The story is really a series of gags and situations loosely strung together. Dudley Moore, as the short-order cook uses each of his seven wishes to assume a role (pop singer; millionaire; intellectual; nun) in which he can pursue the waitress (Eleanor Bron) who works in Wimpy's Hamburg Bar with him.

Each role provides an opportunity for satire, and at times it is deadly. Peter Cook is superb as a pop singer doing a number in which he tells his fans how boring they are, and how much he despises them, while they adore him and fawn at his feet. (Shades of the Mothers?)

Particularly funny is a sequence involving an order of leaping nuns who scrub the lawn, hedges and trees with soap and mops, and whose initiation rites involve trampolines. Their cells sport huge photographs of the Mother Superior, with the caption "Big Sister is Watching You".

The only real complaint about the picture is that there is simply too much in it. Cook and Moore are so anxious to attack everything in sight, that they no sooner choose one victim than another captures their eye, and the first is abandoned. As a result, nothing is treated as fully it might be, and the impression is often one of superficiality. There are times when the continual jumping around, unsustained by any strong story line (or any development of any kind for that matter) threatens to grow tedious.

It is well worth going to see however, if only for the performances of Cook and Moore. Dudley Moore as the cook is an appealing ingenuous fall guy, not too bright, who gets it every time, but never fails to come back for more. As a continual victim, he is the perfect foil for Peter Cook as the Devil. Cook brings to his role a sophisticated elegance, as he rips the last pages out of Agatha Christie mystery books, and cheats old women out of their savings. He is rather like a somewhat bored confidence-trickster going about his business with no particular relish, but because he has to. On the whole, he comes out of the picture much better than God who has seldom been so severely ragged on the screen. The irreverent sacrilege in Bedazzled is aimed not at the Church (the usual target), but at God himself. In this picture of black comedy, he is depicted as a cheat.

Raquel Welch as Lillian Lust appears all too briefly to serve Dudley Moore breakfast in bed. Fortunately a great deal of her appears.

What the picture ultimately wants to say is left unclear. Possibly nothing. It is essentially a review written for the screen, a little insubstantial perhaps, but still fiendishly clever, and one of the funniest pictures to reach Toronto in a long time.

Chopped Up CHAPLIN

BY MEL BRADSHAW

The Funniest Man in the World is not apt to make many new fans for Charles Chaplin.

In the first place, it is not an anthology as much as a biography. Although the film is mostly composed of clips from Chaplin movies, the aim has been to trace his development through a number of short sequences from different films. The cutting is sometimes abrupt and seldom are we allowed to follow a situation through without being hurried off somewhere else (an exception is the splendid flop-house sequence rejected from Police).

plin's best, or at least best-known, films and concerns itself exclusively with his career from his first film with Sennet in 1913 to the formation of United Artists Corporation with Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks Sr.

Within the limits the film sets itself, it does a reasonably competent job. That the material it deals with is on the whole not of great intrinsic merit justifies in part its butterflyishness. Two parts of the picture are of special interest: a series of takes of Chaplin's improvisations which were rejected from the films he was making and a collection of shots of "the little tramp's", imitators from Hollywood to Tokyo.

Technical difficulties arise not so much from the quality of the film as from the cutting and an occasionally awkward and over-insistent narration spoken by Douglas Fairbanks Jr.

The Funniest Man in the World (now showing at the International) would be unfairly compared to Harold Lloyd's World of Comedy shown in Toronto a few years ago which was immensely entertaining in its own right. The Chaplin film depends much more on nostalgia for its appeal, and while I enjoyed it, I am sure I would have been much more appreciative if I had been seeing Chester Conklin, Mabel Normand, Edna Purviance, Leo White, and the rest as old friends and not meeting them for the first time.

The floor becomes crowded. The chant grows and builds in loudness. The school is jumping on the floor in time with "Hey beat U-C-C, Hey beat U-C-C . . ."

Most of the 300 cheering bouncing bodies join in a weaving snake-like dance, leaping along to "Hey beat U-C-C", holding the belt of the man in front of them.

The snake's head rears and whips out of control and cuts and destroys itself. The snake becomes chaos and the chaos becomes a horde of hot and sweaty bodies jamming together barking "Hey beat U-C-C, Hey beat U-C-C . . ."

There is a lull.

A grating hysterical voice screams "Let's KILL U-C-C".

"Let's kill U-C-C" reply 300 voices in one. The tension, the frenzy, the excitement, the thrill of it all, build and build and mount into one timeless terrifying war cry.

"Let's Kill U-C-C".

And then it stops and everyone stops, drooping, gasping, dazed, sweat-soaked and exhausted and wondering what has happened.

Suddenly without warning, without reason, two second team football players grapple and fall to the floor.

"Shirt fight".

Two dozen of the beefiest brawniest boys begin brawling, clawing, ripping and shredding each other's ten-dollar Brooks Brother buttondowns while the less aggressive recede to the safety of the walls.

"Okay you guys, you've got five minutes to make it to the study hall," a Prefect shouts in a commanding voice that sends sweaty armpits, tired feet and the occasional shirt collar oozing down the stairs and out of the gymnasium.

"Go Tiger beat U-C-C, / Winners of this day we must be / Colours waving, never failing / lead us to VictoREE RAH RAH RAH . . ."

Same Old Layton

By LARRY HAIVEN

Irving Layton's new volume of poetry, The Shattered Plinths, will hit the bookstands before many people have finished reading his last book, Periods of the Moon. Yet it's just like Layton to come chasing after laggards. He's that kind of poet — lusty, opinionated, prolific, sarcastic.

Nothing has changed about him. It's the same old Layton. Which means that you get poems that are alive, original, often disturbingly, truthful and often scandalously funny. There is usually a masterpiece or two among them and always the bad ones that make you wonder whether it's the same poet writing. That's not quite true, because the bad poems are Layton and very much so. You can see that very plainly. Perhaps more poets, should publish their bad poems. It would give us a lot better look at their personalities.

Written mostly in the summer (long, hot) of 1967, poems in The Shattered Plinths throw curses at the Russians, look cynically at the Negro riots, ridicule De Gaulle and cluck a sympathetic tongue at the Arab defeat. And there are the ones that are full of the cutting, sardonic insights about men and women that Layton has become famous (notorious) for.

But Layton has weakened. Apparently he finds the thought of being controversial a bit disturbing. So he writes a five page introduction explaining why some of his poems are shocking and controversial. He laments the fact that some people are offended by his writing and tries to justify himself. You get the feeling as you turn the page to start the poems that Layton is saying, "Well, here I go, ha, ho!" and indeed quite a few of the poems are self consciously vehement and righteous. They don't come across at all, except to give you a chill of embarrassment down your spine, (for the poet, that is.)

The majority of the poems, however, reaffirm the fact that Layton is a good poet. He has the sensitivity that derives insights from simple incidents and observations, and communicates them so that they are shared intimately with the reader and in doing this, Layton does not lose his individuality. In one of the poems, he surveys bikined sunbathers on the Riviera on a hot, languid day and muses on the peacefulness, "Surely suffering and evil are merest illusion when such colour and sounds overflow into eye and ear." The poem has the richness and sensuousness that are distinctively Layton's and the wry perception of things that the poet has.

An Iroquois chief on holiday in Nice provides the material for a sad and funny poem, full of Layton's wit.

"Ugh, Ugh" the Indian chief says with the utmost guttural expressiveness so as not to disappoint the American and me (but he may have merely been clearing his throat) "This sea smells too much of Espresso coffee, also of love-making and imported whisky.

Some of the poems about the Arab-Israeli war sound like mad ravings. In one, the poet screams at the Russians at the U.N., "Comrades-cancer rots your well-oiled tongues." These poems don't come across as poetry. Layton has lost his temper and forgot to translate it into verse. The poem called "The Larger Issue" is grossly bland and unintelligent, something you make yourself forget.

Two of the poems on the war stand out, however. One, called, "For My Two Sons, Max and David", boils all of his anger down to a powerful outcry on the history of the Jew:

The Jew who sends Christians and Moslem theologians back to their seminaries and mosques for new arguments on the nature of Divine Mercy.

The Jew, old and sagacious, whom all speak well of: when not lustling for his passionate, dark-eyed daughters

It's an excellent poem. And then there's one called "Arabs", a sympathetic look at their defeat. He calls them "the world last poets" and says:

...The 20th century ticks in all the ominous corners of your contemporary courtyards: "you are not contemporary, go away" and in your defeat I see my own as destiny picks you up still muttering to the indifferent air "Inshallah, malesh, bukra" and like one of Omar's chessmen puts you one by one silently away.

The words and the language are rich—the poem flows. It's one of the best he has written, but then there's the question of its impact.

Is Layton speaking from a position of superiority as a Jew? Can he expect to be taken seriously by those who have read his other comments? Taken as an absolute, the poem is excellent; taken otherwise it means nothing. It's something best left to the reader to decide for himself.

Among the other good poems is a sarcastic comment on white people in the midst of the riots: "because you won't attempt self-transcendence is no reason for keeping white folk from trying," he tells one rioter. "Village Funeral" is effective in its terseness. A poem about Aberfan is subtle and chilling. Numerous short poems sometimes hit and sometimes miss.

Lovers of Layton will revel as he makes love "to a neglected female corpse in the city morgue." Layton haters will get sick as they thumb through the book looking for things they can get sick at. And others including this reviewer will resort to witty clichés and academics comments to hide their inability to take a side. And Layton will go on writing poetry.

Two Art Exhibitions: One Exotic, One Local

BY DAVID PAPE

There were two thoroughly refreshing openings this week: the arts of India and Nepal at the ROM, and a seven man show out at Erindale College.

To see the Indian and Nepalese exhibition is pure joy. There is no other word for it. It breathes of colour and laughter and delight. After seeing this show, one is filled less with wonder than with affection.

The exhibition includes hundreds of small sculptures in bronze and stone, priceless artifacts in jade and crystal, incredible textile work, and a large collection of illustrated manuscripts mounted as paintings. Everything in the show appeals to whatever is in you that cherishes life, its energy, its beauty, and its timeless pattern.

Unlike most of the Japanese exhibit seen here two years ago, the paintings emphasize the activity of life rather than its solitudes. These scenes have not the stillness of landscape, the lonely almost unnoticeable figure patiently following a mountain trail, nor the solitary house on a wooded hillside.

These works all have the exuberance of story about them. And you can't help getting into the story. For these are endearing gods.

The most loveable is Krsna, a sort of Pied Piper for women. They flock to him from all over town. As a child he is always leading devilish forays into the neighbours' butter. Full grown he inspires a host of erotic poems and illustrations designed to evoke the mood of accompanying song.

Notice the charming painting in which he becomes his lover and she becomes he. They exchange clothes, hairdo, skin pigment, and love roles. Notice too, the wild rejoicing in depiction of a raag that is sung so well it brings rain.

Above all these gods are to be enjoyed. Buddha has four heads, because they sprouted willy nilly to see a beautiful woman walking about him. Ganeshe, the fat bacchanalian god of wealth has an elephant's head because his father knocked off his own. He was preventing access to the mother's boudoir.

Along with the liveliness and humor, one is impressed with the sense of form. Siva, even in the dance of destruction and chaos is divinely balanced, and circumscribed by a wheel of fire.

The unique exhibition is staying until March.

ends in only two weeks. It is the fifth show they have sponsored this year to large audiences from Toronto and the Georgetown area.

The show presents a striking contrast between the vision of men who have immigrated to Canada, and the clever, hard-edge formalists who were raised here. The only reason for their being together is that the show was organized by John Sammer a Georgetown dealer who has shown all their work.

The most impressive by far is the old school, especially the agrarian sculptures of the Drenters family. The father, Joseph, has been a farmer, a blacksmith, and inventor. His sculptures convey a strong sense of the land, of the tangibility of objects, of energetic humanity, and an assertion of sense perception.

In his wrought iron sculptures of the farmer, sower, and mower, we find a marvellous precision of line and suppleness of form, wonderfully defined by surrounding space. One regrets that his work is not for sale.

The work of his son, Yosef, also emphasizes the world as perceived. Man in Space is accordingly a simplified wood sculpture of a man on a flying animal, a soaring dolphin. His Saint Cecilia (below) profoundly speaks to the mystery of the unexpressed—a spiritualism rooted in the base elements of our environment.

Leonhard Oesterle achieves his greatest strength in a maquette for a commissioned work of much greater proportions. The piece, one of his "Element Series" is a splendid example of potential energy, like a solid helix stretched. His "Mythic Series", as assemblage of small factory parts, have in themselves marvellous rhythmic development and, like all his work, sounds the ground tone of a fervent humanism.

The Toronto and area artists, Raymond Spiers, his wife Pat Fulford, and Robert Downing could not be more antithetical in statement. They work in pattern and artifact. Their sculpture represents the ingenuity of plexiglass, chrome and painted steel. It is clever, it is varied, it is rational; but it lacks passion. In the cool formality of Spiers and Downing, I sense no liberation of colour or rhythm.

Incident At Vichy

The Canadian premiere of Arthur Miller's INCIDENT AT VICHY directed by Joel Kenyon will be presented by the University College Players Guild with the assistance of the Centre for the Study of Drama at the Colonnade Theatre February 14-18. Mr. Kenyon, the play's director, is one of Canada's busiest actors. Born in Chicago he came to Canada in the early Sixties and has remained ever since working with the Village Playhouse, the Crest, the Manitoba Theatre Centre and the Canadian Players. He came to Stratford in 1965 to play Tsar Nicholas in The Last of the Tsars and has been a member of the company since. He has just returned from Ottawa where he opened the new Town Theatre in Luv. Next week he leaves for Stratford to begin rehearsals for the international tour of Midsummer Night's Dream. Here in this article expressly written for the Varsity he discusses Incident At Vichy:

INCIDENT AT VICHY can, I believe, be a theatrical experience of great personal impact, yet it is scarcely a play. It can be considered a dissection in dramatic form of Arthur Miller's conscience from quite another point of view than that presented in AFTER THE FALL.

The characters are perhaps less people than aspects of that conscience. While the conflict is impersonal — yet another attempt to explain Man's inhumanity to Man — we are offered a view into the most private recesses of a sensitive and conscientious spirit, into the innermost heart of a man who is aware and suffers for it; and it is for this reason, I believe, that the piece is profoundly and very personally moving.

The action is very simple. In dramatic substance it is one of the first, quiet roundups of Jews by "cooperating" French authorities in occupied Vichy during September 1942. Thrown together, they are compelled to talk while waiting to be interrogated. As their awareness of their situation grows, there is a striving, individual and collective, to understand their own agony and each others', and the causes for it. The focus of the excruciating analysis is accomplished through the pitting together of a brilliant Jewish psychoanalyst and an Austrian nobleman — a Christian — who has been picked up "because he had an accent". It is primarily from the psychological interaction of these two enormously sensitive characters that the suspense of the play is achieved — certainly not from anything else; the fate of 6 million Jews at the hands of the Nazis is scarcely history.

For the director and acting company this play, so static in physical terms, presents enormous problems and a tantalizing challenge — to translate the "stillness" of the piece into theatrically effective terms. It requires performances of great sincerity, involvement, and utmost control. The "acting problem" is to excite the audience's imagination to such a pitch of immediacy and empathy that they share in the "waiting", which is the only action of the play. (But then, are we not all "waiting to be judged"?)

It is of course a message play. The message is not new, but it is exquisitely expressed: "... Jew is only the name we give to that stranger, that agony we cannot feel, that death we look upon like a cold abstraction. Each man has his Jew; the black, the yellow, the white; it is "the other".

We have still a week to rehearse at the time I'm writing this, but I feel very encouraged that we shall succeed in this production, I certainly hope so. This is not a play to do badly, if any play is. It is a great play, deserving the most painstaking production. I cannot understand why it has not been produced in Canada until now.

Jeanne Moreau, to my mind one of today's most fascinating actresses, appears next week at the Electra (362 College) as Mata Hari in a 1965 French film of that name. Francois Truffaut worked on the screen-play of the picture directed by Jean-Louis Richard. Jean-Louis Trintignant of Man and a Woman fame co-stars.

W. C. Fields replaces Bob Dylan at the New Yorker today in The Bank Dick and Never Give a Sucker an Even Break. In Cold Blood has just started at the Hyland.

Bonnie and Clyde has another week (at least) to run at the Cinema. Mastroianni as The Stranger and Paul Newman as Cool Hand Luke are worth a visit (at the Towne and Imperial respectively).

The U of T Film Society will show its "to be announced" feature Wednesday: Charlie Chaplin's Modern Times, at 6 and 8:30 in Rm 102 of the Mechanical Building. Also at the Mechanical Building the CFB and the CFDC show Soul Freeze, Face Junks and other underground films. Friday and Saturday at 8:30.

On Campus: La Lecon concludes today at Cartwright Hall (1 p.m.) and next week Trinity Players open Crawling Arnold, a Feiffer monologue, no doubt. On next Wednesday, the PLS and the UC Players open in West Hall and the Colonnade respectively. Look for Cambises, a mirthful tragedy, and Arthur Miller's Incident at Vichy.

Off campus, Charlie Brown goes on and on, at the Playhouse. Little Murders opened at the Royal to execration and music. Don't send your mother. At the O'Keefe, Eddie Bracken is only worth $2, half the price of admission. Gentlemen Be Seated is in its final week, and is followed on February 15th by Ben Jonson's The Alchemist. Take note, drama students: it's at 12 Alexander Street.

Lunch Hour Entertainment

Is it a Trinity fetish or a natural impulse that makes people feel justified in translating Ionesco with a British accent? Whatever the reason, the Trinity College Dramatic Society presents The Lesson in this way. But there are redeeming features.

The theme appeals to our miserable-pressured-exploited-studentness, since its about a sympathetic angel-faced young girl mercilessly lectured (and finally knifed) to death by an inhuman and self-righteous professor. It humourously exposes some archaic teaching methods, ridicules rambling lectures and memorization, and effectively criticizes the ludicrous illustrative example "... arithmetic: If you have two ears and I nibble one off, how many are left?"

There is an interesting episode in which the prof, hopelessly carried away by his eloquent explanations of how things can differ because of their marked resemblance, forcefully ignores the plight of the darling student, suffering (almost believably) from a toothache. It turns into a rhythmic semi-dance that could have been better rehearsed (as could all physical-contact moments in the play).

The almost innocent cruelty, and eventually violent behaviour of the professor provides the best characterization. Douglas Watters' nervous yet cultivated attitude fit more than adequately, although he sometimes avoided an eye-to-eye sort of communication with Margaret Keith, (the pupil), that would have increased tension and improved the performance. Margaret spoke clearly and convincingly.

It's unfortunate that her concentration isn't always consistent, especially during the toothache; it seemed to hurt most while she was saying her lines.

Sometimes the direction, by Clare Coulter lacked motivation, but generally her blocking was good and she made the most of the better lines.

The Lesson is playing again this afternoon, at 1:15 p.m., in Cartwright Hall. It isn't the greatest thing around, but I can think of a lot of less enjoyable ways to spend an hour, and besides, it only costs a dime.

A little more lesson-planning, specifically a quicker pace, and the play shapes up as a wellspend lunchhour of entertainment—for Ionesco-lovers, and professor-haters alike.

Bob torn between anarchy and activism

After winning an Ontario Scholarship and getting 100 on his Grade 13 history examination ("I know how to play the examination game") he enrolled in soc and phil. He now is in third year General English, after passing briefly through several courses.

Bossin says he is "constantly thinking of dropping out."

"There are a lot of interesting things happening in the university, and a lot of things that being in university makes difficult, so I end up paying only half attention to everything."

He expects, however, to last the few remaining months of his course and go to Rochdale College next year to "read, talk, and, hopefully, to make love." He has virtually abandoned his long-time ambition to enter law.

You can feel within Bossin a certain tension between the love of anarchy, of "doing his own thing," (which led him to befuddle his high-school teachers by purposefully doing poorly on IQ tests) and the need to be involved and active.

His "hippyish" irreverence for organization took him ironically last year to the leadership of the Lady Godiva Memorial Band, the first artsman to be honored.

"They didn't take anything seriously. I never knew if three or 25 would show up," Bossin admits. "They were the most unorganized group in the world. They were great."

In a more aesthetic vein, Bossin is a fan of squirrels and Gerard Manley Hopkins. A professional folk-singer, he is good enough to earn his tuition singing in a duo called Bob and Susan.

At SAC meetings, Bossin is a lively debater. He conceptualizes and simplifies problems in down-to-earth terms, occasionally at the expense of subtleties.

His delivery is studded with epigrams and clarifying metaphors. To Varsity reporters, he is a good man to go to for a "quote".

As education commissioner, Bossin has outlined a number of programs which, if implemented, will revolutionize the commission and SAC's entire role in the university.

Bossin feels students must have concrete proposals to offer the administration when they are finally given a place in academic decision-making.

"Course unions are great, but we should know what we're unionizing about."

Bossin's report on education emphasizes his belief that education is possible only in an atmosphere of freedom, free especially from the fear of being wrong.

Though his report was dismissed by Professor G. E. Johnson SAC staff advisor as "wide-eyed airy useless philosophy," Bossin has several concrete proposals for next year.

He plans to set up a series of independent, SAC-run courses and seminars on subjects like "the flaws in empiricism." In addition he hopes to hire a full-time education coordinator.

The 22-year-old Bossin, who lives at home with his mother, considers himself "a strong humanist."

"I look on Community as a goal — people talking, not trying to impose their will, free love, just being turned on," Bossin says.

Bossin was greatly affected by a CUS seminar in Vancouver this summer. "It was 12 days with no organization, nobody to turn to. It showed me you don't need structures."

The Vancouver seminar also exposed him to hippies.

"I'm pro-hippy," he says, fingering the beads around his neck. "They're opting out from being told what to do. I think it's great if you can get stimulation from lying on the beach."

But you can't be a hippy and an activist. "An activist is always worrying about what everyone else is doing," Bossin sadly admits, pointing wistfully to the two or three grey hairs he is beginning to sprout.

Bossin took part in the Dow Sit-in at the Placement Service. He says he doesn't "dig" violence.

"It was a mistake to sit in, and it would have been a mistake not to have," Bossin explains. "It wasn't really fair to keep the engineers from going in, but at least the sit-in made it human, rather than the stereotypes people usually thing of"

"You can't be a blind activist, but if you're not blind, you just end up being inactive." But he also worries about the "dangers in divine righteousness which can lead to authoritarian actions" like the Dow sit-in.

But basically, to Bossin, it's all a matter of people understanding each other. It bothers him that he has to finish his essays before he can go out with his girl friend. It bothers him to put things ahead of people.

Bossin says there are five ways of progressing with another person. You can argue with them, subvert them, ignore them, shoot them or you can both just try to become simple, interacting human beings and build from there together.

The trouble with activism is that you start looking at interests rather than people. "You start to react negatively," Bossin says, "and you forget you're all basically on the same side."

Bossin fingers his beads again. "I got them from a girl in Vancouver. She was a lovely girl."

St. Mike's residence still rejects women

By TOM COLLINS

St. Michael's College has stuck by its traditional policy of excluding women from men's residences.

The SMC administration last week turned down a recommendation by the men's residence council that there be "privileges for women in the men's residence areas on Friday and Saturday evenings, 8 p.m. to 1:15 a.m."

Students were told of the rejection at a stormy open meeting Tuesday. MRC members said the decision was taken by SMC president Rev. J. M. Kelly, dean of men Rev. R. J. Madden, assistant registrar Rev. A. R. Walligore, and residence director Andrew Lang (II Law).

The MRC brief followed a two-month study of the question by a joint committee of the men's and the two women's residence councils.

A non-confidence motion against the committee that prepared the report was defeated amid derisive shouts from the audience.

Mike Magee (III SMC), an SMC SAC representative, said: "As a member of the biggest circus in the province, I have finally found one that is equal to it."

Interviewed this week Father Madden said men's residence should be a "male sphere."

"But we are willing to talk over this or any other situation.

"We feel that the college is responsible for the life led in the residences in terms of facilities and opportunities.

"I do not feel a responsibility for the moral actions of individual students, but the changes suggested could be disruptive for study atmosphere on weekends."

Father Kelly said he would, "trust St. Michael's students more perhaps than other people would trust their students.

"I trust them to be aware of some things as Christians — to be aware of their ability to reject some of the things of the secular world."

Frank Petruzella (III SMC), MRC president, said in an interview:

"We are dealing with a generation gap. They represent the opinion of a group of older people.

"We think that perhaps their standards are outmoded. But, if we did succeed in making them aware that we feel differently, it did not force them to reappraise their values."

SAC needs new orientation: Nitkin

By MEIR BESTER

"Education should not be taken for granted," Dave Nitkin declared as he sat in a dim corner of the New College cafeteria.

Nitkin was explaining what motivated him to run for the SAC vice-presidency.

"I suggested to Glen Brownee that he should run for president," Nitkin said, "because I felt the other two candidates were not suitable for the job."

"Glen agreed and then persuaded me to run as his vice-president."

Nitkin, a third-year honour geography student at New College is a tall, large-eyed individual who speaks with great passion and conviction.

"SAC must change its orientation or it is doomed to collapse," Nitkin predicts.

"We need more student involvement in SAC, but this will not happen unless students identify with SAC goals."

"SAC's goals should be student goals."

To remedy the situation, Nitkin proposes that interested students, not SAC members be appointed to committees such as the ones that investigated the book store and the library.

A member of New College students council, Nitkin is not satisfied with the way college councils operate.

"They should be more concerned about quality of education and less about the number of potato chips sold at a dance."

"SAC and the local councils should work together."

Nitkin is convinced that his experience on SAC, coupled with Brownee's experience on Vic's council will enable them to establish harmony between SAC and local councils.

Harris leaves Innis — Russell appointed

Peter H. Russell has been appointed acting principal of Innis College, it was announced yesterday. He will replace Principal Robin Harris, who will be on leave during 1968-69.

Dr. Russell, now an associate professor of political science, is spending this year researching at Harvard University.

He graduated from Trinity College in philosophy, and was a Rhodes scholar in 1954, graduating from Oxford in political science and economics.

UC English department has new head

John J. Carroll has been appointed chairman of the English Department at University College, it was announced yesterday. He replaces Professor Clifford Leech, who will continue on the staff.

Dr. Carroll, who has been at UC since 1958, was born in Peoria, Illinois, and earned B.A. degrees at the University of Illinois and at Oxford as a Fulbright Scholar. He took his PhD at Harvard.

Scarborough set for huge expansion

Students at Scarborough College may have residence space for 400 students by 1969 if a multi-million-dollar expansion plan gains approval.

The master plan, which also calls for the construction of academic and recreational facilities, must be approved by the Ontario government and the Board of Governors.

Scarborough Principal William Plumtre said yesterday that preliminary contact with provincial officials "seemed encouraging."

Earlier this week the Scarborough College Students Society distributed a questionnaire dealing with the residential problems. Of the 200 who answered, 193 demanded the building of the residential and the recreational facilities.

"After 5:30 the college dies," said Plumtre.

"Students are concerned about the lack of university atmosphere," said Harry Brown, president of the student's society.

Are you in top two per cent? - try Mensa

By TERRY GLUCK

Did you find the following questions a breeze?

Which of the following does not belong: iced, steamy, wet, frozen, snowy?

Adversary is to victor as suicide is to: depression, corpse, religion, cowardice, achieve?

These questions were printed in Monday's Varsity. The article went on to say that: "If you find the preceding questions a breeze you may be a potential member of Mensa, One of the world's most exclusive societies."

I am a member of Mensa I didn't find those questions a breeze.

Mensa is an organization founded in England in 1945. To join you must pass an IQ test with a score higher than 98 per cent of the general population.

Now. Those questions. I dug two answers out of them.

Question one: FROZEN—all other words pertain to water in one state or another. Frozen does not. i.e. Benzene can be frozen, or a person or animal may be in a "frozen" position.

Question two: CORPSE—victor is an adversary, corpse may be a suicide. A time relation is also present—the word "victor" is present after there is an adversary, a corpse is present after there is a suicide.

I overheard groups of people talking about the correct answer to the questions and also received several different answers from people I considered intelligent. Many of these answers differed from mine.

To find the correct answers, I phoned several other members of Mensa, and gave them the questions. The result? There are no correct answers. No one answer is more correct than any other answer (within limits).

Here's what some Mensa members said. If your answers are the same or follow the same line of reasoning, cheer up — you may be smarter than you think.

● Martha Warnes, ex-local secretary of Toronto Mensa:

FRONTIER COLLEGE NEEDS

Labourer-Teachers for May to Sept. 1968. Come to recruiting Wed. Feb. 14

1 - 2 P.M.

HART HOUSE MUSIC ROOM

Interviews will be arranged

Question one: WET — because it is the normal state of water. The others are extreme forms.

Question two: Can't give logical answer — none of the choices are good. However, if one must choose; CORPSE — because grammatically it matches suicide in the same manner that victor matches adversary.

● Peter Urquart, ombudsman for Mensa Canada:

Question one: WET — because it pertains to the normal state of water. The other words are due to extremes of temperature.

Question two: CORPSE—

● Gordon Haliburton, membership executive of Mensa:

Question one: WET — all other words are a result of being wet.

Question two: DEPRESSION — victor wins over adversary as suicide wins over depression.

● Marg Haliburton, membership executive of Mensa Canada:

Question one: WET — the others are water in a changing state.

Question two: DEPRESSION — the victor wins over the adversary (etc).

● Bob Cumming, a Mensa member:

Question one: FROZEN— the only one that doesn't have to be water. i.e. frozen steel.

Question two: CORPSE — a victor is what an adversary wants to be. A corpse is what someone wanting to commit suicide wants to be.

● Vicki Haliburton a student member of Mensa:

Question one: FROZEN — not necessarily water.

Question two: CORPSE —

a victor is what an adversary wants to be. A corpse is what someone wishing to commit suicide wants to be.

● Gerry Haliburton, a student and member of Mensa:

Question one: WET — pertains to water in liquid form. All other choices are vapor or crystalline form.

Question two: COWARDICE — adversary loses out to victor. Suicide loses out to cowardice.

Now do you see what I mean by my statement that there is no "correct" answer? All of the above mentioned people are members of Mensa, yet they arrive at different answers by different methods of reasoning.

The test you write for Mensa is not marked by an IBM machine. All tests are checked by psychologists. Often, different answers are right.

For example: two people may have the same IQ but on the same question these two people may give different answers. Both answers will be considered right.

The psychologist marking the IQ test paper will determine your mode of reasoning throughout the paper and on this basis he will determine your mental ability in comparison with the rest of the population.

That is the method and those are examples of questions used to discover members of "one of the world's most exclusive societies." (quote from The Varsity).

Do you think that you are in the top two per cent? Try the test.

You don't have to tell your friends.

PC's sponsor technology 'think-in'

Man in the Technological Society is the theme of a think-in to be held Feb. 12-15 by the U of T Progressive Conservative Club.

Everyone is invited to see films produced by the National Film Board and to participate in seminars to take place during the rest of the school year and during the summer.

The films are: The Living Machine; Man and his Resources; Can the Earth Produce; The City and the Future; and A Place to Stand.

The think-in, however, is part of a larger effort by the PC club. Members are preparing in-depth reports on our technological society, pointing out its weaknesses and suggesting solutions. The completed reports will be sent to members of the federal, provincial, and municipal governments.

Club members have produced a background paper dealing with the effects of technological change, covering such topics as: the computer revolution; air transportation; urban transportation; communications; automation, employment & income, research & development; and social implications. In preparation are reports dealing with housing, air pollution, crime and law enforcement, and the Indian problem.

Electioneering should not be a campus political club's sole purpose, the PC's say. It should rather work actively for social reform, which the PC's feel can be most effectively accomplished through the political system and through the present political parties.

Music tuningforks UC 6-2

By GELLIUS HOCKEY

In this week's featured game (be sure to read the story in SPORTS ILLUSTRATED), Music, led by the phenomenal Dave "Vladimir" Richards, first man to play Chopin's minute waz in under 55 seconds, the Dave Keon of the classical piano, defeated UC III, 6-2. Knowles (2), Chafe, Martin, and Gagula (famous Roman emperor who made a consul into a horse) got the other Music goals; Saltzman scored twice for UC III.

Vernon recorded his second shutout in as many weeks (2) as Law edged Sr. Eng., 1-0. Footballer Jim Ware scored the game's only goal by replied for Meds.

Webster scored to give Jr. Eng. a 1-0 triumph over SMC B. Sweet earned the shutout.

Pfaffe (imported German beer) scored twice to lead Forestry over Law 11, 3-1 Swindle got the other goal for the Ents; Bridle hit for Law II.

BASKETBALL

McKenzie and Crouter scored 15 points each as PHE A swamped Sr. Eng., 53-35. Swanston and Slekys had 9 for the losers.

Dents A beat Law, 36-32 Taras Bulas scored 17 for Dents, Shivas 9 for Law.

New emerged victorious over Scar, 30-23. Fine scored 9 for Gnus (A gnu is a small South African antelope related to the Ichneutai.) Carter led Scar. with 12.

Even without big stars, swimmers shine

By DAVE POWELL

The Varsity swimming team confirmed Tuesday night that they have the depth needed to win their third straight Intercollegiate championship, as they whipped McMaster, without any of their big guns in action. Blues won all but 2 events, and piled up 76 points to Mac's 28.

Freestylers Doug MacIntosh and Alan Pyle led the way with two victories each. MacIntosh recorded his best times to date in winning the 200 and 500 freestyle, and veteran Pyle swept the 50 and 100 free, Steve Gerring took the 1000 yard freestyle and placed second in the 500 free.

Cliff Gentle had his best time in winning the 200 individual medley, and came second in the 200 butterfly. Klaus Koch won the butterfly and followed Gentle home in the medley. Rookie Don Carr took the 200 yard backstroke, while Andreas del Junco nipped teammate Dick Bowerman in the 200 breaststroke. Steve Low placed third in the 100 free and the 200 back.

Toronto split the relays with Mac, winning the 400 yard medley, and losing the 400 free. Mac also managed a win in diving.

Blues will be at full strength when they meet University Settlement and Etobicoke Aquatic clubs on Saturday night, at 7:30, in Hart House. The fine young swimmers on these two clubs should give Toronto a hard workout in preparation for the OAAA finals in two weeks time.

Frank (Granny) Buck didn't win but Varsity Blues did on Tuesday evening when they took on McMaster in an exhibition squash match at Mac.

Blues defeated the Mac squashers 5-1 in preparation for the intercollegiate squash championships to be held next week at McMaster.

Buck, the self-styled "Old Man" on the Varsity squad succumbed to Mac's top seeded Bobby Dubeau, a nationally-ranked player.

Buck later redeemed himself by severely trouncing the Mac seventh seed, 3-0.

Registering victories for Blues were Vic Harding, Dave Gunn, Terry Swinton, Mike Zimmerman and Howie Fluxgold.

BADMINTON

The University of Toronto Men's Badminton Team left Toronto Thursday night for their sectional meet at Western. The winners at Western will play against the Eastern Champions for the Jemmett trophy a week late. Toronto is presently defending this trophy having won it for the last two years

This year's team is one of Toronto's better teams in recent years. John Forsyth returns to it as No. 1 singles player, with playing coach John Gilbert playing No. 2; Bill Kinsey will play No. 3 and John Patterson No. 4. All these players have represented the university before. The doubles make-up will be Kinsey and Gilbert at No. 1 and Forsyth and Jack Wade, a newcomer to the team, at No. 2.

Crucial showdown tonight at Varsity Arena

By PHIL BINGLEY

It's almost like a televised golf playoff. The stage is set, all the tickets are gone and the game is for all the marbles, i.e. first place. That's what is happening tonight when Waterloo Warriors invade Varsity Arena to tangle with Varsity Blues. At stake is first place in the SIHL. Game time is 8 o'clock.

The importance of this game has been gathering since the beginning of the season. Waterloo won their tenth game of the schedule Wednesday night as they dumped McMaster Marlin's 6-3 in the Dundas rink. Warriors have lost but one game, 5-2 to Blues last week.

Blues, meanwhile, have also won ten games to date. The only mark on an otherwise perfect record is their 2-2 draw with Mac last Friday. The one point they picked up in that game is currently the margin between Varsity and second-place Waterloo.

However, since it is unlikely that either team will be beaten from here on in, the winner of tonight's game should end up the season in first place.

In the lineup department, Blues appear healthy and ready to fly. The line of Murray Stroud, Bob McClelland and Brian Jones has been coach Tom Watt's best production unit this season. Stroud and McClelland are presently running one-two in the league's scoring race while Jones has been scoring regularly.

Varsity's other veteran line of Paul Laurent, Ward Passi and Gord Cunningham has been starting to move of late. Probably the best line in the league, they had early scoring problems and are just beginning to find the range. Laurent has been skating a mile in Blues past few starts, and Passi and Cunningham have followed suit. A little luck around the net would solve all of the threesome's problems.

Last but not least is Blues' young Canada line. Centre Brian St. John has improved with each and every game this season. Never hampered by his offensive capabilities, Brian has become one of the better checkers on the squad. St. John along with his colleagues (that is to say his wings) John Gordon (Blues' most improved player) and Mike Riddell (who never gives less than a 110 per cent effort) gives coach Watt a strong two-way line.

Defensively, John Wrigley has a great year in goal. Were it not for his play Blues would not be in first place. Always a steady backstopper, Wrigley has been magnificent in the clutch.

Bob Hamilton has been Blues' steadiest defenseman

MEL BAIRD
rugged W. defenseman

so far. Rarely caught out of position, "Hammy" has been the "Big Bopper" on the blueline along with rugged partner Doug Jones.

Captain Peter Speyer and Jim Miles form Blues' other defensive pairing. On top of the solid protection they have offered is the ten goals they have produced between them in eleven games.

Extra forward Paul McCann has been used predominantly as the trigger man on Blues' potent power-play. However, McCann is ready for regular duty if needed and possesses one of the best shifts in the league.

Warriors, as their record indicates have been tough this year. Forwards Terry Cooke, Don Mervyn and Ron Smith are the most potent in a Don Haye's coached attack. All three are veterans of SIHL competition.

On defense, Hayes has two of the league's best in Mel Baird and Bob Murdoch. Murdoch, a converted forward, is also noted for his rushing and shooting ability. However, injuries to Larry Banks (shoulder separation) and Vince Mulligan (broken ankle). Have left the blueline brigade in a weakened condition.

Warriors have top-rated Dave Quarrie in goal. Although unimpressive in the first Toronto-Waterloo encounter, Quarrie has the skill and is capable of coming up with the big game.

On the whole Blues are two goals better than Waterloo. They are stronger both man to man and as a unit. But a psyched up Warrior team will be trying anything to win. It looks like a good one so plan to be early!

After a slow start, Blues' Brian Jones, shown above, has been patting goals regularly, and he'll sure be looking for same tonight.

Hotshot Hawks at Varsity

It's a nothing game as far as League standings go. But revenge will be the overriding factor for Varsity Blues' hoop platoon when they join combat with Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks tomorrow evening in the spacious surroundings of Hart House. Blues are still smarting from their humiliating 108-81 loss to Hawks last month in Waterloo, and will be looking to redress a few grievances.

Lutheran may well be the best collegiate basketball squad in the nation. Just this week they upset Windsor Lancers by three points in another exhibition duel.

Blues, of course, underwent a traumatic experience in Guelph Wednesday night as they needed a late drive to defeat the lowly Gryphons 80-74.

But a win is a win is a win.

In preliminary basketball action Saturday night, Victoria College meets Meds.

COMMENT: what ails the cage Blues

By TOM COLLINS

Varsity Blues had better get off their asses and Coach John McManus had better think, and think hard, if the basketballers still hope to make the playoffs.

Their lackadaisical 80-74 win over Guelph Gryphons in Guelph Wednesday evening kept their playoff chances alive, but Blues' performance was not one to inspire great hope.

Blues are weak on both offense and defense, but especially on the latter. Some forceful coaching on the part of McManus could make these talented players work together as a team, and solve Varsity's problems.

The fact that Guelph scored 12 more points than their season's average (62) demonstrates Varsity's biggest weakness — defense. Even when you consider Varsity's sometime casual attitude towards this easily-handled team, they were atrocious against the smaller Guelph players.

Blues were out-rebounded, out-passed and out-smarted in their own zone time after time. In particular, John Hadden's timing was so off that his great height was almost nullified, and Arvo Neidre was not working in close enough to the boards to give the help he should.

The only player who did perform well defensively was Mark Slater, whose aggressiveness was quite noticeable, especially to the rather-biased referees.

Offensively, against a man-to-man defense, Blues have no real problem, except that their forwards are not adept enough (except for Ron Voake and maybe Slater) to make the necessary moves to get free for a shot. Thus the man-to-man

Blues' offense is restricted to three or four players at the most—in other words, it's more important than scoring.

It worked in the dying moments against the last-place Gryphons, but can they beat Windsor, the second place team? I think not, unless Neidre and Hadden work, and really work—for that's what basketball, and man-to-man basketball especially, is all about. And not unless McManus is prepared to really coach Blues, not just let them drift along.

McManus has got to pick the ballplayers that suit the peculiar situation in Hart House—the players that are great in a large gym have got to make themselves suit Hart House or sit on the bench, for they are hurting the team.

Hart House, because of its size, demands three big men on the front line. But its size also demands a zone press which in turn demands fast, aggressive men. Since this is the case, how can McManus let McNaughton, Slater and Kirby (three who fill the bill to perfection—except for inexperience and confidence) sit on the bench?

It's perhaps a bit late in the season to be advocating changes, but its probably the only way that Blues can win their last league games. Blues have a good opportunity to put all this into practice in the exhibition game tomorrow night.

If Blues use a zone press with the right people, and if McManus can make those people work and work, they could conceivably win or, at least, not lose by too much. At worst, it will be good experience for some deserving people. I hope you will give it a try Coach.

Gym meet

By JAMIE ALLEVENTSI

Strength, courage, and flexibility will take over the Hart House gym this Saturday afternoon at 2:00 when the Varsity gymnastics squad hosts the team from McMaster in this year's first (and last) home gymnastics meet. The exhibition show will be the final tuneup for both teams prior to the OQAA championships which take place February 17.

Since the OQAA has ruled that only six men may compete in the championships, coach Julio Roncon will be forced to pick his final team after tomorrow's meet.

Alex Hamilton, John Kortwright, Jamie Archibald, Brian McVey, and Dave Cope land will likely compete in all events. Specialists Carl Sloane, Phil Michaelif (floor exercises), Mauro DiPasquale (rings), and Arthur Stein (side horse) round out the team.

Camera freezes the action as Varsity Blues' Paul Laurent (8) bursts in an Waterloo goalie, Dave Quarrie, despite warrior Ron Smith's lunge. Laurent was big gun Friday night in Varsity Arena, scoring four goals for Blues in convincing 9-5 victory over second-place Waterloo Warriors. See page 12.

Moncton raises fees; Students will strike

MONCTON (CUP) — The University of Moncton student body is going on strike today.

A Proposed tuition hike is the cause of the walkout. Eighty five per cent of the 1,100 students voted in a referendum Friday to leave classes to protest the fee rises.

Students leaders are asking for a freeze in tuition fees and want more scholarships and bursaries, higher government subsidies to universities and a government commitment to a gradual lowering of fees. They say they won't return to classes until their demands are met.

A strike committee has organised students for picket-line duty.

The strike vote followed approval by the board of governors of fee hikes ranging from $100 to $150 beginning in September. Moncton's fees now range between $430 and $495.

Student council representatives tried to dissuade the board from raising fees but the board said it had no financial alternative.

Moncton's fees are among the lowest in the province. But Student leaders point out that the Acadian French students at Moncton and its affiliated college at Bathurst come from the lowest income groups in New Brunswick.

A protest group of 800 Moncton students and another 350 from Bathurst are expected to petition the provincial government tomorrow.

Student councils at the University of New Brunswick and Mount Allison university have declared full support for striking students.

UNB students will join the Moncton student march to the legislature. Mount Allison students have also planned a one day class boycott for tomorrow.

The sane government policy responsible for tuition fee hikes has raised assistance fees at both Mount Allison and UNB.

Faulkner presents student views to Senate

By DAVE FRANK

Students Council President Tom Faulkner Friday night became the first student ever to address the University of Toronto Senate.

Faulkner led a delegation of five into a regular meeting of the university's supreme academic body to present the student viewpoint on proposed student representation on the Senate.

Last month SAC asked for and received an invitation to send representatives to an "open" meeting of the Senate to discuss this issue.

Faulkner stood on the deep blue carpet, between the two banks of seated senators. He apologized for wearing his blue serge RCAF cadet's uniform; he was going to the Tri-Service Ball at Hart House after the meeting.

He introduced the delegation, the first students ever to attend a Senate meeting — SAC Vice-President John Treleaven (SGS), university committee Chairman Steve Langdon (III Trin) and two Varsity reporters.

"The SAC's idea of an 'open' meeting," explained Faulkner, "involves the presence of as many observers as care to attend."

The presence of reporters, he noted, while "less than ideal," was an attempt to involve "fellow students in discussions of which they should be fully aware."

Both the composition of the delegation and the speech were endorsed by SAC Wednesday.

Wilkie quits SAC race

Late-comer candidate Peter Wilkie (III Trin) has dropped out of the Students Administrative Council Presidential contest.

"I made my decision rather suddenly," he explained last night. "After thinking it over this weekend, I decided to withdraw."

Wilkie admitted he had started without much knowledge of SAC. "After looking into it, I decided I wouldn't bother."

He now thinks the point of view he would have presented is probably covered by another candidate.

"Peter Szekely seems to be leaning in that direction in his campaign literature at least."

But Wilkie also pointed out that the issues were more clearly defined in December's Faulkner-Charlton contest.

"The interest and the turnout will be very much less this time," Wilkie said.

"But from the beginning I didn't expect to have much effect on the outcome."

Pretty Co-op chariot driver smiles with glee as her hardy Campus Co-op drivers (see leg in left hand corner) pull to victory in the Blue and White Winter Carnival Chariot Race. Eng. Sci. and Forestry took second and third. The woodchoppers then returned to cop laurels in the tug of war. Wycliffe College won the snow sculpture competition (division one); division two is scheduled for 'the next big snowfall.' The Powder Puff football game was cancelled but the Pancake Eat-out ate an schedule and a good time was had by all, including the harried B & W organizers. If at first you don't quite succeed . . .

STUDENTS & FACULTY

SAC Housing Questionnaire

The Students Administrative Council has drawn up a detailed questionnaire designed to find out such things as how much students are willing to pay for what type of accommodation, and how far from campus they want to live.

Letters were sent to 3,000 selected students, asking them to fill out a questionnaire in Convocation Hall this week. Students can fill out the form tomorrow to Friday from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. At least 1,500 replies are needed to make the survey a success.

SAC ELECTION RULES

Elections Officer Dave Hoffman (I New) has outlined the principal rules governing candidates in the current Students Administrative Council presidential campaign.

— SAC will pay the candidates' expenses up to $150 for both presidential and vice-presidential candidates. A president and vice-president team will receive $300.

— Candidates may not spend or have spent on their behalf more than $150. Goods and services received as contributions will be included at full value. The voluntary services of students shall not be included.

— Each candidate must make a $20 deposit. This will be refunded only if he polls one-third or more of the winning candidate's votes.

— Candidates must present an account of their expenditures within 72 hours of the close of elections.

Reporters, Senators listen to Faulkner speech

The Senate chamber is decorated in solid blue and yellow, with oak panelling on the walls. Electric chandeliers dangle from the high ceiling. If all of the 200 members had come, they would have needed a chamber twice as big.

The senators listened carefully as Faulkner spoke in resonant well-modulated tones.

He told them SAC welcomed their concern over involving students in the government of the University. A bill to seat seven students now is before the Senate.

But Faulkner warned against considering student representation "in isolation from the broad problems of the university". He asked the Senate to table the bill indefinitely.

Instead he called on the Senate to "redouble its efforts to promote a Presidential Committee to consider more general reforms."

Faulkner pointed out that the Senate itself suggested a similar committee in November 1967, and that "major change should be preceded by scholarly investigation and debate in the academic community."

This Macpherson-like study would seek to answer such general questions as the nature and purpose of the university and propose solutions in line with the findings.

But Faulkner made it clear that SAC's immediate disinterest in Senate seats was not a signal for a period of isolationism.

"We have sought and shall continue to seek membership on bodies such as the library council executive, the bookstore committee, and the Placement Service advisory committee.

"As a general rule membership on these bodies means power: that is, the ability to play a meaningful role."

The senators listened. There were several points in the speech where Faulkner raised his voice; there were several wry jokes.

But the senators didn't laugh, and few smiled. They listened silently, patiently, impassively.

Faulkner spoke for 15 minutes. He said he hoped for "free and frank" discussion when he finished.

Dr. Moffat Woodside, the Senate's chairman, called twice for comments and questions. A portly grey-haired gentleman rose from his seat.

"Mr. Faulkner has given a very able presentation of a point of view," he said, "I think we should thank him."

There was the barest ripple of a consensus among the senators. Then he crossed the carpet again, smiling, leaving behind printed copies of his speech.

When the oak doors closed Faulkner was laughing. Treleven was grinning broadly. Langdon was half-puzzled, half chagrined.

"We can't go on writing things like this forever," said Faulkner. "This must say something about the effect of the lecture system on people."

"In the end we're still students and they're still faculty and administration."

Residence deans discuss housing report

By DAVE FRANK

The campus deans of residence were confronted Thursday with the Students Administrative Council housing report.

"Many students simply can't afford the kind of residences the university is supplying," declared Ed Clark (III UC), architect of the report.

The brief recommends cutting residence fees by eliminating "luxury services" such as maids, dons and food caterers in at least half the residences on campus.

Wednesday night the Students Administrative Council adopted the report and launched a feasibility study on whether the council should move into the housing field, as is recommended in the report.

Clark had to field questions from several of the dozen deans questioning the relevance and accuracy of the data. One dean criticized the report for "apples and oranges comparisons."

"If I were marking this study," said David Staeger, New College dean of students, "I would not give it a passing grade."

"I'm not used to failing anything," retorted Clarke.

"I can afford to live in residence, and I like it," he continued. "But there are 6,000 other students who do not live in residences. The reason most of them don't is because of the cost."

The figure of $14,100, cited by the report as the average family income of students in residences, was vigorously attacked.

But after the opening confrontations, the deans welcomed SAC's interest in residence problems and urged greater co-operation in future.

The deans were cautious about cutting out "luxury services" and making them "just like co-ops."

Clark argued for such low-cost service, pointing out that students at Taylor House in the Sir Daniel Wilson residence have voted overwhelmingly to experiment with such a system next year.

Clark maintained that many students go to co-ops because they can save $200 by doing so.

There was a lock of agreement over the type of housing students really want.

Students in residences run by the University of Toronto face a $188 fee hike this fall unless the university or provincial government comes up with a subsidy.

Clark's report suggests that this burden be borne by students in all residences. This would cut the hike to $76 a student.

Train times have been changed for the Blue and White Quebec Winter Carnival excursion. The train will leave Toronto, Wednesday, Feb. 21, at 11:55 p.m. and will leave Quebec, Saturday at 5 p.m. There is a four-hour stopover in Montreal each way. Tickets go on sale today Memo: to Peter Worthington.

Re: Great series Pete. Screwed those peace types good, the dirty Commies. But Pete, why did you have to go and say you're opposed to the Vietnam war too? That nearly spoiled the whole thing. Good thing most readers won't think about your series and see that. I'll show you what I mean.

Those peaceniks can easily accuse you of being naive and maybe even immoral on the basis of the articles you wrote.

The way you constructed your argument was fine, Pete, but after all it was pretty thin. You take a guy's statement and then follow through with: I don't really want to say Mr. so and so is a Communist but here, look at what Lenin once said, and he was a Communist.

See, that doesn't prove anything. Anybody can come along and take statements out of your article and call you names by comparing them with something that Hitler said, or Mao Tse-tung, or Castro. Probably even Confucius, or Thomas Aquinas or Claude Bissell. See, it doesn't mean a thing.

So, what you have to do — and you did this better than anyone I can remember—what you have to do is score the people reading your stuff. Call everyone in sight a Communist or at least a dangerous subversive planning ways to overthrow our society. Remember people have a high prejudice level. You throw things at them with twisted facts, or only half the facts, or you juxtapose charges that don't have any relation, or you draw suspicion on something that people don't know much about, and they'll put your charges into their prejudice.

See, in a series like you wrote, it doesn't matter so much what you prove that counts: it's what the reader wants to believe, that's important. When you figure out what he's ready to believe, then you can tell him anything and he'll take it as truth. Best explanation of that I ever saw was in Hitler's Mein Kampf — that man knew how to convince people.

But to do it well you have to keep up the pressure all the way through. And that means not admitting that you're opposed to the war yourself. That kind of thing might make the reader think that people opposed to the war have something to say. Oh God, Pete what if they get hold of some of the peacenik literature, not the Trot or Commie stuff, but the literature by the undogmatic left. Remember that's pretty powerful stuff.

You probably saw that not all the peace movement types are the same. (It's good that you called them all Communist or something equally as bad. No use in making differences here). See, these guys can then turn around and call you naive.

Let me explain that. These peace types have been protesting for years — I can't remember did you oppose the war back then? Anyway, they did and sometime last year came to what they call a "loss of innocence." Their marches and protests didn't have any effect.

See, now it turns out that what they've been saying about the war was right all along. Except, nobody in power listened to them — most of them still aren't. So, what did the peace types do? Well, they said that arguing logically about the war doesn't do any good, so there must be something wrong with society as a whole. LBJ doesn't kill people in Vietnam because he's a murderer or anything like that. Society is doing it.

See when you have good arguments and they don't do any good, it's really easy to say that reason in human affairs is a myth. Wars, especially, aren't run by reason. So you can't oppose them with reason. You have to analyze society and see what it is that causes these wars and then propose solutions.

There are the timeless solutions that the Trots and the Communists use and then there are the solutions of groups like SUPA and the New Left (that's the traditional New Left). Luckily the whole movement is getting more violent these days, so we can easily yell Communist and get people to believe us.

But since you didn't see that the war is produced by faults in our society — they might say — they can accuse you of being just an innocent babe in the woods with no analysis but lots of prejudice.

Anyway, these are just a few things to keep in mind when you go to speak at U of T Tuesday. Just some charges to be prepared for — if they bother with you that is. Intellectuals bug me. They think too much.

LETTERS

the szekely pamphlet

Sir:

This letter is in answer to statements by one of the SAC presidential candidates that misrepresent the facts.

In Mr. Szekely's pamphlet, under the heading "What has Peter Szekely Done?", he claims that he:

— "serves currently on the SAC Committee to draft a response to the Macpherson Report" and — "participated enthusiastically in the High School Visits Program of the SAC".

1) The SAC committee re the Macpherson Report has never met and has not even as yet been constituted. Mr. Szekely's sole service was in submitting his name for consideration a week before the campaign began.

Nor has he attended any of the open meetings of the SAC Education Commission at which the Macpherson Report has been discussed. All Education Commission meetings are advertised.

2) Further, Mr. Szekely has been on no High School visits and has not attended a meeting of that committee since November. Miss Georgina Solymar, High School Visits chairman does not define this participation as "enthusiastic".

Especially in light of another "mistake" on the same page of the pamphlet (a printing error that claims Mr. Szekely negotiated a loan of $5000 rather $500 in equipment for the U.C. festival), Miss Solymar feels as I do that is the most blatant % of misrepresentation.

Bob Bossin,
SAC Education Commissioner

outstanding service, and should like this to be known at a time when the Health Service is being criticized.

thanks, prof

Dear Sir,

While the criticism levelled at the lack of communication between professors and students is largely justified, a recent exception should be noted. Last Thursday Professor Ramsay Cook of the History Department conducted a "bull-session" with about twenty of his second year Canadian history students who simply wanted to talk with their prof. in a more human and informal environment than the normal lecture hall. While car pools waited and trains pulled out they spent two and a half hours discussing various issues not directly linked with the course, but which nevertheless proved most interesting and informative.

We would like to take this opportunity to thank Professor Cook publicly for his willing co-operation. Would that he were the rule rather than its exception!

no, mr. curley

Sir:

May we express our sympathies for Mr. Curley and his tender nose (Letters Feb. 9). He must be lonely indeed, feeling as he does that so many of his peers stink. (We cannot imagine a room which is cleaned daily stinking so we assume that Mr. Curley meant that students stink).

Despite his obvious dementia, we feel we must reply to the assertions cast upon students who live in co-ops, a group which he accuses of "casual and slap-happy sanitation practices".

Our houses, though odd, are not the "pig sties" which he claims will result where maid service is lacking. Once a week the residents of each house undertake a systematic cleaning of all common areas and private rooms. During the week the kitchens and dining unit are cleaned daily. We regulate our own affairs with neither help nor interference from Dons. Despite this anarchy neither bulimic plague nor rowdiness (sin of sins) has befallen us, and our rooms do not stink. Our residents for the most part react well to the increased responsibility entailed by co-operative living. Those who do not are not given the opportunity to return the following year.

This mature attitude plus a willingness on the part of each member to contribute three hours of their time per week allows us to exist quite nicely without what Mr. Curley feels are necessities of life i.e. maids and Dons. We also don't have to pay for them. Consequently, while the cost of university administered residences rose approximately one hundred and fifty dollars over the last three years, fees at Campus Co-op rose less than fifty.

Consider the inequity of the situation: Mr. Curly who has his bed made, his floor swept, and a Don to tell the bad boys to "Kool it" may claim over eight hundred dollars on his P.O.S.A.P. application while co-ops claim only six hundred and ten. With limited funds available from the government how can this difference be justified? It obviously cannot by calling maids and Dons necessities.

Local boy stays in school (and makes good)

By KASPARS DZEGUZE

Joe Mendelson: blues musician, belt maker, window trimmer, display man, junk collector, clothes designer, guitar teacher, antique dealer, photographer, decorator, B.A.

The B.A. is from Toronto, 1966. For him it is last and least. It is irrelevant. What he is, what he does, he feels has nothing to do with what he learned at university. He has learned only "to play games by rules."

"In my first two years at U of T I wrote essays based on my own thinking. The result was generally a D. By third year, I decided to tell the marker what he wanted to be told: I got A's."

Mendelson was steered into university by parents who looked upon a degree as the first step to success. "They wanted happiness for me, but they wanted it in their terms". Joe felt neither pleasure nor pain in first year. He was engrossed in football and paid little attention to school work. The next two years of his undergraduate life were a torture.

JOE MENDELSON, B.A.

RESPECT FOR PROFESSORS

"I could not feel any respect for my professors (except Helmstadter in History and Van Stone in Anthropology). They kept talking down to their classes. They wanted to be scholars and were afraid that, if they talked the same language as the students, they wouldn't be."

One serious problem with university learning is that it does not leave room for creativity, Mendelson found. The only professors who desired creativity in their students were also the ones who would have anyone bothering to do independent work for them.

But Joe doesn't think that the Arts faculty has anything to do with learning anyway. "It is a social thing. You go to learn the rules because you want to make it in society: you play each game by its own rules. Any imbecile who follows the rules and refrains from thinking for himself can get a B.A."

He feels that the university is askew because the faculty as yet refuses to recognize that learning is no longer the reason for going to university, at least not in undergraduate circles. "University is a general remedy for youth. When you come out, anything at all can be done with you because it is pretty well known how you will react."

NOSE TO THE WHEEL

Indeed, Joe believes that university has its reputation with employers not because the degree means that its holder is an intelligent being, but because it in effect certifies that this person will do what he is told, that he will keep his nose to the wheel, that he will kill himself trying to get ahead in the mold that has been set before him.

All his development occurred outside school, Joe claims. "I would have saved time and money if I had travelled, gone to Europe and slept with fifty million women" The main thing he got from university was a look at what goes on inside. "I met people who were tied up in knots, parasites, pseudo-intellectuals, and, mainly, phonies. I have no respect for intelligence if there is nothing behind it, and I can't tolerate people who talk and do nothing".

SOCIAL CERTIFICATION

"Sure, I was a misfit, but don't think I'm crying the blues. I'm doing exactly what I want, when I want, something few people who go through university ever do. And I'm making a living doing it."

"University is social certification. It is like the 'Canada Approved' seal on a slab of beef. Of course there can be more to university than this; you get out of it exactly what you put into it. I put nothing into it and got a piece of paper in return".

"Success for me is not a better job or a higher post. It's an internal thing, satisfying your self-respect, and becoming proficient at what you like to do. If I were simply interested in making money, I'd drop most of the things I am doing today".

Presently Mendelson makes most of his money making belts and from designing and executing windows for some of Toronto's best tailors, under the tutelage of Harvey Aslin. He and Harvey are responsible for the windows of Mr. Casual, Lou Myles, and the House of Mann. Mr. Casual is presently selling suede jeans and trench coats designed by Joe, as well as belts of his design and manufacture.

tiny mind strikes back

Sir:

If you wish, you may caption this letter: TINY-MIND STRIKES BACK, but allow me one last word.

The Textbook Store is not primarily a browsing bookstore, but we are pleased when a student is sufficiently curious and interested to browse.

On the other hand, the University bookroom, whose function it is to complement the basic service offered by the Textbook Store, is a browsing bookstore par excellence. It offers a much finer selection of reference books, course-oriented paperbacks, and books, in general, than is to be found on any other Canadian Campus. (See also S.A.C. Services Commission Report). And because it is a browsing bookstore, Anatomy of Criticism is to be found in the subject classification labeled: Literary Criticism.

The shortage of space on the St. George Campus has necessitated the artificial division of the two stores but a recommendation has been made by us to the University that as soon as possible textbooks and general books be brought together again, in a suitable location and with adequate space.

degree carrying jackasses

"You know, Mike," a friend said in the JCR yesterday, "I think that you and I belong to the 'great souls.' The rest of these people here are just robots. Some are little better than animals."

In the three years I've been at U of T I've heard that kind of remark from about a hundred people.

Edgar Friendenburg, speaking at Babel last month said: "The real source of antagonism to student radicals in the United States is not the middle class, but the lower class. What you might call the lumpenproletariat." Prolonged, stormy applause.

A group of Varsity writers were sitting in a restaurant in Kitchener this fall, and one of them began chewing out the waitress. She had mixed up his order. I was sitting at the other end of the table and when I got around to asking him why he had been so hard on her, he snarled that was the only way you could treat people like her. The others agreed, telling stories of shop clerks who had given them the wrong change, TTC busmen who were discourteous, etc.

When the engineering faculty got its lumps last year for messing up the subway system all afternoon, there was a great deal of controversy over both the incident and the subsequent fine imposed. Most people seemed surprised and indignant to find that anyone would question the right of university students to run amok like British noblemen riding to hounds.

A friend of mine in charge of hiring teachers shook his head sadly and told me recently: "I get more and more little girls fresh out of college with a general degree coming to me for interviews. None of them want to teach; they all feel they should be supervisors or superintendents."

Every student group, whatever its political leaning, begins its manifesto by saying: "We university students, the leaders of tomorrow ..."

Well, it's a damned good thing that we're not the leaders of tomorrow. Scratch any university student and you'll find a fascist; some you don't even have to scratch.

Somewhere the idea has gained currency that if you spend four years writing essays and such you become a paragon of wisdom, and it's only society's short sightedness and envy that prevents it from throwing itself at your feet.

(Babel: Society as Madness and Myth. Society is mad, say all the profs, apparently because it's not being run the way the academics like it).

Consider this: not much you learn here is particularly valuable, and you certainly can't get wisdom by osmosis, so how does going to university make you a better person, one who is entitled to special privileges? Honesty and a common sort of decency are all that count in this life, and we students don't have any monopoly on these virtues.

The next time you watch a work crew of "common labourers" and they seem to be indolent and apathetic, remember: They may hate their jobs as much as you would if you had to do them. Can anyone really be happy as a waitress or street-cleaner, the way capitalists say you have to be to get ahead in the world and earn your medicare?

A jackass who gets a B.A. is a jackass with a B.A.

—MIKE KESTERTON

GLEN BROWNLEE

"MORAL ISSUES: In the last presidential election for this body one question which was commonly asked was "Should SAC make "moral" decisions?"

The question brings up the whole realm of what exactly is a "moral" decision, and more important what about the rights of minorities?

The nature and extent of such decisions rests with the individual SAC representatives. If these representatives are deemed unrepresentative by the constituency then a great deal of the blame for this falls upon the constituents themselves who if they deem the situation dangerous enough can recall their representative.

THE POSITION OF THE PRESIDENT: I firmly believe that it is the position of the President to actively lead this body in policy derivation and decision making. It is my opinion that the SAC has come dangerously close to allowing internal upheaval this year principally because the vocal minorities on the campus were not taken seriously enough in the decision making process.

The President must deem the solidarity of the SAC as the issue of prime importance when it is quite obvious that a clear and present danger exists to the solidarity of this body, no matter how important the issue at present may be.

EDUCATION AND UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT: The system at this university at present is in many aspects in need of change, I think we all realize this. Problem oriented teaching and other types must be extensively investigated by the SAC.

Course Evaluations, the encouragement of Course Unions and the encouragement of Student Representation on Faculty Councils are fields which the SAC has gone into and yet are fields where so much more has yet to be accomplished.

The SAC could act as much more of a catalyst to bring College Councils into education. Local councils could be valuable assets not only to the students on Faculty Councils, but also the Course Unions and the Education Commission of the SAC.

The CUS does much educational research and is certainly worth 75 cents/student/year. Thus recommendations of the SAC in the realm of academic reform will in essence imply a meaningful role for the SAC in the establishment of a true Community of Scholars.

A committee will I believe be set up by Dr. Bissell upon his return to the University to establish effective proposals for the internal restructuring of this University. If this is to be a community of scholars the scholars should essentially govern the university. Since students are part of this community we should share in this.

function; however, remembering that we are nearer the bottom of the hierarchy based upon scholarly attributes.

THE PLACEMENT SERVICE: Students have a right to be represented on the placement service. I would fully concur with the present SAC method for assigning student representation on this body. What I did not agree with however was the SAC policy (which has since been reversed) to "specifically instruct" the students on this voting body on how to vote. It may be recommended to these students by the SAC on how to vote; however, when the vote is cast the decision remains with him.

THE BOOKSTORE: If we are responsible students we must at the same time be responsible citizens in society and subject to the laws of the land in the same manner as a person of the same age not within the university. This shall be my guiding belief in any dealings with the University Caput.

ACCESSIBILITY: It is essential that we remain at the present a part of the CUS and fully back them in their political pressuring to bring about eventually the policy of Universal accessibility.

MANPOWER COMMITTEE: Hard working, perhaps non-politically minded recruits will be needed by the SAC for long-range projects. This SAC Committee should keep in constant contact with the student councils on campus and solicit the names of those interested in specific projects. This will help to a significant degree to combat the non-involvement barrier of the student body with the SAC.

POSAP: We must also continue our support of the OUS in its dealings with Queen's Park on our behalf for more student aid and fairer student aid.

FURNITURE CO-OP and WAREHOUSE: The SAC will establish a non-profit furniture co-op to alleviate this harassing problem faced by students. The problem of what to do with furniture in the summer months and where to buy cheap furniture are very aggravating as I believe many of you at the present realize.

SERVICES COMMITTEE: This SAC Committee shall be responsible for establishing an Information Bureau to be established within the Campus Centre. Information on essay typing, housing and even babysitting could be handled by such a bureau.

HOUSING: It is needless to say that the SAC has done a remarkable job in this field. Mr. Ed. Clark's report is most extensive and most promising. All I can say is that every effort on my part would be given to the SAC's fight against expensive and inadequate housing.

STUDENTS MUST HAVE AN A.T.L. CARD IN ORDER TO VOTE

PRESIDENT

PETER SZEKELY

We believe SAC goals should be student goals. A student government can only claim legitimacy if that is the case.

We believe our work on SAC this year and our backgrounds in arts and professional faculties can help us greatly if elected.

The social purpose of the university is essentially education, freeing the unique capabilities of each individual, making of each student a skeptical, self-motivated citizen with certain acquired knowledge and abilities. The quality of this education at the University of Toronto is the major issue in this election. The need for great improvement has been documented by the Macpherson Committee in Arts and Science; the need for reform is as real in the professional faculties.

We believe the building of course unions and the encouragement of educational activity and evaluation by the Professional Student Societies is a first priority in improving education. In co-ordination with the SAC Education Commission these groups can seek more student-oriented teaching in their respective areas.

We will establish SAC experimental counter - courses in any event to seek better, more satisfying learning situations for the student. The SAC-run Tartu College will provide another chance of experimenting with different educational methods.

Some weekends this campus is so dead, it resembles the rest of Ontario. SAC Dances, film festivals, plays, speakers, car rallies, happenings, etc. should be sponsored and co-ordinated with college and faculty affairs to provide a fully-integrated social program all the time.

SAC goals should be student goals. SAC Commissions should increasingly be made up of non-SAC members; student conferences and open forums should be held on controversial questions which come up during the year; and regular questionnaires should be used to facilitate student communication, especially with non-residents.

Since the Varsity only prints really newsworthy items, justifiably, SAC should probably issue more extensive background papers on various topics during the year and circulate them to the student body.

Finally, the democratic basis of SAC's authority should be recognized by permitting 2,000 students to sign a petition and thereby obtain a referendum on any motion passed or defeated by the Council.

The SAC should provide a service for students to advise and aid those caught up in the bureaucratic tangle, those unsure about dropping out, those with real course problems or those for whom the stresses of university seem temporarily too great.

Educational opportunities depend to a large extent on environmental conditions; the SAC must improve these as well. The accommodation projects suggested by the Administration, such as Innis College, are in limbo. SAC is building Tartu College; this, however, must only be a start.

We must apply the lessons learned from Tartu to building residences to meet the housing demand; it can be done. Further services, such as a furniture co-op should also be provided to improve individual accommodation.

Bookstore: our suggestions are not unreasonable; a 10 per cent discount on books is less than that currently granted at the University of Waterloo. In fact, the Bookstore met SAC demands earlier this year, and then cancelled their agreement. We seek only the renewal of that original agreement. If, however, this cannot be obtained, we believe the time has come to establish a co-op bookstore on this campus.

Lower prices for all students will be the result.

LIBRARY: further action is still necessary to gain full access for all undergraduates to the main stacks. Action must also be taken to see that the SAC is involved in discussions for the new campus library planned for Harbord and St. George.

ENVIRONMENT: the parking problem on campus is going to get even worse, unless long term planning begins now to solve it. While projected plans for the south campus include several cafeterias, further action may also be necessary here to provide decent meals on campus.

We will continue to aid social action projects such as the Summer Education Program, high school visitations and the Canadian Indian Youth Council Program. Social action should not, however, mean the passing of meaningless resolutions on national and international matters.

The idea that SAC goals must be student goals, must also apply to the university government question. As President and Vice-President we shall seek significant student participation under open conditions in order to achieve the wider student goals of educational reform and environmental improvement.

This then is our program: with the teamwork of a professional and an arts student can come, we believe, wide campus support for SAC and its goals. With our experience as members of the SAC this year, can come a better idea of how the Council works, the set-up of the bureaucracy, and the way to get things done.

And with the support of the student body, can come a real push to make life better for the students of the University of Toronto. This is our commitment; on the basis of our program, we seek your support.

made above is not an ideological split between the Left and Right, but simply a choice between the irresponsible and the responsible, the sensational and the pragmatic.

I have made my choice; and I believe that most of this campus feels, as I do, that the SAC will relate to the vast majority of students only when it concerns itself less with draft dodgers and war materials and more with improving the quality of education and developing student services.

Certain as I am that the SAC has wasted much of its energy this year, I remain convinced that student government, properly led, can make great progress in the areas that count.

If I am elected, here are some of the areas in which I will act:

COURSE REFORM: I will appoint a SAC COURSE UNION CO-ORDINATOR who will help set up course unions in each subject taught at the university. The Co-ordinator will encourage these unions, once established, towards thorough analysis leading to reform of the present courses, and will bring the full resources of the SAC to bear on implementing any valid recommendations of the course unions.

COURSE CRITIQUES: I will insist upon close co-operation between the editors of next year's Course Critique and the Course Union Co-ordinator, so that the Critique will be useful and not just $15,000 down the drain.

REFERENDUMS: The SAC Constitution should be amended to allow a campus-wide referendum if TWO-THIRDS of the Council Members so desire. The Dow issue should not have led to a presidential election but a referendum.

SAC PRESS LIAISON: I will appoint the Communications Commissioner as the SAC's Press Liaison. Each issue of the Varsity next year should contain a small section where SAC progress and programs can be publicized.

MACPHERSON REPORT: Continuing analysis of the recommendations of the MacPherson Report should be added to the responsibilities of the Education Commission of the SAC. The Commission will direct SAC initiative towards implementation of this Report.

STUDENT HOUSING: Government is willing to finance 90 per cent of the cost of any student housing project. Let us use the experience gained from the Tartu College experiment to fully exploit this willingness.

CUS MEMBERSHIP: The University of Toronto should strongly support the Canadian Union of Students (and OUS) only if it concerns itself with legitimate student interests, and I will forcefully advance this position at the next CUS Conference and Seminar.

SUBSIDIES FOR CAMPUS CLUBS: A separate section of the budget should be set up, to be used for subsidies to campus clubs. Active participation while at the University should be encouraged.

STUDENT - RUN BOOKSTORE: I will go through with plans to set up a SAC-sponsored bookstore if continued negotiation with the University Bookstore proves fruitless.

BLUE AND WHITE SOCIETY: The University should also be a centre for recreation and culture. If its programs are imaginatively conceived and efficiently produced, the Blue and White Society should have strong backing from the SAC.

EATING ON CAMPUS: I will press for low-cost eating facilities around campus, particularly in Sidney Smith Hall and the old bookstore.

RADIO VARSITY: Radio is a direct medium with exciting possibilities. But Radio Varsity cannot fulfill its potential until its broadcasts reach a larger percentage of students. The SAC should support Radio Varsity's expansion plans, including service to Scarborough and Erindale.

DEALING WITH THE ADMINISTRATION: I believe that students and university administrators share a common interest in working together to foster the welfare of the University. While I will firmly advance the student's position, I will avoid the paranoid suspicion which has tended to color recent SAC thinking.

Any student leader who seeks to commandeer the SAC in pursuit of a single social purpose should be at the head of a demonstration, not at the head of the SAC.

During this campaign, I have made no secret of where I stand. My ideology, my programs, and my desire to be of service, are all placed openly before you. It is on this basis that I ask for your support.

I am running for President of the SAC because I believe that student government on campus needs a new direction.

For though we may all agree that many SAC programs are excellent, we should realize that they need constant effort and attention. This year we have seen them overshadowed, neglected, and their progress retarded, while the SAC insisted on pursuing sensational issues.

For what is the purpose of the SAC? Is it to prescribe an Official Morality for U of T students? Or, is it to serve the students, designing and carrying out programs which meet their real needs.

In this light, the distinction

NORM SCHACHAR

By ANNE BOODY
Norman Schachar (II Meds) wasted no time in starting his campaign for the vice-presidency of the SAC.

The ballots for president and vice-president will be separate and this worries Schachar. "I only hope people realize I'm running on the same ticket as Steve Langdon."

Schachar and Langdon think they make a good team, representing both arts and professional faculties. "We're out to show both that SAC is relevant to them, not how it could be relevant to them," commented Schachar.

Schachar lives in New College residence, but he is against the building of additional residences where the costs can be as high as $12,000 a bed. "We need housing like Tartu College, which costs $4,500 a bed," he said.

As a member of the Medical Society and a SAC representative, Schachar has had experience with students and administrative problems. Last summer he was sent as a representative to the Canadian Union of Students seminar in Vancouver.

"I went to the seminar a staid young man and came back wearing beads. They taught me a lot, especially the importance of having a human element in student government."

"Many students shy away from SAC because of its highly political nature. I'll do my best to encourage students to come and work for SAC even if they don't know exactly what they want to do. SAC can always use manpower and it is a way of getting students involved in their government."

To Schachar one of the central issues of the election is the problem of education. Though there have been course evaluations undertaken in arts subjects, he feels it's time for an evaluation of the professional courses.

One of the possible solutions to the education problem is the formation of alternative courses to be offered by SAC.

Though no credits would be given to students attending these supplementary courses, it would be a step forward in determining a solution to the problem of education.

"I'm firmly a man of compromise," he says. "I don't agree with those who say we have to bite the hand that feels us."

Frontier College--education in the rough

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Bill Jordan (III SMC) sent last summer worrying with alcoholics, illiterates and ex-convicts at a rail camp in northern Quebec. And he enjoyed it.

He was a "laborer teacher" at Frontier College, a Toronto-based adult education centre that recruits and sends out students to work and teach during the summer at rail camps, mines, and lumber and construction camps in northern Canada. The college can grant certificates up to Grade 11.

A "laborer-teacher" works and gets paid just like the other workers during company time. But after-hours he teaches any who are interested. Frontier College supplies the books, magazines and films.

CLASSROOM IN BOXCAR

"My classroom was a boxcar," said Jordan. "It took me weeks just to wrangle that boxcar out of the railroad company. You're on your own out there."

One of the men Jordan taught was Hugh Jobbes, a 64-years old Cape Bretoner with a Grade 3 education who had worked on the gang for 22 years.

"I've never seen anybody work so hard in my life as Hugh," Jordan said. "He earns $167 an hour—and supports four kids at his home in Bras D'Or."

"One day he got news from home that his house had burned to the ground. He lost his home, furniture and all the clothes that weren't on his back. But he did not lose a half hour of work over it."

"We helped him reconstruct his home at the end of the summer," Jordan said proudly.

One Saturday night at the camp, Jordan planned a party. He had set up several committees of workers to organize it, but when the time came, could find no place to hold it. Jobbes solved the problem. He broke into a disused conductor's house.

"It was a Centennial party," said Jordan. We showed National Film Board movies and sang 'O Canada' in French.

Frontier College instructor Michael Denker with Eskimo students in Frabisher Bay.

"You talk about separatism in Quebec—I've never seen as much cooperation as on the gang this summer."

The food at the camp ranges from fair to foul. Jordan described meals where you had to "look at your food before you ate it to pick out the maggots."

Personal hygiene was another problem, said Jordan. "There was one worker who didn't wash all summer. The company gave him a full day off to wash. He didn't and they fired him."

INVALUABLE EXPERIENCE

Despite the obvious hazards of a job with Frontier College, most laborer-teachers feel the experience is invaluable.

"Anybody who goes out there for the money is crazy," said Bob Cherniak (III Eng).

John Henderson (III Knox) stressed the importance of friendship at the camps. At night he went out to the pub with his co-workers and on weekends he took them fishing.

Frontier College is holding a recruiting meeting 1 p.m. Wednesday in the Hart House Music Room. It is open to all students interested in being a laborer-teacher this summer.

"Before you leave you are given a grounding in handling illiteracy, VD, and alcoholism," said Jordan. "You are on your own once you leave Toronto."

Charniak agreed: "There's a common saying at Frontier College — 'We're right behind you . . . a thousand miles behind you."

Gymnasts fail to groove real cool meet

By JIM MEAT

The Varsity gymnastics squad tuned up for next week's OQAA championships with an impressive victory over MacMaster in an exhibition show held Saturday afternoon at Hart House.

Unfortunately for both gymnasts and spectators, the temperature in the gym was a cool, crisp fifty-five degrees and only meet coordinator Tom Watt, used to the rigours of Varsity Arena in his more familiar role as hockey coach, appeared at all comfortable. The cold however, was more than uncomfortable—it was dangerous. The gymnasts couldn't get a grip or bounce on the cold, hard floor and several sustained minor injuries, while at least two competitors came off the high bar in the middle of their routines because it was too slippery.

Varsity gymnasts dominated most events with Dave Stein taking fourth place. Copeland also finished in a Copeland and John Kortwright finishing first and second respectively in the all-round competition. A first place finish by Carl Sloane and a third place tie for Jamie Archibald and Copeland in the opening free exercises event got Toronto off to a strong start and they never looked back.

Brian McVey and Copeland finished one-two on the parallel bars, then reversed the order in the side horse competition with Arthur first place tie with Toronto's Phil Michaelif for vaulting honours and was third on the horizontal bar. A second place showing by Mauro Di Pasquale on rings and a first place performance for John Kortwright on the horizontal bar rounded out the strong Varsity team effort.

It appears that the gymnasts are more than set to give favoured Université de Montréal a real battle for top honours in next Saturday's showdown.

H<sub>2</sub>O Blues thrash U.S. Aquatic Club 63-33

By DAVE POWELL

The University of Toronto swimming team finished their regular season in fine style by defeating the University Settlement Aquatic Club in an exhibition meet Saturday night. Even though strengthened by the addition of several swimmers from the Etobicoke club, USAC still managed to compile only a score of 33 points to Varsity's total of 63.

Blues' rookie sensation Terry Bryon again was their outstanding performer with victories in the 500 and 1000 yard freestyle and the 200 yard butterfly. Toronto's great veteran, Gaye Stratten, won the 200 yard individual medley, and the 200 backstroke, both by wide margins over his opponents. Alac Pyle and Chris Fisher finished one-two in the 50 free and Theo van Ryn took the 160 free in a close finish over USAC's Lance Peto.

Peto was a big gun for USAC, with a narrow victory over Blues' Robin Campbell in the 200 freestyle to go with his second in the 100. Glen McClochlin also had a big night, as he beat Varsity's Morris Vaillencourt in the 200 breaststroke, and placed second in the 200 medley.

Blues won both relays. The team of Stratten, Bob Heatley, Paul Fisher, and van Ryn took the 400 medley, while Chris Fisher, Pyle, Campbell, and van Ryn, again, combined for a victory in the 400 freestyle.

Toronto now concentrates on the OQAA championships to be held in London in two weeks. Blues hope to qualify at least eight men for the Canadian Intercollegiate finals, two weeks later, which means that they will have to get great performances from the whole team at Western. This will require the swimmers to reach a peak in two weeks, and then hold it for another two until the Intercollegiate; a very difficult task.

PAUL LAURENT SPARKS BIG WIN

By PHIL BINGLEY

The bands played on, the fans roared, Paul Laurent was a hero and Varsity Blues virtually clinched first place in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League for the fifth straight season.

That was the happy scene for Toronto supporters as Laurent scored four goals and set up another to lead Blues past Waterloo Warriors 9-5. The game was played among the strains of the LGMB and the Waterloo Engineering Band as 4800 noisy Varsity and Waterloo partisans looked on. Victory, Varsity's eleventh of the season, gave Blues a three point lead over second-place Waterloo with each team having four games left to play.

Waterloo was never in the game after Gord Cunningham's high backhander banked in off the goalpost to give Blues a 1-0 lead at the forty-five second mark of the first period with Warriors playing a man short. Blues turned in their best period of home hockey this season as they skated circles around their opponents and consistently beat them to the puck. At one point in the first twenty minutes they held a 17-2 margin in shots on goal.

Probably the biggest goal of the night came with twelve minutes gone in the first frame. Warriors had cut Blues lead to 3-1 and were applying the pressure on a powerplay when Murray Stroud stole the puck in the Waterloo zone and fired a quick wrist shot past surprised Dave Quarrie. The score appeared to crumble the Warrior attack and Blues went on to take a 6-1 lead into the first intermission.

Warriors rallied in the latter stages of the second period and the early part of the third, scoring four consecutive goals. However, Blues had the game won and seemed to sag a little as the pressure was off both teams.

The game was especially satisfying for Varsity's threesome of Laurent, Cunningham and Ward Passi. Cunningham added two goals and a pair of assists to Laurent's effort, and Passi set up three markers.

John Wrigley came up with another fine effort in goal for Blues despite a second-period injury sustained when he was accidentally bowled over in his crease by Warrior's Orest Romashyna. "After Romashyna hit me," Wrigley explained later, "I couldn't see properly out of my left eye. The vision was blurred and I had trouble with a couple of long shots. The eye was all right in the last period but I have a beautiful headache right now."

Although the game didn't erupt into a full-scale battle, there were several do-si-do and smash your partner sessions. During one particular episode, a Waterloo fan reached over the boards and hit Doug Jones in the face and then attempted to kick him. Jones, who played a strong game and set up three goals from his blue-line post, invited the clown out for a post-game coke but the tipsy fellow rejected the offer on the grounds that he didn't drink.

Blues' Coach Tom Watt commented after the game, "We really had them going in the first period but we let down a little and they hurt us. At least now we know we'll be playing a good hockey team come playoff time". If Warriors can come up with stronger goaltending, they might make things tougher in the finals. Netminder Quarrie has not been impressive lately and Friday night his inability to cut down the angle (probably the most basic move a goalie must learn) cost his team dearly.

Blues played the game without high-scoring Bob McClelland who was forced to sit out with a bad case of the flu.

Brian St. John and Brian Jones had Varsity's other goals while Terry Cooke with two, Bob Murdoch, on a pretty solo effort, Stu Eccles and Ron Smith countered for Warriors.

AROUND THE NET . . . PAUL LAURENT, JOHN WRIGLEY and BOB MURDOCH were chosen as the three stars . . .

Blues' veteran leftwinger Ward Passi and Waterloo defenseman Bob Murdoch chase an inviting rebound in front of Warrior goaltender Dave Quarrie. Waterloo captain Ron Smith ( ) gets set to cover up possible deflection.

Flashy five finesse foes for faithful fans

By JIM MORRISON

"We're number one" thundered the myriad Lutheran fans after Saturday night's contest in Hart House. Their Golden Hawks had just defeated Varsity Blues 84-73 in exhibition to run their record against Canadian teams to 15-2.

The fans' confidence seems justified — Hawks are a good team and appear a sure bet to make the national championships in March. Their five starters (who played the entire game) are the best single unit around, with size, speed, and finesse going for them.

Blues, nevertheless, were right in the game until the final five minutes. The first half ended with the score 43 apiece, and the play reflected the score. Varsity's shooting was accurate, and John Hadden put in a fine individual effort, collecting 13 points and ten rebounds.

The teams exchanged baskets for most of the second half. But with five minutes to play and the score 68-65 for Waterloo the timing clock stopped, and so, it seemed, did Blues. Varsity shot miserably, and they were unable to get the rebounds for that second try. Hawks, led by guard Sandy Nixon, forced the play at Blues' end and upped their margin to the final eleven points.

Forward Pete Misikowetz was the game's high scorer with 20 points, followed by Nixon with 19, Dave Baird with 18, Norm Cuttiford with 14, and Bob Bain with 13.

High man for Blues was Bruce Dempster with 18 points. John Hadden finished the game with 15 points, and Arvo Neidre had 13.

And now a complaint. If Hawks are the most talented team in the area, they are also the chippiest. Coach Howard Lockhart seems to have schooled his players in all the fine arts of elbowing, tripping, and shoving. Guard Bob Bain, in particular, appears to enjoy his role as team hatchet man. Saturday night the aggressive tactics worked, and Blues, who are less experienced in belligerency, were getting caught when they retaliated — Varsity, for example, picked up 21 fouls, to 9 for Hawks.

If Lutheran plays in a closely refereed game, (Saturday night, the officials let both teams get away with murder) several Hawks are going to spend considerable time on the sidelines. Winning is fine, but a little sportsmanship never hurts. You don't make many friends the Lockhart way.

Below the Boards:

Blues had the misfortune to be booed in their own gym — Lutheran fans outnumbered Toronto's almost THREE TO ONE . . . Former Hawk GLEN WILKIE made his first home appearance for Varsity and showed good moves around the basket . . . You've heard of RED AUERBACH'S cigar? — HOWARD LOCKHART takes off his jacket when the game is won . . . Blues slim playoff hopes are now almost nonexistent as WESTERN MUSTANGS handed WATERLOO WARRIORS their first loss of the season Friday night . . . now all Blues can hope for is a TIE.

SCORING

FOR LUTHERAN: Misikowetz 20, Nixon 19, Baird 13, Cuttiford 14, Bain 13.

FOR VARSITY: Dempster 18, Hadden 15, Neidre 13, White 10, Vooke 9, Wilkie 4, Garbe 4.

ERROR

Through a printing error, the following introduction was left out of Tom Collins' "comment" article last Friday: "Tom Collins is a second year student at St. Michael's College, former sports editor of The Mike, and analyst for the St. Mikes A basketball team. The opinions he expresses are not necessarily those of The Varsity."

Eben drafted

B. C. Lions ignored Mike Eben's protestations that he wants to stay in Toronto next year, and named the Varsity football star as their number one Canadian college draft choice. Eben has said many times that his main interest next year is obtaining a masters' degree in German literature, and the only university that offers the appropriate courses is Toronto.

Also drafted by a CFL club was the SIFL's top rusher last year, Varsity's Mike Raham. He was drafted by Calgary Stampeders.

Cock Blues shuttle five enemy racquets

University of Toronto's shuttle crew steamrolled to victory last weekend in the Western Division OQAA badminton tournament held in London.

Competing against five other universities, Varsity won 26 of their 30 matches.

Neither of the doubles combinations lost, and the team dropped only four decisions out of 20 in singles. John Gilbert (2nd singles) swept all his matches while John Forsythe (1st singles) and John Patterson (4th singles) provided strong support, dropping but a match apiece.

Next week the team returns to Western to defend the OQAA title it won last year against the Eastern Division champs. John Gilbert and Bill Hinzie, Blues' No. 1 doubles team, will also have the opportunity to snare the doubles' crown against Eastern opposition.

Students yawn as candidates give final pitch

By ANN BOODY

As the Students Council presidential campaign draws to a close, candidates are still talking about education, the bookstore and administration. The meetings are still polite, restrained and largely unattended.

At a meeting at Innis College last night the candidates restated their reasons for running for SAC.

"I want to be President because a number of campus issues this year were handled contrary to myself and a large majority of the campus," said Peter Szeleky (III UC).

"I believe I'm the best man for the job," said Glen Brownlee (IV Vic).

"Some people say this is a very dull election and that the three of us have no differences," commented Steve Langdon (III Trin).

"But there are differences. I want to see SAC fully support off-campus activities such as Trefann Court and Project 999. If we're concerned about university access-sibility then we must support them."

Langdon called for a SAC presentation of alternatives to the present methods. "We would present the results of these experiments to the administration, and prove to them they work."

All three candidates claim they would put SAC in priority over their studies. Brownlee will take the job full-time if he is the winner. "The job should be a full-time commitment to be effective," he emphasized.

"I'd like to see the university run by the community of scholars," said Brownlee.

"The term scholar power is vague," replied Langdon. "At the moment scholar power is well established here. The Senate members are faculty scholars. Where do student scholars come in?"

"Scholars, rather than outside interests represented on the Board of Governors should run the affairs," Brownlee retaliated.

SAC president Tom Faulkner came to the floor. "I've got a problem and I'll need the help of whoever wins. Since last September SAC has been pressing for reversal of the bookstore regulations.

"The Bookstore Committee agreed to meet the demands but then reversed their decision in January and have refused to speak to SAC. What would you do if you were president?"

"I'd go ahead with the student co-operative bookstore," Szeleky decided.

"Well Tom, you're in a real fix," sighed Brownlee. "I'd try to establish direct contact with the committee."

"They refuse to see us," replied Faulkner.

"Then I'd get to them through friends. I'm sure if you deal with them properly they will come across," Brownlee said.

Langdon decided he would go ahead with a student co-op. "We'd have to find a place for it next year but the Student Centre would be appropriate in 1969."

Faulkner presented another problem:

SAC is soon to be approached by the Kensington Residence Committee which is complaining about the construction of two tower residences at College and Spadina. They claim the positioning of one of the towers will disrupt community planning. "How would you face the situation?" asked Faulkner.

"I'd put the students interests first and go ahead with the construction," answered Szeleky.

"Go ahead and build," replied Brownlee.

"This is an example of the moral questions that face SAC," said Langdon. "The answer is simple. It is the responsibility of students to see that the residence which would benefit them would not break up another established community. Students must not consider themselves elitists. Their interests could easily be moved elsewhere."

Love today. Vote and/or drop out tomorrow. Happy Valentines Day from us to you.

Innis shafted again

The construction of Innis College has been set back again and the Student Society has reacted.

In response to Principal Robin Harris' announcement last week that the proposed design for the college has been rejected as too expensive, Innis College Student Society executive decided last night to set up cooperative housing for its students.

President Ken Stone (IV Inn) says Professor Harris told the Innis College Council Wednesday that the Board of Governors and the department of university affairs rejected the college plans because of a formula which allows only a certain amount to be spent per classroom foot and per bed.

A new plan, retaining the facilities of the previous design while reducing the cost, will now be substituted.

Stone was disgusted by the rejection. "The Department of the University Affairs is in the mass education business," he said. "They're interested in the most education for the greatest number, and are willing to screw community."

At present the college has no residences, though the administration owns and runs a house on Spadina Road.

Clare Booker (11 Inn) said that the executive hoped to get money for the co-ops from the Society, the College Council, the Students Administrative Council and the university.

If the Council accepts the proposal, student fees will rise by two dollars next year.

Innis College was originally scheduled to be built at its Sussex and St. George site in 1964.

Strikers say university for learners not earners

MONCTON (CUP) — The student strike at the University of Moncton enters its third day today with no end in sight.

Students maintained picket lines yesterday, vowing to stay out of classes until the New Brunswick government agrees to freeze tuition fees at their former levels.

The 1,100 students walked out Monday after they voted Friday to strike against fee increases ranging from $100 to $150. The new fee scale is due to come into effect in September.

On Monday, students demonstrated outside the science building, calling for university education for those with the ability to learn rather than those with the ability to pay.

The U of M faculty has supported the strike and has withdrawn its services by holding a "continuous session" to study and discuss the situation.

Students at the affiliated Bathurst College also held an all-day study session Monday, but returned to classes yesterday.

A planned march on the provincial legislature in Fredericton has been postponed until tomorrow to allow students time to organize.

Saturday, the National Society of Academics and the Acadian Education Society backed the striking students. The latter called for "universal accessibility to education and the elimination of tuition fees as soon as possible."

The same day, student and administration officials met with provincial government officials to discuss the university finance problem. One student termed the visit "a knock on a closed door."

The administration is adopting a "wait and see" attitude, university President Adelaar Savoie said. He added that the demonstration would focus attention on the financial difficulties of the university as well as student fees.

Mac's to go under axe

Soon we may weep hot tears, for the sword of destruction hangs heavy over our old watering hole.

Thirty years have passed since Stewart Macdonald first opened this shrine, which has eaten its way into all our hearts and digestive tracts; Mac's Grill and Drugstore, on Harbord down from St. George.

The year 1971 looms ominously in the future as the scheduled opening date of the University of Toronto Reference Library. The new 4,000-student library will occupy the entire St. George - Harbord - Huron - Sussex block, of which Mac's occupies a small part.

Macdonald isn't weeping yet, and he isn't too worried. "Thirteen years ago we were expropriated and I haven't heard anything about it for four years now." He expects he'll be able to run out the lease—three more years.

But there are hints that the axe may fall sooner. The Canadian Alcohol and Drug Addiction Foundation will soon be moving into its new on-campus hospital. The 1971 opening date indicates demolition in the spring.

Although grads of '41 who remember spending happy hours chewing the fat at Mac's may wax nostalgic, present-day diners were almost unanimous in their opinion about the place.

"Atrocious!"

"When they tear the place down I'm going to come out and cheer."

"It reeks, but I don't know where I'll buy my groceries when it's gone."

Two cashiers chimed in unison: "No comment."

And the floor sweeper gave the classic shrug: "I wouldn't know—I just work here."

But Macdonald himself smiled pleasantly and timelessly as the cash register jingled in the background.

VOTE LANGDON/SCHACHAR

To Our Fellow Students:

As we have gone from door to door in the residences, from table to table in the cafeterias, from person to person in the common rooms, the students we have met have all talked about the same problems.

None of us are wholly satisfied with the education we are receiving. More meaningful learning opportunities — that is the key issue for all of us.

We also need well-run, imaginative social activities, satisfactory accommodation at a reasonable cost, sufficient financial aid, a better bookstore, open access to library facilities and ways to beat the many bureaucratic complications of the large university.

We realize the complex, even baffling difficulties involved in bringing these things about. The reason we entered this campaign is that we feel our experience this year in actually dealing with these issues on SAC will enable us to meet the important problems of the office.

SAC must not only press for desired changes as all candidates agree; it must also act itself to provide alternatives through, for example, SAC-run residences, courses and a Co-op Bookstore.

As the only team from both Arts and Professional faculties, we feel we can well represent the whole campus.

We seek your support.

Sincerely,

Steven Langdon

16 seats not enough: Faulkner

The proposal to seat 16 students on the Council of the faculty of arts and science has been termed inadequate by Students Council President Tom Faulkner.

The Arts and Science Council, which totals 800 members, is the supreme academic body of the faculty. Most of the action to implement the Macpherson report will be taken there.

Earlier this year the council recommended that 16 students be elected to this body through a system of electoral colleges.

"The proposal is a necessary step in the right direction," said Faulkner. "However, it suffers two major drawbacks.

"Arts and science include so many diverse elements that a representation of 16 students will not do it justice."

Further, the SAC objects to the electoral college system through which these representatives are to be elected.

This system will leave the elected representatives completely on their own, responsible to no one but themselves, Faulkner said. "Such representation could easily become irresponsible representation."

A circular printed by the SAC suggests that each department should have two representatives on the council, one from the honours course and one from general.

It also suggests that each of the colleges at U of T be granted one representative.

Under this plan, about 50 students would be elected to the council.

Faulkner said he had confronted arts and science Dean A.D. Allan with the SAC's recommendations and that a compromise will likely be reached.

"Resistance to student representation seems to be declining," Faulkner noted.

'Visits' will open minds

Georgina Solymar (II Vic), head of the SAC High School Visits Committee, is out to change the system. The purpose of her program is to "prepare high school students for university life so they won't waste two years getting used to it."

This apparently innocent goal has already been sternly resisted by high school principals. One commented, "How can we send a student down to a seminar when we don't know what we will get back?"

Last October, Miss Solymar was invited to the guidance teacher's convention and received much support for her program, which will get underway this week.

"We are trying to open their minds in seminars on campus and at the high schools. If you change the students the system will change, and the students are very enthusiastic."

Despite the fact that some high school principals withheld information from the student leaders in high schools, a seminar will be held in March for 50 high school students.

Miss Solymar invites all who wish to participate in the High School Visits program to contact her during the day at the SAC office.

Purpose fulfilled: Baum

By TOM COLLINS

The St. Michael's College Centre for Ecumenical Studies is folding this summer.

Rev. Gregory Baum, the centre's director, who announced the closure, said in an interview:

"The purpose of the centre has been totally fulfilled.

"I founded the centre in 1963 when ecumenism was an exceptional thing. Since then the entire graduate school of theology has become ecumenical; Catholics, Protestants and Anglicans, professors and students co-operating in a single school."

The centre is a multi-denominational institute dedicated to breaking down barriers between faiths. Now, he said:

"Every course has become ecumenical because Catholics and Protestants study together.

"Even on the undergraduate level changes are being foreseen which would create a single department of religious studies, totally ecumenical in character."

Father Baum said his interests have changed from the problem of the Church and ecumenism to the problem of the Church and the individual—"to the problem of God, of faith and unfaith of belief and unbelief.

"Today every professor of theology would take into account the scholarship of other churches.

"Last year I taught a course on the Foundation of Belief. Professor Fairweather of Trinity did the same. The students said that to get to know the Catholic authors they had to go to Trinity and to get to know the Protestant authors they had to go to St. Mike's."

After the interview was over Father Baum went back to his "new interests." In his large, well-organized office, desk piled high with multi-linguaged books ("that's to impress reporters") the rotund priest recommenced typing his fifth book.

Its title: The Credibility of the Church Today: A Reply To Charles Davis.

Mr. Davis is a former English Jesuit priest who recently left the Catholic Church to get married.

Housing probe needs you

Less than 200 people have filled out the Students Administrative Council's questionnaire on housing. "The quality of the response has been excellent but we need more people to make the survey a success," said David Hunter (SGS), one of the co-ordinators of the study.

Letters were sent to 3,000 randomly selected students asking them to come to Convocation Hall to fill out the questionnaire on such things as where they want to live, how much they are willing to pay, and what type of accommodation they want.

It takes about 30 minutes to fill one out and there are people there to talk about housing and discuss the questionnaire with anyone interested.

The results will be used in a housing study report this summer which will help determine the housing situation on campus in the future.

Questionnaires may be filled out in Convocation Hall from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. until Friday.

Voting exclusions

Following are the students excluded from voting in tomorrow's Students Administrative Council presidential election:

Special students; extension students; students pursuing diplomas in town and regional planning, dental public health, orthodontics, periodontics, paedodontics, surgery and anaesthesia, desources management.

Students taking diploma courses in dentistry, bacteriology, hospital administration, nutrition, public health, medical radiology, anaesthesia, othanolgy, otalaryngology, audiology, industrial health.

Students pursuing a certificate in public health; interns; graduate students taking a PhD course in music or an MA in surgery.

Attention should be drawn to the election ballots, which should read: Glen Brownlee (IV Vic); Norm Schachar (II Meds-New).

Sperly Smearred by Saccandidates

Candidates in the presidential election campaign were accused last night of using "smear tactics" by members of The Varsity staff.

Moo Sperly (1 LO) said she arrived at the Varsity office to find a wall poster defaced.

"Some person of little faith must've dun this," she said, pointing to the 'sikedelik' poster on the wall. The words "God Grows His Own" were partially covered by a small red and white sticker. The sticker bears the names of two candidates.

"I don't mind them licking the stickers," Miss Sperly objected, "but do they have to put them on MY poster? Do they?"

Sports editor Rod Mickleburgh was also furious over the candidates' interference in Varsity decor.

"When I first got here," he reminisced, "all the type-writers were stuffed with these propaganda sheets!" He thrust a copy in this interviewer's face.

"Immediately, I called their campaign headquarters. They told me they knew nothing about it, and sent someone over with a mimeographed open letter denying their complicity in "sabotaging The Varsity."

Varsity Editor Volkmar "I'm too crazy to argue" Richter, who was awakened from his frenzied sleep, commented:

"Does he really grow his own?"

Author extolls learning as play

Howard Adelman, co-editor of The University Game, told the Graduate Students Union Tuesday that learning should be more like play than work.

He said the essays in his book "raise the fundamental problems of the university. The university is a reflection of the technological society which has no ideals, but pretends to."

Rather than a university where "play is according to rules" and "the end is important", Adelman suggested a "university of flexible play where play is the end itself."

He decried a society that is too "fragmented" and "impersonal" — that holds the concept that people won't work without punishment or rewards.

Play he defined as "responding sensitively to a situation — "a joyful activity with serious intent".

He cited Rochdale as a place of "free play".

Rochdale is involved in community development, unregimented education, and such creative arts as films, and an underground newspaper, he pointed out.

BROWNLEE-NITKIN

ON FEBRUARY 15

"The public doesn't know who it wants, it only knows one thing — that it doesn't want me."
—Stanley Baldwin

"Stanley Baldwin had the perfect ability to hit the nail on the head without driving it any further in."
—Harold Macmillan

Whatever else it may have been to you, to us the current SAC presidential campaign has been a dreadful bore.

Perhaps all the fire was syphoned off in last fall's special election, but the three candidates seeking your vote tomorrow are as much, if not more, to blame for the unexpected dullness of the campaign. Let's take them alphabetically.

Glen Brownlee, 23, president of the Victoria College Union Council, shows a disturbing naivete for his age. Running the VCUC — essentially an uneasy coalition of several special interest cliques — is far different from mastering the diffuse operations of SAC, but this he seems not to realize.

Brownlee's naivete is best seen in his policies — nearly all are desirable but unrealistic. He wants a second campus newspaper to compete with The Varsity's editorial policy. But when pressed for specific details on staffing and financing, Brownlee simply can't answer. He doesn't know.

Brownlee's political philosophy is essentially idealistic me-tooism. He has picked up a few progressive ideas but really hasn't thought them out in depth. He correctly complains about the impersonal university factory but proposes merely to sit down with the faculty and discuss the problems — already being done — to produce what he terms a "communal and intellectual environment worthy of the name university."

He favours referendums on controversial issues on the apparent assumption that referendums solve problems. Too bad; he'll learn. He says SAC should build residences at Scarboro and Erindale "if the administration won't." This assumes the administration has sufficient funds but refuses to spend them. But it is quite apparent the university hasn't got the money, and for that matter, neither has SAC.

Brownlee says SAC should discuss moral issues but shouldn't take action resulting from these discussions. Talk is fine, but Brownlee draws the line at action.

Steven Langdon, 21, co-chairman of the SAC University Committee, has run a dreary presidential campaign, and that's a shame from a man as experienced as he. Langdon, we suspect, has far more to say than he has demonstrated to date.

Instead of pushing his ideas and analyses to make the campaign catch fire, he has chosen written statements and quiet speeches. This is his style — the easy, calculated speech, the quick answers to tough questions where others flounder, the subtle put-down of opposing arguments.

Langdon's views of student government come from experience and wide personal contact with the people a SAC president should be dealing with.

He came out in favour of referendums. All three candidates have, but Langdon, with his wider political experience, should have known better. The cost and work involved in referendums are virtually prohibitive and he's just talking into his hat when he mentions them seriously.

Langdon seems to assume that all problems can be solved merely by the appointment of the appropriate committee. His proposal for SAC-run "alternative courses" is unrealistic as he is sure to find most of the "younger faculty" will prefer to do what their departments consider prudent so as not to miss out on promotions and other valuable considerations.

However, by placing his emphasis on the nature and quality of university education, Langdon has grasped the most important issue confronting students and their government.

Peter Szekely, 21, describes himself as "not the politician but the intellectual motivated to action." His campaign has been strong, however, and very political. Since he's been unable to attract anyone to run with him for vice-president, Szekely has been forced to campaign twice as hard as either Langdon or Brownlee. To meet this challenge he's attempted to create the image of a person involved in everything; but actually he has been involved in very little.

Szekely says he has served on several SAC committees, including one which has yet to hold a meeting.

He modestly claims to have "served with distinction" on the UC Lit and "participated enthusiastically" in the SAC high school visits program. Other members of the Lit refer to Mr. Szekely's service as somewhat less than distinctive: some SAC people question whether his work on their committees has been all that enthusiastic.

All his proposals are safe because implementation has already been started by others: blue and white, student housing, implementing the Macpherson report.

Warning to his task, Szekely charged yesterday "The Varsity has given Langdon more exposure and ignored the letters and articles I sent them over a period of two weeks (two articles and one letter.) They printed an inferior picture of me in Monday's paper."

The picture in question was supplied to The Varsity by Mr. Szekely, and our reproduction system, faulty as it is, picks no favourites.

Anyone who can seriously say, as Szekely's pamphlet does, that SAC has "paranoid suspicion" of the university administration, has no conception of either the nature nor the history of SAC dealings with the university hierarchy.

As for Szekely's charge about unfair campaign coverage in The Varsity, the editors assert that each candidate has received equal coverage in the news columns: Szekely has received a little more because several SAC and Lit people have corrected mistakes in his pamphlet through The Varsity's columns.

This is our analysis of all the pamphlets, letters, position papers and speeches of the three candidates. For proof or refutation, listen to the candidates yourself in the speeches scheduled today and ask them questions.

LETTERS

Sir:

"Remember people have a high prejudice level. You throw things at them with twisted facts or only half the facts or you juxtapose charges that don't have any relation, or you draw suspicion on something people don't know much about, and they will put your charges into their prejudice." (from The Varsity editorial, Monday, February 12).

On the same page, The Varsity printed a letter by Mr. Bob Bossin, one of Mr. Langdon's supporters, which was a perfect illustration of the techniques you attacked in your own editorial.

Not once during this campaign have I been attacked for my ideas or my approach to student government. Instead, it has been my personal integrity that has been impugned.

I am hopeful that the students of this campus will reject these efforts to discredit me, and will vote for or against me on the basis of my policies and my position.

Peter Szekely

(Ed. note: But according to your pamphlet you base part of your position on your alleged experience and knowledge of student affairs).

Sir:

When I arrived at the university this morning I was handed a mimeographed sheet signed by "the Peter Szekely Campaign". It pointed out that I am a slanderer and a false accuser, facts of which I was, until that moment, unaware.

However, this does not alter the fact that, in his pamphlet, Mr. Szekely claims to be currently serving on a committee that does not currently exist, and also claims to be an enthusiastic participant in another committee which has not benefited from his presence since Nov. 18.

Bob Bossin
SAC Education Commissioner

Sir:

We are appalled at the content of the enclosed letter.

It is shocking that such unworthy and pernicious ideas have found a place on our campus.

Truly yours,

Ulo Malmiste (III UC)
Bob Rae (III UC)
Brian Greenspan (III UC)
Paul Lysy (II UC)
Jeffrey Rose (IV UC)

Dear U of T Student;

I am writing to inform you of the S.A.C. presidential candidacy of Peter Szekely (III UC) and to request your support of him on election day, February 15th.

Mr. Szekely is an Hungarian student and himself a refugee from communism. He is running for office on the premise that the Left does not hold a monopoly in concern for student interests, that the New Left is not the sole repository of political wisdom on campus.

I am acting on the assumption that most Baltic students have little use for the "revolutionary social change" concept peddled by presidential aspirant Langdon, sponsor of the S.A.C. resolution to label Dow "evil" and oust their representatives from campus. Nor do I feel that the slightly less radical and far less intellectual leftist diatribe of Brownlee can hold much appeal.

With either of these two in office, S.A.C. can fully be expected to carry on its function as the political arm of the local Vietnicks. Both would intensify efforts to misuse our money, through the closed-union shop that S.A.C. is, to make a mockery both of the laws of the U.S. and of the Canadian oath of allegiance through financial aid to U.S. renegades from responsibility.

In place of this adherence to the dogma and the ideology of Anti-American New Left with its enforced one-side manifestations, Mr. Szekely seeks an atmosphere of independence for all sides, recognizing a pluralistic concept of absolutes with no official truths as to the morality of various companies.

However, the essence of Mr. Szekely's platform is not a mere negative reaction to the Left, but a positive concept of responsible student participation on decision making bodies on campus and a greater emphasis on student services. As a productive member of his college council and the active president of the U of T's debating union, Mr. Szekely is fully qualified to act on these issues.

Since presidential elections rarely bring out more than 40% of the electorate, this election will to a great extent, be decided by which candidate can get out his supporters. Therefore, please exercise your vote, Thursday, February 15th.

Mr. Szekely is hoping to meet you in person to discuss the issues, through E.U.T. and other Baltic organizations.

Yours sincerely,

Jaanus Proos
For the Peter Szekely Campaign

(Ed. note: It was this letter sent to 150 Baltic Students that inspired our editorial on McCarthyism last Friday, and our analysis of McCarthyite tactics Monday. But since McCarthyism has been used in this election—and not by Mr. Bossin—we decided to print the letter in full).

Sir:

"It has come to my attention that several letters have been written in support of my candidature, notably one by Mr. Jaanus Proos. I had no prior knowledge of his intention to write and I disclaim all responsibility for its contents."

Peter Szekely,
Candidate for SAC President

TARTU — more than just a residence

By INGRID VABALIS

A dingy third floor garret and hot plate have ceased to be the only substitutes for living in a university or college-run residence equipped with maid service and dons.

Tartu College, a 17-storey apartment building scheduled to open in September 1969 has a new concept for student accommodation.

It will provide inexpensive pected to be a residence for foreign students.

Since then the project has expanded. More land has been acquired — there are now two lots on Bloor and Madison for the site. The building itself has been enlarged and will no longer be only for foreign students.

Steve Langdon (III Trin) a SAC member of the Ad Hoc Committee when the proposal was brought up last summer, fully provide intense discussion on international affairs as part of the educational environment."

The SAC Education Commission is working out possible types of programs suitable for Tartu. SAC hopes eventually to extend the education program outside Tartu to the Campus Centre where rooms will be available for seminars.

Last October, SAC moved to accept the Tartu project in principle and to hire a full-time educational consultant.

Some type of intellectual activity on a communal level is becoming a vital part of student run residences. Rochdale is a case in point.

GOOD TIME

"As a residence, Tartu is valuable in physical terms," said Bob Bossin (III Innis) SAC Education Commissioner, "but that isn't enough. The education idea is what will make the people there have a good time."

Details for the administration of the building have yet to be worked out.

"People who live there should be the ones to make the rules," said Treleavan.

After construction is started, the initial project workers hope to see is student committees set up to determine the environment of the place — what kind of furnishing will be installed, how the rent will be paid, how the education program will be run.

When the building is completed, the steering Committee hopes there will be a group of people experienced in communal living and administration ready to move in.

To this end, SAC hopes to lease a floor of Rochdale next September to put people there who want to live in Tartu next year. By participating in co-op living they will be able to help with Tartu's organization.

ESTONIANS

Financially, the Estonian Student Association (through the Estonian credit union) has provided the required 10 per cent equity for the building. Hence the name Tartu, for an Estonian university town.

The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will pick up the remaining 90 per cent of the costs. Approval has already been given by the local office here. When details are worked out in Ottawa, construction will begin.

The tangled complexities of building a $3,000,000 building with only $40,000 and of running it with only 'student power' are well on their way to being worked out.

How the finished product will turn out depends very much on the interested students who will work on the committees and make the decisions.

a time for LOVE

"Love is a season and holidays like signposts mark the time."

(Rod McKuen)

Valentine's Day isn't what is used to be. Everywhere the mass media confronts us with its 'cool' February 14 message: Love comes once a year (like Brotherhood week). Watch your card, too - for heaven's sake, don't be sentimental - be supremely camp and buy a huge cynical poster-size Valentine, so that he (or she) won't think you like them TOO much.

Supposedly, in this age of 'New Morality' all interpersonal barriers have been shattered, leaving a completely guilt-free society. They tell me that moral dishonesty is a thing of the past. We are free thinkers — we believe in free love — we believe in LOVE. They tell me. But, where is it? Where is this love they proclaim?

Look around you. Who smiles any more? Who beams because they love life, today, at this very moment? Try smiling warmly at someone you don't know, as you walk between classes (if you're really daring, say hi!) Watch the predictable reaction. Some will look at you, as though you're nuts and quickly walk on. Others, puzzled, will force out a hesitant greeting, sure that they met you at some drunken party - bopping like hell you're not the girl they dragged into the bedroom. Occasionally, a kindred spirit will pass, and acknowledge you, as though it were only natural. He won't be worried about playing the Iwouldliketosayhelloandtalktoyoubutwehaven'tbeenintroduced game.

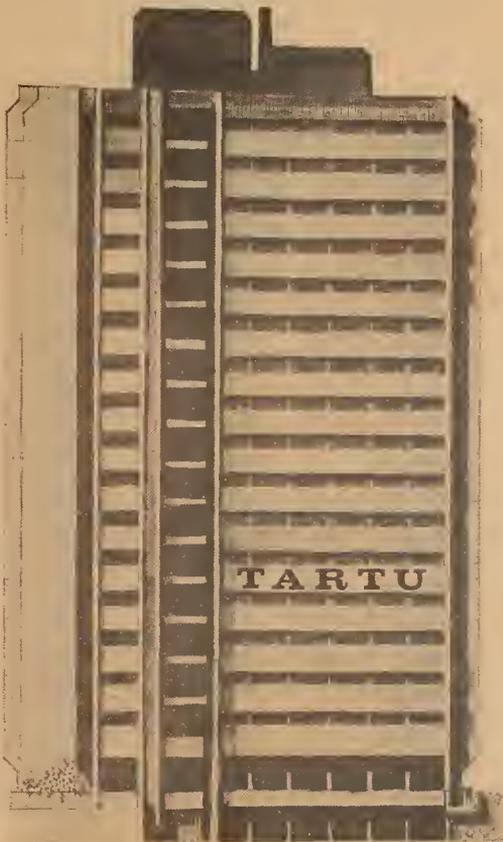

Try sitting down beside a girl who is alone and striking up a conversation (don't forget the sweet smile as you approach). More than likely, she's "waiting for a friend", who inevitably never appears. Have you ever seen someone once or twice, and just known intuitively you'd really get along? Have you ever had the nerve to walk up to this person and flatly say "You're great, you're a real human being, life is short and I'd like to know you!" If she hasn't run away to report to her friends what HE SAID, she'll probably be trying to decide if it'll be your place or hers.

The Beatles tell me all I need is love. I see more and more of this word as a perversion, a rationalization for jumping into bed. Have all the sentimentalists disappeared - people not ashamed to admit an intense love, even for a member of the same sex ("but they're always together, they must be queer") or perish the thought for a blood relative ("I have to like him, he's my brother").

How long has it been since you enjoyed somebody, rather than something? Maybe, in our striving to be the 'cool generation', we have lost some of love's essence — the ability to appreciate beautiful people and things, expressing these emotions spontaneously.

Maybe today you will get a long white envelope in the mail — 26c worth of sarcastic affection. Maybe you will be lucky and receive a homemade Valentine of red construction paper and silver foil — like in Grade 7, when we gave them to the whole class, because in our naivety we thought everybody deserved a little love. But if St. Valentine picks you out as a special person, someone will walk up to you with a smile on his face and in his eyes. Suddenly, you will be smiling too. It's contagious.

housing ($13 a week for doubles and $15 for singles) not offered by any other university housing project.

With a capacity of 474, it will contain four six-man units with 80 per cent of the rooms planned as singles.

Six is not a purely arbitrary number. Sociological studies have shown that six is the primal group for decision making. Ontario by-laws limit bathrooms to six users. Six is even a good number to work with generally in distributing the work load — cooking and cleaning.

Each unit has a common room, a kitchen and two bathrooms. The units will be run on a co-operative basis, as will the entire building.

PROTOTYPE

Howard Adelman, who set up the Co-op College residences here, brought the idea for this project to the Students' Administrative Council last summer. It was known as International house and was expected to see more residences along Tartu lines.

"Tartu is a prototype on which SAC is experimenting," he explained. "It is the type of residence accommodation that there is a need for and SAC has to supply."

But Langdon went on to say, the educational program at Tartu is perhaps the most important part of the project.

FREE LEARNING

It will be along the lines of Rochdale — a free learning atmosphere with courses set up to break down a lot of the lines between disciplines.

"Hopefully it will not parallel exactly the program at Rochdale," said John Treleavan (SGS) SAC vice president and one of the workers on the Tartu project representing SAC.

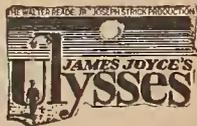

John Jordan of Rochdale College, now taking an active part in getting Tartu off the ground, sees a possibility of a "heavy concentration of foreign students which will hope-

WHAT HAPPENS

By SUE HELWIG

Back in September a freshman engineering class was being given an introductory lecture when the professor told each student to take a careful look at the two people sitting beside him.

"Take a hard look," he warned, "because by this time next year one of those people won't be here any longer."

First year casualties are almost a way of life in the university, especially in heavy science courses. But in second and third year the faces are still disappearing.

They are called dropouts in causal conversations and withdrawals when the university counts heads on Feb. 15 each year.

But in spite of the label the dropouts are still very much alive. In talking to them you find that in many ways they are still very much here.

Jane (pseudonym) is bidding her time in one of Toronto's public libraries ... Eddie Kamin strolls down to the campus almost every day to "shoot shit" with his friends ... Bill Barclay says that by next week he will be gone ... off hitchhiking somewhere ...

"I sort of decided that I was more important than any math problem," Eddie explained, hesitating a little over the words as we talked to a background of Dylan in his apartment.

In October Eddie stopped attending his second year maths and physics courses.

Jane dropped out of third year English Language and Literature in early November: "It was an impulsive move. I was feeling like a robot ... the course wasn't too interesting and it was a heck of a lot of work to be doing without a sense of direction."

Jane doesn't seem to have any regrets. She laughed as she answered my questions and I could picture her face lighting up at the other end of the phone at the absurdity of being interviewed for a story.

"You see, I just wanted a kind of breathing space to think things over."

For both Eddie and Jane there was something essentially wrong with the courses they were taking.

"The course was funnelling me towards something I wasn't interested in," Eddie said. "I could teach school in a system I do not respect or I could remain within the intellectual euphoria of university research."

He was quick to explain that he wasn't being overly critical.

"In saying intellectual euphoria I'm not knocking it ... only so far as it prevents you from re-integrating what you're doing with your everyday experience."

For Jane it was a question of finding a balance in the work she was doing. There seemed to be a conflict between what she wanted to do and what she had to do.

"I was learning things that were too microscopic. Perhaps general arts would be fine but they seem to skip a lot."

"It's so easy to get involved in one small part. But then you ask yourself why and you realize that you have the threat of exams over your head."

In some ways Eddie, although he is a year behind Jane, has had a closer link with the university. In his first year he lived in residence whereas Jane has always commuted.

"The first year I really enjoyed it. There were all the comforts of home and people were in the same situation I was. It was a way of slipping easily into the mainstream of university life."

But he seems to have found the atmosphere tedious when he came back last fall.

"First of all there was the noise—always. It was like being in a boys' camp every once in a while you assembled and played games.

"As far as work is concerned I would probably have done more work on the outside. The social atmosphere of a residence is against any kind of privacy."

Now that he has dropped out he sees things in a slightly different way.

"I've found now that the residence was a very sheltered kind of place.

"You are fed three times a day. Your sheets and towels are changed. You always have a place to go when it's cold. You are rarely in a situation in which your wants are not satisfied."

And this definitely isn't the kind of life that Eddie is looking for. He plays the sax and the piano a bit and is really interested in seeing how far he can go with them.

"I want to perform and communicate through music with other people. You can't communicate mathematics with anybody. It has nothing to do with people—with understanding them and dealing with them.

"It's very, very abstract, and when it becomes a way of life, this abstract way of thinking—"Eddie stumbled a little on the words—"Like being with people and walking into a restaurant had nothing to do with what I was learning.

"This isn't to say that one is wrong and one is right. But the kind of learning I was doing gives you no awareness of yourself, of your identity," he added quickly.

Living out of the university on his own offers Eddie the chance to learn about himself and he is able to do so in a way that he finds relevant.

"Learning is essentially an individual freedom thing. Now I'm learning about myself in a way I wasn't before.

"I can form an organic concept of myself ... test out certain strengths and weaknesses ... put myself in situations in which I have to react.

"Like now I'm reading stuff like Strindberg and Hesse. I have a new interest in the arts. I'm beginning to see literature as a kind of heightened awareness of given situations."

But Jane is finding that she needs the stimulation of being at university to keep her interests alive.

"At first I was delighted with all the free time I had. But I was used to having to structure my time and I find that you need something to keep you interested."

Folk-dancing has always been one of the things that she wanted to spend more time at, but now it isn't enough to fill the gap.

"I used to think that I could be happy with anything. But now I have been exposed to things like literature and history and philosophy and I can't turn my back on it now and say that it isn't part of me. It doesn't work.

"I don't want to stay at the Grade 13 mentality," she remarked when we had been talking for a while. "But there's a danger in thinking about it too much."

I asked her to explain: "If I didn't go back, I would think that I had short-changed myself. But what happens when you're there is that you can't see the forest for the trees."

For Eddie, dropping out was a far more positive and permanent move. And he has some definite ideas why the university was wrong for him and how it could be changed.

"I went into MPC because

AFTERWARDS

I thought I was interested in what it had to offer and because I really wasn't aware of other possibilities.

"I did all the stuff I was supposed to do in first year. But if you're really interested it's hard to find an outlet for your interest. Things move from the professor to the student."

"There was no place for creativity," he repeated several times.

"To learn creatively, you have to be involved in a process of expanding and restricting your scope ... you have to be aware of alternatives. This happens when you are challenged and the choice is important. It has to involve a limitation of yourself.

"In the university, you memorize facts and analyses. There should be a greater flexibility in response, a greater emphasis in individual response in the classroom.

"It has to be the student's decision to come to grips with the problem. The teacher should be there to suggest alternative ways of looking at things."

Right now Eddie is very enthusiastic about his interest in music (he may be taking a few courses at the Faculty of Music next year). And he seems to be experiencing a kind of quiet delight with his own existence.

But when he looks at himself he confesses:

"Objectively speaking it's hard to tell what part is due to my dropping out and what part is due to the changes I have undergone myself."

Making the drop-out scene, Ed Komin learns there is more to living out of residence than meets the eye.

Spend a Summer on the Seine... and Stay Solvent

by MIKE KESTERTON,
Varsity Travel Editor

Want to see the Eiffel Tower this summer? Or watch the changing of the guard at European palaces? Would you like to have your pocket picked in the Vatican? Other students do it every year, and some actually break even on the trip. The trick? A job abroad.

Every summer North American students work in Europe as lifeguards, waiters, waitresses, office help, models, teachers, factory workers, chauffeurs, construction labourers and farm hands. Most of these positions are obtained with the aid of an employment agency (euphemistically called a non-profit "student information service," because employment agencies procuring outside labour are strictly forbidden) which provides footloose wanderers with the necessary work and health permits — for a fee.

The American Student Information Service (ASIS), for instance, offers "thousands of jobs" in Europe. The cost is about $150, which also includes an obligatory guided tour of Europe.

When ASIS participants arrive on the Continent they are given a cultural orientation course. Although the service is a private, non-sectarian organization, it is aimed at Americans, and students are reminded that they are "young ambassadors" for America.

ASIS provides jobs in Europe any time during the year and guarantees work permits, accommodation arrangements, health insurance and other details. It also offers special discounts on tours of Europe for those who want merely to travel and not work.

"Although you have heard endless words about European cultures," proclaims ASIS advertising, "this learning cannot be compared with the actual experience of living and working in Europe. In the midst of a foreign culture you no longer look at it abstractly; rather, you integrate and incorporate yourself into it. In other words, you become an animated member of a foreign civilization."

But ASIS warns its prospective customers that a job in Europe involves the willingness to "adapt to an entirely new environment as well as the willingness to do the job."

It places most students in Germany, where there is generally a wider selection and quantity of jobs available. There, the working conditions are usually better than in other countries.

ISIS: testimonials, but disillusionment

Founded in 1958, ASIS works out of Luxembourg. Another "non-profit organization," the International Student Information Service (ISIS), was founded in Belgium in 1962. It was also known as the "International Student Travel Centre," until travel agents charged that it was infringing on their business. It then changed its ISTC initials to read "International Society for Training and Culture."

Its publicity material bristles with testimonials from students:

"I've gained greater insight and understanding into a number of things since I've been here," wrote Linda Richardson, a U of T co-ed who worked as a Swiss chambermaid.

George Vandenburg, a U of T medical student, said: "The work is hard but the pay is excellent. My patrons are very nice people." George worked in a French hotel.

The ISIS offer is a guaranteed job, work permit, visa and health permit for $150. Some students, however, have been somewhat disillusioned with their treatment by ISIS.

"I worked as a waiter in the Isle of Wight," said Don Kibblewhite (III New), "and I thoroughly enjoyed myself. I'd like to go again, but I wouldn't let ISIS make the arrangements. A SAC flight to Europe would have been cheaper."

Kibblewhite said that many students, including himself, complained about their treatment by ISIS to the Canadian representative, Professor Tonge, of Queen's University. "I never got a reply," he added.

A young co-ed at U of T told the following story:

"I paid $150 to ISIS for which they guaranteed me a job, a visa and a work permit in the country of my choice. They didn't have a visa or work permit ready for me in time, however, and I was told to enter the country as a tourist. This was illegal, of course, and I could have been arrested by the authorities. I heard of two other girls who did this and were jailed.

"Eventually ISIS contacted me and told me to leave the country so they could get the necessary papers for my legal re-entry.

"My employer paid for my hotel bill while I was outside his country, then billed me. ISIS promised to pick up the $45 tab, but never did.

"I finally got a visa and a health permit, although I never got a work permit. I went back to my job at a restaurant.

"It soon became apparent that my employer had a vicious temper; one one occasion he threw an ashtray at my head. On another, he tried to push a female employee out of the window."

(Describing its job-hunting activities, ISIS says: "It took a lot of conferences, phone calls, letters and personal meetings with employers of all kinds. Copious credentials were exchanged with businessmen who listened warily. Questions answers and discouraging brushoffs followed repeated presentations of a programme staunchly believed in meetings. And finally, the foreign businessmen who agreed to go all

"I wrote to the Brussels office for other job and told my employer to find me another job immediately, that he couldn't afford to lose would stay another two weeks.

"It didn't help to learn the office that ISIS has no record of students it places."

(Kibblewhite said he had grievances and had been surprised displayed as "ISIS World Head-slick magazine, ISIS actually occupied floor.")

"I went to London," continued get me a work permit. I didn't find out 'til later that a Canadian doesn't need one. The result was that ISIS took $150 of my money (while advertising itself as a non-profit organization) and I got taken.

"I complained to the Canadian authorities; they told me to put my complaint in writing. It's too late for me, but I certainly hope that other students don't get taken in by ISIS."

Professor P. Bouillaguet, of the University College French department, was campus representative for ISIS. As such, he was entitled to cut-rate prices on flights to Europe, which he never took advantage of. His actual interest in the ISIS plan was that it encouraged North American students to travel to Europe and come into contact with other cultures.

A number of students, he said, had complained to him of ISIS, so he and Prof. Le Pan, UC principal, drafted a letter to the Canadian embassy in Belgium. Shortly afterwards, the professors severed their connections with ISIS.

Expressing displeasure at ISIS, Prof. Bouillaguet at the same time cautioned against accepting, at face value, the stories of unhappy students who had worked in Europe.

"These little girls," he said, "One should expect to find a different standard of living in a foreign country, but many of them weren't prepared for this. It has been my experience that most of those who complain are those who don't understand what living in another culture means."

(Passport, vaccination, and maple leaves)

But ASIS and ISIS are not the only organizations in the student travel business. Other plans to get to Europe are student-run, such as the SAC flights, or training-oriented, like l'Associa-tion Internationale des Etudiants en Sciences Economiques et Commerciales (AIESEC).

The latter is an exchange programme for business and economics students, to acquaint them with foreign businesses, economics and people. Companies in 40 countries are polled, and participating firms provide a paid commercial position, often management training, to a foreign student. They are allowed to express any particular preferences as to nationality, language or previous experience.

AIESEC local committees are student-run and see to all the visas, identity cards, lodging, etc. Last year 20 traineeships were exchanged with Toronto, 180 with Canada.

A student pays $20 to take part in the program; each participating firm pays $50. AIESEC offers businessmen "keen analysis of operational problems by an objective observer," and "excellent public relations opportunities, even for firms with solely domestic operations." Interested students can apply to the local committee at 100 St. George St.

Students who just want to travel in Europe, and do it cheaply, are advised to buy a cheap plan guide, such as "Europe on Five Dollars a Day," and prepare carefully. The CUS travel bureau at 140 St. George St. has an abundance of free literature.

The first thing you need is a passport and a smallpox vaccination certificate. The passport takes a number of weeks to obtain, so apply early if you don't have one. (Be careful with it when you travel in Europe, too; lose it and you automatically get tossed into the local jug until it can be replaced.)

Buy some U.S. traveller's cheques and a currency converter if you're not a math head, and be sure to obtain special pass-like the International Student Identity Card; it often cuts the price of admission to art galleries and museums by one half.

Dress conservatively, bring along a gross or two of maple leaves, and wear them. Europeans are quite decent toward us.

Get a language phrasebook, but don't worry if you aren't a linguist. Making an effort to speak a native language pleases people and many are proficient in English. A conversation can even be carried on by signs and gestures.

Remember: In Europe you can drink the tap water, no matter where you are. In fact, in many places it's mineral water and is considered quite beneficial.

Bon voyage!

Diggers' new pad supplies bread (eating variety) to homeless hippies

By LOUIS ERLICHMAN

It's pretty bare. Cigarette butts on the floor, five or six radios and a record player going full blast.

But when it's zero outside, and you've got nowhere else to stay, the Diggers' house at 117 Spadina Road looks pretty good.

They'll put you up, feed you, give you clothes—as much as you need, for as long as you need it.

Only one rule, according to Digger Brian Wilcox: No drugs.

In time, the house will also have a man from the Department of Manpower to help the kids find jobs, and an office for the Village Bar, a group of young lawyers and law students who advise Yorkville types on their rights.

From the 17 residents (there is room for 20), the reaction was all good. "Really groovy." "No hassles." "Nobody bothers you." "The atmosphere is cool."

Debby, a chubby girl who had been there a day and a ves on the news, Ginger Edwards, an 18-year-old from San Francisco's Haight Ashbury, chewed a cookie and explained how Canadians were friendlier than Americans but "too reserved."

"There's nothing like this house in Haight-Ashbury or anywhere. It's got everything but drugs."

It may not be heaven, but Jim Robichaud, the chief cook, can eye the single penny in his hand and say: "My total wealth, but I'm smiling."

"It took us ten months to get this house, and we don't feel like losing it."

The Diggers are renting the house, to be torn down for the Spadina Expressway, from the city for $250 a month. The rent, like the food, clothing and furniture (a few chairs and 20 bunk beds) are all donated.

"It's nice to know that people are willing to help us out," said Yorkville denizen Terry, as she sat on the floor of the darkened parlor watching dancers throb to The Wild Ones.

Yesterday evening, five days after opening up, the larder was bulging: twelve gallons of milk, enough food to last for "a couple of months" and the promise of free bread every day.

half, sat on a step and talked about where she had lived before. "I crashed wherever I could. It's never any trouble for a girl to find a place to stay," she smiled.

How had she heard of the Digger House? "If the earth blew up, everyone would know about it. It's almost like that."

For the fellows it's not so easy to find a place to stay.

"It's this or out on the street for me," said one big Negro from Chicago. "I'm like an apprentice, see. I feel that I must reveal myself through my art, my experience. It corrupts me to do it any other way. I work in all mediums."

As Joe Wheeler called up to rent a television set so that they could see them-

Students will tour Canada - free

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce is sponsoring a three-week all-expense-paid tour of Canada in May for 30 university students entering their final year of undergraduate study.

The students will meet and talk with prominent Canadians in the fields of education, industry, politics and culture.

At the end of the tour, which will take the winners to every province and the Northwest Territories, the students will be asked to write a 1,000-word report of the tour.

A joint committee of representatives of the Chamber will use academic performance, extra-curricular activities, personal attributes and interests and statements of reference from two of the applicant's professors to select the winners.

Applications may be obtained from registrar's offices or from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Applications must be received on or before March 15, and winners will be notified by April 12.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1968-69 TUESDAY, MARCH 5, 1968

A new method of electing five student representatives to the Athletic Directorate has been recommended by a student committee of the Directorate and will be used for the first time this year. If successful it will be incorporated in the constitution of the Athletic Association which has been under revision for the past year. To be eligible for nomination at the date of his nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University.

A modified Hore-Spence system has been used up to the present under which the candidate with the lowest number of votes is eliminated on each ballot until only five candidates remain. This year there will be one ballot only under which 125 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"
- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"
- The nominee polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph).

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate. The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article I of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport".

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence; also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, for the first time, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

Soviet anti-semitism sparks student activism

By DONNI BOHNEN

Student activism is taking a new direction with the organization of Student Concern for Soviet Jewry.

Working temporarily through the Hillel Foundation, the organization was formed last week as a reaction to anti-semitic discrimination in the Soviet Union.

Founder Abie Pesses (III UC) says the organization's objectives are threefold.

"We hope to supply factual information about conditions of Soviet Jewry, to arouse popular opinion on their behalf and to raise funds for groups working underground to alleviate their condition."

Three million Jews in the U.S.S.R. face spiritual and cultural extinction due to illegal restrictions imposed by the Soviet government, says Pesses.

The Stalinist regime initiated the anti-semitic campaign with the closing of all Jewish schools, the dismantling of Jewish publishing and the liquidation of Jewish anti-fascist committees. Jews were eliminated from positions of public authority and a mass anti-semitic propaganda campaign was initiated.

With Stalin's death, says Pesses, Soviet tactics became more subtle.

CONSTITUTION

The Soviet Constitution reads: "Freedom of religious worship and freedom of anti-religious propaganda is recognized for all citizens."

"Equality of rights of citizens of the USSR irrespective of their nationality or race, in all spheres of economic, state, cultural, social and political life is an immutable law."

But, says Pesses, no Jewish schools have been allowed to open in the U.S.S.R. since 1945; there now are only 60 synagogues, 390 less than in 1956; rabbinical students have been prevented from studying; and Hebrew Bibles and devotional articles have been banned.

Last year's war in the Middle East has aggravated the situation, Pesses says. The Soviet diplomatic break with Israel has been accompanied by stepped-up propaganda and anti-Jewish riots.

PROTEST

But Pesses feels that external pressure, public education and underground lobbying are the only tactics which can alleviate the situation.

"Protests are psychologically effective. The will of Soviet Jews to resist is strengthened by our action," he says.

"Also, the Soviet government, since Stalin's death, is very sensitive of its public image. Press reports of protests directed against their discriminatory policy carry a lot of weight in government circles especially since such discrimination is illegal."

The new organization is planning a community-wide conference to examine the issue Feb. 25-26.

The conference will feature J. B. Salsberg, a former communist MPP; Dr. Allen Pollack of the University of Pittsburgh, a specialist in Soviet Jewish studies; Yaakov Sharett, journalist and former Israeli embassy officer in Moscow, and others.

The student committee is trying to mobilize public support and interest in further long-range programs and protests.

Canadians afraid of Russians: Worthington

A journalist gets paid four times as much as a doctor in the Soviet Union, Peter Worthington, a Telegram reporter who spent two years in Russia said yesterday.

"In the Soviet Union it is more important to influence people than to save them," he said.

Worthington, addressing a packed lecture hall on Canadian-U.S.S.R. relations, claimed Canada's foreign policy is like that of a women's auxiliary—it changes topic every two weeks.

The Russians treat visiting Americans with courtesy, he said, while their attitude toward the Chinese verges on racial hatred.

While Worthington was quick to praise the Soviet education system and speak highly of their continuous scientific progress, he also criticized their inefficiency in providing local needs. Russia, he said, cannot adequately clothe, feed or house its own people, and its industries can't make ballpoint pens or taps which don't leak.

While Russia accuses Canada of all sorts of crimes such as plotting to kill Soviet officials, Canada always keeps quiet for fear of offending her, he said.

"Canada will have a better relationship with Russia if it uses less fear and more understanding," Worthington said.

RADIO MCGILL STUNS STUDENTS

Americans drop nuclear bomb on Hanoi?

MONTREAL (CUP) — Radio McGill stunned evening cafeteria patrons last week with an Orson Welles type announcement that the United States had just dropped a "medium yield nuclear device" on Hanoi.

The announcement shocked most listeners into silent immobility and girls began to cry. Angry students who went to Radio McGill were met by locked doors, backed by staffers who barricaded the inside.

The program originally went on the air as a mistake and was immediately retracted. Fifteen minutes later, another announcement said the original reports had been confirmed and the U.S. had indeed bombed the North Vietnamese capital.

The announcement said the president was to address the nation in 20 minutes and then switched to "reports" from Washington, Ottawa and the United Nations.

As the "president" was about to speak the Star Spangled Banner began to play and a quivering voice explained:

"There is a thin line between lunacy and reality. Radio McGill has taken you over that line. We now bring you back. The events described in the last 20 minutes were entirely fictional. This has been a Radio McGill production."

Chris Partner of the Radio McGill managing board said the program was inspired by Welles' 1938 broadcast of The War of the Worlds "a serious program with the greatest sincerity of purpose."

"The belligerent attitude of those hearing the program would strongly support the conclusion that the trend of events in the Far East have been so critical as to result in the marked diminution of the thin line between that which is credible and that which is obviously fictional."

Further Fekete hearings televised

MONTREAL (CUP) — John Fekete, McGill Daily columnist, will have a televised hearing after all. Perry Meyer, chairman of the senate committee on student discipline said on the weekend that the McGill administration has been asked to provide closed circuit television for the hearing. Fekete suspension will be lifted as soon as he appears at further hearings.

Fekete was suspended last Wednesday when he walked out of a closed hearing and refused to appear at further hearings unless they were televised.

A letter to the senate committee from the McGill student council said there was "widespread campus concern" about an open meeting. Daily editor Peter Allnut and supplement editor Pierre Fournier had earlier had a focused hearing on the same issue.

Motels woo UWO students

LONDON, Ont. (CUP) — A London motel is providing housing facilities for University of Western Ontario students.

The operator of the Trade Winds motel near London plans to offer students rooms in his motel at $1,000 for two terms, the same as at the university residences.

Both the motel and the residences offer three meals and a single room at this price, but the motel is throwing in radio and television, wall-to-wall broadloom, private washrooms and maid service.

And the motel will have no residence rules.

Straight eleven for Skulemen

By GELLIUS VOLLEYBALL

Now that we're talking about volleyball, it seems a propos to announce that Sr. Engineering has won the Victoria Staff Trophy, emblematic of supremacy in Interfaculty Volleyball, for the eleventh year in succession. (Miss Staff is a former Dean of Women at Margaret Addison.) Skule swept the final series against Vic in three games — winning the first by default (fief for shame, Vic) and the other two 15-8 and 15-9. Respectively, that is.

Squash Blues contra McGill

Non-playing captain Gary Miller will watch Varsity Blues attempt to dethrone defending champion McGill Redmen in the intercollegiate squash championships at McMaster Friday and Saturday.

Redmen have all five men returning to the team which captured the title last year. They are led by intercollegiate champion and national-ly ranked Peter Martin.

Martin is having an excellent year with a victory over Sam Howe the North American Open champion to his credit.

Blues are led by No. 1 seed veteran Frank Buck who will be up against rough competition in Martin and Bobby Dubeau of McMaster, both ranked nationally.

Following Buck is Vic Harding, Toronto and District junior champ, Dave Gunn in his first year on the five-man team, Terry Swinton who played in last year's tournament and Howie Fluxgold also in his first year on the five-man team.

This year's entry is the largest ever for the tournament reflecting the growing interest in squash.

McMaster and Waterloo are entering for the first time. Western, McGill and Toronto are the other entrants.

Gary Miller wishes the team all the best.

Russian victories

It's been nothing but the best so far for Varsity track stars Abby Hoffman and Dave Bailey in their current crack at competition in Russia.

Each is undefeated in two events. Bailey, Canadian record holder in the mile, won in successive indoor meets at distances of 3,000 and 1,500 metres. Miss Hoffman dusted off her competitors in duels of a half mile and 600 metres.

U of T's fleet female also took time out to celebrate her 21st birthday.

Merlocco the Magician, McGuinness, and Cengarie scored to pace SMC's 3-2 triumph over Trin. Murray and Akiyama scored for the Losers (Trin.)

Jr. Engineering, led by Pitts (2), Craig, and Higashi, edged Scar, 4-3. Scar scorers (note alliteration, showing influence of Anglo-Saxon verse on Varsity sports, your ECLECTRIC sports department) were Curiveau (2) and Proclmier.

Dents and SMC B tied, 2-2. Rice and Sullivan (Dents) and Teolis and Kelly (SMC B) scored.

Calliezzi scored twice and so did Pitmann as Pharm slaughtered Vic 11, 6-1. Rossart and Seychuck rounded out Pharm scoring; Shore replied for Vic 11.

BASKETBALL

Short scored 13 points to lead Vic over Meds A 86-63. Kent led Meds scorers with 18, it is true; yet can one judge a man's worth to his team by his point production?

You may well ask. Vic later edged Sr. Eng. 44-43 on Evans' 15 points. Slekys had 19 for Skule.

Longpre's 18 points carried SMC over UC, 40-34. (Actually, that's just a metaphor; he didn't really carry them.) Rogers led UC with 10.

PHE decided they wanted to get onto a good thing too, so they beat UC 46-30, led by 13 points by each of Crouter and Mackenzie. Feldman was UC's best with 15.

Ah, there ne'er was a gallant like young Sprogis, who had 21 points in Etindale's 47-43 triumph over Trin. Baines' 15 led Trin.

Quinlan had 14 points as Meds B deposed Archduke, 35-27. Kolin had the same total for Arch. (How many points did Kolin get? Address all answers to Rod Mickleburgh, Avuncular Editor, Varsity Sports; enclose Valentine card from U of T Bookstore and 25¢ to cover processing expenses. Contest deadline 1971 (like, when I graduate.)

BOB HAMILTON: cool, inconspicuous, effective

By PHIL BINGLEY

Practice was over for the Varsity Blues and several of the players sat watching an interfac hockey game while others finished their meal. As one stalker defencemen belted an opponent into the boards, Bob Hamilton, a four-year veteran with Varsity laughed out loud and yelled "Beauty check".

This is hockey as Hamilton enjoys it. Nicknamed "The Champ" because of his success in intercollegiate boxing two years ago, Bob thrives on hard work and hard hitting. Not known for his scoring ability, Hamilton has been the steadiest defencemen in Blues' offensively oriented attack this season.

His ability to head-man the puck and to pick up on rushing forwards without losing a step as he skates backwards have been the keys to Hamilton's success. "I'm not a strong puck carrier so I try to stay with the plays that work well for me. Whenever we control the puck in our own end, I try to move the puck up to one of our forwards. With all the firepower on this club I am more valuable if I play my position and let the forwards take care of the scoring."

Another thing that Bob does well is standing up at the blueline. His great reverse speed allows him to get back quickly without losing a stride and once back in position he and his partner try to force the play before the opposition moves into Blues defensive zone. "Both Brian Jones who played with me last season and Doug Jones who is my partner this year have helped my play. Both are standup players who like to hit and as a result one of us can play the puck while the other takes the man out."

Hamilton, who plans to enter the teaching profession, was once a top prospect in the Detroit Red Wing organization. However, after his first season with Hamilton of the Junior 'A' league, he decided that the long schedule was too much hockey for one year. "In my first year at Hamilton we played 84 games between August and May. By the end of the season I was completely fed up with the sight of a puck, and when I returned the following year I'd lost a lot of my keenness for hockey." Hamilton left the bigtime at Christmas of that season.

Hamilton considers shooting to be the weakest point in his game. "My shot wouldn't break a pane of glass," he claimed. What he didn't point out is that his strokes from the point are low, accurate and easy to deflect.

Hamilton was chosen to the SIHL second all-star team last year, and he should be a first team pick this year. But chances are he won't because people tend to overlook his cool, deliberate, inconspicuous style of play.

Yet his teammates appreciate his work, and Bob will certainly be a key man in this year's drive, toward another Canadian college crown for Blues.

Lovely, lithe ladies lubricate limbs in buxom Benson Building

By LOUIS ERLICHMAN

Supple young bodies. An array of soft, shapely torsos and smooth, downy limbs to gladden the heart and improve the circulation.

The Victory? A year's subscription to Playboy? Neither, dear reader. Rather the first Girl's Interfaculty Gymnastics Meet held last Wednesday at the Benson Building.

Watching those lithe, slender female forms, those delectable thighs, one could almost feel . . .

The results? Oh, yes, the results.

In Level A, Diane Leitch (III PHE) was the winner. Ruth McMullen (III PHE) and Sue Bishop (II PHE) tied for second, and Barb Holland (II PHE) and Klara Lendway (III PHE) tied for third.

Jane Williams stood first in level B. Tied for second were Bonnie Tribble (II PHE) and Linda Hardy (III PHE). Carol Angelson (III PHE) took third.

WHY NOT?

U of T judo team "gets it in the neck" from bureaucracy

By JIM COWAN

Without dropping a match the University of Toronto judo team lost its OQAA championship in Montreal last weekend.

The team was disqualified before the tournament began, when the other participating universities refused to allow the U of T contingent to take part. The reason given was that U of T judo coach Mitsuo Tamino, was under suspension from the Canadian Kodokan Black Belt Association, the ruling body of Canadian judo.

A letter from the secretary of the CKBBA, Victor Kadonaga, to the other OQAA teams suggested that their members would be banned if they fought the Varsity team.

Kadonaga is the brother of the Waterloo judo coach.

Allan Sattin (I Law), secretary of the U of T club, has protested the exclusion in a letter to Warren Stevens, director of U of T athletics.

The ban was effected by the OQAA standing committee on judo in a meeting in Montreal Saturday morning. Sattin says the committee exceeded its powers in banning his team.

"They have the power to decide the order of events and select the site of next year's tournament. They can't make new rules," he explained.

Stevens confirmed this, saying that only the Administrative Council of the OQAA could make or amend the by-laws under which a tournament is held.

Apart from the doubtful legality of the standing committee's action, Sattin is concerned about the interference by the CKBBA in a strictly university affair.

"It all comes down to this: the U of T judo team, composed of full-time university students, was not allowed to compete in university athletics."

The judo team is angry that they were allowed to travel to Montreal, only to be barred from competing. The team had passed up an earlier invitation to Cornell so they could afford the Montreal trip.

The team was also invited to McMaster, but they will not be able to afford this trip either. It cost about $250 to send the 10-member delegation to Montreal.

In his letter, Sattin questions the validity of calling the Montreal tournament a championship. "How can there be a championship without the titleholders able to compete?" he asked.

Stevens has sent copies of Sattin's four page letter, which outlines in detail the events in Montreal, to the other OQAA athletic directors. He plans to bring the matter up at the OQAA Administrative Council meeting on February 26-27.

"It was pretty unfair," he commented yesterday. "When judo was first proposed, the Administrative Council decided they would run it on their own. It's a pretty serious situation. I don't know what the Council might do."

"The meets are arranged by the Council and should go through as planned. The whole organization could come apart if the standing committee starts assuming powers not delegated to them."

As Sattin explains it, the question is clearly one of whether an outside body can impose its will on university athletes. His letter states that "All the members of the standing committee are puppets of the CKBBA. The only reason for their not allowing U of T to compete was their fear of reprisals from the CKBBA . . ."

"Why should an outside organization be allowed to dictate policy to the universities."

The judo club is requesting an investigation to look into the matter. They also want a member of the CKBBA to appear before a board of inquiry to explain the actions of CKBBA. Such an inquiry could be ordered at the Administrative Council meeting.

But no matter what the final outcome, the judo team has lost their championship for this year. Last year they swept the field, placing first in every event but one, in which they came second. As Sattin suggested, "Maybe they're afraid to fight us."

LANGDON-SCHACHAR SWEEP

By DAVE FRANK

Steve Langdon swept to an easy victory in the presidential election last night, polling more votes than both of his opponents combined.

Langdon (III Trin) counted 2709 votes to 1040 for Peter Szekely (III UC) and 1036 for Glen Brownlee (IV Vic).

In the vice-presidential race Norm Schachar (II Meds) overwhelmed Dave Nitkin (III New) by a tally of 2767 to 1166.

The balloting was sparse, with less than 25 per cent of the eligible voters turning out. In the January contest between Tom Faulkner and Bill Charlton twice as many students voted.

Langdon outscored his opponents at every polling station on campus except Engineering, where Szekely took him by 61 votes.

His greatest margins came from the Sidney Smith poll, Meds, Trinity, University, New, and St. Michael's Colleges.

On Brownlee's home territory, Victoria, Langdon still managed to edge Brownlee by 46 votes.

Schachar, Langdon's running mate, led Nitkin at every poll including Engineering.

It was the night of the computers as the IBM-card ballots were stacked on the long carriages and fed into the grey machines.

But it didn't work as smoothly as expected. It took several machines four hours to stutter through the 4,500 ballots. Finally a computer on the 12th floor of the New Physics Building gave way and blew a fuse. The last 250 ballots were counted by hand.

Harvey Schipper (IV AP-SC), who masterminded the program, blamed it on the IBM cards.

"They were warped and inferior in quality," he said, "If we'd had the right cards, the results would have been out by 8 p.m."

As it was the scrutineers waited in the corridors, drinking, joking, playing cards.

The candidates themselves waited nervously in different

Sir George garbage can crew invade

By MARY KATE ROWAN

Beware of Sir George Williams types bearing garbage cans.

"They're our main reason for being here," said David Langlois, one of 12 students from Sir George Williams University in Montreal. "We want to return to Toronto what is rightly hers—six garbage cans."

The procession of three cars drove into the City Hall parking lot yesterday at 10 a.m. trailed by a motorcycle policeman.

An army of newsmen sprinkled with a few curious bystanders awaited the delegation. Behind their grins the policemen looked apprehensive.

Queried one, "Now just a minute kids. What are you doing?"

Answered Howard Arfin, "We're from Sir George Williams University on a goodwill mission to return these garbage cans to Toronto."

"After all, the honourable mayor did ask for them."

Last Fall, Mayor William Dennison asked Montreal mayor Jean Drapeau to return a number of garbage cans and park benches the City of Toronto had loaned to Expo.

Drapeau had attempted to persuade the Toronto officials to change the loan into a permanent gift, but council refused.

"You won't leave them lying around now will you," admonished the policeman.

"They do belong to the City of Toronto," said Arfin in mock seriousness.

Last Sunday, the students sent Mayor Dennison a telegram announcing their expected arrival but gave no reason for the visit.

The mayor didn't respond.

The 12 emissaries arrived in Toronto Wednesday evening, and spent the night at The Varsity office eating, singing, playing word games, and (occasionally) sleeping.

A Telegram reporter attending yesterday's ceremonies found this part of the itinerary deeply fascinating and asked for a detailed explanation of the various word games.

His thirst for knowledge unquenched, the reporter then pressed Arfin for a minute description of a car accident which had occurred en route from Montreal.

"This may be human interest, but don't you think you're going too far?", Arfin asked, and the matter of the accident was dropped.

At that moment, enter His Worship the Mayor, sporting a yellow construction helmet and carrying a real genuine tomahawk.

Dennison addressed his opening remarks in French but the students weren't satisfied. They gave him an Arret-Stop street sign and a French-English dictionary.

"I've been working on my French for twenty years but can't find anyone to talk to here," apologized the Mayor.

"Come to Montreal," suggested the students.

Gifts included a shovel "to restart the scrapped Eaton centre" and a puck "so the Maple Leafs can find the net."

Attention was centered on the garbage cans. "Only one is a real garbage can stolen from Expo," confessed the students, but they are all properly labelled "City of Toronto."

"What's that," asked the Mayor, pointing to Georgie, a mallard duck.

"He's a penguin our mascot for our Winter Carnival which will be held February 19-24," explained the students gasping for breath.

They admitted that part of their aim in pulling the caper was to publicize the S.G.W. Winter Carnival.

The mayor outlined the glories of Toronto and urged the students to visit Fort York.

"We'd like to, but we have to get back to Montreal. We have classes tomorrow," replied Arfin.

As the visitors trooped into the Mayor's office for a guided tour "Sloppy Joe Novak" carefully concealed a bottle of beer he had in his pocket.

Next the students had a tour of the City Hall.

"Gee, you sure have a nice mayor" commented one student "Of course, I still like Jean-baby."

Howard Arfin denied that they would have stormed the Mayor's office if he had refused to see them.

"We wouldn't do anything rash like that. After all, we are university students."

Twelve delightful diplomats from Sir George Williams University arrive at City Hall to return garbage cans from Expo.

Faulkner furious at UC bias charge

Tom Faulkner, incumbent Students Administrative Council president, reacted angrily yesterday to a newspaper article quoting him as charging "that University College may be practising discrimination in hiring its faculty."

The Toronto Star article yesterday says Faulkner, at a Brotherhood Day panel discussion Wednesday, said:

"One wonders why there is an absence of Jewish professors in senior positions around this college."

In a sharply worded statement yesterday, Faulkner said:

"The point that I did make was an empirically verifiable fact: there are not and never have been Jewish people in the most senior positions at UC."

"The press," he continued, "has turned a plea for a study of the way people relate to one another in general at this university into a crusade against a conspiracy to keep Jews from being hired to the UC faculty."

The Star article contains denials of the alleged charge from several faculty and administrators.

"To hell with Tom Faulkner," Provost Moffat Woodside is quoted as saying. "This is absolute nonsense. He's crazy."

In his statement, Faulkner said: "If someone had commented on the fact that, although SAC is 20-per-cent Jewish my executive is completely gentile, I should have tried to think through the factors like race, religion and sex that shape human relationships in even the most liberal minds and institutions.

"With the insinuation of conspiracy removed from my remark, we can contemplate the possibility that neither administrator nor student leader may be entirely free of prejudice.

"I suspect that the real problem is a basic human problem—we don't love one another, and we use rationalizations such as race and religion to reinforce it."

Szekely spent a quiet secluded evening with his fiancée as he waited for the count. He could not be reached for comment on the results.
But his two campaign managers watched the ballots closely, fortifying themselves with generous liquid refreshment.
Brownlee and his supporters gathered at Victoria, after a tense college council meeting.
As the room slowly filled with smoke, the candidates grew edgy. There was a dead silence when the final results were announced.

Then Brownlee walked across Queen's Park to congratulate the victor.
Langdon and Schachar were waiting at the SAC office. Tom Faulkner sat close by reading a book about King: Camelot.
Hersf Ezrin dropped in to chew the fat. "University College has been given representation on the Faculty Council," he said. "Right now they are negotiating how much. We've asked for open meetings and 40 to 50 seats."
Two hours later there was no air, and too much smoke. The results came through. Dogs barked, corks popped.

"Terrific!" commented Faulkner, "They're the best men for the job."
Langdon and Schachar were standing on some cartoons reading out the final totals, when Brownlee walked in.
"I want to congratulate Glen," said Langdon, "he ran a very fair, a very enjoyable campaign."
"I hope they do well, I wish them luck."

ROM to sever connection with university

By PAUL CARSON

Professor Peter Swann, director of the Royal Ontario Museum, has applauded proposed legislation that would separate the museum from the University of Toronto and up it under direct financial control of the Ontario government.

"This is one of the nation's most precious cultural assets and it should not be allowed to limp along as it was," Prof. Swann said in an interview.

Legislation to change the status and financing of the ROM was promised in Wednesday's speech from the Throne opening the Ontario Legislature.

Prof. Swann called the proposed changeover "the second important step forward in the revival of Canada's largest museum."

"The first important step was the Ontario government's appreciation last year of the museum's plight, and the ready measure of financial support it provided."

Since its affiliation with the university in 1947, the museum has greatly expanded its research, excavation and display facilities.

However, says Prof. Swann, its increasing financial needs have been gradually "submerged beneath the overwhelming demands of a rapidly expanding university."

He expects the proposed takeover by the province will enable the museum "to enlarge public financial support and to serve the whole province more effectively."

Director Swann said annual museum attendance is close to 800,000 persons "and that's more than any other activity in Toronto — even hockey games."

Prof. Swann's excitement at the proposed new financial arrangements was echoed by Information Director Bruce Easson.

"Our most pressing need is a larger purchase fund," Mr. Easson said. "Until Prof. Swann came two years ago, this was almost non-existent."

The museum has managed to build up a purchase trust fund of about $75,000, but usually is able to spend only the interest — approximately $4,900 a year.

Academic problems → dropouts

By SUE HELWIG

Students are not withdrawing from the university for financial reasons, say arts and science registrars.

"The main reasons for withdrawal can be classified as scholastic and academic problems," Registrar R. M. H. Shepherd of University College said.

"Either they are having difficulty with the course or they have lost interest in it. But almost no students are leaving for financial reasons, perhaps only one per cent," he added.

By Wednesday, one day before the final withdrawal date, 373 students have withdrawn from the Faculty of Arts and Science and 99 from the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering.

Both of these figures are slightly less than last year's percentages — engineering 4.9 per cent this year and 5.3 per cent last year, and arts 3.7 per cent this year and 4.4 per cent last year.

Registrar A. C. M. Ross of Victoria College echoed Prof. Shepherd's words and commented that there don't seem to be too many weepers any more.

"But I still keep a box of Kleenex handy just in case," he said.

When a student wants to withdraw, we try everything," he explained.

"We offer them money and we offer them tutors and we offer them counselling. And sometimes we try to find a place in residence for the student who has to commute a great distance."

Registrar David King of Innis College feels that withdrawal is never a failure or a wasted year.

"At least you've found out something about yourself," he told me in an interview.

"The university is geared to people with a goal. There is no place for people who seek self-development in a free atmosphere."

Registrar King may see a student for 15 minutes or they may spend four or five hours together discussing the problem.

"I always ask the withdrawer two questions," he explained, "Why not stick it out and what are you going to do when you withdraw?"

"I feel that it is important for the student to have some positive course of action, even if it's hitch-hiking to Mexico."

"All who have withdrawn for reasons other than academic difficulty go with my blessing," he said with a smile.

"There is no wrong reason for going except the reason that the student has not clarified in his own mind."

Letters to the editor

dropping out

Sir:

Two years ago I was a first-year student at the University of Toronto. In my five years at high school I had been an honor student and had graduated as an Ontario Scholar. I failed my first year at the university. This happens to many Ontario Scholars. Why it happens is difficult to say. I think one reason is the difference in the courses offered at high school and university levels.

Most high school courses can be absorbed the night before the exam while this is next to impossible with a university course. An honor student, usually having a good memory, can go all the way through high school studying only the night before each exam.

When he reaches university this study method backfires in two ways. The student finds it difficult to start studying until it is too late; and if he does study ahead, he finds it difficult to remember anything he learned more than a few nights before.

In high school an honor student is usually sought out and encouraged by his teachers. He is used to being more than just another student in the class. At university, he finds himself in a class of 100 students and discovers the professor doesn't know one student from another.

Any encouragement the student needs comes from within himself, since the professor has too many students to have time to care how any one individual is getting along.

For myself this situation made the work seem unimportant since no one in authority seemed to care about how much anyone knew or did.

Looking back, I realize I never really got into my subjects because there was no one to give me the initiative to do so. There always had been before. I was not very mature, I didn't realize how bad the situation was until it was too late to do anything about it.

In my own case, I feel that going to an out-of-town university for the first year contributed to my failing. This may not affect others at all; but moving away from home for the first time and going from high school to university was too much for me to adjust to all at once.

Attending university away from home is a good experience, but more profitable after the first year.

Finally, I think that for first-year students at least there should be regular Christmas exams, just as intensive and just as long as the final exams. This would give the student a good idea of how he is doing.

Speaking from experience, I know it is quite possible to do well on the Christmas exam and then fail miserably at the end of the year.

There are probably many more reasons why an honor student from high school fails in university. The ones I have mentioned are those that seem to me the most important as I look back now.

—Linda MacLeod

(Ed. note: Interesting, but maybe your criticisms should be directed against the highschools and your own performance in highschool rather than against the university).

mr. davies replies

Sir:

I read your editorial, Integrity in the Backlands, with interest and there are one or two comments which I think I should make.

The first is that I do not feel that Peterborough the home of Trent University, will very much like being referred to as 'the Backlands'. A certain humility in the use of such terms is always advisable, for there are parts of the world from which even Toronto might seem to be the backlands.

The second . . . which I think should be made is that I did not personally sell the Peterborough Examiner; it was owned by several shareholders, of whom I was by no means the largest, and the decision to sell was not one I could have resisted even if I had chosen to do so.

The third point which I dispute is the suggestion that I have somehow retreated from an honourable occupation to a less honourable one by joining the faculty of this university. I have been a journalist for, all told, 28 years; when any of the present members of the Varsity staff have become professional journalists and have completed 28 years at that work, I shall be prepared to discuss matters of integrity with them.

out of context

Sir:

I should like to make one small but very important correction to the report of the SAC's presentation of its comments on student representation to the Senate presented last Friday night. My final remark, "in the end we're still students and they're still faculty and administration," was taken out of context. As we left the Senate Chambers, we were followed by Professor D.F. Forster, the Vice-Provost, who, among other things, asked me what we had meant when we suggested that one of the things to be investigated by a commission on the structure and purpose of the University's government was "social stratification." I replied that, when students, faculty and administrators sit down to work together, a freshman will bow to a fourth year student, a student to the dean of the faculty, and assistant professor to the chairman of the department, not because of the intrinsic value of the ideas the latter put forth, but because they hold a position senior to them. To my mind, authority based on the position one holds rather than on the value of one's thought is damaging, not useful. It was in this context that my remark quoted in Monday's Varsity must be taken. Taken out of context, it suggests that I subscribe to the "enemy thesis" of university government reform.

Tom Faulkner, SAC President

we're confused

Sir:

The statements on the Bookstore attributed to Steven Langdon (The Varsity, Feb. 12) and Tom Faulkner (The Varsity, Feb. 14) confuse us. If by Bookstore Committee Mr. Faulkner means the Press Committee of the Board of Governors, then this committee could not possibly have reversed any decisions because it has not met to this date to consider the questions before it. If, on the other hand, he refers to the unconstituted group of representatives from the Students' Administrative Council, the Bookstore Management and the Press, including the undersigned, then we would like to correct the statement that "The Bookstore Committee agreed to meet the demands (of SAC) but then reversed their decision in January and have refused to speak to SAC."

In meeting with Messrs. Faulkner, Langdon, Nitkin and others, we stated that we would endorse the requests put forward by SAC, namely:

- (1) to relieve the University of Toronto Press of its financial responsibility for the Bookstores;
- (2) to advise the Press Committee to consider the granting of a 10% discount on all textbooks and to ask the University to underwrite the resulting (additional) net deficit of over $75,000;
- (3) to institute formally a Bookstores Committee.

While voicing reservations regarding some of the details and procedures suggested in the SAC brief, the Press has not changed its opinion on any of these points, and has endorsed them in letters to the Administration and to members of SAC.

Not having been approached by any SAC representatives since our last meeting, we have at no time refused to speak to SAC. We hope, to the contrary, that the constructive dialogue between SAC representatives and Bookstore management, which for the first time this year was beginning to bear fruits, will continue on a regular basis.

nuts, bolts and mouse manure

Sir:

The recent SAC study of housing missed one of the fine points of living in residence, mainly the stimulating food. The person eating in residence is assured of variety, mostly a variety of bugs (dead or alive) worms of assorted pieces, lengths and colors, odd-sized nuts and bolts and liberal sprinklings of mouse manure.

If a person is unlucky enough to miss any of these treats and consume an apparently harmless meal, he need not go away disappointed as it is quite possible that it is only the time lag between foul food tonight and the shits tomorrow morning. If only several such reactions were noted, other causes could be blamed, but when most of those who eat a particular New College meal get cleaned out, it is not hard to identify the source.

If such an occasion were rare it could be treated with humor, but when it is such a typical movement in residences it is time for the health inspector. If such events took place in public eateries they would be shunned by the public if not closed by officials—the relatively captive resident should not be subjected to such laxity by catering staffs or to university officials who fall to act towards tightening up the situation.

It would appear that those responsible believe the quotation should read "Eat shit—forty million residents do".

misrepresents Rhodesia

Sir:

The lecture by Prof. Pratt last Wednesday on "Canada and Rhodesia" was yet another example of the general tendency among self-professed experts to provide solutions for problems whose complexity they have failed to grasp. Mixing up his carefully researched statistics with statements that there is "legally enforced job discrimination" in Rhodesia (there is not) and "vastly disproportionate spending on European education" (African education accounted for nearly 10 per cent of government spending 1966-67. Europeans pay a "vastly disproportionate" share of taxes) the professor muddled his way through to a conclusion whereby a foreign, possibly Canadian "presence" in Rhodesia would ensure majority rule. How about a French task force in Canada under Gen. de Gaulle—to ensure equal opportunity for French Canadians?

Had he looked at Rhodesia IN THE CONTEXT OF AFRICA instead of in the context of North America he might have appreciated some of the tragic consequences of forcing the vote on vast masses incapable of understanding let alone wielding it, and in so doing rendering them liable not only to intimidation by rival "nationalist" leaders but to the breakdown in political and economic stability which has marked similar experiments in other parts of Africa.

Surely the professor recalls the slaughter and upheaval in the Congo in 1960 and ever since, in Zanzibar in 1964, the Lumpa Massacre in Zambia, the Lincoln Salon Limousine valued at $47,275 ordered by President Nkrumah shortly before his deposition. Can he honestly believe that the calm and unconcern which mark the black Rhodesian are born of fear and oppression—but perhaps he has not actually been to Rhodesia.

Political power is not necessarily equivalent to well-being and content, nor is it always considered more important. Let those who would organize Rhodesian life, feel, know, experience and understand it. Let them examine it in the CONTEXT OF RHODESIA—a mixture of the primitive and the developing which a sophisticated North American has so much trouble comprehending.

KARSH: a great photographer

By JOHN SWAIGEN

Before Christmas Joan Murray wrote a penetrating criticism of Yousuf Karsh ("Karsh: Only the Great Make it into his Book"). Although I have to agree with many of the points she makes, at least individually, on the whole she is wrong. Karsh is a great photographer.

Overcame lighting problems

Karsh is a master of lighting, both artistically and technically. He pioneered in the use of portable electronic flash lighting in portraiture. With it he was able to take portraiture out of the studio and into the milieu of the subject, capturing the creature in its natural surroundings. He learned to size up the available light in any situation and quickly set up supplementary flash units to fill in the gaps and create the lighting he wants.

Eliminated artificial posing

With this lighting Karsh is able to hold a conversation with his subject, establish rapport, let the subject relax, and wait for that revelation of personality which occurs in "a small fraction of a second with an unconscious gesture, a gleam of the eye". Then the flash. Karsh's great technical contribution was that he did away with the artificiality that results from posing people to suit the lighting instead of adapting the lighting to suit the people.

Portraits always different

A book of portraits is not a good vehicle for the artist. There is not enough variety in the subject matter. It is impossible to look at forty or fifty pages of faces without getting bored. The magic of Karsh is that after you have thumbed through so many pages of faces that they all look alike, one face will suddenly grab you. The eyes will hold you as if the person were in the room with you. And it is a different face each time you open the book. I have looked at Karsh portraits three or four times without seeing anything even interesting, then, on fifth or sixth viewing I see a magnificent human being looking back (Anna Magnani).

Focus hard to photograph

Portraiture is the perfect example of the phrase "art conceals the art". Even with a little training in portraiture I am still tempted to say "anyone can snap a picture of a face", but the more I try to do this the more I realize the difficulty of getting even a technically competent picture of a face (look at the portraits on the back page of the Review section. Is there one of them which is a real human being?).

Captures real person

People who know the Karsh subjects personally say that in most cases it is Karsh who has done the definitive portrait of them. A Hollywood writer who worked with Cecil B. DeMille on "The Ten Commandments" and has been friends with him ever since recently told me how Karsh photographed DeMille on the set of that movie. Of all the pictures Karsh took of him, the one he chose to exhibit was one in which he caught DeMille as he became intent on a passage in a book. That photograph, the writer told me, seemed to him to catch all the strength and greatness of DeMille, not DeMille the famous movie maker, but DeMille the individual, a painstaking craftsman and perfectionist.

Not only the famous

Personally I feel that the great (and the great aren't necessarily the famous) often do make better subjects than you or I for the same reasons that they are better at their chosen fields than you or I, that is, the ability to express themselves more fully. But that is neither here nor there. If you want to see how Karsh does photographing steel workers and farmers they are in "Canada" photos by Karsh, text by John Fisher publ. — T. Allen 1960. For those who do not mind Karsh's preoccupation with the famous, I would recommend Portraits of Greatness rather than the Karsh Portfolio (which Miss Murray reviewed); it has a higher percentage of outstanding pictures.

The Saint Valentine's Day Jam Session

By JACK McCaffrey

Let me tell you about Valentine's Day in jazzland.

On our way down to the Town Tavern to hear Clark Terry, we decided to plug into the grapevine at Sam the Record Man's. "Sonny Greenwich is back in town," was the word. "He's playing tonight at the Alexis Zorba club."

That was exciting news, for we had heard many stories about Greenwich in the last few years, but hadn't had the opportunity to hear his music.

But meanwhile, what about Clark Terry? Well, there isn't much to tell. You may have heard of the renowned trumpeter and flugelhornist through his work with the Skitch Henderson band on the Johnny Carson Show. But for jazz fans, Terry is valued for his playing with the Duke Ellington Orchestra in the '50's, and with his own very fine quintet.

But if you want to hear Clark Terry, you would be smart to spend your money on the records he made with his quintet. For at the Town Tavern, he seems to be coasting most of the time. Although he is never less than an extremely proficient, polished, and professional musician, his current offerings are not very stirring. It would help, I suspect, if he were playing in more stimulating company.

The Charles Rallo Trio is nothing more than a junior Oscar Peterson Trio — tickling away unobtrusively in the background.

This policy of bringing in big name soloists and then saddling them with a local rhythm section is always regrettable. Of course Toronto musicians are good — but how many of them are in class with the best jazz musicians in the world?

If there is one who has a chance of making it, Sonny Greenwich should be the man. The last time I heard him was 5 years ago when he was sitting in with Coleman Hawkins. Since then, he has played around Toronto infrequently, and has been heard quite a bit in Montreal. For a short time he played with the John Handy group, and also cut a record in New York with Hank Mobley, Cedar Walton, and Billy Higgins. But somehow, I just never got around to hearing him. I regret that.

Finally, if the rumour was right, we had a chance to catch up with him. And so it was that at 10:30 on Saint Valentine's Day, we climbed the stairs to the Greek restaurant where the session was to take place. You may have seen the signs around campus — "Zorba Con Jazz" — advertising the Geordie McDonald Trio, who play at this replica of Athens on Yonge St., below Dundas.

As we entered, Greenwich was tuning up his guitar and meeting the members of the group. For the first few numbers, there was a feeling of uneasiness, which is natural enough for a group of musicians who have never played together before. But the main difficulty, I think, was the disparity in ability between the guitarist and the trio.

Bruce Harvey, although only 23 years old, looks like a 35 year old senior executive, but is a jazz pianist of substantial promise, with a fluent technique and some good ideas. The diminutive bassist, Gary Brisbane, is also very good. To me it seems the weakness in the group is largely attributable to drummer, McDonald who although he has some good ideas, tends to be loud and heavy handed.

But Sonny Greenwich is in another class altogether. His playing is mature and exciting and uniquely his own. Spinning out long, complex lines with wide intervals leaping out in all directions, Greenwich never takes the easy way out. On slow ballads, which he seems to like, Greenwich displays an intense lyricism; on faster pieces, he shows harmonic adventurousness and builds to great peaks of excitement.

After the first set, Greenwich disappeared, and it looked as if he might never return. But finally, around 1 a.m. he walked in with a small and very beautiful woman. As the guitarist picked up his instrument, his beautiful friend sat down at the piano, and with her tiny, delicate fingers attacked the keyboard. In a medium tempo blues, she played strong, earthy, controlled phrases, which gradually became longer and more complex, filled with all kinds of unusual twists, and yet always articulated clearly and forcefully. She played with power, real blues feeling, and imagination. It was beautiful.

Greenwich responded, playing at first with simple funky lines, then extending the harmony to create a solo of richness and power.

It was worth waiting for.

Greenwich will be heard around here in the future. If he could get his own group together to provide him with sympathetic support and stimulation, it would be an exciting and rewarding musical experience.

Dear Mr. Nicklebuggar:

We, the undersigned, strongly regret the absence of the Jazz Column by Brother Jack McCaffrey (guru of music and semi-professional jazz pianist) in the Review section of last week's Varsity. We realize that as a newly-appointed (alternate) editor of the aforementioned paper, you wish to establish your own outlook by being the first this year to devote an entire issue to pseudo-intellectual bullshit, aware of course that Mr. McCaffrey's usual pugent, clear, down-to-earth approach adds a jarring note (i.e. discord) to the overall tone of fuzzy-minded sudo-radical ameliorative (sic) journalism for which the Varsity is so well known. Therefore, we demand that the whole issue of the next issue be devoted to jazz even though you may not be able to see its relevance to your vaguely new-left, so-called political orientation. We do not wish to cast dispersions on your integrity but on your editorial intelligence.

Contemporary music of the Toronto Symphony

By PAUL DARBY

If the Toronto Symphony performed one contemporary work at each concert during the remainder of the 1968 series, then, by next September the audience would have dwindled to under 500 persons. And even with 500 educated and appreciative listeners (and that estimate is rather optimistic), no city, not even Toronto the Culturally Good, could afford to subsidize an orchestra.

Toronto loves tunes! Ah for end rhyme and Mozart. What enthusiastic clapping, what "bravos" (no inhibition here) for Joerg Demus and the Heintzman. Hurrah for Mozart and the T.S.

I could watch the audience check off the recurring rondo theme in Mozart's Concerto No. 21 on their finger tips, their eyes aglow with pre-determinism.

But didn't they notice, under the formality, under the mathematically conceived sonata form, that the string intonation was ragged, that the Allegro movement was texturally coarse, that guest conductor David Zinman had little success co-ordinating the orchestra with the piano part, that Demus, though tonally precise, was rhythmically unsteady?

Or were all these people who applauded so warmly spending their time preparing for recapitulations instead of listening to music?

The highlight of the evening was the Toronto premiere of Penderecki's, Threnody: To the Victims of Hiroshima. Here was a work for string orchestra displaying sonorities unlike any I have heard, and certainly at the other end of the string spectrum from Stravinsky's Concerto in D, on the same program, which is a soupy extension of impressionistic emotion.

I can think of no instrument more capable of displaying tension approaching hysteria than a violin. Take a thread of steel one inch long and apply enough pressure to produce a continual vibration. The result is a piercing sound, somewhere below the audible level of sound, yet above the area of distinguishable pitch.

This was one of the major components of Threnody and as a musical element it was a sound well used. Other sounds used were arpeggios played below the bridge (producing an eeriness something akin to a berserk air-raid siren), magnificent glissandi in contrary motion which produced an illusion of sickening vertigo, percussive effects of hand against the wood of cellos, bow against tailpiece, vibrati that wavered at least a semitone.

The most amazing aspect of the work was the composer's application of sparse materials to create an over-all visual and auditory image of great magnitude. There were many string sounds left untouched by Penderecki, as inappropriate for the sonority he desired.

What I mean to say is that Penderecki has not merely been "cute," has not simply combined all conceivable string sounds into a mass of white noise. He has restricted himself, has painstakingly built particular sounds around his intellectual theme. He has not allowed his artistry to slip the way of unrestrained affectation.

There were, as I remember, four sections; the first of which was built on a growing accumulation of piercing sounds that have been likened to walls. The tension was considerable and never relaxed or wavered.

The second section made use of clustered sound, particularly in the cellos. The whole tended to suggest a rather lyrical aftermath to the initial horrors of Hiroshima.

The third section was a failure. It was conceived as such. It was an illogical amalgam of sounds, none of them coherently related. If you consider section one was the direct aftermath, section two, with all its decaying sounds in the low strings, was the period of mental shock, then section three represented the image of debris and complete visual anarchy.

Section four was something of a restatement of section one but without the same apocalyptic climax, and without any suggestion of repair or hope.

Though I consider this a highly effective representation of the subject, I think that, because of the scant material, Penderecki has fettered himself much more than, say, R. Murray Schafer, whose Threnody on the same theme, being a collage of electronic, vocal, instrumental sounds tends to suggest the vastness of the catastrophe more than this, a rather more personal, introverted reaction to Hiroshima.

The major difference between these two works is of course, that, while Schafer comments on the external fact of the bombing, Penderecki stresses the human aspect. Penderecki writes from inside the mind of a victim of Hiroshima. Schafer is only an observer.

Penderecki's work is one of great cohesive strength. It is a very short work, a very intense dramatization, an effort at recreating a definite experience, an attempt to bypass the abstractions of music to create an immediacy of emotional involvement. Thus as a tone poem it is a strong statement.

But it is not primarily dependent on literary or visual imagery. It is very much music. As music it is not finally bound to the physical description of Hiroshima. It is an intricately intellectual blend of sonorities. The resultant emotions exist in their own right, the Hiroshima theme merely providing the matrix binding them.

The Leary Trip

by ALLAN KAMIN

In the Varsity Review of Feb. 2, several writers recalled the exciting mystical aura, surrounding LSD, which the UC Dope Festiva, Perception '67, helped to generate. Timothy Leary was telling us, or so it seemed through the mass media, that dropping a capsule or tablet of LSD into one's mouth was a certain ticket to expanded consciousness, to God, to the "beyond within".

People were programming trips to fit the Leary model, then feeling cheated when the anticipated mystical experience was not forthcoming.

Now, Brian Cruchley, in his own unique and entertaining porridge style, has proclaimed the end of the era of "psychedelic hullshit". Heads today, he says, are using acid as they use a number of other brands of dope — for fun and relaxation. No more "God in a pill".

Most of those who constitute the growing campus "head" scene were indeed naive about LSD at this time last year.

A trip was a solemn convocation with the Creator which would have an earth-shaking impact that would last for the rest of their lives. But, more often than not, God never showed.

Some people tripped once or twice, became disillusioned, and quit. Some continued tripping very occasionally on small doses, enjoying themselves, but never really having their minds blown.

But there are some, definitely a minority of users, who have had the fortune to break through to the other side of reality. They may have spent their first few trips in general frustration, caught up in their own personality hassles or other assorted unromantic phenomena. But they persisted, and when their number came up for the Big Trip, they were ready. And, once the barrier was pierced, it became increasingly easy to do the same thing on subsequent trips.

And they discovered that ... o, no ... that the compartmentalized reverent mystical experience is an illusion, hullshit, an artifact of language; that, in fact, simply being totally stoned on acid is being God., being all life, all consciousness; and they realized that God is actually ... A BIG JOKE; and that the holiest reaction possible is not fear-and-trembling, but rather laughter; and that the best defence that one can make for being God, being stoned, being everything, for four hours, is that it's GOOD CLEAN FUN.

Mr. Cruchley was correct in calling it relaxing. Being totally stoned on acid is being ultimately relaxed. We are all normally up-tight, and being up-tight is being divorced from our true nature, which is God. But acid can enable one to ease every point of tension in his mind and body, to relax into being the All. It's simply going home.

Standard one-trip doses, as sold on the black market, are generally too weak to get you there, and one might perhaps need to use three times the black-market dose to discover what Leary is really talking about. Curiously, a large dose is probably safer for most people than is a small one, for enough psychic energy is provided to blast one's way through discomfiting personal hassles. But even with a large dose, some minds find it easier than others to rid themselves of the bullshit structures that prevent a naked confrontation with existence.

When one comes down from his trip, once again tightening up, he finds that he has retained little of his experience, for the psychedelic experience takes one beyond the realm of language, and it is language that codes events for future reference, i.e. that is responsible for memory. One returns to his worldly self, to his wordly problems. He may have some what of an abstract intellectual perspective of where things are really at, but must await his next trip to regain the true experiential perspective. After each trip, however, he may find that he has retained a little more.

So it's fun and relaxing. No miraculous long-term changes. But is it valid? People who have had psychedelic experiences need only read a section here or there from various Eastern founts of wisdom, like the Buddha and Lao-Tzu, to conclude that these minds are very stoned themselves, though not on dope. Which brings us to the Beatles, and Donovan, and others who have downed acid for activities like Transcendental Meditation. All they are in fact seeking is to be totally stoned, completely wiped out, for a longer period than four hours, and perhaps by safer means.

To those who are still searching for a mystical experience: Stop. Searching is being up-tight. You are moving in the opposite direction. Drop some acid for fun. And maybe ...

LETTERS

Sir:

After reading the two articles by and about Bob Bossin, which appeared in last Friday's edition of The Varsity, there is little question in my mind as to whether he is a meek and mild person. His article on high school education is a violent and atrocious defamation of one of the finest secondary schools in the province.

Those of us (myself included) who voted Mr. Bossin into office as president of North Toronto Collegiate's student council, did so largely based on his reputation as the greatest "shit disturber" in the school's history. Our expectations were well justified; Mr. Bossin attempted to question the authority of the staff on every point and attempted to upset the organization of the school merely to live up to the reputation he had acquired. That he resigned from office is only partly true. His resignation was a face-saving device when confronted with the fact that he was about to be thrown out of office. Those of us who are familiar with the situation might be inclined to believe that the article was nothing more than a cleverly planned plot for revenge against those who he felt had done him some grave injustice. The necessity of exposing the obvious anachronisms which exist in the high school system may perhaps justify the publishing of Mr. Bossin's article. But nothing can justify his use of the Varsity as a mouthpiece to vindicate himself. Mr. Bossin has shown an incredible lack of integrity in his "sour-grapes" attack on North Toronto and Principal Page, and he has lost the truth of many people who used to respect his judgment.

Lorne Fienberg (UC II)

Dear Sir:

The Varsity of Feb. 9 was geared to the questioning of educational methods in North America; the collection of illuminating articles being dominated by a centre page interview.

This article certainly made me sit up and think of what I had been taught at school. The headline reaching across the page read: "educare—to lead out," and in the thick of the article, Bob Bossin — "You took Latin didn't you? — explained that educare means to lead out and that it has nothing to do with instruction, a "thrusting-in".

I suggest that Bob meekly return to his hooks before making any more ignorant proclamations.

Education does originate from the Latin verb educare, but educare means to bring up, rear, or train; educere is the word he was thinking of, and this does mean to lead out.

As Bob Bossin goes on to say, "our whole educational system is founded on the proposition that you can't trust the student." But is he anyone to inspire confidence?

Your sincerely
Michael Hibbit (Trin I)

A reply to the letter impugning Mr. Robert Bossin's latinity in which various issues raised by the letter above are clarified.

1. "Education" certainly is from "educare, educere", or rather from its supine stem, "educatus"; if it were from "educare, educere" the word would be "education" (cf. the analogous "deduction" from deduco). "Educare" itself, however, is probably derived from the same source as "educere"; it may be a frequentative form of that verb, such verbs often showing a change in conjugation and a resulting change in quantity. ("u" is long in "educere", short in "educare" because of the influence of the following vowels, short and long respectively.)

2. Mr. Bossin's point was that education should be understood as a "leading out." This is NOT a meaning of "educare," which means "to bring up, to rear" a child. It is, however, the normal meaning of "educere", which is so used by Cicero and others. Mr. Bossin, then has been misled by a similarity in morphology. And he is not alone. For Cicero, Vergil, and Tacitus all use "educere" in the admittedly uncommon sense of "educare." This is the only possible interpretation of Aeneid VIII, 413 (ut possit parvos educere natos) and Tac. 1, 4 (hunc prima ab infantia eductum in domo regnatrice). The derivation of "education" from "educere" is absurd from a strictly morphological point of view, but the fact that (1) "educare" is a by-form of "educere" and (2), that only "educere" has the double connotation of "lead out" and "bring up" (surely the logical derivation of "education") may influence the reader to pardon Mr. Bossin, especially when his condemnation involves that of Vergil and Tacitus.

3. "Omnia gallia," on the other hand, is unforgivable, though here it is obviously Mr. Bossin's memory of Caesar that is at fault. He means "tota Gallia"; "tota" is more applicable to something divisible into parts than is "omnis". "Omnia Gallia" is, of course meaningless.

Cumbersome clever Cambyses

By STEPHEN SNYDER

With minor, rarely performed plays, there is always a temptation for actor and director to show-off, to sacrifice the text for the sake of gymnastic bombast and clowning. Certainly Cambyses, King of Persia, the story of a sadistic tyrant whose acts of outrage become steadily more horrendous until he meets his nemesis in a riding accident, is particularly susceptible to such treatment. In the Poculi Ludique Societas production of the play, however, the temptation has been avoided. The treatment of the play is both honest and skillful.

In the first place, all the technical aspects of the production were outstanding. West-hall itself, with its wood panelling and high ceiling provides an ideal setting. One can imagine oneself at a court performance. And its arrangement, a playing-space down the length of the hall and platforms at either end is well-suited to the play and well-used. The staging never calls attention to itself. The costumes are always telling and appropriate. A garter, for example, on the king's knee speaks volumes, or a court sycophant is placed precisely by an outrageous yellow and red robe. Props, too, are always just right: a basket of food with a particularly repulsive chicken-foot in it, or a hoe carried by the "vice" reminiscent of a devil's pitchfork.

The two leads were excellent. Paul Mulholland charts the king's increasing depravity with some subtlety. He strikes the right balance between the king's intelligence, his impatience with the fools around him and the joy he takes in his cruelty. Until the end, he never allows his portrayal to become mere caricature. Andrew McKenzie's Ambidexter is a delight. Pixyish and sly he modulates bravery, moe k grief, and moralizing. And does it effortlessly and without exaggeration.

Except for the first comic scene in which noise was mistaken for humour the play was adequately acted. David Bare gave us a senile and pathetic court-schemer who almost made us sympathize with Cambyses. Stephen Martineau's pompous introduction placed the play quietly in an ironic context. Two minor characters added effective touches: an effeminate Knight (Joe Pastor) who was always making righteous comments upon the proceedings and a country hick (Ian Lancashire), the depths of whose stupidity were unfathomable. The rest did what they could with basically unsatisfactory parts.

One point leads to another: No production can turn a poor play into a good one; Cambyses is a decidedly poor one. There are successful comic moments—with Ambidexter especially. There are even successful moments of pathos and irony. The play does have an historical value as a precursor of the greater Elizabethan drama. All of which fails, however, to compensate for long stretches of barren verbiage, and what is to us the embarrassing quality of the play's violence. For one thing, it is so extreme as to cancel itself out, being neither funny nor terrifying. And further, Ambidexter is so attractive a character that he tends to deprive the horror of its meaning.

The death scene is played for laughs. It had to be. But the satisfaction one got from it was superficial. Although the evening was far from a waste, one left with a nagging feeling of dissatisfaction, regret perhaps, that such talent and energy as had been displayed could not have found for itself a more worthy vehicle.

Crawling Arnold: another success for Trinity

By ALLISON LANG

Trinity College Drama Society just keeps on turning out plays. This week's production of Crawling Arnold by Jules Feiffer assembles an excellent cast from across campus, and the good cast does a good job.

The particular Feiffer hangups of this show concern an aggressive establishment American couple, the Enterprise family, and their overly intellectual son, Arnold. A social worker is called in for consultation because Arnold, a 34 year old, has taken to crawling at the same time as his two year old brother.

The self assured social worker thinks Arnold is trying to compete with the new baby—a case of advanced sibling rivalry. When an air raid drill begins, the negro maid (black power) beats everyone to the shelter and locks the door. The Enterprises hit the dirt, in the basement, while Arnold seduces his fourth social worker in as many months.

The real fun of this play is not only Arnold's ingenious solution of how "to make his own road" in life, but the skilful satire on everything American from martinis to marriage, from television to white supremacy.

Jack Newman acted convincingly and crawled well as Arnold. He expressed the various moods of Arnold—resentful, indifferent, petulant and amorous—with great competence. He is able to make a statement like "neutralists are too extreme. I'm neutral" intensely funny.

Angela Fusco's Miss Sympathy was an animated and revealing portrayal of the patronizing do-gooder, proud of her advanced views.

Alan Price's exaggeration as Mr. Enterprise was just what the character demanded. His perverted dream for the new baby is that he become the "biggest, baddest, toughest" cowboy in the world. He is a fanatic on air raid shelters; his ideal is of a nation "mobilized, sitting it out."

Clare Coulter as Mrs. Enterprise is equipped with energy, irony, and accent.

The production is well staged; the lively pace and consistently amusing lines made the slight action an advantage. Martha Black and Sally Gover have designed a colourful and imaginative set, that creates the informal mood of the garrish suburban terrace.

Profile views of alienated young men and father-son hang-ups are specialties of Feiffer's cartoons. This play was an interesting opportunity to see how Feiffer creates a character in the round.

Vic Music Club knows its territory

By ARLENE PERLY

Ye gads! It's the Victoria Music Club's annual Ziegfeld-type spectacular. This year's show, The Music Man, was complete with a cast of thousands, live children, sets and sets and sets, floorlength dresses, feathery hats, and lots of happy smiling singing dancing romantic people (and sets).

Everyone knows the bustling plot of Music Man; and Chuck MacRae steps handsomely into Robert Preston's shoes. It didn't really matter if he couldn't utter a word; from the moment he appeared, the whole audience fell promptly in love with him. His charm was not lessened by his singing or acting ability, although his dance movements were stiff and might have been more relaxed.

The female lead, Patricia Hartman as Marian the librarian, sang with feeling although her voice wasn't particularly strong. She managed her role easily, and like everyone else in the cast, she seemed to be enjoying herself.

The crowd scenes were very well handled, frequent and well choreographed.

Each character was involved in the action on stage, and the continual participation and spirit added to the smoothness, general appeal and length of the show (almost three hours, which stretched comfort by about twenty minutes).

A few of my favorite characters were Elizabeth Leslie playing the mayor's wife, a high-society chick named Eulalie Shinn and Carole Hall (egads!), her daughter, who sustained her cutesy image admirably throughout. Deanne Clark portrayed a charmin' Irish lassie as Mrs. Parou, and of course there was Winthrop, her lithping thon.

A lot of the credit for the show belongs to Robert Galbraith, who directed, designed and choreographed (what else is there?). He gave the characters a lot of punch through energetic and exciting sequences. Especially good was the scene inside the library.

The Music Man was overambitious insofar as the sets and scenery was concerned. A less cluttered stage, and more freedom could have been attained without all the proppan's paraphernalia.

In any case, it's an antidepressant, an imaginative escape, and a lot of fun for both cast and audience. The Music Man continues at Hart House for two more days, and is almost sold out. You can talk, talk, talk, you can talk all you wanna, but you've got to know the territory. The Victoria Music Club knew it well.

GROWING UP

It's new. It's exciting. It can be a little complicated, too. But, listen. Life can be easier for you. Tampax tampons — the modern internally worn sanitary protection — all but do away with "difficult days".

You may not know it, but Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor over 30 years ago for girls just like you. You can't even feel them when they're properly in place.

But perhaps the best thing about them is that there's nothing to interfere with your normal activities. You keep on doing whatever you want to — completely unhampered. Always feeling confident and secure. And remember: both the Tampax tampon and its container-applier just flush away. What could be simpler than that?

The theatre is empty and dark. The walls have disappeared and the warehouse is an infinite sea of blackness — except for a tiny island. The stage, compelling in its solitude, its isolation, its warmth.

The odours of sweat, cut wood, makeup and fresh paint hover in the air. From far behind the stage a door opens; light spills out and laughing is heard. Milo Ringham, dressed in an overflowing Elizabethan gown pads out in her bare feet, holding up the hem. She giggles. Does a little turn and then disappears back into the door.

In a few moments, the actors file out of the door, absorbed in the costumes they are wearing for the first time. Some go over in front of the stage and sit in the seats. Others circle around the stage repeating their lines. Ed Kelly strides up and down and repeats in a booming voice: "Threescore . . . mumble, mmmmm . . . threescore . . . and you are a Saggi-tarius . . ." He is thin and has a hook nose and is wearing knee breeches. He stares up at the ceiling. "Jesus! The line!" he shouts, obviously searching for the next line, then flops down in one of the seats, mumbling to himself.

A few lights brighten, illuminating the chattering group of actors, and John Faulkner, the stage manager, emerges from his tiny control room (it fits one person). He stands at the top of the orchestra, runs a hand through his frazzled mop of russet hair, and surveys the stage through thick glasses. An apprentice, on the stage with costumes, yells to him: "Hey John, you're a genius; where do we hang the hats?"

"Yeah", he answers as he bounds down the steps to the stage, "I'm a genius, but nobody appreciates it!"

Suddenly there is a peal of laughter from the seated actors and everybody looks around. Out of the dressing room comes Geoff Read, wearing the ridiculously huge padded costume of Sir Epicure Mammon for Ben Jonson's The Alchemist. Long, spindly legs in pink tights support an enormous brown-tunicked belly which in turn supports a gaunt, bespectacled face. Geoff smiles sheepishly.

"You look obscene, Mammon," shouts one of the actors, "With those little, skinny legs, it's marvelous!" Geoff shuffles up to Milo, and pushes his belly into her bosom, and, in character, says "Hello there, Doll." (Milo plays Doll Common in the play) and she gives the belly a poke.

Then the clamour quickly subsides; the laughter stops; George Luscombe has entered. He wears an old grey, coat with rayed cuffs; his fists are inside the cuffs. François Klamfert and Milo Ringham run up to the stage and start to talk to him. He asks Milo a question, his eyebrows raised in curiosity. "Well, there's two solutions," she answers, and then turns to François, "If I come at you from the front, well I mean if you grab me here, then I can't go that way." She points to the rest of the stage.

While they talk, Luscombe listens intently, drags on his cigaret, pouts his lips and scratches his head and nods in agreement. He then takes off the coat, squints as he takes the cigarette out of his mouth and says "okay". The actors scurry off stage as Luscombe runs up the stairs to a bench high in the orchestra.

"All right, stand by, stand by," he vells. John Faulkner jumps off the stage, and hurries up to the control room, and closes the black curtain behind him. The house lights go out as the actors take their positions, some up in the balconies, some behind the stage, others near the dressing room. They surround the stage from all sides. A single light hits the stage.

From the darkness, Luscombe's voice emerges. Okay, stand by, please. I'll wait until you're quiet. Right. Now this is the first rehearsal in costume. We have lots and lots of problems. You make a mental note of them and we'll make other notes. Now I've invited two people from the university to see the rehearsal (something he rarely does). They won't get in your way, so ignore them. All they want to do is find out how we work—if they ever can." Laughter arises from around the stage. "All right now, stand by; . . . cue!" All the lights go out. Luscombe settles back on his hench, legs crossed arms pinioned around in back, a cigarette hanging from one hand, a pen from the other, and a clipboard in his lap. The play begins.

The action is quick paced, the lines are delivered rapidly; there is a lot of movement on stage and even though the stage is very small, the movement is never confusing. At one point, Milo wrestles both Ed Kelly and François to the ground in a space barely large enough to accommodate the three of them. Throughout the rehearsal, Luscombe sits intent, sometimes scribbling notes. Only once does he yell a direction and that is but a quick, clear sharp interjection: "Leave the charts alone, François!" Without any hesitation, François bypasses those props and continues with his lines as if the direction came from his own head. Numerous lines are missed, especially in the very long speeches, but the actors never lose the thread of action.

Eighty minutes and nine cigarettes later, Luscombe, jumps up: "Fade out, John!" The lights dim and go out. "House, house, house, house, John!" The house lights go on. "All right, actors, break for coffee."

THEIR OWN THING

What is it that is so unique about their work? To understand it, one must look at the artistic director of the theatre, the human dynamo and oftentimes explosive George Luscombe.

In fifteen minutes, as we sat on one of the long, orange leathered benches that seat his new theatre, he elucidated his ideas on his theatre, his expressive face contorting, his thick eyes penetrating us, his hands always moving. He talked about what is wrong with theatre today: "The proscenium arch (or picture frame theatre for those who don't dig) is an illusionary peep show, set up by the English aristocracy for their own enjoyment. The caliber of the actor has declined ever since after the Elizabethan times. They have only come back when they lost the proscenium arch and brought back the thrust stage."

I asked him if there is any hope for the proscenium theatre as it is today. "Would you try to cure a cancer?" he asked, "It's dead. There's no cure for it. You look into the peep show and you intrude on something, but it has nothing to do with what happens to the average Joe on the street."

"The purpose of the theatre is to communicate. You, sitting here in this seat, communicate with that other member of the audience sitting way over on the other side because of a common experience — what is going on on the stage."

How is this experience built? The basis is Luscombe's relationship with his actors — he leaves them alone. They are free within certain limitations of character, theme and situation laid down by the director and the writer. An improvisation develops.

Before the rehearsals and improvisations, the actors run through a series of exercises and calisthenics to loosen up. Then they go through basic exercises in movement called "efforts" where they break down the very fundamental movements required for action on the stage. By breaking the movement down, their work becomes simple and strives for effortlessness.

The actors have been trained by Luscombe to use their bodies as tools, to express with their bodies. They know what is expected of them and they develop characterizations and scenes. From the various insights that emerge from these improvisations, the writer culls dialogue and action. Faulkner starts to play with the lighting setup; Nancy Jowsey thinks of costumes; properties and sets are considered.

One playwright has the gist of what the actors have suggested by their improvisations, he moves away from the stage action and improvises on his own so that the script begins to suggest new characterization and action. A play begins to form. The actors, the director and playwright, and the technicians are intimately bound up with each other's ideas and the play is a product of their combined effort.

THE MAN

at has almost unbeivable patience when there is something he wants to get across to them.

In situations like these,
he becomes excited, involving himself with the actors. "I remember for one scene in "The Alchemist", says Geoff, "I have this long speech and George wants me to direct it out to everybody in the audience because it's in my character, of Sir Epicure Mammon to be a huge gross, surly being not only in body but in speech. So George wanted to get this across without it coming out false. He didn't tell me exactly but started to run all through the orchestra as fast as he could, making me shout after him as he did so. Now, whenever I do that speech,
I remember that."

Geoff remembers Lus-combe carrying his excitement to a hilarious extreme once: "He was smoking away at his cigarette when he got really excited and started to run up and down in front of the stage. Then he forgot about the cigarette when he put his hand in his pocket. A few minutes later in the middle of a good improvisation, we smell smoke; George was on fire. We couldn't help it; we broke up laughing our heads off. Oh, yeah, somebody threw water over him to put him out."

THE ACTOR

Geoff Read is tall, thin and has a lean, boyish face with a small tuft of beard on the chin. He gave up his steady job as a mechanic two years ago to work with George Luscombe and Workshop productions. And he has no regrets at all. "I was swept over by it. I was offered a challenge and I took it up. No, I never worried about success or failure; I just felt that I would be successful. I guess I was very honest with myself."

He has a great respect and admiration for Lus-combe and what he is doing in theatre. But he would also like to widen his experience. "I want to see how decadent it really is out there." But he quickly adds, "I would like to re-tun here after a couple of years and find a thriving theatre".

Geoff's first contact with Luscombe was at the Hamilton Players' Guild where the George was giving a ten-week course in acting. Fifty people showed up the first time and more than thirty dropped out right away. "George can come on very tough if he wants to. He can be very uncompromising. But he's got the patience of whatever that god of patience is if somebody doesn't understand him. He puts the emphasis on simplicity. You see, so many actors nowadays are doing too much while they're on the stage. It's the small things that are of great importance."

What do you do when Luscombe scolds you?
"Well, if he's right, you go off into a corner and lick your wounds; and if he's wrong then you argue with him."

Geoff is a good actor, thoughtful, introspective and very modest. He prepares himself for his roles.
In "Hey Rube", in which he played a clown, he warmed up with the other clowns before they went into the audience in the performance. As Mr. Interlocuter in "Gentlemen Be Seated", he played Abraham Lincoln cum director of a minstrel show, a part that called for a detachment from the gaiety of the rest of the cast. He put on his makeup and clothes apart from the rest of the actors.

He isn't starving and he's very happy and enthusiastic about his career as an actor and his enthusiasm is contagious.

HOW THINGS STAND

The productions of the workshop are exciting, the whole idea is exciting, especially when you think of how they are done. The actors working with the playwright and the director. It is a theatre full of life, a theatre that fulfills the idea of what theatre should be. The excitement in the performance spreads like wildfire. "Gentlemen be seated" was the perfect vehicle for the company.

It combined music, dance, mime and made effective use of the stage that is so important to their concept of theatre. And audience involvement is a very important part of their thing.
Just by the stage being so small and isolated, you feel drawn magnetically to it and all the audience around you are part of the stage. The actors move in the audience, make them feel at home without embarassing them.

One of the criticisms of the company is that they are first and foremost dancers and second actors.

But all you have to do is take a look at the actors today who do not change a hair on their heads from performance to performance.

The sophisticated forces that are so popular on Broadway today are a good example. The actors move through their blocked out scenes with all the originality of marionettes and indeed they all look like puppets from far up in the row in the balcony saying prefabricated lines to elicit prefabricated responses from the audience.

Where are Luscombe and his troupe headed? This season they have agreed with the Canada Council to do five plays, two of them original. The actors are getting paid more now and they have a brand new theatre with all the enthusiasm that comes with it.

They have gained a respectability that will attract an audience that didn't dare venture into the gloomy depths of Fraser Street.

I asked them if they were trying to spread the gospel of their ideas, since it is sort of a gospel that Luscombe has. "No, we guess we're spreading it just by doing what we do."

Defense of Red China tells more about the writer

By BOB RAE

China in the Year 2001 By Han Suyin: Basic Books, 1967 — $6.95

The eternal, inscrutable colossus that is China remains the greatest question mark in the world today. For all the fads about buying Mao's Little Red Book and reciting make-believe revolutionary chants, we really can't pretend to know what is going on, what the Cultural Revolution is all about, or, on a more trivial level, whether Mao-Tse-tung is in fact alive and swimming down the Yellow River at thirty-four miles per hour.

Han Suyin's book, China in the Year 2001, is on first glance an earnest attempt at closing the culture gap, the knowledge gap, before it is too late, before our mutual misunderstanding leads to war. There is certainly room for a sensitive, non-academic explanation of what modern China is all about, of what the Chinese Revolution has come to mean to the Chinese people as a whole. One would have hoped that someone with Han Suyin's literary skills could have made a real contribution to explaining China, or at least looking at China in a sympathetic but rational way.

The book is, in fact, a disappointment. For reasons known only to herself, Han Suyin has decided to swallow the Chinese Revolutionary Pill whole. In every chapter, she does not interpret, she apologizes; she does not translate critically, rather she has chosen to present the orthodox Peking opinion on the development and expansion of the Chinese economy, on the spread of education, on the Great Cultural Revolution, and on the battles for the minds and hearts of the Third World.

The difficult cultural position in which Han Suyin finds herself perhaps forced her into accepting either all of China, intellectual nonsense and compromise included, or none of it at all. The book's real fault is simply that she has not taken advantage of her unique qualifications: the book could have been an insight into the Chinese mind, into the Cultural Revolution which has completely changed the Chinese world-view.

She has described all the symptoms, the humiliation of the whole pre-Revolution period, the excitement of the May Fourth Movement and the liberating effect this had on Chinese intellectuals, and the second liberation, that of the Chinese peasantry in 1949. But as a narrative, the book is unsatisfactory because Han Suyin's relationship with the reader is never established; if she imposed her own personality, her own judgment on the reader, one might at least feel that one could come to grips with an articulate and enquiring mind. The book tries to be dispassionate, and so takes on the air of an earnest revolutionary pamphlet in Praise of Mao.

And surely we are beyond the stage of mere apologies about China. While the empathetic approach must be the basis of international relations, and while we have tremendous gaps to bridge in coming to terms with the Chinese presence, it is foolish to pretend that 'understanding' and saying 'Yes' to revolution will make Mao love us.

While we have to condemn our own past attitudes towards China, and while we have still to be embarrassed by governmental policy toward China, there are limits to the Han Suyin approach. Western bourgeois intellectuals, and Western bourgeois democracies, have to be aware of their limits: they cannot in the crux, tolerate a completely revolutionary situation. Would Han Suyin be willing to clean latrines for the rest of her life because the party decided that this is how she could best serve her country? Han Suyin lives in New York, she does not live in Peking. It would surely be more honest, intellectually, for her to face up to her own ideological and cultural limitations, and look slightly more analytically at the revolution in China.

Han Suyin writes well, and to condemn the book as I have done is not to mean that it is not worth reading. There is a decent bibliography at the end, and much basic information hidden between the Odes on Chinese purity and Western insanity. If you want to start learning about China today, about Chinese cultural world-view and China's historical psychosis, this is by no means a bad place to start; it gives the Chinese government's outlook in a more readable and eloquent format than is normal in most bureaucratic revolutionary prose.

Compromised intellectuals seem to be a universal phenomenon; Han Suyin's book provides unique insights into the acceptance of the China she once might have questioned. Indirectly, she has told us more about herself, and her country, than she is perhaps aware, or ever intended.

Wait Until Dark: Audrey Hepburn stars in taut, suspenseful thriller

By JOHN LOWNSBROUGH

In Wait Until Dark (at the Hollywood) Audrey Hepburn plays a blind woman who is victimized by a trio of crooks searching for a child's doll and convinced that Audrey must have it hidden away somewhere in her small basement apartment. Mind you, this is not your run of the mill doll: the thing is stuffed full with tiny bags of heroin. So, the better part of the film's two hours centres around the effort of these men to get Audrey to tell them where it is. Because she has no idea what's inside the doll and because she can't see them, their initial tactic is to invent a pretext for dropping in on her in the hope that they can extract the necessary information this way without having to go through the old Tie-The-Lady-To-A-Chair routine.

This approach fails simply because the lady in question hasn't the faintest idea where the wretched thing is. When she finally DOES have the doll in her possession she has found out enough to know they're up to no good. Moreover, by this time she is not prepared to surrender the doll on any account, convinced, thanks to a neat plot convolution, that her husband's future hangs in the balance.

If this sounds slightly complex, you ought to see the movie. It has one of the DAMNDEST plots! Some of the story-holes are so large you could whip basketballs through them. Because of Terence Young's taut direction, however, the audience has no time to ponder the credibility of the story, based on Frederick (Dial M For Murder) Knott's Broadway play of the same name. And the ending really is a classic in suspense. There is one particular moment which is so exquisitely terrifying that it's guaranteed to make you jump right out of your seat.

Surely, few can arouse viewer sympathy the way Audrey Hepburn can with her ultra-feminine, spunky heroines. Her's is an excellent performance in controlled hysteria. As the principal villain, Alan Arkin skitters dangerously close to the brink of cartoonity. However, by the conclusion, his hideously reptilian character is dead-on. The other roles are minimal. Richard Crenna and Jack Weston are good actors but have little to do here as Arkin's minions and Efrem Zimbalist Jr., in briefly as Miss Hepburn's husband, solidifies his standing as a 'cum laude' graduate of the Playwood school of acting.

Madness of the "senseless" crime

By MEL BRADSHAW

The almost simultaneous arrivals in Toronto of Richard Brooks' In Cold Blood (now playing at the Hyland) and Larry Peerce's The Incident (opening today at the Imperial and affiliated theatres) follow appropriately on the heels of Babel: Society as Madness and Myth.

The "senseless" crime is the particular madness of society which forms the subject of these two films. In the screen adaption of Truman Capote's best seller, the crime is the real-life slaying in cold blood of Kansas farmer Herbert Clutter and three of his family by a pair of ex-convicts, Perry Smith and Dick Hickcock. In Peerce's picture the incident is the fictitious but almost plausible terrorizing of the passengers of a car in the New York subway by a couple of young thrill seekers early one Sunday morning.

Each picture has a myth to explode as well: the former, that the criminals are to be despised; the latter, that the victims are to be pitied.

Working on the premise "To know all is to forgive all", In Cold Blood gradually fills in the background of Perry Smith, including his mother's promiscuity, his father's brutality, his boarding school education, and the motor-cycle accident which maimed him and all this miraculously without becoming tedious or excessively sentimental. Robert Blake, an experienced but little known actor, delivers a hauntingly fine performance as Smith. His partner, played by Scott Wilson, is a much less sympathetic character and little attempt is made to gloss over his basic meanness, perhaps because he was not the one who did the actual killing.

(In tracing the pair's flight in a stolen car, the film has some moments of Bonnie and Clyde-like levity. There is one scene in which they fill the back seat with pop bottles discarded along the side of the road in order to collect the refund.)

By contrast, when The Incident fills in the background of the two thugs and the dozen or so subway passengers it is apparently to arouse antipathy, not to plead for comprehension. These are characters who can be defined by a short sequence and a scrap of dialogue each: a lonely homosexual, one practising and one reformed alcoholic, a timid social-worker married to a blustering black-powerrite, an impotent history teacher and his status-hungry wife, and so forth; in short, the dreary, squalid individuals who make up our world.

Each one is victimized in turn, harassed, baited, beaten, and scared, while the others look on in petrified fascination. The message is only too obvious: acting together, they could have stopped the incident before it started but of course no one is willing to take any responsibility. A soldier from Oklahoma says, "It doesn't bother me. It's not my city" and his New York buddy replies, "This part of it isn't either".

Crime has always been an entertaining subject and on one level both In Cold Blood and The Incident are good thrillers. The taking of a small group of characters and cutting them off from the outside world, usually in a train, boat, or plane, is a formula which has often worked well (e.g., Murder on the Orient Express, Zero Hour) and its application to the subway car is intriguing, if mildly far-fetched. In Cold Blood provides the more conventional interest of a police manhunt tautly handled.

Notwithstanding, The Incident is clearly the inferior picture. Despite one or two smooth and authentic performances (Tony Musante and Beau Bridges), much of the acting and dialogue is soap-opera calibre. It is all very well to make a movie with a message, but it is offensive and inept to rub your audience's noses in the dirt, as Mr. Peerce does.

Here Brooks has the advantage in that he is working with fact and his scrupulous realism protects him from the extremes of banality and melodrama. The events are not deliberately contrived to bring home a point. This is not to say that Brooks gives up an impersonal documentary. He does express attitudes—attitudes which are after all a good deal more disturbing than Peerce's. At times his editorializing becomes embarrassing; shots of Clutter's sixteen year old daughter saying her prayers on the night of her death are an inexcusable case in point. Knowing how fully to portray the Clutter family in a film whose primary interest is with the killers is obviously a problem which has not been satisfactorily worked out. Sentimental touches do little to mitigate the impersonality of treatment.

It is somewhat upsetting to grant Smith and Hickcock more sympathy than their victims, yet we are forced to this attitude. Doubtless this is largely due to the fact that the Clutters are killed off-stage while we actually watch Perry hang. We are ultimately asked not to approve of the killings but to accept them as inevitable. "Next month, next year, it will all happen again", remarks Capote's screen equivalent. Senseless crime is like floods and lightning, something which simply happens so capital punishment is completely futile as well as brutal.

Those who find this apparent moral ambiguity objectionable should remember the understanding treatment given Peter Lorre as child rapist in Fritz Lang's M. One does wonder, however, whether some film might also make us like a Richard Speck. In any case, whether or not one subscribes to the theory, In Cold Blood is an impressive character study and an engrossing film.

Weary and wrack'd: Little Murders

By DAVID PAPE

To live in New York City you need a gun and a psychoanalyst. Jules Feiffer, in his play, Little Murders, tries to convince us we need them too.

The play is pure satire, and the cast wrings out its venom until we squirm with uneasiness. There is no let-up, no resolution. Picture two masochists wracked side by side, each with a hand on the other's winch, and drawing it ever tighter.

Who needs it? The great American neurosis? Feiffer gives us a family that compounds every N' York hang-up imaginable. The daughter (Maureen Fitzgerald) is an overbearing behemoth. She fights back! The father is a walking cliché of the good old days. The mother, magnificently portrayed by Amelia Hall, is the Stoic frontier wife (in her own mind), while an incessant nag to her family, and lover to her son (Richard Monette) who turns out to be queer anyway. Let's just leave him in his sister's closet.

Enter the heavy. Colin Fox as Alfred, the future son-in-law looks like he's right out of a Feiffer drawing. His thing is nihilism. He can be something to himself only when he is a frustrating nothing to everyone else. He turns off at the slightest reference to any convention: marriage, love, violence, whatever. All he wants is to take photographs and sleep.

So there you have it. A psychotic Hay Fever. Instead of insipid wit, we have a melodrama of sirens, shootings, blackouts.

Of course, Feiffer is funny. Read any of his cartoons. They're a scream. But don't try to read a hundred of them. It's gruesome: Dialogue sample 1: So I ended up taking photographs...

Mother — Of what, Alfred.

A — Of shit.

M — This is my table!

A — I photograph shit.

D.s. 2.

Behemoth: But I loved the man I was going to mould you into.

D.s. 3.

When you've got 347 unsolved murders, a pattern begins to make itself clear. They all have three Things in common. First they've got nothing in common. Second, they've all got no motive. Third, they're all unsolved.

That's the Feiffer bit. The cameo monologue. And Hugh Webster, Gerard Parkes, and especially Joseph Shaw manage it with great skill.

The play is a barage of good jokes, but far too long. Not even the Smothers Brothers take it more than an hour.

Dramatically, the conclusion is ridiculous. It's a sell-out to put the audience's nerves at ease. It's the logical example of the idea that American optimism (keep smiling, baby), is maintained by American democratic violence. I have as much right to shoot from a rooftop as anyone else, idea. The ego is on top again, and we all go home laughing. Baloney we do!

The most important thing about the show is that we can see a company forming. Except for a few long costume changes, the performance is well paced, and the characters well cast.

Everything about them is solid and competent.

The set with its plexiglass walls recalls the APA design for Exit the King, and serves the same purpose in creating a presence of darkness and squalor.

I can only wish: Julie, ya never should have gone to Playboy.

Cabaret fails to chill

By LARRY HAIVEN

"Underneath the excitement, there was the shadow lurking, of insecurity, or decadence, of tomorrow will be your last day, so you might as well enjoy yourself." I was talking to Prof. Bauer of the German department about his youthful days in the frantic, wide-open Berlin of the 1930's. Cabaret, now at the O'Keefe Centre, fails to portray this decadence by being cute rather than cutting, wordy instead of witty. Nevertheless, it contains many moments of genuine entertainment.

Bare-bellied Brunhildes bounce their gartered derrières through the steamy red light that bathes the stage; a scantily covered all-girl band belts out swinging Charlestons; and Robert Salvio, as the master of ceremonies of the Kit Kat Club, winks at the audience and tells them: "The girls are bee-yoo-tee-full; the orchestra is bee-yoo-tee-full; everything is bee-yoo-tee-full."

The idiotic lines of a trite script, and even more lifeless songs are redeemed only by the cabaret scene itself. This scene, however, is adequate compensation.

There is no opening curtain. A huge distorted mirror stares out at the audience and a winding staircase at the side spills girls into every scene. Into the blue and red bathed stage moves the set: a gaily coloured piano surrounded by a female band, a shimmering streamer curtain in front of a cabaret dancing platform, and tiny round tables, each with a golden telephone. The music starts—the gay, wild carefree music of the roaring twenties, with the warmth unique to early jazz.

As the two leads, Gene Rupert and Melissa Hart do no more with the script than distract us from its defects. We can concentrate more easily on their own. Miss Hart's voice lacks sparkle and conviction, and Mr. Rupert has a voice that shouldn't be tolerated on the professional stage.

Signe Hasso and Leo Fuchs generate even less excitement with their middleaged romance. Their charm is merely silliness. Only briefly does any spirit shine, in a song called 'Meeskite' by Fuchs. He rolls his eyes and waddles like a duck through the story of an ugly boy who meets an ugly girl called 'Poil'. Together they bring forth a beautiful child. Only here does Fuch's charm achieve the quality of entertainment.

Robert Salvio, as the M.C., is the real star. He fills the theatre despite his smallness with a delightful mercenary song and dance welcome. He carries the show with his zest, his strong and versatile voice, and good natured lewdness.

The funniest routine occurs when Salvio dances out with a big loveable lady gorilla dressed in a diamond-studded brazierre and bonnet. As she mugs her way across the stage, Salvio apologizes for her, singing, "If you could see her in my eyes, you would understand."

Pape at the theatre: Vichy--vicious or weepy?

By DAVID PAPE

Self restraint is only hypocrisy. If you despise Jews, the most honest thing to do about it is burn them up.

Self restraint is only hypocrisy. Act by what you know, not by what you think. Recognize that the threat of extermination is both incredible and real. Your reasonableness is the Nazi's greatest weapon.

I can live my life with integrity, abiding by the laws, even if I despise those laws.

These are three of the paradoxical threads of argument running furiously through Incident at Vichy, now at the Colonnade.

The last is perhaps the most meaningful statement to most people. In the face of our wars, our prejudice, our aspiring ways, to live with integrity is the greatest problem that faces us.

Significantly, the man who says this, the actor, is the most pathetically ridiculous of all the refugees awaiting German interrogation. The actor will not let down his mask, his faith in the values of art and civilization. And like us, he plays his role (or in the lingo—does his thing) to cope with his cowardice. In terrified disbelief he walks to his death.

So do they all. That petty handful of officials and delinquents, going through the unpleasantness of Jew-round-up-and-shipment to Poland.

Cabaret

Even though the singing and dancing are on the whole entertaining, they also seem harmless. They do not reveal the decadence that was eating away society. And so an attempt to show the advent of Nazism at the club is weak and incongruous. Everybody seems to be having such a good time that even the storm troopers with their swastikas arm bands fail to evoke a sense of chill horror.

The finale is a marvellous attempt to show the new order of Hitler taking over as the strains "Come to the cabaret, old chum" become dissonant, and the warmth of the club turns icy; but the potential of this scene is never realized. Rather than leaving us up in the air, the finale is inharmonious with the rest of the play. It is a bad ending

They all have their security and routine behind which they can hide away from what is happening.

Nobody knew. Not even amongst the Jews is there willingness to articulate the truth. They don't want to know.

But is this really what VICHY is about? I don't think so. Certainly in the theatre it seems about the roundup, and realization of impending doom. (Atrocious somehow isn't the right word when it applies to yourself) and certainly it is about Nazi persecution, especially to those who remember. There are bound to be a majority of self-righteous sufferers in every audience. And so there ought to be.

But the play is more about guilt and complicity than an attack on Nazism. It is about self-preservation, about conscience, about what happens to you if you manage to survive where others die

Spokesmen

The characters themselves are more spokesmen than living people. They set the atmosphere of the play, disclose necessary information, represent the small men that scratch a little at life, and perish.

They speak of their beliefs, and the havens of humanity crumble: law, culture, art, Marxism, even the small prejudices of the persecuted themselves.

Neither do the two central characters develop so much as they guide the argument of the play through the labyrinthine contemplation of the unbelievable. As we might expect, one of them is a prince of the mind, a psychiatrist, and the other an actual prince of culture.

Complicity

The programme of the play pretends that it is all about our complicity, our human nature. It is a kind of complicity to believe in the lies of your leaders, and we see that in order to preserve all that their lives stand for, these refugees must find ways of believing. They verbalize away the peril.

There seems to be two alternatives to such passive sacrifice: acceptance of a dehumanizing militarism, or active sacrifice.

Those within the German army are helpless because they have submitted to its discipline. Those opposed to it believe in ideals, but this is ultimately only faith in the strength of someone else's army.

The play then is written in the personal and suffering tones of one who lived and now must tell. It is an introspective voice that probes at prejudice and power and discloses guilt. It is a play which lacks resolution. The end seems to present a triumph of the ideal, but is an ineffectual act, an active sacrifice.

The director

The Production is a credit to the Players' Guild. Joel Kenyon has directed his cast to articulate their ideas in uncluttered tones. He has used the awful Colonnade stage well, although his blocking of the old Jew disipated the dramatic effect of that aged one.

The actors

In this play of stereotypes, every character has his moment. Michael Gladman as a painter, Stephen Katz as a waiter, and Tom Edwards took full advantage of theirs. Andrew Bethell as the socialist electrician perhaps began too high, while Edwards was for the rest of the play an inconsistent heavy. Arnold Rubenstein, as the actor, played from his painted eyes to overcome his military syndrome most convincingly.

Brian Linehan, underplayed his prince almost to inaudibility in the difficult role of the good arian.

Charles Dennis as the psychiatrist played little more than Charles Dennis, and was unwilling to allow Leduc any internal stillness; and surely his questioning must grow out of intellectual coolness. Despite this overplaying, Miller still speaks clearly.

And Chas.

Dennis deserves credit for producing this show, and for exposing it to the public. It is playing to full houses; it cannot help but move; and is well managed student production.

Cabaret plays to mixed opinion. I've heard it's a failure and also that it's the best show of the winter: at the O'Keefe. Incident at Vichy at the Colonnade is definitely worth seeing, and is selling out. The Music Man at Hart House is a spirited anti-depressant. Little Murders continues at the Royal Alex, and would make an interesting complement to Feiffer's Crawling Arnold, noon-hour at Cartwright Hall. For my own part, I'd rather see the one-hour production: a little more than a little is by much too much.

Toronto Workshop opens its production of The Alchemist tomorrow at 12 Alexander St. It will be a severe challenge to their technique. On Saturday, The Tinderbox, a children's play will utilize the Workshop theatre.

MISC

Brownie McGee is playing at the Riverboat — not with Sonny Terry, who is sick in New York, but with Will Scarlett. Even so — don't miss them. This is blues at its best. He'll be here for three weeks.

It's a pretty good week for films, and probably the last chance to see some of the old stand-bys. Last six days for (wowie!) The Sound of Music at the Crest. Far From The Madding Crowd, The Sand Pebbles, and Doctor Zhivago are all on — and if you want to see some good ol' big ol' Wallowywood, catch them before they go.

Internationalism is pretty big in town too: a dubbed version of French comedian Robert Hirsch's fun-fest Impossible on Sunday opened yesterday at the Vaughan; Polish-English director Roman (Knife in the Water, Repulsion) Polanski's strange new (two years old) feature The Fearless Vampire Killers opened at, of all places, The Downtown. It has had, obviously, very mixed critical reception: any director that has one film spend six months at the New Yorker, and the next open at the Downtown is nothing if not controversial!

For a look at the most violent of the recent openings, see the Film Section — and, hopefully, see some films. You can't work or ski for all of Reading Week!

ART

There is a Graphic show at Scarb. Mirolithographs at Albert White's, New paintings by Robert Hedrick at the Gerald Morris Gallery definitely worth attending. During the Holidays on Feb. 23 the Guggenheim International Exhibition of sculpture from 20 nations opens including works of Arp, Moore, Hepworth, Armitage and others. This work is all modern conceived since 1960.

At the Riverboat . . . Brownie Terry and Sonny McGhee. Sonny is missing, home sick with a case of arthritis. In his place, Will Scarlett plays harp. The Opera School on March 1, 2, 4, and 5, will be presenting Debussy's Pelleas and Melisande, Time: 8:00 p.m. (Adults $1.50. Students, $.50). The opera school has been busy touring local high schools — giving excerpts, explaining the business of opera, etc. Their reception has been good.

GARBLEDY BOX

A funny kind of night. Henry told us what we would do with our lives, and insisted that Fraser hire him someday when he asks him for a job someday. Soul-searching about selling out and dropping out. Henry feeling cynical but tolerant. Fraser slept most of the day, again, and Rocking-Horse Rod and Len "irreplaceable" Gilday did most of the work, again. Halven being contemplative about Rochdale, writing, medicine, dropping out, and the Accidental Century. Pape took over Alan Gordon's theatrical duties while Alan recuperates in hospital, and became involved in a search for "meaning". Switzman in the office across the hall was festive because he had some Drambuie, which made some of us feel pretty festive; Tim Colton got accepted at the Columbia School of Journalism, had a festive case of beer, and Bob the Corporal Manger came back, which made us all feel very festive. ## BLOC-NOTES

Up on the second floor at Sam the Record Man, there's usually a long-haired, rather unobtrusive-looking record salesman named John Norris. If you ask him, he'll play a Judy Collins record for you, or give an articulate opinion on Bob Dylan's latest disc. But John Norris isn't up there to handle the folkniks in the crowd. John Norris is there because he probably knows more about jazz than any other person in Canada. He is truly a walking and talking encyclopaedia of the jazz world.

Besides selling records (and also handling a weekly radio show on CBC-FM), John Norris also puts out Coda magazine—with Downbeat's recent eclipse now the best jazz mag in North America. This month Coda is celebrating its tenth anniversary. What started out as a clumsily mimeographed, relatively infrequent little journal has grown in a decade, under Norris' loving tutelage, to an exceedingly handsome, informative, and striking 50c magazine. Over the years, Norris lost considerable money as he nurtured his project alone along. It was and still is entirely "his baby".

But it did survive the rocky financial road and thanks to Norris' dedication, your favourite newstand carries one more good magazine.

Cool Radio

Publication nights are always made a little more bearable every Thursday night, thanks to Radio Varsity. Last night, after an hour or so of beautiful sound (The times to exude in its soupy Advertisements for Itself. Jed McKay (The Fox) and Pat Diamond (The Toad) of The Fox and Toad show.

Jed is a cool, dry, sarcastic send-up of all the pomposity and self-satisfaction that Radio Varsity tends at times to exude in its soupy Advertisements for Itself. Jed plays them—and mocks them.

In the middle of one of these solemn little cartridges which told the listeners that Radio Varsity was now a year and a half old, and the best thing around, Jed turned to me. "Do you realize how pompous that sounds?"

The cartridge ended. Jed flipped the switch, and said, sarcastic, over the air: "Oooo yeah. We're really making it here."

Jed is now in the process of producing records, after spending last year playing piano for "The Easy Riders". His first record for "Phonodisc" featuring a group currently called "The Underworld."

Which goes to show that, the sugary self-congratulatory 7-up ads to the contrary, Radio Varsity is producing some good people.

However, possible the most enjoyable disc-jockey in Toronto today for my money is CHUM-FM's Frank Lowenthal, who introduces the midnight to six classical selections. The guy is witty, knowledgeable, and engaging: probably the only disc-jockey in town who would play 15 minutes of John Cage's mechanized noise-collages.

MAGAZINES

Canadian magazines have always played the game of Constant Revolution. Yesterday's Young Turks are today's Establishment. The "Fiery Young Turks" that brought about the first Magazine Revolution were the then-young men that Arthur Irwin brought into Maclean's in the late '40's. Irwin searched the newspapers, and hired the brightest young men he could find: Ralph Allen, a Toronto sportswriter, Pierre Berton, a Vancouver reporter, and Blair Fraser, a book reviewer-turned-desk man for The Montreal Gazette.

Irwin's successor, Ralph Allen, hired the men that now have Canadian journalism in their hands: Peter Gzowski, Harry Bruce, Peter Newman, and Ken Lefolli (who dropped out of the Mag Game) to go into T.V.

These men, specifically Gzowski, are now trying to put as much life into the magazines they work with as Irwin and Allen put into Maclean's. The heart-breaking thing is that it's not quite working. Gzowski's New Look in the Star Weekly seems — so far — to be fading. The hold that his generation has on Toronto/national journalism seems to be increasing, rather than reaching "down". When younger writers, like Gail Dexter, Arthur Zeldin, Sherri Brydson, and Laurel Limpus write for Gzowski, they seem to be being moulded to the style of what is now our latest Magazine Establishment. It's a shame.

Canadian colleges hike fees

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students will pay $30 to $175 more for residence accommodations at Canadian universities next year.

Inflation, higher maintenance costs and salary increases are blamed by administrators for the hikes.

Highest rents will be at the University of Western Ontario in London, where fees will top the $1,000 plateau.

Several universities have pointed to Western's move to justify their own increases.

Waterloo Lutheran University will raise fees to $825 from $775 and University of Waterloo to $960 from $850. A single room at U of W will cost $1,000 in 1970.

Other universities scheduling fee hikes are Dalhousie in Halifax, York in Toronto, Alberta in Edmonton and St. Dunstan's in Prince Edward Island.

Students have not been consulted on the fee raises, administrators say, because no university money is involved. Financing of residences comes under federal and provincial housing, not education, schemes.

The Canadian Union of Students is currently on a campaign to encourage construction of student co-ops.

Co-ops get their money the same way. But they are generally operated more cheaply, backers say, because they are built more creepily than standard residences, have no maid services, and are run with student help.

UBC council election nullified

VANCOUVER (CUP) — The University of British Columbia student council will hold a by-election next month to supercede last week's disputed contest.

The council Monday declared candidate Stan Persky ineligible to run. It accepted an administration recommendation that the election be declared null and void.

Persky does meet the council constitution's stipulation that candidates for the presidency must have attended UBC for two years prior to election.

The administration committee also recommended that the ballots, sealed in the student council vault since election day, be destroyed. But this was ruled unconstitutional by incumbent council President Shaun Sullivan.

In a 10-0 vote council later decided not to count the ballots.

However, on election day last week five members of the council executive decided to count the ballots face down and seal them in the student council vault. A total of 6,528 students voted.

Persky will be able to run in the March 13 by-election if a proposed student referendum amending the exclusion clause passes.

The referendum would amend the article to limit candidature to students who have been at UBC for one rather than two years. The referendum will be held Feb. 28.

McGill students demonstrate quietly as Hawker-Siddeley recruits

MONTREAL (CUP) — The first peaceful protest in a long time was staged at McGill University Tuesday.

About 150 students demonstrated against the return of Hawker-Siddeley Co. of Canada Ltd. to the campus recruiting centre. The only violence occurred when a few students scuffled briefly on the recruiting centre's steps.

Students also splashed some red paint on the steps, but returned after the demonstration to clean it up.

The director of the centre said the demonstration did not interfere with the work of the centre, and all appointments for the day were kept.

Five police cruisers and several paddywagons were at the scene but no arrests were made.

Barry Crago of the McGill Association to End the War in Vietnam said his group was protesting the university's "moral" decision to allow companies involved in war production to recruit on campus.

HOCKEY

Burman got two goals and Cengarle and Donovan the others as SMC defeated Engineering, 4-1. L.A. Treen scored for Skule.

Canada beat Sweden, 3-0. Vic triumphed Trin, 4-1, on goals by the slippery Gries (2), Reeves, and Van Wyck (a kind of goatie). Akiyama replied for Trin.

Sekura (2), Werbicki and Rossi (imported vermouth) led UC over Meds, 4-2. Bates scored both goals for Meds. Hartley (2), Open Sesam, Bakker, Moore, and Kernohan scored as Archipelago wheeled freely over Pharm. Cote scored twice for Pharm; Mausser and Bertrand had the others.

Robb's three goals paced Erindale's 4-2 victory over PHE B; Mastromatteo had the other goals and five syllables. Stevens had all the PHE B goals (duo-Scholia ad Varsitatem.)

Lambert's fine goaltending was a major factor in New's 2-0 shutout of Businness. Harris and Brisehois scored for the Gnus (a gnu is a small South African antelope related to the Influenza.)

Hall scored twice and Henderson, Keys, and McDonald once each as Knox ("k" silent) slaughtered UC 11, 5-1. Tissis of the d'Ubervilles hit for UC 11.

BASKETBALL

Laglia and Quinn scored 6 points each to lead SMC over Meds A, 30-24. Kent led Meds with 11; Lloyd Rossman (who's he?) had 8.

SMC B beat Jr. Eng., 34-28. Kelly (SMC B, 12) and Calaghan (Jr. Eng., 13) were the leading scorers.

Oleszkowicz (I'm sure that's some kind of code) and Harris each scored 6 to lead Innis past Dents, 26-25. Mon Kapitan had 9 for Dents.

Vic 11 got 13 points from Mather as they beat Erindale, 36-27. Lochinvar Sprogs continued his fine play (he is one of the leagues leading scorers) with 12 for Erin.

SQUASH (oops)

Taylor and Major won their matches to lead Law B over Meds A. Ozolins of Meds won his match.

Law A got victories from Laskin and Hahn as they swept their series against Trin B.

Cook and Fallis (more cheap Varsity sensationalism) gave Vic the decision over Innis. Goldbach won his match for Innis.

Earlier, Meds A had defeated Trin A, as Ozolins and Toguri came through with wins. Drunken Loat won for Trin A. And Law B (Taylor, Hess, McComb) had swept Vic 11 (my, what a menial field.)

Varsity gymnasts seek to corral Caron

By BARNEY HIGH

Varsity's six top gymnasts — Alex Hamilton, Jamie Archibald, Carl Sloane, John Kortwright, Dave Copeland, and Brian McVey — head today for "Winter Carnival Town" and the OQAA Gymnastics Championships at Laval University. For tomorrow afternoon's meet, they have one goal — to regain the Caron trophy from the powerful Universite de Montreal team. The trophy was not in Toronto this year for the first time in eight

Coach Julio Roncon is confident that the team can meet the challenge. "If the boys come up with at least the performances they show in workouts, we have a very good chance of beating Montreal."

There is little doubt that this year's squad is stronger than the one that placed third in Kingston last winter. All members of that group are back and have improved greatly. All-round sophomore competitor John Kortwright rates a fine chance for a medal on the high bar and is strong on the rings and parallel bars. Veteran Alex Hamilton remains the group's steadiest man. His rings work is particularly strong, but it is his unspectacular but extremely competent handling of all events which gives the team its solid foundation.

In contrast to Hamilton, Brian McVey is the most spectacular performer. The number two junior all-round gymnast in the country last year, McVey was also runner-up to Montreal's Gilles Briere in OQAA university competition. This year should see another close fight between the two. Carl Sloane, floor exercises specialist, is probably the team's most improved tumbler, and is given an excellent chance of copping the gold in that event by Coach Roncon.

Finally, the addition of rookies Dave Copeland and Jamie Archibald has added depth to the team. Copeland's winning performance in last Saturday's all-round competition against McMaster puts him in strong contention for the OQAA title, while Archibald adds tremendous form to his talent on the parallel bars, side horse, and vaulting.

The main drawback for Varsity is the OQAA ruling that only six gymnasts may compete per team. The theory behind this is that teams will be forced to develop all-round gymnasts. But, says Julio Roncon:

"I really feel strongly that we should have been able to take along our best eight gymnasts, even though some are specialists."

The OQAA rules call for at least three all-round men, but permit five competitors per event per team and count the best three of these five towards the team total.

"By adding two of my three specialists, Phil Miccaelis (floor and vaulting), Mauro DiPasquale (rings), and Arthur Stein (pommel horse), I could have had three strong guys in every event, virtually ensuring a first place finish."

The Toronto representative to the standing committee which recommends rule changes for the meet is to request a change in this limit for next year's competion.

Nevertheless, the gymnasts are in peak form and will definitely give U. deM. a tough fight for all the medals.

POMMEL PATTERN: Our boys will undoubtedly be the "worst dressed team" in the meet. New uniforms have finally been ordered but won't be in on time . . . Because of commitments to his professional career, COACH RONCON flew to ENGLAND yesterday and will most regretfully not be with the team. Former Varsity and outstanding Canadian gymnast BARRY BROOKER will fill in.

Basketbelle tourney

By JCAN STEVENSON and LUBA OLESNYCKY

Varsity's red hot Basket-Belles face the Queens Golden Gals tonite at 7:30 in the opening round of the women's intercollegiate basketball tournament.

After disposing of Queens, coach Anne Hewett's squad do battle with perennial champs Western Mares.

Armageddon is scheduled for the main gym of the Benson Building at 11:00 am Saturday morning.

Men are invited to attend both games and cheer the Bluettes on the victory. Meanwhile, back at the net, U of T VolleyBelles have retained their WIAA volleyball championship.

The nubile Varsity gals spiked their way to five straight wins en route to the title, including a crucial triumph over heavily favoured Western.

Final home contest tonight

By ALBY TROSS

Varsity Blues begin the home stretch of their Senior Intercollegiate schedule tonight when they play host to Western University Mustangs in a 8 p.m. encounter at Varsity Arena. The game marks Blues last home appearance of the regular season.

Varsity needs at least two wins and a tie out of their four remaining games to nail down first place. They currently lead second-place Waterloo Warriors, who have only three games left, by one point. Of course, if Warriors should lose or tie any any of their matches Blues would be all but home free.

But coach Tom Watt and his players are looking for more than first place as the schedule heads into its final week. If Blues can get through tonight's game with Western and away games at Guelph (tomorrow afternoon at 2:30) Montreal and Queen's (next Friday and Saturday respectively) without a loss, they will become the first team ever to finish the regular season unbeaten.

Also at stake in the four games is the league scoring title. Murray Stroud currently leads the race with 31 points (9 goals and 22 assists) while another Blue

Paul Laurent is in second place just two points back. Laurent also leads the circuit in goal-scoring with his fourteen markers in twelve games.

For tonight's game coach Watt will go with much the same lineup that faced Waterloo last Friday night. Bob McClelland, recently recovered from the flu, will reassume his left-wing post on a line with Stroud and Brian Jones. Terry Parsons will dress as the fifth defenceman.

For Western, the game is absolutely crucial. Any hopes they have of making the playoffs rests on their success tonight. Should they lose, the best they can do is tie for fourth place while a win would put them up tight for the final playoff berth.

Western coach Ron Watson has had his problems this season with personnel changes and injuries. Goal-tender Gary Bonney, a former SIHL all-star has been replaced, defenceman Ernie MacLaughlin has left the team and another defenceman, Bill L'Heureux, is out with an ankle injury. As a result, Watson has been forced, with only limited success, to double-shift his two remaining blueline regulars, Dave Field and Bob Blackburn.

AROUND THE NET . . . Tonight's game against Western will not be televised on CHANNEL 11 . . . The DR. DAFOE TROPHY, awarded annually to the Varsity player voted the most valuable by his teammates, will be presented between periods. . . Blues alternate goaltender PETE ADAMSON, who has played only in exhibition games and in Austria, may see some SIHL action before the end of the schedule . . . Coach Watt is not dismissing tomorrow's tussle with Gryphons as an automatic Varsity victory; "Guelph are tough, a real good hockey team, and it won't be easy."

rod mickleburgh

Yaas, yaas. Bein' a maple-syrup Canuck is jes' fine these days. Jes' fine. That plucky young 'un, Nancy Green, no sooner grabs off a gold in that there gigantic salami than our shiny lads, god love 'em, go out and also do some pretty fine prospectin' in that direction. Mother of Pearl, next thing you know Varsity Blues'll tie the Russians 5-5. And my late aunt (long since laid to rest, amen) might almost come to the conclusion that, despite their citizenship, Canadian athletes could actually win at somethin'. No need to scoff and treat 'em second-class, dear lady. Yaas, yaas, no reason 'tall.

Then we come to the Canadian Football League (hal-lowed ever by thy name, O great one!). Bluntly, to be a Canadian in the CFL is to be second-class. They bend the rules to flood their rosters with Canadians, but pay them second-class salaries, give the second-class bonuses and guarantees, and generally treat them as if the biggest break of their lives was to be invited to try out for the team. You've heard of "student as nigger." How about "Canadian football player as nigger?"

Varsity Blues' quarterback last year, Bob Amer, went through the "nigger" routine before he reported to Blues, and he's justifiably bitter about it.

"It's a pretty wierd set-up all right," said Amer the other night, "I was at the Montreal camp from June 15 to August 20. I didn't get any sort of shot from the coaches. Just before I got cut, my activity was down to calling defensive line signals."

So Bob Amer was kept at training camp for more than two months, practically ignored, and then cut. Well, that's tough, you say, but at least the club gave him something to show for all the time he put in. Prepare to be disillusioned, naive reader. Bob Amer got nothing.

"I got a small advance (that's what they called it) for signing in February, but that was way gone by June. At the camp I was put up and fed, and given five dollars a week spending money. My summer earning was blown and I got nothing out of training camp but a dislike for pro football. So I'm living on student loans for a year."

The attitude of the Als, and the other CFL clubs too, is that Canadians deserve nothing and just to allow them on the field is sufficient remuneration until they actually make the team.

Americans, on the other hand, are all treated as if they're second Jackie Parkers. Says Amer: "They get $2,000 just for coming across the border." And an articulate athlete named Mike Eben adds some wise words: "Any unqualified nut from the States can come up here and be assured of a two or three thousand dollar bonus. If he doesn't make it, at east he has some remuneration to show for the whole thing." Bob Amer didn't make it and blew more than a thousand bucks.

Which brings us to Mr. Eben, the finest pass-catcher ever to don a Varsity uniform, and, this year, the first college draft choice of the B.C. Lions.

Mike Eben knows what he's worth and knows what he wants. One thing he doesn't want is to play football in British Columbia. He plans to continue his education next year and "Why should I go from the best to the second-best graduate school in Canada?" Instead of grasping hungrily at the barest thread of a chance to play pro football (and Eben does want to turn pro), he is dictating his terms to the clubs—a courageous, revolutionary thing for a Canadian collegian to do.

Right now Lions are trying to swing a trade with the Argos for Eben. However, even if it materializes, there's still no guarantee Mike Eben will suit up for the Argonauts. Eben is making a stand which may well be a vital trail-blazer for Canadians trying to get a fair deal in their own league.

He wants money—not just a pittance but a substantial bonus.

"Yes, I'll definitely want a bonus to sign. I'm getting married this spring, and I'd be crazy to throw away a whole summer with the added expense of marriage for a shot at pro football when there's no guarantee I'll make the squad. Clubs don't pay bonuses because they like to but because it's necessary to get good football players. There's no reason why I should be treated any differently just because I'm a Canadian."

I'm for Mike, Eben, eh booby!

Rebuilding Lancers confront Blues in HH

By JIM MORRISON

This was to have been a rebuilding year for Windsor Lancers. Left with only one proven star from last year's Championships squad, Lancers were supposed to relinquish, at long last, their stranglehold on the SIBL, passing the torch to some other deserving team.

Someone forgot to tell Bob Samaras. The Lancer ten-some that faces Varsity Blues in Hart House tomorrow night are currently in first place, in the SIBL with a record of 6-1.

The answer to Windsor's success this season is balance. Only three Lancers are among the top twenty League scorers, but eight team members are averaging over seven points per game. In a Windsor game, everybody gets into the act.

Headliner is forward Bob Navetta, currently in first place individually with a 22.3 ppg average. The other two front-line spots are occupied by Chris Wydrzynski and Joe Bardswich, with assists from Andy Auch, Tom Elliott and Ed Lanktree.

Lancers have only one all-star candidate at guard—ball—hawk supreme Guy Delaire. But Delaire's companions Sante Salvador, Tom Murdock and Gerry Bunce are all competent backcourt material.

Blues, of course have to win if their dim playoff hopes are to be kept alive. They will be attempting to break the Hart House jinx which has given them a 1-4 record in the matchbox, worst ever for a Varsity team in recent years.

Blues can beat Lancers. The 88-84 overtime loss in Windsor proved that. Bruce Dempster seems to have regained his early season shooting form, and Blues' other four starters are way up in the scoring race. If they can keep Bob Navetta's point total down, they could win easily.

This will be Varsity's last home game, since they close out the season against Waterloo on Feb. 24 in Waterloo. It will also be the fans' last chance to catch Mark White and Ron Voake in Blues' uniform, since neither plans to be back next year.

FOUL LINE FACTS:

Mark White has been named winner of the Dr. W. A. Potter Trophy, awarded annually since 1958 to the Blues' team member judged most valuable in the opinion of his team-mates. — Mark joins the illustrious company of the likes of DAVE WEST and JIM HOLOWACHUK . . . In a game played Wednesday night, Waterloo Warriors rejoined Windsor Lancers at the top of the standings with an 89-71 over McMaster Maurauders.

Boxers, pugilists and mittmen to RMC

By JOHN SWAIGEN

Varsity boxing team goes against Royal Military College in Kingston Saturday Night in the second half of a home and home tournament. U of T pugilists (you should excuse the expression) clobbered RMC four bouts to one two weeks ago at Hart House.

The lineup is: Bill Fisher, 140 lb.; Peter Junger, 145 lb.; Mike D'Ornellas, 150 lb.; Biff Matthews, 160 lb.; Harry Ewaschuk, 175 lb.; Joe Donohue, heavyweight.

In addition novice Len Brown will fight an RMC novice. Varsity coach Tony Canzano expressed guarded optimism about Saturday's outcome. "Of course we'll beat them," the modest coach said. "Look, how many times have we beat them before? I don't go there to lose."

Boycott continues at OCA - march may follow

By ANNE BOODY

A student boycott at the Ontario College of Art heads into its third day today with about 700 of 1,030 students expected to continue their protest against the "unjust dismissal" of two OCA instructors.

The boycott began Thursday when students staged a sit-in in the auditorium against Principal Sydney Watson's actions in firing Aba Bayefsky and Eric Freinfeld.

Students claim that the dismissal of Freinfeld, who has been 22 years at OCA, and Bayefsky, with 12 years tenure, jeopardizes the rights of students and faculty.

The crisis began last Monday when Bayefsky rose at a meeting of students, faculty and administration to clarify a point Watson had made.

Bayefsky's statement—"in the interests and honesty of the facts, I would like to disagree"—led to a dispute about whether Watson was lying.

At another meeting the next day Freinfeld questioned the competence of a principal "who would not listen to his own students and faculty."

Wednesday the two men were summoned from their classes and dismissed on the spot.

Their dismissal prompted the sit-in Thursday and Friday with students, who say the two were popular and competent, gaining support from nine other faculty members among the 50-odd OCA instructors.

Organizers also have drawn support from other Ontario schools and are looking for more as the protest continues.

Last Monday's meeting was called by the students council over a year-old controversy involving the drawing and painting curriculum.

Carl Schaeffer, head of the drawing and painting department, was informed of drastic changes in the course curriculum by Watson. He was sworn to secrecy not to tell either faculty or staff of these changes.

But rumors of the proposed changes spread and students demanded to know about them.

Students in the department feared that eventually their course would be eliminated and they would be amalgamated into the commercial course.

They formed a committee and appointed fourth-year student John Bowman to present their grievances to the administration.

Watson refused to speak to them but finally, with the threat of a march on Queen's Park, agreed to see them last Monday.

After a headstrong debate the students had not gained any of their demands.

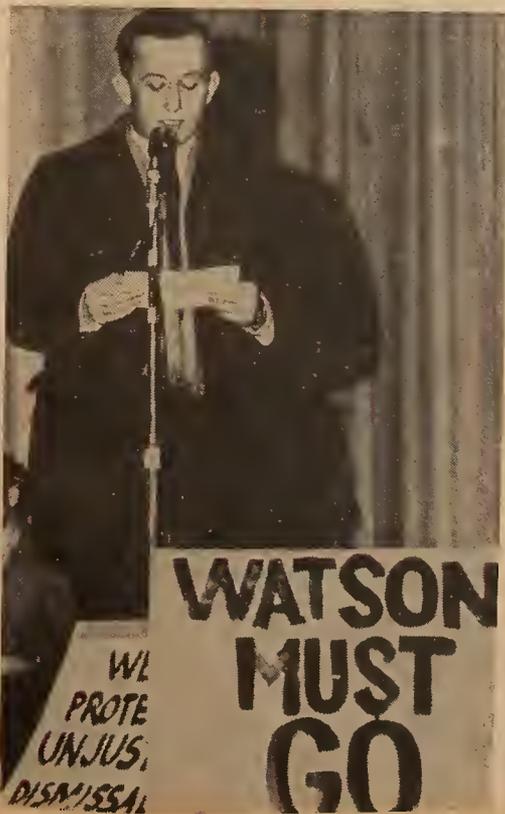

"I've been called a liar by one of my own staff — I really appreciate that," Watson said in reply to Bayefsky's charges that Schaeffer had been sworn to secrecy over the change of curriculum.

Wednesday the two were fired because they were "poor employees" according

John Trelevan, SAC Vice-president, stood up and spoke to Watson.

Bowman was informed by Watson that day that unless he worked through the proper channels—the students council — he would be expelled. If he presented this ultimatum to the press he would also be considered expelled, Watson said.

Bowman knew nothing then of the instructors' dismissal, but when he learned of it he went directly to the press and therefore considered himself expelled.

The dismissal of the two instructors was made in consultation with other department heads and the principal. Wes D'Angelo, a student council representative present, was given no say. This the students believe is a serious infringement of students' rights.

At the sit-in Thursday the students were given a rousing speech by OUS Vice-President Brian Switzman.

"The faculty at OCA are being treated like scabs," Switzman said. "They are forced to obey the orders of the administration or lose their jobs. What right has the administration to force curriculum changes on the students without consulting either staff or students when they are not even interested in art?"

Friday they came out in full force. Telegrams from other universities and colleges and the Canadian Union of Students poured in announcing support for the boycott.

Representatives from the students' executives at Ryerson, York, Glendon, U of T, George Brown College and Windsor spoke to the students.

Lawyer Vince Kelley, called in by the Ontario Union of Students, said that according to the OCA contract the two instructors have not been fired.

The contract states that in immediate dismissals written consent from Education Minister William Davis is required.

Mr. Davis apparently did not give consent. He has been in Chicago for the last five days. Clare Wescott, executive assistant to Mr. Davis said there is nothing relating the minister of education to OCA.

Mr. Watson said last night: "There is absolutely no chance of the instructors being rehired."

He noted that OCA is an "autonomous college," in a reply to a query on whether

Mr. Davis is required to improve firing by the college.

Later he said this interpretation was "not correct."

He said nothing would be done about the boycott.

"We're having classes as usual. There's about 75 per cent attendance. You call that a boycott?"

"The students go to see the fun and then go to classes."

Thursday the halls were empty and few students were seen in classes. All the action and noise came from one place the auditorium.

A petition is being circulated among students demanding the reinstatement of the two instructors. There are tentative plans for a march to Queen's park Tuesday if the two are rehired.

The students are calling for the support of other Ontario schools to support them in their fight.

Telegrams of support have been received from Ryerson, Laurentian, Lakehead, St. Patrick's College, Guelph, Ottawa, Northern Institute of Technology, Western, Waterloo, Waterloo Lutheran and the Canadian Union of Students.

Moncton students suspend strike

MONCTON (CUP) — Students of the University of Moncton voted overwhelmingly last Tuesday to suspend their strike, which had paralyzed the 1,100-student campus for 10 days.

Students had voted to stay out of classes until the New Brunswick government froze tuition fees at their present levels. The crisis followed the announcement of a fee hike by the university administration.

Wednesday, university President Adelard Savoie warned that students missing lectures from then on would have to make them up in their spare time or not be allowed to write final exams.

Seventy per cent of the 800 students who voted favored halting the walkout.

Meanwhile, in Fredericton, the provincial capital, 3,000 students supporting the tuition-freeze demands demonstrated in front of the legislature buildings.

City police had to remove several demonstrators from the lobby of the Centennial Building Wednesday, 27 hours after they sat in at the height of the demonstration.

Three history profs leaving

Professor J. M. S. Careless, former head of the University of Toronto history department, is one of three department luminaries apparently leaving for other universities.

The others are Prof. Ramsay Cook, going to York University, and Prof. Donald Creighton who is reported on his way to Trent University in Peterborough. Prof. Creighton has denied the report, however.

Prof. Careless, who has been here since 1945, is going to University of Victoria.

He made it clear that he isn't quitting because of problems of the university.

"This damn city is driving me away. It's dirty, crowded and polluted. This city is in a mess and I've decided I need a change. Maybe things will look better from the other side of the fence.

Dr. Louis Hertzman, acting chairman of the York's history department, said he "anticipated" that Dr. Cook's appointment would take place, but hinted that it was almost certain.

Prof. Cook will sidestep to Harvard University for a year, where he will be visiting professor of Canadian studies, a post now held by U of T President Claude T. Bissell.

It is estimated that eight graduate students are doing theses in Canadian history under Prof. Cook's direction.

Dr. Hertzman said these students could expect difficulty in completing their theses after Cook leaves, depending on the U of T history department.

Prof. Cook refuses to say anything about his future except that he will be going to Harvard for a year.

Foreign graduate awards cut

There will be fewer scholarships available for foreign graduate students at the University of Toronto next year.

The Province of Ontario Fellowships will no longer be available to students in Canada on a students visa.

Foreign students who already hold the fellowships, or who have landed immigrant status, will not be affected by the change.

The applications for the fellowships ask the student to declare a serious intent in teaching in Ontario.

But those here on student visas must leave after completing their studies.

A spokesman for the Ontario government department of information said the discrepancy was always recognized, but "Now we're making it official."

In the past, the rule has been generally ignored.

Keith Yates, assistant dean of the school of graduate studies, said last week:

"Many foreign students would like to declare a serious intent but are in no position to apply for landed immigrant status."

Dean Yates said the move would reduce the number of awards available to the graduate school. More than 100 students will be affected, he said.

Tom Faulkner, Students Administrative Council president, commented, "It does not surprise me.

"They've been fiddling with the plan since it started without discussing it in the legislature. This isn't the first time."

Dean Yates said overseas students would be encouraged to apply for the U of T open fellowships. "But of course the will have to compete with everyone else on an academic basis."

The final result will probably be less scholarship money for all the graduate students, as the graduate school tries to compensate for the fellowship cuts.

24 Woodrow Wilson awards at U of T

Twenty-four University of Toronto students have been awarded coveted Woodrow Wilson fellowships. U of T tied Harvard University for third place among the 307 North American universities whose students got awards.

The $2,000 awards go to students judged the best university teacher prospects in North America by the Woodrow Wilson National Fellowship Foundation. It was founded in memory of the late U.S. president whose reforms at Princeton University revolutionized higher learning in the U.S. Princeton led with 32 awards.

Toronto's winners are: William Alexander (Trin), Stephen Barnstien (UC), John Dougheny (SMC), John Dunn (SMC), Frederick Grossberg (UC), Jonathan Kertzer (UC), Brigitte Koestler (SMC), Monika

Langer (SMC), Douglas Long (Vic), Carolyn McMaster (Trin), Mary Morton (Vic), Kenneth Popert (UC), Darla Rhyne (Trin), Ian Sadowsky (UC), Antonio Santossosso (SMC), Douglas Schoenherr (Vic), Arthur Sedgwick (Trin), Joseph Steiner (UC), Ian Storey (Trin), John Tucker (SMC), Philippa Wallace (UC), Russell Westkirk (SMC), Gregory Whincup (Trin) and Mark Wilson (Vic).

Designates will be highly recommended for first-year graduate study awards in North American graduate schools.

Ford Foundation funds will support 50 of the 93 Canadian designates as Woodrow Wilson Fellows in 1968-69.

In addition to the 24 designates, 15 University of Toronto students won honorable mention.

Two University of Toronto students were killed and five others injured in a head-on crash on Highway 11 Saturday morning.

The students, all members of the Emmanuel College hockey team, were returning from exhibition games in South River and Powassan.

Dead are James Forsythe and James Peacock, both 25.

Eric Inghram, 24, Doug Joblin, 23, Fred Joblin, 21, Victor Shepherd, 20, and Lee Coulter, 23, were injured in the crash.

The games are an annual event organized by the South River United Church. The U of T team members called themselves The God Squad.

Also killed in the accident was Lloyd Hicks, 34, of South River, the lone occupant of the second car.

SAC fees increased by $4 for '68-69

University of Toronto students may pay an additional $4 to the Students Administrative Council in 1968-69.

An increase in fees to $12 from $8 will be debated at the SAC meeting Wednesday.

Finance Commissioner Jan Duinker has recommended $2 of the increase to cover increased operating costs. The other $2 is advised by Joe Merber, university committee co-chairman, and John Kirkpatrick, communications commissioner, to cover capital expenditures.

The main cause for the increase in operating costs is the introduction of new SAC educational and service programs such as hiring a full-time educational consultant.

Other proposed expenditures include the establishment of a film production committee and subsidization of the Blue and White Society.

The capital expenditures increase is to cover the expansion of University of Toronto Radio to FM programming and the increased capital expenditures when the Campus Centre opens in 1969.

The increase is the first in eight years and still leaves U of T students paying the lowest student fees in Canada.

OCA and us

The chances are that students at the Ontario College of Art will walk across Queen's Park Crescent tomorrow to carry their current grievances to University Affairs Minister William Davis.

They'll be carrying a lot of grievances. Even though there are only about 1,000 students at OCA, their grievances are directly relevant to the faculty and students of the University of Toronto and every other educational institution in this province.

The art students and about a dozen of their instructors are fighting for freedom of speech in the Ontario educational system.

The freedom of speech of two members of the faculty of OCA was seriously violated by the principal, Sydney H. Watson, when he fired them for no other reason than having made a couple of unfavorable remarks about himself.

Last Wednesday, he gave drawing and painting instructors Aba Bayefsky and Eric Freifeld one half hour to clear out of the OCA building. This, after 12 and 22 years' faithful service to the college.

Watson decided to forget about the two teachers' long and distinguished records as two of this country's best painting instructors simply to show them who's boss.

Watson told students and reporters that he fired the two men because they called him a liar and an incompetent. An investigation by the OCA student council has shown that, in fact, neither instructor used those words in direct reference to Watson.

That he is a liar is Watson's own interpretation of certain remarks made apparently in good faith by Bayefsky at a student-faculty assembly last Monday.

And Freifeld remarked at a Tuesday meeting that any principal who will not listen to his students is not fit to head a college.

There is no cause for dismissal in the actions of these two men. Watson's action was rash and unfair; proof, in fact, that if anyone should be dismissed it is he.

The student strike at OCA enters its third day today. We hope it will continue as long as it is necessary to reverse the two firings. If the students go back to classes without total victory, not only will they suffer but every student and teacher in the province will suffer.

Unless Watson can be made to reverse his decision, either because of the strike or by pressure through Davis, no teacher in the province will be able to voice criticism of his administration without fear of immediate firing.

There seems to be a legal technicality which may result in the reinstatement of Bayefsky and Freifeld. Their contract stipulated that they could be dismissed immediately with the consent of the minister of education. Watson has admitted that this consent had not been asked or obtained.

But regardless of this technicality, students and teachers from across the province should band together to support the OCA fight immediately. So far, several student groups have sent telegrams of support to the OCA students and instructors. More support is needed if the minister and the principal are to be convinced that this is no small fight.

It is a big fight involving us all. This is why, today, as many U of T students and professors should pay a visit to OCA on McCaul St., just south of Dundas, to tell the art students they are not alone.

Today the striking students are collecting signatures on a petition asking Davis to intervene on the two instructors' behalf. They will also consider a proposal to march on Queen's Park tomorrow to present the petition. If that decision is reached, OCA students should not be alone. Students and teachers at U of T and at every other educational institution in Ontario have an obligation to march with them.

The unfortunate thing is that this controversy has completely sidetracked the students from the campaign that started it all—a battle against some of the outdated and sterile aspects of education at OCA.

notes . . .

When Jock Ludwig's novel Confusions was published some years back, at least one critic of the University of Toronto asked: "Why isn't he here."

Ludwig, a native of Winnipeg who had been writer-in-residence at some Canadian university, but was working in the States. He's an English professor at Stoney Brook, a sort of experimental pin in New York State's 58-campus system.

Anyway, Ludwig starts a new job July 1, as writer-in-residence at U of T, living in Massey College, giving lectures and seminars and being available for chats with students.

Let's see, Mordecai Richler is doing the same work at Sir George Williams University and Earle Birney is in Waterloo. A few advances are being made.

Stoney Brook, by the way, is set in a farming-cum-suburban area on Long Island where Suffolk County crime fighters carried off a military-like marijuana raid on student residences two weeks ago (Newsweek, Jan. 29).

Commissioner of that rural police force, John L. Barry, commented: "Academic freedom is not written into the penal codes," while the school's president, John Toll said: "It's the responsibility of the university community to create a situation where there will be no need for undercover agents."

Where presidents and commissioners blather, students will find the void and one told it like it really is: "I think someday we'll look back on this raid like our parents looked back on police raids of the Prohibition era."

more vigor, please

Sir:
I should like to comment on a letter from the Director and the Business Manager of the University of Toronto Press regarding the interruption of negotiations between the SAC and the Press. Messrs. Jeanneret and Bohne are quite correct in that I did not say that the Bookstore Committee had agreed to meet our requests. It was, as they and I have said, the administrative representatives of the Bookstore who had agreed to support the SAC's request.

It was, however, my impression that they had reconsidered their support for these requests, or, in any event, were pressing for them with less vigor than before. I am pleased to learn, therefore, that this is not the case and that they are still very much in favour of having students as full members of a Bookstore Committee which would, to all intents and purposes, manage the Bookstore.

I should also like to point out that our chief problem has been, not trying to get to talk to Messrs. Jeanneret and Bohne, but trying to get the Press Committee of the Board of Governors to meet and discuss our requests. The Governors do not, as a rule, discuss matters with students, but prefer to deal through their administrative representatives. Since the examinations are approaching rapidly now, we are most concerned that the Press Committee still does not know when it will meet to consider our request.

Tom Faulkner
SAC President

the artsie's plight

Sir:
I am prompted to write this letter in conjunction with a recent conversation I had with one of my professors. In brief he stated that he was awed at the apathy that prevailed in my class and was frustrated with the apparent disinterest. I want to offer him and any enquiring professor what I think the reason is.

Basically the problem is being in a general course. We are collection of numbers associated with a certain college and nothing else. It is true that apathy exists to a large degree but how can this be overcome when the course is so large and contains students of so many diversified interests. Students in the general course are associated with the high and mighty faculty of Arts and Science. Big deal. There is nothing around to provide motivation or interest.

If you look at the Engineering Society you can see why they are proud to be called Engineers. Their various capers and the L.G.M.B. are unique to only them and make them interested to some degree in school.

But what does an artsie have? Nothing but the monotony of sitting in a lecture with 300 other students who hate it as much as you.

Take for another example the students in Medicine. They are taking pertinent subjects to their desired profession and in all probability enjoy them. But what about an artsie? Frequently he is forced to take subjects which he couldn't care less about, but nevertheless has to suffer with them. If you ask me, we're just puppets being controlled by almighty arts faculty.

Finally, there is the competition. When you get 300 students all trying to disperse into different professional faculties which will only take the top 10 per cent, you're in danger of getting your throat slit by your classmate who wants to eliminate you as a competitor.

In a professional course, generally, once you're in there, there is little chance your place will be usurped by someone else. But the artsie has to walk around with the constant idea of "I must get more marks". How can you enjoy school with a price like that on your mind?

Apathy is the word all right and the reason why is justifiable. I'm just as apathetic as the next guy because school frustrates me to no end. To my poor professor, I express sympathy, but what about us, the artsies, the poor dejected, apathetic puppets you see being strung around campus?

Irv Ferferman (II New)

to clarify again

Sir:
We very much appreciate Mr. Faulkner's courtesy in having sent us a copy of his response to our letter published in The Varsity (Feb. 9, 1968), thus giving us the opportunity of a further reply. Although we continue to agree with most of the points Mr. Faulkner has made, we should like to clarify again our position with regard to the proposed Bookstores Committee. While we have consistently urged the formation of an effective committee, we don't believe that such a body could be reasonably charged with voting many of the measures which would be in its own interest (for example, discounts, credit privileges and other services), when the financial responsibility lies elsewhere. But a strong student committee could be invaluable in assisting management to maximize such services to the University Community. Several suggestions made by SAC representatives in the past have already been incorporated in plans for the next academic year.

SAC: what a social union means

THIS IS THE FIRST OF A TWO-PART ARTICLE IN WHICH SAC'S FINANCE COMMISSIONER EXPLAINS HOW SAC'S NEW ORIENTATION AFFECTS THE AVERAGE STUDENT.

By JAN DUINKER

SAC representatives have changed over the last few years. The SAC rep of the past would be an all-round, average sort of guy, who wore the right clothes, went to the right parties and was accepted by all the right college cliques.

He would be in fact the expected product of the system that created him, the popularity contest election. He would have run for SAC because he thought the experience as a junior politician might be valuable, or because he thought it might look good on a job application form; SAC would be a great place to make friends that might help him in his future career as a lawyer or business man.

His political debate would consist of jocular attacks and defences of the various campus cliques and organizations; he would feel his prime responsibility as SAC rep was to lobby for his constituency to make sure that they got a fair share of the SAC pork barrel.

NO PETTY LOBBYING

But SAC representatives have changed, they are just as easy going as always (maybe not as well liked); but the modern SAC rep is certainly more serious than his "quiet generation" predecessor. SAC meetings are now taken up by the analysis of philosophies and by the development of utopian structures. SAC reps now talk about the socialist-liberal dialogue, selling-out to the system, and the anti-ideological thinking of administrators. They don't care that much about petty lobbying; there are many more important things to do.

This year, SAC has changed from the liberal student government of the nineteen fifties towards the "social union" students government of the future. Now what does this really mean? How will this new "social union" political philosophy affect the average student?

Besides the changes in SAC reps themselves, there has been a change in the policies that SAC now espouses. The policies of SAC are now based on well-thought out philosophies of education, of democracy, etc, and now seem to reflect a much more reasoned view of society than that visualized by the student leaders of the past fighting for their share of SAC budget. And in even some cases, the present policies of SAC have initiated action. Hence we have the development of the student power movement.

But what are the ideas which direct the present change in SAC? What exactly does this "social unionism" mean? Social unionism can be best described as a compromise between twentieth century liberalism and the ideology of student syndicalism.

Twentieth century liberalism provides the pragmatism which allows the student union to interact and to exist with the rest of society, while student syndicalism provides the ideas and the direction of the policies of student unionism. (A brief explanation of student syndicalism — student syndicalism was first adopted by U.N.E.F. (French Union of Students) in Grenoble in 1946. This philosophy is based on two fundamental principals (1) the student is a young intellectual worker (2) the student should view all problems of society in terms of what he can do individually or collectively as a student).

IMPROVE STUDENT ENVIRONMENT

The first priority of student unionism is to improve the environment and conditions where the student does his studying—in the classroom situation. Student unionism would feel that the real need of reform or change in the university is in the classroom and in the lecture room; education should be directed towards the interaction of professor and student so that a creative dialogue is developed.

Student unionism also has an idea of democracy; not simply based on the principal of one man - one vote but rather based on the idea of a "free and liberated" human being who has equal opportunity to take part in all aspects of society's workings. Student unionism would feel that it should concern itself with the real problems of students rather than wasting its time on the superficial extra-curricular affairs which took up the time of student governments of the past; the student union would articulate the student position in all cases where united student action is desired.

But what good is "student unionism" for the average student? Is it simply a grab for power (to quote John Burns of the Globe and Mail). Perhaps this question can be answered by looking at a university which operates under this philosophy. Such a university would be the University of Goteborg in Sweden. (I was very fortunate in meeting the student president of this university this summer).

One of the fundamental ideas in student unionism is that the student union should look after all the common interests of students. This would mean that the student union would have control over all aspects of the university which solely concerned students. Going back to the University of Goteborg, we would see that the student union has complete control of all the residences.

NO "IN LOCO PARENTIS"

Living accommodation for students, is fundamentally a student problem and it appears pointless to have the academic half of the university concern itself with this problem. (Goteborg student union owns $75 million of residences (this is over one-half the assets of the University—U of Goteborg is about the same size as U of T). The residences themselves are run by the students that live there.

The concept of "loco parentis" which has some influence in Canada does not exist in this Swedish University. The student would be subject to the laws of the land and that is all; if he had any secondary group restrictions, they would be to the student union — but these don't really exist. The student union also provides many services for the students; it provides really every service the student would want - restaurants, publishing house, secretarial pools, hospital, etc.

dining with the community elite

The best thing about the University College Scholars' Dinner was seeing Allan Kamin in a shirt and tie.

The coveted red and white embossed invitation with the UC seal announced the august event. "The Principal requests the honour of your company . . ." Well, it's a good place to make an appearance.

Tis indeed a warm and wonderful feeling when Principal LePan greets us:

"University College has a warm place in her heart for all its students—even the third class students,—yes, even the drop-outs. But for you people—an especially warm place."

Drop-outs rejoice! University College has a warm place in her heart for you.

A Gentleman named Mr. Swan gave the after-dinner address. It was a pleasant talk with just the right proportion of congratulations for us (the scholars), light-hearted anecdotes (with a message) and candid advice to stand us in good stead for the future (shades of high school commencement). Also some in-jokes for the head table.

He said we should not be afraid to indulge our senses. But, be cautioned, do not prostitute them—do not misuse them so that they become deadened instead of sharpened. I watched Kamin folded over the back of his chair. He hasn't missed a Scholar's Dinner yet.

But the UC dinner is small-time compared to the annual bash in the Great Hall for the one-one people. These select few are those who have stood first in first class honours in each course of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The first and last time I made the scene at one of these was in my freshman year. Some of us who had psyched out the Ontario government on the grade 13 departmentals were invited to mingle with the elect.

At the one-one dinner a strange rite is practised. All the faculty members enter the ball first and take every second seat. Then the students file in and take the remaining seats between the faculty members. That's for student-faculty communication.

Now, for a freshman, the Great Hall is a sobering and humbling experience. Magisterial portraits of university presidents and chancellors and other pillars of the academic community look down sternly upon the undergraduates; the resonant periods of Milton's Areopagitica declare "Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant Nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks . . ." And there, surrounded on three sides by professors, in the lofty hall sit I—the quaking freshman.

The dinner conversation, as I remember, was one of the first traumatic experiences of my academic career.

"Oh, you're in English are you, miss?" said a hoary sage sitting across from me genially. "Now let's see, can you tell me who wrote the quotation engraved on the paneling?"

"Do or die," think I. "It isn't from Wuthering Heights or A Tale of Two Cities. It isn't even from Hamlet or Macbeth or The Tempest." (so much for high school English).

"I'm short-sighted," say I meekly. "I can't read it." That's beating the system!

Robertson Davies, B. Litt., D. Litt., LL.D., spoke at that august gathering, I remember. He was better than a floor show. Who can forget how he greeted us?

"You are the cream of the cream," he announced.

We writhed with humility.

SAC visits

the smart land of thighs and money

By PAUL MACRAE

The pupils of Forest Hill Collegiate are rich and look it.

The boys wear sweaters and slacks, hair is neatly combed no matter how long it is.

The girls have long dark hair and deep brown eyes, slim hips and carefully groomed thighs under just-right minis. They didn't look that good when I went to high school.

They're more sophisticated than I remember from my high school days, and they're all headed straight for university.

Thus it was surprising that only 15 showed up in the school cafeteria last Monday for the first part of the Students Administrative Council's high school visits program, headed by Georgina Solymar (II Vic).

"The teachers kicked the other kids in the cafeteria out," Georgina explained angrily.

The ones who came were missing a period of classes and had to sign a list in the Student Counselling Office.

"I wouldn't sign a list," Georgina snorted.

During the next hour and a half the cafeteria filled up until finally about 40 students were clustered around Jules Kronis (III Law), Russ Schachar (I Meds), Mark Sydney (III UC) and Georgina.

Mark and Georgina took those interested in arts. Initially there were two of them. The rest were more interested in hearing about law, medicine and engineering.

"Most of them aren't ready for university and really don't want to go," Georgina noted, "but at this school, they are expected to." Georgina should know — she attended the collegiate.

Kronis concentrated on solid information — where to study and how much to read, watching the Here and Now for events, whether to buy insurance.

"After two years of pre-meds, you become a memory machine," Schachar told his audience. "I come out of a 2½-hour exam paralyzed. But you need marks to give the professor an assessment of your work.

"Or maybe we need to change the philosophy or start a new type of examination system.

"The place to start is high school, or even better, public school."

A boy with a splash of hair across his forehead and a blue sweater exploded: "I get one period of history a week — the rest the teacher talks about a TV show on the Third Reich or garbage like that.

"I go to class to pass exams. I've got better things to do than listen to garbage."

"Shall we go?" the kindly-looking, white-haired middle-aged guidance teacher in a blue, knee-length suit broke in. Earlier her contribution had been carefully phrased stopgap questions when her charges ran dry. Some didn't want to go.

The guidance teacher put a pile of excuse slips on the table and the kids who wanted to stay filled them out.

As they did I noticed a boy in a purple sweater talking to her. He looked her in the face once during a two-minute conversation. The rest of the time he jerked his head from side to side avoiding her eyes.

"How else can you teach people?" blue sweater asked Schachar. "What can you possibly change?"

"You can sit and talk about things," another boy in a grey sweater ventured.

"More comes out of it that way," Schachar agreed.

"Yeah," said grey sweater, "you forget the books and you learn something."

The boy with the squint interrupted: "Why talk about it? You can get just as much information from an afternoon's reading in the library."

"This is a progressive school and a progressive area," Georgina had explained earlier. "There are no grades in the public schools, and the 13's are free to attend school or not. They're trying to extend this to the 12's."

Grey sweater: "I had four useless periods out of eight today."

Schachar: "What about the poor guys that had eight and couldn't walk out?"

"The training's good here, but there's no learning," a lad in brown turtleneck said.

"You should be able to do what you want to create your own education," Schachar agreed.

"Nothing's stopping you," said a boy with a squint. "But there has to be a certain amount of discipline."

"You know," a brown-jacketed lad told me later, "we've got a French teacher who really wants to involve you. If the class is bored he changes to another topic. He holds a dialogue with himself and then involves you in it."

He grimaced. "I failed, but at least it wasn't his fault. It was my fault."

"I had a French teacher last year who was really bad. I failed then too, but it was her fault."

Jody is a remarkably attractive brunette wearing a purple mini-dress and white net stockings. She says she is a conformist.

"I didn't used to be," she explains. "I used to break the rules, but not any more."

"You have to obey the rules of the society. You can't do anything about it. Besides, most kids don't want to change. Grade 10 kids are too irresponsible to be without rules."

Jody wants to be a teacher when she finishes university. Preferably with underprivileged children. Why not with brilliant kids?

"They don't need help."

Afterward I strolled through the school's pink corridors with its green and pink lockers and honor award plaques on the walls, peeked into the huge gymnasium, listened to the noise and sidestepped rapidly-moving bodies.

As I left I noticed a sign on a window reading:

JOB CORPS

Wilbur Welfare
Needs You

I don't recall that in my high school.

Students at the International Student Centre are busily completing plans for their International Variety Festival, which will fill the Ryerson auditorium this Saturday.

Students from 17 countries and regions will take part in the affair, organized in the form of a competition. They will present skits, fashion shows, folk dances, songs and poetry readings representative of their homelands.

"The purpose," says organizer Vernon Edwards (I Meds), "is to give each country 15 minutes to say in the most vivid and artistic manner something about some facet of the country."

Edwards, who organized two similar festivals at McGill University, said six judges will award a trophy to the best competitor and three prizes to runners-up.

The areas represented are: Africa, China, Estonia, French Canada, Greece, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Japan, Latvia, Malaysia, Singapore, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, the Slavic countries and the West Indies.

Any profits will go to the Canada plus One Project, a branch of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization.

Of the 1,450 tickets, only 500 are left. They are on sale at the ISC, 33 St. George.

A Community College

"Have you taken LSD?"

"Yes, I have."

"Do you take speed pills?"

"No, I stay away from speeds." A long-haired hippy blinks into the strong lights in the television studio.

From inside the control room, a voice comes over to one of the cameramen, "Listen, once he's off camera, I want number three to sweep around and get a close-up."

The program is one in the series, "Hippies, Hooters and Loud-Mouth Hollers", an English course at the newly opened Seneca College of Applied Arts and Technology in North York. And this course is only an option.

"The term hippy comes from the word, 'hip'. And if you're hip, that means you understand, you're with it." Jim Rance, a well dressed, self-confident and very articulate hippy stretches his legs, ready for the next question from the group of students sitting around on the lush carpeted floor of the studio.

Soon the program is over, the student cameramen swing the cameras down, a few lights go off and some students pick up their books and start to move to their next class.

But an equal number get up and go over to talk with Rance, asking him questions about himself, about hippies and about the comments he made during the program. They are in no hurry to leave and nobody hurries them along to the next class.

ENTHUSIASTIC STUDENTS

I watch the program sitting on the comfortable green carpet, surrounded by a group of students who describe their school and their courses with an enthusiasm that is surprising and refreshing.

One pretty co-ed Maxine Mackenzie, 20, finds the atmosphere of friendliness and lack of cliques among the students exciting.

"No small groups that stick together," she says, "Here, you can't tell who's who." Vince Cairo, 20, the one who interviewed has a word for it, "It's hip," he says. "Next week's drug week." He is referring to the next program to be taped and shown to English classes by closed circuit television.

"And we're going to see The War Game in two weeks."

The teacher, or rather "English Master" for the course is Don Evans, who graduated from Radio and TV Arts at Ryerson and then got his B.A. at Western. He is presently working on an M.A. in English there. He explains the purpose of one of his courses in communications.

COMMUNICATIONS COURSES

"We try to show the students how they are manipulated by T.V. The course is 16 weeks, eight of which are devoted to learning the operation of the television equipment and videotape as well as pleterial composition. Four are given to the study of other mass media, such as newspapers and radio." On the bulletin board are newspaper clippings and articles.

The cafeteria is crowded with students laughing, talking, playing cards and eating. I sit down and am welcome. There is no racial discrimination at Seneca.

I ask Jo Anne Harley, 18, a secretarial student, what she thinks of Seneca. She answers curtly but sincerely "I like it."

Why did she come to Seneca? She starts but is interrupted by Steve Swift, 19. "You had no place else to go, admit it," he says laughingly.

That is the truth for the great majority of students at Seneca. Some cannot or do not want to go to university and this school as well as the four others in the Toronto area has given them another chance at education. For others, it is a preparation for university, giving them a little more time and background than they would have had if they went in fresh from grade thirteen.

Students can enter the college from grade 12 and the diploma courses are from two to three years long. With a diploma the students can enter business industry or government, or go on to higher education. The courses range from Business Administration and Computer Technology to Principles of Law Enforcement and Crime Detection.

RELATION TO REAL WORLD

The thing that is most noticeable about the courses at Seneca is their relation to the real world. The Social Welfare course consists of field work and experience. The Early Childhood Education course often has real children and the students build puppet theatres and dolls.

Even in the secretarial course, there is a room set up to resemble an actual business office as closely as possible. The college itself is a converted factory, with spacious halls and colourful rooms.

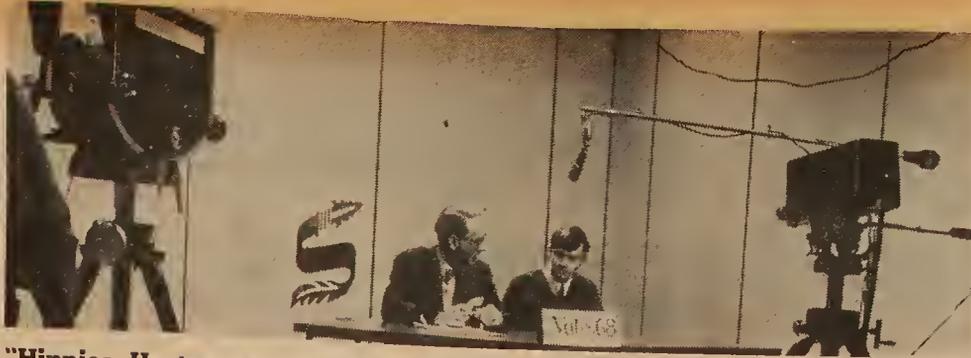

There are no rules in the college and students are encouraged to develop responsibility from this freedom. The freedom shows. Everybody at the college is helpful, considerate and enthusiastic, especially the teachers. Some come in turtle-neck sweaters and the atmosphere that pervades the classes is relaxed, confident and friendly.

The President's opening address for the second semester was given to twenty students at a time in a comfortable, modern carpeted room.

A SENECA DIPLOMA

Mr. W. T. Newnham, who recalled that he himself was a high school dropout, welcomed the students to Seneca with a minimum of pomp and oratory but a maximum of friendliness and common sense. "What value is a Seneca diploma?" he asked, "Nothing. A 10-dollar bill is worth nothing unless a country is strong and can back it up."

The address lasted 20 minutes. In it Mr. Newnham outlined the expansion of the college, which aims to have over 20,000 people in twenty years. He told how it is overcrowded but how the college has persisted with its "open door" policy to allow people of many ages and interests to further their education. The students listened attentively.

Last year, the province of Ontario established eighteen community colleges in response to the great need for higher education other than university. Too many students have been dropping out of school because the prospect of grade thirteen and then university seemed too formidable a barrier to overcome.

FIRST GRADUATES

A major test for the colleges comes this spring. Centennial college in Scarborough, which opened in 1966, will send the graduates of its two year courses into the outside world.

Their success in finding good jobs will be a measure of the success of the community colleges. Next year will prove an even greater test when the rest of the colleges release their first graduates.

It also gives a chance to older people who want to get an education.

One such person is Mrs. Percy Saltzman, who is enrolled in the Social Welfare course.

Mrs. Saltzman explains that she only went as far as public school and felt that it was necessary to get a better education even if it meant going to school with so many young people. She is one of many people who are already married or even working and settled who come to Seneca for the regular and extension courses in order to update or further their education.

The pride and joy of the school, however, is its English program in which there will soon be over 50 different courses ranging from the Evolution of Ideas to Man's Search or Values. The books vary from Lolita to U of T's own Varsity.

SCREEN ARTS "TERRIFIC"

Steve Swift, 19, said he especially enjoyed the course called Screen Arts. As soon as the other students at the table heard the name, Screen Arts, they all chimed in, "Yeah, great," "Terrific," "Really Interesting".

Students came at 6:30 in the morning to see films like the Red Desert, Psycho, Alfie, and Billy Liar.

"The teacher would stop the film at certain points and would show us how the director used the camera angle and lighting," says Steve. "He stopped a lot of times during the shower murder in Psycho to show how Hitchcock built up suspense. He says that Hitchcock spent two weeks shooting that 20 minutes of film."

SPEED READING COURSE

Every student is given a reading test when he enters the school. If he is a poor reader or wants to improve reading ability, there is the Effective Speed Reading course run by Dr. C. J. Wilkins.

The equipment is the latest including controlled reading projectors in separate carrels for each student and a tachistoscope that flashes images on a screen at 1/100th of a second, faster than the blink of an eyelash. Here the students are encouraged to increase their reading speed and appreciation of writing.

The audio-visual room is full of cameras, projectors, television, tapes and there are numerous graphics on the walls. It is run by Mr. George Suzuki, a former commercial photographer.

Mr. Suzuki says that he was given an outline of what was required in the department and then given a budget and a free hand in the purchase of equipment.

The audio-visual department trains audio-visual technicians but it also supplies audio-visual aids and programs for the English courses and is a vital part of the English program.

ENGLISH A MULTI-MEDIA COURSE

The school's policy is that "English will be a multi-media course of studies. Students will explore the languages and literature of books, film, television, radio, advertising, newspapers, and magazines. It will also be extremely practical and functional.

"The English courses at Seneca will serve the student's need to think, write, and speak clearly, and to apply every media of English Communication in situations related to their intended vocations."

What the English courses, if fact, do is educate the students and make them more articulate members of the community.

It is in this school that you will find a student of engineering technology or electronic data processing talking about the existentialism of Bergman or about the beat culture as epitomized by "Howl", Ginsberg's frenetic poem. And this student will be able to separate fact from fiction when he is bombarded by opinions and ideas on television and in the newspapers.

He or she will have a specialized and interesting job upon graduation and will also be an interesting person to know and talk to.

Bev Coons, 19, had to drop out of grade 13 because of illness and was facing a lost year and all the consequences that it entails. But she saw the ad for Seneca College in the paper and enrolled right away.

She is very enthusiastic about her course in Life Science and hopes to enter Early Childhood Education. She especially likes the course in man's search for values.

When I asked her what she thought about the College, she answered, "can you imagine where most of the students would be without this college? I'm serious."

Before I had been in the school ten minutes a student said to me, "you tell them this should've happened ten years ago." Another added "Even more than that."

HART HOUSE: A SOCIAL EXPERIMENT

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Student power is alive and hiding in Hart House.

This is the opinion of two of Hart House's most devoted trustees — Undergraduate Secretary Alan Toff and Warden E. A. Wilkinson.

The cultural activities of the house are determined by five student dominated standing committees.

Each March the members of Hart House elect eight new undergraduate members to the five committees — art, library, debates, house and music.

Three members of the previous year's committee are carried over to the next year to give continuity to the cultural life of Hart House.

Each standing committee has 11 student representatives out of 15. So, the cultural life of Hart House is determined by the people who participate most in the house — the students.

An interesting result of this means of government is the rarity of student-administration splits on contentious issues. The members of each committee are rarely conscious of their academic status — be it student, administrator or faculty member — within the context of Hart House affairs.

President Tom Faulkner and many other progressives on the Students Administrative Council could learn a worthwhile lesson in human relations within the university by studying the Hart House committee system.

For the last two years Faulkner has been adamant in calling SAC's proposed cultural centre a "campus centre" and not a "student centre".

The idea behind the House system is apparently that if students get to know faculty and administration and vice-versa, people would understand each other better and there would be less internal conflict within this university.

"Mr. Massey designed Hart House as an experiment in social organization," Warden Wilkinson said.

"He wanted to set the right environment so everyone — faculty, and students — could learn to work together. If everyone can get together only in crisis situations (the Placement Service advisory committee), we will always have problems."

Nominations for the standing committees of Hart House will be open until Thursday. So far only four students have had themselves nominated for the debates committee, seven for art, three for house, six for library and three for music. Nomination forms are available in the Undergraduate Office.

Many American student unions have patterned their cultural administration on the Hart House standing committees, the warden said.

However in many cases representatives must be appointed because students are unwilling to put forth the limited amount of time to fill a committee position. This results in a lack of spontaneity and anticipation in the union's cultural life, the warden said.

Warden Wilkinson felt the unstructured experimental activities SAC is generating occupy the time of students who would otherwise devote time to a Hart House committee.

"While the committees are somewhat structured and formal, their continuous efforts in the long run produce notable lasting achievements," he said. He cited the work of the art committee, which has built up one of the country's most important collections of Canadian paintings. All the work was selected by the student-dominated committee.

In a reflective tone the warden concluded: "If people opt out Hart House can't go on. It would be no good if the house was to function as an exercise in administration."

UWO president defends student suspension

LONDON, Ont. (CUP) — The board of governors of the University of Western Ontario had the right to suspend student Mark Kirk, President D. C. Williams told student council members last week.

Kirk, a freshman, was suspended after a Nov. 15 conviction for possession of marijuana.

Dr. Williams, in answering questions submitted to him by council members, said the case was not one of double jeopardy.

He agreed with board of governors chairman A. E. Shepherd who drew an analogy between the university student and an employee who is liable to the law, his employer and a civil suit for his actions.

Mr. Shepherd said: "It is a privilege to be a member of this university."

The university, he said, has a right to require obedience to the laws of that community.

If a student does not obey these laws, his actions must be examined to determine: — the moral quality of his act;

— whether he may be a danger to others;

— whether the good of the university community requires that he leave.

Dr. Williams said Mr. Shepherd's statement sets forth the general philosophy of the board.

He also denied that the board had made any commitments to anyone to suspend Kirk. The suspension was intended as a warning to other students.

600 students mass at Sask. legislature

REGINA (CUP) — Six hundred students marched on the Saskatchewan legislature Feb. 15 protesting a tuition fee hike and alleged threats to the University of Saskatchewan's autonomy.

Inside, Lieutenant Governor R. L. Hanbidge read the Liberal government's speech from the throne outlining plans to expand both campuses of the U. of S., provide French-language instruction, and increase education, training and rehabilitation for the province's Indians and Metis.

The students said the government's plan to scrutinize capital and operating expenditures of the university will endanger its future.

Carrying placards they lined the hallway as the lieutenant-governor passed into the legislature to read the speech. He did not react.

University President John Spinks was booed as he entered the gallery.

A student representative said the marchers were protesting the low priority Ross Thatcher's government has been giving to education.

He said Thatcher had refused students invitations to speak at either the Saskatoon or Regina campus since taking office in 1964.

In a recent interview Thatcher said he was sympathetic to student views but didn't have enough money in the treasury to avoid increasing tuition fees.

Tuition will increase about $80 an academic year, still third lowest in Canada.

Three day student boycott at St. Mary's

HALIFAX (CUP) — St. Mary's University students went on a three-day boycott of classes Feb. 14 but returned a day early at the suggestion of the university president.

Students were protesting the Roman Catholic diocese of Halifax's control over the university. They claim the Chancellor, Rev. James M. Haynes, has a virtual veto power over the board of governors.

"We wish to have an effective board of governors," said Mike O'Sullivan, president-elect of the all-male St. Mary's campus.

The students want the diocesan committee on higher education abolished, calling it an infringement of academic freedom. The university community must have the right to make de-isions affecting the university, they say.

The main bone of contention is a student-sponsored report which recommends amalgamation of St. Mary's with Mount St. Vincent University, a local catholic girls' school.

Student President Robert Shaw said the principle of co-education was accepted in principle last fall by the university. The diocesan committee on higher education is to decide the issue at a March 5 meeting.

University President Henry I. Labelle told an open meeting of students Feb. 15 there was no point in continuing the protest.

The students agreed to discuss the matter in a student-faculty-administration committee.

PACFTEODPATUOT?

The SAC needs three students to serve on the Presidential Advisory Committee for the Examination of Disciplinary Procedures at the University of Toronto. Terms of reference are:

The Committee is asked to inquire into and report upon the existing disciplinary institutions and procedures at the University of Toronto, and the principles and policies which have been pursued. The Committee will examine the scope and adequacy of existing arrangements with a view to recommending appropriate changes, if any, in the nature of these arrangements. It will also seek to specify the proper limits of the jurisdiction of such disciplinary procedures as applied to both students and members of the University staff . . .

. . . It is being asked to submit its report to the President during the academic session 1968-69 — if possible, in time for publication during that session."

Please apply in writing, stating qualifications, interests, reasons for applying, and ideas on discipline in the university to:

Investigate CIA role at Michigan

ANN ARBOR, Mich. (CUP-CPS) — President Robben W. Flemming of the University of Michigan has ordered an investigation of the university's involvement with the Central Intelligence Agency.

Flemming's action followed two articles in the campus paper, the Michigan Daily, on co-operation between the CIA and the university's institute for social research.

The Daily claimed four ISR personnel had six separate contacts with CIA agents during the year.

The Daily claimed four that four professors met with six CIA agents in 1966 to discuss the possibility of using university faculty members and facilities to train CIA agents.

Although ISR officials told The Daily that information they gave the CIA was minimal, the institute's executive committee considered the problem significant enough to consider restrictions on contracts between ISR staff members and the CIA.

Alberta mans birth control bureau

EDMONTON (CUP) — A birth-control information bureau is operating on the University of Alberta campus.

The Committee on the Status of Women, formed in January, has set up its booth in the hall of the student union building and is distributing pamphlets on venereal diseases, birth control methods, the philosophy behind the committee and women's rights.

The women have more than 1,000 names on a petition supporting such a program.

"We are trying to show it is not unrespectable to talk about birth control or venereal disease," said Lynn Hanley, who is in charge of the program.

The booth has a list of doctors who will prescribe the pill to co-eds.

Senate "reprimands" McGill protesters

MONTREAL (CUP)—Thirty-one students who sat in at McGill principle H. Roche Robertson's office in November have been given a "conduct probation" from the senate discipline committee.

The students were told they will receive a harsher penalty from the committee if they step out of line during the remainder of this year or all of next.

Students had refused to leave Robertson's office during a sit-in protesting the administration's action against students involved in the reprint in the McGill Daily of a passage from The Realist, a U.S. magazine.

A committee member said the students are free to demonstrate peacefully on campus, but other infractions of campus rules will lead to a penalty for that offense in addition to a penalty to be assessed for the sit-in.

A Rockefeller Foundation grant of up to $280,000 will enable the University of Toronto to send six faculty members and six graduate students to teach and do research in African and South American universities.

Professor R. C. Pratt, director of the international studies program at U of T, will visit the overseas universities this spring to discuss their teaching needs. Then the appointments will be made.

The program is expected to begin in 1969 and will be carried out in a period of three to five years.

Opera students create unique campus group

By RON GRANER

"Merry Wives of Windsor—scene three, take two, reel four" shouted the scrip assistant. Then, whack! Down came the striped stick of the call board, narrowly missing his thumb.

What was the excitement? The CBC was doing a documentary on the University of Toronto's Royal Conservatory Opera School, the only one of its kind in Canada.

John Coulson, producer of the show, said the school's uniqueness has prompted the show, to shown Sunday, March 10, at 2:30 p.m.

For students of the school the show means, besides a welcome honorarium, a working laboratory in television and cinematographic technique.

Right now the cameramen are stalking through the corridors of the Edward Johnson Building and zooming their lenses in on unsuspecting students.

When finished the film will present the average working day of the students taking the opera courses and those in theatre technology courses, with a 20-minute portion on an opera school production of the Magic Flute.

Where do opera singers come from? From all over, apparently. In the School there are graduate engineers, former literature majors, janitors, coutouriers and kids straight out of high school, with a large proportion of professional singers who have gone back to school for polishing.

Why do people decide to become opera singers? For some the answer is simple.

"I have always sung," says soprano Lois Guryea. "Three years ago I won both the Vancouver and Seattle Metropolitan Opera auditions and was in the finals at New York when John Guttman (of the Met) suggested I come here. He knew Herman Geiger-Torel, head teacher at the school, and thought the course excellent."

Gerrard Boyd, a countoroi at Creeds, said he was "discovered" by opera singer Jeanette Zarou, now in Hamburg, Germany, while singing in a church choir.

Another student said he was an aircraft gunner at the time of the Cuban missile crisis and suddenly got an urge to take up singing.

In spite of their various motives for taking up music all the students in the course share one thing in common—lots of hard work.

Classes start at 9:30 a.m. with an hour and 15 minutes of physical exercises, with emphasis on a different discipline each morning.

Monday it is mime and pantomime, Tuesday stage movement and so on through eurythmics (the study of rhythm and physical movement), modern and ordesigned and made on the premises.

The school houses complete workshops, wardrobe and fitting rooms, and one of the largest stages in the country (even larger than at O'Keefe Centre).

John Leberg, assistant director of this week's production, Pelleas and Melisande, discusses some rough spots in the score with leads Paul Trepanier and Herman Rombouts.

ential dance and other assorted tortures.

Through the rest of the day there are classes in acting, make-up, play reading, French, German, Italian and English diction, history, recitative singing, vocal coaching and private voice lessons. A 90-minute staging lab finishes the afternoon at 6 p.m. but students are back in the classroom at 7:30 p.m. for an hour of fencing.

Rehearsal time for productions is added on top of the regular class time and so it is not uncommon for rehearsals to continue until 10 or 11 at night.

Saturday morning starts off at 10 a.m. with three hours of classes. The afternoon is devoted to rehearsals. (An occasional but unpopular move is to schedule Sunday for rehearsals as well).

Opera students are not the only ones who are engaged in perpetual motion. The school also has a complete theatre technology course.

All sets, props and costumes for the seven operas presented this year were

The theatre technology students work longer hours than opera students.

Included in their courses are: set and costume design, scenic painting, theatre management and lighting, and carpentry. All instructors have had wide experience in Canada and Europe.

Bridging the gap between technical and artistic courses are the students taking directing courses. They take all the dramatic courses that opera students take (except musical studies) and work in close co-operation with the technical and stage crew.

They direct for some of the staging laboratories with first-year students and work as assistant stage directors on major productions.

What are the chances of success after completing the courses at the Opera School?

For those in the technology course there are jobs waiting for them as soon as they have finished the first year of their two-year course. There have been many theatres built in the last few years, many as Centennial projects.

For those students in the singing course it all depends on the talent, work and luck. Few of the students really make the big time.

But former students Jon Vickers did, and so did Victor Braun, Bob Goulet, Jeanette Zarou, Maria Pellegrini Macko, Alex Gray, Roxylana Roslac, Cornelius Opthof, Peter Van Ginkle.

Gymnast team second in OQAA meet

By MATT TUMBLER

Despite strong performances from all competitors, the Varsity gymnastics team was unable to defeat the squad from L'Université de Montréal to regain the Caron trophy. In the OQAA Championship Meet held in Quebec City a week ago Saturday, the powerful U. de M. group beat out Toronto by a fairly comfortable 127-58-120.00.

The gymnasts had no complaints about the well-run meet, and even the usually questionable judgement of the judges was not blamed for the defeat.

Montreal deserved the victory. All five Montreal gymnasts competed in all events and took first, third, fifth, seventh, and twelfth place in the individual standings. By contrast, Varsity gymnasts Brian McVey, Dave Copeland, John Kortright, and Alex Hamilton were second, fourth, tenth, and fifteenth respectively.

For Varsity, the highlight of the meet came when specialist Carl Sloane made a prophet out of coach Julio Roncon by taking the gold medal in the floor exercises with a brilliant performance.

Brian McVey, competing all around for the first time since a shoulder injury sidelined him several months ago, had a fine day with second place finishes, in pommel horse, parallel bars, and vaulting, and thirds in floor exercises and horizontal bar. However, Montreal Gilles Briere managed three firsts and two seconds to edge out Brian for the individual all round championship for the second year in a row.

Dave Copeland also performed well, taking thirds on the pommel horse and rings, and fourth place in the overall standings. Rookie Jamie Archibald rounded out the team effort with respectable tenth and twelfth place finishes on the side horse and parallel bars. RINGS ROUNDUP: The meet was held in a high school away out in the suburb of Ste. Foy and it seems that the gym floor could only be reached through the team dressing rooms. The French are not noted for shyness, and female spectators made frequent trips past dressing gymnasts. Dave and Jamie, in the interests of Canadian unity, were quick to pick up the French customs in showing they had nothing to hide.

Netters nab title as boxers split with RMC

Varsity Badminton Blues whipped all opposition to grab top honours in the OQAA finals held at Western University last week-end. Blues toppled Eastern OQAA champs Laval University 4-2 to nail down the championship for the third year in succession.

In the Western OQAA tourney held the week before, Varsity lost only four of forty matches in winning the title.

In addition Bill Hinsey and John Gilbert copped the doubles championship. Other members of this year's team were John Forsythe, John Patterson and Jack Wade.

U of T and Royal Military College split evenly in eight bouts in Kingston Saturday night.

Mike Blair (RMC) decisioned Sunid John (U of T) and Bill Fisher (U of T) TKO'd Jean Olivier (RMC) in the first round after decking him twice with a series of left hooks.

Larry Gibbs (RMC) decisioned Peter Junger (U of T). Jerry O'Neil decisioned Len Brown (U of T). Brown was replacing ailing Biff Matthews, who couldn't make the trip.

Mike D'Ornellas (U of T) decisioned Blake Grace (RMC).

Clark Little (RMC) decisioned Ralph Starr (U of T).

Harry Ewaschuk (U of T) decisioned Ray Charleau (RMC).

Joe Donohue (U of T) decisioned Ray Carlson (RMC).

U of T novices Rick Smith and John Nedeljkovic fought an exhibition bout.

Sportsies hear charge of discrimination

Women are discriminated against in the universities, Laura Sabia charged at a Scarborough College lecture on Human Rights last week. "There is a quota system for women entering university for the professions," she said, "and there are age limits for women in post graduate work.

"They are indifferent to the problem of continuing education for women."

She blamed "the myth that a woman is nothing but a misbegotten male" for prejudice against career women.

Riddell puts Blues back on track

By PHIL BINGLEY

Off the track, on the track, off again, and back on again. That was the story in a hectic week-end as Varsity Blues clinched their fifth straight first place finish in the SIBL.

Blues, who were delayed for almost three hours when a car on their Montreal-bound train was derailed, lost their first game of the schedule, 5-4 to University of Montreal Carabins Friday night before bouncing back to post a 6-0 title clincher over Queen's University Golden Gaels in Kingston.

As a result of the two games, Varsity lost their shot at an unbeaten season but finished a point ahead of Waterloo Warriors.

Mike Riddell highlighted a solid team effort in Kingston as he scored his first goal of the season and set up markers by linemates Brian St. John and John Gordon.

The other members of the team, feeling that Riddell was due for his big goal, held a pool on the minute the goal would come, and Mike came through at the 18:02 mark of the second period to make manager Mike Kiloran five dollars richer.

Goaltender John Wrigley made several brilliant stops in posting his second shut-out of the season. The white-wash was also Wrigley's second in as many Saturday afternoon games.

The game was never really a close one as Blues out-skated and outshot Gaels by a wide margin and held a 6-0 lead at the end of the second period. Queen's defense had difficulties clearing the puck out of their own end while the forward lines were generally slow and ineffective when attacking.

Paul Laurent, Gord Cunningham, and Murray Stroud had Blues' other goals while Bob McClelland and St. John each had a pair of assists.

UPSET WIN

In Montreal on Friday night, a goal by Jean Delorme at 9:56 of an exciting third period turned out to be the margin of victory for the fourth-place Carabins.

The game itself was a rough one in which a total of twenty-four penalties were handed out by referee Jim Kierans. Blues served thirteen of the misdemeanours including a major and a misconduct.

Varsity was soundly outplayed during the first twenty minutes but managed to escape with the score tied at 1-1. However, when they dominated the action in the second frame, they were still deadlocked — this time at 3-3. An evenly-played third period saw Carabins out-score Blues 2-1 before the ten-minute point and then hold on for the win.

Ward Passi, Peter Speyer, Gord Cunningham and Brian St. John had Varsity's goals while Delorme, Andre Gin-gras, Ghislain Dumais, Jacques Larin and Normand Goulet accounted for the Montreal total.

With the schedule completed, playoffs are slated to begin this Friday at 7:00 p.m. in Varsity Arena. Blues will meet Montreal Carabins in the first game and Waterloo Warriors will play third-place McMaster Marlin's in the second. The two winners will then playoff for the Queens' Cup and the right to represent the league in the Canadian finals. Game time for the final will be Saturday afternoon at 2:00 p.m.

AROUND THE NET . . .

Paul Laurent, Murray Stroud and Bob McClelland tied for the team scoring leadership with thirty-five points apiece . . . Laurent was the top goal-getter with eighteen in sixteen games . . . Stroud was recently awarded the Dr. Dafoe Trophy given annually to the Varsity Blue judged most valuable by his teammates . . . In Reading Week games, Blues defeated Western Mustangs at home 4-1 and Guelph Gryphons 5-0 in Guelph . . . Paul Laurent, Ward Passi, Bob McClelland and John Gordon scored in the Mustang game while Laurent and McClelland with two apiece and Gordon with one tallied in Guelph . . . John Wrigley won the league goals against title as he allowed but thirty six goals in sixteen games for a 2.25 goals per game average..

Mike Riddell brake personal goal-scoring slump with second period marker as Blues clinched first place with 6-0 win over Queen's. Riddell also had 14 assists during season.

Bruce Dempster goes high in the air for jump-shot in Blues' game with Windsor Lancers. Blues lost it 118-81. Dempster was top Varsity scorer with 20 points.

Varsity cagers 4th after double loss

By JIM MORRISON

Varsity Blues climaxed an undistinguished season over the past two weekends by absorbing their worst two losses of the year. Saturday night, Blues fell to Waterloo Warriors 86-71 in Waterloo, after a 118-81 stoning at the hands of Windsor Lancers the week before.

Varsity's two losses gave them a final record of 4-6 and fourth place in the SIBL. Windsor Lancers finished first on the league (9-1) followed by Western Mustangs (7-3) and Waterloo Warriors (6-3 with one game to play).

The villain in Waterloo was 6'8" Brian Brown, who hooped 18 points and destroyed Varsity on the boards with 19 rebounds.

Neither team was particularly sharp and several players on both sides had off nights. Ron Voake managed only one field goal and three foul shots for 5 points, while Arvo Neidre and John Hadden had 9 and 6 respectively. Doug Lockhart had his poorest game of the season for Warriors, collecting only seven points.

36 at the half, but Waterloo pulled ahead in the final ten minutes for their victory. Sol Globler followed Brown with 14 points, and Jan Laaniste and Neil Rourke had 9 apiece.

Visions of next year made Coach McManus happy with the performance of guards Larry Trafford and Joe Faust . . . Filling in for Mark White who didn't make the game, Trafford and Faust had 15 and 10 points respectively. Bruce Dempster was the other Blue in double figures, with 14 points.

The Windsor game, played before a partisan Lancer throng in Hart House, proved a nightmare for Varsity. The well-drilled Lancers tore apart the Toronto defense with their hot shooting and charged to a 56-33 lead by halftime. Blues could offer nothing in return, as the entire team, with the exception of Bruce Dempster, was unable to score.

Varsity's play improved considerably after intermission, but Windsor seemed to get even better. The 23 points margin at the half was enlarged to the final 37 point spread.

All ten Windsor players got into the act, and all ten scored, with five players hitting double figures. Bruce Dempster collected 20 points for Toronto, followed by Mark White with 17, and John Hadden and Arvo Neidre with 12 apiece.

In the SIBL playoffs which begin next week, Windsor takes on Waterloo and Western meets either Queens or McGill. At this juncture, it appears unlikely that anyone will topple the disciplined Windsor machine.

FOUL-LINE FACTS

JOE FAUST was called into action against Windsor when RON VOAKE got sick just before the game — Faust had just finished playing for UC Redmen in the Interfac game at 6:30. Final scoring averages for Toronto are. BRUCE DEMPSTER 18.6 ppg. MARK WHITE 15.6, ARVO NEIDRE 15.4, JOHN HADDEN and RON VOAKE, both 12.1.

OCA STUDENTS MARCH ON QUEEN'S PARK TODAY

WHY are curriculum changes at OCA made in secret?

WHY were two respected instructors fired for questioning this secrecy?

WHY does OCA Principal Watson deny that Education Minister Davis must approve staff dismissals when staff contracts specify otherwise?

today...

About 700 students of the Ontario College of Art march on legislative buildings at 1 p.m. today in support of demands to be presented to William Davis, minister of university affairs.

And their numbers may be swelled if hoped-for support from University of Toronto, York and Ryerson materializes.

Representatives of the OCA students council will first confront Mr. Davis at 9:30 a.m. with demands for:

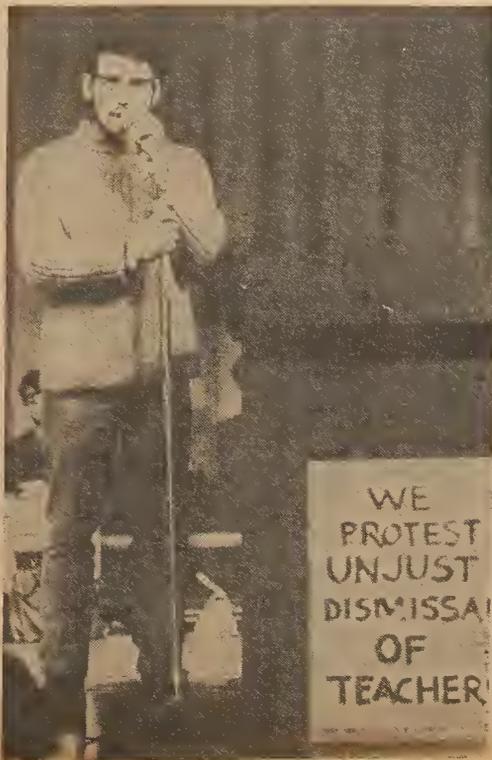

- reinstatement of fired instructors Aba Bayefsky and Eric Freifeld pending an investigation by the Canadian Association of University Teachers;

- a written promise that no recriminative measures will be taken against staff and students who took part in the boycott;

- a more democratic decision-making process involving all members of the college;

A petition endorsing the four demands was signed by 71 per cent of the college's 1,050 students.

After the protest the marchers will crowd into the visitors' gallery of the legislative chamber to hear Opposition members lance prepared questions at Mr. Davis.

What does OCA crisis mean to U of T students?

By PAUL MACRAE

"What do you think of the OCA affair?" I asked a friend at lunch yesterday.

"Nazism," he replied. "The principal has obviously acted in an authoritarian manner."

"Would you go to a demonstration at Queen's Park tomorrow to protest?" I asked.

"Well, if I was at OCA I would, and I'm not very political. But it's not my fight. This couldn't happen at U of T. We're developing better relations with faculty and students are getting more say."

"What if I could convince you that the OCA thing is your fight? Would you go then?"

"I suppose so," he said after a moment's thought. "But it would be pretty hard, especially at this time of year. People are basically selfish in matters like this."

Maybe the OCA struggle doesn't affect University of Toronto students at all. Maybe the 600-odd students who have sat-in at the OCA cafeteria during the last week are nothing but rabble whipped up by a small group of power-hungry radicals.

But the facts don't support this point of view.

WHAT IS AT STAKE

At stake is the whole concept of the rights of students to have some control over their own education and lives. At stake is the right of a teacher to speak out against his superior when he believes the superior is wrong.

At stake are the livelihoods of OCA instructors Aba Bayefsky (12 years experience) and Eric Freifeld (22 years experience) who were fired by Principal Sydney Watson. The jobs of 11 other instructors who have supported the OCA students may also be in jeopardy.

If people are important then what happens to the fired instructors is important. Maybe even important enough to stand outside Queen's Park for an hour or two.

The 600 students who have missed classes for four days and could face punitive action by their instructors and Principal Watson are important too.

They are trying to establish the principles of free speech and the freedom of students to participate as equals in a democratic institution of learning.

These issues affect University of Toronto students as much as those at OCA, or any university anywhere in the world. Let OCA down and you have let yourself down.

THE ROAD TO FREEDOM

Can it happen here? Maybe it can't, maybe we are further along the road to academic freedom than OCA.

If you're satisfied with this then you have a right to be selfish. It's none of your business what happens at other schools. You go to a free university and that's all that matters.

If you want to step back and survey the wider issues involved in the OCA struggle, you have a better idea of its importance.

In a way it's a prototype of every attempt at freedom that ever was or ever will be.

Sounds like a lot of crap, doesn't it?

The students at OCA have been denied the right to participate in their own education. And they have been denied the right of free speech.

One student, John Bowman, has been threatened with expulsion because he spoke out against the OCA administration. Two instructors have been fired for that reason and that reason only. Watson has admitted this.

It has been alleged that the instructors were fired because they tried to foment a revolt among the students instead of going directly to the principal himself with grievances.

Freifeld was fired because he questioned the competence of a principal "who would not listen to his own students and faculty."

The students of OCA have shown they overwhelmingly favor the reinstatement of Bayefsky and Freifeld. Watson has stated that there is "absolutely no chance" of the two being rehired.

Does that sound like the kind of man who has attempted to listen to his staff and students? Demonstrations are only necessary when an authoritarian administration or power structure has refused to listen.

TO SPEAK THE TRUTH

Freifeld and Bayefsky were fired because they said what they believed to be true. So if you go to Queen's Park today you may be demonstrating for truth, tritely exalted as that sounds.

Finally, have the OCA students been misled by a small group of left-wing communists working for their own nefarious ends? Is this whole affair nothing but a power grab by a tiny bunch of radicals who perpetrate what The Telegram has called the "student power hoax."

The OCA fight is being led by the OCA student council. As a matter of fact the council members had to be dragged into the affair by their cars before they realized that the "established channels" they hold so dear no longer work.

Yes, Virginia, the OCA council is a small conservative council. It has even endangered the student cause by trying to be too dovish with the OCA principal.

Conciliation has not worked. That leaves demonstration.

The OCA students will be at Queen's Park today, 1 p.m., appealing to University Affairs Minister William Davis. He has the power to help them.

So do you, University of Toronto students.

Butt.

—Students decide to cancel meeting.

Wednesday and Thursday
Feb. 14 and Feb. 15

—Drawing and painting students make approaches to Watson but his replies are not satisfactory.

—Students in the department elect a core of second, third and fourth-year students and elect John Bowman as their spokesman.

Thursday, Feb. 16

—Staff and students of drawing and painting department issue invitations to attend a meeting the next day to clarify students' positions. Butt appears and the department head not present. Chairman Bowman asks Butt to arrange to have Watson present. Butt replies he is competent. Chairman closes meeting saying Watson's substitute is not suitable.

Monday, Feb. 19

—Reports in early morning news media that the drawing and painting department plan to voice a protest.

—Watson then decided to meet them at 10 a.m.

—Chairman of the meeting asks Watson if he would agree to forming a committee to study the internal problems of the department. Watson answers no.

—Chairman then asks Watson if it is true that last year Carl Schaeffer was sworn to secrecy about course changes. Watson replies no.

—Mr. Aba Bayefsky replies, "in the interests of accuracy and indeed honesty," he felt obliged to clarify the situation to which the chairman had alluded.

—Bayefsky reads signed statement regarding the events of the previous spring signed by six department heads who agree that Schaeffer was sworn to secrecy.

—Bayefsky and Eric Freifeld and other staff present question Watson on points of vital concern.

—Watson then agrees to setting up a committee of staff and students to study the internal affairs of each department.

—Arrangements made for another meeting the following Monday.

Wednesday, Feb. 21

—Bayefsky and Freifeld summoned to Watson's office and informed that their services are no longer required.

—Bowman meets Watson the same day and told if he doesn't work through the proper channels (SAC) he will be expelled. Bowman says he won't work through SAC because they are insignificant in hiring and firing of staff and course changes.

—Students learn of the firing of their two instructors and realize their lack of power in the decision.

—Sit-in planned for Thursday morning.

Thursday, Feb. 22

Students protest in large numbers and have support of OUS and other Ontario universities and colleges.

—Seven faculty members among the protesters.

Friday, Feb. 23

Boycott continues and more support pours in.

—Plans made to continue sit-in on Monday.

—Faculty votes 36-9 in support of administration.

Monday, Feb. 26

—Boycott continues and a petition is circulated among the students demanding the reinstatement of the two instructors.

—The students council ask for student support of a march to Queen's Park on either Tuesday or Wednesday.

—Students decide to march Wednesday when Davis returns from Ottawa.

Tuesday, Feb. 27

—Boycott of classes is as strong as ever.

—Vice-president of SAC at OCA speaks to the deputy minister of education, William Stewart who says it would take an act of legislation to give the students their demands.

—It was pointed out that the SAC constitution legalizes the formation of course unions whose chairman can take complaints to the administration.

—Students realize the extent their rights have been jeopardized.

—Students decide to meet Wednesday at 8:45 a.m. to march to Queen's Park and deliver their message to William Davis.

—decide to have main march on Queen's Park on Wednesday afternoon at 1 p.m.

—have been promised the support of Glendon Campus, U of T, George Brown College and other universities and colleges.

The executive of the University of Toronto Students Administrative Council supports today's march.
A resolution adopted yesterday reads: "SAC endorses the march to be held on Feb. 28 by the students of the Ontario College of Art and the Ontario Legislature, and urges all U of T students to lend their support to this action."

OCA wants your help

it's easy, mr. davis

Sir:

Oh Davis, deliver us from (Medi) evil (ism) ... A prayer by the wronged, Sounds absurd but we are prepared to kneel for our cause.

Legally and humanely speaking, we, the protesting body of O.C.A., can only win. Unfortunately They, realizing this, have shown the odd tendency to place dismissal before hearing. Odd.

It has taken fellow victims with similar grievances to identify, sympathize and pledge their support—yes you, U of T, together with other gravely concerned universities. For as you have formerly impressed upon us, ours it not merely a fight to salvage OCA from an undemocratic and dishonest administration but also one whose outcome, regardless, will inevitably set the precedent for all surrounding institutions.

It is with greatest thanks that I leave you, only until, of course, Wednesday 1 p.m. when each and every one of you shall have joined in with OCA's march through Queen's Park.

Good grief, its all very elementary my dear Davis.

C. Rigg

students rights

Sir:

As a student at OCA I strongly urge the students of U of T to join us in our march on Queen's Park in support of the reinstatement of Mr. Bayefsky and Mr. Freifeld and in support of not only democratic rights for us at OCA but for students across Canada.

Allan O'Marra (B29)

not hippies

Sir:

The students of OCA have united together with those teachers who share their feelings to make the college a more democratic unit. We are not a bunch of "hippies" but a group of free-thinking young individuals who are concerned about their future. This sit-in is bringing the students and teachers closer together as a unit with mutual aims. We are fighting for something in which we all believe and welcome any other students who believe in our struggle and wish to join us.

Freda Hafezi

a more democratic voice

Sir:

As a student of OCA I would like to voice my opinion concerning the current crisis here.

This demonstration is not an attempt on our part to slander any one person. However, it is an effort on our part to gain for ourselves, our teachers, and indirectly for you a more democratic voice in curriculum changes.

Because we at OCA feel that our democratic rights have been violated, we have taken action in the only way open to us. It must be stressed that this sit-in came about only after our right to meet with the administration had been denied us several times.

As you have indicated by your support, this violation of students' rights is a matter for every students' concern, not only those at OCA.

Therefore we ask for your physical as well as moral support.

Mauren Gauthier

it's up to you too

Sir:

Please join us in our march, Wednesday 1 p.m. to Queen's Park.

We feel that the upholding of the democratic principles that we are striking for, not only depends on us but upon all of you as well.

Think about it and lend us your support.

Gayle Wilson
(III Drawing and Painting)

all are concerned

Sir:

The students at the Ontario College of Art would greatly appreciate your attendance at a demonstration scheduled for Wednesday 1 p.m. The various aspects of this issue have been, by now well publicized; but as you know, we are basically fighting for the right of free speech. This is an issue which should concern everyone. I hope you will attend.

Dave Larmour

a tea party

Sir:

We at The Ontario College of Art are having Tea with William Davis at Queen's Park. Please join us.

Suzy Weslak (III Painting)

help!

Sir:

For Christ Sake Help!

Keith Cooper

prove it to the public

Sir:

OCA has stopped living a lie. And it's about time. We would appreciate any help from U of T to help us prove this not only to the administration but also to the whole public.

Margret Rueger

we'll get by--maybe

Sir:

My plea is simple—Join us on Wednesday to Support Student Democracy!

"We'll get by with a little help from our friends."

Sally Hendriks
(3rd Drawing & Painting)

unjust dismissal

Sir:

The students at the Ontario College of Art are not apathetic. They deeply feel the unjust dismissal of Aba Bayefsky and Eric Freifeld. They want to do something about it. They are.

Protests are being staged in the Art College auditorium by both students and teachers. However more support is needed. This is your chance to get involved in an issue that affects you. In an academic institution should the study courses be dictated by one man? Ultimately students and staff have no say in what courses we wish to study.

I urge you to support us in the march on Queen's Park.

Liuda Perney

we need bodies

Sir:

Throughout Canada many schools and universities have pledged their undivided support to the students of OCA in their fight for principle. Pledges and moral support are not enough to win this issue. We need physical support.

Please march.

Graham Irwin

your college next?

Sir:

Although OCA is a small school by U of T standards, a large issue is at stake. At some future time our present situation may be paralleled in your own colleges. Will you help support our Queen's Park march by your presence on Wednesday?

Nancy Pugh

basic democratic rights

Sir:

We, as average people, would not consider ourselves activists; however, the present situation at OCA is one in which we find ourselves deeply, and actively, involved, for the simple reason that we are faced with a denial of any and all principles of democracy and decency which we hold.

Therefore, our intention in asking for your support in our march on Queen's Park is nothing more radical than asking for aid in a search for basic democratic rights.

Greg Fraser
Ian McLeod

please support

Sir:

Please support the cause for a democratic voice at OCA for students. We march to Queens Park Wednesday at 1 p.m.

Bill Ireland
(III Drawing & Painting)

fight for democracy

Sir:

We students at the Ontario College of Art request your support in the fight for democracy in post-secondary institutions. In using the word democracy we mean not only freedom of speech for staff and students but a say in any curriculum changes. This is not just our fight but yours as well!

Glyn Ganoug
Stephanie Takach
Sue Allison

your concern too

Sir:

We urgently plead for your support in our demonstration at Queen's Park on Wednesday hoping that you feel our protest is as much your concern as it is to all students at the art college.

A teacher who consistently exhibits respect for the aims of the College, faith in the potentialities of students, objectivity, open-mindedness and courtesy will naturally be most influential in engendering wholesome social attitudes in students.

A teacher's responsibility for students is not limited to his classroom but pertains to any situation in which Ontario College of Art students may need guidance or help.

oca makes a start

Despite what Principal Sydney H. Watson has said time and again, the student protest at his Ontario College of Art has been growing. He has tried to convince the world it was comprised only of a few scruffy mcontents sitting in the college cafeteria — their usual habitat anyway, he says.

Watson's description has never been true and during the past two days the protest has seen the beginnings of a new and important phase that just might dumbfound the principal by the speed with which the rug is pulled out from under miscanception.

Basically a process of radicalization has started operating — slowly, too slowly perhaps, but still offering hope. In such a process the rank and file of the movement get involved with its leadership and direction and therefore more involved with its motives.

Before yesterday the movement was directed by a core of about 15 people — far too small for a protest that includes several hundreds.

Yesterday, new people were coming to the microphone in the college cafeteria, where the protesters have been sitting in boycott of closses. And the subjects talked about were wider than the big issue, the unjust firing of long-time instructors Aba Bayefsky and Eric Freifeld.

Students were discussing the role of the individual in his education and his relation to the administration of the college. They talked about marks and how they are used to control the student's works. (The best example of this occurred right as they were protesting when several instructors announced that assignments not handed in by Friday would get a 0 grade.)

Discussions such as these are absolutely imperative if a student protest is going to grow into a responsible and active student power movement. Obviously, the movement can't grow unless every member has an analysis of what's happening and what needs to be done.

And at that point the sensational issue comes in — the firing of the two instructors. This is not a case that can be isolated from everything else going on at the college — it is merely the peak that dramatizes the wider issues.

It brings in the whole issue of the instructor's role in the college, his power to teach a course as he sees fit and his power to speak out. Bayefsky and Freifeld were prominent figures in a movement to form a faculty association among instructors of the college.

Watson's action in firing them should be seen in connection with their role as organizers of this association.

And the two streams — the movement among instructors and among the students — have to be seen together. Both are actions protesting against the almost complete control over all aspects of the college exerted by the principal, a power given by the Ontario Government's legislation establishing the legal structure of the college.

With that power, the principal controls the tenure of the instructors and the type of education given the students.

And here is where the new signs among the students become encouraging. True they have directed all their energy in the fight to get these two men reinstated, but they are now starting to see the wider issue — the almost colonial situation in which they study at OCA.

(In contrast, U of T's Macpherson commission spent all its time talking about structures — structures of power, of courses, of the federation of the colleges, and so on. Its failure to look at the student's role in the university was the commission's main shortcoming.)

At OCA, the difference was that the movement started outside the normal structures and among the average students themselves. The student council, which like all councils is concerned with the regular channels and structures, didn't support the protest until last Friday, five days after it started.

The protest's momentum has all been channelled into today's march on Queen's Park, which, therefore, is important in two aspects — the legal and the political.

First it is calling on Education Minister William Davis to define his position in relation to the college (the act says he has to approve all firings) and is calling for the reinstatement of the two instructors.

Politically the march could have effects on the momentum of the protest and the solidarity of the participating students.

That momentum has been slowing down because the students are tired; there's nothing for them to do just sitting there in the cafeteria.

Students have been working together but this tendency needs encouragement from more OCA and non-OCA sources.

And that's why today's march should be supported.

don't play around

The authors of the Students' Administrative Council's housing report meet again today with the various deans of men and other administration people concerned with housing for students.

Let's hope this meeting will not be the near-fiasco the first one was — the famous meeting in which New College's Dean David Stager came in and promptly set the wrong tone. He noted that such student-stuff meetings often break down into two camps and proceeded to point out that had he been marking the housing report as an essay, he would have had to fail the author, Ed Clark.

The rest of the meeting was a shooting-match between the "camps" as the deans questioned statistics and refused to discuss the issues that tie them all together.

SAC's report points out that because of the high cost of maid service and other luxuries, residences are filled with rich students. It also notes that fees are surely to be raised this year because of the high cost of mortgaging the New College II women's residence.

The report suggests that the increases could be kept at a minimum with elimination of the luxuries and spreading the mortgage costs across campus — to include the colleges which run their own residences. Residences at University College, New College and Devonshire are run by the university itself.

Evidently the deans have been calling for more subsidization, which the SAC people say is unrealistic. They say increased subsidies are not likely to come from the Ontario government and expecting all students to pay for the living quarters of a few through increased tuition fees is unfair.

The deans had a meeting on the matter last week and Registrar Robin Ross is expected to give a report on it to today's meeting. He is also to give a report to Acting President John Sword's office.

Hopefully today's meeting will not daily around with student-administration animosities again. The situation is pressing, since New College II might mean a cost of $250 for every student in the university residences and the deans are said to have suggested fee raises which would bring the costs of living in residence to something between $935 and $1,030.

LETTERS

of thighs and things

Sir:

I am an amazed freshman! I was a bit surprised by the activities of the campus right-wing "loony-birds" and the engineers (another rare bird known to flock with the loony) in protesting SAC activities and forcing a mid-term election, but this latest blow is shocking. No, things haven't been the same since Superman died.

What amazed me was a series of lies printed on page six of The Varsity on Monday, Feb. 26. In an article entitled The Smart Land of Thighs and Money, Paul MacRae describes the fact Forest Hill "frauleins" as having "long dark hair ... deep brown eyes, slim hips and carefully groomed thighs under just right minis." He claims girls didn't look that good when he went to high school. Well, I went to Forest Hill for the last four years (and I couldn't be prouder) and they didn't look that good either. In fact, I would say Forest Hill possesses most of the flabby thighs (as well as calves) in Toronto. It was for this reason (among others) that I looked ahead eagerly to the lithe-limbed maidens of Trinity, Vic and their predecessors, Bishop Strachan and "Havagirl." I wonder where these slim-thigher girls from the Hill that Mr. MacRae speaks of have been hiding? I should imagine in Argentina (so, by the way, are God, the Toronto Maple Leafs and Hubert Humphrey, it is rumored).

Why do fat thighs predominate in Forest Hill? You are heard to wonder aloud. Surely it is not fair to say that the Forest Hill girl is born with naturally fat legs. No, the problem is more social than hereditary. Knowing that boys like big bosoms, the Forest Hill girl, under the careful tutelage of her Forest Hill mother, decides that eating more will beef up a diminutive chick. Unfortunately, the increased volume of food, unlike the youth of Forest Hill, lacks direction and ends up in the rump and thigh. Whatever happened to that old remedy, the padded bra?

No, thighs aren't slim in Forest Hill, Mr. MacRae. For this revelation I may suffer. One day as I get off the bus near my home, a squad of vengeance-seeking Forest Hill girls will trample me mercilessly with their oversized limbs. I have only one hope—a decoy. He can only be one of my classmates, wearing his Meds jacket. As they pounce on him, I will flee to safety, for, remember, there is only one thing Forest Hill girls enjoy consuming more than food: Meds students.

we blew it

Sir:

As Mark Twain once said of the report of his death, the report that I am leaving Toronto (Canadian death-wish?) has been somewhat exaggerated. The Varsity on Monday rightly stated that I was going to the University of Victoria next year, and rightly recorded that I was not "quitting" because of any university problems—but wrongly left the impression that I was quitting.

I told your reporter that all that was definite was that I was going to teach at Victoria for a year. I added that if I did leave, it would not be because of the University of Toronto but because of the city in which it is located: a place whose pretensions and shortcomings depress me, despite — or perhaps because of — having lived much of my life here. This may be judged a personal idiosyncrasy, of no interest to your readers. I even told your reporter I might feel better after a year away looking at things, as he says from "the other side of the fence." All this may not be news, but it is fact; and I would ask you to set the record straight.

Student politicians: a bad thing?

FOLLOWING IS THE SECOND IN A TWO PART ARTICLE IN WHICH SAC'S FINANCE COMMISSIONER GIVES HIS VIEWS ON HOW SAC'S NEW ORIENTATION AFFECTS THE AVERAGE STUDENT.

By JAN DUINKER

I could continue with a description of how the actual student union works, but I think it would be more worthwhile to answer some questions about student unionism.

Does this sort of student union with its strong philosophy of united action detract from the main purpose of the university which is the free pursuit of truth?

Education has been defined as: "a contributive social process, the essence of which is an expanding awareness of man's social and natural environment through dialogue and co-operative intellectual effort. The principal goal of education is to serve society by developing the full potential of all citizens as free, creative thinking and active human beings." (CUS Congress 1967)

The full implication of this definition of education is that the pursuit of truth is a dialogue between two opposing points of view; and the truth can be found as a synthesis between the two points of view. The political process or the process of social or collective action is precisely this sort of process. The socialization process helps to develop the ability to see the truth through a synthesis of two opposing views, and also helps students to see the true problem now facing society, that is; how to liberate the full potential of all human beings. When it comes to pure independent research, it is easy enough to opt-out and to develop thoughts on one's own; this alternative exists here in our multiversity just as much as it does in the Swedish social union university.

Steve Longdon, newly-elected SAC president, is on stage with opponents Peter Szekely and Glen Brownlee during the recent election. Duinker suggests that opponent shortcomings in student unionism — such as student politicians — aren't all that bad.

Doesn't this sort of system produce a large number of student politicians, and that is probably a bad thing?

Perhaps a view of our present system would be enlightening. If it is directed towards anything, our society is oriented to allow the non-questioning, non-philosophical, nice guy, to run up the corporate ladder at his gentlemanly speed. Perhaps these quiet leaders would not be as political as the leaders that a student union system would produce; but is the clean-cut, well-groomed, person who has solved all his problems by using the appropriate formulae and who has never confronted a moral problem head-on, a better leader than the politician who has been through a few battles and might even have a streak of humanism in him. Perhaps the well-polished MIT and Harvard graduates have led the American Dream into destruction in Vietnam.

Is the North Vietnamese fighting for his country impressed by the West Point credentials of General Westmoreland? Perhaps the hurdles that must be cleared in order to reach the top in our society are not that well in tune with reality?

But I have not answered the question — do you want all these student politicians? I will take the rather cynical view of human beings and society and suggest that those people who want power — will get power. However, under the social union system, those who want power have to obtain power through a more human process, and when they do get power, they will have had much more experience in handling it. This is probably a good thing.

Doesn't this system of social unionism for the university, suggest a monolithic structure for society where true human freedom and liberty is curtailed?

No, not really, the view of man expressed by "student unionism," is a positive view of man. At no time does the student union restrict any of the freedom exercised by man in our present day society. The only real change is that the organizations which make up the university have been re-organized so that the students which make up the university will identify more with the more human social union institutions rather than the multiversity institutions. (i.e. for example it is assumed that a restaurant run and controlled by students would provide a better service for students than a restaurant owned and controlled by a non-university group).

It is very difficult to hypothesize what the rest of society would be like under a social union structure, but it would appear to be more human and freer than the bureaucratic society that is now developing in North America.

Life is a glass in limbo

Reading week carried over into an all night discussion, as we rationalized our essay writing by delving into universal hang-ups of generation gaps, structured education and breaking the parental cord. The endless round of cigarettes left throats dry, and longing for liquid relief. As we gulped down apple juice, its amber fluid became a focus for our thoughts. It was this which brought us to a view of life as a glass continually being filled and emptied.

At birth everybody is an empty glass waiting for knowledge and experience. As the glass of the younger generation becomes fuller with what is being transmitted from the family, the older generation, finds that the level of fluid in its glass is dropping. The children grow up in the stable, structured world of the older generation, and accept for the first years of their life the values by which their elders lived.

In the mid-teens a subtle change occurs. The child becomes aware that there are other values in the world than those he has implicitly taken for granted. With this realization he arrives at a crisis point in his life. Should he cross the psychological moat and try to form his own set of values and beliefs, or should he withdraw into the womb of his parents' apparent happiness and security? Many people shy from this stream and live off the fluid that their cup already holds. Others see the possibility of a new way and forge ahead on their own, either wading the stream cautiously, or plunging headlong into the current, swimming briskly to the other side. With this self-recognition and discovery the individual can stand on the far bank and survey with perspective the stable, structured life which is the fluid in his parents' glass and proceed to form his own philosophy.

As the individual recognizes his own concept of life he finds that it will be unstructured and will conflict with the values carried over from the first stage. At first the fluid which he is pouring into his glass will not mix with what is already there. Eventually, however, this new liquid will quietly blend with the structured fluid given him by his parents, and result in a homogeneous solution—a composite philosophy of both systems of values.

The individual, even while storing up the fluid which his interactions with the world continually offer him, is aware of the fluid with which his parents first covered the bottom of his glass. In the end these values will temper the idyllic manner in which he sees the world.

When old age comes, the glass finds that it is not as bright and shiny as it once was, and the fluid is not as clear. The individual recognizes the import of being old, and the fluid crystallizes while he finds it more and more difficult to identify with what he sees going on all around him.

He tries to communicate with these of the younger generation to partly check the ever-increasing crystallization and depletion of the fluid.

As the level of the liquid drops more and more swiftly the person becomes increasingly feeble and eventually the person dies, as the glass is dry.

Our glasses were dry, our voices were talked out. But life's apple juice tin was keeping cool, on tap for us, anytime we wanted to pour it into a rising glass. The world was there for the asking, in a simple "Fill 'er up, Joe."

On the Meds battlefront

By BOB SOROKOLIT
 Bob Sorokolit is a third-year medical student and representative on the Canadian Association of Medical Students and Interns for the University of Toronto Medical Society.

It's no news that Toronto is a bi-lingual city. But few people know this better than the medical students, particularly those in the hospital where they meet many of the city's 300,000 Italians.

Often they are of the "non parlo angliese" variety, and this fact provided the incentive for the instructive course in clinical Italian attended by more than 200 medical students, doctors and nurses at the Toronto General Hospital last week.

In addition, a comprehensive booklet was produced organizing questions in English and appropriate Italian so that they require only yes-no, number and date replies.

No adequate booklet existed previously and the students involved in the project, Gerry Koffman, Tullio Albertini and Leo Di Paolo (all III Meds), have decided to send copies to all the hospitals in Toronto and to the Ontario Medical Association for the information of other doctors.

The Italian project developed from the local committee of CAMSI which also provides weekly noon-hour educational medical films.

Nationally CAMSI organizes summer field clinics in Jamaica and exchanges for summer hospital jobs in Europe.

CAMSI is one example of a number of organizations giving medical students a role in influencing the method and content of their medical education.

This year also saw the birth of the community-minded Student Health Organization, founded by Gerry Friedman (III Meds).

Further at U of T, students this year won voting positions on all faculty of medicine committees rewriting the revolutionary curriculum which will begin in 1969.

Stan Kushnir (III Meds), Medical Society presidential candidate, hopes to develop more continuing student involvement in the current medical education face-lifting.

A developing new student program will provide students with opportunities for giving formal lectures and presentation of their research work in addition to publishing articles in a monthly U of T student journal.

Remember, you always find things in the last place you look.

Course evaluations to start

Arts and Science students will have the opportunity to criticize their courses next week on class time.

The editors of the Students Administrative Council course evaluation have sent letters to faculty members requesting a summary of course content, lecturers and tutors, and the most convenient time for distribution of questionnaires. The editors have already received many replies.

It is estimated that this year's shorter questionnaire can be distributed, filled in, and collected in less than half an hour.

The answers to the questions will be filled in on IBM porto-punch cards (the same as those used in the recent SAC election) but there will be space at the end of each questionnaire for the individual student's comments.

Should a student make a mistake on his card, extras will be available.

The comments will be published only if they are repeated by many students or supported by a great number of answers on the rest of the questionnaire.

SACCE is doing only university-wide courses, but if any college curriculum committee wishes to evaluate a college subject, the course evaluation committee will print the questionnaire and publish its results. One has already been printed for the History Students Union.

Dr. A. D. Allan, dean of arts and science, has promised the faculty's full cooperation in handling the questionnaires.

The results of the evaluation will be written and published during the summer. They will be mailed to the students in early fall.

Dr. D. G. Creighton, former head of the department of history, has been appointed University Professor to succeed Dr. Northrop Frye, it was announced yesterday.

Professor Creighton has written extensively on Confederation, and is well-known for his two-volume biography of Sir John A. Macdonald and his Commercial Empire of the St. Lawrence.

The Varsity incorrectly reported Monday that Prof. Creighton was leaving the University of Toronto.

University presidents sidestepped students: OUS

"The existing form of government in our universities is an elitist one . . . the tyranny of a minority."

This is the spirit of the Ontario Union of Students' reply to the brief on student participation in university government published last month by the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario.

The eight-page OUS reply was written by OUS President Monique Ouellette.

The reply charges that the CPUO brief's authors sidestepped the concept of student goals and "have instead been lured by the mirage of the intellect."

"Had the authors talked with the students who are most concerned with the matter of participation, they would have heard them talk about student-centred teaching, the quality of education; they would have heard them express concern about education, for that is why they are at university."

The OUS reply says the brief on its first page "defined the purpose of a university as being a brain factory."

"Students want more than to tinker with the system. They want to change it to an entirely different one," the OUS reply says. The reply criticizes the CPUO brief for accepting the assumptions of the Duff-Berdahl report.

"Students have rejected the Duff-Berdahl report because it was . . . a management consultant's report, simply interested in how to make the university function more smoothly," says the OUS reply.

"The existing form of government of our universities . . . is, in fact, the government of Huxley's Brave New World."

"What is asked for is that every member of the community take part in making the decisions which affect their individual lives and the life of the community," the reply concludes, after an involved discussion of what democracy is all about.

OUS takes up the matter of communication between students and administration and concludes that there is none.

"When the authors (of the CPUO brief) talk about 'preserving the dialogue' we wonder what dialogue there is to preserve, for a dialogue can take place only between equals who respect each other."

African Students Union to sponsor conference

"Africa wants to develop her great spiritual values and teach the world how man should live with his fellow man, for the hope of mankind depends on how man views humanity."

This view, expressed seven years ago by Aloc Quaison-Sackey, then foreign minister of Ghana describes the African Conference to be held on campus Friday and Saturday.

The conference, sponsored by the African Students Union, will focus on the problems of African independence.

It opens at 8 p.m. Friday at Sidney Smith with an address by George Houser, executive director of the American Committee on Africa, and moves to Convocation Hall Saturday. A reception at the International Student Centre at 6 p.m. will close the affair.

Following is the program:

The Rev. Gladstone Htlabati, one of the speakers.

Friday

8 p.m. to 11:30 p.m.

Opening address, Africa in Perspective, by Mr. Houser, slides and films on Africa.

Saturday

If residences are too expensive, there's no room in the co-ops and you are less or don't want to live at home, what can you do?

There are still a number of types of accommodation open to you. You can rent a room, take over part of a house with few others or share an apartment.

Mary, a third general arts student, shares her $12-a-week room on Huron street. Her needs but just barely. She shares a room and fridge located in the hall outside the room with three other people, the room with six others.

Sometimes Mary gets so cold she has to sleep on a mattress in the apartment. Most of the time she "thinks" and piles on the sweaters.

In spite of the cold, her room is cozy with its walls papered to look like wood panelling and covered with posters and prints. There is just enough room for a couch-like bed, a desk, chair and a set of drawers.

Although she lives in the city, Mary moved into a room in order to be closer to campus and because her parents had told her "like a second-class citizen."

She feels freer now although there are rules about not having people in the room after 11 p.m. Since the landlord doesn't live at the house the rules are largely ignored.

One drawback she mentions is that she is getting very sick of her own cooking.

"There are just so many things you can cook for one person on a stove like this."

Mary would have preferred to live in a

By TOM COLLINS

"Rules, rules, rules!"

"Freedom, freedom, freedom!"

St. Michael's College's Residences are overburdened with rules; University College's residences are overflowing with lack of restrictions.

The above statements are only half-truths. Both Colleges have rules, but St. Mike's is stricter in enforcing them.

What is residence life like at the University of Toronto. What are the differences, if any, between the religious-oriented SMC and the secular-oriented UC? Are the students different?

First, St. Mike's men's residences.

The rules are simple: no alcoholic beverages allowed (U of T rules forbid liquor on campus), and no women allowed into the men's living quarters.

But St. Michael's men do not seem too affected by these regulations:

Paul, a first-year student, doesn't mind the few rules:

"I don't find them restrictive at all. For one thing the drinking rules are not enforced. I don't mind the 'no girls' rule right now, but probably will in later years."

Jim, a resident dweller for four years, didn't mind the rules too much either, but he was more prone to break them.

"The drinking rules are ridiculous," he said, surveying his small collection of empty, half-full and full wine bottles.

"As for women visiting privileges, there are times when personal relationships demand a more private atmosphere than lounges can provide. At such times I freely break rules and know that the don will take an understanding view of the matter."

Jim's comment brings out an interesting point about St. Mike's residence life. The dons differ in how they enforce policy.

The residences are divided into six separate units — ranging in size from Elmsley Hall's 200 students to Teeffy's 12.

Many dons in the smaller units Fisher, More, Teeffy, House 2 and the three Cloverhill floors) leave the following of rules up to the discretion of the students.

This attitude is reflected in the placing of the students in the various resident units: first-year students are placed in Elmsley; other years can get into the smaller, freer units and if you're lucky enough to be in graduate school, you can live in the almost rule-free House 2.

The attitude of both students and dons at UC is very similar to that expressed at St. Mike's.

"There are rules, but they're so loosely enforced that I'm not really sure what they are," was the comment of Len, a first year student.

The rules are the same as those at SMC, with one significant difference: the men are allowed to bring in women on weekends.

But the guys bring them in during the week too, and the dons aren't too worried about fining them.

"If they do fine ones that get caught a five-buck fine, and more than a cheap one. Only a few have been so far."

"As far as drinking, the dons certainly don't point of ensuring that you don't drink. They have parties for the three or four times conveniently ignored parties."

The big difference in residence rules is shown in girls' residences. St. Mike's, UC does not.

But the curfew is a little too many students.

"The curfew is manageable for the dons, but instead of waiting until said Mary, a second-year student at St. Joseph's."

"It's easy enough to enforce there's no real problem in when you want to go out."

There are general rules for some of the students. First-year students at St. Mike's have to be in by 10:30 p.m. They have a midnight curfew (the same as the previous years) for the second year.

Weekend late curfew is 1:30 a.m. for first-year students. For those who stay in one hour late, on the weekend later.

The question of visiting privileges at UC is aroused enough interest in the house council for several of "open" day afternoons.

T STYLE OF LIFE

co-op but there was no room when she applied in November. She didn't have much trouble finding a room on her own.

Jane, a second-year economics student, also lives in a room by herself. But since she rooms with a family she has a homey atmosphere that Mary lacks.

"My landlady has a huge old grey dog that barks everytime someone comes in and her cat is always asleep in the front hall. I often have tea with her in the evening and discuss her stock market investments. The other day while I was studying she brought me a bowl of cherries to munch on."

Jane finds that living off-campus with non-students helps keep academic problems in perspective as well. Of the four other young people who live at the house, three work and one goes to Ryerson. "School is rarely a topic of conversation", she says.

Unlike Mary, Jane looks on cooking for herself as one of the best things about rooming.

"You can eat what you want, when you want, and if your culinary experiments aren't completely successful no one complains."

Jim and Gary are two second-year students who describe their particular set-up as "perfect" and "fantastic".

With two other students, they share the top two floors of a house about 12 minutes from campus. Each has his own room and there is a kitchen on each floor.

Gary was in residence until January when this place became available and Jim was living in a room.

"Living here is infinitely superior to residence," says Gary. "It has a lot to do with people, I think. The most important thing is being able to choose who you're going to live with."

For Jim the most important thing is having a room to yourself although he is happier with the present arrangement than he was in the rooming house. "It's not much fun cooking for one person," he says.

"The best thing about moving out of residence was that I learned to cook," Gary said. "We're all practically gourmet cooks now."

Most of their entertaining involves having people over for dinner and cooking as fantastic a meal as possible. This means that their food bills are enormous but the rent is so "unbelievably" low that Gary figures it is still cheaper than living in residence.

Rules in residence were not very restricting, he found. Sometimes, due to lack of discipline, the residence became too noisy to study. He finds it much quieter at the new place.

There are some obligations to living with other people, like being home for dinner when the other person is cooking. But rules set by the landlord are no-minimal, mainly relating to keeping noise down.

Those who don't want to live alone and aren't lucky enough to find someplace like Jim and Gary have, may end up sharing apartments.

High rents sometimes necessitate squeezing in several people but there are advantages as well.

Linda and two other girls share a one-bedroom furnished apartment on the second floor of a house just above Bloor or $130 a month. There used to be two of them (which was really better for the size of the place) but when the landlord raised the rent in January from $100 per month, they had to take another girl in. The apartment has a large living room, bedroom and kitchen.

Linda is from out of the province and lived in co-op last year. She is happier in the apartment.

"I got sick of co-op food and I'd rather cook for myself. Residence would be all right but I'm used to being able to have people over and using the living room to entertain."

There are the usual rules about being quiet after 11 p.m., but they aren't really restricting, Linda finds. They hardly ever see the people in the other nine apartments.

The bedroom is separated from the living room by the kitchen, which ensures quiet for studying.

or a residence

"I would like to see some sort of open house once in a while," said Pat, "but there are valid reasons against it — such as the disturbance it might cause to others."

"But I really enjoyed it when the guys raided the residences on Hallowe'en, though they did annoy some."

Over at UC's Whitney Hall, the girls have curfews in first year, but only during the first term. Whitney has a male guard on duty all night, so the women can come in anytime they want.

Men can visit the girl's rooms Sunday afternoon, but "the privilege is not used too much," say Sue and Pat, two third-year students.

Visiting privileges at Whitney are enhanced by the fact that all the girls get single rooms after first year.

"There was some sort of movement afoot to open Whitney to men all the time, but nobody wanted it," said Pat. "It would interfere too much with one's privacy."

Privacy does not seem to be the main problem in residence living. Noise and poor food are the major annoyances, say most of those interviewed.

The girls try to alleviate the problem by having "quiet hours." The main function of the female dons is really to enforce the silent period.

The men usually have no real fixed hours of study, but somehow manage to get their work done.

Food is another problem that's a little harder to solve.

"At least it's convenient as hell — you can get up at 9 a.m., hit breakfast, and still make it to class on time," said Len.

That last statement sums up pretty well the attitude of all those in residence.

Those interviewed liked residence living for two main reasons: its convenience and the people.

"It's convenient for meals, for classes, and it's convenient for finding out what's going on — for people always think of residences when placing posters," said Mary.

"And for getting to know people," continued Len, "I think it's an excellent idea in first year especially. You get to meet a lot of people and have all the advantages of a fraternity without the drawbacks."

Beat the high cost of dying — Why not do it yourself?

By MEIR BESTER

—Men's burial suits, newest patterns in high quality materials, expertly tailored. Extra large arm pits, easier to slip on.

—F-12 arterial fluid, clearing and skin toning before your eyes.

—Head of Christ, electrically illuminated —be the most talked about funeral director in town.

The preceding ads, taken from the American Funeral Director magazine, reflect the growing trend in our society towards what has been termed "funerals with frills."

Simplicity has moved out, as undertakers, casket manufacturers, florists, monument makers and cemetery promoters are geared for elaboration and expense. In fact, the most expensive car ride you will ever take is the short trip from the funeral home to your grave.

All this extravagance seems to be an attempt to erect a screen against the reality of death.

In the broadloomed hush of funeral homes, death is never acknowledged out loud. The occurrence that has taken place is a "passing on," and the loved one is said to be "resting" there.

"Pay now, die later" is the slogan of commercial cemeteries, many of which have door-to-door selling campaigns.

The average cost of dying in Ontario is $800.

If you are appalled by this irrational tendency to keep the standards of dying on par with the standards of living, you can dispense entirely with the services of an undertaker.

Be your own funeral director.

You have just been notified that your father died in the hospital, and being a firm believer in dignified, inexpensive burials you are going to do everything yourself.

First, contact the Toronto General Burying Grounds. This public service (head office at 1643 Yonge St.) operates Mount Pleasant, Beechwood, Pine Hill and York cemeteries. Purchase a burial plot and make arrangements to have it opened. Total cost —$200.

Next, get some lumber (7/8-inch pine or its equivalent) and build a simple box with a removable top. Lumber and nails cost about $10.

(Be wary of cheap lumber. In September, 1965, the bottom fell out of a coffin, depositing the body of a 250-lb. woman on the church steps.)

With the box in the back of your station wagon or truck proceed to the hospital and convince the cautious hospital authorities that you are serious. You will be asked to sign a form stating you have taken the body.

Ask for the medical certificate of death which should be signed by the attending physician (form 18), then obtain and fill the statement of death (form 17.)

Back your vehicle in the service entrance. Have the body brought over and placed in the box. The lid can be nailed on at this time if desired.

Then, pay a short visit to your local divisional registrar, surrender forms 17 and 18 and secure a burial permit.

Headstone? You don't have to get a pair of pensive marble angels ($4,000). A plain granite tablet can be had for $15.

A death notice in the paper will add $5 to your costs.

Total cost—$230.

If you decide to have the body cremated instead of buried, the expense will be even less.

Cremation charge in Toronto is $60. The body has to be in a box.

A coroner must examine the body if it is to be cremated (in case there has been foul play and you are trying to burn the evidence). Coroner's fee—$10.

Contrary to popular belief, an urn is not essential for claiming the ashes. A plain jar is sufficient.

You can do anything you want with the ashes.

Total cost for cremation (death notice included)—$85.

Usually, a death in the family leaves us too grief-stricken to contemplate a do-it-yourself funeral. In our sorrow we turn to a competent organization which relieves us of the details.

But even then, the cost need not be enormous.

The Toronto Memorial Society, a non-sectarian group promoting simplicity, dignity, and moderate expense in funerals, can direct you to undertakers who have agreed to provide services for $150 (burial or cremation costs not included).

The body, placed in a plain wooden coffin, is transported to the funeral home where a room is provided for services.

Later, it is transported to the cemetery or the crematorium, but no cars are provided for the procession.

Finally, the cheapest service is provided by the University of Toronto department of anatomy.

If donated to science, the body can be transported directly from the hospital to the university. Cost—nil.

Spring blood drive starts up

There was nothing very spectacular about the accident, as Toronto accidents go. Just a pedestrian who got in the way of a car and landed on his head.

The first person on the scene was a student nurse from the University of Toronto.

"I tried to stop the bleeding by applying pressure with my hands," she said later. "When the policeman arrived, he had some paper towels. He asked me if I wanted to wipe my hands, then he started wiping the blood off the road."

The temperature was about 10 degrees above.

"My hands were really cold, and the blood on the road was freezing. His head was still bleeding when they put him in the ambulance. I don't even know who he was."

Traffic accidents account for some of the most urgent requests for blood in Toronto, but make up only a small percentage of the total demand. In all, about 500 units of blood are required every day in Toronto. Most are used for operations and past surgical care.

The Toronto blood bank, run by the Red Cross, is always low, and requests for even the more common types of blood are often hard to fill.

Tony Cottrill, of Carling's Breweries and chairman of the U of T blood drive for the Red Cross, feels the two major problems are indifference and fear, especially indifference.

"The University of Toronto has the greatest potential for blood donors in the city," he said last week.

"But the spring drive has always received a poor response. We cannot accept the old excuses that students are busy at this time of year.

"Illness and sickness are no respecters of time."

To promote the U of T drive, Carling's is again sponsoring the Blood Cup. The rules have been changed since the fall drive. It was felt the old system placed the large colleges at a disadvantage.

For the two-week spring drive, starting Friday, goals have been set for every college and faculty. The goals are 25 per cent of the total enrolment of each.

The cup will be awarded to the group exceeding its goal by the greatest number of units of blood.

Donations will be credited to the student's college or faculty no matter where they are made. Students who can not attend clinics during the day can give at 67 College St. in the evenings, and have their donations credited to their college or faculty.

Innis gets more democracy

The student representatives on the Innis College Council have been made responsible to the students of the college in a move described by Student Society President Ken Stone as "almost as important as getting student representation originally."

The College Council unanimously approved Monday evening an amendment to the Student Society constitution which will allow the society to recall student members of the council.

Recall is possible by a petition of 15 per cent of all Innis College students, or by failure to attend two-thirds of the Council meetings up to a given date, without a reason judged sound by the Student Society executive.

"It was due to the liberal views of the College Council," Stone said.

Expected opposition to the amendment from council members didn't materialize Monday.

Several had previously expressed opposition to the idea of student members being held accountable to their student constituents.

Principal Robin Harris was on the committee on student participation in university government for the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario.

Its report last month said: "The student participants... must not regard themselves as delegates or reporters. The do not serve one constituency, i.e., the student body, but the entire university."

Principal Harris explained yesterday that his support of the Innis College amendment was not inconsistent.

"If a person is elected by an electorate," he said, "they should have the mechanism of recall. It's a legitimate democratic process."

"What I oppose is taking away the freedom of members of the council to operate as individuals. Since the members are not instructed delegates, the control of their constituents works only after the event. I am perfectly satisfied with the agreement."

Soviet Jewry unequal

"The Jewish 'nation' is the only national group in the Soviet Union that is not allowed the rights of nationality," says Dr. Allan Pollack.

Dr. Pollack, an expert in Soviet Jewish history, was speaking at a Conference of Concern for Soviet Jewry, the first in a series of programs and projects organized by the newly-formed Student Concern for Soviet Jewry.

Each Soviet citizen belongs to a "nation" into which he is born and is identified by it on his passport and identity card.

All of these "nations" are encouraged to preserve their culture by setting up schools and preserving their language and rituals. But the Jewish "nation" is denied these rights.

During the Stalinist period all Jewish schools were forcibly shut down, the Jewish press and community organizations disbanded and most synagogues closed.

The older generation of Jews is too frightened to object for fear of a return to Stalinist terrorist anti-semitic tactics.

But the younger generation is beginning to rally to defend its legal rights.

Dr. Pollack said any protest against discrimination by the Soviet government should point out the illegality of such practices. The Soviet constitution guarantees cultural rights for all "nations."

The Soviet Union is very sensitive to foreign accusations of discrimination since communism advocates equality, he said.

J.B. Salsberg, an ex-communist MPP, said the Jewish fate is bound up with the movement towards a larger degree of democracy in the Soviet Union.

Salsberg left the Communist party in 1956 when the anti-semitic terrorist practices of Stalin were revealed.

He said the Soviet government fears Jewish loyalty to Israel, which it considers an outpost of American imperialism.

A student housing survey team is touring Ontario universities to examine housing conditions and their effect on education.

The team, sponsored by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, is headed by architect Henry Sears of Toronto. It has already visited universities in eight other provinces in an attempt to make the survey Canada-wide.

"We hope that persons who have definite views on how housing affects education will come forward with their ideas," Mr. Sears said.

I think that I have never knew
A layout chief as great as Sue;
She works so well and hard and fast
I just don't see how she can last.

And when there's 20 pages here

The War Game - student style

By WARREN BOURGEOIS

In the Sir Daniel Wilson residence the thunder of battle roars through the McCaul House ping-pong room. Gone is the peaceful green table, replaced by Tru-Scale Scenic Surroundings of rivers, hills and gun emplacements.

The war games are in progress. Fought with plastic soldiers, tanks, planes and ships, the war has extremely complex rules.

"We're all belligerent!" shouted a subordinate officer. He was quickly put down by the two commanders.

The generals, Chris Denis (II UC) and Guy Elliot (II UC) explained that it is a gentlemanly game, — "similar to chess, the first of the war games."

"Get the hell out of my river," screamed Denis as I inadvertently stepped between two wires taped to the floor.

"Let's have the altitude and attitude of those planes," said commander Guy Elliot with all the aplomb of a 10-year-old smoking his first cigarette.

There was something macabre about the way Elliot puffed his pipe, crossed his legs and said in all seriousness, "My wife and I must come over and have a game with you sometime Chris."

The games were evolved by Chris Denis' family, which has been gathering around the hearth for the last five years to slaughter "Krauts, Rusksies, Japs and Britishers" in this family fun sport.

There are four or five pages of formal rules for land battles and a separate set for naval battles. The moves of different pieces are determined by a deck of cards. Wires and yardsticks are used to determine what men are within range and sight of the opposing guns.

"Print this for propaganda purposes," shouted a subordinate officer with sanguinary glee as the opposition shot down a Tru-Scale model of a little girl on a horse.

"No one takes this seriously, except as a good way to work off aggressions," said Denis.

"This particular battle will last about 13 hours and is planned on our number two scale. We have another scale for smaller battles and one for outdoors."

"Watch were you're walking, dammit!" yelled Denis as a neutral observer came within a scant foot of his plastic bomber. In close proximity to this model was a covered wagon bringing supplies to the "Japs."

"See that number 78," said Chris proudly, "I made that myself." I squinted at the home-made scale model anti-aircraft gun which looked somewhat forlorn among the cereal-box plastic ones. "Gee that's super-keen," I mumbled, swallowing hard.

With equal pride, Guy Elliot described the hard thinking that went into such a production. Among the green blankets (representing hills) he toyed delicately with his favorite troops and guns.

"We spent 10 days planning for this big one," confided Guy Elliot with a sly Montgomery smile as he tapped out his pipe on the north bank of the river. "Within a few hours we will know the outcome."

Apparently, knowing the outcome doesn't stop the combatants from fighting on for another six hours to the last drop of plastic blood.

The battle was still raging in a fashion that would really impress any 12-year-old when I left for lunch, with a saddened countenance and a heavy stomach.

"You've really got a hold on me"

By MARY KATE ROWAN

Jarvis and Queen — where the action is — at the Hata-shita Judo Club, the most famous in Canada.

Practice sessions echo with the slap-crack of students being thrown and landing every minute of it.

Frank Hatashita is vice-president of the World Judo Association. One of his devoted judokas is Penny Hutchens, a first-year student at Erindale College.

"I'm considered slightly a fanatic," she admits, "but judo has changed my whole life.

"Now I feel relaxed and self-confident."

She first became interested when a boy in her grade 8 class gave a demonstration.

"I was so enthralled that I walked around in a trance and told myself that one day I would take judo."

That day came a year and a half ago and Penny's been a judo enthusiast ever since.

The first thing she learned was how to fall properly so she could land without any vital organs or bones touching the floor.

The shock on the arm is absorbed by the whole limb. It hits the ground with a violent slap a split second before the rest of the body.

Learning to do a good breakfall takes practice but you can't be thrown until you master it.

Says Penny, "After a while you just know how far away the mat is, even without looking."

Judo is a sport of endurance requiring good physical condition.

A typical practice session involves non-stop exercise including situps, pushups and practice falls.

Penny could hardly walk after her first session she was so stiff.

"Week after week, I forced myself to do all the exercises. I knew that to get anywhere in judo, I would have to exert myself."

"Judo is primarily a sport," says Penny.

"A lot of people come for a quickie course in self-defence thinking they only have to learn a few things before they can go out and kill everybody."

"They don't realize that for judo to be used for self-defence it can't be superficial. It must be so ingrained that it comes out in times of crisis."

Because judo is a violent sport involving impact, instructors stress safety. And no one is ever allowed to come onto the mat under the influence of alcohol, drugs or emotions.

"But," says Penny "the niceties that are so strongly stressed can be removed. When they are, judo can be deadly."

Judo depends on balance, timing, co-ordination and reflex action, not on brute force. However, if two contenders are equally matched in every other respect, the stronger will win.

Judo is a battle of wits, says Penny.

"You must become sensitive to what the other person is thinking. Since it is a contact sport, most of the information about your opponent comes through the arms.

The SAC needs three students to serve on the Presidential Advisory Committee for the Examination of Disciplinary Procedures at the University of Toronto. Terms of reference are:

The Committee is asked to inquire into and report upon the existing disciplinary institutions and procedures at the University of Toronto, and the principles and policies which have been pursued. The Committee will examine the scope and adequacy of existing arrangements with a view to recommending appropriate changes, if any, in the nature of these arrangements. It will also seek to specify the proper limits of the jurisdiction of such disciplinary procedures as applied to both students and members of the University staff.

It is being asked to submit its report to the President during the academic session 1968-69 — if possible, in time for publication during that session.

Please apply in writing, stating qualifications, interests, reasons for applying, and ideas on discipline in the university to:

UGEQ to hold plebiscite on Quebec

MONTREAL (CUP) — Quebec students will hold a province-wide plebiscite on La Question Nationale next fall.

The Union Generale des Etudiants du Quebec congress is expected to approve a proposal by the executive for a plebiscite among all its members.

Louis Gendreau, newly elected vice-president for national affairs of UGEQ and chairman of the national affairs commission of the congress, said Friday that the plebiscite will be held in October or November. First, an intensive education program will allow the union's 58,000 student members to evaluate the situation.

The plebiscite ballot, to be voted upon at all institutions simultaneously, will ask a battery of questions on Quebec's future status with the rest of Canada.

Gendreau said an independent committee of representatives from the universities and college federations will supervise the education program, the wording of the ballot and the plebiscite.

The official ballot will be in French but the committee will approve an English translation.

UGEQ is officially unilingual. All of its documents and official business are conducted in French. But the commission is approving the English version for those students who might misinterpret the French ballot.

Plebiscites on all campuses will be supervised by the independent commission to be formed by the conseil central national of UGEQ, its governing body between congresses.

Gendreau said the union would officially take a stand on the results of the plebiscite sometime in November.

At its opening plenary session Wednesday, labor unions told the union to take a position on the question, criticizing them for not acting on it sooner.

UGEQ President Pierre Lefrancois said the question can only be decided after intense education of the students to the issues involved.

He cited the main reason for the cautious approach as the presence in the union of more than 22,000 English students from McGill, Loyola and Sir George Williams Universities.

Opinion in these universities has apparently become increasingly sympathetic to demands for increased Quebec autonomy and extra federal consideration for its unique problems.

B.C. grants inadequate: Armstrong

VANCOUVER (VNS) — Provincial grants for 1968-1969 to British Columbia universities are inadequate, charges William Armstrong, deputy acting president of the University of British Columbia.

Mr. Armstrong, dean of applied science, was commenting on grants to UBC, Simon Fraser University and the University of Victoria in Premier W.A.C. Bennett's provincial budget.

While the three universities received only $65,000,000, the B.C. Assembly of Students say the universities require a minimum of $77,000,000.

"We won't get any additional capital until the next five-year plan in 1969," said Mr. Armstrong.

Armstrong said money was needed for the building of an $8,000,000 biological complex and a new engineering building. He also stressed the need for increased study space.

Allocation of operating funds to each university will not be known until an advisory board to the department of education makes its recommendations at the end of the month.

McGill probes conversational French

MONTREAL (Special) — A senate sub-committee has been established at McGill University to investigate the possibility of instituting a course in conversational French.

A unanimous Students Council motion passed Dec. 13 prompted the administration's move.

Ian Hyman, former council representative for arts and science, presented the motion calling for "utilizing the most modern available instruction methods."

Subcommittee member Professor James Ellis of the linguistics department said many linguistics professors would favor such a course:

"The resources which would have to be dedicated to such a course are extensive and the students involved would have to have some pretty serious dedication."

Faculty and administration have given widespread support to the idea of the course.

Night bumps ain't bunk: Rose

Have you ever bumped into one of those little things that go bump in the night? If you have, there seems to be a perfectly logical explanation for what happened.

According to Prof. Elliot Rose of the Dept. of History, these "little things" are quite definitive. Prof. Rose was speaking at Seeley Hall Monday at the first of a three-lecture series on Things That go Bump in the Night.

On coming into contact with one of these things "we ought to feel a shudder, un frisson," said Prof. Rose.

This is not a supernatural happening. "If magic exists," said Prof. Rose, "if ghosts fly and witches ride, they belong in the created orders and therefore to nature."

"Unconsciously, we are all logical positivists," he said. "We are the minds that do not give a damn about things that can be proved by science."

Prof. Rose sees magic as a learned profession. He defines it as "the manipulation of this world by mysterious means learnedly acquired."

Witchcraft is similar to magic in that it relates to nature, but is not a literary learned tradition. It could be folklore. But a witch is usually thought to have either inherited her powers or learned them at her mother's knee.

Fairies are those little ones who possess innate powers we don't have.

There are two kinds of fairies, as Prof. Rose, "is that if they exist, they ought to be to the Kingdom of the Fairies and whom we see dancing and feasting. Then there are the lone fairies who are seen sweeping floors and doing good deeds.

"The trouble with ghosts," said Prof. Rose, "is that if they exist, they ought to be able to be examined." But they are still apparitions, usually visible, of one of the dead who has an unquiet soul. They walk and make noises but can't be examined or recorded.

Some of the other things you might be likely to bump into are Imps, Goblins, Dragons, Vampires, and Werewolves, Giants and Pygmies.

But this is only looking at things from one angle. The second of this three-part series features Dr. Paul Christee, superintendent of the Ontario Hospital on Queen Street.

If you are at all worried about what tripped you last night you might find the answer at the next lecture.

Survey says Ryerson students want fourth year plus degree

Presentation of a degree would induce 60 per cent of Ryerson business students to return for a fourth year.

A survey administered by the Business department, found that an advanced technical education with a degree would be the most popular program. A general education with an advanced diploma would be the least popular.

"The question of whether or not Ryerson should grant degrees and the addition of a fourth year are two separate issues", said David Crombie, director of student affairs.

Major barriers to returning to a fourth year were College of Education was particularly important to those interested in teaching.

He said the real question was what role Ryerson should be fulfilling.

"It is somewhere between the community colleges and the universities," he said.

The report cited the most important factors motivating students to return for a fourth year as higher income after graduation, more skill, degree status and transferability.

The opportunity to go to university or the Ontario found to be self-doubt, being sick of school, possible lack of degree status, and lack of recognition by the business world.

The report states a majority of students feel POSAP's present structure would be adequate in eliminating most financial barriers.

Ye poore squash Blues jousted at Mac

Varsity's injury-jinxed squash Blues missed dethroning defending champion McGill Redmen by two points in the intercollegiate squash championships. Redmen had 15 points to Blues' 13. McMaster and Western tied for third; Waterloo was fourth.

Blues lost their number two player Vic Harding the day before the tournament started due to illness. They were also without Mike Gardiner out with injuries. Last year Blues lost three of their first five players due to injuries and ineligibility.

Blues still put up a tough battle but their inability to defeat McGill proved their downfall. Only Dave Gunn who moved up to the number 2 position was able to take a match from Redmen. He defeated Tom Gavin on the last point of the fifth game.

The record of Blues' five-man team was: Frank Buck, 2-2, Dave Gunn, 3-1, Terry Swinton, 2-2 Howie Fluxgold, 3-1 and Mike Zimmerman, who replaced Harding, 3-1.

Blues have placed an inquiry into the eligibility of McGill's number 4, Dick Pound. Pound, who won all four of his matches, has completed three years of law school and is articling in a law office. There has been no reply from league officials to date.

Over the past weekend Dave Gunn lost out in the final of the Ontario "C" championships. He was defeated in five games by Les Bourne of the Toronto Cricket, Skating and Curling Club.

Gunn and Howie Fluxgold will play in the U.S. Intercollegiate championships this weekend at Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Boston.

Defending champion is Anil Nayar of Harvard who defeated Peter Martin last year in the final. Nayar, from Bombay, India, is the reigning Canadian champ.

Silky O'Sullivan sparks SMC

By GELLIUS

HOCKEY

O'Sullivan scored the only goal as SMC blanked PHE A, 1-0.

Frost scored twice and Wyse once to lead Trin to a 3-2 triumph over Sr. Eng. Lennard and Simpson tallied (ho!) for Skule.

Vic shut-out Law, 1-0, on a goal by Dawkins.

Meds tied Jr. Eng., 1-1. McDougall (Meds) and McCallum (Eng.) were the scorers.

Swindle's two goals paced Forestry's 4-1 victory over New. Griffin and Yamasaki scored the other goals for For; Taylor hit for the Gnu, thus becoming the only Gnu that's fit to print.

Kindree and The Grim Repei both earned shut-outs as Dents and UC drew. (Well, OCA's on strike so somebody has to do it.)

Pharm. slaughtered Knox, 7-2. Seychuk (2), Cote, Pekkette (Fr., = "small peach"; almost), Mausser, Holdday, and Pittman (when they were short-handed) scored for Pharm., Henderson and Keys for Knox.

Hutson and Spragge scored to lead Archvillain over PHE B, 2-1. "Connery" replied for PHE B.

Erindale vented the frustrations engendered by their deep-seated neuroses by obliterating UC II, 9-0. Robb (3), Lockhurst (3), Pelech (2) and Samson Delija scored.

Olivo's goal, when added to that of Hambly, was enough to edge SMC B, 2-1. Olivo was playing for Scar at the time. McCarthy replied "Connery" for SMC B.

Law beat Business, 4-2, on goals by Bryant (2), Fischer of Men, and James. Cortey and Longpre hit for Bus.

Wright, Clark, Dyer, Lawrie, Barry, and Gin Fizzer scored as Vic II blanked Lnis, 6-0.

BASKETBALL

Crouter scored 18 points and PHE A beat Meds A, 49-30. (Post hoc ergo propter hoc.) Kent led Meds scorers with 8; Lloyd Rossman scored 6. If it hadn't been for him, the score would have been 49-24.

Vic edged SMC A, 37-36. On Evans' 17 points, P. O'Neill (The Ballad of You, Me and P. O'Neill - Jefferson Airplane) had 12 for the Irish.

In a real, genuine-like full-length game, Sr. Eng. beat UC I, 75-69. Slekeys had 23 for Eng., Feldman 24 (ellipsis) for the losers.

Mon Kapitan scored 12 to pace Dents over SOBus, 40-38. Molinari had 17 for SOBus (dative plural of SOB) Jr. Eng. later beat SOB, 23-22.

Lalonde (fr., = "the londe") had 19 and Shivas 18 as Law beat SMC B, 58-36. Deeney led SMC B with 16.

Innis topped Jr. Eng., 68-62, and Archentina took Pharm, 32-24. Our reporter, Qwertyuopus, was too busy planning a special REVIEW issue on Bob Bossin ("Is Bob Bossin really a CIA agent") to transmit the names of leading scorers.

"A school is a cavern of fear and sorrow. The mobility of the captive youths is chained to a book and a desk; an inflexible master commands their attention, which every moment is impatient to escape. They labor, like the soldiers of Persia, under the scourge, and their education is nearly finished before they can apprehend the sense or utility of the hard lessons they are forced to repeat."

A Joycean look at a season with Varsity Blues

By PHIL BINGLEY

The football team is winning and camp opens . . . gone are five starting forwards from last year including the legendary Monteith brothers — yet things don't look too bad as several promising newcomers show up to practice then — disaster.

Returning veteran Brian Tompson suffers a compound fracture of his right leg . . . with only two other right wingers left, Coach Watt is forced to turn defenceman Brian Jones into a forward . . . rookies Brian St. John, Paul McCann and Terry Parsons along with veteran Doug Jones play well and the lineup is all but set . . . Blues sweep their three exhibition games and open the schedule with back to back victories in Quebec . . . St. John scores the hat trick in the home opener and Bob McClelland sinks four against McGill . . . as Christmas arrives, Blues are 6-0 and McClelland has twelve goals already . . . holiday practices are optional as the team prepares for a big tournament that includes the Big Red of Cornell, last year's U.S. intercollegiate champs . . . Colgate falls in the semi-final and the stage is set . . . the fans hardly have time to take a deep breath following three scoreless periods of hockey when Cornell scores with just six seconds gone in the first overtime frame — gloom.

Next is the Molson Tournament in Montreal . . . a 4-3 squeaker over Loyola gives Blues the Molson Trophy for the second year running . . . happiness . . . vacations over and Blues dump McMaster and Guelph . . . Bon Voyage as the players head for the 1968 Universiade in Austria . . . travel arrangements bog down and the team is a day late in arriving . . . first game is against Czechoslovakia . . . Czechs hit for three goals in the first two minutes and go on to win 8-4 . . . gloom and fatigue.

Next, a big win over Austria, 10-1, followed by a 4-1 decision over Finland . . . then a stunning tie with Sweden . . . despair . . . but the Russian game is the big finale . . . veterans and rookies alike are psyched up and anxious . . . The score teeter-totters until the final siren . . . 5-5 . . . ecstatic happiness as the players receive the bronze medal . . . more travelling and then good old Canada . . . fatigue and only one day's rest before a three-game weekend . . .

Waterloo bites the dust at home for their first loss, Mac salvages a tie in Varsity Arena and Montreal falls 4-2 to the Blue machine . . . still undefeated with five games to go . . . Paul Laurent is starting to find the range as he fires our goals to pace 9-5 win over Waterloo in the return match . . . first place is all but locked up . . . Western goes home beaten 4-1 and John Wrigley posts his first shutout over Guelph 5-0 . . . two games remaining and an unbeaten season hangs in the balance . . . back to Quebec but Montreal bursts the bubble with a 5-4 win . . . on to Kingston for the finale and a win needed to clinch first . . . Wrigley who has been great all year comes through with his second shutout and Mike Riddell scores his first of the year . . . Laurent, McClelland and Murray Stroud tie for the scoring lead but two Waterloo players go wild the same night to win the race . . . Stroud is awarded the Dafoe Trophy as the most valuable player and Wrigley wins the goals allowed title . . . losses to Cornell, Czechoslovakia and Montreal were all big disappointments but the tie with Russia, the Loyola tournament and a first-place finish helped to even the balance . . .

Now playoffs are coming and everyone is working a little harder in practice . . . anywhere from one to four sudden-death playoffs stand between Blues and the end of another season . . . they are still number one until somebody proves otherwise.

Would you believe ten straight titles?

By DAVE POWELL

The amazing Varsity swimming team swept to their tenth straight OQAA championship over the weekend, and established themselves as favourites to repeat as Canadian Intercollegiate champs next week at McMaster.

Blues amassed an incredible score of 455 points to outdistance runner-up McGill (270) and the host club, Western (252). Guelph, Queens, McMaster, Windsor, Laval and Montreal finished up the track in that order.

Rookie sensation, Terry Bryon, confirmed his status as Toronto's newest superstar as he again led his team to victory. Bryon swam to an OQAA record in the gruelling 1650 yard freestyle, the first time he has gone that distance this year. He then proceeded to win the 500 freestyle and placed a close second in the 200 yard butterfly.

Captain, Robin Campbell, also had a great meet, with a victory in the 200 freestyle, a second in the 100 free, and a third in the 500 free. Gaye Stratten, despite a painfully sore arm, won the 200 yard backstroke, but lost the 100 back on a judges decision. Both he and the winner, Rainer McGuire, of McGill, were clocked at an OQAA record time of 58.3 seconds.

Theo van Ryn passed up the 50 free in order to be eligible for both relays, but won the 100 freestyle and placed third in the 200 individual medley behind the record of Guelph's Mike Lackowitz.

The big guns were not the only story for Blues, however, This was a great team effort, and every swimmer on the squad did a fine job. There were Alan Pyle (2nd in the 50 free, 6th in the 200 free), Bob Heatley (3rd in the 1650, 4th in the 100 fly), Chris Fisher (5th in the 100 free, 8th in the 50, Doug MacIntosh (4th in the 200 free, 5th in the 500), Steve Gering (4th in the 200 individual medley, 8th in the 500, 5th in the 1650), and Bob Watt (5th in the 200 free, 8th in the 100).

The breaststrokers, Maurice Vaillancourt (2nd in the 200, 7th in the 100), Paul Fisher (4th in the 100, 5th in the 200), George Goldsmith (6th in the 100 and 200), and Barry Bowerman, all did very well.

In addition, Cliff Gentle (5th in the 200 medley), Klaus Koch (back and fly), Don Carr (back) piled up points to help Blues to their wide margin of victory.

Nowhere was the team effort more apparent than in the relays. Stratten, Paul Fisher, Heatley, and the strong finish of van Ryn carried Toronto to an OQAA record in the 400 medley, and Chris Fisher, MacIntosh, Campbell, and again van Ryn swept to victory in the 400 freestyle.

To top off this fine performance, Varsity qualified ten men to represent U of T, and the OQAA, in the intercollegiate championships in Ipswich. Stratten, Bryon, Campbell, van Ryn, both Fishers, Heatley, Pyle, MacIntosh, and Vaillancourt will carry Toronto's hope for a third straight Canadian title.

A squad as strong as that has to be a heavy favourite.

WHAT PUSSYCAT IS NEW?

To coin a highly unoriginal phrase, a new men's athletic complex for U of T is not dead; it's alive and hiding in Wycliffe College.

At a meeting with John Huether and Gurston Dacks last year, our august absentee president, Claude Bissell, confirmed through his regal robes (an interesting feat) that there was certainly enough money available to build an intricate complex. And Darcy Dakin, assistant to the chairman of the planning board, has spent many long hours relating the ultimate cost in a satisfactory manner to a User's Report which outlined exactly what was needed. So at this very moment (even as you read this even) all that's needed is a suitable site. (Why don't they use Raquel Welch — she's a suitable sight. Pitiful chuckle).

Which brings us to that home of homily, Wycliffe College, obviously the ideal location for the proposed complex. The only alternative is the corner of Spadina and Harbour — a drag of the worst kind.

But Wycliffe has a perpetual lease on its present land from the university, and since present plans do not permit the alteration of the college from one of prayer to one of sweat without some sort of divine assistance, a new complex means a new Wycliffe.

Diligent searching around has produced a prospective location; plans were accordingly drawn up and given to the university for approval. However lack of money nixed this Wycliffe-oriented scheme. Then the university cleverly countered with a counter-scheme involving the building of an additional 200 rooms which apparently would sufficiently alleviate the cost.

An answer on this proposal is expected within a few months, but it could take longer. The ways of the holy are usually slow and deliberate, especially at a college such as Wycliffe which survives to a large extent on endowments. Any least departure from the norm (and demolition of the old and construction of the new is certainly a departure) always costs a great number of the old-fogey endowments in jeopardy. One can hardly blame the Wycliffe seers then for wanting to go slow.

Perhaps it's not quite so simple as this, but still, all that's basically needed for an awesome dignitary to come along and turn a spade of athletic complex sod is an agreement by Wycliffe to have their place demolished.

Should Wycliffe give the nod, Varsity basketball coach, John McManus, would probably go stark raving naked with joy. McManus has had to suffer 14 long years in "the cave", which is almost as bad as two years managing the Mets. Said McManus wonderingly the other day, "It's amazing we ever get one fan to our games. Toronto must have the best basketball fans in the league to support us the way they do when we're stuck in the worst basketball court in the city."

Amen. How 'bout it, Wycliffe?

Hackhousemen hacked up

Varsity curlers bowed out of the OQAA championships held at Guelph Feb. 16 and 17, losing their first games in the double knock-out competition. The team, skipped by John Mather (1 Dents), included Alex Segall (SGS), Dave Murphy (1 Trip) and Doug Paterson (1 New).

Against Windsor the team dropped a big four on the seventh end of a tight game, and then blew a chance to tie it on the last end when Mather's last rock hit and rolled out, leaving them on the short end of a 9-8 score.

The second game, best of the afternoon round televised by Channel 11, was against Queen's the eventual tournament champs. With the score 2-1 after six ends a key miss by Mather let Queen's pick up two, and then, with a big three developing on the next end, another two misses let the machine-like Queen's quartet take a 5-1 lead, when Mather was unable to chip out the fine saving draw of Queen's skip Don Campbell. Final score — 7-3, and Toronto's worst showing in the 9 team tournament in many years.

In the recreational curling league at U of T, Steve Griffiths leads a thirsty trio with 35 points. Mark Steeves, Dave Algar and Doug Watson share runner-up with 33 points each.

Davis to speak to embattled OCA students

By ANNE BOODY

Wednesday's march of more than 1,000 students on the Ontario legislature yielded at least one concrete result: Education Minister William Davis is to speak to students at the embattled Ontario College of Art this afternoon.

The students went to Queen's Park Wednesday to present to Mr. Davis their grievances, rising out of the firing last week of two popular OCA instructors, Aba Bayefsky and Eric Friefeld.

The demonstration was so efficient that many latecomers, including Tom Faulkner, University of Toronto Students Council president, found themselves standing on a deserted sidewalk outside the building.

After 35 minutes of hasty speeches and a noisy but orderly demonstration, the students returned to OCA.

Earlier in the day a delegation of representatives from the students' council at OCA, Ontario Union of Student and the drawing and painting committee at OCA spoke with Mr. Davis in his office.

After listening to student complaints about the "dictator-like" administration of the college, Mr. Davis apparently sympathized with the students' position. But he said he would have to hear the other side of the story before he could take any action.

The delegates informed Mr. Davis of the student need for moral support in their boycott of classes. Mr. Davis replied if he were invited he would be happy to come and speak to the students.

The delegation then split up and sent members to the Liberal and NDP caucuses. Both parties voiced support for student views.

After the afternoon demonstration the weary group of students returned to the college to listen to more speeches and decide on further tactics.

A few students stayed behind to sit in on the legislative session. They questioned Mr. Davis, who again said he would have to hear both sides of the story before making a decision.

Back at the college lawyer Vince Kelly was given a standing ovation when he told the students they must continue their fight if they want their demands met.

CHIPS ARE DOWN

The students face a serious problem: today marks the end of their term and if their projects are not in they are threatened with O grades and hence failing their year.

Will students continue their boycott knowing they will miss their year, or will they return to classes? Interior design students have decided to continue the boycott and withhold projects. Most of the other students are following the same path.

Some of the faculty supporting the students have extended the deadline for projects.

A loud cheer arose when a faculty member on the stage told students one of the teachers who originally supported the administration had sent a telegram to Mr. Davis saying she fully supported the students.

More applause for Glen Williams, a York University student. "Don't get sucked in," he declared. "Usually the administration gives in and agrees to set up nice little committees to study internal problems of the college and everyone is happy. But nothing ever comes of it."

150 FROM U OF T

Faulkner spoke to the group and informed them of the support from U of T, which was only 150 strong at Queen's Park.

There was at least one dissenter among the students. Graham Pilsworth, an OCA advertising student, told the audience there was no such thing as student democracy.

"The school has to be run but not by students and faculty who want things their own way," he said.

Pilsworth said he was adverse to the way the students were working to their demands. "You have to go through the proper channels if you want your demands."

We went through the proper channels last year and got nothing from it," replied Ken Kettleworth. "Why didn't Watson go through the proper channels to fire Mr. Bayefsky and Mr. Friefeld?"

Yesterday the boycott was strong as ever. Classes were still largely unattended and more speeches were given to boost the morale of the tired protestors.

Today is the day of decision. Will the students boycott and sacrifice their diplomas? What will be Mr. Davis's stand and how will the students react to the stand?

Speeches have been lined up for the afternoon and Mr. Davis will speak at 4:30 p.m.

Residence debt may cause fee hike

By KATHY ADAMS

All University of Toronto students may have their fees increased by $10 to $20 to cover the university's debts on residences.

A meeting of campus deans of residence, student representatives from residence councils and the authors of the Students Administrative Council's housing report suggested Wednesday that all students—not just residence students—should absorb the capital costs of residences.

A meeting of campus deans of residence, student representatives from residence councils and the authors of the Students Administrative Council housing report suggested Wednesday that all students—not just residence students—should absorb the capital costs of residences.

At the moment the university doesn't know where to find the $18,000 to pay for New College I.

The college was planned at a time when the government was expected to cover the capital costs. The government policy has been changed and the university now has to raise the money to pay off the debts.

The students and deans held that the fairest way to distribute the debt is to have every student, resident or non-resident, pay $10 to $20 rather than have residents pay $250 to $300.

A committee was set up to investigate the political consequences of central financing, particularly with respect to the federated colleges (Trinity, Victoria and St. Michaels.)

The deans of the federated colleges felt that if all students were to contribute to the cost of building new residences, the whole university would have to be consulted first.

SAC President Tom Faulkner agreed, "We cannot commit future students to a fee hike without giving them a voice in building residences," he said.

"They should not be asked to pay more than necessary because the university is not building the most economical residences."

Other suggestions for minimizing the increase in residence costs were to decrease the maid service and the number of dons.

The residence representatives reported most residents would agree to relinquish some maid service if this would mean a smaller fee increase. Opinion was divided on the desirability of dons.

The presidential advisory committee on residence fees feels that dons make the residence part of the academic life of the university, said Registrar Robin Ross.

"Since their function is primarily academic, we have suggested that dons should be paid by the college not by the residence fees," he added.

"But it is clear that there is going to be an increase in residence fees next year. The amount is yet undetermined."

Engineers vote reps and exec today

Engineering students today elect their Engineering Society executive and Students Administrative Council representatives for next year.

They are using a computer ballot similar to that used in the recent presidential election to choose five of the eleven candidates for the SAC positions, and three members of the Society executive.

The polls will be open between 8 a.m. and 2:30 p.m. Candidates for SAC rep are: Allan Bruce (III APSC), James Ford (I APSC), Gregory Gulyas (I APSC), Peter Hammond (II APSC), Paul Kappus (III APSC), Brian Margeston (II APSC), Laszlo Ori (II APSC), Vahe Kouyoum-rjian I APSC), Wayne Richardson (II APSC), Daryl Schnurr (III APSC) and Edward Swantson (III APSC).

Candidates for president of the Engineering Society are James Allan (III APSC) and Brian Dunk (III APSC).

Nominations for Students Administrative Council representatives for all constituencies except medicine and engineering close today at 5 p.m.

The closing date has erroneously been advertised as Thursday, March 1.

Nomination papers must be filed at the SAC office.

There will be no general election day this year, as each constituency will choose the date of its own election.

Inside OCA...

By SHERRY BRYDSON

As you wander through the halls of the Ontario College of Art, you become increasingly aware of the departmental in-fighting going on there.

One painting instructor, Gus Weisdorf, took time off to hold an informal corridor discussion on the strike.

"This whole thing started last year, not last week" he told me. "Those two (Freifeld and Bayefsky) were trying to take over the department of drawing and painting."

"From (present department head) Carl Schaeffer?" I asked.

"Yes," he said forcefully. "There are things going on in the department that nobody understands. People shouldn't jump to conclusions without knowing the facts."

"Freifeld and Bayefsky were trying to overthrow the department."

"Why don't you go down to the cafeteria and tell them what you've told me?" I asked.

"Why should I? I'm showing what I think by staying up here and teaching my class.

"Look—almost 60 per cent of my 4th-year class is in here working. They know they've got it good. They've been through the program and will tell you it's good."

"Yes," chimed in one of the students, "I'll tell you. Last week Bayefsky and John Bowan (chairman of the drawing and painting committee) came around and tried to subvert the students."

Weisdorf was adamant on the subject. "It was all part of a plot to take over the drawing and painting department. It's been going on for a year," he insisted.

Later I asked one of the striking instructors if this was true. "I can't believe it," he said. "Last year Freifeld negotiated raises for all OCA instructors. It was through his efforts that instructors got substantial raises."

"Some got as much as $2,000 more," said another instructor.

OCA Principal Watson has several times accused instructor Aba Bayefsky of calling him a liar. On at least one occasion, Watson did indeed mislead the students.

Watson told the students Feb. 19 that he had not consulted William Davis about the firings. But when the delegation met with Davis Wednesday morning, he said Watson had phoned him "sometime between 10 and 11 a.m." on the morning of the 19th—before Watson met with the OCA students.

Even if none of the other student demands are met, Bayefsky and Freifeld should win their case in court.

Lawyer Vince Kelly, called in by the Ontario Union of Students to advise the OCA students, told the students Wednesday:

"There is a clear case of breach of contract. Watson can terminate a contract immediately with the consent of the Minister of Education and full pay plus one-eighth of a year's pay, or on 30 days' notice in writing with the consent of the Minister of Education.

"Watson has not received the consent of the Minister of Education," he said.

"He has only himself to blame. He himself wrote in those two clauses."

Careless and Creighton and now Northrop Frye. The select but growing list of professors to whom we offer apologies.

Therefore, take note that Prof. Donald Creighton has been appointed University Professor to join (not succeed) Prof. Frye. The title, which allows its holder to teach anywhere on campus, is not exclusive to a single appointment.

GET THIS, STAFFERS
— yet another Varsity party this Saturday night. Sounds incredible doesn't it, but not as incredible as a Varsity party itself, in the flesh. Details up in the office.

NOTICE VARSITY STAFFERS: There will be a staff meeting Monday at 1 p.m. in the office to elect next year's editor. All those who have worked on eight issues or more are eligible to vote.

Overwhelming support was voiced for the striking Ontario College of Art students by the Students Administrative Council Wednesday night.

SAC will send a delegation down to OCA this afternoon. All U of T students have been invited to come down and get a firsthand look at the situation.

hang tough

To the students of OCA:

Time was when democracy meant stepping out once or twice a year, marching into a cosy voting booth, marking a ballot with a big black X. This was called exercising one's god-given right.

That's not what democracy means when you don't have a vote.

When you don't have recourse to "proper channels" to have injustices righted, or when the proper channels don't care or can't work fast enough to do any good, one man one ballot doesn't work any more.

One man, one body does work, sometimes.

Real democracy means laying your body on the line if it is to mean anything. It means standing outside Queen's Park or the U.S. Consulate or City Hall to show that something you hold as important has been violated.

Democracy isn't a cheap thing any more. You're learning that, OCA, the hard way.

Because the old channels are ossified and slow and ineffective.

That's why you had to boycott classes and sit in. That's why you had to march on Queen's Park.

That's why the students of this university — not just 150 of them — should have supported you. One man, one body.

The principles should have drawn them to your cause. Two men have been fired without due process, on a dictator's whim, for speaking out against the dictator.

The principle here is one of free speech.

You have no say about how your lives will be ordered in your college, you work in the equivalent of an authoritarian state.

The principle here is academic and personal freedom.

Don't think the students of U of T are indifferent to these principles. It's just possible they might lay their bodies on the line if it happened here.

But, you see, they don't think principles apply when they are being violated somewhere else. And so they don't care what happens to you.

You might say democracy has failed at U of T. When the principles are violated here we won't be ready because we don't know a principle is a principle no matter where it happens.

But democracy lives at OCA, as long as you let it.

notes...

Dr. John Summerskill is a university president who knows the reasons for things. Or at least he was. He resigned last week as president of San Francisco State College.

S-F State has seen a stormy year in which Negro students attacked some student editors, the Negroes were suspended and a black-power protest closed the college one day last December.

At that time militant activists kept up steady pressure on his administration causing New Republic to remark they have ruined what was once a pretty good liberal university.

Summerskill pointed the finger in the right direction — Gov. Ronald Reagan's anti-intellectual administration, at dissatisfaction with social injustices, the Viet Nam war and draft laws.

Not enough people have really analysed the social disruption in North America that this war has caused and that people who support this war have allowed.

The Telegram yesterday showed again that when there are not enough threats to freedom in our society, newspapers will provide some.

In the paper's report of a movement among former priests and nuns taking mutual psychoanalytical therapy, the suggestion was clear that this was probably something akin to the casting out devils cult reported before, and at best a flock of errant faithful enticed away from their religious duties.

Why the paper has to go snooping around looking for dirt when a bunch of former priests and nuns get together to discuss their humanity within the church and what organized religion does to their humanity, is beyond us.

However, heretics and wayward faithful won't get a head start in our society as long as we've got our alterconscious, the newspaper, to expose them.

setting it straight

Sir:

I regret I did not write earlier when Mr. Dave Frank's report of a meeting of the SAC Housing Committee and Deans of Residence contained errors of fact. Since you have repeated these errors in an editorial on February 28, I hope you will publish these corrections:

1) In my remarks on Mr. Clark's report, I said that it was highly commendable that SAC had finally taken such an interest in university residences and had prepared a report of carefully considered recommendations. I also said that I agreed with nearly all of the recommendations but that the statistical analysis on which they were based did not deserve a passing grade.

2) The anticipated increase in residence fees for 1968-69 is to meet, in part, the amortization cost of the New College men's residence and not the uncompleted women's residence.

3) No Dean, during the four years I have been at Toronto, has ever suggested a fee increase. The Deans have devoted innumerable meetings to finding reasonable means of reducing costs and have prepared several reports arguing the necessity of keeping residence fees as low as possible. The support of SAC in this campaign is welcome, if not essential.

Sir:

I have just read with interest the article "Spend a Summer on the Seine..." by Mike Kesterton, published in The Varsity of Feb. 14th, 1968.

Let me say that I know that I.S.I.S. is not perfect, but they do try to do their best and, in the majority of cases, students have been satisfied.

Regarding the complaints of Mr. Kibblewhite: I have never received any letters from this student. The first time I heard of his complaints was on reading your article. I have dealt with all complaints I have received to the best of my ability, but one can hardly be blamed for not dealing with a case one has never heard about!

What absolute tripe in some parts of the article: "It didn't help to learn from a girl friend in the Brussels Office that I.S.I.S. has no record of where it sends the thousands of students it places." Never have I had any difficulty in tracing a student, and indeed mail addressed to participating students c/o I.S.I.S. in Brussels has always been sent on to the addressee. How could this be done, if I.S.I.S. keeps no records? Again, Mr. Kibblewhite's assertion that I.S.I.S. occupied "a small room on the third floor" is bunk, as indeed any of the participants will tell you. One cannot help doubting the fact that Mr. Kibblewhite ever went to the I.S.I.S. offices in Brussels at all!

It might have been wiser to check facts before rushing in to publication of an article which smacks of cheap sensationalism.

Of course, some students complain, but the adaptability of students, their willingness to work has more to do with the success of the program than the workings of I.S.I.S. It has been my experience, along with that of Professor Bouillaguet, that those who complain are, in general, those who are the least adaptable and who should not have embarked upon such a venture in any case.

However, serious accusations have been made against I.S.I.S. and I should like to have fullest details from those concerned. I can promise that a complete and thorough investigation will be made. I am interested in seeing I.S.I.S. improved since I believe in the idea, and think it serves a useful purpose.

Sir:

We, the "general and officers" mentioned in your article of Feb. 28, "The War Game-Student Style", should like to make a joint statement concerning this article and the accuracy and quality of its journalism. There are several blatant errors: first, the spelling of the names (Dennis and Elliott), second, G. Elliott's year, (III), and third, perhaps trivial to the author but very important to Mr. Elliott, his marital status (single). Of the 11 quoted remarks, three are figments of the author's imagination, and four are misquoted, either in dramatic style. While we do, of course, allow his wording or attribution.

We are also disappointed in the author's meliorism to a certain amount of journalistic licence, we see no point or purpose in attempting to downgrade Mr. Dennis' family, of whom the author has no knowledge whatsoever. This "family fun sport" was not invented by his family but comes to us via Clausewitz, Napoleon, and Winston Churchill. We do not pretend to be any of these gentlemen, but we endeavor to do our best with whatever skills and resources we possess.

We should like to quote Mr. Harris, an expert on military models and war games: "The War Game continued to have such famous sponsors as Von Molthe and Von Schlieffen. It was used to test offensive strategy in the First World War, and played an important role as a training aid for the revived German Army and was later used to try out the initial offensives against France and the Soviet Union. In 1954, War Games were officially entrusted to the Army Operational Research Group, a scientific body which advises the British Army Council."

However, we no more intend to earn our futures as warmongers than Mr. Bourgeois does, we hope, as a journalist. To be fair to the Bourgeois article, we should like to invite Mr. Bourgeois to take part in a War Game to allow him to see just how impressed a 12-year-old mind can be when it is taking part in the letting of "plastic blood", and to afford him the opportunity to demonstrate his flexibility of mind and his ability to think in a different frame of reference. We trust that The Varsity does not encourage or support erroneous and stilted journalism as a matter of policy.

the war criminal-in-residence

By KASPARS DZEGUZE

The First Great war had unprecedented effects on civilian populations. Never had suffering been felt so acutely by non-combatants; never had any war such immediacy and impact. Discontents which arose during the conflict were to some degree allayed by the propaganda machine of the governments; especially dramatic was the claim that this convulsion was necessary to "make the world safe for democracy." The war ended: women voted, hereditary rulers fell, and colonial empires unravelled. All this, no doubt, made a striking preface to the Democratic Millennium. People sat in Sunday clothes awaiting the unfurling of banners proclaiming World Democracy Day. But no voice summoned them to the festivities, and they assumed that a more dignified and diplomatic celebration had been arranged.

One quiet day, the yellowed crepe paper decorations were disturbed by a heavy, drawing voice which issued from the radio: "With patience and unity in the country, our troops in Vietnam will make the world safe for democracy." What? Again? Did we miss the first time? Perhaps the Millennium came, in the years between Korea and Sputnik, and was simply phased out in the American tradition of planned obsolescence. "Has all the joy gone out of your Millennium? Call Johnson and Westmoreland, fun consultants." But what the hell is it that we want so badly we'll kill anyone who gets in our way?

Democracy is a precious and perishable commodity. Do not expose to heat or light. Nor, it seems, to people. The 'dirty little war' exists by presidential fiat, not by declaration of war authorized by elected representatives of the people. Its direct benefits are enjoyed by a foreign military clique whose very existence is dependent on the continuation of the war. These facts have been public knowledge long enough to lose any impact or meaning. Just recently, however, we were brought away from the exciting events of the war itself, to an oblique look at what is happening with the direction of the war.

The retirement of McNamara, the Secretary of Defense, must be rated as a most significant revelation of the extent to which the war has been taken out of the hands of civilian administrators, and committed to the declared needs of the military. McNamara's opposition to the extension and escalation of the war was a continual thorn in the side of the military, whose patriotic demands he was in the habit of assessing for their probable consequence and effectiveness. He was bound by the consideration of 'where, why, and how' that it seems the privilege of the military to ignore. They ask, and are given. The Joint Chiefs sought, and have now obtained, the right to run the war as they see fit, by methods of their own choosing. It used to be that American presidents would force the hand of Congress by committing forces first, and asking for authorization afterwards; the military now seems to have gone beyond this, and committed the politicians to their course, regardless what they might like to do.

This will go a long way in removing from American citizens the embarrassment of responsibility for what the government does. The 1968 elections will not ask their opinion on Vietnam, but shall merely give them the choice of several teams of actors who will act out identical, predetermined roles. It is especially depressing to recall that it was Eisenhower, of all people, who, in a lucid moment at leaving the White House, spoke of the most important task as that of curbing the mushrooming power of the military and of the weapons establishment. Surely, there will follow no acknowledgement more overt of the failure to do this than the fall of McNamara.

It may be argued by some that the most important thing that remains to us is to keep accession within the military 'democratic.' Then, if the military rules the country, but any fool can lead the military, we shall be in substantially the same position as presently. Aspiring politicians will start off not as schoolteachers, but as corporals; they will learn not to 'make the world safe', but 'hold it in trust', for democracy.

It seems that the only way to avoid the loss of democracy is, either through enlightening the military, or by bringing to ourselves a new kind of education. It is said that education is inadequate to the task, and that history only teaches that it teaches nothing. Not so. Introduce into the drama one more character: this man lives in turn by American and Soviet forces.

Rudolf Hess has been in captivity since 1941, when he paraded into Scotland, ostensibly on a mission of peace. After the war, Hess was sentenced at Nuremberg, as Hitler's right hand, to life imprisonment for the "...preparation and execution of aggressive war." Various people may learn different things from this fact. The American or Russian who would plan or wage war remembers that if he were to lose that war, public opinion would demand justice. Therefore, serve justice and win wars. The rest of us simply observe that neither has justice been served, nor revenge wreaked, and we are back in exactly the same predicament that was sanctimoniously decreed out of existence at Nuremberg. Whether a criminal mind is destroyed, or kept in jail for twenty or forty years, the only achievement is the sweeping of the person and his acts under a dank rug.

Why must the generations that have no knowledge of criminality be forced to seek solutions to questions from between the covers of musty apologetics, especially when perpetrators of such deeds still live? Is there not something conspiratorial in making a direct source of knowledge part of the Librorum Prohibitorum? Is there not sinister melodrama in a force of thirty-three men enveloping one man in a prison fortress designed for six hundred? What further harm can come from such as Hess than exists now; if they are imprisoned for fear of their ideas spreading, there must be a well worn, scholarly path to Spandau. Surely such men ought not be shunned, but sought out for what they might teach us of those who govern and the decisions they make. We can only seek to educate the young of democracy by exposing them to deadened viruses, that they may avoid the disease. Expose them to those who have earned the name of War Criminal that they be dissuaded from the bright plumage with which the media invest evil, that they may recognize its tonelessness, which Hannah Arendt called 'the banality of evil.' It would be most instructive to place these men in residence on university campuses, where they might be accessible for study by all. Not the private torments of a cell, but the hell of public exposure and examination should be the fate of War Criminals, subject at every step to question, harrangue, and interrogation. The sins of the fathers might be less visited on the sons.

Once the initial, unseemly display by the large American universities seeking to attract the most criminal of the War Criminals to their campuses was over, much new learning could be gained, as these men would provide material for such departments as anthropology, sociology, history, medicine, and psychology. This assumes that individuals, not societies, are responsible for the massive crimes of this century. Without such an abstraction, we could safely exterminate societies which we suspected were 'wrong' ones. A society cures itself when it rejects the men who symbolize the worst and extreme elements of that society. Californians, for example, could impeach Reagan, and prove that they are not the mad dogs of the twentieth century.

The need for 'Resident War Criminals' is the need to compare officially acknowledged exemplars of evil with events and persons in the contemporary world. We might then avoid the scenario envisaged for the last two men, one civilian, one military, on earth. The soldier is forced to shoot the civilian to make the world safe for democracy.

it still bothers me

It was around 11:30 at night. Krando came galloping across the front campus like the devil was after him. He leaped over a snow bank, continued on the pavement and just as he turned to acknowledge me, he slipped up, his feet shooting out in front, and landed in a mess near me.

He groaned. I walked up to him and picked up my briefcase. "You all right?" I tried to sound worried.

He was silent for a while. So was I. Then a snort arose from the heap, then a snigger, then he rolled over and exploded in uncontrollable laughter. He couldn't stop and soon he was holding his stomach while convulsing in the snow. He was all covered with snow and he looked crazy.

"That was beautiful," I said, "You were beautiful. I've seen lots of people fall but you did it great. I mean you looked almost professional..."

"Help me up," he said. I gave him my hand. "I'm going out of my head", he added and he looked at me strangely: his left eye was piercing right through me.

Now Krando is a facetious guy. He is one of the facetiouses around. You haven't seen sarcasm till you've met him. He's also very funny. So naturally I figured he was kidding and I took him up on his last remark.

"Most people tend to go out of their feet," I replied, "It takes great time and patience to learn the art of going out of your mind. However I once knew a guy who went out of his spleen..."

"Cut it out." He pushed my shoulder pretty hard.

"You're not facetious any more," I said weakly. "Hey, where were you going?"

Krando was brushing the snow off. "I told you I was going out of my mind. I'm in my room, see, and I start to lose my mind and so I figure that most people, when they lose their minds, do it in one room, you know? But I thought of something new. I thought it would be real sharp if I lost my mind while running across the campus. That way I'd see lots of different things while it was happening. See."

"Are you hurt?" I asked.

"My ankle hurts a bit."

"Oh.... Well I've only taken anatomy of the upper limb, neck and head so I won't hazard a diagnosis. Does your upper limb neck or head hurt?" I chortled.

"No," he spoke past me. He didn't find me funny.

For a minute, I was at a loss for words. "Oh.... Well, how's it going," I asked more reservedly. Krando looked straight at me. He became very angry and started to shake me, his eyes enflamed. "Boy, that's a stupid question. How's it going? Here I'm going out of my head and you ask me how's it going. You are the stupidest son of a...."

I disengaged myself gruffly from his grasp and stepped back a bit. He was acting wild and I began to assume my far-away tolerating attitude that I reserve for drunks, kooks and friends with big mouths who embarrass me. It's a sort of cold shoulder that tells people you wish they'd go away. I did not know Krando that well, even though we joked around a lot when we met.

Krando noticed my iciness and his expression quickly changed to fear. I've seen real fear in movies, but this was the first time I saw another human truly panic. His eyes locked on mine in a far away, helpless glance. He looked real ugly. His face turned gray. "Noooo" he groaned. "How could I expect you to understand?"

I tried to say something but he didn't hear. "No, no, no", he repeated, yelling and echoing across the empty campus. Somebody at Sir Dan opened a window and stuck his head out.

Krando started to run, just as fast as before but with his right foot limping a bit: down the sidewalk, across St. George and into the night. I picked up my briefcase, and slowly walked the other way towards Avenue Road.

Shine off student job apple: Ghent

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

The scarcity of jobs for university graduates makes student demonstrations against companies like Dow Chemical appear ludicrous, says David Ghent of The Financial Post.

"From the corporation side of the school fence, it has become a buyer's market," he said on the CKEY radio program Spotlight. "For the students, the shine is off the job apple."

An article in a recent issue of The Financial Post gives more details about this problem.

The article says the number of graduating students is up 18 per cent while available jobs are down 15 to 20 per cent.

One reason the article gives for the decrease is that "companies are using technicians in many jobs formerly offered to university graduates."

Although most graduates will get jobs, it said, the choice will be narrower and the competition tougher than it has been in previous years.

Fewer companies are recruiting now on all university campuses. At University of Toronto the recruiters are down to 320 from 371 last year, he said. Engineers will suffer the most and business administration graduates the least, The Post said.

And this tightening up in hiring will affect summer employment as well.

"I'm all for protests," Mr. Ghent said in an interview yesterday. "I think that's the best thing about youth in this country, today."

"They're all fired up about napalm or what-have-you . . . and in later life they will direct this fire into more conventional channels when they get into industry."

However, he said he believed the protests against Dow are "bloody ridiculous."

If a student doesn't want to work for a company, "let him stay away" without hindering others, he said.

Protesters have yet to demonstrate against the textile manufacturers who sell cloth to the U.S. for uniforms or oil companies that sell petroleum for trucks that carry items in Canada-U.S. trade," he asserted.

"I deplore the act of war," he emphasized. "I'm in sympathy with the idea but not with the method of the demonstrations."

Frats will engage in blood battle

A competition between male and female fraternities will be a feature of the campus Spring blood drive.

Fraternity members can have their donation credited to both their college or faculty, and their fraternity, by registering both when they give at campus clinics.

There will also be a special Frat Night at the 67 College St. clinic March 11.

It is hoped there will be a separate trophy for the fraternities.

The first on-campus clinic will be held at the dentistry faculty today from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday's clinic is in the Junior Common Room at University College.

Students are not restricted to giving at their own clinic. Donations at any clinic, including 67 College St., will be credited to the student's faculty or college.

Goals have been set at 25 per cent of each college or faculty's enrolment. The Blood Cup will be awarded to the group which exceeds its goal by the greatest amount.

This is a departure from the fall drive, when the goals were set by the individual factions and had no bearing on the competition.

The goals for the Spring drive are:

Persky loses UBC presidential bid

VANCOUVER (VNS) — Stan Persky, who won a battle last month in his fight to become student council president, at the University of British Columbia, lost the war Tuesday.

Persky won an election for the post Feb. 7, but a student court declared him ineligible because he was not at UBC for the required two-year period.

Tuesday, a referendum on whether to change the constitution to make Persky eligible received support from 64.9 per cent of the students — 1.8 per cent less than needed.

A by-election is scheduled for March 13 to fill the post.

Manitoba youth has view of its own

WINNIPEG (Special) — The University of Manitoba will produce a weekly television program this year similar to the CBC's The Way it is.

Organizer Ron Coke says the show will be an expression of youth and its world.

The purpose of the program—A View of our Own—is not to reach conclusions but to inspire thought, Mr. Coke said.

"The idea will be to arouse the emotions of the viewer, to create a reaction, whether positive or negative, so he will remember the issue and think about it," he added.

Financing the program is a problem for the young producers. Because of union rules, the participants in the show must be paid a specified amount even if they are willing to work for less.

The summer was full of death and disease at the hospital, and at home, in the group of students that I lived and worked with, we alternated between manic and depressive moods, but it was the best summer I have spent so far.

At the time there was an obvious solution because I was a SUPA activist: quit our jobs, picket the hospital and try to get into the press and arouse public concern. The other students didn't share my philosophy and we disagreed over what we could do as a group and as individuals.

I've scarcely allowed myself to think about it in the past three years. I always remember that I failed to respond to the patients. I was too much like them and it frightened me.

But all that summer I wrote about it on scraps of paper and in letters — pointless theorizing about the meaning of mental health, advice on how to change the Ontario mental hospital system, romanticized observations — mostly a lot of crap that told more about my ignorance than about my subject.

"The patients and staff fill the daily round of their existence with routine that enables both to go on to their next day's existence... it never seemed as if the staff had despaired... it was more like they had never started trying... the doctors made their duly appointed rounds... they stayed a moment or two and then left..."

A..... was quite sane, but because the CNIB wouldn't take him because he wasn't blind enough and his son and daughter-in-law didn't want him and he was ill, so they sent him here. On his right was N....., who was hard of hearing and spoke only in his own symbolic language. On his left was V..... who spoke only Italian. The attendants resented him because they had to empty his catheter. So he was lonely. Mercifully, he died within a few months.

"Wed. May 19 — The best way to sum up the day on the ward is one word — shit. We spent half the day — staff, superintendent, nurses and even patients trying to figure out how to spell "Diarrhoea". I told all the kids that the whole ward came down with diarrhoea. But that's not really true. I was just looking for sympathy — actually only one or two had diarrhoea and the rest just went along in a sort of sympathy effort — a sort of shit-in."

I went back a year later to see someone at the hospital. When I entered the lobby the smell was waiting. It carried all the feelings with it. I turned around and left.

"There was no active therapy on the ward. The patients could stay there for months without seeing a psychiatrist or leaving the corridor — 83 cement blocks long and five blocks wide by the count of patients who had paced the floor for months.

"Why is this so, "I asked the head nurse.

"Well, most of them" she said in her charming Scottish burr, "have returned to the vegetable!"

The superintendent of this ward liked his job. It was clear cut. With no therapy on the ward the ambiguity disappeared. He was a jailer, pure and simple. But there were kind attendants too. A German who had flown bombing missions for the Nazis was one of the gentlest men I've ever met. The patients gave him no trouble.

When D..... was forty-five he entered the hospital thinking that he was the Crown Prince of Scotland. When he was sixty he didn't think that anymore. He thought that it wasn't worth going back out and starting over again at his age in an inhospitable world, so he continued to proclaim that he was the Crown Prince. He was only faking, but they could never get him to admit that he just didn't want to leave.

When I moved to a new ward the first surprise I got was that they gave me new blades everyday to shave the patients with.

"Dear Pete, We're thinking of writing a report on the situation at the hospital in hopes that it will help the attendants in their fight for decent wages (their top wage is 3,600 dollars, I think) and force the government to do something about the antiquated facilities (toilet facilities are below the legal standards for instance) and about the overcrowding, understaffing of the hospital. This will probably be the major accomplishment of the camp in respect to mental health, if it work out."

The patients started a newspaper and I asked them if I could work on it. They made me co-editor. "But I don't know anything about editing a newspaper," I told them.

"That's all right," Pat told me. I've already done everything. "The editor's job is to write editorials." I accepted the post.

"We hope that the paper will diminish a little the fears and blind spots that permeate an institution such as this."

"Dear Trudie, ...and some of the kids don't share your dreams and you feel it is important that they do. But sometimes they make you realize that everyone has a right to be apathetic sometimes, and that if something is your own idea you can't expect others to be as excited about it.

Specifically, we may be able to do a lot of good by writing a report for the hospital, the government, and the press telling of conditions in the hospital, but it is a tremendous undertaking and the others don't want to as much as I do and don't feel it will do as much good as I try to convince them it will."

Before our second issue our reporter was put on enough drugs to kill a horse. He wandered around in a daze all the time, thereby ending his journalistic career. I resented it when my co-editor was discharged from the hospital because it meant the end of the paper.

"As things stand now most attendants who come with a real concern for the problem of mental illness soon lose all interest in this and come to think of themselves

An adventure in innovation

CLASSIFIED

By JOHN SWAIGEN

Item: "The attendants and ward aides, if they ever had any conception of themselves or their jobs as an aid to the patients' recovery, soon gave up any such ideas. Their job was to wash, feed, shave and guard the patients. The hospital made no use of them in its therapeutic program. If they could help the patients by lending a sympathetic ear they did. At least those of them that weren't hardened by the dirtiness of their low-paying, low-status jobs did".

Notes on an Ontario mental hospital in 1965.

Item: "Adequate training and career opportunities should be provided for this group (aides) in the nursing services. The general objective should be to improve the calibre of people caring for patients by providing better training, greater incentives and a clear career line.... all should be considered capable attaining higher degrees of qualification and responsibility". Canadian Mental Health Association, 1963.

Item: Ward H: An Adventure in Innovation in which Topeka State Hospital in 1960 began a four-year research project designed to help the chronic schizophrenics, the "hopeless" cases who had been locked away for an average of ten years and who had shown no improvement in several years.

Armed with the theory that the patient needs a lasting and intimate relationship with a normal person which the psychiatrist is unable to provide for administrative reasons, the project directors turned the therapy over entirely to the ward aides, the mental labourers who were in constant contact with the patients.

There was no miracle cure as soon as the "spontaneous, action-oriented" aides took over.

In fact, for the first five months the aides were completely lost in their new role. They felt inadequate to give therapy. They either made impractical and arbitrary decisions and resented advice from the professional staff — the nurses, social workers, psychologists and psychiatrists whose new function was to support them — or, more often they continued to do their old job and waited for orders. In short, they continued in the secure "nigger" role long after they had been freed.

But by the tenth month the aides had learned to make decisions and take initiative. The patients had begun to improve.

Now it was the professional staff's turn to rebel. They too were robbed of their old role as therapist, and they were caught between supporting the project and appeasing their supervisors in other areas of the hospital who were not always sympathetic to demands made by the new set up. The professional staff became quite anxious, participated in a series of crises, and one nurse quit because of the conflicting demands made on her.

Eventually the professional staff also became accustomed to the new social system which was evolving, but there never was a complete accommodation between the project and the rest of the hospital: "Whereas in the general hospital culture the lines of decision-making, role definitions, and authority relationships operating among personnel were clear, on H this was not always the case; and even when clear, the boundaries of authority were different from the rest of the hospital. Generally on H there were few hard and fast rules about decision making; rather, the likelihood was that any decision needed to be negotiated".

Ward H contains two stories. The first is the building of a therapeutic relationship with a schizophrenic patient, an undertaking which takes much more dedication, time, involvement and frustration than most institutions care to encourage or even allow their staff to spend. The aides built such relationships. Every patient showed some improvement, many of the "hopeless" were discharged, only two were readmitted; an excellent record.

The second story is the building of a social system conducive to growth rather than stability in which such therapeutic relationships could survive. In this the project also succeeded. In four years the aides had grown into self-confident, responsible women able to handle relationships with the patients, take initiative and handle criticism.

The professional staff had learned to redefine authority as support for the therapists rather than power over them. And the project had formed a workable relationship with the rest of the hospital, whose administration was still geared to custodial care and never quite accepted the authority of the aides.

But in trying to change the status quo, success inevitably runs a poor second to tradition. Despite the fact that it cost only slightly more to run Ward H than the rest of the hospital.... "The project terminated in September 1964. It was not possible for the hospital to absorb it as an isolated system; however, those aspects of the Ward H project that were compatible with the ongoing system were absorbed".

it would be impossible to find sufficient staff for a large scale programme of Warrendales but not to find enough kids to fill them though".

B. had taken LSD and turned psychotic. He was the first one I saw and that scared me away from it for quite a while. They used to have staff meetings at which they discussed the patients in this big theatre. Then they called the patient in and questioned him. I was assigned to watch over B. until they had discussed him and were ready to call him in. After they questioned him I started to take him back to the ward and after a few yards he stopped and begged me to let him go back to the meeting. I knew that any of the regular attendants would have refused so I immediately said "yes". They were quite surprised when he reappeared in front of them. "I have to ask you a question", he said. "Will I ever recover?" The psychiatrist was smooth and urbane and gave him some public relations instead of an answer. If they had been alone I think he would have given him an honest answer, but in front of all those people he was afraid to feel anything.

"It's a funny summer. Every night there is a different feel to the air. And you say to yourself, I've got to take trish for a walk to dig this air. But one day's air is pretty much the same as the day before's air once you're walking in it.

And then you pass a park bench under a tree as you're on the streetcar and it's perfect and you can just see yourself sitting under it and being fulfilled. Then you say, let's go for a walk to sit on this park bench, and when you get there it's the same as any other bench in the park.

It's a funny summer".

RECORDINGS

Hair is greasy kid's stuff

By PETER GODDARD

"I've got my hair, my arms, my hands, my eyes..."

"I've got my life, I've got..."
"You've got alot of nerve, baby." A woman shouts from somewhere backstage.

True. The Off-Broadway "American tribal love-rock musical" Hair, has a lot of nerve. And if RCA's recording of Galt MacDermot's music for the production grows naturally out of the play's text and characters, as I suspect it has, the production is full of jangling exuberance.

Perhaps the outstanding thing about this production is that there is nothing outstanding about it, no moralizing, no message, no sore-thumbs. The music is, after several hearings, a portfolio of rock'n'roll cliches; the singing, often self-conscious and embarrassing out-of-tune.

Yet a feeling of concord flows out of the record. In structure, it is similar to earlier Broadway musicals. Yet here the folks optimism of Rodgers and Hammerstein or the big city cynicism of Rodgers and Hart have been replaced by the good-natured vibrations produced by Hair's rock rhythms.

What little plot there is in Hair might be overburdened with discussion about its comment on our society. As an artistic production it offers no such comment. And as a sociological study it has little use: in fact it is somewhat facile.

What it does is use certain contemporary conditions artistically — a much different process. It doesn't take society seriously. More pertinently, perhaps, at its best moments it doesn't take itself seriously.

The story is simple in outline: hero Berger is kicked out of school (the teenage tragedy); Sheila, who makes protest posters, loves Berger (the teenage compensation for tragedy). Jeannie, a rather hapless hippy, loves Claude. But Claude loves Sheila.

Lest Claude get away with such a subversive idea as loving another man's woman and defying that good old American work-warped tradition, the US Government drafts Claude. But love, life and the pursuit of happiness conquers all, as Claude and Sheila finally have a chance to make love.

Throughout, Hair sounds more like a ritual than a musical, more like a hedonistic happening than a Broadway offering. Action and dramatic development have been subordinated to mood. And while the record registers an occasional bit of dialogue, it is the ribald rock lyrics that give the sense impressions of New York's East Village where the play is set.

The two songs around which the rest of the music revolves are Dead End (sung by Jill O'Hara and the company) and the title song, Hair (by Walker Daniels, Jerome Ragni and the company).

While the first laments society's do's and don'ts, the second becomes as much of a hippy anthem as The Beatles' All You Need Is Love. It is hair, it goes, "long, beautiful, shining, gleaming, streaming, flaxen, waxy, long, straight, curly, fuzzy, snaggy, ratten, matty, oily, greasy, fleecy, down-to-there hair" that symbolizes the new generation's protest against the Establishment.

So far so good. But now and then the album runs into a problem: how do you make your audiences sense your 'involvement' without having them merely stare at you? When Hair's music deals in light or heavy-handed satire, high spirits or unpretentious high-jinx, the result is a carcening sense of the absurd.

But when the mood turns toward seriousness, Hair's ideas become more mythical than mystical. Beauty, personal harmony and sensuous delight are the subjects of the songs, Aquarius and Hare Krishna (both sung by the company) and Walker Daniel's Exanaplanetooch. But with lyrics as "Mystic crystal revelation/ And the mind's true liberation" not only is execution of the tunes soft and fuzzy, but so are the ideas behind them.

The play of Hair was conceived by Jerome Ragni (who also appears in the cast) in a workshop of the Open Theater, an experimental very far Off-Broadway group which also gave a start to two similar endeavours, America Hurrah and Viet Rock. It was subsequently written by Ragni and James Rado and was chosen by Joseph Papp, founder of the New York Shakespeare Festival, to open New York's Public Theater at the edge of the East Village.

Yet, for all of its overtones of the rock generation, Hair is not a radical departure from the Broadway musical tradition. For as Gershwin, in Porgy and Bess almost raised the convention of the musical to operatic stature, Hair almost raises the idiom of rock'n'roll to musical stature.

But there is a recognizable difference. Traditional Broadway musical creates an illusion that we only live on the surface of our emotions, sincere, and true, and touching though they may be.

Another film gem from Czechoslovakia

By LARRY HAIVEN

Only in a Czech movie can an actor pick his nose for five minutes and make it a work of art. Every tiny bit of characterization, every facial expression is endowed with almost unbelievable precision.

Closely Watched Trains, now at the Towne Cinema, is delightful, charming, disarming, warming — there's not much more you can say. And it is so for this very reason.

No character, be he hero or villain, is safe from the ribald eye of the camera. From the fat, clumsy stationmaster who raves against debauchery while lusting after his cousin to the shocked mama who reveals her daughters' stamped backside to everybody — the performances are hilarious and touching.

The film is about the sexual hangups of a 17-year old apprentice train dispatcher — that's all. Vaclav Neckar plays to perfection the shy, awkward Milos who, finding he cannot make it with his girlfriend, decides that he is impotent and then proceeds to cut his wrists. He survives — eventually to find that all is not as bad as he thought it was.

Josef Somr, his mentor, and a man of the world and women, gleefully teases him about his girlfriend, meanwhile enjoying the earthy pleasures himself with Milos peeking into the keyhole. He eventually reveals his concern for Milo's dilemma and arranges for a solution.

But the best role by far is the local head of the state railway. Vlastimil Brodsky plays the part completely with his eyes. A stooge for the Nazis, he explains to the men at the railways station that they should be proud Germany is forging a new Europe. Then one of the men asks, "Why?" The expression that comes upon his face is priceless.

A few moments particularly stand out — Milos confronts the stationmaster's middle aged wife for advice while she is stuffing the neck of a duck (one man in the audience couldn't control his mirth); or when the doctor, 'played by the director, Jiri Menzel, himself awkward and stuttering, tells Milos that his problem is premature ejaculation and that he should think of a soccer match when he is with a woman.

What the heck, you've got to see it; it's a masterpiece, although you've probably heard that before. You'll have to see it for yourself.

Ulysses Is A Good Film But...

By MEL BRADSHAW

A five-dollar movie ticket is like an Oxford M.A.: a status symbol depending on economics rather than merit.

It is a lamentable truism that expensive seats rarely accompany qualitatively superior entertainment. The obvious complaint is that they are hard on moviegoers financially, especially on students who almost never get discounts on hard-sell tickets. Less obvious is the effect on the picture itself of the road-show syndrome: it seeks to impose greatness, which can be as embarrassing for good films as it is ludicrous for bad.

Ulysses is a good film. But it cannot, in my opinion, bear the weight of such an imposition, the weight of all the build-up and bally-hoo which surrounds it.

In view of its reputation it is perhaps a hard film to judge objectively. The situation is complicated by the fact that it has served as a cause celebre in the struggle against censorship. Its wholesome use of hitherto forbidden language does make it a fine test case, but if you find yourself anxiously (or eagerly) awaiting Molly Bloom's famous closing soliloquy, you are missing the best part of Ulysses.

The best part is Leopold Bloom, Molly's husband, whose personal odyssey, both interior and exterior, forms the film's core. Milo O'Shea's performance is characterized by sensitivity without sentimentality. Together with a score of Dubliners and Dublin itself, he creates a wonderfully unhackneyed Irish atmosphere, a native naturalness doubly refreshing by contrast to the popular St. Patrick's caricature.

Barbara Jefford as Molly is also first rate. Charming, ambiguously, she embodies beauty and sluttishness, cynicism and warmth.

Where the film falls down is in the treatment of Stephen Dedalus, Joyce's "artist as a young man" (played by Maurice Roovers). There is a striking disproportion between the care with which he is introduced in the opening sequences and the scanty treatment he receives in the balance of the movie. He is in effect left as that familiar stereotype, the alienated youth. This problem may well be due to the necessity of compressing James Joyce's huge novel into Joseph Strick's 24 hour film.

The amazing thing about the film itself is that it is not padded out with the trappings of spectaculars, no lavish sets or costumes. The restraint is commendable. Yet it leaves all the less justification for such high-priced admission. Ulysses has much to recommend it but if you feel you can't afford it or won't be able to see it before the expiry of its four-week engagement, don't feel you will be missing a masterpiece.

Some people get used to mental hospitals... some don't

There is something that intrigues us all about mental hospitals. And insanity. It's all part of our gothic, romantic, slightly fearful glorification of the wonders and terrors of our own mind, a glorification which the manufactured madness of hallucogen has neatly and commercially preyed upon.

Squirming slightly with fear and fascination, we've been lapping it up. Society as Madness and Myth. Psycho. One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, The Red Desert, Lilith, David and Lisa, The Trip, I Never Promised You a Rose Garden, Marat Sade, Warrendale (the film and the phenomenon), we've all been caught up at one point with sometimes morbid curiosity about what the thin line is between madness and sanity, and how near we are to that line.

Of course, this is certainly not a curiosity that dates since Leary left Harvard, or since Freud articulated the existence of the subconscious. Lear, Ophelia, Hamlet, Rimbaud, Neitsche, Coleridge, all trod the thin line.

Usually, any university student who goes to work in a mental hospital carries this tradition of interest and squeamishness somewhere with him. He also goes with a number of much less clearly articulated assumptions. Briefly, that the mental institution is designed to help the inmates, that the existence of institutions that don't help, or even harm inmates is due to the insensitivity of the ignorant people who work there, and, the most firmly held assumption of all, that we won't be like them, the nasty insensitive ones, when we work there.

I entered Montreal's l'hopital St. Jean-de-Dieu on my first day with some sense of unease. My Mother had been frankly frightened at the idea of my working in the place; my Father was filled with admiration, and kept saying that he wouldn't have had the guts to do it. This made me even more uneasy.

The hospital was enormous. The biggest in Canada. Perhaps one of the biggest in the world. (In mental hospitals, unlike automobile factories, it's generally true that the bigger they are, the worse they are.)

Looking east from Montreal's Mount Royal on the east side, you can make it out in the distance. First you see the dense, winding-staircase-lined streets of Montreal, then the majestic green of Parc Lafontaine, and more dense urban streets petering out to pale brick suburban two-storey apartments and car-clogged shopping plazas. In the distance you can see a tall smoke stack, surrounded by high grey stone walls with barred windows. Beyond the hospital, you can see the oil-fires of the refineries. It's almost a Dantesque vision.

St. Jean-de-Dieu was built in the 19th century by les Soeurs de la Providence, who still run the hospital. Until a few years ago, it had as many as 8,000 patients. (There are now about 4,500. Then in 1961, a crusading Montreal publisher named Jacques Hebert published a book by a recent inmate, Jean-Charles Page, entitled Les Fous Au Secours. (The Madmen Cry for Help.) An enquiry proved Page's accusations to be true: brutality, bad food, lack of proper treatment. St. Jean-de-Dieu was a snake-pit.

When I walked into the hospital five years later, in May 1966, as one of a group of university students working at the hospital, it had changed a great deal. The meals were good (and hot), the wards were kept spotlessly clean, patients' sheets were changed regularly and efficiently. It was all very efficient.

But, walking down the long long corridors as we were led to our wards, I was struck by the faces. Dead, grey faces with lifeless eyes. They walked or shuffled along the corridor, with those frightening, vacant eyes.

When we got onto the elevator, the elevator man had the same grey, empty look. Only he was wearing a name-tag. He was on the staff.

St. Roch was a geriatrics ward. I was an orderly. I arrived at 8:30, and for about the next hour or so, cleaned all the tile-work in the bathrooms. Toilet bowls, basins, floors, showers. Sometimes I helped with the baths, which were being given simultaneously.

About half the patients in St. Roch were bathed by the orderlies. They would shuffle to the bathroom, and, as they waited for their turn, would get undressed as an orderly would take each piece of clothing as it was being taken off. Then, they would sit, naked, on the bench outside the bathroom, and wait. One by one, they would be led quickly by the arm into the bathroom, into the bath. In about three minutes, the patient would be washed; firmly and efficiently. The patient's chest, legs, shoulders, face and hair were firmly scrubbed, and his rectum and genitals cleaned. Then he would be rinsed of and taken out of the tub. He was briskly dried with a sheet, and then dressed in clean clothes: either a regular pair of trousers, or a kind of shapeless white hospital-issue pant with elastic at the top. Then, he shuffled back to the solarium, where he would settle back into a rocking chair, where, except for meals, he would stay until he went to bed.

After cleaning the tile-work and the patients, I would usually have about an hour until lunch was given out, at 10:15.

My first day, I was given the job of feeding M. Laflamme. Laflamme was kept in a rocking chair in the annex to the bathroom. He was blind — in a fit of rage, I had been told, he had torn out his eyeballs — and except for the occasional strange noises, dumb. But he was irritating to feed. He would rock back and forth on his rocker as you tried to guide the spoon into his mouth. But, in a strange reclusive kind of way, I got rather fond of M. Laflamme. There was something final and defiant about the man.

Occasionally, in the calm of the solarium, usually only broken by mutterings of some of the patients and the squeak of rockers, there would be a hoarse, wordless scream from the annex to the bathroom — and Mr. Laflamme would bang his head with his fist.

The rest of the day was filled with more dead empty time than specific chores. I started out doing my best to talk to patients; to "help" them. But, more and more, like sitting beside a silent or tedious stranger in an airport waiting-room, I would give up and sit in silence, rocking beside them, waiting until there was something specific to do, or waiting until my shift ended. The others just waited.

But, with this kind of acquiescence, I grew more and more ashamed of myself, and grew more and more to feel like a guard at Auschwitz, where even kindness to the inmates was a kind of hoax and deception.

This deception is more honestly called betrayal. As Erving Goffman points out in his book Asylums, entry into a mental hospital involves a profound "experience of abandonment, disloyalty and embitterment . . . . (the patient) . . . starts out with relationships and rights at the beginning of his hospital stay, and ends up with hardly any of either."

Goffman looks at mental hospitals as institutions — with none of the pre-conceived notions of sanity or insanity to judge or justify the proceedings. He decided that the operating standards of mental hospitals were those of efficiency, and standardization; the same standards and values found in other "total institutions" with less therapeutic intentions: army camps, prisons, boarding schools and monasteries. Where an army camp defines its inmates as soldiers, a mental hospital defines its inmates as insane. The difference between an inmate and an orderly is that the inmate is mad and the orderly is sane. Corollaries: what is good for the functioning of the ward is the practice that the inmate will be forced to follow, and it will be for his own good.

Reading Goffman during this summer, I became more and more conscious of the extent to which I had adopted the standards of the other orderlies. It was, after all, just a job — to be featherbedded like any other. Most people, it must be recognized, are placed in mental hospitals because somebody found them unbearable to have around, and was able to define this "unbearable", "deviant" behaviour as "insanity".

Mainly because I felt a kind of self-betrayal had taken place, I decided to go back to the hospital last summer.

Coming back, familiar to the place, one doesn't feel the same squeamishness at the bars, the fences, and the wards. I was placed in a different ward (though also a geriatrics ward) which I felt was a friendlier, more "progressive" ward. I gradually became friends with the orderlies, and was able to fill up much of the dead time chatting with them. Somehow, it felt different the second year.

Of course, there were still things which shocked me. I would become quietly quite annoyed when orderlies would strap and lock patients to their chairs when they became irritating; when the matron of the ward would assure us that the patients with the most reasonable demeanor and requests were, in fact, the most psychotic in the ward. (To her it was obvious; they refused to accept the environment in which they found themselves.) Yet, patients were often being unreasonable. Asking to go in to the solarium when it was the time to be out on the balcony, wanting to stay by their beds instead of going out on the balcony, constantly pacing up and down . . . One grew to accept a lot.

There was one patient who would pace continually up and down the balcony, shaking his head and mumbling. (During the summer, the patients spent most of their time out on the balcony.) One day, feeling quite virtuous, I decided to take him out for a walk on the lawn outside the balcony. We walked about for about twenty minutes, as he picked up twigs, and examined them closely, and then threw them.

Then, it grew near to supper time, and we had to go in. But he didn't want to. I took him by the arm. He snatched it away. I took it again, more roughly. He hit at me. Angry, I grabbed him around the shoulders in a kind of nelson position and wrestled him up the steps into the ward, and, forcing him into his chair, strapped him in and locked the straps. He grabbed the table-knife on his tray, and swung it at me. I tore it from him, slammed it back onto the tray as another orderly came to feed him.

I was feeling quite righteous about this, and it wasn't until later that I realized that I had been almost pleased that he had swung at me at the foot of the steps so that I could justifiably be rough with him.

A few minutes later, I was feeding another patient, and said, half in jest to the orderly at the bed nearby "You know when I first came into the ward, I was shocked that you locked patients like that one into their chairs. Now I'm surprised you ever unlock them!"

The orderly roared with laughter, and then said soberly: "We're all like that when we first came into the ward. It's different after five years."

It hadn't taken me that long.

Here Lies Sarah Binks: A Mini-Musical

BY ALAN GORDON

The Central Library Theatre is now a meetin' hall. That's right. The same theatre that plunged us into the despair and frustration of Fortune and Men's Eyes has been transformed into the forum of Quagmire, Sask. And we are all met, on this Dominion Day, 1931, to commemorate the passing out and consequent passing away of some Sarah Binks, the poetess. She is not entirely renowned... perhaps nowned would be a more appropriate term, but she apparently embodied all of the qualities of a horny Emily Dickinson, an illiterate Robert Frost and a less sophisticated Mortimer Snerd.

We are never fortunate enough to actually meet the divine Sarah as she is remembered by the townsfolk and literary critics who turn out to pay her homage and for her tombstone, but the bucolic glimpses of her Saskatchewan dirt farm poetry that we are afforded during the evening leave no doubt that she has created and maintained her firm foothold on her own genre of the "Fertilized Pastoral".

Though we don't ever meet the Sweet Songstress of Saskatchewan's, we do meet several of her friends, neighbours and a couple of parasitic critics of her poetry who are dependent on Sarah's Work, which is measured in the cubic foot, for their own preservation. A little later in the meeting, the hustling Honorable MP from the riding returns from Ottawa to hand-shake, promise make, and eulogy-make about the dead local girl for which we are all met to, uh, put away and pull the strings...

Here Lies Sarah Binks is a mini-musical by Don Harron that goes for the mini laugh. There are many of them and the range of gentle satire is enormous. Points are delicately made, about seemingly trivial things, but Sarah Binks never pulls its nudges.

Chief Nudger is an old lady named Jane Mallet. She is the funniest lady I have ever seen, Margaret Rutherford, Elsa Lanchester and the Late Gacie Allen fade into shadows when Miss Mallet's vague Charilady Lolita Of The Sea takes over the Central Library Stage. What timing! what delivery! what a funny lady.

We laughed all evening. How silly and pompous these people are... the self-possessed professor of English and swimming at St. Midgets college, the glad-handing, backslapping M. P. whose sole interest is getting the hell out of his hick riding and into Ontario's big-time... Funny.

Later, when we started to think about it, these people, funny though they may be, still exist... and run our city and country... and I didn't know whether to laugh or cry.

Alchemist Without Magic

By DAVID PAPE

Grapevine has it that the Canada Council Grant for Luscombe stipulates that he produce five shows a year — and that seems to demand greater range and acting ability than his company evidenced last Friday. Certainly the demand to produce will take Luscombe far from the improvisational choreography he specializes in. The question is whether his company can be trained to deal with dialogue as respectfully as with movement.

Perhaps the failure may be attributed to miscasting, for Luscombe has not used his cast to fullest advantage. Perhaps it may be attributed to lack of training, for not only were Larry Martin and Jack Boschulte incredibly naive and unskillful in their elocution, but Subtle (Edward Kelly) and Face (Francois Klanfer), the leads, rushed through their lines. They caught little humour of the language; they failed to make clear even the most basic elements of the plot, and left the audience confused as to what was happening. They mistook noise for interpretation and seemed not even to comprehend what their lines were about. How then could they inform then audience?

Perhaps Subtle, whose lines could dominate the play, was so used to changing his performance each night, that he deliberately forgot his lines in order to finish them in a garbled, nonsensical but wholly original way.

It seemed, really, that Luscombe merely coached his actors as far as the pacing of the play. There was next to no effective characterization. Diane Grant, Ray Whelan and Geoffrey Read were mildly entertaining. For the rest, I've seen much better acting on campus. The cast didn't understand their people; their roles were only superficially differentiated, and there was no meaningful interaction. Worst, they showed no respect for Jonson's language.

The Alchemist reads as a wonderfully funny play, but its humour requires infinite vocal subtlety. The parts are hugely overwritten and take supreme comic sophistication to fill them. Luscombe's cast however, failed to prepare for and highlight lines that the audience must understand, to play with Jonsons satire, to let the language speak for itself, and to win the audience's sympathy.

Rather, they ran as briskly through their verbiage (save Read) as they hustled about the cramped set. Furthermore, not even their pacing yielded sight gags. Every change of costume by Subtle and Face should be a miracle to behold, growing funnier each time. But we are allowed to see them changing, and the entire effect is dissipated.

In fact, we hardly care about them. Why? Because Luscombe hadn't any real direction in his direction. There was no point in the production. His methods didn't work with the text. His cast hadn't the depth for their material. And no one seemed to have the competence to relax into a genial sense of humour.

"I Guess We Should Give Them A Clap": An Italian Straw Hat

BY ARNOLD RUBENSTEIN

An Italian Straw Hat is one of those century-old plays that is revived from time to time by drama departments at summer camps, because it has a large cast, and by amateur drama groups, because of the recognizable merits of the play itself.

Regrettably, those who choose to present it are not always those who are so equipped to ensure its success.

Written by Eugene Labiche in collaboration with Marc Michel, the play is filled with mistaken identities, witty asides, ludicrous situations, buffoonery and hot pursuits. It is French farce at its best.

As a result An Italian Straw Hat requires a production of style and aplomb.

Unfortunately, the New College Theatre Guild production, currently at the Colonnade Theatre, has little, if any, of this.

And it is unfortunate, because with a production staff almost as large as the cast itself, it is obvious that a great deal of work has gone into this, the production aspect of the play.

That the players, under the direction of Bill Peters, have either worked half as hard or are inexperienced, is even more obvious.

Handicapped, to begin with, by the small stage, Mr. Peters makes the best use of it he can.

But at times, when there are well over a dozen characters on stage, entering as fast as they are exiting, the stage proved to be simply unworkable and more than Mr. Peters could handle.

This made for clumsy act changes which left the audience wondering what was happening as the actors shuffled off the stage in embarrassed silence.

As the lady in front of me put it: "I guess we should give them a clap."

From a technical point of view, taking into account opening night jitters and the fact that an over-enthusiastic actor broke a chair, which threw everyone off for a while, the production rarely looked better than a bad dress rehearsal.

From the point of view of performances it was much less.

The characters must be played with rigid control, finesse, a certain body deportment and vocal quality which were clearly out of reach of most of the actors.

Consequently, lines varied in delivery from being garbled and often inaudible to being yelled and therefore not understood.

One often had to judge that an aside was indeed an aside from its context as little vocal differentiation was supplied. Once, an aside was even delivered directly to the person concerned.

Nevertheless, there were one or two performances that moved admirably in the right direction.

The most fully realized of these was Morty Paul as the hilariously affected Achille de Rosalba. In his role as Beaupertuis Mr. Paul was less successful, but he still brought a badly needed energy to the show.

Varent, playing Fadinard in search of the Italian straw hat, started off very well but by restricting himself to the same key, he lost most of his charm by the end of the evening.

Others worthy of note were Alf Chaiten as Bobin, Stan Cornfield as Tardiveau, who at times sounded extraordinarily like Jose Jimenez, and Cheryl Catzman as the Baroness de Champigny.

The play continues tonight and tomorrow night at the Colonnade Theatre and as the lady in front of me remarked at one point: "It's so stupid, it's funny!"

Japan's Answer To W.C. Fields

By JOE MEDJUCK

This week Toronto theatre-goers will have a chance to see the classical Japanese theatre's answer to both W. C. Fields and The Roadrunner, when the U of T Drama Centre presents a performance by the Nomura Kyogen Troupe.

Kyogen plays are comic interludes traditionally presented between Noh plays and are intended as comic relief to the Noh program. Though presented on the same stage, Kyogen contrasts sharply with the Noh: the Noh is refined, solemn and dignified, presenting its story through song and dance; Kyogen is unrestrained, exuberant and earthy, and consists chiefly of action and dialogue—particularly the former, so that the story can be understood without any knowledge of the language. (However, the program notes for the plays will provide brief summaries.)

Until the 17th Century the Kyogen were considered unworthy of being transcribed because of their vulgar (by Noh standards) and often anti-establishment outlook. Before this the plays, which probably go back to the 11th Century, were transmitted verbally from generation to generation with the actors improvising and developing their own plays. Once transcribed, the Kyogen lost the qualities of improvisation that had been essential to it, and instead the Kyogen actors turned to refining the existing plays. The language of the Kyogen is thus still that of the 17th Century and the plays contain both the exuberance of their improvised beginnings and the refinement of centuries of presentation. (Much in the way that Fields and Chaplin improvised gags but refined them over the years before presenting them in films.)

Though naturalistic by Noh standards, the Kyogen does retain much of the grace and some of the stylization of the Noh. The action often falls into patterns that may be repeated from play to play (eg. many of the plays end with one character chasing another character off the stage — a bit like Roadrunner cartoons). Though the plays are often anti-establishment they are never too topical. About one-third of the extant Kyogen plays are about the characters of Dainyo, a feudal lord, and Taro, his servant. Taro is a rascal who usually manages to outsmart his master but the two characters always remain Everyman-like archetypes rather than taking on any individualistic characteristics. (Any possibility that Daimyo might be identified with a particular lord would have been dangerous for the Kyogen actors).

For centuries the Kyogen were considered unworthy of study by Noh scholars and were treated with the same kind of silent disdain that a film critic might give to a Donald Duck cartoon on the same program with 8½. This in spite of the fact that the Kyogen takes as much skill and training as the Noh. Like Noh actors, Kyogen actors belong to family troupes and the skills are passed down from generation with the actor often making his stage debut at the age of three. The Nomura company which will be performing here contains three generations of actors: the oldest, Manzo, was born in 1891, the youngest, Saeko, was born in 1962.

Manzo Namura is head of the family and leader of the company. He was recently designated as a "living art treasure" by the Japanese government. With two of his sons he was artist in residence at the University of Washington's Centre for Asian Arts during 1963-64 and in 1965 led the troupe on a European tour.

The Nomura company will perform three Kyogen plays (two Daimyo-Taro plays and one demon play) in the MacMillan Theatre, Edward Johnson Building at 8:00 P.M. on Thursday, March 7. (Tickets from Hart House Theatre box office.) At 4:00 P.M. on March 7 there will be a demonstration of the art of Kyogen in Cartwright Hall, St. Hilda's College. Admission Free.

"...bad pay, lousy living, and getting burned."

After the Jimi Hendrix concert at the Colosseum on the Ex grounds last Saturday I was left with: 1) one cancerous head-ache; 2) a fifteen-year-old teenie-hustler who wanted to get home to Don Mills; and 3) a pad scribbled with notes.

But if Fellini can use his notes to make a movie, why can't I? You may not have learned much about the movie director in 8), but you learned a lot about Fellini.

OK, 7000 kids having a lot of trouble looking hip and bored with one set of make-up. Show starts half-hour late. CHUM DJ's ambling around, smoothing their collective ID's for photographers.

The Paupers are first on the show. Adam Mitchell, their singer looks more and more like John Lennon. So much is good about them; so much is balderdash. By trying to do everything at once they succeed in none.

NOTE: "It is natural for the mind to believe, and for the will to love; so, failing real objects, they must fix on false ones." But the teenagers prove Pascal wrong. And the Paupers are dismissed with a resounding lethargy.

The next group, The Soft Machine, presents a different problem. Their songs are long, intricate, full of impotent rage. Each one offers some form of frustration—something always seems incomplete.

Depending on your point of view, The Soft Machine are either a) using a pretended intellectuality as a tool to get across their music, or b) using music to get across their pretended intellects. If Graffiti were ever orchestrated, the result would sound like, the Soft Machine.

Another half-hour wait. 11:15 p.m. Hendrix is still in a cavernous dressing room; giggling, telling reporters "It's my thing, you know. ..." and taking pictures of bassist Noel Redding and drummer Mitch Mitchell, then they take one of him, then Redding, then Hendrix again ...

But Hendrix gets on-stage quickly. Pours out ten cool, slinky songs, only to get crushed by the crowd at the end of the last one—Red House. Cop # 2916 knees a kid seven times, and crowd gets quiet again.

But what happened?

Marlyn Beker, in her Globe review, helps point out Hendrix's impact, or rather, non-impact: "not even the Hendrix 'experience' could arouse an audience in that hall to empathy ... at $4 a ticket, the evening wasn't so much an experience as an ordeal."

In characteristic inverse fashion, Miss Beker emphasises Hendrix's appeal. His music, rather than being explosive, remains static. His songs remain short by contemporary pop standards; his methods primitive—simple chord formations, well-delineated melodies.

Hendrix's songs—from Hey Joe to Foxy Lady—are more introspectively remote than dramatized. For all their electronic gimmickry, it seems that the singer is practicing a private art in public. The listener almost has a sense of intrusion.

Ah. The critical kiss of death. For the truth remains: Hendrix fits no convenient pigeon-hole. He still operates on that still-open no-man's land between the surface and the deep. Between the soft machinery of the world and the subterranean rigors of the mind.

But how can you pin-point a man on the run? "Where do you stop?" Hendrix asks. "Sound and being good, that's important. Like we're trying to find out what we really dig. We got plans for a play-type scene with people moving on stage, but everything pertaining to the song and every song a story."

And every song a story. Musically, he came up the back route learning to play listening to Muddy Waters' records; playing in Negro clubs in Nashville; begging his way into Harlem bandstands; and touring for two years with neathandral-rockers as Isley Brothers, Joey Dee and the Starlighters, King Curtis and even playing the Fillmore once backing Ike and Tina Turner.

And Little Richard. "Like once with Little Richard, me and another guy got fancy shirts' cause we were tired of wearing the uniform."

"Little Richard called a meeting. 'I am Little Richard, I am Little Richard,' he said, 'the King, the King of Rock and Rhythm. I am the only one allowed to be pretty. Take off those shirts. 'Man it was all like that. Bad pay, lousy living, and getting burned.'"

Nineteen-sixty-six and Hendrix finally got to Greenwich Village. Here he played at the Cafe Wha as Jimmy James with his own hastily formed group, The Blue Flames.

"Dylan really turned me on—not the words or his guitar but as a way to get myself together. A cat like that can do it for you. Race, that was okay. In the village, people were more friendly than in Harlem where its all cold and mean. Your own people hurt you more."

"Anyway I always wanted a more open and integrated sound. Top-40 stuff is all out of gospel, so they try to get everybody up and clapping, shouting 'yeah, yeah.'"

"We don't want to get everybody up. They should just sit there and dig it, or we wouldn't be there."

Smug Reviewers, But Good Book

By GRAHAM FRASER

Pierre Berton's The Smug Minority has probably received more, and harsher criticism than any Canadian book in recent memory. Or, to be more specific, Pierre Berton has received more criticism than any Canadian author in recent memory.

On the basis of the publicity, this was understandable. Elsa Franklin, who is both the producer of Berton's Under Attack show, and also in charge of public relations for McClelland and Stewart, publicized Minority as if it were an electronic rockband. Critics, journalists all, have a tendency to jealously protect their public from the pretensions of presumptuous publicity, and journalists invading the world of hard covers.

It is a shame, because Pierre Berton has written a book that no Canadian has ever considered writing before, that anyone else has ever considered reading.

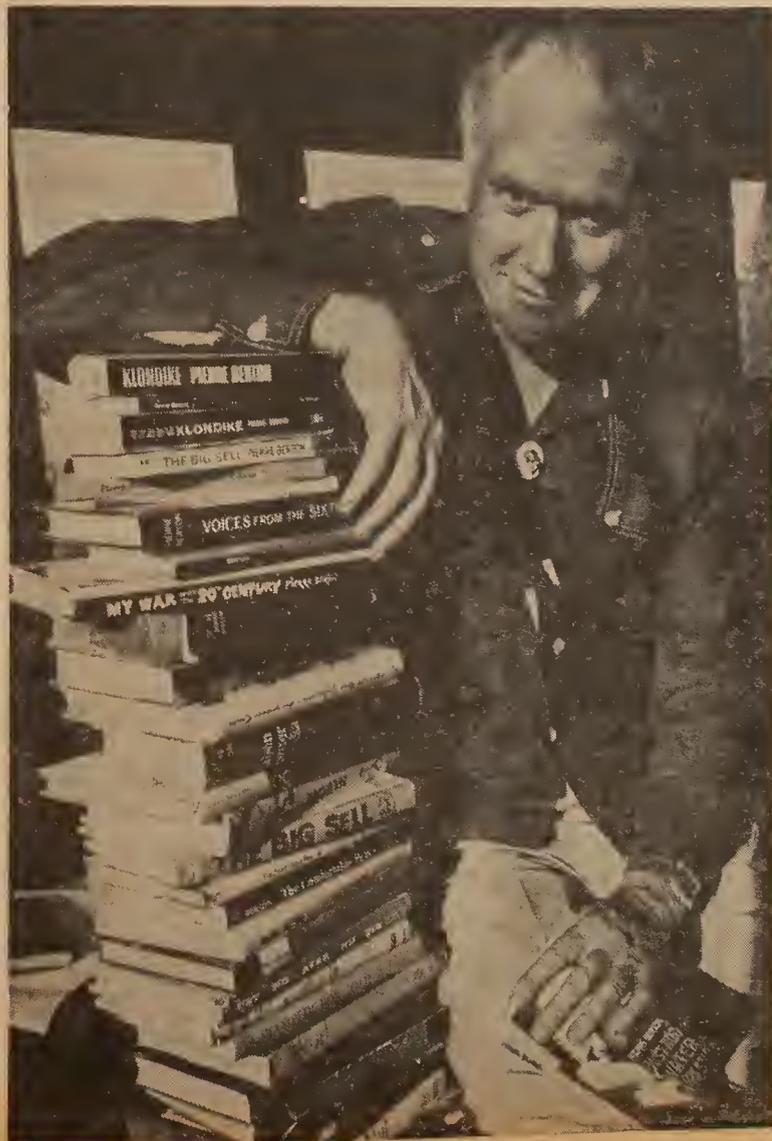

It is not, however, (and, aside from the publicity, doesn't pretend to be) a particularly original book. It's just that very few of us have ever bothered to actually read the thinkers whose ideas he has culled for the book.

Berton quotes or paraphrases men like Robert Theobald, John Morgan, Daniel Moynihan, Michael Harrington, and Sebastian de Grazia in a breezy synthesis of various theories on automation, education, and what Oscar Lewis calls "the culture of poverty."

But, more prominently running through the book is a theme of pure Bertonesque: a "conversation for the twenty-first century", where a small boy finds out from his father that life in the 1960's was for most people "composed of equal parts of boredom and drudgery. It was, in essence, a serf society run by a smug minority of well entrenched overseers." To which son replies "Gee, Pop, that sounds like the Middle Ages. Were those people really ike serfs?"

By this time, (page seven), all Berton-haters have their teeth on edge.

Nonetheless, the book is a well-articulated attack on the cliches and platitudes about Hard Work, How Welfare Pampers People, and How Education Frills Spoil Our Kids. I hope that all 100,000 copies sell and are read. The only pity is the skwawk and screech of the publicity. But then again, it is Pierre Berton who wrote the book.

BLOC-NOTES

The Zoo Story

The characters in Edward Albee's plays are real, believable people. A man with a wife, two girls, a cat and two parakeets; or an old lady awaiting death; or a professor's brazen, loudmouth wife. We see these people every day.

What Albee does is pull out the stops that make these people nondescript. He puts them in absurd, jolting circumstances and out of their mouths issue—absurdities, the truth. And that is why his plays cut so deeply.

The actors in The Zoo Story at Cartwright Hall have become so involved with the disarming spontaneity and absurdity of their lines that they have lost themselves in and emerged somewhat less than real. This is a serious error in an Albee play, one that destroys the tautness of action and the continuity that are so essential to keep the play alive.

The dialogue should be allowed to speak for itself. Instead, George Young, as Jerry, neglects to make himself believable as a lonely, hung-up young man, while lavishing great care on the lines he speaks. It seems as if it is the most natural thing for him to be crazy. This detracts from the impact of his actions and gives the role an ambiguity where it can least afford it.

Don Watson, as the man whose dull life Jerry shatters, is also guilty of just missing the mark where credibility is concerned. The part of Peter has few lines and therefore requires great concentration of action and an almost perfect sense of timing and reaction. Watson is slack with his responses, sometimes to the point of falsehood, like the time that he buries his head in his arm for what seems an eternity. His final exit, screaming "Oh, my God", is a sorry ending for the play.

There are some exciting moments, though. The very concern with dialogue that breaks the continuity of the rest of the play is perfect for a long soliloquy by Jerry about his attempt to communicate with a dog. It is terse and exciting.

The scene where Jerry is stabbed is particularly well executed because it consists of simple action and short, clear dialogue. But the potential shaking effect of a good play is lost with the failure of the actors to let the audience identify themselves with these simple normal people who have been given voices of madness.

More Dullness

Jack Cunningham's Aperitif, directed by Herb Whitaker, is currently playing at The Coach House. An extensive review is unnecessary because Aperitif is a thoroughly genuine flop from its opening guzzle to its dying gasp.

Family strife, complete with mysterious sexual surprises à la Virginia Woolf, dominates the play. Since the dialogue however, is bogged down by Britishisms and irrelevancies, the action moves ever so slowly. Alf (Albert Hand) and Bea (Elizabeth Ward) are the parents of three misguided, woebegone "young adults": Jamie (Robert Thompson), Jerry (Gary Shallenburg), and Janive (Beverley Paul). Jamie is a gigolo (how awful!), Jerry is useless, and Janive, poorly dressed and looking thirty five, is pregnant. They all return home for a little parental sympathy and the meeting results in a hilarious heart seizure for Alf. That's it.

Oh, there are those rapid, rhythmical, and "clever" conversations that are supposed to sound like Albee, but the words just do not make it. There is either too much elevation (Shakespearean quoted, quatrains, and tragic-comedy) or total lack of taste ("The foreman's a real prick!").

Aperitif, furthermore, is amateurishly directed and clumsily acted. The stage itself was left barren a number of times. What more can be said of such a vague, sloppy, and physically distressing piece of drama?

K.K.

Film

Losey and Pinter loom large this month at the Electra. Accident, with Dirk Bogarde and Stanley Baker, will be shown during the next two weeks from Monday to Thursday. Reactions to this sexual duel of Oxford dons have been mixed: it is certainly worth seeing and judging for yourself. Later in March The Pumpkin Eater will be shown. One really should see Anne Bancroft's very fine performance as Peter Finch's wife in order to appreciate her bitchiness as Mrs. Robinson in The Graduate which won her an Oscar nomination.

Kwaidan, a Japanese ghost story, is at the New York-er but not for long; it is a six-day engagement. In the realm of the less recent, the Garbo festival continues at the Capri with Queen Christina tonight and The African Queen with Humphrey Bogart and Katharine Hepburn is still at the International Cinema.

Now that the Academy award nominations are out, you can go and see several of the nominated films and decide for yourself: Wait Until Dark with Audrey Hepburn, Bonnie and Clyde, In Cold Blood, and even Guess Who's Coming to Dinner although apart from Spencer Tracy it has little to recommend it.

Theatre

We didn't get to see The Soldiers but you'll hear about it next week, and we hope to hear how Tynan and Olivier feel about the Theatre Toronto Production of it. Theatre Toronto has loused up its previous shows, but ... Carbaret wasn't as bad as everyone says it was. The theatre loused them up.

The Drama Centre's last show of the year, Jhnn Gabriel Borkman by Henrik Ibsen opens tonight. It should be good, now that Major has a play to work with rather than the stuff that the Drama Centre has inherited to work with. Italian Straw Hat is at the Colonnade ... The Flower Snow is at the O'Keefe, But Run do nnt walk to see. Sarah Binks at the Central Library Theatre ... Its witty charming, corny ... all the things we are ... and hate about ourselves ...

Books

If you are interested in what a mental hospital experience is and means, there are a number of books that make fascinating reading. On the academic side (in the best and most relevant sense), the best book is Erving Goffman's Asylums (Doubleday-Anchor paperback); four chilling essays on how a mental hospital operates as a bureaucratic, authoritarian, "total institution" rather than as a therapeutic community. Goffman is a sociologist who writes as one outside the psychological-psychiatric profession, and produced a brutal study that has become a classic.

On the psychiatric side, perhaps the most exciting book by a psychiatrist to be published since the war is R.D. Laing's short selection of essays entitled The Politics of Experience. (Penguin.) Laing treats schizophrenia as a viable, and often valuable form of human experience, and accuses "modern" techniques of electroshocks and drug therapy of destroying the experience, and, often, the individual. The books ends with a section entitled "The Bird of Paradise": a shattering collage of anecdotes, recollections and prose-poetry that vents all the anger of a sensitive man involved in what often seems to be a profession committed more to social control than individual therapy.

Two novels express the two sides of the story. Ken Kesey's One Flew Over The Cuckoo's Nest is a gripping, funny, very sad story that tells everything. That is what it's like and what it means to be a patient in a mental hospital. If you care, read it. Hannah Green's I Never Promised You a Rose Garden is a much more optimistic novel that makes none of the most plausible articulations of the fears and horrors of life as a schizophrenic.

Two more modes of campus living

Co-operative communities

By BRIAN JOHNSON

For some of its members, Campus Co-op is a social group; for others, it's a residence without rules. But for most, it's just an inexpensive place to live.

"This place costs me $630 a year," said Doug Black (III New), who was sitting in a well-furnished, tidy double room in Howarth House. "That price includes 20 meals a week and laundry service — and it's the best room in the house."

Doug estimates he saves $200 by not living in residence.

Students at the Co-op save the money by being their own administration. There are no dons or maids, and each resident must devote four hours a week to working in the co-op: two hours in his house and two in the dining room of his division.

Although each dining room has a hired cook, the students wash the dishes.

Campus Co-operative Residences Inc. is divided into three divisions (North, Central, and South), each with four houses and one main dining room. There is also an apartment division.

Despite the popular image of the co-op as an unorganized free-for-all, there is a more than haphazard supervision — by the residents themselves.

Carefully mapped-out work schedules cover the bulletin boards through all the houses.

Doug Black, work schedule controller for his house, produced from his desk a very official-looking, mimeographed "fines form" for those skipping their work hours.

"The fine is $4," said Black, "but it's only a last resort after we've issued warnings. Anyway, most people do their share."

Monica Lynch (I Vic) was washing dishes when I spoke to her after lunch in Urwick House on Spadina Avenue. When she finished we sat down in the empty dining room and talked about her six months of experience in the Co-op.

"There are very few rules," she said. "We make our own. We have quiet hours 7 to 10 p.m. week nights, and no guys are allowed in the rooms."

The men have a similar arrangement for quiet hours, but have no restrictions on women in their rooms. Quiet hours can be broken if there is common consent for a party.

There are coffee parties, room parties, house parties and on-the-spur-of-the-moment parties.

Monica described one party that was raided by the police. "There was some crazy girl with a bottle out in the street," she said.

"We were arrested and fined, since we were under age. But it was all kind of a big joke.

"We also made a movie once," she added. "We all went out to Toronto Island and put on funny clothes and just made a movie. It was great!"

It would seem natural that the great physical interdependence of the co-op residents would lead to a social interdependence, but most residents seemed to be unaffected by social pressures.

Black says the co-op society is "an additional set of relations," although he thinks other co-op students react differently.

"There are a helluva lot of co-op marriages," he said. "But I wouldn't want to see the girl I'm taking out every day of the week."

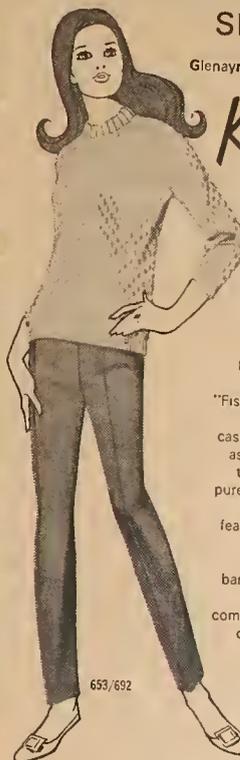

Meal times are the forced meetings to which Black is

Communities

referring. It was lunch hour when I spoke to a three-year Co-op resident, Paul Brigel (II Meds). He was eating a hamburger.

"The food's not bad here," he said, "but they buy it in large quantities. Sometimes we get stewing meat three days in a row."

Paul emphasized some of the drawbacks of co-op living for him.

"This dining room is ugly. My room is ugly. Sometimes it gets depressing," he said "I suppose it affects me because I've always wanted to go into interior decorating."

In his first year, Black had a roommate whom he could not get along with, and he asked to transfer. "But the co-op didn't do anything about it for quite a while."

Paul considers himself an individual, with most of his good friends except his girlfriend outside the co-op.

"There's no moral code that you have to adopt," he continued. "But the co-op is not a hothouse of prostitution."

"Whenever I tell someone I live in the co-op, he gives me this knowing wink — but it's just not true. People are not amoral."

There is a different type of independence in the apartment division.

There are no organized social activities, no communal dining rooms, no rah-rah spirit. Freedom is regarded as more of a responsibility than an ideal happiness.

Instead of communal dining rooms, each house contains a kitchenette where the students cook for themselves.

"Each girl cooks for herself," says Elizabeth Bohnen (III UC). "It's more convenient that way since we're all coming and going at different times."

There was a dog-eared paperback on the kitchen table — The I-Hate-to-Cook-Book.

Generally, the Co-op does not live up to its often bad image. Many students in college residences imagine Co-op members living in a pigsty—most of the rooms I visited were remarkably neat.

Constant noise and wild parties is another misconception. Most students find it easy to study in their rooms, and the library is close by. Black said the Co-op life even improves his academic standing.

Studies, morals, social involvement — everything — it depends upon the individual. But the co-op is not just an institution that produces individuals: it attracts them.

Home-where the food is

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

Living at home and attending university is not the paradox that it sounds, to many University of Toronto students.

The biggest hang-up to most "day-hops" is commuting. Tom Stobie (I New) spends 2½ hours a day commuting from Port Credit.

"It's a lot of money, too, and you get nothing out of it," he says.

A Don Mills resident, Charlie Barrett (II New) wastes an hour getting home each night. He is luckier than some — at least he gets a ride to school in the morning.

Susan Jackson (I UC) finds that commuting from Downsview limits her involvement in university activities:

"I could stay on campus later if I lived down here — otherwise without a lift, I hate to go home alone at night."

For those who live near campus, like Julie Volgayesi (I New), a Bloor St. resident, living at home is "very convenient."

Rules and regulations are of little worry to home dwellers. They find they have little or no restriction upon their actions.

Studying at home can be a problem, though. Tom said he usually stays on campus to study to avoid the interruptions and constant noise at home.

Susan said there were too many distractions at home to study.

Some people living at home apparently do think of moving out. For Tom Stobie, it is almost definite he will move closer to campus next year.

Susan said, "If I lived down here, I could be more active. It wouldn't be such a bother to come down."

"And I'd be under less restriction from my parents," she added.

For Julie, moving away from home would just be "too expensive" — especially since living at home is "so convenient."

"Of course, the biggest advantage of living at home," Tom pointed out, "is that you get good food — not like some places on campus."

Ryerson creates media college

Sightsoundsystem, a technological arts festival, will be held at Ryerson for six days starting Tuesday.

The festival is designed to "make people aware of their environment." It will feature lectures, concerts, a "radio media artist" and environmental presentations.

The festival director is Ugo Kasumets, a Toronto composer who has presented mixed media concerts at the Isaacs Gallery.

Three of the presentations are concerned with the city and its environment. A total-environment Sights and Sounds of the City will be presented as well as a film environment reconstruction of the city through photo media.

Admission for the week is $2.50 for students and $5 for others.

It was a very poor year

By JAMES MORRISON

Hmmmm. That was the year what wasn't, say Varsity Blues — a 4-6 record and fourth place. Out of the money, as it were.

It all started well enough. In London before the Christmas break, Blues assault Western Mustangs eventual League winners, 90-89 in overtime (for the story of first place, see Apology appended). Whence to Mac, and a 60-56 win to take over first place.

Then the fade, as close win became close loss. Western comes on in Hart House to win 91-87. After a time-out to throtilt Guelph Gryphons 107-79, Blues lose to Waterloo in H.H. 87-81, and then drop a thrilling overtime to Windsor Lancers 88-84. Mac then storms the Massey citadel to the tune of 104-97 and misery prevails.

When you're down and out, even Guelph looks bad, and Blues have a tough time winning 80-74. Then Lancers arrive, bearing rocks, and Varsity winces 117-80. What more could happen? Waterloo Warriors decide to get into the act and hammer out a final game 88-73 victory.

This was the best-balanced League ever. With the exception of Windsor at Hart House, Blues were in every game until the final minutes. But close only counts in cliches.

There were fine individual performances. Bruce Dempster against Western and Guelph, Mark White at home against Mac, Arvo Neidre and John Hadden against Waterloo in the box. And great team showings in London and Windsor. Five Blues finished in the top twenty scorers, and Bruce Dempster and Arvo Neidre made All-star rating. (how could they overlook Mark White?).

John McManus is optimistic about next year's team. Mark White and Ron Voake are returning to the US of A, and Arvo Neidre and Albie Garbe may have heavier study commitments. But back come Bruce Dempster, John Hadden, Mike Kirby and Mark Slater with another year's experience, while Larry Trafford, Ross MacNaughton, Brian Shaw Jor Faust and Glen Wilkie have overcome their rookie season. Any bets on Trafford?

And if there are any potential arsonists in the crowd, how about the Hart House gymnasium for starters? For the eternal benefit of humanity and John McManus.

An Apology:
We have been guilty of a grievous error in factual reporting (sin of sins). On Monday we stated that Windsor Lancers had won the league with a 9-1 record while Western finished second (8-2). But Saturday night in London a Western demolished Windsor 97-72 to give both teams 8-2 records. And Western took first place with a seven point margin in points scored between the two teams.

Alors... The SIBL playoffs take place this weekend in London. Western meets Waterloo and Windsor takes on Eastern Division winner Queen's. The SIBL winner then advances to the national championships in Halifax.

MONTREAL vs. TORONTO

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity Blues begin their annual game of Russian roulette tonight as they start their ascent toward a possible third consecutive Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union crown. Blues, who finished the regular schedule in first place in the nine-team SIHL, play two suddendead games this week-end and two more next week in the national finals to be held in Montreal.

That is, they play these games as long as they continue to win. A loss in any of the four matches would mean immediate elimination.

The first step in the climb comes this evening at six o'clock at Varsity Arena when Blues play host to fourthplace University of Montreal Carabins.

The OQAA final takes place Saturday afternoon (2:00 p.m.) between the winner of this game and the winner of the McMaster-Waterloo contest which follows Friday evening at 9:00 o'clock.

Carabins, although finishing nine points behind Varsity in the final standings, had the best home and home record in the league with the Blue and White. Their hard-fought loss to Blues a few weeks ago at Varsity Arena was followed by a 5-4 win in Montreal last Friday night.

Carabins got off to a slow start this season, losing their first two games of the schedule. However, a 7-5 win over Western Mustangs in the latter's home rink seemed to get the Claude Chapleau coached team rolling and from that point on, they have been extremely tough. Their strength lies in two areas—goaltending and hustle—and Varsity coach Tomm Watt realizes that his players will have to be skating hard to beat Carabins. "Goaltending (in the person of Luc St. Jean) and hard work are the strong points of the Montreal attack. And the only way to beat hustle is with more hustle. We have to beat them to the puck and shoot a lot on St. Jean.

"We are a better team man for man but Carabins seem to get excited in a big game and start to play like they think they are all Jean Beliveaus.

"I don't think overconfidence will be a problem with our players. Montreal have given us two good games and we know they'll be ready for tonight. We'll be ready too."

Along with St. Jean, Carabins boast several top scorers and an adequate defense anchored by second team all-star defenseman Ghislain Dumais. Forwards Jacques Larin, Yvan Gingras, Robert Dubuc, Jacques Dube, Andre Hayes and Norman Goulet have all fared well around enemy nets.

Varsity will go with much the same lineup they have used all season. All-stars Ward Passi, Paul Laurent, Peter Speyer and John Wrigley will be the pace-setters but to say ultimate success rides entirely on the efforts of these players would be an injustice to the rest of the team. Second team all-star members, Murray Stroud and Bob McClelland, have both had good seasons as have Brian St. John, John Gordon, Doug Jones, Bob Hamilton, Jim Miles and so on. In fact, there isn't one member of the team that hasn't played well. Win or lose, there will be sixteen players to praise or blame.

In sum, Blues have the horses and if they can add the hustle, it shouldn't be less than a two-goal margin over Carabins. But as most veteran fans realize, anything can happen when it comes to sudden-death sports. If you want to see exciting wide-open hockey, be there!

AROUND THE NET ... There will be no home television of tonight's games however CHCH Channel 11 will carry the Saturday afternoon final in the regular 6:30 p.m. time slot on Saturday evening ...

McMASTER

vs. WATERLOO

Varsity fans also get a chance to size up the opposition in neutral fashion Friday night when McMaster Marlins and Waterloo Warriors clash in the second half of the evening's sudden-death doubleheader. The game starts right after Blues' match with University of Montreal.

The survivors of these two contests clash Saturday afternoon for the Queen's Cup at two o'clock.

Warriors come into their game against Mac following their best season ever in SIHL competition. Only one point separated them from the league-leading Blues. Against McMaster, Warriors were fairly hard-pressed, but recorded solid 5-3 and 8-6 victories.

Waterloo has a well-stocked, all-round team whose only apparent weakness is between the pipes. Dave Quarrie has been a bit shaky, and understudy Larry Copeland may see some action during the weekend.

All-star Bob Murdoch heads a tough Waterloo defence, augmented for the playoffs by the return of previously-injured rearguards Larry Banks and Vince Mulligan. There's no lack of scoring punch on the team with forwards Terry Cooke and captain Ron Smith finishing one-two in the league scoring race.

Mac is a rough, hard-hitting club with defencemen George Lachenbauer and John DeDiana among the league's best in the body-check department.

GEORGE LACHENBAUER

Speyer lone unanimous choice

By PHIL BINGLEY

Blues' captain Peter Speyer led all players in the balloting for the SIHL allstar team. Defenceman Speyer was the only unanimous selection on the team which was announced yesterday by the OQAA publicity department.

The team was chosen by the nine coaches in the league with the restriction that no coach could vote for players on his own team.

Speyer, a dream team member for the third time, had his best season ever for Varsity. Playing in his final year, he scored nine goals and assisted on fourteen others. Montreal Canadians of the NHL have sought to move Speyer into the bigtime for the past two years, but the flashy rearguard plans to enter the law profession following graduation this spring.

Ward Passi another perennial all-star made the first team for the fifth time as did linemate Paul Laurent (his second year in a row). Goaltender John Wrigley was also selected for the second consecutive season.

Other members of the first team were forward Terry Cooke and defenseman Bob Murdoch, both of Waterloo Warriors.

Blues placed centre Murray Stroud and forward Bob McClelland on the second team. The other forward was Normand Cote of Laval.

Jim Horton of Guelph and Dave Quarrie of Waterloo tied for second team goaltending honours while Gord Lackenbauer and John Dediana, both of McMaster, Ghislain Dumais of Montreal and Dave Field of Western received an equal number of votes for defense.

Players of note overlooked by the coaches were Ron Smith of Waterloo (who finished second in scoring to Terry Cooke), defenceman Bob Hamilton of Varsity (a second team pick last year) and Brent Imlach of Western (a former Junior 'A' star with Toronto Marlboros and London Nationals).

OCA students victorious

By ANNE BOODY

Students and faculty of the Ontario College of Art had their first taste of power Sunday after getting the go-ahead from University Affairs Minister William Davis.

Veterans of the seven-day strike met with representatives of the Ontario Union of Students to hash out a plan for democratizing course structures and improving communication within the college.

Striking OCA students and faculty, including fired instructors Aba Bayefsky and Eric Freifeld, will be back in classrooms for the first day of the final term today. The strike ended Friday following Mr. Davis' unexpected accessions to the strikers' demands.

Friday, Mr. Davis announced a three-point settlement in the Ontario legislature. As requested, the two fired instructors will be reinstated. A student-staff committee will be formed "to consider the whole area of curriculum planning and to clarify all points of view."

In addition, Davis will name a commission "to study the present structure of operation and administration of the college in light of the recent problems, with the objective of bringing such matters in line with present-day needs."

Mr. Davis expects the commission to make its report before the end of April.

About 500 somewhat weary strikers were holding down the OCA cafeteria Friday when the victory announcement came. Cheering, dancing, kissing, hugging and champagne-guzzling followed. A few girls cried quietly.

By 4 p.m. the auditorium was packed with nearly 900 students from OCA, U of T, Glendon, Ryerson, George Brown and McMaster, who had come to give Mr. Davis a standing ovation.

"For heaven's sake make sure you all pass the next semester," he told the jubilant crowd.

Now the real work begins. With only two months left in the school term, the reformers will have to work fast to set up a workable committee.

Actual re-vamping of courses will follow from the committee's investigations. In the meantime, the reformers spent all day Sunday discussing the constitution of the committee.

Delegates to the Sunday talk-session agreed the committee should consist mainly of students and teaching staff. Some delegates thought the administration should be given only one vote on the committee, while others felt the administration representative should be a voteless chairman.

Faculty delegates were concerned over the status of instructors. "Many of the instructors have never been told which department they belong to," said one. "The system has to be changed so the instructors know at least what their positions are."

Student delegates agreed the faculty should be given power on the committee so that they are no longer "mere serfs of the administration."

Some hot, some cold as SAC contests shape up

By LOUIS ERlichMAN

Interest in the elections for next year's Students Administrative Council seems to vary across campus from lukewarm to none at all, it appeared after nominations closed Friday.

The warmest is St. Michael's College, where 10 candidates are vying for four places on next year's SAC.

As usual, the hotbed of disinterest is Victoria College, where, for the second straight year, all five SAC reps have been acclaimed.

The hot contest at St. Mike's features incumbents John Karl (II SMC), Toni McNamara (III SMC) and Edmund Burkites Fred Paul Fromm (II SMC) and Joe Genovese (II SMC).

Rounding out the field are Joe Blonde (II SMC), Alberto de Giovanni (I SMC), Chester Gryski (III SMC), Mary O'Connor (II SMC), Fred Owens (II SMC) and Lawrence Stichmann (I SMC).

The Vic acclamees are Jaanus Proos (I Vic), of the EBS, Mike Fertile (II Vic), Mark Nakamura (III Vic), Lee Coulter (II Vic), and James Plumptre (II Vic). None of them have previous council experience.

Other acclaimed candidates are George Murray (I Law), Dale Wilson (II Mus), and Harry Mathews (I Knox).

Another strongly-contested election seems to be in store for University College, where eight candidates are fighting for the five available seats.

Familiar names in the race include present council member Irving Weisdorf (III UC), and Hillel President Mark Freiman (III UC).

Also on the ballot is another one of those political Brewins. This one is Jane Brewin (III UC), daughter of MP Andrew Brewin and sister of former SAC president Mary Brewin.

Joining them in the fray are Ed Clark (III UC), Arthur Leader (III UC), Bob Rae (III UC), Larry Robbins (II UC) and Gerald Rowe (II UC).

Chris Szalwinski (I AP-SC), elected in a by-election only a month ago, is the only one of the five candidates seeking the four New College seats with any council experience. The others are Rob Douglas (III New), George Ford (III New), Kim Graybiel (II New) and Don Short (II New).

Incumbent John Winter (SGS), and SAC Speaker Wayne Hankey (SGS) will be fighting Andrew Wernick (SGS) and Borden Campbell (SGS) for the votes of the traditional two per cent or so of graduate students who vote.

The other contests all look tight.

Robin Holloway (IV Phil.) will attempt to hold on to his Wycliffe constituency in the face of the challenge of Jim Harris (I Wycliffe) and Ralph Rowe (I Wycliffe).

Peter Boag (II Arch), Kalmali Greisziger (III Arch) and Robert Janvrin (II Arch) are all trying to pick up the mantle of Gerry McMaster (V Arch), long-running SAC rep and Campus Centre chairman.

Rae Chombie (III Food Sci) and Janice Webster (II Food Sci) are both seeking the Food Sciences seat on council, while at Trinity, Peter Picherak (I Trin) and Donald Ross (III Trin) both hope to replace the irreplaceable Steven Langdon.

Three newcomers to campus politics, Barry Spinner (III APSC), Gail Swaigan (II Inn), who, incidentally, used to sit next to me in Grade 12 English, and Stanley Zlotkin (I Inn) are after the two openings at Inniis.

Most constituencies will hold their elections this Thursday. No computer cards will be used in the balloting. Preferential ballots will be used where only one number is to be elected.

A MOST IMPORTANT GOAL

Varsity Blues scored a lot of goals this year but none was more important than the one shown here fired Friday night by Fred Pollard (15). It came at 4:45 of sudden-death overtime against Montreal Carabins for a spine-tingling 4-3 victory. Without it Blues would never have been able to whomp Waterloo Saturday afternoon for their third straight OQAA title. See page 12.

Many still waiting for POSAP grants

Between 600 and 800 University of Toronto students have still not received the second instalment of their POSAP loans.

"Only about 300 of these have been waiting for a long time," Lois Reimer, Director of the Office of Student Awards said in an interview Friday. "The rest applied after Christmas."

Miss Reimer blamed the "sheer scale of the program" for the long delays. "We have processed over 8000 applications, and some have been pushed aside in the press."

"We have, however, provided the Department with a list of the delayed grants," she said, "and we are hoping for quick action."

SACCE begins criticism this week

This week the Students' Administrative Council will distribute course evaluation questionnaires in arts and science classes, and students will be able to criticize their courses in class time.

This year's course evaluation promises to be better organized and more comprehensive than last year's, which was generally considered unsuccessful.

Under the full cooperation of Dr. A. D. Allan, dean of Arts and Science, the SACCE will cover only university-wide courses unless any college curriculum committee makes a special request to have a course evaluated.

Students will mark their answers on IBM cards, although there will be a space at the end for comments.

The results will be published in the summer and mailed to students in early fall.

African bloodbath likely, say speakers

By JOE LAUFER
KATHY ADAMS
HARRIET KIDECKEL

Violent revolution is the only solution to Africa's racial problems, according to speakers at last weekend's Conference on African Affairs.

"We may be laying the foundations for future Vietnams in which the race issue is the only issue that exists," George Houser, Executive Director of the American Committee on Africa, told an audience of 200.

"There has been frustration and despair when Rhodesia and South Africa have been confronted by the other African states, because the non-racist states have not been backed by the big powers.

"The minority forces of white supremacy are more dominant now than ever before. If there is no peaceful change, then it will be violent," he said.

This was reiterated by Dr. Gerald Caplan, who had attended a university in Rhodesia and seen the racial problems created by Ian Smith's government.

"Violent revolution is the only solution to the racial problem," he told an audience of fifty. "Most of the Negroes are prepared to fight — if given the lead."

"The big western powers will not take a stand against Rhodesia and South Africa and the UN can only act as far as the superpowers will let it act," said Richard M. Akwei, ambassador and permanent representative of Ghana to the UN.

"Africa can expect little help from the big powers and the UN in the future. When all the peaceful methods of eliminating colonialism and racism are exhausted, force will be justified," he continued.

Rev. Gladstone Hlabati, imprisoned for his activities in the nationalist movement in South Africa, and now with the African National Congress of South Africa in the U.S., spoke passionately.

"The South African government is fascist and needs to be overthrown," he said. "The white oppressors must be killed. Non-violence works only where the opposition has a conscience.

"War is more than a threat. A Vietnam-like bloodbath is inevitable in South Africa," he declared.

The present policy of the Western powers, and especially that of the United States, towards Africa was severely criticized.

George Houser said that the United States had lost the once-good image it held with Africa, because of its tacit support of South Africa and its poor treatment of newly-independent African states.

"The U.S. has a large investment in South Africa, on which it makes a 21 per cent profit," he said. "Its present policy of neither encouragement nor discouragement is in fact one which encourages the maintenance and expansion of present industry.

SAC goes to President's Council today

A delegation from the Students Administrative Council will go to a closed meeting of the President's Council today to ask for open decision-making on university committees.

The President's Council, established in 1965, is a central co-ordinating body comprising representatives from faculty, administration and the board of governors.

SAC President Tom Faulkner said Wednesday night that the President's Council was "perhaps the only body which really has a meaningful role to play in the university."

The SAC policy on secrecy is that "meetings of decision-making bodies of the university be open to any member of the university community," although committees could vote to close the doors where confidentiality was essential.

This would allow the presence of reporters from university publications, but bar members of the outside press. The committees could also set standards of conduct for observers present.

In January SAC suspended its participation in the Placement Service advisory committee until its "openness" policy was accepted.

Attending Monday's closed meeting is an exception to normal policy.

CUS wins again

GUELPH (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Students won its fifth referendum of the year Wednesday.

University of Guelph students voted 564 to 310 in favour of the national union, along with the Ontario Union of Students which was on the same ballot.

CUS President Hugh Armstrong said the fact that CUS has won five out of six referenda indicates the union has broad student support for its policies.

CUS president urges student strikes

OTTAWA (CUP) — Students should go on strike to protest residence and tuition fee hikes says Hugh Armstrong, president of the Canadian Union of Students.

"It is clear that costs must go down," he said last week "but provincial governments want to let costs go up."

"This demonstrates the necessity for students to organize more effectively in order to make their demands more forcefully to administrations and provincial governments."

He cited Newfoundland which has abolished tuition fees and pays stipends to students, and Ontario's system of stabilizing fees and granting financial aid to needy students as proof that governments can freeze fees or lower them.

Armstrong also urged builders to make use of building techniques pioneered by co-op residences to lower residence fees.

"If it can be done for $5,000, there's no reason why it should cost more."

Lawyers — contrary to the beliefs of many people — are in many respects almost human. A lawyer has interests, hobbies and activities outside of his professional life. His interests may be many and varied. He may also experience many calls upon his spare time because of his professional standing. Further, he is aware that there is some economic benefit to be derived from his outside activities. They can result in the creation of potential clients and legal business.

—from Bar Economics and You, in Illinois Bar Journal, March, 1964.

the law

There are more than 400 law students on this campus, all of whom would be well-advised to read today's feature on the Village Bar. Not just a cursory reading but a very careful one, especially for the way the people quoted see the law profession.

The Village Bar is an attempt to take the law out on the street and make it relevant to the people it is supposed to serve.

When the Bar was formed last summer there was a big need for this type of service: hippies were being hassled unnecessarily by the police and no matter what you think of them, you can't forget that they're kids entitled to the same protections as anyone else.

Yet, the lawyers and law students connected with the Village Bar encountered a fair amount of resistance from the law profession. Complaints were made to the Ethics Committee of the Law Society of Upper Canada that they were bastardizing the image of the lawyer in our society.

The complaint, of course, was about the image — that large desk and briefcase concept — of the members of the profession. Members don't think very much about the law itself any more.

The reason for that can be found in the appeal of the profession to most of the young men that go into it — money and status. Helping scruffy hippies, to them, was somehow lowering the dignity of the profession.

Desks and large cars and briefcases and large houses are supposed to bring a man this dignity. The profession seems to have forgotten about the only real source of its dignity, helping people.

They speak about the important protective function they serve, but it's hard to find much evidence that they actually have any real belief in that function any more. Of course, they'll mention the good work they are doing with Ontario's Legal Aid service, also initiated last year.

But it's also true that they get paid to work in that program. For younger lawyers who have just opened offices and aren't getting a steady flow of clients yet, the plan is a good source of work. And then, when you talk to some of the people who have had need to call on the Legal Aid plan for help and hear them tell of the unconcerned way lawyers have treated them, one has to wonder if the lawyers are there to help people or themselves.

Not all lawyers are this way, of course, and the same charges can be made of most professions in our society. A report issued recently showed that some doctors, for instance, are not qualified to treat patients. A few are actually dangerous.

It's necessary for students who go into these professions to do a little bit of soul searching and to see their profession less as a tool for social mobility and more as a tool for expressing their own humanity.

LETTERS

it's good but has faults

Sir: In regard to Professor Tonge's letter in Fridays Varsity entitled "Setting It Straight (2)", I feel constrained to rely to the imputations made against my person.

Firstly, as stated in the original story by Mike Kesterton, I spent a most exciting and interesting summer in England, both at my work, and later while travelling. Indeed, I am most anxious to return, and my comment to Mr. Kesterton was that, the next time, I would take a SAC flight and arrange my own job as it would be less expensive, although I.S.I.S. help is invaluable for anyone planning to work in Europe for the first time.

Secondly, Mr. Kesterton misquoted me in his article perhaps because a considerable period of time elapsed between our lone telephone conversation, and the printing of the article. I have never personally written to Prof. Tonge — I have had no complaints; I did say, however, that a friend of mine who was unable to obtain I.S.I.S. "on-the-job-assistance" despite assurances in the I.S.I.S. magazine, wrote to the good professor, and at the time of my talk with Mr. Kesterton, had received no reply. Furthermore, I did go to the I.S.I.S. headquarters in Brussels, and found the organization's rooms on the third floor certainly not what one would expect from the picture in the I.S.I.S. magazine.

In conclusion, may I restate my original concern: that I.S.I.S. (as Prof. Tonge admits) does have its faults; as merely one example, I.S.I.S. failed to arrange for our group's British work permits and we were told to tell customs that we were only tourists, forcing us to fabricate stories in order to enter the country. Nevertheless, despite the intemperate remarks made by Prof. Tonge, I still think that I.S.I.S. is a worthwhile organization and that the I.S.I.S. style of program is a good one.

Donald Kibblewhite (Wycliffe College)

one for engineers too

Sir: My congratulations for the article "Spend a Summer on the Seine" (Feb. 14). I would like to add some more details which might be of interest.

Parallel to the AIESEC (l'Association Internationale des Etudiants en Sciences Economiques et Commerciales) for students in Business, there is IAESFE, the International Association for Exchange Students in Engineering. This is a non-profit movement, offering practical training of two to six months in many European and American countries.

The conditions are as follows:

1. No fee is to be paid by the student.
2. Travel expenses are paid. The salary provided is enough to cover accommodation, food and some extras (530.00 DM in Germany in 1962).
3. The student must be in 3rd year or 4th year of a 4-year Engineering course.

When I was in Europe in an Engineering College, thanks to that organization, many students had the opportunity of going to Spain, Italy, Nederland, Germany, Austria, Poland, and Sweden. Usually they were quite happy with their foreign experience.

In Great Britain, if as you say, Canadians can work without a work permit, I am sure that finding a summer job is rather easy. But for people not members of the Commonwealth, it is possible only in the native country.

In Germany, you can find jobs by asking in ARBEITSAMT in the larger towns. In 1963 it was possible to get a good summer job in a few weeks.

In all Europe it is possible to enroll in summer camps for a duration of at least three weeks. Usually for 6 to 8 hours' work a day, accommodation and food are provided. Usually you pay nothing and get no money. But this is the place where you can meet students and workers from all over Europe.

I worked for two weeks in one of those camps in England (Concordia). I got 10 pounds a week and I had to pay 3 pounds 10 shillings for the accommodation. It was my first experience in the country; I had to pick apples, apples, apples.

Such camps are also organized in France. In vineyards you are paid 10.00 F a day. The accommodation and red wine are free.

If you would like to have the address I can write to one of my friends in Europe, but anyway, I think it is possible to go to Europe without paying $150 to ISIS.

Daniel Doutriaux,
Dept. of Chemical Engineering

three tidbits

Sir: These (three clippings) might be of interest to you.

ESTIMATED FIVE HUNDRED ARE ARRESTED IN CAMPUS DEMONSTRATIONS IN 2 MONTHS
Preliminary information collected by the National Student Association indicates an estimated 500 students were arrested during on-campus demonstrations during the months of October and November. NSA staff members collecting data reported they have counted 410 arrests and 730 disciplinary citations on more than 40 campuses during the two-month period, but that the totals are expected to reach 500 and 1,000, respectively. The NSA study is limited to demonstrations of more than 40 persons on college and university campuses.

Not counted by the NSA were students arrested away from campuses as part of national anti-war demonstrations. (From Higher Education and National Affairs, ACE, Washington, D.C.)

PROF. QUILTS AFTER PARKING CHANGE
Minnesota is cold in winter (10 to 25 degrees below zero), and especially so at the University of Minnesota, it seems. A recent newspaper report tells of a periodontist (gum specialist) who taught one day a week at the university's School of Dentistry, and had a reserved parking space in an inside heated garage. When notified that the university had reshuffled parking spaces, and his space would henceforth be in an open parking ramp, he resigned his position as an associate dentistry professor. He is quoted as saying, "I don't care about the car. It's me I'm worried about."

DISCRIMINATION

Now a university is being charged with a different kind of discrimination — discrimination against out-of-state students! A University of Iowa law student has brought suit in U.S. District Court challenging the right of the Iowa Board of Regents, the governing body, to authorize state schools to charge out-of-state students higher tuition than in-state students, according to an item in The National Observer for May 15, 1967.

an overlooked letter

Sir: In Canada the struggle of French Canadians for freedom to assert and maintain their cultural identity often overshadows similar needs in other ethnic groups. I take this occasion, the beginning of the new year, to bring to the fore the cultural plight of a large ethnic group here in this very university, namely the Chinese student community. Our numbers exceed 500 and we can mostly be found swelling the ranks of the science and engineering faculties. It cannot be denied that we contribute significantly to this university community and indeed provide more than our fair share of scholarship. Yet despite this we are not given official recognition nor are we identified as a separate people by the administration or the scholastic community — we are denied public cultural expression, so vital to the maintenance of our identity.

So much for criticism — now now can this unfortunate situation be remedied? No, I am not advocating a cultural revolution on campus but perhaps we can follow in the steps of other slightly more enlightened university administrations. Last year when I was attending St. Mary's University in Halifax, about the time of the Chinese new year the tiny Chinese community (pop. 10) was officially treated by the administration to a sumptuous luncheon, exquisitely prepared and featuring exotic foods. Not only that, but we were officially relieved of the obligation to attend classes or submit assignments for a period of two days.

Might not the administration institute similar customs in recognition and appreciation of the slightly more sizeable Oriental contingent based at the U of T.

A. F. (I APSC)

notes...

Logos is a new underground paper from Montreal dedicated as are all these little journals to complete freedom of the individual.

In the most recent issue appears an article on liberation of the person from the junk, chemicals and other worthless things his diet puts into his body. Deep inside the article, you'll find this paragraph:

"Psychedelic drugs bring change but no freedom. Instead of being chained to the exterior slave system, the 'head' becomes chained to his own interior slave system."

It's good to see an underground journal taking a more realistic view of the drug scene than all the others who have bought Timothy Leary's message as dogma and thereby forgotten to look around.

If they did, they'd see all those people who misuse drugs and marijuana and yet say how free they are.

What's OUS done lately? Clarify issues, mobilize forces!

By PAUL MACRAE

When 500 Laurentian University students marched on Sudbury city hall to back up demands for a campus pub recently, the vice-president of the Ontario Union of Students was there.

"Did you cause the demonstration yourself?" I asked vice-president Brian Switzman last night in an interview.

"Well, not exactly ..."

"That means you had a lot to do with it, doesn't it?"

"Well, it's pretty hard to step back and say that," he countered.

Curiously enough when 800-odd Ontario College of Art students marched on Queen's Park last week, the entire OUS executive, including Switzman, was there.

Not that the OUS is a take-over group, nor is it an active fomenter of rebellion. But when the situation warrants strong action, as Switzman says, "We can supply a certain amount of technical information."

The OUS supplied a lot of technical information during the OCA revolt, especially in planning the march. Sound equipment, speakers, the legal aspects of a demonstration ("They didn't even know whether they could march on the road or not.").

NOT MAIN FUNCTION

But Switzman doesn't see this as the primary function of the OUS in that or any other demonstration. "Our job is to try to develop leadership within the group, and get people thinking in a disciplined way."

"When you release people from a structure you get mass chaos," he explains. "After three or four months it works itself out."

"But when you've only got a limited time you need immediate impact plus a disciplined examination of your activities, answers, goals and how to achieve them."

BACKBONE

Lillian Smith an attractive third year advertising student at OCA, doesn't describe it exactly that way.

"They gave us backbone," she says. "Before the OUS stepped in we were disorganized and haphazard. They helped us work together."

"It's a new concept, working together," Switzman broke in. "It's a fantastic thing to happen to a university."

"The OUS speakers sparked our interest," Lillian added. "They stabilized the audience—we were pretty wishy-washy at first. Somebody'd attack the administration and we'd cheer, then somebody else would praise (OCA principal) Watson and we'd cheer him too."

"The OUS helped clarify the issues."

Switzman and OUS president Monique Oullette spent most of the week and a half of the boycott at the college, except for meetings with OCA staff and students in the cluttered OUS office at 91 St. George.

FITTERING DEBATE

"When I first got to the college," Switzman recalled, "there was a frittering debate. So I went to the mike and spoke my mind. At that point it had become a personal issue."

A Telegram photographer interrupted the discussion. He wanted a picture for an interview story with a member of the OCA board of governors. Switzman said the member calls the OUS "a fascist, Communist organization."

"They're out to screw you," I said.

"It's still better to talk to the press," Switzman said. "Maybe they won't hit you so hard."

"Besides, what you're called isn't important."

...and Hersh Ezrin's comments

By HERSH EZRIN
President, U.C. Literary and Athletic Society

The Students of the Ontario College of Art have won a significant victory in their struggles against certain school authorities. However, the real issues have yet to be debated in the committees that are to be established at the request of Education Minister William Davis.

The events at the college these last two weeks have great importance in a number of ways. First, they have given impetus and supplied encouragement to the other students who may be suffering under some of the same ills that led to the student strike at the College of Art.

In a broader view, the most important feature of the OCA protest was not the Minister's statement but rather that the statement was actually made. Credit for this achievement must be equally distributed to the Drawing and Painting Committee at OCA, the student council there and the Ontario Union of Students.

OUS, the provincial arm of the Canadian Union of Students, has worked with vigor in a number of areas important to students. Seminars on barriers to higher education, the High School Union of Students project, writing reports and requests to submit to the provincial education department are examples of the work its numbers have done with very little publicity.

The success of the OCA project will, no doubt, enhance the stature of the OUS and I sincerely hope that more students and student bodies around the province will be willing to ask OUS for assistance.

drawing on tradition

In recent years, student government on this campus has become just that—government. Seeking wisdom and guidance from the inestimable lore of British governmental traditions, our student leaders have developed a sort of Parliament, a chief of state, an executive council, and of course that indispensable accoutrement, a small but ever-expanding bureaucracy.

But somewhere along the way, our leaders have neglected that most treasured of British traditions — the Royal (or Prime Ministerial) Mistress.

Think of the great epochs of British government and what immediately springs to mind? Why, of course! The crucial role of the mistress.

The Hanoverians had their supply of "ladies-in-waiting"; we need not ask, "waiting for what?" Whenever the pressures of politics beat hard, the Duke of Wellington (among others) sought solace in the relaxing company of one Harriette Wilson.

In more recent times, Prime Ministers Asquith and Lloyd George are remembered more for the talents of their mistresses than the accomplishments of their ministries.

And if the Canadian government had had the wisdom to continue this noteworthy British tradition, Peter Newman would have been able to discern more tantalizing proofs of Parliamentary crisis than the increased consumption of ice water. What a dreary way to bring down a government!

The lesson is clear: efficient government demands the presence of an efficient governmental mistress.

SAC should immediately dip into its contingency reserve and procure an official SAC mistress.

Apart from her limited sexual functions, the presence of an official mistress would automatically institutionalize intrigue and provide a cloak of respectability to plots, cabals, and conspiracies.

In its present mistressless state SAC is often merely the tool of the inner clique: the executive. Ordinary SAC members are usually unable to thwart the policies of the dedicated, hard-working, incorruptible executive.

But note what would happen if there were a mistress. The executive would become distracted, maybe even a hint of corruption (on the premise that boys will be boys); suddenly debates will become more meaningful, the rule of the executive will be broken, democracy will triumph! SAC meetings will once again be scenes of passions and politics as the president and his supporters do battle with the mistress and her friends. Can there be any doubt as to the outcome?

Note especially the essentially Parliamentary role of the mistress. She is a purveyor, not of lust and adultery, but rather of democracy and freedom. Hiring a nymphomaniac would be quite inappropriate. Why, a successful mistress could be ugly, frigid, and sexless. Any typical Innis freshie would do quite nicely.

The necessity for a mistress in government was briefly discussed in John Steinbeck's charming novel, The Short Reign of Pippin IV.

In the midst of yet another crisis, French politicians decide to restore the monarchy. One of the reluctant king's first tasks is to obtain a mistress "to enlighten your people with her extravagance and charming unreliability." A suitable candidate is found, but poor Pippin never gets to see her, let alone sleep with her. The monarchy is soon overthrown, but at least the mistress did her job well.

Unless provision is made for the immediate acquisition of mistresses, SAC can never expect to achieve true respectability.

What a glorious day it will be! Student government thrusts ahead into areas where adult governments dare to tread.

the hippie...

If a policeman stops you on the street, and asks you your name, what do you do?

Do you have to give it to him? Tell him where you live? Where you are going? Show him how much you have in your pockets?

If he tells you to come along to the station, do you have to come? Do they have to tell you the charge? Do you have the right to call anyone, or to get a lawyer?

If you happen to be clean-cut and respectably-dressed, the questions are for the most part hypothetical. The men in blue are pretty unlikely to bother you.

If, on the other hand, you happen to be bearded, long-haired, ragged, or show other such signs of total perversion, you can count on going through the police-interrogation ritual rather often, particularly if you frequent the Yorkville Village.

and have been connected with SNCC, SUPA and other radical organizations.

But says Paul Copeland, a young lawyer and one of the founders of the Bar, "everybody does his own little thing. Everybody joined for his own particular reasons, and there's never been any pressure to make anyone conform to a fixed standard."

"The only member we've pressured out" he said, "was a fellow who joined just to see how many teenyboppers he could make."

The methods employed by the Village Bar are of necessity unorthodox. "The hippies have no affinity to law, or legal process," says Ruby.

So last summer the Bar stationed a young lawyer and a law student every Friday and Saturday night in front of the "Grab Bag" shop in Yorkville, dispensing advice to the hip and the occasional sub-

"The hippies have no affinity to law, or legal process"

And it's also quite likely your only source of legal advice will be the jail guard who advises you to plead guilty.

Any arrest is a confusing and frightening situation and most of the kids in Yorkville are no more able to cope with police action than the rest of us. But the police have been exerting constant pressure to drive them out of Yorkville, says Clayton Ruby, an articling law student, mostly by pressing flimsy vagrancy and trespassing charges.

A distance for this police "harassment" and a general respect for the "hippie ethic" led Ruby last summer to form "The Village Bar."

The Village Bar is a group of young lawyers and law students who offer free legal advice and information to Yorkville residents.

Most of them believe, like Ruby, that the "law must be made relevant to society," that the old form of lawyer-client relationship lacks humanity.

Many, like Ruby, seek "social change" urban kid with a traffic violation.

The Diggers distributed cards with the phone number of a twenty-four hour answering service which a Village resident could call before, during or after being "busted."

The answering service which is still in operation, is manned by lawyers and law students in 24 hour shifts.

The lawyer on duty gives advice to anyone who calls up in his shift. He pleads in court the trivial "summary" cases like vagrancy (which makes up 90 per cent of their business) and trespassing.

If the client is charged with a more serious, indictable offence, the duty lawyer refers him to three reputable lawyers, who can, if necessary, be paid by legal aid. The Village Bar does not handle narcotics cases.

Also common are landlord tenant problems and runaways whose parents try to use the law to get them back home.

Everyone commits vagrancy who
a) not having any apparent means of support is found wandering abroad or trespassing and does not, when required, justify his presence in the place where he is found.

...help anybody to avoid the law unless he allows us to structure his life for

In order to bridge the education gap, the Bar last summer gave a series of legal talks, featuring dramatized arrests, in the basement of St. Paul's United Church. They are now in the process of producing a pamphlet in the "hip" vernacular explaining to the uninformed that they should ask to be told their charge before submitting to arrest, ask for search warrants before they let policemen wander through their houses, and other such useful bits of advice.

The Bar is also setting up an advice centre in the new Diggers House on Spadina Road.

Sitting behind the mahogany desk in his stylish apartment, Ruby explained his reasons for forming the group:

"In law, I'm concerned with the way the law affects people. What does it mean about society when you see a pattern of illegal searches, and spurious arrests." Sipping a pepsi, he continued, "Law ought to be involved in social change. We're trying to make law relevant to people, to make it human."

He talked about the dehumanizing effect of orthodox legal procedures. "The client is a human being with a problem. The lawyer cuts away most of his problem and most of his life to get down to the legal kernel of the matter. The client becomes a number the moment he comes into the office."

What kind of reception has the Bar received from the legal profession? "Parts of the profession are pissed off with the unorthodox methods of the Village Bar," Copeland said. "Others think it is fairly important and useful." "I am sure," Ruby said, "that there are a number of lawyers who feel our style is not in keeping with their image of a lawyer."

One law student who attended a Village Bar meeting decided not to take part in the scheme. "It's just helping dope-pushers to avoid the law," he said. Ruby denies this charge. "We can't help anybody to avoid the law unless he allows us to structure his life for him. We just tell them to keep away from drugs."

The Bar has also been criticized for not being vigorous enough in prosecuting police for false arrests and searches without warrants.

Ruby admits the possibilities of such action but says it is difficult to get a con-

Linda, 16, left her suburban home Saturday morning and moved into a room in Yorkville Village.

At eight o'clock on Monday morning, the police, acting on the request of her parents, arrested her as she went downstairs from her room to buy a coke. She had $12 in her pocket. She was charged with vagrancy.

In court the next day she was defended by a lawyer from the Village Bar. The charge was withdrawn. She went back to Yorkville.

Two days later she was again arrested for vagrancy. This time her parents protested that Linda had been receiving psychiatric therapy before running away. Consequently she was remanded for 60 days to Whitby Mental Hospital for a pre-trial examination.

On the following Wednesday morning (ten days after her original arrest) the Bar lawyer secured her release. Linda returned home.

viction in an action against the police. "It might take two years," he says, "and most kids are not willing to go for it. Even I wanted to proceed with the action I couldn't impose my priorities on them."

The entire cost of the program, at present just $25 per month, for the answering service is paid out of donations, often from the lawyers themselves.

For now, Ruby is pleased with the progress of the program.

"At the beginning of last summer," he says, "there were two or three vagrancy arrests in Yorkville a night. By the end, it was down to two or three a week."

"Most of the charges were getting dismissed. The officer on the beat was becoming less and less willing to make the arrest, go to court without pay, and have the case thrown out."

The Bar provides another kind of legal education for the law student. "This kind of involvement" Ruby says, "makes law a more meaningful profession."

Paul Copeland explained it all as he sat in his broadloomed office on the twelfth floor of the Richmond-Adelaide Centre "Most of us have a radical activist outlook. We're trying to change the lawyer's role in society. This is the way law should be practised."

JOHN GABRIEL BORKMAN

Hart House moves into true theatre

By ALAN GORDON

Well, at last the Drama Centre has produced a play. Hart House Theatre is no longer a lecture hall. Nor is it a museum, presenting the audiences with quaint quirks of the sensibilities of the past centuries. With its production of John Gabriel Borkman, the Drama Centre has moved us into the realm of symbolism and allegory that is the theatre's own special realm. Henrik Ibsen was one of the masters of presenting symbol and subject matter in a most compelling way, in which the audience and the situation became so involved with each other that a kind of highly charged claustrophobia would set in. In The Wild Duck, A Doll's House and Hedda Gabler, characters larger than life were forced to deal with the trivialities and complexities that make up reality. In this basic confrontation between the real and the ideal, Ibsen found a way to make the conflict a gripping one, one that seemed to hold our own destiny as inalterably mixed with those of the characters of the plays.

In John Gabriel Borkman, Ibsen has renounced his characters and made them into animated symbols. He has not bothered to shape his people into people. He has been satisfied to leave his characters to exist as things, as expressions of his point of view. Clifford Leech, in his program notes, writes that in John Gabriel Borkman, Ibsen "turned away from a predominant concern with social issues to a probing of mental states."

In turning away from this "concern with social issues" evidently he has turned away from what makes up the society—people. What makes up the "mental states" that Ibsen decided to probe is anybody's guess. Ibsen seems to think that the mind is made up of flat, thin slogans, and anemic voices crying out such homilies as "You have been guilty of a double murder — you have killed your mind and your soul!" The mind is apparently a place where twin sisters fight it out, over who should control the heart of the man, and who should control the man's son . . . who of course, has a mind of his own.

In this production, Leon Major seems to have gone for the individual moment and apparently has let the shape of the whole play try to take care of itself. He has given us a collection of details. Small things stick out in our memory, but we never feel the impact of the whole. Borkman's death has the same weight and force as Vilhelm's limping entrance. Borkman's entrance into the drawing room after his self-imposed 8 year imprisonment in another part of the house is as telling as Ella's entrance in the first act. We know nothing of Ella, have supposedly been deeply concerned with the mind and machinations of Borkman, and yet there is neither any greater nor any less involvement with Borkman's entrance, late in the third act.

Instead of a careful development of climaxes, we are given a collection of incidents, almost as if a child were telling a story: First we see Gunhild and then we see Ella and then we see Fanny and then . . . and so on . . . nothing caused, nothing results . . . just one thing following another, rather like a cat and dog sentence in four acts.

Of the combined Pro-Am cast assembled for the show, Henry Tarvainen and Meg Hogarth seem to have come to the closest to what Ibsen was getting at. Rex Southgate played at Borkman, picking at one thing in the text, and then going on to another, seemingly basing his whole characterization on his make-up. Anything we knew about Borkman was what we heard from the text. Southgate appeared to be content with letting the others tell us what Borkman was like, and gracefully declined to make any commitment about his character's character one way or the other.

Martha Mann's set, supposedly suggesting the mine and the underground in which Borkman thrived was overdone, I think. These people live in a mine? Why the angled proscenium? Just because it worked in Sweet Charity doesn't mean that it should work here. In the fourth act, when Borkman finally, after sixteen years in one kind of jail or another, has his first gasp of any openness, Miss Mann's open spaces are just as claustrophobic as are her interior settings. If that is the general idea, then it should come from the acting and not from the settings. Borkman is to be enclosed by the sky, not us.

John Gabriel Borkman is one of Ibsen's later plays, and one of his least impressive. He seems to have written himself out. We must be grateful, however to the Drama Centre for presenting the master at his least successful. We must also be grateful to the Drama Centre for presenting a production that, except for some basic flaws, allows us to judge the writer, and not despair that the writer has been ill-served by the production.

Mawande wanted ASU to confront world issues

"If I go home to Rhodesia—and I want to—I would probably be arrested."

Naison Mawande, President of the African Students Union of Toronto, was describing the consequences of his moral and political beliefs.

Presently studying at the U of T for his PhD in Political Science, Mawande conceived and largely organized last weekend's Conference on African Affairs.

"The conference should serve a dual purpose," he said Friday. "It should focus on important problems now concerning Africa as a whole, and deal in terms of large regions instead of small states.

"But even more importantly, it should revive interest in African problems among the 150 African students here at the U of T. They are Africa's future leaders and must play an important role in her future development."

Mawande was elected to the ASU on a platform of activism, and promised to turn the union from a social club into one oriented towards serious issues facing Africa and the world at large.

"To combat the apathy and cynicism facing many African students, we began with a series of seven lectures first term," Mawande said.

"The next step was this conference," he continued. "The conference, which appeared as part of my election platform, was stimulated in part by the Edmund Burke Society Teach-In on Rhodesia, which did not do justice to the situation.

"Rhodesia is not a democracy, but a fascist regime progressively worsening," he declared.

Mawande feels that after African independence, the colonial powers maintained their domination through economic loans and investments.

This economic power was obtained by agreements with individuals, made often at the expense of the masses.

This small leadership became more isolated from the masses, resulting in military takeovers.

"African government must reflect the will of the masses, not of a small elite.

"Only then will she be able to cope with the urgent problems of nation-building, political stability and economic development."

Mawande looks to a united Africa, in which all states will co-operate politically and economically.

He plans on a job with the Economic Commission of Africa, or teaching at university—in Rhodesia if possible.

"The U.S. might one day call the African states Communist, because they might turn economically to the East."

Rev. Hlabati reiterated this view: "Canada will be with the United States on the side of the fascist regime in order to protect vested interests and white lives and to save the blacks from communism. If the people being oppressed were white, Canada would intervene," he said.

Professor Paul Oflin, who taught in Africa, questioned white supremacy policy: "Is the white race capable of ruling itself with such incompetents as Sir Alec Douglas Home and President Johnson in power?"

"The average African income is $300 a year while the average European's income in Africa is $3,300 a year.

"In a land where there are 200,000 whites and 4,000,000 blacks, the same amount of money is spent on the education of each race.

"Although whites are outnumbered by blacks 20 to one, the white representatives in government outnumber the blacks 20 to one.

"And nothing is being done about it," he declared.

"The race war has begun — sporadically but definitely — God save Africa."

Blood drive: Dents bleed into lead

The molar men from dentistry oozed their way to a commanding lead in the Blood Cup competitions as they donated 204 units of the red stuff to kick off the spring blood drive at the University of Toronto.

Over 30 percent of the faculty bled at the clinic on Friday, as Dents topped their quota by 46 units.

Inter-year rivalry encouraged a good turn out. The third-year men tried in vein (ouch!) to extend their unbeaten string, only to have it drained away by the upstart frosh.

Today the action swings to University College for a 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. clinic in the Junior Common Room. The goal for UC, based on 25 percent of its enrolment, is 527 units.

The clinic at 67 College St. will be open from noon to 3:30 p.m. and from 5:30 to 8 p.m. Donations will be credited to the appropriate college or faculty.

Tuesday's clinic at the Buttery will give Trinity, Wycliffe, Law and Social Work a chance to answer the Dents' challenge. If the early results are any indication, this could be the bloodiest battle since the Yanks took York.

Thinking of a Career In Teaching?

This is an important time for education in Ontario. Across the province secondary, separate, and public schools are looking for dedicated men and women to fill several thousand staff vacancies.

The Telegram is now publishing pages and pages of the finest teaching positions daily. Special Careers in Teaching supplements will also be included with The Telegram on March 1, 2, 8, 15, 16, 18 and 19.

Interviews with school officials of many school boards can be arranged at the Teacher Centres. The Telegram will be there to assist.

Teacher Centres will be open — at the Royal York Hotel:
March 1, 2, 8, 9 and 16.

At the Park Plaza Hotel:
March 18, 19 and 20.

Warriors win but lose Cooke

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

For more than half of Friday night's second semi-final between McMaster and Waterloo, Mac goaltender Iain Budge wouldn't, and it appeared an early goal by Marauder defenseman Bill Hickox would stand up for the whole shebang. It didn't however, and Warriors eventually found the range for a convincing 6-3 victory which advanced them to Saturday afternoon's final against Varsity Blues.

Budge played spectacular shutout hockey until Mac ran into a penalty at 12:25 of the second period. Thirty seconds later a defensive lapse by John DeDiana allowed Waterloo's Ron Smith to waltz in all alone and he made no mistake. Less than a minute Dave Rudge gave Warriors the lead and they never looked back (Dylan wouldn't allow it).

Other Waterloo goals were scored by Joe Modeste, Dan Hostick, Don Mervyn and Rudge (bis second of the game). George Lackenbauer and DeDiana augmented Hickox's tally for Mac.

It was a ruff, tuff shinny match with enough chips on enough shoulders to stock Las Vegas for a week. Referee Lou Maschio tried somewhat vainly to keep the lads under control with 57 minutes in penalty but he might just as well have been trying to pour Sophia Loren into Twigg's bathing suit. No way.

One unfortunate result of the ruff stuff cost Warriors dearly. Their top scorer during the year, Terry Cooke, was carried off the ice on a stretcher after being viciously slammed into the boards by an animal charge from Mac's John DeDiana. Cooke received a concussion and the loss of three teeth while DeDiana was rewarded with a major for his cowardly attack from behind.

Cooke was sorely missed by his teammates in their game against Blues. Shots on goal were 40-26 for Waterloo.

ATHLETIC ELECTION

Acclamations were the rule as nominations closed last week for Monday's elections to choose students (male) to serve on next year's athletic directorate.

Acclaimed in Group A were Peter Adamson (hockey) and Alex Topps (football). Brian Hamill (rugger) and Gaye Stratton (swimming of course) were acclaimed (to the cheers of many) in Group B.

But Group C, with only one to be elected, was turned into a rugged free-for-all (as it were) with Gord Cunningham (hockey), Al Giachino (rugger) and Bill Nepotiuk (soccer) seeking election.

Vote for the man of your choice but vote! (for the man of your choice).

BLUES WIN THIRD STRAIGHT TITLE

By PHIL BINGLEY

When you add great goal-tending to a solid team effort and throw in astute coaching for extra measure, the results are bound to be positive. Such was the case on Saturday afternoon at Varsity arena as Varsity Blues whipped Waterloo Warriors 8 to 1 to win the Queen's cup and the OQAA title for the third straight season.

Goaltender John Wrigley was the key to the victory despite the lopsided score. Handling all but one of the shots the Warriors hurled toward him, Wrigley made forty saves including several that seemed impossible.

As a team, Blues were never better as two line-up changes made by Coach Tom Watt seemed to add increased zip to an already potent attack. Watt moved Gord Cunningham into Brian Jones' right-wing post on a line with Murray Stroud and Bob McClelland and Jones into Cunningham's spot with Paul Laurent and Ward Passi. The switches were first employed in Friday night's 4-3 win over Montreal, and the success of the two lines' play carried over Saturday's final.

Bob McClelland regained his old scoring form as he scored three goals including the winner. John Gordon continued his great play with two goals while Laurent, Brian Jones and Peter Speyer chipped in with singles. Dave Hostick had Waterloo's only goal.

The game was fairly wide-open throughout but Warriors who lost all-star winger Terry Cooke in the semifinal against McMaster suffered from their sloppy defensive work and their inability to beat Wrigley.

Netminder Dave Quarrie again failed to impress as he was often caught deep in his crease on long shots. But Quarrie wasn't by any means the goat of the affair. His defensemen were slow to clear while Waterloo forwards were slow in picking up their checks.

Blues on the other hand never stopped hitting. They continually outfooted the Warrior defense and back-checked diligently. Gord Cunningham, although held to a single goal on the weekend was superb. He carried the puck with more authority and checked better than he has all season. Also, despite the many opportunities Waterloo had on goal, Blues' defence was generally tight and effective in clearing the puck out of their own end.

Following presentation of the Queen's cup to captain Speyer by acting President Sword, Blue's dressing room was a crowded frenzy of happy but exhausted players. Coach Watt, besieged by well-wishers and press sat in a corner repeating over and over: "A solid effort. Everyone played well." Elsewhere half-dressed participants slapped each other on the back, and made plans for celebration activities and next weekend's Canadian finals in Montreal. The general consensus was that everyone was much looser following Friday's squeaker over Carabins. In fact, from this corner, it seems that Blues really won the whole shooting' match the moment Fred Pollard scored his overtime marker. Saturday afternoon's title game was almost an anti-climax.

Blues now have three days to prepare for their defence of the CIAU crown. Their first game in the finals will be Friday night at the Montreal forum, with the winner of a preliminary game between U of Alberta (Western Champs) and the Maritime intercollegiate champs. In the other semifinal Ottawa-St. Lawrence champs, Loyola University, will play Laurentian University, winner of the Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association conference. The winner of the two-semi-final games will then meet in the Forum Sunday afternoon for the Canadian title.

AROUND THE NET . . .

John Wrigley, Bob McClelland and Gord Cunningham were chosen as the game's three stars . . . Blues outshot Warriors 42-41 . . . attendance was slightly over 3,000 persons with loyalty split almost evenly . . . Brian Jones set an intercollegiate record when he found John Gordon's lost contact lens in 14 seconds flat.

There was no precedent . . . Murray Stroud played the final with a painfully swollen elbow . . . However, he is receiving treatment and will be all set for the Canadian finals.

Spare forward Pollard gets Blues past U de M

By PHIL BINGLEY

Fred Pollard wasn't exactly a household name to most Varsity Blues fans before Friday night's game between Blues and Montreal Carabins. However, Pollard soon made them all remember when he lashed a backhander past an outstretched Luc St.

Jean at 4:45 of the first sudden-death overtime period to give Blues a 4-3 victory.

Pollard, who saw limited action all season, was playing only his third shift of the game when he scored after taking passes from Brian Jones and Ward Passi. The winner came on a power-play following a penalty to Carabins for too many men on the ice.

The regulation sixty minutes was a dull one at the outset. Blues played poorly for the first two periods yet managed to take a 3-2 lead into the final frame. However, as the game progressed it became evident that Montreal was gaining confidence in themselves and playing stronger. When Carabins did tie the score at 3-3 just past the midway point of the final period, it was obvious that the next score would win the game. Both teams opened up quickly but neither could capitalize on a number of excellent opportunities.

Gord Cunningham, Ward Passi and Paul Laurent had Blues' other goals while Marc Picard with a pair and Andre Hayes countered for Carabins. Gord Cunningham, who played with Murray Stroud and Bob McClelland for the first time this season, Laurent, Passi, Bob Hamilton, Peter Speyer and goaltender John Wrigley were the best of the Varsity team and goaltender St. Jean, Picard and Norman Goulet and Dumas were tops for Carabins.

Brian Jones fitted in well in his new spot with Laurent and Passi as he set up three goals including the winner and turned in a solid effort.

Carabins will have most of their players returning next year and will certainly be a top contender for the 1968-69 season. They have excellent goaltending, a solid defence, good speed and are well coached by Claude Chapleau.

AROUND THE NET . . . Victory gave Blues a 1-1 record in sudden-death overtime games. They had previously lost 1-0 in extra inning to Cornell University . . . attendance was approximately 3,500.

Blues' Paul Laurent (8) fires controversial last-second goal in the first period past Carabin netminder Luc St-Jean. Carabins claimed period had ended before Laurent's goal. They were probably right.

SAC to go ahead with co-op bookstore

By BRIAN JOHNSON

The Students Administrative Council is going through with its threat to establish a co-operative bookstore for next year, after apparently failing to wring concessions from the University Bookstore.

"We're going on the assumption that there will be a co-op bookstore next year," President-elect Stephen Langdon said in an interview Sunday night.

"That's one of the reasons for the $4 fees increase."

In January SAC threatened to set up a co-op if the U of T Bookstores did not agree to give students a 10-per-cent across-the-board discount on all books, create a committee of students, staff, and administration to determine bookstore policy and separate the financial operation of the store from that of the U of T Press.

A declaration between SAC and the U of T Press was worked out, but Press Director March Jeanneret refused to sign it.

The demands now have gone to the Press committee of the Board of Governors, but so far it has delayed meeting.

"A couple of their people have apparently died," Langdon said.

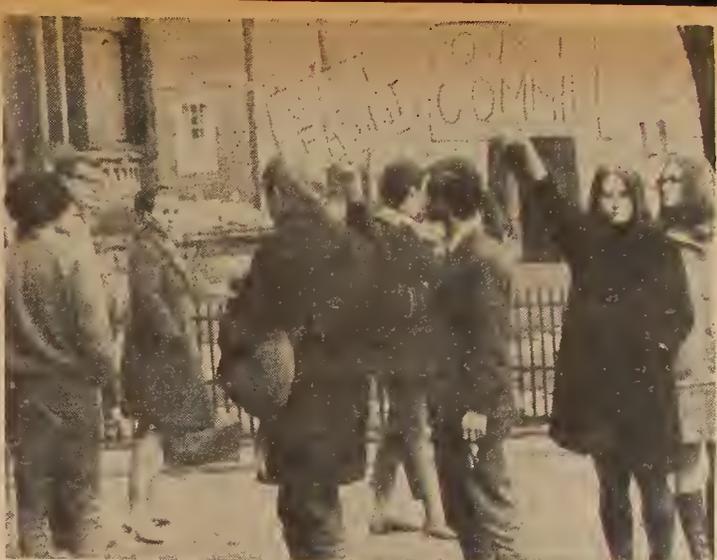

He said SAC would make investigations this summer of the situation at Carleton and Waterloo Universities, which both have co-op bookstores.

Another source of concern for SAC is the U of T Bookstore's stepped-up campaign to buy used books from students at half price and to sell them next year at reduced prices.

"It's good for the students," Service Commissioner Laurel Sefton said in an interview, "but in the long run it's probably a political move."

She hoped there would be enough students to supply both this campaign and the annual SAC book exchange.

The bookstore's idea differs from the concept of the exchange in that it offers a flat half price, while the exchange evaluates the price of the book.

Determined defenders of democracy yesterday picketed the 91 St. George St. office of the Ontario Union of Students which, the Toronto Telegram has revealed, is a "fascist, Communist organization." Fredrick Fletcher, chairman of the Ontario College of Art Board of Governors, made the charge in an interview with Toronto's family newspaper. Fletcher also cautions that persons "connected with the OUS" had threatened violence to OCA students who refused to support the student strike there last week. The Varsity has its offices in the same building as the OUS. "To protect ourselves we've got to get them (the OUS) out of the building," said a trembling reporter who refused to be identified. He said he feared reprisals by brutal OUS Vice-President B. "I couldn't punch my way out of a wet paper bag" Switzman. photo by JIM COWAN

Education hits big time

By KATHY BARCZA

The Students Administrative Council is moving full steam into the field of educational reform next year.

But first the council has to approve the education commissions proposed $12,000 budget — 24 times larger than this year's.

President-elect Steve Langdon (III Trin) and education commissioner Bob Bossin (III Inn) have worked out the barebones of next year's program. Bossin outlined in an interview yesterday the most important features of the new plan.

- non-credit courses to be worked out over the summer and run by SAC next year independent of regular courses. These will deal with general topics not available to the student in his own course; for example, a seminar series for arts students on the meaning of science. Format would vary with the topic.

- interdisciplinary programmes somewhat on the model of SHOUT, a co-operative organization of students from medicine, physical occupational therapy, nursing, dentistry and pharmacy working together on common medical problems.

A project on urban development, for example, could involve students from the social sciences, the arts, engineering and architecture.

- a series of lectures, films, seminars and other presentations under the heading, Focus. Hopefully, enough interest would be generated in the topics raised that several working discussion groups could be formed.

- "something along the lines of a festival." A possible theme could be "what did you learn in school today?" Sessions could concentrate on topics such as, "propaganda in the high schools" or "How we are programmed to fit the demands of society." The festival would include films, speakers such as Carl Rogers, possibly performers such as Pete Seeger.

- a freshman program. This would be an extension of the present high school visits, with increased communication with high school students as its goal.

"High school," groaned Bossin, "that's where the main part of your damage is done." Lectures and seminars on the relative merits and weaknesses of individual courses, and sessions on more general problems such as "sex and the co-ed" are possibilities.

"The colleges, in theory, are taking care of this aspect," said Bossin, "but they sure aren't doing a very good job."

- a summer program of discussion groups for people who will be in Toronto, and, as Bossin put it, "get bored on warm, moonlit nights."

- a course evaluation in the fall.

Bossin explained that money will also be set aside to aid educational programs at individual colleges in need of funds, and course unions.

A full-time educational worker will be hired to help co-ordinate and carry-out the new program. Although the position may involve some research into educational theory, its main function will be practical.

"His job," said Bossin, "will be primarily to get people on campus interested in education."

Anyone interested in the position should contact Bossin or Martha Tracey at the SAC office.

White students on alert to protect blacks

ATLANTA, Ga. (CUP) — Student leaders in the southern states are organizing "white alert teams" to stand between black students and police when confrontations occur in future on Negro campuses.

The teams, conceived at a meeting of the southern region of the United States National Student Association, are a direct reaction to the killing, last month, of three black students by police on the campus of South Carolina State in Orangeburg, S.C.

The theory is that black students stand a better chance of not being killed if police have to shoot white students to get to them.

Several black students at the meeting warned the organizers of the alert teams that they should expect to be "hit from both sides."

One white student said: "We're going to make damn sure that whether we get shot by the police or the blacks, it will still be the cops' fault."

If the police start shooting and killing white students, he said, the white power structure will be in trouble.

"White people in the south may not get disturbed when black students are killed, but we don't think they will let the police get away with killing white students."

Law may opt out of SAC

Students in the law faculty will vote next Wednesday in a referendum on whether to stay in the Students Administrative Council.

"There is a lot of dissatisfaction among Law students," Law Society President Dan Webster (I Law) said last night.

"Although I personally don't think we should leave SAC, many people are complaining that SAC has no benefits to offer a law student. They would rather join the Graduate Students Union.

"What good are course evaluations, workshops in accounting, and seminars on 'Interacting,' they say."

If they vote to stay in SAC they will elect a SAC rep.

The Varsity erroneously reported Monday that George Murray had been acclaimed in the Law SAC election.

If the students vote to leave, negotiations will begin with Simcoe Hall and the GSU.

Tomorrow is election day for Students Administrative Council representatives and College student councils across the campus.

Polls are open from 9 a.m. to 6 p.m.

Euthanasia . . .

whether to die in peace or live on in pain...

"Our hospitals are being filled at an increasing rate with 'vegetables' because our law forbids mercy killing," says Rev. D. W. McKinney, president of the American Euthanasia Society.

Mr. McKinney was "under attack" in Convocation Hall Monday night from a panel of three students and an enthusiastic audience.

"The major and most immediate goal pursued by the Euthanasia Society is 'voluntary euthanasia,'" said McKinney.

Under voluntary euthanasia, a person informed by his physician that he is to die shortly from an incurable disease requests his life be terminated at a future date when a panel of doctors agree that a further prolongation of dying is impractical.

"It is better to die in peace than to live in agony," said Mr. McKinney.

Asked whether he approves of suicide, Mr. McKinney replied with an emphatic "No."

"Suicide is a conscious decision to stop living," he explained, "while euthanasia proposes to stop the process of dying when a person has lost all the dignity of living."

"Do we have the right to play God, To decide who is to live and who is to die?" asked a medical student.

"In the first place we don't decide who should live and who should die," replied Mr. McKinney. "Under my plan we will merely shorten the dying process and lessen the pain."

"And besides, aren't we playing God already by curing people who would surely die if we let nature take its course?"

To ensure that the plan will not be abused, the society proposes that the courts appoint the panel of doctors to make the final decision.

"It is plainly a case of civil rights," said McKinney. "Surely a person should have the right to decide how much suffering he is to endure before dying."

Engineers elect plethora of campus candidates

Engineers on campus can probably look forward to a more unified voice in campus affairs, judging by returns in last Friday's elections.

The blue-jackets sent five representatives to the Students Administrative Council, and elected a mechanical club chairman, a fourth-year chairman and a president for the Engineering Society.

Elected as SAC representatives were James Ford (I APSC), Ted Swantson (III APSC), Daryl Schnurr (III APSC), Wayne Richardson (II APSC) and Peter Hammond (II APSC).

Brian Dunk (III APSC) is the new Engineering Society president, R. Lewis Watts

(III APSC) is mechanical club chairman and Rod Nugent (III APSC) is fourth-year chairman.

Richardson, in mechanical engineering, said the five SAC representatives would be meeting next week to plan their positions on various issues.

"I tend toward severing relations with SAC," he said last night. "The differences (between the engineers and SAC) have become quite obvious."

Schnurr, studying chemical engineering, said: "Relations between SAC and the engineers are pretty poor. I think better relations would benefit the whole campus. We'll strive harder for better relationships."

Nugent feels there should be more dialogue with SAC representatives. "Engineers should be more unified in their outlook toward what is happening on campus," he commented.

Swantson views the SAC post as a representative one "On any controversial issue concerning the engineers directly or indirectly I will abide by the majority engineering opinion," he stated.

President-elect Dunk foresees a busy year ahead for the Eng. Soc. "We'll try to develop the staff-student committees established in the last couple of years. Course evaluations should also be developed."

Dunk said plans for the cafeteria in the old University of Toronto Press building are near completion. "With a push this could be ready when everyone comes back next September," he said.

A more tightly-knit organization for the Engineering Stores is high on Nugent's priority list. "We can not do it all in one year, but we can start a trend toward a balanced budget and greater efficiency."

The candidates were generally disappointed with the light turn-out at the polls. Only 890 ballots were cast out of about 2,000.

"There's still a lot of apathy on campus. It's rather disgusting," was Nugent's comment, while Dunk said, "My only 'comment' is disappointment."

No solace for blood-seekers at UC

Notice to all ghouls, vampires, and mosquitos. Do not, repeat, do not go near University College. You'll starve.

Only 125 donors dribbled into Monday's clinic at the Junior Common Room. Rumor has it that half of these were the gargoyles, who made a last ditch attempt to save the college's name.

The turnout was the worst on record for UC, which has close to 2,000 students. The previous low for the college was 236 units, recorded in November, 1966.

Co-chairmen Carolyn Keystone (I Pharm) and Helen Shapinko (II New) both expressed disappointment with the results. "It's disgusting," Miss Shapinko said last night. "They're so apathetic."

Tuesday's clinic at Trinity was average, with 135 units being donated. Both colleges could improve their totals at other clinics in the next week and a half.

Blood drive organizers hope to recover some of the lost ground at the two-day clinic in New College tomorrow and Friday.

Other clinics this week are at Loretto College lounge today for St. Michael's and at Margaret Addison Hall Friday for Victoria, Emmanuel, Music and Food Science.

So far the response from the fraternities has been poor. Students should register their frat name as well as their college or faculty when they give.

And as for UC, well, maybe they're good card players.

Radio Varsity ponders expansion route

Radio Varsity knows it's not getting through to people, and so it wants to expand.

The cost could run from about $3,000 to more than $50,000, depending on what type of broadcasting is chosen.

But Radio Varsity will probably change over to either a low power FM station or a system called Carrier Current. Either would cost less than $5,000.

Carrier Current system puts up a 10-watt transmitter on each of the buildings to be served. The signal is heard at the extreme end of the AM band.

The problem with this method is that although it is used extensively in the U.S., it hasn't yet been tried in Canada and the department of transport is reluctant to commit itself.

A lower-power educational FM licence seems the more likely alternative. The plan is to set up a transmitter with a one-mile broadcast radius. Later it would expand to a city-wide station.

Wednesday night the Students Administrative Council endorsed the expansion plans in principle but no final decisions have yet been made.

Several Radio Varsity staff members fear that expansion to a city-wide station would result in a professional radio station like Ryerson's CJRT-FM, where only six hours of the broadcast week are devoted exclusively to student training.

A licence for an FM station would probably require Radio Varsity to stay on the air more than 16 hours a day, 11 months a year.

Doug Payne, managing director, estimates that three to five permanent staff members would be required but feels that students can still do a competent job.

"We'd like to keep it student-run at least at the beginning," he said.

Laurel Sefton (III SMC), the one SAC member who voted against approval in principle, objects to expansion because Varsity radio doesn't know how professional its people are.

"If we gave them the $52,000 and then they lost their licence because they weren't up to it, the whole thing would be a waste," she said.

Payne feels that the radio station is ready for expansion however, basing his opinion on the professional-calibre work they have done on a public affairs series on CHUM-FM.

He is also optimistic about the prospects of eventually writing off a SAC contribution and making a profit in five to 10 years.

John Kirkpatrick (III

Vic), SAC communications commissioner and applicant for the managing director post for next year, thinks the Radio should expand since "putting a lot of work into programs for closed circuit broadcasting just isn't worth it".

He wants at least carrier current expansion so that the present programs can be better appreciated.

Miss Sefton also objects to the expansion on the grounds that Radio Varsity hasn't yet explored all the possibilities of the present system.

"They haven't done anything new with news broadcasts," she declared. "They've had special programs but nothing on residences or housing."

"Before they ask us for more money, they should show that they have used their present system to the maximum."

Payne feels that the university could benefit from expansion of the radio to a city-wide station since the public could then get a better picture of U of T.

"Now the only picture the community gets of the university is through sensational articles, protest reports and Globe and Mail editorials," he said.

The question of expansion will be further debated at the SAC joint meeting.

Smug Minority goes under mild attack

The technical workings of a television program rather than curiosity about Pierre Berton's ideas on social change seemed to interest 200 students at Convocation Hall Monday night.

CHCH-TV was taping the program Under Attack. Pierre Berton was supposed to be attacked for the ideas in his new book The Smug Minority by a panel of three University of Toronto students and questions from the audience.

But the students did not seem to find anything novel and radical in Berton's book to attack.

Berton admitted that his book is a synthesis of ideas expressed by social critics such as Michael Harrington and John Kenneth Galbraith.

"My book was not written for academics, for people who have read the originals," he said. "It was written for the people who do not usually buy books; the low-brows if you want to call them that."

The questions were generally trivial, such as "Why does The Big Sell cost 95 cents while this book costs $2.50?"

When asked about what he planned to do to bring about the changes he advocates, Berton replied: "I'll continue to write books, collect royalties and appear on the mass media expressing my ideas. I'm a writer not a politician."

SAC wants open administrative meetings

A delegation from the Students Administrative Council went to a closed meeting of the presidents council Monday to recommend that meetings of the university's governing bodies be open to all members of the university.

No formal decision was made by the presidents council but SAC President-elect Steve Langdon was optimistic that the recommendation would be gradually implemented.

"The important thing is that they were willing to talk about it," he said. "I think that the meetings of some of the committees will be opened to the university soon."

In January SAC suspended its participation in the placement service advisory committee until its "openness" policy was accepted.

Students to invade Bulgaria

Long live Sofia (Bulgaria)! This summer about 20,000 students from over 100 countries will descend on her.

The 10-day World Festival of Youth and Students will open July 25. Although it is the ninth such festival, this year's will be the first since 1961.

"It's a great bargain for anyone interested in travelling in Europe and learning something about foreign students and their affairs," says Jennifer Penney (II UC), a member of the Canadian preparatory committee.

The cost of the trip is $600 including transportation. It is expected that between 50 and 100 Canadians will go.

For information and applications, write the Festival Committee, Box 423, Station F, Toronto 5.

Dr. Leon J. Kamin has been appointed professor and chairman of the department of psychology.

Dr. Kamin, formerly head of McMaster University's psychology department, succeeds Dr. C. R. Myers.

Dr. Kamin's specialty has been the development of conditional response in stress-provoking situations.

"The new bedroom by-law says that people of the opposite sex over the age of 10 can't sleep together, which has got people living common-law all bothered. For all you common-

not quite there

U of T's second attempt at producing a student evaluation of courses in arts and science on this campus is under way this week. Questionnaires are being distributed in classes, during which—with the co-operation of Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen—students are given time to fill them out and criticize or praise the courses they are taking.

The filled-out cards will be run through a computer; the results through the editors' minds and through a printing press, so that by next fall, the student can understand what a course contains, and how it is taught, before he enrolls in it.

Given the sparse descriptions the U of T Arts and Science calendar provides of the courses offered, the evaluation fulfils an important function. So important that the Students Administrative Council has budgeted $15,000 for the project.

Last year's evaluation cannot be called successful. It was authorized and begun too late to get a good response from students, and was incomplete. It used up only $10,000 of its $15,000 budget.

This year's is going to be bigger, comprehensive and on time, the co-editors say, and considering the energy with which the survey is being conducted this week, there is no reason to doubt them.

Now, SAC should consider whether the project is worthwhile at all. What does it really offer?

The Macpherson Commission recommended that course descriptions in the calendar should be written with more information and if this suggestion is implemented, a part of the evaluation's function will be undermined.

Macpherson supported the idea of course evaluations since they offer the opportunity for a lecturer or professor to read an objective critique of his performance. On the other hand, there must be other ways for a person to get an outside opinion on his work.

Participation in the evaluation gets the student involved in his education, considering what's good about it, what's not and what's in that uninspiring middle. That's what the evaluation's supporters say. And that's where the whole concept should be questioned.

Reading last year's incomplete version, it's hard to find any real involvement in education. It reads like an efficiency report. So and so lectures too fast or tries to cram too much into 50 minutes. Mr. X inspires. "General consensus was that the course was potentially interesting, will be no better until adequate physical accommodation can be found."

Mr. A. P. Thornton lectured too early in History 301, before students had an adequate grounding in Commonwealth history to fully understand him. "Students (in Anthropology 201) found that the mid-term shift of lecturer from Prof. Ottenberg to Prof. Inglis had a disrupting effect from which they never recovered." In other courses students suggested a rotating lecturer-ship.

The entire 48-page booglet is full of this sort of stuff. Economics 420 would improve with more application of the macro-economic theory to practical situations. Etc., etc.

The criticisms printed last year — and there is no reason to believe that they will be any different this year — were shallow. The timeless complaints such as the numerous animal experiments in psychology are frustrating, have to be repeated each year, yes. But a lecturer's speaking style does not alone education make.

Yet most of the criticisms were of that level. Many lecturers were lauded for making a course interesting, too, of course. But really for the student about to enroll, the choice of lecturer, is not his to make. Neither is a wide choice of courses in most cases.

Course evaluations as they are being run do nothing but legitimize the existing system and simply point out tiny flaws that can be corrected. That won't make education any more exciting though. SAC, in its educational theorizing, is far ahead of pinpricking this approach. It might have been good when Harvard started it 50 years ago and it made news when students at the University of British Columbia followed their lead several years back. But more is called for today.

Why, the departments, themselves, are doing more than this to update education.

The best example right now, is probably History 347, a course started this year called The Industrialization of Europe. It's a seminar course, which alone is a change for third-year.

But look what they do in that course. They study revolution in parallel to the civil rights movement in the U.S. They read Hannah Arendt and Lipset and talk about the changing structure of the family and the social problems caused by urbanization. All topics so damned relevant you read about them in the newspapers every day. Two weeks from now, when they get to colonialism, the assigned reading is Franz Fanon's Wretched of the Earth.

That's the kind of course that should be given more at this university because it breaks down these bothersome barriers between the disciplines, and shows that when confronting a theme sociology and history and political science and economics and everything must be seen together.

These kind of suggestions don't come out of the course evaluation, partly because of the students themselves — their preoccupation with passing the existing courses — and partly because of the questionnaire they fill out.

"As a learning experience, this course was: 1. highly worthwhile; 2. worthwhile; 3. a necessary evil, a means to an end; 4. a disappointment."

"The material of this course: 1. provided a well-balanced overview of the subject; 2. provided a too-general study of the subject; 3. provided a too-detailed study of the subject; 4. left no conclusion."

"With respect to the lecturer's preparation and organization, I would rate the quality of the lectures as: 1. excellent; 2. good; 3. fair; 4. poor."

These are typical questions from this year's (proposed) questionnaire. The evaluation is probably going to be based on the extent to which the course prepared the student for the exam. Yet, even the Macpherson commission this year suggested a lesser role allowed to exams and lectures and more to independent study.

Professors who try to deviate from the established course and get into their own thing, are sure to be criticized. In other words, the evaluation will not be an evaluation but a marking of the lecturer's work and style. The result could be a sort of tyranny of the goal-directed student.

Better suggesting and criticism is being done in course unions. These should be encouraged and better financially supported. Why, look, the History Union got into a clash with the History Department just last week. They must be doing something right.

where it's at

Sir:
Your editorial writer, and the "Logos" magazine article from which he quotes, reveal a misconception of what psychedelic drugs are all about.

Those who have explored internally with LSD (and that is by no means all LSD users) recognize that there is no distinction between external and internal slavery — that the only chains are internal, though originally engendered by forces external to the person. The careful use of LSD in a process of consciousness expansion involves the unwinding of these chains, leading to a point of ultimate and absolute freedom.

"Timothy Leary's message as dogma"? Timothy Leary, in telling us that we must find our own truths, belongs to a stream of great mystics who realize that self-enlightenment can not be attained through another's teachings: the Taoists say: "The Tao that can be spoken is not the real Tao"; the Buddha says: "He who mentions the name Buddha should wash his mouth."

The psychedelic people, unlike their up-tight friends in the "New Left", have the wisdom to reject not only others' dogma, but also any attempts at their own "knowledge"-building.

Your editorial writer misunderstands. I understand and dig his misunderstanding.

Love and peace,

Allan Kamin (III UC)

Sir:
Concerning article in Section 3 of the Telegram March 4 Art College Boycott:

Twenty-four years ago I was born a Canadian citizen. I was taught in Canadian schools by Canadian teachers and actively participated in the development of our Canadian society. A few weeks ago I exercised my democratic rights as a citizen and took a stand on an issue of academic freedom which I considered to be of the utmost importance in the pursuit of my future as a Canadian. Through my exercising of free speech it has been stated by the chairman of the board of governors at O.C.A. that my participation is somehow related to "Communism and Fascism! Is this a just reward to my heritage? Why am I and other responsible students like me collectively referred to as communists and fascists for taking the initiative in pointing out a flaw in the administrative structure? The magnitude of this injustice was realized and acted upon by the Minister of Education, Mr. Davis. Surely this does not make Mr. Davis a communist or fascist?"

How can a person holding a position as responsible as that held by Mr. Fletcher, at the same time hold such an erroneous and ignorant view?

typing, to wit

Sir:

I had an essay typed by Mary Dale Stott who advertises in the Varsity. I asked her the rate over the phone. She told me it was $3.00 per hour and that 2500 words cost between four and five dollars (or 45c per page) depending on the organization and clarity of my hand writing.

My hand writing is easily readable; my essay was 4200 words or 17 pages. The bill she presented me with was:

TIME ..... 3 hrs ..... $9.00
PAPER ..... ..... 15

$9.15

This works out to 54c per page. The highest rate I have found in other places is 40 to 45 cents. I believe she is trying to take advantage of those who are unfamiliar with the rates.

John R. Saldov (II Inn)

(Ed. note: The solution is obvious; next year volunteer to work for The Varsity and learn to type while you do it).

YORKDALE

Not many decide they want to drop out and get married. More often they spend agonizing weeks trying to find an abortionist. The experience is as shattering for friends who try to help as it is for the mother herself.

Sandy is a second-year student at an out-of-town university. Recently she decided to go on the Pill and made an appointment with a doctor. He made a physical examination and gave her a prescription for a year's supply of birth-control pills.

Then he told her she would not be needing them for a while. She was six weeks pregnant.

Sandy knew immediately she didn't want the baby, but the doctor couldn't (or wouldn't) help. He refused to give her the name of a sympathetic doctor.

Sandy figured her best chance of finding an abortionist was here in Toronto, where she has two high-school buddies attending U of T.

Both friends were immediately sympathetic, but their resources were limited. After spending two days on the telephone and experiencing one failure, Sandy's friend Ron phoned my boyfriend.

He passed the story along to me. I immediately phoned Ron the name and number of a doctor who had aborted two of my friends last spring.

I could hear the exasperation and disappointment in Ron's voice as he told me: "That's the guy we already tried."

"He gave Sandy an appointment but said he couldn't do the operation because the cops were watching him."

I was stunned. Dr. X, whom I have met on several occasions, is bluff, kindly and sympathetic. He is almost matter-of-fact about aborting girls or giving them prescriptions for pills. He says he is doing it because he believes every woman has the right to sex before marriage, a university education and control over her body.

He also gets $300 a shot for his operations, so I guess he can afford to lay low now and again.

I told Ron not to worry, that I had several friends who knew all the ropes, and I would set the grapevine going immediately. The relief in Ron's voice was so evident that I felt he was handing responsibility over to me.

I immediately called a friend whom I knew was five in birth-control months and who should be able to put me in touch with another doctor. She gave me name and phone number Dr. X.

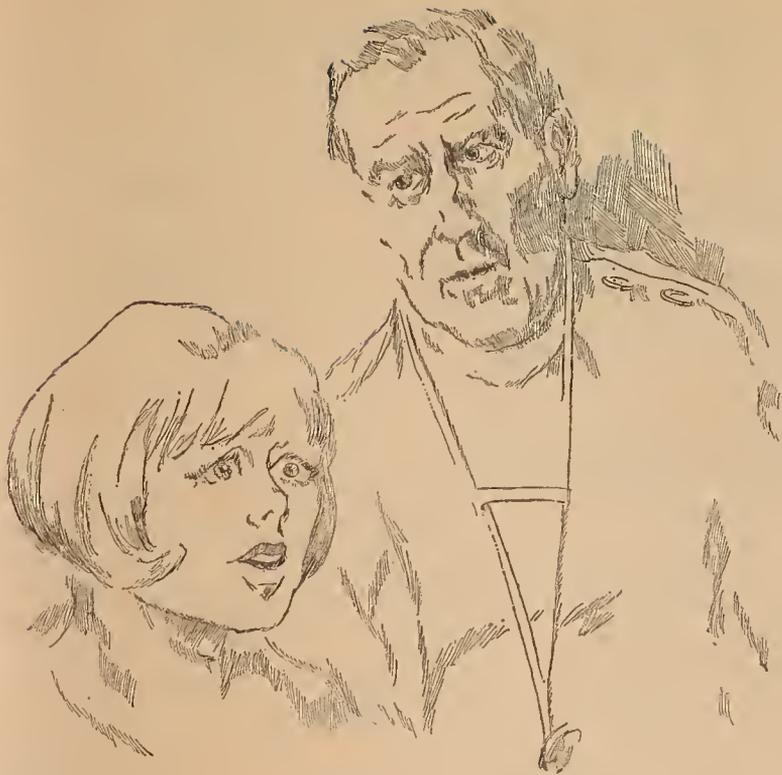

Gail was as startled as I had been to find Dr. X no less co-operative. He was the doctor she herself was sure but she said she would contact a friend who was sure to have some different names.

Ron wasn't at home when I called him, so I called Sandy, who was staying at a friend's apartment. Her voice trembled but she sounded quite lucid. I tried to reassure her as much as I could.

Gail would see her friend tomorrow, I told her. We should have a name by tomorrow night.

But the friend only had the name of a nurse who was "very good" but was nevertheless not as safe as a doctor. Neither Gail nor I wanted to run the risk. I could have quavered in Sandy's voice as she agreed with me.

Elzstein-Varsity

She had been waiting for four days to find an abortionist and she was almost ready to accept a dull spoon and the neighborhood witch.

Sandy's boyfriend arrived and they went out on the town and they forgot their predicament. "I just can't sit here waiting any longer," Sandy told me.

Later Ron told me Sandy had been so uptight that it had been necessary to keep her half drunk most of the time.

After much phoning and waiting and phoning and waiting, Gail and I came to the conclusion that all the abortionists in Toronto had gone underground for a while.

"Ask her if she wants to go to Montreal," said Gail. "We have contacts with a couple of very good men there."

When I phoned Sandy the next morning she hesitated, then said she would call me back. I assured her that Montreal was her best bet, as the situation in Toronto was so tense.

Sandy's sentences were almost incoherent. Her voice trembled down the phone; she couldn't make a decision.

Later she agreed to go to Montreal and Gail's friend met her to make final arrangements. Sandy would have to go through a complicated series of steps to make contact with the doctor, but his fee was very low — $200 — and the operation was to be conducted under hospital conditions with an anaesthetic.

Abortion prices we heard ranged from $300 to $500 and none of the doctors had been reported to use an anaesthetic. (An abortion involves dilation of the uterus and scraping of the uterine walls with a knife-like instrument. This is not exactly painless.)

Sandy left Toronto, more

By A. S. Barker

shaken than ever because she had to go through more waiting and telephoning and creeping around back alleys before the operation.

She was remarkably unafraid of the operation itself. She knew she must find a sympathetic doctor before it was too late.

We didn't hear from Sandy for two weeks, and often wondered how she had made out in Montreal. Then one night she phoned her girl friend here.

"She sounded really great," the friend reports. "It only took 10 minutes and she didn't feel any after-effects."

EXERCISE YOUR FRANCHISE

HART HOUSE ELECTION PROCEDURE

Members are elected to the five standing committees by a method which combines the straight popular vote with a system which gives as broad representation as possible from the various colleges and faculties. This is achieved by a 30% vote rule:

"Up to the number of eight, one candidate from each Faculty or College is elected to each Committee, provided that he obtains at least 30% of the highest number of votes in his Committee.

If there is still an insufficient number of candidates, the remaining vacancies are filled by candidates below the 30% figure in order of the number of votes received."

No college or faculty may be represented by more than three men on any one committee except where three men have been carried over by the outgoing committee; in this case a fourth representative may be elected.

Education as Immolation

By ROB MARTIN

Last Friday 15 students gathered around a large refrigerator carton on the playing field behind Trinity College. The carton was fantastically decorated with all the impedimenta of university life: Varsitys, Randoms, Gargoyles, posters advertising plays, lectures and dances, beer bottles, draught glasses, endless cigarette butts, an ounce of tea, the arts and sciences calendar, naked men and women, negroes, The Student as Nigger and various student power slogans such as Free Speech, i.e. Fuck! and Student Power Now!

The group is chanting "Watermelon, Watermelon" while the high priest of this self-styled prayer meeting and ritual immolation, wearing teeny-bopper beads and script on a clipboard, beats time with a tambourine and harangues the crowd.

"You are the niggers of Academia, You are the slaves of this white ivory tower. You are the numbered, the processed, the cattle. Are you contented? No! Are you angry? Yes! Well, what is the answer, what's the alternative?" And the chant changes: "Student Power! Student Power!"

This is a meeting of Religious Knowledge course 413-A run by Rev. Ted Gale, a graduate student at Trinity. The course is called Creativity or, by its detractors, the "fingerprinting course."

The purpose is to "attempt to draw out and analyze the student's creative response to various imposed gical and sociological implications of this experience could form the basis for a new philosophy of education—it is hoped that the student will discover for himself what these implications are."

The refrigerator carton scene was one student's response to a photo stated series of articles such as Farber's Student as Nigger, stories about administrative censorship of student newspapers and the like.

The student said: "These articles so pissed me off that I decided the only solution was to destroy the whole present mess and start all over again. But since I couldn't go around blowing up university buildings, I decided to do it symbolically."

"The carton symbolizes the way we live now at this place, the university itself, and on a literal level, it's a pile of garbage. And what else can you do with garbage but burn it?"

"However, I don't think that this act is entirely destructive. I only want to destroy what is bad in order to create something good, like the phoenix rising from its own ashes, only changed and better."

Now this is not your average R.K. course, but then neither is Father Gale your average R.K. prof. An almost baby-faced man of 31, he admits to being a rebel who has reacted against the educational system ever since he was a child.

He went to the University of British Columbia as a member of "that amorphous ween students. The problem students have in attempting to communicate with the administration, he says, is the generation gap.

And this is what Father Gale's research is all about. People must be "trained" not merely to react to a given set of data in a predetermined manner, he says, but to think creatively.

People in Father Gale's classes do not write essays to solve problems. They are given graphic materials, paints, dyes, found objects and magazines with which to work. Most students have no background in art and often the materials given do not seem to have any relationship to the problem."

By this means, people are involved totally in the problem, says Father Gale. "Part of the point of the thing is to experience the problem; it would be less effective merely to pose a problem on an intellectual level without having the emotional aspect involved."

Father Gale feels his theories are applicable in many other fields: science, engineering and arts courses. Given a certain amount of required information "people could beset a virtually impossible problem with the idea firmly fixed in their heads that they can come up with a new idea that will solve the problem."

Father Gale believes that "as soon as you say 'let's take a completely fresh look at the educational system which we have' then people start getting terribly threatened. 'What's this going to mean for me? Does this mean that I'm not going to be able to regurgitate the lectures I've been giving for the last 25 years without adding one iota of new information or insight? Maybe I'll be out of a job, because I won't fit into a new system which requires people who are educators, instead of merely teachers."

Meanwhile back at the Immolation, two students are shouting beatitudes at each other across the university-refrigerator carton, which is burning briskly in the 20-m.p.h. wind. One student reads for the administration the other for the students.

'problems' through the use of art media," says Father Gale.

The "problems" imposed will require the student to be highly resourceful and creative in their solutions. They are problems which are by nature paradoxical, either requiring the student to see things in a manner in which they are not actually perceivable, or involving the use of unlikely materials.

Father Gale said that even more important than attempting to solve the problems will be the student's analysis of the experience. "The philosophical, scientific, theological, educational, psycholo-group who were at university in the mid-fifties where people thought things and resented things, but it never occurred to a single one of us that it would do any good to complain, or that we should get together and present a brief or protest about something."

As such, he is very impressed by the student power movement. But he worries that the students, in the heat of an immediate situation, may sometimes fail to see the implications of their actions.

He advocates not revolution but communication bet-

UBC treasurer fired
 VANCOUVER, (CUP) — The treasurer of the University of British Columbia student council has been declared ineligible by the student court to hold an office he has filled since June 1967.

 Dave Hoye was a student when he was elected last spring but didn't enrol again this year.
 Hoye argued that the constitution does not say executives must remain students while holding office.
 The court took four hours to decide Hoye was ineligible.
 Hoye said he would submit his resignation to President Shaun Sullivan immediately. Sullivan said the council would accept it at the next meeting.

By GELLIUS

HOCKEY PLAYOFFS

Murray and Akiyama scored twice and Wyse, Frost, and Adamson got a goal each as Trin heffalumped

UC, 7-2. Brunskill (a kind of plant disease) and Sekura replied "for" UC.

A player known only as No. 7, who may or may not be the famous cigarette of that name, scored twice as Archimedes beat Jr. Eng., 4-1. Moore and Van Nosttrand for Arch and Craig for Jr. Eng. were the other scorers.

BASKETBALL PLAYOFFS

Unheralded Jr. Eng. played approximately 8 miles high over their heads to pull a stunning upset, edging Group I division champions PHE A, 72-71. Callaghan led a fine Jr. Eng. performance with 20 points; McKenzie played well, alas in vain, for PHE A (29 points worth of well).

WATER POLO PLAYOFFS

Interfaculty water polo, formerly thought to be alive and living in limbo, a small town outside Buenos Aires, surfaced with a splash (isn't that à propos; also French) in the form of Eng (Malayan Minister of Tourism) defeating Dents, 10-2. Out of the foam, Engineering Mil-gram had 6 goals and a half-dozen of the other and 3-2-1 Vlassoff! four goals for Eng; Burman scored twice for Dents.

John Huether awarded Sid Smith Trophy

John Huether, pride of Wycliffe College, is this year's recipient of the Sidney Earle Smith Trophy, "awarded annually to the Intramural Athlete adjudged worthiest in the qualities of leadership, sportsmanship and performance." Huether, in addition to a myriad of other duties, has been President of the Wycliffe College Athletic Association for the past two years.

On an intercollegiate level,

John played Varsity football in his freshman year, before a back injury prevented any further participation on the gridiron. The following year, he was a member of the Varsity Track Team.

As an intramural athlete, he took part in rugger, track, basketball, soccer and swimming, as well as coaching the rugger and basketball teams from Wycliffe.

As well this extensive puffing athletically, John perspires freely from reams of paperwork as chairman and member of innumerable committees. Right now as Chairman of the Intramural Sports Committee, he is leading a study on the Intramural Programme as presently constituted and through this study to provide guidance for requirements for the new Athletic Building (touch wood).

When and if we finally get our new Athletic Complex, it will be due to the efforts of people like John Huether, who actually do something rather than writing nasty editorials in the Varsity about Hart House.

So thank and a tip of the Hatlo hat to John Huether, this year's winner of the Sid Smith Trophy.

Enraged curler doth protest forsooth

As one of the "Hackhousemen hacked up" (VARSITY, Wed., Feb. 28) at the recent OQAA Curling Championships, I feel I must speak out concerning the disgusting article mentioned above. Let it be plainly understood that the reporting of U of T's performance in the tournament cannot be attributed to the VARSITY Sports staff (who are not in the habit of "hacking up" Varsity teams in this manner), but rather was the handiwork of none other than the President of the U of T Curling Club!

I, for one, am at a loss to account for such a scathing attack as the aforementioned, especially since it was made by one so closely associated with the team. I find the situation particularly repulsive when one who professes to have a knowledge of the game singles out one member of the team with such tags as "blew a chance" and "key miss". There is enormous pressure on skips in curling championships of this calibre, more so than in most sports. U of T is fortunate to have a fine player from Saskatchewan as its skip: he deserves fairer treatment.

"I must speak out"

The President of the U of T club is a curling "hack", a member of the "Old Guard", an ex-intercollegiate competitor who this year was ineligible, having joined the ranks of the faculty. This successful veteran of what I personally prefer to call the "rubby-dub" era of OQAA competitions apparently revels in "To-ronto's worst showing ... in many years," as he calls it. Doubtless, it is easier to rest on ones' laurels et al. in the stands than to make the pressure shots on the ice.

The Toronto players are the first to congratulate Queen's on their victory, and to admit their mistakes in two exciting games which were closer than one would have you believe. We curlers thrive on criticism. Yet the distorted account in question is causing widespread harm and misinterpretations; we regret this.

Curling is a game of inches. OQAA Curling Championships can be lost by inches. But give some people inches and they will take a mile.

D. Murphy (I Trin)

(Ed note: The headline "Hackhousemen hacked up" to which Mr. Murphy directs some of his criticism was composed by the Varsity Sports staff in a fit of nefarious nebulousness, and not by the writer of the story which followed.)

Most unsung Blue of them all

With fiery Phil Bingley suffering from bookworm, veteran Varsity winger Gord Cunningham steps into the breach with some well-chosen words on an unsung hero of the hockey team. Bingley wishes to assure his sixteen readers that his hackneyed, cliché-ridden copy will return for Friday's Varsity.

"Hey Dobie, get me a left lace will you?" or "Hey Baby Howie, tell Howie, the harness maker, that my goal strap is ripped again." This is the type of comment prevalent in the Varsity dressing room prior to game-time, and no matter what you call him, it is Mike Killoran, student manager of the Varsity Blues, who bears the brunt of all orders.

Academically, "Dobie", as he is probably best known, is in his final year of Arts at St. Mike's, and as such, will no doubt be moving on to new horizons next year. The position of student manager is by no means an easy job. The holder receives little or no credit for a trip that runs smoothly and yet considerable abuse if it does not. Thus Dobie, who has held the position for three years, has been a bit of a rarity, the general tenure being only one year.

Perhaps the best way to pay tribute to Dobie's three years of service to the Varsity Hockey Club is to take you on a whirlwind tour of Dobie on the road.

The trip begins early for Dobie as he picks up the tickets and travel arrangements from the Athletic Office. From this point until we return, he is in charge of making sure that tickets and hotel reservations are all looked after and that all the bills are paid.

As well, he looks after all the little things such as buying oranges, gum, etc. — all of which help make the trip more pleasant for the players. If any question arises about times, expenses, or the like, the general rule of thumb is "ask Dobie."

Now, all this is not to say that Dobie has always been in top form. I recall a trip to Montreal a few years ago when he fell out of his upper berth, landing on and spraining his ankle so severely that it was necessary for us to wheel him around all weekend.

To add to all this, Dobie's job is not over when the team returns to Toronto. For he then must face perhaps his most difficult task — the justification to Mr. Loosemore as to why this trip cost more than it generally does.

The qualifications to be a good student manager are not easily filled, and it is very much to Dobie's credit that he has done such a fine job over the past three years.

AROUND THE NET . . . The five finalists for the Canadian Intercollegiate hockey tournament at Montreal this weekend have all been determined. They are Alberta Golden Bears, Laurentian, Varsity, Loyola and St. Francis Xavier . . . Blues leave for Montreal by plane 2:30 Thursday afternoon.

Giachino elected

THE RINK RAT

By JIM COWAN

Varsity Blues were about half way through their Tuesday practice, working on two-on-one line rushes, when a hard shot hit the top of the net and deflected up into the deserted arena.

A small boy in a faded blue jacket, corduroy trousers, and high rubber boots, scrambled up through the empty red seats and, after a brief search, found the errant disc. Smiling, he brought it back to where we were sitting, discussing hockey and the Blues. He flipped it in his hand several times, then tossed it back on the ice.

Richard, age about ten, looks, talks and acts like a thousand other boys in Toronto, in winter. He plays hockey in the street, follows the Maple Leafs, and hangs around the local arena, hoping to pick up broken sticks and watching the "big" boys play. He is a rink rat, in the true sense of the words.

"I come almost every day," he said. "I got 14 sticks at home, and a bunch of pucks. The Blues are great."

Earlier, when Blues were running through skating drills, he said something about how fast the players moved. "Even the goalies skate good"; John Wrigley is one of his favourites.

"Do you know the Leaf coach?" he asked. "He was crazy to trade Mahovlich. I would have traded three crummy guys." Like who, for instance? "Oh maybe Keon."

Another puck to be retrieved; this time he said "I'm goin' to score this time," and threw it toward the net. It stopped about five feet from the crease.

"Three of us play hockey all the time. My friend has a net, and whoever scores five goals first goes in. My friend is really good in goal, I can never score on him."

Off again. This time he found two pucks up in the last row of the greys.

He had already collected one stick, with a cracked blade. When a puck came near the boards, he reached out and flipped it toward Wrigley. It went wide.

Fred Pollard, who scored the overtime goal against Montreal last Friday, was watching him. Pollard lobbed a soft pass over near the boards. The kid saw it, and fired it back. Pollard grinned, and started another rush.

"That caretaker, the short, old, one, sure knows how to swear," Richard confided. "The other one's OK."

The Blues were scrimmaging now, and Richard moved out to the rail to watch. Brian Jones skated over to the gate. "Here's a stick for the kid, if he wants it," he said. "It's just cracked at the heel." The kid wanted it.

Soon the practice was over, and it was time to go. Richard headed home, clutching his two "new" sticks, numbers 15 and 16. He'll be back though, even if he gets a hundred sticks, because that's what kids do, in Toronto, in winter.

Few drummed up for race

By WALLACE GREENSLADE

It was only a cardboard replica.

Herculeum Grippe-Type Thynne was speculating on the failure of the first international indoor men's hundred metre bass drum race, held yesterday at Hart House. Although teams were invited from over one hundred universities in Canada, Czechoslovakia, Peru, the United States, and Finchley Road, only three turned up for the race.

Teams consisted of two men, one of whom had to run doubled over, carrying the bass drum on his back. The other one ran behind the drum, beating the bass drum in triple metre while at the same time repeating in duple metre the war cry of the Roxolani. If the second man failed to maintain a vocal volume sufficient to make him audible at all points in the spectator gallery, the team was disqualified.

As you might well imagine, this race is a very tricky one to run correctly. Of the three teams, only two managed to complete the race. The third, C. Eccles and E. Bluebottle, ran into difficulty when the turkey drumstick they were using caused the head of the drum to become greasy. Eventually, it became so soggy that the drumstick broke through the head. Hereupon it was no longer possible to maintain a steady pulse on the bass drum, and, alas, the team was disqualified.

The winning team, from Finchley Road, consisted of Ned Seagoon, an idiot by trade, and Professor Heary Krun, a cardboard engineer.

It is hoped that next year will see a more enthusiastic turnout. Another explanation for the poor showing was offered by a spectator, Minnie Bannister (II New). "It must have been the heat."

SAC debates $10 tax to curb residence fees

By DAVE FRANK

The Students Administrative Council sees a solution to the expected residence fees hike — a $10 levy on all students.

But the price of SAC's support for such a measure will probably be the following conditions:

- the increase cannot exceed $10 a student or last after 1968-9;

- the Board of Governors (which bears the responsibility for the university's financial affairs) must join with SAC in a campaign to get the Ontario government to provide capital subsidies for the construction of residences.

President-elect Steve Langdon presented this policy to the Wednesday night SAC meeting. It will not be voted on until next week.

The purpose is to offset the immediate crisis and buy time to carry the case to the government.

But if the administration goes back on its word, SAC could call a fees strike.

"And if the administration makes only token gestures," added Tom Faulkner, "students will damn well know it."

"Unless we take action," said Langdon, "the university will have to raise residence fees about $150." This would have students in university residences paying from $935 to $1030.

The crisis situation results from the amortization payments on New College I, St. Michael's Residence and the St. George Apartments. Langdon charged that the cost of New College had been allowed to skyrocket beyond all estimates.

Langdon pointed out that the university is legally prohibited from using general operating funds to pay residence costs. Residences are supposed to be self supporting.

Langdon set forth the alternatives: Students at New College could pay $350 to $400; students in university-run residences could pay $130 to $150, students in all campus residences $50 to $70; or the cost could be distributed among all students.

"These costs are going to have to be met by students. It's a pragmatic problem.

"It's unfair to ask students who don't live at New College to pay for it," reasoned Langdon. "But it is also unfair for the New people to pay for this blunder alone.

"It has to be a general student levy."

But the proposal. Langdon's first big test as president doesn't seem to be in for smooth sailing.

"We're being asked to subsidize those who can afford to live in residences," protested Art McIlwain (II APSC). "This is insanity." The Clark Housing report says students in residence come from families with average incomes of $14,000.

John Winter (SGS) said graduate students, who, he said are not eligible for residence, would be getting nothing out of it. He wants the levy charged to undergraduates only.

"Otherwise I will personally lead a campaign to take the graduate students out of SAC." (Note: John Winter was not re-elected in yesterday's GSU elections.)

The long-term goal is to have residences for everyone who wants in—the kind they want at a price they can afford.

Faulkner lashed out at the Ontario government, attacking its "silly policy of not subsidizing student residences when the province is suffering from a serious housing shortage."

But the two-hour discussion kept returning to the central point—the conditions.

"The only justification for taking the $10 from students next year," underlined Faulkner, "is that with it we are buying the administration's wholehearted support of a province-wide campaign to demand government capital subsidies for residences."

"If we're going to pick up the ball for an administration goof" seconded Langdon, "we must insist on these conditions."

Langdon is also asking that SAC's support of such a temporary levy be coupled to three further conditions:

- residences be provided for Scarborough and Erindale as soon as possible,

- students and deans of residence have voting representation on a committee which would plan future residence construction,

- all financial records of the residences to receive the students' subsidy be made public.

Fighting Fromm leads poll

F. Paul Fromm, a St. Michael's College student who divides his time between studying English and marshalling the campus Edmund Burke Society, topped last night's Students Administrative Council poll with 477 votes.

"At least it shows we have a sense of humor," one SMC student said after hearing that Fromm—who billed himself as "Fighting Paul" on his campaign posters—had scored the highest of the 17 victors elected.

Other SMC winners were Alberto Di Giovanni (I SMC), with 428, and incumbents Toni MacNamara (III SMC), with 427, and John Karl (II SMC) with 339.

At University College, Jane Brewin (II UC), sister of a former SAC president, Mary Brewin Lewis, led the list with 364 votes. Mark Freiman (III UC) had 355, incumbent Irv Weisdorf (III UC) 348, Bob Rae (III UC) 314 and Larry Robbins (II UC) 242.

The New College candidates ran neck to neck. Chris Szalwinski (I APSC), the only candidate with SAC experience, led New with 128 votes, followed closely by Kim Graybiel (II New) with 121. Rob Douglas (III New) came third with 115 and George Ford (III New) took fourth with 110.

Wayne Hanky (SGS), this year's SAC speaker, led the graduate school division with 80 votes. Andy Wernick had 77 and Bordon Campbell 73.

Barry Spinner (III APSC) took the lead at Innis College with 100 votes, followed by Gail Swaigen (III Inn), 79.

At Trinity Donald Ross (III Trin) lambasted Peter Picherak (I Trin) 145-17.

Jim Harris won at Wycliffe with 18 votes and Rae Crombie (I FdSc) topped Food Science with 33.

Scarborough and Erindale College students didn't hold their elections yesterday. Vic representatives were acclaimed last week—Janus Proos (I Vic) of the Edmund Burke Society, Mike Fertie (II Vic) Mark Nakamura (III Vic), Lee Coulter (II Vic) and James Plumpton (II Vic).

SAC fees up by $4.00

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday endorsed a $4 fee increase, effective next September. Students now will pay $12 a year.

The increase, first in eight years, will finance such SAC programs as the expansion of Radio Varsity, the proposed co-operative bookstore, the education commission budget, course unions, and a proposed anti-bureaucrat service.

President-elect Stephen Langdon (III Trin) suggested the possibility of a fees reduction after the Campus Centre is opened in June, 1969.

QUAKERISM

Quakers subscribe to no creed and have no priests. Each tries to find his belief by experience in the silent Meeting for Worship; all try to implement their common faith in social concern and in action for peace. It is a demanding way in which we fall far short, but if you are interested in the concept, come to 60 LOWTHER AVENUE (north of Bloor, east of St. George) any Sunday at 11 a.m. Coffee is usually served after the meeting and there is time for informal discussion. There is also an active young people's group. Phone 921-0368 for more information.

Faculty blood flows slowly

The teaching staff of the University of Toronto has always had the reputation of being cold-blooded, especially at this time of year. Now there is serious doubt as to whether they have any blood at all.

So far staff members have donated a total of five units of blood in the spring blood campaign. There are about 2,200 staff members at U of T.

The staff performance has never been very inspiring. Last fall they donated 35 units of blood, and in March, 1967, they managed to squeeze out 28 units.

The fraternities also have generally failed to respond to the special drive directed at them. Hopefully frat night at 67 College St. Monday from 5:30 p.m. to 8 p.m. should attract many who have not already given.

That clinic is open to everyone.

So far total of 1,003 units have been collected, substantially below last fall's mark.

Woodside abandons Simcoe Hall post

By PAUL CARSON

Professor Moffat St. Andrew Woodside is expected to resign shortly from his administrative position as the first provost of the University of Toronto.

Although no official announcement has been made by Simcoe Hall, Prof. Woodside will return to University College as a professor of Greek and Roman history.

Prof. Woodside was a special lecturer in classics and principal of University College when appointed provost and academic vice-president of the university in July, 1963.

"Since no formal announcement has been made by the Board of Governors I cannot make any comment at this time," Prof. Woodside said Wednesday.

However, Prof. Niall Rudd, chairman of the classics department at UC, confirmed that Prof. Woodside would resume undergraduate teaching in September.

"I am absolutely overjoyed that Prof. Woodside is returning," Dr. Rudd said.

A 1928 Rhodes scholar, Prof. Woodside has been registrar of Victoria College, dean of the faculty of arts (1952), and acting president of the university (September 1957 to July 1958 — prior to the appointment of Claude Bissell). He was appointed principal of University College in 1959.

Prof. Woodside's return to the UC classics department coincides with the resignation of another celebrated scholar, Prof. F. M. Heichelheim.

After 20 years at UC, Prof. Heichelheim, a specialist in ancient economic history, will transfer to St. Michael's College for the 1968-69 academic year.

"There are many pre-Christian elements preserved in Catholicism, and as a Jew, I feel more personal and theological affinity with Catholics than with Protestants.

"As for St. Michael's, it turned out I could be useful, and I like it there."

Prof. Heichelheim, already past the usual university retirement age of 65, said he will continue teaching "on a year to year basis."

But after producing 12 books and more than 100 scholarly articles and reviews, he shows no sign of letting up. He has five more articles in preparation.

A native of Germany, Prof. Heichelheim was forced to leave the University of Giessen in 1933 when the Nazis decided he was becoming a "disruptive influence."

Shortly after the war, the university officials made amends by offering him an honorary professorship, which he accepted.

Meanwhile, for the two classics professors, the returnee and the transferee, life goes on pretty much as usual.

Provost Woodside attends his committee meetings and waits for the day when he can "get back to my first love — teaching."

Professor Heichelheim continues teaching, researching and publishing, and occasionally pondering the quirks of the modern student.

"I even had a beard once myself," he recalls, "when I was trying to look older."

Compromise opens stacks?

By BRIAN JOHNSON

The Students Administrative Council compromised; the Library Council compromised. First-year students lost; second-year students won—maybe.

The Library Council will deny stack access to the Sigmund Samuel library to all first-year students and grant it to all second-year students, if it accepts Wednesday's recommendation of the Students' Administrative Council.

In the motion SAC conceded that "universal stack access will definitely not be granted" until the new graduate library is built.

"Library representatives have found it impossible to convince the library that there wouldn't be a huge influx of students with universal stack access," SAC Vice-President John Treleven (SGS) said in an interview yesterday.

Temma Stulberg (SGS) who has been pressuring Chief Librarian R. H. Blackburn, said the more demands they made the more Mr. Blackburn threatened to revoke existing privileges.

Treleven, however, seemed optimistic.

"Regulations haven't been changed yet," he said, "but we have good reason to believe that they might be changed to favour universal stack access for second year students."

Temma Stulberg and Ashley Thomson, SAC library representatives, did, however, have good news for the student who has looked all over campus for a book to find the only copy is in another college's library.

The student can fill out a regular call slip at the Central Library, take it to the Catalogue Information Desk to have it verified and stamped, and hand it in to the college library between 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday to Friday.

Then he'll get the book.

BURNABY, B. C. (CUP) — The Simon Fraser University voted Monday to be come Canada's first university senate to open its meetings to the public.

Arrangements for open meetings will be established at the April meeting, and the May meeting will be the first one open.

Dr. John Walkley, committee convener, said after the decision that the opening of senate meetings would lead to better understanding between the senate and the community.

Election of commissioners

Another election for GSU?

The Graduate Students Union, which tried to declare December's Faulkner-Charlton election invalid due to irregularities in voting, is at it again.

This time John Winter, GSU treasurer and school of graduate studies students council representative, wants the SGS part of the SAC elections nullified.

Winter claims two of four ballot boxes used by SGS students were left unlocked, says Jenny Penney (II UC), a SAC election committee member.

One was taped shut, the other was delivered, without a lock, to the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. In addition, says Winter, that box was returned to the GSU building by SAC candidate Borden Campbell.

Winter himself could not be reached for comment.

Miss Penney says the election will stand, however.

"The ballots in the boxes were all initialed by poll clerks and all votes tallied exactly with names on the voters' list," she said.

"A policeman is a bureaucrat. So is a Nazi death-camp commandant. Is that why they got on so well together?"

turn the other

Saul Alinsky told an interesting story in a seminar he gave this week. Alinsky is one of the original community organizers, sort of a Che Guevara among social workers.

His reputation preceded him to a college town in Texas, so that when he got there to hold a seminar, the whole of the local John Birch society and Ku Klux Klan was at the airport to meet him.

The Birchers have been mad at him ever since he announced that everyone was allowed in wherever he spoke, except Birch Society members. They were only allowed in if they produced negative Wasserman tests. He figured this did not really do any good, except that every time someone announced his membership in the Society, someone else would make an inane comment about the guy's Wasserman, and that was good enough.

When he got to the hall he found one half of it filled with students and the other half filled with Klansmen, in full regalia. The students watched the Klansmen and the Klansmen took down the names of the students. Nobody listened so he stopped talking and waited for everyone to notice. Then he turned to the leader of the Klan and said, "It may be the lights, or I could be mistaken, but I've studied a great deal of Culture! Anthropology and have become pretty good at recognizing racial characteristics and to me, you Sir, look Negro."

Silence. Everybody turned and looked at the confused Wizard. Five minutes later the Klan had withdrawn from the auditorium.

After the speech, some of the liberal faculty people accused him of using a McCarthyist tactic. The question he posed for the U.C. seminar was "what is the difference between this and the Wisconsin senator's red-bating."

The answer, he wanted was that to call a man a Negro was to say nothing — only if the man himself possessed the prejudice would it become "insulting."

The trouble is this is bunk. To call a man a Communist like McCarthy aid is to say nothing and it too only becomes prejudicial if it runs up against community values. But the fact is that people jumped in front of subway trains in the early fifties because they were rejected by their community, as misled as it may have been. Alinsky had ruined this guy's life — he said that he was fully aware of that — in exactly the same way. As Joey Steiner suggested from the audience, the bastard may have deserved it but that does not alter the nature of Alinsky's smear.

The game Alinsky was playing was Log-kill, where you act perfectly rationally while at the same time completely ignoring the human truth of the action. It is what a marine does when he drops a load of napalm on a village. It is what happens when a sixteen-year-old gets thrown out of university, or into jail: it may logically be the ideal deterrent, but it ignores the human truth of a scared kid.

Most of us find it easier to hurt Klansmen than Canadian teenagers. Alinsky does. Maybe it is necessary, in order to break up the Klan. Maybe it is necessary to assassinate Johnson, or if you think from the other side of politics, to kill Kennedy. Or to arrest hippies for being hippies. The other alternative is turning the other cheek. And to the extent that that has been tried, it hasn't worked.

LETTERS

what i really said

Sir:

In Wednesday's article concerning the Engineering Society elections I was misquoted. I did not say, "The differences (between the engineers and SAC) have become quite obvious." It is the difference between the engineering and arts faculties that are rather evident. Such incidents as occurred at the Placement Service and the peace demonstration display these differences rather well.

The article gave the impression that I am all for pulling out of SAC as soon as possible and disappearing forever to the south campus. Yes, it is true that I tend towards leaving SAC, but this is only an alternative, not a threat for SAC to "please us, or else."

In the next year we are going to embark on a very comprehensive study of our relationship with SAC, placing unification ahead of division.

The Engineering Society is in no way prepared for any independence; however as our position becomes more clarified and stronger than it has been in past years we will find ourselves either needing SAC and its services more than ever or going as far as leaving SAC.

Wayne Richardson (II APSC)
SAC representative

subtle sarcasm, eh?

Sir:

The article spanning Wednesday's centre spread concerning the problem of the unfortunate Sandy in locating a reliable abortionist deeply stirred what humane sympathies I yet possess. Clearly the blame for the whole matter rests with society which, as is usual, attempted to absolve itself of all blame in Sandy's becoming pregnant. After her final success at finding an abortionist that was skilled and yet humane enough to charge a reasonable rate, I can only say—Congratulations Sandy. It's marvelous that everything finished well for you in the end, and perhaps, after becoming acquainted with the proper channels, everything will be that much easier next time.

Your ardent admirer,

Denis Squires (II SMC)

Sir:

Ekstein's sketob certainly was a lot better than the article it illustrated in the Wednesday Varsity's centre spread: "What does a girl do if . . ."

Mike Geller (III Arch)

bossin boobed

Sir:

As one interested in education, Mr. Bossin has made two serious omissions in his outline of the SAC education commission's proposals for next year. (I assume The Varsity did report Mr. Bossin's comments accurately).

In the article of Wednesday, March 6, titled Education hits big time, Mr. Bossin, in speaking of "interdisciplinary programmes" involving "a cooperative organization of students", chose as his example a programme dealing with common medical problems. All paramedical sciences on campus were included in his example except the science of physical and health education. His second sample programme, "a project on urban development," would include students from the social sciences, the arts, engineering and architecture. Who in this group could provide the background necessary for the planning of outdoor recreational facilities as well as a physical educator?

This insignificant position given to our profession is inexcusable. It indicates to me that Mr. Bossin possibly does not understand the needs of the individual in our Society, nor the potential of a physical educator to serve some of these needs, as well as a contemporary educator should.

Gil Martin (IV PHE)

it goes on...

Sir:

"Gallia est omnis divisa in tres partes": (Varsity quote). What is that? It sure is not the Caesarian section I quoted to you. I hope Julius craps on your head from the top of Olympus or where ever greek generals hang out these days. What a sorry state student journalism is in today surely when it can't even get the retractions, write?

Mind you lets not be terribly negative about your work, you did manage to get four out of seven words correct, and those words were very well spelled indeed, lets go over it again:

GALLIA (well-spelled, you know gallia as in deGall) EST (as in the french (ou)est—the est part of Gall) OMNIS (see the Hallelujah Chorus on second LGM album "for the Lord God omni(s)polent raineth") DIVISA (not divias like in diviant, but divisa like in vivisset) IN (as in in) PARTES (a rather queer construction allowing the noun, i.e. name word to follow the preposition IN (as in in) immediately) TRES as in TRES PARVI PORCI (Magnus lupus malus flat et flat et flat.)

Another retraction, he says fearfully?

Love (from amo, amare to pass ammunition).

Bob Bossin (III Innis)

sac and housing

Dear Sir,

While a clash of personal views has occurred over the issue of residence "reforms", nobody yet seems to have commented on SAC's method of procedure in the matter, which is, to say the least, questionable. Basically, the idea of creating cheaper student housing, and particularly of providing more housing, is thoroughly commendable. However, neither of these goals is satisfactorily attained in SAC's measure for existing residences. From a certain number of facts they have drawn up a report, have made recommendations, and have approached the deans, without at any stage having an official vote in the residences concerned. The obvious deduction is that they are not concerned with the students in the residences, but with the students outside who can't afford to live in them. This is in effect what the report says. However, residence fees are scheduled to rise for next year, so that, even if the ideas of SAC were carried out, and "luxuries" were cut, the cost of living in residence would still be higher than it is for this year, so that "poor" students would still be excluded, whereas the supposedly wealthy residents would not be desperately inconvenienced.

Moreover, their middle-headed policy is backed by middle-headed arguments. Most students in residences, they maintain, come from families of high income—but not all. Most of them are to some degree financed out of their father's income—but not all. Therefore, one cannot say that it is impossible for a student of limited means to live in residence. At the most it is inconvenient—it might mean working a little harder during the summer vacation. If one wants to argue from a financial point of view, what about the poor maids SAC is intending to do out of a job? It's as good an argument as SAC's "underprivileged student" line.

Suppose SAC did have their way over this point what would their next move be to counteract rising costs? Cutting out the residence heating? Selling the furniture in the common rooms? What in fact is a "luxury"? Perhaps a number of residence kennels should be instituted for those who really want to live cheaply.

Might it not be a better idea for SAC to concentrate their attention on new student housing matter for residence councils alone? If there is a rather than trying to "reform" the old, which is a housing shortage, as they claim in their report, they ought to think of this primarily. Bringing down residence costs by a hundred dollars or so doesn't accommodate any more people.

notes...

Not much needs to be said about yesterday's SAC election. Right wingers at St Mikes and Engineering and Victorio and Innis.

That means Steve Langdon and Norm Schachar will be constantly at odds with their council, not because they are extreme leftists, but because enough of their opposition is iron-fisted right.

So campus politics will go back to its normal state — students against students while the real directions will come from course unions and groups like the Vietnam Committee.

And that's nice. Let SAC build their residences and student centre and let somebody else do the thinking. Student politics will be comfortably irrelevant again.

UNIONS

Time was when any man who wore a white shirt to work wouldn't be caught dead in a union. Unions were for Irish hod-carriers, and people who lived in slums. Time was, too, when the unions were the vanguard of social change.

Things have changed; collective bargaining and union certification is now no more the preserve of the "blue collar worker" than beer. Industrial and craft unions find themselves as often on the defensive, opposing change, as they are in the vanguard demanding it.

One of the greatest problems facing the unions today, in fact, the problem driving the unions into defensive positions, is the change in the nature of work. The very word "bargaining" assumes a marketplace relationship between labour and management. The unions bargain with management over the value of that concrete piece of goods, "work". The most serious problem posed by automation is that work, as a piece of merchandise, is being destroyed.

Any union that restricts its responsibility to that of a bargaining agent is bound to be bypassed by events. (See Mike Ignatieff on R-5.) John Crispo's book points out, (see opposite page) this has been one of the less beneficial results of "international" unionism.

One of the clearest results of the increasing complexity of what J. K. Galbraith calls our New Industrial State, with its increasing development and compartmentalization of white-collar workers, is that Marx' easy delineation between the alienated workers and the oppressing capitalists is too simple. White-collar workers are abandoning the Horatio Alger myth, and, feeling the alienation of the industrial worker, are organizing as a collectivity. (See Mike Kesterton's article on R-8.)

Whatever else an examination of the labour movement reveals, one quickly learns that simple slogans and blanket condemnations no longer work.

Visiting The Digger House

By MARY OMATSU

It was a Voice of Women meeting, and Mary Pocock was reading a letter from June Callwood about the Digger House, on 115 Spadina Road.

Miss Callwood was saying how the Digger House wasn't a home or an employment bureau for hippies as she had hoped, but that it had become a place for sick young kids, who needed food, and clothes, and care. And she mentioned how a girl had t.b. and was taken to the hospital and how there were cases of Trench mouth because no one was getting enough vitamin C., and how there wasn't enough food for the hundreds of kids who passed through, looking for a meal.

And so I went by, intending to see if there was anyway that I could help. But the two kids sitting on the front steps made me feel like I was playing Sally good shoes or something, and so I just walked on by.

But I still wanted to help. So I phoned Bernie Frayne, who runs the Digger House, and asked him what I could do. Bernie said to come over, talk to the kids, and take an interest in them. I asked if they needed food, and he said to bring some fresh fruit or tinned stuff, if I could spare any, but that the important thing was just to drop in.

When I got there, David Depoe had just brought over some bread, and the kids were finishing supper. The place was shabby, neat and surprisingly quiet for a house that had twenty young people living under one roof.

I sat down on one of the sofas, and some of the kids came over to talk. They mentioned their hassles with the police, the places they had hitched to, the homes they had left, and the things that they disliked. But they never spoke of the future, nor suggested any solutions to the problems that they saw.

As they were talking, it became obvious to me that I had very middle-class conceptions and that, that really made a difference — I thought in the future: exams, job, my next meal, and they didn't. I was ambitious, that is, I have some plans for the future, and they don't. And what made it worse was that, although I could see the difference between us, I couldn't really understand.

And so we talked about being put down, and being up tight, as opposed to being bored, and about the drugs that they had used and the conversation ended up sounding like a pharmacist's convention.

Then someone brought in a puppy, who skittered across the floor, plopped on his stomach, paws outstretched, and eyes closed. Someone had given him some acid the night before and he was having a quiet trip. They mentioned how the dog couldn't go out because he hadn't had his shots and that they were trying to get enough money to take him to the vet.

But then it was time for me to go, they said to come again soon I said that I would and I meant it.

As I walked down Spadina I was feeling somewhat disappointed, and somewhat frustrated. I suppose I had visions of coming on a white charger, to cure some starving flowerchild who had said fuck to the entire system and was consequently in some kind of euphoria of doing their thing and never being hung up. But that's not the way it was. There kids had quit high school, left home, hitched across the country and been on drugs continually for more than a year. They had no plans for the immediate future, didn't consider returning home or quitting drugs. There was no way they were going to become middle class to please me or anyone else, because that just wasn't their bag. (Exit knight on white charger).

When I asked them how they liked being called hippies, one boy said that his father called him a "bum", another boy, reading from a magazine said that he was just "an underprivileged, culturally deprived, underachiever." Whereupon we all broke up.

Subtlety of manifest unionism

By GRAHAM FRASER

International Unionism: A study in Canadian-American Relations, by John Crispo McGraw-Hill, 1967.

In the recent excitement concerning the Watkins Report, there has been a tendency to look at Canada's links with the U.S. in terms of corporate ties, heavy investment, and generally the corporate aspects of the branchplant economy. We tend to ignore the facts and implications of what is generally (and often euphemistically) called "international unionism" in Canada.

John Crispo, currently Director of the new Centre for Industrial Relations at U of T, has written a book which delves deeply and competently into this field, which is complex and fascinating, and which has had a tremendous influence in shaping the nature of our country—and our lives.

The problems in writing a book on Canadian unionism are frightening. To begin with, there are 516 unions operating in Canada (not counting the various militant professional associations which have begun to use union tactics). Of these, 110 are international unions. However, international unions account for 70% of Canadian union membership.

There is a much more basic problem which confronts anyone trying to do research on labour unions. Union men are very wary of revealing information about the way they operate, particularly to academics or reporters. (To be fair, union men have considerable past justification for most of their suspicions; it is only recently that industrial relations courses weren't specifically designed to train people to "deal with"—i.e. out-bargain, control, pacify, or beat—the unions). The result is that one very rarely sees unions studied or reported from anywhere near the "inside", the way Sports Illustrated covers sports, or Fortune reports the machinations of big business.

In a balanced, impersonal, but very readable way, Crispo reveals a tremendous amount of personal research, and synthesizes the essential (but limited, for limited it is!) literature on Canadian unionism. However, the very originality of his research hampers him in reaching out to the non-academic reader. This is a great shame, for Crispo reveals the frightening extent to which Canadian society has been shaped by Canada's involvement with American-based unions. As Crispo points out

"Under the circumstances, there are bound to be times when the sovereignty of the Canadian government will be diminished in one way or another. Only if the government considers this diminution a serious threat is it likely to protest. While Canadian discretion in this respect might appear untenable to some nationalists, it is a fact of life which most Canadians have learned to accept without giving it a second, if indeed a first, thought."

However, sovereignty is not usually a key issue in North American unionism. American unions entered Canada, Crispo points out, not as a function of some kind of workman's Manifest Destiny, but usually because they were asked. There was a vacuum;

Canadian unions either weren't in existence, or weren't militant, rich, or skilled enough to serve their members properly. (The parallel circumstances involving the growth of American investment are disquietening to consider). Crispo is thorough and fair in his research. Blanket accusations of American domination and exploitation of Canadian workers don't hold water.

However, the issue is a crucial one, and one which must make Canadians concerned about their own political and social nature stop and think. Canada has been absorbed, in one way or another, into an American economy, and an American set of values—not simply on the rather simplistic level of corporate, industrial domination by American capital, but on a much deeper level of acceptance of values. The American unions which formulate an American policy of dealing with American management have shaped our reactions; not necessarily in the terms of the traditional "conspiracy theory" of international unions that all decisions concerning Canadian members are made in the U.S., but in a much more subtle way. The fundamental assumptions of American unions concerning the role of government and business, the individual in society, unions and politics, and class struggle have formed and shaped our fundamental assumptions.

In his conclusion, Crispo quotes a private memorandum written on this subject, which builds on a projection of what would have happened if there had been no International Unions in Canada. This would have led to a greater adherence to European practices, a greater emphasis on left-wing and class party politics. There would have been lower wages, and lower living standards in Canada as a whole. American labour's unquestioning acceptance of the ethic of mass-consumption, mass-production, and the other fundamental assumptions of American life would have been less quickly and less unquestioningly emulated. Crispo quotes the memorandum's bitter conclusion:

"The effect in Canada has been, by and large, for Canadian branches and members of International Unions to "work within the system" rather than seek to abolish it. The end product of this type of "American" union penetration and indoctrination has been, not the development of a generally class-minded Canadian worker, but the Canadian version of his United States fellow union member, a wierd, hybrid type of middle-class proletarian. He is militant, not in seeking a "new society" but with a penchant for a heaven offering continually rising consumption."

Crispo has done a remarkable job in examining the intricate workings of the strange varieties of International Unionism in Canada, and in doing so, has cleared away many musty, cobwebbed theories of conspiracy, domination and oppression, while documenting others. Blanket accusations are proved to be generally untrue concerning the actual functioning of International Unionism in Canada, but the frightening reality remains. We have quietly inevitably, and where total apathy did not apply, usually willingly become involved in a system of operations, values and assumptions that many of us would like to consider foreign to Canada.

CHARBONNEAU AND LE CHEF

A play by John T. McDonough, McClelland & Stewart, $5.50.

There aren't many of us who awoke with a start last evening and began worrying about the Asbestos Strike of 1949, and its ramifications on the Catholic Church in Quebec. John Thomas McDonough, who is a former Dominican Father, is trying to rectify this, and, with Charbonneau, he goes a long way.

Essentially, this is the story of conflict. Maurice Duplessis, Le Chef—the supreme dictator of the Province of Quebec and master of the only Catholic Government in North America, finds himself opposed by the Archbishop of Montreal—Charbonneau—over the question of the Asbestos Strike. To momentarily put the matter in historical perspective, it should be noted that this was one of the bloodiest and most violently contested strikes in Canadian history.

The town of Asbestos is a Company town, and outside the Company, there is no salvation—only unemployment. The Company was an American one; it served as a major source of tax revenue for the Provincial Government, and therefore any prolonged strike would, and did, have grave consequences for the people of the province.

Duplessis moved in the troops, the Quebec Police force who are noted for their efficiency the world over, and these gendarmes were paid an extra $50 a week by the Company and encouraged to drink up the difference in order to be in a healthier position when the violence started.

The strikers, as is always the case, were suffering great deprivations, and could turn only to the Church for assistance. The local priests were willing to help; they could do little. The archbishops and the higher orders could do a great deal to ease the suffering, but they refused, since this would be going in the face of authority—and taking from Caesar (or Duplessis, which was worse) that which was rightfully his.

Charbonneau, however, refused to abide by the dictates of political necessity and followed the dictates of his well indoctrinated conscience instead. He was moved by the suffering, and moved as well by the arrest of the strike leader, when the Police entered and said, "your Excellency, this man is under arrest". "Why?" Charbonneau asked. "For resisting arrest". Quebec's finest replied.

His appeal to the people brought Charbonneau the aid he required to ease the suffering of the strikers, but it brought him as well the animosity of Duplessis, and the reactionary members of the higher orders of the Quebec clergy. It was convenient then, in that pre-McCarthy era, to accuse the Communists of fomenting the revolution of the strikers. Thus, when the workers won their demands, those in authority—the Church especially—feared a Communist takeover was imminent. Charbonneau was seen as the Archbishop of Moscow in the matter, and Duplessis, who had suffered the gravest defeat of his political career, vowed revenge on the Archbishop.

In sinister alliance with the Archbishop of Rimouski, who represents the old, farming heritage of Quebec, the contingent who would return to the pre-industrial era to find peace, Duplessis hatches a plot to destroy Charbonneau by appealing to the Pope (Pius XII). As leader of the only Catholic Government in North America, Le Chef was already in a good psychological position; but he also controlled grants of revenue to the church, for their seminaries, hospitals and schools in the Province. The Pope, recognizing quickly which side his bread was unbleached on, ordered the dismissal of the worthy archbishop, and did not even grant appeal.

Charbonneau turned in his rings, Duplessis did a dance of joy, the strikers went back to work, the church got its money supply guaranteed, and Quebec headed back to the good old days of the Eighteenth Century. Oh yes, and the Communists were so disappointed they never came back.

Well, what are we to learn from all of this? First, I think we should see that there's more drama to our history than meets the eye. For apart from giving us a stunning insight into the Duplessis regime, and the so-called church state conflict, McDonough has attempted to show that there are indeed epic struggles of the highest consequences, moral and political, being waged in this country. At the outset he remarked that his purpose was to awaken the Canadian conscience to its own poetry and drama. I believe he has done this admirably, although at a price of $5.50 for 130 pages, it's hard to know whether the Canadian conscience can afford to be awakened. Certainly this is a reasoned and dramatic argument of the underlying problems of the Province of Quebec.

However, McDonough states that the Asbestos Strike was the beginning of the Quiet Revolution. It is obvious, though, by the way the strikers, after their return to work, forget about the lost Archbishop, and exultantly support Duplessis' Union Nationale, that it was the beginning of no revolution at all. It was merely the tip of an iceberg which surfaced momentarily to give an indication of the vast discontent below the surface. Above all, the Asbestos Strike, and its ultimate conclusion, show beyond doubt that no revolution of any kind could begin until Duplessis had departed for that Holy Dictatorship in the sky. And it was to be on his visit to another mining town—Schefferville—that Duplessis inaugurated that Revolution by applying for membership in the heavenly host.

Contemporary unionism: what went wrong?

by Mike Ignatieff

The first thing that strikes you when you sit down at a typewriter to say something about unions is how little students know about them. Unions, belligerent but fat heirs of a radical tradition, have nothing to say to students, belligerent but fat creators of a new tradition. The new radicals' ignorance about the old radicals is one of the marker stones of the death of union radicalism — the old days when a generation of intellectuals wrote the tactics (George Sorel) and even got smashed on the head at company gates (Bayard Rustin) for the cause of bargaining rights, eight hour day, job safety.

Today one reads the most brilliant intellectual remnant of union radicalism, George Sorel's Reflections on Violence, with a nostalgia which would have horrified that great theorist of heroic proletarian violence. Sorel argued that the workers' union, by using the violent tactics of the general strike, could lead the revolutionary remaking of society. Union violence was the only tactic, in his view, which would end the insidious capitalist technique of seducing workers to conformity by reformist gradualism. Union violence in the general strike would force the capitalist managers back into their Marxian monster archetype, the ferocious, repressive captain of industry, and would thus end the reform of the system which was ensuring its perpetuation. But the workers were seduced; they were as frightened by the tactic of union violence as the ferocious captains; they weren't prepared to bite the hand that offered the eight hour day without a fight so long as they remained peaceful and productive. So they sold out. They fell victim to the capitalist technique of absorbing dissent by reform — a technique which Sorel alone had foreseen in 1908. The unions no longer sought to bring about the regeneration of society. They settled down in the niche provided in the economy for them. They became the fourth tier in the military-industrial-governmental-union complex. The mayor of Minneapolis recently spelled out this progressive de-radicalization of the unions: "Labour's political thrust has been weakened by the very success . . . of the legislative (reform) of industry. As labour's political activity has been dulled, the affluence of labour, its pre-occupation with problems of suburban living, its concern to maintain its relative place in the economy combined to put labour into a more conservative position." Symbolic of the sell-out was the recent sight of David Dubinsky and Walter Reuther, both veterans of the lockouts and the club swinging melees in front of company gates, shaking hands with Ol' Lyndon and clearly being promised a great place in the grand ol' liberal consensus if they would jes' jump over and deliver dem votes in '68.

Not that it could have happened any other way. Sorel saw the dangers of reformist gradualism but like all Marxists he overestimated the workers' revolutionary potential. Why get your lead split open if you can get what you want over a bargaining table? And perhaps in American unionism, anyway, the radicalism was more apparent than real. The goal of collective bargaining assumes an ultimate accommodation with business across the bargaining table. Sorel was right: only relentless worker violence, only refusal to accept any accommodation with business could have kept the unions radical. There are two sad consequences of the sell-out. First, the system was strengthened by the absorption of the force which might have had the power to pose a corporate challenge to it. Second, the unions lost their conscience.

Let's talk about the first consequence. The radicalism of the unions raises the question of the politics of confrontation. Sorel, who really invented the concept, argued that since the liberal bourgeoisie was prepared to use any amount of coercive power to maintain the existing structures of domination in society, then dissenting individuals should use the coercive power of numbers, organization and violence to challenge the bourgeoisie. The liberal argument that corporate politics of confrontation (the general strike, sit-ins, violent disobedience) is destructive of social order, as well as being ultimately politically ineffective, Sorel rejected as a myth designed to preserve the status quo. He argued in fact that all really effective social change is brought about by corporate social movements, refusing to work within the system, refusing to be respectful about the social order.

Sorel's tactics for union violence are being re-read by black power and by some of the more left-wing student power men because they are really the best argument against working within the system which in Sorel's view inevitably makes dissenting groups sell-out. The sad question remains, however. If the unions were unable to preserve in the tactics of confrontation, can students, can the black power men? And if the union men have sold out what powerful allies can the students and the black power men enlist?

The Faulkner-Charlton keffuffle last year over Dow touched on this issue of whether students should play the same corporate radicalizing role in society which the unions had the chance to play. When Charlton argued that students should not be a 'pressure group', and that being a student did not mean being part of a special corporate interest, he was affirming the liberal position that dissent within society should not be expressed in corporate, outside-the-system challenges to authority. When union radicalism died perhaps the last chance for this kind of corporate challenge died too. With the unions on their it was an act to assuage the conscience; it said, in effect, the capitalists haven't done enough, the government hasn't done enough to help the poor, so why should we? And it made one even angrier because of all the union lament about automation. The assumption again was that the government and the companies should be carrying on the job-retraining programs, not the unions. When pressed the Steelworker admitted. "The trade union movement as such is doing nothing distinctive with respect to young people."

He argued that unions had done some things with regard to job retraining, though. He said they had bargained with companies for the right of workers to transfer from one company to another and from one skill to another when they were displaced in the first company by automation. He said his union had fought to win jobs and training for Indians in Manitoba. And yet the old belligerency remained. It was management's bag. The unions had fought for industry councils to plot long-term changes (like automation) in industry, but there had been no action.

One had the feeling after listening to the Steelworker that the unions might have done more than just screw management for higher wages. They might have included among the demands for fringe benefits and holidays with pay etc — demands that management hire Negside, the structure is invincible against the black power bomb throwers and the sit-in students. I hope not.

The second consequence of the death of union radicalism was the loss of its conscience. Occasionally this conscience stirs itself and the effect of the union man's plump indignation only reminds one more painfully of the demise of union social concern. At a conference on rural poverty programs in the U.S. I went to once, a Canadian representative of the Steel Workers got up and shouted, "If the Great Society we are talking about is what we have had discussions on in the last few days, then I reject this concept of the Great Society. We have been talking about an operation where the rapes and ravages of the past capitalist exploitations are going to be patched over and future capitalists are going to be invited to exploit all over again." The effect of the Steelworker's outraged virtue was not what he expected. One's reaction was not to say, 'My, my, yes indeed the capitalists have been raping and Johnson is going to merely make it easier'; one thought instead of how much the unions had done to fight the ravages of strip mining in Kentucky. Had the unions tried to stop the coal companies from systematically destroying Appalachia? Had they lifted a goddamn finger to help the unorganized farmers and unemployed in Pappa's Passes? They were prepared to strike Ford for the fat suburban link worker, but were they prepared to lay their incredible power on the line for the sake of the marginalized in American society? Had they taken any significant part in the effort to train and find adequate employment for the 20 million Americans earning less than $3,000 a year? And the questions could be directed to Canadian unions? Had they sought to organize and to train the unorganized urban poor, the farm workers? One was moved to a kind of slow burn at the implications in the Steelworker's outburst:

roes, Indians, Puerto Ricans, that management curtail excretion of pollutants in factories, that management and unions cooperate in job training programs for those displaced by automation and for those without education. They might have fought for better planning in industrial design—for more human less ugly industrial centres and for more liveable factory towns. Surely these would have been in the workers' interests. But they were too busy blaming the capitalists for all the rapes and ravages, too busy building up their strike funds.

The nice thing about this conference was that there was somebody to express all my prejudices for me. A bald professor replied with what I thought was crisp and devastating accuracy:

"What is labor going to do to upset the established patterns in order to establish the Great Society?" . . .

"Labour is busy defending the workers against the evils of the last industrial revolution, much more than preparing society to accept the new industrial revolution." . . .

"Labour is much more concerned with protecting those who do have jobs than finding jobs for those who don't . . . Half the poor are fully employed and getting little or no protection from organized labour."

"We all know about the housing situation in Canada but I do not see any real power being put behind the public demand for housing and I cannot understand why organized labour does not take the matter up."

I cheered.

Happiness Is Seeing Allen Ginsberg Put Down Pierre Berton

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Allen Ginsberg — beat poet, hippie, pothead, mystic, philosopher, social critic, homosexual, American. And he still emerged unscathed from the uptight establishment of Pierre Berton's "Under Attack" and the Hart House Library Committee.

Wednesday was be-kind-to-Allen-Ginsberg night at the television show in Convocation Hall, where the poet ably defended the legalization of marijuana from the attack of Berton, panelists, and audience.

It was farcical to see Berton, author and member of The Smug Minority, introduce Ginsberg as "the world's best known hipster." Berton — clean-shaven, distinguished white sideburns, bow-tie, suit. Ginsberg — wild hair and beard all over the place, baggy blue jeans, ratty sports jacket, purple beads, flowered tie.

You could tell it would be an evening of the unusual as Ginsberg surprised his host by opening the show with a chant to Shiva, a Hindu god associated with marijuana. It is difficult to argue with a formally initiated Shivite like Ginsberg.

"It would be safer to sell marijuana in five and ten cent stores than to sell it illegally," said Ginsberg. "Or sell it on prescription to ministers and poets. Thirty thousand people are in jail for smoking pot."

Ginsberg had the answer for everything. The poet of the irrational debated with cold reason. He used a combination of repartee and fact to redirect the attack at his attackers.

When Berton said marijuana causes brain damage, Ginsberg categorically stated that modern scientific evidence disproves this contention.

Berton retreated.

"But it causes asocial behaviour," he said meekly. "What is asocial behaviour," asked Ginsberg. "The U.S. government is clinically mad."

The critical moment of the confrontation was a question off topic from the floor:

"Mr. Ginsberg, are you a practising homosexual?"

"Yes, occasionally," replied Ginsberg. "... or rather a practising bisexual. . . I practise in every direction. . . make love to whoever I want to, whoever will have me."

"Break up the family structure," he shouted. "Reproduction and orgasm need not be a one to one correspondence."

You could see Berton flinch at the word 'orgasm.'

"Is there any link between homosexuality and marijuana?" he quipped nervously.

Ginsberg is adept at destroying format, giving the unexpected answers, drawing poetry, religion, Vietnam, L.B.J., all into the humanistic theme of marijuana.

He says the legalization of marijuana would create "a society based less on fear, more on pleasure, one that might end the Vietnam war."

The experience of the Ginsberg truth became most apparent when he left the debating of "Under Attack" for the poetry reading at Hart House.

A packed audience in the Great Hall heard Ginsberg open with the hypnotic chant of Hare Krishna.

Humility. Sincerity. He was on the level of his audience. Communicating. Then his spoken poetry: more musical than the chant. His poetry is sound; slow, halting, words building on each other; then rising tone and fluid thought; rising to exorcism; A poem ends.

His imagery presents the absurd — "Zeus rides reindeer through Bethlehem's blue skies."

As he reads a poem composed on an acid trip, he toyed with the beautiful — "Heaven balanced on a grass blade. . . Horses dance in the warm rain."

Obscenity is part of the beauty and absurdity of Ginsberg. He laughs at his own lewdness: "Pulled down my pants on the porch showing my ass to cars in the rain. . . You can f u c k a statue but you can't have children."

Ginsberg is the epitome of McLuhan's medium and message; he has perfected communication.

He closed his readings with a mantra chant. As Ginsberg went wild and the audience was entranced, a hippie wandered on stage. He was holding the poet's songsheet.

The audience was shocked. The hippie took what looked like sugar cubes out of his pocket and washed them down his throat with a pitcher of water. He was already stoned on something. Wandering around stage. Throwing ice-cubes from the pitcher at the audience. Psyched by the poet's chant he stared at him. Ginsberg stared back. Rhythm of the chant rose. Ginsberg was communicating. Artist and audience on the stage in microcosm. Ginsberg kissed his hand. The chant ended.

Ginsberg later said that it was the best manta of that type he had done, that the hippie was not part of the act, that he wished he were.

Fred looked at the union newsletter:

*"If every union member
Were like me,
What kind of a union
Would my union be?"*

"Brother Smith said that it was aggravating to him personally that some members, even some who are still at a young age, should continue on being so apathetic".

Fred gritted his teeth and drummed his fingers on the desk. Ever since completing high school about fifteen years ago, he had looked down on manual workers. With his honour graduation diploma, he had it made. But now things were different and he was considering joining a union.

It was a choice many office and clerical workers have been making recently. In 1966, the last year for which figures are available, union membership jumped 10.6 per cent, reaching a new high of 1,921,000 enrolled unionists. This was a new high, capping a five-year period in which union membership rose by 500,000. Many of these people have been white-collar workers. Union organizers have finally realized that it is not worth their while to scrape the bottom of the blue collar barrel among the anti-union residue for new membership; there are whole new fields for recruiting in the offices across the country.

"Fifteen or twenty years ago the office worker was sitting on top of the world", says Mr. H. Simon, organizer for the Canadian Labour Congress, "he used to get more wages, and additional benefits such as vacation pay".

"But now the blue collar worker gets more, and white collar people are recognizing that they should have had the guts to form unions, too".

The Canadian Labour Congress has been assisting office workers in their desire to form and join unions, and Simon rates their efforts as "quite successful".

"Our approach is a little different when we organize", he said. "Office workers are a bit leery of coming to big meetings. We generally send people around from house to house, and gradually get them to come in".

Labour unions can thank the federal government in Ottawa for a big chunk of the 10.6 per cent increase. It gave collective bargaining rights to federal employees. These employees are members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada (PSA). Late in 1966 PSA, with about 93,000 members, affiliated with the Canadian Union of Public Employees in order to be part of a union experienced in bargaining.

The trend to collective bargaining by civil servants has boosted trade union members in the past,—for example, when about 26,000 Quebec civil servants affiliated with the Confederation of National Trade Unions several years ago. And in 1967 a royal commission urged bargaining rights for New Brunswick public servants.

The situation is different with the provincial government. Civil servants may, if they wish, join the Civil Service Federation, but they don't have to.

"It's just a 'company union', " says Simon. "Members can't strike".

Some CSF members are bitter because negotiations they have with the government result in higher wages for everyone, including those that don't join their Federation and don't pay dues.

A secretary for the Department of Education said: "We members of the CSF have to do all the dirty work, and the lazy ones who don't join—which is a large fraction of the provincial government—benefit along with the rest".

Wilf List, an observer of the Labour scene for many years sees the growth of white-collar enrolment as being related to a blurring of the distinction between white collar and blue collar.

"Offices are becoming bigger and more depersonalized", he says. "Offices are getting more personnel and each worker is given less responsibility—and this division of labour is coming to approximate the situation that exists in factories".

Office workers have always distinguished themselves from factory workers because they have received weekly or monthly salaries, while factory workers have been paid by the hour. Also, office workers hold "positions", whereas factory workers have "jobs".

But in recent years some firms, such as Alcan, have been putting their factory staff on salaries rather than hourly wages.

Also, many factories are increasing the size of their office staff and the office-within-a-factory setting is conducive to recruitment.

Industrial unions have started organizing offices of companies where production workers have long been unionists. Examples include the United Autoworkers gain of Chrysler Canada Ltd. office personnel, and the Steelworker's gain of Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd. office.

Management is taking more interest in the phenomenon of union recruitment.

“Watch out for more pressure from unions to organize your office”, warns the Financial Post, in a recent study.

Dr. Donald Wood, director of the Queen's University Industrial Relations Centre, outlined the reasons as he saw them for white-collar union growth to a recent meeting of the Calgary chapter of the Administrative Management Society:

— There has been explosive growth in white collar employment. Most of the new jobs that are created as a by-product of technology are white-collar, and most of the jobs that are disappearing or affected by automation are blue collar. A white collar worker no longer enjoys the exclusive status he had about twenty years ago.

— The economic gap between blue and white collar workers has narrowed, thanks to the militance of unions, who are demanding better pay and benefits.

— the “new offices” of the sixties are not only larger, but also more mechanized. Automation is beginning to threaten white collar people, and the “family” atmosphere of the smaller office is disappearing.

— university trained people are taking over management jobs that white-collar workers would eventually rise to. One of the strongest elements of bargaining power an employer held over his office staff in the past was the promise of advancement to a managerial post: the “stockroom-boy to president” myth. Now that employers are looking for B.A.'s and, in some cases, are preferring them to experience, this power is lost, and staff feels increasingly alienated from their superiors, as well as resentful toward the college people who walk right in and take over.

A question in Unionist's' mind while organizing was: How aggressive will these white-collar people be?

They needn't have worried. The Quebec school teachers proved how militant professional white-collar workers can be with their massive strike. And Simon himself expressed surprise and approval over bank workers in Montreal.

“When they found out that management was stalling on negotiations, they went out and picketed on their lunch hours until a settlement was reached”.

“This militancy should not surprise us”, said Wood, “when we think of the number of white-collar workers involved in the many protest movements we have seen recently in North America”.

— boss and employees? — exploiter and exploited? or fellow workers?

This is not the only myth about office unions that has been destroyed in the past few years. Others are:

There is little white collar organization. There is, in fact, large scale organization in the public services and some substantial groups in industry. In the service field, hospital employees are being drawn into unions across the country. Although white-collar people are joining blue-collar unions (that happen to exist in the same plant say) because it is easier to join an available union that is actively soliciting membership than it is to set out on the arduous task of forming a new union, exclusively white-collar unions such as the Office and Professional workers are doing quite well.

It has been believed that the job interests of white collar workers are entirely different from those of blue-collar workers. The “alleged differences”, Wood feels, have been overemphasized, and at any rate, with the changing organization of offices, are no longer as relevant.

It was believed that office workers didn't have a sense of “solidarity”, that management had, in most case, quite successfully applied the rule of “Divide and Conquer”.

“In the past, office workers didn't trust one other, it is true”, said Simon. “But more and more they are coming to be of one mind. They realize that they have interests in common with one another”.

The picture isn't entirely rosy, however. A problem being presented to us by white-collar unions is the fact that two-thirds of all Canadian unionists belong to an international, that is to say American, unions, and the new recruiting drive isn't altering the proportion all that much. This is yet another hold the U.S. has over our economy. And one must also consider the fact that the most successful organizer of white-collar unions in the United States has been the Teamsters.

Then, too, as Simon admits, white-collar workers in a blue-collar union meet separately to discuss their own affairs. The social distance separating the two classes hasn't been removed completely, and there is a definite lack of “solidarity” among the toilers.

Which brings us back to my friend Fred, who works in the federal government, where an employee may join the union of his choice. He doesn't really make enough to look after his large family properly, but he makes too much to want to be classed with the “common labourers” who didn't get that high school diploma.

After all, one should expect some benefits from that piece of paper.

JAZZ

CHARLES LLOYD: "One of the beautiful people"

By BASIL HARRIS Jr.

The Charles Lloyd Quartet in the past year has overwhelmed festival, concert, and rock hall audiences with a music that defies labeling. It combines all the innovations of jazz — blues, bop, progressive and primitive — with poly-tonal, poly-rhythmic, avant-garde classical music. The rapid development of Lloyd's artistry can be traced on four albums: Discovery! and Of Course, Of Course (Columbia), made before he formed his own quartet two years ago, and then the more recent Dream Weaver and Forest Flower (Atlantic). A fifth, called Love In, is the latest arrival.

Lloyd likes to say that he plays "love vibrations" and that his music "is like a movie in which you can see all the answers that you can't possibly articulate". He firmly maintains that "the function of music is to turn people on". And his music is effervescent. It is full of shifting rhythms and harmonies. At times, influenced by Indian sitarist Ravi Shankar and composer Ali Akbar Khan, his sound becomes eerie and dream-like, carried along by the hypnotic, percussive piano of Keith Jarrett. At times, his compositions — and Lloyd writes most of what he plays — are rich and contemplative, reflecting his love for the classical impressionists like Debussy, whose work he dissected while getting his master's degree in music at USC.

What is Charles Lloyd? To begin with, he is a towering slat of a man from Memphis, Tenn., with more hair than a lion's mane and a way with a tenor saxophone that discourages virtuosos.

In performances, he works a pianist, bassist and drummer, about as gifted at their crafts as he is. Together they play an astonishing combination of things that at first don't seem possible, yet it all works. It ranges from melodic and lyrical to wild and raucous; from orthodox modern jazz to abstractions, elements of Indian music, a wide range of Latin rhythms from calypso to bossa nova, a shouting kind of mainstream swinging, and sometimes, too, that underlying element of bedrock blues. "I can feel the vibrations of the young... I played the Fillmore Auditorium in San Francisco. The kids came there to hear a folk-rock group... but our message reached them. Maybe I'm the first to get the psychedelic generation into the jazz bag".

And then there is the incident at Tallinn. On May 14, 1967, the Lloyd Quartet participated in a Soviet Arts Festival in that city as well as in Leningrad and Moscow. "Participated" is entirely inaccurate in this case; "totally dominated" is closer to the truth. It is ironic that, a number of times just before they were to go on stage, the group was cancelled out for one reason or another. In spite of those who attributed the "cut-offs" to his American citizenship, Lloyd was nevertheless convinced that he was being discriminated against for race reasons. Whether or not that was in fact the case proved to be of no consequence when he was actually allowed to perform before the Russian people. On fan described his explosive success as "the end of the world".

The thunderous applause that swept the packed five-thousand-seat Tallinn Sports Palace lasted eight minutes and twenty seconds, according to one newsman's watch. During that entire time, Festival officials were on the stage frantically calling for order through the public address system. "Tovarisch, tovarisch, let us behave ourselves!... we are not children, we are adults". Although Charles Lloyd had opened the program a thirty-minute intermission was promptly announced and the house lights were turned up. Still the applause went on.

"I don't want the beer taverns; I don't need some guy in a beer joint to talk to me about where my thing is really at. I really need time, and my compositions must go on, man; something is speaking to us and we come to nature that way. Whatever our gift is, it mustn't be negated by the beer taverns. I want freedom to sing my song. It should be presented where it's a total thing, a total experience. Man, it's a hard life if you don't weaken." Charles Lloyd has seen the first concrete signs of escape from the beer joints. The Quartet has played only four clubs since August 1966. The rest of the time has been taken up with college, ballroom and theatre concerts, plus new triumphs in Europe. The key in the United States was the breakthrough at the Fillmore Auditorium in San Francisco, where Lloyd became the first jazz artist to play the "psychedelic show" ballrooms and theaters.

The appeal of Charles Lloyd's music is limited only by people who will not allow it to be heard. Its universality transcends jazz.

The same music which flipped the audience in Tallinn, Leningrad and Moscow has an equal effect on teenagers in California, and on the classically-orientated audiences who heard it in Bergen alongside Mozart, Bach, Beethoven and Verdi. Thanks to the openmindedness of European government-sponsored television, millions of people have heard the Charles Lloyd Quartet in their homes in nine countries, including the Soviet Union, where no American jazz had ever been televised before. Yet when he came from the most exciting, dramatic, and historic trip that any American musicians have ever made to the Soviet Union — and I don't discount Van Cliburn's winning the Tchaikovsky Piano Competition — he couldn't even get on a local educational T.V. show!

When he comes to Convocation Hall for a concert on March 15 at 8:30 p.m., maybe it will be shown that 1800 Canadians can get just as excited about a magnificent artist as 5000 Russians; if no one shows up, the democratic cause will go down without a fight. Tickets for the performance are now on sale at S.A.C. Office, Sam's Records and the St. Michael's Coop for $2.00 a seat ($1.00 for S.M.C. students).

Rare films on tap for jazz afficianados (and flick fans too)

By JACK McCaffrey

Did you know that Tony Richardson's first film was a short jazz documentary? Featuring Chris Barber's "Trad" band, the film, entitled Mama Don't Allow is the record of a typical performance in an English jazz club.

But this is only a minor attraction among a whole slew of rare gems that you can see this Saturday (Mar. 9) at 8 p.m. and Sunday afternoon at 2. Showing at the Music Library at St. Clair and Avenue Rd. are two different programs of about three hours each in length. Most of these films are extremely rare, and so this may be your only opportunity to see some of the greatest jazz musicians on film.

Heading both programs is Bessie Smith's classic performance of St. Louis Blues with the great Fletcher Henderson Orchestra; the film captures the majesty and power of the "Empress of the blues". Another highlight of the Saturday evening program will be the 1944 masterpiece Jammin' the Blues, featuring Lester Young and Illinois Jacquet. Rounding out this showing will be films featuring Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong, Jimmie Lunceford, Stan Kenton, and a half hour of real New Orleans jazz.

Besides the repeat of the Bessie Smith film, Sunday afternoon's lineup has more Duke Ellington and some clips of the enormous Fats Waller singing and playing songs with his unique drive and humor, Miles Davis, in a 1960 performance with Cannonball Adderly and Gil Evans' orchestra, promises a smashing finale for the jazz film festival.

Tickets for this important event are available at Sam the Record Man.

Charles Lloyd and his band will appear at Convocation Hall on Friday Mar. 15. Once again it is St. Michael's College that has organized one of the most promising musical events of the season. If Lloyd can match the superb concert given by Donald Byrd last year at St. Mike's we can all be grateful.

Lloyd is perhaps the most publicized (or even overpublicized) jazz musician in the last few years. Besides his highly successful tour of the Soviet Union, his alliance with flower children has got him a great deal of attention. Performing in so-called hippie centres like the Fillmore Auditorium, Lloyd has shown us that, in both appearance and sound, he can outbreak any rock group you care to name.

Nonetheless, he is a fine musician. After coming to prominence with the same Chico Hamilton Quintet that included Gabor Szabo, Lloyd moved to the Cannonball Adderly group. Just as he had done with Hamilton's band, Lloyd simply took over the group. As its musical director, he demonstrated his forceful musical personality and undeniable ability.

Those who are familiar only with his flower power performances may not realize that Lloyd, far out as he may sometimes appear, is a musician grounded securely in tradition (he has an M.A. in music) and in fact can be very lyrical on both tenor sax and flute when he feels like it. Buddy Rich, who saw Lloyd for the first time at a recent Monterey Jazz Festival, doesn't seem to have been aware of this. Rolling on the floor with laughter, the great drummer confessed that this was the funniest thing he had ever seen, and gave it as his opinion that Lloyd just could not play music.

With all this controversy surrounding the young reedman with the hair that looks like an electronic pincushion, it is very difficult to know what to expect next week. But whatever he may do, Lloyd will undoubtedly be interesting and provocative.

It's relevant and it's funny

By PAUL MACRAE

The Man in the Cannibal Pot, by Graham Wilson, Doubleday hardback, $3.75.

Charles Addams used to be the unrivalled master of the slick but "sick" cartoon combined with a grotesque sense of humour.

Addams' work featured almost realistic people with one trait slightly out of wack—a malevolent mouth or evil, piggish eyes.

Graham Wilson is Addams' closest competitor and eventual heir. His cartoons are usually line-drawings, his characters are often shapeless and even "childishly" executed.

Childish eh? Just try it. The Man in the Cannibal Pot gives a good idea of Wilson's depth as a cartoonist and satirist if you haven't seen his work elsewhere.

A clue to Wilson's world view can be found in his drawing. As a general rule, the more evil the character, the more carefully he is filled in. In situations which are themselves malevolent and where the people are willing if callous pawns, the people are simply drawn.

Wilson's sense of humour is as grotesque and original as his art. The cover drawing is an overworked, hack-nied, cliched-to-death old saw about the African explorer in the cannibal pot. Then you see that he's pouring a small bottle of poison into the mixture.

Another example—a man and his daughter on the street. "Look, Daddy—the first robin!" she cries joyfully. The robin is a dead mess of feathers.

Sick, eh? But what emerges from Wilson's mind is a slight crinkling of reality toward the macabre. He takes a relatively "normal" situation (and the cannibal pot routine is normal in cartoon folklore) and twists it. You have to look carefully to catch the tremor.

Again and again he fools you into accepting, at first glance, a relatively routine situation, then forces a double-take. The simplest, commonest objects—chairs, televisions, flowers—are all tools of this method.

Behind the grotesquerie you find a good deal of social satire combined with human misery and frustration. "If only he'd teach us something useful", a circus lion complains to his mate as the animal-tamer menaces them with a whip.

That means Graham Wilson's humour is not only funny, it's relevant. Maybe the university could use a good cartoonist-in-residence.

My funny Canadians...

By BOB BOSSIN

We are funny, Canadians.

I never used to believe that, having seen Wayne and Shuster on the Ed Sullivan Show and found Ed more enjoyable. Neither the Dumbells nor Rich Little do anything for me, and our country's greatest humourist, Leacock has a rather skimpy ratio of chuckles per column inch.

However, the latest addition to the Canadian Illustrated Library (the tall skinny, red-jacketed series including Great Moments of Canadian Sports, One Hundred Years of Canadian Glass Etching, etc.) called "A Treasury of Canadian Humour", turned out to be damn funny.

This is not really surprising since Richard Needham, Gary Lautens, Scott Young, and Pierre Berton can all be extremely funny in small doses. Here the doses are just the right size and, on the whole, well selected.

James McIntyre provides a perfect case in point. The Ingersoll poet of Confederation days was especially inspired by the Oxford County cheese industry, witness: "We have seen thee, Queen of cheese, lying quietly at your ease gently fanned by evening breeze. Thy fair form no flies dare seize."

While McIntyre's contribution to the anthology is brief it is not too brief and as such, is quite memorable.

Most of the early Canadian humour contained in the book is of this unintended kind, unless the early Canadians were more sophisticated than historians suspect. Humour intentional of 19th Canada tended more to this sample from Grip: "If you have a child and beat it, how does that prevent it from having smallpox? Because you whacks and hates it". ("Vaccinates it", Grip explains).

With the exception of Mac Kenzie Porter, all of the contemporary writers included are funny because they want to be. Scott Young's picture of women seated in the stalls of Eatons washrooms holding hockey sticks to ward off purse-snatchers is a beautiful piece of writing.

In light of this week's accusation that Jean Claude Killy is a professional and should return his gold medals, Jim Coleman's story about Nanoodnik of the North, the Canadian marathon star who was disqualified from the Olympic competition (because she had opened a supermarket), becomes even funnier than it was when the

WAYNE AND SHUSTER

Ed more enjoyable?

Globe first printed it some eight years ago.

And there is Nathaniel Benson's Paeon to a new refrigerator ("Bannered like the Assyrian in purple and gold . . . chill and correct as a Japanese apology") and Richard Needham ("faster than a speeding Newfie bullet . . . Everything about him is phony; even his nose which appears to be false is real")

Of course nobody will like all of the book. The extracts from Spring Thaw are weak, even for Spring Thaw. Mavor Moore's Togetherness was hilarious on stage sung by Jack Duffy, Dave Broadfoot and company; in print it dies. And for my taste, Walter O'Hearn should have written the title "Lady Chatterley, Latterley" and quit while he was ahead.

On the other hand, editor Robert Thomas Allen finds LCL one of the funniest piece he was ever came across. That's the way it goes with humour. The book costs $4.95, which is not a bad price these days, and is good for laughs, sick friends, coffee tables or the bathroom book shelf if anyone still follows that old but functional tradition.

A Treasury of Canadian Humour, ed. by Robert Thomas Allen, McClelland and Stewart, $4.95.

Elvira Madigan: easy to like

By MEL BRADSHAW

A boy and girl are romping in a field under a pale Scandinavian sun. Cut to a dank parade square: "Where is Lieutenant Sixten Sparre?" The couple in the grass again: the boy is tearing gold braid from a military tunic and shaving off his beard; the girl interrupts him and they make love. Cut to the stuffy inside of a circus tent, the ringmaster yelling, "Where's Elvira? If Elvira Madigan doesn't perform they'll want a refund."

Last year Swede Bo Widerberg wrote, directed, and edited a film of the true story of Count Sixten and the tight-rope walker Elvira who ran off together in 1889. With the substantial aid of Jorgen Persson's justly lauded colour photographer and the music of Mozart and Vivaldi, he presents all the joy and beauty of their ideal love. But interspersed with his bursts of lyricism he also shows the world closing in on the incautious lovers.

Sometimes the contrast between abandon and seriousness is abrupt, as in the opening sequence quoted. Mozart's 21st Piano Concerto, allowed to swell with the lovers' moments of freedom, is cut mid-chord into increasingly shorter and more infrequent bursts: an upset bottle of wine is enough to destroy the spell.

Underlying the contrasting moods, the austere lakes and rich Swedish forests remain. By the repetition of a striking vista in different contexts, a sort of instant nostalgia is achieved without exaggeration. But this is no pastoral world. Despite its attraction, nature is not life-sustaining for the fugitives from a materialistic world.

In addition to the army, Sixten has left a wife and two children for Elvira. Caught between guilt feelings and the certainty of execution if captured, unable to provide or to compromise, only one path is open to the lovers. The conclusion is as inevitable as it is poignant.

Widerberg's dialogue is sparse and often pointed. Sixten asks a fellow officer if he knows how many layers a bayonet must go through before it reaches the intestines; Elvira recalls the smell of burnt flesh after a fire in the circus: for her it is symbolic of war.

Elvira Madigan (at the New Yorker) with Thommy Berggren as the amiable, awkward Sixten and Pia Degermark as Elvira (a role which won her the Cannes best actress award for 1967) will naturally be compared with Le Bonheur for its blatant romanticism. Yet with its admission of cruel realities it is — and I don't mean this pejoratively — a much more conventional film, a Farewell to Arms if you will. The film has faults, but provided you can sacrifice a degree of critical acumen in order to surrender to its formidable seductive powers, you should find Elvira Madigan a very easy film to like.

Bogey's for real

By ALAN GORDON

No. I'd never seen The African Queen before. And the only Bogart picture I'd ever seen before was a personality poster in Blow-up. But it never occurred to me that the gravel face on the wall could act. I knew it could talk because I heard all those imitations. But act?

Well, act it does, and reacts, with such beautiful timing and honesty that I was overwhelmed by his performance. The whole thing of the movie could be seen in his face. Any film actor will tell you that the eyes are the most important part . . . the eyes, Bogart's eyes, are almost the whole show. I'll never forget the slow take he does when he realizes the leeches could kill him . . . or the shy plea to Peter Bull that he marry the couple before their hanging. All eyes.

All eyes, that is, except for the words. James Agee's words have done more for movies than any of the jump cuts and flash-backs and Antonioni colors have. Agee's script reminds you that movies are talkies, and the words that can come out of the stereo movie systems can be as noble and beautiful as the images themselves.

The story of The African Queen is the basic Huck and Jim, Antony and Cleopatra thing. Through amazing difficulties and by way of the archetypal River journey, the affirmation of the human worth and dignity of man as a social creature, needing others to survive against the brutality of an indifferent nature and an even more indifferent collection of individuals, which we tend to call Society.

Everyone knows that John Huston is a genius . . . and I guess that with the recent flood of Czech, French, and English films, we've forgotten just where the thing began. The Agee-Huston-Bogart Hepburn team has provided the Hollywood quarter with a film that stands up with the best of all of them, from anywhere!

Bresson's rigorous cynicism

By KEN DANCYGER

Robert Bresson's Mouchette currently at Cinecity, is a difficult film to enjoy. It is a film, rather, to appreciate.

This is a sad, strong story as presented by Bresson's penetrating camera. The action is slow, the events trivial. Bresson has accommodated the style of the film to Mouchette's life. Her relentless pain is juxtaposed against the drabness of her surroundings.

Mouchette is a young girl, just beyond puberty. We've all known her — embarrassingly poor, hostile, given to fantasize at the slightest provocation.

Unlike the other girls, she returns home from school through the forest. Its mysteriousness provides a proper local point for her fantasy life. Not unlike her mind, the forest is also subject to sudden violence — the cruel snaring of a pigeon or a rabbit hunt, a fantasized murder.

Mouchette is jealous of her classmates. They have boy-friends; they use perfume. She feels feminine but cannot or is not allowed to articulate it. When she feels attracted to a boy at a fair, her father intervenes and slaps her. When she is raped by a poacher, she is ambivalently proud — she has a "lover". When she shares her experience with a neighbour, she is called a slut. Even these happy fantasies are denied her.

The film is about Mouchette — one girl, but it may be taken on several levels. There are many Mouchettes. Should poverty condemn one? There is no dignity for Mouchette. She is always treated like a slut, as if she had no legitimate feelings.

The church is present throughout the film — the bells are always ringing. But in the end, the girl dies. She doesn't consult a priest as did Von Sydow in Winter Light. Bergman admitted the fallibility of the church; Bresson obviates and censures it.

Unlike Meursault, Mouchette does wish to be part of society, but it relentlessly persecutes her for her background and her idiosyncracies. Her condemnation is more poignant than that of Camus' hero. She is young, more helpless. She doesn't even have to reconcile herself to death, if it follows naturally.

Mouchette is almost an "anti-movie". Bresson uses amateur actors, very little dialogue, no elaborate settings, no colour. He dwells on trivial details for the longest time — but this is the construction of a tragic life, as it must seem in real life.

Kwaidan: beautiful, moral folk tales

By GRAHAM FRASER

This week, The New Yorker presented one of the most beautiful Japanese films ever to be shown on this continent.

Kwaidan is a series of four folk-tales; the kind of mystic, frightening, yet moral tales that make children shiver with delicious fear, and snuggle more warmly into a little ball under the blankets, or huddle together and watch the campfire crackle and flicker. Unlike the Germanic tales that Grimm made immortal, there is a depth and meaning to these stories. Men are betrayed by their own faithlessness, anger or sacrilege rather than by the sadistic whims of the forces of evil.

The four tales have this one unity; there are secrets that must be kept, and trust which must not be broken.

The first two tales dwell on the bond of trust which must be kept between Man and Woman — and the secrets which Woman must keep from Man.

The second pair of tales could be said to deal with Man's respect for the dead; or, specifically, the mysteries and reverence surrounding heroes of the past.

Kobayashi, who also directed

Harakiri, has maintained his duality of a structure of traditional Japanese formalism on the one hand, and individuals working out their human problems within the demands of these tradition on the other.

However, while films like Harakiri and Yojimbo stress the bloody, realism of Japan's fierce often senseless Code of Samurai Life, Kwaidan glows with the depth and beauty of Japanese folklore. Kobayashi sketches his panoramic tales in pastel colours, using painted backdrops and stage settings which magnify rather than destroy the mystic sense of make-believe that the film conveys.

Kwaidan is essentially a collection of ghost stories; how the supernatural intervenes when men have broken faith. The first describes a poverty-stricken samurai who divorces his beautiful weaver-wife to marry the rich, plain daughter of a powerful noble, and incurs himself in the noble's service. At the end of the term, he throws up his unhappy marriage to return to his first wife.

The second tale tells of a woodcutter who is saved from freezing by the intervention of a Spirit of the Snows. Later, he marries a beautiful orphaned woman whom he meets travelling through his village.

In both of these tales, the mysterious silence that rests between Man and Woman is extended into the supernatural. It is an extension which is subtle, and terrifying in its force and impact.

In approaching the dangers of sacrilege that hover about those who delve into the secrets of the past, Kobayashi is more ambiguous. However, the third tale, in dramatizing the mediaeval battles that live in folk-chans and ancient scrolls, presents the heroic legends of war with a respect and grace that is quite stunning to a Western viewer brought up on Hollywood's tradition of plastic sacrilege.

The fourth tale, concerning the eerie fate of a 19th-century writer who digs too deeply into the mysteries of the past, is the weakest of the four. Nonetheless, it is the only blemish on a film that is a unique experience for westerners in sensing the richness of the Japanese heritage.

'The Soldiers' is incredible tour de force for Colicos

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Gaudily garbed patrons arched eyebrows, swished furs, and withered their fellows with scrutinizing glares. Pseudo sophistication filled the air as lovelies frolicked in the perennial fun fest "Find the Celebrity," while Honest Ed Mirvish counted the gate receipts from one of Toronto's grooviest theatre soirees ever.

The occasion (Go directly to Jail if you haven't guessed by now) was the English-language premiere of Rolf Hochhuth's controversial "historical" drama, The Soldiers, and hey man, there it was at our very own Royal Alex.

Finally the tinkling started and people moved slowly to their seats still murmuring over their conquests (Did you see Pierre Berton? Isn't he tall?). They continued to murmur through a drawn-out and rather meaningless prologue, through five seconds of Act I, and then they gasped with amazement. Wasn't that Winston Churchill stalking out onto the stage? Wow!

of course it wasn't Churchill, but John Colicos' stunning entrance as Britain's great leader shocked the crowd into a frenzied burst of applause.

From that point on, I'm afraid, the play retained only a cursory meaning for me. I was watching Colicos . . . or was it Churchill? After the initial few moments of shock, for all intents and purposes there was Churchill on the stage. It was magic. It had to be. No one was that convincing.

There he was—smoking a raucous cigar, floundering with rage, stalking back and forth on his cane, making history with aphorisms. Come off it, Winnie, you died a couple of years ago.

That was the story of Hochhuth's play as presented by Theatre Toronto to the mass of thousands. Colicos, as Churchill, overshadowed everything. Hochhuth's allegations concerning Churchill's guilt in the Sikorski affair and the fire bombing of Dresden paled beside the towering strength and oratory of the Prime Minister.

Whether it was actually intended by the German playwright or whether it was merely the strength of Colicos' performance, the point of The Soldiers that came through to the audience was not the sometime inhumanity of Churchill but his greatness.

What all the fuss was about in Britain, where the play was banned, is hard to imagine once you actually got down to viewing it.

It is entirely irrelevant to the play whether Churchill did in fact have Sikorski murdered, or even that he ordered the horrible firing of Dresden. What matters is the fact of Churchill performing in the theatre of war. Hochhuth records for us two "day in the life" decisions of the sort that came to him often in his unavoidable, bellicose role.

Churchill's greatness (but only as a war-time leader, note) comes through because he is courageous enough to make these decisions and defend them, despite their repugnance. When faced with the harsh realities of war, what does an idealist do? He can't depend on a Hitler being nice, argues Churchill.

In the key confrontation scene between Churchill and the Bishop of Chichester, I (who vehemently oppose American napalming etc.) found myself being carried away by and agreeing with Churchill's rationalization of Dresden.

Whether that says something about me or the play, I don't know, but at any rate The Soldiers is not to be missed by anyone with a fair-ora meddling mind.

Churchill (John Colicos) confronts Sikorski (Eric House)

Audience of the world react!

By JIM WARK

Enjoy, Enjoy

I think it's time the Review critically considered audiences around here. As a second-year spear-carrier and progress-sweller, I offer a few observations from the point of view of both an active and a passive witness to the many forms drama takes in this city. That's "witness" as in "bear witness", because even if you're sitting in the back row of a rotten lecture, you're taking part in something vaguely religious.

Arthur Miller said this about what he's trying to do to his audience:

"My concept of the audience is of a public each member of which is carrying about with him what he thinks is an anxiety, or a hope, or a preoccupation which is his alone and isolates him from mankind; and in this respect at least the function of the play is to reveal him to himself so that he may touch others by virtue of his mutuality with them."

What emerges in Miller's statement, in his work, and in almost every good attempt at communication, is a concern for the response each one of his listeners makes as a genuine individual. That is what distinguishes propaganda from art, and Nathan Coben from a theatre-goer. The purpose of seeing drama is, after all, to enjoy yourself while hearing what an author has to say to you; people who allow artificial critical standards to interfere with this learning experience are doing more to debase the standards of theatre than to maintain them.

Let's get specific and consider what practical and immediate things we can accomplish as audience members. To start with, there are two groups our responses are directed to: management and labour. We can turn the actors on, get them warm and excited, we can even get a cold pedant to put something of himself into his teaching. As for the producers and theatre-owners and bosses at Simcoe Hall, we can tell them what we like and to give us lots more of it; we can tell them what's so rotten we can't stand it, and hope they'll give us lot's less of it. All this not so much as politicians (though the political role is important) but as audience — as fellow participants in a learning experience.

It is because negative response cannot spoil people's performance in the cinematic medium that I strongly urge all movie-goers to start expressing themselves at movies. If, for instance, people started to hiss and boo and groan after every poorly photographed, thoughtlessly-edited and insultingly-narrated travelogue, the balance-sheet minds in the Odeon chain might get the message and relieve us of this intolerable burden. If people cheered and whistled when Peter Rowe's Buffalo Airport Visions was shown as a short, we would not only be contributing to improvement of movie programmes, but we would be creating a market for the fledgling Canadian film industry. Discover your latent power, and you can change the world.

Because of the added dimension of direct, effective communication with the cast, live theatre demands more artful response from the audience. What it need from us is loving, directed encouragement. If Leon Major saw how much we turn on to Edward II, we'd get more Marlowe and less Victorian melodrama. Pray God that Theatre Toronto doesn't die because people didn't encourage it by buying tickets and forking over deluges of thunderous, pleased applause.

Applause and laughter can accomplish something much more direct and more important for all concerned. It can bring a production to life; cues are picked up more rapidly, emotion is portrayed and felt more vividly; most of all, the audience joins in a creative experience. Because we're all helping the actors live the lives of the persona, we're part of those lives, and when they're over, we've learned from them as much as if we'd lived them. Even in a lecture: if your audience response makes it a dialogue between the lecturer and the student group, you will have come into contact, not just with facts, but with a man.

Ilya Ehrenberg expressed it with a fine, moving eloquence:

"In art, I am primarily a consumer. Not only when I look at the canvases of Picasso and Matisse, but also when reading books I like, I do not stop to consider how they were fashioned. Like any art lover or reader, I give myself to the work and let my imagination build upon it. To my way of thinking, responding to art is a creative process, which can broaden and enrich a person's inner life."

"It's wonderful to be here, It's certainly a thrill. You're such a lovely audience, We'd like to take you home with us, We'd love to take you home, the singer's going to sing a song, And he wants you all to sing along."

John Lennon and Paul McCartney.

BLOC-NOTES

A Lecture

The Centre For The Study Of Drama is planning a free lecture and film on the Drottningholm Court Theatre. The lecture will be delivered by the theatre's director, Dr. Gustaf Hillestrom in Cartwright Hall, St. Hilda's College, 3:00 p.m. Friday, March 15.

Dr. Gustaf Hillestrom directs the world's most completely preserved 18th century theatrical landmark, the Drottningholm Court Theatre just outside Stockholm.

The theater flowered as the personal project of Sweden's King Gustaf III during the late 1700's, and Dr. Hillestrom might be regarded as a present-day representative of the culture of that period. His flair for elegance, his broad aesthetic and humanistic interests and even his descent are Gustavian. His ancestor Pehr Hillestrom was a popular painter in the court of the historic monarch.

Young aristocrats of Gustavian days broadened their education through travels to Europe's cultural centers. As a student, Dr. Hillestrom's training was implemented by visits to all the theaters and museums on the continent, focussing on Italy.

In 1942 Dr. Hillestrom was given the task of bringing order to the long-neglected archives and library of the Drottningholm Theater. His employer was Professor Agne Beijer. It was Prof. Beijer who by mere chance stumbled upon and rediscovered the theater in 1922 after 120 years of oblivion.

In 1948 Dr. Hillestrom succeeded Professor Beijer as director of the theater and its museum. In his era the Drottningholm Theater has developed into a living theater with regular summer seasons made possible through collaboration with the Royal Opera in Stockholm and other important support.

To many people Dr. Hillestrom is the Drottningholm Court Theater. The more than 20 years he has been affiliated with the theater have seen him as theatrical manager, impresario, PR-agent and museum and library director. His most important responsibility, he says, has been the planning of the summer performances. He has personally attended every performance of these 20 years.

During the summer he literally lives at Drottningholm. His charming summer house is the castle's former laundry called "The Calm." When summer is over he moves to Stockholm where he has his office in the library of the Theater Museum. The museum contains 42,000 volumes and 50,000 stage paintings, set designs and portraits of artists. However, the original 18th century stage settings designed for Drottningholm are still in the theater and are in regular use today.

Dr. Hillestrom also is one of Sweden's most prolific writers in the field of theater history. Apart from theater he is a fine and devoted collector of Chinese porcelain, especially of Tang figurines. This spring his collection will be displayed in the Museum of Far Eastern Antiquities in Stockholm.

Garbled Box

This issue took seed when Graham Fraser was asked to speak to the Worker's Educational Association, and began to run into some fairly challenging questions about why students were so preoccupied with their own problems, and why they weren't interested in labour.

A number of problems immediately arose. For one thing, the men at the W.E.A. were right; most students aren't interested in labour.

So, ho ho, given the topic, given that the Review staff has collectively 346 essays due in three weeks, given that the exam timetable went up in the middle of the production-afternoon driving dozens into deep depression, it was a pretty mixed up issue. Tarvainen had the gall to bring in a press release (A PRESS RELEASE!!!) instead of a column, and leave ten minutes later to prance upon the boards of dramaturge. Rod had a quieter day than usual; only one or two manic fits of leaping onto tables and bowling. Barbara and Stephen debated the relative neurotic feeliness and/or intraversion of Marx and Bakunin, while Rae and Pargiter campaigned. Goddard and Pape in relative agreement about Cage and Duchamp, while Ignatieff entered, typed virulently and violently and then left. Fraser waxed ecstatic about soft-core pornography in Honor Blackman's pics as Havens tried to sort out Zoological critiques of The Naked Ape. Salut, baby,—only one more time!

Theatre

Things are slow all over. We were screwed out of tickets for The Soldiers, but Rod saw it and didn't know he would have to review it at the time ... Tynan and Olivier haven't show up yet, but if you can get seats, from all reports this sounds like a good one to see. Charlie Brown is still aroun' and Sarah Binks is still at the Central Library theatre. It's very funny and they are offering special student prices. Either Sunday show will cost us a buck, and any other weekday show will cost us a buck and a half.

That's cheaper than the movies, and its all live and funny. The National Theatre School is accepting applications now for the acting, technical and design courses. The adress for more information is:

National Theatre School,
407 St. Laurent Boul.,
Montreal, 1, P.Q.

Tomorrow, Strafford is having Public Dress rehearsals of their touring production of Midsummer Nights Dream ... call the Toronto number for tickets ... They aren't reserved ... they're on a first come first served basis, but there are some left. That's all for now ... Maybe next week we'll have seen The Soldiers ...

Film

A reliable source informs us that the Ontario censors are responsible for the high-prices for Ulysses and for the fourweek only engagement policy as well. They ostensibly wish to discourage would-be-viewers with a prurient interest. It is unclear whether all such people are presumed to be of slight means or whether they well-to-do have somehow earned the right to indulge themselves.

In British Columbia all publicity for Ulysses must carry the warning "This film may shock and disgust you." What kind of patron do they think that will attract?

M. B.

Music

Ryerson's bacchanal of all that's new continues tonight and tomorrow as does Intersystems at the Art Gallery tonight. Odetta likewise has two more nights at the Riverboat. And starting next Tuesday ... Tim Buckley. This singer is from the west coast, has two albums out so far. Comparable to Gord Lightfoot in the extent of his international popularity, his singing is much stronger and more interesting. On Sunday, at 3 p.m. the U of T Concert Band will present their second concert of this season. And the TS still hasn't answered my letter about the conductorship. z boehm

SHIMER

By SUSAN REISLER
and
BARRY KARP

"The College that doesn't fit the pattern." A strange phrase to attract prospective students, yet an apt description of Shimer College. Never heard of it?

Quite likely, since you are probably someone who does fit the pattern. This college is weird. It's a happening. Situated 128 miles west of Chicago amid plains and rolling hills, Shimer has a calm pastoral setting. Quite a contrast to the inhabitants of the school.

You see, this is not a Joe College institution. In fact Joe would find himself rather isolated here — no penny loafers, white shirts or tight continental pants. The emphasis is placed on intellectualism, not on loafers.

Originally a Catholic convent for girls, Shimer became a junior college in 1919. By 1947 it offered a four-year general AB, and in 1950 it became a co-ed college. Thus began a chain of events that eventually rated Shimer as a "community of scholars," number 1 among the small colleges.

Basically the program works like this: a high school student applies to the college on the basis of his grades and his SAT scores. If he fulfills the requirements he is admitted to the college. The student then writes placement exams which put him at his particular level. This need not be first year, it could be third.

No student is held back because of age or grades. Potential is the key-note. A first-year student strong in philosophy may place himself in third or fourth year, while still following a first year program with the rest of his subjects.

From 1950 onward Shimer attracted the bright, eccentric generation, what now is referred to as the beat generation. This was followed by the drug-oriented student who defined his non-conformity through drugs and oriented mystiques. This type of student proved to be nihilistic, and as result the complexion of Shimer changed.

SHIMER IS IT

The college is strongly academic. Sports? Well, their basketball team lost 65 games in a row. That's a record most schools wouldn't care to boast about. Just listen to their rally cheer and you will see how enthusiastically sports-minded everyone is:

Shimer is it,
Shimer is it,
S-H for Shimer,
I-T for it.

The sports void is filled by theatre, music and intellectual pursuits. Here high standards are set and met. Creativity is encouraged and successful plays and musical compositions are written and produced every year.

The courses at Shimer are distinctive. The overall aim is to develop a true intellectual capable of clear thought and intelligent inquiry. They arrive at this goal through an integration of thought.

Eighteen courses covering all areas are offered. Teaching is based on a discussion method. Classes usually number five to 12 students.

They rarely use textbooks. Students are encouraged to go to the original sources, interpretations are taboo.

Class hours are devoted to applying what students have just learned to their other courses, and questioning set truths.

Challenge is the main feature at Shimer. The students try to tear down the basic thoughts. Questions like this form the frame of reference for their discussions: What does Aristotle say? Can it be applied to contemporary sociological, philosophical and cultural thought?

Discussion here is vital. Lectures are rarely used unless needed to supplement a tutorial. Attendance is required, but due to the close student-professor relationship, rules can be relaxed.

On top of the 18 general courses each student must choose five concentration subjects and two elective concentrations in his desired field.

A concentration in English, during four years a student chooses five concentration courses in English. He applies the techniques learned in his general education to do a very intensive study of his small area.

NORMAN MAILER— BASIC ANGLO-SAXON?

This doesn't mean that you must begin English with Anglo-Saxon and finish with Norman Mailer or Malcolm Lowry. The concentration is more intense than U of T students are accustomed to.

By graduation nine comprehensives are written. Each exam covers three or more areas, mathematics, natural sciences and humanities are integrated into one seven-hour examination. Each must be passed. There are also individual exams but the comprehensive mark can cancel out the other mark if it is higher.

Many of the students at Shimer are brilliant. They all stand well above the average in their SAT scores. Through tutorials and independent study they are able to get a four-year degree in one year. It all depends on the student's ability.

The professors at Shimer are usually liberal-minded experts in their fields. The school practices an internship system where a masters student, having completed the verbal for his PhD, is hired by the college to teach for two years, after which the student completes his doctorate.

THE PROBLEM— TOO MUCH SUCCESS

Shimer faces many problems. As the college came very close to realizing its own idealism, experimentation was replaced by a pragmatism, and intra-college communications were severed.

Since the machinery of the college had been running so smoothly, talks between the board of trustees, the administration, the faculty and the students became arbitrary, almost nil. "Things worked well before, we don't need to get together anymore," was the empty explanation.

This attitude went against the idealistic nature of the college. The result—16 out of 25 faculty members resigned in June, 1967.

This left a tremendous gap and from which the college is still suffering. Dean Dennis Cowan tried to get things back to normal over the summer, but failed not possible because the new members had not been trained for the Shimer system.

Shimer now needs new traditions. Previously it was noted for its spontaneity its happenings. It was commonplace to see a play acted out in front of a building for no reason other than the desire of some kids to act. These little happenings, far from appearing strange were welcomed.

Today spontaneity still exists, but to a lesser extent. The campus authorities have been cleaning up in an attempt to bring back the free-thinking state which existed pre-drugs.

With the help of interested students and faculty Shimer may again reach its former excellence.

Students now can play an active part in Queen's Park politics as research assistants to Progressive Conservative MPP's, it was announced Wednesday.

The PC party has launched the first Student Research Assistant Program.

The students will investigate topics of interest to members, especially background to bills and resolutions.

They will be chosen by a party committee on academic qualifications, political experience and particular interests.

Applications can be obtained from the campus Progressive Conservative club.

Dr. Leon J. Kamin of McMaster University will not be appointed professor and chairman of the psychology department. The Varsity apologizes for Wednesday's report that he would be. The Simcoe Hall information department informs us that the good doctor has "decided to go to Princeton instead."

Hockey semi-finals continue Monday at 12:30. Bring the whole family.

BASKETBALL PLAYOFFS

In semi-final action, Vic was hard-pressed to down Jr. Eng. (who had defeated PHE A; cf "Varsity", volume 87, no. 61) in a total points series, 115-112. Vic took the first tilt 60-49 (tilt? is Gellius Phil Bingley?) led by 31 points by Evans. Swarbacki (language spaken in South-West Africa) had 9 for Jr. Eng. Jr. Eng. won the second tilt! 63-55 despite Evans' 22 points for Vic. Caughan had 22 too to lead Jr. Skule.

SMC kallikakked Sr. Eng, 76-55 on 29 points by Laglia. Slekys had 17 for Eng.

WATER POLO SEMI-FINALS

Opportunity Knox kelow-na'd Forestry, 12-3, paced by 7 goals by the Great White Wade. Codling had 4 for Knox, Kennedy the other. Hautamaki (Fr. = "high Amaki") had all three Forestry goals.

Kontar scored thrice and Watkins two times and Chamberlain three and Zonder (contracted form of "God's wonder", found in Shakespeare: Zonder! Or maybe one of Santa's reindeer) once and Meds IV year beat Eng I 9-5 and I just finished this sentence. Vlasoff scored four for Eng. and Gentle ("Do not go, Gentle, into that good night" — Dylan Thomas) one.

Pyle scored five goals as SMC calloped Law, 10-3. Crowley added 3 and Barcony (you remember the Barcony scene in "Romeo and Juliette", don't you?) and Gianini one each. Kellerman, Felkai ("8 Felkai" — The Byrds) and Pashby scored Law's goals.

Montreal woos Blues to defend CIAU title

By PHIL BINGLEY

MONTREAL—Up, up and away. Varsity Blues are flying the friendly skies of Air Canada again.

Blues took off from Toronto International Airport yesterday afternoon en route to what they hope will be their third consecutive Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union crown.

The team gets a night's rest in Expo town to prepare for the opening game of their defense. Blues play Loyola College Warriors (Ottawa-St. Lawrence titlists) tonight at the Montreal Forum in the first semi-final encounter.

The other half pits Laurentian University Voyageurs (OIAA winners) and University of Alberta Golden Bears (Western Intercollegiate champs). The winners will then meet in the final to be held at the Forum on Sunday afternoon. The consolation final is slated for Saturday evening in the Loyola rink.

Alberta moved into the semis following an awesome thrashing of St. Francis Xavier X-men (tops in the Maritimes) yesterday afternoon in a preliminary match. Railbirds immediately clocked Bears in the garb of tournament favourite as they ran up a 13-3 count against the usually strong X-men squad.

Blues will employ the same lineup they used in last week-end's successful defense of their OQAA title. That means Brian Jones will remain on a line with Paul Laurent and Ward Passi, while Gord Cunningham will patrol right wing for Murray Stroud and Bob McClelland.

What kind of opposition can Blues expect? Certainly Alberta will be tough if both teams make the finals.

Bears are red hot. They closed with a roar out West to win their league in a playoff after lying third most of the season, and their win over X-men was impressive. Should Voyageurs upset Alberta, Blues would probably have little trouble. They opened the season with an 11-2 exhibition win over Laurentian, and there is little sign of any recent miracles taking place in Sudbury.

But first, Blues must get past Loyola. Last January in the J. David Molson Tournament, Warriors held Varsity to a tough 4-3 decision. The Loyola camp is brimming with confidence. Consensus among the haughty Quebecers is "We're not worried about whether Blues can beat us, but how are we going to beat Alberta?" Needless to say, Warriors' cockiness has wiped out any traces of overconfidence among Tom Watt's men. Rugged rearguard Doug Jones said simply, "We're going to win."

AROUND THE NET ... Blues will be permitted to dress one extra man for the tournament—probably spare defenseman, Terry Parsons ... Most of the Varsity players attended the CIAU banquet last night ... Loyola seems to think that Blues' win in January was a fluke ... Toronto had to score three third period goals to win ... we shall see what we shall see, but certainly, this year, Blues are no shoo-in.

AFTER THIRD STRAIGHT CIAU TITLE

The following is a story on Varsity's swim team

By DAVE POWELL

This weekend, the Varsity swimming team travels to MacMaster to compete in the Canadian Intercollegiate Championships. If everything goes well, the Blues will win their third straight Intercollegiate title. Two weeks ago, they won their tenth consecutive OQAA championship, their twelfth in the last thirteen years, and qualified an astounding total of ten men to represent them at the Canadians'. Their chief competition, UBC and the University of Alberta, are the only teams in the country even close to this number, with seven men each.

The success of the Blues over the years would seem at first glance to be due to the long list of super stars with which Toronto has been blessed. Great champions such as freestylers Wally Unger, Marv Chapelle, Tom Verth, John Weekes, and Peter Richardson; former world butterfly record holder, Bill Yorzik, and his successor, Graeme Barber; backstroker Bob Fisher, and breaststroke ace, Mike Chapelle; all have played important roles in the past decade. Today, veteran freestylers Robin Campbell and Theo van Ryn, backstroker, Gaye Stratten, and distance and butterfly man, Terry Bryon, are four of the top swimmers in Canada. Among them, they could compile a total of eight first place finishes in the next two days, and either van Ryn or Stratten will undoubtedly be voted the outstanding performer of the meet. As important as the super stars may be, however, they alone are not enough to win championships.

A winning team needs depth to back up its big guns, and this one comes through hard work, the right attitude, and good coaching. These factors make a strong team, and are another reason why the Blues are just that.

The swimmers have the longest season of any intercollegiate sport, training from the beginning of October, to the middle of March. They practice three times a week, with a meet every week-end from November on, until the end of December. Then it's a workout every weekday, with a meet on Saturday, and even an optional practice on Sunday morning, until the end of the season. An average practice runs for about an hour and a half, during which each man swims from one to two miles of sprints, against the clock. As the year goes on, the times drop, and the effort increases, as the swimmer peaks physically and mentally for the OQAA and Intercollegiate finals. The results of this tremendous effort are that ten men will compete this week-end for U of T, while no other team in the OQAA qualified more than three.

Coach Juri Daniel, with the team for the past five years, must be given much of the credit for his squad's recent success. Aided by Peter Vandenburg, Jim Coutts, and manager Levi Diosady, coach Daniel has been able to develop the potential of his swimmers to the highest degree. The fact that he is so highly respected and well-liked adds greatly to his coaching effectiveness. His manner is a catalyst for the great spirit and pride which binds the team together, making them work hard in practice, and produce so well in competition. This ability to pull together is most evident in the unbeatable relay teams which give Toronto a tremendous edge over their opponents.

THEO VAN RYN

Looking ahead to next year, Blues' future appears to be very promising. Of their big guns, Varsity loses only Robin Campbell this season. Campbell, graduating from Phys. Ed., will be hard to replace, but Toronto hope to acquire Mike Guinness, of North Toronto, the top high school freestyler in Metro, to try and fill Campbell's shoes.

Freestyle veterans Alan Pyle and Steve Gerring, and breaststroker, Paul Fisher all graduate from Poly. Sci. and Ec. and will be tough to replace. However, freestyler, Doug MacIntosh, who improves every time out, should come into his own as a star next year, and along with veterans Chris Fisher, Bob Watt, Bob Heatley, Cliff Gentle, and Klaus Koct, as well as van Ryn and Bryon, the team should be just as strong in the freestyle and butterfly.

Gaye Stratten will provide another year of excellence in the backstroke, and young Don Carr could develop into a capable replacement with another season of experience. Rookie breaststrokers Morris Vaillancourt, George Goldsmith and Barry Bowerman should be stronger with a season under their belts.

Add it all up, and there appears to be no end in sight for Blues swimming supremacy.

Basketbelles third in Queens' tourney

Toronto Basketbelles continued their round robin tournament at Queens last weekend, where they ousted Guelph and McGill but fell to MacMaster in a 23-22 squeaker. Mac potted a free shot in the last 20 seconds and Toronto was unable to find the hoop in time. Mac continued on to brush by Queens in a thriller to tie the perennial champs, Western for the Bronze Baby.

Top scorers for Varsity were Bev Dillo (PHE IV) with 37 and Joan Stevenson (PHE III) with 28 points.

SAC spends $2 a minute in six hour binge

By PAUL CARSON

It was exactly midnight. Even bad it tried, the Students Administrative Council, in joint session assembled, could not have chosen a more auspicious moment to begin debate on the 1968-69 SAC budget.

Six hours, 43 minutes and countless speeches later, council approved the $410,481 budget including proposed expenditures of $390,481.

The main source of revenue will be the new $12 SAC fee to be collected from a projected 21,343 students, raising $256,716.

Other important revenue producing items are the Printing Bureau ($56,500), the various Blue and White Society projects ($26,390), and the revived McGill Weekend ($14,400).

Major expenses will include staff salaries ($38,615), per capita membership fees in the Canadian and Ontario Union of Students ($29,316), and almost $13,000 for the increased programming of Radio Varsity.

Amid demands for quorum counts, speeches about priorities and urgings from all sides to "keep the meeting moving," council agreed to maintain a contingency reserve of not less than $21,954, and then decided to increase the proposed surplus to $20,000 from $15,000.

This double-barrelled motion dictated a $5,000 cut in expenses, and council promptly began the pruning job in earnest.

President-elect Steven Langdon suffered two unexpected defeats as $2,700 was trimmed from two of his campaign projects — interdisciplinary educational programs and a proposal to encourage student feedback on SAC policies.

Next to feel the pinch was The Varsity, as $2,000 was quickly lopped off the $25,000 SAC grant.

Varsity general manager Bob Parkins said the reduction would force The Varsity to cut back production in February and March (of 1969), "just when the most important news is taking place."

As the debate dragged on, Council trimmed $5,100 from the proposed furniture co-op only to transfer most of it to the proposed co-op bookstore.

The bookstore budget now stands at $10,800.

The proposed student information bureau, another Langdon campaign project, lost $1,000 and a similar amount was excised from the plans of the drama committee.

"We need a sacrificial lamb about now," admitted the newly-elected cultural affairs commissioner Mark Freiman (III UC), "and it looks like the drama committee is it." see SAC page 3

It was a long, long night. It started at 3 p.m., in full daylight. It ended at 6:43 a.m., in near-daylight. Same left. Some stayed. Some catnapped. It was the longest joint SAC meeting in history.

SAC backs down

By DAVE FRANK

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday night beat a mild retreat on the residence fees front, covering its trail with a seven-point program.

SAC rejected the $10 levy on all students which was proposed last week as a temporary solution to the residence fees crisis. At that time SAC President Tom Faulkner and President-elect Steve Langdon vigorously defended the move, saying it would offset the immediate problem and buy the administration's support for a campaign for a long-term solution.

But by Wednesday night they had changed their minds. Langdon said the administration had been "not at all happy" about the proposal. In the face of this "discouragement," he didn't want to go ahead with the levy.

"It was irrelevant," he said. "It would not have won our demands."

Faulkner agreed. There was no justification for the levy unless it was certain there would be some success.

"Otherwise we are simply subsidizing students in residence, who are generally from higher income families."

SAC now is asking that:

—part of the of the $240,000 amortization costs be met from the university's funds, and not from fees;

—residences be provided for Scarborough and Erindale colleges as soon as possible;

—a joint student-administration committee be formed to plan all future residences;

—all financial records of existing and proposed student housing projects be open;

—SAC and the Board of Governors co-operate in a campaign to urge the Ontario government to adopt a policy of supplying capital grants for university residence construction.

The two new points are that SAC hold a province-wide summer workshop on student housing and that the whole question be raised at this summer's joint meeting of Ontario student leaders and university presidents.

But, as several irate council members pointed out, the fact is that students in university residences will be paying about $130 extra in the fall and "SAC offers only workshops and meetings."

Langdon suggested that in the fall SAC might find "some other way of dramatizing our opposition to the sharp escalation of fees."

Summer education project still alive

By KATHY BARCZA

Despite rumors to the contrary, the Varsity Summer Education Project is alive and kicking in the imaginations of Tom Faulkner, president of the Students Council, and Bob Bossin, SAC education commissioner.

Bossin explained that this summer's session is the preparatory stage to a summer experimental educational program centred on high school students from "economically-deprived" urban regions.

Volunteers will be trained through the Canadian Urban Training Centre as resource people for such a project, which would begin in earnest in the summer of 1969.

Although academic research, lectures and seminars will constitute part of the training program, the emphasis will be on first-hand experience and practical application. Settlement house work, for example, is the sort of direct learning situation encouraged by the Centre.

Trainees may live together. About 25 underprivileged high school students were to be selected for the project to live on campus in one of the residences. Resource people would have included interested students, teachers social workers and the like.

But several problems were raised by George Markl, a former Company of Young Canadians consultant.

One of his objections was the assumption that a campus environment is necessarily a good thing for such adolescents.

He said the affluent university environment could create problems for students—who had to return to less amply equipped high schools, and for principals of such schools—who had to cope with the possibly disillusioned students.

The Varsity Summer Education Project for this year is a direct attempt to avoid these problems before they arise in the context of an experimental educational program.

Volunteers are urgently needed for the program. If you wish to participate you can sign up at the SAC office

In response to popular demand, there will be no more issues of The Varsity this year.

Eager summer reporters please turn to page 29 for information on the Summer Varsity.

The staff of The Varsity wishes all its readers good luck in the coming exams. As usual, we're beyond hope. Thanks to Jerry for the flowers.

Student dies in HH

By SUSAN REISLER

George Anderson, a second-year Physical and Health Education student in apparent perfect health collapsed and died Wednesday in the Hart House gymnasium.

He had taken his only health examination at the University of Toronto health service in the fall of 1966.

At that time Anderson showed no signs of heart trouble and was given an A rating.

An autopsy performed Wednesday revealed an abnormality of the heart. Dr. G. E. Wodehouse of the health service said then that the reasons for the abnormality would not be known for 48 hours.

Unless Anderson had complained about his heart, Dr. Wodehouse said, it would have been difficult even for a hospital to have detected the disease. Had he done so he would have been given a detailed heart examination.

It was not necessary for Anderson, as a physical education student, to take a medical examination every year. This is only required of students participating in competitive sports.

Other users of the Hart House equipment, such as graduate students and alumni, are not required to have an annual examination but are encouraged to do so.

The common form of Quaker worship is an hour of silence. We find that in this silence there may be a real meeting of people, one with another, and each with God. The experience may be refreshing, challenging, disturbing or merely dull, according to what each brings to it. Any of those present may be moved to speak, or the meeting may find its strength in silence.

Population explosion due next fall

"The Population Explosion" will hit the University of Toronto in about nine months. Volunteers are urgently needed to prepare for the event.

This year's International Teach-In, tentatively scheduled for Oct. 25-27, will examine the scientific, social and philosophical aspects of this urgent problem.

"Surely it is a great moral issue to decrease suffering and bring the world's population in balance with its environment," says Zoology Professor J. Bruce Falls, Chairman of the Teach-In. "If we are concerned about the quality of life, we must be concerned about quantity."

"The only humane solution lies in matching 'death control' with 'birth control', but social, racial, economic, racial and political as well as technical obstacles lie in the way", says Dr. Falls.

Canada's role in the solution of this problem will be also examined.

"Proposed reforms of the criminal code promise to correct our own hypocritical legislation regarding birth control", says Dr. Falls. Our immigration and foreign policies will also receive scrutiny.

Dr. W. Friend, Department of Zoology, will be Vice-Chairman and Dr. H. Regier, Department of Zoology, will be Programme Committee Chairman.

Volunteers are requested to phone 928-3508, or drop into the International Teach-In Centre, 91 St. George, on Monday, March 18.

New SAC executive picked

The Students Administrative Council should not seek "an ideologically correct executive and council," President-elect Stephen Langdon said in his inaugural address Wednesday night.

"SAC should be a group thing; we should relate as people, not politicians."

Student government, Langdon insisted, should demonstrate that politics can be run on an element of trust with "person-to-person contacts, not elitist dictation."

Everything SAC does next year will concern some aspect of education, Langdon said.

"We are dedicated to building a new university community and we have a responsibility to that community."

Langdon's new executive includes Bob Barkwell (I Meds), finance commissioner; Laurel Sefton (III SMC), university committee co-chairman; and Jennifer Penny (II UC), judicial committee co-chairman.

Toni McNamara (III SMC) is external affairs commissioner, Jane Brewin (II UC) was acclaimed to the services commission.

Andy Wernick (SGS) heads next year's education commission, and Mark Freiman (III UC) is cultural affairs commissioner. Rob Douglas (II New) took the communications commission seat.

BABEL organizer Bob Rae is next year's university committee chairman. The judicial committee chairmanship went to Alberto Di Giovanni (I SMC).

Alberta students march, win review

EDMONTON (CUP) — The Alberta government Tuesday promised 3,000 students marching on the legislature that it would review the University of Alberta's operating grant.

Armed with a 6,500-signature petition the U of A students assembled on campus, hoisted placards and marched the mile and a half to the legislature to protest an announced tuition fee hike of $100.

The university's board of governors recently recommended the increase because, they say, the operating grant from the government is insufficient.

A government statement promised consideration of the operating grant at its next executive council meeting and an investigation of student charges of inequities in the distribution of student aid.

SAC budget

Between the cuts, the SAC members agreed to a $185 increase in the President's residence fee and approved a special $1,500 grant to college and faculty educational programs.

The lengthy discussions produced $11,800 in cuts, offset by increases of $6,685. The net result is only $115 more than the magic number of $5,000. As yet, no-one is quite sure what happens to the $115.

Several important budgetary items managed to emerge unscathed from the series of agonizing reappraisals.

The ever-troubled Blue and White Society may be bankrolled to the extent of $5,205, subject to the approval of the cultural affairs commission.

"In view of the upcoming debacle at O'Keefe Centre, there may not be a Blue and White on Monday," declared Mike McGee (III SMC).

He was referring to the poor ticket sale for the Blue and White Revisited show scheduled for Sunday evening.

A motion by Engineering rep Rick Seppala (I APSC) to delete the full-time education consultant was narrowly defeated after President-elect Langdon said the motion "tears down all the assumptions about the importance of education programs that were built up during the election campaign."

Debating union chairman Derek Allen (III Trin) successfully fought off attempts to reduce the $2,500 debating budget.

Allen said the UTDU plans to hold an international debating tournament in November and hopes to prove that debating can be "an integral part of the maturing of intelligent students."

Supporting the UTDU position, St. Mike's freshman Alberto Di Giovanni told council he remembered one debate which attracted only 10 students.

"It was on No Salvation Outside the Church, and with a topic like that, what do you expect?"

After a brief debate SAC approved provisions for an advertising salesman for Radio Varsity and ratified a $300 for the first SAC press officer, Varsity reporter Kathy Adams (II UC).

At 5:55 a.m. one sleepy SAC member looked out the window and suddenly exclaimed, "Good grief, people are starting to go to class!"

Council snapped out of its lethargy and quickly cut $2,000 from the budget.

At 6:26, procedural expert Art McIlwain (II APSC) announced, "The sun is now fully up!"

One minute later, the assembled handfull passed the services commission budget.

A few moments later, the loquacious Mr. McGee came within one vote of abolishing the Harvard and Tarheel weekends.

At 6:38, the budget, all $410,481 of it, was finally approved.

Council gave a resounding vote of thanks and appreciation to outgoing president Tom Faulkner.

"I just happen to have a few farewell remarks prepared," Faulkner said soberly. (No mean feat, that, after 15 solid hours of debate).

Council groaned. "All students are fickle; I've had it," Faulkner smiled.

Council cheered.

Seconds later, at 6:43 Thursday morning, it was all over for another year.

Varsity Staff
FERS are reminded of the staff banquet Saturday, and friends of Varsity (those who voted against the $2,000 cut Wednesday night) are invited to a Varsity final party after the banquet. Details in the office. Strange things often happen at these final parties. Don't miss it.

NASSAU 242

go 'souse' to the sun

That's where it's at this summer. - The Bahamas.

It's Canada College week in Nassau. It costs $243.70 - there, back, and everything in between. You don't have to be a U of T student to be eligible. You can be a secretary, a construction worker, a professor, a campus cop, even a senate board member or an intimate acquaintance thereof.

Read on carefully, it'll singe your eyebrows.

The $243.70 includes the four-hour flights there and back (food and booze included); limousine service to the Montagu Beach Hotel; use of golf courses, tennis courts, pools; an evening or afternoon aboard the Tropic Bird complete with Colypso band; free entertainment nightly; easy access to downtown Nassou; all tips; two meals a day; and the coolest (air conditioned) pads.

The trips last for seven days. There are three (April 29, May 5, May 11). Remember seats are limited so make your reservation early.

Remember the following U of T students they are your Mr. Campus representatives:

ROGER OATLEY, AL PURSER, KEVIN DORE

"The obsession to quote others, rather than to rely on one's own words, is a phenomenon of modern public and literary life cultivated by journalists and scholars. For the journalist it is a way of playing tricks and games; he can show a man with his own words; he can suggest to his reader a sense of immediacy—often false; he can endow his writing with authoritativeness—often artificial. The scholar does some of the same things with quotes, but he is also eager to be authoritative. So he quotes others—usually scholars—in the hope that sooner or later they will quote him in return."

—Columbia Journalism Review, Summer, 1967.

the history tutorial

"... and so as far as I have been able to gather in my research, President Johnson was a minor president despite the intense controversy during his lifetime."

"Hmm, yes, a very able presentation Miss Goldblatt, very balanced. Perhaps there are some questions from other members of this class before we start in... No?... very well. Perhaps I shall start. Does anyone know the origins of that Vietnam war that Miss Goldblatt has mentioned was the cause of a good deal of the controversy?"

"Miss Smith, do you?... No? Well, there is a theory that it was really a civil war in the southern part of the country in which a group of patriots tried to overthrow a repressive ruling military clique. Do you agree with that view Miss Smith?"

"Yes, I think I would agree."

"Hmm, and Mr. Jones I see you have your hand up."

"Well, according to the books that I read the war was the result of aggression from the northern part of the country. A Communist government was in control up there and it sent soldiers down all the time to subvert the southern government. And so when the United States sent troops over there, they were just protecting an ally and so I think that President Johnson was right in his war policies."

"Hm, I see. What do the rest of you think about that?"

"I agree with him because I read Prof. Fromm's book and he seems to have a lot of facts to support his theory."

"Yes, Mr. Hanson, but what about the criticism I make in my book that the United States was fighting an undeclared war and that with the overwhelming power of the United States, the Communists still weren't defeated. Perhaps this proves that it must have been an indigenous and popularly-supported movement that the U.S. was fighting? Miss Goldblatt, do you have something to add?"

"Yes, I think we should also mention your other major point that the government of South Vietnam was corrupt and not really worth supporting. After all a government that doesn't have the allegiance of its own people is bound to fall or will have to be propped up forever."

"Yes good point. Do you agree, Miss Borland?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, sir, I'm not really interested in this little quarrel, because that's all I think it was a quarrel. I want to get on and discuss the big war."

"That comes up next term, Miss Borland, and I do think that this little quarrel as you call it, was a rather strategic historical point. There is, of course, one school of thought that places the beginning of the decline of the American Empire with this war. There are also people — although this viewpoint has been reinterpreted and challenged quite persuasively in recent years — that the United States pressed this war further and further to spark a war with China."

"Oh, but Sir, we can see that by hindsight. Nobody at the time knew what was going to happen then. Personally I'm not interested in any of these things. Why can't we hurry and get to the modern parts of this course?"

"I sympathize with your boredom, Miss Smith, but this is a crucial period in this course. I think we should try to understand it fully. The war is an important aspect in our discussion of President Johnson. Did anyone read the book by Professor Jones?"

"I did, or at least I glanced through it to prepare this report. I didn't get much out of it. It was too detailed talking about some Gulf of Tonkin incident involving some ships or something."

"But Miss Goldblatt, did you not find his argument crucial to your evaluation of Mr. Johnson? What about the Congressional hearings Prof. Jones analyzes which showed that the Johnson government convinced the people of the United States that there was aggression from the north without actually showing any evidence that North Vietnamese soldiers had actually invaded the South?"

"Yes, I saw that but I don't think it very significant. Just because the government didn't really prove there was aggression does not really mean there wasn't any. I think we should look at the other side in all this too. I know if I were president of North Vietnam I would attack the south and try to get that part of the country joined back to the North."

"Interesting point. But I think what we must look at here is the reaction of the American people to this revelation. Remember President Johnson was soon voted out of office. Could it possibly be that the people did feel they had been duped and that this was really the basis of the resentment against Mr. Johnson?"

"I think it could be. But some of the authors I read said the agitation against Mr. Johnson was caused by people who were lazy and didn't want to leave their comfortable homes to go and fight and protect their country."

"Well, what do the others think of that. Mr. Bossin you haven't said a great deal so far. What do you think?"

"Well, I haven't read any of these books yet because I've been working on another essay, but I think that it's quite possible"

"But Sir, don't you think that people who were against the war and against President Johnson just might have done it because they were truly worried about what a horrible war it was."

"I don't agree with that sir, because after all what did they know about the war. The real facts didn't come out till later and I think the State Department had more facts than the people did."

"But the facts when they came out later showed that the United States was at fault in the war."

"But those were all facts revealed by the other side and we really have no way of knowing what was true and what was propaganda. And Prof. Fromm makes the point that the North refused to negotiate a peace throughout all this period. If they knew the war was wrong, why didn't they want to stop it. I think they were just trying to get all they could."

"Yes, there is that point, Miss Smith, but I think I have answered that point in my book. Did you read that?"

"I only had time to read your article in the Heath collection, sir and that part wasn't in there."

"Yes, well the editors chose an unfortunate section of the book. But my point was that if the North were to negotiate—which by the way they offered to at times but the United States wasn't willing to include the rebels in the south in their talks. If the North were to negotiate, they would have nothing to gain and everything to lose. Remember the country was divided unnaturally and supposedly temporarily. Negotiations would have legitimized that division and given the south free hand to keep on ruling the way its leaders pleased."

"I would agree with that."

"However, does that not contradict what you have just said?"

"Not really. I think both views could be correct. After all, Prof. Fromm makes a very good case for his side."

"I don't wish to discuss the relative merits of the Fromm logistical method here. Goodness knows I have enough heated debates with my colleagues in the department on that. Perhaps we should get back to the original point, though. I see the time is moving along here. Can we make any sort of conclusions about President Johnson on the basis of what we have just discussed?"

"I don't think so, Sir, because, well, after all, if we can't even agree on the war we surely can't make a judgment on whether President Johnson was correct in fighting it."

"Do the rest of you feel that too? Surely the matter of bombing the North is fairly clear-cut. There is no doubt any more that the bombings killed many civilians and yet President Johnson refused to stop them. In fact he even stepped them up in 1968 in an attempt to boost his sagging political prospects. And there have been impressive statistics cited that show that South Vietnam's rice agriculture was virtually ruined as a result of defoliation and crop destroying activities by the U.S. military? Can we base some arguments on these?"

"I think we can, but I think these are only minor things, Sir. The war is really the point here and that's what I've said in my essay. That your view of President Johnson varies depending on the facts you look at. I think he was a kind of dislikeable old man who was just a bit clumsy and tactless. I think a good part of the unfavorable opinion about him was based on that kind of shallow emotional reaction against his personality."

"I think the same, Sir. I don't think we have enough facts to make a good judgment and can really only go on the books written and if they can't agree, how can we?"

"Perhaps that is that, then. President Johnson may have been bad and good and maybe a little of both. Well, let's see next week, we go on to President Robert Kennedy, an even more controversial historical figure and Miss Smith will be reporting on that problem."

vietnam again?

Sir: Under an aura of stunted perspective, many articles printed in this publication during the past year have criticized both the position of the United States in the war in Vietnam and, of Canada, often labeled a "silent accomplice."

Perhaps more students should re-read their modern history texts before condemning the role of the U.S. government.

I am not defending war; yet could we enjoy our freedom and feel satisfied with our accomplishments if the South Vietnamese were arbitrarily sentenced to communist enslavement?

Undoubtedly, this viewpoint seems too orthodox to be acceptable to students seeking the radical and exhilarating. However, I should like to enclose a convincing article reprinted in the Christian Science Monitor which explains in lucid terms.

- 1) Why the United States must stay in Vietnam.
- 2) That America is fighting for us.

(Mr.) K.P. Brady
School of Business

(Ed note: Somewhere in the burst of mail this last week, we have misplaced the article in question before we had a chance to read it. However, perhaps this except, Joseph Alsop, a staunch defender of the war, wrote in the New Yorker in 1955, will do.

"I would like to be able to report—I had hoped to be able to report—that on the long, slow canal trip to Vinh Binh (Mekong Delta) I saw all the signs of misery and oppression that have made my visits to East Germany like nightmare journeys to 1934. But it was not so.

"At first it was difficult for me, as it is for any Westerner, to conceive of a Communist government's genuineness 'serving the people'. I could hardly imagine a Communist government that was also a popular government and almost a democratic government. "But this is just the sort of government the palm-hut state actually was while the struggle with the French continued. The Vietminh could not possibly have carried on the resistance for one year, let alone nine years, without the people's strong united support.") jaanus proos again?

Sir: Certainly one couldn't except The Varsity to quote a student who felt that the election of Mr. Fromm was "a great victory for student conservatism" or "a deep seated student alienation at the compulsory Utopias of the New Left." An attitude of sour grapes, topped only by that of Miss MacNamara, on the part of the S.U.P.A. graduates who manipulate The Varsity is no surprise. It bugs you that all the abuse your one-sided reporting has heaped on the Edmund Burke Society and Mr. Fromm has failed to sway the electorate. It bugs you that E.B.S. has a better reputation on campus than your rag. And it bugs you that your hypocritical double-standards don't even fool most of the people. some of the time. It just wouldn't occur to you that conscientious political activists who don't see the New Left as the wave of the future, could also be interested in improving the quality of education, the extent of student services and in providing an alternative of responsible student participation to that of radical student power and S.A.C. stupidity evidenced by the refusal of the seven Senate seats as "tokenism." Maybe you think Mr. Fromm and I sat in on the majority of S.A.C. meeting this year for the free coffee and donuts.

I also take exception to the front page coverage I have received this week with the E.B.S. label attached for the cheap innuendo effect that I am a representative of E.B.S. first and Victoria College second. If you chose to list my political affiliations, why did you neglect to tell your readers whether the other candidates were PCs, Liberals, NDPers, communists or syndicalists. (I take the word of the latter group that there is a difference between the last two). You conveniently neglect the fact that I was elected last month as S.A.C. Rep. Being acclaimed this time, at least assures me that no one can complain about overspending on election expenses or nullify me for S.A.C. incompetence to use the proper ballots.

Yours truly

Jaanus Proos

(re-employed S.A.C. Rep. Victoria College)

(ed. note: You misinterpret our worries. Politics is the art of compromise and we hate to see you weaken in any way your delightful uncivilized politics.)

sac elections again?

Sir: One reads with interest your comments on the SAC election (Page Four, Friday's Varsity). It seems funny that you are blind to what might be the real implication of this election. Isn't it possible that some students actually, sincerely, want SAC to be concerned only with such matters as residence building and student centres? Maybe some students don't want SAC to "do the thinking," as you put it. Why shouldn't they be represented?

Kynaston Barker (I SMC)

P.S. — I do not "pretend to speak for the whole of St. Michael's College." I am not a member of the Edmund Burke Society, and I did not support Mr. F. Paul Fromm in the past SAC election!

eh no, not again?

Sir: Why can't Paul Hoch, Paul Fromm, Mike Kesterton, Allan Kamin and the whole gang give up the "either or" Arty vs Christian game and joint th e"both, and." It's not one or the other, never was and never can be. It all at once, all things everything together man. But then that's just the point. They all already are, and can't see They are it. There is nothing left for you to do but have a good belly laugh.

Fred McConnell (II U.C.)

where are the peaceniks now?

Sir: In the past weeks a startling new situation has arisen in the world picture. The USS Pueblo, a spy vessel, was piratically taken off the high seas by the North Koreans, with possible harm to the ship's crew. Since no state of war exists between the U.S. and North Korea this was an act of flagrant irresponsibility.

The U.S. although attempting to retrieve her ship and men through diplomatic means (accepting a mere apology as retribution) has however sent the USS Enterprise to stand off the coast of North Korea in preparation for a retrieval of the vessel if all else fails. The world realizes that since the U.S. cannot afford any large contingent of men to fight a second war, she would be forced into the use of nuclear arms.

Arthur Goldberg, American Ambassador to the U.N. spelled out the U.S. position in the incident. "A virtually unarmed vessel of the U.S. navy, sailing on the high seas, has been wantonly and lawlessly seized by armed North Korean patrol boats and her crew forcibly detained. This warlike action carries a threat to peace which should be obvious to all."

Where, therefore, are all the doves; where are all the peace lovers; where are all the protesters and sitters-in, where are you Mr. Faulkner? Why aren't you marching with signs calling for the return of the Pueblo? Why are you quicker to condemn America, the greatest, noblest and freest country on earth, as politically and morally inferior to Soviet Russia, and North Vietnam, than you are to condemn North Korea?

It must be clear to all now that the peaceniks are not the lovers of peace they claim to be, they are not the champions of the oppressed, they are pathetic anti-Americans; parasites living off the freedom which Canada and the U.S. offers to all.

Sy Zueker (I New)

The white liberal complex

The old man's coat was gray and thin. It hung down below his knees. As I came up the walk in front of Hart House, he turned to face me and shuffled along beside me as I slowed down.

"Could you help a fellow out? A dime for a cup of coffee?" Through the open collar of his coat I looked at the grimy collar of his white shirt.

I stood there and stared at him as he kept chattering on, as if the wind and cold made him keep his slack jaw moving. He was small and wiry. His face was wrinkled and worn from exposure. I couldn't really tell how old he was, but his hair was streaked with gray.

A handout, huh. Offer to take him to a mission or buy him a meal. That's what you're supposed to do. If you just give it to him, he'll probably just spend it on booze. Well, he doesn't smell of booze, at least not yet. But that's what they say. "Yeah, if you offer to buy him a meal, he probably won't want it."

But what the hell, I don't want to go around with the guy, looking for some mission or watching him eat. I'm in a hurry. And besides how much good is one meal to a guy anyway. This one sure as hell needs more.

So I ask him questions. Make him sing for his supper. "Where do you stay?"

"Flophouses, 75 cents a night." The tone is humble. He's been at it long enough to be fairly aggressive and unapologetic. But still a bit of the pathetic whine in his voice.

"What about jobs? Where do you get money." I ask the questions out of duty. I know the answers. I'm not really interested. I just want to get away. But I feel guilty, so I keep talking.

"What about the missions, have you tried the missions?" I ask, not knowing exactly where he could go, just figuring that there had to be some place somewhere where he would be taken care of.

"I was just there (I should have asked where, but didn't). I was too late. Can't be everywhere at once, I was trying to get work at the car washes."

It's getting pretty ridiculous. He's standing there and I'm standing there, and neither of us is in the least interested in the other. And both of us want to go and both of us stay.

And why the hell should I be making him crawl for a lousy dime. It doesn't mean anything to me. I don't even get a kick out of seeing him low.

The easiest thing would be to give him the dime and go. It wouldn't be helping him much, but it gets me out of it. Why should I, with neat crease in my pants, and a few dollars in my pocket, be lordling it over this little old guy who could have been my father or maybe even my grandfather.

I should be helping him. How? A job? I couldn't even get one for myself. At least getting him a place to stay? Where?

The answer is obvious. I've got lots of room. It's so reasonable, I reject it automatically. Somehow I can never fit personal situations into general theory.

I look down at his scuffed shoes, the frayed baggy trousers. It's none of my business. It don't know him. There are all sorts of guys he must know who should be giving him a break. But they're not. And anyway society, or the government, or somebody ought to be taking care of the guy.

Why me? Again obvious. Because he needs it. Again I reject the logical.

I pull out my wallet and fumble for a dime. I look around to see if anyone I know is watching. It bothers me that I care. Why should I be ashamed of giving a guy a handout?

I give him the dime. He shuffles off across the street, clutching the collar of his coat to his throat.

I start walking again, trying desperately to remember where the hell I was in such a hurry to go.

Excuse me, but is this Phil Bingley?

A menagerie seen through glass

By DAVE FRANK

There is a man in a glass box on campus. He sits behind plate glass walls in the students' lounge at St. Mike's.

With him are four chairs, a hat-tree with a heavy winter coat on it, a telephone, a large desk, a microphone, a record player and an FM radio.

The small elderly man wears a tidy black uniform.

The yellow thread on his shoulder reads "Commissionaire Corps of Canada."

The glass box, about 10 feet by 15, is in the corner of the huge lounge, by the door. Blue, green and yellow chairs are scattered over the rest of the carpeted floor. In the soft light the speakers dispense a mindless insubstantial muzak.

"My Dad plays that kind of music at home," comments a co-ed, "It drives me crazy." Sometimes the commissionaire spins records too.

But the atmosphere is relaxed and the man in the glass box is friendly.

As he sits with an alert finger raised to his lips student passing by wave to him and smile. He returns their salute. Others drop in just to chat or to use his telephone, which he polishes afterwards. Sometimes he smokes.

Occasionally he comes out and strolls around. "There's no drinking in here," he tells a student politely, "No drinking or eating." Then he walks down to the far end, where the guys are playing cards.

Three girls stage a mock sit-in in the box. When he returns, the commissionaire jostles with them good-naturedly for a few minutes and they leave, still giggling.

There are other men like him on campus, silently ticking off the comings and goings of students. I was looking for a man with an iron fist and a steely glint in his eye. But those are hard to find. There is just a lovely man in a glass box...

DO YOU HAVE A CANADA STUDENT LOAN?

IS THIS YOUR LAST YEAR OF FULL TIME STUDIES?

If the answer is yes to both questions, you would be well advised to consult your Bank Manager regarding your loan before the end of the academic year.

He can advise you of your rights and obligations and you can discuss with him a mutually satisfactory repayment program.

"Schools" has 5 difficulties

If you think Summerhill is a subway station, and are bored to distraction by all those Varsity features on Rochdale, This Magazine Is About Schools is not your bag.

But if you happen to be interested in education (and in this institution you should be), the future of this publication is important. It is produced occasionally by the staff of the experimental free school, Everdale Place.

It is important as a forum, as sower of new ideas, and as a challenge to the accepted principles of education from primary to graduate school.

As has become common in its short five-issue history, this Magazine suffers from two financial difficulties; "capital lag" characteristic of new publications, and "unbusiness-like" approach which puts honesty before profit.

For example, they lost an advertisement in their next issue, due to be published in April, when advertiser read March's reprinting of The Student as Nigger.

The Magazine is $5,000 in debt. To survive, it must be bought, either at the bookstore or by subscription from P.O. 876, Terminal A Toronto, or receive contributions.

Fund honors Emmanuel students

Victoria College has established a bursary in memory of the two Emmanuel College students who died in a road accident on February 24.

James C. Forsyth and James H. Peacock were killed returning from an exhibition hockey game in South River, Ontario. Five other students were injured in the mishap.

The Forsyth-Peacock Memorial Bursary will be established with an open fund. There is no deadline for contributions, which may be made to the bursar's office at Victoria College.

The grant will be made "to a needy student, with preference to enable a student to live in residence."

Inquiries should be directed to the bursar, Victoria College, or the Victoria College Union office in Wymulwood.

Wanted: tickets to see MORE reproduces per square inch than the O'Keefe Centre has ever seen. The Hollies are just one of the great groups appearing in the Blue and White Revisited show March 17. Get your tickets while they last. At the SAC office.

GARBLE

The Gary Burton Quartet have their album out now. And Waylon Jennings is producing new ones fast: two last month, another this. Dave Van Ronk's group's LP is out and Etta James is back. So are the Kinks. But I still can't find Layers of the Onion by the Incredible String Band in Toronto.

So, what's all this got to do with what I'm supposed to be writing about? Nothing.

Joan Baez and Phil Ochs took to music in opposite directions. Joan started singing beautiful songs and now protests. Ochs started protesting as a sort of musical journalism and now sings and invokes elaborate instrumentations to decorate his efforts.

So, does Joan Baez, of course, at least on her last two LPs, one of Christmas carols and the other containing items such as Saigon Bride, (nee Flowers for Mr. Malthus, which pretty well tells it all).

Neither can bring their multi-piece accompaniments to Toronto when they do their concerts March 18 (Baez) and March 22 (Ochs).

So, with a naked acoustic and an otherwise empty stage, they'll be before you, arousing the days of yesterday before the revolution. Reminding of their revolution, whose products are still with us and good thing too.

Miss Baez can sing, Mr. Ochs is not of the same calibre but he can see and think.

Meanwhile, Janis Ian's new one is a bit more grown up. The Jefferson Airplane's is of such new and higher altitudes it makes you wonder. And Heifetz and Rubenstein have new LP's one of those times.

The Naked Ape makes a monkey out of you

By LARRY HAIVEN

I was sitting in the refectory with some friends, watching another friend who was talking to a girl and inviting her over to our table. Beside me lay a copy of The Naked Ape, by Desmond Morris. I turned to the other people at the table and remarked, "Aha, I know what they're engaging in—the precopulatory period of conversation." The table shook with gales of laughter and, seeing that we find most funny what is most true about ourselves, I suppose it illustrates vividly one of the main points in Morris' book.

Despite modern man's apparent sophistication in a technological age, he contends, the primate instincts in us are just as strong as they ever were. We are the naked ape — the only one of the primates to have no 'substantial body hair' — and this is the basis of a fascinating and provocative study of the human animal.

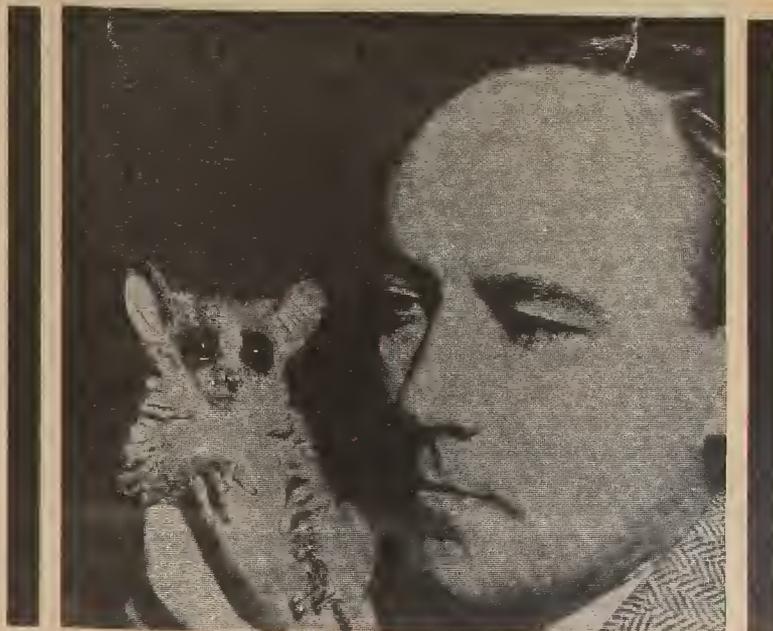

trips with his fellows without worrying about the chastity of his mate; and it allows the children to be raised slowly and carefully so that the complex brain may mature.

Such statements cannot go without controversy and indeed they haven't. One anthropologist friend of mine says that Morris had no right to write book, that it is an outright insult to the science of anthropology and that the reading public has been duped. He contends that a great number of the facts in the book are not correct, that they are purely guesswork or are non sequitur, like the fact that the face of the male baboon is very similar in colour and shape to his genitals and that by using its face, he transmits the vital message to the female. This is a very shaky conjecture, and the anthropologists are quick to capitalize on it.

FRUSTRATING PARADOX

They have their point. Anybody who has taken a course in vertebrate anatomy will be struck instantly by frustrating paradox. For every feature among animals that is a definite basis for formulating a logical theory, there are a thousand that lead into blind alleys. What at first seems obvious to common sense is often blatantly false. It is a very complex subject, with millions of facts, all of which must be recorded, but none of which can be haphazardly thrown together to form a hypothesis. Anthropologists are painstaking people and are very dubious of someone who comes along and puts these facts together prematurely, especially as sensationally as Morris has done.

One of the literary faults of the book however, turns out to be one of the severest limitations of the scientific criticism heaped on it. In order to achieve a rambling, conversational style, Morris skips from subject to subject, making only a rudimentary attempt to tie every observation in with his original thesis. The many fascinating and absorbing examples of human behaviour that the author dwells on quite separate and hence can only be attacked essentially one by one. Far more observations are valid than not and although the book can be dismissed as a manual of anthropology, it definitely cannot be dismissed as a compelling and shit-disturbing experience for the common reader.

If any of the anthropologists took care to notice, Morris hardly ever states a definite fact. Always, he insists that a conjecture is just that, and that a certain series of events only seems to lead to the aforesaid logical conclusion. The more naive reader may be duped into taking his word as law, but this is very unlikely. Nevertheless, the intelligent individual must realize that this book, like the others that deal with the same sort of topic (like Robert Ardrey's African Genesis), is only an intelligent collection of facts that in the intimate environment of the book form seems to be the be-all and end-all. They aren't.

HIGHLY ENGROSSING

But The Naked Ape is as engrossing a book as I have ever read. Even though the book at times loses its coherence, it retains its freshness because Morris' style is familiar, non-scientific and friendly. Of course, his major asset is the fact that he talks about the things that interest us the most; sex, children, ourselves, but despite that, the chapters on sex and child-rearing are unusually provocative and are guaranteed to make you end up laughing at yourself as you probably never have, and make you re-examine the routine things you never thought twice about.

Because social mores restrict us from physically grooming people or touching them to show that we mean no aggression, Morris says, we have developed small talk, smiling and putting of the lips to make these signals. Just listen to the people who talk to you the next time you're at a party or when you're introduced to somebody new or meet somebody on the street. According to Morris, they are engaging in "grooming talking".... to give comfort, lessen aggression and maintain togetherness.

The author also has some interesting views on politicians. Like actors, the politicians and diplomats make it their business to be "behavioural liars". "But unlike the actors," he says, "they are not socially licensed to lie," and the resultant guilt feeling tend to interfere with their performances. Also, unlike the actors, they do not undergo prolonged training courses."

AGGRESSION TOO

Morris also holds forth on aggression, a now famous topic in the study of man. He differs however, with some of the other writers in this field. Man, he says, has no desire to kill his own kind, only to defeat his rival, like all other species. But because of the unfortunate combination of needing weapons that can hit at a great distance and the highly specialized cooperation among men, wars developed. Now men fight primarily to support their comrades, not to defeat the enemy. Morris offers solutions to the problem but emphasises that the only sound solution is massive depopulation, or a rapid spread to other planets, because uncontrollable aggression is sure to develop if man goes on populating the earth as he has done in the past.

These are only a few of the aspects of human behaviour that the zoologist delves into. The others are equally as fascinating and disturbing. All the while, it is brought home to us that we are indeed not in control of our biological urges by merit of our superior intelligence, that in the time of crisis, our intellect will not rescue us from the demands that our sexual, aggressive, territorial and parental instincts put upon us. Only, Morris asserts, by realizing fully and submitting to those instincts, can the human race survive. The book will leave you thinking for a long, long time.

JAZZ

Impressions on the Toronto Jazz Scene

By JACK McCAFFREY

"And what gives you the right to say anything about jazz?"

The questioner was an irate Englishman, attired in a tweed jacket, baggy pants held up by suspenders, and hippy-type boots. Long hair, a rather wild-looking beard, and round rimless glasses led everyone to murmur, "Ah, another typical weirdo social dropout. Why doesn't he go back to Yorkville?"

Looking like a respectable executive type, Patrick Scott smiled sardonically and answered, "Well who are YOU anyway?"

"I'm an engineer," replied Bill Smith, And it's true—the designs aircraft.

The scene was the Second Annual Canadian Jazz Festival. What had begun as a panel discussion on jazz finally ended up as an orgiastic outpouring of hostilities on Scott. The highlight was reached when Moe Kofman's wife a large woman with a mass of shiny, unrealistic blonde hair, took the floor and shrieked incoherently at the belcagured Scott, to the embarrassment of all.

After triggering all this, Bill Smith retired gracefully from the field. He was soon joined by another shaggy-haired Englishman who had sat on the panel but hadn't said much. The second man was John Norris, the editor of CODA, Canada's jazz magazine. With the aid of Smith, who has retired from his engineering career to devote all his time to photography and the art direction of CODA, Norris puts out, every two months, a magazine which continually improves (contrast this with any other jazz magazine on the market).

These two men and their friends are what some have called the "Jazz establishment" in Toronto. But this is wrong. It's just that, instead of sitting back and bemoaning the state of jazz, they are out there doing something.

***

It was five years ago almost to the day that I walked into Sam the Record Man seeking a restorative for my poor nerves. Behind the counter was a tall Englishman who pointed out to me a new record which featured Coleman Hawkins, the great tenor saxophonist and my favourite musician.

Just as I was leaving, the stranger behind the counter also sold me a copy of a magazine I had never seen before — CODA. But it had a photograph of Hawkins on the cover and a feature review of the record I had just bought, and that was enough recommendation for me.

In those days, CODA very obviously was an amateur effort. Printed on second-rate paper rather haphazardly stapled together, it had so many typographical errors and such a horrible typeset that reading it was often very trying on one's patience. However, it was then, and still is, the only way to find out what was happening in Toronto.

Moreover, it is filled with news, from other centres such as New York and Chicago, which seems to elude other publications.

So I continued to buy the magazine. After a while, photographs began to creep more frequently into the pages; the typography became less execrable; the design began to improve, imperceptibly at first, then more radically.

Not until several months after the first encounter at the store did I find out who the friendly stranger was. It came as rather a surprise that a record clerk was also the editor of the only jazz magazine in Canada.

***

Does anyone remember the First Floor Club, the Bohemian Embassy, the House of Hambourg, The Cellar Jazz Club? Can you believe that there was a time when the Friar's Tavern presented musician like Dizzy Gillespie, Stan Getz, Coleman Hawkins?

And by the way, put up your hands all you Charlies out there who did NOT go to the Alexis Zorba club to hear Sonny Greenwich a few weeks ago.

Let's see—that's 16 hands. At last count, this column had 15 readers. Hmmm... and so you wonder why there doesn't seem to be much jazz in Toronto, eh?

"I just can't believe it. I've been in this country for five years now, and all I've seen are jazz clubs folding up".

Joe Colussi, a bassist, was speaking after Greenwich's last set at the most recent unsuccessful attempt to start a jazz club.

"Why can't a city of almost two million support at least ONE real jazz club—not a bar which relies on high-priced New York talent, but just a place where any jazz musicians in Toronto could come and get together and play".

At the particular session

BILL SMITH

we heard two saxophonists and a drummer whom we had never seen or heard of before. Who knows who these guys are? But let me tell you—they were damn good.

When Steve (nobody knows his last name) was running the Cellar Jazz Club, he used to bring in groups like Art Farmer, and Charles Lloyd, as well as providing a place for local musicians like Al Stanwyck, Tony Colacott, and So On (our local version of Son Ra) to play. But unfortunately, Steve did not believe in advertising. So the only way to know what was going on at his club was to be there. After a while nobody was.

***

What we have now is one night club, The Colonial Tavern, which generally relies on old, established "name" musicians such as Earl Hines, Thelonious Monk, Buck Clayton, and Dizzy Gillespie. And we have another night club which just can't make up its mind—the Town Tavern—which oscillates between groups like Clark Terry, obscure R and B bands, and innocuous supper club singers.

Supplementing these are two clubs which occasionally house very good older jazz musicians. At the Golden Nugget is Don Ewell, the famous piano player. And for several weeks a year the Cav-A-Bob hosts the Saints And Sinners.

In the absence of any jazz clubs in this town, the only place we can hear some of the newer groups is at the University of Toronto. This year we have had Bobby Hutcherson and, tonight, Charles Lloyd. Unfortunately, two groups a year is highly inadequate, and in fact a downright shame for a campus this big.

MUSIC

Watch Him And He's Beautiful

By ANDY WAINRIGHT

Tim Buckley is a prism; touch him and you're scattered — watch him and he's beautiful. His songs of loneliness, of elusive women and "heartbreak" rise from his music as verbal expressions of that music. The words, as Buckley admits, cannot stand alone as message, their communicative effect lies in the rhapsodic gliding quality of his voice that races across, never within, the contrapuntal musical medium of lead guitarist Lee Underwood, conga artist Carter C.C. Collins, and Buckley's own twelve-string cadence.

Buckley's live performance style is far removed from the atmosphere of his two Electra albums, the tempo is increased, our involvement because of his presence is magnified. The two records are an appeal to our loneliness, our yearning to sing in such a beautiful way to the people we love. Quiet images of 'ladies' chambers', candles lit for vagabond lovers lead us away from the attack of Dylan (i.e. of pre-John Wesley Harding days) and the suffering that is Cohen's before it is ours, to the happy-sad world of Tim Buckley and perhaps Donovan. On record Tim Buckley is our aesthetic, but on stage he becomes his own, retreating beyond our response to his voice and reappearing so much larger than our own life styles and so totally involved in his own. You must listen to his album ballads, find him in person, and then come back and laugh at your attempt to mingle this artist with your emotion. He is beyond you; one day you will be able to grasp the expression given in the Riverboat and sing the songs that were sung there, but by then Buckley, Underwood and Collins will have moved on farther into their own genre and their own tri-communicative pattern.

Because Buckley is suffering and rejoicing quietly it is we, in our attempts at self-expression, who communicate with him, or rather with his shadow that exists only in sound and not in human form. Too often we confuse the artist with our own particular response to beauty and criticize him when he fails to reflect it when we finally discover that he exists independent of our concepts. The change of protest-Dylan to the folk-rock idol being the obvious example. In the real Leonard Cohen stood up teny-boppers and pseudo-lovers would turn and run (and that includes just about all of us). But Tim Buckley will only "sing a song for you" and you will cross over somewhere in its middle from response to recognition that this is not a philosopher-cowboy to be heeded, or a saint to be worshipped but a melodic songwriter-performer who promises you nothing and then disappears. We can only go back to the shadow, to the self which is, ultimately, the only valid artistic persona. This is Buckley's validity, the ability to create an emotive experience through his expression, and then to step away from the results. It is something that Dylan and Cohen have never been able to do because in the public eye their life-styles and art are seen as one and the same. Buckley's message, or better, his existence is not given, rather it is evoked in a beautiful and simple manner because it has nascent or conscious movement within each of us. A movement which must eventually leave behind, and be left behind by, Tim Buckley.

And perhaps that is why we will never really be ready for him; he is up so high with his music that it would be embarrassing for us to watch him fall, and he is at times so delicate that we

buckley

suddenly realize how unrefined our style, our expression is. You can't follow Buckley, he doesn't want disciples. When he is with you, you don't listen to him but are mesmerized by his dance; and when he is gone there must be enough of your emotion to write your own songs and to retain the validity of his. It's called "bringing it all back home", and it's a dangerous thing for most to try. Through the sheer beauty and intensity of his expression, Tim Buckley makes the attempt worthwhile.

(cont. from R-4)

At U.B.C. there is a group of students who have enough energy and love of jazz to get musicians like Charles Mingus to play for them. Why is it that the U. of T. has no organized jazz society to hold concerts, set up listening and playing sessions among its own members and so on? Such a group is not only feasible; it is necessary. But does anyone really care?

As you can see, being a jazz musician or even a fan in Toronto is very frustrating. And you may be asking, is there even a centre for the jazz life in Toronto?

Well, yes, there is, of a sort, at least. It's on the second floor of Sam the Record Man, where John Norris dispenses jazz records and CODA not only to the fans but also to the musicians.

Freddie Stone, the flugel-hornist and sometime leader of a big band, comes in.

"Hi, John. Any good records in this week?"

Without any hesitation, Norris picks out the latest Ornette Coleman record, another by Albert Ayler, one by Pharoah Sanders, and a couple of recent Coltrane releases.

"OK, and I'm also looking for some Indian music. Maybe two or three records?"

Disappearing into the next room for a moment, Norris returns with four records.

"Do I really need all these?"

"Yes, Fred, I'd say you ought to have them all."

"OK, John, if you say so" As the small, thin, nervous looking musician stands there talking to Norris about his up-coming premier of Norm Symonds latest work with the Winnipeg Symphony, the phone rings.

It is Patrick Scott. Knowing Scott's preferences, Norris is able to safely say, "No, Pat, there are no good records in this month".

Almost everyone in this city (and some other cities as well) who is seriously interested in jazz records relies on John Norris to keep them informed on what are the best things to listen to. Although he is not a musician, Norris has an open mind and devoted his whole life to jazz. And above all he is the only person in this country who cares enough to go to all the effort of putting out a magazine.

Norris not only edits CODA; he also writes many of the reviews, types the entire magazine, does the paste-up work, and mails the results of his labour to his subscribers. It's a hell of a lot of work for one man to do.

As we were heading over to his new studio recently, Bill Smith told me, "You know, with a lot of luck, the magazine just might take off in the near future. For the last ten years, John has been paying for the magazine out of his own pocket. If the subscriptions keep coming in, we may soon be able to break even".

It's been a long, hard struggle for Norris, all of it uphill. At the approach of its tenth anniversary, CODA has come up from a mimeographed few pages concerned mainly with traditional jazz to a magazine of professional quality covering the entire spectrum of jazz and related music.

And with this great upsurge in improvement of design and content, CODA is approaching a circulation of (get ready) ONE THOUSAND. It brings to mind the title of a four-record set of Fletcher Henderson records — "A Study In Frustration".

But John Norris never gives up. Only a couple of weeks ago, he returned from a junket to New York, where he was recruiting jazz musicians to write articles for his tenth anniversary issue of CODA, devoted entirely to the late John Coltrane.

CODA will continue to be the focal point of the jazz life in Toronto. If you care at all about jazz, maybe you will even head for the centre and start reading a magazine which is rapidly becoming the best jazz publication anywhere.

"He's not just a skinny blond guy with glasses who smokes too much and coughs all the time and drinks rye and looks like a tough reporter." A TRIBUTE TO BOB PARKINS

By GRAHAM FRASER
Notes on Bob

1. You want to travel with him. And you want to travel blind Cause he's touched you . . .

We were sitting in The Varsity hotel-room of the Royal Towers Hotel in New Westminster B.C. It was during the Canadian University Press conference at Simon Fraser University between Christmas and New Year's last year, near the end of the conference, and everybody was very happy because Sherry Brydson had just arrived out of the blue, and we were all sitting around when Bob Parkins said, "Uh, sorry to interrupt this, but, uh, since everybody's here, I think we ought to have a short meeting."

And so we sat quietly, Volky and Ingrid in the corner at the head of the bed Bob was sitting on, Sherry and Paul MacRae sittin on the other bed, with Rod Mickelburgh sitting on the floor, and Andy Szende and Sue Helwig sitting in the corner, and listened.

And Bob, stumbling occasionally as he looked around at us, pausing as he would pull a pack of duMaurier's from his shirt-pocket, talked about the CUP resolutions, and what they meant for The Varsity.

and what they meant for CUP, and whether or not The Varsity should light the proposed feerraise . . . this with the weary glinking of a fighter prepared to fight again, even knowing that he would lose, now stopping and wondering if he would be fighting on the right side. And he asked what we thought and we all talked about CUP and the fee-raise, and pretty well agreed with him that even though "they" (the national office of CUP) had promised "us" (The Varsity) that would be no fee-raise, we could afford it, and it wasn't worth fighting.

And through all this he was totally focused on The Varsity, sitting tired on that hotel bed in British Columbia in his shirtsleeves, thin and tired, but tensely and totally professional, following everything we said with his eyes, and breathing sharply in to say something, and sometimes not, and poking his finger or waving his cigarette when he spoke, and identifying totally with the "them" and "us" he was talking about, even though he was applying for a job with the National Office for the next year.

So I said that. "Don't forget, Bob, if everything goes well, you're going to be "them" after the weekend."

He stopped and grinned. "Oh yeah. I forgot." And then he laughed.

And then the meeting part sort of broke up, and Rod put Judy Collins on the record player, and we broke open the champagne that Sherry had brought along, and I tried to propose a toast to Bob, and stammered and stumbled because I couldn't say how much we all loved him and how much we were going to miss him, and tried to be witty instead and finally finished, and everyone clapped or laughed or something, and Bob turned to me, and looking warm and vulnerable and touched said "thanks." And then Sherry gave some Christmas presents that she'd brought with her, and everyone was talking and Bob was standing at one side looking a little lonely, and then Sherry came over and gave him a tartan scarf that she'd bought for him. Judy Collins was singing Suzanne, and with the lonely haunting sounds echoed in my mind, I started to cry.

And then, desperately, I sat down at the typewriter, biting my lip, trying to write some of it down, and then I broke down and covered my face with my hands. By then, Sherry was the only person in the room, and she came to me and held me close to her, and we wept about this beautiful, lonely, wonderful man.

The next day, a group of us went in to Vancouver, while Bob stayed at the conference and worked. We felt guilty about it, but we went anyway — which was kind of ironic, as the night before, most of us had felt that we could willingly cut off our right arm for the guy. So we talked about him off and on.

"You know, to think about Parkins having parents. I mean, he said he was going to stop off in the Lakehead "to see his folks." Like, it's funny — you don't think of him that way."

And with every comment, we were both trying to approach and at the same time separate ourselves from Bob's driving commitment to his folks — and his inadvertent creation of a mystique — an almost mythical ethos surrounding what he worked with which everyone around him unconsciously adopted, and identified with him.

Soon after we got back from Vancouver to the hotel, Bob came into the room.

"Any body coming up to see the committee considering my application?" Bob was applying for field Secretary — which would involve his spending next year living out of a Volkswagen travelling from campus to campus helping editors with their problems.

A few people said yes, and then Bob turned to me with a look of philosophic "they'll screw-you-in-the-end pessimism, and said "You know what. They want me to present clippings!"

We all groaned and laughed. Bob has barely written a thing for The Varsity in the two years he has worked there, and before that, would only have clippings from the Gargoyle newspaper.

Three of us went up to the hotel room where the examination was to take place. The room was full; each candidate for a position with the national office sat one at a time at the front of the room and faced questioning — both from the outgoing executive, and from onlookers like us.

Bob came up for questioning. He was sitting on a desk at the front of the hotelroom, looking tense.

"Tell us something about your background, Bob."

Deep breath, blink, hands between his knees. "Well, I finished Grade 12 at the Lakehead in . . . let's see, . . . 1962, and then I served a year at Ryerson." That brought a laugh. "Radio and Television Arts. Then I went back to Fort William and got a job with the Fort William Times Journal. In September, I decided not to go back to Ryerson, and stayed on with the paper."

"What were you doing for them?"

"Sports and general reporting. Then, at Christmas I got a job with CP-Winnipeg. (Canadian Press).

"What were you doing there?"

"I was night editor. Anyhow, the next year, I applied to the University of Toronto, and was accepted. I graduated last year with a general B.A. majoring in History, and I've spent this last year as full-time General Manager of The Varsity."

Later, the decision was announced. Bob had got the job — and they were beginning a long night of hashing over further decision.

A group of us stayed in the hotel room and chatted about him.

"I get so scared when he coughs! Honestly, you think he's going to pass out some times."

"Neah, its been a tough year. He works all the time! He never has a holiday."

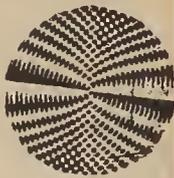

"It's rough on him. Like, he hardly ever gets to see his family. This year in early December, he got a letter from his younger sister asking if he would be home for Christmas. He was telling me he hadn't been home for Christmas in four years, so it hurt a bit to sit down and write that he wasn't going to be home for Christmas because he was going to have to catch a plane from Toronto on Boxing Day to come to the conference."

We had a kind of awe in our voices when we talked about him that night. There were a number of people there who didn't know Bob, and, as much as anything, we were trying to clarify our own feelings towards the guy. He was tough; he had fought for a year and a half to make The Varsity financially independent. He was a pro; in fact, in a funny way, I sometimes had the feeling that Bob never was a university student, in a funny way. He was too direct, and drove himself too hard to ever really be a university student.

We were trying to explain something of this to people in the hotel room who didn't know him — and at one point, I apologized to one of them for our spending the whole conversation talking about someone they didn't know.

"It's all right," he said. "It's kind of like a poem. You don't understand all of it — but it's beautiful anyway."

Sentences on Sammy, Shakespeare and Soldiers

By ALAN GORDON

I saw him Tuesday night, and he was out there for about two hours, in both halves of the show. The last half ran about an hour and was all Sammy Davis. The first half ran about an hour and a half, Sam doing 45 minutes by himself; Laurodo Almeida, a great guitarist, did about twenty minutes, then Sam came out and sang some with him and an indifferent Comedy act called "The Characters" finished off the first half of the show.

At least that's what happened Tuesday night. I can't guarantee that anything like that show will happen again . . . You see, Sam plays the audience and there's a different audience each night. This audience came from Godknowswhere to pack the O'Keefe Centre in the middle of that snow storm. (Sam says he's got a psychological thing about snow . . . it reminds him of cotton . . . he's probably said it before, but it was funny last night and it was as if he had just thought of the line about two seconds before he went 'out there'). And that audience was playing right back to Sam . . . He said he didn't want to leave at eleven o'clock, and the audience cheered, implying that they didn't want him to leave either. But he had to . . . and he did.

None of this False exit nonsense. None of this stuff where the star thanks everyone for coming, twenty minutes before the show is over, prances into the wings to an up-tempo "Danny-Boy" and then returns to applause with a "Who, me? You want more? From ME? Well, all-right, a great audience, eh Marv? Now here's an oldie that We like to do and I hope Youlikeia smuchaswelikedoingit. Marv?" None of that stuff. Sam does his spot, apologizes but he really has to go . . . and then he finishes. He knows he's good and doesn't need any tricks. We have just seen Sammy Davis and know that he is great.

Watching Sammy Davis work gives you the same kind of thrill as seeing Palmer shoot a sixty-five round of golf, or Hull on the ice, any time. You are seeing a pro, in complete control, of everything. Sam dances, sings, acts, 'did the guns', mimes, mimics (and those two are quite different things) so well that if it weren't for the fact that it looked so easy and natural, you would be bowled over by just the experience of seeing a guy work hard.

But on Sammy Davis it doesn't look like work. On Sammy Davis, it looks like fun. And there's nothing more enjoyable, invigorating, yea, even exhilarating, as having fun with a man who has fun brilliantly. And the thrill isn't a vicarious one. It isn't as if he's doing all the things we've always wanted to do. It's the delight in knowing that a man has perfected himself, and his craft, for us. He wants us, and needs us to enjoy his work. So we do . . . and there's the secret delight I felt in knowing that if I were to go back tomorrow, I'd see a different show, another Sammy Davis, and experience the same joy of watching a person doing what he loves to do and sincerely grateful that we enjoy his work too.

The Sammy Davis Show capped off the year just right. The year opened with the A.P.A. and Britain's National Theatre in town at the same time and ended with us seeing Theatre Toronto's Soldiers and Stratford's Midsummer Night's Dream in two days, two wildly divergent productions.

Stratford's Dream was a dress rehearsal for their pre-season tour. The only reason I went was the fact that I had never seen Leslie Hurry scenery before. Ever since he came to Stratford to design King Lear, I've measured every other stage design to his insurmountable standards. His use of colour in costume to heighten mood and clarify characters has never been surpassed by anybody in the business . . . and I say this just from seeing the costumes and props on the Festival Stage.

The scenery that he's worked up for the proscenium touring production has gone beyond my wildest hopes.

They work on the level that transcends the clever trickery of, say Oliver Smith's Camelot and establishes the criteria of decorousness that Aronso got in a part of his Cabaret designs and almost all of his Fiddler on the Roof. Hurry's scenery, made up of elaborately painted scrimms and humourously carved neo-classic maidens holding up a 19th century staircase causes not the "Oh, how clever, I wonder how he thought of that?" comment. Rather, the felicity of his designs causes us to sigh, "Of course. That's the way it should be. How could it be any other way?"

The whole production is like that. The Donovan-Beatle music by Stanley Silverman is a delicate inspiration, commenting and embellishing in just the right proportion. The rustics have eliminated the Stratford cockney that seems to have been spoken, and enunciated, from the navel. James Blendick's amiable lion, Eric Donkin's lost moon and Ken Welsh's Gary Cooper wall are hilariously touching pieces of work.

The rustics don't scratch themselves to excess, and the lovers don't breathe too heavily. Jane Casson's Georgy girl-Helena is a delight to behold.

There are only a couple of irritating things. Douglas Rain is just a little too smooth and calculating a Bottom, and Barbara Bryne gave us not so much a Puck, as a Peter Puck, complete with Mary Marting giggle. Except for that and the crude lighting by James Gleason, the show was a delightful, magical dream.

From Dream, to Nightmare as we finally caught up with Theatre Toronto's production of Soldiers, by Rolf Hochhuth. Whatever this script is judging from what Theatre Toronto did with it, it isn't a play. Is it a book? . . . A documentary? A closet Drama? What?

There is no doubting the earnestness of Mr. Hochhuth. Everything that he says, from the Nietzschean implications of Churchill's command of England to the agonized pleas on the part of England's clergy to play the war game like gentlemen, are things that should be said. How they are to be said is the problem, and it is a problem that Clifford Williams and his company have only begun to grapple with. Colicos looks like Churchill, but acts as though he treats every occasion, from lighting a cigar, to drawing the bath as a chance to declaim. We are given the platform Churchill in the kitchen. The most mundane of instances are, for Colicos' Churchill, occasions for oratory.

Nothing happens in the first act. Now let me make that clear. We are introduced to the central figures, their attitudes, etc. All the necessary exposition is there . . . but it's done so dully, that Churchill's great friend and nemesis, Sikorsky, is introduced as an incidental piece of research. The facts, perhaps, get in the way of the drama. We are given an enormous amount of data to digest, but we are given little help in the digestion. It is shovelled down our throats, this first act, and it is only until the middle half of the second act that we are able get to work on the issues at hand.

The production at the Royal Alexandra is a shambles of confusion. The scenery and costumes, while not getting in the way, do nothing to heighten the dramatic implications of the situation. If Hochhuth wrote this as a play within a play, fine. Let's get some sense of who is playing, and who is playing at playing.

Theatre Toronto proudly proclaimed a coup in getting the North American premiere of Hochhuth's play. Caught up in the whirl of publicity, it seems that they never got around to working at the show. Excepting Colicos' performance, and those of Les Yeo and Terry Tweed, the production has all the earmarks of a quickie B movie designed to cash in on some self-started public attention.

Someday a play will be written about the complexities of Churchill and his times. Soldiers, at least the Theatre Toronto production of it, is a flawed first draft.

During the year the staff has remained in the background; quietly working away in their little home at 91 St. George St. Now we give you, our readers, a chance to see what we really look like.

We're not really nuts. We just love each other. Just look.

We don't want to mention any names. No, we're all one when it comes to putting out the paper. But you wondered whose faces those bylines and photo credits belonged to. We leave you to guess who Ampersand Barker is. (Hint: he appears in more photos than next year's editor.)

The Varsity staff wishes to extend special thanks to Bob Parkins as chief cigarette provider. The office balcony as the best snowballing vantage point. ## Revolution: Mouth To Mouth

By DAVID PAPE

The dialectic of revolution is like a squalling child in pain to breathe; slimy, hanging by its beels, and red with the effort of life.

Jean Luc Godard's latest film, LA CHINOISE, is such an infant gasping in the theatre of revolution. But we cannot be sure whether its dialectic achieves meaning or ends up closer to the bleating of sheep. For the characters in the movie, it is a first difficult step.

From various perspectives Godard approaches the lives of five young people who attempt to form a communist cell in Paris, August 1967. The five represent different classes. Veronique, the leader, is a student-philosopher out to reform education..

Her lover, Guillaume, is an actor whose father worked with Artaud, and whose purpose is to define the theatre of revolution, the true socialist theatre. Brecht is his ideal.

Theatre is a Russian who plays little part. He paints Maoist slogans on the walls of the flat; and ponders the problems of action and culture. Obsessed with thoughts of death, he eventually commits suicide.

The second pair of lovers are a chemist and a country girl. The chemist will fall away from them since he does not approve of terrorism. The peasant girl continues to clean house. The issues of Marxism seem clear to her, but she really doesn't understand a word.

The film progresses with a barrage of images, ideas, jokes, unfinished story-boards, and interviews. The marks of Godard which are both frustratingly difficult to follow, and amazingly convincing in their comprehensiveness.

The result is a number of beautiful scenes, such as when Veronique tells Guillaume "I don't love you any more, do you understand. Not your hair, not your mouth, not your nose, ..." and while nineteenth century music plays on, "and I detest your pompous speeches, do you understand." Quietly he replies, "I understand, but I am sad." The point turns out to be not that she is out of love, but that his reaction could be concurrent with the playing music; ie, that you can fight on two fronts at the same time. And this theme, I believe explains Godard's ever-present technique of playing voices and sounds over dialogue or images not related to the story-line.

If the film is didactic, then it is certainly boring. But I am convinced that it is not. First, to understand the intellectual climate of France, one must understand the climate of communist thought; and that means understanding the split between Peking and Moscow. In the film, the characters are all anti-Moscow, anti-compromise, anti-capitalist. In every field, they are trying to relate their theory to life. They want no treaty with the U.S.

To understand them, however, we must understand their dogma; and the first part of the film gives it to us.

Further, their position is severely shaken by a number of episodes. In one, a trained leftist philosophy professor questions rigorously the usefulness of applying Lenin (1917) or Mao to Paris 1967. We are on his side. There is no basis for terrorism.

Then, we see that terrorism miscarries. In knocking off a party bigwig, Veronique kills the man in room 32 as well as 23.

Most humorously, we listen to a pop recording of "The little red book makes everything work." What more send-up do we need?

Finally, we learn that all their jazz is no more than a summer escape, irresponsible idealism, in someone else's apartment. Veronique is left in a mess; she will go back to school. The final perspective is that all the arrogant revolution of the summer is no more than a first very timid step.

To my mind the film moves beyond propaganda into what I find disturbing and challenging and real: the Paris of Godard.

* * * * *

It is a unique accident that I was given LeRoi Jones THE DEAD LECTURER to review this week. While the book is four years old, it is a complement to LA CHINOISE. This book of poems reads like the lyric record of a man who has made his own cell.

A review of THE DEAD LECTURER must be retrospective. Jones is now aligned with the Black Muslim and Black Power groups; is in jail for carrying a gun in last summer's riots; and is reputed (I don't know) to have abandoned poetry for activism.

In The Dead Lecturer we have all the beginnings of revolution. What is most interesting is that they grow out of love poetry ...

The whole book moves towards self-definition (just as Guillaume defined himself in terms of objective acting—making no distinction between life and theatre). Begin with the lover, a marvelously appealing, wistful lover:

That you will stay, where you are, a gentle wisp of life. Ah ...)

But the lover is quick to realize the pain of love, and its frustration, its incompleteness. And his suffering (I must tell you/my body hurts) is the suffering of all society, not just black. But its image darkness, isolation:

Europe
frail woman dead,
we are alone.

At this point, however, the lover gets paranoid. Instead of being a spokesman, he is looked on as outsider. The others, society, they turn and spit at him. They reason away their failure. They have words: economics, philosophy (my God!); they have grammar; they have their white pure institutions, that are all lies. The white verb, the whitehouse, the whitehall, white God, and whiteman bit with their lies. They accept their lies. For Jones (and Godard) they are dead.

Dead spiritually, and must be overthrown. This is the voice of revolution.

Burton's Vaginas

BY LARRY HAIYEN

To those people who didn't see Dennis Burton's "Garterbelt" paintings at Hart House last year, the new collection at the Isaacs Gallery may come as a shock. To those who did, it will come as a shock. It was easy to walk around in the Hart House Art Gallery and chuckle at the various depictions of female deshabelle and say that surely Burton must be putting us on because well, you know, be just couldn't be serious.

Even when he spoke on his exhibit last year, he had a gleam in his eye as he said, "Well, I was married to this chick, see, and she was a go-go dancer, and one day I figured she was playing games on me. So when she was asleep, I'd go through her underthings . . .". The whole thing was good fun and a lot of us wondered what this original and colourful painter was going to do next.

Even Burton had a tough time deciding what to do next. Now what's the next logical step from garterbelts? The female genitals, of course. Only this time, you know he's serious. He has nine typewritten pages up on the wall describing the motivation for this series. It is the Tantra art of India, a conversion facility for Tantra Hinduism. Tantra was forcefully banned in 16th century India because, "it was anti-orthodox hinduism, since it allowed membership of women, and was tolerant and advocated inter-caste involvement in its religious practices as well as advocating caste miscegnation."

Tantra art also concerned itself very much with the female genitalia, considering these beautiful and capable of being worshipped by the artist's work. The sole preoccupation of the exhibit is the female reproductive system, its many forms and variations and the flights of fancy that Burton's mind has taken with the subject. One painting depicts an multi-coloured orchid blooming forth from between a pair of legs; another shows a butterfly; still another has a molten mass of colour that looks like the interior of the earth.

The colours in the paintings are the most striking element after you get used to the subject. He uses every colour of the rainbow and the paintings are dazzling. The rainbow is even one of the themes for one sequence of paintings called "The Niagara Rainbow Honey moon Series".

In this sequence, Burton combines his Tantra thing and the Rainbow imagery of "The Honeymoon Capital of the World", Niagara Falls. It traces the path of the boney-mooners until it "finds both bride and groom in union, with the self-projecting cerebellum and jnaendriyas stimulated over consciousness."

Burton is now committed. You can't really chuckle at these paintings. They're too striking, too full of meaning or massage or whatever you want to call it. If you take the time to read what Burton has written about the exhibit (and by all means do) and the comments on the individual paintings, and the autobiographical note; and if you find time to look at the paintings, you'll have spent the better part of an hour at the Isaacs Gallery. And that's good. You'll find yourself drawn into the paintings and Burton's ideas: "The fact that we have a birth control pill is sign enough that the society wishes to PREVENT creativity, to PREVENT Nature from its inevitable course, to ABORT, and to stifle life.

In the Hart House exhibit, Burton put up a bulletin board to simulate the artist's workshop. He likes to tell the observer about himself and the way he works and thinks. You can look at paintings by other artists and the painting may be interesting but you don't know who the hell the person is who painted it or why or when or anything. That's okay when you look at art from nine centuries ago and the artist is a mysterious enigma. But not today. It's nice to know something else besides what's on the canvas.

The Isaacs Gallery is on Yonge just above Bloor, and the exhibition lasts until March 25th. See it. And if you happen to have $700 kicking around, buy one of the paintings; you'll have to print up addenda to it but it'll brighten up your place and provide some lively conversation.

Despite temporary setbacks, spring is definitely on the way. In just three and a half weeks will be celebrated a festival which for forty years now has figured prominently in the North American rite of spring: the presentation of the Oscars. The televised ritual on Monday April 8, will once again prove a source of entertainment, irritation, or ennui. The critic's traditional role in the pre-Oscar weeks is to denounce the stupidity of the year's nominations and, while naming his own favorites in each category, cynically predict that the Academy will make the worst possible choices.

It is, however, in my opinion about as sensible to become exercised about the unfairness of the Oscar game as it is to believe implicitly in its justice. On the other hand, the game is not necessarily a proletarian pleasure which superior types need feel is beneath their notice.

The Academy Awards is an autobiographical phenomenon. It is not what the informed and sensitive critic thinks of movies, or what the public thinks of movies; it is what people who make movies think of them. An autobiography is not always the best or most objective sort of biography, but it has an interest of its own and deserves attention in its own right.

The 2,900 members of the 13 branches of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences choose the nominees and the winners of the awards by mail. They allot the awards for excellence in their own branch (the actors for acting, the costume designers for costume design, and so forth). In addition all members are although at times dull and pleasantly pretentious, begins well and ends splendidly. About Dr. Doolittle the less said, in this category, the better and I unfortunately did not see In the Heat of the Night.

man, Spencer Tracy in this case. Is it permissible to try to right previous years' injustices by taking into account past as well as recent films? Such contention might assure Rod Steiger the best actor seeing that he lost out two years ago to Lee Marvin. Similarly Mike Evans' performance in The Whisperer, I would then name Miss Bancroft best actress.

Of the directors I am undecided between Penn and Richard Brooks of In Cold Blood; Penn will probably get it. On the basis of merit alone, I would choose Tracy over Warren Beatty and Dustin Hoffman The Graduate for best actor, although I missed the performances of Steiger and Paul Newman (Cool Hand Luke). Best supporting actor will and should go to Michael J. Pollard as C.W. in Bonnie and Clyde. About supporting actresses I am unsure; there are frivolous reasons for guessing at The Graduate's Katherine Ross (her looks), Guess Who's Beah Richards (her colour), and Modern Millie's Carol Channing (her "Hello, Dolly" popularity).

It is most regrettable this year that only one of the nominated foreign films has been shown in Toronto, i.e. Jiri Menzel's Coisely Watched Trains. One other was shown at the Montreal Film Festival this summer, Alexander Petrovic's I Even Met Happy Gypsies, which is the more substantial and engrossing if not the more charming of the two.

At best the Academy Awards are an interesting bit of self-revelation. At worst they help sell poorer films at the expense of better. But ultimately an Oscar cannot make or break a picture, coming, if at all, well after the release date. If inferior entertainment prospers, movie goers have in the final analysis only themselves to blame.

A LOOK AT THE INSTITUTION AND THE NOMINEES BY MEL BRADSHAW

lowed to vote on the big one: best picture of the year.

Of this year's nominees for that award, I would both predict and choose Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde. Presenting as it does a stock theme in a fresh and original fashion (think how unlike The Untouchables is its treatment of 1930's gangsterism), it contrasts sharply with its chief rival a number of nominations Stanley Krawers Guess Who's Coming to Dinner. The latter film's subject is inter-racial marriage, one which is in fact new to the screen, but it is dealt with in highly conventional manner of a TV family situation con-edy. Guess Who may be useful socially in diminishing prejudice. Its potential value in Quarrels about Oscars can often be traced to disagreements about the proper criteria of selection. Is it all right to vote for a product of your own studio that is doing badly (Doolittle) Is it proper to give awards where they will do the most social good (Guess Who)? Must an award be seen as an incentive to greater effort? Such seems to be the argument of those who maintain it would "make no sense" to award an Oscar to a dead

Nichols' near winner Virginia Woolf could count in his favour this year for the best direction prize.

Judging screen acting is tricky. One is often unsure how much credit is due to the director and how much to the star. Faye Dunaway guided by Arthur Penn is not necessarily the same actress who appeared in The Happening and Hurry Sundown. Personalities cloud the issue also. Audrey Hepburn was very appealing in Wait Until Dark, but then the part conformed well to her screen image. Anne Bancroft, on the other hand, has proven her talent in radically different roles in The Miracle Worker, The Pumpkin Eater, and now The Graduate. Not having seen Dame Edith

...and who are you

The colorful historian A. J. P. Taylor reports that when the news of peace reached the people of London after the Great War in 1918, they went wild for three days and nights; total strangers copulated on the pavements and doorsteps. They were, he said, expressing a preference for life against death. The cops broke it up on the third day, as always, and order was once again restored.

To-day total strangers copulate in their own bedrooms, safe in the assurance that cops won't break it up . . .

Spring will soon be upon us; Washington is a grey dull city for the winter, but if you go there in springtime when the cherry blossoms are out, the broad avenues and promenades are swathed in pink and white, and the moist air is perfumed. It is the only respite.

Some three years ago when marching still seemed like a good idea, we went down to the first SDS affair in Washington. The cherry blossoms were out, Joan Baez sang to us, and we lay on the grass near the Washington monument in the warm spring sunshine listening to the unequivocal speeches. To many it was a family reunion; former SNCC field workers and urban organizers walked around looking for friends they hadn't seen since Mississippi; Black Power was still in the future. The day had the positive gay spirit of a May Festival.

That evening after most of the marchers had left the city, we drove down to a sit-in which was taking place near the White House. The city had fallen asleep and there was no-one to witness the few demonstrators huddled in the shadows near the fence; just one or two bored cops and a few people carrying placards besides those sitting in. It was a much gloomier, lonelier scene than that of the afternoon. The evening air was cooler and the demonstrators shivered visibly.

Across the street a young man leaning against a tree was watching us; after an hour he crossed the street and stood a few yards from the perimeter of the demonstrating area. He approached me, polite, very nervous, and asked if we could talk for a moment.

He glanced nervously over his shoulder at the other people and suggested we move down the street a bit where it was more private. Now I was getting nervous.

"What are you doing here," he asked, "who are those people?" His eyes were bloodshot and he shivered violently. He was confused about the demonstration and asked several questions about the numbers involved, how many there had been in the States etc.

I wondered aloud whether he ever read the newspapers or listened to the radio. There were not, to be sure, as many demonstrations three years ago as the show was getting on the road, but that someone could not have known about the protests was both startling and disconcerting.

"Look, you've heard of the War in Viet Nam haven't you?" I asked, ready to believe that even that might have escaped his attention.

"Oh yes, don't get me wrong," he replied hastily, "I was just surprised that anyone over here knew anything about it."

Over here? Ah well . . . a man from Mars perhaps? Almost. A man from Viet Nam.

"I've been stationed there for the last fourteen months," he told me cautiously, again glancing over his shoulder; "I got back three days ago."

I stared at him stupidly; was polite conversation in order? "What's it like over there," I asked as if we were talking about the weather. He relaxed a little and began to talk at such a rapid speed that one would have thought he was telling his life story in three minutes.

Since his arrival in Washington three days ago he hadn't slept for more than three hours; he woke up hearing insects, gunfire and his buddies screaming; his nerves were raw and his demeanor was that of a man in shock. He didn't know about the demonstrations, that people back home gave a damn; when he finished he was in tears, shaking terribly. He showed me some snapshots of himself in Viet Nam, wrote down his Washington hotel address, spoke of a girl somewhere in Virginia and asked me to come and see him if I could the next day.

One of the cops was now sauntering towards us; my stranger friend was off and running before I could say goodbye. His last hurried, worried words said he thought the demonstrations were fine, just fine, "you've got to keep it up because we're killing people over there and I don't know why I was killing them goodbye."

I could see him running for half a mile before he slowed down; I called at his hotel the next morning but he had checked out. We left the city too. Goodbye Washington, the cherry blossoms were falling.

The following evening we stood by the railway tracks on a hill overlooking the town of Punxsutawney Pennsylvania; our thumbs were out and we were hoping for a ride which might take us to Buffalo before midnight. A good soul, a local contractor had driven us the last fifty miles and offered to accommodate us for the night in Punxsutawney if we got stuck.

The sky was showing its last reds and purples, and we were on the point of calling up our contractor benefactor when an old car with two girls pulled over. Punxsutawney belles.

Half an hour later we were in one of Punxsutawneys few restaurants exchanging cordials. Punxsutawney, we found out, was the home of America's groundhog legend; every spring when the beast is supposed to look for his shadow, the town celebrates with a groundhog festival. Its postcards proudly proclaim this fact.

The girls informed us that they were the town's only two eccentrics, apart from Ivan, a friend who worked in a factory and wrote poetry. They took us home where we met Ivan who was enthralled when he learned that we read Liberation magazine; he had never in his life met anyone else who knew about Liberation. The girls listened to Bob Dylan records but knew no-one else in town who did. Life in Punxsutawney was grim.

Ivan's co-workers at the factory thought he was crazy; he wrote poetry and thought there was something wrong with the war in Viet Nam. The girls thought America was crazy, but looked forward to the day when they could move to Philadelphia away from Punxsutawney and groundhogs. Ivan wanted to know more about the "dis-senters marches" as he called them, and we told him as much as we knew until he had to go home as he was working the following morning.

We stayed on; long into the Punxsutawney night with good Pennsylvania beer, early Dylan and apple pie we talked until we were all in love with each other, all bent upon seduction, total strangers that we were.

The next day we crossed the border where the oil company sign gave us an electric message of welcome to Canada, and we maintained a stony silence when asked if we had anything to declare.

A year later a letter came from one of the girls informing me that Ivan had been drafted and sent to Korea; the two girls drafted and sent to Philadelphia. Do come and visit.

Spring is coming, the depression is coming, exams are coming. If we make it through the summer we'll be back next year with the Review. Who knows, the war might be over then, and we can all get out on the pavements and doorsteps of the campus, total strangers that we are, and do our thing and have our jollies until the university police break it up. Cheers.

BOOKS AND BABBLE

Books For Months Of Intellectual Compromise

By BOB RAE

Few things make less sense than reviewing four books in one column, four books, unrelated, hurriedly read, and superficially consumed. But March and April are the months of intellectual compromise in the student calendar, so I shall forge ahead with scarcely a qualm about Honesty of the Meaning of Literature.

In the Name of America is a documented study of American war crimes in Vietnam, commissioned and published by The Committee of Clergy and Laymen Concerned about Vietnam. It is a systematized and clinical volume of newspaper accounts, military dispatches, Red Cross reports, carefully documenting the brutalities committed by Americans in Vietnam.

The outrage and sorrow that marks the preface written by the Committee reflects their rather naïve view that somehow Americans don't do that sort of thing, that we 'must play by the rules of the game even if the other side breaks them,' and that in the name of God, America must take a look at what its men are doing in the name of peace and freedom.

These are scarcely new approaches to the problem. The simple historical fact is that wars of an imperial nature — by that I mean those fought between a strong Western power and non-Western countries (away game) — always bring out the more heinous qualities in Whitey. This was true in the Crusades; more recently, it was true in Algeria and Vietnam in the 1940's and 1950's. Morality, rules, conventions, all become meaningless: Rudyard Kipling's lines about the Ten Commandments having no jurisdiction East of Suez were among the few sensible things he ever wrote. The American soldier in Vietnam might well argue that the American conscience has no place outside America.

I am not writing a defence of war crimes in Vietnam; I am simply saying that it should come as no surprise to us that they are widespread, or that white-haired boys could commit them. Nor are we holier than the Americans; Canadians would be just as susceptible to the common disease of racism and inhumanity, if ever given the chance to pave South-east Asia.

The book reminded me of Peter Weiss's play on the Auschwitz trials: the same monotonous repetition of crime after crime, the figures becoming almost meaningless as the accounts of brutalities follow one after the other.

The painful contortions of the American conscience cannot leave the reader unmoved, but they are based on the assumption that Americans have a mission not to commit sin in the world. It is of course a natural assumption, but scarcely a realistic one. If Americans were playing by the rules in Vietnam, the war would still be unjustifiable.

What Vietnam should prove to Americans is that they are now a part of the sin of mankind, of colonial Europe, of decaying Empires. They too have committed inhumanity, they too are capable of losing. It should be the symbol of their incorporation into the world order. Then only the Chinese will be on the outside.

Two Penguin books, Polish Writing Today and South African Writing Today, are the beginning of a collection of anthologies of world literature. Designed to "break the sound-barrier of inertia, language, culture and tradition," they fall short of this rather lofty goal, but do succeed in providing the reader with a taste of what the country is about. The better of the two is the anthology on South Africa, if only because the writer is more interested in that area of the globe than New Old Europe struggling to break the ancient barriers of Stalinism.

The anthology succeeds in transmitting some of the tension existing in South Africa today, which is a notable achievement in itself. Many of the short stories are affected, and somewhat stilted in language, but all possess a basic simplicity quite moving in their exposition of problems of white and black. There is also an interesting essay by Lewis Nkosi on 'Black Power or the Souls of Black Writers.'

Finally, The Penguin Dictionary of Surnames, which I must criticize as being of use to wasps only. It is cleverly written, however, and despite its highly encyclopaedic title, is quite amusing to read. What would be an even more interesting book would be a dictionary of Canadian surnames, which would be far more amusing to read, as it would draw on so much more than simply Anglo-Saxon backgrounds. This present edition will scarcely move a generation to tears or laughter, but it is an amusing piece of philological esoterica of interest to obscurantists of all hews.

odd notes

Last issue, baby. Now is the time for all good men to go and introduce themselves to their professors. How do you ask for an extension for an assignment due in December.

Jean Luc-Goddard will not be appearing at Cinecity or West Hall tomorrow, (some one told him about the climate probably — though there are rumours about a heart attack) but Robert Fulford will be speaking in the Centennial Film Board lecture series, Tuesday at 7.00 p.m. in Room 106, UC. Fulford, who writes extremely perceptive film reviews under a pseudonym, is as enjoyable to listen to as he is to read. Not to be missed.

Alan Gordon asks me to thank David, Ken Klonsky, Allison Laing, Arnie Rubenstein, and Arlene Perly. I am very grateful to all the regs. (see last page), without whose, etc. etc. Henry Tarvainen is a great man — all further comment unnecessary, except to note that he will be Editor-in-chief of the Review next year, with Rod Mickleburgh as Co-assoc. assoc. Zic.

Other notes: the second edition of Catalyst appears on March 18th. (Monday.) Something refreshing to replace post-Varsity comic relief with a touch of "creative writing." Salut, It's been —ed.

What's RIGHT with Indians

By LARRY HAIVEN

Chief Dan George is an old, old man. His eyes look out from his wrinkled face with a betraying mute innocence. But when you look a bit longer, you see a patience welded by innumerable defeats, humiliations and unrealized dreams.

On July 1st, 1967, an exuberant crowd at Empire Stadium in Vancouver stopped and listened to the old man talk about himself and his Indian people on the birthday of Canadian Confederation.

"...But in the long 100 years since the white man came, I have seen my freedom disappear like the salmon going mysteriously out to sea. The white man's strange customs which I could not understand pressed down upon me until I could no longer breathe.

When I fought to protect my land and my home, I that leave a trail of drop-outs in their wake breaking parental bonds, question, "Who am I?"; all these things and more make the young man or woman about to enter the big wide world look around with fear and loneliness.

Tony Madamin is a serious looking, quiet talking Indian of 23. He is the chair-load of books, participated in weekly quizzes and were regularly graded for their efforts. Free discussion was also stimulated.

Many benefits were derived from the workshop and it was decided to extend this experience to other promising young people of Indian background.

Tony is taking electrical engineering at Waterloo. He has survived a school system that defied survival, that taught him little or nothing about his culture.

After attending a public school on the Manitoulin Island reserve, he and his classmates had to go to a residential high school many miles away from the reserve.

will come from many different sources.

Waterloo University students' Federation will donate $1,000; U of T's Students Council will give $250. They are also hoping for money from the Citizenship Branch of the federal government and the department of Indian Affairs.

You too, can help the Workshop (sounds like a television commercial, doesn't it?). Saturday night, at Hart House Theatre, there will be a show of Indian songs, dances, stories, satirical skits. The show is sponsored by the Student Health Organization of University of Toronto and the Workshop committee.

SHOUT has been holding discussion meetings between white students and Indians for the last few months. It will handle the complicated production aspects of the program to take a load off the shoulders of the Workshop organizers.

It looks like an exciting show. Dancers are expected from as far as Detroit.

Tickets are $1.50 at Hart House box office, Sigmund Samuel library and at the door.

The success of Canada's next 100 years will depend on whether Canada's many peoples can find a solution to their problems. The Workshop looks like a step in the right direction.

The Indians Are Coming to Hart House Theatre Saturday night

was called a savage. When I neither understood nor welcomed his way of life, I was called lazy. When I tried to rule my people, I was stripped of my authority."

He then offered hope to them that what is past the new generation, remind and gone must be forgotten.

"Like the Thunderbird of old, I shall rise again out of the sea; I shall grab the instruments of the white man's success—his education, his skills and with these new tools, I shall build my race into the proudest segment of your society. Before I follow the great Chiefs who have gone before us, Oh Canada, I shall see these things come to pass."

But for young Indians today, the problems are much more subtle.

The lack of power to govern their own affairs on the reserves, the primary and secondary school systems man of this year's Canadian Indian Workshop to be held at Waterloo University this summer.

The Workshop started two summers ago in the hope of gathering together Indian youths from all parts of Canada to learn about their culture and history, to meet people like themselves, and to learn ways of realizing themselves as Indians and individuals.

The first Workshop, held in 1966 at the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg, left 20 young Indians from seven provinces and 13 tribes with a new insight into their freedom and social responsibility.

The course lasted six weeks and was instructed by anthropologists, historians, social scientists, members of Government and just plain people.

The participants prepared and submitted written assignments, read a heavy load of books, participated in weekly quizzes and were regularly graded for their efforts. Free discussion was also stimulated.

Today he is one of only a 200 Indian students in Canadian universities. Many of them will drop out because of personal crises brought on by loneliness, depression and lack of direction.

Any student who has gone through university will understand these problems at once and realize how magnified they can become when the student loses his sense of identity and of belonging.

This is why the Workshop is so valuable. It provides those attending with a pride in their Indian-ness and a motivation to succeed in their education and careers.

Tony is presently trying to raise funds for this year's Workshop. It's going to cost about $12,000 and the money

Floating freedom

1. An early edition of the Houston Chronicle for August 22, 1967, carried the offer below:

Law stays in SAC

Law students will stay in the Students Administrative Council.

Students Wednesday voted 120-99 in favor of pulling out. But the 120 figure was only 26 per cent of the enrolment, far short of the 50 per cent required.

"We will make a concentrated effort to work with SAC now," said Ron McInnes (II Law), a SAC candidate. "But if SAC again has no relevance for law students, we will have another referendum next year."

3. A week later, "FREE" turned up squarely in South Viet Nam:

The new, improved Summer Varsity will be lovingly edited by Rod Mickleburgh, Varsity Sports Editor and general bullshitter.

All interested writers, photogs, reviewers and social reformers are asked to attend a meeting today at The Varsity offices, 91 St. George St., at 1 p.m. today.

Revolutionaries, unwed mothers and stray dogs also welcome.

U of S board opposed to students' union and paper

REGINA (CUP) — Student power at the University of Saskatchewan could suffer a considerable setback if the administration has its way.

A direct threat to the autonomy of the students union at the Regina campus of the U of S was presented at a recent meeting of the board of governors. It wants to change the student union constitution, which instructs the university to collect student union fees. It also wants to prohibit the union from using the university's name, and to push the student union paper, The Carillon, off campus.

Board and administration spokesmen at the meeting mounted heated attacks on The Carillon, which recently broke the story of a student loan granted to Allan Guy, minister of public works in the Saskatchewan government.

The Carillon has also been following an editorial policy consistently opposed to the government's proposed changes in relations between the government and the university.

(Last October the government moved to assume direct financial control of the university.)

The committee meeting was prompted by a letter from Regina campus Principal W. A. Riddell to the students union demanding:

- why the university should continue to collect fees for the students union;
- why the union should be allowed to continue using the university's name;
- why the university should continue to provide space on campus for The Carillon.

Biculturalism on board a moving bus

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

"Est délicieux? C'est boo, non?"

"Oui, il est très bon," I answered, licking a lollipop while I waited to board the bus.

He was boarding the same bus and as he stood beside me in line.

No one in Toronto ever spoke to me in French before. I liked it. I strained my brain to remember what French I had learned in high school.

We boarded the bus together.

People ahead of me dropped their second-zone fares into the ticket box.

"Est necessaire de payer, ici?" he questioned.

"Où allez-vous?" I asked.

I thought that would be easier than explaining the Toronto bus-zone system.

He showed me a little map sketched on a piece of white paper and pointed to a line with the word Bridgeland on it—just above a line with the word Dupont.

That street is still in the first zone.

"Non, pas necessaire de payer," I said.

He smiled gratefully and sat down in a double seat. His smile was inviting and I accepted the invitation.

I sat down beside him.

"Combien de temps..." I began, but my French was starting to fail me. "Mon ami" understood.

"Ici?" he completed my question.

"Oui," I said, relieved.

"Deux mois." He smiled still, so warmly, and I imagined how difficult it must be to be alone in a strange city speaking a language that most of the residents barely know.

"Aimez-vous Toronto?" I asked, trying to feign some sort of accent.

"Oui, c'est beau," he said.

"D'où venez-vous?" "Suisse."

Now both my French and my conversational ability waned. "Mon ami" took over as I nervously adjusted my books on lap.

"Etudiez-vous à l'université—l'université de Toronto?" he asked.

"Oui," j'ai répondu.

"J'étude à l'université de York," he said.

"O—York," I clarified for myself. He nodded approvingly.

"Je suis dans le premier année," I said, trying harder—I never could remember masculine and feminine words.

"Première année," he corrected.

"Je n'ai pas étudié le français pour deux années, I explained, "et il est très difficile de me souvenir."

I began to regret the "totus Latinus" I studied last year and the "italiano" this year, instead of French.

"I speak English," he said in a warm French accent.

But I preferred the French anyway.

The bus had just passed Dupont and he started to leave.

"Allez-vous au..." I lost the rest of his sentence.

Seeing my confusion, he repeated in English.

"Are you going to the party at the International Students Center?" I shook my head hesitantly, almost regretfully. "Try to come. I will be there after 7:30," he shouted from the front of the bus.

The bus stopped. I caught his smile once more as his light brown hair and beige trench coat disappeared down the steps.

"Bonne chance," I shouted after him. I hope he heard me.

And if he didn't, I hope he reads it now.

2. Apparently somebody noticed that "FREE" lay in North Viet Nam, and it disappeared in a later edition:

Varsity Fund drive phones for its money

What's going on in the East Hall of University College these days?

Banks of telephones. People talking out of the sides of their mouths, demanding, cajoling, pleading. Is it a bookie joint, a phony stock promotion, a magazine dodge?

No, all this vocal arm bending is for a far worthier cause, the Varsity Fund.

The fund last year raised more than $140,000 in its phone campaign. This year's five-week campaign has 2,000 volunteers soliciting funds from the 37,000 University of Toronto alumni in the Toronto area.

In past years, the Varsity Fund, administered by the president of the university has been used to found the centre for culture and technology, the centre for criminology, the student reception service, and numerous other programs.

The Benny Louis Story

The Benny Louis orchestra is looking for draft-dodgers with musical talent.

The band, which plays at many Hart House and engineering dances, wants to supplement its mainly-Canadian ranks.

A spokesman for the Toronto Anti-Draft Program said last night that one person had been referred to the band.

Louis complained that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been raiding his band for the CBC studio band. "I've gone through this for 20 years, and it's worse than ever now," he said.

The band leader stressed he would audition anyone interested in playing. "And I pay my men union rates or more, even the new ones," he said.

American democratic society is falling apart. The entire political system is quickly tumbling into the hands of people whose heads are buried in old and dangerous myths.

LBJ and Congress, together on a paranoid psychotic trip if there ever was one, have made America the laughing stock of the world, also the terror of the world. Allen Ginsberg, here recently, likened the American government to a gambler on a losing streak, madly going for broke.

For the first time in American history, the young are coming to massively identify themselves with the other oppressed elements in the country — the Negro, the Indian, the mentally ill. Each young male faces the distinct possibility that the Strangelove-Jack-de-Ripper team at the Pentagon will summon him to kill or be killed in the name of an ethic which he questions.

As more and more kids begin to smoke pot, they find themselves in direct confrontation with authority. The police plant undercover men on campus to arrest students engaged in the gentle, harmonious ritual of dope-smoking. The official agencies make statements which pot-smokers see to be lies. If lies prevail in this area, then where can one be assured of truth? More questioning, more defiance.

As the liberal-technocrats, castrated, shrink from view, we see a marked polarization in America: on one side, the death-forces of hatred, fear and delusion. On the other side, the life forces — bubbling from the ghetto Negroes who have found their African roots and derive nobility from them. The old "New Left", focus anger upon those who are themselves the most angry. The happy, turned-on, mind in, dancing love-children are confident their chants of God and their holy love-vibrations will eventually topple the most imposing bullshit edifices.

There is a general feeling throughout America that things are rapidly heading towards a confrontation. Police forces are being strengthened. New anti-riot arms are being developed. Dope arrests are increasing. Negroes are lining up to buy guns.

In August, the National Death Party is meeting in Chicago to re-nominate Lyndon Johnson for the Presidency. And this is the point in time which seems fated to be the scene of a classic confrontation between Caesar and the forces of life.

More than 200,000 young people are expected to flock into Chicago for the Convention days. Some are already infiltrating hotels and restaurants, there to do their private bits of sabotage when the time comes.

Cab drivers will pick up delegates and drop them off in Wisconsin. Streets will be blocked, the Convention Hall besieged by chanting, dancing hordes. Chicago Negroes, from the densest spade ghetto in the U.S., will be delighted to join in.

The pulsing energy flowing through the streets of Chicago will act as a magnet, attracting in droves the discontented, the dispossessed. Perhaps there will be massive breakouts from mental hospitals by inmates who have been locked up because they refuse to participate in the Great American Sanity Trip. They will join all the other inmates of the grand asylum, who have decided, once and for all, to break out.

All this will be happening while the streets of Chicago are filling with the vibrations of people like Country Joe and the Fish, Arlo Guthrie, Pete Seeger, Janis Ian, the Fugs, Phil Ochs, Judy Collins, Allen Ginsberg, Papy Krassner, and the Steve Miller Blues Band, to name a few.

The great universal drama of control-and-fear meeting ease-and-harmony will be enacted on this Chicago stage. A revolution of love and laughter in the making.

I wouldn't miss it.

Letter from Mr. McLuhan on Playboy and hippies and...

Marshall McLuhan returns soon, triumphant after a year in that great electronic country to the south. What's he done? Maybe there's a clue here, his letter to the April Playboy commenting on an article in which Harvey Cox explained that hippies comprise a new religious movement.

"Stay dry, Sweetheart"

Remember rain? Remember how she'd get a little crazy on rainy mornings! She wouldn't let you get away with anything! ("Either you finish all your oatmeal, or so Captain McNight tonight.") Then there was always that extra spoonful of saddle oil, just to be on the safe side. When it was time to get dressed, she'd make you put on practically everything you owned. And when she was through, you looked like one big, gaudy. Then she'd plant a misty one on your already so called brow and lovingly put you out the door.

Since you have placed Dr. Harvey Cox in so glamorous a context, it would be unfair to him for me to comment on his thoughtful piece without making a few observations about the medium you have assigned to his message.

Nudity is not realism. Compared with the clad figure, nudity is sculptural. Clinging is an anti-environment, a kind of weaponry, providing an enclosed space that is pictorial rather than sculptural. Sculpture is a tactile form that is both abstract and mathematical. When photographed, every feature and effect of the sculptural human body is slanted toward the visual rather than the tactile. In fact, high-definition photography is so intense and specialized as to paralyze ordinary perception and, hence, is accepted as a welcome tranquilizer. Of course, basic human sex attraction is olfactory, not photofactory, hence the playful harmlessness and innocence of your pictures.

The apparent suddenness of the acceptance of nudity in public media today has nothing to do with any change of mind. What is changed is our sensory life, as a result of living in the new information environment of electric tactility and involvement. It is this new environment reshaping the total perceptual life of the Western world that relates Twiggy and Bucky Fuller and miniskirts and LSD. It also concerns all of the themes that Dr. Cox discusses. None of the changes that Dr. Cox mentions and none of the changes that have ever taken place in any society could have been achieved by conceptual arguments. We all know how to protect ourselves against any form of reason. But every technical innovation provides a new environment of sense and feeling that is as invisible as it is invincible. No conceivable argument could have convinced people to wear miniskirts or to establish liturgical and ecumenical reforms. In the same way, LSD and its relatives are an "artistic" stimulation in our own bodies of the new outer environment of information and exploration. An electric environment is necessarily one of feedback via circuitry and provides an inner trip for the society at large.

The private trips are done chemically. So far as the economic and political establishments are concerned, their inner trip is provided by the computer. None of these things are fashions that will yield to a return to the old usages. The miniskirt is not a fashion. It is a tribal costume worn by men and women alike in all preliterate societies. We have already gone tribal and will go increasingly Oriental as our electric technology loosens the bonds and structures of 500 years of fragmented mechanical living.

Congratulations, therefore, in providing so electronic a context for God and the Hippies.

Project aids slum children

By TOM COLLINS

University students are being asked to help solve one of Toronto's many social problems by working with a half-way house for Toronto's slum children.

The project, now in its final planning stages, will give delinquent children 12 to 14 years of age the chance to live in a stable environment, perhaps even to reach university.

The project organizer is Allan Hill, who was for five years director of the Loch Eil training centre for boys from some of the worst industrial slums in Scotland.

Mr. Hill is presently the Senior Awards Officer at this University.

CAME TO CANADA

Mr. Hill was invited to Canada by an organization known as "Toc H", which was formed in the first World War to provide homes for young men away from home.

"The public is disnally unaware of the facts, of the lack of facilities, that surround delinquent children", he says "I would like to see university students take an interest in this field".

Besides the half-way house, to be located in a large Victorian residence on Huron just north of Bloor, Mr. Hill hopes to organize a summer camp for the boys.

Boys coming to the House and camp will be carefully selected.

"They will be referred to us by the Juvenile and Family Court, and by related agencies such as Children's Aid", says Hill.

SLUM BACKGROUND

"Not all will necessarily have a record of delinquency. Most will likely come from slum homes, but there is an increasing amount of delinquency in affluent families.

"We hope to pick the boys largely for academic ability. Our idea is to have them stay three or four years to see them through their period of schooling.

"We want these kids to get to university, to let them see the value of education, to show that university is not beyond their grasp."

Approval of the provincial cabinet is necessary to make the House a recognized institution under the Child Welfare Act.

START BY AUGUST

"It may take a bit of time, says Mr. Hill, "but the government is completely behind the idea. We expect to be functioning by August."

"This is where the university student can help. We need them for our summer camp; we need young adults to whom these justly-cynical children can relate. The older students especially could help our educational aims and the camp."

Both men and women are needed to work on this project. If you are interested, phone Mr. Hill at Simcoe Hall, 928-2183, leaving your name address and phone number and whether you would like to help this summer or in the fall.

What happened to the Macpherson Report?

The Presidential Advisory Committee on Undergraduate Instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science (better known as the Macpherson Commission) handed down its recommendations last September.

Among other sweeping changes, the report recommended the reduction of classroom hours and less emphasis on examinations. Emphasis was placed on fewer lectures and more tutorials.

Macpherson recommended the abolishing of exams in second year, and advised that elected students should sit on policy-making bodies.

Another sweeping change was the suggestion that the general and honor courses should be split into specialist and generalist courses.

After six months of studying the report, this is what the departments of the faculty of arts and science are planning to do next year.

ANTHROPOLOGY: "I don't know to what degree the Macpherson report has influenced our course changes," Prof. J. N. Emerson said. "Our main problem is in just trying to cope. Our classes are too large."

"As far as I know, there will be no major switches. There will be more lab discussions and research groups and, rather than being compulsory, they will be on a voluntary basis. This was started this year and response has been about 50% attendance."

"One of the questions under study is the question of using graduate students for teaching."

COMMERCE AND FINANCE: a student-faculty committee has been set up and has made recommendations.

ENGLISH: There have been no definite changes in the English department of the faculty of Arts and Sciences as a result of the report, said Professor K. D. Kee, chairman of the combined departments.

However, since English is a college subject, there have been local changes in aspects other than the calendar-prescribed curricula.

Staff-student committee and course unions have been and are being set up through the colleges. A staff-student committee has also been established this year for the combined departments, he said.

Such liaison groups were suggested in the report.

There has been a general effort in the English departments to reduce the size of classes and set up more tutorials, within the limits of staff manpower.

By a motion of the staff-students committee of University College's English department, the faculty will set up first-year and, if possible, second-year tutorials for next year.

Prof. Kee said the lack of important change after the report was due to the slowness of the machinery of approval.

PHYSICS: The department has a curriculum committee composed of six staff and six students which is studying the report.

"The committee existed before the report," said Prof. H. L. Welch, department chairman, "but the Report has speeded things up and alerted the faculty to deficiencies."

Prof. Welch said there were two key recommendations from the committee which he described as "in the spirit of the Macpherson report."

The first is the reduction of the number of lecture hours. "This tendency is already here," he said, "though I don't think it can be carried to the extreme views of the report."

The second recommendation concerns the unifying of courses for both "generalists" and "specialists."

"We do not know far we can implement it," Welch said. "Sciences are generally sequential subjects. The changes must be made in collaboration with other departments, which teach related subjects."

The department will begin next year by instituting a "core" curriculum for all physics students. This will lead to fewer and more comprehensive exams.

"We are being careful, however," he said, "to institute these changes with caution."

POLITICAL ECONOMY: a staff-student committee has made a submission to the dean of the faculty supporting many of the proposals of the Report, and there is hope that some of the changes may be made on a trial basis next year.

There is agreement with the suggestion to reduce the emphasis on exams, placing more stress on term work. Comprehensive examinations, and the gradeless second year recommended by the Report were both rejected by the committee, which feels that these would create far greater stress than desirable in the third year.

Reduction of lecture hours and upgrading of tutorials are also recommended.

"I've been giving courses for years with only one lecture hour," said Prof. W. T. Easterbrook, department head. "I don't know whether some courses are suited to that kind of treatment, though."

"The problems," he said, "are mostly physical. We don't have the money, the space or the staff we need to make all the recommended shifts."

Professor Easterbrook felt timetable difficulties would also slow down the integration of generalists and specialists in one course.

PSYCHOLOGY: Prof. C. R. Myers, department head, said it was a large question and that course changes in Psychology were still under discussion.

He declined to discuss the matter further.

ZOOLOGY: the department has a committee examining the Report recommendations.

"The department is generally sympathetic to the report," Dr. Bruce Falls said. Dr. Falls was instrumental in drafting the zoology brief to the committee.

"There's a lot of effort going into it, but no concrete results as yet."

The draft &amp; Varsity Blues

By JIM COWAN

The Vietnam war came to the University of Toronto this year, and for weeks it dominated the campus political scene. To the war can be attributed the Fall presidential election, the Dow protests and the Arts-Engineering split.

But it was an impersonal force, a struggle between opposing political and moral philosophies. When the personal element did intrude, it was in unlikely places where it went unnoticed.

The Varsity Blues basketball team will lose two key players this summer. Both are Americans returning to the United States. Both will probably enlist to avoid the draft. To them, the war is not an abstract subject for debate, but a reality calling for action, now.

Mark White, 21, a third year general arts student at St. Michaels College, played guard for Varsity Blues for the past two seasons. Although he is smaller than most basketball players (five feet, eight inches, 135 pounds) he finished the year with a respectable 15.6 points per game average.

This year he was chosen by his teammates to receive the Potter Trophy as the Blues Most Valuable Player.

White has has been accepted at Albany Graduate School in New York State, but says he will almost certainly enlist. He would like to be a navy pilot. "It's better to enlist and get some worthwhile training out of it, he says. "I would like to get into commercial aviation later. I'm kind of sick of school."

The second southbound Blue is Ron Voake, a 22 year old graduate student in the first year of a two year Masters degree in philosophy.

Ren, an all-star guard at Paloma College, California, spent only one year as a Blue. Dogged by illness, he still managed a 12.1 points per game seasons average. McManus said of Voake, "If he had been playing regularly he would have been the outstanding forward in the league."

Voake still isn't sure what he will do next Fall. He has applied for a teaching position at U of T and if he gets that, he may stay in Canada "Otherwise, I'm thinking of going to UCLA and joining an ROTC group." ROTC is a training program for university students who intend to enter the armed forces after graduating.

"I don't happen to agree with what's going on," Ron said, "but I much prefer living in the States. Military service is sort of a responsibility."

White echos Voakes feelings. "I live down there;

it's an obligation you can't overlook."

Asked about draft dodgers, Mark said "I can't really blame them. A lot of them are married and have their families and friends up here. There is nothing for them in the U.S."

The critical Canadian attitude bothers Voake. "It kind of irritates me because they're outside of it. I've become more of a patriot since I've been here."

Mark and Ron still have their IIS student deferments, but neither are sure they will be renewed. Mark explained his deferment will expire in

RON VOAKE

June. "It looks like they're just waiting for me," he says. So he will enlist.

Ron is not looking forward to military life, but says prison is not a very attractive alternative. So he too will probably enlist.

By next Fall, both will probably be in basic training. And those of us who were lucky enough to have been born north of the forty-ninth parallel can go back to our debates.

Even Ike-type politicians made firm commitments of moral support towards a pre-season prediction that Queen's Golden Gaels would John Treleaven in '67. It was also confidently predicted that Queen's powerful goliaths of the gridiron would finish first atop the SIFL in a Zephyrean breeze and Toscanini waltz.

Varsity Blues, at any rate, weren't to be worried over. They had a gaping hole at quarterback (similar to a peeping tom) with the retirement of all-star Bryce Taylor, wots of wookies, and an entirely new offensive alignment to learn (the egotesticle I-formation).

Blues opened the season with a rather inept performance, and while Coach Ron Murphy wasn't hanged in effigy, there were a lot of heads hanging in shame following the exhibition 17-14 loss to McMaster Maulers.

The SIFL season got under way two weeks later and Blues failed to surprise even 82 liberals with a 35-6 decision over consistently winless McGill Redmen.

A Phyrrie victory followed at London as Blues hung on for a pelvis-percolating 26-20 win against Western Mustangs. But it was a battered and bruised Toronto team that left the field, with injuries piling up throughout the game. Most serious was some torn ligaments suffered by quarterback, Vic Alboini, sidelining him for the rest of the year.

The outlook wasn't brilliant for the Hogtown host next week. Six regulars were out with injuries and waiting for the slaughter in Kingston were the haughty, healthy Golden Gaels. But a wicked slingshot that replacement quarterback fired Bob Amer and a rock-ribbed defense onto the turf slew the mighty goliath. The favoured Gaels were blown down by Varsity 19-14—perhaps the most inspired performance ever by a Blue and White football team.

Blues had to repeat the trick a week later in Toronto. They did 16-13, but left thousands of thrombotic tickers behind in the process. A field goal by Paul McKay in the dying (ah sweet death) moments won the game.

Only a tie was needed now against Western Mustangs to clinch the Yates Cup. No use doin' things the easy way, sang Blues, and they staggered to an 18-18 draw on McKay's single on the game's final play. 'Twas a great moment for Murphy and his men.

An undefeated season was chalked up when Blues throttled McGill 38-6 to close "a very good year".

Mike Raham won the scoring and rushing titles.

Paul McKay tied an old, old SIFL record with seven field goals in one season.

Alberta Golden Bears won a fair-to-middling College Bowl 10-9 over McMaster after the SIFL had left the room (so to speak).

And remember football fans: you don't have to be a cliché to coin a good one.

HOCKEY

Long is the best way to describe the hockey season for Varsity Blues this season. Blues played a record 34 games losing but four and tying the same number.

Balance was the key to the success of this year's squad. Bob McClelland, Paul Laurent and Murray Stroud all tied for third place in the SIHL scoring race with eighteen markers. On top of this, Blues overall scoring was very evenly distributed.

John Wrigley had a great year in goal and was probably the man most responsible for Varsity's ultimate success.

Blues opened the season with six straight victories following exhibition wins over Laurentian Voyageurs and Halifax Junior Canadians (two games).

During the Christmas holidays, Varsity participated in two tournaments, losing 1-0 in overtime to Cornell in the Nichols Invitational and edging Loyola Warriors to win the Molson tournament in Montreal.

The highlight of the season was the big trip to Austria. Blues won the third place bronze medal with the pinnacle of the trip being a 5-5 tie with the Russian national College team.

Back home, Blues wrapped up their fifth straight first place finish in the SIHL before eliminating Waterloo and Montreal in to take the Queens' Cup.

In the Canadian finals in Montreal, Blues were forced to take a back seat as they fell to Loyola 1-0 (overtime) in the opening game. However, Varsity did manage to grab the consolation final with a 5-3 decision over Laurentian.

In sum, a long, tiring but successful season.

BASKETBALL

Varsity basketball Blues had none too successful a season, winning only fourth place. But the potential existed and should be there next year.

Seasonal highlights included the 90-89 overtime conquest of Western Mustangs, the eventual League winners. And the one that got away — that 88-84 overtime loss to Windsor Lancers in border land.

Bruce Dempster, Mark White, Arvo Neidre, John Hadden, Ron Voake and company all provided their share of thrills . . . incredible ball handling and driving scores by Dempster and White, shooting displays by Voake and Neidre, and blocked shots and slam-in scores by the 6'7" Hadden.

Even the others got into the act — muscular Mark Slater, Mike Kirby who developed great moves but couldn't score, "Spider" Larry Trafford in his defensive crouch, holler-guy Albie Garbe with the unbeatable dribbling technique, Ross MacNaughton the rebounder.

White and Voake are leaving (see story), and so probably are Neidre and Garbe, but the others return for bigger and, hopefully better, things. John McManus is looking for recruits from this year's Interfac League — those fancy St. Mike's players, Dale Crouter, Keith McKenzie and Jerry Barker from Phys Ed, and others . . . So everyone looks forward to 1968-69 and who knows? With a new gym perhaps . . .

SWIMMING

The Varsity swimming team had one of the best years in its history, as they won their tenth straight OQAA and third consecutive CIAU championships. Under the fine coaching of Juri Daniel, the Blues have developed into an unbeatable powerhouse in Intercollegiate circles. They hold records in seven of the ten recognized events in the OQAA, and in eight of the fourteen in CIAU competition. They have not lost a swim meet to Canadian competition for years, and do not appear to face the possibility of defeat in the near future. Although they lose their great captain, Robin Campbell, and veterans Alan Pyle, Steve Gerring, and Paul Fisher, through graduation, (the strength of Blues veterans), the rise of promising young swimmers such as Bob Heatley and Doug MacIntosh, and the inevitable new talent from the high school circuit, should keep the team at least as strong as ever next year.

GYMNASTICS

For the Varsity gymnasts, 1967-68 was both fruitful and frustrating.

Despite strengthening and marked improvement, the team's determined effort to retain OQAA supremacy was frustrated by a powerful Université de Montreal group, and the squad had to settle for second place at the team championships.

HARRIER

University of Toronto won the Canadian intercollegiate harrier championship for the third consecutive year. Taking the Little Cup back to Toronto was Varsity's Dave Bailey who led Blues with a time of 29:03 over the 5.7 mile course at the Edmonton campus of the University of Alberta. Along with Bailey who copped the individual honours at the meet, were Brian Armstrong, Brian Richards, Dave Tong, and Bob Cairns.

As Josh Blanche once said to an admiring throng, "Finished if necessary but not necessarily finished." Whereupon the admiring throng quaffed their quota of rutabagas and cried, "Git off the stage you stupid nit!"

Meanwhile, back at the stench, the Varsity Sports Department keeps their admiring throng in a little black box reserved for special occasions. One day yesterday it released its admiring throng, coloured black and white and red all over. The Dept's energetic throng scurried around a bit and eventually ran into an engineering throng. Manacing words took place, but despite a terrifying contingent of Varsity reporters and photogs, there were no fisticuff. After all, two throngs don't make a fight.

I am feeling very melancholy, baby, because was the worse pun since Lyndon Johnson called Paul Krassner a pain in the neck.

One of the fortunate things about being sports editor, besides the wine, women and song one doesn't get, is that one can always blame everything on somebody else (preferable on a complete and utter void like Paul MacRae). When MacRae isn't around (only too rare, alas), I have the inferior members of my staff to cast hate and desecration among, about and atop.

My associate editor, for instance, Phil Bingley (yes Virginia, there is a Bingley). Phil is an authentic folk hero these days. He's the stuff of which songs are made. In fact, Fiery Phil has already hit the charts as "The Yellow Submarine". In the days when Pocahontas courted Smith, Bingley was on the scene covering the many "tilts" (to use his own word) between the powerful Pilgrims and indigenous Indians. His most famous line was: "For the score was 1,345,629 to eight with but a century left to play."

Then there's quiet, elegant, refined, and devious James Morrison, of whom it was once said, "Well we can't all be gems." In fact, Morrison was such a dud covering basketball this year that he has been awarded the Hubert Humphrey "Where are they now" trophy for splendid achievement in the lofty realm of insignificance. In all honesty, though, ("Yes father, I cannot tell a lie, I did destroy your pot plant."), Morrison did write a half-decent rowing story earlier on in the year.

Gellius, our renowned interfac hack, has managed to turn interfac roundup from a dreadful, statistical bore to a dreadful, comical bore. Keep up the good work, Gellius, and Mark the Golden mean at all times. The Varsity's interfac team would also like to thank the SMC soccer team for its fine dish of Italian food delivered to the office last fall.

Varsity's colourful squashed personality, Howie Fluxgold, who turned in some adequate copy this year, wishes to point out to those making snickering allegations behind his back that he has not nor will have never not nothing to do with the present world gold crisis. "Squish is my racket," sialred the slambuoyant Fluxgold.

The Varsity Sports Department was blessed with a lot of grey-matter this year (note: not grain-matter) most of which took the form of "photographs". Several were to blame—notably Gen Lildlay, Shuttering John Swaigen, Fart Goldwat . . . er . . . McIlwain, reliable Lynn Spencer, Tim "Classy but glassy" Koehler, Rick Sauter who missed his photo credits regrettably, and Dave Isaac, the only man I know who combs his navel before going to school. Isaac received his photo credits, regrettably. And The Varsity Sports Department wants to go on record as the sole section of this noosepaper which did not write a eulogy to Len "Disposable" Gilday.

If you look at page 34, you'll see the latest work of artiste extraordinaire Harold Ekstein. Due to circumstances beyond his control, Harold's employ with us was restricted this year, but I will say this: "Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow creeps are yesterday's sereed leaves." Stick that in your smoke and pipe it, Unca Harold.

Dave Powell covered the swimming beat, but I'm afraid we'll have to get somebody new next year. You just aren't cut out to be a sportsie, Dave. I mean what's with all this efficiency crap, anyway? Can't you bring your copy in late and untyped like everybody else. Come off it, eh?

We're gittin' near the end, so I'll blame in rapid fashion: hobblin' goblin, Rich Pyne; the man with the slippery feet, Austris "Tony Toe" Liepa; rugged rugger, Doug Woods; nice guy Bill Allison; shimmering Steve Kates; Bingley arch-rival, Bob Clark; gym-dandy Art Stein; bone-to-pick Tom Collins; "slick" Mike McGarry; quiet newscie Jim Cowan; and, may I say it, Graham Fraser, a gross, serene, raucous intellectual. I'd also like to blame, but mostly to thank myself.

I love you all, you know, I love you all.

Unfitting end for a fitting team

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity Blues are number three. Mike Griffin was a hero, and Alberta Golden Bears are Canadian Intercollegiate hockey champions.

These were the results of last week-end's action in the Canadian finals held in Montreal as Blues lost 1-0 to Loyola Friday night when Griffin scored at 13:56 of the first sudden-death overtime period. Then Alberta dumped Loyola 5-4 in the Sunday afternoon final to end Blues' two year reign.

Blues' game with Loyola had some 6000 Montreal Forum fans in a frenzy for the best part of three and a half hours. Everyone in the building save the Varsity players and a few loyal fans were pulling for an upset. The excitement was almost unbearable at times as the action teetered from end to end and back again.

Goaltender John Wrigley was even better than usual, if that is possible. He produced at least a dozen impossible saves while his counterpart Andre Molino was also good (although he didn't have near the number of difficult chances). A good indication of the play on goal were even at 39:39 was the fact that the shots after regulation time.

Warriors carried play in the opening two periods but Blues had the better scoring chances from then on. Loyola was one of the few teams to skate with Blues all year.

For a team that doesn't know how to lose, Blues played the role of the vanquished to their credit. Despite the fact that the ice surface was crowded immediately with hundreds of milling fans, not one Varsity player failed to fight his way through the mob the shake hands with the victors. And, in the dressing room following the game, there were no exclamations of bitterness as coach Tom Watt told his tired and dejected players, "You have nothing to be ashamed of after that performance. Everyone tried his best and I don't want to see you hanging your heads. We've had a good season—only four losses (including two 1-0 overtime defeats) in 34 games. So have a shower and walk out of here with your heads high."

A few of the players reflected over the loss. Veteran Ward Passi offered simply: "You have to score goals to win. We didn't, so we did not."

The worst part of the week-end came 12 hours later when a weary group of Varsity players dragged themselves out of bed to play their first consolation game in a nearly-deserted rink on the outskirts of Montreal. Paul Laurent fired four goals and Brian St. John a pair, but any enthusiasm was gone as Blues stomped St. Francis Xavier 9-1.

The same process was repeated the following morning when Varsity outplayed Laurentian 5-3 to win the consolation final. John Gordon led the way with a pair while Laurent, Ward Passi and Fred Pollard had singles.

It was a sad finish for a team that just seven weeks earlier had played for the world intercollegiate title, and had held the Russian college nationals to a 5-5 tie before 10,000 people.

Probably the only highlight of the week-end was the selection of John Whigley and Paul Laurent to the tournament's all-star team.

With the season over there are a few players who probably won't be back. Ward Passi thinks that he may hang them up after six successful seasons. However, Passi has one year of Law left and may just return. John Wrigley plans to enrol at McGill next year, and Bob Hamilton and Doug Jones are looking forward to a return visit to Europe next fall. Brian Jones, Murray Stroud, and captain Peter Speyer will all be graduating this spring, and in all likelihood won't be back.

AROUND THE NET . . .
Peter Speyer suffered a jammed wrist and torn ligaments of his left forearm in the third period of the Loyola game. He played the remainder of the match despite great pain but was forced out of the others. The injury was an unfortunate conclusion to the Varsity career of one of Blues' most brilliant defencemen ever . . . McGill hockey and football coach, Dave Copp, will be coming to U of T next year as a full-time assistant to head football coach Ron Murphy. The move is a good one for Varsity and McGill is already crying in their beer over the loss . . . The winning goal in the Alberta-Loyola championship game came with just 17 seconds remaining . . . To coach Tom Watt, trainer Howie Ringham, manager Mike Killoran, and all the players, thanks for an enjoyable season. Didn't even make the showers . . . Happy exams, sportsies . . .

Swim team thrashes way to tremendous CIAU victory

By DAVE POWELL

The University of Toronto swimming team, with probably the finest performance they have ever given, won their third straight Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union championship, and led the OQAA to a conference title, last week-end at MacMaster. Blues set five CIAU records and tied a sixth, in winning eight out of fourteen events.

This was a team effort all the way, as every Toronto swimmer, in each race he entered, finished in the top twelve among as many as thirty competitors.

Individually, there were some tremendous performances. Gaye Stratten was outstanding, setting records in the 100 and 200 yard backstroke, and placing first in the 100 butterfly. For his efforts, he was voted the number one competitor of the year in Intercollegiate circles. Right behind Stratten was Theo van Ryn, who won the 50 yard freestyle, tied his own CIAU record in winning the 100 free, and placed third in the 100 back. Captain Robin Campbell finished a brilliant intercollegiate career by knocking 2.5 seconds off his best previous time to set a new CIAU mark in the 200 yard freestyle. He then went on to register his best personal times in placing third in the 100 free and fourth in the 500 free.

Terry Bryon gave by far his top efforts to date, coming second in the 400 individual medley, and third in the 200 fly and 500 free, both of which were won in record times. Bob Heatley lost the 100 fly by a fingernail to teammate Stratten, and came sixth in the 200 back and seventh in the 200 fly, to round out a great performance. And so it continued down the line, with each Blue surpassing himself in every race. There were promising freestylers, Doug MacIntosh (sixth in the 200 and 500, and eleventh in the 100 free), veteran Chris Fisher (fifth in the 200 medley, eighth in the 50 and tenth in the 100 free), Alan Pyle (seventh in the 500 and eighth in the 500 free, and tenth in the 100 fly), and breaststrokers Morris Vaillancourt (fifth in the 200, seventh in the 100) and Paul Fisher (ninth in the 200, eleventh in the 100).

Nowhere was team effort and spirit more evident than in the relays. In the 400 freestyle, Campbell, Bryon, Pyle, and MacIntosh all registered their best times to set a new CIAU record. Stratten, Vaillancourt, a tremendous butterfly leg by Heatley, and a strong finishing kick by van Ryn, gave the Blues another CIAU mark in the 400 medley relay. Their winning time was also an OQAA and Ontario Open record, and tied the Canadian Native record.

Final score of the meet was U of T 339, to 240 for runner-up UBC, and 163 for Alberta. The OQAA nosed out the West by 605 to 599 for the conference title.

Biggs and Louden winners announced

Murray Stroud and Bryce Taylor have been announced as winners of the Louden and Biggs trophies respectively.

Stroud, who played with Varsity hockey Blues this season added the Loudon silverware to his growing list of awards. Murray also won the Dafeo Trophy awarded annually to the player most valuable in the eyes of his teammates.

Stroud, an assistant captain with Blues this year, finished third in the league scoring race and led the loop in assists.

The Loudon award is

given each year to the undergraduate who contributes most to athletics at University of Toronto.

Taylor, who played on five football teams as quarterback, was awarded the Biggs trophy as the University of Toronto graduate who has contributed most to university athletics from the standpoint of leadership, sportsmanship and performance.

Although Bryce did not compete in the SIFL this season, he did continue to work in Varsity athletics as he acted as advisor to the Meds Athletic Association and was a member of the U. of T. athletic directorate.

Beware the Ides of March, Gellius!

By GELLIUS
HOCKEY PLAYOFFS

SMC disposed of Trin (wishful thinking) in one semi-final, but only after losing the first game of the total goals series, 2-1. The rangy Moffatt and Bent Reid scored for Trin, Burman for smc. This very same Burman later scored four (IV) goals as SMC cannabised Trin 4-1 to take the series. H. A. Patrick "Chicken" Little scored for Trin.

In the first game of the other SF (= San Francisco), Vic got goals from Sharpe (3), Jones, Dewson, and Van Wyck (as in Allied Van Wyck, Dixon Van Wyck, etc.) as they keffuled Law, 6-3. Fitzpatrick ("bastard son of Patrick"; more cheap Varsity sensationalism), Moorhouse, and Garbe replied for Law.

Best two of three finals will begin 12:30 Monday and continue Thursday and, if necessary, Tuesday sennight (isn't that elegant).

BASKETBALL PLAYOFFS

In the first game of the best two games out of three (games) final, SMC anastelized Vic, 74-67, led by Laglia's 21 points. Dale Evans had 19 for Vic.

WATER POLO

Meds IV year took the first game of their best of three final with SMC, 5-3. Kontor (2), Watkins (2), and Chamberlain scored for MIVY; Pyle, Jim Crowley and Teeny-Weeny Yellow Poika-Dot Giannini hit for SMC.

Leroy's 9 goals paced New's 11-8 victory over Knox in the Intermediate Water Polo final. Siarkowski had the other two goals for Gnu. (A gnu is a small south African antelope related to the Igitur). Brice (4), Codling (3), and Kennedy scored for Knox. The jubilant Gnu threw New College dean David "Self control not birth control" Stager into the pool after the game. They didn't realize he could swim.

MINOR LEAGUES

Vic X (the Vic football team) will meet Law III for the Intermediate Hockey championship. Meds football players with rocks admitted free.
