATHERINE O'KEEFE

The other day in Central Park New York, Claes Oldenburg created what is supposed to be the world's first invisible sculpture. Two grave diggers union men, so they got fifty dollars an hour, dug a grave for a few hours and then filled it in. City Hall officials and cultural assistants watched with a mixed bag of feelings. "Fifty dollars an hour to stitch the Emperor's new clothes" was in strenuous competition with "Oldenburg's genius". Oldenburg said that he grew up in New York City and loved it. This loosening of the dirt was to him a significant expression and communication, involving the squirrels and birds and worms and passing helicopters. It would seem that he feels that people either dig him or they don't because that's all there is to know about Monday's newspaper.

But this review is obliged to admit that all sorts of cosmic, not to mention comic, umbras are emanating from that invisible sculpture. The following dialogue for example, was jarred loose from the marble block of this review's consciousness. "If Oldenburg wanted to show how he liked the spectacle and action and shapes of New York why didn't he make a sculpture of all the people and cars, squirrels, birds and worms. Then people would look at it and see what he saw". Oratio: Because the wonderful people, trucks, birds, squirrels and buildings are there. All anyone has to do is dig a grave and call it sculpture and people will look at people, cars, sticks, squirrels, birds and say: look at all that life. Of course this situation obliges them to add: that guy dug a grave and thus the cosmos is covered. Consequently inconsequence — this comic strip masquerading as a mild mannered book review will.

Not forgetting the hovering MacPherson Report, ex-hume a few books in Berkeley, where it all began. One book is Berkeley: The New Student Revolt, Hal Draper, intrd. Mario Saivo, Evergreen Black Cat. If you are in general agreement with the tribulations of the Berkeley students this is a good book to read for chronology. It is not easy to get along without dates but it is not easy to go through or remember a whole series of dates unless a little festoon of anecdote accusation or awful event hangs from each. Due to his committed, political outlook Mr. Draper's history is easy to remember.

The book is what would now commonly be called anti-Establishment and indeed the University of California and all other large institutions seem to play in this generation the role of the fierce spinster aunts of other generations. The technique of analysis used in the book is mainly political which this review considers inaccurate. Rather than understanding the length and breadth of various corridors of power as a means to reform it would seem that the contemporary generation wishes to blow brain cells and that the character of a person is synonymous with what they wish to do.

The next book The Berkeley Student Revolt ed. Seymour M. Lipset and Sheldon S. Wolin, Doubleday Anchor, embraces an extremely wide range of opinion. Its editor is not popular with any section of the large and crowded audience of this review's opinions. But he has included enough from each direction (North by North West included) to enable the reader to see where the students were sitting, and where the faculty was running. (There is, buy the way, a book put out by the students. This eagle eared reporter didn't pick up that news till too late, having trusted a yellow coated member of the Coles Establishment). At any rate this Book of the Berkeley Student Revolt is inclusive enough to be one of wild and astonishing confederations of print where the most contradictory (and often disagreeable) opinions repose quietly together though held down only by thin sheets of paper. The secret is print technology of course.

Here is one example. As you know the Berkeley students thought that they were concerned with civil rights, free speech, and above all, the effect of educational systems as they now exist upon the individuals those systems most affect. Professor Lipset in his article "University Student Politics" compares the Berkeley Free Speech Movement to the behaviour of "underdeveloped nations" (that is Asia, Africa and Latin America) and Communist countries. The suggestion that any practice is spreading from underdeveloped or communist nations is, in the U.S. enough to summon the border patrol. It amounts to severe condemnation. But if it were a question of civil rights and just treatment for the Negro? Student demonstrations and politics in Professor Lipset's view are "deviant" behaviour fostered by the change, freedom and insecurity of college life. And:

"Participation in politics may be viewed as an alternative to other forms of student extra-curricular activities — organized sports — to divert the adolescent energy." (p. 7-8)

It would seem to be Professor Lipset's position that a combination of tough exams and sports will see a student through his student situation into his secure teaching position from which place it will be easier for said student to ignore the civil rights (or any other). Professor Lipset is probably correct. But he doesn't raise or answer the question: what will happen when, because they are busy kicking a football around, even deviant students can't see serious injustice? And! how well does anyone read or think who refuses to look at his contemporary world for fear he might act? These and other questions, raised by other articles that ignore equally serious issues, drag me from my chair and leave me standing before blank doors muttering, "Am I bearing you? Are you hearing them? Are you really saying THAT in our only life?"

But anyhow, if one wants to sort of sport through the book without grinding analysis one might make up Compare, Contrast and Discuss lists. Who thinks the students have anything to say? When? When they talk about Lincoln, Schlesinger, Tanzania and the Lancasterian kings? When they talk about themselves, their friends and their reactions? After awhile the students who are repetitiously limited to "me in my life," "me in my life" will seem engaging but not so intellectually engaged as those who are hurling political, sociological and other above their heads. Chancellor Strong, Paul Goodman, Clark Kerr, Nathan Glazer, even Hal Draper. That's the time to remember that these students won by their actions.

And this is the time to summon up Claes Oldenburg and his gesture toward sculpture because we up here have our own problems. For example, life is not as exciting as it is in the U.S. newspapers. Revolution? Quiet Evolution is the title of a study of Ontario's school system and RRRR often does seem to be the difference between the U.S. and Canada. There will be no revolution here. It's not just that ideas that seem good in the far and lurid California sun lose their tan in the near Northern snow glare and slush. (The Waterloo Love In was dispersed by cold wind). It's also that the U.S. is Canada's Distant Early Warning System. But mainly it's because the students won by using unprintable gestures and Canada, a nineteenth century country, isn't ready for that.

JAZZ

hungarian freedom fighter

By JACK McCAFFREY

The feedback you hear these nights at the Colonial Tavern is being deliberately manufactured by a former Hungarian Freedom Fighter.

Reaching a climactic point in the development of his solo, Gabor Szabo brings his acoustic guitar with electric pick-up in close to the microphone. His right hand ceases to pluck the strings; the fingers of his left hand simply hold the strings to indicate the desired pitch, and then feedback produces a loud moaning or whining wail.

Szabo can play short melodic phrases in this way; however he is still experimenting with the feedback technique, which works only over a short period of time and only for certain pitches.

After the 1956 uprising in Hungary, Gabor Szabo came on scholarship to Boston to study jazz at the Berklee School of Music. He first came to prominence with the Cbico Hamilton Quintet. The sensitive melodic interplay between Szabo and Charles Lloyd is the highlight of Passin Thru, a record made by the Hamilton quintet in the early '60's.

On Jazz Raga, his latest Impulse recording, Szabo allegedly makes an attempt to bring together Indian classical music and jazz by overdubbing a sitar onto rock-jazz versions of tunes like "Summertime" and Jagger's "Paint it Black". Because of the enormous differences between the two musics, the rudimentary level of Szabo's sitar technique, and the obvious shallowness of the whole idea, no meaningful synthesis takes place. It is a gimmick, and a not very original one at that, to cash in on the current popularity of Indian music.

This week and next, the Colonial promises us "new sounds in jazz" — Indian ragas, exotic rhythms, etc. However, what we hear is Gabor Szabo, whose style and conception are unlike any other jazz guitarist's, playing his own highly personal music.

Szabo runs up and down his instrument playing long, intricate, rhythmically complex melodies. Sometimes these take on a Greek tinge, as he repeats each note in a series very fast and frequently. As he abruptly ends a long roller-coaster melodic phrase, he begins playing a succession of repeated dissonant chords; then he gradually thins the harmonies until he is working over a simple phrase built around one note whose pitch he twists and bends.

Then, using the tonic note as ground, he plays a series of stark fourths and fifths, then starts to work in seconds and sevenths, giving the music an austere, hard-cut, angular sound. At times it reminds one of the simple Hungarian folk tunes which Bartok arranged for piano.

Allied with his large repertoire of guitar sounds, ranging from a twang to a soft thick hum, to a high clipped blip, as well as melodic feedback, this variety of ideas gives richness to Szabo's own playing.

However, the rest of the group contributes little to the music. Perhaps when the harpsichordist finds his instrument, this session will cease to be merely a showcase for Szabo. At any rate, this Hungarian jazz musician is well worth hearing.

Magazines FRASER

For anyone who tires of the Time-Newsweek-U.S. News choice for weekly newsmagazines, there are two refreshing alternatives.

The New Republic, in a quiet middle-aged-left way, provides a weekly answer to those who don't trust those over thirty. NR has been providing some of the most steady and consistent analytic attacks on the contractions in American foreign policy, and is one of the few non-Underground, non-psychedelic shirt-and-tie magazines to take a strong stand against the laws on marijuana. This week, an editorial statement, headed The "Crime" of Marijuana, begins with the sentence "Physicians, like hippies, are subject to fads."

A magazine that is required reading for anyone interested in what's happening in Europe is Le Nouvel Ob- servateur. It has no North American counterpart; the closest metaphor would be a weekly Ramparts. This week: an interview with Edgar Faure — the embattled French Minister of Agriculture, now trying to cope with farmers' riots; also, a series on Castro: "A Cuba, le socialisme n'est pas tranquille."

Le Nouvel Observateur has, in Michel Cournot, perhaps Europe's most distinguished film critic. A sensitive and articulate man, he writes with insight and grace. The magazine is also principally responsible for the worldwide interest in Regis Dubray. Long before the American press 'discovered' him, Le Nouvel Observateur was leading a French press campaign on his behalf.

Both Observateur and NR are on sale at the Book Cellar.

Film BRADSHAW

Next week the Teach-In will present four afternoons of films to get involved by, starting Tuesday with The Prisoner. Alec Guinness and Jack Hawkins, two of Britain's finest actors, make it eminently worth seeing. Showings begin at four in East Hall, U.C. Admission free!

For Pinter-Losey fans, a fascinating early film of theirs, The Servant will be on at the Elektra next week (closed Monday) together with The Innocents (James' Turn of the Screw).

The Memory Lane Silent Film Club starts tonight with The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, on the third floor of 22 College. To find out more about their programme call 533-4515. The French Cineclub are offering students ten films (sans sous-titre) for six dollars beginning Oct. 23 at the Century theatre. For application form write 15 Lynwood Ave., Toronto 7.

Cul-de-Sac is funny and does not leave you feeling guilty about having missed the point (if there was one). It is certain to have a wider appeal than Polanski's last, Repulsion.

The Family Way I certainly would not recommend despite creditable performances by John Mills and Marjorie Rhodes. Its innumerable plot and dialogue clichés are intolerable (Schroeder beat the sensitive young hero to Beethoven by a good decade).

Blow-Up is back in town and certainly worth seeing (no matter if you find Antonioni generally boring). Grand Prix is still on and in my opinion has been unfairly faulted for weak plot.

Apologies! I am informed that Joe Medjuck, despite helpful comments, was not an organizer of the SMC Film Club.

Shakespeare Wallah, Enter Laughing. Gone with the Wind are coming.

Art MURRAY

Don't miss the Ontario Centennial Art Exhibition at the Art Gallery of Ontario this week (closes Oct. 14). It displays a peculiar but always lively sense of selection.

David Sorensen is showing till Oct. 17 at the Carmen Lamanna Gallery, Alma Duncan drawings (very beautifully detailed) are at Isaacs till Oct 12, and Suzanne Bergeron is showing at Roberts. Bergeron is interesting: she has the guts not to frame any of her paintings except for the cheapest of wood surrounds. It shows she doesn't care for the public. Her paintings are dynamic and feminine and have a good sense of color.

Don't forget High Park on Sunday. Vaillancourt should have got his piece up by now.

Theatre GORDON

Hoo hah! What a week is coming up! Gideon, Godot, and Saul are going to be dotted around the campus as the Teach-In starts to kick up its cultural heels and discovers that drama can delightfully instruct. Waiting for Godot, by Samuel Beckett, perhaps THE great play of the past decade will be on view at Cartwright Hall, St. Hilda's College; Gideon, by Paddy Chayefsky manages to deal with man's rejection of a too-demanding God without the pompous poetry and posturing that most playwrights feel the subject requires. The play will be at the Central Library Theatre; and Endor, a new play that deals with the most tragic figure in the Old Testament . . . Saul. Howard Nemerov's play which sees Saul as the modern Everyman will be at Brennan Hall at St. Mikes, noon hour from Oct. 10-13. The other plays will run evenings from Oct. 10 to that Saturday, the 14th.

After The Fantasticks finish at the Royal Alex, Anne of Green Gables returns to complete its run. The theatre will be dark for a week to give the staff a chance to recuperate from the past three weeks of unremitting, cloying sweetness.

Then come the A.P.A., Number 10 Downing St. with Alastair Sim and later on, Olivier's National Theatre of Great Britain. Who says that Toronto's a nothing theatre town?

Music GODDARD

One warms up on smaller potatoes first. One of our more faithful fags around here went to a recital and his review follows forthwith: "The question about soprano Mary Simmons is not whether or not she can sing, but rather what type of material should be her medium. The answer to this question is the ultimate judgment upon her artistry. Last Sunday's Hart House concert illustrated the difficulty in making such an answer. Certainly Miss Simmons sings—at times exquisitely. The verde instilled in the allegro section, 'Ma poi morte . . .' of Handel's Piangero La Sorte Mia, contrasted by the smoothly flowing sorto voce achieved in Schubert's Nacht und Traume, attested to a sensitive striving towards as wide a tonal range as possible. The fact that her ambitions were not always achieved — that the focus was not to the end of the work for instance — gave fuel to the fires of doubt concerning the selections chosen. But then there was the exquisite rendition of Die Post in as confident a chamber style as could be imagined. The first two groups, Handel, Mendelssohn and Schubert, were characterized by sensitivity and subtlety. Bu the voice was not always her own. The approach was restrained and constricted. The closed eyes in soft passages betrayed a lack of assurance that would preclude that the face remain an expressive feature of the singing.

But the Poulenc and Strauss selections were right in every way. The former's 'Banalities' were sung with a steadiness of expression and tone expected from a singer who has chosen so often to sing contemporary music. The four Strauss selections were the highlight of the entire program: the big beautiful voice soared over the wide intervals with a majesty not heard earlier. Stuart Hamilton's accompaniment, always adequate, was notably inspired in the Strauss. Indeed, Poulenc and Strauss came closest to the answer for Miss Simon's program problems. Although her musicianship is apt in any medium, it is the modern and the grand that she should be exploring because her mind and her voice are that way." And that, it seems, is the last musical event on campus for a while. However, the excellent Soviet pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy will be at Massey Hall Oct. 12 (starting at 8:30), and the Siegle-Schwall band is at the Riverboat for two more nights. (Ignore the lunatic folk-reviewer for the Globe and Mail — they're no that bad. He tends to be a purist mentally, at times.)

Apathy threatens Commonwealth: Smith

By SUE CARTER

Arnold Smith, the secretary-general of the British Commonwealth, warned Wednesday that public apathy is a more serious threat to the Commonwealth than the Rhodesian crisis.

Addressing a Convocation Hall audience on Canada and the New Commonwealth, Mr. Smith, centennial professor for October, said:

"I have always been less concerned that the Commonwealth would blow up with a bang over a crisis, even the Rhodesian crisis, than that it could subside into ineffectiveness, with or without a whimper."

However, the Commonwealth provides a respected framework for international contacts in diverse fields, Mr. Smith asserted, and it would be "monumental folly not to build on this in the coming decades."

"Great power" politics have been replaced by tensions between developed and underdeveloped areas, he said. The Commonwealth has ensured its relevance in this world by evolving from an "exclusive white club" to a "representative cross-section of mankind."

Canada, by virtue of its multi-racial, multi-linguistic composition, is in an excellent position to contribute to, and to benefit from its Commonwealth connection, Mr. Smith said.

Canada has led in shaping the present Commonwealth because its domestic experience has shown "the importance of tolerance, imagination and the identification of underlying common interests," he said.

In turn the Commonwealth connection, he said, has given Canada access to wider horizons and has heightened the awareness which is essential for pursuance of a realistic role in world affairs.

U of T enrolment totals over 27,000

By JIM COWAN

More than 27,000 full and part-time students will be attending classes at the University of Toronto this year, an increase of 2,000 over last year.

Dr. W. Szenci, assistant director in the office of statistics and records, said more than 5,500 freshmen have registered this year. This brings the total full-time undergraduate enrolment to 16,500.

About 5,000 graduate students, 6,300 part-time students and 12,000 students in non-degree granting courses have also enrolled.

Among the professional faculties, the freshman engineering class increased to 766 from 651. Engineering has not yet had to place any restrictions on its first-year class.

Professional students make up almost a quarter of the total full-time undergraduate enrolment. This figure does not include the college of education.

This year only 3,740 first-year students were admitted class on the St. George campus. The remainder were enrolled at the satellite colleges of Scarborough and Erin- dale.

Scarborough College this year registered 960 students and Erindale registered 158. By 1975 the two colleges are expecting to serve some 3,000 students.

Dr. Szenci also said the projected enrolment of full time students was expected to reach 34,000 by 1975-76. This compares with an enrolment of 12,700 in 1957-58.

Sixty-five per cent of U of T students are Metro residents. Another 26 per cent come from other parts of Ontario, three per cent from the rest of Canada, and six per cent from foreign countries.

There are about 1,500 foreign students at U of T.

Victoria College is still the largest college on campus with 2,400 students.

Motion to fire Ubysey editor quashed

VANCOUVER (CUP)—Attempts to fire and officially censure Ubysey editor Danny Stoffman were thwarted at Monday night's Alma Mater society council meeting.

The council narrowly defeated a motion to censure Stoffman for opinions expressed in editorials. An amendment to fire the editor was also quashed.

Mike Coleman, clubs chairman, claimed several editorials in the Ubysey misrepresented his views.

"It's a freedom of the press issue," said AMS treasurer Dave Hoye, who opposed the motion.

"The Ubysey is responsible to council," said Law Society president Jim Taylor, voting for the censure motion.

Its budget is supplied to the extent of $16,000. What the members of the Ubysey want to be is a totally irresponsible press."

"I read the editorial - it's exactly what I thought," said second vice president Kim Campbell. "Sometimes the truth hurts."

President Shaun Sullivan

voted against the censure motion, supporting the right of the press to criticize.

"I fully expect to be crapped on by the Ubysey on the coming year and would be surprised if it didn't happen."

Hart House dance

The Hart House Fall Dance scheduled for tomorrow night has been CANCELLED.

"It's all due to the good weather," Hart House spokesman said. "The students are going home for the weekend."

It will be replaced by a street dance at Soldiers Towel.

Refunds on dance tickets are available at Hart House and the SAC building.

Scullers enter first regatta

Varsity scullers embark for the first time tomorrow at the Toronto Argonaut Rowing Club. Regatta time is 11:00 a.m., as crews from York, Ryerson, Western, McMaster and Brock join Toronto in the quest for this year's championship.

Blues will field crews in all four categories — freshman, junior varsity, lightweight, and senior varsity — and hope to improve on last year's third place showing.

Defending champion McMaster will also float four crews, as will Western. York and Ryerson will enter senior varsity crews only.

Prospective fans are reminded that they can catch all the action tomorrow and still return in time for the Varsity- McGill football game.

Soppelsa leads Blues to 6-0 win

The soccer Blues meet McGill Redmen tomorrow at 11 o'clock on the back campus in what could be the first of a two-game total-goal play-off series, or merely an exhibition. Little is known about the McGill team, but Blues must rate as favourites after their convincing 6-0 victory over McMaster last Wednesday.

In that game, Frank Soppelsa had three goals while Graham Shiels, Austris Liepa, and Ormond Mendes added one each.

From the kickoff, Blues showed poise and ability while Marauders hustled desperately to make a contest out of the game.

Varsity's most dangerous attacks came from the wings where Ron Muir and Graham Shiels had Mac defenders running in circles.

Soppelsa got his first goal from a scramble in front of the net at the twenty-five minute mark, and added another ten minutes later by blasting the ball past a bewildered Mac goalie.

After the crossover, Blues kept the pressure on and soon Soppelsa had his third goal of the afternoon as the Mac netminder found his shot just too hot to handle. Blues did not let up and Graham Shiels scored on a rising shot to the upper corner of the net.

McMaster was now relying on individual efforts but Blues' defensive line of Alan Cragg, Eric Sereda and Bill Nepotiuik thwarted their forwards. And what the defense could not cope with, Erving Stach took care of.

Seconds lose sloppy match

By DOUG WOODS

Varsity seconds opened their league season on Wednesday with a 5-0 loss to York University firsts, on York's new campus at Keele and Finch.

Neither side could mount a dangerous attack until well into the second half, when York backs managed to hold on to the ball and run it over for a try.

Despite disorganized play, both teams managed some beautiful recovery plays, but inaccurate kicking spoiled much of the game.

Scott McClure was a standout of Toronto throughout the game, making several fine breaks and repeatedly destroying York attacks with hard, driving tackles.

On Saturday, Blues first team open their league season against McGill on the back campus at o'clock. Blues have won their first three games this year and they have proved improved each time they play. Last year they were beaten by McGill in a game that could have gone either way, and they are determined to avenge that defeat on Saturday.

Blues have strength in all positions and are fit enough to play peak football from first to final whistle.

PIGSKIN PREVIEW

Varsity's chances hinge on offense

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Varsity Sports Editor

1966 REVIEW

Almost forgotten in light of their sag at the end of the season was the fact that Blues had their best won and lost record since 1959. It was an impressive debut for head coach Ron Murphy.

After slithering by McMaster, 26-20, and humiliating Waterloo 50-2, Varsity began the regular SIFL schedule before the home fans by stunning Western Mustangs, the pre-season favourites, 45-7. Quarterback Bryce Taylor continued to hold a hot hand the following week, leading Blues to their first win in Kingston in seven years, 28-19 over Golden Gaels.

An undefeated season and a second successive Yates Cup seemed certainties now, but Blues hit an unexpected snag in their next two games against McGill Redmen. Although they lost both games by more than two touchdowns, the understaffed Redmen gave Varsity a severe physical pounding from which they never quite recovered. Queen's rolled into Varsity Stadium for the key game of the season, and left clutching a well-earned 23-15 victory, forcing a deadlock for top spot.

Blues' final regular season game was a formality which they stole from the frustrated Mustangs 21-20. Blues fell in the playoff to the surging Gaels 50-7.

Despite their gloomy finish, Blues dominated all-star selections, placing eleven men on the squad. Offensively, guard Bob Pampe, tackles Jim Kellan and Arnie Carefoote, end Mike Eben, quarterback Bryce Taylor, and fullback Mike Raham made the team, while end Laird Elliott, tackles Alex Squires and Alex Topps, linebacker Ranny Parker, and halfback Ian Kirkpatrick made it as defensive all-stars.

1967 PREVIEW

So far this season Blues have played six quarters of terrible football and two quarters of sound, aggressive football. The big question is which will prevail for the next six games. On paper it should be the latter as Murphy has lost only five of his all-stars, Pampe, Taylor, Elliott, Parker, and Kirkpatrick, as well as eight others, none of whom appear hard to replace. Depth has always been a feature of Varsity football teams.

VARSIY BLUES

Blues' offense has been shaky to date as it adjusts to the new I-formation. Fullback Mike Raham, who led the league in scoring and rushing, is the anchor man. He will receive support from spectacular rookie Wolfgang Gut, Pete Broadhurst, Mike Eben, who has shifted to wingback, and ends Jim Ware and Brent Morris. The whole operation hinges on quarterback Bryce Taylor's replacement, currently a struggle between Bob Amer and Vic Alboini.

Blues appear very strong defensively. Led by captain Mike Wright, ably augmented by Jim and Bill Bennett, Alex Squires and Topps, the defense will give up scant yardage along the ground, while the defensive backfield has yet to be tested by a strong passing game due mainly to a fierce rush from the line.

Paul McKay has developed tremendously as a punter and may share field goal and convert duties with newcomer Bill Stankovic.

OUTLOOK

Blues appear a lot like Hamilton Tiger Cats. They have a superb, consistent defense but only a hot-and-cold offense. The key to Blues' chances will probably be the performance of quarter backs Amer and Alboini. If Alboini can maintain his play of last Saturday, Blues could conceivably upset Queen's. But right now, that's still an "if". Certainly, the material is present in the backfield, and Mike Raham can provide most of the glue but not all of it.

The defense alone is enough to ensure second-place for Blues. A first place finish is definitely out of reach. However, from their strong showing in the second half against Western, Blues may have a chance at forcing a play-off by beating Gaels at home. Coach Murphy's big advantage is the experience his team will get by playing the soft-touch Mustangs and Redmen right off the bat. By the time they play Queen's, momentum may carry Blues home.

IT'S FOOTBALL TIME AGAIN!

SEASON OPENS

Blues should defeat weakened Redmen

By BOB CLARK

The Senior Intercollegiate Football League opens its last season as a four-team aristocracy tomorrow, as McGill University Redmen visit the University of Toronto Blues.

Next year, the noble experiment begins with two more teams, McMaster and U of Waterloo, being added to the hitherto elite four. Only once, in 1953, was an additional team added, and that year McMaster went through a dismal, winless season. However, the junior loop to which Mac and Waterloo belong have seen steady years of gradual improvement.

McGill, weak sister of the league for the last couple of seasons, is showing little in the way of improvement. A large scale turnover has hit McGill for the second straight year, but this year, loss of such notables as fullback Pete Howlett, pass receiver Al Schreiber and first string quarterback Robin McNeil spells deficiency in quality more than in quantity.

Blues lost some line stalwarts as well as their top quarterback, Bryce Taylor, but have added strong rookie strength.

Wolfgang Gut, just another unsung rookie at 2 p.m. last Saturday, displayed strong broken field running ability that has thrust him into a starting role in one of the halfback slots for tomorrow's game. All-star Mike Raham, top rusher last year, may find extra running room this year when opposition defences find that Blues' have another potentially dangerous sprinter.

Pete Broadhurst, formerly of Queen's, has returned after a year of academic ineligibility, and Varsity coach Ron Murphy plans to move him from defence to the offensive backfield against Redmen.

The rest of Blues' starting offence is essentially unchanged. Brent Morris and Jim Ware are scheduled to start at the ends, with Mike Eben again in the flanker position. Don Rogers will go at centre, with Ron Wakelin and Gord Whitaker, at guards, and Arnie Carefoot and Jim Kellam, the tackles.

Although McGill's chances of upsetting Blues are extremely thin, the Redmen are one of the best conditioned teams in the league. Last year, with Blues apparently on their way to an undefeated season, McGill pounded Varsity physically in back to back games. Blues were never the same.

Coach Murphy again expects Redmen to be physically tough, and must be secretly flinching about the prospects of getting knocked out of the running early.

The quarterback battle has not yet been settled. Although Murphy refused to even hint at who his starting signal caller might be, the diminutive Vic Alboini was much more impressive in the second half that was Bob Amer in the first against Western. However, Amer received much less protection from his line.

BLUENOTES: John Gordon and Larry DeRocher will not dress, because of injuries, but Glen Markle is slated to be in uniform... Despite the unspectacular running game last week, coach Ron Murphy still hopes to develop a predominantly ground-oriented attack...

rod mickleburgh

By crackie, Ebenezer, it is football time again. Time to unleash the effigy twine, uncork the still swill, and bind of ma in the basement. Time to don raccoon respelndence, lubricate the lungs, and get out to the ballpark.

Once there, it's time to swear, suffer, sip and swagger before your sweetie as you treat her to the big game. Men run around on the field and people peep from the bleachers. That's what it's all about.

With football fever rampant as the SIFL opens tomorrow, the Varsity sports department, always ready when the cause is just, has dispatched roving correspondent Scoop Bluebottle, to the playing fields of Eton where he reports "it's not how you win or lose but whether you conduct yourself in a gentlemanly manner at all times during athletic endeavour whenever the referee happens to glance one's way." That Scoop's a real card; he'll have to be dealt with. (sotto "ho ho")

During his egress to Eton, dear Scoop buttonholed a few famous personages concerning Saturday's game at the Stadium. (Funny how we got around to that). He asked these questions and got these replies.

SCOOP: Mr. Diefenbaker, what do you think of the SIFL's decision to expand to two divisions next year?

HONEST JOHN: Maise frairs canadienns. My record is clear. I have never believed in discrimination of any sort. With all my heart (Olive! have you seen Happy?) I ask the SIFL to reconsider. There should be NO division in this country. There should be one Canada and no division. I put it to you with all my heart.

SCOOP: Mr. McLuhan, what do you feel is the role of football in the electronic society?

Engineers oppose draft dodger aid

Engineering students have voted 16 to 1 against a Students Administrative Council proposal to give aid to draft dodgers.

The results of an Engineering Society referendum on the issue, to which, 35 per cent of engineering students responded, were disclosed at a meeting of the society last night.

Out of 566 who answered the poll, 94 per cent said they opposed the use of student funds "by an organization such as SAC" to help draft dodgers.

Eighty-seven per cent of those polled did not think SAC or any other organization should invite draft dodgers into Canada.

Eighty-two per cent did not think SAC should commit students to a particular stand on the issue.

SAC will vote tonight on a resolution to allocate funds to bring draft dodgers into Canada.

Engineering Society President John Morris said that the referendum results would not be binding for engineering SAC representatives, but that "we want them to be aware of the feelings of our students."

SAC member Art MacIl-wain (III APSC) says he will vote in accordance with the

This Varsity reporter may look good, but you ain't seen the half of it until you turn to page 13.

referendum because the results reflect his personal opinions.

"I feel that a person who comes to Canada to avoid the draft is avoiding one of his primary responsibilities as a citizen, and would probably do the same here."

SAC rep Allan Bruce (III APSC), said he favors giving aid but will take the referendum into consideration.

"I can see a clear-cut and obvious connection between the university and the war in Vietnam and the draft dodger issue," he said.

"As a corporate structure, the university is training people for an industrial society which is directly involved in the Vietnam war through economic commitments," he said.

"People cannot say that we have no reason to become involved in this issue."

Contrary to public belief, the Phantom of the LGMB never has touched a drop of fermented spirits in his hundreds of years of existence. One of "Metro's Finest," looking on at Saturday's game would gladly support this fact! P.S. Note the clenched fist?

Students protest unfairness to cult

Four University of Toronto theology students have quit their studies to protest what they called "unfairness" to members of an alleged "cult" at a Toronto church.

Abbott Conway, 27, Peter Bussell, 26, Robin Hart, 34, and Chras Walker, 25, ail of Wycliffe College, left Friday, complaining that George Snell, Anglican archbishop of Toronto, failed to support Canon Moore Smith in the controversy surrounding the death of 18-year-old Katherine Globe.

The girl died early this summer of meningitis in the home of Canon Smith. Ontario supervising coroner Dr. H. B. Cotnam called an inquest into her death, saying members of a "cult" at the church may have prevented her from receiving medical attention.

The inquest last week found Canon Smith "negligent" in the death.

Conway said in an interview that Bishop Snell could have cleared up the incident early, but refused to act.

"Bishop Snell has allowed church matters into secular courts with evidence that was theological.

"How can a priest get help from his bishop when this happens?"

He denied any implications of "witchcraft."

"You can count on it that there would never be anything like that in the Christian church," Conway said. "To call the work of the Christian church witchcraft is slanderous."

The four are seeking work in Toronto and hope to continue their theological studies.

First U of T day nursery opens

Fourteen pairs of graduate students heaved sighs of relief today as they consigned 15 pre-school children to the University of Toronto's first day nursery.

The nursery, at St. Andrew's United Church, is limited to children with at least one parent in graduate school, and will eventually take 30 or more tiny tots.

Fees range from $75 a month, to $55 in cases of extreme need. Preference in placing will be given to children with both parents as students.

Application forms can be obtained at the Graduate Students Union building, or at St. Andrews United Church, Church and Bloor.

SAC debates U of T membership in CUS

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Tonight the University of Toronto's campus politicians will form battle lines on one of the oldest and most recurrent issues in university student government.

The Students Administrative Council will debate a motion to rescind a council decision last March to hold a referendum on U of T membership in the Canadian Union of Students.

David Hunter, a former SAC vice-president made headlines March 10 when he questioned the usefulness of CUS to the students who support it.

He said a CUS referendum to be held in January would make or break the organization, which co-ordinates the efforts of about 40 university student governments across Canada.

CUS president Hugh Armstrong said then that he would try to reduce the CUS levy of 65 cents a student to 60 cents.

The CUS levy is drawn from the $8 that 19,000 full-time U of T students pay as their students-council fee.

This fee is one of the "incidental fees" a student must pay along with his tuition before he is allowed to register.

However Armstrong now has announced that the student levy would be increased to 75 cents this year.

Armstrong justifies the increase because CUS has lost revenue from universities that withdrew from it last academic term — including U of Alberta with 10,000 CUS-contributing students.

Also the CUS staff in Ottawa has been unionized and must be paid a minimum wage, he said.

The question concerning our SAC members is whether the $14,000 expenditure on CUS is worthwhile.

The anti-CUS faction will argue that the money could be spent more beneficially on more student services for U of T students only.

The pro-CUS activists will support the national organization because it provides leadership in involving students in areas of interest beyond the university. They will also say CUS is valuable in providing a government lobby for students.

The SAC meeting in Hart House will also debate a proposal to provide funds to the draft resistance program in Toronto.

Mark Satin, director of the program, will ask SAC to approve his program in principle and will ask for a monetary contribution.

The University College Literary and Athletic Society has voted $250 to the program and other campus groups have considered making donations.

The communications commission will also recommend that The Varsity operate under an 11-member board of directors rather than SAC. This would sever all links between SAC and The Varsity.

A committee appointed last year to investigate the SAC - Varsity relationship found disadvantages in SAC governing the paper. Since The Varsity comments on SAC it is awkward to have SAC holding ultimate publishing control.

This and other recommendations concerning The Varsity report will be debated in council.

A commissioner for the newly-created education commission will be elected at the meeting.

The old education commission is to be renamed the cultural affairs commission or an equivalent title.

Bob Bossin (III Inn) has let it be known that he will run for education commissioner.

He said the old education commission dealt with a wide range of topics but it didn't deal directly with the learning process.

Legal services planned for students

A group of law students and the Students Administrative Council student services commission have established a legal services bureau for University of Toronto students.

The formation of the bureau follows Varsity articles on student housing problems.

Law students, through the provincial legal aid program, can handle any misdemeanor involving less than $200 in magistrate or county court.

This category includes most landlord haggles, some narcotics charges, and many other cases in which students might become involved.

The free student service, organized by SAC member Cliff Lax (IIIILaw), provides useful experience for the law students.

More important, it can protect and help other university students in trouble. Often a well-worded legal letter can clear up landlord difficulties.

If the bureau cannot handle the case, it can put students in touch with capable lawyers.

Any student in need of such legal advice or help can pick up forms at the SAC office.

Narasimhan: world bids God goodbye

Religion is no longer a decisive factor in world affairs, says C. V. Narasimhan, United Nations under-secretary for General Assembly affairs.

He told a Convocation Hall audience Saturday that most nations have bid "goodbye to the rule of God."

"The most serious cause of world conflict today," he said, "is the religion of nationalism."

Citing examples of recent world crises such as those in Vietnam and the Middle East, he said traditional religion is a minor issue compared to "the near religious fervour of ideology".

Mr. Narasimhan, who is also chef de Cabinet of the UN, was speaking on Religious Overtones and International Conflicts. The lecture was a prelude to the Teach-In on Religion and International Affairs to be held at Varsity Arena later this month.

Noting the trend toward blending of ideologies today, he said this ambiguity of dogmas causes both internal and external conflicts. Most controversies come from a "struggle between rival camps professing the same ideology".

Tomorrow a queen will be chosen for each college and faculty to compete in the semi-finals.

From these, a panel of judges will choose the finalists Friday Oct. 20.

Chaplain advocates birth control

By ELEANOR COULTER

Rev. Eilert Frerichs, United Church chaplain for the University of Toronto, is "all in favor" of the Students Administrative Council's program of making birth control information readily available to students.

"There is a definite need for this information and I think the best way is to let the girls (senior coeds) speak openly to students and hand out pamphlets," he said in an interview.

"If students came to me, I would hand it out myself or send them to the University Health Service."

The Criminal Code of Canada makes it an offence for anyone to hand out contraceptive information. However, groups like the Planned Parenthood Association have been operating for several years without any legal repercussions.

"The law is absurd," Mr. Frerichs charged. "It's about time it was changed."

Birth control is only one topic of a Student Christian Movement seminar led by Mr. Frerichs for first-year students. The seminar is to be held throughout the school year on Thursday from 1 p.m. to 2 p.m.

"It's mainly a theoretical discussion on abortion, premarital sex, ethical problems in the university and personal relationships," said Mr. Frerichs.

"We're trying to acquaint freshmen with the new, sometimes radical ideas that they meet up with in university."

Asked about his views on legalizing marijuana, Mr. Frerichs said:

"I think the temptation might be removed if it were legalized. It might stop these 13, 14 and 15-year-olds from trying it because it's the thing to do, but I can't really say for sure."

He said he was in favor of adopting Great Britain's policy of listing drug addicts by name and giving them drugs through a special doctor's service.

"The amount of crime involved in drug addiction is just fantastic. I know for a fact that in Montreal the crime rate is greatly affected by addiction."

"Most men turn to shoplifting, women to prostitution. A drug addict may need as much as $500 a day for drugs, and this is the only way he can get it."

Mr. Frerichs condemned the United Church for withdrawing its $1,000 pledge to help draft dodgers emigrate to Canada.

"First of all, I am a founding member of a Toronto committee, mainly clergy, protesting the action of the United Church's general council, and the way it was done."

"The church has spoken out against the war in Vietnam but has failed to take on a concrete involvement in the problem. As soon as something like this happens, its nervousness and timidity prevents action."

Mr. Frerichs has collected 135 signatures to a statement condemning the general council's action. He is still collecting signatures from any member of the United Church and urges others to voice their opinions in letters to the council.

Mr. Frerichs said his main fear was that the church would become too conservative and fail to become involved meaningfully in world controversies.

York anxious over $6,700 debates loss

York University has set up a three-man committee to investigate a $6,700 deficit incurred by its student debating society after a March 31 international debate.

Members of the investigating committee are Professor John Priestly and students James MacDonald and Hart Sernick.

The university auditors last spring found the society had spent $13,600 on the debate to import, house, feed and entertain competitors from Russia and the United States.

The auditors termed as "unco-operative" the co-ordinator of the society, Harry Lipskar.

Lipskar was impeached in June by the society.

The society expected to sell $12,000 in tickets but only made $4,300.

In addition, 500 tickets worth $3,000 are missing and nobody seems to know whether they were sold.

These tickets were to be given to an agent at the University of Toronto for sale to students, says Lipskar.

The university has paid the bills and the society has promised to pay back the university on a long range basis.

Both Lipskar and the present co-ordinator of the Society, Mel Lubek, have refused to take part in the hearings unless they are open to the public.

One thousand persons purchased tickets for next weekend's International Teach-In. But organizers say that with two weeks to go there are stacks of tickets left.

Activist and writer will talk

Canon Lewis John Collins of St. Pauls Cathedral, London, is one of the fiercest activists in the Church of England.

Canon Collins marched in one of the first Alderman marches, the prototype of ban-the-bomb marches.

His urgent concern for world peace won him the chairmanship of the Bertrand Russel campaign for nuclear disarmament.

Canon Collins known for practicing his belief in the political field, has been the frequent focus for church controversies.

At 62 he still remains the chairman of Christian Action, a Group concerned with political action on such issues as Vietnam, apartheid and nuclear disarmament.

His autobiography, Faith Under Fire, is a lively explanation of his personal theology and concept of the Christian mission.

Dr. Kenneth W. Thompson is an influential writer in the field of ethics and foreign affairs.

His works include four books, co-authorship in 24 others, and contributions to 20 journals.

At 46 he is vice-president of the Rockefeller Foundation. He holds a PhD in political science from the University of Chicago.

Dr. Thompson and Canon Collins will speak in the first ITI session, Religious Faith and War.

draft-dodgers and the war at sac tonight

Your SAC representatives are sure to be talking long and hard tonight over the issue of aid to draft dodgers.

SAC will be asked to give aid to a Toronto group that gives aid to young men coming to Canada to resist compulsory military service for the United States government.

An article on the page opposite to this explains in more detail how the Toronto Anti-Draft Program, originally started by the Student Union for Peace Action and now run by draft-dodgers themselves, works.

What concerns us here is SAC's role, and therefore, your role in this issue. Should you support (either morally or financially) a program that aids young men who are breaking a law in another country? We think you should.

First of all, there is the war in Vietnam, which about 60 per cent of the draft dodgers who come to Toronto are trying to avoid. They are morally opposed to this war in a small South-East Asian country that is in the throes of a revolution, not as apologists for the U.S. say, aggression.

By interfering in the revolution, even at the invitation of the weak Saigon government, the U.S. is in effect the aggressor and these draft-dodgers don't want to participate in that aggression.

You might not agree with their analysis of the war but don't stifle their attempts at keeping out of it. The necessity of the individual soldier to resist orders which he considers crimes against humanity, was set at the Nuremberg Trials.

So, by international law, young Americans have the right to resist their government's policy. Given that, how should they do it?

It is true that the U.S. government provides means for conscientious objectors to bow out of the fighting and do alternative service. But getting that service is pretty hard.

First the draftee has to appeal his case to his draft-board, which is not made up of military personnel but prominent citizens in his own area. They hear his case and give their verdict; in effect putting him on trial as he insists on his democratic rights. Ludicrous.

Then consider the wartime atmosphere of the U.S., especially now that the war is not going well and military experts say the war may go on for five, ten years or more. That's a lot of fighting against a country that doesn't have one tenth the resources the U.S. has.

It's frustrating to the superiority-complexed American. These are the people that are on the draftee's draft board.

Then just imagine appearing before a draft board on which a member has lost a relative. What can a draftee say to explain why he should not go? Or imagine a draft board with a few extreme rightists on it. Or a Southern Draft Board hearing the appeal of a Negro.

The war-time hysteria, especially when the war is not being won and probably lost, eliminates the right of the individual. Wartime Germany saw the majority of usually cultured and sophisticated people support the most incredible crimes against Jews, gypsies, aliens. Even wartime Canada added a dark page to its history by its treatment of Japanese Canadians.

Then imagine the courage a young man has to have to actually dissent against this war, when it's a matter of national honor to support it. Look at all this in the context of the post-war anti-Communist paranoia that pervades the U.S.

When the cards are stacked so high against a young man, how can you deny him the right to run away? If you don't deny it, how can you then stand back and not help him when he gets here? Yet some SAC members will be proposing tonight that help should not be given.

They feel that SAC should not consider the issue because it involves interference in another country's affairs and because student councils should worry only about the campus and never venture outside it.

To suggest that we as students can possibly live in this world and yet isolate ourselves on the campus, is more than ludicrous. The university is set smack in the middle of society and students can't creep inside its buildings and not concern themselves with what is outside.

Anyway, we are already supporting draft-dodgers right on this campus. It's university policy, you know.

St. Michael's College has an enrollment of about 300 American students, who by staying in school are, in effect, dodging the draft. And three members of the St. Mikes student council are Americans.

In the United States, meanwhile, it is impossible for a college student to stop for awhile. They can't take a trip to Europe for a year. They have to work hard and furiously to keep their marks above a military-set minimum. In effect, the draft during wartime is a military lever to control the nation's youth and keep it working hard.

Anyway, what right has any government to force a young man into its armies against his will? Liberty, during the 1960s, means personal absolute freedom of the individual to govern his own life.

If the war were more just it would be more popular and there would be no shortage of volunteers to fight it.

how valuable are these gifts?

The faculty of Arts and Science council voted last week to invite students to participate in its policy-setting committees. The matter went through the council without opposition.

At this time it is hard to accurately assess what this move will mean to students on this campus, especially since the council has still to set the terms on which students are to be given representation. A special committee was created to study the matter and report back to the council.

As assistant dean W. T. Foulds pointed out, the six course committees to which students will be invited actually have a good deal of the say in curriculum matters in the faculty.

The various departments make recommendations as to course changes, or additions or deletions. These recommendations are then considered by these committees who then pass them on to a vote of the full council.

The council rarely reverses a decision of the committees.

Obviously, what role the students will play on the committees is important in judging what has actually been given to the students. If they are to be observers, they have been given nothing. If they are to be full participating members, they have been given a little.

Even if they have been given full representation, there is still much to be done to make this university even approach a democracy.

Students should be on all the department decision-making bodies. Some departments now have student-staff committees to recommend changes, but is this enough? Where is the final say in the department? Can such a student-staff committee actually set policy? It should be able to.

Then there is the faculty council. C. B. Macpherson recommended students should be directly elected as full voting members. This should be implemented.

Dean A. D. Allen pointed out the move of his council was not inspired by Macpherson's report. Allen had made it known to his departments last spring he wanted them to prepare for student participation in their policy-making.

Allen's move was prompted by the obvious tone the Macpherson commission hearing was taking. Student participation was being given credence far before the commission's report was published.

The principle goes back at least to last year's Duff-Berdahl report which recommended that the student voice should be heard. That report was written in response to the student agitation at Berkeley, California in 1964.

Other universities, most recently the Saskatoon campus of the University of Saskatchewan and Sir George Williams University in Montreal, have decided to give students representation on the top academic body — the Senate. This should also be done at U of T.

Then there is the Board of Governors. At the University of Toronto, the B of G is not much more than a rubber stamp for policy set by other bodies. Yet, the board does exist and student representatives should be on it for the decisions it does make.

For one thing, such representation would help add some colour to the repetitive Tory grey on our board.

Real policy at U of T is set by the provincial government and the President's Advisory Council. PAC should have student representation.

One does not have to go so far as to shout "give me liberty or give me death" before the lapses in democracy in the modern university become apparent.

Why SAC should support draft-dodgers

One of the most volatile items on the agenda of tonight's mammoth Student Administrative Council meeting concerns draft-dodgers. We present here two viewpoints on the aid-to-draft-dodgers issue.

Danny Drache, a tutor in the U of T Political Economy Department, and Paul Hoch, a post-doctoral fellow in the Physics Department, both work with the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

Brian Greenspan, a University College SAC representative, argues that SAC has no business concerning itself with the issue.

The Toronto Anti-Draft Program has much to commend it. For the past two years TADP has been providing badly needed aid, both to Americans of draft age who are considering the possibility of coming to Canada, and to those draft resisters who actually come to the Toronto area—at the moment, an average of six new arrivals approach the TADP office every day.

When the Program was originally conceived, there seemed to be an immediate danger that prospective American draft dodgers might find themselves discriminated against by Canadian immigration officials. Furthermore, many Americans did not know the correct legal procedure for taking out Canadian immigration papers.

TADP sends mailings to individuals and groups requesting information and providing a person-to-person counselling service for prospective immigrants who come to Toronto.

The TADP office also receives dozens of letters each day asking for our printed pamphlet Escape from Freedom, which contains a summary of Canadian immigration policies and procedures, and also attempts to deal with other questions of vital importance to American draft immigrants.

EXPANDED PROGRAM

Recently, the Program has expanded into other areas. As the number of draft resisters coming to Toronto has increased, TADP has tried to assist the new arrivals on a personal basis to deal with their problems of adjustment to the Toronto environment and, in particular, to help them to become productive Canadian citizens as quickly as possible. This is itself a virtually a full-time job and requires volunteers and money to supply to supply new immigrants with information, temporary living accommodations and expenses, legal aid to help secure Landed Immigrant status, and to set up a job placement service.

The responsibility for carrying out the different aspects of the Program falls mainly on the back of its only full-time staff member, Mark Satin, who is himself a draft resister, and who works about 12 or more hours a day, six days a week in the TADP office for the token subsistence salary of $25.

Some well-meaning people have said that TADP is unworthy of support because it presumably encourages Americans to break their country's draft laws by "recruiting them to come to Canada." This is simply not true. It is not the intention of the Program to recruit anyone to do anything, and the TADP office simply does not have the capacity to force unsolicited advice on any American individual or group.

At the moment, the office is barely and very inadequately able to supply information about opportunities in Canada to those who specifically (and often desperately) request this help.

SOLICIT RESISTORS?

Other critics claim that, although TADP is not itself doing any soliciting or recruiting, this is in fact being done by U.S. anti-draft groups to whom our group mails its literature. Again, this is a misinformed simplification. There are few, if any, anti-draft groups in the States advocating emigration to Canada: most U.S. groups favor either fighting the draft law by test cases in the courts, or pushing to expand criteria for CO deferments and alternate service, or going into the army and propagandizing against the draft, or simply clogging the jails.

There has been a good deal of misinformation and misrepresentation about the kind of person a draft resister is. In order to allow the public to hear his side of the story, last year TADP director, Richard Paterak, who is also a draft resister himself, spoke at a number of Ontario and Maritime universities.

He stressed the fact that there is no single type of resister leaving the States for Canada. Of course, many (although, by no means, all) draft resisters are opposed to the War in Vietnam, and feel that they cannot in good conscience fight in a brutal war which, to them, is unjustifiable on either political or moral grounds.

They leave their country because they simply cannot live there any more without going to jail; and many resisters believe going to jail simply does not get at the root of the problem since their imprisonment will not end the cruel violence and destruction of the American military.

Furthermore, since the anti-war movement has not been able to change the course of American foreign policy, many resisters view the situation as hopeless.

CANADA A HAVEN

In the past Canada has been a haven of Liberty for Americans who sought refuge from political upheavels in the United States. It became the home of the United Empire Loyalists at the time of the American Revolution. During the Civil War, Canada received black Americans from the Underground railway and welcomed their resettlement.

Again in the 1950's American intellectuals who were victimized by Sen. Joseph McCarthy's witch-hunts took advantage of Canada's haven to escape further persecution. The draft resisters to the Vietnam War are part of this same tradition. When personal freedom is denied and political rights are in jeopardy, Americans will naturally look to Canada as an alternative to "the American way."

TADP deals with so many former American students, the Anti-draft Committee decided to approach student governments for vocal and financial support for its efforts.

As he stands on the rubble of a bombed U.S. Army building in Saigon, this GI may just be wondering why he is forced to fight a war he is not winning.

Many of the current wave of American exiles are students like ourselves who had the misfortune to major in "the wrong subject," or fail a course, or have a "tough draft board" and who, through no fault of their own, have had their lives turned upside down by the political blundering of the older generation. Because

STUDENT'S ROLE

It is to be expected that a responsible Student Government debate the merits of this program. But the issue at stake is not the abstract one of "should social and political issues be a part of a student government's agenda." By its nature, student or any type of Government is a political organization involved in social issues. The substantive issue is how the Student Government defines itself and how it relates to these questions.

One viewpoint holds that a line can be drawn between university affairs and non-university affairs. Another claims that the business of drawing lines is deceptive and that the real difference between these categories must be hammered out on the basis of content and social purpose. Only the latter approach provides a realistic framework for examining what student government is and should be doing.

Student involvement in the university and student involvement in the community-at-large cannot exist unless students as a group are prepared to accept their role as social beings. SAC, the Lit and the other college councils are responsible for seeing that the word responsibility is given programmatic content. Assisting draft resisters is one instance of applying that principle to a specific need.

Why SAC shouldn't...

By BRIAN GREENSPAN

Tonight SAC discusses possible endorsement of an organization operating in the interests of American draft dodgers. It is my contention that the real issue is not draft dodgers; the issue is SAC and precisely where limitations should exist on its apparently all encompassing powers.

Almost three years ago, SAC in a formal referendum, received an ill-defined right to deal with moral and political issues. The time has come for an exhibition of that ambiguous right which was granted in 1965.

I do not recommend that SAC withdraw entirely from the socio-political arena and return to its pristine position as solely an administrative council. I nevertheless suggest a limit to its responsibility.

SAC operates on behalf of the students of the University of Toronto. It seems to follow that council should act directly in their interest. When students are genuinely affected by a particular issue, then SAC should have the right to deal with it. This primary criterion does not place a stringent limitation on SAC's public duty, it merely directs it. Issues such as housing, course evaluation, and birth control do have this legitimate and direct effect.

In applying this standard, SAC cannot support the organization which is requesting funds this evening; nor should it ever enter into a discussion of American race riots, the Middle East crisis, or even separatism in Quebec.

If there exists on this campus active groups dedicated to these causes, these groups should solicit personal support whether moral or financial. But it is my feeling that SAC must bear in mind to whom it is responsible and whom it represents. Certainly this is more accurately the courageous democratic leadership of which my fellow representatives speak.

Vietnamese student rep speaks out: Eloquent evasion or uneasy language?

MONTREAL (CUP) — The following is an interview with Ly Van Sau, one of three student representatives of the student wing of the National Liberation Front of Vietnam, who are currently touring Quebec. The interview was conducted in French by Denis Racine of Le Sainte-Marie, member paper of la Presse Etudiante Nationale.

Racine: Have you personally fought gun in hand against American soldiers?

Ly Van Sau: Yes, certainly. We carry on the fight in military, political, economic and cultural spheres, that is wherever the American attack is felt. Because the Americans are trying to implant their whole way of life on us.

Racine: You receive aid from China and Russia. Do you fear that after the Americans leave, you will be subjugated by these two countries?

Ly Van Sau: Not at all. Canada furnishes much aid to the U.S.A. and I don't believe the U.S.A. will become dependents of Canada because of it.

Racine: Who else do you receive aid from aside from Russia and China?

Ly Van Sau: We receive blood (of which we have great need), medical supplies and money from students the world over.

Racine: What are your methods of action?

Ly Van Sau: Apart from simple demonstrations in the streets we publish forty newspapers and we have an underground radio which broadcasts in all languages spoken in Vietnam.

Racine: Does American information on Vietnam conform to the facts?

Ly Van Sau: For the most part it is false, the truth is hidden. They claim the aggression comes from the north to the south, that we are communists when we have in our ranks people of all political and religious beliefs. But the truth is stronger than falsehood and it will come forth in the end. The Americans are now forced to admit their difficulties in Vietnam.

Racine: What do you think of the attitude of the English students at Sir George Williams University?

Ly Van Sau: We think that those responsible were in a minority and, despite what The Georgian says on the subject, we will always consider Sir George Williams an honourable institution.

Racine: How is the morale of the troops on the NLF and the Vietnamese peasants?

Ly Van Sau: It is higher than the highest than the highest New York skyscraper!

Students protest closed meetings

HAMILTON (CUP) — McMaster University graduate students are threatening to withdraw from senate and administrative committees on which they now have representatives "which are not open or are without representative participation."

Graduate student society President Don Poslun described the closed sessions as "undemocratic."

Most McMaster committees are closed and non-representative, he charged.

The motion for withdrawal was tabled last week.

Indian poverty analyzed

By JIM COWAN

Government attempts to assimilate Indians into the white man's society have produced the worst poverty in Canada, says Khantinetta Horn, sociologist and member of the Choctawaga tribe.

Miss Horn was among the speakers in the first of the U. C. Lit's Current Lecture series on the topic "Affluence and Poverty - Quo Vadimus."

"The Indian doesn't think like the white man," Miss Horn told a Convocation Hall audience. Centuries of communal life had left the Indian powerless to cope with the white man's way of life.

"His motivations are different, and once exposed to a white society he cannot function."

Miss Horn has no easy cures for the problem. She pointed out that the first step would be for everyone to learn something about the real history of the Indian people.

Bob Phillips, head of the special planning secretariat of the Privy Council, agreed that the definition of poverty in 1967 could "well be the Canadian Indian."

He went on to say, the problem extended over a much broader range. What is required is "a sense of engagement on the part of the Canadian people."

Controller Allan Lamport said that the affluent society spills over to benefit the less fortunate members of the community.

Those receiving welfare now receive more than a worker could make 40 years ago, he noted, but handouts are no answer to the poverty problem.

Only the profit motive acting in a democratic society could effectively raise the standard of living, Lamport concluded.

Allan Clark, executive director of the Company of Young Canadians, outlined the efforts and methods of the CYC in dealing with the poorer areas.

"The CYC operates on two propositions: that we are seeking a society in which people are in charge of their own destinies, and that there is room for the individual in our society."

The CYC today is considered by community leaders to be controversial, he said, but it is also useful, meaningful and destined to grow.

All four speakers agreed that there was a need for more research into the problems, and a great need for more understanding on the part of the members of the affluent society.

This is how it looked last year as a pretty co-ed is enticed to the auction block in aid of SHARE. Slove auctions are highlights of the annual World University Service campaign to raise money to help universities in other countries. It runs Oct. 16-20 this year.

leftist views righted

Sir:

Each year, we (where "we" is defined as the U of T student body) find that "we" are responsible for every radical attitude that the Varsity can think of. It is time that the Varsity defines the collective pronoun, "we". It would seem that "we" is rather specific and perhaps alludes to a "thinkers" group from Sydney Smith.

For a newspaper representing twenty thousand plus students, the Varsity has gone too far to the left. Remember, we, the U of T student body as a whole are blamed for such irresponsible, rash statements as: "there can be no question of whose side we are on" — The National Liberation Front.

There are papers for such thought, an example is Random, but not in a paper representing such a large number of people who surely don't endorse, as a whole, leftist views such as those expressed in the Varsity.

John Loch
(SMC III)

idealist Bradford

Sir:

According to your article in the Varsity of October 4 — GSU and the 1960's — "...Bradford had won his position on a platform designed to bring the GSU into the 1960's..." As far as I remember, all Mr. Bradford proposed in his election speech was... more emphasis on the intellectual activities of the GSU and an attempt to end the squabbles with SAC... I don't think any of those present at the time took this to imply giving financial assistance to hippies and draft dodgers, or spending half the annual budget on an Educational Consultant. I find it unacceptable that the GSU Executive went ahead with such a drastic change in policies without consulting or even informing the Graduate Student community. But as your article mentions: "Bradford isn't concerned with these things." That is the prerogative of an idealist, I presume?

T. R. Govers S.G.S.

didn't wipe with flag

Sir:

I refer to the article on the CRAP "demonstration" at the SMC Senate Club debate. The primary purpose of the caper was to return to the Senate Club their beloved mace, which was stolen during initiations. There was no serious ideological purpose to the group.

I emphatically did not sweep the floor of the debate's room with any flag, American or otherwise. (This act is frowned upon by Congress.) I am getting a little tired of reassuring people, who are so naive as to believe what they read in The Varsity as gospel, of my sanity. In the future, why not treat capers as capers and only serious news as serious news?

Mike Dobmeier (III SMC)

random evaluation

Sir:

An article under my by-line appeared in this last issue of Random. The article severely criticized Course Evaluation 1967, a program with which I find much fault.

Unfortunately, and unbeknownst to me, a picture of Bob Parkins (who was chief editor of the printed report) was appended to the article. The picture was distorted, giving the definite impression that the article was a personal attack on Mr. Parkins and his fellow editors.

May I state clearly that I was attacking the concept of course evaluation, rather than any individual or group of individuals, save my suggestion that SAC had used funds frivolously. I did not mention the editors by name nor refer to them as being responsible for the content of the report. As far as I know, they fulfilled their editorial functions in collating and summarizing the material they were given to work with. It is that material with which I find fault.

My apologies to the editors of Course Evaluation for any grief this unfortunate incident may have caused. As for myself, I fear the points I was attempting to make were lost if read as a personal jibe.

WUS gives Vietnam aid priority

The World University Service has made Vietnam an area of top priority for its International Program of Action.

This program includes the maintenance and expansion of services offered to university students by the Vietnam WUS house obtained in 1965 from the Saigon government.

A book bank, cafeteria, health centre, legal advice bureau and limited accommodation are among the facilities available at the centre.

Money for WUS self help projects in Vietnam and other underdeveloped countries throughout the world is raised through the SHARE campaigns of various local WUS committees.

Registration for TEE

Billy Mountain is an appealing, blonde 13-year-old boy in Grade 6. He lives in Toronto's first mass public housing project — Regent Park. Last year his father died in a Toronto jail.

Last year, too, he nearly got hit by a puck at Varsity Arena while excitedly jumping up at a Blues' game. He and several of his friends were taken to that game by a University of Toronto student participating in Toronto Educational Encouragement Inc. (TEE), a little-known group in the fight for universal accessibility.

You could get the government to suspend tuition fees without making one bit of difference to Billy's chances of seeing this or any other campus through the eyes of a participating student. You could even force the issuance of $10,000-a-year student stipends, and Billy still wouldn't be any closer to higher educational opportunity than he was at that hockey game.

For Billy's family belongs to the urban poor, that nagging pocket of North American society which persists in destroying the illusion of equality upon which that society prides itself so much. And because Billy was born in that situation, the odds are overwhelming that he will never complete high school, and that he will merely repeat the pattern of poverty for yet another generation.

Those odds, however, are being strengthened in Billy's favor just a little bit thanks largely to the efforts of Jim Steele, a tired, prematurely greying, 46-year-old resident of the Regent Park area, who has devoted phenomenal slices of his life to TEE, his six-year-old brain child.

Basically, the aim of his program is to compensate for the inner city child's lack of a private place to study, parental encouragement — so many things taken for granted by the rest of society, which often mean the difference between success and discouragement in elementary and high school. It's a sort of Project Headstart which catches the kids when they're already in school.

As one of the participating children put it, "I come here because there are a lot of babies at home and I have to do my homework in the kitchen. Here I get more done. And if I use the encyclopaedia to add more information to my work, then I get better marks."

The plan received its first feeble start in 1961, when Steele and five fellow workers in the Ontario department of highways badgered a Salvation Army outpost on Parliament Street to let them use three badly-lit rooms on a third floor for four nights a week. The space involved totalled half the size of an average classroom. Then, after "scrounging equipment from a bankrupt store," they provided personal attention and a quiet place to study for 100 area children — 25 a night.

The following year TEE moved into the Regent Park South Community Centre and began to accommodate 80 to 90 kids a night, with 25 or 30 volunteers. At the end of that year, four out of its 35 Grade 8 pupils had picked up high-school entrance scholarships, and The Metropolitan Housing Authority was attributing to TEE some of the area's decline in property damage and delinquency.

SUMMER PROJECTS

Summer programmes soon began too: Steele and his cohorts wrote to the editors of small-town Ontario newspapers, asking for rural families to "adopt" one or two of the children for a few weeks in the summer. Then Steele went to work on local politicians, drumming up transportation to go with the summer vacations.

Last year, TEE moved into a Macedonian church, with 50 to 60 volunteers active, while during the summer, the Neighbourhood Youth Corps (NYC), another Steele project, took over. Besides providing informal summer recreation in the back lanes and alleys of the Regent Park area, NYC volunteers went into residents' homes to involve parents, and also greatly expanded the exposure programs.

Elementary-school boys were taken by the Donlea chapter of Professional Engineers to conservation areas, Hydro plants, and the Buttonville Airport. The Ontario government produced GO rail transportation for one of several picnics. York University opened its darkroom facilities weekly to budding young photographers, and sewing circles and a "junior hostess" charm school were instituted.

During this winter, many of the summer exposure programs, including the introduction of the youngsters to university life, will continue. A drama club and library visits are in the making, 2,150 children are to see a circus, and, Steele has finally got through to School Board officials: TEE will be using Regent Park Jr. School, as well as some of its facilities.

VOLUNTEERS NEEDED

This year also, Steele wants to build a separate high-school program two nights a week, as well as to expand the elementary-school efforts which will take place three nights a week. To do this adequately, however, he needs 150 volunteers.

But he has only 70, 15 from U of T.

"We find it extremely difficult to acquire sufficient volunteers," he said. He thinks many aren't educated enough, but pointed out that although specialists in French, math and physics are required, there is an even greater need for people who will merely supervise elementary school children. These volunteers are asked to try to keep some semblance of order, but, in the main, simply to give warmth, attention and encouragement to the youngsters under their care.

Steele outlined the qualities necessary in the volunteers:

"A child who is denied for granted by more may live in a crowded sleeping space, a lack of privacy may be common; where a father yet new babies keep via the relief check, father, or from a small sums while the shift for themselves a school classroom may ment, where the interests scarcely pre world he enters at five are Annelise Goldman (III SMC), Paul Miki (SGS) and Ron Miller (IV VIC). Why did they get involved?

"I know what it's like to have someone take an interest in me," answered Mrs. Goldman. "I empathize with these kids. Their greatest need is the warmth of a relationship which some of them miss at home." She found that, once the children were given a little interest and encouragement, their work improved considerably.

Miki, who is studying to teach children from kindergarten up, described his motives as "purely selfish — the self-satisfaction of working through a community. It's not what I can do for these kids; it's what I can get from them."

Miller put it this way: "In the latter part of September last year, I decided I had a lot of free time on my hands, I wanted to do something of a social nature and, through the campus recruitment efforts of the Social Planning Council, I ended up here. This meant running a high-school program, giving tutoring in math, physics and chemistry to three or four pupils one night a week." He stuck it out because he felt he was "doing something."

Other volunteers responded with comments like, "I've seen only the happy side; it's time I saw the other side..." "You get sick of sitting on the balcony drinking beer," ... "You get some sense of accomplishment, a sense of achievement," and "I came because I like the kids."

TEE PATHETIC

In one sense at least, TEE is a little pathetic: the needs of its area are so great that its scope, at the moment, seems quite tiny by comparison. It is working in the region bounded by the Don River and by King, Parliament, and Carlton Streets, an area which, says Steele, houses 8,000 children.

"In the suburbs, a similar piece of land would contain about 3,000 children," he said. Of the 500-600 university-aged young people here, a maximum of 10 actually attend an educational institution beyond high school. Applying the Canadian average, that figure should be more than 70.

Why do so few make it? Simply because they drop out long before. And, given the prevailing conditions of the area, the drop-out rate is hardly surprising.

"This area," said Al Knight, principal of Sprucecourt school, "is one of the lowest-income areas in all of Metropolitan Toronto. Why? — Because the residents have low-paying jobs, and that's because they generally have little education."

As Steele put it, "Very few people here are high-school, let alone college, grads. They just can't earn a good living."

THE KIDS SUFFER

"This," continued Knight, "leads to a deteriorating attitude towards education, and produces an environment which affects the child. For instance, larger families and smaller accommodation combine to deprive the child of a place of his own for studying. The parents can't help him with his homework, either — the new math, for example. And there's no money for educational books. Father can afford a dime for a comic book, but not $1.50 for a reader."

"The parents," he went on, "are fighting from behind all the way, and many of them seek escape in drinking. This just means less and less money for the kids, and you have a big snowball going downhill."

Steele also pointed out the problems of adjustment faced by city dwellers who have just moved in from rural areas or the east coast, and the fact that 50 per cent of the area's homes are one-parent families. Both emphasized that there are many families in the area who are giving their children plentiful opportunities.

"But," said Steele, "there are enough people with problems to make it serious. They in turn are affecting the others who are making the grade."

"Every large city in North America has a downtown problem — a problem that is the creature of urban sprawl and of neglecting the difficulties of inner cities: low incomes, large families, high density and a lack of leadership."

"We certainly cannot relieve all of these problems but we can come up with leadership and programs that will attract a large group of youngsters and motivate them to desire to reach the educational plateau that they are capable of reaching."

"Equal opportunity for kids like Billy doesn't mean putting a few extra teachers in the school. It means creating opportunities outside school hours, where most of the damage is done. We can expose these young people to programs and people that they might not normally come into contact with, in order to discover and develop their talents and interests, and to let these kids meet people who have goals."

UNIVERSITY NOT AN ISLAND

"The talents and enthusiasm in a university could well be directed into an area like this. The university has a lot to offer; it cannot be an island. What we do here can make the difference between the development of these young people into antisocial, defeated persons, and the acquiring of personal dignity and self-esteem for many youngsters."

Author's note: It hath been said that news writers ought not editorialize. This is surely a worthy exception. Further information on TEE can be obtained by phoning Ian Harrison at 923-8742. Leave your name and number.

U of T student has trumpet troubles

By BOB BOSSIN

Mike is a University of Toronto student with a problem — which is not unusual — except that it is an unusual problem. He has a $30-a-month flat, where he has to line up with other students for the bathroom. However he doesn't complain. It's only a ten-minute walk from campus and "the cockroaches are free."

The trouble is that the crowded conditions at the rooming-house are not conducive to practising his trumpet. Mike is a good trumpet player. I know because I heard him practising in the Innis College men's washroom, his music propped up on the sink.

He first went to the Mechanical Building last week. However, the superintendent wanted to close up so he sent him across the street to the Galbraith building. But there were night classes there and the superintendent wouldn't let him practise.

Ditto Sidney Smith Hall.

Then he began a more concerted effort, naturally starting at the Hart House Music Room. The Hall Porter said no: piano yes, trumpet no.

So Mike and his trumpet went to Loudon House and asked several of the Sir Daniel Wilson residents if they minded his using their music room.

They minded.

Then he found out that there were small practice rooms at the Edward Johnston Building of the faculty of music. But they wouldn't let him practise because he wasn't registered at the faculty, and there wasn't enough space as it was.

"But right now there are empty rooms," he said.

"Good-bye" the woman at the office replied.

Since Mike belongs to Innis College he returned there and played a few bars in the men's washroom until I interrupted him.

"I'm not mad," he said. "It's not Innis College's fault it doesn't have any space and I know my playing will disturb people trying to study. But I wanted to try out for the U of T orchestra and for that you have to practise."

By this time several persons had joined us in the washroom, so he packed up his trumpet and music, then left to try his luck at New Collège.

In five years he may be able to practise in the new Innis College building. Until then, they say, Convocation Hall can be obtained free of charge.

FROM THE HINTERLANDS...

Macpherson report provokes varied Queens' reactions

KINGSTON (Special) — Professors at Queens University have offered varied reactions to the 98 recommendations of the University of Toronto's Macpherson report, and to the problems underlying them.

Dr. H. M. Estall, chairman of Queens arts and science faculty board, described changes at Queens in the last five years as "rather modest".

"Classes are still much too large. First-year philosophy classes run to over 200 students."

"We are not in favor of the student being a receptacle," says Dr. J. A. Leith of the history department. "Lectures predate the printing press as a means of communication."

"I agree absolutely with the recommendations to equalize grants for general and honour students," says Dr. Glen Shortcliffe of the French department.

"The motivation and interests of general and honour students are different," says Dr. G. A. Harrower, dean of Arts and Science.

Dr. Harrower concedes that Queens must have a specialist program producing professionals, although honors classes are inevitably small and expensive.

"I believe very strongly that courses should not distinguish between general and honors students where their needs are the same," he said.

Questioned on examination systems, Dr. Estall said "We are moving in a direction of relying more on term work."

The report recommends adoption of a general honors course, recently dropped by Queen's.

"There was some division of opinion on this, and perhaps we were a bit hasty," Estall said.

NLF causes near-riot at U of M

MONTREAL (Special)—A near-riot exploded at the University of Montreal last weekend as some 75 chanting, sign-waving South Vietnamese students tried to force their way into an assembly waiting to hear the visiting delegation from the Student Union For The Liberation of South Vietnam.

Led by South Vietnamese Student Association President Minh, carrying a portable microphone, the students, mostly from U of M's engineering faculty chanted "FLN! Assassins!" and "Laissez Nous Entrer," as angry students blocked the way, shouting "Fascistes!"

Before order was restored by Students Council President Jean Dore, tables had been overturned and signs swung like baseball bats. Scuffling and punching turned the crowded entrance to the auditorium into a melee of pushing and shouting.

There were several minor injuries, and several were escorted from the university by police. No arrests were made.

Dore finally allowed the group into the auditorium on the condition that signs and microphones be left outside. The executive promised the students that they could have a noon-hour session this week, but prohibited their making speeches after the National Liberation Front speakers had finished.

About two-thirds of the 1,500 students in the hall gave the visitors a tumultuous welcome.

The strong opposition to the visitors followed a special meeting of engineering students to protest the visit. At this meeting, it was reported that the Vietnamese students on campus had been invited to plan a protest, but that the engineer's council refused to endorse the Vietnamese students' plan to disrupt the meeting with loudspeakers and tomatoes.

The first speaker, Ly Van Sau, spoke of the American atrocities in Vietnam, managing to finish his speech without losing his composure. But the next speaker was visibly unnerved and had considerable difficulty in finishing her speech.

After the meeting, the delegation and their students' council hosts appeared generally content with the meeting. One students council member said that the South Vietnamese students were studying on grants provided by the Saigon government, and that their reaction was to be expected.

The delegation completed its tour of Quebec universities yesterday, and was to leave Montreal for London today.

Sir George wants students on senate

MONTREAL (CUP) — A special senate sub-committee at Sir George Williams University has recommended that four students be placed on the senate and two on each faculty council.

The recommendations must be approved by the senate at its Oct. 27 meeting. Student president Jeff Chipman says he is certain they will go through.

U of S wants student senate seats

SASKATOON (CUP) — A committee of the board of governors of the University of Saskatchewan has recommended that students be allowed on the university senate.

The recommendations suggested seats for four students, two each from the Saskatoon and Regina campus. The students would be appointed by their respective student councils for a term of one year with provision for a one-year extension.

This recommendation and several others, if approved, will have to go to the provincial legislature for ratification.

Faculty requests views on Vietnam

A letter from the University of Toronto Faculty Committee on Vietnam asks all candidates in the provincial election to give their views on Vietnam war industries in Ontario.

The letter asks whether "Ontario should continue to welcome and assist the growth of industries which produce war materials for the United States" or should "assist industries to convert from present war-related production."

The candidates are also asked if Ontario party members should press Ottawa to step up opposition to American policy in Vietnam.

The committee comprises Innis College Principal Robin S. Harris, historians Kenneth McNaught and D. G. Creighton, and theologian Gregory Baum.

The committee is taking part in the anti-draft campaign with an educational program on "The Canadian Way of Life."

A study is also being made on the relation of Ontario industry to the American war effort. Co-operation with a proposed high school teaching program is being studied.

Response to pre-Teach-In films good

An audience of more than 300 jammed the East Hall of the University College yesterday to see the first two films of the pre-Teach-In film festival.

John Biggs (III TRIN) film festival coordinator, said he was "very happy" with the response to the films, The Hangman and The Prisoner.

A new program will be shown each day until Friday. Starting time is 4 p.m. and admission is free.

and I just barely stopped twirling long enough for Joe to take the pics.

And the show went on . . . the next outfit was a cotten knit which felt clingy and kind of sexy. With that I stood very straight and still as Joe snapped and Mick Jagger (poster version) looked on.

Back into the dressing room and out with a hot pink number which I didn't particularly like. But the picture made it look great so maybe I'll go back and look at it again.

Then at last I got to the evening gowns. There's something about a long gown that makes you feel tall and slim and so graceful . . . even beside Twiggy.

The dress I liked best was this gorgeous minty-green brocade puff. It was very minny with angel-sleeves and just my color.

Joe said no more pictures and NO I couldn't keep it. Finally he relented . . . no dress but I got a picture.

Here's to Miss U of T . . . she'll have some fantastic clothes and a real hey-day picking them out.

INTERFAC ROUNDUP

New look Mulock Cup race

By JIM MORRISON

The new look in interfac football begins today on the back campus with a double-header. Mulock Cup champions Victoria College will be gunning for their tenth straight title as they face St. Mike's A, while Trinity meet Medicine in Group II action.

Group I this year consists of Vic, St. Mike's, Engineering, PHE, UC, and newcomer Dentistry, with the four top teams making the playoffs. A single schedule will be played.

Trinity, Medicine, New College, Pharmacy and Forestry will comprise Group II.

The two top teams will meet in a sudden death final and the winner of this game will meet the second place team in Group I in the playoff draw.

Intramural lacrosse also swings into action today along with the interfac track meet at 1:30 at Varsity Stadium. These will be followed by rugby and volleyball next Monday.

The soccer schedule got underway last week. On Wednesday Dents tied Meds A 1-1, Trinity A defeated Vic I 2-1, and St. Mike's beat PHE A 1-0.

Scoring for Dents was J Meikle, while A. Peron replied for Meds. Trinity goals were scored by C. Loat and R. Wolsh, with John Clark getting Vic's only tally. L. Lombardi netted St. Mike's winning goal.

On Thursday Forestry matched Wycliffe 2-2, and U. C. held SGS to a scoreless tie. A. Cameron got both Forestry goals. E. Bitarebelio and B. McCumber scored for Wycliffe.

Knox College finished off the week with a 3-1 win over Junior Engineering. D. Cooper, D. Coddling, and S. Estabrook tallied for Knox, with D. Kocur netting the lone opposition goal.

Rugger Blues begin quest for Turner Trophy with 9-3 victory over McGill

By DOUG WOODS

The Varsity Rugger Blues won their first league game on Saturday morning, defeating McGill 9-3, in one of the more exciting games seen on the back campus in several years.

Fly-half Andy Gibson opened the scoring for Blues with a beautiful drop goal on the run around the middle of the first half. Bill Kyle added a penalty kick to make the score 6-0, until the McGill leftwinger scored a try on the sideline slicing the margin to 6-3. The McGill place-kicker was unable to cope with the difficult angle and missed the convert.

Late in the second half, the McGill full-back dropped a fine kick by Andy Gibson and the ball rolled out of bounds. In the ensuing line-out a penalty was awarded to Blues on the McGill 40 yard line about two yards in from the side-line. Blues had the choice of running the ball or kicking from an almost impossible angle. Gibson elected to kick and split the uprights with one of the finest place kicks I have ever seen.

The Varsity players managed to outlast McGill for the remainder of the match avenging their close defeat last year in the semi-finals to this team.

Though Blues' backs were faster and in better condition than the opposition, their ball-handling left something to be desired. Several times harassed Blues players passed right to on-rushing McGill backs. However, this is an easy fault to remedy and coach Hamilton will be stressing getting the ball out to the winger in this week's practices.

In spite of sometimes embarrassing passing the Blues as a unit played inspired rugby.

Soccer

Soccer Blues coldly polished off McGill 7-0 Saturday morning making it a clean sweep for Varsity over McGill. The soccer Redmen, much like their football counterparts, were in no way a match for the experienced Blues. The home team showed accurate passing, good imagination and deadly shooting in their impressive victory.

Jim Lefkos broke his three game scoring slump by netting four goals. Singles went to Austris Liepa, Graham Shiels and John Gero. Stan Bogucki replaced the injured Erwin Stach in goal and chalked up the shutout.

Blues' defense had probably their easiest game of the season. Alan Cragg, Eric Sereda and Bill Nepotik were often able to carry the ball upfield freely and make a play to the forwards.

At midfield Jim Laverty, Dwight Taylor and Ormond Mendes were always in control and managed very often to combine beautifully with the forwards to create scoring opportunities. The forwards, led by the great playmaking and hustle of Frank Soppelsa and Ron Muir were all around the McGill net; the score should have reached double figures.

It was obvious from the start of the game that Redmen would be crushed. Soppelsa set up Lefkos for the first goal, Lefkos passed to Liepa for the second, and Soppelsa and Liepa set up Lefkos to make the half-time score 4-0.

Redmen, inspired by their beautiful cheerleaders, tried gamely to make it close at the beginning of the second half but got nowhere.

Blues' shooting practice continued. Liepa sent Shiels in for number five, and Shiels crossed to Lefkos for number six. Gero scored the last one from a scramble in front of the net. Frank Soppelsa had close misses when he hit the post twice.

REGATTA

The caliber of rowing in the OQAA has improved considerably over the past few years. This fact was made painfully clear to Varsity crewmen who failed to win a single event Saturday at the Toronto Argonaut Rowing Club.

On the brighter side, the Toronto heavyweight crew, forced to include several inexperienced oarsmen among their ranks, ran a hopeful second to a crew of seasoned scullers from Western.

Though experience cannot be ignored as a factor, poor conditioning coupled with very rough water are to blame for the losses.

The results of the regatta left Western as the overall winner.

The champs placed first in the Freshman, Junior Varsity, and Heavyweight classes while a second Western crew was third in the Freshman section.

Brock University nailed down second place honours with a Lightweight Varsity victory, a second place finish in the Freshman class and a third in the Junior Varsity grouping.

Although Toronto failed to win any of the events, Varsity finished in third place over-all on the strength of second place finishes in the Junior and Heavyweight divisions and a third in Lightweight Varsity.

TRACK

U of T track Blues had their second tune-up for the OQAA championships Saturday in an exhibition meet at the Royal Military College.

Toronto picked up two firsts as Ron Nastiuk pole-vaulted 12'6" and John Loaring ran away with the half-mile in 1:54.6. Seconds went to Brian Armstrong in the three mile and to the mile relay team composed of Loaring, Ron Fields, Bill Franklin and Larry Bobbett. The Blue quartet finished in a nifty 3:26 behind Queen's.

On the field Steve Wetmore ended up fifth in the hurdles and Bill Taylor bowed out of the high jump at 5'7".

SAILING

High winds and mountainous waves buffeted eleven college teams who competed for the Canadian Intercollegiate Sailing Championships held at the Royal Military College in Kingston last weekend.

Six races were sailed, with Queen's emerging as victors, edging out the Toronto team by a mere quarter of a point. McMaster and Dalhousie of Halifax finished third and fourth respectively.

Alan Leibel (Law I) and Lewis Mitz (Law II), sailing for the U of T, ran into bad luck in the first two races. They were disqualified in the first and were forced to withdraw from the second because of a mechanical breakdown in their boat.

Leibel and Mitz then proceeded to win three of the last four races but fell a quarter of a point short of taking the title as Queen's, who won only one race, nevertheless sailed consistently well, and never finished worse than fourth. McMaster had been strong contenders until they capsized on a wild planing spinaker run during the fifth race.

The Toronto team was awarded the RMC Trophy for their second place standing and the D. M. McClure Trophy for the team winning the most races in the series.

VOLLEYBALL — Schedule starts Tues. Oct. 17. Teams scheduled to play during first week will be notified by mail.

Many mistakes mar home opener

Spectacular collision in the end zone as Blues' Jim Ware (72) just fails to grab touchdown pass. Shadawing Ware are Redmen Wade Kenny (35) and Britt Daherty (26).

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

William Shakespeare smiled from his clammy grave last Saturday afternoon as McGill Redmen and Varsity Blues put on a superb rendition of "A Comedy of Errors" before 8,451 disbelieving spectators. When the curtain finally descended, 11 fumbles and 7 interceptions after the opening whistle, Blues had a commanding 35-6 margin.

It was a game which left pigskin perfectionists leaping through their programs in embarrassment at the colossal chaos going on in front of them.

McGill quarterback, Steve Reid, won supreme plaudits for his impersonation of a McGill player as he threw only three passes, all of which went straight into the waiting arms of Blues' Riivo Ilves. He returned two for touchdowns.

In toto, McGill fumbled seven times, recovered only twice, and had five passes intercepted. For Varsity, the dismal dole was four fumbles, two lost, and a pair of passes picked off.

Despite their lopsided margin, Blues' offense was not impressive. Two touchdowns were accounted for directly by the defensive unit, and two others were set up by McGill fumbles deep in their own zone. Timing once again was the main hindrance as Blues' attack displayed about as much synchronization as the clocks atop Sir Daniel Wilson Residence.

Mike Raham, with 116 yards in 15 carries, and Mike Eben, who collected two touchdown passes from Vic Alboini, were the only players to really dent McGill's understaffed, but gritty, defense.

Varsity opened the scoring in the first quarter before they even had a first down when Reid found his favourite target, Riivo Ilves, in the clear, and Ilves scampered 16 yards over the goal-line with the interception. At the 6:00 minute mark of the second quarter, Reid made an early encore, hitting Ilves on the Redmen 24, and watching as the Toronto player sped over for his second touchdown. Paul McKay converted to boost the score to 13-0.

Five minutes later Alex Squires recovered a loose football inside the 25 and Blues scored in three plays with Eben grabbing a seven yard strike from Alboini. 'Ebo' did it again in the final minute of the half this time from 5 yards out, after tough Jim Bennett had fallen on a fumble at the 22. McKay's convert left the score 26-0.

Bob Amer replaced Alboini at quarterback early in the second half, and directed Blues' longest march of the day which ended, rather unrequited, in a 16 yd. field goal by Paul McKay.

McGill's best man, Pete Bender, scored their lone touchdown in the fourth quarter on a 64 yd. pass and run play from George Wall after Christ Hicks went for an interception and missed. Fittingly, Mike Raham ended the scoring with one of his typical power bursts of 17 yds.

Mooney moans McGill institutions

By HOWIE FLUXGOLD

"Problems by the hundred, troubles by the score." That was the tune Tom Mooney, coach of McGill Redmen, was singing after Blues whopped Redmen 35-6, Saturday afternoon.

"I guess we'd have been better off without our quarterback and two halfbacks," said Mooney in a slight understatement.

Redmen quarterback Steve Reid, whose passes had all the zing of stale beer, connected with Riivo Ilves three times, twice for touchdowns.

The McGill backs wanted no part of the ball allowing it to wobble around on the Varsity Stadium turf on seven different occasions.

But Mooney was not critical of his team. In fact, he says it is the best team he's had in his three years at McGill.

But just ask Mooney why he has had to rebuild in each of his three seasons and he becomes highly critical of various institutions at McGill.

He seems to think McGill is one big Playboy Club and if there's one thing Mooney doesn't want it's playboys.

"They want to be social directors, play football and study and you just can't do that at McGill," he said. "We had nine members of last year's team fail."

Mooney is a strict disciplinarian by his own admission. He doesn't allow smoking or drinking and as for dating, "I don't encourage it."

McGill alumni also came in for criticism "Look how they help out at Western and Queen's. Here I have to phone them for help Toronto is right in the middle of football but in Quebec there are only 28 high schools playing ball.

"The principal picks out a teacher and says, 'You're coaching football,' so the calibre of play is poor."

Americans, who won McGill championships not so long ago seem to have done more harm than good. They used to come into the dental and medical schools, however McGill regulations have stopped this.

"There used to be 10 or 12 Americans on the team. Canadians wouldn't try out because they knew they couldn't make it. There still are some players who won't come out because they think they can't make it."

Losing coaches like to say that if they can't build winners at least they can build character, Mooney will have to be satisfied with building character for a while longer.

Racketeers edge Western

Last minute heroics by Frank Blyth gained Varsity tennis Blues the Western Division team title on Saturday at McMaster. Blues were ahead of Western 25-24 going into the final match of the two-day tourney, as Blyth came up against Western's number three, Will Hawrlyw. In a tense and exciting match, Blyth prevailed 6-3, 5-7, 9-7, and Varsity edged into the winner's circle with two point cushion.

Western's Brian Flood won the singles title, defeating Varsity's Mike Zimmerman and then joined teammate Bob Byrich to take the doubles.

Zimmerman finished the day with a 4-1 record, as did Paul Kent, Toronto's number two man. Frank Blyth and Rudy Knobloch, the third and fourth ranked team members, were both 5-0.

In doubles action, Kent and Blyth were 3 and 2, while Zimmerman and Knobloch had a 5-0 record.

This Friday Blues travel again to Mac for the Intercollegiate finals. Facing Toronto will be the powerful netters from the University of Montreal, who crushed all opposition in the Eastern Division. Heading the Montreal team are brothers Yvon and Michel Leblanc, who combined to win the doubles title after Yvon had taken the singles. The other members of the team are Pierre Brunet, number one last year for Montreal, Jacques Boileau, and Jean Laverdure.

McGill's Pete Bender (24) gets no further as he runs into the unyielding grasp of Mike Wright (33) and Dave Church (30). Ylo Kargemagi (64) and Pat Rahming (72), who is from the Bahamas, peer an intently.

SAC dodges draft-dodger dilemma in dramatic debate

By DAVID FRANK

The Students' Administrative Council Wednesday night decided by a 24-21 vote not to support the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

Fifty spectators waited through three hours of grueling debate and procedural wrangling to hear the tense roll-call vote.

The debate centred on the principle of supporting the anti-draft program, but on whether a SAC representative should act from personal conviction.

"I would sign a petition, I would make a private donation," said Cliff Lax (III Law).

"But I will not support this resolution as a representative of the faculty of law."

"To vote for this resolution would be to stab our neighbour and protector in the back," said Joe Genovese (II SMC), a member of the campus Edmund Burke society but not of SAC.

"We believe these draft dodgers are cowards and slackers, who would rather come here than go out and fight in the mud. If called upon to defend Canada they would run out the back door to Russia," he continued in spite of jeers.

"I'm sure some of them would feel more at home there."

TADP aids draft resisters in coming to Canada and getting adjusted. The program has already received support from several campus groups — the University College Literary and Athletic Society, the Graduate Students Union, and the SAC Executive.

Speaking for TADP, Dr. Paul Hoch said the organization now is unable to supply adequate information to potential draft resisters.

TADP receives about 10 phone calls and 20 letters a day requesting information on moving to Canada, he said.

"However, no unsolicited information is sent to anyone. We are not recruiting people."

"You can vote for the humanist aspects of this program without committing yourself on its political implications."

But Mike Magee (III SMC) said he wouldn't support anything either implicitly or explicitly political.

Vice-President John Treleaven (SGS) argued that SAC would be taking no stand on the war in Vietnam.

"If we were really opposed to the war, we would be trying to shut down CIL, which supplies the U.S. with explosives for the war," he said.

Irv Weisdorf (III UC) said granting political asylum was a common international practice.

"It is our moral obligation to give young Americans the opportunity to follow their moral convictions," he said.

Several council members tried to separate their personal feelings from their decision as a SAC representative.

But Joe Merber, university committee co-chairman, said:

"There is no limit to the responsibility I have, and therefore my involvement."

"I am asked to forget my personal feelings, but I can't be a mouthpiece for what I think others think. I am primarily an individual."

"There is no grave issue here," he asserted.

"It is a very simple thing — to give information. It is a basic right of any individual to decide whether he wants to live in the framework of a given society."

Art McIlwain (III APSC) charged that the pamphlet distributed by the TADP "gives the impression that this country was founded by draft dodgers."

SAC decides no referendum on CUS

No referendum will be held on University of Toronto membership in the Canadian Union of Students, the Students' Administrative Council decided Wednesday night.

By an overwhelming vote of 32-8, SAC rescinded its decision of last March to hold a referendum in January.

Vice-President John Treleaven (SGS) said: "I am now convinced I was wrong to urge a referendum."

"Originally it was to be a method of acquainting the students with CUS, but the best way to sell CUS is through the programs we implement."

Most members agreed that a referendum on CUS would interfere with normal progress on other programs.

"The problem with CUS," said Jennifer Penny (II UC) "is that it's a they — us relationship."

"But we are CUS. If CUS has failed, we have failed. If CUS is bad, what we are doing is also irrelevant."

John Kirkpatrick (IV VIC) asserted that students object to CUS taking stands on international issues in their name.

But Treleaven pointed out that at its last convention CUS had taken no stands on international affairs.

SAC votes independence for Varsity

By PAUL MACRAE

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday night voted overwhelmingly to make The Varsity independent of SAC.

The council approved in principle recommendations of the Varsity Report which would make the newspaper responsible to an 11-man board instead of SAC.

The board will be made up of students, faculty and administration who will serve for overlapping three-year terms.

Instead of receiving a SAC subsidy, The Varsity will be financed solely by advertising.

Varsity General Manager Bob Parkins was mandated to set up the machinery to make The Varsity independent next year.

"SAC and The Varsity are the two largest student concerns on campus," Parkins said yesterday, "too big to be together under one roof."

"Because SAC publishes The Varsity, its members lack the freedom to react to the paper as other students can."

"The present situation has created an uneasy atmosphere not conducive to publishing because it is largely a political situation."

Lib Spry, president of Canadian University Press, called the move a step in the right direction and an important precedent.

"A student council should not have the power to act like God doesn't agree with what the editor is saying."

Sadden engineers give the Corling solute in a typical journey across campus publicizing LGMB's latest long-play release The Lady Godiva Memorial Band Blows. Less than 200 (records, not engineers) are left of the SAC office and Engineering stores. They sell for $2.95 and can be melted down into attractive oshtroys on request.

Coffee and multiversity concern politicians

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Every second Wednesday night in the Debates Room of Hart House about 40 campus politicians assemble to discuss the problems of the University of Toronto.

The meetings are usually long — five or six hours — but everyone likes to have their coffee and donut break early.

This Wednesday the meeting was unusually well-attended. Almost 50 SAC members and as many spectators jostled each other for cups and saucers at the east end of the hall under the icy stares of portraits of former Canadian prime ministers.

In the corner sat someone who looked a little older and a little more experienced than the students involved in animated conversation around him.

He remained silent, studying four pages of notes in small writing.

To some of the SAC members this man was an intellectual, to others an American physicist, and to a few a Communist.

His name is Paul Hoch and this night he was going to tell the University of Toronto why they should support draft resistance.

The speaker smashed his gavel on the wooden table where the students would sit and called for order.

Hoch rose and walked toward the speaker as the call for order echoed between the stone walls.

The speaker introduced him as a member of the Toronto Anti-Draft Program. Hoch smiled briefly as stragglers took their seats.

The spectator area at the other end of the room was jammed. It usually is empty. Globe and Telegram reporters sat at the minuscule press table, which is rarely frequented by anyone but Varsity reporters.

Hoch stroked his long brown-blond hair back over his ears. All three of his jacket buttons were done up, but one of the buttons on the collar of his shirt was not.

One would guess that Hoch doesn't wear a shirt and tie very often. But one would be unlikely to guess that Paul Hoch has earned a Ph.D.

He spoke with a heavy American drawl, and after 20 minutes he sat down.

Hoch had been effective. He had swayed a number of SAC votes to the draft resistance cause. And the second speaker helped Hoch win votes.

But then Joe Genovese spoke against draft dodgers, denouncing them as cowards and urging SAC not to "stab our neighbor and protector (the U.S.) in the back".

Joe Genovese is a member of the Edmund Burke Society.

After the first two speeches the tide was definitely favoring the pro-draft resistance faction. But after two and a half hours of further debate it was defeated 24-21.

Paul Hoch went home and the Students Administrative Council let the draft-dodger issue go to sleep.

Due to the illness of Otis Redding, he will be unable to perform. As a result, the Blue and White Society regrets to announce that:

THE OTIS REDDING SHOW, ONE COLISEUM,
SUNDAY OCT. 15 IS CANCELLED

TICKET REFUNDS will commence Monday Oct. 16
AT THE S.A.C. OFFICE

Blues Festival definitely cancelled; Injury sends Redding to hospital

The Blue and White Society Blues Festival, which has been off and on several times in the last few weeks, will definitely not take place, it was announced Wednesday night.

Society Chairman Marty Low (I Law), said Otis Redding, the feature performer in the show slated for Sunday at the Canadian National Exhibition Coliseum, is in hospital with a foot injury.

Low said the Blue and White stands to lose between $800 and $900 on the production and co-sponsor Mike Lais of Record World might lose more.

However Lais said yesterday that his losses will be about $200 and that the society's shouldn't be more than $400.

Low said the financial set-back would come if the rock groups who were to play Sunday insist that their contracts be honored.

Lais said he has good connections with the groups and the contracts would be broken. The main loss would be in publicity costs.

Besides publicity, losses for the Blue and White would come from money for the Coliseum rental and the chartered buses that were to take students from the campus to the show.

Part of the festival was to be a blues workshop tomorrow afternoon.

Low said Lonnie Johnson and Hagood Hardy, the performers for the workshop, have agreed to break their contracts with the Blue and White.

Low was angry with Redding for opting out and not trying to find an alternate.

There was a slim possibility that the Four Tops, who will be appearing in Niagara Falls, N. Y. on Saturday night, could be brought in for the Coliseum show, Low said.

Lais said: "We were screwed from the start. I'm not so much worried about the loss of money as the loss of reputation."

However Lais said he wouldn't rule out the possibility of another co-sponsorship with the Blue and White.

Money for festival tickets will be refunded starting Monday at the Students Administrative Council office.

Student Health Organization formed

About 70 students from health science courses at the university have decided to fill what they call a "shocking gap" in their learning experience.

They have formed the Student Health Organization of the University of Toronto to get students involved in community projects.

"Our education is often divorced from real life," says Jerry Friedman (III Meds).

Through the Canadian Indian Centre on Beverly Street SHOUT will run recreational youth programs, tutoring for school-children and a health information service.

Project 999, which was in operation last year, involves work with mentally ill hospital patients.

SHOUT has also been investigating possible projects for the Yorkville area in co-operation with the Company of Young Canadians and local doctors.

SHOUT volunteers also will participate in University Settlement, Half-Way House and Drop-In Centre projects. For further information call Friedman at 783-5209.

Students agree with SAC decision

By SUSAN REISLER

University of Toronto students seem generally to agree with the Student Administrative Council's decision not to support the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

One student interviewed, Jack Combs (III SMC) said the SAC decision was a good one. "If they are not good citizens in the United States then they won't be good citizens in Canada," he declared.

An SMC co-ed felt we shouldn't encourage draft dodgers. "We seem to be saying in bold print, 'Come on over to Canada boys!'"

She said the issue has been glamorized.

But Graham Fraser (IV UC) said: "It was a rotten decision. It proves the backward reactionary attitude of SAC representatives."

Kevin Rose (III UC) said, "The vote stinks, since the war in Vietnam also 'stinks', we should help those who are of the same opinion avoid the draft".

Richard Macy (SGS) said he would support aid being given to boys dodging the draft once they got to Canada, but there must be no recruiting in the U.S. He said he supported the SAC decision. Susan Weisman (II New) suggested a campus referendum on the issue.

"I agree with the decision," said Chris Thompson (II New). "We should not help them. They are running away from their responsibilities. We should not be a party to anyone avoiding their national duty."

Dave Smith (II UC) said he was against the SAC decision. "We should help them as a humanistic enterprise, they have a right to object," he said.

He felt a referendum would be preferable in this case. Meanwhile, he said anyone wishing to help should certainly go to the committee already established for draft dodgers and volunteer.

In contrast, Gerry Geddes (II SMC) said he was in favor of the decision. "If we give them this aid we will encourage boys to become draft dodgers," he said.

Garth Holloway (I UC) also argeed. "If your country is going to fight, you should support it. It is a matter of principle which is involved."

Faulkner irked by anti-draft defeat

Students Council President Tom Faulkner said yesterday that he was "bitterly disappointed" at SAC's refusal to endorse a program to help draft dodgers.

"It is a weak consolation that we lost by such a narrow margin that if two people had changed their minds it would have passed," he said.

The motion was defeated Wednesday night 24-21.

Faulkner said he also regretted SAC's failure to exercise a leadership function on the campus, but hoped students and professors would still support anti-draft programs.

He said a majority of council could reverse the decision if someone who opposed the original motion moved to have the motion reconsidered.

"I would like to see this brought up again, but the chance is remote now."

In the continuing Varsity tradition of presenting to the pointing campus the natural beauty that abounds here, we present Joon Hart, Miss University College, 1967.

how SAC dodged the draft issue

You could, of course, feel that it's nice your Students Administrative Council representatives find they must be so representative.

But it isn't.

Or you could take satisfaction in the SAC "consensus" that it should not venture into the realm of things political — whatever political means in that sense.

But again, you shouldn't.

Because the SAC managed Wednesday night to step back to the football scores-and-dances student government that was gradually becoming a thing of the past.

The actual defeat of the resolution supporting the Toronto Anti-Draft Program didn't do the trick. It was the things that were said as council stuttered for three and a half hours to a vote.

Nothing is written down to direct SAC's action in specifically social and political fields, but common sense should indicate that the results of the South Africa debate several years ago, last year's support for universal accessibility and even Wednesday's vote rejecting a referendum on membership in the Canadian Union of Students were at least partially aimed at developing social conscience on this campus.

Instead we heard how some members supported the draft program personally but could not vote for it because they were, after all, representatives.

And we heard a well-worn equation that fingered draft-dodgers as Communist cowards who belong in neither Canada nor the U.S., but in Russia.

And, too, we witnessed a disgraceful display of procedural haggling as frustration drove some of the eventual winners to attack the chairman of the meeting.

We were even privileged to watch council pick at the constitution in a generally irrelevant manner.

And for a finale, we could watch and listen as the twenty-four who opposed the motion pounded the table in a shocking display of glee after the roll call vote.

That was the worst of it — topping off three and a half hours of off-track wrangling with the sort of cheering that might belong at a public school debate on Elmer the Safety Elephant.

The debate, when it was a debate instead of a series of short-sighted and sometimes vicious comment, did have its finer hours.

One came when Joe Merber, the pseudo-engineer who graduated to become university committee co-chairman, made the clearest expression of the point that two dozen missed — or refused to hear.

He couldn't, Merber said, be a mouthpiece because he is an individual. Nothing could be more apparent.

Contrast that with such thoughts as: ". . . I will not support this resolution as a representative. . . ."

"We believe those draft dodgers are cowards and slackers. . . ."

"We are trying to intervene in the same way de Gaulle interfered. . . ."

The disappointment in the faces of those who had worked hard in support of the motion is another easy thing to understand.

It's never very easy to watch something you believe in torn down by the sort of thing SAC managed Wednesday — that is, by words that reached backwards, by manoeuvres that leave a bad taste, by juvenile gestures and jeers.

A body such as the SAC can never act in perfect unison — and probably shouldn't — but when its differences came out the way they did Wednesday, with that kind of result, it becomes difficult to appreciate the value that such an organization could have.

There is really only one redeeming factor of the last three and a half hours of Wednesday's marathon.

Three years ago a draft-dodger resolution couldn't even have reached the floor of the Hart House debates room.

A year ago — perhaps six months — it would have been dealt with in a matter of minutes before going down to a far more significant defeat.

At least it got to SAC and hung on valiantly before being dismissed.

But that doesn't alter the fact that a majority of members of the senior student organization on this campus missed the import of what they were talking about.

It was a shabby performance. Presumably the same people will have left council, complimentary beer mugs in hand, when the draft-dodger issue comes up again.

We can only hope that next time brings a somewhat more enlightened approach to the debate — and leaves SAC in a position where it is finally a truly significant organization.

LETTERS

who's a draft dodger?

Sir,

Referring to your editorial on Wednesday, October 11th, I would like to point out that the 300 Americans at St. Michael's College are not draft dodgers, nor do I know of any Americans who intend to deliberately avoid the draft upon the completion of their studies here. By staying in school one does not dodge the draft but simply postpones it.

When an American applies for 2-S draft status he is normally deferred for four years but his eligibility for the draft is automatically extended from the age of 26 to 35 years. Furthermore, effective this year, a person who applies for 2-S status is not eligible for any other deferments (for example a marital deferment). To insinuate that a person who is willing to extend his draft eligibility and give up the prospect for other deferments for the sake of his education is a draft-dodger is downright insulting and ludicrous.

—Donall B. Healy,

President, St. Michael's College Student Council

Ed. note: Our point was that many students by staying in college postpone their military obligations hoping to avoid them altogether. They have a right to do that, of course, but when they do, they shouldn't deny someone else the right to avoid service in other ways.

Our statement that 300 American students at St. Mike's are, in effect, dodging the draft was hasty, we admit. That number actually breaks down to about 175 males and 125 women, the latter of which are obviously not dodging, postponing or otherwise avoiding the draft.

but, what have you said?

Sir:

Your editorial on marijuana represented a futile and irresponsible attempt at frivolity and cheap sensationalism compared to which anything said so far by politicians ranks alongside the Proverbs of Solomon in their sagacity and relevance.

So pot should be removed from the narcotics schedule? Fine; no argument. Maybe even sell the stuff in drug stores like candy, since it is just as harmless. Maybe the 13-year old kid going to buy his first deck of cigarettes will enjoy his first smoke in an ethereal cloud of bliss. Maybe the middle-aged business-man will say, "the hell with it," and spend the rest of his days laid out on a park bench. Maybe they all will.

Candy rots your teeth. Let us maintain the parallel; marijuana rots your mind. Walking in a park and feeling supremely elated without some form of artistic or creative outlet is the equivalent of continual masturbation; it induces in a very short while, a state of atrophy and lack of production.

Yet the aesthetes will say, "Well who gives a damn about production anyway?" — Lovely idealism. But I submit that aesthetes, the seekers of beauty and truth, are and always have been supported by the production of others. Which is all right; poets earn their existence by the fact that once in a while, through their art, they let us see a thought that is life on a higher plane.

I can condone, even admire a man who writes, paints, creates, procreates under a bale of grass, so that his experience may be thereby enriched. This man is one per cent of the human race.

For the rest, it is only the nothingness of escape. They sit around like cow-manure on a super-highway. And you get more and more cow-manure until there is no super-highway, and somebody has to start building a new road on top of all that dung. Simple allegory—pot does not make every man a philosopher. And, you see, you can't distribute marijuana like candy; the social impact is considerably more consequential.

Of course, I agree that the present system of narcotics control is useless, even harmful. But attempts made on the other side of the fence are ever so much more gratifying than yours. After all, what have you said? You've compared pot to booze, an idiotic comparison in any case (but sure to get a few laughs) and you established the point that marijuana is more fun. More intellectual. Psychological dependence? Yes, but that is the user's fault, you say, omitting the fact that this innate dependence would not bother him in the least, were he not exposed to the drug in the first place.

The rest of your article is a gross tirade against police, laws and politics, highly "controversial," but nothing, in effect that we did not already know.

In short, sir, you haven't said a damn thing. Of all rebels against those old chestnuts "Society" and "The Establishment," you are without a doubt the most ineffectual. There are several good arguments in behalf of the point you raised, but you have not approached a single one of them from a reasonable angle.

Allan Jameson

Lyrics have to say something today. Instrumentation has to be poetically connected to the words. And as that is thought out, the recording studio has to be kept in mind for all the electronic tricks available: tape recordings, sound effects, special recording techniques, unusual instrumental work.
That's the great achievement of Sgt. Pepper.

The Beatles: Sgt. Pepper's
Lonely Hearts Club Band
(Capitol SMAS 2653)

On that album, the Beatles proclaim a new life for themselves by killing the old.
They mockingly start off in concert with the group subservient to the audience.
Ringo follows in with the only song that could have been possible a few years ago, A Little Help from my Friends. After that, the record goes up, raising the consciousness of its listeners, not just supplying what they are used to hearing.
There are poetic gems with new visions, pleas for a better life, put downs of the old, dramatic tales, and most important of all, a coherent philosophy, based on absolute freedom and warm friendliness. It's not happy, mind you. Loneliness, hang ups, dreary dehumanization run all through this album culminating in its most important song, A Day in the Life. On the way, Paul weaves the tale of a girl leaving home, accurately depicting the egotism on both sides:
the daughter's ("Fun is the one thing that money can't buy") and the mother's ("How could she do this to me?"). Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds gives a psychedelic vision in childhood colors and images. George extends his interest in Indian music further than ever to give his philosophy "To see you're only really small and life flows on within you and without you." A Day in the Life gives a harrowing view of urbanized society that hopefully more people than just hippies will seriously consider.

Sgt. Pepper actually gives the most profound musical view yet of modern society and the new generation of adults that is just starting to participate in it. Anyone seriously interested in understanding this generation can use that one LP as a beginning.

This look at society is not easy to take. It's disturbing, not in the macabre way Bob Dylan sometimes paints it, but with gentleness, humor and optimism. That's what makes the Beatles' music the real folk music of today, or of one particular generation anyway.

This new music is basic to that generation in the same way that blues are basic to the Negro. The music and its ideas comes right from the centre of the individual, his experiences and his problems; right from his soul.

Not all the new music is as delicate as that of the Beatles. Listen to The Doors for a more eerie view, one that reaches right into man's subconscious. What the Doors find there is evil and violence — hidden perhaps but still exerting more influence over the individual than most care to admit.

The Doors (Elektra EKS 74007)

Listen especially to the 11
min. 35 sec. cut The End, a musical and poetic psychiatric monologue about, among other things, sex. The words ramble freely letting the stream of the singer's consciousness construct them.
Sexual images are shot into view, the snake being predominant. The singer's reactions to these images create a drama in his own mind, a drama that flows out into the song and leads the listener to fit in his personal reactions. At crucial stages in this song, details are obscured, allowing the listener to add his own reactions.
So the singer decides he would like to kill his father (as a gesture of liberation from his influence — both actual and hereditary). When he confronts the mother, he proceeds to make love to her (if that's in your mind) or throws the biggest tantrum you ever heard and possibly beats her (if that's how you hear it).

The whole Doors album can be seen as dissertation on sex — including the female's attention — getting parading and her fear of being raped; including the many hang-ups the puritan heritage has left in North American youths. Obviously this is no record for children
... or adults.

As with most of the good groups recording today, the Doors music is intensely visual, thereby fitting right into this era's McLuhan consciousness. Images are created and painted in detail, both with words and music.
If the listener hears the record high, the images are sharper.

Movies seem to be the influential medium to these groups, and most obviously the Doors who are (all four of them) drop-outs from a film-making school at UCLA.
The sound effects, the mood music and the scene structure of movies can be traced into the images of their songs.

The Doors, by the way,
have the tightest band playing today. They constantly change the dynamics, the sounds, keys and tempos and never lose their togetherness. The work together like

And they can all play their instruments very well. Listen especially to John Denmore's drumming, not rock drumming at all, but more classical. He doesn't just keep a beat, but plays the drums as a solo instrument. Listen how often he will use a time completely separate from the singer and the other instruments. Music can become very complex when people like this are playing it.

More than just complexity though, The Doors, the Beatles, and the others play with a breadth of musical knowledge and experience that was never heard in earlier pop music. Members of these groups when they come together bring their various musical instruments and fuse them together. The Doors' hit Light My Fire has apparent classical influences; The End has a raga-like drone in the background with jazz improvisations up and front.

Country Joe and the Fish
(Vanguard VRS 9244)

Classical influences are also apparent in the Electric Music for the Mind and Body by Country Joe and the Fish. Songs are written not in stanzas but in movements with varying tempos and styles in each section.

Country Joe (McDonald) graduated from the folk scene where he used to write protest songs. His album has one example of political protest, Superbird, a funny protest against the rule of LBJ. Joe also dabbles in rhythm and blues, especially in his sexy and fiery love-command Love. The Masked Marauder has a pretty tune played in a continuous stream first on an organ, then in a non-word vocal and finally (after a three-second bridge by a full orchestra) by a harmonica. Not So Sweet Martha Lorraine looks at the boy-girl relationship in a modern way — not Tin Pan Alley but like Bob Dylan or Leonard Cohen. Tin Pan Alley would never have pointed out the narcissism of the girl like this song does nor would the alley have written "the only way you can get her high is to let her do her thing and watch you die." Joe's music flowers at its best in Grace, which has LSD music and lyrics, clean sharp images and colors, sensual effects including superimposed sound effects.

The Indian influences are strong in Joe's music as in many of the new groups. Sometimes they are obvious as in George Harrison's sitar explorations; sometimes less so. The easy flowing sensuality of Indian music has reached into North American pop on all levels, instrumental and vocal.

The initial impetus to put poetry back into music was given by Bob Dylan. It was he who made the picture more important than the beat. It was he who started saying something accurately, not insipidly — first in political terms then in more personal terms about relations between people.

Dylan didn't sell out to rock 'n' roll in 1965; he adopted a musical form that he grew up with to make his poetry more relevant and communicative. Anyway, he was never protesting at all. He was merely putting down his views and images on civil rights, politics, and war slowly raising the consciousness of his listeners. When it was high enough, he found it possible to expand into more obscure imagery and concerns.

Dylan didn't listen to the Beatles at first. He always talked of the Rolling Stones who were playing music closer to his own background — Chicago blues, Chuck Berry, etc. The Beatles, however, listened to him and developed their own musical content with his lead. They had the potential all along; listen to the lyrics of You've Really Got a Hold on Me to see. Most of the articles we read today explaining the music scene have that chronology all wrong. Everything is attributed to the Beatles.

The music scene has developed to the present stage not because of the Beatles but with them. The Beatles happened to have worked in an age that saw several groups adding new ideas. The Lovin' Spoonful added joyousness and freedom of form. The Mamas and the Papas added a new emphasis on vocals: harmony and counterpoint. The Byrds brought an emphasis on instrumental experimentation. Their guitars, especially Jim McGuinn's big electric 12-string play complex contrapuntal lines in dazzling 7ths and 9ths unheard of before. The Byrds played jazz-like inventions.

Their singing was watered-down folk and Dylan and for some time their instrumental work was stilted and dryly technical. Their great single Eight Miles High set them free to a more loose kind of improvisation.

The Byrds: Younger Than Yesterday (Columbia CS 9442)

Their latest LP, Younger Than Yesterday never matches the achievement of Eight Miles High, but it does contain several brilliant musical gems. There is a preoccupation with sense effects and colors especially in Renaissance Fair. There are country and bluegrass harmonies in Time Between, which also has a Dylanesque look at the boy-girl theme. So You Want to be A Rock 'n' Roll Star adds a note of protest, this time against the music business in which "you sell your soul to the company who are waiting there to sell plastic ware." That song also uses sounds of girls screaming at a concert to intensify the image. The same is done with the sound of spacemen in C.T.A. 102. Both these come across as rather silly. Sometimes sound effects can be used subtly and to good effect; the Byrds haven't learned how yet. They seem to be reaching to keep up with the psychedelic scene.

So-called psychedelic music has many practitioners right now, since the music is very in. Some of them think that strange sounds and obscure lyrics are enough to get by. Others like The Jefferson Airplane are much more artful.

Jefferson Airplane: Surrealistic Pillow (RCA Victor LSP 3766)

The Airplane created another trend-setting LP in Surrealistic Pillow, which has musical influence stretching through folk and blues, rock 'n' roll, jazz, classical and especially raga, the classical music of India. My Best Friend is pure folk rock set in the good-time music era. Today is pure folk. Embryonic Journey has Jorma Kaukonen playing the sweetest guitar solo you ever heard set in a baroque style. Grace Slick, blatantly manipulates the listener's mind, in White Rabbit her own Alice-in-Wonderland vision. The Airplane project an image of youthfulness and verve that is refreshing to hear. There is a great deal of variety in their music although, as on their latest single Pooh Neil, they sometimes overdo the experiments with gimmicky feedback and new sounds.

Also from San Francisco are the Grateful Dead, Moby Grape and Big Brother and the Holding Company. The Dead play with joy about drugs with strong country and bluegrass undertones. The Grape hasn't yet developed an interesting content but have a good tight, well-disciplined band. The Holding Company's LP has a weak collection of material. Too much of it is old teenybopper stuff. It seems their record company Mainstream felt they had a better grasp of the market than the group has. It's a shame, though, because this group should be better produced. They have a good band and a great singer. Janis Joplin's vocals reach back into the jazz-blues of the 20's.

Many of the new groups have had luck with their record companies. They are being allowed to create what they want without company interference. The Doors LP is an example of what can be done by an intelligent producer and a sympathetic record company.

There are new groups coming out all the time. Vanilla Fudge on Atco just released an LP of very complex and often overdone music. The Jimi Hendrix Experience gives a Negro's view of the drug scene with violence and sexual imagery. The Hobbits, taking their name and their LP title from Tolkien's Books (Down to Middle Earth Decca DL 74920), play almost teenybopper music in elaborate arrangements and intricate recording production. In their music, strange sounds are used abundantly but with little basis to hang them on. Their lyrical and musical content is not high.

The Paupers, Canada's made-good group, also has a tendency to use odd sounds with little reason.

The Paupers: Magic People (Verve-Forecast FTS 3026)

Their first LP, should have been much better than this. Its production is thin. The Paupers make cosmic and other sounds but their songs can't keep the listener's attention. Magic People self-consciously points out the drug influence in their lives. All four Paupers are good musicians but they use their talents to play gimmicks instead of reasonable music. The results are rather artificial.

It's almost impossible to give a clear outline of the current music scene. There are so many people doing so many different and interesting things.

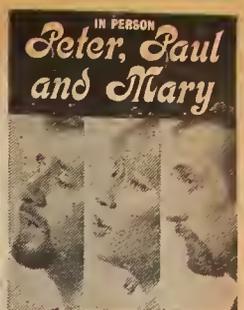

Before the years end, the whole scene should be shaken up again. Leonard Cohen, will have an LP out on Columbia in a month. This should continue the trend in poetic explorations of personal relationships, love and the ego. Dylan will also have a new one soon, setting the world on its ear again.

The Jefferson Airplane will have a new one, and hopefully they'll resist the temptation to play gimmickry. The Beatles may have a new one by Christmas, but what can they do to beat or even match Sgt. Pepper? Expect new ones from the Rolling Stones, whose last LP, Flowers, was merely a collection of left-overs, some like Backstreet Girl — very interesting, most not.

But with the Stones going in more and more for electronic music and the Beatles off drugs and turned more and more on to Indian philosophy, we can only expect music to go further into those directions.

That loose prediction is the only kind that's safe to make, so changeable is the popular music scene right now.

Chandler Davis is at present associate chairman of the Department of Mathematics of the University of Toronto, was an organizer of the first International Teach-In, and has been actively involved in protesting the war in Viet Nam with several groups.

By CHANDLER DAVIS

I thought we had already told them. We DID tell them. In February 1966, Northrop Frye, George Grant, Donald Creighton, and several hundred professors, students, and others made representations to Mr. Pearson and Mr. Martin.

We told them, what they knew, that the US forces are fighting on the side of an oligarchical regime at Saigon, with almost no support among the general population, against the National Liberation Front which even the US admits has broad popular support. As the US military has said, the only way to destroy this popular force is "to destroy the Viet-Cong infrastructure". That means the destruction of the very fabric of Vietnamese society: the saturation napalm bombing of peasant villages, the shifting of peasants from their homes to internment camps, the burning and poisoning of the crops the peasants depend on. . . . If our choice in Vietnam is between genocide and the National Liberation Front, how can we choose genocide?

We also submitted that

. . . to this moment the Parliament and Government of Canada have not spoken or acted decisively.

The Government challenged that. They assured us they were taking all sorts of actions dependent for their effectiveness upon absolute secrecy. Whatever those may have been, they don't seem to have been much more effective secret than public.

We made several suggestions. One — that Canada call publicly for ending the bombing of North Vietnam — has been followed by Mr. Martin almost two years later. Another was as follows:

Withdraw permission for Canadian firms to export any arms or material, such as Caribou aircraft, helicopter parts and electronic equipment, to the United States or other countries to be used in the war in Vietnam.

We got no answer to that one.

Last winter we tried again. The tone of our petitions, some said, was loftier, in that the signers included no notorious student radicals and indeed were All Faculty. Letters went to Messrs Pearson and Martin from U of T (370 faculty signatures), from UBC (350), from University of Saskatchewan (175), from Queen's (170), and — note well — 200 from l'Universite' Laval.

. . . Nous voulons rappeler au gouvernement du Canada que, dans ces conditions, notre pays ne peut contribuer a l'armement des belligerents . . . Nous sommes effrayes par l'influence politique des generaux, nous sommes epouvantes par l'efficacite' des teurs a la chaine. nous sommes ecoeures par le napalm sur les enfants.

The wording varied between the five letters, but all attacked the Canadian arms shipments to the US. And each letter with hundreds of faculty signatures — well over a thousand in all.

This time the Prime Minister not only received our delegation, he gave us a careful written answer, which was printed in full in the Globe Mail. He told us that the imposition of an embargo on the export of military equipment to the USA, and concomitant termination of the Production Sharing Agreements, would have far-reaching consequences which could contemplate with equanimity.

Who asked him to contemplate it with equanimity? The question was whether to DO it. What's to stop him? He explained that the USA is . . . a natural source for much of our defence equipment. The US/Canadian production sharing arrangements enable the Canadian Government to acquire from the USA a great deal of the nation's essential defence equipment at the lowest possible cost, while at the same time permitting us to offset the resulting drain on the economy by reciprocal sales to USA. Under these agreements, Canadian industry is able to participate competitively . . .

This sounds as if he didn't know that the Pentagon has killed a quarter of a million Vietnamese children, has poisoned crops and bombed dikes, has levelled thousands of villages. But everyone knows, and we had just reminded him. The reply we got was in terms of opportunities for profit, of economies to be realized!

Actually, if the Defence Production Sharing Agreements were terminated, Canada could offset the resulting loss of weapon contracts by producing peaceful goods which are now imported. It's not clear that it would cost the country, or any industry, any hardship at all. A little imaginative planning might turn it to an asset. But that's secondary. A man wants a gun from you to commit murder with, you may be able to answer without considering his price. You may just refuse.

We told the Government plainly, they acknowledged they heard, and look at the answer they gave us.

It can't be because we didn't use our serene and dignified academic voices. Maybe it's because we did. Maybe the voice of reason and humanity at this point can't be serene. Maybe too decorous a critic is easily dismissed, for he will never rock the boat.

I suspect we need to find new language. Not because what we said last year was wrong, but because it was right. It is enough to have offered sound counsel in vain. We MUST have gone about saying it badly, otherwise how could Mr. Pearson have thought he was answering us, when we were speaking of blood and he was speaking of dollars?

This time, let's try it differently. Let's rock the boat a bit.

Let's more of us speak out. Let's address ourselves, not only to Presidents and Prime Ministers who are formally responsible, but to all the thousands who authorize and carry out the shipment of aircraft, bomb casings, and green berets.

And let's speak — how? Leaflets? Resolutions at union meetings? Delegations to corporation executives or to Mr. Pearson? Picket signs? Sit-ins? Maybe all of these; maybe other ways we haven't thought of yet. Somehow our language has to do more than describe the world justly, it has to work upon it.

The Caribou aircraft are still going from Toronto to Vietnam, the polystyrene is still being shipped from Canadian plants for the preparations of napalm. Let's go stop it.

The SAC circus and the draft

Near the end of the summer of 1966 I was in a large Cuban hospital in Havana under treatment for kidney stones; sitting opposite me one afternoon in the lounge, dressed in the same hospital pyjamas as myself, was a young man in his late twenties quietly smoking a cigarette, seemingly oblivious to the other patients and nurses who provided a steady stream of traffic through the lounge. His face was almost completely bound by bandages, and as far as I could make out there was only one eye which was at all operative; his left arm was in a sling.

As I was out of cigarettes, I asked him for one; he was interested in the fact that I was not Cuban and asked if there was anything he could do to make my stay in the hospital more comfortable as I spoke no Spanish. It was time for my enema, so we couldn't pursue the conversation any further; walking down the corridor the nurse informed me that the young man was a hero of the Cuban revolution. The mess of his face and limp arm was due to subsequent action defending his country in the Bay of Pigs invasion by Cuban mercenaries from the shores of the United States.

The next day we met again; he spoke to me of his country and his people, a gentle man who bore little malice towards anyone; he had pacifist tendencies, yet he was ready to fight if necessary — part of his family had been killed by Batista's henchmen; the rest by an American bomb prior to the Bay of Pigs — yet there was little hate. He sympathized with the many thousands of Cubans who were leaving Castro's Cuba and hoped they would be happier where they were going; he was sad rather than angry that hundreds of his countrymen had returned at the Bay of Pigs to attack Cuba. He didn't like fighting, but he fought.

His views were not unusual, as most of the Cubans I spoke with had expressed similar sentiments. He like many other Cubans, also had a great deal of sympathy and compassion for the people of Vietnam; they had suffered from the same enemy.

The day I left the hospital we had become friends; he wished me luck and I said that we would probably meet again if he were to come to Canada, or I to Cuba in the future; he smiled and said perhaps but he had already volunteered to go to Vietnam as a volunteer if Cuban troops were invited...

During the course of my stay in Cuba the story was the same — nearly all the young men were preparing themselves to go to Vietnam should they be invited by the Vietnamese; many of them had become friends of mine during the warm summer evenings in beautiful Havana. We had sipped coffee in the cafes, flirted on the broad promenades with the senioritas, and talked idly on the palmed beaches until sunrise, trying not to think about Vietnam, Guantanamo, or the American battleship which cruised off the horizon every day.

It was then that the United States became a very personal and immediate concept to me — if these young men went to Vietnam, or if there was to be another attack on Cuba from the United States, I would have to face the fact that the Americans would be killing friends of mine...

I was reminded of the Youth Festival in Helsinki in 1962; I had been hitch-hiking through Europe and happened to be in Finland at the time of the Festival which had been condemned by the Americans as a Communist propaganda show. Among the friends I had made there were some Spanish students who had travelled from Madrid to the Festival against the explicit orders of Franco. They were a frightened and cautious group, fearing that the Spanish authorities would discover their presence in Helsinki.

Two years later in Canada I was informed by three different sources who had visited Spain that some of them had been executed for their visit, and others imprisoned.

Many years ago my uncle had fought against Franco in the International Brigade during the Spanish civil war, a war which Hemmingway, Norman Bethune and Pete Seeger have romanticized and given us the proper liberal sentiments — yet in the early sixties Franco was still killing people, and some of them happened to be friends of mine; again a political problem had become a personal sorrow for me. Facts, figures, and political concepts became secondary to the reality of a friend's death.

That same summer I visited Auswitch, preserved today as a museum in Poland; I spent a day walking among the barracks and through the barren muddy paths which had seen the destruction of millions of people. I tried to understand, but got violently ill before the day was over and stopped trying. None of my friends or relatives were in the camps, but there are many Jews in Toronto, some of who remember... ask them where they derived their political consciousness from.

Remember Selma? Two years ago when thousands were marching in Toronto, sitting on the pavement in front of the American Consulate, it was easy to be as outraged as hell, to sing the songs; half of the students in Toronto sounded like they wanted to "go South and work for SNCC". Many did, working in the movement until the days of Black Power; they often faced death together; they all remembered the little girls in Birmingham, Jimmy Lee Jackson, Chaney, Goodman, Schwerner... ask them where they derived their political activism from.

Two weeks ago I read in the papers of a girl I had met in Jackson Mississippi who had been arrested and beaten up; the same summer (1966) I met her, I had been in Atlanta when Stokely Carmichael was arrested for inciting the riot which had begun when a white cop had shot a black man suspected of car theft. Now everyone wants to get Stokely's neck for his speeches in Cuba, and his open support of the Vietnamese people (Communists to some). Where are the good ol' days of civil rights and freedom songs? What does the black man want?

What does any man want? The right to determine the course of his own life perhaps.

These thoughts were running through my head Wednesday night as I listened to the SAC debate on the draft resistance programme (see the Varsity news reports). Shortly after I came in to the meeting, one fellow had finished an impassioned plea to Council to defeat the bill; shortly after he had finished he was making sure that one of the reporters from the daily papers had his name spelled right, while a fellow Council member was making an equally impassioned plea to support the motion; I guess he had nothing more to learn from the debate.

A photographer walked around taking pictures; the Speaker of the Council was being hassled by procedural motions; a group of nervous girls in one corner who never spoke pounded the table loudly after each put-down of the draft dodgers. It was all very macabre, for this was no ordinary resolution and no ordinary debate.

I suppose one could expect a good deal of pompous nonsense and moral self-righteousness in council meetings — on most issues; Wednesday night, however, the SAC was in a position to do something quite concrete in terms of saving human lives, for the issue involved was not a mere condemnation or approval of the Vietnamese war, but a concrete expression of support for the draft resistance programme — eventually leading to money donations perhaps.

As all the issues I have mentioned here are personal ones to me because of friendship, so too was the issue before council. The implications of the war come closer to home every day as thousands of draft dodgers leave their homes to come to Canada; during the last few months a few of these "cowards" and "traitors" have stayed in my home until they could locate elsewhere; many have become my friends. Many are alive and free today because they heard of the alternatives offered by the Anti-Draft programme.

To me, most of the grey shadings of the issue had become black and white; regardless of the senseless talk of "representative" and "individual" in defining their right to vote as they wished; the real issue was one of life and death; one alternative offers death, imprisonment or killing people you don't want to kill, and the other offers life in Canada.

Any attempt to judge these men is both morally authoritarian and presumptuous; to deny them an opportunity by not supporting the motion before Council, because of a vague distinction between representative and individual is less than moral.

The debate might have been more serious if the centre of the room was piled up with the dead bodies of those young men who are now dead because they never heard of the Anti-Draft programme... but I suppose this is going too far — except that I remember that one frightening moment when the vote was taken and the motion defeated. The room exploded in a roar of table thumping, victorious eyes gleaming, girls giggling louder than ever, members winking at each other. It was all very virile and triumphant.

Tom Faulkner who supported the motion — and revealed himself a person of quiet and dignified integrity in his beliefs, sat quietly as the crowd cheered. His was the reaction I would have expected from everybody — even those who had won. The issue seemed to me to be too serious to cheer about. Yet the winning side traditionally cheers I suppose...

I went home and told one of the draft resisters staying at my house that they had cheered when the bill was defeated. He continued watching the late show and shrugged his shoulders.

I do not wish or hope to misrepresent the precise motives of those members of Council who voted against the proposal; I am sure that a great deal of thought went into their decisions, for they are all honorable men. Many, I am certain, would have gladly shown their humanitarianism in 1956 when Hungarian refugees were seeking to emigrate to Canada; some said that they would gladly write personal cheques to the draft resisters organization although it was a different matter now that they were representatives of students and could not vote as thinking, feeling individuals. They had many reasons.

JAZZ

Death, Dearth, Dissolution of Ancient Amities

BY JACK McCaffrey

Last Saturday, the whole front page of the Toronto Star's entertainment section announced to the world that JAZZ IS DEAD. One of the musicians enlisted to support this assertion (which is so stupid that I wouldn't waste energy refuting it) was Ray Bryant.

After having listened to some of the records on which pianist Bryant (now appearing at the Town Tavern) demonstrated substantial talent, I found it incredible that he would agree with that preposterous statement. Bryant has played with some of the greatest jazz musicians, including Miles Davis, Sonny Rollins, Dizzy Gillespie, and Coleman Hawkins. On WORKTIME, a great jazz record by Rollins, Bryant plays beautifully conceived, precisely articulated lines which have the clarity and brilliance of fine cut crystal.

On SOUL, by Coleman Hawkins, he plays a blues solo which is as earthy, funky, and down-home as anyone could get; yet, he avoids sounding contrived and affected.

And on ALONE WITH THE BLUES, Bryant reveals a talent that is truly rare among modern jazz pianists — the ability to create solo music which is completely self-sustaining. The music is relaxed, lyrical, and richly coloured with the blues. Bryant combines qualities of Teddy Wilson, Art Tatum, and Bud Powell, and blends them with a deep blues feeling to define his own unique way of playing.

Yet at the Town this week, there was no evidence of the Ray Bryant who shone on the recordings of a few years ago. He began the set with a sort of rock-funk thing which sounded, not earthy, but merely corny. Following this were "Green Dolphin Street" (a tune which has been absolutely bludgeoned to death by thousands of musicians in the last few years), and "Ode To Billy Joe", which Bryant has recently recorded in the hope of cashing in on a hit.

Following this, we left, because it was just too sad to have to listen to a man who was once a fine musician playing garbage in the hope of making a few more bucks.

Now, there is nothing wrong with a musician playing pop tunes — but does he have to play this music so badly? "Ode to Billie Joe" is a blues, and a good jazz musician with roots as deep in the blues as Bryant's could play music of real substance within the framework of pop tunes like this. But instead of exploiting the possibilities of the piece, Bryant just falls back on the funky clichés and the stale old r and b devices of a few years ago, and makes no effort to give the music an original, thoughtful treatment.

Furthermore, his trio is severely punished by a drummer who simply has no place in a jazz group. Sitting rigidly behind his drums, with an expression of glazed stupidity on his immobile (perhaps dead?) features, this man plays with all the precision, imagination, and swinging flexibility of a broken metronome. The ill-timed crashing of his cymbals frequently drowns out Bryant's lines, which are rather muddled and mindless anyway.

How could Ray Bryant sink so low? Unfortunately, like some other jazz musicians, he suffers from the misconception that playing pop music badly is the key to popularity and economic success. Some of his recent pop-jazz records have sold well, he says. Yes but where are the crowds? Not in the club. Tuesday night, there were only a few people present and these actually seemed to want to hear some real music (a real rarity at the Town); nevertheless, Bryant laboured away at his Pseudo-funky claptrap, as if he really believed he were captivating the masses. All he did was alienate his real fans.

Of course, it is truly difficult to make a living playing uncompromising jazz. Miles Davis and Sonny Rollins do it. Coltrane did it. But only musicians of the greatest stature can succeed in this way, for there isn't enough appreciation of good jazz to support all the musicians who are out there scuffling. And so, many musicians try to ape the commercial success of Jimmy Smith and Ramsey Lewis. Unfortunately, the nation really isn't clamouring to hear "jazz" versions of pop tunes which have already been overexposed in the media.

In spite of all their attempts to cash in on the nebulous market lying between "pure" pop music and "pure" jazz by trying repeatedly to create "hit" records, jazz musicians and record companies are inevitably doomed to fail. Blind N. Wayne Smith, a great but little-known blues musician and musical commentator explains the problem:

"Now you take your average pop-rock fan; now if he has already heard "Ode to Billie Joe" by Bobbie Gentry, now he ain't going to be interested in hearing another version by Ray Bryant anyway; and your typical jazz lover, now he'll want to hear Ray doing what he used to be known for — playing his own personal jazz as well as he can. It's the same with all them Blue Note records — your average pop-rock follower never heard of Blue Note or Lee Morgan or Herbie Hancock anyway; and them folks what like jazz, they'll only be disappointed in their favourite musicians for squandering their talent."

The only solution to this problem is that each musician must play his own music truly and well. Otherwise he will end up in a no man's land. And that is where Ray Bryant has been heading for several years now.

O Again

During the editing of last week's review, considerable controversy arose over the Story of O by Pauline Réage reviewed by Katherin Collins. Without wishing to contradict, or diminish Miss Collins' review in any way, the editors felt it would be worth while to publish several short comments on the novel by male readers of the book. Following are comments by Donald Crowe, Henry Tarvainen, and Graham Fraser.

Not a woman

Fellatio, anal intercourse, flagellation. I'm sure that a purely voyeuristic interest in such fun ceased for nearly everyone other than engineers and JCR virgins at around the age sixteen. So I don't quite understand why so many American reviewers have gone to such pains to justify the "erotic" content of The Story of O as being far above the level of mere pornography; it is neither above nor below. For pornography is dead to literature and is hiding only in the realm of graphic photography.

It's all been done, said and written before. No apologies necessary, thank you. Any consideration of a book on simply its pornographic aspects is irrelevant. The Story of O, however, gives us enough to think about without focussing solely on the heroine's sexual activities.

Because her experiences are only the means to a highly desired end — complete physical and psychological bondage to her lover. Her motivation supplies the interest, the means supply the "pornography" (absolutely no "offensive" language here — I suspect a bad translation).

L'Histoire d'O was written in 1954. All right, so maybe the author was still hung up with Sartre's maxim concerning man's condemnation to freedom. And in the face of a progressive feminine cult she probably found reactionary solace in her return to the position of a medieval Catholic chattel. So what? The Story of O is totally unsuccessful, simply because Pauline Réage was not woman enough to exhaust the intellectual aspects of the problems presented. She exhausts the physical aspects quite admirably.

So women want to be dominated, put irrevocably in their place. Fine. But Pauline Réage, or O, loses completely her cherished femininity. She cops out of womanhood, from maternal instinct to genuine sexual pleasure. Granted, she does enjoy the freedom to be thoroughly carnal with a variety of partners, but I've yet to hear of a woman having an anal orgasm and it seems that O has only the anticipation of one to sustain her through half the book.

Pauline Réage remains an unknown figure. So much so that the preface has to argue (with evidence from the book itself) to prove that Réage is indeed a woman. I prefer another view. I believe that the writer of The Story of O was a queer who underwent a slight operation. That would explain a lot of things.

D. C.

The girl next door

The Story of O seems to me to be a simple, bleak and uncompromising narration which can be seen as the logical extension and conclusion of many male-female relationships. The complete and willing subjugation of O to her lover parallels many everyday relationships, although they are not acted out in the stark extremity of O ...

H. T.

de Sodion Nun

One of the most obvious things about O is the striking monastic parallel; Réage's O surrenders body and soul—not to the transcendent Body of Christ, but to the almost equally mystic Body of Man. The antithesis of everything that feminism, and emancipation stands for, The Story—like the religious orders—represents the total enslavement of Woman. Reading it, I thought of an attractive young nun I knew once—who glowed and radiated her pleasure in submitting herself to the regime of The Order. Her mission and O's strikes one as almost identical; the mystique of virginity on the one hand and prostitution on the other involve the same glorification of physical sacrifice. Even the physical spiritualism is interchangeable; fellatio-communion, the habit, the ring,—all underline the negation of feminine freedom, and the incarnation of sacrifice: the traditional, Victorian role of Woman that we still see women trying to emancipate themselves from.

might be described as an extremely clear diagram of the workings of a good strong thresher, able to separate chaff from wheat eight hours a day seven days a week. So much clarity, energy, and sheer steady work stir an admiration as deep as it is reluctant. Reluctant because the Report generates a vague malaise somewhat like that malaise generated by reading Mathew Arnold and Henry Miller on the same day. Only a close search finds the objective correlative for this malaise.

Like mice in a Spanish peanut machine, two opposing schools of thought scuttle about under the even swing of the Report's prose. On one hand there are a number of proposals which, by cutting down on lectures, lecture oriented exams and meaningless tutorials, attempt to give independent study a place in the university. From this English university tradition they propose an answer to student needs. On the other hand there are a number of proposals which, if carried out, would deprive the colleges of the right to hire, pay, promote, or fire, their professors.

It is a somewhat tentative theory of this review that, if it is difficult to say what elements feed the American imagination, it is easy to say that the American synthesis of them feeds the Canadian imagination. The U of T and its reform is a case in point. For years now huge structures have sprung up down south of the border. At present their variously experienced defects are feeding the American imagination. But the U of T, like an aging foolish beauty now wants to have one of those unlined but streamlined faces, ignoring the fact that the sixties respect the lines of age and experience, not the scars of face lifting.

It is perhaps clear now what was meant by the statement that two schools of thought are scrabbling about in the Report. On one hand we have institutional changes to give the individual time for individual effort; on the other hand we have institutional changes to erect a faceless society in which the possession of a face would be as useless, needless and weird as a Greek tragedy mask for Willy Loman. It is easy to imagine such a university and such a society. It is also easy to imagine how far from such a university everyone would live. Everyone would need help to come in for the day and the tax to support the necessary loans would break societies back. Fight The Fare Increase. Learn. How to vote Follow. your own leader leader.

The following statement is a fragmentary voice from another drawer but necessarily the opinion of this review.

There is a tangled pile of letters, telephone books (sky high what? can fly), old newspapers, scraps of poems, Blake engravings and Chinese tea holders on a desk. On that same desk reviews of "Undergraduate Instruction in Arts and Sciences, University of Toronto 1967" have made sporadic appearances and then disappeared like television shows that didn't make their rating. This particular review believes it to be significant that each new attempt to assess the Undergraduate etc. involves a long tangled search for the book among the articles of daily life, a search that is always unsuccessful. Though flowers appear suddenly on the desk, splashing reminiscences of the sungod over steel shining stolen spoons, this book is always in a bookshelf in another room. The smell of the chrysanthemums drifts over, the mind turns off and begins to float and curl like smoke from burnt fire, burnt leaves. A hasty sniff of the Macpherson Report sets at least this to rights. From first grade to last breath the smell of new textbooks will have that Eye of Mondor effect and you may tell your children someone said so.

Freezing in soul the great audience of this review's opinions looks to you, above average reader, and says!

Canadian Art Books

By JOAN MURRAY

E. Kilbourn. Great Canadian Painting, McClelland, 1966, 128 pages, $4.95.

Despite sour grapes in advance from the grapevine, Kilbourn's Great Canadian Painting has turned out to be a fairly good introductory text to the last hundred years of Canadian art. The book is copiously illustrated by 106 plates, some of them unusual, and this will probably be Kilbourn's main claim to fame. The unusual illustrations include some of Borduas' works as well as others. Town's excellent "Great Seal" (1961; Waxer Col., Toronto) is shown, a fine choice as the Waxer collection has some great Canadian works which have never been reproduced.

The text opens with John Fraser, which is not a bad place to begin, although Fraser's work is not recognized as being as novel and forward-looking as it actually is. (Look for Fraser's flattening of planes, use of contours, and heavy, rich color if you want to name a Canadian "Gauguin"). However, this treatment of Fraser is redeemed by the most understanding mention of Robert Harris to date. From there on, the text goes through the usual painters, with rather more comment on the post-1930 painters than may be warranted (though it's handy). An unusual artist to be mentioned is Jan G. Wyers, a Saskatchewan semi-surrealist, whose work has a curious combination of primitivism and sophistication. Because the text is divided into chapters ("Landscape," "Daily Life," "The Cities," etc.), it is often repetitious. It also tends to be overly anecdotal. Furthermore, there is an incredible over-emphasis on the cost of paintings: how many artists died bankrupt or rich, how much pictures are selling for today. Who is the author trying to convince with this information? Does she really want us to visualize Canadian painting as a sharp investment?

Oddly enough, in its appearance, the book recalls Life Magazine's publications of flora, fauna, and space. Perhaps it's all the glossy pictures and the anecdotal, discontinuous text.

The McMichael Conservation Collection of Art. Introd. by Paul Duval. Clarke, Irwin, $5.95.

This catalogue is a handy guide to the outstanding Robert and Signe McMichael collection of Canadian (mainly Group of Seven) art. There is an introduction by Paul Duval, his usual smooth work. The formation of the collection is one of the many indications of a growing interest in Canadian art. Excellent illustrations, particularly of some fine Tom Thomsons, and J. E. H. Macdonalds. The collectors were lucky in getting absolutely top quality work by their chosen group. Interestingly enough, there is an Arthur Lismer, "Evening Silhouette," which is a sketch for the large picture in University College. A back section of the text illustrates all the McMichael collection in small photos. This feature, which also appears in the National Gallery catalogue, is very useful for quick reference purposes.

K. D. Pepper. Morrice. Clarke, Irwin, 101 pages, $4.50.

Kathleen Daly Pepper is an artist herself, and so her account of Morrice cannot help but reflect her own artistic tendencies: both are very realistic. The narrative is at the level of the general public aged eight, and can be quite unappealing at times. Every cliché of artistic development is used—"He was more in harmony with simple living... He needed periods of solitude and the freedom to paint. His zest for art could not be curbed."

However, this is the only book on the artist so it has some value until superseded.

E. Carr. The House of All Sorts. Clarke, Irwin Paperback, 166 pages, $1.90.

Emily Carr is undoubtedly Canada's most lyrical artist-writer, and this book is one of her most charming. It tells of her horrible experiences as a landlady. A second section tells of the wonders of raising Bohtail dogs.

One should be wary of certain of Miss Carr's viewpoints. She was an old spinster with something against men, probably because she had a mean, tyrannical father. Hence, all the sketches of men in this book vary between the child-man and the man "crude, enormous, coarse." Miss Carr immediately identifies with the wives in any marriage. Babies are also often seen as nasty, slobbery, scowling infants. It's all part of spinsterhood.

There's one terrific sentence: "To part from pillow and blanket is like bidding goodbye to all your relatives suddenly smitten with plague."

The Media Group Another Example of Belling the Cat

One of the new campus organizations is the Media Group. What is it and what can it do?

In answer to the first question, it is a group of interested and enthusiastic people from Architecture and Fine Art involved in every description of art medium from photography and film-making to painting and designing to sculpture and metal-work. Before the idea of this group came into being the members were separately engaged in their own art interests. However, to achieve anything on a large scale it became necessary to have enough manpower to carry out their ideas.

In answer to the second question, let us suppose that one of the members wishes to execute a large metal sculpture. He informs the various members of the media group of his plans. After collecting enough people willing to help him undertake his project, the next step would be to determine if the work involves costly equipment. In this case an oxy-acetylene torch plus bottles of oxygen and acetylene are needed. The Media Group as a whole would then approach an industry and ask for a donation of bottles of oxygen and acetylene or the use of an oxy-acetylene torch. Perhaps even various members of the group would know where to locate such equipment. In this way the sculptor would be able to turn his idea into a finished piece of sculpture.

It can easily be seen that by this approach of working together as an interested group of people towards a common goal, the Media Group can accomplish a great deal more than the individual members on their own could.

There are endless things to learn and endless possibilities to discover and explore which are not available to the individual. We feel the Media Group is a step in the right direction towards solving this problem.

There is no limit to the scope of this group. Eventually we hope to involve O.C.A., Danforth Tech., interested high school students, artists in and around Toronto, the Music Faculty and generally any cross-campus student interested.

Watch for a group balloon happening at Architecture as well as a photography exhibit with a new twist.

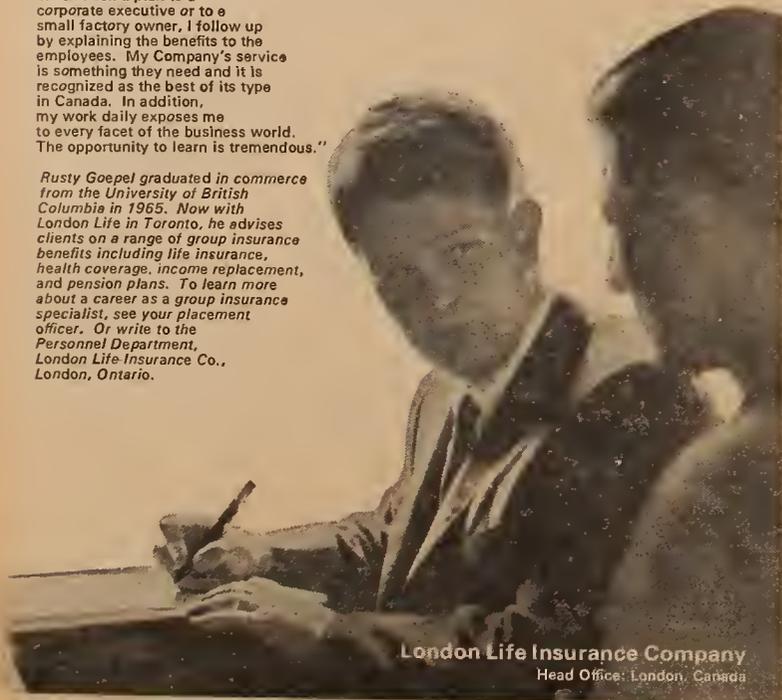

Anyone interested in further information should contact Bob LaBelle in Architecture or Leslie-Ann Thompson in Fine Art, 261-9061.

Gideon

If seeing Gideon Tuesday night means that I shall not be able to see Godot, then I have made a bad exchange.

This play by Paddy Chayefsky is renowned to have been a hit on Broadway. If Lou Jacoby and Zero Mostel felt benevolent, I imagine they could give the play the pure schmalz humour it requires.

Pamela Beckwith's production, unfortunately, misses the nostalgia of the old world, and the bite of the new.

In the play, Gideon, a bullock-brained farmer, is called on by God in the austere guise of a black angel, to redeem his oppressed and paganized brethren.

—You must be kidding, he replies.

So is Chayefsky. He tries to ridicule God by making Him a peevish and vain old despot who has numbskulls win His victories so that His might is recognized and exalted above all human strength. But the lamebrain, appropriately, is too simple to accept this regime. He cannot bear the burden of humility. He wants his fame his principedom and the trappings thereof.

In the series of debates between God and Gideon, the difficulties of a divine love affair are worked out; Gideon is blessed but his lover asks him to forego his humanity. In a comic moment he treats God as a lover as easily conquered as a foolish tart.

The point is finally that Gideon, who knows that God exists, pretends to be ignorant of Him, so that he (Gideon) may believe in his own human significance; although he knows that he is not at all significant.

Now, unlike the contention of the blurb, this is really a very commonplace paradox; and not a dramatic enlightenment since Gideon remains a dumb and superficial character.

As for the "humorous" belittlement of God — it is a battle easily won. Milton's God broaches on ridiculousness when He indulges in human reasoning. Chayefsky performs no tour de farce when he has the angel rant and rage, "I am a jealous God," or when Gideon proclaims to a very palpable presence, "You are too great a concept for me to conceive of, God."

The production itself is a tatty affair. The debates between Gideon and the Angel have their funny moments, but too soon degenerate to repetitive dullness. As for the acting, there is no way it could rescue this parable that passes for comment on "modern man". It was frankly amateurish, stiff, unconvincing, tediously blocked and badly paced. Better direction and heaps of coaching were needed.

A little of such banter—say to the first intermission—might have been enough. A little more than a little was by much too much.

A Letter To The Editor

October 7, 1967

Sir,

Please refer to 6 Review of your current newspaper, by a man named Ewing, lines three and four. If this person likes to fornicate, let him keep his passions to himself! He is presumptuous—even insolent—in taking it for granted that others are at his low level.

This level is unfortunately that of much of your newspaper, though parts of it (e.g. book reviews, theatre critiques, etc.) are good, even very good at times. The dictionary comments on the word "bugger" as "not now in decent use." This is true, yet this very word appeared in print in an article written by a woman! Similar words appear from time to time in your publication.

Years ago, universities were frequented by ladies and gentlemen (some still are though not, it seems, here) and those who were not so on arrival became, in most cases, ladies and gentlemen by the elevating and refining influences that surrounded them.

You, Ewing, and others seem to take pleasure—since you do it so often—in dragging down the standards of those who have them and exerting a pejorative influence on those whose standards are low in any case.

It would be too much to hope that the foregoing will stop the coarseness and coprophily that mars your publication. I hope, nevertheless, that you will read it and think. Your predecessors did not descend to such depths as you have done. If you doubt this, read the older issues of your newspaper.

There is nothing libellous in this letter, and you will note that it is addressed to you and not to a third party. I therefore do not feel that I am being caiffiff or cowardly if I do not sign it (since I am closely connected with the University).

P.S. I have re-read this letter and now wish to cancel and withdraw the eight words contained in parenthesis in the third paragraph. I wrote rather hastily, I fear, and without proper justification. Please accept my apologies for having written this.

Director Tarvainen was a little too concerned with pace, and not enough with motivated action for our taste, and too often did business seem attached to the text rather than to be deriving from it . . ."

E: Is that it? Can we go now?

V: Not yet.

PLS and the York Cycle

By MARY CANE

If exam-time fever takes the joy out of Easter for you, celebrate now: go to see the York crucifixion in the West Hall of UC. You will also be treating yourself to an excellent production, for the Pocoli Ludique Societas has come up with another piece of good theatre unearthed from the "dark ages".

If you found yourself able to understand most of the Middle English in last year's Coventry Pageant, a new challenge awaits you in this play for the language is even more archaic. Fortunately the familiarity of the plot and the efforts of the actors to convey visually the meaning of their lines assist the audience to understand what is going on.

The acting is generally of a high standard, with particular good presentations of the leading characters. James Bradford is excellent as Pilate, while Angela Fusco as his wife brings to her role both a charming characterization and a beautiful singing voice. Terry Tweed as Mary, and Skip Sband as Judas are particularly moving. As the priests who instigate and urge on the persecution of Christ, Paul Mulholland and Ron Mlodzik present contrasting pictures of evil—the one openly malicious and the other coldly impersonal. In the role of Christ, Barry Smith is visually perfect—not only does he look the part, according to Christian conventions, but his characterization is both subtle and compelling. Vocally he is, at times, less successful, for some of his speeches are not completely audible.

Three scaffolds, representing the courts of the high priests and Pilate, and the hill at Calvary make up the main elements of the set. These serve to separate the principle actors from the audience and draw our attention to them, thereby creating the illusion of a theatre without losing the close rapport with the audience. An ingeniously devised Calvary makes possible the most dramatic moment of the play, the raising of the cross.

The costumes and properties are similarly well designed and executed. The only noticeable exceptions are those of a flagrantly phallic fiend and his long-nosed companion, whose papier-mache outfits seem out of place among the other, more realistic and carefully made costumes.

The play is a long one, taking up about two hours without an intermission. For this reason, and because the dialogue is so difficult to understand, some of the long speaking scenes should have been shortened and perhaps some of the smaller scenes, such as the interlude with devil and fiends cut altogether.

On the whole, however, director Reiner Sauer and his cast and crew have assembled an extremely interesting, at times exciting, production. The York Crucifixion will be presented in West Hall at 2:00 on Friday and Sunday and on Saturday at 3:00. It's well worth seeing.

A Gallery and A Book

By Joan Murray

There's a good show at Gallery Pascal till Oct. 24 — John K. Esler's prints and collages. Esler, who lives in Calgary, has made a trip through the United States an inspiration for much of his most recent works like "Amerca America". His earlier prints were often of tin foil arranged and then printed. The resulting texture was beautiful. Now he has left this technique behind because it did not pose enough problems ("If it worked, it did; if it didn't work, it didn't"), and turned to more complex techniques. Two outstanding works were "Freeway and the Cherry Orchard 1, a monumental and compelling abstract, and "A quo", an embossed print of 1964.

There are some books which remind you that there are strange people in this world. One of these books is by Fielding Dawson (AN EMOTIONAL MEMOIR OF FRANZ KLINE, Random House, 147 pages, $6.50), and the strange person is not Kline (concerning whom the book is nominally written) but Dawson himself.

Dawson was Kline's student at Black Mountain College and followed him from there to the wilds of New York. In the Big City, we see Kline at his favorite haunt—the old Cedar Bar. We find out about Elizabeth, his first wife, Nancy, Betsy, and a girl named "Dark Eyes". Dawson was an artist as well as a writer so we also meet Pollock, de Kooning, Guston, Creeley, and the rest.

Kline has a complex image in the book. Immensely productive and fatherly, a sort of Walt Whitman (of painting) father figure for the younger generation, he was tender but fortunately for his popularity, quite un sentimental. Dawson was completely sucked up in the whole Kline phenomena and gives us a good idea of the cult and mysticism surrounding the artist.

However, Dawson gives a much better picture of himself than of Kline.

One interesting point about Dawson is his constant stress on his own-sleeping around. Exact and often wildly funny descriptions of conversations are given: "Can't you just hold my hand? Why — why do you always touch my —". I found it all extremely amusing and it recalled to me James Baldwin (notorious homosexual that he is) and his stress on a homosexual's heterosexuality in a book like GIOVANNI'S ROOM. Perhaps this bisexual boasting is a feature of a person moving towards full homosexuality. Perhaps it's a feature of the New York school of writing too. Dawson, though he was 'queer' on Kline, obviously never got to first homosexual base. In a book as confiding as this one, he would have said so.

The writing is enjoyable. It's filled with those epiphanies or 'moments of insight' that James Joyce loved so much. The time scheme is curious. We move towards Dawson's marriage, which was obviously a traumatic point, a time of "darkness and terror" for him, when he had to leave behind his father-image, Kline.

Occasionally, I found it amazing that people can stay immature as long as they seem to in this book. Furthermore, I found out for the first time that the fifties in America was the most naive and touching generation since the 20s.

This is a book to buy.

"Unhappily, there are times when violence is the only way in which social justice can be secured," claims T. S. Eliot's Hugh de Morville over the bloody corpse of Thomas à Becket. "At another time you would condemn an Archbishop by vote of Parliament and execute him formally as a traitor . . . At a later time still, even such temperate measures as these would become unnecessary."

Peter Glenville's film The Prisoner, shown Tuesday as part of the pre-Teach In programme, takes place in this "later time still", our own. The archbishop has become a cardinal but the issue is the same: how does a secular state rid itself of a "meddlesome priest"?

In a sense The Prisoner begins where Murder in the Cathedral ends. The cardinal in his church is warned that the police have come to arrest him and as soon as he leaves the sanctuary he is taken into custody. But it is a long way from the butchery at the altar to the arrest in the vestibule; a lot has happened in the intervening eight centuries.

As Morville noted, raw violence has gone out of style — partly because of increased public sensibility, partly because of the embarrassment caused by martyrs. We have now to consider what circumstances made this change possible.

For one thing, the theory of body and soul has undergone significant modification. From Plato to Descartes the two were always quite separate; accordingly, no matter how the flesh was humiliated, a pure heart and a courageous spirit could always overcome its tormentors. When false confessions were extorted, it was an act of bodily weakness which left the mind of a Galileo for example, unrepentant.

But in our psychological age we have discarded the body-soul distinction, in fact we have discarded the notion of soul, and this opens new vistas for the latter day inquisitions. If a man's convictions lie in an inaccessible, immaterial entity called the soul, all we can hope for is to reach them through some bodily member. But if they exist in the physical brain they can be reached, eradicated, remolded, and replaced.

It is by this process of Orwellian brain-washing that begins with the cardinal's arrest that the state hopes to obtain a confession of treason. Yet it is not purely a psychological process but also a conscious one and retains a paradoxical aura of choice.

Since Becket's time we have also seen a breakdown of absolute moral standards. It must have been comforting to the archbishop to have a hierarchy of values by which he could see that power, glory, and pride must be sacrificed to God's will. The rise of situation ethics, however, has afforded new opportunities for sacrifice which are entirely outside conventional moral teaching. Virtue used to be the path to salvation. But when Huck Finn refuses to turn in a runaway slave and when the nun in Les Misérables lies to save Jean Valjean from the police, both believe they are thereby losing their immortal souls. We wonder whether to stick by our preconceived moral notions at all costs or trust our judgment for each situation.

This is the dilemma faced by the cardinal. The aim of the brain-washing is to find the right stimuli to make him abandon his principles and admit to the trumped up charges.

These themes of body-mind distinction and moral relativism provide the two main areas of conflict in the film.

The churchman's inquisitor, a combination doctor and lawyer, must fight a running battle with the impatient military, which still swears by Gestapo-like torture techniques. This issue is reflected not only in the question of how to handle the cardinal but also in the problem of pacifying the masses, of how to make them accept the destruction of a man who through his record of wartime heroism has become a national monument. The old-school general hopes to quell the riot by sending truckloads of armed soldiers through the streets while the progressivist lawyer realizes the value of getting his victim to confess in open court.

The presence of this vestige of Nazi brutality is strangely comforting. The cardinal's aging uniformed guard with his jovial black humour embodies something familiar; the jack-booted thugs, the wailing sirens, the cold-blooded killings arouse unambiguous emotions.

Ultimately these tactics fail and we are left with the personal confrontation of two men.

When arrested the cardinal told his friends, "If you hear I've confessed, you know it's a lie—or the result of human weakness." It is this weakness his inquisitor is searching for, but in the process ethical ideals and even the concepts of strength and weakness are altered. When the man of faith is asked to confess or see his mother the victim of medical experimentation, which is the moral choice?

The gradual psychological and moral deterioration we are forced to watch is excruciatingly painful, but it is not nauseating. What saves it is partly the repugnance revealed in the cardinal's very tormentors. Even the inquisitor comes to realize that what he is doing is diabolically wrong. Unfortunately, this attitude strikes us as the least authentic element of The Prisoner. We are desperately afraid that modern brain-washing is even more devastatingly efficient in that its practitioners are free of any such sentiment.

The tragic quality of the suffering also keeps it from disgusting us. We might call the cardinal a tragic hero par excellence. His fatal weakness—a variant of Becket's pride is sought out and developed until it destroys him. The inquisitor also has weaknesses by which his victim in turn breaks him.

These two men are played by Alec Guinness (the cardinal) and Jack Hawkins (the lawyer) in what must be among the most brilliant roles of their outstanding careers. They assume the stature of giants who, far from repelling us, leave us with a genuine, though perhaps practically unfounded, hope for humanity.

The Flim-Flam Man

By KATHERINE BARCZA

"I've got a degree of sorts," boasts the Flim-Flam man. "I'm a Master of B.S.C.S.-D.D. — back-stabbin', corkscrewin', double-dealin'." Mordecai Jones, played with remarkable understatement by George C. Scott, proceeds to demonstrate his variegated skills on a poor unsuspecting southern community.

Mordecai's excuse for his long career in skulduggery is the dishonesty of others. He became disillusioned with humanity in his youth, and grew all twisted inside. "Terrible thing," he concludes, "terrible," and then smiles with a guileless cherubic grin. And we realize that the excuses he carries around with him are a kind of excess baggage, of which he no longer has any need.

Michael Sarrazin, a Canadian actor, gives a sensitive performance as the naive farm-boy in whom Mordecai detects "a natural-born shill." Although unwilling to cheat anyone, he soon finds he has a talent for Mordecai's tricks. He is really very close to following in the Flim-Flam man's anarchic footsteps until salvation appears in the form of the love of a good woman (Sue Lyons).

Throughout the film a feeling of authenticity is achieved by the depiction of the southern community. The smalltown caricatures are uproariously funny. The sheriff even eats Colonel Sanders fried chicken.

The Flim-Flam Man is a fine comedy in the best tradition of the rogues' tales.

Art MURRAY

The shows to see this week are those of John MacGregor at Hart House (Oct. 11-29), Eisler at Gallery Pascal, McEwen at Moos, and Marthe Rakine at Roberts (Oct. 17-18). MacGregor is a vigorous, aggressive and excellent young draftsman with a flair for monumental images. His work stands up well and he could easily become a major artist if he could mature past his present point and realize that more than sex exists in the world. Still, it's a youthful fault, and many a man goes through this curious phase, though perhaps not with the extremism that MacGregor is happy to display.

On Thursday night the Art Gallery opened its Henry Moore exhibition. It should be interesting as this is certainly the greatest modern sculptor.

Next week watch for Sotheby's Sale. Nights especially important will be those of Oct. 16, Monday, when the paintings, drawings and sculpture go up for sale, and Oct. 20, Friday, when the Canadian watercolors by W. Hind come on. If you want tickets, phone Miss Mockridge at Simpson's and see if she can sneak you in. There may be a few seats left.

Theatre GORDON

There's one more night to catch Gideon at the Central Library two more for Godot at St. Hilda's.

Next week begins the onslaught. Number 10 Browning St. at the O'Keefe, Charlie Brown at the Playhouse and the A.P.A. production of You Can't Take It With You at the Royal Alex. The movie of that play is on tonight, with Barrymore and Stewart.

Incidentally, be sure to see the production of The Four Pageants of The York Cycle of Mystery Plays directed by Reiner Sauer. (See Review) The design—costumes, properties and particularly the hell mouth and fiends—make this a surrealist work of art (straight from Bosch).

Mr. Sauer keeps getting more and more powerful as a director, and more and more clever as a producer. This afternoon at two, and tomorrow at three.

Music GODDARD

With Jack McCaffrey what is there left to say. John Norris, Toronto's Jazz Critic phoned me pleading me to plead you to go to Ali Akbar Khan's Concert. Apparently, the promoter for the concert took Khan in favour of Ravi Shankar not realizing that even hippiedom has its price. Now said promoter fears that no-one will show for Khan's concert. If you consider Shankar the Menuhin of Indian music, then Khan is the Stern and Heifitz. The Staple Singers, a gospel-wailing family group from Chicago are at the Riverboat until Oct. 15; Otis Redding will not appear at the Ex. grounds. He broke his foot and may/may not be sued. TS next week, Ashkenazy next week. z-boehm.

and we recommend...

Shakespeare Wallah

There has always been something of an awed fascination about the India of the viceroy, the pith-helmeted diplomat, and that bastion of British imperialism, the English memsahib.

Shakespeare Wallah essentially deals with the problems faced by a troupe of Shakespearian players during the post 'British Raj' years. The company itself is as varied as the audience it plays for, consisting of an English family of three, an overly-nostalgic old Britisher, and two or three Indians who come in handy as bit-part actors and automobile mechanics. The audience ranges from a wistful maharaja to a polite congregation of school-boys.

On a superficial level, the problem faced by the troupe is a lack of demand, following the mass exodus of British subjects in 1947. But it is more than this. It is the tension of a new India, a new people and a new art form.

Madhur Jaffrey as the pining and petulant film actress Manjula, is played off against Felicity Kendall, who, as Lisa Buckingham, has been brought up in a world of Shakespeare and live theatre. It is the contrast of the new with the old, as a way of life and as an art form. In between them stands Shashi Kapoor, playing the role of Sanju with boyish enthusiasm — in effect, the new India, independent, intrigued by the old, but unwilling to commit himself.

A great deal of the merit of Shakespeare Wallah rests on its ability to capture the smallest detail of local colour and native mentality — the Indian railway carriage, the Bandar wallah, the misappropriation of an English idiom, the beetle-nut chewing, and so on. The question is, how much of this, and consequently, how much of the value of the film is lost on the unfamiliar occidental viewer? It would appear that the proportion is quite high, and perhaps some would argue that the film suffers for it. Be that as it may, there are segments such as Madhur Jaffrey's bucolic dance routine, accompanied by the Hindi 'dil dharke' (heart beats) which no-one is going to have any difficulty with; at least, not after the sophisticated stuff North Americans have been hearing from Shankar, Akbar Khan and Harrison.

Still others may find some of the Indian characters a bit too Anglicised; the maharaja, and the deputy schoolmaster in particular. A line like "Well, old chap, give me a tinkle the day after," is a bit hard on the palate, regardless of who it comes from.

All in all, I'd still recommend it for anyone who hasn't lost a taste for gulab-jamans and samosas.

By Martyn Clark

Lutz Dille

If photographers were lionized the way other artists are, more people would know that Canadian photographers are among the best in the world.

Karsh's portraits, Boris Spremo and Reg Inell's news shots, and the nature pictures of John de Visser, Rudi Haas, and Freeman Patterson can generate real excitement.

Lutz Dille, whose photographs are being shown until October 15 at Scarborough College is another of these fine artists.

At a time when the conventional way of seeing things — in terms of content — has been replaced in art, and increasingly in photography by the portrayal of form, using content only as a framework on which to experiment, one has to admire the artist who sticks by his unfashionable viewpoint, especially if he does it well, as Dille does. He photographs lovers in parks, mother and child, the stirring encounter of man and park pigeons, the Hyde Park soap box orator, — all the hackneyed subjects — but he does it with an unobtrusive sense of form and composition.

You don't have to notice the painstaking balance of shapes, of light and dark, the symbolic elements. You can just look at the faces, the joyous, pensive, defeated, determined, innocent, universal faces. But if you want to study the pictures you can also see all the elements that transform the candid "grab shot" to a work of (minor) art.

The NFB has published a paperback book of Dille's pictures called "The Many Worlds Of Lutz Dille" at the ridiculous price of $1.50, which means they will probably lose money on it, but I could afford to buy an extra copy for a friend.

SHARE plans slave auctions, back rubs

The World University Service's SHARE campaign will brighten the campus next week with slave auctions, paint-ins and back rubs.

The object is to raise $15,000 — a modest goal considering the 25,000 students on campus, say SHARE organizers.

WUS was founded in 1922 by universities in Europe and North America to help restore college facilities devastated in the First World War.

It has tried to surmount the barriers to higher education around the world through self-help and international co-operation. The chief targets have been underdeveloped countries.

The WUS international committee at Geneva, composed of representatives of 40 national committees from universities, directs the use of funds and the choice of projects. WUS aid is mutual self-help, not charity.

In Karachi, for example, one project was a student health centre. The cost was $25,000, $13,000 of which was raised by the local committee in Karachi.

Seminars, scholarships, workcamps, cooperative housing, canteens and bookstores are other WUS projects.

Students faced with lack of food, housing, health facilities and educational facilities receive a helping hand from WUS, and from SHARE dollars.

WUS has also been providing material aid for the last eight years through the South African Committee for Higher Education to colored students in South Africa barred from universities by that country's apartheid policy.

This committee has set up underground universities and has provided books and tutorial assistance to enable South African students to take correspondence courses and exams from the University of London.

Recently WUS has had its turn at being under attack. SAC and CUS have questioned its usefulness.

Funds are slender and WUS tries to spread its resources over two dozen countries. Its achievements are modest but they are achievements. It is a definite aid program.

Board will review housing policy

WINNIPEG (Special)—The University of Manitoba's housing policy will be reviewed by the board of governors, President H. H. Saunderson announced this week.

The review follows recent charges by students union President Chris Westdal that the university housing service was listing landlords who discriminate against colored students.

Dr. Saunderson said the review would not take place until the board of governors receives a students union housing study now being compiled.

He defended the university's housing policy, denying the charges of institutionalized discrimination. The university's policy of accepting landlord preferences for certain students resulted in mutual congeniality between student and landlord.

Dr. Saunderson questioned whether the university could infringe upon the homeowner's privilege to select the students who will live in his home.

Westdal, in a statement supported unanimously by the students union, said any landlord who turned away a student for race, religion or origin should be deleted from the university's list.

If a housing shortage resulted, he said, it could be coped with by an appeal to the public or a crash residence-construction program.

He said the principle involved far outweighed any practical considerations.

U of T library shows rare exhibit

Co-operation between the British government and the National Library in Ottawa has enabled the University of Toronto library to prepare a Centennial exhibit of rare books and manuscripts.

Highlight of the exhibit is a rare 300-year-old edition of a classic historical work, Survey of London by John Stow.

A history of the lord mayors of London since 1190, it was presented to the university by Sir Ralph Perring, who was lord mayor in 1963.

Other items in the exhibit include a 15th-century edition of Euclid, a collection of Plato printed in 1513, and a valuable first edition of John Bunyan's The Holy War published in 1682.

The exhibit, located in the main lobby and the rare book room, will continue for three weeks.

GSU president aims to destroy SGS

James Bradford, president of the Graduate Students Union, said Wednesday his aim is to destroy the School of Graduate Studies because it gets in his way.

Any "structure," as he calls both the university and the School of Graduate Studies hampers him in his attempt to lead an unstructured life.

"University is a farce. Education is a farce. The world is a farce. It's one big put-on," he told a Student Christian Movement gathering.

However he admitted he is taking graduate work because it will increase his earning power.

Dance planned to buy Town painting

Organizers of a psychedelic dance at Scarborough college tonight hope to raise enough money to purchase a Harold Town painting.

The painting, Fate Curtain will be donated to the St. Lawrence Center.

The dance is sponsored by Scarborough College and radio station CKEY and will feature the Stitch in Tyme, Dan's Herd and the Power Project.

Tickets are available at the Students Administrative Council office and cost $2 a person, $3.50 a couple.

Last chance for fun without furor

Unless students behave, this year's McGill train may be the last, the Students' Administrative Council was told Wednesday night.

The student train will run to Montreal Nov. 10-12, but it will definitely be the "last chance for students to show that they can have fun without going on a rampage," said Art McIlwain (III APSC), who conducted negotiations with Canadian National.

The basic return fare will be $16, $4 less than a regular fare. Students will also pay a $4 deposit, to be refunded if damages to the train do not exceed $175.

Damages have risen sharply over the last four years, from $150 in 1963 to $800 last year.

It is hoped that by assuming a financial responsibility, students will not commit the vandalism of last year's expedition, McIlwain said.

If there is a repeat performance, CN officials say they will definitely not permit the excursion in the future.

Vic begins Mulock defense with victory

By JIM MORRISON
Victoria College Scarlet and Gold began their Mulock Cup defense on a winning note Wednesday afternoon, with a tough 7-0 victory over St. Michaels College.

The only touchdown in this defensive contest came on a heavily disputed scoring pass from Vic quarterback Don Karn to end Phil Monick. St. Mike's protested that Monick had caught the ball out of bounds, but to no avail. Bill Marshall added the convert to complete the scoring.

In the other game played Wednesday Medicine ran up its largest tally in many years, defeating Trinity College 34-7. Scoring touchdowns for the Meds were Dennis Symons, with three, and Andy Davis with two.

Yesterday afternoon, Engineering shut out PHE 14-0 and Pharmacy beat New College 18-6. A strong passing attack and an aggressive defense were responsible for the Engineers' victory, as they got one touchdown on a 55 yard passing play, and the other off a recovered fumble in the end zone.

LACROSSE

In the opening game of the lacrosse season Wednesday at Hart House, Vic I trounced St. Mike's 17-3. Leading the Vic scoring parade was G. James with six goals, while Al Vallillee (4), Stew Evans (3), B. Ellerker (2) and B. McClellan (2) had the other counters. O'Reilly, Beaudette and Ferguson answered for St. Mike's.

Further boxla action yesterday saw perennial champion Law Lords beat PHE A 9-5. Garry Grierson, with five goals, and Don Arthurs, with two, led the lawyers, while Bill Pashby and Gord Hill scored one each. Replying for Phys. Ed. were Don Alexander (2) goals), Brian McVey (1), John Dale (1) and Christ Rudge (1).

SOCCER

Interfac soccer continued its heavy schedule this week. On Tuesday Emmanuel nudged by Meds 2-1, and Vic II defaulted to New College.

Doug Joblin and Dave McKane scored for the theologs, while M. Pascoe potted the Meds goal.

Wednesday games saw Innis College tie Dentistry 0-0, Trinity B defeat Pharmacy 6-2, and University College beat Sr. Engineering 3-1.

Roger Smith had four tallies for Trinity, with singles going to John Philpot and Brian Murray. P. McClure and B. Ray netted the only Pharmacy goals.

Ken Cancellara had all three UC scores, while Garth Rothwell notched one for the Engineers.

In a game played yesterday afternoon, PHE B blanked Architecture 2-0. Joel Webster and R. Cumberford were the Phys Ed marksmen.

Varsity seconds strong against Mac; Firsts oppose cadets in must contest

By DOUG WOODS

The Varsity seconds scored an impressive victory last Saturday against McMaster in Hamilton. Varsity held the upper hand almost from the start.

Hooker Brian Hamil scored a try midway through the first half and wing-forward Jim Van Banning added another a few minutes later. Steve MacIntyre got the convert to make the half-time score 8-0 for the Blues.

The second half of the match was highlighted by the fine play of the pack and the excellent tackling of the backline. Scott McClure played his usual strong game finding touch on many long kicks and contributing several booming tackles.

A fine passing attack by the Blues line resulted in a try by wing-3 Bob Riddle early in the second half. The Varsity squad out-classed the McMaster players all through the game and came out winners 11-0.

The second's next game is tomorrow against Western at London. This could prove to be the toughest game in their schedule since Western won the Turner Trophy last year. If the seconds play as they did on Saturday they should have a good chance of taking this match.

Last night the Blues firsts handily defeated Toronto Scottish in Varsity Stadium by the score of 12-3. Centre George Wraw and fly-half Andy Gibson each tallied penalty kicks in the first half making the half-time score 6-0 for the Blues.

In the second half prop-forward Andrew Bethal scored a beautiful try off a cross kick by winger Scott McClure and Wraw carried the ball across the Scottish line a few minutes later for the Blues last score of the match.

Scottish's only score resulted from a drop-goal by their out-centre, Peter Hand and John MacKay both made fine tackles on defence while Andy Bethal and Joe Donohue played well in the scrum.

Blues' next game is against R.M.C. tomorrow morning at 11 o'clock on the back campus. This should not be a difficult game for Blues who have demonstrated in their first four matches that they are strong in all aspects of the game.

Soccerites place unbeaten record on line at London

Blues' soccer team goes to London this weekend to put their unblemished record on the line against a winless Mustang eleven. Varsity will again be without their captain and last year's M.V.P. Tom Johnson, who is out with a leg injury. However, rookie Jim Laverty has played such outstanding ball as Johnston's replacement that the team has not suffered.

Coach Ernie Glass had installed a modern, attack-oriented, 3-3-4 formation this season. So far it has produced excellent results. The rear wall of Alan Cragg, Eric Sereda, and Bill Nepotiuk has been almost unbeatable, while the middle-men, Dwight Taylor, Austris Liepa, and Jim Laverty have consistently dominated the mid-field. The forward four have been devastating as can be seen by the fact that Blues have averaged five goals a game. Jim Lefkos and Frank Soppelsa, the twin centre-forwards, are top scorers, and wingers Graham Shiels and Ron Muir, the playmakers.

As excellent substitutes the team sports Ormond Mendes, a good playmaking half-back, and John Gero, a rugged centre-forward.

As far as the Western game is concerned, Blues do not expect much opposition. Some players are going as far as saying the team will score ten or more goals. No Varsity team has reached double figures in recent history.

It is hard to say nevertheless, how the game will develop. Refereeing is usually Western's strongest point and could spur them to great efforts. Three years ago, Blues had three goals disallowed for unknown reasons. Four years ago, they were awarded seven non-scoring free kicks inside the Western penalty area. At least five should have been penalty kicks.

Three of Blues' players, Ron Muir, Jim Laverty, and John Gero played in a game Wednesday night between the Ontario junior A All-Stars and the Ontario All-Star team.

Prof. blasts ITI chairman Forrest

By SUE HELWIG

Prof. E. L. Fackenheim of the department of philosophy has demanded that Rev. A. C. Forrest, editor of the United Church Observer, be replaced as chairman of a Pre-Teach-In discussion on "Religious Factors in the Arab-Israeli War".

"Rev. Forrest has forfeited any claim to the kind of impartiality required of a chairman," Prof. Fackenheim says in an open letter to Prof. K. Joblin, chairman of the Teach-In Committee.

"Mr. Forrest's magazine wrote not a word of concern or protest in May," the letter says, "when Arab leaders threatened the murder of Israeli men, women and children.

"Now he has devoted a whole issue to the subject of Arab refugees. In that issue he asserts that Israel stands condemned for the treatment of these refugees.

"He should by all means be invited to speak as a partisan. The invitation extended to him to act as chairman should be withdrawn at once."

"He does not so much as mention recent pogroms in Arab countries," Prof. Fackenheim concludes.

Mike Ignatief, Co-chairman of the Teach-In, said last night that Mr. Forrest was invited before the Observer articles were published.

"I fail to see how the Observer articles endanger his impartiality as chairman," he added.

"The particular view taken by Rev. Forrest was in response to human suffering in a particular issue," he explained.

"There were Arabs starving in the desert and if the Israelis were to blame, then the Israelis were to blame."

Prof. Joblin said last night that Mr. Forrest's article condemned the treatment of Arab refugees but praised Israel's quick and decisive military actions.

"I don't think the writer could be accused of being entirely pro-Arab," he said. "His only criticisms are on the refugee problem."

Narks seize pot, head

A University of Toronto student has been charged with possession of marijuana and released on $13,000 bail.

Thomas Dobrowolski, a second-year philosophy student at Victoria College, was arrested following the seizure of two six-pound blocks of marijuana late Thursday night.

Police said the haul was worth $20,000 "retail" and called it the largest amount ever found in Toronto.

Marijuana is sold at $20 to $35 an ounce wholesale and would be worth $4,840 to $6,720 to a supplier.

The marijuana was found in the trunk of a sports car in a garage which was under the surveillance of the RCMP and Metro morality officers.

SHARE sex, burn virginity

By INGRID VABALIS

This week everyone at University of Toronto can match his sex-life to the computer age.

The SHARE Computer Dating Service run by the Engineering Society begins today and will operate for the next two weeks.

Forms sell for $1 and every last dollar goes to the SHARE campaign.

The engineering planners have programmed the computer for Sex. Questions are included which ask whether you are a virgin or non-virgin.

If you aren't convinced just look at some of the ads in the Varsity. For example: "FIRE SALE! Bargain on women—three for a dollar! get them while they're hot. Share computer dating. Next week, burn, baby, burn."

Even if you've got more dates than you need, try it anyway. It's for a good cause and you can have some fun with it.

Like, you can fill out two forms. Do one honestly—like you really are. Then fill one out as some sexy, glamorous creature like Scarlett O'Hara or Rhett Butler, or someone you've always wanted to be. Just see what you come up with then.

As an innovation this year a free dance will be held for all who have taken the plunge. The dance will be open to everyone but those with stubs from the computer dating forms will be admitted free.

Presumably, you can take your three dates to this dance and not spend much money.

Ballots for this year's sex spree will be sold until Oct. 27 and must be placed in the boxes in the SAC office and the Engineering Stores by Oct. 30.

If you're shy about this sort of thing just rationalize. It's for a good cause—SHARE!

SHARE is prepared to sacrifice one of these virgins for $15,000. If the SHARE thermometer reaches the top one of these girls will stay there until Christmas. So, if you want a stacked pillar of ice in front of the SAC office, SHARE.

Buy teach-in tickets

Teach-In ticket sales have reached 2,100, Joey Steiner (IV UC) announced last night.

Steiner, chief Teach-In ticket seller, hopes to put out 6,000 tickets for the Varsity Arena Teach-In sessions this weekend.

About 1,100 of the tickets have been sold to students.

Steiner is urging people to buy their tickets on campus this week to avoid the expected long line-ups Friday night at Varsity Arena.

Students at The College of Education will not be receiving the first installment of their $500 Ontario College of Education Fellowships despite written promise by the Minister of University Affairs William Davis earlier this month.

Action delayed on Macpherson Report

College principals seems to be biding their time on implementing portions of the recommendations of the MacPherson report until the administration gives the go-ahead.

Trinity College Principal Dr. G. Owen said he would not undertake any reforms since the recommendations of the MacPherson report must be instituted by the university.

"Anyway," Owen said, "Trinity already has small tutorial groups and our lectures are more in the way of discussions."

Professor Donald Ivey, Principal of New College, said that while he was "totally in favour of curriculum clubs," he would wait for an official edict from the Faculty of Arts and Science before taking any action.

Dr. Ivey feels the clubs create more interest on the part of the students for their subjects and provide for good communication between students and professors.

However, Ivey personally prefers more lectures and fewer tutorials. He also hopes the report can be implemented without any formal revision of the university structure.

Douglas LePan, Principal of University College, also said he favoured curriculum clubs. He would not comment on his plans and said only that he thought the report "impressive and valuable."

Innis College Principal R. S. Harris has formed a council to solicit views on implementation of the report.

The council, composed of President Sword, Professor Harris, the registrar and professors of Innis and five students, will meet today to discuss the best committee structure to further study the report.

Straight scotch helps create ITI

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

On many wintry evenings last January a lean and lanky figure would walk from Trinity College to Sir Daniel Wilson Residence.

Michael Ignatieff was a frequent visitor to the third floor room in Taylor House where Jeff Rose lived.

In this room in Sir Dan last winter, Ignatieff and Rose founded the beginnings of next weekend's third International Teach-In.

In three-hour sessions that blended straight scotch and soul-searching into intense discussion, the grounds for a moral and intellectual confrontation over religion and international affairs were explored.

A teach-in isn't created overnight. While the speakers must be invited months ahead and technical matters of producing the event must be organized weeks in advance, a teach-in requires a purpose that must precede everything.

Ordinary weekend workshops and conferences are created by simply inviting people and providing facilities.

The subjects for discussion and debate are already present — that's why the workshop or conference is being called.

But in a teach-in and especially this year's teach-in, the grounds for debate must be constructed. It is unlikely that the average student immediately recognizes the relationship between religion and international affairs.

Furthermore a teach-in is debate on such a grand scale (five weekend sessions, 18 international speakers, 12 pre-Teach-In panels and lectures) that areas of conflict must be isolated in some discussions, related in others.

A tremendous amount of energy has been expended by Rose and Ignatieff in defining the Teach-In issues and arranging the sessions for meaningful debate.

After exams, Jeff Rose began his full-time duties as co chairman of the Teach-

In. Rose worked through May, June and July sodifying the program.

Rose was meeting four people every afternoon, soliciting support and getting the Teach-In off the ground.

Rose and Ignatieff have been working up to 16 hours a day, seven days a week for the past two months.

Ignatieff doesn't waste any time on breakfast or lunch if he can help it. Someone could be talking to him at the Teach-In office at 91 St. George St. when Michael Ignatieff decides he is hungry.

He will ask the person talking to him to continue the conversation in the ticket office across the hall.

Walking into the neighboring room without a pause in the conversation, Ignatieff will open the refrigerator and pull out a carton of milk and a package of instant breakfast.

He mixes the milk and powder in a glass and gulps the concoction that tastes like a chalky milkshake.

"It doesn't taste very good but it fills me up in a hurry," he says. And then he continues to talk about the Teach-In.

Both Ignatieff and Rose have other extra-curricular activities to keep them occupied in between teach-ins.

Ignatieff is editor of Random, the campus magazine, and Rose is president of the U of T Historical Club.

They were both actively involved in the organizational hierarchy of last year's Teach-In on China: Coexistence or Containment.

In comparison to most student endeavors, the Teach-In runs very smoothly under the wing of its dozen organizers and scores of volunteers.

However, the Teach-In has its hang-ups. Recently they were taken off the hook when Garfield Todd, former prime minister of Southern Rhodesia, cabled his confirmation from South Africa that he would attend the Teach-In.

Although he had been publicized as a feature speaker for the session on Religious Faith and Revolution, there was doubt as to whether the government of Rhodesia would let him out of the country.

Because of his controversial views such as removal of the color bar he may not be allowed to re-enter Rhodesia after the Teach-In.

Rhodesian officials will be watching his performance in Toronto and "he will have to exercise some degree of caution," says John Pepperell, Teach-In publicity coordinator.

Live television coverage of the event is still unconfirmed because TV programming time is so valuable.

But the Teach-In has been assured of live CBC FM radio coverage in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto and a one and a half hour wrap-up on CBC AM on Monday evening, Oct. 23.

CJRT, the Ryerson station, will again cover the event on their FM station.

Pepperell estimates that 125 press people will attend the sessions next weekend.

Joey Steiner (IV UC) and Bill Winegard (II UC) have been rallying hundreds of volunteers to sell tickets and distribute thousands of Teach-In programs, pamphlets posters and flyers.

Hopefully this weekend, Jeff Rose and Michael Ignatieff will be able to look on a full house in Varsity Arena and see the fulfilment of the objectives they have been working toward since January.

Jeff Rose and Mike Ignatieff discuss the Oct. 20-22 Teach-In.

All Varsity reporters assigned to cover the Teach-In (panels, lectures, weekend sessions, color and background) MUST attend an important meeting at 1 p.m. today in the office.

the university student and his vote

Well, it's that time again.

Elections, democracy, the voice of the people, the power of the ballot, the usual balmy attendant to the mystique of popular government.

For the first time in many years, an Ontario election amounts to something more than the quadrennial selection of the Conservative of your choice.

The electorate will determine whether a well-oiled and lavishly financed party machine can steamroller to victory on a platform of pious platitudes, an appeal to prosperity, and a leader portrayed as the stolid pater familias.

For university students, Tuesday's voting carries a special importance.

Our votes as students have been sought with an eagerness unparalleled in Ontario politics. We have been courted, cajoled, promised, pledged, warned, entreated, solicited.

The politicians may hate our guts, laugh off our demonstrations, ignore our appeals, reject our demands, ridicule our idealism, condemn our morality.

But for the next forty-eight hours, they need us. Boy, do they need us.

The student vote on this campus is the decisive factor in one riding and could, but probably won't, determine the outcome in another.

Most of the campus electorate will vote in the riding of St. Andrew-St. Patrick, a new constituency resulting from last year's long overdue provincial redistribution. In political terms, it is definitely a marginal seat since the over-all Conservative majority in both previous seats combined was less than 1,600 votes.

The Tory candidate is Allan Grossman, the genially incompetent minister of reform institutions.

Grossman expects little support from the campus, and in this he's quite right.

His opponents are Ryerson lecturer Adam Fuerstenberg (NDP) and lawyer Leonard Shifrin (Liberal).

All three candidates have been telling us what they think we want to hear — lower tuitions, more residence space, more scholarships and financial assistance.

There's just one slight difference: Shifrin and Fuerstenberg believe in what they are promising; Grossman doesn't.

Grossman might retain the seat but only if the strong Liberal and NDP vote cancel each other out.

We hope this doesn't happen.

The situation in St. George riding, which includes Victoria and St. Michael's, is slightly different.

The sitting member, Allan Lawrence, has displayed a sincere interest in student affairs and a capacity for independent thought rare in the provincial Conservative party.

Mr. Lawrence supports student representation on university governing bodies, and in March 1964 he was one of the few Tories who openly opposed the so-called Police State Bill presented by the government.

We could support Mr. Lawrence without hesitation except for one important consideration. A vote for this or any Conservative candidate amounts to tacit endorsement of the abysmal education policies of Premier Roberts and education minister William Davis.

To vote Conservative is to vote for the party that gave us POSAP too little and too late, that starves our graduate school and thinks the residence space is adequate, that vetoed student representation on the board of governors at Western.

As the NDP candidate appears to be merely going through the motions, our vote in St. George must go to Liberal Bruce Thomas.

We hope he wins but we're not going to bet on it.

problem: solution

People usually make a fuss over Student Aid and Universal Accessibility because a college degree is very necessary these days if you want to get any kind of a good job. The trouble with these things, however, is that they cost so much.

There is a cheaper solution to the problem. The province should immediately print up 5,000,000 BAs from various Ontario universities and distribute them in the next mail.

Naturally, these documents will be useless to many people. An Italian labourer, for example, would find it a little difficult to masquerade as an Engineer (for one thing, he can hold his liquor too well). However, at least 300,000 people in the province would have the gall and intelligence to pull off the imposture of being a college graduate.

If the justice department simultaneously seizes university records and burns them, it will be impossible to tell who has a degree and who hasn't.

Businessmen will have to fall back on the rather dubious method of choosing employees on the basis of their apparent merit rather than their education (also apparent).

People who presently flaunt their degrees will be laughed at. No one will believe them any more.

College enrolments will drop until only those who want to get an education will be attending.

Many university presidents will resign or take leaves of absence to American Universities, finding it intolerable to be the head of less than a multiversity.

Evenual cost to the province $50,000 or so (less than 400 POSAP loans at present).

SHARE your wealth

After a day of classes, students at the U of T go home with the assurance that there will be a meal waiting for them when they get there, that there will be a quiet place for them to study, that there will be books to study from and a bed to sleep in.

These are things we all accept naturally. But this sense of security is nowhere present for many students in Asia or Africa. They face the problem of avoiding disease in conditions of squalor and poverty.

Students often live on one meal a day, with no guarantee of one tomorrow. There is no assurance that they will even have a place to spend the night.

The university buildings are filled until late at night by students who put off going home as long as possible.

Very often there is no home to go to. They spend the night in a park or on the streets and return to the university early next morning.

It is nearly impossible for us to comprehend what these conditions would mean when they are laid on top of all the usual problems of students in university.

This is why the SHARE campaign is so vitally important. It provides the money for canteens, for cheap meals, medical clinics to eradicate disease, and hostels for cheap accommodation.

SHARE's goal is $15,000. Considering there are over 20,000 full-time students of the U of T, this sum represents less than ONE dollar per student.

One dollar or five dollars is of only passing importance to a student here — a movie or a book or a record.

One dollar will provide three meals a day for three days for an Asian student.

Draft dodger referendum

Sir:

Referring to your editorial on "How SAC Dodged the Draft Issue", October 13, I would like to make a proposal.

In your article you expressed dissatisfaction, to say the least, with the manner in which the crucial question was handled by the SAC members. The close vote (24-21) opposing the resolution is, I think, unfair to judge the merits of aiding or not aiding "draft-dodgers".

The whole question of military involvement in Vietnam is ripping the moral reasoning of our Western society apart. The black and white issues have disappeared, and we are left with a gigantic, horrible, grey monster. In a complex issue such as this war, we do not give justice to the opinions of either side when this crucial question is brought before 45 people who represent 25,000 others. I believe the only way of settling the matter of aiding "draft-dodgers" is a campus-wide referendum.

The use of the referendum is by no means new to us. The conscription crisis in Canada in the last World War was settled, as far as most Canadians were concerned, by such a referendum. It was brought out of the hands of politicians and into the hands of the people. Many hundreds of constitutional amendments, provincial, state, and federal in Canada and the U.S. have been put directly to the people. True, the larger issue of the morality or the immorality of the war itself can never really be settled by us, but once and for all we can extinguish debate on what U. of T. students really think about aiding American "draft-dodgers". The question must be put to all of us, to our minds and consciences — not to 45 people on the Council. This is a moral issue — one which we must decide for ourselves.

I believe the best way to have a fair vote on the referendum would be to hold a special vote, exclusively for this question, in one month's time. This should provide ample time for dissenters of all sides to voice their opinions and for the SAC to organize the voting procedures.

The issue can be settled with one simple but complex question — "Are you in favour of the Students' Administrative Council providing the means of aiding those men in the United States of America, who feel that personal military involvement in Vietnam is solely a matter of conscience?"

I have made my proposal; now it is up to interested members of SAC and the University of Toronto to act upon it.

Boston trial may set marijuana precedents

By JOE PILATI
COLLEGIATE PRESS SERVICE

BOSTON — Over the next few weeks, Boston attorney Joseph S. Oteri might become one of the most admired — and maligned — figures in the American legal profession.

Over the next few years, he might become the primary instigator of a precedent which (if underground optimists are correct) could literally re-make America.

And Oteri, a legal rationalist of the old school who even looks a bit like Darrow, is simply "doing his thing." In his own words: "Five years ago, I began defending kids accused of various marijuana violations. I've been singularly impressed with these people—decent kids, not criminals, not violent, full of life and peace.

"Each one told me the same story—marijuana is not addictive, not harmful, a relatively innocuous substance. I started checking into it and decided that the next time we got a case, we would challenge the law."

The challenge is here. It goes by the name Commonwealth vs. Leis and Weiss, and pre-trial hearings, expected to last for several weeks, have begun in Suffolk Superior Court in Boston.

The actual trial of Messrs. Leis and Weiss, two former students caught greenhanded at Boston's Logan International Airport, will be the second part in Oteri's drama. If he has his way, the "action" will still be rising, wafting inexorably toward the U.S. Supreme Court, after these local hurdles are cleared.

Will call 23 expert witnesses

Twenty-three expert witnesses will attest to the unworkability and probable unconstitutionality of current anti-marijuana statutes.

Oteri's firm — Crane, Inker and Oteri — has offered the attorneys for the prosecution, Hale and Dorr (who are also attorneys for Boston University "full mutual disclosure of witnesses before the hearings begin." Hale and Dorr have not yet responded to the offer.

Oteri estimates that the pre-trial hearing will take three or four weeks at the very least. "We may cut our 23 witnesses by five or so, just to speed it up," said one of his assistants, who also intimated that the attorneys for the prosecution are having trouble finding witnesses, not to mention reputable data, which would support existing laws.

Oteri's office in downtown Boston, lushly carpeted and paneled, is as subdued and conventional as the lawyer himself is not. A wooden sign hanging on his bulging office bookcase is indicative of the somewhat puckish but essentially dignified attitudes Oteri carries into the case: lettered in the serifed style of "B" Westerns and embellished with the curlicues and chruscoro artwork, it says "Honest Lawyer: Two Flights Up."

A legal, not medical problem

He feels that present marijuana laws "run the risk of excluding perhaps 25 per cent of the future leaders of this country, branding them as 'drug addicts.'" He says he is having trouble convincing people "I'm interested in a legal problem, not a medical problem. There are an awful lot of lives ruined by virtue of this law, and I'm trying to compel the courts and the Congress to take a long look at this problem."

As you watch Joe Oteri sitting in his swivel chair with his feet propped onto his well-polished mahogany desk, gesturing with a giant cigar ("less harmful than tobacco cigarettes, and legal"), you're aware almost instantly that for him, "this problem" refers to anachronism in American jurisprudence more than it does to nascent anarchism in the lack of respect for present anti-pot laws which is manifested by American youth.

"We are not advocating legalization of marijuana," he stressed, "but we say that it could be regulated, with prohibitions on age groups that can get it, and so forth," he says. He drew the familiar analogy between current anti-marijuana laws and the Prohibition amendment of the Twenties: "Prohibition dealt with a downright dangerous and addictive drug; even now, fully three per cent of the population is addicted to alcohol. On the other side of the fence, we have the much more innocuous substance called marijuana. Can we afford to prohibit it?"

Oteri's arguments for dismissal of charges against Leis and Weiss, codified and couched into the cumbersome sentence-structures of the legal brief, would be familiar to readers of the underground press. But their assertion in a court of law (perhaps especially in Massachusetts, with its heritage of witch-hunting both literal and figurative) represents an almost unprecedented progressive step.

"Arbitrary and irrational statute"

The defendants' motion contends that the Massachusetts statute is "arbitrary and irrational and not suited to achieve any valid legislative end in that it fails to properly distinguish between marijuana and so-called 'hard narcotics' such as cocaine, opium and morphine, and it imposes harsh penalties upon mere possession of marijuana, or possession with intent to sell, or being present where marijuana is kept, without showing that use of this substance presents a threat to the public health, safety and morals.

"The claims of grave danger are contradicted by the weight of scientific evidence, which evidence is being ignored by the government, and hence, the statute under which defendant is prosecuted, and the entire statutory scheme, violated the due process of law guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment . . ."

The motion further argues that the statute "goes beyond the valid exercise of police power of the Commonwealth in that it seeks to control activity which had not been shown to pose a serious and immediate danger to the public health, safety or morals" and that it would "deny to the defendant his rights to life, liberty, and property, without due process of law, as well as the right to security, privacy and the pursuits of pleasure, in violation of the Fourth and Fifth Amendments . . . as they are applied to the states by the Fourteenth Amendment."

Tobacco more harmful than marijuana?

And it goes on: present law "would deny to the defendant the equal protection of the laws in that it has singled out possessors of . . . marijuana, while the laws permit use, sale and possession of substances far more harmful than marijuana, to wit: alcoholic beverages and cigarettes containing tobacco . . ."

Finally, the motion points out that the present law "would impose on the defendant excessive and cruel and unusual punishment (five-to-ten-year prison terms) in violation of the Eighth Amendment to the Constitution, as incorporated into the Fourteenth."

"I've received more than 50 letters from other lawyers in at least ten states, who have started the same kind of proceedings, Oteri added. Many earlier cases brought to Oteri himself, prior to that of Leis and Weiss, are also being held in abeyance pending a decision in the next few months.

Oteri emphasizes that he considers marijuana to be "a very harmful substance at the present time because it's illegal. I would strongly urge everyone not to use it, but not to give up the fight to change the law." To Oteri's thinking, "the only substantial argument against marijuana is that we don't need to legalize another intoxicant. But why put people who choose to use this particular intoxicant in jail?"

And now that the argument that marijuana leads to heroin had been shot down," Oteri suggested, "the authorities are starting to say it leads to LSD. This is curious, because it amounts to saying marijuana should be a felony because it leads to a misdemeanor—which, in any case, it doesn't."

tutorials are a challenge

Sir:

Your editorial on the tutorial seems to have accidentally pinned down the real problem in university teaching, although you were careful not to recognize it for what it is. The carefully selected phrases; "Few tutorial leaders are competent enough," "it's far too easy for any student to hide himself in the small tutorial group," "It therefore becomes the university's duty to draw the students' natural ability out." Clearly place the blame on the ugly monster and its professional keepers. But what you are really asking for is a re-play of the high school system which you deplore (and there is every reason to deplore it). In educational jargon you want to be "motivational," and it becomes the "duty" of each tutor to chase you verbally around the classroom until he has pinned you in a corner where he can perform mental rape. And when he does there's nothing there. You figured you could "fake it" and didn't bother to prepare the subject.

There is plenty of work to be done on the tutorial system and you aptly point out such problems as locations, durations of the sessions, and the selection of sensible tutors. But face the key fact; the student at the university is not being put through the high school mill. If he does not want to dig in, demand, force the issues, he can't expect the university, whose very basis is freedom, to stuff knowledge into him.

No amount of modifications will correct the basic need of the student to accept the challenge privately. Until he does the ideal seminar will consist of the "one or two people (who) know anything about the topic."

The other students don't care enough to fight the machine.

why not invite both sides

Sir:

In view of the fact that the C.U.S. wants to invite representatives of the Viet Cong to speak on our campus, would it not be appropriate to also obtain some of the Vietnamese students at the University of Montreal who seem resolutely opposed to the views of the N.L.F. I believe such a move might be slightly more objective and just might improve the far out left image of the C.U.S.

ERNIE MAKES RESERVATIONS

Ernie McCullough, a fourth year modern history student at Victoria College, worked for the Progressive Conservative convention committee. He was also a voting delegate.

Ernie decided to volunteer after hearing Gene Rheame, the party's executive secretary speak at the PC Student Federation conference last February. He wrote to Mr. Rheame and eventually found himself on the housing and transportation committee.

Ernie started work in July, confirming reservations for out-of-town guests. His committee booked rooms in 27 Toronto hotels providing accommodation for about 4,000 people.

Sometimes the delegates had special problems. Ernie remembers a Scottish lady from Winnipeg who wrote saying she didn't want to spend too much money, and wouldn't mind walking to and from the convention site. Her greatest concern, it seems, was the need to preserve the chastity of her young co-ed travelling companion.

More seriously, a man from out west who had been the victim of a heart attack wrote saying that although he was now better he was still supposed to get a good night's sleep. Fortunately a doctor's request for accommodation was received the same day and the two were paired off.

Rheame warned his workers that the convention would mean hard work and long hours. Ernie usually worked from 9 a.m. to 11 p.m. His longest day was 17 hours. But, he pointed out, "Rheame is the kind of guy you'd work your butt off for, and not mind it."

During the convention Ernie helped man the telephones at the convention's main headquarters. One of his more memorable calls was from a woman who complained that it was indecent for men to be on the platform in their shirt sleeves, especially as the convention was being carried on national television.

Some people, watching TV, wanted to talk to the speakers. "They wanted me to call the candidates to the phone, even though they could see them on the platform," Ernie said. "Some of them just wanted to argue policy with me."

Ernie was very impressed with the trust Rheame placed in the students. In the housing and transportation office alone, more than half the workers were students. In fact, one reason for holding the convention early was to make use of the manpower offered by the universities.

WE DIG DAVIE

Of the 700 students in the Davie Fulton Youth Committee, more than 50 were from U of T.

One of them, Dave McFadden, a UC graduate now at Osgoode Hall, appreciated the fact that he and other young people had not been shunted into a subordinate role in the convention.

Impressed by Fulton since 1960, MacFadden offered his services to the Kamloops lawyer in Ottawa last May. He set up a Metropolitan Toronto Youth Committee responsible directly to Fulton.

This committee was made up of about 20 young people, mostly students. It organized all of the Fulton demonstrations at the convention, one of which was loud enough to put Norman Depoe and CBC Newsmagazine off the air.

MacFadden said he felt the demonstrations played a vital role in boosting Fulton's morale and maintaining his support among the delegates. "They also served to involve young people actively in politics," he said.

Another member of the committee, Rob Patton (II Vic), was the driving force behind The Fulton Leader, the only national newsletter for youth in the campaign.

Patton and his small staff wrote, laid out and printed all five editions of the newsletter.

"There was a lot more to it than I expected and I spent most of the summer on it," Patton said, "but I gained a great deal of experience from it."

Fred Buckland (IV Vic) acted as Fulton's personal aide at the convention, staying with him all week and even sleeping in his suite.

"I saw the campaign as a candidate might see it," Buckland said. "I was in on all the Fulton strategy conferences and gained insight into how politics really work."

Buckland felt his dominant experience was "an impression of Fulton the man." He was "calm, considerate, and always willing to listen."

Two ways of campaigning — neckholds and the smiles of Lyndo Lourie (VIC II).

WOMEN - glorified

By SHERRY BRYDSON

When I decided to work at the PC Convention, it was more out of curiosity than out of a burning desire to come to the site of the party.

Oh, I thought Fulton was a good man. I had made that decision way back in May. But I had heard a lot of things about conventions, by and large bad things.

My father, for instance, said they were nothing more than a paid holiday for the delegates from Upper Podunk. They would, he said, be looking for booze, broads — and bed. Well, I'm a big girl now and I wanted to know what was behind the men who run the country, so I went.

Fulton's organization was good. The people were all very friendly, and there was a large Quebec delegation to give the group a bilingual flavor.

There were mobs and mobs of young people on hand wherever Fulton went, so I decided I could coddle my agoraphobia and stay close to the hospitality suite in the Royal York. There, the delegates interested in being lobbied came to chat or to have a glass of free booze.

I was supposed to be friendly and conversational. I should try to win EVERYONE over to the Cause, I was told.

Fine. Except for one thing, which had completely escaped MY notice. I am a woman. For the first time in many years, I was actually made to feel inferior because of my sex. Delegates talked down to me. They were overly polite, giving the impression they were just killing time (or actually wasting it) while waiting to speak to someone in authority.

Is there really such a thing as student power? Politicians are continually proising their student supporters — without whom, it seems, they couldn't survive.

Hundreds of students from all across the country come to the recent Progressive Conservative convention in Toronto. Many of them were University of Toronto students and some of them hold important positions.

der, gets away from the convention noise and of The Royal York Hotel.

d sandwich makers

When convention chairman Eddie Goodman got up in front of all those thousands of delegates and spectators and national TV, and said that PC women were the backbone of the party, I was ready to believe him. I was also ready to throw up.

Do you really want to know why? Because in those three days I cut cheese, got drinks, passed out BC apples, smiled until my cheek muscles hurt, fended off about a zillion passes . . . and was NEVER ONCE TREATED LIKE A RATIONAL THINKING BEING.

I did all the things I could have done at home short of sweeping the floors, perhaps. Oh yes, the women certainly are the backbone of the party! Without them the men would have had to cut their own cheese!

I'm not really knocking the PCs. Actually, I had a very good time and I wouldn't have missed it for the world. But after the whole thing was over, I began to wonder just what it is that attracts a woman to a political party.

The only men who talked to me were the ones interested in a little company later on in the evening — much later. Valiantly I pointed out that I was a university student, a Poli Sci major at that but it did little good. I began to feel like a choice piece of meat up for grabs. I was grabbed, literally, by a drunken delegate as I tried to pin up a Fulton sign in the foyer of the Lord Simcoe.

All in all, it was a very interesting experience, one which I wouldn't care to repeat unless I had some sort of guarantee that I would be treated like a thinking being instead of a glorified sandwich-maker.

"I'm a Fulton man forever now," Buckland vowed.

REFORM WELCOMED BY YOUTH

The influence of youth was felt long before the actual convention.

The whole move to reform the Progressive Conservative Party was in part spearheaded by the party's young people. Notably, support for Dalton Camp came largely from the Young Progressive Conservative organization and the campus PC clubs.

When Camp suggested that the time had come to re-appraise the party leadership, young people responded enthusiastically.

In choosing the delegates the role of youth was recognized. Two delegates were chosen from each university campus. One delegate from each constituency had to be from the local Young Progressive Conservative Club or under 30. Over 500 delegates were drawn from these groups. "It was very much a young person's convention," said Bruce MacOdrum (II Law).

Bruce, who is president of the Ontario PC Student Federation, was a voting delegate-at-large and supported Robert Stanfield. He was the only member of the U of T PC club who chose to work for the winning candidate.

Along with other campaign workers, it was his responsibility to contact the delegates and try to persuade them to vote Stanfield. He also served on the convention planning committee, which planned the demonstrations, organized the communications network on the convention floor, and handled the delegate receptions.

Bruce found that "young people performed the jobs they were given in a responsible manner, doing as well or better than the traditional, middle-aged party workers could have done."

HAMILTON HIJINKS

The student faction was also important to the campaign of Alvin Hamilton.

Bob Radford (III Law) tells of an incident that reflected the young influence. "A bunch of the students got together and started making the rounds of the hospitality suites. We were trying to encourage support for Mr. Hamilton — and incidentally, to drink all of our opponents' liquor. We were more successful in the latter than in the former endeavor."

Bob worked on the delegate committee for Mr. Hamilton, taking care of the university students from around Toronto. He was in charge of the information booth at Maple Leaf Gardens, and later arranged for the distribution of campaign literature in the hotels.

According to Bob, Mr. Hamilton felt he stood quite a good chance of taking the convention until Mr. Diefenbaker entered the race. Then the Western support which Hamilton had been counting on was split and the feeling in the caucus was that he no longer had any real hope of winning.

"But he stayed in right to the end," said Bob, "because he had promised his workers he wouldn't give up."

HEES HYSTERIA

George Hees told his workers at the beginning of the campaign, "If we aren't going to have a lot of fun, we might as well forget it."

Jules Kronis (III Law) worked on the Hees team and described him as "The greatest guy I ever worked for."

With three or four cocktail parties a week, huge receptions at the Royal York and a scotch-guzzling chimpanzee, the convention provided all the hoopla usually associated with American politics.

SUSPENSE — Would seek re-election?

Jules found the serious side of the convention "most rewarding." He was Ontario university student organizer and also vice-president in charge of research.

In keeping with the party's policy of giving responsible positions to young people, Jules was invited to the Montmorency Thinker's Conference, where he participated in many of the debates. He felt that his ideas and opinions were respected, as were those of the eight other students present.

The power of the student delegates was greater than most people imagined, says Jules. He was quite indignant about the way the press overlooked the fact that 110 of the delegates-at-large were students.

Less seriously, Jules remembers the Friday night speech of John Diefenbaker. While Diefenbaker was going through the French part of his speech, one Westerner in the audience turned to his buddies and remarked, "That's what I like about John; when he speaks French, I understand."

A chimpanzee was part of candidate Michael Starr's entourage. When somebody tried to feed it peanuts, the trainer almost fainted. "What are you trying to do, poison him?" he shouted. Like many other conventioners, the monkey refused everything but scotch and water.

In spite of the inanities of the convention, Jules feels he gained a valuable education. "My philosophy is that students, by working for the party of their choice, gain an invaluable experience in education," he said.

Ottawa law council members resign

OTTAWA (CUP) — Three Ottawa U civil law faculty council members resigned last Thursday after council refused to pass a motion condemning both UGEO and AGEUM as "unrepresentative".

The Union Générale des Etudiants du Quebec (UGEO) is the union of Quebec student governments, Association Générale des Etudiants de Université de Montreal (AGEUM) is the student association of U of M.

The motion came in the form of a letter to Quebec prime minister Daniel Johnson, prime minister Lester Pearson, justice minister P. E. Trudeau, creditiste MP Réal Caouette, and other members of the federal and provincial parliaments.

The letter condemned the "non-representative" character of both UGEO and AGEUM, due to the control of these organizations by a few persons.

The letter complained that recruitment policies made it necessary for anyone joining the Travailleurs Etudiants du Quebec (TEC) a social action program similar in aims to the CYC, to hold separatist views.

The three students who resigned are Gerald Tremblay, President; Marrion Pelletier, secretary; and Luc Racicot, fourth year representative.

WLU students help select president

WATERLOO (CUP) — Students will have a voice in selecting a new president for Waterloo Lutheran University, officials announced yesterday.

Acting on a request from the student council, the executive committee of the board of governors decided to seat a student on the selection committee to pick a successor to president William Villaume, who resigned last June.

Lakehead disputes late calendar

PORT ARTHUR (CUP) — At Lakehead University a confrontation has developed between students and administration because the calendar was issued two weeks after registration.

Professors counselling students at registration had special Xerox copies of the calendar to work from.

But due to conflicts with the new calendar, some students will have to change courses.

This means that they will have to buy new books, although they already have the books for the courses in which they registered.

A hastily-formed student committee is protesting the ruling stating that they are committed to remain in their original courses, and the administration should take responsibility for the error and pay for the loss.

The committee, made up of third and fourth year students has demanded immediate withdrawal of the ruling.

Dean of arts Gordon Rothey said, "This is too bad. But we all make mistakes don't we?"

Asked who would pay for new books for students who changed courses, he said, "I can't help it if you've bought the wrong books."

Two members of the CUS secretariat, Carol Wilson and Bob Baldwin are in Port Arthur investigating.

Research on pot

INDIANAPOLIS (Special) A person under the influence of marijuana may be subjected to an accurate and practical test for detecting the drug, according to a UPI story out of Indianapolis.

Research is under way in Indianapolis but finding human guinea pigs remains a problem.

Dr. Robert Forney, director of the state laboratory for toxicology at Indiana University medical center in Indianapolis and Dr. Francis Hughes, professor of pharmacology at the center got together two years ago to commence work on the project.

Marijuana and most similar drugs cannot be determined in the manner that alcoholic beverages are measured using a "breathalyzer." This device was also invented in Indiana.

However Forney and Hughes are devising a method which will detect the active ingredients of marijuana in the blood or urine.

How Canadians don't help Vietnam

By Dr. MICHAEL HALL

Dr. Hall has returned from a three-year teaching assignment in Vietnam.

As you read this, the Marines in South Vietnam are attacking villages in the northern provinces, and soldiers are calling in air strikes on the paddy fields and villages of the Delta. Many civilians are killed and wounded.

Tomorrow morning it will be the Viet Cong's turn to mortar the villages. The peasants foolish enough to remain will be killed or maimed. The Viet Cong will shoot the young boys who try to defend their homes, and they will disembowel the village leaders who haven't the sense to sleep in the security of a town.

Occasionally one or two of the wounded can be taken out by helicopter; the others have to be carried for miles to the nearest large village. From there they bounce for hours in the back of a little motorcycle van to the Provincial Hospital.

In these hospitals there are almost no Vietnamese civilian doctors capable of doing surgery, but the wounded may be fortunate and find a foreign surgeon from the United States, the Philippines, Australia, New Zealand, Holland, France, Germany, Persia, Great Britain, Switzerland, Italy, Taiwan or Japan. They won't find a Canadian surgeon because in Vietnam there aren't any.

Canada's programme of external aid was founded on a belief expressed 17 years ago by Prime Minister Pearson — "We agreed that the forces of totalitarian expansionism could not be stopped in South East Asia by military force alone.

"If South East Asia and South Asia are not to be conquered by communism we must demonstrate that it is we and not the Russians who stand for national liberation and economic and social progress".

To demonstrate in Mr. Pearson's words that "we stand for national liberation", we have given South Vietnam $60,000 worth of butter — the people never eat butter.

We have given them $790,000 worth of wheat flour — but the people eat rice.

We have started, and failed to complete, the enlargement of a Medical School and a University Assembly Hall.

We have given scholarships to young Vietnamese men so that they may come to our Universities, while American students are drafted in the middle of their studies, or are given asylum in Canada.

And although multilateral defense treaties and trade agreements make it difficult for us to prevent it, even if we wished to, Canadian explosives are being used in Vietnam, and there are Caribou and Otter aircraft flying on military missions there.

In Vietnam there is one Canadian general practitioner concentrating on the treatment of tuberculosis, and a few priests and missionaries with small clinics. There is not a single Canadian with the necessary skill or equipment, but the little equipment that was sent by the government was assembled for use in Canada and a large part of it is useless in Vietnam.

Like the butter and the flour it was just what we happened to have on hand and what was convenient to send.

When asked to assist the largest civilian service for war casualties in Vietnam, Canada decided that "the cost was too great and the Canadian content too small" — and gave nothing.

When asked again to aid in the treatment of casualties, the Director General of Aid said he wouldn't give equipment and supplies to the Medical School Hospital "because he didn't want Canada to get the name of forcing aid on other countries".

When Canada had a chance to create a service to supply artificial legs for the many children who are losing their limbs in the war, the scheme, and the children, were abandoned with "quiet diplomacy".

Canada preferred to work to rule, and the rules didn't quite fit the children's needs. But the Americans bent their rules, and the children are now walking again.

Appealing to the participants in a war to stop fighting is a perfectly legitimate use of our position in the United Nations.

But, can we expect the people in Vietnam, or indeed anywhere in Asia, to believe that it is their welfare that concerns us, when the country is filled with hungry, homeless families, when its hospitals are overcrowded with inadequately treated wounded civilians — two or three in each bed — and yet when the material assistance from Canada, one of the world's richest nations, is remarkable only for its scarcity?

Speeches in the United Nations may impress the diplomats but they are not a substitute for timely medical and social help to people in need.

Rugger firsts win, seconds lose

By DOUG WOODS

The Varsity rugger seconds lost 18-8 to a very powerful Western team in London on the weekend. The score is misleading as Blues played well and, if they had been luckier on a few penalty kicks, the game might have been much closer.

Western had a definite edge in the first half scoring 9 points on a penalty kick and two unconverted tries. The Blues only score resulted from a blind-side try by Bob Noble from the Western 5 yard line. Towards the end of the first half, the Varsity scrum was performing very well and won a large percentage of the scrums and line-outs.

In the second half it was Western all the way as their backs managed to score 4 tries. None were converted.

A fine pass by lock-forward Rich Van Banning set up a try by winger Bill Imrie. This was Varsity's only score of the second half. The Blues held on gamely throughout the match in spite of injuries to Gus Sinclair, Brian Hamil, and Bob Noble, but the Western players were just too good.

Western won the Turner Trophy last year and they showed why in this match. Gus Sinclair was the outstanding player for the Blues all through the game.

In other action at Kingston over the weekend the Varsity firsts had no trouble defeating R.M.C. 22-6. The Toronto pack out-muscled their R.M.C. counterparts for the whole length of the game and the backs capitalized on all opportunities given them.

Blues opened the scoring with a try by Dave Imrie from a scrum near the R.M.C. goal-line. Andy Gibson got the convert. The rest of the scoring in the first half came from 4 penalty kicks; two for each team. Andy Gibson scored both the Toronto kicks.

In the second half it was the Blues all the way. Winger Doug Phibbs made a long break for the Blues passing to Andy Bethal who touched the ball down in the R.M.C. end-zone for a try. Andy Gibson converted.

A long run by John McKay set up a try by prop-forward Maris Apse and centre Pete Sutherland ended the scoring for the day with a try after a fine run off a pass by fly-half Andy Gibson. Hooker Dave Ledson played his usual fine game winning many scrums for Blues.

The R.M.C. team is much improved over last year and it is to their credit that, in spite of a severe drubbing at the hands of Blues, they continued to tackle and run hard right to the end of the match.

Next weekend Blues meet Queens at Toronto. Gaels are reputed to have the best team in the league this year but it is interesting to note that they lost to R.M.C. two weeks ago.

Saturday's game is a crucial one for Blues and they will be playing all-out rugger for the whole match. It will be a game worth watching.

BLUENOTES:

Since each team scored three touchdowns, Blues' actual margin of victory came from the pedal extremities of Paul McKay, easily the most versatile player on the field. McKay kicked three punts, two singles, and a field goal for eight important points ... Western rookie, Bill Hendershot, may be Metras' long-sought replacement for Whit Tucker. Only 154 pounds, he displayed amazing speed and gluey hands as he gave Blues' defensive backfield scads of trouble ... Dave Church played a strong game for Blues, recovering two fumbles and baling a third down play inside the Varsity 10 ...

Other injuries were suffered by Don Rogers, Wolfgang Gut, Tom Reed, Nick DiGiuseppe, and Brent Morris. Gut appears most seriously hurt ... Queen's had trouble with McGill, falling behind 16-13 at one point, before prevailing 41-23. Quarterback Don Bayne threw three TD passes to lead the way.

So don't just sit there ladies. Find those musty old running shoes and get this show rolling.

Water polo commences at Hart House as Blues win

Saturday afternoon the waters of Hart House pool churned in the opening game of the 1967 intercollegiate water polo schedule as Varsity Blues defeated RMC 7-3 in an exhibition match.

Coach Eddie Szakaacs kept his first team in reserve and gave the fairly inexperienced second line an opportunity to show themselves.

Although the cadets took initial command of the game and led 2-1 at the end of the first quarter, the newcomers to the Varsity lineup showed considerable promise and closed the holes.

Blues' defencemen John Carr and Ross Freeman thwarted several offensive attempts while rover Terry Bryon and forward Dave Brech allowed the RMC goaltender no rest. Only some good stops by the latter prevented the score from exceeding the final count.

Saturday's close game gave Blues' rookies an opportunity to iron some rough spots in their play. With several veterans, including 1966 top scorer Graeme Barber having graduated, the newcomers will have to work hard to fill the vacated berths.

However, with the excellent depth and experience Blues possess, this year's team is a good bet to successfully defend and retain the OQAA title and the Herschorn Cup.

Blues survive late onslaught to win

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

A funny thing happened on Blues' way to the victory forum Saturday. They almost didn't make it.

After cooking up a delicious, well-deserved 26-0 gap in the first half, Varsity were life and death in the final thirty minutes as the hometown Mustangs came roaring back and singed their hoofs in a desperate attempt to pull the game out of the fire. Their comeback drive fell just short when 'Stang quarterback, Bob Israel, overthrew Bill Hendershot in the clear on the second last play of the game. Israel fumbled on the next play leaving Blues still clinging grimly to a 26-20 lead, their second straight win of the SIFL season.

By the time the game drew to its exciting close, Blues were a badly-hurting team. As so often happens when a team relaxes with a big lead, injuries piled up throughout the second half, culminating in the most damaging of all, to quarterback Vic Alboini. He was snowed under late in the game by a pair of marauding Mustangs, and was carried off the field in considerable pain. Alboini suffered severely torn knee ligaments and will be lost to Blues for the remainder of the season, a cruel jolt with the Queen's game next week.

For the plucky Alboini, it was a tragic conclusion to an afternoon which had started out in unparalleled perfection. Never before has a Varsity team unleashed a more potent attack on the road than the one Blues let loose in the first half.

Paul McKay opened scoring for Blues with a 28 yd. field goal, set up by a 38 yd. ramble by Wolfgang Gut. McKay also accounted for the next two points on a wide field goal attempt and a booming 70 yd. single.

Then Alboini really got hot and began connecting all over the place. Jim Ware got the first touchdown at the 4:00 mark of the second quarter on a six yard pass. On the ensuing kickoff however, Western's Bill Hendershot danced 106 yards for an apparent touchdown, only to have some clown in a purple jersey throw a clip about forty yards behind the play which nullified his teammate's artistic footwork.

Blues took over the 26 and marched methodically down the gridiron in nine rigidly executed plays before Alboini tossed a touchdown pass to Eben from the 6. Ninety seconds later, Dave Church recovered a wild lateral, and the ebullient "Ebo" followed with his second touchdown, boosting the score to 26-0.

The second half of course was an entirely different story as Western's smouldering pass attack finally sprang to life. Israel hit rookie Bill Hendershot for 'Stang's first touchdown of the day at 11:00 of the third quarter from 19 yards out. Then after a Toronto fumble, Hendershot again shot into the clear behind Riivo Ilves and grabbed an 18 yd. scoring strike from Israel, narrowing the score to 26-13. With less than two minutes left, Western counted their final touchdown on a short run by Jeff Hilton. The dynamic Israel-Hendershot combination set it up with consecutive 28 yd. completions.

Soccer Blues foiled by inept referee; superior skills overcome Western 7-3

By SMILEY

Varsity Soccer Blues came from behind to pull out a 7-3 victory over Western Mustangs Saturday in London. The result did not fully indicate the relative strength of the two teams as 'Stangs had the referee and the linemen playing on their side—or so it seemed. Blues had three goals and several breakaways called back on ridiculous decisions.

Perhaps as a result of this, Blues did not look very impressive. With the exception of Jim Lefkos, who scored six of Blues' seven goals and had another one called back, Varsity players were rather sluggish and their passing was erratic.

Lefkos opened the scoring when he was put in the clear by a Frank Soppelsa pass that split the Western defence. Then came the best goal of the day. Alan Cragg moved up the sidelines and crossed the ball to Soppelsa whose header was kicked into the net by Lefkos.

But disaster struck. Two defensive miscues by Blues resulted in Western goals by Loren Fossaccca and Bruno de Brouner and the game was knotted at 2-2.

The referee then decided to contribute his share to the action as he rewarded a questionable penalty kick to 'Stangs De Brouner converted and Blues found themselves trailing for the first time this season.

Varsity appeared stunned and disorganized. However, they slowly regained their composure and Lefkos tied the score before half-time on a deflected shot from an almost impossible angle.

The second half pitted the whole Varsity team against the refs. Blues won handily as Lefkos scored the fourth and fifth goals on breakaways. Then Austris Liepa broke the Lefkos monopoly as he scored on a penalty kick. Lefkos then closed out the scoring on a good hard drive.

Korner Kicks, Jim Lefkos, Frank Soppelsa, and John Gero each had a goal called back. The referee was extremely quick in leaving the field after the game.

Rowers second in weekend regatta

A heavier training load and some major shuffling in crews paid off for U of T rowers with a point total of 50 and a tie for second place with MacMaster in a regatta held on Lake Fanshawe in London Saturday.

Western was again the overall winner with a total point score of 70.

Toronto, fielding only three crews this week, managed two seconds and a first. The second place boats were the Freshman and the Varsity heavyweights, while the junior varsity, (stroked by Bill Dickinson) rowing a fine race, provided the lone U of T victory.

Results in each event were as follows: Freshman: 1. Western 2. Toronto 3. Brock. Junior Varsity: 1. Toronto 2. Brock 3. MacMaster. Lightweight Varsity: 1. Brock 2. MacMaster 3. Western. Heavyweight Varsity: 1. Western 2. Toronto 3. York.

Varsity fullback, Pete Broodhurst (20), assumes the foetal position as his drive is stopped by Roger Bereza (30) among others. Bawing to some earthen god is Blues' Gord Whit-oker (50) while Jim Kellom (66) hovers.

Blue and White blasted - temporary abolition seen

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

The Blue and White Society plunged into a soul-searching session last night, hearing a suggestion that the society be abolished for two weeks.

Concerned about the purpose and the efficiency of the society, Chairman Marty Low (I Law) said:

"I'd like to see the Blue and White become a fantastic issue on campus — perhaps we could abolish the society for two weeks.

"But the Students Administrative Council wouldn't go for that because too many people like dances and there would be nobody to put them on."

On Monday Low attended a meeting of SAC's old education commission. The society was blasted as the most inefficient organization on campus and as being too far behind the times, Low said.

By the SAC constitution the Blue and White falls under the jurisdiction of the old education commission. (This commission is to receive a new name in the future).

The University College literary and athletic society also censured the Blue and White Monday night.

The Lit did not send its two Blue and White representatives to the society meeting last night.

Lit President Hershell Ezrin (IV UC) said yesterday the society had "no idea what it is reaching for . . . and it is totally incompetent."

He added that the Lit motion had no personal reflection on Low, whom he described as "one of the hardest working members of the society."

Low said after the meeting that SAC will grill him at its meeting tonight on how the society can be improved.

The Blue and White Society has made efforts this year to improve its efficiency. It implemented a com-

Fackenheim upholds demand to replace Forrest

By SUE HELWIG

Professor E. L. Fackenheim has upheld his demand that Rev. A. C. Forrest be replaced as chairman of the pre-Teach-In discussion on religious factors in the Arab-Israeli war.

Prof. Fackenheim questioned Mr. Forrest's impartiality as chairman due to an article on Palestinian refugees which Mr. Forrest wrote for The United Church Observer, which he also edits.

Mr. Forrest severely criticized Israel's treatment of these refugees in the article.

Mr. Forrest said last night that the Teach-In Committee may have to replace him as chairman for the Thursday night discussion.

"Rabbi Fackenheim may be quite right," Mr. Forrest said in an interview. "I always have trouble sitting on the top of a fence."

"The Teach-In Committee may have to appoint a new chairman."

College bowl committee drops SIFL . . . again

By PHIL BINGLEY

The College Bowl selection committee has done it again.

At the end of last year's football season cries of "bush league" and "rat" went up.

The Bowl selection committee insisted that the game was not a Canadian championship and thus SIFL teams had no preference over any of the three other college leagues across the country.

And now — although claiming that the bowl is indeed a national championship — they have eliminated the teams from the powerful Queen's, Toronto, Western and McGill loop from the spectacle next month at Varsity Stadium.

The reason given by the committee is that the SIFL will not re-arrange their schedule to leave an opening for a pre-Bowl playoff game Nov. 18. This date has been set aside by the SIFL for a possible Yates Cup playoff.

Also, three of the four teams — Queen's, Western, and McGill — have rules forbidding football competition after Nov. 18. And so Blues, who are willing to play in the Bowl game should they win the Yates, were overruled and forced to abide by the league's decision.

As a result, the situation is as follows:

The Western Canada Conference champion, by virtue of the absence of an SIFL representative, will get a bye into the final.

Their opponents will be the winner of the Atlantic Bowl between the Maritime and Central Canadian Conference league champs, to be held Nov. 18 in Halifax.

It all adds up to a hollow contest with some of the best college clubs in the nation ineligible.

Slave tells story of SHARE auction

By SUE HODGSON

"Fifteen bucks! You couldn't do better on the Black Market."

With these words the SHARE auctioneer banged his gavel and there I was, sold to the highest bidder.

Thankfully I stepped off the block and returned to the comfortable oblivion of the floor. The ordeal had not been pleasant, and even the assurance that it was all in a good cause was not sufficient to convince me that it had been worth it.

The auctioneer started the bidding at $5 despite the protestations of an engineer at the back of the room who kept yelling "39 cents."

I then had one horrible moment when a burly fellow at the back of the room bid $6, followed by a dead silence which almost resulted in disaster.

I managed to avert such fate by waving my eyelashes a few times and displaying a lot of leg.

The bids rose higher and higher and finally stopped at $15.

I heartily recommend this experience to any girl who wants to know first hand what it was like to be auctioned off as a slave in the deep south.

However, I understand the worst is yet to come. My engineering owners intend to raffle me next week.

Great god SHARE claims first victims

The first trembling virgins have been sacrificed to the great god SHARE.

Fourteen Victoria College girls, two Vic males and four Engineers were led to the auction block yesterday at Wymilwood to satisfy the god's voracious appetite. In the process they contributed $408.07 to the SHARE campaign.

Donna Rolenc fetched the top price of $32. When asked what was in store for her, she replied, "Just a date. That's all I'm giving."

The Annesley Hall girls also paid $32 to obtain the services of Vice-President Steve Grant of the Victoria College Union. Grant is looking forward to two months of uninterrupted bliss with 60 girls.

The best the Engineers could do was attract $25 for two of their number.

Mild-mannered photographer Tim Koehler, assigned to the Nurses' SHARE backrubbing clinic, was attacked and stripped to the waist by the over zealous nurses. One grabbed his camera and took this picture.

THE ISSUES:

- Can the man of conscience kill for his country?
- How must men respond to the cry for revolution?
- Why do men of faith hate those of other religions?
- Do we need new moral standards to judge and to motivate action in international affairs?
- Can the man of conscience play a relevant role in the pragmatic world of international politics?

Interracial talks impossible: Clarke

A pre Teach-in panel discussion, Rich White World, Poor Non-White World: Can Faith Bridge the Gap? sparked animated controversy Monday night.

An ardent Black Power advocate, Clarke contended that a dialogue between black and white is impossible.

James Finn saw hope for the black people, "But only through the present established channels." Mr. Finn is a former associate editor of the progressive Catholic magazine Commonweal.

Clarke said he could see no way in which the church could effect a reconciliation between the two peoples.

"The church today has led the rest of our complacent society in its hesitancy of getting involved in vital and human rights matters."

Mr. Finn, author of a book on the Negro protest movement, asserted that violence was no answer to the dilemma of the American Negro.

"Administrators make poor revolutionaries, and revolutionaries make poor administrators."

Questions from the audience showed a great anxiety over Clarke's belligerent statements.

"Is there any way to be with you as a human being," asked one spectator, "without being in fear of my life?"

Clarke replied, "No."

U of T begins new medical institute

The University of Toronto will soon have a new institute of medical science, Acting President J. H. Sword announced Monday.

The institute will be headed by Dr. John C. Laidlaw, professor of medicine and director of the university's clinical investigation unit at Toronto General Hospital.

Full-time members of clinical departments and basic scientists within the faculty of medicine will staff the institute. A division of the school of graduate studies, it will offer MSc and PhD degrees in human biology.

Innis holds Monte Carlo for SHARE

The Innis College student society will hold a Monte Carlo Night tomorrow to raise funds for SHARE.

Ken Stone (IV Innis), president of the society, says the night will be the first of several challenges to Caput, the supreme judicial body of the university, on which students are not represented.

The evening will defy the "stupid laws" of Caput, Stone said. Caput forbids gambling on campus.

Poker, craps and other games of chance will be played. A vertical roulette wheel will be used to avoid breaking a federal law which terms 'illegal' the use of a horizontal wheel, Stone said.

Stone also plans a drinking spree for students over 21 to celebrate Sir John A. MacDonald's birthday Jan. 10.

Stone expects no trouble from the law: "There is a difference in committing an illegal act and being persecuted."

TADP will solicit funds at UC

The Toronto Anti-Draft Program will be allowed to solicit donations on the University College campus, the UC literary and athletic society decided Monday.

The Lit will let TADP set up a table in the UC Junior Common Room for a trial period of two weeks.

The table will probably be manned by U.S. draft resisters.

"It will let people find out more about the anti-draft program and raise the money it desperately needs," said Mark Freiman (III UC).

Freiman said it was necessary to "re-affirm our position" in the wake of last week's Student Administrative Council decision not to support the TADP.

The UC Lit has already donated $250 to the TADP.

British will debate at Hart House

The British debating team visits Hart House tomorrow night as part of its two-month Canadian tour.

Hannan Rose, a graduate of Oxford and Colin MacKay, who has a master's degree from Glasgow University, will try to prove that "Youth is naturally revolting."

Opposing the British are two members of the Hart House debates committee, Bob Rae (III UC) and Steve Luxton (III New).

MacKay has worked part time for the British Broadcasting Corporation for seven years and Rose is a promoter of racial equality in Britain.

"Chinese are enemies" warns Fraser

By KATHY ADAMS

The cultural revolution in China today is a "disciplined ecstasy of hatred" for all who do not love Mao Tse Tung, Blair Fraser said yesterday in the first of the pre Teach-In lectures.

Mr. Fraser, who is Ottawa editor of Mc-

Fraser speaks on Religion of Ideology
by TOM ALFOLDI

Lean's magazine and has travelled in China in 1956 and 1966, spoke on the Religion of Ideology: Mao's China.

The cultural revolution reminds the western visitor of a religious revival, he said and resembles a fervent evangelical worship.

"Imagine a Jesuit order combined with the techniques of the Salvation Army and the Jehovah's Witnesses. This is the cultural revolution."

Quotations from Mao are the prayer book of this religion. "To read the book itself is disillusioning," he said. "It contains political tactics and almost no ethics.

"Patriotic songs are sung like hymns throughout China. If you substitute the word Jesus for the word Mao, we recognize it at once.

"All independent thought or expression is suppressed and any suspicions of heresy are routed out," Mr. Fraser said. "Public humiliation is used to force heretics to confess.

"There is little bloodshed but the tactics used are more degrading than physical torture.

"We tend to criticize China without reservation," he said. "China has made an amazing recovery from the anarchy of 1949. It is economically stable with one of the highest standards of living in Asia.

"Whether we realize it or not, the Chinese are our enemies. They are taught to hate us."

Tartu forecasts freely-run residence

By INGRID VABALIS

Once every few weeks a group of people go up to a cosy upstairs room in Hart House and ponder how to build a $3,000,000 building with $40,000.

And they think they've got these complicated finances figured out.

So now comes the most interesting part—planning the building.

It's called Tartu College and it's a students' residence.

The only definite plan is that it will be a place for students to live, to study and to learn.

Right now it's an open structure. There will be no landlords, no deans, no guardians.

What there will be is really up to anyone who has some ideas.

This is what has happened to date.

Howard Adleman who set up the Co-op College Residences here, decided last year that an apartment hotel residence would be a nice change from the rather old Co-op houses.

He negotiated to buy a site at the corner of Madison and Bloor. Helping him on this project were Stan Adleman, former president of New College students council, John Jordan of Rochdale College, John Treleivan, SAC vice-president, and others.

Financing comes next. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will pick up 90 per cent of the $3,500,000 building costs.

The required 10 per cent equity is being raised by the Estonian Students' Association.

Hence the name Tartu—it's an Estonian university town.

Last summer, SAC approved the use of up to $30,000 for investment in the project, then known as International House.

Final confirmation requires a SAC motion approving the project design. Approval is likely to be discussed at tonight's SAC meeting. The Tartu planners will be asking SAC to invest $10,000 in the project.

The designers, architects Elmar Tampold and J. Malcolm Wells, have already produced a floor plan and elevation drawings for the building.

Six-man units are planned in four combinations. Each unit will have a common room, kitchen facilities and two bathrooms.

There is no architectural reason why the residence should not be co-educational. But this, as most of the details, is up to the student planning committees.

Construction is scheduled to begin late next spring and student committees to plan the details of the decor, facilities and administration will be set up at a meeting next Wednesday, in the South Sitting Room of Hart House.

In Tartu College the students will make the basic decisions of how they want to live and learn. They will participate in creating the college, they will make all the decisions from the maintenance they will have to the rates of rent they will pay.

Eighty per cent of the rooms are expected to be singles. Rents have been estimate at $13 for doubles and $15 for singles.

Acadia will withdraw from CUS

Acadia University Monday voted by a three-to-one ratio to drop membership in the Canadian Union of Students.

Acadia student council President agreed with the decision.

"I feel that we have gained little from our association with CUS over the years and the fact that many of you ask what it is, is more than eloquent testimony to its irrelevance."

Peter Warrion, CUS president-elect who travelled to Acadia Monday for the vote, said, "One of the reasons the vote may have gone the way it did is that people simply do not have information or familiarity with CUS."

CUS President Hugh Armstrong said in Ottawa yesterday he was "disappointed and mystified" by the withdrawal. He pointed out that Levy had not attended the CUS congress in London, Ont. in early September.

"I wish he had been at the congress," Armstrong said. "I wish he had contacted us for information."

The University of British Columbia will hold a similar referendum Nov. 1.

SAC by-elections on Wed.

Four Students Administrative Council members will be elected in by-elections next Wednesday.

One opening is for the school of library science and the other three for the school of graduate studies.

Nominations opened Monday and are to close Friday at 5 p.m. The elections will be held from 9 a.m. to 3:15 p.m.

of prices, press reports and a fair trial

A University of Toronto student was charged last week with possession of 12 pounds of marijuana after police seized two, six-pound compressed blocks of the drug from the trunk of a parked sports car.

The police estimated the value of the seized marijuana at $20,000, which by any kind of marijuana business arithmetic is far out of proportion.

Twelve pounds equals 192 ounces — the measure marijuana is most commonly sold in today. Ounces sell at $20 to $35 each, depending upon the market. Thus 12 pounds should be worth $3,840 to $6,720 — far from the police estimate.

Possibly the estimate is based on the well-known $10 (or dime) bags which are often measured with a matchbox and yield about seven bags to an ounce. Twelve pounds sold in this way would earn $13,440 — better — but still not $20,000.

We have noticed that the police often over-calculate the figures in such narcotics cases, thereby taking advantage of public ignorance of marijuana economics to propogandize.

Obviously the higher the money involved, the more serious the matter is and the more disturbed people are.

The disturbing part of this, though, is the effect this has on the accused's chances of getting a fair trial. In effect, when such a large figure is published, it lessens the accused's chances and a contempt of court is committed.

Anyone commits contempt by publishing anything that would prejudice a trial. The police do this constantly in narcotics cases.

They leave a loophole, though, by saying that marijuana is often adulterated with foreign substances to raise the volume. This statement assumes that the marijuana business in Toronto is the same as it was a few years ago, when there was very little coming in.

With the larger supplies sold now, the quality has gone up. Marijuana with foreign substances — even cola or molasses poured over it to give more weight — is becoming rare. The middle-class people buying this intoxicant these days, would never put up with such bad quality. And to be successful, a pusher has to cultivate buyers who trust him.

The police, on the other hand, don't want to admit that the business is becoming increasingly sophisticated or that many middle-class people are buying. As long as the public can be convinced that Yorkville-hippies are the offenders, the police can say they are controlling the situation.

Thus, the police can — in fact must — give a faulty impression of the situation or they would have to admit they cannot control it any longer.

And so, the rights to a fair trial we should all have are put into jeopardy by such police statements. In that respect, the effects of the police action are far worse than the infractions of the law the police are trying to enforce.

But another important matter disturbs us. Using the figure $20,000 again, we calculate the police set marijuana prices at about $21.30, for a bag usually sold at $10, or about $116.30 for an ounce usually sold at $20.

They should shop around because they are being cheated.

building a better residence

The Macpherson Commission's report recommended that more students — especially those in first year — should be encouraged to live in residences on campus.

Macpherson argued: "The more closely they are drawn into the university at the beginning, the more rapidly they can be expected to appreciate the ethos of the university, to sense its difference from high school, and so to make a successful adjustment from school to university."

In this, C. B. is on the right track. When a university is attended by a majority of commuter students — as U of T is — the students cannot be expected to become fully involved in what goes on around here.

Macpherson's commission therefore, recommended cutting residence fees by 20 per cent to make it more financially feasible for freshmen to live in.

The other side of the coin, though, was not considered by the commission. Will living as well as learning on campus make students too involved in the university, to the exclusion of the world outside? The ivory tower effect, in other words? There is a great danger that it will.

And most important of all, is the need for students to draw themselves away from their parents. How else are they to become individual thinking and acting human beings?

As a pamphlet distributed by the Ontario Union of Students pointed out, when students are under the financial and emotional control of their parents, they often go into courses they don't have an interest in, becoming what their parents want them to become and not what they want to become.

Macpherson's remedy substitutes one bad thing for another. When many students are put into a residence, they are under the control of another parent group, this time acting, as universities think they have the right to do, in loco parentis.

When a little girl at the St. Michael's College residences is given restrictions on her time, she becomes subservient to the dean. When another girl at Trinity or Victoria College has to ask permission to do something, whether that permission comes easily or not, she is participating in a degrading exercise of submission.

Rules have been loosening constantly for the past few years, especially in men's residences but are still too tight. Most students in residences don't feel the pressure of the stifling influences there because they have never experienced anything else.

They've just come out of the home environment where rules are stricter. Residence life, to these students, is better than what they are used to.

Then too, many students are willing to put up with residence life for the camaraderie and the convenience.

Co-operatives in which students make their own rules are a much better solution, one which Macpherson recognized but said he couldn't discuss.

Rochdale College, a student-run co-operative residence is now under construction. Tartu College, somewhat like Rochdale, is in the planning stages. These offer much more hope, both for alleviation of the housing problem and for the development of student individuals.

Tartu's planners are soliciting the participation of anyone interested in planning a residence.

coincidence or propoganda?

Sir: Was it by coincidence that your article titled, "Boston trial may set marijuana precedents" in Monday's Varsity, your cartoon on marijuana "the law is an . . ." and the front page article on the arrest of a U of T student on marijuana charges appear in the same issue?

It would seem that the Varsity condones the berishment fee. On requesting to pay a fair fee for just unjust.

The fact that medical experts feel that there is a great probability that pot cannot be considered harmless and is indeed harmful, should deter potential users. But the blind desire for pleasure and kicks at whatever the price, especially when repeatedly praised and justified by newspapers such as yours, overrides any decision based on logic.

Your voice is, by no means, without influence, and your propaganda in favour of pot in Monday's and past Varsity is going far beyond what is justified by an "urgent need" to legalize pot. It may be a good idea to think of the responsibility of the press and not only the freedom of the press once in a while.

the wondering jew

Sir: As a young secular Jew in quest of meaning in mid-century Jewish life I was most anxious to attend the lecture sponsored by Hillel on Oct. 15: The Dilemma of the Secular Jew.

In order to attend a Hillel lecture it is the club's "official policy" that one must purchase a $5 membership fee. On requesting to pay a fair fee for just this one lecture — as $10 is quite expensive for an hour lecture for two — the president of Hillel flatly refused, saying: "Five dollars or nothing. Six hundred other Jews think this club's all right. If you don't like it, too bad!"

I wonder how this policy covers Christians interested in learning about Judaism? Possibly it would be better if Hillel would advertise their prices as well as their lectures in the Varsity, so that people would be forewarned.

SAC avoids moral decision in dance of unreality

Miss Limpus is a SAC representative from the School of Graduate Studies. Opinions expressed in the following article are not necessarily those of The Varsity.

By LAUREL LIMPUS

Last Wednesday's SAC debate on the draft-dodger issue was an empty dance of utter unreality. At a time when finally, a question of real validity and importance was before SAC, when the subject involved war, death, individual choice and the essential relationship between man and his society, SAC as usual consumed itself in triviality and engaged in endless debate about the nature of student representation and the right of a representative to make a moral decision.

The fact that there might in this world be issues more important; that beyond our nice, safe, clean and encapsulated university world there are such realities as suffering, torture, and death, hardly intruded itself at all in this mindless exercise in trivia. Well-scrubbed and healthy students were seriously contending that the draft-dodgers should just go to war, that they shouldn't be so squeamish about sloshing around in the mud. None of the SAC reps had been sloshing around in the mud themselves lately, but after all, war is hell. None of them had killed anyone lately either, but we all know how demeaning it is to be a coward.

The hard and unpleasant fact is that most of these SAC reps, indeed, most of the students who elected them (one might even say, most of the society that produced them), had no right at all to deliberate and pass judgment on this matter. This is a serious matter, this is real, this is earnest, this involves being faced with real alternatives: to kill for your society, to obey your society, even to the extent of negating life at its command; or to oppose yourself to an external, dictated morality, to create your own gods, your own loyalty, your own patriotism.

Most of these draft-dodgers have had to do something which very few of us have ever even thought about: they had to make a decision which would affect the rest of their lives. They had to choose. They had to ask themselves: Where are my loyalties? How shall I regulate my behaviour? What is my relationship to the state? What is my relationship to myself? What am I? What responsibility must I bear for my own actions?

These young men, faced with the real possibility of killing and being killed, could not be as glib about it as the SAC reps last Wednesday night. Unlike these reps, safely shielded from the real world by the protective unreality of the university, they have had to face up to what is really going on, out there where it really happens (before it ends up on Huntley-Brinkley every night).

Unlike those in Europe, we in Canada and the United States have not undergone a major war in 100 years, on our own soil, in the midst of our own civilians, near our own homes. The thought of war remains just that: a picture, an image, filled in a bit by the memory of countless war movies, but untouched by the experienced and remembered horror. To be really appalled by death you have to have contemplated death. Vietnam affects us so very little because we have no conception of what is going on there. Life intrudes upon us so seldom, with its violence, its stunning reality, its moral choices.

How many of us has asked himself lately: Could I kill another person? How would it affect my life? Would I be responsible? Anyone who hasn't done this has no right to judge the draft-dodgers, because they have done it. It's easy for us, too easy, to accept the mass slaughter going on in Vietnam, but it is less easy for them, faced with the imminent prospect of actually carrying it out. We are very willing to encourage others to go to war.

We are also willing, apparently, to force others to go to war. One argument that constantly came up in the SAC debate was that draft-dodging was against the law. It also used to be the law in England that thieves went to the gallows, and what did that prove? A law that forces a man to devastate and kill, when the survival of his country is clearly not at stake, against his own humanity, will, and better judgment, has negated him as an individual. A society that placidly accepts such a law, and believes that those who disobey it should be classed as criminals, is a society where freedom has lost all significance. And a university campus that is unable to question such a law and such a society is in serious danger of producing little more than insensitive and passive additions to the unquestioning and mindless mass.

Tom Faulkner, SAC president who led the draft dodger supporters.

Paul Fromm, head of the Edmund Burke society, who encouraged retaliation.

sac members had no mandate to act

Sir:

With specific reference to your editorial comments of October 13, I wish to disagree with your conclusion that a majority of Students Administrative Council Representatives missed the point of the debate, (re aid to draft-dodgers).

As one of those who voted against the resolution, I find it incomprehensible that the proponents of the resolution could be so self-intoxicated with the righteousness of their moral and political beliefs that they sought to endorse this program with the signature of twenty thousand University of Toronto students. Any person with strong personal convictions in this regard should actively participate in the program, but on an individual basis. The SAC has not gone back to a high school students' council concept of government but has realized that it must act in a responsible manner and as the executive voice of the student body. Until the SAC is given a clear mandate to voice an opinion in an issue involving such grave political and emotional issues, it should not volunteer the endorsement of each university student.

I would agree that debate became bogged down in displays of personal vendettas. I would however like to point out that both sides were to blame for the poor taste direction of the debate. Liability should rest with both sides of the issue, although I feel the attack on the Speaker was entirely unwarranted.

The resolution itself was poorly designed and attempted to conceal a future request for funds. When the executive realized that the resolution was running into stiff opposition, they proposed a hasty and ill-conceived amendment, the meaning of which not even the proponent could be sure of. The constitutional issue was also introduced into debate by a speaker in favour of the resolution.

One final word, however, I too was shocked at the jubilant emotion displayed by some council members, when the result of the vote was announced. Hopefully such immature displays could best be reserved for the winning touchdown when Toronto beats Queens.

sac members must reflect campus

Sir:

I feel that some answer is called for to your editorial of October 13. As you point out, the issue involved in the matter of the "draft-dodging" resolution is whether an elected representative should act on his own opinions or those of his constituents. The first of these alternatives which you support, is acceptable only if there has been a clear choice of alternative policies in the views of the various candidates, so that the representative is chosen for his views and thus given a mandate to act on them. This is not the case in SAC elections.

Working for SAC involves a great deal of time and effort. Few students are prepared to risk their education on which their entire future rests and which is their purpose in attending university, for the comparative minor returns of student politics. Anyone who does run must be a strong, and generally radical, activist by definition. Thus the voters have no real choice in the matter of programmes, and cannot choose their representatives on the basis of the views they hold. This means that the candidate is approved on the basis of his personal character, not on his opinions, and he has a duty to ascertain what the views of his constituents really are and to make sure his actions are really representative of them. If his "individuality" forbids this, he can abstain, but he should not present the views of his constituents as something that they are not.

This is particularly important considering the nature of SAC. It is the representative of the student body, and it works for all students, and its pronouncements are accepted as being representative of student opinion by society outside of the university. Thus all students bear the consequences of SAC's decision, irrespective of their personal views. SAC therefore has a responsibility to see that its policies really do represent a consensus of student opinion.

This consensus is likely to exist when SAC is dealing with matters that concern the students personally as students. This is a status that all people attending U. of T. have in common.

All of them are affected in the same way by these matters and in consequence they are likely to have well-defined views in common.

However in political affairs of a non-student nature the situation is different. The views of the student are likely to be determined, not by his status as a student, but by his background, personality and individual philosophy. These very greatly from student to student and the resulting diversity of opinions makes a consensus difficult to achieve.

It is a human trait for SAC members and The Varsity and everyone else to believe that their own views are right and to try to convert other people to them. No one doubts the good intentions of those who want SAC to take political stands. However they should not be condescending as President Faulkner was when he justified SAC's political actions on the ground that it would lead to moral improvement of the students. They should realize that it is possible for equally moral, sincere, well-intentioned people to hold different opinions, and that their own viewpoint is only one of many.

If they hold strong political views, they are free to form a campus organization to support those views just as the Conservatives, NDP and Liberals have. Members of SAC are fully entitled to try to convince others of their views.

However they should not in the official capacity proclaim their own morality and opinions those of the student body or means of approval in principle or financial aid if the student body is in fact not united on the issue. Only if a referendum or some other objective measure than the representative's personal opinions indicated that an overwhelming consensus of student opinion exists on a question should SAC make a statement of official student policy. Any other course of action is morally wrong and grossly unfair to the mass of the student body.

Tuktoyaktuk—a settlement on a spit of land jutting out into the Arctic Ocean. The end of the world.

Your seaplane is flying low over the tundra, and the lakes and flat rocks send up a dazzling glare from the reflected sun. You wonder who could possibly live in Tuktoyaktuk. The Arctic Ocean appears below the horizon, and your plane begins to descend.

Just before the plane settles into the water, you skim over the tiny settlement and over the tents occupied by Eskimos who hunt seal and polar bear in the winter.

You step on the ground and pinch yourself. Ocean, bright sun, and a cool wind. Those growling, half-starved animals tied to posts are huskies. Those antlers lying here and there on the ground were discarded by reindeer. The whole scene is too extravagant for you to really believe.

Tuktoyaktuk (called "Tuk" by the locals) consists of 400 Eskimos and 50 whites in a motley collection of dwellings. There are houses with walls of driftwood logs brought down the MacKenzie River by the spring floods. Then there are shacks, made of scrap lumber and canvas. Finally, there are tents used in summer by the Eskimos who leave the settlement in winter to hunt.

Smiling Eskimo Stereotype Misleading

On my visit to Tuk this summer, the settlement lost its air of unreality as I met and talked with local people. I soon discovered, however, that the popular stereotype of the Eskimo as a smiling, cheerful extrovert is misleadingly superficial.

For example, not wanting to impose, I declined an invitation for a meal with a large Eskimo family who had little to spare. My would-be hostess smiled and smiled; only much later did I learn that she had been bewildered and hurt by my refusal. In terms of her culture, my refusal had been unthinkable insulting.

I had meant well, but, in intercultural contacts as elsewhere, the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

Also living in Tuk, but in rather more elegant style than the Eskimos, are a small number of whites from "the South" (i.e.) what we imagine as all of Canada). One of these is a public school teacher, Don MacDonald, a 24 year-old former UBC student who lives in a cozy suburban bungalow with his Jamaican wife, Carmen.

Carmen is a tall, graceful girl with soft features and a gentle voice. Like the southern Canadians who have gone north and stayed, she has fallen in love with the North. "Life is free and easy here," she says. "There's no hustle and bustle, and the people are very natural—like in Jamaica."

Inuvik—"Model" Discrimination

Life may be free and easy in "Tuk" but it's difficult to say the same about Inuvik, which was our home base. Inuvik is the government's "model town" in the Mackenzie Delta. It is many times larger than Tuk, too large to enable everybody to know everybody else.

One side of town is white: here the federal government employees live in houses with water and sewage connections, and all the comforts of Don Mills. On the other side of town live the Eskimos, Indians, Métis, and a very few whites. This native side of town has more cabins and shacks than houses, and is not serviced with water and sewage pipes.

The official terminology for the two sides of town is "serviced" and "unserviced". It is ironic that the "servicing" really stands for more than sewage and water. For as one walks across town

The government's intentions are honorable. Again, the intentions. The government feels the need to attract civil servants because of the arctic permafrost be transported aboveground in the costs several hundred dollars a foot that the government builds its part of town.

The result is a serviced side and an unserviced side (basically native).

There is something wrong in the leads to the construction of a town might question the basic premises are not provided with utilidor services. Or, even if it is true, is it worth? As long as utilidors are not supplied the government will continue building.

It is perhaps unfortunate, but within a community tend to separate and socially from one another. Canadian government should plan separation becomes inevitable.

Fort Rae—Error

With this in mind, it was a mistake made at Inuvik is being ment is planning another "model town" called Fort Rae.

Fort Rae is a community of 100 arm of Great Slave Lake, hundred still in the Northwest Territories this summer, dwindles to 900 in winter, traplines.

The town is a public health menace and waste water run off into the resulting pollution of the water supply of bacterial dysentery every summer.

Five years ago a public health report looked around, and promptly sent Minister Diefenbaker. Fort Rae, he said, Canada. The government subsequently sewage treatment plants. The former Indians do not like the taste of chlorine convinced of the need for it. occult government logic, has been in town — both belonging to the Eskimos.

The government has now decided to present town, and construction has started. The government wants the Indians to

More Of This

This "model town" will be built for public health reasons. But the Indians on the water for their livelihood (fish) site is ideal, precisely because it is not more, they do not see the need for their present water supply is polluted, and they prefer its taste to that of the chlorinated water.

The Indians also object to the planned removal of their dogs to a nearby island. The reasons for the move are purely legitimate (safety and sanitation), but the Indians — as ever, unconsulted — have not been convinced of this.

For these reasons, the Dogribs are unlikely to move when the "model town" is opened. Those I talked to, from the 86-year-old chief to a 24-year-old mother of two, were unanimous in their intention to stay put.

One is left with the unmistakable impression that the federal government and its town planners are primarily interested in engineering, and are either oblivious of or indifferent to the social consequences of their engineering.

Doctors Disruptive, Too

This malady has affected doctors, too. Primarily interested in medical treatment, they have sometimes created social disruption in the North.

Consider their well-meaning fight against tuberculosis: Last December, almost the whole town stayed away when the TB X-ray survey was carried out in Fort Rae. TB is prevalent throughout the Territories, and patients are usually treated in Edmonton for periods of up to two years.

The Chief explained that the record low turnout was due to fear of having TB diagnosed. He felt that the dissolution of home life that occurred when the head of a family was sent to Edmonton with TB was a bigger problem than the disease itself.

One Fort Rae Indian, Vitello Thomas, explained it vividly. His wife went to Edmonton to be treated for TB, and he was left to care for the four children. His wife spent seven months under treatment, and he was unable to see her because of the distance and expense of the trip to Edmonton. "She could have died there," he said, "and I would never have seen her."

He explained that patients usually do not hear from their families while in Edmonton, for their families cannot write. They are often isolated culturally and linguistically. Men may return home, after one or two years, only to find that their dog-teams, boats, motors, and fish nets have been damaged or lost — in short, to find that they are economically helpless.

Good Intentions, But Harmful Results

This is just another example of how the best of intentions do as much harm as good. Hopefully, the disruptive evacuations of TB cases to Edmonton (and from the Eastern Arctic to Toronto) will stop and be replaced by TB treatment within the larger northern settlements.

The white man, in the form of the Canadian government, town planners, doctors etc., is not really trying to be malevolent. His actions are based on a noble premise: that despite their isolation and remoteness, the people of the North ought to be given the same opportunities for education, medical care and economic viability, that are available in the rest of Canada.

The white man, however, is trying to solve the physical problems of the North without adequate thought about the social consequences of his actions. Moreover, he rarely consults or actively involves the native population, and the resulting decisions, though well-meant, are often arbitrary and unacceptable to them.

Only when we make a sincere attempt to work with the native people, and to understand the problems in their own terms, will our programs be really effective.

UC plans festival on mass insanity

The sponsors of last February's University College psychotic festival, Perception 67, are making plans for a festival on mass insanity next January.

The UC literary and athletic society will probably call the festival Psychosis 68, Propaganda 68 or Society as Madness and Myth.

Literary director Bob Rae (III UC) said he hopes the festival will ask questions such as "what is the meaning of madness and non-conformity," "what is the meaning of violence in a seemingly civilized society," "how do myths of national innocence, of Canadian reasonableness, or whatever, develop."

Plans for the Jan. 26-29 weekend are still tentative. But Rae hopes the speakers will include prominent social critics, writers and intellectuals.

"We want to set up an experiment in controlled environment, perhaps consisting of a series of rooms, each concentrating on a different theme," says Rae.

Suggested feature entertainment includes a production of Brecht's Galileo and a Haight-Ashbury rock group, the Mothers of Invention.

Al Kamin (III UC), co-chairman of Perception '67, said the proposed theme was very relevant.

"Criticism of society as myth is at the root of the hippie movement," he said.

Students get vote on U of W faculty

WATERLOO (CUP)—Two students have been granted full voting membership on the engineering faculty at the University of Waterloo.

No other faculty has yet provided seats for students. Ontario NDP leader Donald Macdonald, electioneering on the campus, said the NDP is battling for at least one student on the board of governors of each Ontario university.

"The NDP believes fees should be eliminated completely," he said. An NDP government would set up a ministry of student housing and accommodation to deal with campus housing problems.

Report recommends beer on campuses

NEW YORK (Special) — Serving beer in college cafeterias would improve America's attitude toward alcohol, a government report said last week.

The report, Alcohol Problems—a Report to the Nation recommended that drinking be made a more gregarious social adventure.

Serving beer on college campuses, the report said, "might reduce the current practice of groups of students piling into a car, driving several miles to a bar, drinking substantial amounts of alcohol in settings that lack the desired social control, and then driving back to campus."

Drinking at social gatherings should be encouraged because women are present and usually have a restraining influence on men, the report said.

The report also said the legal drinking age should be 18 throughout the U.S.

The 224-page study was written by Thomas F. A. Plaut of the National Institute of Health, and published as a book by Oxford University Press.

UBC initiates college without exams

VANCOUVER (Special) — An experimental college scheme without examinations proposed four years ago by former University of British Columbia President John MacDonald has been implemented this year.

MacDonald's proposal, under wraps until now, failed because the Ford Foundation refused $1,500,000 needed for initial capital.

Forty students have been admitted into each of the four years of the undergraduate program. Free from examinations, any student admitted to the programs would get automatic credit for that year.

"We hope and expect to find a higher and more desirable level of motivation directed toward learning rather than merely passing examinations," Mr. MacDonald said in his letter to the foundation.

His now-implemented college should "teach students to read effectively and to write good prose easily, to cultivate competence in the French language and to develop in the student an appreciation for art, music, and the theatre," he said.

Other features of the program include: residence living for all students to serve as tutors, a staff-student ratio of one to 20, emphasis on tutorials, seminars and essays, few lectures, classes in French, a separate library, record collection and rotating art collection.

Ryerson SAC institutes "Indian Fund"

A motion instituting an "Indian fund" was passed last week by the Ryerson Students Administrative Council.

The bankroll of $7,000 will be allotted by SAC's centennial fund committee to give bursaries to Indian and Eskimos, support Indian-Eskimo publications, the Indian-Eskimo Association, the Canadian Indian Youth Council, and community programs.

Allen Redbird, 28, a Chipewyan Indian worker for the Company of Young Canadians is heading a five-man committee planning an Indian cultural center.

The committee's program aims to:

—establish a self-determining leadership core to serve the social, cultural and intellectual development of Toronto's Indian community;

—demonstrate the contemporary and traditional culture of the Indians of Canada and to accommodate cultural interchange;

—foster and display crafts and fine and performing arts programs;

—serve as a meeting place, interchanging and publishing information related to Indian advancement and well-being;

—provide the catalytic atmosphere for generating self-determined community action programs.

Once the centre is set up the Indians will be able to finance it themselves by the work it provides.

Youth Council vetoes Red Power vote

PORT ARTHUR (CUP) — The Canadian Indian Council Youth Council voted last week against a program of Red Power.

The young Indians voted to set up a Canadian Indian Institute, a centre of higher education for Canadian Indians modeled on Toronto's Rochdale College.

It was disclosed that the CIYC was in the red $6,800. But the Canadian Union of Students has donated $5,000, and Ryerson Polytechnical Institute added another $2,000. Both grants were in the form of Indian Scholarships.

New society would plan shows early

mittce system rather than recruiting volunteers at meetings.

Low furthered this last night by introducing a motion that the committees write reports for the general meetings of the Blue and White. The motion was passed unanimously.

Low said later that he would like to see the present society dissolved at the end of this term with the college councils electing new Blue and White representatives for January.

This would allow the new society to make plans for their fall entertainment early in the year and would give them plenty of time to book top artists, Low said.

Presently the society has no communication in the summer and has only one meeting between its election in March and exams.

"Thus the society only has one month to prepare for a mid-October production," Low said.

This is what happened with the off-and-on Otis Redding show. Because the society didn't have time to iron out contract technicalities, it was left without a feature performer for its Blues Festival.

Ezrin accused many Blue and White members of an apathetic attitude toward the society.

Sharon Kann (I Scar) a three-year veteran of the society, repeated the charge at last night's meeting.

The society is writing other university social clubs to find out how they have overcome their problems.

It also will form a committee to draft a written document outlining the aims and meaning of the Blue and White. This document will be available to all college councils who are questioning the society's relevance to themselves.

Low suggested that the society be made independent of SAC with revenue coming from a student levy of perhaps 25 cents.

He also suggested that Blue and White members be chosen by the society and not the college councils.

Low welcomed Ezrin's motion of censure because it would make people think about the Blue and White.

Irish post muddy 6-2 win

By JIM MORRISON

Revenge was sweet for the St. Michael's College Double Blue yesterday as they squeezed out a muddy 6-2 win over University College Redmen. After losing to Vic last week on a disputed touchdown, St. Mike's happily saw two UC touchdowns called back because of infractions, and hung on to record their win.

Defense accounted for St. Mike's only touchdown, as Julian Kiss scored off a blocked punt in the first half. The Redmen, who spent almost the entire second half in St. Mike's territory, came close to winning but were frustrated every time. After the two illegal scores, and a third down fumble on the one yard line, UC had to settle for a safety touch as their only points.

RUGGER

Seven-a-side rugger began Monday afternoon with two games. New College defaulted to Meds A, while Trinity A blanked PHE A 6-0. Top gun for Trinity was Al Partrish, who had all six of their points.

Yesterday afternoon, Law shut out Wycliffe 5-0. S. Goudge, with three points, and P. Stockdale, with two, led the lawyers.

SOCCER

Two shutouts marked interfac soccer competition on Friday the thirteenth. Vic I defeated PHE A and Trinity A topped SMC by identical scores of 1-0. Rich Senior potted Vic's only goal, and B. Nixon had the sole tally for Trinity.

Monday's action saw Sr. Engineering top Law 3-1. Kowalewski (2 goals) and Scia-vone (1 goal) were the Engineers' talent, while E. Feliker replied for Law.

The game between Forestry and Meds B was rescheduled when the referee failed to show up.

Yesterday, Vic II matched Architecture 2-2, and Trinity A tripped up PHE A 4-0. Heikki Thoen paced Vic's attack with two goals, while J. Lehto and B. Meddings had singles for the building squad. Scoring for Trinity were R. Walsh (2 goals), B. Nixon, and R. Smith.

LACROSSE

Friday action saw PHE nip Vic II 6-5. S. Blocki and Bob Fevov scored two apiece for the athletes, with singles going to G. Gibbs and J. Coutte. W. Murphy led the Victorians with two, while R. Woitzik, T. Clark and E. Reid had one each.

On Monday, Trinity hammered PHE D 5-2. John Houghton (2), Bob Unger, Ian Story, and Brian Murray tallied for Trins. G. Dowell and J. Embrey had the lone scores for Phys. Ed.

Soccer Blues rate among top twenty

By TONY TOE

The Varsity Soccer Blues are rated by their coach and players as one of the top twenty teams in Ontario. Their opinions are not based on undue optimism but on experience as no less than nine Blues have played in the Ontario National (semi-pro), Toronto and District, or Ontario Junior 'A' leagues.

Comparing the Varsity team with the Junior 'A' league, Jim Laverty, an all-star at left halfback, said: "The soccer in the junior league is of the artistic variety. However, the players lack conditioning and experience. Blues have better personnel but do not exhibit very good teamwork—probably because of the short two-month season."

When asked about the Toronto and District league, Alan Cragg declared that what he had to say about it was unprintable.

Ron Muir, the flying Scotsman, said: "I'll never play there again. A lot of clowns play in that league and dirty players abound."

It must be pointed out that these comments are restricted to the second and third divisions of the league.

According to Jim Lefkos, Bill Nepotiuk and Austris Liepa, Blues could finish about halfway in the standings in the semi-pro Ontario National League. The standard of play is definitely high in this league.

Most teams consist of five or six excellent players and fill most other positions. Players in general are more experienced than Blues but Varsity would benefit from the fact that all their players are of nearly the same caliber.

Injuries sting Varsity Blues

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

They played the Toronto victory song after the game, but a short stroll beneath the stands told a different story.

There was losing coach, John Metras, calmly sipping an effervescent beverage, looking for all the world, like the cat who'd just quaffed the canary. "We had them reel ing; with a few breaks we'd have won," smiled Metras, basking in the surprisingly strong showing of his underdog Mustangs. He dismissed his opponents, Varsity Blues, "They'll have to play a lot better if they're gonna beat Queen's."

Meanwhile, in the winner's dressing room, there wasn't a smile to be seen. Not only were the players upset at their letdown in the second half, but stretched out on a bench with his knee swathed in tape was quarterback Vic Alboini. Veteran trainer, Howie Ringham, had seen torn ligaments before. "He won't be back this year," said Howie softly.

Coach Ron Murphy worriedly made the rounds of injured ballplayers, asking them how they felt. It was a long trip as Blues suffered more injuries against Western than they had accumulated all season.

And injury mania couldn't have come at a worse time for Varsity. This Saturday they play their most crucial game of the year in Kingston against everybody's favourites, Queen's Golden Gaels.

So far the toll reads like this: Alboini—out for the season with torn ligaments, Wolfgang Gut — will probably miss Saturday's game because of a knee injury, Don Rogers — his shoulder has popped back in, and he's rarin to go, Ron Wakelin — doctors have given him the green light for Saturday, Brent Morris—still hobbling from an ankle injury, Nick DiGiuseppe—also has an ankle ailment, and Tom Reed—another ankle sufferer. Blues' dressing room was almost deserted last night as players crowded into the trainer's quarters for treatment.

With Alboini gone, much of the burden of success or failure passes to veteran quarterback, Bob Amer, who now takes over pivot duties. In the limited action he has seen so far this year, Amer has failed to move the club consistently.

However, as a seasoned ballplayer, with four year's experience at Carleton, he may very well rise to the occasion. Amer has a good arm, and with fullback Mike Raham back in the line-up for Saturday's game, he is assured of a good running game.

BLUENOTES: Pete Raham, who saw action against Western at defensive half, becomes Blues' back-up quarterback . . . Amer also played briefly in the defensive backfield . . . Murphy made a wise decision in resting Mike Raham for the Western game. Raham has recovered completely from a bothersome hip injury, and is now running at 100% says Murph.

Turkey of the week

Turkey of the week award goes to Western Mustang player Bruce Hough who threw a superb chip thirty yards behind his teammate Bill Hendershot, nullifying Hendershot's spectacular touchdown on a kickoff return. Hough claimed after the game, "I still don't know what happened." Western lost by a touchdown, 26-20.

U of M wins tennis for Second straight year

By JIM MORRISON

The Intercollegiate tennis finals at McMaster last Friday saw a clean sweep for the University of Montreal netters, as they beat the best in the West to take all three titles.

First to succumb to the Montreal onslaught were Western's Brian Flood and Bob Byrich. Flood lost 6-3, 6-4 to Yvon Leblanc, as the latter won the singles title. The combined efforts of Flood and Byrich were not enough to take the doubles title either, for they went down in three sets to Yvon and younger brother Michel Leblanc.

After taking both individual titles, U of M went on to beat the Varsity team 4-2 and take the Canadian Lawn Tennis Association Cup for the second straight year.

The sole Varsity victory in singles competition went to number two man Paul Kent, who exploited the volatile Michel Leblanc to win 6-3, 7-5.

Mike Zimmerman put up a tough fight before falling to Yvon Leblanc in three sets. Frank Blyth lost to Pierre Brunet in straight sets, and Rudy Knobloch was decidedly off last week's form in losing to Jacques Boileau, again in straight sets.

Blues' first doubles team of Blyth and Kent lost in straight sets to the brothers Leblanc, but Zimmerman and Knobloch saved face by taking Brunet and Jean Laver-

COLLEGE BOWL 1967

All is sweetness and light in the wake of Morris Regimbal's announcement, as CIAU chairman, that the SIFL is again excluded from College Bowl participation. On the surface.

Ivor Wynne, last year's CIAU bigwig, says benignly, "It is unfortunate, of course, that OQAA (Toronto, Western, Queen's and McGill) scheduling did not permit an SIFL team to play in the Bowl, but rumours to the effect that the OQAA is boycotting the game are completely untrue." Wynne also denies that the College Bowl is saying in effect, "Well, since you won't play it our way, you're outta luck, fellas." "It's only a matter of schedule difficulties," intones Ivor.

Al Lenard, Athletic Director at Queen's, nicely rhymes off, "Oh yes, Queen's definitely supports the principle of the College Bowl, as does every university across Canada. If our schedule had permitted, we would have been most happy to play in the Bowl." And so on.

But I smell a rat. After the extremely bitter acrimony that swept OQAA circles last year when the SIFL was snubbed, it is difficult to believe that everything has been smoothed over so quickly.

The main difference in reaction seems only that the OQAA has known since last April that they would not be involved. Thus there is no tremendous shock to overcome such as happened last year when the selection committee dropped its infamous bombshell by choosing Waterloo and St. Francis. This year, the OQAA was determined to make the all-important move, and drew up an SIFL schedule last- ing until Nov. 18. Since Queen's is not permitted to play after that date, there was no way the OQAA could participate in the Bowl, in effect returning the snub of the year before.

However, in March of 1967, along came a letter from the Bowl moguls, ensuring the SIFL a berth in the game against the Western college champions. No dice, returned the four-member OQAA, led by vocal Al Lenard:

"It was the unanimous decision of the OQAA football representatives that it is in the best interests of the players, general student bodies and staff, that the OQAA does not prolong the football season beyond the normal play-off date."

However, last year if you remember, when it appeared that Queen's might win the Yates Cup and a Bowl berth, this principle was waived by their university senate. Then, when the College Bowl decided not to accept Queen's late application in order to protect their own integrity, Queen's got all excited and now seem determined to leave the Bowl scene for good.

In the midst of all this, the University of Toronto nobly decided to reconsider its stern position concerning the Bowl because it feared adverse public reaction and a storm from the alumni if Toronto happened to win the Yates and did not compete for the Vanier Cup. U of T asked its fellow OQAA members to move the schedule ahead one week so that the College Bowl could be played on Nov. 18. But once again the path was blocked because of "schedule difficulties."

What this all means is that positions have become completely reversed in one year. Whereas before, the SIFL was clamoring to be included and the College Bowl said no, while now, the College Bowl implores SIFL participation, and are themselves flatly refused. Each year the Bowl committee has made an almost irreparable error, but it has tried gamely to learn from mistakes. So heavy criticism directed at the selection committee, which is sure to follow Regimbal's announcement, is both misdirected and smacks of sour grapes. If the blame rests on anyone, it rests on the prestigious shoulders of the OQAA. Perhaps there were "schedule difficulties" impossible to overcome, but the SIFL was definitely not snubbed. It was welcomed with open arms.

A hint at the bitterness felt by the OQAA toward the College Bowl committee, which puts on the show on behalf of charity, comes from U of T's Director of Athletics, Warren Stevens: "They have the colleges over the barrel. If we object to anything, everyone accuses us of being hard and unfeeling to the Save the Children Fund. These people aren't concerned with Canadian college football; all they want to do is make money for their favourite charity. They use our students, they use our stadium, and we get insulted."

There is a great deal of truth in what Stevens says. It is unfortunate that such a tremendous idea of holding an annual College Bowl has fallen into the hands of an organization outside the CIAU. Charities are not immune from ineptness and selfishness as has been shown for the past two years, both terrible fiascos. This year the OQAA is getting a bit of its own back after being maligned previously.

Anti-war marchers ready for International Mobilization

OTTAWA (CUP-staff) — This weekend promises to yield the biggest show of international solidarity against the Vietnam war in that conflict's short history.

Saturday, officially declared by anti-war groups around the world as International Day of Protest, will see marches in Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton, Vancouver and other Canadian centres; in every major city in Europe; in Australia; and in Japan where 3,000,000 protestors are expected.

The main target will be the Pentagon in Washington.

About 3,000 people are expected to congregate in Queen's Park tomorrow at 4:30 p.m. in a demonstration organized by the Ontario Mobilization Committee, which comprises student, labor and religious groups, part of the International Day of Protest Against the War in Vietnam.

The march has run into stiff police resistance. Metropolitan Toronto police chief James Mackey has invoked a police by-law originally intended to regulate parades, to curb the demonstration. The marchers plan to take to the sidewalks.

A student rally organized by the Student Association to End the War in Vietnam will be held at 3 p.m. at the flagpole in front of Hart House. Joe Young, of York University, president of the committee, will speak at the rally.

The student demonstrators will subsequently join the Queen's Park rally for the march to City Hall.

The U.S. mobilization is expecting up to 100,000 protesters—students, mothers, pacifists, intellectuals and veterans—to converge on Washington.

The program calls for marches from the Lincoln memorial and from the Washington monument to end at a rally in front of the Pentagon.

The crowd will be addressed by outspoken opponents of the war including Dr. Benjamin Spock and Toronto's Rabbi Abraham Feinberg. The protesters will then stage a sit-in at the Pentagon.

The object says Dave Dellinger, national chairman of the Mobilization Committee, is to "sit down inside the Pentagon and stop it from working." He says they are not likely to succeed, but the Pentagon workers will at least have to step over their bodies to get in.

Mobilization organizers have been working since May. The committee represents more than 100 peace groups in the United States.

Participation is expected to be heavy and varied. In contrast with previous demonstrations involving mainly students and left-wing groups, this march will parade such organizations as the Committee for Independent Political Action, a New York group which had previously shunned such protests; the Women Strike for Peace; and student delegations from 47 states.

Demonstrators are expected to flow in from all states and Canada. A thousand buses are expected to descend from New York alone. Students for Democratic Society are organizing a network of buses throughout the states for members who want to go Washington.

Buses will cross the border from Toronto, Montreal and the Maritimes.

She smiled and danced on the table and brought the top price of yesterday's Engineering SHARE auction. Unofficial totals lost night were $3,670, with the faculty, Victoria college and extension students leading the contribution list. But, "there is still a lot of uncounted money," said SHARE chairman Peter Kelk (III Trin).

Student senators elected at UBC

VANCOUVER (CUP) — Four students were added this week to the University of British Columbia's chief academic policy-making body.

Four new seats were opened up to students by the senate last spring. They were filled by student election Monday.

"Senate secrecy is over" said Ray Larsen, one of the winners.

All four senators are committed to a platform of ending senate secrecy.

"I'm inviting some students along for the first meeting next Wednesday" said Larsen. "And that will include the press."

Larsen said he was going to start holding talks with senators and try to get on a senate committee.

SAC debates permanent end of B & W

The Blue and White Society may be permanently abolished Nov. 1.

Joe Merber, university committee co-chairman, introduced the resolution at Wednesday's meeting of the Students' Administrative Council.

"The Blue and White lacks direction, lacks organization, and is constantly losing money," said John Morris (IV APSC), president of the engineering society.

He said the engineers and the University College literary and athletic society would be willing to undertake all the functions the Blue and White performs.

"The Society has never been as inexperienced as it is now," explained Blue and White Chairman Marty Low (I Law).

"The framework in which we are operating is too new," he added. "Foul-ups are bound to occur."

Merber's motion, which is in effect a constitutional amendment, will be debated at the next SAC meeting.

In the last month the Blue and White has lost more than $1,000 on the cancelled Hart House Dance and the abortive Otis Redding show.

On Monday the Blue and White was strongly criticized by both the SAC education commission and the UC Lit.

Engineers snap up $1129 worth of giggling slaves

By INGRID VABALIS

Mounds of panting, chanting, sex-hungry engineers packed the mechanical building yesterday afternoon.

All they wanted to do was help SHARE.

But never was charity served with such gusto — $1129.69 was the result of the auction of more than 30 females.

Perennial auctioneer Leo Siegel, a former Engineer, began the proceedings by calling for bids on empty slide rule cases, apples and nurses' lunches.

"That's to get them aroused," an aroused engineer confided.

Head slave-collector John Pullam organized a herd of giggling slaves out back. Some girls refused to go on with it when they saw the hundreds of Engineers waiting for them.

Others were taken to the scaffold, a demonstration counter in a Mechanical Building lecture hall, hoisted up and left to the chanting buyers.

The first girl wiggled out of her coat — I suppose you could call it sexy. The engineers roared and the chant began . . . "jump up and down."

So she did, in the interests of charity. "Turn around and touch your toes." She turned around but that's all — $30 for her.

Blondes do have more fun. A gorgeous platinum dish got the highest individual bid. Mechanical engineers shouted down their opponents with the grand bundle of $110.

An engineer was then put up — of the female variety. No disparagement to the girl but engineers don't bring a good price. — $5 for her.

"Take off the coat . . . clothes . . . Sex . . ." and then the lights went out.

A green-dressed redhead slunk across the stage — for $45

Then an event unique in auction history — five POTS slaves were lined up all at once. Back seat negotiations began for this bonanza. Said one gentleman engineer to another, "How much you got?" "Forty dollars," screeched a hoarse voice. Mergers of classes ensued and the electrical men got the five for $165.

It was the highest price of the day and the mob needed recuperation; Everyone stood and sang "Godiva."

Then, when the girls ran out, I was auctioned off.

By the grace of several dozen strong arms and against my protests, I was up on the platform facing a chanting, rolling ocean of engineers.

"Fifty-one dollars going once . . ."

That wasn't a worthy sum for the power of the press, even with two subway tokens and a transfer thrown in.

So I shouted "more" and I threw pens and rulers and pencils to indicate my displeasure.

That brought the price up along with the level of noise. I sold for $70 and, I guess have to go out with an industrial engineer. My date's name is to be picked out of a hat by his class.

Out back, Pete Ryan (II APSC) explained why he was handing out free SHARE computer-dating forms for the girls.

"I guess they figured the girls should have something for the trouble," he said. "They cost a dollar otherwise."

MacGregor paintings removed from HH

"It's damned ridiculous but what can you do?" Toronto artist John MacGregor sighed last night.

Four of MacGregor's paintings were removed Tuesday night from an exhibit in the Hart House Art Gallery by the House art committee before students could see the show.

House Warden E. A. Wilkinson, who speaks for the committee, said yesterday that no reason was given by the committee for the removal.

MacGregor's paintings are explicitly sexual and feature snake-like creatures straining out of open-ended beaths.

"I drive at the idea of sex," MacGregor said in an interview. "Sex is displayed in everything and I just draw the analogy closer than most artists would."

MacGregor denied his work is erotic. "I can see someone masturbating over Playboy but not over John MacGregor."

"Someone from the art committee explained there was a vague chance somebody might object and they might have to close the gallery. So they took the paintings out right off the bat.

"To be fair to them, they warned me that it's a public gallery. But I still don't understand why they took them down."

Avrom Isaacs, owner of the Isaacs Gallery, which has shown MacGregor's work, said the committee's actions would not destroy the exhibit.

"The show is of such a nature that if you remove four paintings you don't remove the mythological problem of eroticism."

Campus reps to administer Centre

The Campus Centre will be administered by representatives of all members of the campus community, the Students' Administrative Council decided Wednesday night.

Introducing the proposal for the Campus Centre board, SAC President Faulkner stressed that it was designed to "make sure that it is responsive to what goes on on campus and responsible to all who use it."

Representatives of students, faculty and administration will each have three votes on the Campus Centre board.

The board will handle final details of construction, establish procedures for administration and be responsible for maintenance.

Blood Drive publicity will start Oct. 25 and the clinics will open Oct. 30.

If you want to help with the campaign, please call either Carolyn Keystone, 783-4389, or Helen Shapinko 633-9742.

Hillel president defends fee policy

Hillel President Mark Freiman (III UC) has defended a policy requiring purchase of a $5 membership fee for attendance of Hillel Sunday night lectures.

A letter appeared Monday in The Varsity criticizing Hillel for this policy.

Freiman said Wednesday that the policy was designed to keep up Hillel membership and serve as an incentive to join.

"The lectures are primarily intended for members," he said. "However, we do let religious leaders, faculty members and press people attend free.

"We also admit those who are obviously very interested in only one lecture and could get nothing from Hillel by joining."

Freiman said the major speakers normally give an additional open seminar at no charge.

Anti-semitism has deep roots: Demson

By DONNI BOHNEN

Anti-semitism is deeply rooted in Christian thought, Professor David Demson of Emmanuel College said in a pre-Teach-In lecture Wednesday.

Prof. Demson said a negative Christian attitude toward the Jews is rooted in a "corruption of the New Testament by Christians."

In the New Testament, he explained, the coming of Christ is seen as the supplanting of an old sinful order with a new righteous order. Jesus is the Messiah of the new order, while both Christians and Jews as well as all other peoples participate in the old order of sin.

The tension originally existed as a kind of "family quarrel" between those who believed in Christ as the Messiah and those who did not, Prof. Demson said.

Official anti-semitism began with a corruption of the text of the New Testament which identified the Christians with Christ as participants in the new righteous order and the Jews as typifying the old evil reality.

By the fourth century sin in the form of deicide was blamed on the Jews.

Prof. Demson cited examples of persecution and genocide of Jews throughout the middle ages and Renaissance when the church officially sanctioned anti-semitism. The popular image of the Jew was that of the evil and cunning monster, the incarnation of sin.

Such theologians as St. Thomas Aquinas and Martin Luther advocated the removal of the civil and property rights of the Jews and contended that they should be kept in perpetual serfdom as befitting their "fallen status."

Prof. Demson contended that this tradition persists subconsciously in Christian thought today.

To corroborate his point he cited statistics from a Glockenstart survey which appears in Christian Belief in Anti-semitism.

According to this survey, which was taken in California, 80 per cent of Christians acknowledge negative feelings toward Jews. Sixty per cent of Protestants and 40 per cent of Catholics believe that Jews deserve the persecution they have received through the ages or are uncertain as to its justification.

North and South agree on Vietnam war

By KATHERINE BARCZA

A North Vietnamese and a South Vietnamese found themselves in total agreement about the Vietnam war Tuesday at a panel discussion night.

The topic was Religious Factors in the Vietnam War. However, both Huynh Khanh, a member of the staff at the University of Western Ontario, and Tran Van Dinh, former charge d'affaires of the South Vietnamese embassy in Washington, emphasized that the religious factor was relatively unimportant.

Mr. Dinh said American escalation of the war could only result in even greater unity among the people of Vietnam.

The two agreed that the war in Vietnam was a part of the enormous power struggle among the three imperialist nations of the world, the Soviet Union, Communist China, and the U.S.

Both accused the U.S. of committing an act of "unprecedented aggression" on Vietnamese soil.

Mr. Khanh said the names North Vietnam and South Vietnam, implying a geographical and social division, have been deliberately conceived and propagated "by those who would keep the nation divided and have us believe the North is invading the South."

Father John McGoey, the third member of the panel and director of the Scarborough Foreign Mission Society, said the Vietnam war was symptomatic of the general sickness assailing modern man.

"If human beings go on neglecting the spiritual element, God help us."

At the end of the debate, the chairman, Prof. Jonathan Mirsky of Dartmouth College, pointed out that the whole panel agreed, "this war is an affront to anyone religious or otherwise."

"No one in this room, has claimed that the war in Vietnam is being fought over the so-called 'right' issues."

Queen's council elects student as rector

KINGSTON (CUP)—The students council at Queens University took matters into their own hands Monday by electing a student as rector. George Carson, council president, was chosen interim rector.

The position has been vacant since Leonard Brockington died last year. He had been rector for 20 years.

The rector sits on the board of trustees as the student's representative. There has not been a student rector since the position was created in 1912.

Tuesday night the council executive voted to hold a referendum Nov. 1 to decide if the rectorship should be abolished and, if not, if the rector should be a full-time or part-time position.

Two students, Chuck Edwards and Kenneth Fisher, said in the campus newspaper, the Queens Journal, that the post was tokenistic.

The official election of a rector is planned for November. Senator Gratton O'Leary has been mentioned for the post and has said he will accept if elected.

SGS proposes seminars on teaching

Graduate students in history may receive seminars to help prepare them to be more effective teachers.

Harvey Dyck (SGS) has proposed that seminars be established for graduate history students on the subject, The Historian, The Society and the University.

Dyck's suggestion was discussed at a closed meeting of graduate students Thursday.

The purpose of the course would be "to give prospective history students a chance of an opportunity to read systematically into the subject and to reflect on the nature of their vocation." This is contained in a letter to graduates signed by Dick.

It is hoped that by informing the students on the topic some improvement in the "increasingly complex and tangled educational situations" may be achieved.

The letter concludes, "An added benefit ... would be ... to examine our own pedagogical assumption—something also to be sought after."

ITI ticket sales set new record

Teach-In ticket sales are running at a record pace off campus and at last year's rate on campus.

By early this week, one and a half times as many tickets were sold off the campus as went during the whole of last year's teach-in.

Best ticket sales have been recorded at ITI headquarters (50 per cent ahead of last year), Victoria College (15 per cent up) and Sidney Smith (20 per cent up).

Sales are reported to be a bit behind at other sites. Teach-In spokesmen said last night that students should buy tickets before attending the forum to avoid long lineups.

Students' tickets are selling for $2 and non-students' for $5.

the blue and white should be abolished

The time has come to decide the future of the Blue and White Society for once and for all.

In the last 12 months, the campus has missed out on two big-name concerts — the Mamas and Papas in Oct., 1966, and Otis Redding this month.

In Feb. 1967, the society lost $3,000 when they tried to hang feature entertainment billings on The Cyrkle, an uninspiring two-hit group, and The Brothers-In-Law, a bunch of off-duty policemen from Windsor.

Jan Duinker, finance commissioner for the Students Administrative Council, announced yesterday that the Blue and White has lost $1,200 already this year.

On their one potential money-maker this year, the Ferry Boat Dance, someone forgot the cups for mixed drinks at the bar. Consequently the venture broke even instead of chalking up an expected $400 profit.

Because of this series of administrative ineptitudes, the Blue and White Society should be abolished.

The concept of a Blue and White Society is out-of-date at the University of Toronto.

Girls no longer drool over the brawny, broad-shouldered football quarterback with visions of a diamond on the third finger of their left hands.

Guys wear U of T jackets so they can get student discounts in stores, get picked up when they are hitch-hiking and keep warm — not because they are proud of our fragmented school.

School spirit only rises to the surface at a football or hockey game when it is created by liquid spirits.

And yet the clean-cut Blue and White kids still perpetuate corny anachronisms like the winter carnival weekend and Homecoming.

U of T students who like rah-rah college capers are better off visiting Waterloo Lutheran or Western on appropriate weekends rather than attending the Blue and White events.

Joe Merber, university committee chairman, introduced a motion to abolish the Blue and White at last Wednesday's SAC meeting. Council will debate it Nov. 1.

The campus has little to lose if council supports this motion.

The two perceptibly important functions of the society — dances and big-name entertainment productions — can be easily absorbed into the activities of other campus organizations.

John Morris, president of the Engineering Society, said at Wednesday's meeting that his group puts on more profitable and more successful dances than the Blue and White.

It is very feasible that the engineers would do an excellent job of running the Blue and White's Hart House dances.

As cultural affairs commissioner D'arcy Martin (under whose jurisdiction the Blue and White falls, according to the SAC constitution) said after Wednesday's meeting:

"The engineers are sex-starved; they never see any girls in their classes. So naturally they love dances and work hard to make them successful."

If the Engineering Society found the burden of dances too great, perhaps the House Committee of Hart House could sponsor a few.

The House Committee puts on a few dances every year and has a sound financial record.

Last year in a one-shot big-name entertainment effort, the University College Lit brought the Fugs from New York to Convocation Hall.

In one hour the Fugs provided more entertainment for the campus than the Blue and White Society has in its efforts in the past year.

The UC Lit could take over the function of providing the campus with top-flight entertainment.

Other minor Blue and White functions like campus queen contests or the Homecoming parade, if the campus feels they are necessary, could be sponsored by the councils of the colleges and faculties through an ad hoc co-ordinating body set up by the SAC cultural affairs commission.

The Blue and White Society as it now exists is comprised of about 10 responsible, hard working people interested in co-ordinating campus activities, and several dozen non-involved, inefficient hangers-on.

The 10 responsible people could join the dance committee of the Engineering Society, the festival committee of the UC Lit and/or be appointed by SAC as a special committee for the sponsorship of big-name entertainment on campus.

The hangers-on should be thrown out of the extra-curricular arena because they are chiefly responsible for the sad position the Blue and White Society found itself in last Wednesday night.

high-school politics

Sir:

We are all familiar with the antics that accompany high school election campaigns — the posters of Peanuts and Charlie Brown vowing undying devotion to the candidate, the slogans stuck in washrooms, the skits and take-offs on teachers, and the general idiocy rampant in the halls.

As we grow older and wiser, and are moved from the realm of Student Council to Queen's Park, we expect politics to be conducted with more seriousness. One of the aims of SAC has been to aid in this broadening of our political scope.

Last Thursday four students plunged into Riverdale riding to bear a Conservative candidate fighting for his political life. Following SAC's recommendation, they came with serious intent to listen, to question, and to probe.

First they listened in disbelief to the canned nostalgia of a Barber Shop Quartet, then to the platitudes of the Conservative candidate, Ying Hope, and finally to the anecdotes and unrestrained endorsements of the ebullient and ubiquitous George Hees.

They questioned the relevance of the Second Annual Meeting of the Ladies' Association, who composed the greater part of the audience, and of the rendition of "Happy Birthday" to one of the prominent members.

Finally they had their chance to probe the stand of Ying Hope and the Conservatives on important issues — like air pollution and education. But they found themselves treated with formal courtesy and polite evasiveness by Ying Hope and with smooth condescension by George Hees.

Finally, jostled by the eager crowd of blue-haired ladies trying to touch George Hees, and disappointed and disillusioned, they left.

These students followed SAC's precepts with a sincere hope of becoming better informed on the issues and personalities of provincial politics, but found themselves back in high school.

miss limpus and the draft

Sir:

Regarding Miss Limpus' editorial in the Oct. 18 issue, the SAC debate was on aid to draft-dodgers, not only on "war, death, individual choice" etc. The draft-dodgers made their decision and should be prepared to follow the consequences. They are free here to work as many of us do to finance their education. I do not see how working one year to obtain enough money is any hardship.

Miss Limpus declared that a law that forces a man to kill "when the survival of his country is clearly not at stake" negates him as an individual. What is the worth of an individual who refuses to help a small country whose freedom is being threatened? Let us suppose that the Arabs had defeated Israel and gone on to destroy her. Would we have all sat back and watched because our country was not under direct attack?

Miss Limpus then goes on to declare that a society which believes in such a law and classes those who disobey as criminals is a society where freedom has lost all significance. Miss Limpus has only to look at her own editorial along with many of the Varsity articles to realize how great our freedom is here. We can dissent and do it loudly and openly. The fact that there are people who believe the draft-dodgers should support themselves is in no way an indication of suppression of freedom.

Laryssa Towstiak (III SMC)

Note: Editorials, unless specifically marked, are printed on Page Four. The article you refer to was on Page 5, which is reserved for outside comments, feature articles or letters.

more on limpus

Sir:

I feel some reply to Miss Laurel Limpus' outburst in the Varsity is required. Contrary to her impassioned italics, the question here is precisely whether or not the SAC has the moral right to make a decision on an issue where student rights are not immediately at stake. The justice of the American war is an American problem, the draftee's problem, and we have no more right to interfere in that problem than Americans have to interfere in Asia.

A vote against SAC-sponsored aid is not a vote against the draft-dodgers. Support for a movement that encourages young men to break their national laws belongs in voluntary groups, who can back up their actions with personal convictions, not a vague hope that their constituents support them.

Miss M. McConnell (II Vic.)

Levesque, DeGaulle and Elitism

By GRAHAM FRASER

Last weekend in Quebec City, an era ended. A brave, honest era that was exciting for all of us . . . though perhaps a little frightening for some of us. Rene Levesque is politically dead.

It was an exciting seven years, all right. Levesque — who died politically just as Fidel Castro confirmed Che Guevara's death — turned out to be comparable: a guerilla who carried on a one-man war on Quebec's political traditions: traditions of patronage, paternalism and two-faced rhetoric.

For there was one thing that stood out with Levesque, even in a cabinet that included men like Gerin-Lajoie, Laporte, and Kierans. Levesque spoke from the heart — and he said exactly the same thing in English that he said in French. In a country where political bilingualism is only gradually beginning to make inroads into our unilingual political doubletalk — and — double-talk, this fact may not have the impact that it might.

For Levesque was a people's politician. As a minister, he had fought for the nationalization of the myriad of small private electric companies into Quebec Hydro, and for increased family welfare; as a columnist after the Liberal defeat, he wrote, not for the prestigious intellectual Devoir, but for the tabloid weekly, Dimanche-Matin.

Some of the things that Rene Levesque revealed — and fought against — were not only the various manifestations of The English Spectre, but also the existence and nature of the French-Canadian elite, and its rising middle class — so closely tied with Quebec's archaic system of education.

The traditions of elitism run very deep in Quebec; deeper than most of us realize or can understand. The simile here — and it's only slightly exaggerated — would be if the only people in this country of any university education, influence or power (and, John Porter to the contrary, this is not the case) were from private schools like Upper Canada College or Ridley. Until very recently, the only way a French-Canadian could go to university was by way of Classical College, private, church-run colleges whose exclusiveness is based on the same terms as the exclusiveness of our private schools: money.

Until about 1960, there were two French-speaking universities in Quebec; there are now three. (In contrast, there are fourteen universities in Ontario, four in New Brunswick — and three English universities in Quebec.) In a province of seven million that is 80% French-speaking, the elitist condition becomes obvious.

It is an elitism which is as evident in student activism, the constitutional debate and the so-called revolutionary terrorism as it was in the power structure that Lord Durham observed dominated by local priests and lawyers. It is an elitism that we tend not to notice when we visit Quebec, as the power we understand is economic power. And that is obviously still English power. As a result, we tend to look at all French Canadian politicians as radicals, simply for being French-Canadian.

In fact, we find it difficult to understand that Quebec society is a French-Canadian society — with a political tradition, a literary history and a legal system that we neither know nor recognize, not to mention pop-singers, musicians, poets and chansonniers, films and television programs that we've neither seen nor heard of.

For someone like myself, who fully accepts the fact, dimension and psychological reality of the French-Canadian nation (though often without understanding it), the serious question now is not one of separatism but of liberation.

It was this question which General de Gaulle in fact posed with his famous cry on July 24th. I write as someone who stood on tip-toe in the six-deep crowds lining Sherbrooke Street, and felt an irrational sense of exaltation at his words — but the resultant dilemma is a very real one which has plagued French-Canadian activism since 1960. Does liberty (or liberation) mean independence? Does independence mean liberty?

Certainly, it was ironic that only a few months before Daniel Johnson endorsed De Gaulle's slogan, Yves Gabis, the provincial Secretary in Johnson's cabinet, was quoted as saying "Plus qu'il y a de la liberte, plus qu'il y a de la decadence." (The more you have liberty, the more decadence there is). One wonders what the Johnson government means by "Vive le Québec libre."

In fact, the dilemma of whether nationalism (or separation) is more or less important than social change is one that has plagued and crippled Quebec politics on every level. Pierre Bourgault's R.I.N. has recently purged its left-wing elements, and is moving towards union with the far-right group, Gilles Grogreire's Rassemblement Nationale. The formerly militant left-wing groups like the Mouvement de Liberation Populaire, Parti Pri and the Parti Socialiste du Quebec are in a state of disarray.

Perhaps the problem of a nation without a state makes the dilemma inevitable. Nonetheless, the tail-chasing frustration that cripples nationalist progressives in Quebec as Levesque's idealistic nationalism crippled him is painful to watch.

It is painful mainly because one feels that tremendous social energies are being diverted into a morass of legalism and constitutionalism which strikes most North Americans as an archaic exercise in pre-Cartesian hair-splitting.

For many of us, the Constitutional Debate is not the only area which seems less than relevant. The student left in Quebec is definitely Old Left: 1930's socialism. The marijuana-LSD scene is an English-speaking phenomenon only; French Canadian students have as little interest in turning on and dropping out as American Negroes. (Know many Negro hippies?) They want in, not out.

Which tends to produce a power-orientated left-wing (and non-left) political atmosphere . . . with none of the youth-mystique of the drop-out which is a part of our "scene." The last group of terrorists to be arrested had broken with the Mouvement de Liberation Populaire on an elitist issue: whether to work for a seizure of power, or to work in radicalizing at the community level as SUPA and SDS have tried to do. Pierre Vallieres and Charles Gagnon opted for violent seizure of power — a very elitist approach — reformed the FLO, and bombed a factory 18 months ago. They are now in jail awaiting trial; folk-heroes of the student left.

The problem remains that in many ways separatism itself is irrelevant to the liberation, or fundamental social change in Quebec. Conceivably (in fact, probably) separatism would result in the mere replacement of English middle-class economic control by French middle-class economic control in a nation crying for social change.

And yet — in many cases, Quebec has the chance, whether separate or not, to solve problems of social democracy which have been absorbed or bought off by affluence in the rest of the continent. They still have a chance. It often seems as if we've muffed ours.

French Canadian Music

By PETER GODDARD

Whether there is any political delineation between Quebec and the rest of the world, there is certainly a spiritual one. And the differences between the French and Americanized popular song are many and substantial. While the latter until quite recently was meant to be danced to, the former is meant to be listened to, preferably under concert conditions.

The French (for there is little difference whether the suffix, Canadian, is included) has for a long time been able to deal with complex and emotionally difficult subjects that require the close and literate attention of the listener, whereas the American has been forced to treat fairly superficially (vide: Strangers in the Night) the subject of romantic love.

The French writers and performers look at the subject more realistically, more humorously and on the whole more interestingly. Tout e couleur élatante fait parti de la vérité.

There is another difference between Gallic and American songs: the origin until the post-Beatle influx of most of the best songs of the latter type have been the Broadway musical. The songs are usually fragments taken from larger tapestries.

Because of the need to write songs that make sense in the context of a musical and can then go on to have a separate existence as romantic songs afterwards, many of them have a curious unspecific quality. Because the French song is meant to be a complete dramatic entity unto itself, it has, at its best, a satisfying quality lacking in the American counterparts.

The French song is bigger and longer. It isn't hemmed in by two minutes and thirty seconds limitation of the American recording industry. (This is the requirement that each of the records made in the USA and American-Canada, whether a single or a track on an album, be kept short in order that disc-jockeys can wedge it in among the plugging plethora of commercials on radio).

Finally there is another important difference between the two types of popular song. The French song is usually written by or for the person who performs it. Charles Trenet not only wrote his own material but was its most distinctive interpreter. Even these singers who have not been writers (Yves Montand and the late Edith Piaf) have worked closely with the composers and lyricists who did. Piaf always made a point of announcing the names of the writers of her songs before performing them.

But most of the best of the French and French Canadian singers write their own songs — Charles Aznavour, Adamo and Gilles Vigneault for examples.

French music is not generally popular in North America for it lacks a strongly flavoured emotional content, either moral and uplifting as in Beatles or Beethoven, or introvert and lowering as in Bob Dylan or Tchaikovsky. In general the musical public agrees with W. J. Turner who thought Debussy (Debussy!) a purveyor of "first-class bonbons and you can't live on bonbons all the time . . ."

To seek in French music, whether classical or popular, primarily for a revelation of the composer's or the performer's soul or for marks of the sublime is to look for something which the French consider a by-product.

This instinctive shying away from the obvious, the high sounding aims, no more betokens artistic cynicism or moral impotence than the refusal to make a display temperament and characteristics argues a lack of personality or character. The French composer-performer is consciously concerned with the two data which no-one can question — his intelligence and his senses.

This combination is the sound one can hear in the voices of Gilles Vigneault, Monique Leyrac (at times), Jacqueline Lemay, Claude Léveillée, Nicole Perrier or Sonia Malkine.

Their material ranges from sophisticated arrangements by Andre Gagnon, Gaston Rochon, and Alain Gorgauer, to simple guitar-accompanied solos. Mlle. Malkine singing of French songs of the provinces fits into the latter category. Her light, true voice and the imitancy of her style are perfectly adapted to the fragile beauty of these French Canadian songs.

Among the most appealing songs of her repertoire are the fifteenth century Celle qui m'a demandé: as soft, supple excerpt from the 700-year-old Le Jeu de Robin et Marion by trouvere Adam de la Halle; O, Magali, a delicate Provençal love song by Frédéric Mistral; a Breton war ballad, Le Vin gaulois, that has survived from the distinct pagan past. Her repertoire is comparable to that of Cantaloube's settings for Songs of the Auvergne.

Vigneault is French Canadian. His voice is thin and child-like in its halting, quavering quality; there is on his records some crooning that borders in the effects and some mannered interpretation that strikes a false note. Yet his songs have a dramatic structuring, a built-in emotionalism that allow M. Vigneault to indulge in the occasional voice-straining.

This style is on the opposite end of the French Canadian spectrum from Mlle. Malkine's. In between most of the other singers fit. The familiar smooth texture and stylistic flair are always present. They make their best effects in songs that call forth a simpler, more straightforward brand of singing. And always there is a shrewd blend and balance of color and texture, emoting and restraint, lyricism and jagged spoken interpolations.

Montreal Rock

By DON QUINLAN

If you're looking for a new out of sight rock movement capable of turning you on and blowing your mind, don't go to Montreal. It's stietly a non-bapping. A Montreal sound doesn't exist. Its a sleep-in where originality of any sorts is conspicuously absent and the fare ranges from tepid psychedelia to lukewarm soul.

With 550 clubs and niteries to groove in, Montreal makes up for what it lacks in originality with plenty of heady atmosphere and liquor. The city swings, but only because it has emulated all the happening sounds of Hashbury, Detroit, London, and even Toronto.

Discotheques rate as number one among the night spots and places such as La Mousse Spatheque, Le Bouquet, Le Vendome and La Place Pigalle groove every night until three a.m. Considerably more atmosphere is found in these spots than in most clubs on Yonge and Yorkville. Soul is "in" at most of the clubs and recorded Motown or Atlantic-Volt rhythm and blues is heard everywhere. Such imports as Sam and Dave, Ben E. King and Joe Tex appear at the Esquire, the soul center in town. La force des fleurs or "flower power" hasn't made any real impression musically, although most of the clubs exhibit much of the paraphenalia of psychedelia. Hippies exist as an unobtrusive element with little contribution to the rock-scene.

The groups in Montreal are astonishingly mediocre, even a lowly Toronto group would blow them off the stage. Les Classels, Les Houllaps, and Les Sinners, are popular groups, but their records are French versions of such songs as "Runaway" and "Don't Go Out Into the Rain". The Classels and Cesar et les Romans sing with a great deal of soul but it's straight from the Al Jolson-James Brown Bag. Many of the psychedelic groups such as the Electric Gap present their music sloppily and roar and reverberate aimlessly. Flashing lights, psychedelic calligraphy and blurring images abound but they seem strangely unrelated to the music being played in these clubs.

Imitation of incoming stimuli from other rock movements and centres is the Montreal scene. The city presents popular now sounds without the depth of creativity or intensity of feeling that created them. Montreal showcases all that is happening everywhere else without adding one iota of native creativity to the rock scene.

The Montreal Jazz Scene

By JACK McCaffrey

If you looked in the newspapers, you would find no evidence that there is any jazz to be heard in Montreal. In spite of this lack of promotion, a few places do present jazz, although on a rather uncertain basis.

For the past several months, the jazz underground has gained a foothold in Montreal at the Jazz Workshop.

This is part of a "psychedelic" night-club called The Barrel. Archie Shepp, Albert Ayler, Marion Brown, Freddie Hubbard, and Paul Bley — some of the best-known exponents of "new music" (or avant-garde or whatever you want to call it) — have played engagements at the club. Sonny Greenwich, a very interesting guitarist from Toronto, has also played at the Jazz Workshop for several months. Needless to say, we in Toronto don't get the chance to hear musicians like these.

The Workshop is generally open from midnight to 6 a.m. weekends only. In addition to this, the unbearably hot and stuffy atmosphere makes listening very difficult. Even the Varsity's sports editor (a dedicated listener to new music when he isn't busy skipping seminars) succumbed and fell asleep while listening to Albert Ayler (and if you have ever heard the frenzied sounds of these men, you will appreciate the magnitude of Mr. Mickleburg's feat.)

At the Black Bottom, you can eat chicken wings and rice while listening to Nelson Symonds, the resident guitarist whose music is compelling and original according to all accounts. And at the Jazztek, you can dance to hit parade music between acts by Lee Gagnon, whose quartet features Pierre Leduc, a very fine pianist.

For some time, however, there has been no place where you can hear established groups. But while Toronto gets to hear Dizzy Gillespie and Earl Hines, there is no opportunity to find out what is happening in the new music. It is uncertain how long Montreal will be able to support this activity, for jazz has never had a really strong hold on that city. But, at any rate, it should be exciting while it lasts.

Seen in Montreal

By AGLAYA MARTINS

Thief of Paris — Belmondo, Dubois, Malle superb. Bu-jold disappoints, she is so aware of her prettiness. The most subtle film on class conflict, realization of self, the turn of the century and freedom so basic you can't stand the pain—of the week. Watch for it coming soon and watch Belmondo act. He stops being himself.

Man the Provider — be freaked out as Americans burn surplus crops and the third world starves. Karsh's picture of Hillary who conquered Everest — watch his eyes and you'll know what it's like to be smashed.

The first room of the British Pavilion — if you were a nobody, they rubbed it in.

Montreal is a hell of a lot of fun, but it's also shallow and unoriginal. Easy liquor and women make one tolerant. The Montreal scene just isn't.

MacLennan's Montreal

By LARRY HAIVEN

Hugh MacLennan is a novelist who fills his works with a strange kind of lyricism, a gentleness which is lacking in many of the hard-hitting, brutal American novels today.

In his description of this country, in his development of characters, and in his treatment of even commonplace things, he shows a rare and unique sensitivity.

"Return of the Sphinx" is primarily a story about the conflicts between English and French Canadian today. But this is really only a setting into which five people are carefully placed.

Alan Ainslie is an English Canadian, Minister of the newly-formed portfolio of Cultural Affairs, a man "terrified that unless English Canada wakes up pretty soon, things will drift into Civil War". He is the novel's main character, honest, intelligent, well-meaning but at the mercy of forces which he wrongly believes he can change.

Ainslie is a character not new in MacLennan's novels. The man who, through suffering, is far from youth, and who is forced by a crisis to re-examine his soul turns up as George Stewart in "The Watch that Ends the Night". And as in "The Watch", one feature of "Return of the Sphinx" is that the author keeps his crisis building up until near the end. The novels close with the main character coming to terms, not with the specific problem or crisis, but with life itself.

LOST CHILD

By far the most interesting character, both in terms of story and in terms of a change in style for the author is Daniel. The son of Alan Ainslie and a French-Canadian mother, he is "du coté français". Daniel is an ardent separatist, a member of the impatient Quebec youth portrayed by MacLennan as impetuous, impressionable and very, very confused. MacLennan has tried to take away the sentimental covering which so befits his older character, and reveal Quebec youth today as it really is. But he has not succeeded fully.

Throughout the story, MacLennan's desire to describe Daniel detachedly clashes with his sympathetic view of Daniel as a lost child. The result is sometimes ludicrous, perhaps purposely so, and yet wholly ineffective. More than once Daniel slams the receiver down with his father on the other end. The story ends with Daniel careening down the highway with a car full of explosives. And after a night in bed with an older woman, he proudly thinks, "I think I know more now than my father ever knew".

Although MacLennan shows profound insight into Daniel's conflicts and treats them seriously enough, the very fact that he chooses somebody so confused and so impulsive to represent Quebec's youth, shows that the author is not fully aware of the power of the separatists today. They are much more sophisticated, less given to irrational acts and generally more sober and frightening. The author is behind the times, perhaps because the book was written two or three years ago, an eon of time considering how fast things are moving today.

This does not mean to imply that MacLennan has lost the heartbeat of Quebec. He knows, perhaps better than any other English Canadian, what is coming. "But the smoke of the cities changed it. Television changed it.

The new money changed it.... I'm not going to be like same, till I die all torn up inere from having a dozen kids.... With two or three kids any husband I take, him and me can live like les Anglais and les Américains we see on television.... Why can't we succeed as French Canadians and not as imitations of the English and Americans.... Work for the English boss all the time".

Quebec has changed from the days of MacLennan's "Two Solitudes" and wisely, even if disappointing to the reader, he ties up no strigs at the end. His view is best given by his own words in a recent article in "Tamarack Review". He writes, "The novel I am now completing in Montreal will reflect, I hope, that change (in Quebec, especially Montreal)... The old colonial attitudes are gone now and some a nationalistic politicians are seeing the present with the eyes of the past."

About politicians, MacLennan writes in another article, "In a country like Canada, it is surely obvious that the importance of politicians has been grossly exaggerated." In "Return of the Sphinx", MacLennan releases his cynicism and disillusionment of Canadian government. Of the Prime Minister, he says, "He was one of the many men who would have been perfect leaders if only they had never become leaders." When continually harassed without sympathy by members of other parties and his own about his son and his own views on Quebec, he repeats MacLennan's words. "We try to see the present with the eyes of the past. In this house we make it a ritual. We use outworn political techniques to deal with something so new it-it so terrifies us that we refuse to admit to ourselves that it exists".

IDEALIZER OF WOMAN

MacLennan's women constitute the factor that distinguishes him from other Canadian and American writers. They are the antithesis of the ruthless, blind, destructive world of man. They are all knowing for they alone know that "all loving is a loving of life in the midst of death". Hence the author treats them with great respect, even reverence.

Some may say that MacLennan is unrealistic and indeed he appears to be alone against a sea of American writers whose women are variations of Bellow's "Bitch Goddess". They seem to have a fear and hatred of women and it appears in their works. The men are confused because the women lead them by the nose; the poor men must hit back, subdue, conquer, render helpless to achieve satisfaction. To MacLennan, men are indeed helpless, not at the mercy of women but at the mercy of themselves and the world they have created. Only the woman can provide comfort because she is an island of serenity in a sea of turmoil.

All three love stories in "Return of the Sphinx" have this main theme; and perhaps the author is too sentimental in this respect. But this is his style, one which those who admire the author have come to respect and admire for its freshness and optimism amidst the general disillusionment of today's writers.

LYRICIST MCLENNAN

MacLennan has always been the master of description. With a lyric sensitivity he paints pictures in words of the country he loves. His characters are intimately bound up in the land. He can make original and unique comparisons without sounding pretentious. "The Australia-shaped cloud was now directly over their heads and a few heavy rain-drops fell out of it, making splashes on the pavement that looked like squashed starfish".

He can evoke a scene in the city he knows best, Montreal. "Haze of a summer twilight hot and heavy; remnants of a sunset smoldering behind Mt. Royal but the city purplish and unnaturally livid."

He can describe an automobile accident with a shocking violence that seems unlike him, only because to him violence is the part of life we do not understand, which we try to forget but with which we must live. This gift of description is his key claim to fame.

As a novel, "Return of the Sphinx" is not a failure. It is expertly written, always utterly truthful, always intelligent. It does not have the compactness and unity of "The Watch that Ends the Night"; MacLennan seems to have sacrificed some of his concern with character for the plot and its implications. Both suffer.

As a political novel, it is acute in its observation of Canadian government and Canadian spirit, but somewhat bazy and inaccurate in its treatment of immediate Canadian problems, especially Quebec. However, as a novelist, MacLennan cannot deal primarily with facts and situations. He is a writer passionately and sympathetically concerned with people. "Return of the Sphinx" is an attempt to reveal the conflict existing in Quebec today, of youth against experience, of temperance against radicalism and of love against violence and death. The book, as the author, is a valuable one and cannot be ignored.

And Our's

By BARBARA UTECK

Every English-Canadian faces a unique dilemma upon his arrival in Montreal: should he adapt to the French-Canadian fact, or ignore it? If he's going to adapt, he can't live in Westmount. (The only apartment I could find last summer was in that "forbidden city" and my French-Canadian friends never let me forget it.) And he's got to speak French—and speak it well.

Hugh Hood is an example of an English-Canadian who has successfully made the grade in French-Canada. In his book Around The Mountain ("Scenes from Montreal Life," Peter Martin Associates, $5.00). Hood reveals an intimate knowledge of his adopted city. It's not MacLennan's Montreal, that of Westmount, and The Gazette and a stereotyped "two solitudes," but Montreal 67—dynamic and expanding, bursting under the impact of Expo, Centennial and the Confederation Crisis.

Around The Mountain is a warm and glowing, and sentimental but not soupy series of scenes from Montreal life. In a fluid, yet richly detailed style, Hood captures the spice of Canada's most popular city: variety. In a series of twelve vignettes which follow in a cycle from one December to the next, Hood describes the weekly amateur hockey games at St. Vincent de Paul Sportive Centre, and the Grand Demenagement on April 30th. (All Montreal leases run out on April 30th., and as this is Hood's birthday, he goes on an annual birthday walk to watch the moving vans blocking the streets.)

Hood talks about Montreal's Jews and Gypsies and, of course, its Separatists rioting in Parc Lafontaine on Victoria Day. He is proud of both the old and the new in Montreal. His characters climb the mountain—but they ride the Metro as well.

What appealed to me most in Hugh Hood's stories is the delicate irony with which he handles his personal success in breaking down the barriers between our "two cultures." Hood is by birth and education a Torontonian. (In fact, he did his undergraduate work in English at St. Mike's). But he is also bilingual to the extent that he has "got a bank loan, gone to Confession and appeared on television in French." He teaches at l'Université de Montréal, and walks with familiarity through Montreal's East End—rue Saint-Denis and Papineau.

The most touching example of this irony peeps through the slightly melancholy story of "Bicultural Angela." Mary Angela Robinson who learned her French at Trinity College changes her name to 'Marie-Angé', she gets herself a job with CBC-Montreal and makes her home on Maplewood Avenue, a street which "is in effect the dormitory of l'Université de Montréal." When Marie-Angé is jilted by a would-be 'chansonnier' it becomes evident that she hasn't quite been able to transform herself into a 'canadienne'. Hood seems to kindly imply that you can't change your culture, you can only be open and sympathetic to another.

Hugh Hood does not ignore the slums beneath the Jacques Cartier bridge, the rows and rows of 'logements' in Montreal's east and traditionally French quarter or under stroboscopic lighting represent social stratification in an existential context: Nietzsche once pointed out that freedom becomes a voluntary prison when absolute values are rejected. In a satire on Michelangelo's painting of the creation of man, Adam is replaced by a proud, confident astronaut, touching the hand of a hazy creative force. Is this man being reborn through his electronic devices? Sweet, have run out: Expo can point the docks along the St. Lawrence. Nor does he neglect Montreal's sophisticated cine-clubs and political revolutionaries.

Hood achieves an artful balance between documentary objectivity and affectionate familiarity. For those who know Montreal, Around The Mountain will stimulate warm nostalgia; for those who don't, it is a splendid introduction.

out the need for a collective examination of conscience. It becomes painfully clear that answers lie only in a world outside the exhibition. So, the party will soon be over. Some will sober some drunk. And ...the world moves In apptency, on its metal ways Of time past and time future.

Quebec Soul on Film

By GRAHAM FRASER

Last year, after no Canadian films were awarded a Grand Prize at the Montreal Film Festival because "none reached the standard set by Canadian film in the past", film-maker-critic Jean-Pierre Lefebvre wrote that the next step would be to have no prize awarded because the films were too good. As he exultantly said this year, "I never believed it would almost happen a year later!"

It almost did. As it was, Lefebvre himself shared the Grand Prize for his film Il Faut Pas Mourir Pour Ca with Alan King's Warrendale.

Lefebvre claims that Canadian film is French-Canadian; he feels almost sorry for Canadian directors like Don Owen who make sudden successes in the United States. "This means that necessarily Canadian film become more American" he says. "I was in Toronto this summer and saw some of the Toronto Underground films. They're all just like the New York Underground! That made me very sad ... partly because I don't like the New York Underground, and partly because I think it's a shame to see Toronto following New York so closely."

Lefebvre himself isn't following anyone. He is often compared with Godard, certainly has Godard's flippancy and low budget — but in contrast with him, is slow and deliberate, never improvises, and rarely uses words the way Godard does.

His prize-winning film, Il Faut Pas Mourir Pour Ca has a deliberation and an underlying seriousness that in retrospect made me think more of Bergman's Persona than any other film I have seen, although the subject is very different.

Il Faut Pas Mourir (which will soon be distributed to English audiences by Film Canada) deals with an eccentric, delightful young man — who, in one day, has to come to grips with a large inheritance, the death of his Mother and the departure of a girl he loves. The young man, whose life-style is similar to the mad antics of Morgan, has to come to grips with himself in the context of sanity.

As Lefebvre admits, the film can be seen as a symbolic picture of the new Quebec: strange, eccentric and endearing, yet now forced to come to grips with serious problems.

This theme of confused youth is one that has been a theme in many of the most outstanding recent Quebec films. Claude Jutra's A Tout Prendre is the story of a young man who is not mature enough to handle the serious responsibilities of a love affair, and opts out when the girl becomes pregnant. Gilles Groulx's film Le Chat Dans le Sac studies the love affair of a young revolutionary leftist and his English girl friend.

Pierre Perrault, whose film Le Regne du Jour was also shown at this year's festival (and which won a prize at Cannes) has made a trilogy of films about life at Ile aux Coudres. The first, Pour La Suite du Monde (from which the photo above was taken), showed the old folk tradition of using sapling rods to build a trap to catch dolphins in the St. Lawrence; Le Regne du Jour follows Alexis and Marie Tremblay, a central and senior couple in the first film, as they voyage to France to the country of their ancestors.

Both films present a loving poetic vision of what people mean by French-Canadian Heritage. The wisdom, and the love that emerges from the films of these simple people and their traditions is deeply moving. In fact, one of the most emotional moments I've ever experienced in a theatre was when old, wise and beautiful Marie Tremblay stepped firmly onto the Expo Theatre stage to take a bow with Pierre Perrault.

Lefebvre and Perrault are both former writers (Perrault is a Governor-General's Prize-winning poet); they have both turned to film to express their vision of the French-Canadian heritage of dilemma and tradition. Lefebvre has taken a very different direction from cinema-verite; Perrault has used cinema-verite to go beyond the limits of mere documentary.

In films like these, French-Canadian film-makers are making striking and beautiful statements about French-Canadian life. However the films that are being produced are much more than mere statements. They are superb films.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL DEBATE

An Analysis By Bonnie Campbell

Over the past weeks the constitutional debate in Quebec has moved more rapidly and heatedly than ever before. It is quite distinguishable in tone and character from the discussions which preceded it.

Constitutional debates in Quebec earlier this century generally expressed a defensive attitude. They took the form of self-interrogation and electoral protest. The change came about with the realization several decades ago that traditional and rural Quebec, with its agriculturally-based economy was ill-prepared for the challenges of the twentieth century. Simultaneously, it was realized how ineffectual were the methods on which Quebec relied to ensure the historical French place in North America.

The French-Canadian who had always thought of himself as a member of a rather unique cultural minority suddenly became aware that he retained very little in common with his French-Canadian ancestors. Rather he had much in common with the inhabitants of Toronto and Denver, and the 220 million people who surrounded him and with whom he shared the same values and commercial products.

It was natural that this awakening to what the French-Canadian was becoming should lead to a reassessment of the structures within which he had to flourish or disappear. Translated into constitutional terms this reassessment changed the tone of the debate. After what may be called the renaissance of 1960, the concern for survival was re-directed by the quiet revolution to an attitude of dynamic affirmation.

The desire to see the place of the French culture guaranteed in North America has been expressed through demands for greater autonomy.

STATUS QUO?

The reaction of most of English Canada in the face of the constitutional debate has been to cling to the 'status quo' in the hope that the storm will pass. The events of the past summer have made it practically impossible not to give recognition which is long overdue to the debate over Quebec. However English Canada's attempt to understand recent developments has amounted to little more than classifying various proposals as separatist or anti-separatist.

Claude Ryan, in an editorial in Le Devoir, Oct. 13, 1967 points with regret to the fact that the Toronto Star was unable to distinguish between the Quebec Liberal party resolution and the report from the constitutional committee. Through gross oversimplification, this English newspaper could see little difference between the Gerin Lajoie report which rejects separatism and the proposal of M. Levesque. As Mr. Ryan points out, these statements indicate an extremely crude interpretation of the constitutional debate which has gone in in Quebec since the summer.

The English language press has not contributed to public understanding, but has been satisfied, in general, with presenting a highly simplified and sensationalist interpretation of events in French Canada.

Twentieth century technology in the field of radio and telecommunications has, as Mareel Masse, a Quebec Minister recently pointed out, had the effect of greatly unifying the world. As a member of the Quebec Department of Education, M. Masse is acutely aware of his province's reliance on modern means of exchange for linguistic and cultural reasons: "Quebec cannot remain isolated from the rest of the French-speaking world." On Oct. 9, 1967 in a simplistic and categorical way, the Globe and Mail reported M. Masse's speech under the suggestive heading, "Quebec urged to join world."

CLAUDE RYAN

At the risk of reiterating what has become obvious, it is perhaps worth mentioning certain premises which lie at the root of the constitutional debate. Much of the material that follows appeared in an article by Claude Ryan entitled "Quebec in the Canada of Tomorrow" in a supplement to Le Devoir, June 30, 1967.

The British North America Act has proven its worth by its survival over the last century; it has permitted Canada to enjoy a century of relative peace and considerable progress. However in order to be relevant, constitutions ought to be documents which the people may identify, which express their aspirations and engender spontaneous loyalty and respect. As far as the French Canadian population of Quebec is concerned the B.N.A. Act no longer fulfills these requirements. Moreover the constitution contains such weaknesses and ambiguities as to make it ineffectual. Revision is necessary for the following reasons:

1. Where it refers to the division of powers, the present text is ambiguous. It says nothing of activities which did not exist in 1867.

2. By its tone, the present text reflects the colonial period in which it was written. It is full of references to the British Empire and other entities which have no meaning today.

3. The present text contains no provision for constitutional amendment and no satisfactory mechanism for arbitrating constitutional disputes.

4. The present text does not lend itself to harmonizing English-Canadian nationalism, (which tends to polarize around a desire for a strong central government) with French-Canadian nationalism, which without wishing to be cut off from the rest of Canada, will at least in the near future, be more Quebec-oriented. The result is tension between the two 'isms' mixed with confrontations and never-ending quarrels over procedure and laws. All of this impedes action.

5. The fundamental intention of the text has remained ambiguous. Did the Fathers of Confederation wish to create a true association between two peoples who were considered equal at the outset? Or did they think of creating a "new nation" which would permit no more than the continuance, within a territory called Quebec, of certain religious, cultural and linguistic particularities. Neither the B.N.A. Act nor history holds the answer. The historian Creighton has flatly contradicted anyone who thinks that the problem has been resolved. The Anglo-Canadian history specialist on Confederation has rivals in Quebec who have reached similar conclusions to his but by very different routes.

NEW CONSTITUTION

These are matters which cannot be corrected by minor alterations. The document as a whole and the general inspiration of the text must form the basis of a new constitution.

Whatever the result of the constitutional debate, no one expects it to come without prolonged negotiation. A renewed Canadian system must be the product of vigorous and informed debate. Before considering certain principles and proposals which are central to discussion, it would be well to clarify one important point. If one sets aside for a moment the connotations which the phrase "special status" has now taken on, one must recognize that the term in itself does not entail anything that is really new. The germ of the idea exists in the B.N.A. Act not only in so far as Quebec is concerned but also as far as other provinces are concerned. One must recognize that special status does not imply privileges or special favour as one is too easily led to believe, but rather it entails realistic recognition of diversities which are so pronounced that they are incompatible with a system which aims at uniformity.

The following discussion of Ryan's proposals as to Quebec's place in a Canadian federal system may be classified as forming particular or special status. No attempt is made to do so for such terminology is quite secondary to any attempt to present proposals for eventual revision.

"In the preamble of a new constitution one would have to state clearly that Canadian political society is founded on the principle of cultural duality. If this duality is to become meaningful, special responsibility for the 'distinct society' will fall on the government of Quebec. Means must also be found to write into the constitutional text that major observation of the Duntou-Laurendeau Commission — that is, that there exists in Canada two 'distinct societies' one of which is mainly centered in Quebec. Cultural duality in Canada is a noble ideal worthy of the most generous efforts. However, if Quebec is not made the focal point of our second culture there is no chance of achieving this ideal. History has proven this amply."

WIDER LATITUDE

Without in any way altering the powers exercised by the federal government by virtue of Section 91, it would be well to add certain precise clauses which would give wider latitude to the powers Quebec already exercises. Social and cultural considerations call for the possibility of delegation of power in sectors such as the placement of labour, agricultural credit, detention, rehabilitation work for delinquents and police services.

Particularly in the field of social security, Quebec could offer its citizens a whole scheme of services which could differ appreciably from national schemes in the methods of implementation but would be of a standard equivalent to those available throughout the rest of Canada.

In other matters of a social or cultural nature not assigned exclusively to one or other levels of government in 1867 there must be the possibility of either national solutions of the right of Quebec to declare its prerogatives and, as a result, withdraw from federal programs in exchange for fiscal compensation. The following matters might be included:

- 1) housing;
- 2) loans and bursaries to students;
- 3) regional and urban development;
- 4) scientific research in the universities. These provisions would enable Quebec to take into account differences in the level of employment, education and economic development.

In sectors which have traditionally fallen within the jurisdiction of the federal government, certain legal interpretations have led to a rigidity which is inconsistent with the realities of 1967. The maintenance of the French culture in North America implies an interest in immigration policy. In the past the English-speaking provinces have seen their interests in the fields of immigration carried out by the federal government. Is it not natural that recent concern for the French language in Quebec should result in a share of immigration policy to the extent that an English province participates in selectivity as is the case of Ontario House in London?

COMMUNICATIONS

Mention has been made earlier of communications and broadcasting which are also fields which in 1967 cannot realistically be considered as exclusively federal.

In certain areas the British North America Act must frankly be altered. Substitutions must be made for articles which have become obsolete or ambiguous so that the new terms take Quebec's particular position into account. In this respect, here are some examples:

"1. Jurisdiction should be given to Quebec over matters such as marriage and divorce which are intimately connected with property and civil rights.

"2. The organization of the courts should be revised so as to encourage more uniform development of Civil Law and to give Quebec more clearly defined guarantees in matters of arbitration, particularly those concerning constitutional questions

"3. Quebec's right to have its own language policy should be more clearly established in the same way as exists in the other provinces. By this we do not mean to advocate unilingualism, a concept to which we do not personally subscribe. We will, however, use all our energy to protest against a constitution which entrusts French-language right to the other provinces, but shackles Quebec with English-language guarantees.

"4. In the present constitution, the central government possesses several very general powers, notably: taxation, the right to make laws for peace, order and good government in Canada, the power to act in the national interest and the residual power. To avoid the conflicts which have arisen in the past, a new constitution must define more rigidly the contents and the exact limits of these general powers. It should also be specified that Quebec has the power to disassociate itself without being penalized by

In our six month love affair with Expo, we have tended to look closely but not too deeply at Expo, and the still-real urban problems in Montreal. To get a less dazzled view of the panorama of Expo and Montreal, "The Review" asked three students to write their impressions. Georgina Steinsky, a fourth year student at St. Michael's College, is working at the Man and His Community Pavilion. David Ticol, a fourth year student at McGill, spent part of the summer working for the Expo Corporation, doing audio-visual studies. Arthur Leader, in third year at University College, recently returned from a Conference in Mont Gabriel on urban planning. —Ed.

EXPO AND MONTREAL

THE MYTH

By GEORGINA STEINSKY

"Hey friend, say friend come on over, come... see smiling faces," stamp, shake and sing out the vocalists in one of the many sets of lyrics that siren-like have tempted the world to the enchanted fairground in Montreal. The children of this earth have heeded the call: with eyes a-goggle and guidebooks ajar they have streamed on in unorganized processions to behold the wonders of Jean Drapeau's alter ego. Five and a half months and forty-five million visitors later, has Expo said anything worthwhile about la Terre des Hommes? Or, have the public relations men, like solicitous mothers, duped us with lollipops and ice cream at Canada's birthday party, so that we can forget life outside the entrance gates?

Goodies abound. You need only ride the Expo Express to la Ronde amusement area where gigantic toys like the Gyrotron whirl you a fantastic journey, or the artificially constructed Quebec habitant village and Fort Edmonton provide gaudy, giddy outlets from a tedious existence. In another sense, the national pavilions — which collectively take up the largest exhibit area — are also part of the superficial party atmosphere.

Most have put on their best clothes and are displaying them with varying degrees of finesse and imagination. If the latent violence of the movie soundtrack in the American pavilion is overlooked, the United States emerges as a country that is a great big ball of fun with dolls, hats, pop art, movie stars and space capsules coalescing into the unshattered dream of American innocence.

For Russia, machines are playthings, and if the layman gets tired of their incomprehensible technicalities, there are always Russian coloured televisions to distract him with cartoons.

And so the fun goes on, as each country bewitches and baffles with its cultural masterpieces, its industrial achievements, its plans for the future. This is not the place to talk of poverty, famine, ignorance, and international hostilities. At Expo statesmen make pledges of fraternity at national day ceremonies as white doves circle gracefully to the echoes of a 21-gun salute. Didn't L.B.J. say he was "glad to be here"? This is the cake of good hope. Take a bite.

However, there's subtler sugar in the air. It is inescapable. It is the essence of the fair's physical being and in some cases, perhaps, the creator of its values. Technology, the machine and its capabilities, dominate the society of Expo. Maybe they also dominate the world outside. Through images moving to a symphonic melody while being projected on multi-shaped screens Czechoslovakia has transformed the manufacture of automobiles, chairs, books, and other consumer goods into an art form. Machines and men are equated as creative beings in a masterful mosaic screen of the same country's pavilion. At times, science acquires a mystique that seductively satisfies and plays upon the weary mind. When lights twinkle in a heavenly manner and the hushed voice of the narrator recites the litany of the component parts, Man the Explorer's gigantic model of the human cell metamorphose biology from a rational, empirical discipline into a religious, mystical experience. Audio-visual syrup can provide a powerful coating for reality.

Yet, boisterous soires have their quiet intervals, when conversation is dulled and you're left wondering what it is all about before the next triviality is uttered. Expo too has its reflective moments for those who care to face them. The British, like the Czechs have sensed the dizzying effects of industrial advancement. But, Great Britain's three screen film masterpiece culminates in an A-bomb explosion. Will this be humanity's fate when with ever-faster frenzy we immerse ourselves in value-free progress? On large posters in one sector of Man the Producer, a colourful, healthy regulated environment is juxtaposed to a grey, starving, sick one. The questioning letters: MAN IN CONTROL? propose that our world can gain dimension coherence and meaning only if humans learn to cope with a machine-oriented civilization. The choice is left to the onlooker. The investigation of the twentieth century technological, scientific situation is all-pervasive in the theme pavilion Man in the Community. There, movement light and sound bombard the visitor's consciousness and entrap him in a microcosm of his own rapidly changing society. White statues in black cages

THE THE

By DAVID T

In the beginning Mayor Drapeau gathered together the waters of the mighty St. Lawrence and created Expo. And so it was that Man gave birth to his World, a new universe of pride and glory in human accomplishment, a mystification of the products of human intellect and industry, and an insecure questioning of human mastery over the environment, "Did it cost too much?"

The Labyrinth is supposedly one of the pinnacles and focuses of the Expo achievement. The Official Guide touts it as "an interpretation and a consummation of Expo's unique Theme program". Interesting, this, for in both method and meaning, the Labyrinth makes a statement which, despite the fancy machinery, is hopelessly archaic. As the commentator says at the beginning, "This is a Labyrinth in modern dress" — in fact, it is a dressed-up version of an outdated weltanschauung.

Labyrinth, as we all know, is based (more loosely than meets the eye) on the story of Theseus (Man) and the Minotaur (the monster within). The visitor is subjected to a wait of four hours followed by a 45-minute procession through three chambers. The first contains two large 70 mm. screens, one standing vertically on a wall, and the other lying like an Olympic pool on the floor. The second chamber consists of a sound and light show in which tiny coloured bulbs are infinitely reflected by mirrors. The third contains a five screen cross viewed from normal type seats.

The films in the first chamber present birth, youthful optimism, horror, and disillusion. A commentator peeps up the story occasionally with such meaningful commentary as "One day you are confronted by your mortality."

The story proceeds through the presentation of various images such as a rushing train, a baby, the Lovin' Spoonful, and an auto accident.

The light show in the second chamber is timed to music which sounds like a played out Sgt. Pepper. It begins with chirps and bow-wows and ends with a weak crescendo similar, in style only, to the mind explosion of A Day in the Life. This, one imagines, is supposed to produce a mystical vision of death.

In the third chamber, multiple images explore the relentless caravan of carrying on, poverty, and finally the descent into the primitive: the ritual crocodile hunt and introspective self-confrontation of a western lady washing her face before a mirror. Light breaks and we return to community and celebration around the world. Death ("Just when you think you have it all...") and old age reappear and the cycle begins anew. We know now that it is a cycle and as the film ends we all go down to the seashore to peace.

Technically, the Labyrinth is of surprisingly little interest when compared the British, Ontario, or even the CP-minco film exhibits. The first theatre a spectacular show relying almost entirely on the most elementary cinerama techniques. The horizontal bottom screen is a waste. Its interplay with the vertical screen is rare and unimaginative. When used, it seldom contributes to economy of statement. The only significant spectacle thrown out by the screen is that a tall man falls over an equally long shadow; but the point is almost missed.

The light show in the second chamber is quite uninspiring. The music is too delicate, the lighting too delicate. It is like a window inside a tinselly plastic Christmas tree. Compare it to the Xenakis symphony, the centrepiece of the French exhibition.

The third chamber is technically far more interesting than the first two, almost living up to its five-screen experiment. Visual juxtapositions and selective editing of fewer than all five screens are pretentious imaginatively and economically, though conservatively in comparison with the underpublicized three-screen masterpiece in the British pavilion.

The statement made by the Labyrinth is even more to be desired than its techniques. No one is seen in the agony of confronting the monster within: we witness an aggressive act (the killing of the crocodile), which in more an expression of frustration than self-awareness. As for the lady examining herself in the mirror, perhaps the ambiguity of what she may be thinking is part of the statement, the Labyrinth seeking to express a wealth of associations in one sweep of the celluloid; perhaps this is an excuse for not expressing self-confrontation in all its grueness and subtle detail. It seemed to me when the sunshine broke through that I had missed something (even after several rewinds).

But, most important, the Labyrinth is a non-religious statement which has little relevance to the modern world. It may be that man seeks an ideal Nirvana-peaks. It may be true that only after confronting himself can man truly face the world. But the big lie of Labyrinth is the confidence that life is a constant series of cycles, with beginnings, middles, and ends. It is the collapse of this complete view of the world which is the essence of the modern consciousness.

Significantly, all the scenes in the third chamber which express the sense of peace at the end of the cycle take place in rural, traditional societies. For the urban civilization, to live is not to be at peace with the world but to recognize that man is at war with a psychic monster made of clockwork.

Roman Kroiter, one of the creators of Labyrinth, has compared the aim of art to the aim of religion. Is the highest gift from the Theme Division to the people an arte?

THE URBAN REALITY

By ARTHUR LEADER

How is it that a city that is the site of Expo 67 and contains such architectural gems as Place Ville Marie and Place Bonaventure can fail so miserably in the creation of a pleasant urban environment?

Why is a civic government that could foresee and did prepare for many of the problems of a world's fair so paralysed at a time when the housing needs of its citizens are the most critical in Canada?

Why is it a civic government country's worst slums are located within fifteen minutes' walking distance from Expo?

Perhaps it is because some of the most creative minds in Quebec have devoted too much of their thoughts to the rather esoteric question of constitutionalism rather than the concrete and pressing needs of their people.

If the recent ICAP (Institut Canadien des Affaires Publiques) conference (the Quebec equivalent of the Couchiching Conference) is an example of the politician's or policy-maker's concept of the city, then it appears that Quebecers will have a long wait before the ideal city is even planned, let alone achieved.

At the conference, several facts became apparent and these were later borne out by my tour of some of the depressed areas of Montreal.

First, there is the desperate need of housing - of any quality - in the city of Montreal. Walking through the Pointe St-Charles district, you see row upon row of houses (some in good condition) boarded and marked in French, "expropriated." Some houses have remained this way for up to six months, while families seek charity shelters. Government remuneration for the lost homes is small. Too small for most in this working-class district to buy elsewhere without suffering a financial hardship.

In some instances, rows of houses have been demolished (to make way for a section of the Trans-Canada Highway) and the space left for two years or more.

This needlessly premature and often ill-considered wholesale destruction of half-blocks throughout the area must largely be attributed to poor planning on the part of civic officials.

For those that manage to survive demolition, there is the question of whether to remain amidst the rubble, the industrial wastes and the dirt of the area. The result of neglect over the years, the degeneration of the area doesn't concern Montreal officials, residents or visitors. It is just ignored.

Tenants are not encouraged to repair their dwellings, although some manage to do so.

Second, is the lack of coordination between the various levels of government, the experts and the people involved in any public or private project.

As Jacques Lee, an organizer for the citizens of La Petite Bourgoigne told me, "When the city decided to redevelop this area they began by expropriating the houses and then sent a vague, general pamphlet explaining what they were planning to do. We protested and they listened - for the first time."

When highway planners intended to build a highway through the city, they naturally chose the area where the land was the cheapest, without reference to the needs of the people (most of whom were poor) or the consequences of their actions.

At the conference, planners and psychologists readily admitted that they rarely consult one another in drawing up proposals for urban re-development.

With over three hundred municipalities in and around metropolitan Montreal, it is little wonder that not much is accomplished in the way of a unified approach to common urban planning. While the municipalities are the creatures of the provincial government, the Union Nationale government is firmly opposed "to interfering in any way with the legal autonomy of the municipalities." The words are those of Paul Dauzois Minister of Municipal Affairs and acting Premier for Quebec at the ICAP conference.

Third, the concept of planning is new to the Quebec political scene. Until the present, all development has been the result of private capital and initiative. That is why you can walk just a few short blocks from any major architectural landmark in downtown Montreal into a slum that will rival and surpass any in Toronto.

Montreal received its first taste of urban planning just one month ago when the Service d'Urbanisme presented comprehensive development plans for the city's growth to the year 2000 AD.

The aim of this $14 million projection was merely to demonstrate to the technocrats and people alike that planning was a meaningful and necessary step to a more complete city. According to Mr. Harry Lash, of the Service, Montreal lags behind other Canadian cities in its concept of planning and this plan if accepted in principle, is merely a first step towards the establishment of a more meaningful government involvement in urban growth.

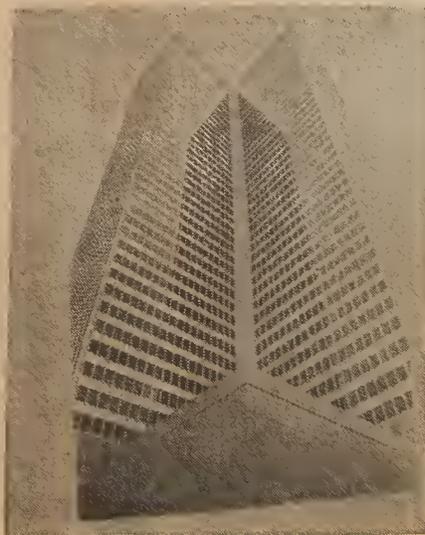

And grow Montreal will, at an alarming rate. If some balance is to be struck between physical needs and esthetic quality, long term urban planning will be a necessity.

Despite the lack of enthusiasm on the provincial government's part to get involved in urban affairs, it is slowly being drawn into the vortex by the demands of the poor and rich alike for a more humane approach to the urban environment.

Unlike their English counterparts in Toronto, the French planners and administrators have a flair for the tasteful in design. While Toronto's council debated for two hours and finally defeated a motion that would have replaced the city's garrish trash cans with more pleasant wooden ones, the Montreal council, realizing the design values of the wooden ones passed the motion in less than two minutes of discussion.

At present, Montreal, Trois Rivieres and Chicoutimi are wrestling unsuccessfully and only partially with their urban problems. When they finally decide to do something about them, the rest of Canada had better watch. Gauging from reaction at the ICAP conference, that time is not too far away.

Privelege: The Corporately-owned Soul

By ELIZABETH MARTIN

Is the nation in a pinch? Is the state on the verge of cracking up? How can the milk sop coalition government unify us, pacify us, vivify us? Steve Shorter, pop idol of millions, is the ultimate solution. Just imagine what he could do for L.B.J.'s campaign in Vietnam.

Peter Watkins, in his film Privelege, explores our almost mystic world of the fabricated image, and displays the frightening potentials of its power.

Steve Shorter, in fact a very ordinary young man, is worshipped with irrational fervour by both young and old alike. His appeal is based on an elaborately staged act, which is calculated to release the pent-up emotions of youth, caused by the strains of living in the modern world. The sadistic brutality with which Steve is treated in the act, causes the audience to respond frantically to his pleas for freedom. The catharsis that is produced is given full support by the government, in hopes that the process will keep the youth "off the streets and out of politics." The appeal of this sort of act is not hard to grasp, because it is not really foreign to us. There is a definite connection between the happenings, staged today, that emphasize the emotional responses from the audience. What about the pianos, cars, etc. that are destroyed, and the groups that climax their performances by smashing their instruments?

However, the government soon realizes the vast potential of power that the idol controls. The "Steven Shorter Enterprises" in alliance with the government, first employs this power to save the country from economic disaster caused by an over abundant crop of apples. Every man, woman and child is urged by Steve on the tely to eat six apples a day. (Was F.D.R.'s New Deal really necessary?) After readjusting the economy, Steve is called upon to save the Church from extinction, turn the British youth from their wayward paths, and unite the country against the insidious forces of communism.

But how does one man control such unquestioning loyalty? It is not the man but the image. This "gilt edged investment" has been carefully molded to perfection, polished and packaged with the same calculation that goes into any marketable product. He is corporately owned body and soul by stockholders and completely controlled by the Board of Directors. In order to serve the interests of the state, his image must undergo a vast transformation. As the image repents and slips into a mindless docility, so it is hoped, will the adoring masses. The huge rally which follows makes a Billy Graham extrazaganza look like a hucksters sideshow at a country fair. "We Will Conform!" the masses chant as fire works explode and Steve bows repentent before a huge neon cross. The Liberal myth dies.

There apparently is only one person left in the world, besides Steve who is aware of the enormity of the situation. Vanessa, played by Jean Shrimpton, has been commissioned by the state to paint Steve's portrait. She is the only one who seems to see him as something more than an image. It is through her that he finds the strength to destroy the fantastic hoax he is a part of.

It is possible to criticize the two leads for not projecting strong characters. Where is our sensitive young man tortured by the enormity of his role? Where is the sensuous, vibrant woman who suffers with him? Watkins has a definite purpose in portraying these two characters in such a low key. He emphasizes the power of the "corporate - symbol" world by making Steve and Vanessa little more than zombies. Steve is so perfectly molded that there is very little left in him to rebel. They are in fact very close to being non-people. The fact that the roles do not appear to be "acted," helps to build a frightening sense of realism.

Was this just another good movie that you can walk out of and forget? Or maybe you saw it on the eleven o'clock news last night. Watkins skilful use of the documentary style creates this impression of immediacy or spontaneity. Borrowing the technique from the French cinema verité, most of the shooting is done with the hand held camera. Because of this, we get the impression that the director is not totally in control of each movement, that the events have not been planned out or staged. It could easily be a newsreel. The quickly paced cuts from action scenes to candid interviews, also helps create the realism of the television documentary.

You may leave the theatre with the feeling that you have been hit over the head with Watkins sledge hammer. Are his central points driven home too enthusiastically? But then, is it possible to overstate the grotesqueness of extreme nationalism, and the frightening vision of complete state control? Can or should the effects of the state upon the individual, whom it regards merely as one of its propaganda tools be underplayed? I found the film excellent in its presentation of these moral questions. But, of course, it's up to the individual taste, and judgement, at least for a little while.

De Broca Charm

BY STEPHEN KATZ

The King of Hearts is a zany fantasy, and probably Philippe de Broca's best film to date. Although he uses many of the same comic devices found in his earlier films (That Man From Rio and Five Day Lover), he has given us a somewhat more substantial film in which the comedy is no longer merely an end in itself. It concerns the adventure of a Scottish private (Alan Bates) who is sent to disconnect a bomb planted in a deserted French Village by a squadron of Germans retreating before the allies at the end of the First World War. Bates is spotted by Germans as he enters the town, and forced to hide in a lunatic asylum where the inmates assume he is their long-missing king.

Before long Bates finds himself in the embarrassing position of ruler in a village inhabited by lunatics, who have left their asylum to take the roles of the absent villagers. They have not heard of the war at all, but have a carefree, joyous society based on moderate chaos and child-like idealism. There are many scenes of delight and unrestrained idiocy, such as Bates' arrival at his coronation, clutching a melon in place of an orb, and drawn in a cart by a white camel crowned with ostrich plumes; the Germans pursued by their own tanks in the hands of the villagers; the mock-bishop romping about the deserted cathedral in his ceremonial robes.

Yet beneath the riotous fun there are far more serious tones, and we are never allowed to forget the impending destruction of the never-never society. Despite Bates' warnings that the village may blow sky-high at any moment, the inhabitants refuse to leave. "There is a wall between us and the world outside," they explain when Bates tries to lead them to safety. Of course it is only a matter of time before Bates comes to realize that they are the only sane people in the world, and decides to stay with them, even if it means destruction.

De Broca is saying nothing very new in this film, but he brings to a well-known and well-worn theme, a wonderful freshness of approach. Lunacy and asylums have been popular ever since Caligari was first screened, and are found today in works such as Marat/Sade and The Physicists. One has only to look to Bergman's Persona, Genet's The Balcony, and the plays of Pinter, to find people unable to differentiate between roles they are playing and reality. Yet in the King of Hearts, de Broca treats these themes, not with the grim horror we have come to expect, but with a whimsical detachment. "In order to love the world," the mad bishop explains, "one must remove oneself from it." The lunatics, if they do not know what life is about, certainly know what it should be about. They are happy in their madness, and even a little proud of it. When, in outburst of temper, Bates screams that the day before they were all in a nuthouse, they reply cuttingly: "Yesterday, you were with the 'others'."

The acting is first rate, and the roles of the lunatics (too numerous to mention) are handled with great style and an exaggerated manner that often borders on caricature. In contrast to this, Genevieve Bujold (a Quebec actress whom we have now lost to France) manages to stand out in her role as the tightrope-walker engaged to Bates, by carefully underplaying. As for Alan Bates himself, he is given a rough time by the other actors who have numerous opportunities to act rings around him. When he yields to the temptation of vying with them, he is at his weakest. His scenes of restraint are much better although he rarely seems at his ease. This is probably because he is working under the strain of a foreign language (French) and a bad Scottish accent.

This is a picture that uses charm rather than assault to make its point. Visually it is superb, filled with colour, movement and absurd tableaux set against the background of a crumbling French town, with narrow cobbled streets and implausible Gothic Architecture.

Number Ten Downing Street

BY DAVID ALLEN

"Nothing that goes on at "Number Ten" is what they thought when they came here". That is one of the early statements of the Prime Minister's Private Secretary and it holds true.

The play, originally a novel of William Clark, adapted by Ronald Millar of "Robert and Elizabeth" fame, has travelled 3,000 miles to take part in British Week in Toronto "Downing Street", after a two week stay at the O'Keefe, returns to the Provinces in England for a month before opening in London's West End.

The strength of the play lies more in the players than the script. The place is Number Ten sometime after the next general election. Zimbabwe, one of the Crown Colonies, has decided to nationalize its copper mines with, the British fear, the help of the Communist Chinese. Zimbabwe wants independence, but needs help to achieve it; she looks to the Chinese because they do not feel superior — they too are coloured.

England, wishing to regain "her place in the world", must choose between the use of brute force or a United Nations' settlement. Unfortunately, the squabbling of the Defence and Foreign Secretaries, played by Michael Denison and John Gregson respectively, never created the extreme tension I would expect in such a catastrophic situation. The fault, I feel, is in the writing. Several characters, such as the American Ambassador and one of the three private secretaries, could be cut with no effect on the plot.

But it's not all bad. I could quote numerous lines that leave one almost rolling with laughter. To this add an accomplished set of actors, namely Alastair Sim who underplays the Prime Minister with admirable subtlety, Dulcie Gray, his wife (she claims: "The mess the world is in is not my husband's fault, but the Americans'") and Tom Chatto, the Chancellor of the Exchequer who would rather remain at a meeting than go home to his wife.

The direction is well handled by David Sease, and his use of two television sets which actually work on stage for all to see is intriguing, yet gimmicky. The sets, including the false proscenium which makes everything more intimate, are superb.

'Only the British' can create such a wonderful evening of theatre. The show plays until October 28 and I recommend it to all.

Underground Film

BY CARL LAUPPE

This Saturday evening at 11:30 Cinecity will inaugurate a weekly showing of underground films. The first programme includes seven offerings, the shortest lasting three minutes, the longest twenty-eight.

The best film of the evening is the long one, An Early Clue to the New Direction, by Andrew Meyer; it is also, curiously, the least avant-garde of all the films shown. Mr. Meyer explores the bizarre relationship that develops between a young girl and an old man brought together by a mutual interest in an attractive but elusive ne'er-do-well. Mr. Meyer has some success in turning the usually comic January-May situation into a delicate examination of a revealing encounter.

However, this and all the films of the evening have problems too serious to be overlooked. They are all too long, even the shortest. Most of them take themselves with an adolescent seriousness that becomes embarrassing. Most of them are far too static for a medium that is predicated on pictures that move: rarely do they consider motion in space, much less in time, as a fundamental artistic and intellectual concern. Mr. Meyer, for example, finds it necessary to use the written word to inform us of the passage of time in An Early Clue, when, in fact, time is precisely the issue he has been trying to probe in more cinematographic ways.

The other six films are all directed by Robert Nelson. They vary greatly in quality, from the witty Oh Dem Watermelons to the vacuous and annoying The Awful Backlash. All of Mr. Nelson's films, with one exception, tend to be extended metaphors and conceits. The exception, Plastic Haircut, falls far short of its promise to investigate a whimsical neo-Euclidian universe with any basic understanding of shape.

For the most part, Mr. Nelson's metaphors are failures. Brute aptness and significant movement alone save Watermelons from this fate. The director seems unaware that metaphor without context is cliché — even the first time through —, that interest wanes to boredom in the face of sententiousness, and — most important of all — that art is basically not mystical. His glimpses of humour disappoint severely because they never become affixed to anything that is tangibly human enough to lend them real substance.

The horror of the evening is The Awful Backlash, fifteen tortured minutes of random, incoherent muttering as counterpoint to the straightening-out of a hopelessly snarled fishing-reel.

Mr. Nelson could well take to heart Alexander's solution to this very problem: the swift, unhesitation application of a judicious knife.

Yet certainly art does not have to be great — or even good, for that matter — to be worthy of interest. The evening may not edify you at all, or it may do so only slightly and sporadically. But you should not avoid these films on that account alone; the time you spend seeing them and thinking about them will not be wasted.

Letter to the Editor

Dear Sir:

Some remarks on The Story of O, and its review in last week's Varsity:

The reviewer speaks of the "relationships" between O and the men who use her. I call attention to the vacuity of these relationships, devoid by decree of friendship, intimacy — even of joy. It is not merely the individuals, but sex itself which is debased in this strange and unreal tale: torn from its context, far from being celebrated, sex is subordinated to every other aspect of existence.

And then—the men. In a book where everyone is faceless, it is perhaps easy to overlook circumstantially-depicted unhappiness. But these men are going out of their minds in the effort to possess women (we focus on O), and they just can't make it. O is already Rene's. But he abducts her, symbolically enslaves her. There is a ring. He then finds that the fullest enjoyment of his possession is to be had by making a gift of O to Sir Stephen. Sir Stephen uses O, but is unsure of her. His abuses are tests. He has to crush her tiny rebellion, to make her masturbate for his voyeuristic delight. The real is not good enough—he must have more symbolism, so he has her put in chains. But apparently this does not convince him that she is his; so follows the public display described in the review.

In this book, the people are flat, but they are frustrated. (We are even allowed to see O searching through her burnt out sexual forest for a tiny blossom of love.) O is perhaps the closest to fulfillment of any "character" in the book, because she gives herself, while the men do not.

The book seems to me a technical triumph in its deadpan use of mere pebbles of petty eroticism to build so grim a dungeon for the human heart.

You Can't Take It With You, Charlie Brown

BY ALAN GORDON

For the few among us who feel that art is not necessarily the vision of Fay and Warren being pumped to death in slow motion by a torrent of bullets, and who feel that perhaps pacifist messages could be best described peacefully, there are two, count 'em, TWO productions that opened this week to suit our tastes. You're A Good Man, Charlie Brown, the Peanuts Musical opened at the Playhouse and You Can't Take It With You, the Kaufman-Hart classic will be at the Royal Alexandra this weekend and all next week. The Charlie Brown producers are hoping for a run of two years.

Both shows are songs of Innocence. Charlie Brown's is of an innocence betrayed, Kaufman-Hart's is of an innocence found and maintained.

We have all seen the Peanuts conception of Charles Schulz, either in the papers, in those cloying "Happiness is..." books, sweatshirts, records, hats, pencil cases and the list goes on. There has even been mentioned at one time, the possibility of marketing a Lucy training bra. The Peanuts idea has been Davy Crocketted to almost an inch within its life, and the show, You're A Good Man, Charlie Brown could be re-titled, You're A Rich Man, Charlie Schultz.

I couldn't help feeling that I was part of the Huge Charlie Brown Factory when I was watching this short, rather over-priced package.

All the familiar kids were there. This time they sang a little, and, with the clever use of the celeste-organ and vibraharp, the right tone of wistful nostalgia was struck. But when I say familiar, I mean familiar. The lines are directly from the multi-printed peanuts books, and as a result, the show had no real artistic life of its own. It was a live reprint, so to speak.

This is not to say that it isn't enjoyable. Schulz is a genius, there's no question of that. Whether he is the theologian, sociologist that others claim he is, is irrelevant. He, and his characters, both in print and, secondarily, on stage, are warm and funny.

One could sit back and say that Bonny Enten wasn't really the Lucy, and that Don Potter was a perfect Snoopy (His suppetime jug-band song is terrific) but you'd be quibbling. The perfect Lucy is on paper, and charming as this show is, I can't help feeling that she belongs there.

The A.P.A. is indulging in another type of nostalgia at the Royal Alec. Intermissions are filled with '30's arrangements of Sunny Side of the Street and We'll Meet Again as apt hypens to the three acts of You Can't Take It With You.

The play is a classic, filled with a kind of warmth and optimism that provide a welcome relief from the doom and gloom and kill that modern writers feel is necessary to comment on man's condition.

Relief is, I think the right word. The play is blatantly escapist. All complications and worldly problems are best forgot in the World of the Sycamores, the leader of which, Martin Vanderhof went up the elevator to his office thirty-five years ago... collected his things, and went down the elevator, never to return to work. Now he has time for what he calls "havin' fun". Fun may be persuading a doctor to be a policeman, raising snakes in the dining room, or going to jail for the night. Martin Vanderhof is, in 1936, one of the first of the flower people.

The eccentricity of the Vanderhof-Sycamore clan is de-emphasized in Ellis Rabb's production. Every character makes sense and, when squares, people from the other world, enter the living room (brilliantly designed by James Potts) they are at first bewildered; then if they can last that long, transformed.

As people from the other world, we too are transformed from the neurotic, anxious existential beasts that we usually are to people who find nothing wrong with Donald Moffat's Tevye-like conversations with God that masquerade as grace before meals, and that find little unusual with a grown man playing with a Meccano set, or a writer writing because a typewriter was delivered by mistake.

This play is whimsy, but whimsy of the highest order — as demanding on the players as any comedy of manners or deep, convoluted Ibsenesque study. And the players are brilliant, from Donald Moffat's daring Martin Vanderhof, through Nat Simmons Step 'n fetchit cartoon of Donald, the Negro non-worker, even into Claribel Baird's Chekavian Grand Duchess who now works as a waitress in Child's.

The production is superb, the play a splendid exercise in whimsy and gentle charm. The evening is a total success.

Eccentricities: A Damp Diversion

BY DAVID PAPE

The Eccentricities of a Nightingale struck me as a rather weak name for a play; especially a play by Tennessee Williams. The production at the Coach House Theatre, however, illuminated the title somewhat. For the play like its title, is an amorphous piece of sentimentalism about weak and limpid characters.

It is a strange sort of diversion, which is justified in its banality only by the performance of Maureen Fox, as Alma, who manages to bring life to the cliché that is her character and her story.

Now the play is entertaining, and its sentiment cannot help but engage you; but it is nonetheless a bad play.

The story is rather simple. In the town of Glorious Hill, Miss., the helplessly romantic heroine is politely exorcised because of her affectations. Hers is the plight of the homely girl, desperately in love with a handsome young doctor, who happens to feel somewhat interested. This sad little comedy develops in a series of vignettes — each like a short one-act play. We move from the summer of her romantic longings, to the Christmas of her failure and embarrassment. Then on New Year's Eve, for the briefest of moments her love is returned before the winter chill sets in. Years later, the cycle completes itself in the summer of discontent and disillusionment. Alma has pursued her loneliness to its inevitable conclusion, and is now the available woman, superior to her clients, and faithful to the memory of an hour's happiness.

The play presents many problems, least of all the accents. Williams has written Alma into a void. The people involved with her are flat and often incredible. A group surrounds her in one scene, lay their stress upon her, and disappear. They all have their moment in which to repress some skeleton or vaunt about their prejudice. But she develops independently of them. They are like props that tell us vaguely what a southern pre-war town was like. The trouble is that they are unbelievable.

Alma really has no one to act with. Her lover is more talked of than talked to. Her father, a strong part, disappears early. The antagonist, Dr. John's mother, who dotes on her son and victively intervenes in Alma's love, has no more life than a deus ex machina. At appropriate moments she appears, calls away her baby, and vanishes unchallenged. If she is real, then John's indifferent arguments with her, and his disinterested sufferance of her does not tally.

The play does not grow, Alma does. Each scene is isolated by long blackouts and dramatic time lapses. With this framework, the use of mechanically shallow characters could be very effective, except that Williams repeatedly emphasizes that each of the characters is in the same hopeless limbo. So many scenes end with a sudden shift in focus, revealing the emotional despair and loneliness of still another personage.

The overall effect is pathos, a sentimental sadness in which we receive Alma's confessions with understanding. But the play remains a kind of confession, without adequate conflict or internal focus.

It is to Miss Fox' credit that she brings so much versatility to her part. She has a commanding presence, and gives a sensitive interpretation of a difficult role. Without her the evening would have been a loss and it was not.

Geza Kovacs, as the handsome doctor, has the sole chance to spark the action out of its monologues; but he fails to respond to Miss Fox. He speaks in a voice slightly more quiet than everyone else and makes all conversation seem out of phase, unnatural, inharmonious. His reaction to his mother is undefined, and as the doctor who has seen the big town, he is not a sophisticate, a rakish cynic, nor a southern gallant. He merely hints at these possibilities, and ends up neutral and bland. It is difficult to imagine that Alma has remained so much in love with his passivity.

Williams seems obsessed with sad and frustrated and lonely women. It is too bad he does not always make good theatre with them.

The Quality of Mercy

BY DAVID PAPE

Persevere my little voice of conscience said, and everything will turn out right.

In a sense it had done, my losses were restored, and for a night bad plays did end. And the point was that nothing is restored.

Despite my hamburger, an acne'd broad was crying in Harvey's.

Sitting on her keister in a corner. The busboy eyed us and cried chicken man.

In the car outside a man stares out alone. Behind him a blonde curls one leg up to suffer male gaze — indifferent fingers flitting on her thigh where the mini-skirt bad been.

In the corner on her keister.

The shouts of the play bounced off one another, broke in and pilfered. "When in disgrace with Fortune and men's eyes."

This was the shake-up. Its essence: how in your private world you try to preserve some vestige of dignity, when all things are smashing and tearing and spattering it with the filth of your existence.

Fortune and Men's Eyes is a play. It is hard to remember that. The play was written three years ago by Jack Brundage who now goes under the name of John Herbert. Then it was powerful, coarsely written, clumsy and slow. It has been reworked continuously with the dramatic help of experienced people, and improvisation, and careful pruning.

It is hard to remember, I repeat—that this final version is a play. It is a shake-up. It takes place in prison—Kingston—but anywhere else would do. In fact, it is an effort to keep Kingston in mind. Kingston, the homos in Queen's Park, these things are too near. Stephen Truscott and jokes about license plates. What you experience in the theatre is a world of comic deviation and violent passion, and a deliberate confrontation of love in its numberless forms. How hard to bring this so near.

The play will shake up all your days and ways. It will entertain you, regale you, frighten you, stimulate you and finally exhaust you. It is an intellectual play without intellectual stress. It is a sociological play without preaching. It is a sexual play without trying to titillate or exploit your prurience.

I look at the picture they gave me and I see the great bonesty and believableness of these four men in a cell. The names are on the programme—they are all superb.

Rocky, or Tibber, is up for theft. He stole his sugar daddy's Cadillac. He is tough; he's a pimp and hates fags, yah, but has a rod on for Mona that every one can see. Beneath his crust and violence is cynical self-blinded pragmatism and longing.

Jan, or Mona Lisa, is a quiet sensitive and intensely sympathetic Negro. (He) She reads herself into a dream world, trying to keep something of herself pure. She gives herself to no one—asks no old man's protection. She yields only when she is raped: each Tuesday in the gym.

Queenie is the top banana. She rules the cell, even though she is a fruit. She is the coolest and slickest. She knows the politicians in the prison, and that means a lot. She and Rocky play the power game, with Mona and Smitty in between.

Smith is the newcomer. His initiation takes him into and beyond the worlds of all three; until, when he finally has it figured out, his own experience crucifies his soul.

Over this presides the guard, whose life is inextricably linked to all theirs.

In this world everything that protects you outside is stripped away. There is no way out. All the action takes place in the confines of one set—a claustrophobic cell with heavy piping above. Just as goodies appear from mattresses and from behind vents—as nudes go up on walls and come down as swiftly when Holyface approaches—so do moods, ideas, and passions flicker between these characters like electric flames.

No exit. Just more degradation and suffering and pain. You feel trapped. They are trapped. The conventions of legality are meaningless in the prison world, and will be beyond the pale of a future with a record.

Witness the example of Brundage himself, who was recently refused entry to the States to see his own opening.

Under the piping, the outside world disappears, and there is little left to cling to. And that little is jealously, viciously fought over by the perverted bulls of the herd.

All this fuss about a Canadian author and Centennial is justified. Fortune is a unique creation.

Words like engaging, compelling, involving, terror, pity, detachment—are quite useless before an experience of this intensity. I thank my reviewing stars for the chance to have seen it. Fortune is one of those rare plays that are greater than theatricality; that restore life to a medium that is quickly losing its message.

Toronto Symphony

By PETER GODDARD

Symphonic orchestras over a period of time begin to take on certain characteristics; the Cleveland, a red-knuckled schoolmaster admonishing in clipped accents the rest of the truant musical world, the Philadelphia, a middle-aged bride lolling in the boneymoon bed, the New York Philharmonic, a Madison Avenue wolf clinking notes in his pocket, waiting for his buddy, Elmer, to lead him to new and devilishly wicked places.

The Toronto Symphony? Middle-aged spinsters have had more admirers than the TS; that is, until this week.

Performing Stravinsky's Le Sacre du Printemps, Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto with twenty-year-old Korean Uck Kim as soloist, and Briten's Variation on theme of Frank Bridge, the orchestra managed to combine all those elements required for an intellectually and viscerally exciting performance; elegance of tone, precision of attack, consistency of interpretation and — most important — taste.

Taste. Le Sacre, under Ozawa's energetic baton, became a savage, orgasmic eruption of percussive effects. The angular counter-rhythms slid together in an intellectual mesh; concertmaster Gerard Kantarjian's solo became all the more bitter because of the ensemble piano playing to contrast it.

(It should be noted that the bassoonist who manipulated those early solos so aptly was not the TS's first chair man Nicholas Kilburn. When Kilburn came down with the flu Monday, the orchestra made a continental-wide search for a replacement, finding eventually Eli Carman, former first bassoonist with the NBC Symphony.)

Taste. Compared to Stravinsky's own interpretation of the score, or that of Boulez', Ozawa allowed the thick score to retain some measure of flow. Without mathematical precision, the Ts still maintained a clarity of tone that rendered the notes in gasps and rasps of exhilaration.

Taste. Violinist Kim attempted to forge the Bruch Concerto in the same romantic mould as the Stravinsky. But his on-stage histrionics, intellectual ardour, and sensitivity to lyrical content could not delete the fact that his one was not full enough. Nor is his conception sufficiently mature. By the end of the work interest lagged and much of the initial fire had gone out.

Taste. Again, in the Britten, the basic and accepted concept of the score was renovated. Instead of a set of youthful etudes based on a common theme, it was rendered in a more weighty, virtuosic vein. Gone was youthful excitement and invention; in its place there emerged a more mature heavy-handedness. Inspiration was replaced by perspiration.

The LGMB

A myth surrounds the Lady Godiva Memorial Band, and like all myths it has little to do with reality. After all what can be more illusionary than The Telegram's Michael Walsh's comment, "The caper-prone combo has won the affection of all but the bardest of Varsity's beats."

Generally the LGMB by conducting themselves in a crude, pre-pubescent, deranged way strive to create humour. In their latest album, The L.G.M.B. Blows They've Created the Opposite Effect; while attempting to be satirical, they sounded crude, post-pubescent and deranged.

The initial attempt at humour was through parody: the cover of the album looks not unlike The Beatles' Revolver cover; their back-cover annotations were obviously a gloss on the writing found in a junior high-school yearbook; and leader Robert Bossin's solo effort on the Talking McGill Train Blues seemed (with apologies to Tom Rush whom Bossin copied blatantly) as a frontal (lobe?) attack on down-and-out - grass - roots - back - bone - funk - greasy - low - down - hirsute - garbage - earthy - hippier - than - thou folk singing.

With the exception of the performance of the first movement of Holst Suite in E flat recorded in actual performance at the Kiwanis Music Festival under Paul Higgen's direction and which was performed with taste both in matters of stylistic interpretation and technical execution, the record is a travesty.

By ADRIAN WINTLE

In his Massey Hall recital last Thursday, pianist Vladimir Ashkenazy was as eloquent within the fine-grained weave of Schubert's harmony as within the cement-block clangor of Prokofiev's motor rhythms. This polarity between the two styles allows for the slow movement of Prokofiev's Sonata No. 7, in which the big melody is locked like a homing device to a bass moving in chromatic thirds: Schubert never needs to emphasise melodic orientation, especially when one considers that the B Flat Major Sonata summarises a particularly aria-like vein in his general style. Ashkenazy was able to demonstrate cohesion within the individual movements and, except for an arguably unbalanced moment in the allegro, to show the sonata's overall unity.

A cornerstone of his method lay in his captivating range of dynamic levels. Thus the first movement's cantabile utterance acquired a velvet limpidity; and the aria line of the second movement blossomed by easy stages. Yet in the allegro ma non troppo the ff bravura passages seemed slightly too strident within the context of Ashkenazy's view of this music. In the initial movements he was right to dwell on Schubert's rich tenor sonority—a conspicuous Brahmsian fingerprint—since it is a wellspring of this sonata's autumnal flavor; but at least from where I was sitting those last movement chords had a steely edge to them.

But for the Prokofiev sonata the question-mark in Schubert becomes an expressive necessity. This is not exactly a style that encourages pious thoughts about median relationships: Prokofiev relies primarily on a fusion of rhythm with vertical chord chunks. Because the harmonic language is thereby fragmented, the sonata exerts a characteristic tension; and Ashkenazy rose vigorously to its challenge—perhaps most noticeably in the allegretto, in which an electric rhythm and martellato style banish the tang of those chromatic thirds in the slow movement.

The movement in short needed and received maximum precision and fire in execution. The Prokofiev sonata was preceded by an immaculate performance of Chopin's Twelve Studies op. 10 studies, not etudes; songs, not lieder) in which a sophisticated rubato lent to No. 3 the stylishness so often lacking in hopeful home pianism.

Elsewhere, Ashkenazy reinforced the pianistic verve of these studies with rewarding interpretative insight.

Ashkenazy — two

By ALICE O'GORMON

There are people who would be content seeing only the program Ashkenazy performed reproduced before their eyes word by magic word, people that is, who were there and need no other reminder of the time that sometime eight days ago. Some have it tacked to their walls even now with the Chopin Mazurka encore all the more legible somewhere between the autograph and intermission.

There are people who know the program as they know the sound of that time when Ashkenazy waited before beginning the second movement of Schubert's 3rd Piano Sonata. Just as they know the sound of the piano itself. It is for these people that what follows is unreadable for they are eternally listening.

There are the people who went but didn't hear, coughed and forgot to listen, who read too much, play too lightly and generally don't. There are those who do not, did not or dare not. Some go to the theatre. Some think they really care enough to find out when it's all come to pass. Some are bored; some are having lunch; you, it's you in the basement of the library. THIS IS A STORY FOR YOU.

Vladimir Ashkenazy is a 30-ish Russian emigre with an Icelandic wife and a very heady rapport with an equally 30-ish American traveller Malcolm Frager (vis: Martin Mayer's Recordings column in the current Esquire). Ashkenazy bears many distinguishing marks from international competition, accolades, medals, prix, kisses. He bears them with a charm he wears throughout his rather slight physical frame, a charm apparent when he bows, walks, sits, and curls his face as he plays the piano.

Especially when he plays the piano.

Maybe you've heard Geza Anda play Schubert's 3rd Piano Sonata on the piano; or you maybe heard Rubinstein here a few years ago. The first two movements occupy a great deal of time with very subtle ways, remember the lyricism of the opening theme itself — they are mute of a sort for they do not speak easily. Ashkenazy, for all his later brilliance, could not hold their thread. He played beautifully, you say, so I say he never fails to thus, but where is the line to be drawn?

end of part — and now

the REAL Ashkenazy

It was easier, perhaps, to find the key to the final two movements of the Schubert, easier because themes are brighter, tempos quicker, and so much less to go through to find out.

The twelve Chopin Etudes (his first set) that followed intermission, include so many that have come to be recognized instantly that a pianist attempting them may easily leave himself open to a credibility gap of Johnsonian proportions. Ashkenazy preferred brilliance.

With high consciousness of dynamic contrast, both dramatic and subtle, effortless tonal control of technical material, with lyricism, bravado and flourish. He performed. The infamous Revolutionary Etude. He gave it a standard that few will surpass. Pray for him. He is young.

Your soul, Sviatislav — it speaks so softly Ashkenazy's performance of the Prokofiev 7th Sonata was remarkable in its intensity, unyielding in its . . .

Why we did this — George Segal don't know and Say coming back Thursday — listen to the radio mark the time this is the thing you want to do most.

The style unlike much of American music is written into the notes. The lean figure on stage is participating in an experience that the audience comprehends.

In the new pop music the eye meets the ear. The children of movies and rock'n'roll. Films started silently and then moved into sound. The new music began the sound and soon added visual effects. Consider the effect of the Beatles' movies. San Francisco's Fillmore Auditorium is like being inside a jukebox.

And it is here where the audience and the performer, in our Americanized society, share the common experience: delirious, insane, semi-automatic, semi-machine-like living. It is ironic in a supposed McLuhanistic age that as the French Canadian singers become more personal, they become more universal.

But then one writes poetry to reveal the truth and one's autobiography to fictionalize.

The Sotheby's Sale

By JOAN MURRAY

An incredible and historic happening occurred Monday night, Oct. 16th, and through the following days of this week: Sotheby's auction. Lunch in Simpson's Arcadian court will never be the same again as it was in the Moorish Art-Nouveau lunchroom that the sale was held. Of course, it was too crowded (100 people on the eighth floor and the same on the balcony — the largest auction in Sotheby's history) which led to some confusion in the bidding. But the whole pushy, pushy, tense atmosphere was perfect for the Simpson's image.

The reason this was a happening is that it seemed like a circus where people threw money away for the entertainment and edification of others. By "threw away", I mean precisely that. The paintings were very largely mediocre. There was a wide selection of second-string Flemish, Dutch and German seventeenth century paintings — and a wider selection of third-string modern French "masterpieces". At times, one felt that Sotheby's was clearing its European stock on its country bumpkin cousin.

Some of the good pieces in the show were the Canadian maps and charts, one Krieghoff from the Ritchie collection, one Marquet, and of course, the Gainsborough. Everything went extremely reasonably. The Ulster Museum in Belfast got the Gainsborough for $65,000 (I had heard people talking $100,000). A Monet painting which was estimated to go at $45-54,000 by Sotheby's went at $43,000 (which is low). The maps of Halifax seemed especially low in price to me, as were the Krieghoff's which sell for $10-12,000 in England (they went last night for $7-8,000). Consider the following if you want to know how prices were running: Roberts Art Gallery sold Krieghoff's "Tandem Driving on the Ice-Bridge" (1858) for $4,800 about 1958. Last year, it was sold in Toronto at the King Edward Hotel (Ritchie collection sale) for $7,900. This picture went last night for $7,000. The other two Krieghoffs, which sold for $8,000 were simply not the quality of the Krieghoff now on sale at approximately the same price at the Framing Gallery on Bay St. ("Sleight on the St. Lawrence").

So the prices were fairly standard, perhaps a little low, and Sotheby's must have been somewhat disappointed at its close to $450,000 take. I heard for a month beforehand from dealers and museum people that prices were going to be high. Obviously, one of the values of the sale was the attempt to establish a new North American price. An attempt it must remain.

But the spectacle of the thing will remain with people for a long time: the deluxe catalogues, Pinkerton's guarding the door, everyone in their silk and pearls, the inability to see a bid unless one was in the balcony, Peter Wilson (Chairman of the Board of Sotheby's, who did the auctioneering) and his deadpan voice. My favorite moment was when a person sitting next to beautiful Princess Alexandra clearly framed the words to her: "It's not worth it".

It all reminded me of Oscar Wilde's "Importance of Being Earnest".

Ottawa financially or otherwise. Quebec would be free to take this step except in grave situations such as a state of war or rebellion within the country. In case of a constitutional dispute, only a constitutional tribunal which had been accepted by all parties should have the authority to decide the case.

"5. Finally, constitutional discussion would provide a chance to examine completely the role and the composition of the Canadian Senate which, in its present form, hardly corresponds to the requirements of wholesome federalism."

QUEBEC LIBERAL FEDERATION

The proposed increased powers for Quebec which were outlined in Claude Ryan's concept of special status were very similar to those advocated by the committee on constitutional affairs of the Quebec Liberal Federation presided by Paul Gerin-Lajoie. This report was printed in Le Devoir, October 11, 1967 and contains a formal condemnation of separatism. In spite of this, the Toronto Star could see little difference between it and the Levesque resolution.

Significantly certain clauses never appeared in the English language press. The Q.L.F. report lists the wide range of powers which the provinces already possess by virtue of section 92. Quebec, the report continues, has powers which it has never exercised. Clause 12 bears repeating.

Constitutional problems must not be used to camouflage incompetence or refusal to act on the part of those who already possess the constitutional power in these fields."

The tone of self-criticism in this section of the report is difficult to reconcile with English-press' assessment of the committee report as a separatist conspiracy.

VEHICLES OF REFORM

We speak of constitutional revision but where are the vehicles of reform to be found? In English Canada a general preference for the status quo will work against the idea of change. The leaders of the Liberal Party and the upper echelons of the federal civil service favour pragmatic evolution rather than fundamental change. The English-speaking press, the business world, the bourgeois elite, and the labour movement are almost all in favour of the status quo.

In Quebec, certain divisions prevent consensus and thus facilitate the maintenance of the status quo. Left to their own devices a high proportion of the French Canadian Liberal caucus in Ottawa would no doubt be pleased to study the means of achieving new status for Quebec. However they are not free to say publicly what they think.

The English-speaking Liberal leaders have placed them under the authority of Mr. Trudcau whom, as Calude Ryan points out, "it is unlikely they would have chosen themselves." Whatever their personal opinions, it is quite understandable in their best interest to act as if they shared the views of the new orthodoxy which rules Ottawa.

Next month the constitutional debate will be taken up by private initiative through hundreds of French-Canadians who will participate in the Estates General without having solicited the good wishes of Mr. Trudcau.

DESTINY AND RESPONSE

It is from the Quebec legislature that the main impetus in the constitutional debate must come. The initiative of the Liberal party last week went a long way towards providing the basis for serious negotiation with the rest of the country. One can only hope that as soon as possible, the Liberal Party will be able to reach some agreement with the Union National and so get the problem out of the political thicket.

The future of the Canadian federation is probably being decided at this time in Quebec in a struggle among French Canadians themselves. It would be unrealistic to pretend Quebec expects the rest of Canada to accept their demands wholesale.

They do expect—and rightly so — that English Canada take seriously the view that present constitutional arrangements are a threat to their language and cultural tradition.

In the end, the viability of the constitutional solution at which we arrive will only be ensured if English Canadians are able to match Quebec's passion and sense of destiny with an enlightened and creative response.

The Rock Scene-like it was

By AGLAYA MARTINS

Some kind of the usual communications gap between CBC and intent (read the title) was responsible for another candy-coated big lie Monday night on O'Keefe Centre presents a lot of beer commercials, too much of Noel Harrison and too little of The End.

The whole familial slice of the Doors' masterpiece was out. Camera techniques failed to show the Doors' guitarist Robby Krieger and his raga-inspired fingers (he listens 12 hours a day) when they were inspired. Sound, unless you heard FM was constrained, unbalanced and poorly lip-synchronized.

Jefferson Airplane suffered almost the same rough treatment but aside from White Rabbit their material didn't justify anything less. Psychedelic gimmicks abounded—triple images over a background show by the Headlights — okay, okay, okay, put your own record on. For better quality and a better show the CBC asks us to treat them silently.

Dionne Warwick singing Don't Make Me Over the real high light. Eric Andersen making a comeback. Don't mention Sergio Mendes.

What television must realize. The music must be there. Then you play with the cameras. What must be done. Programming with FM to synchomesh sound track with TV light show whatever, old movie, Festival, Take Thirty.

Wake up CBC, do Country Joe and the Fish have to come to Toronto before you can listen and watch at the same time. And who knows else?

FILM Bradshaw

I've just got word of two more promising looking film societies. The National Film Theatre has already started its programme of Czech films. On Wednesday and Friday evenings at 7 and 9:15. Whatever else you see, don't miss Karel Zeman's The Stolen Airship, a rare treat which uses the medium to the utmost without being in the slightest pretentious. It will be shown Friday, October 27. For info call 489-9638.

Also York U is offering twelve double bills for $6. Among them are La Notte and Divorce Italian Style (Oct. 29), 8½ and Sandra (Nov. 19), Winter Kept Us Warm, Black Zero, and Iain Ewing's Picarro (Feb. 4). Call Nicholas Ayre, 635-2370.

If we reduce flicks to their lowest terms, we can boast of having the two "greatest" in town starting this week: Sound of Music ($90 million) and Gone with the Wind ($70 million). Watch for something on the latter in next week's Review.

Bonnie and Clyde is worth seeing but will probably be around for a few weeks, while Grand Prix has only a fortnight to run before the Glendale is taken over by John Darling Schlesinger's Far From the Madding Crowd. Also see Carl Luppe's article in this issue for underground films tomorrow at Cinécity.

THEATRE Gordon

Whatever happened to the St. Lawrence Centre, The Women's Union Theatre Renovation Program. Last week in these pages, the UC Player's Guild announced an ambitious program as is their wont, but where are they going to put these plays? And who cares?

As for planning your weekend, the A.P.A. has two matinees of You Can't Take It With You tomorrow and Sunday, and a performance Sunday night of the Kaufman Hart classic. You're a Good Man Charlie Brown is start-into what its backers hope is a long run with an excellent New York cast in a fly-weight re-reading of the Schultz cartoons. Number Ten Downing Street with Alistair Sim is at the O'Keefe Centre. Tennessee Williams rewrite of Summer and Smoke is at the Coach House and Fortune In Men's Eyes, the Jack Heibert play about life in the penal cage is at The Central Library Theatre. There's not a dark theatre in town and all of the productions are worthy of your attention.

ART Murray

Next week in town is a busy week for openings. The most important one last week was McEwen at Moos. I liked his earlier work better but most other critics think he's advancing. For the plethora of exhibitions next week, why not read the "Guide to Shows" in The Star, as I do. The most important opening will be at the Art Gallery on Friday night: Three Hundred Years of Canadian Art (till Nov. 26). It should be an exciting show; even the $5.00 catalogue is unusually good. Dr. R. H. Hubbard of the National Gallery, Ottawa, will give a special lecture on The Confederation Period in Canadian Art in connection with this exhibition at the Art Gallery on Oct. 25.

I could not face reviewing the Henry Moore show at the Art Gallery. His classical themes and the reclining figure are becoming a little tiresome. The reason why? Henry Moore has no sense of humor. And in contrast to popular opinion, I insist that sometimes Henry Moore's holes through a sculpture, which are supposed to suggest "another environment," look just like holes. One thing though, and this makes him a master, is that he has grasp ed and is able to work in a monumental scale.

Incidentally, I hear that someone lifted three MacGregor's from the Hart House art show. Someone has good taste.

MUSIC Goddard

Volky yclept: "People keep saying that I take my reviews down to the level of drugs . . . that I didn't mention Jimi Hendrix . . . that I write too much about the Beatles . . . that . . . that . . ." And for an answer: pop music is being covered the way it is to the length it appears because much of the pop music produced is vacuous in content, produced by people who are avaricious in intention, bought by people who sit on their taste buds. Folk, however, is starting to flourish; starting next week at the Riverboat is Penny Lang, a modest but accomplished traditional singer. At Massey Hall Sunday and Monday are Peter, Paul and Mary (and also on Monday, Ali Akbar Khan in Eaton Auditorium). And if you are lucky enough to get tickets, Ashkenazy will be taping a CBC program next Thursday at the Edward Johnson Building. z boehm.

MAGAZINES Fraser

Yesterday, SW Magazine (the old Star Weekly, brightened up in recent months) hit the stands, with a cover story on the housing crisis. The story, by Walter Stewart, is one of the most angry and concise summations of the desperate situation that Canadian housing is in. As an introduction, Stewart contrasts two tragic situations of families without homes with these statements: "... Temporary setbacks are bound to be endured periodically in the competition which supports private enterprise;" (Labour Minister Nicholson, on Sept. 28th.) and "... The government, ably assisted by the CMHC, has executed brilliantly and efficiently the housing policy so far approved by the House." (Ian Wahn, Liberal MP for Toronto St. Paul's, on Sept. 28th.). The piece is an incisive attack — of the kind one didn't usually expect to see in the old Star Weekly.

Also this week is an article by Gail Dexter, our revered former boss at The Review, the ebullient, expansive narcissiste extraordinaire, on what it's like to put on a dinner for 20 in 24 hours. Complete with nine (9) photos in living Kodachrome of art critic-journalist-socialite Gail Dexter. A must.

LGMB steals the show...

By BOB BOSSIN

Last Saturday was supposed to be Denmark's day at Expo. But few people knew it.

The Lady Godiva Memorial Band and 50 more boisterous engineers stole the show, convincing many spectators that it was University of Toronto day.

"I first heard them Saturday morning. Then I ran into them four more times even though I tried to avoid them. They were everywhere", said one Victoria College student, who was at the scene.

Like all Expo entertainers, the LGMB was bilingual. Jim Skeaff (SGS) an LGMB member for nine years was the band's translator during two official and a staggering number of unofficial concerts.

"We would like to play The Pink Panther," LGMB leader John Pullam would announce.

"Nous presenterons maintenant L'Animal Etrange," Skeaff would translate.

From the performance, the panther had good reason to blush. So did Colonel Bogey (translation: Corporal DeGaulle) played by a chorus of 18 kazooos. But the crowds loved it.

"We've never seen anything like it," said one American visitor. He even sent his daughter up to the stage in order to snap a picture of her with the men in Viking helmets, monks' cowls and beer-cap-studded hard-hats.

By the time the Expo entertainment officials had caught up with the fast moving Skule musicians, the engineers had marched halfway round Ile Ste-Helene, given a concert on the Ontario Pavillion rocks and another in the Ontario theatre between showings of A Place to Stand.

A smooth LGMB soothes the city

"I ran into them four more times even though I tried to avoid them" said one Victoria student.

... amazes Expo visitors

Before their Sunday concert they added a musical mini-rail tour playing Midnight in Moscow (at the American Pavillion), Never on Sunday (Greece), It's a Long Way to Tipperary (Britain), Allouette (Quebec) and Onward Christian Soldiers (Israel).

"We think that they're very entertaining," said one official of Expo band control, "but we never know where to find them."

However, more than 1,000 persons, including about 100 U of T students attended the band's scheduled Sunday bandshell performance. Earlier in the day the official Expo band drew a crowd of 17 listeners.

The only difficult moment came when the official Expo photographer tried to assemble the band in rows for a publicity picture (he failed), and when several members of the audience from Quebec, having never seen the Carling Red Cap television commercial, mistook the engineers' raised thumbs as something other than a salute.

"The trip was a great success," concluded leader Pullam, located after the concert in the Bavarian Beer Hall.

"I even had three offers to buy my raccoon coat."

Fiery session anticipated Saturday

By LAWRENCE BRICE

A freedom-fighting bishop and two former presidents of the United Nations General Assembly should create a biting cross-fire at the Teaching Saturday session.

The bishop is Rt. Rev. Trevor

Huddleston, Anglican Bishop of Masasi, in East Africa, a long-time enemy of apartheid.

Mr. Huddleston is no recluse. Up at 5 a. m. every morning to spend the rest of the morning in prayer, he has been in the vanguard in the struggle for civil rights in South Africa.

In 1956 he incorporated his ideas into a book, Naught for Your Comfort, which he smuggled out of South Africa shortly before the police raided his home in search of it.

He remains today an exile of that nation.

Dr. Alex Quaison-Sackey, UN president for 1964-65, and Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan, UN president for 1962-63, will join Huddleston in the same session, on Religious Faith and Intolerance.

Seventy-four-year-old Sir Muhammad, former foreign minister of Pakistan, is a powerful spokesman for the entire Islamic bloc. He has gone on record for his unyielding stand that Kashmir be part of Pakistan.

Sir Muhammad has numerous political honors and appointments without end. His latest book Islam and Human Rights was published this year.

Dr. Quaison-Sackey is a colourful intellectual from Ghana, considered one of the most respected and experienced African statesmen of his time.

He has served as Ghanaian Ambassador to the U.S., 1959-65, to Cuba 1961-65, and to Mexico, 1962-64. During 1964 he served as head of Ghana's delegation to the UN peace-keeping headquarters, Ottawa. When the military coup

Stephen Spender sympathizes with NLF

By DAVID FRANK

British poet Stephen Spender said yesterday his sympathies were with the Vietnamese National Liberation Front.

But he backed away from making a direct comparison between the Front and the 1936 Spanish Republican Government.

As part of the pre-teach-in program Mr. Spender spoke to a capacity audience of more than 200 on the conscience of the 30's.

"The Spanish Civil War became almost a mythological conflict of light versus dark," he said. "Republican Spain seemed to be a vast popular movement."

Mr. Spender called the 30's a "classic tragedy of our times."

"They dramatized the issues of ends and means," he said. "Don't pretend wrong is right, even if the victims have been wronged." "Do not surrender your sense of truth and justice."

"In the 30's there emerged a politics of the non-political," he said, "a unity based on basic principles of human rights."

He saw the same reaction today "in the thousands deeply concerned about Vietnam and integration."

"But the choices were too easy. All one had to do was be anti-fascist."

"Many well intentioned and idealistic people were hypnotized by the sophistries of the Marxists. Liberal intellectuals were not prepared to look this gift horse, Stalin, in the mouth."

Spender said he was amazed by the "extent to which intellectuals who are so dispassionate in their own fields, are willing to surrender their objectivity in politics."

"I don't pretend I've ever been able to relate poetry and politics," he said. "You can't turn yourself into a propagandist."

Indian mind must change first: Smith

No change is possible in the religious structure of India without jeopardizing the whole social fabric, Professor R. M. Smith said Wednesday night.

Prof. Smith told a pre-teach in panel on Religious Conflict in the Indian Sub-continent that the Indian has never been an individual.

"Religion and the state are integrated for stability. A dichotomy of secular and sacred just is not Indian."

Because of this fact any attempt to change religious beliefs could destroy the social structure of India, he asserted.

His opinion was supported by Prof. J. G. Arapura of McMaster University, who said, "The only significant revolution possible in India is a psychological one. The change must first come in the Indian mind."

He said that although the Indians may have failed to clothe and feed the people, their religion "has instilled an amazing capacity for suffering."

Intolerance is caused by a fear of having other groups "tread upon the sacred places" in an established culture, he said. This was the cause of the Moslem Hindu riots and the unrest in Kashmir.

Professor M. Q. Baig, an expert in Islamic studies, denied that that the Moslems wished to convert India at the expense of social order.

He said the Moslems wished to free India from the caste system and when this proved to be impossible they had no choice but to demand their own state, Pakistan.

Shutouts abound in football

By JIM MORRISON

It's getting to be a rare occasion in interfac football these days to see a player cross the goal-line for six points. This week was certainly a case in point, as three shutouts were recorded.

Group action on Wednesday saw Vic extend its unbeaten streak to two games as they sneaked by Engineering 20. The only points in a massive mud melee came from the fertile foot of punter Bill Marshall, who managed to launch two singles.

In Group II, Forestry nudged Pharmacy 7-0. Only scores for the treeslayers were a single and an unconverted touchdown.

Yesterday, again in Group II, Trinity held New College to a scoreless tie on the back campus. New almost won on the last play of the game as Goodman kicked into the end zone, only to have the punt returned to the three yard line.

VOLLEYBALL

Wednesday saw the season's first encounters in intramural volleyball. Pharmacy was extended to three games before beating Forestry 8-15, 15-4, 15-9, and Sr. Engineering took Vic I 15-6, 15-8.

Yesterday's game had Innis I over the junior Engineers 15-10, 15-10.

LACROSSE

Tuesday lacrosse saw Knox edge Meds A 4-3 and Pharmacy tie Pre-Meds 2-2. Grainger Cowie had all four Knox markers while singles for the medicine men went to Kempston, Shapero and Murnaghan. D. Grove's two goals were matched for Pharmacy by Barry Ray and John Peckett.

On Wednesday, Dents beat Forestry A 5-4 and Scarborough knotted the Engineers 2-2. Greg Mason (2), Hal Leitch (2) and Bob Cromie were the dental technicians, answered by Brian Coffey (2), Scott Elliot and Jim Griffin for Forestry.

Low and McUbin were Scarborough's marks men, while Yellow and Leinonen scored for the meccano set.

In a squeaker played yesterday, PHE A overtook SMC 9-8. John Dale (3) Bill Connelly (2), Chris Rudge (3) and Brian McVey were prolific for Phys Ed. The Irish were led by Bruce Ferguson with six goals, singles going to John Braudrft and Ted McGee.

RUGGER

In fatball action this week, Engineering II defeated UC 9-3, Innis topped Architecture 12-0, and Engineering I matched Wycliffe 3-3.

Richard Seppala, Doug Kidd and Bob Cherniak tallied tries for the Engineers. T. Stasiewicz scored for UC. Helping the Innis rout were Richard Grace (2), Tony Cosentino and Norm Okehru.

Don Kaikkonen's marker for the Engineers' finest was tried by Wycliffe's Tom Denny.

SOCCER

Shutouts were again the story in this week's soccer. On Tuesday, Knox raked Innis College 3-0, with goals going to Al Glen (2) and Spencer Estabrook.

New College trampled PHE B on Wednesday. G. Hurd had two for New, followed by J. Murray, P. Grunwald, M. Rhodd and D. Moore.

In the Dance of the Divine field Wednesday as well, Wycliffe matched Emmanuel 0-0.

Soccer yesterday saw Vic I top St. Mike's 2-0 and Dentistry rap Pharmacy 4-0. Larry Cave and Dave Sharpe were unerring for the Scarlet and Gold. Roger Bateson (2), Tom Rice and Rick Ward were the dynamic drillers.

Squash, water polo and rowing outfits face difficult competition this weekend

WATER POLO

Varsity Blues Water Polo team plays its second game of the young season tomorrow when they host University of Guelph Redmen at Hart House pool at 12 noon.

Blues, who employed only second line players in last week's 7-3 win over RMC, will be looking to improve their playmaking combinations in the exhibition encounter.

Although Blues lost several players off last year's OQAA championship team — including top scorer Graeme Barber — they are certainly not lacking in depth. Returning veterans include forwards Chris McNaught and Steve Gerring, rover Gary Stratton, and defenceman Bruce Warburton.

Five members of this year's team competed in the Canadian National Water Polo championship held in Winnipeg in July. Forward Allan Pyle, goalie Hartley Garfield, defenceman Roger Barcourt, and rover Skip Bergman represented Toronto in the nationals while rover Bud Begay played for Winnipeg.

All will be competing for Blues this season. Allan Pyle also represented Canada in the Pan-Am games and was top scorer of the tournament.

SQUASH

Varsity Blues begin a busy season of squash tournaments this weekend with the Canadian Centennial tournament in Toronto.

The tournament features an entry list of 32 teams from across Canada including clubs from St. John's, Newfoundland to Victoria, British Columbia.

Blues' first match is against the St. John's team at the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club beginning at 3.30 p.m. today.

Their second match should be one of the highlights of the tournament as they come up against Montreal Badminton and Squash club, the top seeded team.

This seven-man team includes six ranking Canadians led by Canadian champion Colin Adair. Blues face this club tonight at 7:15 at the Badminton and Racquet Club.

Varsity coach Ralph Rimmer has had the whip out and Blues are in excellent physical condition. This should show to good advantage in the three-day tournament.

To demonstrate that he means business Rimmer has demanded his team have haircuts for the tournament. Reaction to this request has been unfavorable however, and it has been referred to the club's executive committee.

Members of the Varsity team in order of ranking are: Frank Buck, Vic Harding, Mike Gardiner, Dave Gunn, Gary Miller, Howie Fluxgold and Mike Zimmerman.

Other universities entered are Western and intercollegiate champion, McGill.

ROWING

Brock University hosts the first Canadian Invitational Collegiate Regatta this weekend in St. Catharines. Ready access to the Henley Course, where the World Rowing Championships were held last summer, makes Brock an obvious choice for the site of the meet.

Crews from Eastern Canada and the USA have been invited; and replies have been received from several American universities. Eastern Canada Intercollegiate Rowing Association members will also be represented.

In preparation for what is shaping up as the biggest regatta of the season, U of T crews have been in the rough waters of Lake Ontario every morning this week. Any-one for a 40 degree shower?

Unbeaten teams clash with Yates on the line

Understatement of the year would be labelling tomorrow's gridiron encounter at Kingston an important game.

When Varsity Blues take the field Saturday afternoon against Queen's Golden Gaels, the hopes and fears of both their seers (to ruin an ancient carol), concerning the 1967 season will receive their penultimate realization. Both Ron Murphy and Queen's coach, Frank Tindall, have prepped their squads for almost nothing else than the upcoming game, and next week's return match in Toronto.

As they head into the game, each sporting an unblemished 2-0 record, the heralded Yates Cup teeters in the balance. Although the two teams clash again in Toronto next week, the winner of tomorrow's game should have little trouble repeating for a clean sweep of the series. Momentum is a powerful thing. As Blues' halfback Nick DiGiuseppe put it, "If we'd played Queen's twice in a row last year, we'd have killed them." A year back of course, Blues won in Queen's only to lose their drive in a home-and-home series with McGill. Queen's closed with the big rush, humiliating Toronto twice in a row to win the Yates.

Unfortunately for Murphy and his Blues, the team has been hit by a rash of injuries that make Asiatic flu seem like a common cold. And it got worse this week instead of better. The gloomy news concerned veteran centre Don Rogers whose shoulder injury appeared to have mended sufficiently to permit his participation on Saturday. But recent re-examination has uncovered more serious trouble, and now Rogers joins Vic Alboini on the sidelines for the rest of the year. Rookie Steve Brown, from Malvern has drawn the tough assignment of replacing the rugged centre.

Other Blues scratched from the line-up are DiGiuseppe, end Brent Moriris, halfback Wolfgang Gut, and guard Tom Reed.

Replacement tabbed by Murphy to fill the gaps include Mark Staler at end, Keith Johnson in the offensive backfield, Doug Bucknam at guard, UC's own Stan Lerner, and rookie Larry Lukas.

Despite the heavy injury situation, Murphy plans no two-way duty for any of his ballplayers unless "it is an absolute necessity." Depth has always been a mark of distinction for Toronto teams, and it receives its stiffest test ever tomorrow.

One position causing no concern to the coach is quarterback where Bob Amer has stepped in for the sideline Alboini. "He's worked hard, and I think he'll surprise a lot of people," says Murphy. "The club hasn't moved for him, but you must remember nothing was working for us in those exhibition games."

Way down East on the other hand, Frank Tindall is radiating in the comfort of a completely healthy ball club, and a completely experienced one. Everyone of his 24 starters have experienced intercollegiate competition before this season. Offensively, Queen's is ridiculously strong with all-star Don Bayne at quarterback. Defense could be Tindall's Achilles heel, but Blues' offense may not be healthy enough to take advantage. Punting is Blues' only plus, with Paul McKay worth a first down almost every time he kicks the ball.

On paper, Toronto has about as much chance as the Boston Red Sox had to win the pennant last year. You know what happened. Boston didn't win the pennant on paper; they won it with something quite intangible—something quite intangible—

In the past, desire has overcome injuries, hard luck, and better opposition. Here's hoping it overcomes Queen's.

BOB AMER: THE PRESSURE IS ON HIM TO MOVE BLUES' INCONSISTENT OFFENCE AGAINST QUEEN'S TOUGH SQUAD TOMORROW IN KINGSTON.

BAILEY IN MEXICO

Track Blues in danger of losing Tait

As a result of Dave Bailey's qualifying for the final of the 1500 metres at a Mexico City meet, which will be held to-day, University of Toronto track Blues stand only a very slim chance of regaining the Tait Mackenzie Trophy and the OQAA track championship.

After a run of five victories Varsity dropped to third last year behind McMaster and Western. If Bailey doesn't manage to catch a flight out from the Little Olympics, the potential 20 points which he is worth will be greatly missed.

Nevertheless, although Varsity may be depleted, other schools face similar problems. Hard hit has been McMaster who have lost last year's most valuable performer, Ray Tucker, through academic ineligibility. Western has also suffered insurmountable losses from its team of a year ago and should lose its placing—probably to Waterloo—who this year have shown exceptional quantitative strength.

Individually it should be Mac, Toronto and Waterloo battling in the middle and long distances with Western and University of Montreal than their share of points in the sprints.

The field events which more often than not indicate which school has most depth, could again this year prove to be the margin of victory for the winner.

On the infield Blues are fortunately able to field a number of veterans including Gord Homer and last year's champ Bill Watts in the javelin, both of whom placed in that event last year.

John Hilliard and Mat Nakamura should perform very well in the jumps. A year ago Hilliard was third in the triple jump and Nakamura took both that event and the long jump with excellent leaps in the interfac meet.

Blue also have a good chance in the pole vault in the persons of last years third place finishers Jukka Heikurinen and Ron Nastiuk.

Watts, Bruce Tucker and Dave Arnold should gather their share of points in the shot and discus events with none of last year's place finishers returning outside of Blues' Watts.

The sprints, however, are a different story. From the 100 yards to the quarter mile, coach Foot has a number of solid bodies who as a team may pull through for good points in the relays but individually will have trouble picking off more than even one place finish.

In the middle distance events, Bailey's absence will undoubtedly hurt in the half and mile. However, John Loaring should pick up a first in the half mile against such highly rated performers as Mac's Bruce Woods and Bodo Bilazewski and Queen's Dave Ellis. Loaring's running mate Ron Field could pick up fourth place points if he has a good day.

In the mile Rich Pyne will be alone against a solid field led by Waterloo's 4:04 Miler Bob Finlay and Mac's Ray Varey and Doug Macdougall, a former Varsity standout. The event should go easily to Finlay with a good race for second.

The toughest event will without doubt be the three miles where Blues' Brian Armstrong and Brian Richards could finish anywhere from second to seventh against the likes of Finlay, Mac's Varey and Macdougall, Western's Yetman and Queen's MacLaern.

At any rate, come hell or high water, and it might judging from the weather, the meet could be a close one and Blues just might be bringing back the Tait ...

Soccer Blues dominate league stats: entertain vastly improved Guelph Redmen

Varsity Soccer Blues will attempt to take over first place all by themselves this weekend, when they host the vastly improved Guelph Redmen, in what could be Varsity's toughest game to date.

The game will be a homecoming for Norman Bracht of Guelph, as he played for Blues two years ago. Bracht was a team leader for Redmen last year, but so far this season has been unable to dent opposing defenses. His turn may come Saturday.

Blues will go into this contest without regular goal-tender Erwin Stack and half-backs Ormond Mendes and Tom Johnston. Dressing in their place will be goalie Stan Bogucki and halfbacks Garth Rothwell and Jim Kaiman.

As expected, Blues are high up in league scoring, both individually and as a team. Jim Lefkos leads league scorers with six tallies, while team is first in scoring with thirteen. Blues' goals-against average of 1.5 is also best in the league.

In the eastern division, Queens has a firm hold on first place with three victories in as many starts. Laval and McGill are tied for second with the University of Montreal bringing up the rear. If the present trends continue in both divisions, Varsity will play off with Queens November 18.

Varsity rugger squads see action

In rugger action tomorrow, Varsity's eastern division squad puts its unbeaten record on the line in Kingston against Queen's. In the western section, Toronto hosts Guelph Redmen. Neither game should cause Blues much difficulty. Queen's has lost both starts to date while Guelph has won only once in four starts.

Peter Hand will miss the game at Queen's due to a muscle spasm. Brian Hamill suffered a concussion last week, forcing him to miss action against Guelph. Experienced Maris Apps joins the line-up instead.

iTi stresses religious commitment and Vietnam issue

By PAUL CARSON

Opposition to American intervention in Vietnam and the necessity for political action as an expression of sincere religious commitment were the main recurring themes stressed during the week-end sessions of the third International Teach-in. Under co-chairmen Michael Ignatieff (III Trin) and Jeffrey Rose (IV UC), the Teach-in was devoted to a discussion of Religion and International Affairs.

During the closing session last night, former Indian Defence Minister V. K. Krishna Menon suggested the Vietnam war was actually a case of imperialistic American aggression.

"If we cannot stop a great country from committing war crimes, then we can do nothing at all."

The next speaker, Thich Nhat Hanh, a Vietnamese Buddhist monk now living in exile, said the U.S. was in Vietnam "due to its paranoid fear of Communist China."

In reality, the Americans are destroying Vietnam, he charged.

Conor Cruise O'Brien, a former UN delegate from Ireland, told the Friday night audience the Vietnam war is "totally unjust."

"Resistance to the United States (in Vietnam) is a just resistance," he asserted.

As examples he discussed the doctrines of "the universal principle of truth," the "concept on non-egoism" the absolute stricture against violence, and "the law of love and compassion."

In an earlier session, Dr. Ralph Abernathy, a U.S. civil-rights leader said Christianity not only justified revolution, but actually commanded it. "Everything I know about my faith teaches me to work for social reform," he added.

Garfield Todd, the former prime minister of Southern Rhodesia, said men of true faith will adopt all possible action short of outright violence to combat racial segregation.

Mr. Todd was ostracised from politics and eventually placed under house arrest when he attempted to extend the political rights on of the native population in 1958.

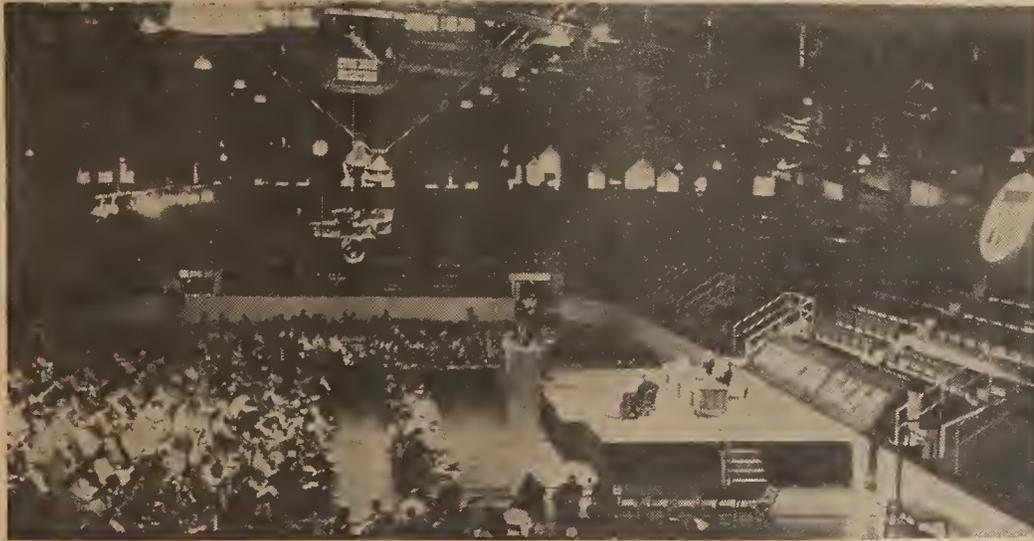

Lewis John Collins, canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, said that for the true Christian, "religion and politics are inextricably interwoven."

Chairman for the first session was U of T philosophy professor Donald Evans, who also chaired the initial session of the first Teach-In two years ago.

Other session chairmen were Anglican ecumenist Roland de Corneille and U of T Acting President J. H. Sword.

Attendance at the five sessions, varying from 2,200 to 3,100, was slightly below expectations.

Viet protest supported across Canada

OTTAWA (CUP)—Demonstrations across Canada Saturday as part of the international day of protest against the war in Vietnam apparently reflected growing concern over alleged Canadian complicity in the war.

In Halifax, Mayor Allan O'Brien was among the 350 anti-war demonstrators. A mile-long trek to Victoria Park was organized by the Halifax citizens committee to end the war in Vietnam.

It was the first mass anti-Vietnam-war demonstration ever in the Maritimes. In Montreal 500 French and English demonstrators gathered in downtown Phillips Square and marched through the rain to the U.S. consulate.

In Ottawa, T. C. Douglas, the leader of the NDP party of Canada, told 500 persons demonstrating in front of the Parliament buildings the War in Vietnam was "one of the greatest moral issues of our times."

"It is also one of the greatest. See Grandparents page 2

Toronto protest march draws 4,000

By PAUL MacRAE

An estimated 4,000 persons snarled traffic along Yonge St. for three hours Saturday afternoon in the biggest anti-Vietnam protest march ever held in Toronto.

The marchers mobilized at Queens Park and paraded in rough double-file along the sidewalks down Wellesley St. to Yonge, down Yonge to Queen St. and over to the city hall.

The demonstration was part of an international day of Vietnam protest.

At one point the line stretched two miles and long after the speeches began at city hall remnants of the march still straggled in.

The demonstrators were forced to use sidewalks because police chief James Mackey refused a parade permit for Yonge St. The refusal was based on a bylaw forbidding marches along streets which are congested and have a heavy mercantile character.

The organizers had refused an offer to use Bay St. or University Ave. because they did not want to demonstrate to "vacant lots".

Trucks bearing slogans and singers cruised along with the marchers at a regular traffic pace.

Several times onlookers shouted at marchers from the other side of the street.

"I fought in two wars when you were 13 years old" one elderly man yelled. Boo! Boo! "Why don't we hit him?" a marcher suggested.

"I lived in occupied Europe," said a man wearing a yellow slicker and mop-end wig. "I know what the Communists are like." He carried a sign reading I'm a Peace Creeper.

A protester stole the wig and told a newsman trying to take pictures, "Why don't you interview us? He's not part of this. He doesn't count."

"It's a disgrace," said a middle-aged man with two days growth of grey whiskers and a definite odor of whiskey.

"These people are foolish. Why fight on your own doorstep? Fight on someone else's! I'm 100 per cent for what they are doing in Vietnam. Why have a massacre in Canada? I'm a veteran you know"

On his lapel he wore a black ribbon outlining the letters EBS. EBS stands for Edmund Burke Society, an ultra-right wing group which mustered about 30 to demonstrate in support of the war.

test threats to world peace existing today. If this slaughter of Vietnamese civilians continues, it will amount to genocide."

In Winnipeg, 700 demonstrators appeared. And in Calgary a 15-block parade through the downtown area grew from 80 marchers at its start to 200 at its destination.

About a third of the marchers were university students. The others ranged from children to grandparents. Hippies, students and others—1,500 in all—turned up at Vancouver city hall to join the nation-wide protest.

Other protests were held at Edmonton, Saskatoon, Regina, Kingston, Kitchener and other cities.

Few marchers were interfered with by police, although some did encounter problems getting permission to demonstrate. Only a few scattered incidents of violence were reported.

Students against draft-dodger aid

A random survey shows that an overwhelming majority of University of Toronto students seem opposed to the use of student funds to aid American draft-dodgers.

But Students Council President Tom Faulkner thinks the issue is still open.

Only 21 per cent of 200 students polled last week said they approved of financial help by SAC.

Informed of the results of the poll—which shows a far sharper division of opinion than SAC's 24-21 vote against draft-dodger aid earlier this month—Faulkner said:

"You say what you believe if you are a man of integrity.

"We have a responsible government, not a representative government."

Faulkner, who was "bitterly disappointed" with SAC's decision, said SAC members had a responsibility to "vote as individuals" on the issue.

Faulkner was disappointed that SAC members had not fulfilled their responsibility to lead student opinion on the draft-dodger issue.

"I think I could change their opinion if given an opportunity," he said.

The question will not be brought up again in SAC, he said. But smaller campus groups such as the University College Literary and Athletic Society and the Graduate Students Union could continue the fight.

Marxism is like Christianity: Gibson

Marxism and Christianity have not carried out a mutual dialogue because they are so similar, a St. Michael's College professor said Friday.

Rev. Arthur Gibson, a consultant to the Vatican's secretariat for non-believers, told a pre-Teach-In audience both systems stress the concept of future good.

Both emphasize the dignity of man, he said, but sacrifice him to the ends of their systems.

Father Gibson asserted that Marxism is a competitor of Christianity, not a definite antagonist. Christians have failed to discern this.

Communists, like other people, are trying to relate to the world around them, he said. There is evidence of "a shift of emphasis from Marx's economic determinism to the importance of free individual human decisions."

The hippie movement, Father Gibson said, is in response to a similar need.

"It calls the individual out of inhuman organized society dedicated to the cult of success to the wilderness to build a new society based on love."

Both movements, he said, are saying that: "You can't organize an effective society on any base other than the human individual who must be able to transcend himself without abnegating personality."

SAC will publish study of bookstore

A detailed study of campus bookstore operations will soon be published by the Students Administrative Council.

A committee headed by SAC members David Nitkin (III New) and Larry Monick (III C & F) has been studying bookstore operations since early summer. They hope to release the report Saturday.

"The report will answer questions many students have concerning the prices they are paying for books and supplies," says Nitkin.

"It will also examine bookstore operations in other Canadian universities," he added. "Some bookstores offer a thesis typing service, for example."

"The report deals for the first time with our bookstore operations. We have seen financial statements we have never been able to see before. We've met officials we have never been able to confer with before. If nothing else, the report will tell SAC why students are paying the price they are for books."

York council will include students

Students at York University's Glendon College will have five members on the faculty council of the college.

The faculty council voted 25-3 to include students. The decision now must be ratified by the York senate.

Rick Schultz, former Glendon students council vice-president, called the decision "a major step in involving the students in their own education," although the students would not be allowed to take part in the council's committees.

The students council will choose the representatives for this year only. A committee has been formed to investigate methods of choosing students in future.

"Once the students have been chosen they will be completely independent," says students council President Alan Whitely.

Washington march sees clashes, arrests

WASHINGTON (Special)—After bloody clashes at the Pentagon Saturday between demonstrators and troops, a few hundred demonstrators remained to lay peaceful siege yesterday.

Their ranks thinned by the more than 400 arrests Saturday, a hard-core group that had spent the night on a Pentagon parking lot sought to rekindle Saturday's protest that saw thousands of demonstrators charge on the defense department headquarters.

At mid-afternoon yesterday, the army said aerial photographs showed 790 demonstrators were outside the Pentagon—compared with its estimate of between 30,000 and 35,000 demonstrators Saturday.

Sponsors of the protest claimed that 200,000 persons participated in Saturday's demonstrations.

At the height of Saturday's violence, a handful of protesters slipped through a secondary Pentagon entrance but were beaten back by troops brandishing clubs and rifle butts.

An estimated 3,500 troops were employed in defending the building against the demonstrators whose avowed aim it was to paralyze the nation's military nerve centre.

Officials said that by early yesterday afternoon 434 persons had been arrested in the Pentagon area on charges of disorderly conduct. Arrests included author Norman Mailer, Dave Dellinger, chief organizer of the march, and Dagman Wilson, leader of Women Strike for Peace.

Of the 47 injured, officials said 10 were soldiers, 13 were U.S. marshalls and 24 were civilians.

Some demonstrators charged that the troops used tear gas Saturday, but this was denied by Major-General C. F. O'Malley, commander of the military district of Washington.

Dan Henkin, a Pentagon officer, said demonstrators obtained nine tear gas canisters when they broke through a line of soldiers and used it themselves.

Massed marchers show hilarity, fury

Varsity reporter Sherry Brydson was prevented from taking pictures of the early stages of the march by protesters who jostled her and waved signs in front of her camera.

"You're ruining pictures for The Varsity," she told one youth. "I don't care," he replied.

"Don't you want publicity?" she asked. "Nah, we only want to end the war."

A mother and her two children bent over to pick up signs which lay on the legislative building steps.

"My kids have been asking why kids are being burned in Vietnam," she said. "I don't think anyone should try to destroy any other country." Her children were 8 and 10.

Students totalled only about one-quarter to one-half of the demonstrators. Women, children and old men made up a surprisingly large contingent and whole families joined the march.

The marchers blocked traffic from the side streets as they crossed and created a huge tie-up.

Police patrolled the curbs on motorcycles urging the marchers along.

"Your horse has got B.O.!" a protestor told a mounted policeman. "That makes two of you then, doesn't it?" the cop replied mildly.

On Queen St. a man in his 30's lunged out at the marchers crying, "You stupid little punks! Communists!" Three policemen moved in and surrounded him.

"Move along," they ordered. "Me move? I live here," the man shouted. "Make them move!"

ATTENTION: all Varsity staffers. There will be a general office solidarity meeting in the Varsity office Wednesday at 1 p.m. Attendance is not compulsory, but it is certainly desirable . . . Very desirable.

The marchers chanted "Hey, hey, L.B.J., bow many kids you killed today?" and "Withdraw U.S. troops!"

Sometimes the march had an almost funeral atmosphere with the somber two-by-two movement of bowed heads.

Joe Young, head of the student wing of the end the war movement, cried to the onlookers: "Join us now! Don't start a third world war." Some laughed, some muttered under their breath. Most stared silently.

Draft-resisters marched as a body carrying yellow placards reading We Refused to Go.

At Nathan Phillip's Square the Edmund Burkites gathered together and shouted, "Hey, hey, Ho Chi Minh, how many kids have you done in?"

Tight circles formed around right- and left-wing debaters but police were always nearby and no violence developed.

Police reported only one arrest during the whole three-and-a-half-hour demonstration — one charge of malicious damage. A St. Catharines student had painted a swastika near the Archer sculpture with an arrow pointing to the Burke delegation.

Speakers Dr. Gus Tolentino, Mennonite minister Bill Epps and June Callwood addressed the throng.

Near the end of the speeches cries of "We want Joe Young" and "Let's hear from some students" were picked up.

The organizers of the march had originally decided not to let Young speak to the rally because he is "too radical."

Finally Young came to the front of the platform as the microphone was taken away. He was handed a megaphone.

"You did a good job today," he cried. "Students make up about one-half of this demonstration! There must be two or three thousand of you out there!"

"We want the war to end! We want to live! We want a future! We want to build a beautiful world!"

"Withdraw U.S. troops!" the crowd chanted several times and then it began to dissolve.

Hundreds of signs and placards were piled in front of the speakers platform and the 4,000 went home.

teach-in: dry instruction

At Sunday night's closing session of the Third International Teach-In, a thin sad-boy-faced Buddhist monk from South Vietnam, Thich Nhat Hanh, gave the best speech of the entire weekend.

His message: Vietnamese don't care about communism or capitalism, which are western concepts. What they do care about is independence and it is the National Liberation Front that is fighting that battle. The NLF is still mostly non-communist but the extent of U.S. involvement in Vietnam is every day creating more communists out of people stifled in their fight for independence.

Thich was refreshing because he discussed the war from a neutral position.

The U.S. is fighting China over the bodies of an innocent people, Thich was saying last night. He thereby dragged the tail end of a weekend's discussions to a particular issue.

Conor Cruise O'Brien mentioned Vietnam in Friday night's opening session, also made strong anti-U.S. remarks, but chairman Donald Evans attempted to steer debate away from that particular war.

Evans told the speakers to be theoretical and general in their remarks, and (to quell any possible protest from activist students) he made the rather pious remark that he knew the war is a problem and had actually helped organize a demonstration of U of T professors against it.

Evans was retreating into the quiet academic role of calm and deep inspection of issues and avoidance of emotionalism on particular topics, or as Claude Bissell has pointed out, submerging protest into education.

Conor Cruise O'Brien, though, had concluded that Vietnam is an unjust war.

It wasn't hard for him to say that, for as he pointed out, it is not a very leftist position; even that darling of Conservatives, Edmund Burke, would agree. The audience agreed too; there was much applause but no dissent for his statements.

It may be merely that the right wing types, who have charged that previous teach-ins were leftist-stacked, stayed away this year. On the other hand, a general drift of public opinion away from the U.S. position has been noted by all the polls lately.

Yet O'Brien's statements confronted the teach-in organizers with the essential problem of the weekend. Yes, Vietnam is unjust but should it be made the central part of the discussions? Certainly it should have been, and several speakers including Thich, Krishna Menon, Canon John Collins, castigating Washington for its Vietnam policy.

Yet, most of the rest of the Teach-In's five sessions were generalised and often pious treatments of morality which hung on no particular examples. That's what made much of it dull.

march: flawed commitment

Some 4,000 people, including U of T students, showed their concern over world affairs in quite a direct way this weekend. They walked from Queen's Park to City Hall to join groups in many North American cities in protesting United States actions in Vietnam.

For practical purposes, the march was virtually devoid of any intellectual content — as any demonstration of the sort is bound to be. There were speeches at the end, and members of various groups distributed literature. But we doubt that the literature, however profound, was greatly read, or that the speeches, however grounded in insight, had much impact as they were shouted through a bullhorn into the October winds.

The marchers showed their conviction, but it is far from certain that they were greatly effective.

There is even danger in the largely emotional appeal of such a protest. Skilful manipulators of opinion might be able to turn to their own ends the sort of sincere but unsophisticated concern expressed by such a march. For example, Washington might be able to deke out many of the genuinely concerned by ordering a bombing halt and calling on its opponents for tokens of "sincerity" — in reality, of surrender. Clear thought and some knowledge would be needed to assess such a development.

In addition to doubts one might have about the adequacy of the march's "message," there are also well-known unresolved questions about the effectiveness of this form of protest. For instance, are uncommitted Canadians impressed by the sight of lines of marchers with placards — especially in view of the inevitable beards, catcalls and delayed traffic?

In balance, however, we consider the march to have been a Good Thing. Probably, it does contribute at least a little to public consciousness. And, whether it does or not, at least opponents of U.S. policy had a chance to get together and take heart from their numbers.

We don't think the 4,000 who marched Saturday have brought us a lot closer to a peaceful world. But they have made a modest contribution.

committed instruction?

The Teach-In was an attempt toward understanding that had some significant failures, most of which involved the lecture format in what is said to be an educative process.

The march attracted 4,000 people but had its own failures, most of which involved its low level of intellectual exchange and high degree of emotional impact.

Briefly, the Teach-In had intellectual content without commitment and the march commitment without intellectual content.

Somehow future Teach-Ins — assuming of course that the tradition of an autumn series of Varsity Arena lectures is to be continued — must combine two themes.

The Teach-In has made much of its evolution from the protest format in which teach-ins were born, but that format is the only way to secure both commitment and intellectual exchange.

If the Teach-In is to escape becoming part of the educative tradition in the same manner as Simcoe Hall or a Sidney Smith Hall lecture, it must escape the purely academic approach which characterized this year's instalment.

The march, of course, spurred commitment with its straightforward, largely non-academic appeal.

Marches unite the previously committed but face the danger of becoming a simplified North American way of being half in and half out of the Establishment, if in fact they have not already reached that point.

A marriage of teach-in theory and march theory is the only salvation for both unless they are to become tired expressions of academia and involvement respectively.

Dr. Alex Quaison-Sackey, of Ghana, Muhammad Zafrulla Khan of Pakistan, both former foreign ministers of their country, and former presidents of the United Nations General Assembly, agreed that it is a bad thing that men are losing their belief in God. Other speakers agreed that religious faith unfortunately has little effect on the conduct of international affairs, hardly an earth-shaking concept.

But only Thich successfully combined theorizing with actual, particular cases in an interesting and emotionally involving way. Only Thich had any real influence over men's opinions.

When most of the others spoke theoretically, they were being controlled by the framework of the teach-in; the framework then actually laid out the theory that would evolve in its sessions.

Only men such as Thich, by quietly protesting, educated the audience on any really pressing issue. He did so with a quiet humility that tended to belie his anger.

That tolerance, morality, humanism and non-egoism, are desired elements in international affairs, as almost everyone from U Thant on film to Garfield Todd in person pointed out, is hardly a fact that needs much driving into our minds.

There was very little actual debate in this teach-in because the speakers all seemed to agree on their premises. They were all moral, liberal human beings concerned for the lack of humanism in international affairs. Had there been someone like Cardinal Spellman who uses his position of religious leadership to actually effect public opinion on issues such as the Vietnamese war (in his case, in a dubious way) present, there would have been confrontation and argument.

But that takes the concept of a teach-in to the level of show business, and this year's Teach-In was definitely not show-biz. Yet the idea of a teach-in implies an element of show business. Not that we should have had the sabre rattler hiss at the Gandhian non-violence man, but something in between would have been fun and enlightening.

As it was, the first night, there was a large number of people submitting questions to be asked of the speakers. The four remaining sessions saw people leaving before the debate and question period. They seemed to sense that if they left there, they wouldn't be missing much.

Religion and International Affairs

By PAUL CARSON

The five weekend sessions of this third International Teach-In can be compared to a grand feast slightly marred by carelessness in the kitchen.

Extending this metaphor, in terms of intellectual nourishment, the chefs assembled enough condiments for a real piece de resistance only to spoil the effect by serving the wrong courses.

Those charged with the organization of each session made serious errors in judgment.

On Friday night, the opening speaker, Kenneth Thompson of the Rockefeller Foundation, took an alert, awake audience and almost single-handedly put it to sleep. Not by WHAT he said, for it was excellent, but by HOW. He preached.

For the next three days, we heard much wisdom, but also too much preaching. We gave the conditioned response, and fell asleep.

The speakers were not confined to their allotted time, consequently, all speeches ran long. Many were simply too long for comfort.

As an example, the plea of Father Ramirez for greater openness towards Latin America and the explanation of the Christ-Morxist dialogue by Milan Opocenski, buried in their lengthy speeches, passed almost unnoticed.

Despite its commitment to the interplay of ideas, the Teach-In was sadly lacking in controversy, either intellectual or political.

The speakers, perhaps seized by the spirit of ecumenism, seemed eager to hide their differences under a cloud of generalities.

Even the "outspoken atheist" Patrick Corbett (he didn't like the title, but that's how he was billed) clung tenaciously to the twin pillars of mutual understanding and ideological pluralism.

The audience waited in vain for deep disagreement, dissentian, debate.

This combination of paor (in the technical sense) oratory and the reluctance to disagree produced the inevitable result: the audience became restless, bored, disinterested.

At every session, and especially on Sunday afternoon, a large percentage of the audience left right after the speeches.

They didn't even bother to wait for the "debate." It didn't matter: nothing was missed.

So much for what went wrong. Compared to what went right, they're just a series of very minor annoyances.

The quality of the speeches, as I saw them as press copies before delivery, was uniformly excellent.

Intelligence, insight, conviction, the occasional flash of wit, all were present.

Unlike the previous Teach-Ins, this current effort has stability. If there were few actual crowd pleasers, there were absolutely no serious blunders. Generally, the speakers varied only in their degree of excellence.

Remember that loquacious Cambodian diplomat from 1965 or the pompous Charles Burton Morssholl from last year?

To my mind, there are four highlights from the weekend's activities:

—Bishop Trevor Huddleston presenting the usual Christian defence of apartheid, then succinctly demonstrating why it is both un-Christian and irreligious;

—the sight of Gorfield Todd crisply attacking racial segregation, and in the process probably forfeiting all claims to honour and wealth in his dishonourable country.

—the halting eloquence of Father Gustavo Ramirez as he insisted the advanced societies could learn much more about the implications of religion from the underdeveloped world than most people care to imagine;

—the passion and dedication of Dr. Ralph Abernathy as he prepared to undergo his twenty-third arrest for demanding civil rights on behalf of all Americans (next week, in Birmingham, Alabama).

The first Teach-In was for the emotions, urgency, innovation, success.

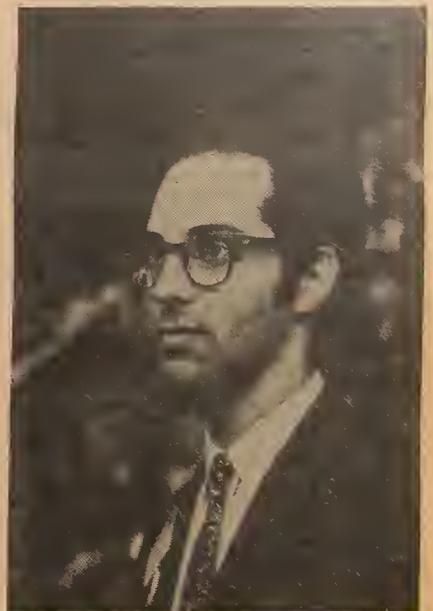

The second Teach-In was for the dissemination of knowledge.

The third Teach-In is for the mind, the heart, the will of the participants.

The organizers took on a most difficult task. They succeeded well, very well indeed.

Man of faith would not fight: Collins

CANON LEWIS JOHN COLLINS

By PAUL MacRAE

The man of faith should never have to go to war, declared Lewis John Collins, canon and chancellor of St. Paul's Cathedral in London.

"I am convinced that in the modern world, seldom if ever would an enlightened conscience give permission to fight," the 62-year-old canon said in round British tones.

"And certainly not if the fighting were for the preservation of sectional or national interests as distinct from the interests of mankind as a whole, or were likely to embroil other countries in a national or global war.

Canon Collins is chairman of Christian Action, a group of Christians concerned with political action on such issues as the war in Vietnam, apartheid and nuclear disarmament.

He cast ridicule on the idea that a limited as opposed to nuclear war was still possible in the modern world.

"Once the rule of law is abandoned between nations and war is begun, how is it possible that rules limiting the weapons to be used and the targets to be attacked would be observed?

"No sanctions of morality or humanity have ever in the past deterred any nation (including Christian nations) from using any weapon, if it appeared to be in its interest to do so."

Canon Collins cited the life of Christ as "the only realistic way of life for mankind" if man wishes to end war.

To create world peace he urged the establishment of a world government and police force, and a study into non-violent ways of preserving peace.

In answer to a question on the morality of the military draft in the United States, he said a government has the "right" to do anything the people allow it to. However, the people may be morally wrong in their decision.

"I have met people who were not Christians but had a better understanding about Christianity than many Christians," he said.

U.S. war in Vietnam is unjust: O'Brien

By BRIAN CAWFIELD

The morality which condemns power politics but does not altogether preclude the use of international violence was presented by Professor Conor Cruise O'Brien.

He described his position as the most "perceptive" approach to the problem of religious faith and war.

Prof. O'Brien claimed his was a morality for ordinary human beings, while the pacifist position is for saints.

"A religious ethic that claims to shape the response of human beings to war must surely take account of what human beings are," he said.

Prof. O'Brien, a former diplomat, now is Albert Schweitzer Professor of humanities at New York University. A distinguished author he has contributed to the New Statesman and the New York Review of Books.

This morality leads to a clarification of the war in Vietnam — which is an unjust war — O'Brien asserted.

If the United States could prove that it is actually menaced by North Vietnam it would then have a morally defensible position, he said.

Prof. O'Brien described his position as neither pacifist nor "necessarily a leftist one." But he conceded that the degree of dissention and incoherence that exists among the American people over the Vietnamese issue is proof of the injustice of the American cause in Asia.

"From what is known of this war, and by the ancient tests of a religious ethic which sanctions war in defence of one's home, and repudiates war fought for prestige, dignity and high renown — by these tests the war which the United States is fighting in Vietnam is an unjust war. And the resistance to the United States is a just resistance."

Prof. O'Brien said religion had consistently been invoked in history both to legitimize and to limit violence.

It is the role of the moralist in international politics, he said, to oppose "the man who is horribly in love with high renown."

This apparent reference to U.S. President Lyndon Johnson was greeted with warm applause by the audience

A modern balance of terrors: Thompson

By SHERRY BRYDSON

Kenneth W. Thompson, the vice-president of the Rockefeller Foundation, said peace "is carved out in the shadow of war.

"And war's only justification must be more stable conditions of peace."

He said present-day peace and order depend upon a "balance of terrors."

Before the two world wars, he said, "men were ready to resist at the first sign of an effort aiming at upsetting the balance of power. Peace will always be the first casualty."

The power-for-peace philosophy so popular with young Americans "opts out of the question of relating force and peace," Mr. Thompson said. "These approaches are not so much wrong as they are insufficient."

There is no simple solution to world peace, he contended.

"The growing belief that peace can be isolated as the ultimate and independent value in international society falls to critical discussion and examination.

Peace, he said, depended on trends within and between states, political and social organization, economic sufficiency and on the maintenance of a stable equilibrium of power.

"Food supplies, population growth and national morale were as vital to peace as single-minded devotion to the idea of peace in the supreme values," he concluded.

Although goodness is "almost boundless" in international society, he said, evil still persists throughout history despite our best efforts to rid the world of it.

"Surely limited war is morally superior to total war," Mr. Thompson said, "and the Cold War is to be preferred to a shooting war."

If, however, there is a shooting war man's moral duties will be "to restrict its spread once it erupts and to bring it to an end as promptly as possible.

"There can be no compromise in individual morality but there has to be a compromise in average social morality," he said.

In response to a question on the military draft, Mr. Thompson replied:

"The sovereign state seeking to preserve its independence has to hold the power to raise an army and to levy taxes to pay for the army. Every president uses this power in a seemingly arbitrary way.

"However, the right of the individual to conscientiously object is imbedded in the Constitution."

Tougher Rhodesian policies needed: Todd

GARFIELD TODD

By BRIAN CAWFIELD

Garfield Todd, former prime minister of Southern Rhodesia, accused Harold Wilson's British government of failing in its policies toward the now-breakaway state.

"Wilson's guarantee of the principle of majority rule before independence might have been good enough to even prevent the Smith rebellion," he said.

Mr. Todd pleaded for Canadian support in his efforts to "see the good started" in Rhodesia.

The world outside his country must pledge massive concern and "everything short of the use of force" in the struggle for freedom in Rhodesia, he said.

Mr. Todd went to Rhodesia in 1934 from New Zealand as a missionary of the Churches of Christ. He was first elected to the legislature in 1946 and became prime minister in 1953.

His efforts in 1958 to extend the franchise to all Rhodesians led to the resignation of his cabinet and he was replaced in office within several months.

Mr. Todd said he would not participate in violence to free Rhodesia. But he did not deny in discussion that force had not produced some good at times in history.

He predicted that guerrillas presently infiltrating Rhodesia from northern states would not be successful in toppling the Ian Smith regime.

"Minority governments ... once committed to retaining complete political control, must grow increasingly ruthless in their use of force, intimidation and terror."

But as a man of faith himself he said he could not condone the use of terror to match terror.

"I would plead that violence would not be used against their de facto government."

Mr. Todd was scathing in his denunciation of the Dutch Reformed Church in both South Africa and Rhodesia.

"The great number of whites in Church membership are supporters of their own position of privilege. The Dutch Reformed Church ... openly supports the governments and their policies of racial separation."

Mr. Todd called on all men of faith to declare themselves against the "sin of separating our brothers into groups, based on race and color."

Christian must be a revolutionary: Abernathy

By JIM COWAN

Dr. Ralph Abernathy, an active civil rights worker with Rev. Martin Luther King, said Christianity not only justifies revolution but commands it.

Religious revolution should take place when it is confronted with the social evils of discrimination and prejudice, he said.

Dr. Abernathy, who drew applause several times from the generally quiet audience, is well acquainted with discrimination.

He has been arrested 22 times for his civil rights activities. There now is a warrant out for his arrest in Birmingham, Ala, and he returns to Birmingham this week to face the charges.

"The true church must be out in front tearing down the old system and building a new one.

"Christ himself was a revolutionary leader. If all the Christians today lived their faith, the world would be revolutionized.

"Everything I know about my faith teaches me to work for social reform."

Dr. Abernathy called for unity among all people who "cherish the most elementary human rights." He said that, "The forces of evil are not merely stubborn; they are powerful and organized."

The predominantly white society is unwilling to spend the money to properly educate Negro children, provide adequate housing or create accessible jobs, he stated.

"We have a mocking, vengeful welfare system which directly causes the break-up and humiliation of families."

Great advances have been made by the non-whites in the last 12 years but the cost has been high. However Dr. Abernathy said, it has been worthwhile. He was only sorry that "every new step on the road to freedom is more difficult than the last."

Dr. Abernathy is a staunch supporter of non-violence. But he said non-violent protest can be effective only when properly understood and carried out.

"Non-violence does not mean inaction," he said, citing the passage of civil rights legislation as a major accomplishment of the non-violent movement.

"There is a fierce wind blowing in the universe today, tearing down social order and ushering in a new era," he said.

"We shall continue onward, confident that we, black and white together, shall overcome someday."

REV. RALPH ABERNATHY

Catholics accept some revolutions: Ramirez

By MIKE KESTERTON

The Roman Catholic Church "quite explicitly" accepts revolutionary uprising against "evident and prolonged tyranny," said Rev. Gustavo Ramirez, a Colombian priest and sociologist.

Addressing the audience as "citizens and members of an affluent society," Father Ramirez said the majority of powerful nations in contemporary history were born in a revolution.

"Civilization does not advance by the action of orthodox conformists."

Fr. Ramirez is director general of the Columbian Institute for Social Development.

When asked if his group would support guerrillas who are opposed to an organized church, he said.

"No. That's one of the things we are trying to change in Latin America."

He called on underdeveloped nations to foster a "strong sense of solidarity and common effort." A revolution today cannot be made in isolation.

At the same time he warned against a revolution like Cuba's, which made it into "a new colony."

He explained that "the poor of the third world are the real proletariat of humanity. They are exploited by the great powers of the world and their existence is menaced by those who attribute to themselves the policing of the poor, simply because they are more powerful."

Father Ramirez told the audience "You are part of the tragedy and thus responsible to a great extent."

THERE'S A LOT MORE TO A TEACH-IN THAN JUST SPEECHES AND QUESTIONS

There were approximately 6,000 cups of coffee sold at the third International teach-in.

Now, if the coffee was just to keep warm, people would have done better to use some of the 113 multi-colored blankets hung on the walls of Varsity Arena.

The coffee was used by watchers undoubtedly to stay awake. The blankets were part of a $250 Teach In project to improve the sound.

Well, the sound was good. Everyone could hear. And the teach-in was boring. Everyone needed coffee.

"We're only hearing one side of the dialogue, and that side we've known for years," commented one listener.

"How much dialogue can there be when there is already consensus among the various speakers?" asked another.

Mike Ignatieff and Jeffrey Rose are to be congratulated on the smooth, organized operation of the Teach-In.

In all modesty, they themselves did just that. Said Rose: "It's the greatest thing that ever happened to me. Everything is going very smoothly".

The organizers, perhaps unwittingly, chose speakers who could not provoke anything.

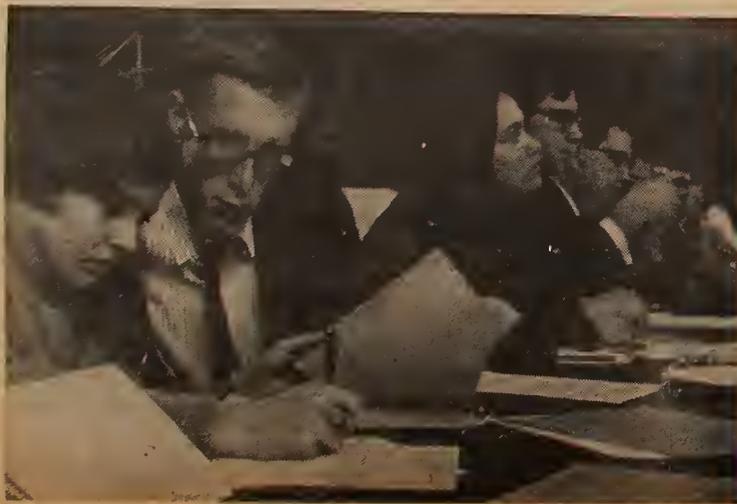

"If this is Student power" said Prof. John Robson, commenting on the choice of topic, speakers, and organization of the teach-in, "we can do with more demonstrations of it". Prof. Robson was chairman of last year's Teach-In on China.

So the students organized a well-organized teach-in.

There were no demonstrations, there was no heckling from the audience, there were no paddy-wagons, and no metro police. The U of T police were on guard but they didn't have much to do.

Even the traditional pamphleteers confined their hand-outs to acceptable locations.

Among the literature distributed were books of Chairman Mao's quotations, End the War in Viet Nam papers, Rhodesian protest folders and SCM book display advertisements.

Meanwhile, back inside, the audience applauded when speakers condemned the war in Vietnam, LBJ's policies and the use of violence to solve problems.

Wonder what would have happened if someone had said the war was inevitable, that the Americans were doing the right thing in Vietnam and that religions had no place in today's world.

No one did so now you'll never know.

The first teach-in was highly controversial, the second undecided and the third harmless.

Maybe the idea has lost its novelty. We see the teach-in degenerating to a grand-scale lecture and we wonder if there will be a fourth.

Some churches justify apartheid: Huddleston

BISHOP TREVOR HUDDLESTON

By JIM COWAN

An African Anglican bishop accused Christians of countenancing racial discrimination.

Rev. Trevor Huddleston, a white Tanzanian bishop, said this has been especially the case in South Africa. Churches there have justified the country's apartheid policy, he said.

Mr. Huddleston called the history of faith 'a history of call, commitment and separation'

Any time a religious faith springs up, the initial result is always divisive, he said.

But faith is also responsible for breaking down inter-human barriers and achieving a deeper unity among men, he asserted.

Mr. Huddleston said the character of intolerance has changed in recent years. Mass communication has made man realize that the problems exemplified in Detroit and Rhodesia are international rather than local. This has given man his greatest shock.

Prejudice arose at the time of the emergence of the church, Mr. Huddleston continued. The conflict then was over binding the church to rituals.

But in spite of discord there has been a steady stream of protest against discrimination from within the church, he said.

"The final question," Mr. Huddleston said, "is what can men of faith do to promote tolerance in our divided, schizoid world?"

"Men of faith and the churches will promote tolerance only if they keep their ideals bright and shining in spite of the constant disillusionment of human existence."

Religious men must influence policy: Sackey

By BRIAN CAWFIELD

A former president of the United Nations General Assembly declared that governments can no longer conduct international affairs without taking into account the wishes of the governed.

Dr. Alex Quaison-Sackey, former foreign minister of Ghana, said:

"If we talk about international relations or race relations we should mean human relations."

Religious men, he asserted, must influence the policies of their governments. Religion has too often been a divisive force in world politics.

Dr. Quaison-Sackey said he could not understand how ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church, "which calls itself Christian," could furnish religious justification for the "obnoxious" policy of apartheid.

"Apartheid debases the African personality and engenders intolerance. Few people know that apartheid goes far beyond the problem of racial discrimination as it is known in the United States."

He argued that while the United States government was at least trying to do something about its country's racism, "in South Africa the chief apologist for apartheid is the Pretoria government itself.

"Politicians are not supermen," he said. It is necessary that they should be guided by the great moral principles enshrined in the different faiths of the world."

No room for intolerance in Islam: Khan

SIR MUHAMMAD ZAFRULLA KHAN

By ROBERT MARSHALL

Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan said that within his Moslem faith there is no basis for intolerance so far as doctrine or conviction is concerned.

Islam, said the former Pakistani foreign minister, stands emphatically for freedom of conscience. "Everyone must make his choice and accept or reject in absolute freedom whatever he chooses to believe in or to deny."

Thus, he said, a Moslem sees intolerance not as bred by sincere religious conviction, "but in consequence of professing allegiance to a faith without sincere belief in its teaching and values . . . Intolerance is both a confession and a proof of lack of real faith."

Sir Muhammad, president of the United Nations General Assembly in 1962-63, and now a judge on the International Court of Justice, is an acknowledged spokesman for the Islamic movement. His writings include Islam and Human Rights.

In relating the ideals of his faith to the realities of action, he said the directives of the Koran "should, one would have thought, have ensured the complete observance not only of tolerance but of beneficence" on the part of Moslems.

The greatest threat to the development of tolerance, he suggested, was a "wave of indifference" growing among all religions and an "attitude of make-believe that has become predominant in our day."

Religions do not prevent intolerance: Hayes

By DONNI BOHNEN

The executive vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress says organized religion "is failing to measure up to the exigencies of modern life."

Saul Hayes said all religions preach the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God.

But, he asserted, prejudice and intolerance result from "the essential difference in man between what he is taught to do and what his primordial instincts make him do."

Intolerance, he said, is overt hate, discrimination and oppression—not the tension growing out of conflicting and passionately held positions.

"The Christian religion, which started as the greatest love-in in history, turned out to be the greatest hate-in in history because of what took place over the centuries of the Middle Ages and beyond into modern times"

The lesson of history is in vain, he said, if the church abdicates its responsibility today. Something must be done to "repair the damage to the psyche, to the institution of religion as a result of this gigantic and colossal failure."

Unless something is done to reconcile doctrine with the changing social values of a new world, we will be guilty of "the worst sin of all, merely expressing piouistic notions and not engaging in what has to be done to remedy the ills of the world."

Christians need Marxist dialogue: Opocenski

Dr. MILAN OPOCENSKI

By JIM COWAN

Christians require a dialogue with Marxists just as much as Marxists must speak to Christians, said Milan Opocenski.

"Jesus did not die against, but for Karl Marx", said Mr. Opocenski, a Czech Christian Marxist and currently the European Secretary of the World Student Christian Federation in Geneva.

"The Marxist movement has preserved a sympathy for the poor, powerless and exploited" said Mr. Opocenski, "better than those who have heard the prophetic word."

Marxism deals with basic questions of the human individual and social existence.

"Marxism reminds us constantly that man is a part of a larger community. In Marxism there is a unity of study and action, a reflection and involvement," said Mr. Opocenski.

In contrast to this, Mr. Opocenski pointed out, the Christian community often contains groups that are narrow-minded and excessively scrupulous.

"They are guided not so much by the wonderful freedom of the gospel of Jesus of Nazareth but more by the Christian labels and cliches, which they themselves have thought out."

Mr. Opocenski said ideologies should neither be glorified nor demonised. He believes that the whole subject of ideology "urgently needs a thorough re-examination."

In conclusion, Mr. Opocenski stated that "The search for truth and the loyalty towards this or that particular viewpoint does not exclude tolerance towards other men. We can co-exist in spite of a profound ideological disparity."

Religion is really an ideology: Corbett

By KATHERINE BARCZA

Patrick Corbett, a philosophy professor at the University of Sussex, England, said it is "seriously misleading" to contrast ideology and religion.

Ideology, Prof. Corbett said, is "a set of beliefs" about the world, man, life and society, "combined with the claims that all these beliefs are inter-connected and that they must be professed by any member of the relevant group."

And religion, he said, is just another institutionalized system of belief about human nature and conduct.

About the relative power of ideologies, Prof. Corbett said political and economic facts indicate that religion exerts "at best a secondary, and often no more than a minor, influence upon the modern mind."

Prof. Corbett called for establishment of "a straightforward secular ethics."

Since "ideologically, as militarily, the world is polycentric," the need is for "an ethics, transcending present ideological divisions."

Prof. Corbett defined "the ethics of understanding" as one of "listening rather than talking, of asking rather than asserting, of inviting criticism rather than making it."

The citizen can play a key role in "so-called democracies" when he "thinks himself out of the standard cliches of the system that contains him."

"I think that we are witnessing at this very time precisely such a grass-roots transformation in American opinion about Vietnam."

"And I doubt if it will be long before the leaders have to listen."

Ideologies pose threat to peace: Booth

By SHERRY BRYDSON

"Ideologies are the greatest threat to peace," said Rev. Alan Booth. "If we are serious about peace we must take a very careful look at ideologies."

Rev. Booth, a methodist minister, is secretary to the Commission of the World Council of Churches on International Affairs Ideologies, claims Rev. Booth, enable us to understand what is going on, or at least give us the feeling that we understand.

However, he warned, ideologies always involve over-simplification and "as a rule, the more passionate the ideology the more it over-simplifies reality."

Of course, one has to oversimplify in order to grapple with history, said Rev. Booth.

"We need ideologies and we use them to change and control events in history. Without them we are helpless, just victims of what occurs, or blind to the meaning of events."

Christianity, says Rev. Booth, is not an ideology. "I would say our constant job is to prevent it being identified with any ideology."

However, the Christian church is in danger of becoming an ideology when people present it as a system of morals. Both capitalism and socialism "are typical of plants grown in soil fertilized by Christianity." Both care very much about men, and both "conceal what terrible things that have been done to flesh and blood in their name."

Christianity, concluded Rev. Booth, is not an ideology but "the end of ideologies with all their moral earnestness"

New Left offers modern solutions: Shaull

By SUE HELWIG

The New Left offers the greatest potential for solving the problems of modern man, Professor Richard Shaull declared.

Pro. Shaull, a teacher of ecumenics at Princeton Theological Seminary and a former missionary in Brazil and Columbia, called the New Left "a new community of messianic concern in the heart of our own society."

"If we are inclined to give any value to the Christian symbols, they would suggest that we become involved in the struggle for man as now defined by these movements."

"There we may find the proper context for reflection about man and his future."

"These symbols do not constitute a total rational system," he said. "But they may provide some insights that can contribute to more creative secular thought."

"The rioting in the United States this summer," Prof. Shaull said in the question period, "indicates the recognition that a fundamental change in the structure of society is needed now."

"At present there is no structure in society adequate for fulfilling such change."

"But violence will not bring about change in the way desired although it may play a role."

Both sides share blame in Vietnam: Hanh

By BRIAN CAWFIELD

THICH NHAT HANH

A Vietnamese monk, long a vehement opponent of the war racking his homeland, blamed both communists and anti-communists for the conflict.

Thich Nhat Hanh said both doctrines present themselves as "ways of salvation."

"The man of faith is responsible for the war," he declared.

Mr. Hanh, a Buddhist poet and scholar, and author of Vietnam, Lotus in a Sea of Fire, made an impassioned plea for understanding of "this very complicated war."

It is not the anti-communist struggle that is the vital one, he said.

"Ninety percent of the people are interested in neither one nor the other. What they want is peace and national independence."

He said the National Liberation Front is composed mostly of non-communists "continuing the work the Vietnamese were doing against the French."

The slim articulate Buddhist said that the longer the United States' forces stay in Vietnam the more Vietnamese they "convert" to the cause of the NLF.

The American forces are unable to distinguish between guerillas and peasants, he said. In fact, a small league for social reform that he had organized was annihilated by American forces.

Religious men in Vietnam are committed to a "third way" of winning the war, he said.

"The problem in Vietnam can be summarized as being that the Vietnamese would like to be saved from salvation, liberated from liberation."

Peace is a state responsibility: Menon

By PAUL MacRAE

V. K. Krishna Menon, India's former defence minister, said peace between nations is not the special concern of the man of faith.

"The Nuremberg trials fixed the idea of individual responsibility for the actions of the state," he said in an address punctuated by applause.

"I would say the time will come when scientists, propagandists, indeed all who allow their talents and apparatus to be used for destruction, must be held individually guilty for their application."

"Since everyone is affected by the impact of modern war, — all men of faith, scientists, housewives and politicians — all have a responsibility."

He said creating and preserving peace has never been the preserve of religion. "Every war in human history has received the sanction of organized religion."

"Further, since those who hold a religious faith fervently tend to believe their own brand is superior to others, this can lead to additional causes of friction among nations."

Mr. Menon suggested that the only ways to end war are to obliterate utterly all engines of war, and to remove fear from the relations of nations.

Mr. Menon concluded that students had the greatest responsibility in preserving peace, "not because of your greater wisdom, but because you will live longer."

Buddhism influences my work for peace: U Thant

By SUE HELWIG

U Thant, the secretary-general of the United Nations, made his presence felt at the Teach-In with a plea for the defence of peace through love and compassion.

In a 20-minute colored film, Mr. Thant delivered a statement explaining how his religious faith, Buddhism, has influenced his work at the United Nations.

Universal compassion to be extended to all beings irrespective of their status, race or creed is one of five Buddhist tenets which he said are relevant to the human conditions today.

This tenet is essential to the "universal principle of truth" that should guide international as well as human relations, Thant asserted.

He called for application of the doctrine of non-egoism to the field of international relations.

"It is understandable that the major powers should pursue objectives which seem to be in their own national interests."

"But they should not be blind to the existence of a larger goal, the common interest of all countries, large and small, in the survival of the human race."

Non-violence, part of the Buddhist code, is a basic concept of the United Nations Charter, U Thant said.

"History teaches us that no durable solution can be found for any human problem except by persuasion and common consent."

The Buddhist doctrine of Karma — the principle that every action has a reaction — is analogous to the UN call for tolerance between nations.

The law of love and compassion is one to which "we are all too ready to pay lip service," Thant said.

Christians have disregarded Christ: Neill

By ROBERT MARSHALL

No religion has done all it could to better international relations and peace, but Christians must accept the major portion of the blame for the trouble that now exists.

So said Rt. Rev. Stephen Neill, teacher and ecumenist, in blasting Christians for "the shameful story of the disregard of the teaching of Jesus Christ."

However, this is not reason enough to condone a reaction against religion, he said. There are powerful forces inherent in religions, which cannot be wished away.

"To a religious man, the concept of peace is not a negative concept, meaning the absence of war. It is full of positive content."

Bishop Neill, a professor of missions and ecumenical theology at the University of Hamburg and a founder of the world's first union of all denominations, the United Church of South India, said the religious man, has two basic responsibilities in the field of peace.

He must never give up the struggle for reliable information, and he must keep an eye on the information being given to the youth of his nation.

The press is "doing a pretty good job" of spreading information, he said, yet it is still difficult to get accurate and reliable information in many situations.

"Religion is not a matter of words, doctrines and dogmas. Religion is not real unless it manifests itself in devotions and services."

Paint, a blank fence, sunny weather and a group of frustrated artists and graffiti buffs — all added up to a SHARE Happening at New College Friday afternoon.

For the modest sum of $1, The Varsity had the opportunity of showing the world where it stands artistically. Remarkably narrow-minded, aren't we?

More creative types carried out erudite artistic conversations as they worked.

"Has somebody got a Playboy? Any issue?" pleaded one prospective artist.

"Ginko tree, we gotta have a ginko tree," said one collaborator to another. "Where can we put a pillow? We can't leave that out."

SHARE canvassing will continue all this week in hopes of reaching the $15,000 goal. There's still time to give, baby!

'Caste' opens Hart House season: less than satisfying

By ALAN GORDON

Can a 100-year-old play find a happy production today? Will we ever see a student revival production that cherishes the intent of the author? Will the Argos play in the Grey Cup? These are just a few of the random thoughts that sprinted daintily across my brow during the opening performance of Caste at Hart House Theatre.

The mere fact that a play was saved from a hundred year exile from the stage would indicate that there is something in it of meaning for us... today.

And there is. Caste is basically a brilliant study of the implications of snobbery. The idea behind snobbery is that, for some reason, some people regardless of ability are better, more worthy than others.

Springing from this attitude are such modern notions that killing for utility is right. That the slicing up of "enemy" human beings in the name of country, family or self is right. That the idea, expressed this weekend again, that the United States should strive for a peace, but a peace not without honour. And one thinks of the honor in Napalm, and the bombing of innocent civilian villages. Snobbery is the stuff that wars are made of.

In Caste, playwright Tom Robertson carefully, with both wit and compassion dissects the ramifications of social stratification, and what happens when an idealistic gentleman marries below his caste. The Honorable George D'Alroy loves Esther Eccles an actress who appears in the Ballet at Covent Garden. By careful, clever handling of situation and realistic dialogue, playwright Tom Robertson explores the joys and agonies of such a relationship. Esther is not equipped to send George off to war with the coolness and aplomb that his mother is. Nor is George's mother, a Marchioness, equipped to encounter the drunken, irresponsible Eccles, Esther's father. Both encounters are brilliantly conceived by Robertson, but like many other instances in the production neither encounter achieves any kind of meaning other than the obvious comic one.

The production at Hart House treats the play as a knockabout farce. While there is comedy in the show, most of the laughs are achieved at the expense of the author rather than to his credit. Asides are shouted and broadened to the point of burlesque. Formal curiosities are so emphasized that the very real conflict between classes is lost in the shuffle. The husband's return from battle is treated as low camp. His explanation of escape from near death is treated as a boring speech best to be got through quickly, with as many distractions as possible.

The chief fault of the production is that it trusts neither the audience nor the author. We are taken by the hand, and told that asides are a strange theatrical convention. (They are not impossible. Alfie used them to terrific advantage.) Then we are forced to recognize all the rusty plot machinery, and rub our noses in the few excesses of florid language. Every defect of the play is brought forth with amazing clarity, and we are forced to ferret out the excellences ourselves.

The acting mirrored this insecurity with the next. Too often did we feel that Jeremy Hole, as George D'Alroy, and Clare Coulter as the Marquise were trying to figure out "what to do" with the speech. Play it straight, for goodness sake! Jack Newman's drunken Eccles whose main claim to the working class is his diligent avoidance of any kind of exertion was perhaps the most completely realized character, with John Astington's amiable lower-middle class gas-man running a close second. Mardi O'Donoghue's Esther had the fragile strength that was needed for most of the show, but her hokey homecoming scene destroyed any feeling we had for her character.

This production of Caste is a confused reading of an important play. Caste seems to become more and more relevant as its hundred year old message goes still unheeded today. This production obscures the relevance and presents us with a play as dated—and camp—as gaslights.

Zionism branded anti-semitic "tumor"

By LOUIS ERLICHMAN

Zionism is actually anti-semitic, a pre-Teach-In panel was told Thursday.

Professor Isma'il Faruqi of Syracuse University branded Zionism a "tumor" founded on "imperialistic, racialistic ideas."

The Arab-Israeli conflict in June was not a "holy war" on the part of the Arabs, he said before a largely hostile audience.

Prof. Faruqi called assertions of biblical origins to Jewish claims to Israel "an unholy twisting of scripture."

"Islam and Judaism are moments in the same semitic stream of consciousness," Prof. Faruqi said.

But many Arabs, including himself, had been "robbed of their land, clothes, books and future by Zionism."

"It is an idea which alienates man from man and we must destroy it."

Writer Earl Berger dismissed Faruqi's denial of Israeli claims to Palestine as being based on "a highly selective view of history."

"Zionism is crucial to Arab nationalism," he said, as it symbolizes all that his gone wrong in Islam in the last few centuries.

"Both Islam and Judaism have faced a crisis in self-esteem, and Israeli success has emphasized Arab failure."

Clyde Sanger, Globe and Mail United Nations correspondent, said the UN would not allow Israel to disappear.

He also felt that while the UN peace-keeping force in the Middle-East had been built on a "crazy foundation," U Thant had taken the only logical action in his immediate withdrawal of the troops on the request of Egyptian President Nasser.

"The troops' presence was based on a personal agreement between Dag Hammarskjöld and Nasser and if the request was not honored this time, the UN would never again be welcomed into any other country."

Saskatoon gives students senate seats

SASKATOON (CUP) — A committee of the board of governors of the University of Saskatchewan has recommended that students be given seats on the senate.

One student from each campus is to be appointed by the Students' councils.

Saskatoon campus President David Pearpoint said he did not regard the move as a breakthrough in student-administration relations, but saw it instead as a step towards opening lines of communication.

Protesters pressured by border guards

By PAUL MACRAE

A University of Toronto student has claimed that he and three companions were detained five hours by U.S. border officials to prevent them from joining the anti-war protest march in Washington.

John Jamieson (11 VIC) said in an interview yesterday he had been elected by the U of T Committee to End the War in Vietnam to attend the Washington gathering.

His companions were Frank Piccolotto, a second-year University of Western Ontario student, Mike Piccolotto, a member of the United Electrical Workers union and Ed Firth (11 Vic).

Jamieson said they were stopped for inspection Friday night by a U.S. border official who examined the trunk.

He found a number of anti-Vietnam-war pamphlets and told them to park the car and go into the customs building.

Jamieson said he was asked if he was a subversive, if he advocated the overthrow of the U.S. government, and a number of other questions relating to his political beliefs and activities.

After an hour of interrogation the four were sent back to the Canadian side for failing to declare the anti-war literature.

They drove to the Niagara Falls crossing point and this time declared the literature. About 40 miles into New York they were forced to the side of the highway by three police cruisers.

They were questioned for 20 minutes when a cruiser from the border guard detachment arrived. They were told that they were under arrest for illegal entry, but that they had the right to call a lawyer and could refuse to answer any questions.

During this time they were called "stupid Canadians, always causing trouble."

Jamieson said they were taken to a dark area behind a service station where the car was thoroughly searched. Then his friends were each put in one of the cruisers and Jamieson was told to follow them in his car to the border.

Jamieson asked for a state trooper for his car so he wouldn't be lonely but was refused.

"They took us to the border and held us for two hours," he said. "They wanted us to sign an oath saying they could interrogate us for an "indefinite" period of time but we didn't sign.

"We said we were willing to answer any questions on our crossing but that's it. Otherwise, we wanted a lawyer.

"The head of immigration questioned us anyway without the oath. We asked them to lay a charge and let us call the Canadian consulate, but they didn't.

"Finally they told us we wouldn't be deported but would allow us to return to Canada 'voluntarily'."

The four were delayed five hours in all without any charge and would have been unable to reach the Washington march in time.

"This is just another example of the freedom of the individual and freedom of speech in the almighty United States of America," said Jamieson—"the only country in the world that fears the truth about itself."

Squashers win two rounds, rowers fade

Varsity Blues went as far as the third round before being knocked out of the Canadian Centennial Squash Tournament, Saturday.

Blues dropped a 5-2 decision to Toronto Racquet Club and were eliminated from the three-day tournament held at various clubs throughout the city over the weekend.

Montreal Badminton and Squash Club won the seven-man team tournament by defeating Hamilton Thistle club 5-2 in the final yesterday afternoon.

Blues dropped a hard-fought decision to the top-seeded Montreal club Friday evening. Although six of seven of the Montrealers are nationally ranked, including Canadian champion Colin Adair, Blues put up a stiff fight before losing 7-0.

In one of the best matches of the evening Mike Gardner took eleventh ranked Ian McAvity to extra points twice before dropping a 3-0 decision.

Frank Buck, Blues' top seed, drew the task of playing Adair and showed well before succumbing to the more experienced Canadian champ.

Blues' only victory of the tournament was in the first round where they defeated St. John's Newfoundland Squash Club 6-1.

Their next tournament is the Ontario team championships at the end of November one week prior to their trip to the United States for five matches against top college competition.

ROWING

A frustrated U of T rowing team returned to Toronto Saturday without posting a single victory at the Brock Invitational Regatta.

Looking in fine shape at the 1,000 metre mark of all three races entered, our crews faded badly over the second 1,000.

The problem—in the lightweight eight race, the winning crew from Mac rowed a controlled rate of 34 strokes per minute while the Toronto crew scrambled along at an uneconomical 40 per min. and were burned out by the halfway point.

To correct this, subsequent training will emphasize controlled rowing, with a long stroke, moderate rate and smooth bladework a few of the factors to be worked upon. Conditioning naturally shall not be neglected.

Toronto cannot yet be ignored as a contender for the OQAA rowing title, as a cursory glance at previous race results would seem to indicate. Though the gap to be closed is appreciable and the time remaining short a victory is possible and Toronto crewmen are determined to make it theirs.

Regatta results: Freshman Buffalo 1, Western 2, Brock 3 Junior Varsity, Western 1, Brock 2, Mac 3. Lightweight, Mac 1, Brock 2, Toronto 3. Heavyweight, Western 1, Buffalo 2, Ryerson 3.

Rugger Blues change names

By DOUG WOODS

In previous articles Varsity Rugger Blues teams have been referred to as the first and second teams. However, since the caliber of the opposition is nearly the same in both the Eastern and Western leagues it has been decided that the teams will be called the Eastern Team and Western Team.

To clear up any confusion: the Western team (formerly the seconds) plays McMaster, Western, Guelph, and York, and the Eastern team (formerly the firsts) plays McGill, R.M.C., and Queens. The winners of each league go into a final to determine the winner of the Turner Trophy.

In action at Guelph over the weekend, the Varsity Western team battled Guelph to a 3-3 tie. The play throughout the game was very ragged with both teams making far too many errors.

Varsity dominated the play in the first half but were unable to score. Guelph managed a few sporadic attacks and on one of them managed to carry the ball over Varsity line for a try. The convert was missed.

In the second half rookie John Holmes scored a try for Blues after running almost the length of the field through the whole of the Guelph team. The convert attempt was unsuccessful.

Bob Noble saved the game for Blues when he kicked the ball out of the hands of the Guelph Hooker before he could touch it down in the Varsity end-zone late in the second half.

A cocky Eastern team almost went down to defeat at the hands of the Queens Golden Gaels as they found themselves behind 5-0 at the half. They came on in the second period, however, and, on the strength of tries by Doug Phibbs and George Wraw and a long penalty kick by Wraw, managed to produce a 9-8 victory. It was not one of the Blues more spectacular wins.

The scrum won a good deal of the line-outs but only when the ball was being returned by one of their teammates. Andrew Bethell was once again a standout in the pack. The Blues did much better in the set-scrum but their loose play left much to be desired.

The backs didn't really start playing until the second half although Doug Phibbs contributed a few good tackles to keep the first half from becoming a rout.

Despite this somewhat shaky display, Blues are now established as the team to beat in intercollegiate rugger. They are undefeated this season and have beaten all the league opposition. It looks like Varsity's year for the Turner trophy.

Guelph tough as Blues come back 4-2

By TONY TOE

A strong Guelph defense and a Toronto attack that did not seem able to finish off their plays almost produced the upset of the year in soccer action on Saturday. However Blues did score three times in the last ten minutes of the game to win 4-2.

Varsity started off quickly and dominated play in the first half hour of play. However, shoddy shooting foiled their opportunities until Jim Lefkos banged in a loose ball after a corner kick for a 1-0 lead.

Oddly, this goal seemed to spur Redmen to fiery action and within five minutes they knotted the score on a fine effort by Jim Kosiw. From that point on, the game was a hard even battle until the end of the first half.

After the crossover, Blues seemed to relax a little allowing Redmen to beat them to the ball. After ten minutes, the Varsity defense blundered and Don Longworth scored on an excellent shot that gave the Varsity goaltender little chance. The Blue machine was beginning to squeak.

However, Blues slowly established their superiority and the relentless drives started clicking and almost paying off. The Guelph goalie was forced to make some spectacular saves while the Varsity forwards were missing golden opportunities.

With fifteen minutes left in the game, Guelph's Jim Kosiw got behind Blues defense and drilled a shot at the net.

Stan Bogucki managed to deflect the shot about a foot. It was barely enough as the ball hit the crossbar and came back into Bogucki's arms. Lady Luck was finally beginning to smile at Blues.

Ten minutes from fulltime, Varsity was awarded a penalty kick and Austris Liepa made good the attempt.

Two minutes later Lefkos went high into the air to head in a crossed ball and give Varsity a 3-2 lead. Re-lie! Lefkos added an insurance marker a couple of minutes from the end on a good passing combination with Ron Muir.

The game was played in a ridiculous mudhole as a result of last week's rains. Nevertheless, both teams seemed to adjust to the hazardous conditions and put on an entertaining show of expertise.

Great team effort enables track Blues to regain Tait

A great team effort by the Varsity quartet of Dave Bailey, who was in Mexico 24 hours before, Larry Bobbett, Bill Franklin, and anchor-man John Loaring streaked home first in the mile relay to upset Queen's in record time, and take the last event of the OQAA track championships. Their performance was typical of the tremendous team effort which regained the Tait trophy for U of T by almost 20 points.

So solid were Blues that coach Fred Foot could not remember one performer who did not count points during the afternoon.

But whenever a team is solid in depth there are usually a few who stand out over the rest. For Blues it was Bailey, who, undoubtedly fatigued by this Mexican trip, roared from last place after the first lap to edge Queen's Dave Ellis in the half-mile. A scant three minutes later he was back on the track facing Waterloo's Bob Finlay in the mile. A gallant final lap left him only 0.8 seconds behind at the tape as Finlay lowered the mile record to 4:08.2. Later Finlay won the three-mile event in near-record time.

However, the really outstanding performer at the meet was University of Montreal's Michel Charland, a member of Canada's Pan-American team. Charland took the 100 and 200 yard dashes and long jump in easy fashion. His 9.8 time for the 100 yards tied the existing record. Charland received the Hec Phillips trophy for his exploits.

As well as the superstars of the meet, other creditable performances were achieved. Not the least of these was Brian Armstrong's brilliant second-place finish in the three-mile race which he ran in 13:56.8, a new Canadian junior record. Toronto also shone in field events with Dave Arnold winning the discus and placing third in the shot put. Gord Homer and Bill Watts placed first and second in the javelin while Jukka Heikurinen garnered Blues' other first in the pole vault.

YEAH MAN!! SMUG GAELS FALL TO BLUES 19-14

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Hell, Boston can have its Red Sox. We'll take Varsity Blues' football team, thank you.

All season Blues have put on periodic displays of greatness, only to lapse into depressing mediocrity at some stage of the game. Saturday afternoon in Kingston, they were a great, truly great football team for the entire sixty minutes as they stunned Queen's smug Golden Gaels 19-14.

Before the shocked, rabidly partisan crowd, Blues fiercely manhandled quarterback Don Bayne and his highly-rated offence, while grinding relentlessly through Gaels' tough defensive line for their upset victory. Mike Raham capped a tremendous individual performance by scoring the winning touchdown on a two yard drive, midway through the fourth quarter.

Given a lead to protect for the first time in the game, Blues' marauding defense turned into a roaring, surging mass of manpower as they completely swallowed Gaels' attack. In the last five minutes, the ferocious front four of Alex Squires, Jim Bennett, Yio Korgemagi, and Alex Topps dropped chagrined quarterbacks three times for long yardage, and forced hurried, inaccurate tosses on five other occasions. Meanwhile, Blues' pass defense were shadowing eligible receivers closer than the narks trail potheads.

For coach Ron Murphy it was his finest hour as a coach. So-called experts had taken one look at his massive injury list and, crossed off any chance against Frank Tindall's healthy powerhouse. But Murphy became Mr. Mldas-Man as his gilded fingers drew into a big bag of tricks and pulled out superb football players.

At offensive centre and end respectively, were rookies Steve Brown and Mark Slater, getting the roughest baptism possible to intercollegiate competition. Off their excellent performances, Queen's must have wondered how good were regulars Don Rogers and Brent Morris.

Quarterback Bob Amer justified a hundred times over Murphy's unwavering faith in his ability to do the big job. Under Amer's direction, at no times did Blues' offense sag. Glen Markle shrugged off an ankle injury to play the entire game in the offensive backfield. His output was merely 67 yards rushing and one touchdown. Defensively, rookie Larry Lukas hit as hard and with as much determination as any of his teammates. He almost broke Gaels' Ron Brooks in half with one particularly devastating block to spring Mike Raham on a long punt return.

Right at the outset of the game, the crowd received a sign of impending doom for their Gaels. On Blues' first offensive play, Slater jumped about a mile offside, so anxious was he to blast his adversary across the line.

Interesting enough, despite the fact that Blues were all over them throughout the game, Queen's led most of the way. After a fine 49 yd. punt return by Jim McKeen, Gaels opened the scoring four plays later on a one yard sneak by quarterback Don Bayne. Guy Potvin's convert made it 7-0 at the 6:29 mark.

Varsity continued to dominate play but an unsuccessful third-down gamble and an unfortunate holding penalty kept them off the scoreboard until early in the second quarter when Markle snuck over from the one. Paul McKay's convert knotted the score.

Following the kickoff Queen's made its only offensive drive of the game, moving 68 yds. in 8 plays, before Ron Clark followed Doug Cowan's blocking into the end zone from the six yard line. With little more than a minute remaining, McKay narrowed the gap for Toronto to 14-10 by booting a field goal from 41 yds. out that just squirmed over the goalposts.

The second half proved the old adage that "a team that won't be beaten can't be beaten." And it proved it well. With the Bennett boys, Mike Wright, Lukas, etc. crunching goldshirted ball-carriers to the ground at every opportunity, and the defensive backfield, covering all and everyone, Gaels' offense tallied only four first downs and threatened only once. Jim Bennett stopped that effort by nailing Clark for no gain on third down at the 20.

During the third quarter, Toronto kept knocking at the door but opportunity awarded only a pair of singles by Paul McKay. One field goal attempt hit the crossbar.

With the wind at their backs starting the fourth quarter, Queens looked in good shape but Blues knew what to do. They kept the pigskin on the ground. Behind crisp blocking, Mike Raham and company tallied yard after yard, slowly wearing away Queen's defensive line. The winning touchdown came on a march that consumed 60 yds. and five and a half minutes in 12 plays. Key play was a pass interference call which nullified a Gael interception. Queen's seemed to believe only in their press clippings. Blues won because they believed in themselves.

Redmen surprise Western

University of McGill Redmen posted their first SIFL victory in two seasons as they defeated University of Western Mustangs 15-13 in Montreal.

Redmen, whose last league victory was in 1965 when they edged Varsity Blues 17-15, scored two touchdowns early in the first half and then held off Mustangs' final rush for the win.

McGill halfback Dave Doherty opened the scoring on a 66-yard pass and run play with QB George Wall.

Minutes later, Redmen guard Mike Butler gathered in a Bob Isreal fumble and covered 11 yards for the major. George Springgate converted both TD's while Mike Kearns booted a 29-yard single to complete McGill's total.

'Stangs, who missed an excellent opportunity to win when Israel fumbled on the McGill 12-yard line late in the final quarter, got touchdowns from quarterback Israel and fullback Jeff Hilton, and a single convert from Ottavio Colosimo.

Both teams were assessed over 100 yards in penalties in the hotly contested game.

Offensively, Doherty was the big ground gainer with 43 yards in 16 carries. Hilton was good for 47 yards in 17 carries for 'Stangs.

Through the air, McGill QB Wall was good on seven of twenty pass attempts while Isreal and Joe Cipparone completed nine of twenty western aeriels for 120 yards.

Doherty also led the receiving department as he latched onto two passes for 83 yards and a TD.

Varsity's top offensive threat, Mike Raham (22), who rushed for 92 yards, caught 4 passes for 53 yards, and tallied 100 yards from 4 punt returns, takes off an one of his many jaunts. Blues' Glen Markle (21) and appanent Jim Tait (29) tango in the foreground.

Eng Soc bombs Blue and White-then compromises

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

The Engineering Society last night overwhelmingly rejected the Blue and White Society.

After an hour and a half of debate, it passed a motion saying "the Engineering Society cannot support the Blue and White in the form it now takes."

However they compromised somewhat by adding an amendment that "the Students Administrative Council investigate the functions and composition of the Blue and White."

The effect of this amendment is to give SAC the impression that the Engineering Society is not necessarily for out-and-out abolishment of the Blue and White, members said later.

Several Engineering Society members were unsure whether or not the Blue and White should be abolished and felt that reform was the better solution to the problem.

Ron Thompson (IV APSC) said: "We should pass the buck to SAC and let them take the responsibility".

But other engineers were worried about the money the Blue and White has lost and felt it was their responsibility to speak out.

Art McIlwain (III APSC) said "the Blue and White has a remarkable capacity for making money disappear."

Shelly Goodman (III APSC) said "the Blue and White is so completely unorganized that when they produce something, it's a matter of how much they are going to lose."

And Allan Bruce (III APSC) declared: "the Blue and White is beyond the point of reform and should be abolished".

SAC will debate a motion saying the Blue and White should be abolished at next Wednesday's meeting.

Engineering Society President John Morris (IV APSC) said the size of the Blue and White (estimates ran up to 80 members) was "unwieldy."

"Their primitive structures and rah-rah ideas are not what a sophisticated campus like U of T wants", he said.

Morris pointed out that engineers build the Blue and White winter carnival ice palaces, build homecoming floats, and are the largest college or faculty group in attendance at Blue and White functions.

Much discussion revolved around possible Engineering Society sponsorship of dances formerly handled by the Blue and White.

Ray Carnovale (IV APSC) questioned the Engineering Society's financial competence to sponsor additional dances. He charged there was no order in the Engineering Society's records of expenditures.

"If we're (the engineers) going to hang out dirty linen, we'd better check our own for spots first," he said.

Bob MacCallum (III APSC) responded by promising to produce a statement of expenditures for one of last year's major engineering dances in question within one hour of the opening of the engineering stores this morning.

Carnovale, publicity director for the Blue and White, was the main opponent of the motion.

He said that even if the Blue and White were abolished, there was nothing to stop it from existing independently.

The present society will ensure that the Blue and White continues to exist, he added.

Artsman loses battle for BFC flag

A University College artsman took on the engineering Brute Force Committee yesterday—and lost.

The unidentified student rushed a group of engineers and tried to seize the S.O.B. flag. They had locked the front gate of UC with a chain as part of their latest caper.

Within seconds he was surrounded by 15 BFC members and thrown to the ground.

One observer said the artsman was accidentally kicked in the head, another that he was accidentally "stepped on."

Both agreed he managed to stand up and left the scene in a hurry. The University health service had no reports of an injury.

The caper involved 500 engineers who marched to Queens Park and tried to present Premier John Robarts with a SHARE computer dating form. Premier Robarts was not in.

While being worked into a frenzy the engineers were urged to "move upward and inward to attain a higher climax and meet their end."

Then with cries of "Free Ontario" (abbreviated) they returned to wherever it is that engineers go.

CUS protests Duff-Berdahl conference

The Canadian Union of Students has organized its own seminar to protest alleged inadequacies of a conference called this weekend to discuss the Duff-Berdahl report.

CUS objects to a public conference this Saturday at St. Michael's College's Carr Hall to discuss the controversial report on university government in Canada.

CUS President Hugh Armstrong criticized conference organizers as offering an overcrowded agenda.

So, CUS will organize a seminar series for Victoria College to be held concurrently with the original Saturday session.

Sir James Duff and Professor Robert Berdahl, co-authors of the report, will chair the original conference.

In a letter this week, Armstrong told Dr. E. F. Sheffield, organizer of the conference program:

"Piecemeal reform is academic government, without regard for the functions of the academic community is, in our view, directionless and futile.

"Discussion of academic government must begin with an examination of the purposes of the academic community, and structures must be consistent with purposes."

The original conference agenda consists of two sessions. Saturday morning five critics will present their criticism of the report and the authors will reply.

In the afternoon a four-member panel will report on reforms or plans for reform of university government. Another panel will study four selected cases.

"This (original) agenda would not provide for the full and active participation of those attending which the seriousness of the issue merits," Armstrong said.

CUS has invited Matt Cohen, lecturer in religion at McMaster University, to speak on Functions of the University, and Ian MacKenzie, a member of the Trinity College English department, to speak on Training Versus Self-development in Education at an afternoon seminar.

Three speakers will discuss Concepts of Power, Strategy for Change in the University and People and Power at an evening seminar.

Innis first to sit on Faculty Council

Innis College has become the first college on campus to have student representation on a faculty council.

The council was made up of 13 faculty members, the principal and the registrar. It will add the students

Innis votes Anti-Draft support

The Innis College students council last night voted moral and financial support of the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

A motion giving approval in principle to the program passed 8-3.

And a separate move to supply $50 to the program's hostel project squeaked by 7-6 after two hours of debate.

"This is something that concerns every student, every single person," said council President Ken Stone (IV Inn).

Dissenter Gary Priestman (III Inn) said, "I voted no because this is a highly moral issue, up to the individual. It should be given to the students as a body."

There is a possibility that a referendum movement will be started within the student body. If 10 per cent of the 474 students request a referendum, it will be held.

"I voted as a representative of the students," said Stone. "However, the referendum is a loophole for the student body if they want a recall of the motion."

The Students Administrative Council earlier this month rejected a motion to provide aid to draft-dodgers through the program.

council president and four students elected by the student body. There will also be three administrative assistants.

"We sent a letter to President Bissell last spring," said Stone. "We were hoping for an answer before this. We elected four members to sit on the council as assessors. Now they have full privileges."

Tiddlywink team travels to Waterloo

The University of Toronto tiddlywink team will travel to Waterloo Friday for this weekend's North American tiddlywink championship competitions.

They will meet competitors from Cornell University, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Columbia University and Waterloo University for the North America Cup.

The victors will fly to England early next year to play Oxford for the world title. The prize there is the Silver Wink, donated by Prince Philip.

Earlier this year the U of T team set a world tiddlywink record by staying at the game 67 hours. This will be registered in the Guinness Book of Records, say team spokesmen.

Blood drive sets 3,500-pint target

The target for the two-week Canadian Red Cross blood drive, which opens next Monday, is 3,500 pints.

Spokesmen for the drive say whole blood is in grave demand at Toronto hospitals to control hemorrhage, speed recovery, save infants born with heart or circulatory defects and for countless other emergencies.

The Canadian Red Cross blood transfusion service provides free blood to any patient in any hospital in the area served.

The whole process takes only 30 minutes—including testing, registration, rest and refreshment.

Student voice proven worthless: Hoch

By SUE CARTER

A member of the Macpherson committee has criticized the recent decision to allow student representation on faculty of arts and science committees.

Dr. Paul Hoch, a post-doctoral student, said in an interview:

"In the light of the Macpherson report, the recently announced student voice in the faculty of arts and science is a worthless concession."

He was commenting on an arts faculty council decision early this month to give students a say in faculty decisions. The move was heralded as a major concession to student demands for a voice in university administration.

The main feature of the decision was the inviting of students to sit on the faculty's six course clubs: general arts, general science, humanities, social, physical and life sciences.

The report is clear on the relative insignificance of these committees, Hoch said.

The report reads:

"The standing committees on the general course and the general course in science meet rarely and do little.

"Anyone with experience on these committees (including those of the honor courses) knows that they are so reluctant to question the decisions of the departments that they seldom intervene . . .

"Nor have they thought it their function to give any creative thought to innovations or improvements.

"Our proposed structure . . . will require something more effective."

Dean A. D. Allen of the faculty of arts and science said yesterday he did "not agree entirely" with these criticisms.

He denied there were any plans for the abolition of these committees which, he said, "serve an important purpose."

The replacement of the existing system, he said, would depend upon "how the Macpherson report develops."

Eighteenth-century costumes and wild bugling this week announced a series of four Sunday evening concerts of 18th-century music. They will involve professional musicians under the direction of renowned conductor Boyd Neal and are sponsored by the Hart House orchestra committee. ## Students on Windsor, Guelph senates

WINDSOR (VNS) — The University of Windsor was one of two Ontario universities which announced last week that students would sit on their senates.

The Windsor announcement, coupled with a similar move at the University of Guelph last week, brought the number of Ontario universities with student senate representation to three. The University of Western Ontario was the first.

Windsor will seat the students council president, one graduate student and two undergraduates. Students will also be allowed on several senate committees.

While allowing student representation, the Guelph senate turned down a proposal for open meetings.

Guelph students now must decide whether to take the representation without the open meetings or to follow a resolution passed at last month's Canadian Union of Students congress in London, Ont. which said:

"Students should refuse to serve on decision-making bodies within the institution which routinely follow a policy of secret decision-making."

Eng Soc defeats impeachment motion

The Engineering Society last night narrowly defeated a motion to impeach Allan Bruce (IV APSC), a Students Administrative Council representative.

The impeachment motion came from mechanical club chairman Enzo Narduzzi (IV APSC) because Bruce voted in favor of a SAC resolution to give financial aid to draft dodgers.

A recent referendum of engineering students showed 94 per cent of those polled against such aid.

Impeachment requires a three-quarters majority of the sitting executive of the society. If Bruce had been impeached the issue would have gone to a general meeting of the student body.

Bruce said he felt he was in a better position to judge the issue after hearing the views expressed at the meeting.

He added that since he was not given a mandate by the engineering society on the issue, he was not compelled to vote according to the results of the referendum.

"After all, you can say to yourself, I must look as bad or mad to him as he to me; and wouldn't it be interesting, even perhaps helpful, to discover how I look to somebody so different?"
J. P. Corbett, ITI fourth session

the ethics of understanding applied

During the International Teach-In's fourth session an English philosophy professor from Sussex, J. P. Corbett, outlined his "ethics of understanding."

This ideology, Corbett said, could be used in international affairs to settle differences.

Suppose, he said, you are confronted with a man who not only rejects your idea but rejects the ideology it is based on. What do you do?

Corbett suggested you try to understand his position fully and get him to understand yours. See what premises you agree on and keep talking out those on which you differ.

You will find he has exaggerated some of his points and you have exaggerated some of yours. When the exaggerations are stripped away, your positions will be closer but probably still not equal.

At this point most people will give up talking. They may resort to fisticuffs, war or whatever combat happens to be appropriate to the situation.

Corbett went on: "... simply hold yourself in check and listen. That is extraordinarily difficult: the whole force of your organized passions carries you the other way, to protest and attack." He pointed out that in international affairs today the large nations have no choice: they have to hold themselves back.

Corbett's idealistic system would be welcome in the handling of international affairs but is not bloody likely to come about. International affairs are not very often based on logic that can be argued and understood.

Yet understanding is the end result of Corbett's ethics. Even if full agreement is not reached, understanding can be.

But no wonder such seminar techniques cannot be carried into international affairs. Right down at the most personal levels of human relations people don't use them.

Even here at an intellectual institution, discussions are based on preconceptions and prejudices rather than logic.

We're judging by the letters we receive here at the Varsity. Some are, like the juvenile illness of the engineer reprinted below, so devoid of fact, and so full of ranting as to make them useless for consideration. We don't really want to receive any more like that. If there's something you don't like, explain it.

On the other hand, there are the many letters from people who merely criticise us for taking leftist positions on issues. That kind of blanket denunciation is equally useless.

Until you analyse why you think a leftist position is so bad, we can't really consider your position. Paul Framm, for instance, doesn't like us taking a position anywhere left of standing still.

Other writers criticise us for saying nothing new. They'll repeat everything we said earlier and say that's not enough, never realising we'd like to hear his ideas if he has any.

Some writers say we don't reflect the opinion of the majority of students at U of T. We solicit opinions on why a newspaper should.

We'd like to see the draft dodger letters over again taking into consideration the freedom of the individual who makes a moral judgment apposed to the will of his government not whether befriending a draft-dodger interferes in the internal affairs of the U.S.

In fact, never send another person to war without considering what you would do in his position and why. So, what would you do if you were drafted to fight in Brazil to defend the property of Brazilian Light and Traction Co. Ltd., against a revolutionary uprising.

That's what Corbett means by the ethics of understanding. Putting yourself into his position, evaluating his ideas as well as your own and, above all, never leaving your prejudices unquestioned.

the macpherson report

As a supplement in today's paper, we have started reprinting the entire Macpherson report on the faculty of arts and science.

It is on the basis of this report that the administration will make changes at this university to bring it a little more into the 20th Century. Some of the recommended changes are already being brought about quietly. Some will take a great deal of talk and arguing before decisions are made.

But all of them are important. And students at U of T should read them, evaluate them in terms of their own work here and then take an interest in the affairs of this university.

We have been critical of much of this report but not all. We want the students to speak up whether for or against it.

The report is sure to have an effect on most other universities across Canada and if you are to have any power in the shaping of your own life, you must start here at university.

The format of this supplement is designed so you can easily collect and collate its sections into a 32-page book. Use the eight pages today as a cover and merely insert the sections we will publish during the next few weeks.

LETTERS

it seems we're peter's malady

Sir:
After reading the last few issues of the Varsity I am convinced your editorial staff is the worst ever assembled and your writers the dullest people alive. Never have I read so much garbage from one newspaper in so short a time. Your articles and editorials on draft-dodgers, marijuana and politics (Vietnam included) make me sick. Every time I see a Varsity now I almost barf.

Peter Dupak (III) APSC

lisa said it but fromm objects

Dear Sir:
Few things are more disgusting than hypocrisy; even fewer things are more revolting than hypocritical crusading journalism.

Your paper has repeatedly supported the programme of the New Left. One of the favourite cries of the New Left is that conservatives are McCarthyites, given to smearing and slandering their opponents. We of the conservative Edmund Burke Society here at U. of T. have striven religiously to avoid labelling or smearing. The draft-dodgers may be, for the most part, despicable, misguided, and cowardly; but we do not label them, as would be convenient, as "communists". Similarly, Austin Clarke may preach the black power, White hating creed so dear to the heart of Chairman Mao; but we do not smear him by surmising that he is therefore a "communist tool".

But what do we notice in the pages of the Varsity. Nearly every reference to the Edmund Burke Society is couched in downright misrepresentations and obscene innuendo. Quoting patent lies, like we are "advocates of genocide" or such diarrheal-drippings of a pornographic tongue, such as the E.B.S. is a group of "psychic masturbators" is in the best tradition of the unscrupulous yellow press.

However, your most flagrant misrepresentation occurred in last Wednesday's Varsity, where my picture accompanied an article by Laurel Limpus. Neither the Edmund Burke Society nor myself was mentioned in her article condemning S.A.C.'s refusal to aid draft-dodgers. Nevertheless, my picture was quite gratuitously included in the article. Indeed, when the S.A.C. decision occurred I was 360 miles away in Montreal. Does fact or truth mean anything to your layout staff. The caption to this picture, though, was even more objectionable in its disregard of truth. "F. Paul Fromm... who encouraged retardation." I was not even in Toronto, let alone the S.A.C. meeting, to encourage or discourage anything. And pray, how have I or the Edmund Burke Society ever encouraged retardation. "Retardation" is a physical ailment present at birth. Even we couldn't promote this disease, were we to so desire.

Your repeated use of journalistic tactics which are just a shade this side of criminal libel is the intellectually impoverished man's way of attacking his political opponents. Such tactics scorn any pretence your paper might have to being an enlightened and progressive paper.

F. Paul Fromm II SMC
Chairman Edmund Burke Society U. of T.

(Ed. Note: Mr. Fromm is correct. His picture should not have been with that article as another member of his society spoke at that meeting. However, had Mr. Fromm been there, we know what he would have encouraged.)

all draft dodgers are not cowards

Sir:
Friday's Varsity made more aware than ever of the abundance of people who make broad sweeping judgments about things they know nothing about. Could anyone who has known "draft-dodgers" still think they were "cowards and slackers"? Or have I just been meeting all the exceptions? And do you know of any businessman who has "spent the rest of his days laid out on a park bench" as a result of smoking marijuana? "Heads" may, as Mr. Jameson claims, be for the most part uncreative, lethargic, escapists (though not one of the hundreds I met on the west coast this summer even remotely fitted that description); but you'll notice that it's not the "heads", or the draft-dodgers that are appalling the Vietnamese kids or running the new Egyptian concentration camps (a la Nazi Germany), to name a couple of the more obvious things that are going on in this nice, normal, creative world of ours. Yet the majority sets the standards of what is the "cow-mature" and what is the "super-highway". It reminds me of this "twilight Zone" episode where the doctors were horrible monsters and the patient whose face they were working on was a beautiful woman. The one promising thing about that story, though, was the fact that the operation was a failure. Maybe there is still hope.

Menon: A flame barely flickering

By ANDREW SZENDE

A white-haired man with brown skin, slowly shuffled to the front row at Varsity Arena Sunday night before the final session of the third International Teach-In got started.

He leaned on his cane and listened intently as a film was projected at the centre of the arena, with United Nations Secretary General U Thant relating his own Buddhist beliefs to the problems of the world today.

Then the lights went on and the old man shuffled to the podium and took his place at the extreme left hand side of the stage.

The chairman got up and introduced the old man to the 3,000 people who had paid up to $25 to hear him and others at the weekend teach-in.

"Mr. Khishna Menon has of the keen wit, but much deep bitterness remain in the man who for a long time was India's second most powerful politician.

He rambled on for more than an hour, talking about politics and politicians, religion and morality, war and peace, youth and hope for the future. The audience did not tire of him and encouraged him with applause.

His eyesight failing, obviously bothered by the bright television lights, Menon rarely gesticulated for emphasis. During most of his speech he just held on to the lectern, as if for support.

He attacked the United States a number of times, had few choice words for the British, among whom he lived for 28 years, and for politicians in general.

"Politicians don't have consciences," he said. "Yet obstinate attitude of a nation."

"Free world is that part of the world which includes such nations as the Republic of South Africa, with its policy of apartheid."

Menon, who was educated in England and holds an honorary doctorate of law from the University of Glasgow lived in England fighting and negotiating for Indian independence until it finally came in 1947.

Nehru then appointed him High Commissioner to the United Kingdom. In 1952 he was elected to the Indian parliament as a member of the ruling Congress party. In 1956 he joined the cabinet and the following year Nehru made him defence minister.

In 1962, when China invaded India, Nehru was forced by the Congress party to fire him for not preparing the the days when he spoke for his country at the United Nations, Menon reiterated India's stand on disarmament:

"My country, whatever government there was, has always taken the view that the manufacture, storage, and use of nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction, like those tiny packets of bacteria that can kill a nation, should be totally abandoned."

Before departing, the old man tried to hand over his torch to the younger men in the audience at Sunday's teach-in. He told them:

"The student body of the world carries the main responsibility, not because you have the greater wisdom, but because you will live longer. You have access to information and a capacity for articulation."

A brilliant scholar, who was the first editor of Pelican Books, from which most university students have done some studying during the past three decades, Menon has resigned himself to the fact that his fight is now over.

A small dark man with flashing eyes, who has never been popular in the world, only a respected and sometimes feared leader, he has suffered several heart attacks since his forced retirement.

THE APPLAUSE

When he finished speaking, the applause in the arena was almost deafening and the air filled with emotion.

He gathered his notes, stepped down from the lectern, started walking back to his seat, then turned back to face the audience again, but it was only to pick up his watch which he had forgotten on the lectern.

After he sat down, the applause continued for another minute. He stood for a second to acknowledge it, then sat back, wiping his face and taking a sip of water, obviously exhausted by the hour-long speech.

The heat of the lights was still bothering him, so he started fanning himself with his notes. Then he stopped and closed his eyes and before the session ended he appeared to fall asleep a couple of times.

In making this speech, the man who once headed Pandit Nehru's 'brain trust' fulfilled an obligation he accepted more than a year ago.

been a household name around the world for 50 years," the chairman said as the audience gave the old man the most enthusiastic welcome of any of the 17 speakers.

In his long and distinguished career as an associate of Mahatma Gandhi and Jawaharlal Nehru, India's first two leaders, Canadians have known Menon as a fiery and colorful orator, who had fought long and hard for his country's independence.

But Sunday night it was sadly obvious that the old fire which he has displayed in New Delhi and London and New York is now only flickering and only a little some politicians sometimes go to hospitals to have their consciences taken out."

"Politicians are all for peace, if they can get by peace what they want to get by war."

The 71-year-old former defence minister warned his audience about the misuse of words by politicians: "When we say 'yes' we should not mean 'no'."

"Balance of power is simply a more polite way of saying an armaments race."

"Power vacuum is somebody else's country from which one imperialist nation withdraws and another has not yet moved in."

"Doctrine is merely the country properly against Chinese aggression.

In the 1966 general election he suffered the double humiliation of being denied the Congress party's nomination in his Bombay constituency and when he ran as an independent, of being defeated by the official candidate.

Earlier this year, after the death of the official candidate, a by-election was held, in which he again ran as an independent and again lost. After 36 years in the Congress party and as Nehru's closest friend, he is now a dejected loner in his country.

What the pharmacists think of us

This editorial appeared in The Script published by students in Pharmacy.

Reading the newspaper (?) called the Varsity over the last few issues, I dare say there are those among the Faculties of Engineering, Medicine, Dentistry and other professional faculties who are pretty glad they are where they are — over and above the fact that they will be professional people upon graduation. The Varsity is run by "Artsies" and their editorials show the typical 'pie-in-the-sky' attitude that many of them hold. When SAC meetings are held, we are told that the three hour debates are for the most part useless — restatements of worn-out arguments. This class of students likes to hear themselves talk of their utopian ideals. . . .

But what irks a lot of people, and in particular the SCRIPT, is the reaction of the Varsity's editorial staff to the SAC decision on draft doggers. They act like spoiled children, who, when they cannot have their way, cry and whine over their fallen thoughts and chastise bitterly those who oppose them.

SAC voted 24-21 to give no aid. The arguments presented by various people were that as a representative, they voiced the opinion of the majority of their constituents.

If the Varsity thinks that the victors' pounding of desks after the vote was immature, what do they consider the actions of the losers to be, as they attempted to shout down and drown out the member of the Edmund Birch Society. Ever closer to home, the Varsity should re-read its editorial in a non-biased light and realize what Kid-stuff that was!

. . . It makes us feel pretty good that we are part of a professional faculty which at least has its feet on the ground and its head facing the right way.

Undergraduate Instruction in Arts and Science

Report of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Undergraduate Instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science, University of Toronto

1967

The full text of the Macpherson Commission Report in a special Varsity supplement.

I. Introduction

THE COMMITTEE AND ITS OPERATION

1. Formation and membership

The Committee was established by the President of the University as "a Presidential Advisory Committee to examine undergraduate instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science and all matters that pertain thereto." The President's letter of invitation to those he asked to serve on the committee emphasized that "the terms of reference are deliberately general in order to encourage the committee to examine problems in the widest possible context."

The announcement that the Committee would be formed was made on March 21, 1966. Appointments to it were completed in May and it first met on May 16, 1966. It was asked to complete its work if possible by the end of the academic year 1966-67.

The Committee was made up of six members of the teaching staff of the Faculty of Arts and Science of this University, one recent undergraduate in this Faculty who in addition to being a full member of the Committee was also its research officer, and one member from another university. The members are:

F. H. Buck, B.A. (Toronto), Student in the School of Graduate Studies

G. R. Cook, B.A. (Manitoba), M.A. (Queen's), Ph.D. (Toronto), Associate Professor of History

W. G. Friend, B.Sc. (McGill), Ph.D. (Cornell), Professor of Zoology

H. S. Harris, M.A. (Oxford), Ph.D. (Northwestern), Professor of Philosophy, York University.

J. R. de J. Jackson, M.A. (Queen's), A.M. (Princeton), Ph.D. (Princeton and London), Assistant Professor of English, Victoria College

C. B. Macpherson, B.A. (Toronto), D.Sc. Econ. (London), Professor of Political Science

S. C. Nyburg, B.Sc. (London), Ph.D. (Leeds), Professor of Chemistry

R. M. H. Shepherd, M.A. (Cambridge), Professor of Greek, and Registrar of University College

The Secretary of the Committee was Wim Kent, M.A. (McMaster), of the Office of the University Registrar.

In addition, the Committee co-opted Paul Hoch, B.S. (C.C.N.Y.), M.S. (Brown), Ph.D. (Brown), a Fellow in Physics, to sit with it as an Assessor. The Committee is grateful to him for serving as in effect a full member of it from November 2, 1966.

2. Procedure

The Committee decided at its initial meetings to proceed by inviting written submissions from all parts of the academic community within the Faculty, and to follow this invitation with a series of public hearings. A letter inviting written submissions was sent to every member of the teaching staff in the Faculty on June 8, 1966. A full-page announcement was placed in the undergraduate newspaper, The Varsity, on October 5, inviting submissions from individual undergraduates and groups of undergraduates, and on November 10 a letter of invitation was sent to every full-time undergraduate in the Faculty. In addition, letters of invitation were sent on November 30 to all the Arts and Science graduates of 1965 and 1966.

The number of written submissions received by the Committee was 431. Of these, 114 were from faculty and 317 from students. Of the 114 faculty submissions, 10 were from heads or Councils of Colleges, 11 were from college or university teaching departments, 7 were from ad hoc faculty groups, and 86 were from individual faculty members. Of the 317 student submissions, 13 were from undergraduate clubs or societies, 23 from ad hoc groups of undergraduates, 35 from recent graduates, 9 from graduate students and societies, and 237 from individual undergraduates.

In addition the Committee elicited much useful information by addressing specific inquiries to the teaching departments of the University and the Colleges, and to administrative officials of the University, the Colleges, and the Faculty of Arts and Science. In November 1966 a questionnaire was sent to the chairman of every university teaching department and to the chairman or head of each college department in those subjects of instruction that were given by all of the four teaching colleges on the St. George campus, requesting certain information from them and from individual members of the department who were in charge of a representative sample of courses in each department. Information sought was about the size and frequency of lectures and other kinds of classes, the amount of work expected of students, departmental policies on such matters as the deployment of teaching staff between different types of courses, incentives to undergraduate teaching, relation of undergraduate to graduate work, etc.; departmental opinions on the adequacy of the situation so disclosed were also invited. The full response to this questionnaire was useful to the Committee in many ways. The chairman of the special Presidential Advisory Committee on College Instruction, which had reported in January 1966, and whose Report had been referred to us by the President, kindly made available all the documentation it had collected.

In view of the keen and widespread interest that has been expressed, on this campus and on many others, in the Report on Undergraduate Instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science, University of Toronto (the "Macpherson Report"), we are pleased to announce that, with the co-operation of The Varsity arrangements have been made to reprint the entire text of the Report as a series of special supplements to The Varsity, of which this is the first.

JOHN H. SWORD ACTING PRESIDENT.

C. T. FAULKNER,
PRESIDENT, STUDENTS'
ADMINISTRATIVE COUNCIL.

We held fifteen public hearings, from November 30, 1966, to March 6, 1967, all in the evening and lasting on the average three hours. The hearings, after the first (which was general in scope), were divided as far as possible by subject-matter. A series of six college hearings, one in each of the St. George campus colleges, was held, each devoted to submissions from within the college. The later hearings comprised one on submissions from Scarborough and Eridale Colleges, one on the submission by the Students' Administrative Council of the University, one devoted to the General Course and one to the General Course in Science, and one to each of the four groups of Honour Courses. At each hearing, authors of significant and representative written submissions, both student and faculty, were asked to present their views and be questioned on them; and when time permitted, further views and comments were invited from the floor.

A list of the hearings, and of the submissions considered at each, is given in an Appendix. We have not listed the authors of all the other submissions, but each of the submissions was reproduced for each member of the Committee and was read attentively by us. We are grateful to all those who sent us written submissions, as well as to those who came before us to discuss them.

In addition, the Committee met on its own 54 times during the year, generally for three hours, to consider material submitted to it, material collected by it, and material prepared by its members, and to discuss many drafts of various sections of the Report. At a few of these meetings particular students and faculty members were present by invitation for all or part of the meeting, to assist us with information and advice on various matters.

3. A note on assumptions and on our method of analysis and presentation

An institution which sets out to serve the higher learning develops over time a set of methods and rules by which and within which it operates. And since an institution devoted to the higher learning is also in some sense a community, it develops formal and informal relations between the various parts of itself — teachers and students, libraries and readers, colleges and departments — and between itself and the society of which it is a part. These relations, and the methods and rules, become institutionalized. In so far as all of them are performing functions valued by those who live and work within them, they nourish and strengthen those individuals. But inasmuch as methods and rules and relations do become institutionalized, they tend to maintain themselves of their own momentum, regardless of their continued adequacy.

Any long-established university is therefore well advised to take a look at itself from time to time, and to do so with the expectation that the law of inertia will be found to be operating. The present inquiry in such an attempt to look at the institutions of the Faculty of Arts and Science at the University of Toronto, which has been in operation for over a hundred years, and in much its present form (though not its present size) for over sixty years.

As we began to amass and sift evidence (both from our own experience and from submissions made to us), and to consider what principles emerged from it and by what principles it should be evaluated, we had to decide in what form to work up and present our analysis and findings. At one extreme, we might have tried to let the recommendations emerge entirely from the evidence, that is, from the evidence of the way the institutions in the Faculty were actually operating and the evidence of faculty and student opinion of where and how this fell short of or measured up to what was regarded as desirable and possible. At the other extreme, we might have tried to reach agreement first on a set of fundamental principles about the objectives of undergraduate instruction in a faculty of arts and science, with a view to setting them out in an opening chapter of the Report, and then reaching and supporting our recommendations by comparing the actual situation with deductions from the first principles.

In the event, we followed neither of these extreme ways. We thought it insufficient to go entirely on the opinions submitted to us. And, of course, we could have made no recommendations on that basis alone: we should have had at least to decide which of the many value assumptions implicit in the views submitted to us — some of which were contradictory — we could endorse. As to the other method, while it would not have been difficult to draw up an abstract statement of the desirable objectives of undergraduate work in arts and science, it would have been difficult to proceed entirely deductively from there, for such statements as are immediately generally acceptable tend to be unspecific, and such as are specific tend to be infinitely arguable.

We have chosen in the end to present our argument for the most part deductively, but not from any simple grand statement of first principles. Rather, in respect of each of the four main aspects (and even of several parts of one aspect) of undergraduate instruction, as we have seen them in this Faculty of this University, we have tried to set out our assumptions and to reason from them, in the light of the factual evidence, to our recommendations. The four aspects, which are treated in this order in the four following chapters, are: methods of teaching and learning, the structure of degree programs, the relation of college to university teaching, and the relation of the undergraduate to the university environment.

II. Teaching and Learning

1. The range of problems

Our first concern in this chapter is with the uses to which lectures are put. We ask whether lectures can do all that they are now expected to do, and whether, to the extent that lectures are useful, the present system of lecture courses makes the best use of them.

Our reasoning here is mainly deductive: we confront the inherent nature and tendency of the present lecture system with the objectives we believe lectures should be serving. Our conclusions emerge from this confrontation, rather than from the volume of criticism of the lecture system which has been presented to us in written submissions and oral evidence. The case we make here was indeed implicit in some of the submissions, and parts of it were made explicitly at some of the hearings. And the weight of the criticism expressed to us in both student and faculty submissions supports the case we make. But we do not base our case on the fact that a very high proportion of the submissions were severely critical of the lecture system. Valuable as many of the submissions have been in pointing out shortcomings, in analysing their causes and interrelations, and in suggesting remedies, we have been aware that the submissions as a whole were not necessarily a representative sample of student or faculty opinion and could therefore not be treated as quantitative evidence.

In many submissions, disenchantment with lectures was accompanied by enchantment with non-lecture methods — tutorials, seminars, and the like. In the submissions and at the hearings the case against the present use of lectures was usually made more effectively than the case for alternative methods. We have been aware of the danger of leaving the frying-pan for the fire. But we are persuaded that the present reliance on lectures as the staple of undergraduate instruction leaves much to be desired, and that the defects of the present practice can be remedied without putting an untested and possibly insupportable reliance on tutorial or other methods of instruction. We discuss this matter in section 2 of this chapter.

Closely related to the lecture system is the system of examinations, which can have a significant effect on teaching and learning. We discuss this in section 3, where we recommend some changes in the examination system designed to reinforce the changes recommended in the lecture system.

We found also that the role of tutorials, seminars, and laboratories needed to be reassessed. Those that are at present provided, whether or not directly supplementary to lecture courses, have come in for some criticism, though more extensive use of small groups was frequently proposed as a remedy for what were held to be the shortcomings of the lecture system. Here again our conclusions are based less on the volume of criticism and suggestions than on the logic of the situation. Our recommendations about tutorials, discussion classes, and laboratories, in section 4 of this chapter, follow in part from our recommendations about lectures and in part from an independent consideration of the expected functions of these other teaching methods.

Finally we have to consider shortcomings in the quality of the teaching, both in lectures and in the other forms of instruction. We find that shortcomings exist in a degree that calls for remedy. In section 5 we consider problems of training, incentives, and appraisals, and make recommendations designed to improve the quality of teaching both by full-time members of the teaching staff and by graduate teaching assistants.

2. The lecture system

2. The lecture system

The use of lectures as the mainstay of instruction is so taken for granted in this as in most other North American universities that, when once it is seriously questioned, there is a tendency to think that it has no other basis than habit. The temptation, to which some of our witnesses yielded, is then to refer briskly to the invention of printing and to urge that the university should at last leap out of the Middle Ages by giving up lectures altogether.

There is some force in this implied criticism of lectures. The probability that habit and custom are a large part of the reason for the lecture system is sufficient to entitle us to take a fresh look at the lectures and ask what functions they are now expected to well as or better than any alternative, and what functions they are now expected to perform in this Faculty.

In this section Macpherson discusses the quality of teaching produced in U of T's lecture system.

- (i) providing an overview of a subject, or branch of a subject, not readily obtainable in any one or a few printed works;
- (ii) conveying to students the professor's enthusiasm and zeal for his subject in a way that cannot be done in print;
- (iii) showing the students how to tackle problems of interpretation, and theoretical or experimental problems generally, so that they can tackle some on their own;
- (iv) showing a scholar's mind at work grappling with ideas, theoretical relations, intractable problems;
- (v) conveying to the students theoretical insights and advances in knowledge that are unique to a particular professor;
- (vi) transmitting information (whether an orderly structure of facts, of theorems, or of theoretical interpretation) which the student must know in order to comprehend the subject.

All of these are functions which either should or must be performed at a university in some way, whether by lectures or otherwise. The first four cannot be done by print, nor can the fifth until the professor is ready to publish. They can only be done by word of mouth. They can be done by lectures. The only question is whether the lecture is the most efficient way of doing them, that is,

Macpherson analyses the effects the lecture system has on the student who wants to learn and the student who just wants a degree.

whether the lecture is the most efficient way of putting the available intellectual resources of the faculty as a whole to these desirable uses. We think that it is, if only because the lecture enables the professor to reach more students in a given time than does any system of small group instruction. Not that we would expect every lecture to perform all the first five functions. It would be a sufficient justification of some lectures that they performed only the first function, that is, that they provided an overview of a subject not readily obtainable in print; this is true especially (although not exclusively) in first and second years. The second function cannot, by its nature, be performed by itself, but only in performing one of the others. Performance of the third function, showing a student by example how to go about analysing and understanding a subject, would be by itself a sufficient justification of some lectures. So would performance of either the fourth or fifth function, though obviously these are not to be expected as frequently as the others.

We argue therefore that some lectures are justified if they perform almost any one of the first five functions, or any combination of them. But, for reasons set out below, we do not find that the present system of lecture courses encourages the performance of these functions. What it does is encourage the performance of the sixth function, the transmitting of information which the student must know, to which we now turn.

The function of transmitting information, in so far as it is separable from the other functions, can be done by print. Where there are textbooks, monographs, articles, collections, or other printed works which contain within an appropriate compass the material which the student must know, it is difficult to see any justification for using lectures merely for transmitting such material to the student. We are prepared to believe that a student with little or no interest in learning finds it more convenient to absorb information by having it told to him than by having to read it. But we do not see why such students should be catered to. For students who can and will read, the lecture is an inefficient way of transmitting information: even if the lecturer's diction were perfect there would be no case for interposing any diction between his text and the student's notebook if the purpose is merely to transfer information. And the case against it is considerable. It imposes a single pace on all students subjected to it — a pace that is likely to be nearer the capacity of the slowest student. Worse, it is bound to dull the intellectual appetite that good students bring with them to the university.

It is true that the transmission of information cannot be entirely separated from the other functions of lectures. Some transmission of information is virtually inseparable from the performance of any of the other functions. A student cannot think, analyse, seek out relevance, tackle problems, unless he has some material to think about, and it is only reasonable to provide the appropriate factual information at the time when ideas based on it are being discussed. But there is a great difference between using lectures merely to transmit information, and transmitting information in the course of doing something else. Students know the difference even when the lecturer doesn't.

We have said enough to make it clear that of our list of six possible or expected functions of lectures we regard the first five as desirable in themselves, and the sixth as undesirable by itself. And it is of course this last use of lectures, merely to transmit information, that is the subject of most of the criticism of the lecture system that has been presented to us. In the written submissions and the oral presentations there was a disquieting amount of evidence that lectures are being used to a significant extent to perform the one function which we regard as least desirable, and that this use is having the deplorable results one would expect it to have.

Now if this use of lectures merely or primarily to convey information were somehow inherent in lectures as such, or were the inevitable effect of custom or of the human fallibility of lecturers, not much could be done about it, short of doing away with lectures altogether. But there is reason to believe that the misuse of lectures is not inherent or inevitable, but is encouraged by two features of our present system of lecture courses. One of these features is the sheer number of lectures given in each subject of instruction each year. The other is the prevailing relation between lectures and examinations. We shall consider each of these in turn.

The Number of Lectures

The normal pattern of undergraduate instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science is that in each of the five or more subjects of instruction which the student must take each year, there are two or three lectures a week throughout the academic year. These may be supplemented by tutorial groups or by laboratory periods, or both, but the lectures are generally regarded as the core and the main substance of the instruction. Hence in most subjects each year there are approximately 50 or 75 lectures.

It appears to us self-evident that 50 or 75 lectures a year are not needed to perform any of the desirable functions of lectures, and indeed that the performance of all the desirable functions together can scarcely be stretched to fill that many hours. It does not take so long to provide an overview of a subject not readily obtainable in published works, even for the first year student. It does not take long to convey the professor's enthusiasm and zeal for a subject in a way that cannot be done in print. It does not take so long to show students how to tackle theoretical or experimental problems on their own, or if it does they will have not time left to tackle them on their own. It does not take so long to show a scholar's mind at work grappling with ideas and problems. And it does not take so long to convey insight and advance in knowledge that are unique to a particular professor; even on the assumption that every professor has something unique to offer as his own studies progress, as much of this as can appropriately be offered to students at the undergraduate level will rarely take 50 or 75 hours to convey.

But while these desirable functions of the lectures do not require such an amount of lecturing, and may even be inconsistent with such an amount, the undesirable function is encouraged by such an amount of lecturing. Since the 50 or 75 hours must be filled up, they tend to be filled up with transmission of information. They are used to "cover" a subject. A vicious circle is thus set going. The more nearly the lectures cover a year's work in a subject the more the student and the professor come to treat the lectures as sufficient to cover the subject, and in so far as they are so treated the more desirable functions of the lecture are submerged or denied. This vicious circle is strengthened by the present relation of lecture courses to examinations, which we discuss a few pages later. But we must first notice another effect of the number of lectures.

So far we have been considering the effect which the set number of lectures has on the uses to which lectures are put. But there is another effect of the number of lectures which may be accounted more damaging. This is that the number of hours of instruction the student is expected to attend each week does not leave him enough time to do the reading and thinking he ought to be doing. The rationale of lectures requires that the student read and think in relation to the lectures. We mean not that the student should prepare for each lecture (as a schoolboy may be required to prepare for each lesson) but that a lecture worth having is one that sparks the student's own thinking on the ideas and problems opened up by it and that gets him reading, more or less widely and more or less independently, around those ideas and problems. The amount of time a student ought to spend on his own in relation to each lecture may vary somewhat between disciplines. But, at least in the non-laboratory subjects, in our opinion it should not normally be less than three times the number of hours of lectures if the lectures are performing their proper functions.

It is apparent that this amount is neither expected nor probable with the present number of lectures.

As to what is expected, we have some indication from the replies made to one of the questions in a survey we made of departmental practices and opinions. We asked those in charge of a substantial sample of courses of instruction in the Faculty to estimate, if they thought it possible, how many hours a week a student should spend in relation to that course apart from the hours of the lectures and other classes. Of those replying for the 154 non-science lecture courses in the sample, 55 could not or would not offer an estimate. The 99 who did, made estimates ranging from 2 hours to 12 hours, with the bulk of the answers being

4 or 6 hours. The average was 5½ hours. (And the average was not very different for the Honour Courses, 5.7 hours, and General Courses, 5.1 hours.)

From these figures no very precise conclusions can be drawn as to the amount of time the student is expected to spend on his own in relation to each lecture. But since this 5½ hours a week per course includes the time the student should or must spend on specific assignments, essays, and possibly preparation for tutorials, and since he has two or three lectures a week in most of his courses, it is evident that he is not being expected to do as much as three hours on his own in relation to each lecture. Even if all the 5½ hours were allowed as time spent in relation to the lectures, it would be less than the 3:1 ratio in courses with two lectures a week and less than 2:1 in courses with three lectures a week.

This disparity between what is expected and what we believe should be expected (and could be expected if lectures were performing only their proper functions) is due, we suggest, to the extent to which the lectures are being used for the undesirable function of the transmittal of information: the more the lectures are being employed to "cover" the whole course on which the student is to be examined, the less time he need spend outside the lectures.

As to how much time it is possible to expect the student to spend in relation to each lecture, given the present number of lectures, some simple arithmetic is revealing. We found that the average number of classroom hours per week for the student in non-science courses is 16 (of which on the average 12 or 13 are lectures), and for the science student 24 (of which 13 are lectures).

To take only the non-science students, who have the most time on their own, it is evident that a student with 12 hours of lectures, and another 4 hours of other classes (for some of which some preparation is presumably required), cannot reasonably be expected to spend another 36 hours a week thinking about and following up what he got from the lectures. The resulting work week would be not 16 + 36 hours but considerably more, as allowance has to be made for time lost in shifting back and forth from classes to work place, and for time required to assemble material. Although an intellectual work week of 52 hours is not impossible, it is not very likely.

Thus the number of lectures, and the Faculty's reliance on lectures as the chief mode of instruction, induce the professors to use lectures for purposes for which lectures are inefficient, induce the students to rely on lectures as "covering" the course, and prevent the students from doing the amount of reading and thinking which the lectures should have induced them to do, thus reinforcing the tendency of the professors to use lectures for the inefficient purpose of covering the material they believe the students should cover.

Only of exam and essay time are libraries crowded.

VI. Summary of Recommendations

(References in brackets are I, chapter; 2, section.)

- 1 In each course of instruction in which three lectures a week or two lectures a week are now given, the number of lectures should be reduced to a maximum equivalent to one lecture a week, except for courses in which all the instruction is given in small lecture/discussion classes (for which see Recommendation 3), and there should be a proportional reduction in courses in which more than three lectures a week are now given. (II, 2)
- 2 In each course which is thus reduced from three or two lectures to one lecture a week, there should be as general rule one tutorial group a week. (II, 2)
- 3 For courses in which all instruction is given in small lecture/discussion classes, the maximum number of class hours should be two a week. (II, 2)

- 4 As a general rule, no undergraduate should have more than ten classroom hours a week, apart from laboratories, of which no more than five should be lectures. (II, 2)
- 5 In first year, a final examination should be held as now in each course or subject the student is taking, with the proviso that not less than 50 per cent of the whole year's mark in each course or subject be the term mark. Candidates should be required to pass on the aggregate of term and final examination marks but not on either or both. (II, 3)
- 6 In second year, there should be no final examinations of any kind, except that students whose term mark in any subject was not adequate (say 60 per cent) should have to pass a formal examination in it (to be written in August or September) in order to be allowed to proceed to third year. The second year term mark should be based on as few tests and as much other evidence (essays, reports, and oral defence of them) as possible. (II, 3)
- 7 In third year, all students should be examined on their grasp of their subjects attained during their second and third years. Those responsible for degree programs should try to accomplish this by a few comprehensive or combined examinations, but in no case should any department require more examinations than it now requires at the end of third year, and no student should be required to write more examinations than he now writes at the end of third year. (II, 3)
- 8 In fourth year, which should become a year of more independent work and optical studies, we should like to see continued the existing tendency away from final formal examinations on each numbered course of instruction. (II, 3)

- 9 At least in large lecture courses where many tutorials are given, the importance of the planning and supervision of tutorials should be recognized, by the department making specific allowance, in assigning teaching duties, for the time spent on this work by the lecturer in charge of the course. (II, 4)
- 10 In those courses in the Humanities and Social Sciences which are taught by lectures plus tutorials, tutorial groups should be provided to an amount that will give each student, in all his courses together, not more than five tutorial groups per week. (II, 4)
- 11 A maximum size of ten to twelve students for tutorial groups should be adopted as a Faculty policy. (II, 4)
- 12 Mixed lecture/discussion classes which are larger than twenty students should regularly be divided into tutorial groups of 10 or 12. (II, 4)
- 13 Departments should attempt to work out some variant of the principle of individual or very small group tutorials,

- for students in second and/or third and/or fourth years. (II, 4)
- 14 The number of laboratory periods required of the undergraduate science student should be reduced by half, by offering labs on a one-term or fortnightly basis, and they should be arranged as problems classes from which students are released as soon as their work is satisfactorily completed. (II, 4)
- 15 The length of laboratory periods should be left open up to three hours. (II, 4)
- 16 Each department should, as a matter of Faculty policy, encourage one or two of its members who are known to be excellent undergraduate teachers to devote some of their time to helping novice lecturers, the time spent to be counted as equivalent to a part of the teaching and administrative duties they would otherwise have had. (II, 5)
- 17 The Faculty budget should provide for a television technician and equipment to be so available to all departments that anyone who is giving lectures may, on request, see his own lecturing on videotape; and all those who lecture should be encouraged to make use of this service. (II, 5)
- 18 There should be a clear and known Faculty policy that promotion and appointment will take expenditure of energy and imagination on undergraduate teaching into account more fully than is now believed to be the case. (II, 5)
- 19 Where students have themselves undertaken a systematic appraisal of teachers and courses, the Faculty and departments should give them all the help they can, with a view to making the appraisals an effective instrument in improving the quality of teaching. (II, 5)

- 20 The results of the student appraisals of each faculty member should be given to him and to the chairman of his department. (II, 5)
- 21 There should be no comprehensive scheme of inspection of teaching performance by colleagues, but wide use should be made of inspection of beginning members of the profession in their first year or two of full-time university teaching. (II, 5)
- 22 Teaching assistants, upon their first appointment, should not generally be put in charge of tutorial groups during the first month, but during that time should sit in on tutorials given by full-time members of the staff, and discuss the conduct of the tutorials (formally and informally, but regularly) with those who are then giving them. (II, 5)
- 23 As far as possible tutorials for first year students should be given throughout the year by full-time members of the staff, leaving the teaching assistant to do more of the tutorial work with students in second and third years. (II, 5)
- 24 No student should be compelled before entering the university to commit himself as a generalist or a specialist, nor to commit himself to a particular specialty, although every student should be free to embark on a specialty from the beginning. (III, 1)
- 25 The same admission standards and passing standards should be required for generalists and specialists. (III, 1)
- 26 Generalists and specialists should sit together in some of the same classes, not only in the first year. (III, 1)
- 27 The distinction between a specialist and a general program should not be a distinction between high-standard and lower-standard work, and should not be the same as the distinction between a four-year and a three-year degree program. (III, 2)
- 28 The present distinction between Honour and General degree Courses (and courses of instruction) should be removed from the first year, and no similar distinction should be re-introduced in the guise of Specialist and General Programs or courses (III, 3); nor should entry into specialist and general programs in second year be differentiated by the standing required in the prerequisite first year work, nor should the first year prerequisite subjects be as tightly prescribed as they now are in many Honour Courses. (III, 3); cf Recommendations 41-43.
- 29 Each department should offer in its subject or subjects, in first year, (i) a Basic course, to be taken equally by intending specialists and by intending generalists who might want to continue that subject in later years; and (ii) if the department wishes, one or two Additional courses designed for those who want to try, or who know they want, more work in first year in that subject. The Basic and Additional course(s) should be the only first year offerings of most departments, and should be not a different level but of a different content. (III, 3)
- 30 Mathematics and possibly English should provide (iii) Collateral courses, for those students who do not need or want as much or as rigorous work in these subjects as do those who expect to make formal courses in them a continuing part of their work. (III, 3)
- 31 There should be (iv) a first year Combined course in each of two or possibly more fields, one in Physical Sciences and one in Biological Sciences, for students who want or need some work in these subjects but do not intend to specialize in them. (III, 3)

- 32 The Basic courses in all subjects should be at approximately the level of the present Honour Courses rather than of the present General Courses. (III, 3)
- 33 All subjects now offered, or which may be offered, in the Faculty of Arts and Science should be grouped in three Divisions: 1, Humanities; 2, Social Sciences; 3, Mathematics, Physical and Life Sciences. (III, 3)
- 34 Each first year student should choose five courses, but not necessarily five subjects, spread over at least two of the three division; and should not be allowed to take more than two courses in any one subject as part of his regular first year program (though students whose entrance standing was up to a certain level might be allowed to take a third course in one subject as an extra). (III, 3)
- 35 All first year courses, whether Basic, Additional, Collateral, or Combined, should have equal weight for the student's first year standing (except for a course taken as an extra, which would have no weight) (III, 3)
- 36 "Pass subjects" should not be included in any year of any program. (III, 3)
- 37 The one-hour pass subject (Religious Knowledge or a Religious Knowledge option) should be abolished. If non-academic reasons are thought to require its retention, it should be offered as an optional non-credit course to all students but should not be required of any. (III, 3)
- 38 There should be only one standard for admission to the Faculty. (III, 3)
- 39 In those subjects in which beginning works is not offered in the Faculty, e.g., some of the languages, mathematics, and possibly physics and chemistry, high school prerequisites should be required for entrance into those subjects. (III, 2)
- 40 Departments should not be allowed to stipulate that a certain standing in a high school subject, above that required for admission to the Faculty, be required for admission to any of their courses, Basic or Additional, except that in some subjects such as Mathematics where experience has shown that, without a high standing in their high school work, students have little chance of managing a lot of first year work, it might be stipulated that a standing higher than the general level be required for admission to an Additional course in that subject. (III, 3)
- 41 Entry into any specialist program in second year should not require the student to have taken, in first year, the permitted maximum of two courses (i.e. both the Basic and an Additional course) in his subject or subjects of second year specialism, but should require only the Basic course. (III, 3)
- 42 Entry into any specialized program in second year, with a few specific excep-

- tions, should not require more than two specified first year courses to have been taken; and even the exceptions should not require more than three. (III, 3)
- 43 Entry into any specialist program in second year should not require the student to have obtained any higher mark in his first year work as a whole or in his first year prerequisite subject or subjects than is required for standing in them (e.g., 60 per cent). (III, 3)
- 44 Additional courses offered to first year students should also be available to, and in some cases required of, second year students who have not taken them in first year. (III, 3)
- 45 In each specialist program, students should not normally be required to carry more than five courses a year. (III, 3)
- 46 There should be in each specialist program, in second, third, and fourth years, one completely free option. (III, 3)
- 47 Departments, program directors (see Recommendation 57), and committees concerned with the structure of specialist programs, should consider, and keep under review, the possibility of reducing the present number of separately organized degree programs. (III, 3)
- 48 In each of the second, third, and fourth years of a General Program, each student should choose five courses (but not necessarily five subjects) spread over at least two divisions, and no more than two courses in any subjects as part of his regular program. (III, 3)
- 49 Generalist students should as a general rule continue most of their second year subjects into third year, but in some cases, a sequence of different subjects in the same division (such as the present General Science sequence) should be possible, and (as in the present General Arts Course) a few subjects that can be begun in third year should be offered. (III, 3)
- 50 Limited transfers in both directions between specialist and generalist programs, at the beginning of third year, should be made possible. (III, 3)
- 51 Any student in any of the first, third, and fourth years should be entitled to a supplemental examination in one of his papers if he has the required overall average of 60 per cent (his failed subject being included in the average), and should be entitled to supplemental examinations in two of his papers if he has an over-all average of 65 per cent (his failed subjects being included in the average). (III, 3)
- 52 A uniform policy on aegrotat standing for specialist and generalist students should be established. (III, 3)
- 53 Both generalists and specialists should be enabled to take either an Ordinary B.A. or B.Sc. or B.Comm. at the end of three years, or an Honours B.A. or B.Sc. or B.Comm. at the end of the fourth year. (III, 4)

- 54 The fourth year, both generalist and specialist, should be open only to those with first- or second-class standing at the end of third year. (III, 4)
- 55 The University should press for a change in the provincial formula for operating grants to universities: all first year students in Arts and Science to remain (as now) weight 1; all second, third, and fourth year students in Arts and Science to be weight 1½ or 2. (III, 4)

University Affairs Minister William Davis. Macpherson recommends the university go to him and press for a change in the system of operating grants.

- 56 There should be three associate deans, one for each division, instead of the present two. (III, 5)
- 57 There should be two "program directors" in each of the three divisions, appointed, like the associate deans, for a five-year term, and, like them, remaining professors and continuing to teach undergraduates in their respective departments, but in this other capacity not responsible to the chairmen of their departments. They would be responsible to the associate deans for the oversight of the specialist programs, both intra- and inter-departmental, in their respective divisions. (III, 5)
- 58 Not more than 50 per cent of the time of the program directors should be taken from their professorial work in their departments. (III, 5)
- 59 The recommendations of the program directors should need to be reviewed only by a standing committee of ten—the dean, the three associate deans, and the six program directors—before being presented to Council. (III, 5)
- 60 Program directors might also act, in liaison with college registrars, as ombudsmen, to whom students could turn for investigation of complaints. (III, 5)
- 61 The Committee of Ten should be the standing committee in charge of the General Program. (III, 5)
- 62 The program directors should consult widely within departments, and where this consultation is not enough, ad hoc committees should be set up. (III, 5)
- 63 A special committee should be established as soon as possible to study long-range problems of the nature of General and Specialist education, and the relation of both to a liberal education. (III, 6)
- 64 Each of the six St. George campus colleges should give first year tutorials in most subjects, and should give first year lectures in at least enough of the more populous subjects to enable each college to give a significant amount of the lectures to most of its students. (IV, 3)

Macpherson's plans call for two new degrees, awarded in generalist and specialist courses of either three or four years.

65 The colleges should seek to cross-appoint (and the university departments to make cross-appointees available) in those first year subjects in which the lecture classes are now, or in future may be, sufficiently sectioned that the placing of sections in all or most of the St. George campus colleges would not require any further sub-division. (IV, 3)

66 All college departments, except possibly religion, should be converted to university departments. (IV, 5)

67 Initially all the full-time members of the college departments should be appointed to university departments. (IV, 5)

68 Subsequent appointments and promotions and granting of university tenure should be made by the usual method of university departments, with the understanding that the colleges would sometimes take initiatives in proposing new appointments to the university departments. (IV, 5)

69 Upon the conversion of college departments to university departments the colleges should restaff themselves by making cross-appointments from the membership of the university departments, each such cross-appointment to be a person acceptable to the college. (IV, 5)

70 A financial incentive should be given the colleges to spread their cross-appointments over enough subjects to enable them to do a substantial part of the teaching of all or almost all of their students, at some time in each student's undergraduate career. (IV, 5)

71 This incentive should be provided by the university receiving all the tuition fees of students in the Faculty of Arts and Science, as well as the provincial grants in respect of all those students, and in turn making to each federated college two kinds of grants: (i) a conditional grant equal to the whole formula cost of the undergraduate tuition actually given by the college, the university grant to be conditional on the college making cross-appointments in such a wide range of subjects that it can do a substantial part of the teaching of all or almost all of its students, at some time in each student's undergraduate career; (ii) in addition to the conditional grant, an unconditional grant equal to say 5 per cent of the amount of the conditional grant. (IV, 5)

72 The constituent colleges should each be treated by the university in a way similar to that which we have recommended in respect of the federated colleges. (IV, 6)

73 Each university department in the Faculty of Arts and Science should attempt to provide, either by recruitment or from its existing membership, such number of persons as is required to meet the teaching needs of the colleges. (IV, 7)

74 There must neither be, nor appear to be, any coercion in the departments' making cross-appointees available; until such times as there are enough individual members of university departments willing or anxious to take cross-appointments, arrangements short of the full cross-appointments scheme should be devised, in the hope that they would lead gradually to a full implementation of the cross-appointments scheme. (IV, 7)

75 As a general principle, departments should make available some of their senior as well as junior members for cross-appointment. (IV, 7)

76 Every person cross-appointed to a college should, if he wishes, also do some teaching in the university department. (IV, 7)

77 The St. George campus colleges should try to reduce their size to not more than 1,500 undergraduate members. (IV, 8)

78 Some of the additional space which it is known will have to be provided for both Arts and Science departments should, by forward planning, be built in the colleges. (IV, 9)

79 In the creation of any new colleges on the St. George campus, no primarily science colleges should be established. (IV, 9)

80 Joint student-faculty committees should be established in all departments where the students request them, these to be the effective decision-making bodies on such matters as curriculum and patterns of teaching. (V, 2)

81 Students representatives should be made full members of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science, and most of its committees. (V, 2)

82 Student representatives on the Council should be chosen by direct election by the undergraduates of the Faculty. (V, 2)

83 Members of the faculty should, as a general policy, be encouraged to announce regular office hours, to the extent of two or three a week. (V, 2)

84 Steps should be taken to provide, in such Faculty buildings as Sidney Smith Hall, shared student/faculty common rooms, meeting rooms and coffee shops. (V, 2)

85 The registration period for first year students should be extended to allow for more counselling by college registrars, departmental student advisers, and college staff in as many subjects as possible. (V, 3)

86 Each university department should have one or more undergraduate advisers, or supervisors of undergraduate studies, who would have a primary responsibility for counselling. (V, 3)

87 The departmental undergraduate advisers should be available during a distinctly advertised period, perhaps just after the February reading week, for consultation about students' choices of options in the following academic year, and, where department programs require it, for pre-registration in such options, and for advice about summer reading. (V, 3)

88 The Calendar of the Faculty of Arts and Science should be more clearly organized, and should give more meaningful descriptions of subjects and courses of study. (V, 3)

89 The University, in concert with other Ontario universities, should seek such a redefinition of provincial policy concerning student residences as would enable a 20 per cent reduction in residence fees for freshmen. (V, 4)

90 The University, in concert with other Ontario universities, should seek such a provincial policy on residence building that more residence accommodation can be provided and that residence charges to the students can be set with some recognition of the academic benefits of residence living. (V, 4)

Report calls for more study space in the Wallace Room.

91 The Library Council should annually seek assurance that the shortfall in the Library's budget is not greater than the shortfall in the whole university budget. (V, 5)

92 Department chairmen should take more seriously than all of them apparently now do the obligation of ensuring that those of their members in charge of courses of instruction should provide the information without which the Library cannot estimate the needs of its undergraduate collection. (V, 5)

93 The University Library should increase its subsidy to the Federated College Libraries to such an extent that it can properly require a more effective co-ordination of purchasing for undergraduate collections than now exists. (V, 5)

94 Steps should be taken as quickly as possible to increase the number of study spaces in the library system. (V, 5)

95 The Wallace and other reading rooms in the Central Library should be redesigned to install carrel desks or other forms of more isolated study space. (V, 5)

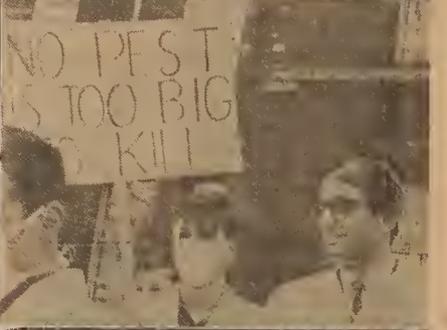

96 The Library should investigate steps that might be taken to improve its orientation program. (V, 5)

97 To enhance the University Bookstore's provision of adequate stocks of books needed for all undergraduate courses in the Faculty, every academic department of the Faculty should regard it as an important responsibility to see that each of its members in charge of a course of instruction does furnish the required information to the Bookstore in time for it to get the requisite number of copies in stock. (V, 5)

98 The Committee of the Board of Governors of the University charged with oversight of the operations of the University Press should institute an investigation into the possibility of the University Bookstore's giving discounts to students on all book purchases. (V, 5)

The Board of Governors is urged to study possible bookstore discounts for students.

Faculty approves Course Evaluation

By JIM COWAN

Faculty reaction has apparently been generally favorable to Course Evaluation 1967, the Students Administrative Council's critique of undergraduate arts and science courses.

A Varsity survey this week queried faculty members on their response to suggestions made in the evaluation, SAC's first effort in the field.

Professor R. C. Pratt of the political economy department called the booklet "generous in the favorable remarks and perceptive and helpful in the criticism it makes of the course."

He has implemented two suggestions made of his course, political science 432. A more specific reading list has been compiled and the tutorials have been re-arranged to eliminate the repetition of lecture material.

Prof. J. A. Page (chemistry 130) says the editors did "a reasonably good job." It would be particularly good for those lecturers who were "panned" by their classes—he was not.

However, he questioned the validity of comments by first-year students:

"They are in no position to realize what should be in a course because they can't get an overall view."

Comments by third and fourth-year students were helpful and valid, he added.

A less favorable view of the study came from Dr. K. R. Chandorkar (botany 311). He was concerned that the reviews were too negative in outlook and would hinder students more than help them.

He cited one instance when the editors had pointed out that 25 per cent of the students had considered a course valueless. It would have been better to emphasize the large majority that found the course of value.

Dr. Chandorkar said the shortcomings of the evaluation were the result of the editors' inexperience.

"Criticism is always welcome. But it should be done in such a way as to bring about more harmony between staff and students."

Prof. J. N. Emerson (anthropology 100) also had mixed feelings about the study. He felt the criticism should have been given to the faculty members privately, and noted most of the problems were already known to the staff.

"It was done pretty fast, and the questions were not too far-reaching," he said.

Prof. Emerson has followed some of the recommendations in the survey. Projects have been set up and seminars arranged. Both will operate on a voluntary basis.

R. A. Buchanan was sharply criticized for his lectures in philosophy 222 and 224.

"This came as a shock," he said. He said several changes would be made but declined to name them.

Despite the unfavourable report, Mr. Buchanan said the concept of such an evaluation was a good one.

The evaluation encouraged Prof. F. F. Wilson Jr. to add an extra term test to his philosophy 210 course. "But the students this year didn't seem to appreciate it," he declared.

Prof. Wilson agreed that tutorials would be helpful but said the money was not available. He was "not sympathetic with the request for a lighter reading list" because he had found the students need the background information.

Dr. R. C. Brown of the department of history said the evaluation was "very fair and helpful." He had only looked at the sections in his own department. Dr. Brown was co-lecturer in history 302 last year.

A major change will involve the final examination. There now will be more questions offered. One book has been removed from the reading list, but this was done before the report was published.

Several professors mentioned that students could be particularly helpful in getting lecturers to improve organization and diction.

"If those who are weak in these areas know that they will be exposed in next year's evaluation, there will be more impetus for improvement," one said.

SAC forms campus housing commission

By SHERRY BRYDSON

The Students Administrative Council has formed a commission to look into the campus housing situation.

The four-member commission under Edmund Clark (III UC) will operate independently of SAC. It should report to SAC before Christmas.

The eventual goal is a "white paper" that SAC will be able to use in order to make recommendations concerning student housing.

"We have no preconceived notions as to what the report will or should entail," says Clark. "All the members are new at this game. We're not particularly activist types—we just hope to come up with a good, objective, factual report."

"Nobody really knows what's going on with the housing situation. That's why we're here — to find out what is going on and to put it into some sort of order."

He said the commission members will be approaching all campus residences for information on costs and operation.

"I hope the issue doesn't become whether to give us the information or not," he said.

Roy Snythe (IV APSC) is in charge of off-campus residence. He will investigate costs, the SAC commission evaluating the university housing service, and the operation of fraternities.

Rick Angelson (III UC) will investigate operation and costs of denominational college residences.

Jean Golden (III UC) will carry out a similar study of non-denominational college residences.

Some of the questions Clark and his committee hope to answer are:

- Are residences becoming nothing more than sanctuaries for wealthy first-year students?

- Should the university build low-cost residences?

- Are "luxuries" such as maid service making costs higher?

- Does a certain type of student seek a certain type of housing?

- What are the operating costs of a large residence?

- How are residences meeting their costs and paying off their debts?

- Where are students living? What are their accommodations like? How much are they paying? Why are they living where they're living?

- What is being planned for the university in the near future?

"So far, the university has indicated that it will give us a lot of cooperation," says Clark. "We hope the colleges will give us the same help."

Some of the fraternities have indicated unwillingness to reveal their financial positions. "I don't see why though," says Clark. "As far as I can see, it's to their advantage to help us out."

Within several weeks the commission will be sending out questionnaires to a sample group of students living away from home but not in residence.

"We're going to need a lot of cooperation from the students on this," says Clark. "If they don't take the trouble to fill out and return the questionnaires, we won't have a very accurate survey."

The survey is being computerized to speed it up and to enable the researchers to work with a larger sample.

"We need lots of help," says Clark. "There is work for all types of volunteers. We have to punch computer cards, there are things to be typed, we need people to do interviews. There are lots of personal initiative positions."

Anyone interested in helping the commission can leave his name at the SAC office.

ISC cleared on charges of CIA aid

OTTAWA (CUP)—A report released last week absolved the International Student Conference of charges of complicity with the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency. Last February Ramparts magazine announced they had evidence the CIA was funding the U.S. National Student Association, then an ISC member.

The NSA was dropped from the ISC shortly after the CIA link was revealed.

ISC was also implicated by Ramparts at the same time and set up an investigation commission.

The San Jancinto Fund in Houston, which admits CIA ties, had paid for publication of an ISC magazine, the Asian Student, and had contributed to administrative costs of ISC conferences, the report says.

Another organization, the Foundation for Youth and Student Affairs, channeled funds into the NSA, the ISC, and on one occasion a small amount into the Canadian Union of students, the report says. Despite NSA allegations the organization denies ties with the CIA.

The commission criticized the fact that NSA officers knew of CIA ties and announced their intentions to sever them only when Ramparts moved to reveal the connection.

The commission confirmed that the ISC knew of no connection with the CIA.

UBC may begin French cluster college

VANCOUVER (Special)—A campus cluster college plan for French-speaking students has been proposed by a University of British Columbia faculty member.

Carl Baar, assistant professor of political science said he presented the proposal for a French-speaking college to president-delegate Dr. Kenneth Hare in August.

In his reply Dr. Hare expressed interest and said the proposal should be discussed further.

Mr. Baar's proposed college, to operate entirely in French, would teach the introductory core of liberal arts courses. The college would offer at least one major subject unavailable elsewhere in the university.

Both English and French-Canadian students would be enrolled.

A cluster college is essentially a 1,000 student liberal arts college set in the middle of a larger university.

Mr. Baar said the college could later take the form of a dormitory complex where students and instructors could be in constant communication.

"Basically the college is to increase interaction between English and French-speaking Canadians."

Effort to fire Georgian editor fails

MONTREAL (Special) — The perennial battle between campus newspapers and student governments flared here briefly last week as an attempt to dismiss the editor-in-chief of The Georgian failed.

Frank Brayton, editor of the Sir George Williams University paper, had been charged with irresponsibility and incompetence but was cleared by a 7-1 vote of the campus's publication board.

The issue at hand is Brayton's syndicalist editorial philosophy.

John Kelsey, field secretary for the Canadian University Press, commented:

"The only grounds for firing an editor is incompetence, and that should be established by a CUP investigation committee."

NDY holds convention; Wants revitalization

VANCOUVER (Special)—The Young New Democrats aimed at a revitalization of their organization at their annual convention at the University of British Columbia earlier this month.

A resolution was passed calling for the NDY to work with other interested groups against the war in Vietnam.

A resolution on Quebec advocated the principle of self-determination and called for further study in the area.

Another resolution passed called for government action against foreign control of the Canadian economy.

Faculty approves Martin Vietnam stand

The Faculty Committee on Vietnam last week sent a letter to Defence Minister Paul Martin to state their appreciation of his recent UN stand against the U.S. bombing of North Vietnam.

The letter said the "call for a unilateral cessation of the bombing of North Vietnam, in conjunction with similar demands by a growing number of nations, clearly expresses the misgivings of millions throughout the world."

The letter expressed the hope that Canada would continue with this policy despite outside pressure.

Professor Kenneth McNaught, the committee's chairman, said the group grew out of informal discussion between several professors last year.

In March it sent a letter of protest to Prime Minister Lester Pearson, signed by 75 faculty members. The letter protested the supply of war materials by Canadian industries to the U.S.

It received a personal reply from Mr. Pearson.

The 400 members of the committee include Northrop Frye, J.M. Careless, Robin S. Harris and C.B. Macpherson.

Prof. McNaught said the most effective way for the committee to help achieve peace in Vietnam was to protest Canadian compliance with U.S. involvement.

An appeal will be made to the provincial government to restrict industrial aid to the war effort and to issue a further appeal to the federal government.

Prof. McNaught described the committee's actions so far as "extremely successful."

Prof. McNaught said the committee might sponsor a series of seminars for American draft-dodgers.

Many of the committee members participated in the Vietnam protest march in Toronto last Saturday.

“General Foods offers you more than just Jell-O.”

This young GF Researcher symbolizes the challenge General Foods offers all its people — the challenge to develop a needed product (to fill the bowl, or cup, or glass) and sell it at a profit. The Canadian housewife has more time to enjoy today's living thanks in part to a group of dedicated young men at GF who have devoted much time and thought to creating products to fill her needs — nutritious products which are quick and simple to prepare, are reasonably-priced, and taste wonderful.

Here's the story of one recently-developed new product: Market studies show that almost 50% of all Canadians do not take the time to eat a regular breakfast. To improve this situation, food scientists at General Foods developed a dry mix which when added to a glass of milk provides the nutrition of a normal breakfast.

Here was a quality product, created to fill a real need. With the support of GF advertising and GF merchandising know-how, almost everyone is now familiar with Minute Breakfast. No matter how time-pressed, anyone can spare half a minute to prepare it. And it will help keep them going all day long.

An objective which calls for the creation of new products each year obviously offers a stimulating and mind-stretching challenge — one which can be met only by exceptional people with a wide range of talents. If you like challenges, you too can enjoy . . .

Government in control; U of S financial takeover

REGINA (Special)—Saskatchewan Premier Ross Thatcher announced last week government plans to assume “direct financial control” of the University of Saskatchewan.

Due to an annual enrolment increase of more than 1,200 students the government must find $28,000,000 for the university for this academic year. In 1963-64 the university was given $11,000,000.

Mr. Thatcher said that in future the university will be treated like any other spending department in its request for funds.

Don Kossick, editor of the Regina campus's Carillon, blamed the move on the administration's refusal to negotiate with the government, mass faculty resignations and student class boycotts and demonstrations.

SGS election today

Polling booths will be set up at the Sidney Smith building and at the main library for today's by-election for three Students' Administrative Council representatives from the school of graduate studies.

Can apartheid be solved? Birley speaks at ISC

A professor of education at the University of Johannesburg recently told a group at the International Student Centre there is no solution to apartheid “while it is preserved by a way of life.”

Sir Robert Birley, knighted in 1966 for advocating less severe action against Rhodesian students, says the South African people have a difficult and unique problem.

“The problem can most affectively be dealt with in the eyes of white South Africans by physical separation-apartheid. Things are getting worse.”

PHE hands Vic first defeat

By JIM MORRISON

Marry mayhem was the tune yesterday as PHE upset the Mulock applectart 12-0. An aroused Phys Ed team took apart Vic Scarlet and Gold both offensively and defensively.

Hal Martin ran for the first T.D. from three yards out after Gary Babcock blocked a Vic punt. The highlight of the game was a dazzling 65 yard pass-and-run play from quarterback Hal Martin to John Chapman which counted a touchdown.

An indication of the one-sidedness of the match was that Vic stopped Phys Ed three times inside their fifteen. The game also featured a touchdown rambled by Ron Kishimoto off a punt return that was called back because the phys edder had stepped out of bounds.

Indicative of the heavy hitting in a penalty-filled encounter, was the injury to Rick Johnston, who was nearly sliced in half on an end sweep by three eager Vic defenders.

Other football this week and last saw PHE shut out Dents on Friday by another 12-0 score. John Chapman scored both TD's in that encounter.

On Monday Dentistry lost again, this time to UC by a count of 12-7. Bob Kram and Steve Seon had majors for Redmen, and Sekura and Kram added single points. Jackson's dental score was converted by Kushner.

Group II on Monday featured another powerful display by the Meds men, as they whitewashed Forestry 42-0. Denys Symons, (2) Craig Retter, Andy Davies (2) and Don Munnings had touchdowns, and Symons added six single points.

RUGGER

Monday rugger featured two high-scoring games. Engineering I demolished Vic I 14-0, and Engineering II followed up with a 10-5 triumph over Trinity B.

Ed Simonen, Barry Boulton, Gord Roberts and Don Kocur all had tries for the ranking Engineers, and Poulton added a conversion.

The sub-minor Skulemen were led by Bob Cherniak and Rich Seppala, with one try each, and natty Peter Blazier, with two conversions. Vic Harding's score for Trins was converted by Chris Loat.

Yesterday, Law and Trinity A shut each other out, and Architecture defaulted to University College.

SOCCER

Last Friday, Meds A slipped past Trinity B 3-2, UC attacked Law 1-0, and New blanked Architecture 5-0. Medical marksmen were Paul Kent, S. Langer and I. Fayer, while Wally Llewellyn and Paul Fisher retorted for Trinity. Ken Amoroso potted the UC marker.

Nudging the net for New were P. Grunwald (2 goals), M. Rhodd, H. Kennard, and J. Murray.

On Monday, UC marched Vic I 1-1 and St. Mike's took SGS 2-0, while Tuesday games saw Innis hit Pharmacy 5-2, and Forestry surprise Emmanuel 2-1.

Bob Allen's tally for UC was matched by Rich Senior's score for Vic. Don Palma and Joe Mauriell were responsible for the Irish win.

D. Pikulyk (2 goals), B. Usher, G. Priestman, and Michael D'Ornelles were integral for Innis, while B. Holliday, and M. Sparrow were the purveyors of powdered potions. The counters of M. Knight and A. Cameron for Forestry were answered by the clerical toe of Tony A.

LACROSSE

Law Lords continued their winning ways, nudging Vic I on Friday, then finishing off SMC 7-1 on Monday. Gary Grierson (2 goals) Gord Hill (3 goals) and Cam Arthurs were enough to surpass the efforts of Gord James, Al Vallillee (2) and Frank Blyth for Vic.

Gary Grierson's four tallies led the lawyers over the Irish, with singles going to Gord Park, Ed Mayhew, and Bill Pashby. Bruce Ferguson was all alone for St. Mike's.

Other games this week had Meds C tie Trinity 3-3 and PHE A defeat Vic I 11-7. The outbursts of P. Fraiteck, D. MacLaughlin and A. Ward for Meds were met by Trinity's Cam Hall, Bob Unger and Brian Murray.

John Dale notched five for Phys Ed in their conquest of Victoria, followed by Chris Rudge (2), Mike Wright (2), Bill Bennett, and B. Connelly. Frank Blyth (3), Wayne Murphy (2), Gord James and Al Vallillee responded for Vic in yet another losing cause.

VOLLEYBALL

Meds B defeated Law last Thursday 15-12, 15-9, and on Friday, Trinity took PHE I handily 15-7, 15-12. It took Innis II three games to dispose of Vic II 15-13, 4-15, 15-13, on Monday.

Soccer Blues at Waterloo for tuneup

By TONY TOE

Varsity Soccer Blues take to the road today for a visit to Waterloo in what should be an easy game for the league leaders. Waterloo is winless after three starts, and instead of showing improvement, they have steadily become worse. Such is usually the fate of a new team.

Blues realize after last Saturday's close call that they have to outscore the opposition as well as outplay them, and are taking the game as no more than a prep for Saturday's tough rematch against Guelph. And what a game that could be. It's too bad that Toronto fans will miss this one as it is being played at Guelph.

A pleasant surprise for Varsity in the last three games has been the play of Frank Soppelsa. The muscle-bulging attacker has transformed himself from a timid centre-forward with a powerful shot to a tiger of a playmaker. Soppelsa is one of the reasons that Jim Lefkos has been filling enemy nets of late.

A disappointment for the overpowered Blues has been the play of their rearguard. They have allowed five goals in the last three games. At least three of those goals were a result of inexplorable mental lapses. The only logical excuse could be the fact that the ball is upfield so much of the time that their idleness results in loss of concentration.

Korner Kicks: Ormond Mendes will return to the lineup for today's game while Frank Soppelsa is a doubtful starter because of academic commitments. Injured goaltender Erwin Stach will travel to Waterloo but will not likely see any action.

Maneating defense key to Blues' success formula

When Hamilton Tiger-Cats were the scourge of the country not so long ago, a certain basic pattern permeated their victories. Under coaches Trimble and Sazio, Ti-Cats parlayed an exceptionally rugged defense with merely an ordinary offense, but an offense that always scored just enough points to win.

Varsity Blues seem to have adopted the same tact. In last Saturday's upset victory over Queen's, a stout defense held Gaels' powerful offensive juggernaut to no points and miserable yardage in the second half while Bob Amer's crew kept pounding away until the winning points crossed the goal-line with six and a half minutes remaining.

Star of the show was a staggering display of determination put on by Blues' front four of Alex Squires, Jim Bennett, Doug Buckman, brought in specially for blitz situations, and Alex Topps who fought off block after block to drop Queen's quarterbacks, Don Bayne and Bill McNeill, on their respective posteriors three times in the final minutes. And any pass that did get away was usually hurried, and inaccurate, to a receiver already well-covered by the likes of Paul McKay, Pete Raham, Chris Hicks, Bill Stankovic, and mainstay Riivo Ilves. The complete turn-about from their porous second-half performance against Western was simply amazing.

Queen's vaunted running attack was choked to a gasping 76 yds., not only by the front four but by ruff and tuff linemen, Dave Church, Larry Lukas, Bill Bennett, and defensive captain, iron Mike Wright.

If Blues are to repeat at home on Saturday, certainly the defense will have to put on another peak performance.

Another similarity between Blues and the old Tabbies is in the penalty department. When Hamilton was playing its best football, over-aggressive penalties for piling on, roughing, etc. were commonplace. Varsity received one roughing sentence and two piling on penalties in the second half.

Another big factor in Blues' win was the ability of the club to keep a steady offense functioning. One of the main reasons for this was the imposing presence of Mike Eben. Employed mainly as a decoy all day, Eben dragged two and sometimes three men with him whenever he left the line of scrimmage — such is the nature of his reputation. Of course this left Queen's in a hole, and quarterback Bob Amer had little trouble finding Mike Raham or Jim Ware in the open.

At long last, Blues' injury list is shortening. No one reported major aches from the Queen's game. As trainer Howie Ringham put it: "When you're hitting hard you don't get hurt. It's when you let up, like against Western, that injuries occur." Flashy rookie halfback Wolfgang Gut is now healthy, along with Jack Rosati and Steve Overgaard.

BLUENOTES: For the second straight game the toe of Paul McKay was the margin of victory. . . Retired Ranny Parker sends his love from Australia.

Rugger teams in action; host Osgoode, Wanderers

Varsity Blues' Western team meets Osgoode Hall tonight on the back campus in what should be a good exhibition of rugger. The Eastern team hosts Toronto Wanderers under the lights at Varsity Stadium. Game times are both 8 o'clock.

The Eastern team is having trouble with injuries this year and the latest addition to the injured list is winger John MacKay. John suffered a separated shoulder in a scrimmage on the back campus Monday night. It has to be classed as a freak accident since the Blues were playing tough and not tackle at the time.

Earlier in the year the Blues lost winger Doug Woods who suffered a dislocated shoulder, also in a practice, and scrum-half Al Giachino, who aggravated a knee injury in a game against York and will never play contact sports again.

For the game tonight against Wanderers Blues will probably play Scott McClure at the wing position. Scott started the season with the Western team but his fine running and tackling earned him a position on the Eastern squad.

Tonight's match should be little trouble for Blues as they have already defeated Wanderers, in their first exhibition game of the season.

Sir George students stage strike; Action brings "unqualified victory"

MONTREAL (CUP) — A one-day student strike at Sir George Williams University has won students a promise of a larger role in the university's government.

About half of the 3,800 students boycotted morning classes, many because professors had cancelled classes in sympathy with the strike, called over bookstore policy.

A joint faculty-student-administration committee was announced last night to investigate how to involve more fully students and faculty in the affairs of the university.

And a 12-member joint committee of four from each group will be set up to set policy for the university bookstore, the source of the dispute.

John Gregory, a spokesman for the students association, proclaimed the decision a "complete and unqualified victory for the students."

"We have won everything we wanted,"

It all started Wednesday as a sit-in at the bookstore to protest high book prices and the allocation of a $90,000 store profit to the athletic program.

When officials rejected student demands a one-day boycott of classes was called by student union President Jeff Chipman.

The students also recommended that:

- a joint committee of students faculty and administration be responsible for the operation of the bookstore;

- the staff discount of 10 per cent be discontinued;

- bookstore accounts be made public;

- Time-Life inserts be removed from all texts.

When the bookstore-investigation committee of the student union presented these recommendations to university Treasurer William Reay Wednesday afternoon, he replied:

"Who's running this university, anyway?"

At this point negotiations broke down and 125 students, led by the committee for a Free University organized a sleep-in.

Yesterday, an informal teach-in ran all day.

Satellite colleges could be dumping grounds

By SUE HELWIG and PAUL MACRAE

An unpublished but strictly enforced Simcoe Hall regulation may be turning Scarborough and Erindale Colleges into second-rate institutions.

The regulation, first used this year, banishes from the St. George campus all prospective students with less than 64 per cent on Grade 13 exams.

Applicants with the basic university admission requirement of 60 per cent, but less than 64, receive a SCAREND letter, politely referring them to Scarborough or Erindale.

Erindale Registrar J. J. Rac says that about 1,000 students received SCAREND letters this year.

Students in honors course are not affected by the cutoff since an average of at least 64 is required to enter honors courses anyway. Also, Erindale and Scarborough take only general course students.

W. D. Foulds, assistant dean of arts and science, said yesterday the 64 per cent cutoff was intended to keep the number of first-year students on the main campus to a maximum of 2,800.

"The feeling has been that students with better admission qualifications should be given a preference in the choice of campus."

However, St. Michael's College could not fill its first-year quota under the system, and both Innis and New College enrollment is down from last year.

Mr. Foulds said the decrease at Innis and New College was due to over-enrollment last year.

He said a slightly different admission procedure was being considered for next year to enable St. Michael's to fulfill its quota.

How, then, will an influx of students with averages of less than 64 per cent affect the academic performance of the two satellite colleges?

Scarborough Principal A. F. Plumptre admitted that his students did have a lower academic achievement than the main campus and that many did not make Scarborough their first choice.

But, he said these students make up only a "significant minority" of the college.

"To a professor, there is a double challenge with this type of student," he said. "We want them to learn to love us."

"We have better accommodation and equipment, small classes, and offer the general science and arts better than the main campus."

He predicted that for these reasons the quality of applicants for Scarborough would go steadily upwards until its standards were equal to those of the main campus.

Erindale Principal Tuzo Wilson denied his college was a dumping ground for poor students.

"I'm not particularly disturbed about the quality of students we're getting because we have so many excellent students. I can think of a half-a-dozen scholarship winners."

"It's simply a matter of facilities," he said. "The new colleges have more space."

"It's not a case of discrimination because some day the situation may change and we may have to send some students to the St. George campus if we become overcrowded and they have more space."

A pride of Cadillacs in front of Simcoe Hall last night was the only indication that the top-secret board of governors was meeting. The governors, who confine their public statements to "no comment," had swooped in earlier in the day for their monthly conference.

The second installment of the Mochpersan report appears in the centre of today's paper. To collate the entire 32 page supplement, use Monday's eight pages as a cover and insert today's and following sections. Pages are numbered.

Introducing Sir James of Duff-Berdahl fame...

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Times have changed at British universities since Sir James Duff graduated from Cambridge in 1922.

Last Tuesday the students of the University of Manchester, where Sir James was Professor of Education from 1932 to 1937, defied their administration. They voted to install machines vending contraceptives inside one of the school's buildings.

SIR JAMES DUFF

When he was an undergraduate at Cambridge, Sir James picked up degrees in Classics and Economics in less than three years and had no time for extra-curricular activities.

Like most World War One veterans, he took his studies seriously.

Sir James is at the University of Toronto as a Centennial Professor and will deliver three lectures on British universities in November.

Tomorrow Sir James will team up with Prof. Robert Berdahl to answer criticisms of their report on University Government in Canada.

Published in April, 1966, the Duff-Berdahl report incited student activists by suggesting students be given a voice in university government.

But the report also fell under criticism for its adherence to the traditional British pattern of a two-tiered system of government — the Board of Governors and the Senate.

Sir James, a 69-year-old bachelor, sports a rugged rust-colored moustache, wears heavy, toned-down woollens and laughs with a throaty chuckle.

"I prefer the quiet country life," Sir James said as he sipped sherry Wednesday evening by a window facing the secluded quadrangle of Massey college.

Born and bred in academic circles, Sir James' father was a professor at Cambridge and his brother became a professor at Cambridge.

The co-author of the Duff-Berdahl report began his academic career at Winchester, an exclusive all-boys school.

"I look back on Winchester with a sense of pride, not social pride, but a pride in the institution itself," he said in reminiscence.

As a school Prefect, he had the responsibility of caning delinquents. As a scholar he lived in the same quarters the original Winchester students occupied in 1393.

James Duff was knighted for serving on a commission that upgraded higher education in British colonies after the Second World War.

However the commission stressed their work was being done "overseas" and not in "colonies."

"Colonies has become a dirty word, you know," Sir James said.

Until 1937, he lectured at Manchester and the University of Durham for 15 years. Then he was appointed Vice-Chancellor of Durham.

The Vice-Chancellor is the British equivalent of a North American university president and Sir James served in that capacity for 23 years until his retirement in 1960.

When Sir James returns to his pleasant 18th century home in Durham County he will resume his duties as a representative of the Queen.

"I'm Lord-Lieutenant of County Durham," he said, "and I get to wear a sword."

Innis will discuss draft-dodger aid

Innis College students will decide their positions on aid to draft-dodgers at an open meeting next Tuesday.

The meeting follows the Innis student council's decision Tuesday to support the Toronto Anti-Draft program in principle and with a $50 donation.

The council voted 8 to 5 for moral support and 7 to 6 to supply the money. It was later discovered that a two-thirds majority was needed to pass the financial measure.

Next Tuesday's general meeting, at 7:30 p.m., will decide whether a referendum will be held on the issue.

WE WANT WOMEN

Women from the University who wish to go into part-time business for themselves, augmenting their incomes (earning extra Christmas money, for instance) and who will be given 10 hours free basic sales training in order to be able to make a minimum of $100 a month. $600 to $700 a month is not unheard of, but it is exceptional. However, rewards are in direct proportion to efforts expended. You will be introducing, demonstrating and selling a very fine line of cosmetics to your friends and to people who may very well become your friends. ### Only nationalism can break barriers

Nationalism may be the only hope for breaking down religious and racial barriers in the new nations, Senator Roy Neehall of Trinidad said this week.

Senator Neehall told a panel discussion nationalization would give different races and religions "a sense of belonging to each other."

The Christian Church, he said, should support "a process of open secularization" that would end religious strife.

Racism must be attributed to social and cultural patterns of development, Senator Neehall asserted. "I have never found any racial prejudice in children."

Christians who "use religion to justify" their racial discrimination "lack a full understanding of what they think to be their faith."

"When the chips are down, when things become personal, they realize that they don't know or understand their god."

The formation of political parties in Trinidad representing the rivalry between racial groups has caused the East Indian minority "to fear loss of their rights and aspirations" at the hands of the African majority, he said.

Though "disturbed by the increasing violence in the world," Senator Neehall said Christians were justified in using violent means to overcome situations in which there was "no social justice and no room for advancement."

"If it is the only means of overthrowing the system that spawns violence, Christian young people must recognize realities and take up arms."

WUS Treasurer Van arrives Nov. 6

Treasure Van, World University Services' annual sale of unusual gifts from 40 countries will be on the main campus during the week of November 6-10, at Hart House.

This week Treasure Van has been at Scarborough College.

WUS hopes to gross $10,000 from the main campus and $3,000 from the Scarborough sale. The proceeds will go exclusively to WUS projects in Canada.

Don Smith (IV Trin), main campus co-ordinator for Treasure Van says he hopes 1,000 students will be involved in the sale.

Columbia admits receipt of CIA funds

NEW YORK (CUP-CPS)—Columbia University has confirmed that it has been receiving funds from the Central Intelligence Agency since 1961 for a research project. The project, designed to study the economics of East Central Europe, has been in existence since 1955. The CIA has been giving Columbia $123,000 annually for the project for six years.

The only secrecy regarding the project has been the source of funds. Columbia listed it in the school catalogue, and a number of students have been involved in the research.

The CIA funding of the project was disclosed by the Columbia chapter of Students for Democratic Society at a news conference last week.

SDS members demanded three immediate steps from the university—the reinstatement of a student suspended last year participating in an anti-CIA sit-in on campus, a program of public hearings on the relationship and immediate suspension of all contracts with the CIA and the department of defence.

The university's statement said the CIA finances only the one project. Any ties with the defence department have not been made public.

The issue, say some students, is not merely that the university should be honest about CIA connections, but that students should control their own education.

SDS claims the right to resist all university complicity with the CIA since the university should not comply with an organization which SDS says "rigs elections, overthrows elected governments, bribes officials, contaminates food and subverts the rights of men."

It disclosed that many trustees of the university are members of CIA conduit organizations. The president of Columbia, Grayson Kirk, has been a member of three CIA conduits.

Many campus and community organizations, including the Independent Alumni Association of Columbia University, support SDS's resistance to the CIA.

Bleeders needed in silver cup race

The University of Toronto blood drive, which starts Monday, will be spiced up a little this year with the spirit of competition.

The Carling Brewing Co. will present a silver cup to the college or faculty that bleeds the most.

An exciting race is expected to develop with each college trying to out-bleed the other.

Smaller colleges and faculties will not be at a disadvantage. Complicated arithmetic calculations will give everyone an equal chance to win the coveted award.

The silver cup will be presented to the bloodless victors after the campaign.

Arts and science students must register with their colleges. Others register with their faculty.

All the colleges and faculties are divided into five groups according to the number of students in each.

A percentage is taken for each college and faculty based on last year's blood yield and last year's enrollment. Then an average percentage is found in each of the five groups.

These same calculations will be applied to this year's effort.

This year's percentage for each college or faculty will be compared to the mean in the respective group.

Then by standard deviation the college or faculty which most exceeds their respective mean will be declared the winner.

Conferences discuss campus reform

University government reform will be the subject of two conferences held on the campus this weekend.

Sir James Duff and Robert Berdahl, authors of the University Government in Canada report, will keynote a meeting sponsored by the committee on instruction and research on higher education to review the findings of their report.

The three-session meeting Saturday at Carr Hall, St. Michael's College, will criticize the report. Several Canadian Union of Students representatives will take part in the discussions.

There is no admission charge except for the banquet.

Dissatisfaction with the scope of the original conference has led CUS to hold an alternative program simultaneously. They have planned sessions that can be attended by delegates to both conferences.

Matthew Cohen, director of the school of social studies and Ian Mackenzie, instructor of religious knowledge at Trinity College, will provide an overview of the functions of the university and its relation to society. Political science professor John Shingler of McGill will discuss concepts of power.

The afternoon and evening sessions of the conference, which will be attended by CUS representatives from across Canada, will be moderated by Students Council President Tom Faulkner.

Pub protest descends on Sudbury

SUDBURY (CUP)—More than half of Laurentian University's 1,200 students descended on downtown Sudbury yesterday to protest the refusal of their board of governors to permit a proposed pub on the campus.

Prevented from marching by the local magistrate, the students held a rally at which faculty members, MPP's, and the presidents of the four colleges spoke.

"After the refusal to grant permits either to march or to rally, we wanted to let the students decide what we should do," said students council president J. D. Lamont.

"We are concerned about the alcohol problem and with a pub on campus students would not go to places where they are forced to beer down. They would be able to drink leisurely in a place that has atmosphere."

The university board of directors has twice refused the student bid for a pub.

Varg staffers! Bob Parkins (VI UC) will perform his world-famous fan dance at the season's first newspaper bash, called to celebrate Polynesian puberty week, this Saturday.

Of this party, Editor Volkmar Richter has said, "A good time will be had by all. That's an order."

Come to the office today to learn the time and place.

department held a faculty meeting that endorsed the student strike and its demands for a say in the administration of the bookstore.

In a poll conducted Thursday in the cafeteria, less than one in four students polled said they did not support the strike.

Rather than seeking membership in existing bodies where their concerns are inadequately dealt with, students might strive for the establishment of bodies made up of representatives of staff, administrators and students and committed to the discussion of problems posed by student members, in this way they could be assured of quick consideration of their pressing issues by a senior body.

President C. T. Bissell,
Annual Report, 1965-66.

duff-berdahl report - still a few signs of life

Remember the Duff-Berdahl Report? No? Then let's have a quick refresher course.

Two years ago, the Canadian Association of University Teachers and the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada commissioned a study of the operations of university government in Canada.

Selected to make the report were Sir

James Duff, vice-chancellor of the University of Durham and former professor of education, and Professor Robert O. Berdahl of San Francisco State College.

Their report was released in August 1965. It recommended faculty representation on the Board of Governors, more power for the various faculty associations, and inclusion of students on senate committees.

Almost as an afterthought, Duff-Berdahl suggested an elected student representative, who would NOT be himself a student, should be included on the Board of Governors.

The report was released, printed and proofed, distributed and discussed, buried and buried.

Oh, yes, committees were formed, and reports were filed but in the end little constructive action was taken.

But take heart, ye believers in university democracy! Duff-Berdahl isn't dead, just sleeping.

Tonight, says the press release, a "light-hearted" banquet will officially celebrate its disinterment.

Don't get excited: the celebrations will end Saturday evening.

The dynamic duo themselves will headline a series of panel discussions on Saturday morning and afternoon.

They will answer questions from a select audience comprising the cream of Conodion university administrators plus all the interested faculty types the organizers can assemble.

There will be a few students too, probably along for the ride. Gotto have students: good for the image.

The Conodion Union of Students has labelled the "official" panel discussions as "inadequate in scope" and designed to impede not facilitate significant discussion.

Accordingly, CUS is planning an "unofficial" panel discussion to run opposite the "official" version on Saturday afternoon.

Students are invited to every panel session of both the "official" conference and the "unofficial" CUS alternative.

The first panel, featuring Duff and Berdahl in the flesh, begins at 10 a.m. tomorrow in Carr Hall of St. Michael's College.

student voice on faculty councils

Student activism on this campus attained a new level of maturity with Wednesday's announcements from Innis College.

Effective immediately, five students will be granted full voting positions on the Innis College Faculty Council.

The decision represents the culmination of a two-year campaign by Innis student council and its dynamic president, Ken Stone.

Under Stone's leadership, the council convinced Innis principal Robin Harris that students should be granted a voice in the operations of the college.

Unfortunately, the Simcoe Hall administration, which has the final say in matters affecting Innis College, was not so eager to grant students a measure of responsibility.

In mid-September, acting president J. H. Sword vetoed the proposal because it represented some kind of "precedent." And we all know what Simcoe Hall thinks about precedents.

However, the university administration finally changed its tune and council president Stone plus four elected student representatives will join the Faculty Council at its next meeting.

Meanwhile, back at the Faculty of Food Sciences, Dean Barbara A. McLaren has invited a student representative to sit on that faculty council.

Still to be decided is whether this representative will be merely an observer or will have full voting privileges, as is the case at Innis.

These new student representatives are now confronted with great challenges as well as great potentialities.

Their contributions will demonstrate to both faculty and administration that students have much to contribute to the institutional operation of this burgeoning operational institution.

At the same time, those diehards in high places who fear and distrust any semblance of student power, will be watching closely for any signs of immaturity or foolishness (real or imaginary).

It is no understatement that the performance of the student representatives at Innis and Food Sciences will determine the future for student representation on all faculty councils.

Their task is not easy.
We know they will succeed.

engineers can't bail out B & W

Sir:

The remark by John Norris in Friday's Varsity that "the Engineering Society and the U.C. Lit would be willing to undertake all the Blue and White Society's functions" may have made debating points but it does not agree with fact.

The B & W, already asked the Engineering Society in late September of this year to take over part of the B & W's football game activities. The Engineering Society voted this down by a substantial majority. It was stated that the Engineering Society did not want to do anything that might engender risk, even though the B & W was to supply money for the materials.

Not only does the Engineering Society not want to take over any B & W function, but financially it can not. So poor are the Engineering Society finances that Skule Nile (an annual financial disaster) was almost dropped and student fees to the Engineering Society were nearly retroactively raised by $2 (to net the Engineering Society nearly $4,000). The B & W, unlike Engineering, does not have the Stores to bolster its income but by SAC ruling must try to work on a break-even basis.

The U.C. Lit for its part has done all it can to hinder the B & W both by withdrawing its reps and by scheduling its festivals to coincide with B & W events. When the Lit has a year to plan and carry out its single festival, it is no wonder that it is good. Should the Lit schedule its festival to coincide with the B & W's Medical festival, the main losers will be the Medical Faculty students who have been putting in most of the work.

Perhaps the problem is that the B & W tries too much and ends up doing too little to satisfy everyone.

EBS has problems, head can't spell

Sir:

Far be it from us to draw any conclusions about the Edmund Burke Society from the grotesque inability of its chairman to write English. I need make no mention of the fact that his letter contains 3 questions unblended with question marks, one split infinitive, and the word "Diarrhoea" grossly misspelled.

why is bob revue limited to vic?

Sir:

Should the awarding of roles in a university production be based on an assessment of an individual's talent or on his choice of college?

My friends and I were wondering about this when, at the end of a two and one-half hour wait to be auditioned for the Vic production, "The Music Man", we were told that it is traditional that only Vic students participate in Vic musicals. (No mention of this was made in the Varsity notice urging all interested to come and try out).

This seems strange because most people choose their college in a quick, arbitrary decision in high school. Stranger, still, because we understand that anyone is allowed to at least audition for such things as U.C. Follies, St. Mike's "How to Succeed", etc.

Besides, why would any producer want to exclude any possible contribution that might be valuable to his shows?

Down with Varsity productions; up with quality shows!

all about communications

Sir:

The Varsity publishes articles which criticize an ineffectiveness or sterility which the paper itself does not possess. Although this statement covers a vast field this letter is concerned only with communications.

At the University of Toronto communications would not exist at all without The Varsity. When in a single faculty communications are dead how can we expect interplay in and among all the faculties? No other medium can claim to present the correct opinions of the members of any faculty, the events on campus and subjects which may or may not affect members of the University Community. How many noticeboards are up-to-date and how many are read? How many of the different campus periodicals interest students from all faculties and what have these papers got to say?

Quit complaining that The Varsity exists. The problem is as always apathy. A certain laziness to participate, to argue, to stand on a soap box somewhere on campus and shout out. But, even so, if you are not willing to shout, then write. Do something, but don't let communications die.

When we are satisfied we have nothing to say — only those that are dissatisfied are ever heard. Let us know what's going on and when, if you say yes or no. Inject this university with an adrenalin of words.

Che... Just doing his thing

"... let me say that the true revolutionary is guided by a great feeling of love. It is impossible to think of a true revolutionary lacking this quality..."—Major Guevara.

Havana, July 26, 1966. It was unusually hot, even for Cuba; we had been trying to quench our insatiable thirst with bottle after bottle of revolutionary Coke (prepared from a formula which tastes just like the home-brewed product, served in the Coca Cola bottles left over from pre-revolutionary Cuba); it was the anniversary of the beginning of the Cuban Revolution and we were standing in the Plaza de la Revolucion, watching the thousands of Cubans streaming into the immense square until we could no longer see the limit of the crowd on the horizon. Like them, we had come to hear Fidel.

Twenty feet away was the raised stone speakers platform; we waited in the blistering heat; a few impatient people in the crowd began chanting something about Fidel, the revolution and socialism, but for the most part the thousands stood quietly; he would come because they had come.

Finally a mild mannered man who had been sitting on the platform arose, very informally, greeted the crowd and casually introduced the speaker of the day, who was by now standing immediately behind him. As soon as the ten second introduction was completed Fidel Castro sauntered up to the podium, smiled shyly, gave a slight wave to someone he recognized in the crowd, and stood quietly facing his countrymen; they were his compañeros.

So too, the crowd — which I thought would have greeted Fidel with wild applause — stood in silence facing Fidel; he was their compañero.

Then he began; for three hours in that hot afternoon, gesturing, head bobbing, jumping up and down, perspiration running off his face he spoke with — not at — his people. As I listened to a word by word translation supplied by an American lady beside me, I realized that this was no demagogue haranguing his followers; his thoughts were concise, precise, somewhat rambling—he does not prepare his speeches in advance — statements and questions which he shared with the crowd; and they listened intently, very quietly. Agriculture, education, the consciousness of a revolutionary; only when he mentioned the courage of the people of Vietnam did the crowd respond vocally in what amounted to a shout of victory; some disparaging remarks about "the ignorant cowboy from Texas and his sidekicks McNamara and Rusk," filled the air with shrill harsh whistles of anger.

He then reached into his shirt pocket and drew out a piece of paper, held it up before him and announced that it was a message of greeting from their comrade — and before the name came out the crowd was cheering and laughing, for they knew who it was from — Ernesto "Che" Guevara. Che, off somewhere organizing another revolution, hiding in some dense jungle knew that they would be there on the anniversary of the revolution he had helped create, and he had written them a letter of greeting...

While the rest of the world played one of its favourite games of Where Is Che? or Is He Alive?, the Cuban people were secure in their knowledge that Che was following one of his most important maxims, that "it is the duty of a revolutionary to make revolution".

When Che made his dramatic departure from Cuba a few years ago, he wrote to Fidel:

"Other nations of the world call for my modest efforts . . . and the time has come for us to depart. I want it known that I do so with mixed feelings of joy and sorrow: I leave here the purest of my hopes as a builder, and the dearest of those I love. And

I leave a people that received me as a son. That wounds me deeply. I carry to new battle fronts the faith that you taught me, the revolutionary spirit of my people, the feeling of fulfilling the most sacred of duties to fight against imperialism wherever it may be. This comforts and heals the deepest wounds.

If my final hour finds me under other skies, my last thought will be of this people and especially of you . . . wherever I am, I will feel the responsibility of being a Cuban revolutionary and as such I shall behave . . . I would like to say much to you and to our people, but I feel it is not necessary. Words cannot express what I would want them to, and I don't think it's worthwhile to banter phrases.

Che also said at one time that there could only be two alternatives for the revolutionary — victory or death. We may alter this statement today when we speak of Che — victory and death. Cuba was his victory, Bolivia his death. On October 8 one of history's largest manhunts came to an end as CIA trained counter-insurgency forces captured and executed Major Guevara; for many his death revealed that he was indeed alive; for many others in Latin America he is alive now more than ever before.

Eulogizing is generally pompous, self assertive and usually fails to do credit to the deceased; in an age when youth has few personal idols, and every man is his own god Che represented something unique — integrity.

Beneath the romantic figure of the bearded passionate rebel, was a medical doctor, economist, poet, philosopher and humanist. With his mind and his discipline he might have taken a powerful position in the revolutionary government of Cuba; indeed this is the role he played for some time in the critical early days of the government, as the economy was painfully reorganized.

His vision however, took him back to the jungle, back to the people of Latin America. Latin America is filled with Communist Party cadres and committees who theorize about social change, who follow revolutionary guerrillas, ready to jump on the power bandwagon when they appear to be victorious. Such was the case in Cuba, and many of the old CP opportunists were angered when the Guerrillas also became political leaders. In fact Che was just as much a nightmare to many Communist conservatives in Latin America as he was to the Dictators and the CIA. Even Fidel who took the seat of government, organized the resistance of the people at the Bay of Pigs and was in the tank that fired the shot which sank the ship of the invaders, Integrity.

Every man has his "thing", and Che was merely doing his thing — making revolutions. Few men of our time have done their thing with as much honesty; The Beatles, perhaps, represent the same value for us as Che. At a crucial moment in their careers when they could have rested on their laurels they remained honest to themselves, their growth and their heads, and with some considerable commercial risk became revolutionaries themselves. They too are doing their thing — with integrity.

It may seem strange to mention Che and the Beatles with the same breath, yet in a strange way — for these are strange days — they are one and the same.

Revolution in Latin America

By CARL GILBERT

The spectre of international revolutions in the form of guerrilla warfare haunts the U.S. government. Their major responses to this threat have been the war in Vietnam, military aid with tactical training in counter-insurgency to client governments and the "operations" of the C.I.A. Instead of dealing with the problems of hunger, poverty, and disease the United States has chosen the course of backing reaction in all parts of the world. As part of these activities the American government played a major role in the murder of Che Guevara and the "elimination" of the guerrilla bands in Bolivia.

Che is dead—but the movements for change in the third world will grow. Che in a sense was the Thomas Paine of the twentieth century, who was not satisfied to help make one revolution. The question that plagues the mind of the liberal—is the necessity of revolution. To the citizens of the so-called stable western democracies the need for revolution is non-existent. Yes, they will say there are major problems, but a few structural changes in the third world under the aegis of the democratic ideology will solve all. The words and the promises of the Alliance for Progress and the various other aid projects are viewed as the reality. Many can see through the words and style of President Johnson but the sophisticated actions of the late John Kennedy that laid the groundwork for the present military defense of the American world system are ignored by most. This inability for most citizens of the "Western - stable democracies" to see the real problem of the third world is also paralleled with their refusal to deal with their major domestic problems outside of the context of property and profits first and people second. (If you do not believe this statement just compare the penalties in the U.S. and Canada for polluting rivers, air, and soil with the regulations against labor unions).

The myth of progress in Latin America is spread as millions of people are starving. As more declarations about improving conditions in Latin America are signed by the U.S. and its client states—the real living conditions decline. Growth does not even keep up with population and the net flow of capital is out of the third world.

If one does not support revolution in Latin America what is the alternative besides support for the status quo?

It is clear, with the possible exceptions of Mexico and Chile, there is no electoral way to remove the ruling elites that control practically all of the land and material wealth. When there was the possibility of this happening, coups and U.S. military intervention effectively removed the opposition from control of the government, e.g. Brazil and the Dominican Republic.

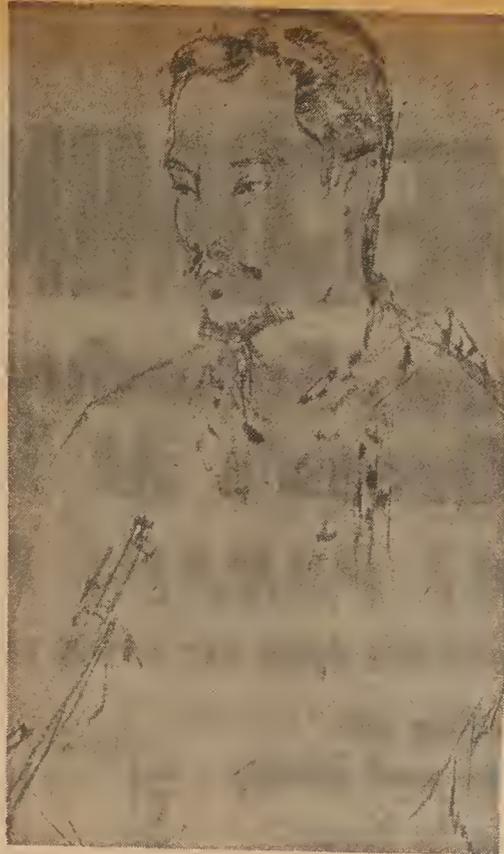

So without the ability to bring about change within the system, revolution is the only course open. Even though many of the revolutionaries are anti-communist, it seems that it makes no difference to the United States. Since the creation of a Cuba, not controlled by the U.S. the military activities of the Pentagon and the C.I.A. have been against all attempts at major social change in Latin America.

Within the context of the American world system the attempt of any Latin American government even to collect the right taxes from American business is viewed as a Communist plot. The program of F.D.R. and the New Deal would be revolutionary to the U.S. government if applied in Latin America. The U.S. would stop it and call it Communist, e.g. Guatemala 1954.

The social cost of the status quo means the continuation of the high levels of illiteracy and disease, low standards of living almost at the level of starvation for most, and police terror against efforts to effectuate a change in the power structure of the country, even on the low level of organizing unions and agricultural tenants and farmers.

If you are a doctor who wants to treat disease and you see people suffering from malnutrition you can do nothing. The status quo means seeing people starving and you are helpless to do anything. High school students peacefully demonstrating are shot down by the police and you can do nothing. Members of the parliament who oppose the government are shot or die under strange conditions and you can do nothing.

These are some of the conditions that Che saw as a doctor and he realized that a man could do something if he became a revolutionary. The revolution will come and is coming, but we in the "Western democracies" seem only to be watching . . .

A New Experiment in SEX EDUCATION

How would you like to be a teacher instructed to give high-school students a course in sex education without any special training? To a class where one girl had attempted suicide; two had had illegitimate babies; and nine complained of drinking parents? Read the intriguing story in November Reader's Digest... how, lacking special qualifications, but possessing objectivity, imagination and a genuine respect for young people, this teacher in a small town high school developed a course which brought both criticism and profound thanks. It's a very different look at the sex education problem... now in November Reader's Digest.

The West

By ADRIAN WINTLE

In its recital at the Edward Johnson Concert Hall on Thursday, October 19, the Berlin Philharmonic Octet demonstrated how an expressive ensemble can be fashioned from a group of eloquent soloists: for in performing the missionary function of aligning works by Blacher, Henze and Hindemith it was possible to trace the relative ascendancy of solo function, and also to pinpoint three distinct views of stylistic approach.

Boris Blacher's Octet (1965) lacks such a conspicuous device as the unifying parallel thirds in his earlier Divertimento; it is a measure of his development that his Octet is held together by subtler means. Motivic construction, rhythmic interplay, a lean, athletic texture are three features with a deliberately cerebral technique which nevertheless has high musical integrity; and the Berlin players preserved a cool outlook, letting the music achieve its point without any circus-trappings of extrusive interpretation. Blacher's sense of color and idiom is manifested in such devices as wind arabesque against the relentless stamp of staccato string chords (Allegro); a typically wistful bassoon melody within the short-phrased and circuitous Andante; and in the langsam section of the final allegro Blacher shows a welcome string sonority that drew silken blend from the Berlin Octet.

In the Four Fantasies from "Kammermusik 1958" Hans Werner Henze stands at a stylistic tangent to Blacher, for within a pungent harmonic idiom Henze takes a linear view, in contrast to Blacher's motivic tendencies. Initially the Henze piece seemed almost Romantic in its need for expression and dynamic terracing — an indication of the intellectual atmosphere generated by Blacher — but as the music progressed one became occupied with Henze eloquences as much as with the playing of the Berlin Octet. More than with Blacher, solo writing predominates; thus Henze includes a movement (Cadenza) in which the subject matter is split and distributed in quick-silver flashes among the instruments.

Again, the horn figuration both in the molto lento and in the adagio — where the sonority is briefly reminiscent of Barber's adagio — needs a player who can deftly insinuate such demanding passagework; and this Berlin horn player was masterful in producing a princely yet discreet tone.

Finally, in Hindemith's Octet (1958) the temper and character of post-Bachian outlook draws together motive features of Blacher and linearity of Henze, superimposing a less exploratory harmonic viewpoint. Where motive byplay occurs, Hindemith carefully nails it down with pizzicato cello or bass; but there are moments of rare delight — such as occasional unison passagework and the engaging major triad that casts a peaceful sheen over the Langsam. Hindemith explicitly justifies his use of two violas by demanding writing, including a moto perpetuo in the second movement; and for the Fugue, which is invaded by quick dance patterns, he achieves exciting momentum, even if the second section seems to neglect the structural need for germane development.

It was an evening, in short, of stylish music-making; and the players were: Alfred Malacek, violin; Rudolf Hartmann, violin and viola; Kunio Tsuchiya, viola; Heinrich Majowski, cello; Rainer Zepperitz, double bass; Herbert Staehr, clarinet; Hans Lemke, bassoon; and Gerd Seifert, horn.

Three Hundred Years of Canadian Art

By JOAN MURRAY

The Art Gallery of Ontario is presently holding its "Three Hundred Years of Canadian Art" exhibition. This show must not be missed. It is one in a sequence of events (the Ritchie collection sale and the MacDonald show in 1966, the Queen Elizabeth building sale and N.G.C. Lawson Show in 1967) which are putting Canadian art on the art historical map. What is being created through these shows and sales is the history of Canadian art — and it is fascinating to watch the development of a history in its infant stage.

This show attempts to come to grips with what actually constitutes Canadian art by enriching its sample and bringing together more great examples of Canadian art than ever before. The only trouble with the selection is that it has focussed on the clichés paintings, choosing the most commonly selected example of each artist's work. For instance, Robert Harris is represented by his sketches for "The Fathers of Confederation" and by "Harmony". The sketches can only be loved by a student of Harris' work as they are unexciting though valuable historically. "Harmony", the little oil-sketch of a woman placing a piano in an exquisitely modulated piece of work which suggests some of the delicacy of mood and subtlety characteristic of the "Brown Decades". But none of these works give a balanced idea of the range of Harris' work.

I wish someday that Harris' "Portrait of Jacobi" would be resuscitated from the National Gallery's storage section and paired with the caricature Harris did of another artist-friend, Berthon (in the Charlottetown Gallery collection). The Jacobi portrait would give some idea of Harris' brilliant handling of paint, as well as conveying, a vivid sense of personality. From this picture alone, the spectator would be able to understand why Harris is sometimes called "the Canadian Eakins". The Berthon caricature would be a witness to Harris' wicked wit and powerful draftsmanship.

Looking at other artists, one can find the same problem. Ozias Leduc's little still-life, so much like detail of a Georges de La Tour, is not characteristic of the artist, who was basically a religious painter. Why not try next time to show some less obvious and more typical works? It might take some digging among private collections, but it would be worth it.

The modern section of the show largely avoids this cliché quality because the works aren't old enough to be clichés. Borduas' "3-4+1" gives the area one definitive masterpiece. After you see this superbly free and vibrant painting, everything else looks dull. Look especially at the way Borduas has solved what Town called "the problem of the corners". Motherwell's suggestion that Borduas was the "Courbet of the XXth century" applies especially well to this picture. You can see the Courbet analogy in Borduas' use of the palette knife and his big violent, earthy approach to creation. On either side of this picture are two earlier works by the same artist which splendidly demonstrate Borduas' development through cubism and expressionism to a lyrical, powerful abstraction.

The show is well-hung by David Brooke who organized the material chronologically and thematically so that, for instance, paintings influenced by Neo-Classicism hang in the same area, family portrait (as in Bercy's "The Woolsey Family") besides group portrait (Berthon's "The Robinson Sisters") for easy comparison. Some of the works from the National Gallery were left at home, but some of them should have been. Furthermore, the show in Toronto is far more compact than the Ottawa exhibition, which stretched over two floors.

The catalogue of the show happens to be excellent as catalogues go and is well worth the $5.00 if only for the plates. The text mainly a re-hash of Hubbard's Development of Canadian Art. Ostiguy did the modern section which was fortunate because he knows quite a bit about the French-Canadian side of things. However, I wish someone would let me in on exactly what "bad habits" Harold Town, William Ronald, and Jack Bush, "acquired from their association with American action-painting" and later lost, in order to make "a genuine contribution to the language of the contemporary painter".

LONDON BRIDGE IS FALLING

It is commonly thought that the advent of the age of technology has been a generous blessing to mankind, liberating the race from bondage to hunger, disease and backbreaking manual labour, enlarging the arena of choice to the masses of people, and providing them with the wealth and leisure with which to exercise their new freedoms. If a caveat is ever entered to this sunny description it is usually framed in terms of the 'great challenge' to human ingenuity posed by the 'enormous dangers' inherent in the exercise of man's greatly increased power. Indeed, who can count the times that he has heard the sentiment expressed that technology offers man enormous possibilities for good or ill, it being only a matter of choosing sides—the devil or the angels?

Almost until the present the idea of the vast liberating possibilities together with the ethical neutrality of technological development has been one of the sacred canons of modern thought among scientists and theologians, economists and politicians, and the political left and right alike. During the recent past, however, a number of unpleasant occurrences tending to subvert the sacred dogma have presented themselves as parables of exceptional clarity.

Crisis at home and abroad

Last spring one of the new hundred thousand ton oil tankers ran aground off the Cornish coast of England pouring its cargo of crude oil into the sea, spreading death to incalculable numbers of birds and fish, covering scores of miles of exquisite coastline with a thick black slime virtually impossible to remove.

In the United States, the most technologically advanced nation in the world, one city after another this past summer sank into the mire of violence and destruction. Detroit, the most industrialized city in the Union, was also the most terribly hit.

Here in Toronto we have been faced with a crisis less apocalyptic, but no less real in its effects. With every passing year it has become harder and harder for the ordinary person to own his own home. Forty years ago practically any unskilled labourer could afford a house, but today, after decades of unparalleled economic progress, we find that for 89% of the people in this city ownership 'has slipped beyond their immediate hopes.'<sup>1</sup> These are only three illustrations, but they stand for countless others which suggest with increasing urgency that technological development has reached the point of diminishing returns and that if a halt is not soon called the consequences can only be more widespread destruction and suffering.

It might put the issue in sharper relief to cast our gaze back over five centuries of European history, the half millennium during which the application of scientific rationality (or technology) to human problems really got underway. Today everyone knows that most of the world is considered underdeveloped, or in plainer terms, poor. We are all agreed that for the great bulk of the world's population life is pretty miserable. What could it have been like in the past, say around the time that Columbus embarked upon his first voyage? Most people, having a progressive notion of history, imagine that if things are bad now they must have been absolutely frightful then. But in fact it is known that they were not, and that it would be quite wrong to think of the world as underdeveloped around 1500.

On the contrary, before the European voyages of discovery and conquest, there existed highly developed and sophisticated cultures not only in Europe but also in India, China, Japan and parts of Africa and America. Even those parts of the world which had not reached a high level of civilisation were stable economically and were much less acquainted with the phenomenon of mass starvation than is the 20th century.

Of the half dozen major civilisations in the world at the end of the fifteenth century one of them — Europe — bad both the inner dynamism and the accumulation of surplus wealth to pose a threat to the others. Europe had also — for reasons which need not concern us here — surpassed other cultures in scientific development. Her inventiveness had put her ahead of the rest of the world in the critical arts of navigation and war. At an early stage, long before the industrial revolution, her economy had been rationalised by a commercial revolution (14th and 15th centuries) and then by agricultural revolutions (16th to 18th centuries). These advances were the necessary precursors of the industrial revolution at the end of the 18th century. It was this last development that magnified European power to dimensions previously undreamt of, with such devastating effects upon the rest of the world.

For it must be remembered that it was the superior power of Europe which annihilated the Indians of North America, raped Africa, impoverished India and mutilated China, leaving in its wake in all these areas a catastrophic decline in living standards, and a spiritual trauma from which many of the victims have still not emerged.

In this century the hegemony has been assumed by the United States, which has now almost succeeded in subordinating even Europe to its economic requirements.

It might be supposed that Europe benefited during her period of supremacy in the measure that the rest of the world suffered; that declining living standards elsewhere were the economic cost of increased prosperity for Europeans. However, the astonishing fact is that until the middle of the 19th century at least this is not so. It has been shown that the standard of living for peasants and craftsmen — the overwhelming majority of the population of Europe — most probably underwent a steady decline after 1450. "In those days," writes the French economic historian F.P. Braudel, "the tables — and not merely the princely tables — were heavily loaded with various meats, the more so as we go further and further back."

People do not generally realize that the situation "in 1750—large rations of bread and a little meat—which continued for another century until about 1850, was itself the result of a deterioration and does not apply when we go back in time to the Middle Ages..."<sup>2</sup> By 1789 we know that the French workingman ate almost nothing besides bread and beer, on which he spent half his income. By the middle of the 19th century conditions were even worse in England, then at the height of her power as the most advanced industrial country in the world.<sup>3</sup>

Since then, living standards have undoubtedly risen in Europe and North America, although we must be careful not to mistake our ability to afford the various necessities of the machine age — like cars, telephones, tranquilizers and psychiatrists — for proof that life is better now than before we needed them. Moreover, the price of these economic blessings has been high: periodic depressions (of which the 1930s slump was only the most recent and probably not the severest), two world wars which claimed 50 million lives and consumed incalculable quantities of wealth, and more intangibly, the continued decline in the quality of life, sharply reflected in the impoverishment of our art and literature.

The human scrap heap

Indeed if we are candid we must admit that Western technology — the great power for good or ill — has been startlingly negative in most of its effects. This is true even if we limit our consideration to economic effects alone. The other equally palpable effects, which may be subsumed under the heading of what Herbert Marcuse calls the progressive moronisation and brutalisation of modern life, have been adequately charted by countless writers, from Vance Packard to Albert Camus.

An English economist has recently argued that further economic growth in Britain, and by implication, in all of the highly developed countries, can only lead to greater hardship for the majority of the population of these countries.<sup>5</sup> Not only are more and more skills rendered obsolete, but larger segments of the population — not merely the insane and the delinquent, but also the stupid and the old — are becoming useless. The level of intelligence required to get ahead in the technological society increases as work becomes more 'intellectual', and the age at which people

So far, in treating the role of the lecture system, we have made no distinction between several rather different kinds of instruction that all go under the name of lectures in this Faculty. It is now time to notice these differences and to consider whether any of the different kinds is by its nature exempt from the strictures we have made on the lecture system.

One obvious distinction is that between the small "lecture" involving a class of 20 or 30 or fewer students, which can combine the functions of lecture and discussion, and the larger formal lecture, to a class of anything up to several hundred students, in which there is not usually any give-and-take between students and lecturer.

In this Faculty, the small lecture is the normal pattern in most of the language and literature courses, either because enrollment in any one course of instruction is small enough (as in German) to require no large classes, or because where the enrollment is large (as in English and French) virtually all the lecturing is as a matter of policy done by separate lecturers to sections of from 20 to 30 students.

In other humanities courses and in the social sciences and natural sciences the normal pattern is the large formal lecture, at least in all those subjects and years in which the enrollment is large. Where the lecturing is to large classes (and sometimes when it is to small ones) the lectures are often supplemented by tutorial groups or by laboratories, but the lectures themselves remain fairly formal affairs.

Again, a distinction might be made between those courses in which the student spends about as much time in laboratories as in lectures, and those in which the bulk of the instruction is in the formal lectures, with only half or a quarter as much time allotted to tutorial groups. Since the relative importance attached to lectures and other forms of teaching can be expected to bear some relation to the relative time allotted to them, it might be thought that the uses to which lectures are put would be different in the laboratory and non-laboratory subjects.

A Sidney Smith lecture hall. Moeperson noted that students tend to see lectures as the core of instruction at university.

Thus we have to consider at least three kinds of lectures: the small lecture which permits some give-and-take, the large formal lecture which is expected to carry the main weight of instruction, and the large formal lecture which shares the weight of instruction about equally with laboratories. There are of course many variations on these three, e.g., translation and exposition of texts in language courses, which is neither lecturing nor tutorial nor discussion class; and there are some courses, especially in the senior years, which are done entirely in seminar form without using lectures at all.

But these three are sufficiently distinct, and do between them comprise a sufficiently large part of the whole area of instruction in this Faculty, to warrant our treating them as the most significant types of lectures.

The strictures we have made on the lecture system are most obviously applicable to the large formal lectures, and to the courses in which they bear the main weight of instruction. It is in them that the amount of lecturing during the year is most obviously apt to result in lectures being put to the improper use of merely or mainly transmitting information, and to result in the proper uses of lectures being submerged beneath the improper use. And it is in them that the vicious circle of the lectures "covering" the course is most likely to be set going.

The small lectures, or small lecture sections, are not so clearly open to the same objection. They are capable of being used less to transmit information than to combine some of the desirable functions of lectures with the equally desirable functions of the tutorial group. But there is no assurance that they will generally be so used. They can be just as didactic as the large lecture. And where the curriculum of such a lecture course contains, as it generally does, a very large amount of material, the pressure to use the lecture time to "cover" the course—to make sure that the student has been told as much as possible about all of the material there is time to tell him about—is very strong.

So the small lecture is subject to much the same pressures that turn large formal lectures to undesirable uses. Moreover, in courses in which all or most of a student's instruction is by way of small lectures, the tendency on the part of the student, if not of the professor, to regard the lectures as the substance of the course can be as strong as in courses where the instruction is mainly by large lectures. The student in these small classes will of course have reading and essays to do, like his fellow in large lecture courses, and he may be subject to a closer and more continuous scrutiny. But his working week will be just as hectic as his fellow student's in the other kind of course, if not more so. The hours he is expected to spend in class are just as great, and the compulsion to attend his classes is somewhat greater. The time he has available to think about, read around, and respond critically to, what he has heard in the lectures is just as limited. And since he is more likely to think that he has to go to the lectures, he will tend to expect, and to get, more spoon-feeding at them.

We do not find, therefore, that the small lecture courses are exempt from the forces which tend to undermine the large lecture courses.

Nor can we exempt the lecture courses where the student spends roughly as much time in laboratories as in lectures. In these courses, some teaching and learning does go on in the laboratories, and some of it is essential for a mastery of the subject. We deal later with the adequacy of laboratory instruction. Our concern here is simply to inquire whether in the courses in which laboratory periods comprise a substantial part of the instruction, the lectures are, because of this, exempt from the forces we have seen elsewhere distorting lectures from their proper use. We find that they are not.

The main reason is that in these courses the laboratory hours are simply added to something like the same number of lecture hours that are normal in the non-laboratory courses.

The science student, with 10-15 hours of labs on top of 10-15 hours of lectures, has less time and incentive to treat his lectures as something to be thought about than has his fellow in non-laboratory disciplines. This would not be the case if the laboratory hours were so designed as to be the occasions on which he could put to the test of practice some of the ideas he had got in the lectures. But generally they are not. There is a perfectly understandable tendency for the laboratories to be treated as a somewhat separate branch of the science student's education. He must have some training in techniques of experiment and manipulation of material. He gets it in the labs, but he is lucky if he gets much else there.

We find, then, that the pressures which divert lectures from their proper uses are strong not only in courses which rely mainly on large formal lectures, but also in those that proceed by small lectures, and in those that divide instructional time between lectures and laboratories.

We find that the present reliance on lectures as the core of instruction, in all but a very few subjects in almost all years, is undesirable and stultifying. And we notice that it is perpetuated by the Faculty's habit, which is the line of least resistance, of attaching importance to lecture courses by listing them in the Calendar as 1-hour, 2-hour, 3-hour, etc. courses. No undergraduate, calculating as he must be, can fail to attach importance to his various courses by the same criterion. In this way the Faculty reproduces in the undergraduate the disposition to regard the lectures as the substance of learning.

We believe that lectures should not be regarded by the undergraduate as the sole, or main, or sufficient, substance of learning; a student who is not learning on his own is not learning much of value. But we have been made aware, by the testimony of first-class honour students in upper years, that, against their wishes, they came to believe, soon after getting into the swing of things at the University, that they had to treat the lectures as the chief source of learning, and that they found, quite early on, that this was the only way to beat, or live with, the system so as to get the high standing which they were astute enough to realize would be the key to their future, either in employment or by way of graduate fellowships.

We have also been made aware, by the testimony of other students, that their expectations on arrival at university from high school rapidly deteriorated. They had been told at school that the university would be a new intellectual experience, that they would be expected to think independently; they found within a few months that they were required less to think than to amass information, via lectures plus narrowly prescribed textbooks, for purposes of final examinations on each numbered course of instruction.

These two kinds of testimony have strengthened our belief that the rationale of university education has now been effectively nullified in a wide range of courses in the Faculty of Arts and Science, primarily because of the line-of-least-resistance reliance on lectures to do almost everything. We find, moreover, that not only does the reliance on lectures lead to their being used for the undesirable purpose of merely transmitting information, but also leads to such a number of lectures in a student's week as to minimize the chances of his doing the amount of reading and thinking he should be doing.

It should be clear from what we have said that we are not opposed to large lectures as such. We see no reason why a lecture to a hundred or several hundred students should not perform any of the proper functions of lecturing, which we have listed as (i) to (v) above. And where the large lecture can perform some or all of those functions, the large lecture is a more efficient use of the Faculty's intellectual resources than is the small lecture. What we oppose is the reliance on courses of 50-75 hours of large or small lectures as the mainstay of instruction in each subject. No matter how far such lectures are supplemented by tutorial groups or laboratories, they can scarcely avoid the evils we have described. These evils are compounded by the relation between lectures and examinations.

The normal pattern in the Faculty of Arts and Science is to have a year-end examination on the subject-matter of each of the lecture courses the student has taken that year. Now it is no doubt possible to set examinations success in which requires something other than repetition of the facts, theorems, theories, and interpretations that have been dispensed in the lectures. But there is a strong tendency to set examinations success in which requires nothing other than that. For why should a professor who has spent 50-75 hours trying to fill the student's mind with such material examine anything else but his ability to absorb and retrieve it? He must assume that what he was doing all year was worthwhile. What more natural, then, that he should examine the student on that?

Thus the system of year-end examinations specifically attached to each lecture course, whatever its merits, sets up a strong and unremitting tendency to turn lectures into exercises in presentation and accumulation of examinable material.

Possible Remedies

Given this diagnosis what can be done? Two lines of reform may be suggested, corresponding to the two apparent sources of the trouble. One source is the use of a standard number of lectures (two or three a week throughout the year) to "cover" a certain amount of material. The other is the standard practice of examining, by which there is each year a final examination on each of the lecture courses. Regardless of what weight is given to term marks, the practice of one year-end examination on each lecture course reinforces the tendency of both professors and students to treat the lecture as the core of the year's work.

The directions of reform required to cope with these two sources of the trouble are clear. One is a reduction in the standard number of lectures. The other is a change in the examination system. We deal with the reduction of lectures in the remainder of this section, and with examinations in the following section.

The Reduction of Lectures

It follows from what we have said so far that the number of lectures per subject of instruction per year should be so reduced as (i) to make it impossible for professors or students to use the lectures to "cover" the course, and thus to restore (or confine) lectures to their proper functions; (ii) to release some of the students' time for more work on their own; and (iii) to release some of the professors' time for supplementary forms of instruction (including more tutorial work, and possibly more preparation of collateral material for distribution). We believe that these purposes require a drastic reduction in the standard number of lectures in each course.

We recommend:

(1) that, except for courses in which all the instruction is given in lecture-discussion classes (for which, see recommendation 3), the number of lectures in each numbered course of instruction which now gives three lectures a week or two lectures a week be reduced to a maximum equivalent to one lecture a week over the whole year, and that there be a proportional reduction of lectures in those courses now giving more than three lectures a week. Thus, given the present undergraduate teaching year of 27 weeks, the present two- and three-hour lecture courses would be confined to a total of 27 lectures during the year;

(2) that in each course which is thus reduced from three or two lectures to one lecture a week, there should as a general rule be one tutorial group a week;

(3) that for courses in which all the instruction is given in small lecture-discussion classes, which we define as classes (a) of not more than thirty students, and (b) requiring regular preparation and participation by the students, the maximum number of class hours should be two a week.

The effect of these three recommendations together is to reduce the classroom hours (apart from laboratories) to a maximum of two a week in any course. We are recommending in the next chapter that both for generalist and for specialist students the normal number of courses taken each year should be five. Our intention is thus to reduce class room hours (apart from laboratories) as a general rule to a maximum of ten hours a week for any student.

We recognize that some departments prefer, or may prefer, to sub-divide the instruction they offer their students in such a way that the normal amount of work is listed not as five numbered courses but as more than five, some of which are slighter than others. In such cases the application of recommendations (1) to (3) might not effect any substantial reduction in the number of classroom hours, since several of the courses comprising the year's instruction of a student might already be listed as one-hour courses and/or two-hour lecture-discussion classes.

It is evident also that one of the purposes which the reduction in the number of lecture hours is intended to serve would not be served if the number of other kinds of classes were markedly increased. If the students are to have enough time to read, think, and write, their total class hours of all kinds, not merely their lecture hours, should be reduced.

One further recommendation is needed to cover the cases mentioned in the last two paragraphs. We recommend:

(4) that as a general rule no undergraduate should have more than ten classroom hours a week (apart from laboratories), of which no more than five should be lectures. The onus would be on any department to show why any exception to this rule should be permitted.

Along with these changes would have to go the abandonment of the present system of indicating in the Calendar the relative weight of different courses of instruction by listing the number of hours of lectures per week. The number of hours of lectures would become irrelevant to the weight of the work, as it should be.

We recognize that the mere reduction of lecture hours will not by itself have the desired double effect of converting lectures to their proper uses and enabling and requiring the student to think more on his own. We assert only that reduction of lecture hours is the sine qua non of those desired effects. Along with it would have to be a willingness on the part of the lecturers, and of the departments, to rethink the nature and purpose of their lectures, to see them no longer as the means of "covering" material but as the means of showing the student how to analyse, how to judge relevance, how to tackle problems, and in some cases giving him new perspectives (or indeed perspectives of any kind). Without this rethinking, the reduction of lecture hours would be of little use: it could leave the lecturer doing the same as before but for only half as long; and the student, who would still be expected by such an unregenerate lecturer to cover a pre-set course, would be left to cover the other half probably less efficiently and at a greater expense of time than if he were getting it from the lecturer, and would thus have no more incentive or time to think about the material.

We may mention finally one feature of the present system of lecture courses which results from lectures being put to their undesirable use and which reinforces the tendency to put them to that use. That is the habit of students, at least in the large fairly formal lectures, of trying to make a full set of lecture notes, the nearer to verbatim the better. Only the extraordinary student can do this successfully and still get the impact of the lecture: but it is generally the ordinary student who does it. If he is not too busy writing to hear it all, he is at least too busy writing to let his mind play on it as he hears it. The student is not to be blamed for making notes. He does it because it pays off at examination time, and it pays off then because or in so far as the lectures are the main and sufficient conveyance of examinable material. Yet it is inefficient. If conveyance of examinable material is to be the main use of lectures it might well be more efficient to provide the material in mimeographed form.

The distribution of mimeographed lecture notes was one of the most frequent proposals made to us in student submissions. But we do not regard it as at all a satisfactory way of dealing with the problem. In the first place it attempts to deal with the wrong problem: it attempts to make the lecture's conveyance of information more efficient. It might do so. But this is not what lectures should be used for. A general practice of distributing lecture notes would tend to confirm the undesirable use of lectures. Distributed lecture notes of any fullness (which is what has frequently been requested) can scarcely serve the proper purposes of the lecture, but could inhibit good lecturing. In the second place, the distribution of lecture notes would negate the one value that note-taking during a lecture can have, namely the exercise of the student's judgment in capturing what is essential.

So, while we recognize the serious ill effects of the present widespread habit of making the fullest possible notes during the lecture, we do not recommend the distribution of mimeographed notes as a remedy. The disease is the use to which lectures are put by the lecturers, by the departments, by the Faculty, and therefore by the students; this disease could not be cured but could be made worse by the remedy proposed.

This is not to object to more use being made of mimeographed material as an aid to some lectures. One can readily think of lectures the impact of which would be increased if a page or so of diagrams, tabulations, syllogisms, propositions, tentative formulations, or other appropriate brief material were in the student's hands during the lecture, saving the time of the student in taking them down. The distribution of this sort of material would we hope be encouraged by the reduction in the permitted lecture hours.

3. The examination system

We have now to consider whether any change in the system of examinations in the Faculty should be recommended. We have already noticed that the system of year-end examinations specifically attached to each lecture course sets up or confirms the tendency to use lectures to pour into the student all he needs to know to cover the course: lectures become exercises in the presentation and accumulation of examinable material. Other criticisms of the examination system can be made, and have been put to us in many submissions.

There is the fact that, in spite of some efforts in recent years to reduce the total number of final examinations in the Faculty, the final examinations still use up 3 weeks of every academic year. This seems rather disproportionate in relation to the 27 teaching weeks and 2 to 3 study weeks (plus 2 weeks vacation at Christmas) especially as it is in addition to any term tests and examinations there may be, which come out of the teaching time.

It may also be argued that the present quantity of formal examinations is unnecessary to assess a student's grasp of the subject and his analytical or critical ability in relation to it, and that the examiner's ability to make the assessment is dulled by the quantity of examination scripts he now has to read.

The relation between term marks (where they exist at all) and final examination marks, which is absolutely prescribed in some subjects and courses, and apparently random and often not clearly understood by the students in others, is also open to criticism. So is the frequent uncertainty about how term marks are composed. So is the provision that no matter what the weight of the term mark, the student must pass the final examination or fail his subject, and in some cases his whole year: this is said to impose an undue nervous strain on the student, to distort the desirable rhythm of the whole year's work, and to give the student an undue preoccupation with what is assumed to be likely examination material.

These criticisms are of uneven importance. Some could be met by relatively simple changes in the rules and practices about term and final examination marks. The more serious ones could not. We shall take first the criticisms that seem to us the more serious. Thus we shall look first at the examination system in relation to the question which is our main concern, namely, how to improve teaching and learning.

So considered, the question of examinations becomes the question whether any change from the present system of examinations could assist, or remove obstacles to, the improvement of teaching and learning.

We start from the assumption that some kind of examination is necessary so long as society expects the university to certify some measure of intellectual competence. We do not enter into the question whether examinations are, from an educative point of view, merely a necessary evil or whether some kinds of examination may have a positive educational value, in, for instance, inviting and requiring the student to pull together and think through a whole year's work. For we think it would be utopian to recommend for or against examinations as such, or some particular kinds of examinations, on the ground of their positive or negative potential educative value. A recommendation against all examinations would, on our assumption, be meaningless. A recommendation in favour of a particular kind of examination on the ground of its positive educative value would be utopian, for it would be impossible to ensure that only that kind of examination should be set.

We set aside, then, the possibility of doing without any examinations. We set aside also the positive educative value that some kind of examinations might have; not that we deny it but we think less useful results are likely from seeking to make examinations into positive agencies of good than from seeking to reduce their evil — a difficult enough task in itself.

The main evil we have found in the present system of examinations is, as mentioned earlier, that it reinforces the tendency to make lectures into what they should not primarily be, a means of transmitting to students most of what they are expected to know, so that they come to treat lectures as the substance of learning, and lecture-notes as the passport to success.

It is easier to say that this should be changed than to say how it can be changed. The ways we have considered all seem to be impractical or unreliable when they are considered as remedies applicable right across the board — for all years and all kinds of courses.

Student studying for his exams. Macpherson's report criticizes what he considers too much dependence on examinations.

The simplest way would be to ensure that every final examination be so set that it could not be passed merely by regurgitation of lecture material. This will be done to some extent merely by the reduction of the lecture hours: since the professor as a rule believes that his subject is important and that all his students should know as much as possible about it, he would, with fewer lectures, be bound to examine on something beyond the lecture material. Yet it would still be possible for the examination merely to ask for the recall of lecture material plus prescribed material committed to memory from other sources. And this would not be any improvement over what is complained of now. What would be needed would be to ensure that every examination should require thought, rather than or as well as recall of information. Some examinations now do this, but there has been enough evidence in the written and oral submissions to convince us that many do not. No faculty stipulation that every examination do this can be expected to prevail on those examiners who don't do it now.

Another way would be to dissociate final examinations from the numbered courses of instruction to which they are now attached. This could be done by replacing them with comprehensive examinations, one or two of such being designed to test the candidate's ability to relate and to think about his whole year's work. There are formidable difficulties about introducing such a scheme as a general pattern.

An obvious difficulty is that comprehensive examinations are scarcely applicable to such a year's work as is now done in the General Courses and in such Honour Courses as Social and Philosophical Studies.

A second difficulty is suggested by the experience some departments have already had with comprehensive examinations as a supplement to ordinary ones in fourth year. The difficulty arises from the fact that the students, naturally enough, approach them like other examinations: they want to know what they are "responsible for." This is a reasonable demand, and the clearest way of answering it is to say that they are responsible for one question on each of the, say, four courses they have taken in their major department that year. Such an examination, no matter how many optional questions it contains, is scarcely a comprehensive one in the sense of testing ability to relate and think about a whole year's work.

The difficulty, then, is that students who are used to final examinations in each of their courses cannot respond to a truly comprehensive examination, with the result that truly comprehensive examinations will not be set. This difficulty might be overcome if students were not allowed to get used to annual examinations in each of their courses, but we see no practical way of avoiding them in the first year at least. The difficulty might also be overcome if in the later years students had no final examinations in single courses, but only one or two examinations each testing them on several of their courses. But even in this case it is probable that not all such examinations would be truly comprehensive. We are thus thrown back on the question whether any system of "comprehensives" would serve our purpose of dissociating final examinations from the numbered courses of instruction to which they are now attached.

It appears to us that this purpose could be served, even though the more positive value of a truly comprehensive examination might have to be foregone. If the four or more final examinations a student now writes each year in his main subject or subjects were replaced by two examinations — we are thinking here of second, third, and fourth years, and primarily of students whose main work (as now in Honour Courses) is in one or two subjects — the effect might merely be to produce combined rather than truly comprehensive examinations. Instead of four 3-hour examinations there would be two. The sort of questions asked might be much the same as now. The net effect would then simply be to reduce the amount of examining to one-half the present amount. Even this would go some way to dissociating the examinations from the lecture courses, for it would be difficult for any conscientious examiner to be satisfied to set questions that required only the reproduction of what would have to be very small amounts of his lecture material. It is more likely that the sort of questions asked would also be different, i.e. that each question would be more comprehensive.

One may also find two positive merits in such a reduction in the quantity of final examinations. First, by reducing the length of the final examination period it would, within the same length of the academic year, give more time for learning. Second, by reducing the pressure on examiners it would permit them to assess the quality of the candidates' performance better than they now can do. An examiner who has to read and appraise 150 3-hour examination scripts within a week or so — which in our experience is not uncommon — cannot exercise the careful judgment he knows is the candidate's due. The combination of tension and boredom, unavoidable in the circumstances, is frustrating to the examiner and may well be unjust to the candidates.

The argument so far leads us to the conclusions: (a) that a reduction in the quantity of examining is possible without harmful effects, and is positively desirable on grounds of its contribution to teaching and learning and to a more careful assessment of students' attainments; and (b) that these advantages are unlikely to be secured, to a satisfactory extent, by an attempt to move from the present system to a system of nothing but comprehensive or combined examinations, since these would not be possible in some years and some courses. And we can see no other change that could be proposed in the pattern of final examinations in all years and all courses that would be both practicable and beneficial.

Accordingly, while we shall suggest that departments be asked to move towards comprehensive or combined examinations, especially in the later years of specialized degree courses, we have considered another possible way of achieving the desired objectives. This is the institution of one or more examination-free years.

The possibility of having one year without any final examinations has often been canvassed. It was one of the possibilities considered by a special sub-committee of the Faculty Council's Committee on Undergraduate Studies in the 1963-64 session, a part of whose terms of reference was to consider ways of "reducing the amount of time now used by the annual examinations." That committee asked the chairmen of all the departments for their proposals for "drastic reduction of the examination time." The replies from the chairmen shower widespread willingness to reduce the amount of examination, but a considerable difference of opinion as to how it should be done. The proposals ranged from reducing third year finals in every Honour course to two comprehensive papers (which was, perhaps unfortunately, the only specific proposal the committee put to them), through relying on comprehensives in third and fourth years, relying on 1-hour examinations in January and May in all subjects in second, third, and fourth years, to abolishing all final examinations and relying on term work, including tests, in all or some years, or in all but a few central courses.

No great reduction in the quantity of examining resulted from the work of that committee, perhaps because its initial inquiry to the departments was too modest, yet the willingness of most departments to break away from the standard system in some way was quite striking. We observe also that, since that time, there has been a significant move by departments to request permission to do without final examination in certain numbered courses of instruction (mostly in fourth year), and that these requests have been almost uniformly granted by the Faculty Council.

We are encouraged, by these evidences of desire for change, to recommend now that there be one examination-free year, in addition to whatever can be done to reduce the amount of examining in the other years. The problem is which year should be examination-free. There are obvious difficulties about each one.

Given the inherent imperfection of any practicable set of admission requirements in distinguishing between those who can and those who cannot handle university work, the abolition of examinations at the end of the first year would mean keeping incompetent or idle students at the university for the whole of the second year, with a consequent waste of resources that could scarcely be justified. We grant that not all of those who fail first year do so because of incompetence or idleness. First year being a year of adjustment from high school, it is probable that there are some late adjusters who would make good by the end of the second year if given a two-year run. We do not know any way of estimating what proportion they are of those who now fail first year, but we do not think that the gain in saving them is likely to be enough to offset the loss in carrying through two years those who should not be here. We therefore cannot recommend doing away with examinations in first year.

For a different reason, third year examinations seem indispensable. In a three-year degree course they are essential, on our initial assumption that the university must be able to certify the student's attainment. And for the significant number of students in four-year degree courses who go on to post-graduate work, it is difficult to see any satisfactory alternative to third year marks as a basis for recommending them for admission to graduate schools.

Fourth year examinations are more dispensable than first or third. We see no need for formal examination in every fourth year course especially as, under the arrangement we propose in the next chapter, the fourth year would be an "honour" year. However, we think it desirable that there be some way in which the fourth year student can register his achievement. This might be done in some degree courses by the writing of a senior thesis. Or it might be done by a single comprehensive examination.

This leaves second year. We think there is on balance an advantage to be had from abolishing examinations at the end of second year. It would probably do more than anything else could do to get away from the rearguard effect. The work of two whole years could not as readily be examined in that way; it would have to be thought about as a whole, and would lend itself better than any one year's work to the technique of the comprehensive examination. Against it there is the danger that those who now fail to cope with second year work would, wastefully, be carried through to the end of third year. But the number is not nearly so large as the number of those who fail first year, and the gains in the quality of teaching and learning could be expected to outweigh such waste

(and might even reduce it). An important incidental gain, in our view, would be an improvement in the rhythm of the two years work: vacations (or one summer vacation at least) might come to be used as a time for reading and thought rather than, as they now generally are, a complete hiatus between two segments of academic work.

Before setting out our recommendations for a scheme of final examinations over the whole three or four years of a student's academic career we must consider the possibility of relying, in some or all years, more or less heavily on marks assigned for working during the term.

To take the extreme case first, would it be feasible or desirable to rely entirely upon term marks? We think that this could not be made a general rule without net disadvantage. It has proven satisfactory in small classes in upper years. But in large classes it would generally mean dependence either on essays or reports, which can be copied, or on several term examinations. The latter device has no greater merit than one final examination and has clear disadvantages: it segments the student's learning, and such term examinations are held in the inadequate surroundings of a lecture room. A third possibility is that, with an increase such as we have recommended in the proportion of teaching time spent in tutorial groups, performance in the tutorials could be made the basis of all or most of the term-mark. But this would have two significant disadvantages. It would inhibit the tutor-student relation. And it would unjustifiably penalize the student who preferred to work and was capable of working independently, by forcing him to conform to a set tutorial scheme. We conclude therefore that no wholesale replacement of formal examinations by term marks can be recommended.

Short of this, should the present chaos of term and examination marks be reduced to some order? We do not see any abstract merit in imposing the same ratio of term and examination marks in every course throughout the Faculty. But it has been urged on us that there should at least be a minimum ratio of term to examination marks, say, 50:5, to reduce cramming for the final examination and to reduce the roulette effect of the final. We see some merit in this. But we should be reluctant to recommend it only on those grounds, for it has the disadvantage of penalizing the independent student. For the same reason we should oppose any requirement of a passing mark on the term work (except in second year, as stated below).

However, we think that some such minimum weight to term marks is a necessary concomitant of our proposals for an examination-free year and for a reduction in the quantity of formal final examining. Our recommendations about term marks are therefore made only as a part of our general recommendations about the reform of the final examination system.

We recommend the following scheme. In first year, a final examination should be held as now in each course or subject the student is taking, with the proviso that not less than 50 per cent of the whole year's mark in each course or subject be the term mark. Candidates should be required to pass on the aggregate of term and final examination marks but not on either or both.

In the second year, there should be no final examinations of any kind, except that students whose term mark in any subject was not adequate (say 60 per cent) should have to pass a formal examination in it (to be written in August or September) in order to be allowed to proceed to third year. This provision is designed to ensure that students don't wait till near the end of third year to do any work. But since there would be no point in having a second year free of formal final examinations if these were merely to be replaced by final term tests, we strongly recommend that the second year term mark be based on a few tests and as much other evidence (essays, reports, and oral defence of them) as possible.

In third year, all students should be examined on their grasp of their subjects attained during their second and third years. While we recommend strongly that departments and those responsible for administering degree courses try to use only a few comprehensive or combined examinations, we would leave it up to each of them to decide how to examine at this point, with the provisos that no department may require more examinations than it now requires at the end of third year, and that no student be required to write more examinations than he now writes at the end of third year. Where comprehensive or combined examinations are used, the term marks (of second and third years) should be given some weight, and before such new kinds of examination are introduced the students should be acquainted with their nature.

In fourth year, which will become, if our recommendations in the following chapter are accepted, a year suited to more independent work and more optional studies, we should are no longer able to adapt to the accelerating pace of change becomes lower. And so, as technology advances the human scrap heap becomes larger.

In addition, there are external diseconomies which stem from technologically based growth — the increasing pollution of air and water, rising levels of noise, the growing sameness of urban architecture (so that all cities grow more similar as large numbers of people have for the first time the means to visit them), and the rising costs of servicing technology — costs borne mainly by the public through their governments.

The sense of degradation and anomie produced by modern urban life has meant a staggering increase in destructive behaviour among the lower classes, and in the demand for psychiatrists among the middle classes. The social cost of the automobile, the most highly prized fetish of urban industrial man has been for the most part unmeasurable, but it is known that the sum spent on automobile repairs in New York City not long ago exceeded the entire budget of the whole state of New York for the same year.<sup>6</sup>

In many ways we have become poorer. The wealthiest nation in the world can only support one professional opera company which is continually on the verge of bankruptcy. Compare this record with that of the 'undeveloped' city of Salzburg in the 18th century, which maintained not only an opera company, but also a music academy, 30 fine churches, all with excellent choirs and choirmasters, and a large number of composers, some of them great.

Even if we allow the proposition that Europe and North America are better places to live than a hundred years ago, we cannot gainsay that most of the third world has become a worse place. It is our own technological advancement which contributes principally to the impoverishment of the rest of the world. The raw materials necessary to the functioning of a highly complex technology come mainly from the underfed nations of Asia, Africa and Latin America. More and more of these raw materials are required to keep the West's technological apparatus functioning, and it is the poor countries which are compelled to supply an increasing proportion of them as the West's resources become depleted.

Global starvation to come

For the poor countries, in many cases this means over-rapid and unbalanced industrialization and urbanization combined with the impoverishment of the nation's agriculture. India is only the most glaring example of what is a global phenomenon.

From 1938 when accurate figures first began to be kept, until 1961 world food production remained virtually static, while population continued to rise. Since 1961 food productivity has actually declined. In 1965/66 there was an overall decline of 2% in food production in Africa, Latin America and the Far East. This represents a per capita decline of 4.5%<sup>7</sup> Global starvation has been predicted by 1980.

The mainspring of the exploitation of Asia, Africa and Latin America has been the drive for new markets occasioned by the production of more manufactured goods than could be consumed at home, and the search for new areas in which to invest the surplus capital generated by the same overproduction. The prodigious growth of American corporations in foreign countries over the past twenty years can be explained in these terms. That the global expansion of American corporations was accomplished at the expense of the poorer countries is suggested by the figures for the inflow of profit compared with the outflow of investment. Between 1950-1963 net profit exceeded investment by 70% — $29.4 billion to $17.4 billion.<sup>8</sup>

Communist and Capitalist alike

The root of the problem of exploitation does not lie in the capitalist system as such but in the uncritical allegiance to the idea of economic growth and technological development shared by capitalist and communist countries alike.

The sense of degradation and anomie produced by modern urban life has meant a staggering increase in destructive behaviour among the lower classes, and in the demand for psychiatrists among the middle classes.

The reason that communist countries, and in particular the Soviet Union, do not now pose much threat to the third world is that they have so far been conspicuously unsuccessful in satisfying the material needs of their own people.

Russian agriculture is still stagnant, and the problem of the scarcity of consumer goods is nowhere near a solution. The taunt of Milovan Djilas that 'Communism cannot deliver the goods' will likely hold true for some time to come. When the communist economies succeed in generating more goods than their own populations can consume, as well as a surplus of capital in search of profitable areas for investment, then we may have reason to fear imperialist activity from them as well.

The poor countries will not have any chance of raising their standards of living and channelling wealth into the development of food production until the overdeveloped countries end their economic exploitation. It is more likely that an end to exploitation will be brought about by the poor countries themselves rather than by any voluntary action on the part of the rich.

However, a lasting solution to the problem will not be found until the overdeveloped countries curtail their technologically induced economic growth. This growth is at present artificially stimulated in a number of ways.

First, there is the practice of allowing expenditures by corporations on advertising to be exempt from taxation. In this way governments are deprived of great sums of potential tax revenue, and production is kept unnaturally high. Second, there is the practice (more notable in the U.S. than in other countries) of allowing generous depreciation and depletion allowances to industry as a spur to technological innovation. Again the national treasury is deprived in the unnecessary cause of increased productivity.

Finally, the failure to tax capital gains and corporation profits more heavily means that the corporations are able to accumulate large pools of capital for which they inevitably seek outlets.

In sum, a continuance of the present rate of economic growth will present us in the West with two manifestations of an increasingly urgent problem: externally we will witness the continuing impoverishment of the poor countries which are the exploited objects of our abusive technology; and internally we will experience a continuing deterioration in the quality of life. Only when large numbers of people become aware that more problems are created than are solved by an unceasing and accelerating economic growth, will authentic social change be possible.

CAREERS IN THE INVESTMENT INDUSTRY

Students, both undergraduate and graduate, who are interested in following a career in the investment business are invited to an information session to be held on Tuesday, October 31st in Room 1071, Sidney Smith Hall between 1:00 and 2:00 p.m.

Four representatives of member firms of the Investment Dealers' Association of Canada will give brief descriptions of the roles, research and underwriting activities of an investment dealer, following which there will be a general question period. These men will also be available for further questions at the Placement Office for the balance of the afternoon.

Further information may be obtained from the Placement Office.

Centennial Film Board

By MEL BRADSHAW

It has been suggested that true originality, as opposed to startling novelty, consists in being the first to give expression to the obvious. If so, Karlo Buckmann's proposal to establish a Centennial Film Board at U of T richly deserves the name.

We are surely justified in calling this an obvious move when we consider the reasoning of the brief Buckmann submitted to SAC. The current issue of Maclean's ranks Toronto as Canada's best university, citing such criteria as extensive library and prestige staff, yet with respect to film we lag behind McMaster and Guelph, both of which have their own film boards. This is not to say that there is a lack of interest or activity here; if this were so we would hardly be justified in splurging ahead for the sake of one-upmanship. What is lacking is an organization to provide encouragement and opportunity to the numerous students experienced or interested in film. From a financial point of view Buckmann points out, "Several hundred dollars are spent on film-making every year in addition to a more costly project every few years. Rental costs are duplicated and unnecessary."

If so much is evident, what is the contribution made by this proposal. In addition to suggesting the establishment of a film board under SAC's Cultural Affairs Commissioner, D'Arcy Martin, it has provided a detailed cost analysis of the equipment required for a 16 mm production unit including camera with zoom lens, tape recorder, and lighting.

The next step is financing the project. SAC gave its approval on October 18 as well as a grant of $350. Further grants are expected from the Centennial Commission and the Canada Council. Moral support has been promised by several college student councils, Radio Varsity, Tom Faulkner and technical advice from Take One, the Canadian Film Institute, and David Selter among others.

Business and industrial communities are being canvassed as well. Generous support is needed to meet the $10,000 estimated cost of the production unit. "We're getting the second best money can buy," Buckmann explains modestly, "The best would cost $40,000."

As a late bid for Toronto's official Centennial Project, the idea has practically limitless possibilities. The acting ability manifested in Hart House and college plays could with proper organization be used to produce dramatic films of a high caliber while the many facets of the multiversity invite realistic or poetically abstract film documentation. As to distribution, Cinecity has already suggested a possible exchange programme with New York.

The proposed Centennial Film Board could make an important contribution to Canada's film industry. Though we still have a way to go to catch up to the Quebec cineastes, it is perhaps not entirely impossible that the winner of the Seventh or Eighth Canadian Film Festival in Montreal will bear the initials CFB.

Vicious Weakness

By MEL BRADSHAW

Any one seeing Our Mothers House (currently at the Towne) without looking at credits would have a hard time identifying its director as the man who made Room at the Top. While Jack Clayton's famous first film dealt with the struggles of a poor Yorkshire lad to make his way in business and society; his latter three films The Innocents, The Pumpkin Eater and Our Mother's House are studies of people more or less cut off from society.

This latter film concerns a family of seven children, among them the young actors from The Innocents, living alone in their mother's house. Termed by Time a "Gothic tale of innocence and evil", the film might more accurately be described as one in which two forms of evil battle for possession of the children. To put it crudely: the thesis of perverted religious fervor and puritan morality collides with the antithesis of cynicism and the most sordid vice to achieve a synthesis by which the way to the world outside is opened.

This is not to say that the action has hitherto passed in vacuo. The house is not isolated on some blasted heath; throughout such neighbourhood figures as the cleaning woman, the man next door, and the schoolteacher intrude upon the family dwelling. Yet these visits only emphasize that no salvation is possible until the passions the children have inherited are worked out inside them.

This fascinating and original plot is based on a novel by Julian Glogg. All Clayton's films have in fact come from novels, but he is much more than a perceptive talent scout and a skilful translator.

In this picture, he makes a substantial contribution to the rapid evolution of colour photography by using a film fast enough to portray all the warmth and darkness of the old house, the mysticism of the religious services held in the tool shed, the firelight glow of the climax around the hearth. Clayton's style, except when it falls into such obvious symbols as a broken watch for death, is masterful.

Child actors invariably provide an opportunity for evoking facile pathos and while this temptation is not entirely avoided, the characterizations and relationships of the three girls and four boys are carefully enough worked out to sustain interest and sympathy.

Under Clayton's direction Dirk Bogarde once again demonstrates his remarkable flexibility. He has now run the gamut from virtuous and insidious strength (H.M.S. Defiant and The Servant) to innocuous (Accident) and now vicious weakness (Our Mother's House).

Pierrot Le Fou

By DAVID PAPE

allons-y, alonzo ... this is too complicated. no it is simple ... too many things happen at once.

I repeat. We are forever redefining ourselves by the context we select to live in. We surround ourselves with characters of just such a nature, and correspond to the role they expect us to act out.

The film, Pierrot Le Fou, made two years ago by Jean Luc Godard, is more about the contexts than the characters. Different environments present themselves repeatedly, assert themselves, and are cast off.

The characters are not brought to life. The hero is as vague as the philosophical abstracts he writes in his journal.

Now the idea of contexts and conventions as artistic framework is as old as literature. We are accustomed to artists working within a tradition and re-vitalizing it by their treatment. Here, the conventions cannot be overlooked.

Basically the film is about Ferdinand and Marianne; together they fly from Paris to the south of France: from the city to the green world; away from materialism towards selfdefinition. The primary rejection they make is of a vapid society which Fellini, Darling, and the lot have already exploited.

As they flee, robbing whimsically like Bonnie and Clyde, a mysterious violence seems to pursue them. Literally, this stems from a flimsy plot about smuggling guns. I could not help relating this to Dante's descent into Hell (a flight from the dark woods of his middle age), also with the fear of Death driving him. The film seemed explicit about this, repeatedly narrating, "Chapter Seven, "Chapter Eight"; each like one of the circles of the Inferno. The flight to the south parallels the journey to the underworld; and as you might expect is both a flight from death and a dance of death.

In a senseless world, everything becomes comic and lacking significance. Thus we have a dance, in which death is everpresent but of no serious consequence. As the dialogue goes: "We drive on a straight road ... without turning ... to the end ... to the end of the night." Again, Marianne says, "Here is a plot for a novel: a man flees south from Paris because he fears death is on his tail, and just when he thinks he has given it the slip, he goes crazy and kills himself."

As a convention cannot cscapc parody, nor the romantic world of pastoral excapisc. There is one beautifully made forest scene, yet its framework is "Chapter eight, a journey in hell." On the one hand, Ferdinand muses that life is senseless but nonetheless beautiful. On the other, we find him reading from a comic book about the adventures of hums in a Wasteland: "Oh the humming sun, is there no water, I wish I was in the shade, the shade of a mug of lager."

Ferdinand and Marianne are odd ducks in this flight. They are called crazy by the newspapers, and are crazy to each other. They are in love—existentially, of course, for the moment only—but they hore one another. Her mind is particular, rejoicing in the experience of life, flowers, the noise of music, enfin tout; while for him the important things are ideas, ambition, movement in space, enfin tout. General and particular fail to come together. The outcome of this failure to satisfy each other is itinerancy and ennui. They keep busy, but not happy.

On the way to the Vie of the Riviera, they pause by the sea, where Ferdinand writes about life. He wants to define it: "Joyce made a start, but there is more to do." But she want to feel life, and soon enough Marianne is chanting, "Whadma gonna do? Dunno waddado." Finally, the world of words is laid aside to return to the world of movies. In an obvious parallel to Rimbaud, they give up poetry for gun-running.

As this pattern of separation, flight, rediscovery, elation, boredom, continues next chapter, hope ... despair ... remembrance of things past), various forces impinge on the lives of Ferdinand and Marianne, but these forces fail to make their lives any more meaningful.

Political satire (anti-American), violence, pop-art, movies, blanc existentialism, easy morality, all find their place. Yet the characters, trying to make sense of it all, do not. Naming is the first step in definition. Yet Ferdinand (remember the hull, and the young prince) is constantly having to remind Marianne that his name is not Pierrot (the clown). While Godard, in the meantime, lays on the point with a trowel, referring to the sound and the fury: a tale told by an idiot ... signifying nothing.

The movie can be stridently topical at points: Pierrot is given the Vietnamese water torture, Marianne is threatened with burning in Napalm "as in Vietnam." Nonetheless, such satire yields its place to the comic spirit of the film. The comic spirit of Godot. The sing and laugh in the face of death (real singing, I might add; death remains far off, unlike its imminence in Bonnie and Clyde). Then when Marianne leaves Pierrot for an old lover, his own despair is immediately externalized into the delightfully comic vignette told by an man we all admit is crazy: "You mean the song which has been haunting me for ten years doesn't really exist?"

After murdering Marianne and her lover, Pierrot prepares for a tragic suicide. Even this is made ludicrous. With his face painted blue, he wraps his head in dynamite, but then tries ridiculously to stamp out the wick he has ignited. Devoid of courage, of expression (we only see a hand groping, hear mutters of "Shit! this is stupid"), lacking even a presence in the world, he disappears in a puff.

Conventions, rather than people, are the subject of this movie; and conventions quickly date themselves. They say in Cahiers, "Qu'est-ce L'art, Jean Luc Godard." But there is no message ha-hy, et L'art, ce n'est pas ici, Godard.

TORONTO: The pressures of growth / The forces of change

You are invited to attend The Toronto Daily Star's 75th Anniversary Conference on the future of our city. Sponsored by The Star in association with the University of Toronto. November 2nd & 3rd, Convocation Hall, University of Toronto.

The Toronto Daily Star is pleased to be associated with the University of Toronto in this study of four basic issues affecting the future of Toronto.

This conference has been conceived to mark The Star's seventy-fifth anniversary of public service and its continuing concern for the quality of life in this city. This concern has been reflected over the years, beginning with The Star's campaigns for public ownership of the city's hydro-electric and transportation systems sixty-six years ago.

It is The Star's hope that this Seventy-Fifth Anniversary Conference will provide a useful contribution toward the objective we all share: making Toronto a finer place in which to live.

Members of the public are cordially invited to attend any of the sessions.

Six Tales of Canterbury

By DONNI BOHNEN

In the Canterbury Tales, Geoffrey Chaucer warns his fourteenth century audience to separate the fruit from the chaff. The production of Six Tales of Canterbury, directed by Ken Dight, now running at the Colonnade theatre, gave its twentieth century audience plenty of chaff but somehow managed to bury the fruit.

Chaucer's is a comedy of human satire. Dight's is a heavy-handed broad comedy of farce and slapstick — often hilariously funny, but lacking any pretensions of being Chaucerian. Chaucer's proverbial bawdry is characterized by a very sophisticated understatement; Dight's is good box office, but is so unsubtle and over-exploited that it isn't even camp. His rendering of the bawdry kept reminding me of the type of high-jinks typical of the med's show, Daffydil.

In Six Tales of Canterbury the Canterbury pilgrims are assembled at inn where they are stopping for the night. Mellowed with wine and the warm welcome of a congenial host, they decide that for their own entertainment, each will tell a tale to the group. Several of the pilgrims assume dramatic roles in the tales, acting them before us while the other pilgrims look on and provide local colour with an occasional off-colour remark, groan, or burp. It's very funny and it gets laughs.

The effect of the on-stage audience on the theatre audience is similar to the effect of 'canned' laughter in a TV comedy. We laugh with them and at them — its contagious. The almost spontaneous geniality of the pilgrims with each other and with the audience along with the intimacy of the theatre, result in a real rapport between actor and audience.

The script is in a prose which is a hybrid of medieval idiom (not diction) and modern speech. The medieval "blood's" and "sfoot's" are juxtaposed with such lines of contemporary idiom as (in the Miller's Tale), "The carpenter's daughter's been screwed!"

The temptation to 'ham' in this type of production is very strong. Overacting in several parts resulted in caricatures which destroyed the character portraits, so outstanding in the Canterbury Tales. A reeve who talks like a fruit, a summoner who crosses his eyes and sounds like Snagglepuss, and three adventurers of the Pardoner's Tale who can be no other than Curly, Larry and Moe, hardly capture the ambiguities and subtleties of Chaucer's characters.

Last week the Varsity reviewer wrote that he wished Charlie Brown had stayed in the comic strip and off the stage. After seeing Six Tales of Canterbury I would contend that Chaucer too is far happier on the bookshelf than in the Colonnade.

JAZZ

Warm, Mellow, Relaxing...

By JACK MCCAFFREY

In the good old golden days of Swing, jazz musicians considered themselves entertainers; they judged the success of their music by the number of people on the dance floor and the bappy sounds of the crowd booing it up. If you weren't smiling and stomping your foot, the men on the stand were worried.

Now, of course, there are not many of these musicians left. In fact, about the only real Swing-era group to be heard these days is at the Cav-A-Bob, a large dining and drinking spot in the Yonge St. Arcade. While the waitresses, clad in fish-net stockings and very brief things designed to show off most of their equipment, scurry about, and the middle-aged couples trot (like loxes) around the dance floor, the Saints and Sinners play old favourites like "Rosetta", "Do You Know What It Means to Miss New Orleans", and "Bourbon St. Parade".

These musical all-stars (as their leader calls them) include trombonist Vic Dickenson, who played with Count Basie at the height of the Swing era; and trumpeter Herman Autrey and saxophonist Rudy Powell, both of whom played with Fats Waller in the '30's. They are not highly trained, sophisticated musicians. Instead of studying music in school, they went out and played in jam sessions and sat in with the groups passing through town. Unlike the present generation they do not intellectualize about their music — they just play it.

Their music is uncomplicated, relaxed, and ingratiating. They don't think about form and structure. After stating the theme of the popular song or blues (for this is virtually all they play) in a simple, unwritten arrangement, the musicians improvise a series of loosely connected choruses.

Herman Autrey plays simple phrases (sometimes only one or two notes) with a warm tone and occasionally uncertain articulation. But in spite of the fact that you have heard these little riffs hundreds of times before, they still sound meaningful, because this man is saying something personal to YOU, (Swing era jazz is not introspective) about what he has seen and felt over a long, long career.

When Vic Dickenson uses an old well-worn lick, he makes you think that no one ever said it quite that way before. With his curious lagging rhythms (he sounds as if he is always trying to catch up to the next note) and his seemingly lackadaisical approach, Dickenson never really STATES a phrase — he just sort of insinuates his way around it.

While they are not the greatest jazz band in the world, the Saints and Sinners are still worth hearing. They won't challenge your intellect, but they will give you a warm, mellow, relaxed feeling, and you will smile and tap your foot. And you may never again have a chance to hear that kind of music.

Waiting for Godot

Theatre GORDON

A lean week. But don't despair, for by the time this issue returns, there will be no less than ten productions appearing in Toronto simultaneously. The O'Keefe Centre will be the home of the three Olivier productions, Dance of Death, A Flea in Her Ear, and Love for Love. The A.P.A. will be in the third week of its stay, and will be showing Pirandello's brilliant treatise on appearance and reality, Right You Are If You Think You Are. If anyone can make this usually dry argument come to life, it is the A.P.A. At Hart House, Caste will have been replaced by U.C.'s annual Follies, usually the most literate and solidly entertaining of the campus shows. Fortune in Men's Eyes continues at the Central Library, it's a play that is less a play than an event, less an event than a cathartic revelation. Charlie Brown is at the Playhouse delighting just about everybody. Chaucer is onstage at the Colonnade, delighting almost nobody.

Next Friday the SAC drama committee's sole raison d'être, the playwriting competition and irrelevant adjudication, closes. All entries in on time please!

Film BRAOSHAW

Tomorrow night Cinecity presents another evening of underground films starting at 11:30. The first to be shown is by Peter Rowe who worked with Hofsess on Black Zero and is called Buffalo Airport Visions. Andy Warhol's Vinyl and the prizewinning Uptight, Los Angeles is Burning . . . Shit will also be shown.

Roger Vadim's La Ronde and Les Liaisons Dangereuses will be on view next week from 5:30 at the Metro 677 Bloor, 533-9131. Performances by Gerard Philippe, Jeanne Moreau, and Brigitte Bardot as well as a score by Thelonius Monk should recommend the latter to even the most selective viewers.

A New Film Society continues its current season with The Pawnbroker this Sunday afternoon at La Maison Dor and the Elektra will be showing Louis (Viva Maria, Zazi dans le Metro) Malle's Le Feu Follet from Monday to Thursday.

The Memory Lane Silent Film Club is showing The Hunchback of Notre Dame on Oct. 29 at 7:30. Reg Hart, 594 Markham St., 533-4515, is the man to call for details.

Gone with the Wind is worth seeing even though this wide screen reissue has meant cutting the tops and bottoms off Clark Gable, Vivien Leigh, Leslie Howard, Olivia DeHavilland, et al. Since the engagement is for six months, there is no rush.

Other good bets for weekend viewing are Bonnie and Clyde and The Tiger Makes Out.

There will be a meeting Monday at 2:00 in the SAC of those interested in the Centennial Film Board.

Art MURRAY

I insist that you go to the Art Gallery to see the exhibit "Three Hundred Years of Canadian Art" this week. If you don't go, you're missing out on your education as a Canadian and also on a very good show. Lemieux seems to appeal especially to students and a very good one, "Night Traveller" is hanging in the exhibition. There is also an excellent Canadian show at the Museum.

On Monday night, Roberts Gallery is presenting Bruno Bobak (Oct. 31-Nov. 11). Sobot Gallery presently has a show of Henry Moore, in case you have a yen for a Moore after seeing the Art Gallery exhibit. Last night, Filipovic opened at Gallery Moos and David Silverberg opened at Gallery Pascal. Both shows should be very interesting;

Silverberg did some admirable illustrations for the "Song of Songs" once. At Erindale College, a show of Charlotte M. B. Schreiber, R.C.A., is on (Oct. 30-Nov. 18). This little known artist lived from 1875 on in Canada; from 1878-1900, she was painting on the present site of Erindale College. To get to Erindale, there's a bus on the U of T campus.

The Fine Art Club is making its yearly trip abroad, this year to Washington, Nov. 2-6. The rates are unusually cheap ($40) for this adventure, and there's room for 15 more people. If you want to go, sign up on the list, 6th floor, Sid Smith, by Monday.

Music GODDARD

Rock may be dying, and jazz may be dead (this connection may be an ideal thesis for some theologian living on the third floor of Wycliffe College) but Toronto gives little substance to these rumours. At the Town, jazz singer Carmen McRae can be heard for two more nights; at the Cav-a-Bob The Saints and Sinners, Patrick Scott's artists-in-residence-in-Toronto are on the stand from 5:30 to 7:30 and from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m.; at the Ford Hotel, blues singer Olive Brown backed by Mc McLean's Trio; and at the Colonial Tavern, the Modern Jazz Quartet is appearing.

Jerry Lee Lewis is at the Embassy for two more nights as is folk singer Penny Lang at the Riverboat. Following her into the same place will be bluesman Len Chandler for a week's stay. Little else is happening in Yorkville — just the usual pregnancies, busts and departures of groups pilgrimageing to pop 'n' rock's mecca, New York. And the orchestra that is currently going under the disguise of the Toronto Symphony (it can't be the same group as last year; this one is emotionally and technically exciting) will be giving two concerts this coming week; a children's Saturday matinee at Massey Hall, 2:30 p.m.; and on Oct. 31-Nov. 1, with pianist Nicola Petrov, also at Massey Hall, 8:25 p.m. A good program for the latter: Debussy's Jeux (poem danse), Beethoven Emperor piano concerto (No. 5), Nono's Per Bastiana Tai-Yang Cheng (a world premiere) and Rousset's Bacchus and Ariadne; Suite 11. z boehm.

Folk

October, and Folk makes up for arid September. At the Dell Tavern The Irish Rovers, fun and beer in Toronto's first Celtic pub . . . Peter, Paul and Mary came to town for their 45th annual visit; see last year's review . . . Louis Killen, English traditional singer, is in the Mousehole, ask him to tell the tale about Maeses and the Egapians (Owen McBride is in the 'hole Sundays) . . . the folk guild is opening a new club (see future Review) . . . for those who don't like atmosphere, Wonderful Penny Lang is at the Riverboat followed Tuesday by Len Chandler . . . and the Abbey Tavern Singers are coming to the Imperial Room . . .

And we recommend:

By Bob Bossin

Imagine a cross between Louis Armstrong and Mama Cass. That's Penny Lang, appearing at the Riverboat until Saturday.

She sings blues with the gusto that is supposed to be reserved for Negro mamas long dead.

Penny Lang is, however, very much alive; each song seems to be very much a part of who she is. Dylan's "Walkin' Down the Line" becomes her story, and See-ger's beautiful "Golden Thread" seems as much her vision as his. Even a chestnut like "Buddy Can You Spare a Dime" ceases to be a curio and becomes a person's life—Penny Lang's — stretched out naked before us.

And she sang verses she learned from her grandmother, and a very funny short song about hang-ups. She sings what she likes, and what she likes is just fine.

Grad student wins in landlord hassle

Jeanne Lance, the graduate student who lost her $20 deposit in a hassle with her landlord in mid-September, has finally got her money back.

Jeanne's landlord, Alfred Blundell, had requested a $20 "security deposit" on a $16-a-week room even though she told him she would be staying less than two weeks.

She stayed only two days but paid Blundell a full week's rent. When she asked for her security deposit back, she was told "we don't accept tenants who stay less than two weeks."

Two reporters from The Varsity accompanied Jeanne on one of her trips to Blundell's Shorncliffe Ave. home and listened while Blundell's wife said:

"He's not home. Were sick and tired of you phoning and coming around. By law you're not entitled to the money."

U of S must be free from political pressure: CUS

OTTAWA (CUP) The Canadian Union of Students and the Canadian Association of University Teachers have come out strongly against Saskatchewan Premier Ross Thatcher's proposed government control of the University of Saskatchewan's finances.

In a telegram sent to Thatcher Tuesday, CUS and CAUT said the university must be free from political pressure.

"It is inconceivable that a university budget can be subjected to debate in the legislature without being made a matter for partisan political strife," the telegram said.

"The best scholars, whether teachers or students, will not long remain where programs of teaching and research are made subjects of political controversy and expedience," they said.

The telegram urges Thatcher to give details of his Oct. 9 proposal to assume "direct financial control" of the university "so that uncertainty in the university and doubt in the public mind may be settled."

The two organizations propose an independent body to "censure the degree of public accountability called for by you (Thatcher) without subjecting to the pressures of political expediency an institution of which Saskatchewan is justly proud."

But Jeanne persisted. A male friend of hers went to Blundell's home at 1:30 a.m. one day and asked for Blundell.

Told that Blundell wasn't home, he advised Mrs. Blundell they would phone every hour until her husband decided to talk to Jeanne. Blundell's wife then told Jeanne to return at 2 p.m. the next day.

When Jeanne returned, she saw Blundell. He gave her the $20, still insisting she had no legal right to it.

"He said he was only giving it to me to get rid of me," she said. "However, I still feel that I was entitled to it."

Shakespeare isn't dead, he's hiding in the Yellow Pages

Students will find the Yellow Pages one of the most useful reference books around. Looking for Shakespeare? You'll find his works at book stores, libraries or record stores. Want to write like Shakespeare? Other than the inspiration, you'll find everything you need at stationery stores, office equipment stores and typewriter dealers. And, if you're thinking about staging a Shakespearean play — the Yellow Pages will help you find costumes, theatrical equipment, lighting fixtures and sound systems. Yes, all's well that ends well when you make it a habit to look first in the Yellow Pages.

U of M plans civil rights committee

WINNIPEG (Special) — University of Manitoba students council President Chris Westdal wants students to look into discriminatory practices in Manitoba.

He said in an interview that the issue of civil rights in Manitoba has come to light as a result of the union's recent attempt to have the university abandon its "restricted" list for off-campus housing.

The student housing investigation team charged that Manitoba has no specific legislation governing discriminatory practices.

Westdal said he hoped the council would endorse a special committee to study discrimination in the province.

He said the council is responsible for any area that affects students, and the issue of student housing discrimination illustrated the need for further investigation.

140 vote in SGS election

Three Students Administrative Council members for the school of graduate studies were elected in a by-election Wednesday.

The new members are Adrian Byron, Colin Campbell and Brent Robinson.

Only 140 students of the 3,800 eligible voted—a turnout of 2.5 per cent. A recount will be held because of the closeness of the tally.

UWO stages park-in to protest regulations

LONDON, Ont. (CUP) — Student cars were barred from the University of Western Ontario campus Tuesday, following a protest park-in.

The students were protesting new parking regulations and the way they were imposed.

A new controlled-access parking system is to be put into effect next Wednesday with $12 fees for students and $37.50 fees for staff.

Some 600 students attended a rally and were urged to sign petitions and to refuse to buy parking permits put on sale last week.

Speakers at the rally said the main issue was the undemocratic way the regulation had been announced, without negotiations with the staff, faculty or students.

University administrators maintained there had been participation of students and faculty in a parking sub-committee of the board of governors.

Western has never before had parking fees.

Westerners shutout Osgoode

By DOUG WOODS

The Varsity Western team won in the mud on Wednesday, defeating Osgoode Hall 8-0 on the back-campus. The first half of play was nearly even as both teams had trouble coping with the slippery conditions. The score was nothing all at the half.

Scrum-half Ted Chamberlain opened the scoring early in the second period of play with a try. The convert was missed. Blues held the upper hand for the rest of the game and their persistence was awarded late in the half with a try by second lower John MacDonald. Billy Kyle made the convert good to end the scoring for the day. The superior conditioning of Blues was the major factor in their victory.

In an exciting match at Varsity Stadium on Wednesday night, the Eastern team downed Toronto Wanderers 11-8 to preserve their unbeaten record for the season. Scoring in the first half was limited to two penalty kicks, one by Varsity's Andy Gibson and the other by Wanderers' fly-half.

Early in the second half, Blues' winger Doug Phibbs scored a try after running through four of Wanderers' defenders. Andy Gibson was successful in the convert attempt. A few minutes later wanderers scored a try off a fine run by their winger, and their fly-half (easily their best player) managed the convert from 40 yards out on the side-line. The score remained 8-0 until the last five minutes of play when Gibson tallied another penalty kick to put the Blues ahead by 3 points.

Second-rowers Andrew Bethell and Maris Apse and wing-forward Al Major played particularly fine games for the scrum. Winger Doug Phibbs and Scrum-half George Wraw were stand-outs in the back line.

In general the quality of play was very good and I think it is very much to the credit of the Blues that they managed to defeat a team which is playing in the Ontario championship finals

Interfac football facing four-way first place tie

By JIM MORRISON

The tightest race in years is developing in Group I football. Yesterday the Engineers escaped University College 9-6 to move into a first place tie with Vic and Pphys. Ed, and if St. Mike's overcomes punchless Dentistry this afternoon, a four team deadlock ensues.

Frantic last-minute activity marked yesterday's encounter. The Engineers were leading 2-0 off booming singles by Cormack, when with less than two minutes to go, Redmen scored on a 13 yard pass from Seon to Bob Kram. A long kickoff return by Engineers' Katsayuma was followed, with 35 seconds left, by Joe Crichton's winning T.D. pass to Bill Lennard.

New were answered by Don McLeod of the Christian brethren.

Dental net nabbers J. Meikle and P. Schuller overcame J. Bertuccini's Engineering effort.

VOLLEYBALL

Tuesday's volleyball was marked by victories for Med C, who took New 15-1, 15-2, and PHE C, who polished off Meds D 15-3, 15-12.

In other matches this week, Forestry B averted Emmanuel 15-12, 15-11; Dents C ran by UC II 15-12, 14-16, 15-7; and Jr. Eng. assaulted Trinity 15-4, 16-14.

LACROSSE

Wednesday evening's boxla action saw Knox take Vic II 7-4, PHE B nip Meds A 2-1, and Erindale set back Scarborough 5-2. In other action yesterday, Forestry B succumbed to Trinity 2-7.

Wednesday rugger was disastrous for the medsmen as PHE A topped Meds A 8-0, and Engineering II blanked Meds B 6-0. Taylor (3 points) and Slean (5 points) led Phys Ed, while Ron Seppala had both Engineering tries.

In the only games yesterday, Trinity A tore apart Wycliffe 11-0, and New College defaulted to Victoria. Ian Scott, Chris Compton and Layton Reid tried for Trinity, and Al Parrish added two conversions.

SOCCER

Ray Osborne led Meds A to a 1-0 triumph over Knox on Tuesday afternoon. His effort was duplicated by Trinity's D. Smith, who scored the only goal in their 1-0 conquest of Law on Wednesday.

Other games since Tuesday saw Vic II default to PHE B, New College take Emmanuel 3-1, and Dentistry overthrow Jr. Engineering 2-1. G. Hurd's two goals and T. Maibaum's single tally for

Crucial Homecoming battle will decide Yates Cup

MIKE EBEN

PAUL MacKAY

Seldom has a Homecoming game loomed so important. When Varsity Blues and Queen's Golden Gaels gallop onto the grid-iron tomorrow afternoon before an affluent alumni and the usual mass of lowly, lush and lively students, at stake is nothing less than the cherished Yates Cup.

Varsity already has a stranglehold on the illustrious icon, and a win tomorrow would salt it away for good. Queen's on the other hand is faced with an imposing "win or else" situation.

Only by defeating Blues tomorrow can Gaels force a SIFL playoff for the third year in a row. A tie is useless to coach Frank Tindall and his men.

However, Queen's have been through the mill before. Last year they invaded Varsity Stadium in straits equally as dire. And before they left, Blues were a thoroughly beaten club, thrashed 23-15 by an avalanche of spirit, desire and damned good football. Toronto remained stunned for the rest of the season and fell 50-7 in a horrible playoff.

The spectre of that discouraging letdown continues to haunt coach Ron Murphy. He has incessantly hammered the revenge motif into his players, and it has paid off handsomely. Last Saturday at Kingston one player said, "Murph had us six feet off the ground when we left the dressing room."

There is no sign among the players of any diminishing in spirit with half the job done. If Queen's does happen to win tomorrow (oh misery!), it will be through superior football, not from any psychological letdown on the part of Varsity. They remember last year only too well.

Following Blues' surprise win last Saturday, many people have looked a lot closer at the respective strengths of the two teams. The result has been a vast revision which has shattered the press-created myth of Gaels' massive superiority.

Defensively, Blues are stronger. Directed by captain Mike Wright, Toronto boasts a superb "fearsome foursome" front line and a hard-hitting corps of cornerbacks. And Blues' secondary has to be rated equal to Queen's even with Bayne Norrie at rover.

Offensively, the lines of both clubs are about the same, but Varsity gets an edge because Queen's has a slightly softer defense to flow against. Gaels have an edge at quarterback with Don Bayne, but Bob Amer has more to work with. There are no better offensive players in the league than Mike Raham and Mike Eben.

Toronto has a big edge in punting and place-kicking, thanks to Paul McKay, league-leader in both departments.

With both clubs sure to be up for Saturday's game, it's gonna be one helluva (sic) pftball game. Cries of "fluke" following last week's result will be answered with finality. At the end of sixty minutes, the better team will be ahead.

WOLFGANG CUT

VOLLEY BLUES LOSE TO MAC

Harrier squad to Buffalo

University of Toronto harrier team travels south to Buffalo tomorrow to toss in its annual two cents worth of nationalism at the Canisius Invitational.

Although the event is always attended by some of the best U.S. college clubs, U of T and McMaster have cornered the event for the past six years with Blues taking the last two.

Heading up the harriers will be Dave Bailey who has a good crack at repeating his individual victory of a year past. With an equally good shot at individual honors is sophomore Brian Armstrong, youngest member of Blues' veteran outfit. Rounding out the team are Brian Richards, Bob Cairns, Rich Pyne, Dave Tong and John Loaring.

Toughest competition could well come from the Canadian side of the boarder with McMaster and Waterloo sending down well-rounded teams. American representation is always unpredictable but strong teams are usually forthcoming from Penn State and Buffalo, and have a fair chance of repatriating their event.

Taimo Pallandi, coach of the 1967 edition of Varsity's volleyball Blues, has a tough rebuilding job ahead of him this season. Last year Blues swept through the opposition without a single loss in the OAAA tournament at Western.

Only three players are returning from last season's team: Matt Rebane, Jim Forsythe, and Brian Carr. New comers are John Patterson, Brian Harris, Uldis Lote and John Rogers.

Before Tuesday night's game at McMaster Pallandi could only submit to the slender hope that even if things went badly, Blues exhibition record has never been outstanding, even with last season's runaway champions. But in Mac's cavernous but brightly illuminated monster field house, Blues' inexperience and lack of expertise took its toll quickly. It was all Mac in three fast games.

Turkey of the week

To Varsity Sports Editor, Rod Mickleburgh, who said way back when: "There seems to be no way the Queen's juggernaut will be stopped in 1967. The rest of the league can only hope for second place." Mickleburgh apologizes (humbly).

BLUES WIN EASILY 8-3

Soccerites blast Waterloo

Varsity Soccer Blues went to Waterloo by bus Wednesday but they resembled a train — the Rapido. As the opening whistle sounded, the Varsity train took off. They soon reached fantastic speeds and provided Waterloo fans with a show of excellence.

John Gero, a starter for the first time this season, blasted in a pass from Graham Shields. Austris Liepa kicked in a penalty shot. Gero got two more on passes from Liepa and Lefkos. Blues were flying.

Then came Belleville. The train stopped. Blues seemed to get off their track and for the last fifteen minutes of the half Waterloo's fighting Warriors came back with a show of their own. A penalty kick made the score 4-1; a cross from the right deflected by the leftwinger made it 4-2 at half time.

At the beginning of the second half, Blues were still stopped. However, after ten minutes the Rapido was off again. Jim Lefkos got into the act with two good goals on passes from Ron Muir and Jim Laverty. Gero decided to make a further contribution to the trip — two more goals within ten minutes. Sandwiched somewhere in between was a Waterloo marker. Central Station. Blues, 8-3 victors, started homeward — by bus.

Varsity used two goalkeepers during the game, Stan Bogucki and Erwin Stack — one in each half. Both will probably play at Guelph tomorrow. Blues' defence again looked leaky in the closing minutes of the first half. As a result, coach Ernie Glass decided to go with a 4-2-4 formation for the second 45 minutes. It worked well, with Ormond Mendes picking up any loose balls around the Toronto penalty area.

Korner Kicks: Waterloo did not look like a last place team yesterday. John Gero, when asked how it felt to score five goals in his first full game, simply replied, "Pretty lucky."

16-13 victory.

Unrehearsed and without benefit of a script, Varsity Blues and Queen's Golden Gaels provided enough drama Saturday afternoon to stock five Shakespearean festivals as they performed before more than 18,000 limp spectators at Varsity Stadium.

When the gun finally sounded amid aberrations galore, Blues were clutching a precarious three-point margin to virtually clinch a Yates Cup journey to Toronto for the second time in three years.

Tumultuous thanks and the tip of the Homecoming hat went to "icicles" Paul McKay who coolly booted home a 21-yd. field goal with two and a half minutes remaining to give Blues their

For McKay it was the third successive game his toe terrific had spawned the winning margin. In addition, his steady punting, when compared with Queen's grossly incompetent efforts, tended to nullify the ill effects of Blues' stuttering second-half offense which managed only two first downs and 23 yds. total offense.

With dark, gloomy clouds enshrouding the field and a chill wind turning platonic relationships into fits of snuggling and warm embraces, it was a game which saw dame Fortune toy with the footballers struggling beneath her. Time and time again, she bestowed her seductive smile on one side, only to flirt blatantly in the other direction a brief moment later.

Duff-Berdahl report called inadequate

By SUE HELWIG

University government is a "benevolent dictatorship," a Canadian Union of Students conference was told Saturday.

Professor D. J. McCulloch, the director of the university's advisory bureau, said structural change in university government is desirable and necessary.

The conference was formed by CUS President Hugh Armstrong to replace a seminar called by the Committee of Presidents of Ontario Universities to discuss the Duff-Berdahl report on Canadian university government.

The consensus of opinion at the CUS conference was that the Duff-Berdahl report was inadequate and had failed to confront the essential problems of the university.

Monique Ouellet, the president of the Ontario Union of Students, said in an interview yesterday that the report merely tinkers with the existing system and does not examine the basic principles, power and structure in the university.

The CUS conference was attended by representatives from as far away as Winnipeg and Montreal.

Discussions of the inadequacies of the Duff-Berdahl proposals ranged from a rejection of political reform of the present system to the assertion that there are constructive ways of using bureaucracy.

The report proposes changes in the relationships of university senates, boards of governors, presidents and faculty councils and suggests that students be given representation on governing bodies.

Matt Cohen, a lecturer in religion at McMaster University, asserted that student goals are not primarily political.

Cohen said he had no answer to the discontent and dissatisfaction evident within the university.

"Problems which arise out of the pressures placed on the university by a society demanding highly trained personnel are not encountered structurally," he said.

"Political action now is not impossible. It is only irrelevant."

Paul Hoch, a post-doctoral fellow, had a more positive view.

"It is important that students be active participants in the administration if only to de-mythologise the professor's role. Such representatives would publicize the inadequacies of the actual operation of existing governing bodies."
