MONTREAL (VNS)—Students at Sir George Williams University appear to have won their fight for increased student representation on their university government.

If the Sir George board of governors approves, four students, one from each faculty, will sit as full voting members on the university council. The council is responsible for all academic programs at the university.

The move climaxed a week of student activity including a boycott of classes in support of increased regulation of bookstore operations, and a day-long teach-in Thursday.

However, university Vice-President Douglas B. Clarke denied that the increased student representation was a result of the boycott.

Other proposals by the committee call for two students to sit on the planning board of each faculty and one additional student to help set up the curriculum in each faculty.

The Board of Governors will meet Tuesday to vote on the recommendations.

'Caput is a fossil,' says master of controversy

The president of the Innis College students society, the chairman of the University of Toronto council of student presidents, and the first student to sit on a faculty council may all be out of office as of tomorrow night.

All three offices belong to Ken Stone, fiery Innis College student leader. Tuesday night he faces an open general meeting of his college. The issue: draft dodgers.

If the Innis student executive's decision to support the Toronto anti-draft movement is reversed, Stone and about half his council will resign.

Ken Stone is not a stranger to controversy.

When he was Innis' first student treasurer he handed in his budget written on toilet paper, to save expenses.

This year he ran on a platform of "student voice on council or student strike." Last week, Stone and four Innis students became full members of the Innis faculty council.

Two weeks ago Innis students defied a CAPUT regulation against gambling on campus by holding a Monte Carlo night in aid of SHARE. In January, Stone hopes to test Caput's "no drinking" law by serving beer on Sir John A. MacDonald's birthday to all students over 21.

"Caput is a fossil," says Stone.

This week it is draft dod-

Ken Stone

gers, and any future plans Stone has may dissolve at tomorrow's meeting.

Following the Innis College student executive decision to support the anti-draft movement, 25 per cent of Innis' 474 students signed a petition demanding a referendum and the meeting was collected.

Jim White (III Inn), who circulated the petition, wants discussion confined to the question of holding a referendum later this week.

In the end, however, Innis will vote on whether or not to support draft resisters morally and financially. Paul Culliford (IV Inn) is willing to give support in principle but not money. White cannot see giving draft dodgers money when "Innis cannot even field a football team for lack of funds."

Stone and six or seven other executive members give the motion for support such high priority that they feel compelled to resign if it is rejected.

"How can I claim to represent Innis students if I vote aye and they reverse the decision to nay" asks Stone.

"My support of the draft dodgers is a pretty solid example of the way I think—who I am," says Bob Bossin (III Inn). Bossin is a Students Administrative Council representative and the man who made the Innis motion for financial support of the draft dodgers.

Fireworks at Innis begin tomorrow at 7 p.m.

Michener can't come to U.C. Follies

Governor-General Roland Michener will be unable to accept an invitation to this year's UC Follies.

Art Stein (II UC), a member of the college literary and athletic society, said Edmund Butler, private secretary to Mr. Michener, told him yesterday the governor-general would be unable to attend.

Lit President Ezrin (IV UC) was downcast when informed of the news.

"I was hoping until the last minute that the governor-general might come but now it appears that efforts have gone in vain."

Lit member David Paice (IV UC) declared that the issue was not dead: "This issue happens to have been handled worse than the UC Arts Ball of 1965. If we cannot get satisfactory answers from Arthur Stein, producer of the Follies, we will have no recourse but to impeach him."

Stein (II UC) expressed surprise at Paice's threat: "My record is unblemished and I have nothing to fear from a judicial investigation."

The Follies will go on this Thursday, Friday and Saturday regardless. Ticket prices will be slashed to $1.50 for Thursday night and $2 for Friday and Saturday nights.

Students chosen for Tarheel exchange

The following students have been selected to go to the University of North Carolina on the Tarheel Exchange Nov. 15-21:

Janet Button (III Vic), Lynn Crocker (II UC), Elizabeth Lake (III Vic), Jane Enlow (IV UC), Elspeth Fordyce (III Vic), Katey Grey (III Trin), Mary Suzanne Lamont (IV UC).

Alison Lang (IV SMC), Carole Lokash (IV PHE), Mary B. Mueller (III SMC), Linda Naftel (II Inn), Janice Narvey (II Meds), Mary Patterson (IV Trin), Peggy Ryan (III SMC), Cathy Williams (III Vic).

Robert Armstrong (III UC), Felix Ernest (IV SPS), Ross Freeman (IV Trin), Richard Gates (IV SPS), Stephen Gerring (IV Vic), Harvey Grosman (II Meds), Greg Haber (II Meds).

Bob Isbister (IV Vic), Edward Kerwin (III SMC), Hume Martin (III Inn), Frank McIntyre (III SMC), Neils Orved (IV Vic), Bill Powlesland (IV SPS), Dave Roffey (IV Vic), Dave Snowball (IV SPS).

UC gets first crack at bleeding

The blood campaign starts today and University College gets the chance to bleed first.

There is a blood clinic in the Junior Common Room from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. UC's goal is 421 pints.

A total goal of 3,770 pints of blood has been set for the university. This is only an eighth of the total capacity that the U of T can donate.

Tomorrow the clinic moves to the Buttery to get blood from Trinity College, St. Hilda's, law, Wycliffe and the school of social work.

Hours for blood donations will again be from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. and Trinity's goal is 230 pints.

Everyone is welcome at any clinic and blood donations will be credited to the donors own college or faculty no matter where he gives blood.

Peace possible despite man's ego: Fox

World peace is possible in spite of the belligerent attitudes men often express, a post-Teach-In audience was told last week.

Professor Paul Fox of the political economy department said his experience as a political scientist, common sense and "certain optimistic assumptions" had led him to the conclusion.

"There is something in man's nature that leads him to assert his ego at the expense of others," he said.

The only way to bring harmony out of this intrinsic discord is through "an attempt to analyse disputes and bring about a reconciliation."

Prof. Fox said education is the first means of alleviating international conflicts. It would break down prejudices and help people to see the other side of any dispute.

But the best way of preventing war, he said, is to increase research into the causes of violence.

"This is the area that must be mined to its fullest. We must run down the causes of violence."

"We must approach the problem on a common sense basis, realizing that there may be no right or wrong. We can only hope to bring about the best solution possible while conducting education and research."

CAREERS IN THE INVESTMENT INDUSTRY

Students, both undergraduate and graduate, who are interested in following a career in the investment business are invited to an information session to be held on Tuesday, October 31st in Room 1071, Sidney Smith Hall between 1:00 and 2:00 p.m.

Four representatives of member firms of the Investment Dealers' Association of Canada will give brief descriptions of the sales, research and underwriting activities of an investment dealer, following which there will be a general question period. # Lower standards but lovable students

By MARY KATE ROWAN and LINDA WALDMAN

Erindale College's academic standards are lower than those on the main University of Toronto campus, the vice-president of the Erindale students council said Friday.

Sid Parsons (I Erin) was commenting on a Varsity article Friday that said a Simcoe Hall regulation may be turning Scarborough and Erindale Colleges into inferior institutions.

The regulation refers to the two "satellite" colleges all students with less than a 64-per-cent average in Grade 13.

"The administration does send people with lower percents to Erindale but we have other things to make up the difference," Parsons said in an interview.

"Most of the kids are oriented to having a good time . . . They are more gregarious and able to get along with people than students on the main campus."

Meanwhile, reaction at Scarborough varied from complete agreement to violent opposition.

"This is garbage," said Dave Glick (I Scar). "This article needs a rebuttal."

John McKerracher (I Scar) asked: "Who wants to be in an old cloistered campus?"

"The atmosphere is friendlier. It's a great place to get to know people."

"There's none of this having to be on the track team to make it to your next class," added John Simmons (I Scar).

Many Erindale students interviewed said they had not chosen to come to the college. About half of the students selected it first, says a sociology professor.

"I was sent here with 64 per cent," said one student, "I couldn't even get subjects I wanted. Fine arts and music are not yet offered at Erindale."

A staff member said the lower academic standard was natural at a school that was in its first year.

"It takes time to attract students to a new college but Erindale has a lot to offer," she said.

"Everybody has a chance to do things here. It's almost impossible not to get involved in some aspect of university life. Rules are almost non-existent," students council president Dale Evans (I Erin) said.

"The classes are very small and you can talk to your professor. You can actually stick up your hand to ask questions."

"There is much more student participation on administration decisions," said Vice-President Parsons.

"According to the constitution students are on five out of 11 faculty committees.

"It grows on you — just getting involved and helping to build your college."

Stephen Yeates (II Scar) agreed with the Varsity statements. "The only reason people are at Scarborough is that they were sent here. Things like Hart House you really miss."

But he said he had become attached to Scarborough. "I think I'm getting more out of my education than I would downtown."

"It's Reject U as far as I can see. I don't feel anything for Scarborough College," said Paul Feldman (I Scar).

Dave Hogan (II Scar) said there are advantages to Scarborough.

"Here we can actually find washrooms. This place is more attuned to academic studies than the downtown campus because there are fewer distractions."

Thieves start blood cup race early

To unidentified men have stolen the Blood Donor Cup from the main office of the medical building.

In a daring daylight raid Friday they waded through screaming secretaries and snatched the cup, which is given to the faculty or college giving most to the annual Blood Campaign.

The Campaign begins today and continues for two weeks. This is the first year a cup has been awarded to the winners.

Carolyn Keystone, (I Phar), co-chairman of the Blood Drive, said she suspected engineers of performing the foul deed but Bob McCallum (IV APSC), a member of the Brute Force Committee, said the engineers had nothing to do with it.

"All engineer capers are approved by the Engineering Society and we are opposed to malicious damage of any sort, including robbery," he said.

However, an anonymous caller told The Varsity last night that he stole the cup and promised it would not be harmed.

"I organized the prank myself," he said in a pleasant voice, "and no society was involved."

"It was thought of on the spur of the moment and done within a half-an-hour after that," he said. "The number involved varied, but two persons actually took the cup.

"We did not think the medsmen deserved to hold the cup since they were not the annual contest winners. In the past the engineers have won most of the time and they will win this year."

He said the cup will be brought forth when the winners of the contest are announced.

The University of Toronto police are investigating.

New float disqualified - too many men

New College was "unjustly disqualified" in the Homecoming float contest Saturday, float-builders claim.

Some students say they are "most unhappy" that the Blue and White society involved an "obscure" rule that there may not be more than 20 people on a float.

Both the engineering float and the Erindale-pharmacy float were over the limit, but were not disqualified, say the New students.

St. Michael's College won the contest with a display that showed Canada's parliament buildings and Washington's Capitol joined by a bridge. It depicted the drain in one direction and the migration of draft dodgers in the other.

Beattie talks to SFD

The purpose of protest is to strengthen government by making government action coincide with public opinion, Rod Beattie (II Trin) said at a Students For Democracy meeting Friday.

"Protest is no longer simply marches and demonstrations. It is a means of acting against the artificial ignorance imposed by the state, of educating citizens about war and peace," he said.

"Civil disobedience is necessary to oppose the insanity of society. We must ask of each law 'Is it a law I can obey? In this way we can truly govern ourselves."

Cothy Williams (III Vic) was crowned Miss U of T of the Homecoming dance Saturday night.

the moral is at the end

PART I

Columbia University in New York is considered one of the great schools of the world. But at least one of its departments, The International Affairs Institute is supported by CIA funds.

The CIA, as we all know, is the notorious Central Intelligence Agency, initiator of the Bay of Pigs Cuba invasion, overthrower of governments unfavorable to the U.S. state department.

Columbia confirmed it has been receiving money from the CIA only after the facts were revealed by a campus chapter of SDS (Students for a Democratic Society), a SU-A-like organization of New Left radicals.

But it was only a few months earlier that Columbia had categorically denied any involvement with the CIA. That denial came after a student was arrested during a sit-in protesting CIA recruitment on the campus.

So what if Columbia denied it and then had to change its mind? Governments do that all the time; why not universities?

So what if Columbia is involved with the CIA?

People were asking the same type of question last year after it was disclosed that the National Students Association in the U.S. was partly financed by the CIA.

The point is simply that universities are now so involved in government affairs, both in financing and co-operation, that they have jeopardized their academic neutrality.

Today's modern armaments are developed in universities.

The bright and effective apologists for the U.S. government are in or from the universities

Police and secret agents for South Vietnam were trained at the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor.

Reports from McGill University last year said a professor there was developing a method of detecting the solidity of the ground from airplanes and helicopters. The results of his research were to be used in the Vietnam war by the United States.

Obviously research grants don't worry about crossing international boundaries even during a time of war.

Research grants for war work are deplorable enough, but Columbia and the National Student Association were playing with the CIA. That's worse, sir, much worse.

The CIA has been accused of some of the worst secret-police tactics since Stalin's NKVD. Professors and students have been forced to spy for the CIA while attending universities in other countries. Foreign students have been blackmailed into spying for the U.S. Even labor leaders have had to work for them.

People involved in the NSA during the past few years will tell you that there was a big difference between their national and international sections. Workers in the national section were starving; their counterparts in the international section were fed fat by CIA wages.

There are many ways to influence international affairs, you see.

PART 2

In American history we learn that third party movements fit right into the American political tradition.

When the two old line parties become too irrelevant to a major part of the population, a third party can be formed by people wishing to put their ideas across. That's part of the natural and orderly working of North American democracy.

This summer we saw a somewhat laughable attempt at forming a third party in the National Committee for New Politics, a loose coalition of Black Power, New Left, Civil Rights, and anti-war groups.

So loose was it that the whites at the assembly in Chicago soon threw themselves at the feet of the Black Power types, the strongest organized group there.

New Politics is not likely to make much of an impression in next year's federal election but Sen. James O. Eastland is worried about it.

Last week his Senate Internal Security Sub-Committee announced plans for an investigation of the movement.

Eastland is one of the honorable members from Mississippi, a die-hard opponent of civil rights legislation and, as if he were right out of the last century, an owner of a cotton plantation.

This planned investigation gives Eastland a chance to harass some of the civil rights, black power, leftist, types he hates so much. He was quoted as saying he is especially interested in investigating the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, a political group of Mississippi Negroes.

It seems a big danger to even Lyndon Johnson's freedom of dissent when the old-line parties take it upon themselves to investigate every new political movement that comes along.

But then, undemocratic Congressional investigations have been right in the centre of the American political tradition since the early 50s.

MORAL

Columbia, the NSA and Eastland's SISS are just three examples apologists for the United States should study.

They should start to realize that the America they talk about today is not the America they learned to love in movies, in comic books, on TV or in history books.

LETTERS

why I might be dodging the draft

(Ed. Note: This letter is from a young American considering running away to Canada to dodge the draft. We asked him to write us and explain why.)

Dear Mr. Richter:

A man must live by his convictions. He must judge for himself what is morally right and wrong, and if, in his judgment, something is morally wrong, he must not do it. I would define courage as the ability to do what is right, despite personal consequences.

Those who wrote the selective service laws, apparently disagree with me on this matter. These laws state that conscientious objector status shall not be granted to men whose objections to military service are based on a "personal moral code".

I believe that the United States is in the wrong in Vietnam, and that it would be wrong for me to support this war. Since I will not be able to get conscientious objector status, my only choice will be to resist the draft. I plan to do this by emigrating to Canada, although I would go to jail if I had no other choice.

The courage to make this decision has not been easy to find. Even though I believe Canada to be, in many ways, a freer and saner place than the United States, I will find it difficult to live in virtual exile, isolated from my friends and family.

I know the consequences of my decision. I will accept them because I must.

Sincerely,
Robert Fleagle,
Seattle, Wash.

thoughts for peaceniks

Sir:

I recently came across this passage written by William Graham Sumner, which I think applies to many of today's peace protesters. It is self-explanatory and I offer it here to stimulate further discussion. "The worst vice in political discussions is that dogmatism which takes its stand on great principles or assumptions, instead of standing on an exact examination of things as they are and human nature as it is. . . . An ideal is formed of some higher or better state of things than now exists, and almost unconsciously the ideal is assumed as already existing and made the basis of speculations which have no root. . . . The whole method of abstract speculation on political topics is vicious. It is popular because it is easy; it is easier to imagine a new world than to learn to know this one; it is easier to embark on speculations based on a few broad assumptions than it is to study the history of states and institutions; it is easy to catch up a popular dogma than it is to analyze it to see whether it is true or not. All this leads to confusion, to the admission of phrases and platitudes, to much disputing but to little gain in the prosperity of nations.

Bob Wicks (III Vic)

island of sanity

Sir:

Mr. F. Paul Fromm II must feel like an island of sanity in the turbulent seas of socialism, communism, and other leftist ideologies.

I sympathize to an extent. There is a responsible conservative position that deserves careful attention and respect. Just sit down and read Edmund Burke.

However, walling with self-pity and self-defence because of an irrational and intellectually pointless attack on his person and his organization, creates a negative reaction to Mr. Fromm and his "conservatism. Both conservatism and liberalism have much to say. Wouldn't it be wise to seek the knowledge and meaning that both systems have to offer.

Dennis Choruornaz (1 SGS)

Bob producer replies

Sir:

In relation to a letter in Friday's Varsity from Valerie Holmes, may I make a few comments. Firstly, the Vic 'BOB' is the production of the YCU, not the Music Club, as one was led to believe from Miss Holmes' letter. Secondly, non-Vic students are permitted to take part in the productions at the discretion of the show producer, with the consent of the Victoria College Productions Committee and the Victoria College Union Council.

As a final comment I should like to register my total rejection of Miss Holmes' final statement, which distinguishes Varsity productions from 'quality' productions!!!

Vietnik tricks and Violence

By F. PAUL FROMM

The observations of a person directly involved in a demonstration are bound to be different from those of an outside observer. I was one of the hundred counter-demonstrators rallied by the Edmund Burke Society to protest the Vietniks at the last anti-war parade here in Toronto. The observations which I am about to relate will, I hope, complement and correct the impressions of your reporter.

Why counterdemonstrate? We in the Edmund Burke Society, along with our many friends in Toronto's ethnic community, who know the brutal nature of communism from first hand experience, felt that the time had come to dramatise to the public a widespread Canadian support for the American stand in Vietnam. The limelight in the past, has been held exclusively by the anti-war appeasers.

At the same time, we wanted to indicate the ultimate, if not in all instances the intended, result of the Vietniks' cry for American unilateral withdrawal. This result would be a communist takeover in Vietnam, slaughters in retribution; and more wars of communist imperialism in the adjoining lands of South-east Asia.

MY FIRST MARCH

For me, this was my first large parade. Hundreds of surprising observations spring to mind. Among these, I was astonished by the lack of organization of the Vietniks in Queen's park. For fifteen minutes their leaders shouted and cajoled before the milling three thousand finally got pointed in the right direction.

Equally remarkable was the restraint and inoffensiveness of the Toronto police. I had been assured by the inspector in charge: "If there is a fracas, my men will wade in and arrest anyone who is involved." Several of our Latvian friends were set upon by some Vietniks and punched as their signs were being wrestled from them. Several officers broke up the fray; but no arrests were made.

Similarly when a Vietnik, a "peaceful" man I am sure, seized my placard and tried to rip it, a plainclothesman grabbed him and shoved him on; but again there was no arrest. Again, in Nathan Philips Square, a woman snatched my sign and began to tear it. A nearby mounted policeman refused to arrest her, when I complained.

DIRTY TRICKS

However, the sharpest evidence that the police were far less severe than they might have been, is seen in the very conduct of the parade. An officer said: "Your men may march; but it's got to be two by two. If there are any more, we'll have to stop it." Eager to comply with the law, we set off along Wellesley two by two; some of us arm in arm.

Just as we reached Yonge Street, the Vietnik parade marshalls sent their minions rushing up the sidewalk ahead of us. This clearly violated the law. As we proceeded to College, the parade was six to ten deep across the sidewalk. The police did nothing. Speaking to the inspector as he pulled his car up to the sidewalk alongside the parade, I mentioned that the violation of the law was not our society's fault. He replied: I know; your fellows are alright." I heard who most loudly advocate the right to free speech and to dissent (for themselves) were the first to try to prevent others from exercising this right. "Peaceful" peace-niks grabbed the Nazis signs and set upon them in their hundreds, beating them with fists, boots and placards.

One friend at St. Mikes, who was an eye-witness, reports that many of the Nazis "were covered with blood" and several had teeth knocked out. All this by men who refuse to go and knock some communist butchers'

In this article, Mr. Fromm, chairman of the right-wing Edmund Burke Society, gives a conservative's view of a recent anti-war march.

one person say: "That was a pretty dirty trick the peace-niks played on you."

From here on in there was minor scuffling all the time. This brings me to my strongest conclusion or observation — the none-too-peaceful disposition of many of the peacenik marchers.

Once the two-by-two ranks were broken, incidents of violence became commonplace. Several of Burkists were kicked or punched. Nearly all of us had to contend with people trying to snatch our signs. Several Cubans with "Viva Che" buttons continually jostled Don Andrew and two of his friends trying to taunt them into a fight. When their tactics failed, they descended to obscenities and threats to "come around and get you, real soon."

At City Hall, a Vietnik mob of about fifty attacked eight of our men behind the speakers' platform, kicking them and seizing our American flag. This flag has still not been returned.

One of our men was cruising around in a car with conservative placards on it. Some believer in free speech hurled an egg-plant at him.

However, we escaped lightly when compared with the American Nazis who counterpicketed the Washington protest. Again, those teeth out because "it is inhumane."

This tendency to violence among the advocates of non-violence calls into question their basic sincerity. Violence is a logical weapon for a communist; for any means is right if it advances the end. However, a man cannot claim that all war is wrong and then go out and act like a brownshirt goon without leaving himself open to the charge of being a hypocrite.

We have seen how Martin Luther King's non-violent violence has led to the brutality and insurrection of full-scale "black power" violence. What started as illegal parades, sit-ins, and obstruction of traffic has become looting, arson, and slaughter in the streets. Similarly, what started as "peaceful" marches are now turning to punching, kicking mob action, and, in Washington, attempted disruption of a nation's security.

The theory seems to be: if I disagree with a situation, I can use whatever means I like, no matter how violent, to protest. We have seen the dreadful disease caused by the virus of "non-violent" violence in the civil rights movement. It seems that history is repeating itself in the Vietnik peace movement.

4. Tutorials, Discussion Classes, and Laboratories

We have recommended that lectures should be used only for those functions which we have argued are appropriate to them, and accordingly that the number of lectures be greatly reduced. We regard this as a desirable reform in itself. And we do not propose that the time which students would no longer spend attending lectures should be filled up with other forms of instruction. On the contrary, we want students to have more time to read and to develop their minds and their understanding of their subjects by applying the insights and methods of analysis which they should be getting from the lectures (and from reading).

However, we believe that other forms of teaching and learning are also desirable, especially in so far as they can help the student apply the insight and methods he is acquiring from the more formal instruction.

Various such other forms of teaching are, of course, now provided in the Faculty. They include individual tutorial periods (these very rare); tutorial groups of 10 or more students (which groups in some cases have swollen to 20, or have turned into "sections" of even greater size); classes, especially in language and literature courses, of 15 or 30 or 40, which may be used on different days or in different proportions for lectures or for discussion (which we shall describe as lecture/discussion classes); seminars, on the model of graduate seminars, which entirely replace both the lecture and the tutorial group in a few courses in the upper years; and, of course, laboratories, which make up a substantial part of the instructional time in most of the physical and life sciences and a few of the social sciences.

It may be assumed that these various forms of teaching have developed in relation to the different needs and possibilities in different subjects, and it would therefore be unprofitable to propose any single system of tutorials, or any of these other forms of teaching, across the whole Faculty. But it would be unwise to assume that all those that are now provided are as good or as adequate as they might be. Moreover, those which may be thought adequate as supplements to the present system of numerous lectures might not be adequate complements to the system of fewer and functionally different lectures which we have proposed.

For these reasons it will be useful to reconsider the use that is now made of these other kinds of instruction. For convenience we consider separately: (1) tutorials and discussion classes, mainly in relation to the humanities and social sciences, and (2) laboratories, mainly in relation to the physical and life sciences.

(1) Tutorials and Discussion Classes

Given that one of the main purposes of the lecture should be to let students see how the more experienced mind of the professor operates on the subject-matter of a particular discipline — how he examines it critically, analyses it, finds unapparent relations between different things in it, and so on — it seems reasonable to suggest that one of the main purposes of the tutorial should be to encourage and enable the students to develop their own abilities along these lines. This the tutorial group can do in so far as it lets the students try their abilities, and hear each other doing so, in the presence and with the help of a more experienced mind, whether a professor or a teaching assistant. But it can only hope to do it well if the groups are small.

From the written and oral evidence submitted to the Committee it was clear that many tutorials do not accomplish this purpose. Blame was often put on the teaching assistants. We discuss the problem of teaching assistants in the next section of this chapter, but we see more important reasons for the inadequacy of many tutorial groups that the supposed defects of teaching assistants who conduct many of them.

One reason is to be found in the present relation of tutorial groups to lectures and to examinations. If, as we have found, much of the lecturing in the Faculty consists mainly of the transmission of information from lecturer to student, it is not surprising that some tutorials have come to be used primarily to ensure that students have received and absorbed the information so transmitted. Furthermore, because there has been a tendency for examinations to be based on material covered in the lectures, it is not surprising to find that many students have come to regard tutorials as "extras" which they can ignore at no great risk. This attitude would explain the comment often made to the Committee that those tutorials which fail do so because students do not prepare adequately for them.

Another reason appears to be that there is often insufficient care taken, by the department and the professor in charge of a course, to see that the tutorial program is adequately planned, supervised, and related to the lectures. There would be no problem here if all the tutorials could be given by the professor who does the lecturing. But not all of them can be, in the many courses where the enrolment is large. In so far as the tutorials are given by someone other than the lecturer himself, there has been an understandable tendency for them to become additional miniature lectures, or monologues by the instructor in answer to single students' demands for more information. While this practice may not be entirely without value, it clearly does not fulfil the most desirable purposes of the tutorial.

Not all of these weaknesses in some of the present tutorials will be automatically remedied by the changes we have proposed in the lecture and examinations systems, although those changes should lead to some improvement in tutorials. A significant improvement may be expected from the fact that students will presumably take tutorials more seriously as they become a larger proportion of their whole classroom time. But although the reduction in the number of lectures should make it possible for the professors to take a few more of the tutorials than they now do, many will have to be done by teaching assistants, so there will still be a problem of planning; and, in view of the increased relative importance of tutorials, the planning and supervision of them will be even more important.

We recommend that, at least in large courses where many tutorials are given, the importance of this planning and supervision be recognized (as it is now in the practice of at least one department) by the department making specific allowance, in assigning teaching duties, for the time spent on this work by the lecturer in charge of the course. Thus the time spent on organizing the tutorials, advising and supervising the people in charge of them, supervising their marking of any assignments related to them, etc., might in a large course be counted as equivalent to a quarter of one lecture course.

We have said nothing so far about the desirable amount of tutorial instruction, except that we do not want it increased to take up all the hours vacated by the decrease in the amount of lecturing. However, it is implicit in what has been said so far that tutorials should generally have a somewhat larger part in the whole pattern of instruction. We may now make this explicit. We recommend that in those courses in the humanities and social sciences which are taught by lectures plus tutorials (i.e., courses other than those, mainly in languages and literature, which are taught in mixed lecture/discussion classes, and other than those conducted by seminars which replace both lectures and tutorials), tutorial groups should be provided to an amount that will give each student, in all his courses together, not more than five tutorial groups per week.

This number may seem too great to allow for adequate student preparation for the tutorials. But, in the first place, preparation for tutorials will presumably coincide at least in part with the student's thinking about and reading around questions arising out of that week's (or the previous week's) lecture, to which the student should be devoting some hours a week in any case. And, in the second place, with the substantial reduction in classroom time, the student will have more time for preparation.

Implicit in what we have said so far is the desirability of keeping the tutorial groups to a certain maximum size. Our experience, supported by much evidence submitted to us, suggests that no group larger than ten to twelve students is likely to perform successfully the function it should perform in a course conducted by lectures and tutorials. We therefore recommend that a maximum size of ten to twelve for tutorial groups be adopted as a Faculty policy.

The mixed lecture/discussion classes which are the usual unit of instruction in many of the language and literature courses, and which are found less frequently in other subjects, have a considerable range of size. Fifteen is a fairly standard size in some subjects; in others thirty or forty is usual; in a few cases it is even larger than forty and in some cases it is smaller than fifteen.

Since in each lecture/discussion the same person is conducting the class whether it is meeting for a lecture or for discussion, there is no problem of co-ordinating the work of different instructors within this one class.

But there may be a problem of size. We think it would be advantageous if the policy now followed in some of these lecture/discussion classes, whereby the whole class is regularly divided into smaller groups for more effective discussion, were generally followed where the whole class is a large one. We recommend therefore, as a general policy, that lecture/discussion classes larger than 20 should regularly be divided into tutorial groups of 10 or 12, it being understood that classes and tutorials together should not exceed the maximum of two hours a week.

We consider finally one kind of tutorial instruction which is now rarely if ever used in the Faculty, the individual tutorial in which a single student meets his professor at regular intervals, usually to discuss some piece of work the student has prepared. We have no doubt that this is a highly valuable form of tutorial instruction. It cannot do some of the things a tutorial group can do, but it can perform one of the most important tutorial functions better than a group can do. It can give the individual student the undivided attention of his teacher's mind at regular intervals; and the fact that these intervals are known will generally induce the student to better work than he otherwise might feel called upon to do.

The difficulty of introducing individual tutorials on any substantial scale, either as an alternative or as a supplement to tutorial groups, is obvious. To replace a one-hour tutorial group for ten students by half-hour individual tutorials for each of them would mean five times as many tutorial hours for the instructor. With any given staff-student ratio this would mean that each student's tutorial instruction could be only one-fifth as frequent; a weekly tutorial group would be replaced by an individual tutorial once every five weeks, a fortnightly group by an individual tutorial once every ten weeks. It is doubtful if this frequency justifies the scheme.

Moreover, the full advantage of individual tutorials is more likely to be had when they are with the professor rather than with a teaching assistant, not because the assistant is necessarily less able but because the student will probably assume that he is, and will therefore not treat the occasion as seriously as he should. If individual tutorials were to be confined to professors, their frequency would be even less.

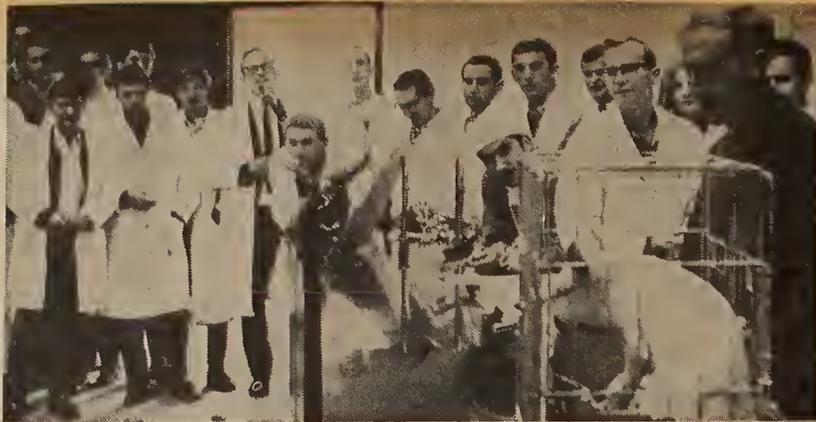

For these reasons a system of individual tutorials can scarcely be introduced on any extensive scale. But something like it could probably be introduced in most of the humanities and social sciences in second and/or third and/or fourth years in such a way that each student would experience it as one part of his whole work that year. We notice with interest the proposal of the Department of Philosophy to provide for their students in second and third years one weekly tutorial period of up to two hours in groups of three students, these tutorials not to be attached to any lecture course but to count as the equivalent of a lecture course, and each meeting to be devoted primarily to the oral defence, sentence by sentence, by one student of a short paper he had prepared for it. The intention of this scheme is clearly much the same as that of the individual tutorial. We think it probable that it would have most of the advantages of the individual tutorial, and possibly even more. And it would permit three times the frequency of tutorials.

We do not presume to recommend the general adoption of precisely this scheme, but we are encouraged that it appears to be within the bounds of possibility, and we do recommend that other departments in the Faculty seriously attempt to work out some such variant of the principle of individual tutorials.

(2) Laboratories

Just as lectures are taken for granted as a main mode of instruction in all subjects in the Faculty, so laboratories are in most of the physical and life sciences. No one doubts that laboratory work is an essential part of the undergraduate science student's learning. But one may doubt whether all of the laboratory instruction now given in the Faculty does perform the functions that should be, and can best be, performed by laboratories. The evidence we heard suggests that while some of the present teaching laboratories perform the most desirable functions effectively, some fall so far short of this as to be regarded as a substantial waste of everybody's time. This is the sort of thing that can easily happen if custom and routine take over. It seems worthwhile therefore to reconsider the purposes which laboratories do or might serve, and to go on from there to consider defects in their present organization and possible remedies.

The importance of laboratory work in any education in the natural sciences follows from the fact that the natural sciences, no matter how deductive or hypothetical, depend at some stage on observation or experiment. Because of this it is important that students of the natural sciences should learn by first hand experience something of the problems, difficulties, and limitations of experiment and observation. This can in most cases be accomplished only in the laboratory; hence the essential role of the laboratory in teaching and learning in the natural sciences.

All the possible or expected functions of the laboratory in science education can be derived from this basic fact. They might be listed as follows:

- (i) To enable students to manipulate materials and instruments and gain first hand knowledge of their behaviour.
- (ii) To develop, through practice, skill in making accurate and relevant observations.
- (iii) To enable students to experience the natural variability occurring in experimental work.
- (iv) To transmit information about method in experimental science, i.e. to illustrate by actual examples how experimental data are obtained.
- (v) To cultivate initiative in tackling and interpreting experiments.
- (vi) To suggest ways in which experimental research might be prosecuted.

We regard each of these functions as desirable and appropriate to undergraduate teaching laboratories.

We found, however, that some though by no means all the undergraduate laboratories were so organized or conducted as to impede their performance of most of these functions. The most common criticism made to the Committee was that too many of the laboratories were so organized as to put a premium on the student's "carrying out the recipe and getting the official answer." Such laboratories may serve the fourth of the above purposes adequately, but they serve the first three less well, and rarely serve the last two at all. The habit of regarding the "official answer" as the goal of the experiments detracts particularly from the performance of the third function, but not only from it. Instead of experiencing experimental problems and attempting their interpretation, the students copy "official answers" from old report notebooks, partly to lessen the chore of performing an experiment whose outcome is a foregone conclusion, partly to avoid being penalized for an "erroneous" result, and partly because they are too busy during laboratory hours to concern themselves with the background and meaning of the experiments.

No single remedy is likely to prevent or reduce the frequency of this type of laboratory, but part of the reason for its existence seems to be that the required laboratory periods are both too numerous and too short. We are persuaded that the desirable purposes of laboratories would be better served if there were fewer required laboratory periods in the undergraduate science student's year, and that a reduction in the number of required periods would reduce the routine tendencies which convert them into "recipe and official answer" exercises. We are persuaded also that two-hour periods are often so rushed as to discourage significant discussion and following-up of insights, and to encourage the recipe pattern. If laboratories are to perform their desirable functions they should be more open-ended than the fixed two-hour duration permits.

We therefore recommend:

- (1) that the number of laboratory periods required of the undergraduate science student per year be reduced by half, by offering them on a one-term or fortnightly basis, and that they be arranged as problems classes from which students are released as soon as their work is satisfactorily completed;
- (2) that the length of laboratory periods be left open up to three hours.

5. The quality of teaching

We are disturbed by the evidence that a significant proportion of the lectures offered to undergraduates are simply bad, whether because the lecturer is inaudible, insufficiently articulate, obviously uninterested, or merely unaware of his faults. We were told by an undergraduate witness at one public hearing, and subsequent inquiries have given us no reason to doubt this, that a student thinks himself fortunate if, of the (say, five) lecturers he has in any one year, one is first-rate and no more than one is deplorably bad. Any such judgments are of course subjective; they depend on the level of expectation the student has, and also on what he expects from a lecture. It is clear that different students want different things from lectures. Some want above all to be able to get a good set of notes, and will thus value clear and not too fast delivery and clear organization, no matter how pedestrian. Others want new insights which they can follow up; others to see how a professor's mind works; others to be stimulated; others to be entertained; and some perhaps just want to be sure they are not missing anything. The existence of such different expectations goes some way towards invalidating any generalized students' judgment of the difference between a first-rate and a merely acceptable lecturer. But it does not similarly invalidate a generalized judgment of what is unacceptable.

The frequency with which the submissions to us have requested either, or both, systematic appraisals of lecturers' teaching ability, and systematic instruction in pedagogical techniques, reinforces our view that there is a serious shortcoming for which remedies should be sought, though we have no confidence in some of the remedies most frequently proposed.

There is a separate but related problem about the quality of the teaching done by teaching assistants, normally graduate students who hold part-time appointments for one or a few years as tutorial teachers and laboratory demonstrators. It is a separate problem in that its improvement may require and permit means which would not be effective or possible in respect of full-time lecturers and professors; but it is related, in that an improvement in the quality of the work of teaching assistants would presumably show up later in the quality of lecturers and professors.

Accordingly we deal separately with the quality of lectures, and the question of the role of the teaching assistantship as it affects the quality of tutorial and laboratory instruction.

We do not think that instruction (especially compulsory instruction) in lecturing techniques, by professional teacher trainers, is the remedy for poor lecturing or the way to improve the general level of lecturing. For such remedy and improvement we look rather to a combination of other means, among them, systematic help to novice lecturers in each discipline by professors of that discipline who are known as good teachers of it. We are not, that is to say, arguing against systematic efforts to show lecturers how to lecture or to remedy their short-comings in other ways.

Those who have advocated compulsory teacher training have, it appeared under questioning, generally done so because they could think of nothing else that might remedy a situation they found intolerable or needlessly wasteful. We agree that some remedy needs to be found for plainly bad lecturing; at the very least, inarticulate and inaudible lecturing should be prevented or cured. But while systematic teacher training might do this, its harmful effect on the quality of university teaching as a whole would be likely to outweigh this benefit.

There are two reasons for this expectation. The first is that, of all the functions university lectures can be or are expected to perform (as set out above, in section 2 of this chapter), the one whose performance is most amenable to any systematic teacher training is the one we have argued should not be the primary object of lectures, namely, the mere transmission of information which the student has to know. Thus the more effective a wholesale scheme of pedagogical training was, the more it would tend to turn lectures into the one thing they should not be. If pedagogical training were aimed only at preventing inaudibility and inarticulateness it would not necessarily have this adverse effect. But it could scarcely be confined to that simple aim. It would, if the people who were doing it had any professional sense at all, be bound to go much beyond that, and in so doing would be most likely to have the result described.

Macpherson writes he is worried about the quality of teaching at this university but shies away from suggesting regular teacher's training.

The second reason for expecting more harm than benefit from a system of teacher training is the effect it would have on recruitment, and hence on the maintenance of the intellectual quality of the faculty. Any one university which decided to require a course of teacher training or a certificate of lecturing competence as a condition of appointment at any rank would soon lose its competitive power to attract scholars and potential scholars. Whatever may be the necessary or possible relation of university teaching and scholarly production (on which we say something below) we believe there is a sufficiently positive relation that any step which would impede the recruitment of scholarly ability would soon reduce the quality of university teaching. To take such a step would be shortsighted even if its other results, taken together, could be expected to be good. But since its other results, taken together, can be expected to be bad, it is not necessary to argue this point any farther.

If we reject professional teacher training as a means of improving the quality of lectures, what other means are there? There are two somewhat different problems here: how to prevent or remedy absolutely bad lecturing, and how to improve the quality of lecturing generally. Some means may be appropriate to the solution of both problems; other means to only one or the other.

The means we have considered for the solution of either or both problems include:

(a) making available throughout the Faculty more systematic help on how to go about undergraduate teaching than is now available or customary in most departments;

(b) establishing a known policy whereby excellence, or lack of it, in teaching, counts more than it is now thought to count in appointments and promotions; and

(c) (as a means to b) establishing a more systematic appraisal of each faculty member's excellence (or lack of it) in undergraduate teaching.

Each of these possible means of improving the quality of lectures has merits, drawbacks, and difficulties, which we now set out.

(a) Help in ways of teaching

We find that some of the novice full-time university teachers (and some of the most promising and most scholarly of them), while valuing the independence and responsibility that are given to them with their first major teaching assignments, would welcome more help and advice than is now offered, and more than they judge it proper or expedient to ask for, about how to lecture, how or organize work in tutorial groups and to conduct groups, how to relate the work they demand in their course with the work demanded of their students by other courses, and so on. No doubt the novice who is strongly interested in and conscientious about undergraduate teaching will find out these things on his own initiative and by his own devices. But even he might profit from the availability of more help, and the less interested novice might profit even more.

How much help should be made available is less easy to say. It has been proposed to us that a small team of professional consulting educators should be available, of whom the teacher could request criticism of the format, delivery, and technique of his lectures. The drawbacks here would be similar to that of any scheme of compulsory teacher training by professionals. Any such team of persons whose profession would be teaching methods rather than the subject in which the lecturing was being done, would be most likely to base their criticisms and recommendations on the wrong assumption about the function of lectures in that subject, since the wrong function, the mere transmission of structured information, is more amenable to methodical improvement than are the functions we regard as proper functions of university lectures.

We have consulted an extensive literature reporting many experiments in improving university and college teaching, chiefly in the United States, ranging from system of teaching internships to systems of in-service seminars in university teaching methods. Most of these relied on professors of the various disciplines rather than professors of teaching methods, and most of them clearly had some merit. But we could not find any evidence that these pilot schemes could be followed up on a wide enough scale to do what needed to be done at any bearable cost of faculty time and energy. One of the pilot schemes that was thought to be most successful, which was conducted with lavish foundation support, required one-fifth or two-fifths of the time of eight senior faculty members throughout an academic year, to plan and operate an in-service seminar for twelve new junior members of the faculty. With or without foundation support, nothing of this order can be thought to be feasible on the scale that would be needed to provide the requisite help to all incoming junior faculty members in a large university.

Yet we believe that some systematic help should be available to all those who are beginning full-time university teaching (and, as we suggest below, that there should be incentives to those who could profit from such help to take it, and penalties for those who need it and either do not avail themselves of it or prove to be beyond help). The help that should be made available, in each teaching department, is that of one or two experienced colleagues in the department who are interested enough in the quality of undergraduate teaching in their subject to be willing to devote some time to this. Such help is now available, and given, informally in some departments, but it is usually not sufficiently clearly offered, nor is the importance of taking it made sufficiently clear, for it to be often asked for. Something more systematic, though it may still be informal, is required.

We recommend the adoption of an explicit Faculty-wide policy that each department, make this help available, make novice full-time teachers aware of its availability and importance, and recognize the time spent by the more senior members of the department who undertake it as equivalent to a part of the teaching and administrative duties they otherwise would have had. We should add that their job would not only be to help the novices about lecturing techniques but also to show them the ropes more generally—how the department and the Faculty run, and what other things than facing a class are required or expected in the department.

We have spoken so far of novice lectures. There are other lecturers and professors who might benefit from criticism but would not be likely to avail themselves of this kind of help. For them (and for the novice) one other type of help, of which they might well avail themselves, is worth considering. This consists in making it possible for them to see and hear their own performance. There is no technical difficulty in doing this, and no great cost is involved. It can be done by the Faculty making available to departments a television technician, with simple portable equipment, who would on any lecturer's request record on videotape an actual lecture (or part of one) in the classroom, for later showing to the lecturer (which could be done in private). Something like this is already being done in some departments which have such equipment at hand, and with very good effect. It is generally enough for the lecturer to see and hear himself: no comment is necessary, though the lecturer may invite comment from colleagues. One or two further recordings at a later time can show him whether he has corrected his faults.

This device can be used without any element of inspection by others, or with some element of inspection. We recommend, first, that it be made available, on a purely voluntary basis, without any element of inspection, to anyone who requests it. So used, it appears to have the merit of avoiding the embarrassment of anxiety that might impede the use or effectiveness of inspection by colleagues; if enough lecturers used it, even only to encourage the others, it would not even imply an embarrassing degree of self-doubt. We recommend also that it be used with an element of inspection in conjunction with the kind of inspection of beginning teachers which we are proposing below.

What is required to implement both recommendations is that the Faculty budget provide for this equipment and service to be available on request to all departments which have not already got it, and that the Faculty explicitly request all departments to make full use of it.

(b) A policy of incentives

Much might be expected of establishing a Faculty-wide policy whereby excellence or lack of excellence in undergraduate teaching was known (as it is not now known) to count in appointments and promotions.

We find there is a widespread belief, among faculty and students, that appointments and promotions are made primarily or entirely on the basis of research and publication (or, in the case of very junior people, on the basis of presumed aptitude for research and publication), with teaching ability left out of the picture. We know that this is an overstatement, but we think that there is enough truth in it to merit some attention.

There is a serious problem here. We assume that a university should strive for excellence both in scholarly research, which is normally judged by publication, and in teaching. We believe that the best teachers are usually productive scholars, or at least that a university which did not have a high proportion of scholars on its staff would not be one in which good university teaching would flourish. We therefore think it essential, for maintaining the quality of undergraduate teaching as well as for meeting its other obligations, that the university should emphasize scholarship in its appointment and promotion policy.

But we are aware that, however complementarily excellence in scholarship and excellence in teaching may be, they are not identical; and that the claims of scholarly research and undergraduate teaching on the working hours of a professor may, though they need not, pull in opposite directions. We think it is likely that they will increasingly pull in opposite directions as the University of Toronto moves increasingly heavily into graduate work. If, therefore, the quality of our undergraduate work is to be maintained, let alone improved, steps should be taken now to safeguard it.

We may observe, in the first place, that the danger of scholarly work and undergraduate teaching pulling in opposite directions will be diminished in the measure that undergraduate lecturing can be moved away from the function of primary transmitting information and be devoted to those other functions which we believe to be its proper ones. For the most of the latter functions are clearly more consonant with scholarship. The second of the functions we listed—conveying to students the professor's enthusiasm and zeal for his subject in a way that cannot be done in print—is not only consonant with scholarship but, in the sense we intend, requires it: we are not recommending un-scholarly enthusiasm. The third, fourth, and fifth functions increasingly clearly require scholarship. Not only is there no conflict between the performance of these desirable functions and a devotion to scholarly research: the former requires the latter. Nevertheless, the latter does not require the former. Hence the increasing emphasis on the development of graduate work in this University may still endanger the amount of energy put into undergraduate work.

The first problem, then, is to prevent incentives to scholarly research and publication from being disincentives to expenditure of energy on undergraduate teaching.

One step that seems necessary is to have a clear and known Faculty policy that promotion and appointment will take expenditure of energy and imagination on undergraduate teaching into account more fully than it is now believed or known to do.

We doubt if it is feasible to go much beyond this. To make promotion require not simply the devotion of some energy and imagination to undergraduate teaching, but the attainment of excellence in undergraduate teaching, would mean putting a degree of reliance on some positive appraisal of relative merit in teaching which is difficult to be confident about: the difficulties of appraisal are considered in the following section.

Nevertheless, some appraisal is possible, and in some departments it is given substantial weight in decisions on appointments and promotions. But the evidence suggests that in some departments ability in undergraduate teaching is given no weight at all, and in others not as much as is desirable. We do not think it should be possible, as it now is, for departments to secure as a matter of course the promotion or appointment of a man who is known to be a bad undergraduate teacher, and to continue to inflict him on the undergraduates. Nor should the hitherto random and obscure weighting or non-weighting of undergraduate teaching ability by different departments be allowed to continue. Our proposals for remedying this are made at the end of this chapter.

(c) Systematic appraisal of the quality of undergraduate teaching

Clearly, if any attempt is to be made to reward excellence, and penalize lack of excellence, of undergraduate teaching, some reliable system of appraisal both of the excellence and of its lack must be found. There are two obvious means by which this can be attempted:

- (i) systematic student appraisal of teachers;
- (ii) systematic inspection by colleagues.

(Other devices have also been proposed, which we consider under (iii) below.)

Our view is that of the first two, (i) has some value, but mainly in revealing lack of excellence; and that (ii) could be used for discovering both excellence (or promise of it) and lack of excellence, but only for junior appointments.

(i) Student appraisals of faculty. We think that where the students have themselves undertaken a systematic appraisal of teachers and courses, the Faculty and departments should give them all the help they can, with a view to making the appraisals an effective instrument in improving the quality of teaching. It is fairly clear from this year's experience (when the first Faculty-wide appraisal was launched by a committee of the Students Administrative Council), that any systematic appraisal by means of questionnaires will require that classroom time be allowed for filling them in, and that a Faculty-wide survey requires a Faculty policy rather than leaving it to the co-operation of individual lecturers. For in the latter case, the response will be uneven, and the respondents will tend to be an inaccurate, because inadequate and random, sample of the students in the different classrooms. It need scarcely be said that appraisal questionnaires which are filled in during classroom time should be collected, and returned to the student organization, not by the professor but by pre-arranged student representatives, in order to avoid any apprehensions the students might have about the confidentiality of their replies.

This year's operation did have support at the Faculty level, but unfortunately the questionnaire was not ready to be administered until the very end of the undergraduate teaching year, so that in many cases no classroom time could be allotted by individual professors for its administration; and there was not time for sufficiently careful planning of the collection and return of the completed questionnaires.

Student-organized appraisals, if intelligently planned, and taken seriously by the students, should be a less inaccurate index of teaching ability and performance than the somewhat random information that now floats around. The information now conveyed by departmental grapevines is not altogether without value. Department chairmen, and members of senior departmental committees concerned with promotions, commonly have some idea of who are the best and who the poorest undergraduate teachers. They get it from casual but cumulative students' remarks, and from their own assessment of their colleagues' attitudes to undergraduate teaching. This sort of assessment will probably never be entirely replaced by student appraisals. But at the very least, student appraisals would be a valuable supplement to these informal assessments. And at best they could replace the grapevine as the primary basis of judgment.

Student appraisals can also be a valuable indication to the individual professor of how far he is succeeding in doing what he wants to do. We have some evidence that smaller and less formal appraisals, initiated by individual professors, have been of direct value to them in improving both their own teaching and that of juniors associated with them in a particular course. Occasional appraisals of this sort may be a useful supplement to the larger student-organized ones.

The results of the student appraisals of each faculty member should be given to him and to the chairman of his department. If the object of appraisals is to improve the quality of teaching, rather than to give students a labour-saving guide to courses, the appraisals need not be made public. Indeed, a policy of publication may have an effect harmful to the quality of teaching, for it may put a premium on the kind of teaching calculated to make a constant appeal to the majority of the students, and so may tend to discourage the scholars who have most to offer.

Given a serious system of student appraisals which are made available to those responsible for promotions, how should they be used? As we have suggested above, we think they should be given a great deal of weight when they persistently indicate serious defectiveness or inadequacy of a teacher, but that they should not be given quite so much weight as positive indices of teaching merit. Our reasons are these. The students, who are the direct and immediate sufferers from any instances of bad teaching, are clearly the best judges of it. They may be the best judges also of very good teaching, though it is not self-evident that they are always so at the time they are being taught. But to rely largely on favourable student appraisals in making decisions about promotions would be to regard such appraisals as accurate ranking of the merits of the faculty members as teachers. We do not think that any questionnaire, however skillfully composed can be relied upon to yield such results.

(ii) Systematic inspection by colleagues. It rarely occurs to an established academic person that there is any need to defend the view that his lectures should not be subject to inspection by his colleagues or superiors. Yet this position may well be questioned by the public, in so far as the public is unfamiliar with the ethos of the university, and even by the students, under considerable provocation. High school teachers are subject to such inspection, why should university teachers not be? The answer is that university teachers are expected to be also creators of new knowledge, that their teaching is most valuable to the university and to the community when it is closely joined to their creation of knowledge, that those whose heart is in the conjoint function (who are the most valuable teachers) would be disheartened by a system of routine inspection and would either leave the university or change their attitude to their teaching, in either case leaving the university and the undergraduate the poorer. And other deplorable results of a comprehensive system of inspection can readily be envisaged, the most deplorable being perhaps that it would be difficult to avoid a pervasive mutual suspicion when everyone's advancement depended on colleagues' reports on his teaching.

For such reasons we reject any comprehensive scheme of inspection by colleagues. We do, however, recommend that a wide use be made of inspection of a beginning member of the profession, in his first year or two of full-time university teaching: this would be in addition to whatever there might have been by way of inspection during his apprenticeship as a teaching assistant. Such inspection of beginning full-time teachers is now being practised in at least one department in this Faculty and does not appear to have any ill effect.

'Homecoming a success' cheers B & W

This year's Homecoming weekend was the biggest success on record, says the chairman of the beleaguered Blue and White Society.

Marty Low (I Law) said total Blue and White profits from the weekend should be between $850 and $950, a jump from last year's $700.

The Hart House Dance Saturday night brought in $1,100, he said, and the overflow dance should have contributed another $20 or $30. The street dance that followed Saturday's football game costed about $300.

Low said the success was mainly due to efficient organization by the society, which has been criticized recently as being disorganized and motiveless.

There was none of the hazy last-minute planning of former years, he said.

U of T tiddlywinks team places last at Waterloo

WATERLOO (VNS) — The University of Toronto tiddlywink team placed last in the North American tiddlywink championships in Waterloo last weekend.

The winning team will fly to England early next year to play Oxford for the world championship.

The Toronto team met stiff competition from Cornell, MIT, and Waterloo universities. "The other teams all belong to clubs that practise every week," said team member Byron Alexandroff (II APSC). "Our team was put together at the last minute.

"Competing was a very valuable experience. We learned that tiddlywinks is not a trivial game. It's like chess. You have to think 10 moves in advance.

"We learned a lot by playing in the championships," Alexandroff said. "We're going to go back and take it next year."

Cornell and Waterloo were to play off for the title last night.

Carleton dean suggests "supersenate" structure

OTTAWA (Special) — The dean of arts and sciences at Carleton University has proposed a new structure to centralize university government.

In a confidential report circulated to members of the faculty board, Dean David Farr criticized the Duff-Berdahl report on university government for advising retention of the two-tiered structure of the board of governors (financial) and the senate (academic).

Dean Farr suggested a "supersenate," of administration, faculty, people from outside the university, and students. This structure would be the supreme governing body in the university and would rely heavily on a committee system and on more active faculty boards.

Plans were direct, members were given definite jobs, and publicity was well-done.

Low said more improvements are planned for next year. The society will try to allow fraternities to participate in the float parade.

It is hoped that the Miss

U of T contest will be like the Miss Toronto pageant, with more organization and improved methods of judging. Talent may play a part in next year's judging.

Hopefully judging will be in the Great Hall of Hart House, allowing more people to see the contest.

Yes Virginia, there really is nowhere for you to stay

By JIM HAMILTON

Once upon a time a sweet little girl named Virginia was accepted by a professional faculty at the University of Toronto.

She arrived in Toronto but alas — there wasn't a place for her to stay.

But she wasn't worried. After all, hadn't the Macpherson report recommended that all freshmen live in residence?

Too late had Virginia heard Students Council President Tom Faulkner lament:

"It's a crime that this university does not provide residences for professional faculties."

If Virginia had been in the faculty of music, faculty Secretary Mrs. F. Fish would have suggested their small—38 persons—residence at 99 St. George St. Or the campus co-op, the college residences or the housing service.

If Virginia had been a pharmacy student faculty Secretary Miss F. M. Ward would have merely referred her to the housing service and would have given her the addresses of college residences.

And if our innocent was in food science? Miss B. A. McLaren, dean of the faculty would have informed her:

"My students don't qualify for residence space in the college residences. I can only refer my students to Innis or New College."

Only the school of nursing would have offered solace. Virginia could have stayed at the school's residence at 146 St. George St. or at the Women's College Hospital residence.

So Virginia talked to Faulkner again. "There are less than 100 spaces in residence, I'm sure, for women in the professional faculties," he said.

Virginia listened on and learned there are 3,069 full-time women students in the professional faculties, 622 of them freshies.

Later Virginia discovered that the university is worried about her problem. Innis College Principal Robin Harris, has said that when the Innis buildings are completed in September, 1970, there will be 256 residence spaces for women. About a half of these will go to non-arts students.

And Mrs. Jaffary says that when the New College residence for women is opened in 1968, the problem of lack of residence space for non-arts female students will be partially relieved.

Rochdale College project, Tartu College and the Married Student's Quarters will all provide relief.

And Robin Ross, registrar of the university, says:

"Within the next five years the university would hope to have residence for 2,000 more people and approximately half of this would be for girls."

History students plan campus union

A history students' union may be formed on the campus as the result of a meeting Wednesday.

Some 150 history students and seven staff observers met to discuss the idea for the union, the brainchild of eight third and fourth-year students.

Mark Sidney (III UC) and Ken Mark (IV UC), two of the original organizers, advocated a formal structure providing for the election of 14 spokesmen, two from first year and four from each of the other years.

It would then be up to the students to present their ideas to these persons, who would then present them to the faculty.

They also proposed the formation of a student-faculty committee to serve as an intermediary body between the spokesmen and the faculty.

The Macpherson report recommended the formation of such committees but provided no suggestions on how this was to be done.

The history students' union would be the first student body to organize such a committee.

"This is just a focal point at present," Sidney said. "We hope to go beyond that. We are aiming for more humanistic education."

Mark outlined other functions of the proposed union. It could function as a club, as an alternative to the solely academic history Club now existing.

Inviting guest speakers and organizing a course outside the academic structure were other ideas put forward.

Students showed enthusiasm and general acceptance of the idea of a union.

The question of a formal structure caused a great deal of debate, but was not brought to a vote.

At the next meeting the proposed alternative structures will be voted on and the union should formally come into existence.

The history department approves the union. It has offered many suggestions and even an office.

The Students Administrative Council has agreed to provide funds for printing and other incidental expenses incurred in starting the union.

Man must control technology: Kranzberg

Technology will not become the "menacing robot or Frankenstein monster" that many humanists claim it has already become, Professor Melvin Kranzberg said last week.

Prof. Kranzberg is the founder and secretary of the Society for the History of Technology at Case Western Reserve University.

He said in a lecture that technology has been the course of man's progress.

"Technology opens doors and does not compel man to enter," he said. "It is up to man to control technology along social channels."

He denied the claim of the "bleeding-heart" humanists that the individual has been sacrificed in the interest of technology.

"Automation helps enrich the individual by freeing him from dull routine.

However, he said, some sacrifice of the individual is necessary if collective tasks are to be performed. Man now can use his energy in re-creating himself.

"It is not the fault of technology that man uses free time as busy time instead of using it to create," he said.

Professor Kranzberg accused poets and humanists of living in a vacuum and of failing to relate modern technology and its effects to man.

Artists, writers and poets have attacked technology as producing the ills of society, he said, but "advancing technology has made man's participation in the arts possible.

"Before the industrial revolution literature and arts were an aristocratic privilege."

Argosy offers birth control study

SACKVILLE, N.B. (Special) — The centre-spread feature of the last week's Argosy Weekly student newspaper of Mount Allison University, is sure to raise a few eyebrows.

A comprehensive study of the procedures and liabilities of various modes of birth control is documented under the title-head of Birth Control '67.

The study is in the form of a chart and includes a cross section of "all rational methods" of birth control, from the hormone pill through the rhythm method to the condom.

Each of seven methods are discussed under the headings

UBC store communicates by selling goods — free

VANCOUVER (VNS) — University of British Columbia artisans have developed a unique form of merchandising—everything in their new store is free.

Supplies are collected from willing donors and distributed on a self-service basis in a student lounge.

Merchandise includes tea, coffee, rice, books and psychiatric help.

About 50 persons are using the store daily to eat, drink, gripe or meditate.

A student spokesman said the store's purpose was "to counteract the communications breakdown on campus by just being nice to people."

Blues roll over Guelph 11-0

Varsity Soccer Blues scored their most impressive victory so far this season when they crushed University of Guelph Redmen 11-0 in Guelph Saturday.

Varsity just rolled over an eager but overmatched Redmen squad with a sensational display of accurate passing, excellent playmaking and deadly shooting.

Blues were overdue for a game like this one. All season long coach Ernie Glass has been trying to get his players to go all out for a full ninety minutes. They did exactly that, and in the process proved that they are one of the best soccer teams ever to play at Varsity.

The game started in a blinding snow storm with Toronto having to face the wind. Blues didn't sweat the small stuff, however, and went immediately to work. Within five minutes, Ron Muir had put them ahead with his first counter of the season.

Ten minutes later Frank Soppelsa hit a fantastic shot that went in off the crossbar to increase Blues' lead to 2-0.

Then Jim Lefkos got into the act as he deftly put a curving shot into the corner of the net. Muir got his second goal by chipping a left-footer over the goalie's head and Lefkos made it 5-0 on a good individual effort culminated by a booming shot. Blues were so much in control that Guelph did not have a single scoring opportunity during the entire first half.

After changing ends, Blues continued to show their excellence by again dominating the play. Lefkos was tripped in the penalty area and Austria Liepa scored Varsity's sixth goal on the ensuing penalty shot.

John Gero put Lefkos into the clear for number seven and Liepa chipped to Eric Sereda who headed in Blues' eighth goal. Lefkos added two more goals on crosses from Graham Shiels and Soppelsa and Muir ended the scoring with his third tally of the game.

The referee, perhaps mercifully, ended the one-sided contest six minutes before fulltime. Seldom does a team leading 11-0 hustle for more goals, but Blues tried. In the process, they almost lost their shutout, as Alan Cragg barely managed to clear the ball from his own goalline with goalie Erwin Stach lying helplessly on the ground.

Blues' fans will have a chance to see their team in action when Varsity meets Western, Saturday, at twelve noon on the back campus.

Harries triumph at Canisius meet

Canadian harrier teams dominated the Canisius Invitational held Saturday in Buffalo. The University of Toronto quintet maintained its championship for the third straight year. The strength of the Canadian teams was shown strikingly by the individual listings, which had eight Canadians in the first ten placings and by the team standings in which U of T with 42 and Waterloo with 83 were the only ones under 100 points in the 140-man field.

Individual winner was Bob

Finlay of Waterloo who shattered Dave Bailey's old record by nineteen seconds as he finished the course in 21.41. Varsity's Bailey crossed comfortably in second place at 22.06.

Blues' Brian Armstrong, Brian Richards, and Bob Cairns also made it into the top ten, finishing fifth, seventh, and ninth respectively.

John Loaring rounded out the team by just outkicking teammate Dave Tong for nineteenth position.

Harrier scoring is compiled by adding the finishing positions of the first five members of each seven man team together to obtain the final point totals.

West second, East first

By DOUG WOODS

need the try anyway.

Both the Eastern and Western Varsity rugby teams emerged with victories over the weekend, shellacking Queens and Guelph respectively.

The Western team now holds second place in the Western league on the strength of their 16-6 win over Redmen on Saturday. Bob Garwood, John Macdonald, Al Hamilton, and Bob Noble scored tries for the Varsity squad with Paul Henry getting two of the converts.

Guelph scored on a long kick which got past fullback Gus Sinclair and trickled into the end-zone where the Guelph winger touched it down for a try. Their only other scoring came on a penalty kick in the second half.

The Western team played excellent rugby and the score might have been higher but for the fact that the referee failed to notice that second-rower Joe Donohue, aided by the rest of the Toronto pack, had touched the ball down in the Guelph end-zone. Donohue went down in a heap of players and the referee unaccountably called a 20 yard drop out. However, as it turned out, Blues didn't

The Eastern team had no trouble at all in their game as they downed the highly touted Queens rugby team 21-3. Al Major, Maris Apse, John Holmes, and George Wraw all scored tries in Blues' winning effort. Andy Gibson added three converts and Wraw a penalty kick to round out the scoring for Blues.

Queens could only answer with a penalty kick as they were outclassed in almost every department all though the game. The win puts the Varsity team in first place in the Eastern league.

Every player on Blues' squad played well but some deserve special mention. Both wing-forwards, Al Major and Peter Hand, played particularly fine games, especially on defence. Second-rower Maris Apse made several long breaks setting up one try and scoring another himself. He came close to scoring again three or four times.

George Wraw at the scrum half position was a joy to watch all through the game. He was particularly adept at relieving pressure or covering up for had plays with long well-placed kicks for touch.

Yates Cup only one victory away

Once the teams established their 13-13 deadlock with only five minutes gone in the second quarter, Saturday's game contained more apparent turnings points than the grand prix course at Mosport. At times it seemed nobody wanted to win despite the desperate determination shown by both clubs.

The result was a game as farcical as it was exciting, as inane as it was thrilling. Way-out officiating, at times almost unreal in its enormity, acted as a catalyst to the wild capers consuming the football field.

QUEEN'S SCORES FIRST

Queen's opened the game by withering Varsity with a staccato burst of offensive might, moving 93 yards in five plays for the first touchdown. Jamie Johnston got it on a well-executed 22 yd. sweep around the right end. Bill Bennett blocked Guy Potvin's convert attempt.

Varsity evened the score five minutes later after McKay angled a beautiful kick out of bounds on Queen's eight yard line. Ensnared in the shadow of their own goalposts, Gaels thought a slick quick kick might be in order. Ergo, Ron Clark unleashed a towering punt which rose mightily into the air and descended softly to Blues' Dave Church on the Queen's seven. Quarterback Bob Amer threw a touchdown pass to Mike Raham on the very next play. McKay's convert was wiped out by a holding penalty.

Late in the quarter, Toronto added a single on a wide field goal attempt by McKay. Another colossal Gael kick, this time an eight yard effort, set up Blues' second touchdown. Toronto moved 40 yards in 4 plays for the go-ahead points with Glen Markle scooting through the centre from eight yards distance.

However, Gaels didn't come all this way to go down without a battle. Following the kickoff, quarterback Don Bayne engineered a brilliant march to square the match. Johnston again scored the touchdown, making a beautiful catch in the end zone for a 17-yd. scoring play.

Then the heebie-jeebies overtook the teams. Blues had a touchdown stolen from them when Potvin intercepted a pass on his own four yard line. Gaels sojourned the length of the field but garnered nothing when Mike Raham ran Potvin's field goal attempt out to the four. Blues had to kick from deep but Clark got them off the hook by fumbling McKay's punt. Carefoote recovered and the first half survived, 13-13.

Then came a turning point. Jim Bennett fumbled the opening kickoff and Gaels recovered. They went nowhere, but an exchange of punts left them on the Varsity 43.

Then came a turning point. Gaels carried to the 16, only to have Doug Cowan's third down fumble recovered by Riivo Ilves, a standout for Blues all day.

Play carried on regardless; then came a turning point. A ridiculous creature in official's clothing nullified a pass to Mike Raham which covered 55 yards. He claimed Jim Ware's devastating belly-button block was a clipping infraction. Sigh.

A bit later came a turning point. Dave Church ruined yet another Gaels' drive with an interception on Blues' 30. Two horrible plays later, Toronto was third and 46 on their own six.

Then came a turning point. Having brought the precious pigskin all the way to Toronto's six yard stripe, Queen's, inexplicably, decided to punt. Jim McKeen drove the ball mightily to an astonished Mike Raham, only eight yards deep. A no yards penalty brought the ball out. It was hard to believe.

A few turning points later, finally saw the turning point. An atrocious snap by Gaels on third down was recovered by Church on Queen's 41. Blues proceeded to pin Gaels on their own two yard line, and when Mike Raham darted 20 yards into field goal position on a punt return, it was all over, baby.

Queen's threatened briefly but a key tackle by Mike Wright, on a last-ditch third down effort locked the game up for good.

Once again, Blues conjured up the old Ti-Cat formula into a rugged victory potion. An emasculating defense shut the door on Queen's until at long last the offense scored just enough points to win. Mike Wright, Alex Squires, and Riivo Ilves were particularly outstanding for Blues.

Based on cold, hard statistics Blues didn't deserve to win, and Queen's has a sort of right to feel cheated. But there is an element in football which will never show on a statistician's sheet, and that is toughness — physical toughness.

Queen's blew a lot of opportunities, and one of the reasons was the fact that they were outmuscled by Blues' tremendous, charging defense. Gaels had a lot of finesse and a lot of desire, but when it came down to rock-em, sock-em fundamentals, as it did on Saturday, coach Murphy had his team well schooled. The better team won.

Paul McKay's toe the main difference; Tindall shrugs off Golden Gaels defeat

By HOWIE FLUXGOLD

Someone once said a good defence is the best offence, but he'd better change that to a good toe is the best offence.

It was Varsity Blues who had the best toe—Paul McKay—Saturday afternoon with the result that the Yates Cup is almost in the Hart House trophy case.

This was a game that should have been played for the Share campaign. Both teams were especially generous with their donations. They gave until it hurt.

But it wasn't the four fumbles or two interceptions which hurt Queen's most—it was no toe.

Jim McKeen punted for a 27.9-yard average and was unable to boot the ball 32 yards out of the end zone for what would have been the go-ahead point in the fourth quarter.

"He (McKeen) had a bad left knee," said Gaels' coach Frank Tindall. "He was the best we had during the week so we decided to use him."

While Tindall was quite a while getting back to the dressing room after the game he didn't treat the 16-13 loss as a major catastrophe. In fact, the 1968 season for Gaels started late Saturday afternoon.

Coach Tindall was delayed from the dressing room by some Queen's alumni who thought they had a good prospect. And there was Tindall writing down the name and address of a high school football player from Guelph.

It's still this year for Varsity Blues. And if anyone should suggest a pedicure for McKay's golden toes coach Murphy couldn't refuse. For the third week in a row McKay provided the margin of victory.

Now all Blues have to do is win one more game to clinch the Yates Cup and two to go undefeated.

Amazing, isn't it?

Quarterback Bob Amer (18) hands off crisply to powerful Glen Markle (21) as Mike Raham (22) watches enviously. Queen's players are John Stirling (76) and Jim Tait (29).

Innis votes for referendum — then hears the debate

By SHERRY BRYDSON

Innis College students last night voted almost unanimously to hold a referendum on aid to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

"It's a cheap way of running a government," Innis student president Ken Stone said against the referendum.

"If you elect a man you elect 100 per cent of him. You can't go around deciding you don't like 15 per cent of him."

Last week Stone's executive narrowly passed a motion to give $50 towards upkeep of a hostel run by the TADP. But opponents circulated a petition to call last night's meeting and hear both sides of the draft-resister issue.

Stone explained a referendum would put the executive into an awkward position. "We don't know whether to resign or not," he said.

"Do you feel we're so far out of touch with the college that we can't vote for you as your representatives?" asked Bob Bossin (III Inn), a member of the executive.

He warned the students that if they forced the executive to resign, they would have to be prepared to take over.

Some 57 of the 127 students who had signed the petition were at the meeting. One of them called for the question and speaker Wayne Hankey (SGS) asked all in favor to stand.

The standees had been almost counted when several from the back yelled they didn't know what question was called. The motion was carried, with six dissenters. Stone was one.

The formal meeting was then adjourned to hear three guests, including two draft-resisters, about the issue. About half the crowd left.

ner stood up. "You have come to this meeting as scholars and liberals, to make up your minds in an open-minded sort of way," he told the room, surveying the empty seats.

"There are three basic human rights involved in this matter. When your country goes to war, you may fight. Or you may suffer the consequence of law — and go to jail. But it is also a basic human right to give up citizenship in your country.

"We in North America have received the better part of our citizenship from people who did just that."

Stone introduced Norman Froomer and Bill Tate, draft-resisters recently arrived in Toronto. They were not at the meeting to ask for aid or even to speak but had been sent by Mark Satin, head of TADP to answer questions.

The crowd asked Froomer the inevitable question: why did he, a post-graduate student with a deferment of at least one more year, choose to come to Canada?

"What is education for?" he began. "The critical evaluation of the world so you can make a moral judgment on the world. You are here to educate yourselves on whether or not you should show concern or belief in a program by supporting it."

You could have heard a pin drop as Froomer continued.

"One of the sickest things of American youth is that they don't make the distinction between thinking and acting. To do something you believe in requires total dedication.

"When you come to Canada, you're doing something. I've lived 21 years in the United States and I'll probably never see my family again. I'll never see Louisville Kentucky again.

"It's probably the disgusting town in the whole world but somehow I love it. I don't owe anything to society with a capital S because I've paid my debt. It's hurt me that much to give it up."

A girl near the front squirmed uncomfortably. Earlier she had enthusiastically supported the referendum motion.

"I don't know whether you are aware of it," Faulkner said, "but there has been a lot of false information circulated around American campuses concerning entry into Canada. I have seen articles in campus newspapers claiming the border has been closed to American draft resisters.

"The American government isn't about to correct this situation.

"Why settle on the draft resister issue? In our society something has happened. People think draft resisters are communists and saboteurs.

"If the Innis College Student Society thinks the TADP deserves support, it would be a signal demonstration that we don't agree with those people who think Canada should close her borders," Faulkner continued.

Universities admit with less red tape

By JIM COWAN

Ontario's 14 provincially-assisted universities have agreed to adopt common admission procedure to simplify the work of applicants, guidance counsellors and universities.

The new procedures and the co-ordinated application form on which the system hinges were outlined Monday by E. M. Davidson.

Mr. Davidson is secretary-treasurer of the Ontario Council on Admissions, an affiliate of the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario, and director of admissions for the University of Toronto.

The Committee of Presidents said the new system was "designed to assure students of systematic consideration of their applications, to lighten the load of reporting by the secondary schools and to eliminate the problem created for the universities when students who are admitted fail to register."

Under the old system a Grade 13 student had to apply to each university separately. For each application, his school had to supply a confidential report listing his marks and other information.

In recent years the volume of paperwork involved and the problem of matching applications to confidential reports has caused serious difficulties for the universities.

The new program will replace the individual application and separate report with a single, integrated multi-copy form. The student fills in half the form with basic identification information and a list of four universities in order of preference.

The application is then returned to the school. A school official, probably the guidance counsellor, fills in information that corresponds to the old confidential report.

The student's final marks for Grades 11 and 12 and all marks from Grade 13 are recorded. In addition, pro-

Religion is not an illusion: Baum

"Religion is not an illusion" stated Father Gregory Baum, addressing a small but enthusiastic audience last night, in the post-teach-in lecture series.

Father Baum, Assistant Professor of Theology at St. Michael's College, said "man is unable to determine his relationship with reality using his will power."

Father Baum said that it was difficult to speak on the topic for two reasons, the first being that religious people claim that their object of belief is difficult to demonstrate for their faith is a result of some kind of experience or insight. The second reason is that "in life it is difficult to discern between reality and illusion."

He described the Freudian concept of religion, to which he strongly disagreed, as "a projection of man's neurotic conflict." These projections in man are a result of guilt feelings and fear, and a desire for wish fulfillment.

"Man," wrote Freud, "is born with a primary conscience which acts as a tormentor throughout his life. Religion is an expression of these guilt feelings."

The New Testament is a primary principle of critique against this interpretation of religion, said Father Baum.

"Jesus constantly wrestled with people who believed that there was a law-maker in heaven. He came with the good news that God was man's Father and protector."

"Paul also fought against this concept," stated Father Baum. "He tried to save man from his illusions about God."

"When man is discontented with himself, there is an orientation within him to change. People therefore look to religion for salvation and this change," said Father Baum.

He firmly insisted that in our life we come face to face with an external voice that summons us in difficult situations.

"We have no control whatsoever over this unworldly power," Father Baum added.

Witchhunt threatened for campus evils

The forces of evil on the University of Toronto campus have been pronounced sinister enough to warrant a good witchhunt.

"Exercise your right to exorcise," said Ted Smith (III Wycliffe), speaking for the ayes at a Hart House debate yesterday.

Smith pointed out that the new morality, the "creeping socialism and anarchy" of the new left, the Red Cross (a "front for corporate vampirism") and the miniskirt, that "scanty loincloth," were strong reasons for the necessity of a witchhunt.

For the nays, A. J. Andrews (II Trin) said university dispels the ignorance that caused people to indulge in witchcraft and sorcery.

"Why be intolerant even if they do exist?" he pleaded.

Paul Henry, (III Wycliffe) of the ayes, said proper identification of witches was necessary.

"Which witch is which, and why?" he asked.

HH will debate draft-dodger issue

The Hart House debates committee has decided to air the already wind-blown draft-dodger issue.

On Thursday night four students will debate: This house condemns any encouragement of U.S. draft resisters.

Ron Thompson (IV APSC), who will support this motion, said yesterday he is unhappy with The Varsity's presentation of the issue.

"Since the discussion of the issue in The Varsity has been one-sided, we think a cross-campus confrontation of the draft dodger issue is essential."

He also said a wide open debate of the issue is needed because of "the apparent disagreement between college council executives and the students."

Thompson cited Innis College as an example of this disagreement.

Alan Rubin (III UC) is the other supporter of the resolution. Irv Weisdorf (III UC) and Gary Segal (IV UC) will oppose the motion.

SAC meets tonight to discuss budget

The axe is falling tonight on campus expenditures says Jan Duinker (SGS), finance commissioner of the Students Administrative Council.

Club presidents, he said, should attend the SAC meeting at Hart House if they want to be sure of getting their budgets accepted.

The budget calls for a total expenditure of $500,000 next year.

Students judged on five-point scale

vincial aptitude and achievement test scores are noted. These tests now are standard for Grades 12 and 13. A final section allows the school to evaluate subjectively the student's chances of success by rating him on a five-point scale.

When the form has been completed the school separates the five copies and files four of them under the appropriate universities.

On a date determined by the individual universities all the forms for each institution are mailed. This means that all the applications from the high schools arrive at the universities at about the same time.

Universities will not be allowed to approach students before May 15 each year and will not be able to demand a reply before June 15. This will give the student time to find out where he can go, and hopefully will avoid multiple applications.

Mr. Davidson said U of T had not been bothered too much in the past by students accepting a place and then not registering.

"We get about five applications for every four serious ones," he said. "In an institution this size that's not very significant. The places it hurts are the ones that receive less than half their applications on a serious basis."

Next year his department expects more than 12,000 applications for first year positions.

U of T will do $100,000 housing study

The University of Toronto will undertake a two-year, $100,000 housing study financed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Prof. J. S. Dupre of the university's centre for urban and community studies will head the study to find a new cheaper type of urban dwelling to utilize existing construction methods as far as possible.

A. J. Diamond, associate professor of architecture,

On receiving the applications from the high schools U of T will send out forms asking for more detailed information, including the choice of colleges, to those who meet its standards.

submitted a brief to the CMHC recommending an examination of types of housing with increased density.

"The building industry is principally engaged in the construction of single-family dwellings at prices large sectors of the population cannot afford," he said.

Dr. Diamond (also) suggested that low-rise housing was "predestined for the most appropriate application of pre-fabrication methods."

Lepan-Lit meeting prompts action

A meeting between University College Principal Douglas LePan and the executive of the UC Literary and Athletic Society has prompted the Lit to prepare a brief on student representation on college councils.

Principal LePan described the organization of the UC council and its sub-committees to the Lit executive last Friday.

Lit President Hersh Ezrin (IV UC) said the meeting was a preliminary move in the fight for student representation.

"Certain committees have not met regularly for years. We had to know which were important before we sought student representation," he said.

The brief will be ready within two weeks.

Blood flows - but not fast enough

The following are the goals for the colleges holding their clinics for the blood campaign today and Thursday:

New College—224 pints
St. Michael's College—426 pints
Victoria College—489 pints

Emmanuel College—50 pints

Food science faculty—34 pints

Music faculty—51 pints.

University College results have been tabulated from their clinic Monday and Tuesday. They have a total of 207 pints, less than half of their goal of 421. There are still a few more days left for the students to pick up the total by giving blood at any of the other clinics.

Today's clinic will be at the Loretto College lounge, SMC. Thursday clinics will be at the New College reading room and at the recreation room of Margaret Addison Hall for students of Victoria and Emmanuel Colleges and the faculty of food science.

Negative-type blood is most urgently needed. A student's donations at any clinic will be credited to his college or faculty.

'Blind dog' has blood cup

The Blood Donor Cup, which was taken by an unknown thief Friday, is still missing.

But an anonymous caller Monday told Carolyn Keystone (I Phar), co-chairman of the campus blood campaign, that the cup was safe and in the possession of "the blind dog society."

"The cup is not damaged. It will be returned when the winner is announced."

The caller said he wanted to present the cup to the winners himself. Since this is impossible, he will present the cup to a chairman of the campaign, who will then give it to the faculty or college who donates the most blood in the current drive.

when faculty and students get together

Student activists on campus have much to learn from last week's successful student strike at Sir George Williams University in Montreal.

A week ago today, the students at Sir George Williams decided to force a reversal of the university policies regarding the campus bookstore.

Protesting the high book prices plus the lack of any student voice in policy decisions, the SGW student body staged an effective and embarrassing sit-in at the bookstore.

This was followed by a one-day boycott of all classes and an all-day teach-in on campus problems.

The boycott and sit-in attracted the support of between 1,000 and 2,000 of the SGW student enrolment of 3,800.

Almost immediately, the university administration relented.

Students will join the committee controlling the operations of the bookstore and four students will sit on the main academic council of the university.

The SGW administration continues to insist these concessions to student power had had nothing to do with the boycott.

Of course, the concessions had everything to do with the boycott and sit-in.

Without student action, the administration would have done nothing.

The SGW protest is an example of student activism achieving its goals through direct mass action.

On this campus, student activism, especially as represented in SAC, prefers to operate within the official channels set up by the administration.

Taking the bookstore as a case for comparison, SAC set up a bookstore committee which negotiated with Simcoe Hall and the management of the bookstore. SAC preferred to argue on the basis of rationality and common sense but there was always the implied (and perhaps stated) threat of a well-organized student demonstration in the event administration refused to make any concessions.

However, sooner or later Simcoe Hall will adopt a position of intransigence, thereby forcing SAC to make good its threats of organized public protest.

If that time ever comes, the SGW experience will provide useful guidelines.

Sit-ins and boycotts worked in Montreal; they will work equally well in Toronto.

An interesting facet to the SGW strike, and one which has been largely overlooked, is the role of the faculty, who by and large supported the student complaints.

Faculty members encouraged the boycott by cancelling classes on their own initiative.

Several departments held faculty meetings and endorsed the students' defiance of the administration.

In no small measure the success of the student protests can be traced to their enthusiastic support.

On this campus, the university administration has adapted a policy of divide and rule.

Simcoe Hall officials encourage student activists to focus their complaints against the faculty not against the administration. Thus we have course critiques, etc.

On the other side of the fence, Simcoe Hall does not stifle faculty complaints against students, for example, bad academic performance.

There are three power bases at this university, the students, the faculty and the administration.

The Simcoe Hall bureaucrats are well aware their ability to control the campus depends on the inability of students and faculty to form a cohesive bargaining unit.

This lack of rapport between students and staff need not become permanent.

Both groups share the same complaints: money, facilities, the library, the bookstore, parking arrangements.

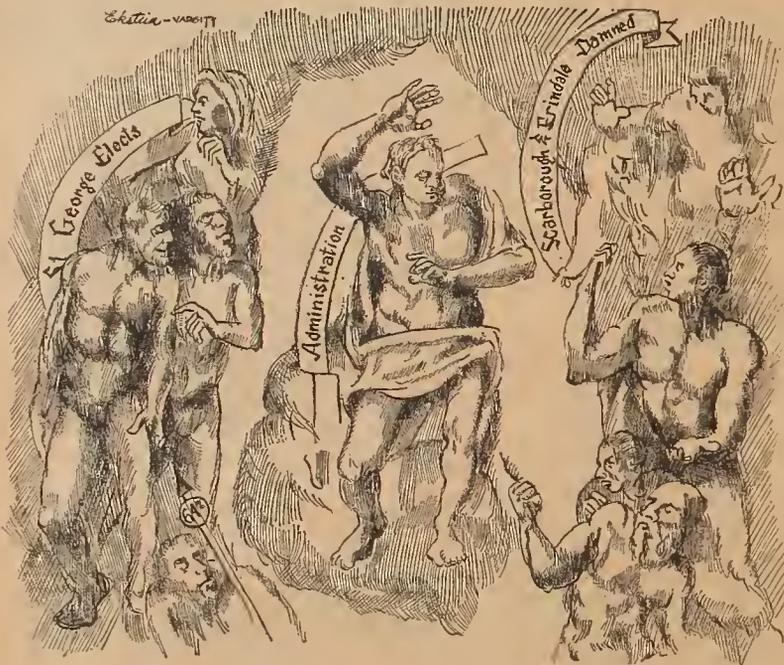

Both groups have effective representative organizations.

Both groups have a common opponent: the administrative bureaucracy represented by Simcoe Hall.

During the demonstrations at SGW, one university administrator asked sarcastically, "Who's running this university, anyway?"

Within a few hours he received his answer.

If U of T faculty and students work together on matters of mutual interest, it won't be long before Simcoe-Hall, too, learns who's running this university, anyway.

The Last Judgment: Criterion 64 per cent

64 per cent or else

It's not often that we are angered by the machinations of those nameless, faceless wanderers over at Simcoe Hall. After all, by now we've come to accept their strange ways as an unfortunate but inevitable part of the university scene.

However, the regulation which arbitrarily assigns freshmen with a Grade 13 average of 64 per cent or less to the satellite colleges is an exception.

We're not affected, of course, since we've been on the St. George campus for several years, but we are greatly disturbed.

Disturbed because it's impossible to arbitrarily select a percentage on any examination, let alone the Ontario Grade 13 examinations, as an indication of intellectual potential.

Disturbed because the administration, blinded by its desire to turn the St. George campus into an honour course and post-graduate environment, enforced the regulation without exception even though some federated colleges had unfilled spaces in their first year quotas.

Disturbed because the regulation indicates the satellite colleges are unable to attract suitable students without the dubious assistance of this foolish decision.

Disturbed because students were not consulted when the regulation was being prepared. Obviously the administration decided either we didn't care or our opinions were unimportant.

Before the days of Scarborough College, suburban students complained they were forced to travel long distances each day to reach the St. George campus.

Today the situation is reversed. Students from the central core are forced to commute to Scarborough or Etimble.

If we ran the satellite colleges, we would not accept a regulation forcing students to register in a college far which they have no particular enthusiasm.

But then we're not college administrators. We don't have to do what we're told.

"Sir, we don't know; tell us what it really means."

By BOB BOSSIN

Mr. Bossin, formerly leader of the LGMB, is currently a SAC representative from Innis College. His opinions are not necessarily those of The Varsity.

I am sick and tired of the intent, scrubbed-looking girl (brown hair, blue eyes and clip-board) who breaks up every classroom discussion just when it has finally reached the nitty-gritty of real conflict.

"It's a poem about dying." "No, it's a poem about ripeness."

At this point she publicly gives up and pours forth from her frustrated mind, "Sir, WE don't know; tell us what it really means."

Sir thus put on the spot smiles his elbow-patched, Robarts, pater familias smile, while he tries to remember what Northrop Frye wrote, and then recites it with suitable pauses and ums, so that it all sounds fresh. Brown hair, blue eyes and clip-board writes it down then recopies it later and gets a B, and now she, Sir and Northrop Frye all have the same answer and nobody is the wiser.

Except me, because I could develop my mind by watching the charade; and since it would be impertinent to ask if Brown Hair was really frustrated or to doubt Sir's place among the obermenschen, I not only have to make my own observations, I also have to make my own conclusions.

And faster than you can say "Mr. Bossin is not paying attention again," I've done something creative.

The odd thing is, Brown Hair does all sorts of creative things, but everytime she does, she gets up tight about them, calls them doubts and calms herself down by saying that she is going through a stage.

Why?
When I was in grade two, Miss Graham, who was very nice even though she yelled a lot, wrote something on the black-board on the last day of school. We were not a progressive school and we weren't supposed to take writing until grade three.

I thought it said "Get your coats and line up at the door for recess." She asked "What does it say?" and Marian, who had the first desk in row one, shot up her hand. She whispered the answer to Miss Graham, who gave her positive reinforcement by telling her to go to the "star" chart and wait. Then she told anyone else who could read it to do what it said. Half the class rushed over to the star chart. I sat there.

"No, that's not what it says," Miss Graham said slowly, smiling to negatively reinforce the little liars, "it says 'Get your coats and line up at the door for recess.'" (dissolve to present).

So Brown Hair and I sit there, so scared of being wrong that we just wait.

Even then, we would probably be alright if Sir wasn't there to tell us, but he always is. Parents tell us, TV tells us, Pepsi-Cola, the Calender, The Varsity, student activists and even C.B. Mepherston all tell us.

While the Macpherson Report cancels exams at the end of second year, it still provides the usual report card, based on term mark. "This provision is designed to ensure that students don't wait until near the end of third year to do any work."

But what if we weren't coerced, would Brown Hair vegetate or would I sit in the basement and draw the curtains over my mind? Could there be another system?

"Much of present education appears to be operationally based on the assumption 'You can't trust the student.' Acting on this assumption, the teacher must supply motivation, information, organization of the material, and must use examinations . . . at every turn to coerce the student into the desired activities.

"The approach we have been discussing is based on an assumption diametrically opposed that 'You can trust the student.' You can trust him to desire to learn in every way which will enhance or maintain self . . . you can trust him to grow provided the atmosphere for growth is available to him." (Carl Rogers, "Student-Centered Teaching")

If you were at the University of British Columbia you might find the atmosphere for growth in their experimental "Arts I" course, or in their examless college.

If you were younger, your parents might send you to Everdale Place, or if you didn't want a degree so much, you might apply to Rochdale College.

The Macpherson Commission rejected the idea of an experimental college, and so Brown Hair, you and I are here, occasionally waking up tight, then lulled back to sleep by nice warm facts.

"... and so Brown Hair, you and I are here, occasionally waking up tight, then lulled back to sleep by nice warm facts."

LETTERS

b & w head defends stand

Sir:

This letter is in reply to the allegations of the "unjust disqualification" of the New College float in Saturday's float judging. The builders assert that the Blue and White society invoked an obscure rule to justify the disqualification — that of having no more than 20 people on a float.

This rule is by no means "obscure"; the Society has simply never had to invoke it. But it is in effect for a few very good reasons.

The first is that this limitation was originally imposed because of the danger occasioned by the overcrowding of a float. It is quite possible that a participant could fall and be seriously injured, and this possibility is enhanced as the numbers involved increases. In the second place, the floats are judged on rather strict criteria, one of the most important being the activity of the participants. This being the case, and with the other floats all adhering to the rules, it would be grossly unfair to the other floats to allow a float which has broken those rules to be judged.

The New College float builders also assert that the Engineering and the Erindale-Pharmacy floats exceeded the limit. The Engineering float had precisely 20 people on it — they were counted. The combined float of Erindale and Pharmacy did have a few people over the limit. However, there were mitigating circumstances which, in the eyes of the Society, justified the breach.

The Erindale builders had their truck called away at the last minute. Pharmacy graciously allowed them to use half of theirs. The number of people over the limit was very small and, in light of the unforeseeable chain of events, was considered pardonable.

It was not a flagrant and unjustifiable breach of established and well-known rules, as was the action of the New College planners in including some 35 or 40 people in their float.

Marty Low, Chairman, Blue & White Society

new float ignored rule

Sir:

Having been on the New College float, I would like to point out the errors in your article concerning it in Monday's Varsity.

To begin with, no one on the float felt "unjustly disqualified" or "most unhappy" as we were warned before the parade was started about the rule concerning a maximum of twenty people. The B & W did not invoke an "obscure" rule as it was listed on the sheet of regulations given to each float. We chose to ignore the rule, feeling that we would rather have all involved who had helped build the float than to worry about winning.

Everyone on the float enjoyed themselves and any complaints I have heard have come from people who didn't participate. The only person on the float who did discuss this with anyone was one of our B & W reps who suggested the rule be changed for the future. We all wonder where the quotes in your article came from as none of us made them.

Dave Gray,
Vice-President
NCSC.

(Ed Note. While Mr. Gray may not have complained about the disqualification of the New College float, several other New College students did so at length but without success.)

fromm and the yellow peril

Sir:

Mr. Fromm is perfectly justified in criticizing the examples of violence he cites as taking place in a demonstration that was organized to promote peace, though objective readers may have been surprised at his insinuations that the violence was all on one side.

Where he is not justified is in assuming that the demonstrators must be in the wrong because their ideals were belied by the actions of the lunatic fringe — a hazard to which any demonstration of this sort is liable.

In the two paragraphs in which he deigns to discuss the question that the whole demonstration was about, Mr. Fromm conjures up an implicit picture of hordes of little yellow men sweeping across Asia. In the true McCarthy tradition this is scarcely conducive to sensible argument, because:

(a) he ignores the possibility of an unconditional bombing halt to facilitate negotiations (every time Ho Chi Minh has expressed a willingness to negotiate, LBJ has escalated the American attack), and

(b) he ignores the fact that Vietnam is one country, that the Vietnamese in their villages couldn't care less which side is dropping bombs on them, that all they want is an end to the feudal system and their country for themselves. What right have we to use them as pawns in our nuclear game?

The Vietnamese on the whole reject Communism, but they are being driven into its arms by the massive U.S. presence in their country.

Yours,
Dave Priest (I New)

CUS weekend conference: what makes a campus run

By SUE HELWIG

Any examination of the political movements on campuses today will reveal the ever-widening gap in ideas between the vast majority of students and their own leaders. Last weekend, while 17,553 students watched a football game at Varsity Stadium less than 50 student representatives from Ontario, Quebec and Manitoba attended a Canadian Union of Students seminar in a Victoria College lecture hall.

Most of us drank beer in the stands. Next door a few people grappled with the philosophical questions involved in trying to understand how a university operates in order to judge the intrinsic value of its role.

Your representatives were trying to answer this question so that they can provide intelligent leadership among students.

They were analyzing the relationship between the university and a society which exerts pressure upon it. Society demands technical and professional experts to operate its economy as well as educated individuals to provide moral leadership. The university must supply them.

They were seeking a better understanding of the needs of the individual student who is subject to the same pressures as his university. He must reconcile his need to learn a skill with the desire for the intellectual enrichment which an education ought to be.

During the discussion, the sole function of the university was defined as "the recruitment of people to fill slots in a machine" by Prof. John Shingler of McGill University. The same speaker described the university system as one designed to eliminate — the person who is eliminated is the dropout.

Another speaker, Charlie Boylan, editor of Sean magazine, defined the student as a "passive trainee being processed in technical efficiency."

Many participants seemed to agree with the suggestion that the main problem in university government is that of creating operational structures which do not result in a loss of good human relationships.

Concerning political power, one person suggested that students' power lies within the collective body of technical and professional expertise which can be used as a bargaining point.

The seminar did not produce any answers to the questions it dealt with. The few statements recorded here do not pretend to be a comprehensive report of what happened during the six hours of official discussion.

But what really matters is that such ideas do not reach the vast numbers of students whose future is involved.

How can we bridge the gap?

expo 67: THE INSIDE STORY

Margaret Robertson (III UC) met the best people while working as a waitress at Expo this summer. She has especially fond memories of the New York carries in La Ronde with their bobnail boots and tight pants. They were tough, she will tell you with tears in her eyes, but underneath beat "bearts of gold". And there was Axel, the red-bearded character who ran a bead shop on Park Ave.

Margaret's experiences are typical of those students who worked at Expo this summer. And they all seem to have come back more knowledgeable, more politically-conscious, more sophisticated people.

When Donald Smith (IV Trin), for example, started working as a host in the Ontario pavilion he could barely speak two words of French. Now he is almost fluent in the language, and it's all you can do to get him to speak English.

Don, however, went to Expo expressly determined to assimilate some of the Quebecois' point of view. He insisted on speaking French at all times, even with his English-Canadian friends. He roomed with a French-Canadian whose command of English was just about nil. He spent as much time as he could at the Quebec pavilion, taking all his meals there. And, for what he insists are purely educational reasons, he dated French-Canadian girls exclusively.

Like many others who spent their summer in Quebec, Don found himself increasingly identifying with the interests of his new Independiste friends. He was further influenced by this summer's barrage of nationalistic introspective editorials out of Montreal. Over the summer, he moved from a somewhat naive acceptance of the one-Canada ideal to a strong feeling that any kind of "special status" for Quebec is at best a minimum.

Crowd Behaviour "Simply Incredible"

Kim Graybiel (II New) is another one who regards his summer at Expo as a real education. Working as a host, he was stationed at a different location in the Ontario pavilion every day. Kim feels he is now qualified to write a sociology or psychology textbook. He found crowd behaviours "simply incredible", and maintains, "I wasn't a host, I was a shepherd".

Kim has, of course, a limitless supply of American-tourist jokes, like the one about the man who came up to him and asked if Sortie was the largest city in Canada, since every highway sign he saw pointed to Sortie.

Kim's sense of humour has stood him in good stead. It was through it that he got his job in the first place. Like the other hosts and hostesses in the Ontario pavilion, he was chosen by the Ontario government from a large number of students interviewed across the province. Deciding that, above all, it would be personality and individuality that his prospective employers would be looking for, Kim walked into his interviewer's office and on the desk laid three type-written pages of answers to the routine questions he expected to be asked. He was given the job right away.

Kim discovered, however, that his glamour-boy job was not all it was cut out to be. A sense of tedium at the unstimulating level of communication with the average Expo visitor soon descended on him and his fellow hosts. After being asked the same standard questions 360 times a day, day after day for four months, it is no wonder that Kim sees Expo's theme in a new light: Man and His Exit, Man and His Passport Stamp, Man and His Stomach, Man and His Expo Express, Man and His Toilet.

The tourists' questioning procedure proved to be so invariable that, one day, Kim slipped into his pocket a small tape-recorder on which he had reproduced all the usual answers to the usual questions. Then, whenever a tourist approached him with a question on his lips, Kim flicked the switch on his tape-recorders, assumed the position of the famous statue, "The Thinker", and simply moved his lips.

Realizing that they were, in effect, Public Relations men for the Ontario government, Kim and the other hosts found themselves provoking funny situations just to keep their sense of humour and their sanity. Elaborate experiments in crowd manipulation were among their favourite pastimes. And the crowd never failed, to the boys' delight, in exhibiting its manifold sheep-like attributes. Another trick which amused them for a while was playing 'statue'. Crowds of Expo visitors would gather in the pavilion, asking for directions to the animated host robots.

Extracurricular Club to Fight Boredom

Kim's extra curricular activities, however, more than made up for the boredom of his job, and Kim refers to his summer as "one long party". As President of the Host and Hostess Club of Expo, he was continually busy organizing get-togethers with other pavilions, lecture and discussion evenings, and trips to spots in Ontario and Quebec. From his varied experiences with the people who worked at Expo, Kim concludes that the Ontario pavilion definitely had the best 'esprit de corps'.

Anna-Maria Farago (III Trin), who worked as a hostess at the Ontario pavilion, claims that dealing with tourists was only a part of her job. Much of her time was occupied by the publicity aspect of her position. This involved receptions, cocktail parties, meetings with the press, and the hosting of visiting

5. Quality of Teaching

(iii) Other procedures. It has been proposed, e.g. in the Muscatine Report, that in establishing a formal procedure for making teaching ability count in promotions, other kinds of evidence than student appraisals of classroom performance are relevant. Thus its Recommendation 1 (at p. 44):

The Instructions to Appointment and Promotion Committees should be amended to require that every departmental recommendation for a promotion to tenure rank be accompanied by a formal dossier on the teaching performance of the candidate. Along with the Chairman's evaluation, this dossier should include all significant tangible evidence, such as course materials and plans, syllabi, study guides, examinations, and textbooks written by the candidate. It should also include written reports by colleagues evaluating the candidate's classroom performance on the basis of class visitations, and a statement by the candidate describing the rationale of his teaching efforts. (University of California, Berkeley, Academic Senate, Education at Berkeley: Report of the Select Committee on Education, March 1966).

It will be evident, from what we have said already, that we are entirely in agreement with the Muscatine Committee's stress on the importance of making teaching ability count for more than it does. Yet we are not persuaded of the probable efficacy of such a procedure as they here recommend. Apart from what we have just said in opposition to reports on "classroom visitations" by colleagues, we shall only comment that we foresee a strong tendency for this kind of dossier to become at best a harmless and possibly a harmful routine. It would be harmful if, as need not but would probably happen, it became a way of emphasizing that which can most easily be judged on paper: careful planning of conveyance of information and "coverage" of a course, our opinion of which as the chief function of lectures has already been made plain.

We are doubtful that any routine devices of this sort will contribute very much to doing what needs to be done. What is important is that there be a formal procedure, not necessarily that it be reduced to or contain a large element of routine procedure. What is needed above all is Faculty insistence that departments not be permitted to be negligent in weighing teaching ability in recommending promotions and appointments. The deans are now in a position to exercise their influence in appointments and promotions to positions carrying tenure. They should make it clear to chairmen that they expect teaching ability to be weighed also in recommendations for appointments and promotions below tenure rank. We look on this not as an encroachment on the rightful power and responsibilities of chairmen, but as a reserve power to prevent the possibility of their actions encroaching on the rights of the academic community.

The Quality of Teaching Assistants

Graduate students who become teaching assistants and demonstrators are an easy target for recriminations. Since graduate students are by definition primarily in pursuit of a higher degree, and since the time they must give to their assistantship duties will generally delay their attainment of that end, it is easy to assume that they take such duties just for the money to enable them to get on with their primary pursuit. Critics may allow that some of those who take on duties of teaching assistants do so, even at the expense of delay in attaining their degree, because they are bent on a university teaching career and want to get experience. But the harsher critics insist that most of the teaching assistants are in it for the wrong reasons. Besides, the beginning teaching assistant is, almost by definition, untrained and inexperienced. Yet—so the indictment runs—he is let loose on the undergraduates and is extensively used in what should be treated as the most important kind of teaching—the face-to-face interchange between tutor and student in tutorial groups and laboratories.

The sweeping indictment of the use of teaching assistants which claims or implies that they are on the average bound to be incompetent, and that the whole system is wrong, cannot be sustained. There is no evidence that teaching assistants are, on the average or preponderantly, incompetent. And we know from our own experience as students and professors that there are highly competent teaching assistants as well as merely competent ones, mediocre ones, and outright incompetent ones.

However, no one doubts that there is a proportion of incompetent ones that can scarcely be justified by anyone with a concern for the quality of undergraduate instruction. And there are steady forces that will continue to produce this proportion of incompetence unless they can be counteracted. The most obvious is that, as has been found in many large American universities, the increasing availability of graduate fellowships and research assistantships which ing commitments, and which go to the best graduate students, tends to remove the best scholars from the pool of talent available as teaching assistants. This in itself would not be a serious factor, since the number of graduate students has increased (and is expected at this University to continue to increase) more rapidly than the number of non-teaching fellowships and assistantships, so that the absolute size of the pool of talent available for teaching assistantships is probably not decreasing. But although its absolute size may be constant, or even increasing, the demands made on it have been increasing even faster because the increase in undergraduate enrolment in the last decade or so has been much more rapid than the increase in the number of full-time undergraduate teaching staff.

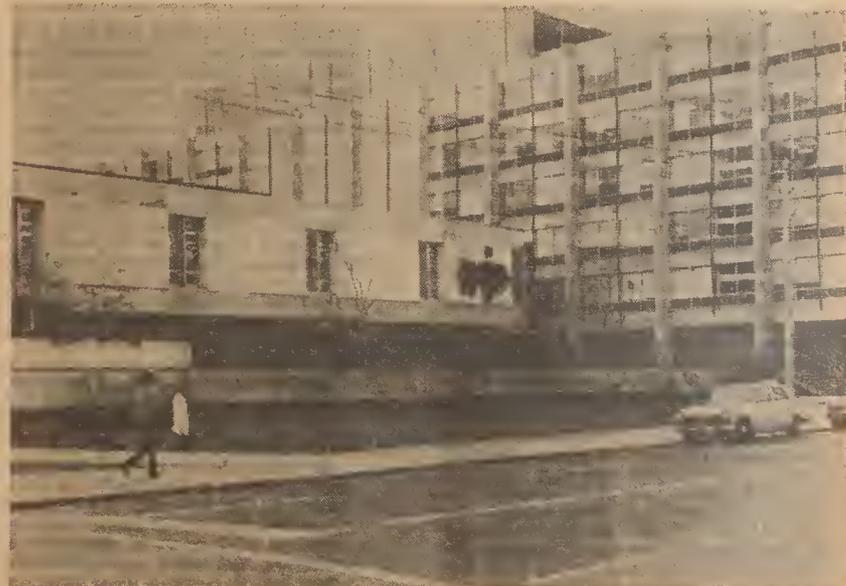

The result of the rise of alternative sources of financial support for the best grad-ables the graduate student to combine the mutually supporting functions of teaching and learning (but only if his assistantship duties are not limited to pedestrian tasks).

Teaching assistantships cannot be justified on these grounds unless some care is taken to make the teaching assistantship useful as training, and realistic as a self-selection mechanism. Unless some pains are taken to help the teaching assistants pick up the rudiments of university teaching, neither the training nor the self-selection function is adequately performed. A graduate student who is considering a teaching career is unlikely to make the most intelligent choice if his first experience of teaching is undergone in an atmosphere of faculty indifference.

Given that teaching assistants are going to be a permanent part of the provision of undergraduate instruction in the Faculty, and that an improvement in their present level of performance is desirable, there seem to be only two ways to look for reform. One is to look for devices which could increase the pool of available talent; the other, to look for measures that would bring improved performance from those who are appointed.

We cannot see that any devices of the first sort are likely to be both feasible and beneficial. The University might raise the ceiling now in force on income from employment in addition to fellowship income, but to do this in any effective degree would be to subvert the laudable purpose of the ceiling, which is to prevent desperate teaching departments from holding back the most promising students from their graduate work.

Sidney Smith Hall, the main building for instruction in the Faculty of Arts and Science. Named in honor of a former U of T president, its series of windowless tutorial rooms and unpredictable heating system have been the objects of much faculty and student complaint.

uate students, combined with the increasing demand for teaching assistants, has been that departments are often constrained to recruit and retain as teaching assistants students whose competence is doubtful, and even some whose incompetence is scarcely doubtful.

Given that the forces at work have produced this result, what can be done? It is idle to propose reducing our reliance on teaching assistants, as some exasperated undergraduates and faculty members have done. Teaching assistants are here to stay. And so they should be. For the institution of teaching assistants has, or can have, positive advantages to the academic community. We support it not on the plea of necessity but on the ground of its potential advantages, which are (1) that it can be an incomparable training ground and selection mechanism (and, even more important, a self-selection mechanism), for future university teachers, (2) that it brings undergraduates and more mature graduates into close academic contact, which should be of advantage to both, and (3) that it en-

Or the University might ask the Province to amend the terms of award of its Graduate Fellowship scheme to require some teaching. This is a superficially attractive idea, since the purpose of the Provincial Fellowship scheme has always been to draw more people into the university teaching profession. But we recommend against such a request, partly because any such amendment in the terms of award would impose on the applicants an unduly early choice of commitment to a profession, and partly because it would require the universities to offer teaching assistantships to all holders of Provincial Fellowships regardless of their suitability as teachers.

Another device that might be recommended is to raise the stipends of teaching assistants to a level that would enable teaching assistantships to compete with non-teaching fellowships and research assistantships that are now offered. But to increase the stipend for all teaching assistants to this level would probably attract only a few graduate students away from full-time study, and would be a very costly way of doing so.

Since it is doubtful that any such devices for increasing the pool of available talent can be relied upon, we must look rather to measures that would bring improved performance from those who are appointed. A good deal may be expected from efforts in this direction, for the treatment of teaching assistants by some departments leaves a good deal of room for improvement. Most departments now employ teaching assistants, but the necessity of doing so on a substantial scale has arisen only over the last decade or so, and too often they are still accepted with reluctance and treated grudgingly. This is understandable, for the extensive use of teaching assistants was introduced as an expedient to take up the increase in the teaching load which the full-time staff was not able to absorb. Yet as long as teaching assistants are regarded merely as an expedient to prevent the teaching load of the full-time staff becoming intolerable, any claim they in turn make on the time and attention of the professors to whom they are assigned is apt to be resented. It is still not unknown for a professor to say that teaching assistants are more trouble than they are worth, since it takes as long to show them what to do and to supervise and correct their doing it as to do it oneself. A professor who is compelled, by the increase in the size of his classes, to accept teaching assistants, but who takes them on with this attitude, is not likely to make the best use of them.

To the extent that this attitude still prevails what is needed above all is a recognition that teaching assistants are here to stay and a willingness to make their work a positive contribution to undergraduate teaching rather than treating them as a necessary evil. The formal and informal devices that may

III. The Structure of Degree Programs

1. The Range of Problems

We are concerned in this chapter with the structuring of the work which the undergraduates in the Faculty of Arts and Science are, and should be, required or permitted to do, and particularly with two matters: the relation between the present Honour Courses and General Courses, and the extent of specialization in the Honour Courses. These matters were frequently called into question in the submissions and at the hearings, and the questions that were raised open up fundamental problems about the structure of knowledge and the nature of a liberal education. Perhaps the most fundamental problem is the adequacy or inadequacy of the concepts of specialist and general education which may be supposed to underlie the actual structure in this Faculty. The concept of general education has never been examined in this University with the thoroughness it has been thought to merit at, for instance, Harvard and Columbia. Nor has the concept of specialist education, nor the appropriateness of various kinds and degrees of specialization to a Faculty of Arts and Science which is not or does not intend to be a professional faculty. Distinguished members of the Faculty, and of the University and College administrations, have from time to time addressed themselves to the problems of specialist education, and have shown themselves aware of and concerned about the difficulties of maintaining the values of a liberal education in a society that seems to put a higher value on trained manpower than on liberation of the intellect. But there has been no concerted fundamental inquiry into such problems. Nor has the bearing of changes in the structure of knowledge on the present division of subjects been given any considerable attention.

It could be argued that these are the central questions, and that they must be clarified and answered by a fundamentally philosophical inquiry before any recommendations can properly be made about a revision of specialist and general degree programs in this Faculty. There is of course a considerable literature on these fundamental questions. Our consultation of the literature, while confirming our sense of the importance of the issues, did not suggest that we could have sifted all the value assumptions that are necessarily involved in any such inquiry, and have reached a consensus about them, in the relatively short time at our disposal. Nor did we find that such a fundamental inquiry was indispensable to our recommending certain immediate changes. We have indeed had to make certain assumptions, some of which are made explicit, and others implicit, in this chapter. They have seemed to us sufficient to support the analysis and recommendations now offered. We propose certain specific changes in the structure of degree programs which we regard as immediately feasible and which we think are sufficiently valuable to be worth recommending now, without prejudice to a fuller and more fundamental inquiry. We do not regard our proposals as a final solution, and certainly not as a complete one, and we recommend later that a more searching inquiry be put in hand.

The immediate problems arise from the present structure of the specialized Honour Courses and from the disparity between Courses and from the disparity between

The unique feature of the work offered to undergraduates in the Faculty of Arts and Science in this university is the system of specialized Honour Courses. They are a source of pride to many graduates, many professors, and many undergraduates. To others, and to some of these same people, the Honour Course system is also a source of concern, for reasons which become apparent only when the full peculiarity of the system is borne in mind. For it is not just the merit of the Honour Courses themselves that is in question; it is also what their existence in their present form does to the students who are not in them, and indeed what it does to those students who do not know, on the day they apply for admission to first year, whether they should be in one of them or not.

The two most important features of the whole scheme of Honour and General Courses may be emphasized here. The first is the complete separation of General students from Honour students, and their differential treatment, from the beginning of first year. Throughout their undergraduate careers (with unimportant exceptions, e.g. in "pass subjects") they sit in separate classes, hear different lectures, and write different examinations. Not only are they separate, they are not even "separate but equal." The admission requirements and the passing standards are lower for the General than for the Honour students. And the duration of their undergraduate careers is different—three years for the General students, four years for the Honour student.

The second important feature is the ex-needed to make their work a positive contribution will vary from department to department, depending on the nature of the tutorial work offered and the kind of attention already given to them, but a few general recommendations may be made.

We recommend as a general procedure that teaching assistants, upon their first appointment, not be put in charge of tutorial groups during the first month, but during that time sit in on the tutorials given by full-time members of the staff, and discuss the conduct of the tutorials (formally and informally, but regularly) with those who are then giving them. This recommendation can be more easily implemented when the amount of lecturing has been reduced, for the reduction will release some more of the time of the full-time members of the teaching staff for conducting tutorials and coaching teaching assistants.

Secondly we recommend that as far as possible the tutorials for first-year students be given throughout the year by full-time members of the staff, leaving the teaching assistants to do more of the tutorial work with students in second and third years. We recommend this in the belief that first-year teaching is the most important in its impact on the undergraduate, and on the assumptions that generally the more experienced teachers can handle it better and that graduate students are generally closer in their interests and outlook to undergraduates of the later years than of the first year.

tent of the specialization that is required of the student in most of the Honour Courses. With the exception of the Honour Courses in each of the social sciences (more accurately, of all those Honour Courses which share the common first year called Social and Philosophical Studies, which include Philosophy and Modern History), the extent of specialization in such as to require in each course a prescribed course of study in first year, unique to that course, and prerequisite to its later years. Thus the student who wants to do all or most of his work in the sciences or in languages and literatures must choose which one or which combination of them he will work in before he enters first year. If he will not then commit himself he can scarcely ever get into one of them. If he does so commit himself he has almost no possibility of changing, except by moving into the General Course.

These peculiar features of the Toronto system—the separation and differential treatment of General and Honour students, and the extent of specialization within the Honour Courses—are, or are thought to be, the price that must be paid for the excellence of the Honour Courses.

Toronto deliberately has set itself to offer a high-level first degree in all the main specialized fields within the arts and sciences. This policy, adopted many decades ago, has been adhered to as the number of specialized subjects has proliferated, so that now we have over thirty specialized Honour Courses, each bringing its students up to a high level of attainment in its specialty. These courses are most usually justified in terms of the reputation of their graduates who go on to further academic work. It would be surprising if their reputation were not high, for we start our specialists sooner and give them a higher proportion of our attention than do most other universities. The Honour Courses are also sometimes justified as producing well-educated men and women.

Yet it may be questioned if either of these justifications of our system is now as relevant as it was when the system was established. Toronto took over the English and Scottish pattern at a time when postgraduate degrees were little used, and when, consequently, a high-level first degree was all-important for the reputation of the university and the quality of its graduates. The Honour B.A. was a sufficient formal education for the future scholar and scientist, who could develop on his own after that. It also certified an educated man. Because the Honour B.A. did both these things it was desirable that the work for the degree should carry the student as far along the path of knowledge of his particular discipline as was possible within the four undergraduate years, even at the cost of possible narrowness or over-specialization.

But now both the intellectual costs, and the benefits, of a system of courses designed to carry the undergraduate as far along as possible in a particular discipline, have changed. The intellectual costs have increased; the intellectual benefits have diminished.

Take the intellectual costs first. The Honour Course system by its nature requires that the student make an early choice of his specialism and that he stick with whether or not was mistaken. This requirement entails a probable intellectual waste which is greater the earlier the choice must be made and the more nearly irrevocable it is. At Toronto now, in most of the humanities and all of the physical and life sciences, the student who enters any one Honour Course is locked in (unless he fails out, or settles for the General Course), and all the others are locked out. Our system provides a lot for those who know exactly what speciality, they want to devote themselves to, and who have assessed correctly their capacity for it. It does not provide for those who guess wrong, or for those who are capable of profiting from a specialized course but who are unwilling, perhaps wisely, to decide which one before they arrive. To provide nothing, or nothing first-rate for such students is an intellectual waste. The waste takes three forms. Some students are locked into what is for them not the most intellectually profitable specialism. Some students, of those who refuse to lock themselves in from the beginning, are virtually denied access to the work that would be most intellectually profitable for them. And some students, those who, refuse to lock themselves in from the beginning, are virtually denied access to the work that would be most intellectually profitable for them. And some students, those who, as the price of getting any first-rate work, risk an early choice of specialism and turn out to have wrongly assessed their ability in that specialism, fail their first year or are reduced to a General Course.

That these costs are heavy is suggested by the high failure rate in first year in many Honour Courses, and by the number of students capable of Honour work in some other disciplines who, when they find themselves unsuited to the particular Honour Course they chose, transfer into a General Course after first year as the only alternative to starting all over again.

We find not only that these costs are heavy but that they have been increasing, by imperceptible stages, and are likely to continue to do so. The increase is the direct result of the proliferation of disciplines and sub-disciplines, which is reflected in the increasing number of separate Honour Courses and the increasing number of special sub-divisions within some of them. The costs of being locked in or out of one Honour Course are obviously greater when there are 30 of them than when there were only 5 (as there were in 1876).

We may look now at what appears to be a diminution in the benefits of the Honour Courses, that is, the benefits of carrying the students as far along as possible in a particular discipline. We have pointed out that originally the Honour B.A. both certified a sufficient formal education for the future scholar or scientist, who was expected to develop on his own after that, and certified an educated man. It no longer performs the first of these functions, and it is doubtful if it any longer performs the second.

As to the first function, it is clear that the rise of formal postgraduate education on this continent has made any first degree, even an Honour B.A., merely a prelude, for anyone intending a scientific or scholarly career, to intensive postgraduate work. The Honour Courses therefore to not need to carry their students as far along in their narrow specialities as they now do, and in view of the increasing intellectual cost of their doing so, it is doubtful if the present policy is any longer justified.

Turning to the second original function that could be claimed for the Honour Course, that of producing well-educated men, we find this also more doubtfully performed now than formerly. We do not quarrel with the assumption on which this claim is based, which is that a liberal education is as possible and at least as likely by submitting the mind to a single discipline or a small group of related disciplines, as by attempting a more general spread. But the pressure generated among students and faculty within many of the Honour Courses by the supposed demands of graduate work and sometimes by the mere proliferation of subject-matter—the "knowledge explosion" that is particularly evident in the natural sciences—has led them to try to pack in an ever-increasing bulk of knowledge. And, at the extreme, it has led to the attitude, within the Faculty, that no student is to be taken seriously if he is not aiming at a career in the speciality, and, among the students, that no learning or insight is to be taken seriously unless it is clearly going to be professionally useful.

In so far as the Honour Courses have moved in this direction they are no longer as justified as they were in their original claim to be producing well-educated persons. And the pressure to professionalize the Honour Courses is bound to increase in the measure that this University grows as a graduate centre. Already the departments of the Faculty of Arts and Science are becoming increasingly staffed with people who will add lustre to Toronto as a graduate centre. This development is admirable in many ways, but it must be remembered that some such professors tend to treat undergraduates as embryonic postgraduates.

Thus, on balancing the intellectual costs and benefits of the Honour Course system, we find it very doubtful that its characteristic feature, that of concentrating on having the students amass as much knowledge as possible of a highly specialized subject-matter, is now justified to the extent it may have been fifteen or twenty years ago.

And so far we have considered the Honour Course system entirely on its own. When its complement, i.e. the two General Courses, is brought into consideration, the intellectual cost of the Honour Course system in its present form looms even larger. The Honour Course system has been built on the complete separation of Honour from General students. And the result has been the debasement of the General student. The student who does not choose to enter a specialized Honour Course from the beginning must resign himself to work of a lower standard in whatever combination of subjects he does choose. Specialism is equated with high-standard work, generalism with watered-down work. The non-specialist cannot get the first-rate work in any subject: each department reserves that for its own specialist students. The generalist is a second-class citizen, not because he is necessarily less capable but because he will not commit himself to high specialization.

These costs of maintaining the present degree of specialization in our course structure appear to us to be too high, especially in view of the weakening of the case for it which we have already discussed. We have therefore sought to propose a reform of the present structure which would retain the merita of the Honour Courses while avoiding the costs imposed by their existence in their present form.

We recognize that it will not be possible to correct what we regard as the main faults in the present structure without incurring, in most of the Honour Courses, some diminution of the amount of specialist training now provided. This is self-evident in so far as that amount is dependent on the present tight structuring of the curriculum from the beginning of first year. We are far from convinced that the present tight structure is in fact necessary in every case for assuring the present extent of attainment by the end of fourth year. Sometimes the pre-requisite requirements which make up that structure seem to be explicable mainly as the result of departmental self-assertiveness. Where this is so, the structure might be somewhat relaxed without reducing the final extent of attainment. But we do not assume that enough could be done in this way to correct the faults without incurring some diminution of the amount of specialist training now provided in most of the Honour Courses.

Chancellor O. M. Solondt will hand you your degree when you're ready. But wait! In this section Mochpherson claims that even the honors degree no longer certifies an educated man.

We believe therefore that a choice has to be made between (1) maintaining to the full the present amount of specialist training, with all the costs involved, and with the tendency for it to become professional training, and (2) introducing such flexibility within the Honour structure, and between it and the General, as will reduce the present intellectual costs and prevent the further domination of undergraduate work in Arts and Science by professionalism.

We recommend in favour of the second alternative.

We have considered the argument that this University can afford to cleave to its present system now that there are so many other universities in Ontario, and particularly now that there is another university in Metropolitan Toronto. We rejoice in the increasing variety of universities now available to students in this province and this metropolitan area. But we do not find that this justifies our retaining any system that cannot fully be justified on its own merits.

We notice also that the interests of the specialized departments themselves are no longer as clearly being served by the present structure of degree courses as they have been until recently. Enrolment in the Honour Courses that specialize from the beginning of first year, relative to enrolment in the two General Courses and the group of Honour Courses that do not begin specialization in first year (i.e. Social and Philosophical Studies), is noticeably declining.*

* First year enrolment in Honour Courses other than Social and Philosophical Studies increased, between 1961 and 1966, by 11 per cent (from 906 to 1,008); in Social and Philosophical Studies plus the General Courses, first year enrolment increased in the same period by 91 per cent (from 1,226 to 2,346), and on the St. George Campus alone by 63 per cent (from 1,226 to 1,982).

It may well be that without some alteration of the present rigid structure, the Honour Courses will lose students they ought to have and want to have.

The Graduate School's Dean Ernest Sirluck. Mochpersan says today's B.A. is merely a prelude to postgraduate studies and reasons that therefore, honor courses do not have to be as specialized as they now are.

There is a further consideration, peculiar to this University, which tells in favour of a reform of the present structure. The University has just established two new campuses—Scarborough College and Erindale College—which initially are offering only the General Courses. Of their own momentum, these Colleges are bound to wish to offer something better than the present General Courses. If these Colleges are to develop as genuine educational entities they should clearly be allowed and encouraged to do so. If they improve their General offerings and the St. George campus does not, the General Course on the St. George campus will become an academic slum. This is an outcome which the University, and the federated and constituent Colleges on the St. George campus, are properly anxious to avoid. We do not see how it can be avoided except by a reform of the present course structure.

For all these reasons we have sought to propose a reform of the present course structure. We have done so quite pragmatically. We have not rehearsed the abstract possible advantages of a free-elective of credit system as opposed to our highly structured system. We have preferred, realistically as we believe, to give full weight to the tradition in which this University has grown, and to ask only how far this may now be modified to retain all that it may of the unique values on which it prides itself.

The reform which we propose embodies the following principles:

(i) No student is to be compelled, before entering the University, to commit himself as a generalist or a specialist, or to commit himself to a particular specialty, but every student is to be free to embark on a specialty from the beginning.

This principle entails:

(a) enabling the entering student either to specialize in his first year (to the extent of 4/5 of his work) in one of the three areas (Humanities, Social Sciences, Physical and Life Sciences), or to spread himself over more than one;

(b) enabling a student who did not do the maximum in his first year in one area and in one subject to go to a specialty in that area in his second year.

(ii) The present understood inferiority of the General Courses is to be removed, by:

(a) abolishing the present separation of Honour and General students in first year;

(b) requiring the same admission standards and passing standards for generalists and specialists;

(c) providing for generalists and specialists to sit together in some of the same classes, not only in the first year;

(d) providing for a four-year as well as a three-year General degree, and for a three-year as well as a four-year specialist degree.

2. A Change in Terminology

Before setting out substantive proposals we wish to recommend a clearer terminology than now prevails and than we have used so far in this Report. In the prevailing usage, "course" may mean either a whole 3- or 4-year program leading to the degree, e.g. the General Course in Science, or (the Honour Course in) Modern History, or it may mean a numbered course of lectures in one subject, e.g. Economics 100. "Subject" is also ambiguous: it may mean a whole discipline or area of study, e.g. English, Mathematics; or, as in the Calendar descriptions of "Subjects of Instruction," it may mean the same numbered course of lectures as is often called a "course."

To avoid these ambiguities we shall in the rest of this Report use the following terminology:

Subject will be used as a general term for a discipline or area of study, e.g. French, Mathematics.

Course will be used to mean a particular course of instruction offered in a subject, e.g. French 100. (It will not be used to denote a three- or four-year course of study leading to a degree, except when we have to refer to the present Honour and General Courses.)

Program will be introduced to replace "Course" in the sense of the three- or four-year course of study leading to the degree, e.g. General Program, Modern History Program.

One further change in terminology is required by our substantive recommendations. In the prevailing usage "Honour" describes a four-year specialized program of study, as well as the degree to which it leads, in contrast to a "General" three-year program and degree. We are recommending that the distinction between a specialized and a general program not be a distinction between high-standard (honour) work and lower-standard (non-honour) work, and not be the same as the distinction between a four-year and a three-year degree program. We shall therefore in describing our proposed structure use "honour" to refer to four-year degrees whether specialist or general, and "ordinary" to refer to three-year degrees whether specialist or general, and shall not use "honour" to mean specialist.

3. The Proposed Change in Courses of Study: From Honour and General Courses to Specialist and General Programs

(A) First Year

It is recommended that the present distinction between Honour and General Courses (and courses) be removed from the first year, and that no similar distinction be re-introduced in first year in the guise of Specialist and General Programs or courses.

This will require change in (a) what the teaching departments offer in first year, (b) the grouping of the whole range of subjects offered in the Faculty, (c) the choices open to the student, and (d) the admission requirements. We discuss the changes in this order.

(a) Departmental Offerings in First Year

Each department would offer in its subject (or, in joint departments such as Political Economy, in each of its subjects) instead of, as now, one or more honour courses and one or more general courses: (i) a Basic course, to be taken equally by intending generalists who might want to continue that subject in later years; and (ii), if the department wishes, one or two Additional courses designed for those who want to try or who know they want more work in first Scarborough (left) and Erindale Colleges could turn the general course on the St. George campus into an academic slum, Mochpersan says. To avoid that, he starts his recommendations for course reforms.

a learning process. For one thing their mastery of French improved immeasurably. Also they discovered to their surprise that the dominant mood of the informed younger generation in Quebec is definitely separatist. However, relations between English-Canadian and French-Canadian employees remained consistently cordial all summer even during De Gaulle's visit. Deirdre still

...Both Debbie and Deirdre rave about the French-Canadian
"joie de vivre". Debbie feels that the French-Canadian students she met were much more socially adept and mature than her Ontario friends. She claims that one of the most important things she learned was "how to enjoy myself without getting smashed". And she sums up the importance of her summer thus:
"Moving into another milieu, speaking another language—that's one of the most broadening experiences you could possibly have."

...Larry Jeffry (II UC) had an interesting cloak-and dagger job. He worked for one month as a security guard on Expo grounds. Crowd control was only a minor aspect of his job, as he patrolled in the guise of a plainclothesman with a $1500 two-way radio tucked in his coat pocket. Larry is one former Expo employee who definitely does not complain about the monotony of his work. In his short but illustrious career, he was involved in five major bomb scares at the Cuban pavilion.

...Larry, who seems to have had his eyes rather widely opened by his experiences of the summer, has returned a cynical man.
He can regale you with stories about restaurants which specialized in horsemeat steak, the many Expo concessions which were mafia-controlled, and the white slavery ring which was usually involved when a girl went into a washroom and didn't come out.
It's no wonder that he found his second job, that of a waiter, somewhat dull by comparison.

...On the whole, students who worked at Expo agree that they wouldn't have missed their experiences of the summer for anything. Working conditions were generally very good, pay averaged $100 a week, and the Expo atmosphere was congenial and stimulating. Some students are already thinking in terms of Expo '70.

“General Foods offers you more than just Tang”

His job keeps him on top of the world. On top of world commodity prices, world markets, and any international developments. He also has a firm grasp on the economics of production and marketing and how they might be affected by market fluctuations.

Who is he? One of General Foods' Financial Services Analysts. Like all of his colleagues, he is well-equipped to meet the GF challenge: to develop a needed product and sell it at a profit.

He finds great satisfaction in his work, because his opinion counts. Marketing management works closely with him, and relies on his sound financial advice to provide a basis upon which they can make wise marketing decisions. And these decisions can involve anything from the launch of a new instant food to a complete change of marketing strategy for a well-known brand such as Maxwell House Caffee.

Does this sound like the kind of career to satisfy your ambition; to test your abilities to their limits? If so, you may be one of those exceptional people who can respond to the kind of stimulating, mind-stretching challenge we offer. So why not take up the challenge — and choose...

Thatcher retreats from former fund statement

SASKATOON, (VNS) — A statement released last week by the Ross Thatcher government is apparently a retreat from an earlier announcement of direct financial control of the University of Saskatchewan.

In a joint release, Education Minister J.C. McIsaac, and Allan Tubb, chairman of the U of S board of governors said changes in university budgeting procedures can be made without altering the independence of the university.

“The government is satisfied that the past budgeting procedures of the university have resulted in careful scrutiny of university expenditures. With increasing costs, it is mutually agreed that there should be developed an even better and more continuous system of consultation and reporting.

“Both government and university representatives agreed that this can be done without in any way affecting the independence of the university.”

No details of proposed changes have yet been released.

Although Mr. Thatcher announced Oct. 18 his intention to “reform our university act in a major way,” the joint release said:

“We are confident that a completely satisfactory solution will be found without major legislative changes.”

Maritime students form Atlantic conference

ANTIGONISH, N.S. (CUP) Sunday's final congress of the Association of Atlantic Students became the first Atlantic Students Conference as the AAS dissolved into three provincial unions.

The ASC will meet annually to discuss common problems of the new provincial unions from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

The first SC project will be an Atlantic student day in January when Maritime students will present provincial governments with their demands.

ASC adopted the Canadian Union of Students “declaration of the Canadian student” as a working guide. But CUS policy will not be binding, and the national body will not provide services.

The AAS break-up was opposed by King's College and St. Francis Xavier University. They said that educational problems are regional, not provincial, and that a strong Maritime union should be built on the rubble of AAS.

The AAS will be open to non-members of provincial bodies.

Bob Levy, president of the Acadia students council, said his school, which earlier this year dropped out of CUS and AAS, will join the Nova Scotia union.

Newfoundland was not represented at the conference.

Faulkner to Innis: student role, TADP...

"But we're willing to regard these American immigrants as criminals. Do we have the right to refuse an American immigrant when we admit Britons and Hungarians?"

Bossin pointed out that Americans had a right to have information concerning immigration to Canada. "The Canadian government advertises for immigrants in other countries but not in the United States. The least we can do is make Americans feel equally welcome."

Ted Montgomery (II Inn) objected: "Yes, but the draft dodgers don't give up their citizenship until after they're drafted!"

Tom Faulkner, Paul Hoch (a post doctoral fellow and TADP volunteer) and several infuriated members of the audience proceeded to tell Mr. Montgomery that:

- the TADP does not give aid to anyone who has already been inducted. They tell him to go home and get a deferment, then come back.

- the TADP is an informal organization helping draft resisters — those who haven't yet broken American laws but who, for one reason or another, feel they must leave their country.

- the TADP encourages immigrants to become Canadian citizens as soon as they have resided in Canada for the required five years.

"If you don't want to fight the Communists, why don't you go to Red China?" Montgomery demanded of the two draft resisters.

"Boo!" cried a member of the audience.

"The people in the United States are willing to give up a lot to come to a country which frequently they think is all ice and snow and still pays taxes to Great Britain," Faulkner said.

Several men in the back row began to talk. An intense listener motioned there to be quiet. Those who had stayed to hear Faulkner were breathing — barely.

"I'd like to say a word about student government concerning itself exclusively with student matters," Faulkner said. "If we confined ourselves strictly to student affairs, there would not be a blood drive on this campus.

"Five hundred students would not be tutoring children and immigrants in this city.

"Seventy medsmen wouldn't be involved in a SAC program to assist people in slum areas.

"You and I can't involve ourselves in a schizophrenia and say, I'm part of this, but not that. We can't split ourselves into pieces."

Ten mile POTS walk produces $2,000

About 150 physical and occupational therapy freshies went for a 10-mile walk recently, and came home with nearly $2,000 for the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

At a POTS undergrad meeting last night, Sue Fryday, second-year president and organizer of the marathon, presented the donation of $1942.56 to Mr. McKenzie of the foundation.

She explained that each girl got pledges from any prospective contributors to pay so much for each mile she walked, but "we only expected to raise about $500." There is still another $20 or $30 to come in, and the girls hope to raise the total to $2000.

Thanking the girls for their contribution, Mr. McKenzie said the money would be used for research. The foundation is looking for a control not a cure, "to do for CF what insulin did for diabetes."

Hockettes hew out victory at McMaster

Pouring rain and drenched fields set the background as the U of T Field Hockettes marched through three straight games to take the Intercollegiate Invitational Women's Field Hockey Championship last weekend at McMaster. This was Toronto's fifth straight championship, including a first-place tie with Western in 1965-66.

With 2,000 known CF children in Canada and many more undetected cases, the $100,000 worth of research projects presently underway are not enough, he said.

Top Toronto scorer was captain Gail Wilson (PHE), ably accompanied by a six and five goal output from Joan Stevenson (PHE) and Lesley Jones (PHE) respectively.

Western, McMaster and Macdonald tied for second place with two wins and a loss each. Toronto did not allow a goal during the tournament.

Conference held to discuss Red Power

PARADISE LAKE, Man. (Special) — Red Power was the theme of the four-day Indian relations conference held here last week.

The conference, sponsored by the Native Canadian Affairs Committee, was intended to help promote relations between Indian and white.

Leading members of the Canadian Indian Youth Council explained to the 71 delegates, mostly students, that the concept of red power does not advocate violence. The white man must become aware that the Indian is an individual with goals and ideals of his own.

The Indian youth is caught between the society of his forefathers and that of the white man, the conference was told. But the only way the Indian can survive is by contributing to the white society.

In most communities the redman is being slowly accepted, but some communities such as Winnipeg and Kenora are on the verge of violence, delegates said. The white community is making no attempt to help the Indians to find their place in society.

The delegates committed themselves to starting Indian-affairs committees on their own campuses and to making an effort to get financial support for the Canadian Indian Youth Council.

Campus votes shake CUS confidence

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Students is worried. The recent pullout of Acadia University, the close vote at Windsor University, and the upcoming referendum at the University of British Columbia are leading CUS leaders to examine the organization's relevance to the Canadian campus.

President Hugh Armstrong has announced that four of the eight members of the secretariat will be working on Canadian campuses this year.

Following resolutions passed at this year's congress at London, Ont., the CUS field work will concentrate on:

- students' awareness of their rights and responsibilities;
- the quality of education at all levels;
- universal accessibility to education;
- the democratization of university government.

The field workers will also discuss other available CUS programs, the union's life insurance and travel plans, relations with other student and youth organizations and human rights.

Armstrong said the field workers would help combat student council lethargy on many campuses. The field work would allow CUS to tailor its program of aid to individual universities' needs.

Armstrong plans a lengthy visit to UBC to defend the CUS position there. The UBC student council voted early last month to hold a campus referendum today on the question of CUS membership.

At that time a member of the UBC students council said students should have a vote on the question of CUS membership because it involves their money.

Armstrong says he is getting disturbed by the many campus referendums:

"You can't fight a campaign and develop programs at the same time."

Vic hands Redmen 20-0 lox

By JIM MORRISON
Interfac Sports Editor
 University College Redmen blundered their way to another loss yesterday, falling to Vic 20-0. Vic now leads Group I with three wins, having played and won one more game than PHE, SPS, and St. Mike's who hammered Dentistry 30-0 on Friday.

UC errors led to all three Scarlet and Gold scores. Dave Sharpe got the first touchdown on a long punt return in the second quarter, and Bill Moebus scored the second on a third period interception. The final T.D. was acquired by Dan Hadley, after the UC kicker fumbled and lost a pass from centre on his own thirteen yard line. Pete Marshall added two converts to round out the Vic scoring.

The St. Mike's rout on Friday featured three TD's from B. McConnell and two from M. Sefton.

In a Group II encounter, also played yesterday, Trinity College demolished Forestry 23-6 for their first win of the season. Al Parish led Trins with two touchdowns and a convert. Eric Farncombe added the other major score, and Dave Adamson contributed a convert and a field goal. Frank Plaff finally figured for Forestry.

RUGGER
 Two shutouts paced Friday rucker action, as Engineering I hit Law 3-0 and Trinity B blanked PHE B by an identical score. Bob Hutchison was effective for Eng, and Ken Wilson was socially prominent for Trinity.

Games this week saw Eng I decimate Meds A 10-0, PHE A lacerate Wycliffe 9-3, and Engineering II dynamite Architecture 13-0. Bob Hutchison led the riggers again, with two trys this time, and Don Kaikkonen added two converts.

Slean, Stevens, and McEachern for Phys Ed were not matched by Wycliffe's Symond. Doug Alley, Kevin Brett and Ron McCowan all turned in trys for the secondary Skulers and Pete Blaz-ier converted two.

VOLLEYBALL
 In the only two games to report so far this week, Architecture took Law 15-9, 15-8, and Innis I blasted PHE A 15-6, 15-4.

SOCCER
 Defaults plagued soccer action last Friday afternoon. Architecture defaulted to Meds B, and Vic II was withdrawn from the league after failing to field a team for the third time. Other Friday scores had Wycliffe sneak by PHE B 1-0 on E. Bitanbenko's tally, and Sr. Engineering destroy PHE A 3-0 on the strength of Sciaivone's three markers.

Games so far this week saw SMC hold UC to a 1-1 draw, Innis trip Trinity B 2-1, and Emmanuel overwhelm Architecture 1-0. Iozzo's UC effort was matched by Irish Mario Chiarocci. Michael D'Ornellas' two were instrumental for Innis, while Eric Munn told the Trinity tale. Colourful Jim Peacock led the Emmans to their triumph over Architecture.

Ice Blues still strong down the middle, but cagers must replace Jim Holowachuk

By PHIL BINGLEY
 and JIM MORRISON

WARD PASSI

When Varsity Blues hockey team takes to the ice to defend their Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League and Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union titles, several familiar faces will be missing.

gone from last year's championship team are the Monteith brothers, Henry and Steve, wingers Pat Monahan, Peter Burwash, and Don Fuller, and goaltender Tom Little.

Certainly Blues' head mentor Tom Watt will have his problems filling these holes; fortunately, however, Watt will still have lots of experience and talent to work with this season.

Leading the list of holdovers are all-stars Paul Laurent (centre), John Wringley (goal), and Peter Speyer (defense), second team all-stars Gord Cunningham (right-wing), Bob Hamilton (defense), and last year's captain Ward Passi (left-wing).

Many hockey experts insist that a team must be strong down the middle to be a contender. This being the case, Varsity is in excellent shape. Along with Laurent, Blues will have centres Murray Stroud and Bob McClelland taking faceoffs.

Although Blues have lost five wingers through graduation, they are still strong in that department. In addition to Passi and Cunningham, Watt has returnees Mike Riddell, John Gordon, and Bryan Tompson, who is coming back after a year's absence.

ster, last year a second team all-star, and speedy Mark White. McManus can also choose among holdover Dave Horner and flashy rookies Joe Faust, from Harbord Collegiate, and Jerry Barker, a city all-star at Monarch Park.

Blues will be hurting down the middle with the loss of Holowachuk, but veteran John Hadden, at 6' 7", is capable of filling in. Also present at workouts is George Carter, a 6' 9" center from Philadelphia's Temple University.

Experience appears to be the chief weakness at forward. Super-sub Arvo Neird is back, as are Mike Kirby and Mark Slater, but the latter two have seen only limited action. Blues also have possibilities in Glen Wilkie a transfer from Waterloo Lutheran, and two more talented rookies—Mimico's Larry Trafford and 6' 6" Brian Shaw.

If American graduate students Ron Voak and Terry Heinrichs also decide to remain at practice, Blues should field a competent team.

However, Varsity will be facing perhaps the strongest league competition in many years. Perennial powerhouse Windsor Lancers look to be as strong as ever, and even they will have trouble with Western, who have added Holowachuk to their roster. McMaster and Waterloo, both very nearly on a par with Varsity last year, have lost very few players, and Waterloo now has a plus in Doug Lockhart. In this league, mere competence will not be enough to guarantee a playoff berth.

Defensively, all four rear-guards will be back on the blue line. Jim Miles will form one pairing with Speyer and Brian Jones is back with Hamilton for another gala season.

BASKETBALL

Over at Hart House, the future is not as rosy for Varsity Basketball Blues. Coach John McManus has to plug the gaps created by the departure of four key veterans.

The leading absentee from last year's third-place finisher is all-star center and league-leading scorer Jim Holowachuk, who has taken up Medicine at Western. Also gone from the team are Nolan Kane, a starting forward for many years, former all-star guard Doug Lockhart, and forward Ron Kimmel.

With football still in progress, workouts have been somewhat curtailed, but several good prospects have turned out to practise.

The guard position will be a strongpoint with returning starters Bruce Demp-

Varsity's PAUL McKay: SIFL's Mr. Versatility

PAUL McKay
Field goal specialist

The worth of Paul McKay to Varsity Blues football team was made dramatically obvious last Saturday when his late 21 yd. field goal attempt scooted through the uprights to give Toronto their exciting 16-13 victory over Queen's.

But this was almost old chapeau for McKay who has been a key figure in each of Blues last three victories. Saturday, Varsity won by three; McKay provided four. A week ago Varsity won by five; McKay scored seven. And two weeks ago against Western, Varsity won by six with McKay accounting for eight points.

This hosanna of heroics has boosted him into a deadlock for the league scoring leadership with 24 points. McKay leads the league in field goals, converts, single points, and punting. His punting average is a healthy 39.8.

Yet he is perhaps the league's most versatile player.

As a regular, he patrols the right safety position with fierce competence. Along with his defensive backfield partners, he completely shut off Queen's utilization of the long bomb. Gaels were forced to resort to short, ineffectual passes, rendered harmless by deadly tacking.

In addition, McKay has been used as a regular in the offensive backfield, where he rushed effectively, and displayed good hands as a receiver.

To complete the picture of the all-round football player, McKay has been used on punt returns and kickoff returns.

In his second season with Blues, about the only thing McKay hasn't been do asked to do is keep up the coach's cracker supply. But who knows? If an injury should occur to the team dietician, mere force of habit would probably cause Murphy to hand over the chores to his Mr. Versatility, Paul McKay. And the job would get done.

Powerhouse soccer Blues continue work

Soccer Blues have been working hard this week in preparation for their encounter against Western this Saturday. Varsity is intent on providing their fans with the same fantastic show they put on at Guelph over the weekend.

Blues now realize that a playoff will be necessary to decide the OQAA championship as Queen's has already wrapped up the Eastern section. That is another reason for Blues' extra effort.

The 4-2-4 formation installed by coach Ernie Glass a game and a half ago is working well. The defensemen, especially the fullbacks, have gained confidence and are often seen taking off upfield to make good plays.

This has helped the mid-field duo who now have additional players to pass to, and, as a result, can start combination plays instead of kicking the ball to the forwards.

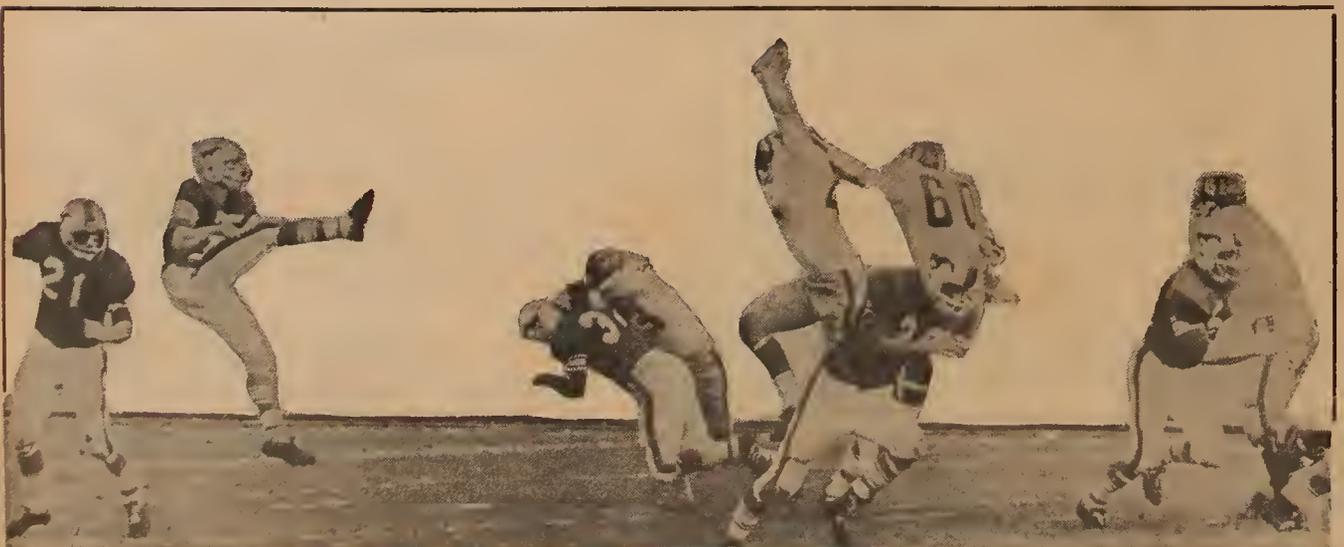

As usual, the forward line is devastating, as shown in the scoring statistics. Blues have five men among the top ten scorers. Jim Lefkos is far in front with sixteen goals in five league games.

He has accounted for almost half of Varsity's overall total.

Blues' goals against record is tops in their division, but is well short of Queen's tremendous feat of allowing only three goals in five games. Maybe the calibre of opposition makes the difference.

Innis offers moral support, not dollars to Resisters

By SUSAN REISLER

Innis College students yesterday voted to support "in principle the work done by the draft resistance organization," but turned down monetary support to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

The students also favored involvement of the Innis students society and its executive in moral and political issues.

The figures were 80-68 in favor of the first motion, 101-47 against the second and 24-11 for the third.

The referendum was decided on at a general meeting of Innis students Tuesday called to discuss the ICSC's decision to supply moral support and a vote in favor of a $50 contribution to the TADP.

Ken Stone, president of the ICSC, broke into a wide smile as the final votes were tabulated.

"I feel fiery and dynamic," he said. "The interest students have shown in this issue is admirable."

"Though I disagree with the tool of a referendum, it did settle several issues."

"The student society as well as the executive of the college will involve themselves in moral and political issues," he promised.

"The people voted overwhelmingly to be involved," said Bob Bossin (III Inn) a council member. "Those who did not vote are not standing in the way."

"I do think it is silly to vote to morally support the resolution and not back it up with money, but I am very happy with the involvement."

Both Stone and Bossin were worried about losing their positions. They felt they would have had to resign if the students voted against the main resolution.

SAC abolishes Blue and White Society

By SUE CARTER

The Students Administrative Council decided Wednesday to abolish the Blue and White Society as presently constituted.

Joe Merber university committee co-chairman, introduced a successful motion that the chairman of the society be appointed by SAC on the basis of his personnel and proposed program for the coming year.

Marty Low (I Law), chairman of the society, viewed the decision as a vote of non-confidence and tendered the collective resignation of the executive.

"A total reorganization was necessary and inevitable," he said. "But I think SAC has acted arbitrarily and with little foresight."

"Such a move deserves far more consideration than it was given. Perhaps the fact that it was budget night accounts for the cursory half-hour debate."

Merber charged that the Blue and White as presently constituted is "unworkable." The new system, he said, will give SAC "the means of choosing a good group with administrative and creative ability."

The executive resignation will be effective in one month. This will allow the wrap-up of details and completion of their current study of the social organizations of North American universities.

The resignation of the executive leaves members of the present Society in a precarious position. Their continued membership depends on the nature of the new organization and on college councils.

Apathy threatens McGill weekend

Lack of interest may force the cancellation of the McGill weekend.

If ticket sales don't pick up by 5 p.m. today there is a chance that the student trains to Montreal won't run. Trains are scheduled to leave Toronto at 6:30 p.m. and 11:55 p.m. next Friday.

Demand for tickets has been running far behind last year. Only 138 have been sold, compared to almost 500 at this time last year.

Initial cost this year is $16 but there is an additional $4 deposit which will be returned only if damage to the trains does not exceed $175.

ed to $2,000.

This year restrictions will be in force that would virtually eliminate alcohol on the trains. This seems to be discouraging the students who look on the outing as an annual drunk.

Under these conditions the Students Administrative Council could lose up to $1,000. Unless 350 tickets are sold by the 3 p.m. deadline there will probably be no train.

Alternate transportation by bus may be arranged if the trains are cancelled. The cost would be about $15 a person.

Two schools retain CUS membership

Two large Canadian universities this week voted to retain membership in the Canadian Union of Students.

The University of Western Ontario was the first, when its students council voted 17-5 Tuesday to stay in CUS.

And a student referendum at the University of British Columbia Wednesday favored CUS membership by a 3,811-1,743 count.

At Wetsern, an anti-CUS motion was proposed by council Vice-President Peter Schwartz, who claimed the organization had overstepped its authority by making statements on issues such as the Vietnam war.

These statements do not reflect student opinion, he said, and the $6,000 UWO students pay annually to CUS could be used in better ways.

He advocated a loose confederation of strong provincial unions.

Council President Peter Larson objected, saying few provinces outside Ontario could have strong unions.

At UBC, CUS President Hugh Armstrong said CUS will now be able to move ahead with strong new programs.

"These results will be well received by the rest of the country."

"We now have a job to get done, especially in the area of educational reform. I look forward to strong UBC leadership in CUS."

"The other two schools who held CUS referendums, Windsor and Acadia did not give strong support to CUS because they did not have strong student governments."

Bradford resignation bewilders GSU

By LOUIS ERLICHMAN

The annual general meeting of the Graduate Students Union Wednesday began with the resignation of controversial president John Bradford and ended with the allocation of money for the graduate students' pick-up hockey team.

In between there were a series of bewildering procedural hassles that indicated that you can confuse most graduate students most of the time, if you really try.

The 75 members of the GSU present decided that they wanted to censure the executive. But the president had already resigned and everybody who knew her said they liked Vice-President Fay Martin. The secretary had resigned previously.

This left only Treasurer John Thompson. But the GSU defeated a motion of non-confidence in him.

They then voted non-confidence in the executive as a whole and passed a motion asking Miss Martin to run again in the upcoming election if she resigned.

The bearded Bradford, who had survived a motion of censure last month, began the meeting by explaining his reasons for resigning.

"I have not been around or even answering my phone for the last month because I have not been well," he said.

"Physical disabilities and some other things have forced me to be negligent of just about everything I have taken on in the last two years, including my graduate studies.

"My resignation does not mean that I am negating all those things I stood for. I will retain the right to sit on the executive as a past president."

Bradford had been criticized for using GSU money to support the Toronto Anti-Draft program and for hiring Eric Antilla as an educational consultant at $7,000 a year.

As the number of constituents present slowly fell, the procedural complications multiplied.

After considerable discussion about the union constitution, an election committee was chosen.

An open meeting of the committee is to be held within three weeks. There are four positions on the executive open, and possibly eight others after a proposed new GSU constitution is adopted.

Discussion of the new constitution and consideration of the budget were postponed until after the by-elections.

A demand that Antilla explain his actions over the last two months prompted an explosive response from Bradford.

"This idiotic teeny-bopping logic game of people innuendoing other people is making a mess of the GSU," he said.

"If it does not stop, I will blow this place to bits — politically."

Marathon meeting views SAC budget

By DAVE FRANK

The Students Administrative Council doggedly sifted through a $500,000 budget at a marathon Wednesday night meeting.

"Keep your eye on priorities," Finance Commissioner Jan Duinker (SGS) admonished members as he introduced his budget.

He predicted that next year student fees will be raised to $10 from $8.

Accordingly SAC trimmed $2,650 from the budget, bolstering the unallotted contingency fund to $7,460.

Tradition went by the board as SAC decided it could do without the presentation of beer steins to SAC members. This cut $600 from SAC's operating expenses. The vote was 23-12.

But at the urging of President Tom Faulkner, SAC decided to keep the honor award system at a cost of $250.

"This is the highest non-scholastic award presented on campus," said Faulkner. SAC's contribution to The Varsity was cut back by $2,700. This means the present quality of photographs will continue.

COURSE EDUCATION SUPPORTED

The course evaluation received overwhelming support.

"This is one of the most important programs SAC has undertaken in the last few years," said Bob Bossin (III Innis).

Last year the evaluation cost $9,505. This year $4,500 has been allotted, not including printing costs. The program will swing into action with a four-month headstart over last year.

However the World University Services of Canada a national charity organization, received less sympathetic treatment. It will receive no grant.

"WUS lacks a sense of urgency," said Faulkner, "Maybe this will shake them up and make their programs more relevant."

Last year the WUS national program received $1,817.

As the hour grew late, the council had to fight back tendencies to rush the debate.

At 1 a.m. a motion to adjourn got two votes. By 1:44 a.m. a similar motion got eight votes.

By 2:16 a.m. speeches had been reduced to a formula; "The previous speaker said what I thought, and said it well."

SECOND WIND

By 2:30 the budget had been adopted and SAC caught its second wind.

The boisterous desk-thumping of the last seven hours was conspicuously absent as SAC pondered a motion to grant $350 to the right-wing Edmund Burke Society.

"The Society performs a legitimate educational function," said Mike Magee (III SMC). "It would help improve the intellectual climate on campus."

Steve Langdon (III Trin) called the Burkites a "groundless, rootless organization."

"They should demonstrate some basis of support on campus. We should not be providing them an operating budget for the year."

The motion was then revised to specify the grant be used for a seminar on Rhodesia which the Society plans for Nov. II.

After haggling over how much SAC should contribute to the seminar, Art McIlwain (II ASPC) rose to declare:

"We should give a fair chance to plant the seed of Edmund Burke on campus. And if this seed decides to grow, so be it."

At 2:55 a.m. SAC voted in elimination bouts to determine the sum: $25, $50, $150, $200. The $200 grant emerged victorious.

At 3:05 a.m. adjournment was moved. The rain was still coming down outside, but nobody stayed for the vote.

Annual WUS Treasure Van opens Monday

Treasure Van, the World University Service's annual display and sale of international handicrafts, opens on campus Monday for a five-day stay.

The Hart House Debates Room will be the site of the unusual and often exotic goods from Asia, Latin America, Africa and the South Pacific.

Treasure Van has set records on most campuses it has visited this year. It is featuring new items as well as plenty of the perennial favorites.

Koala bears from Australia; alpaca slippers from Peru; jewelry from Spain, Mexico, India and Thailand; Korean pipes; idols from New Guinea long-houses; swords, masks and ceramics from Greece, Bulgaria and Columbia; rugs, wineskins and dolls.

WUS of Canada is the same organization that sponsors the annual SHARE campaign. It has two aims, says WUS chairman Donald Smith (IV Trin): to provide Canadians with a glimpse at many different cultures, and to make a profit for WUS.

More than 1,000 students will have been involved in Treasure Van by the end of the year, says Marion Mowat (II Nurs). They'll be working as sales personnel, packers, cashiers, publicity agents and security guards.

The idea of Treasure Van was conceived in a prisoner of war camp in Singapore by a Canadian ambulance driver, Ethel Mulvany.

She resolved that when the war was over she would do all she could to help people worse off than her, especially by stimulating a demand for the goods made by these people.

Bob Isbister (IV Vic), campus publicity director, says sales here should top $10,000 this year.

The Van will be open from 10 a.m. to 10 p.m. Monday to Friday.

We want blood

Bleed willingly says Dracula — your donation is so vital that without it a life may be lost, on urgently needed operation cancelled, or newborn baby's chance for survival eliminated.

Blood donor clinics are being held throughout the campus. Today's clinics are in the recreation room of Margaret Addison Hall for students of Victoria and Emmanuel Colleges and the faculties of music and food sciences, and at 67 College St. Your donation will be credited to your college or faculty.

but what if it affects you personally?

After Tuesday night's disappointing and rude performance by students at Innis College, last night's referendum result comes as an encouraging surprise—in part.

Tuesday, some 57 students gathered to force a referendum on the aid-to-draft-dodgers issue. The executive of the student body there had voted to grant $50 towards a hostel run by the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

They were perfectly within their rights to do that of course, since at Innis every student is a member of the student society, able to confront their executive in a meeting.

But Innis students misused their rights by, first voting to hold the referendum before hearing anyone from the Anti-Draft program speak, and then walking out when the speakers were finally introduced. About half the crowd walked out.

But in yesterday's referendum, Innis students showed they had some sense. They didn't agree with aid to draft-dodgers, and that's too bad, but not all that important. Fifty dollars won't make much difference to the TADP.

The Innis students, allowed their executive to take stands on moral and social issues.

The student society, in other words, doesn't have to confine its activities to dances and social functions and services to the students.

This may be the first time that a student body has actually given the OK to its student council to do that. It may show that one part of this university is becoming a little more aware of the problems of the world outside.

It may also be that some students have started to realize their obligation to think outside their own little desires and see their obligations to the world. On that latter point we are not very optimistic, though.

The draft-dodger issue when it first arose—in the UC Lit, in SAC and even the Engineering Society—polarized political opinion on this campus. Some said, it showed the strength of the right over the left, and therefore, the basic conservatism of the students this year.

We don't think it's as clear as all that. We think the issue showed the students liberalism—liberalism used in the worst possible sense.

A liberal has moral and even perceptive thoughts about issues, maybe even unclouded by the North American anti-communist paranoia. But when an issue calls for him to actually do something, he'll find any number of excuses why he shouldn't.

Opinions on the Vietnam War may be changing fast as doubt about the United States' policies grows, but the draft-dodger issue hit right home to the student. Should he actually do something about it? Should he challenge the U.S. government by helping draft-resisters when they get here?

The majority of the students decided, No. They didn't really want to bring the wrath of the U.S. upon them, probably because Canadians basically love the U.S. in an emotional attachment that has grown up since their first look at TV, motion pictures or any other communications medium.

They refused to even consider that the U.S. may not really be like that at all, simply because they live within the American Dream too. Many of them have hopes of someday emigrating and sharing in that dream.

And even students refuse to question their most deeply-held beliefs and biases. That's an emotional experience that would be simply too shattering for them.

Therefore the liberals may start out thinking realistically, but when it comes time for them to do something themselves, well, you know, we really ought not be too hasty about this. Draft-dodgers break laws and we shouldn't have them here. Anyway, it is better to have citizens in this country who will obey and have respect for laws, than people who don't want to go killing people for moral reasons.

That's why Innis students saw no ambiguity in their voting down aid to draft dodgers but supporting their executive's right to take moral stands.

Gaining this right could be a significant victory for the Innis executive: Ken Stone and Bob Bossin were delighted.

It took courage for Stone and Bossin to put their own positions on the line in this referendum, when they said they would have to resign if their methods were defeated.

Tom Faulkner made a brilliant speech at the Innis meeting Tuesday, but he would never have put his job on the line like that. He seems committed to his ideals too, but how far?

LETTERS

don't ignore us on Vietnam war

Sir:

It seems to me that the "Varsity" on the Vietnam issues is ignoring any and all opposition to the views of that ignoble newspaper save the Edmund Burke Society who's views, i.e. the far right, most students ignore or oppose.

If as poles seem to show 85-90% of all students oppose aiding draft dodgers the issues cannot be all as cut and dried as the Varsity would seem to suggest. It again seems to me that the Varsity should make it its business to find out and make public the consensus views even if the editors of said newspaper disagree with the views of the majority of students.

If as I hope you do examine the opinions of the masses of students I think you will find opinion thus:

Looking back on history we see that Britain and France failed to act against Nazi Germany when they occupied the Rhineland in defiance of Versailles and when they provoked the Spanish Civil War again the two protectors? of the free world failed to act.

In the case of post-World War U.S.A. the circumstances are the same but the answers are different. When Russia, in her then belligerent state tried to occupy West Berlin in 1948, and Rhineland, the U.S.A. answered with the Berlin Airlift. Thus rebuffed Russia has quieted down except for the Cuba Missiles incident in which again the U.S. rebuffed Russia and again Russia retreated.

Both these incidents were Rhineland incidents. A major power tried to get better position in what can theoretically be called her own territory. On both these occasions and Berlin being geographically surrounded by Communist-occupied territory. On both these occasions the U.S. did not procrastinate and in both of the situations Russia backed down.

China, on the other hand, has attempted a "Spain" type war. This war is being fought in an unimportant country, Vietnam, before that Laos, in which China has sent material for testing as Germany and Italy did, and specialists to get battlefield training. Here too the U.S. intent on fighting in Vietnam today rather than in California stands up. In doing this she is throttling new China as she did in Korea, and preventing the launching of another world war by another Hitler—Mao Tse Tung.

As far as the draft dodgers go, I believe that the average student says thus:

If they want to come, let them stay but let them be treated as any other immigrant with no special favours such as University of Toronto money. Let's neither encourage nor discourage them. Those that want really to come will take the time to find out how, those that don't want to come let's make no effort to convince them to come. In other words let's support the U.S. morally in the war and over the draft dodger issue let's be neutral.

The student at large wants nothing to do with aiding the draft dodger but neither does he call the draft dodger a coward. He neither supports the old S.U.P.A. program nor the "Edmund Burke Society" program. The average student is abhorred by both these extremes and radical positions and speaking strictly for myself, I abhor the fact that The Varsity up to now has done nothing to quiz the average student. I hope this letter starts some searching.

Terry Garman (III NEW)

(Ed. note: If the artificial division of Vietnam means that there are and should always be two Vietnams, can't you also argue that the NLF control of most of South Vietnam has won them that country? And surely you don't believe that Ho Chi Minh has nothing to lose by negotiating with the Americans)

go to China is explained

Sir:

I must object to Miss Brydson's article "Innis Votes for Referendum" as she has misquoted me and used statements out of context to create a gross misrepresentation of my stand on the draft-resister issue and Innis' connection with it.

Tom Faulkner, speaking at the meeting, made an analogy comparing draft-resisters to United Empire Loyalists. He said that the Loyalists objected to the war with Britain and fled to Canada. The point which I was trying to make was that Canada at that time was an ally of Britain's and therefore the United Empire Loyalists were defecting to a country which supported the enemy.

If the action of draft resisters was (as Mr. Faulkner implied) truly analogous to that of the Loyalists they would, as I suggested, emigrate to Red China or some other nation which supports North Viet Nam.

I stress that at no time did I suggest to Mr. Froomer or Mr. Tate that they or any other draft resister go to Red China. I was addressing my remarks to Mr. Faulkner and only pointing out his faulty analogy.

Ted Montgomery (II Inn)

afraid to risk a referendum

Sir:

During the C.U.S. debate it became obvious that SAC was not prepared to risk a referendum lest opposition from the general student body be strong enough to cause our disaffiliation from C.U.S. Likewise the "Draft Dodger Motion" was defeated because several members were aware of its unpopularity among their constituents. In view of the scope of activities which council has adopted, I feel a formal "grievance procedure" is necessary, whereby the student body can inform their S.A.C. reps of their displeasure. This could take the form of (for example) a resolution of censure by which a member would be required to reverse his stand; and could be passed by (say) more signatures than the number of votes the candidate received in the last election, more signatures than 50 per cent of the total of votes cast etc, subject to the constraint that if the candidate could raise a similar number to support him, it would be dropped and never again attempted on that issue. If some time limit for filing grievances were included, the working of council would not be unduly jeopardized since such action would only accompany great discontent on immediate major issues.

As of now there is no necessary link between students and their reps, so that these reps are under no obligation to cultivate the support of their constituency or keep them informed. Although this exercise of wide discretionary power on the part of the individual members permits greater flexibility on council, still, it tends to create the image of S.A.C. as an unapproachable elite, unconcerned with majority opinion. In the past the S.A.C. have been in the ambiguous position of advocating student involvement on one hand while denying it effective voice on the other. A formal grievance procedure could, no doubt, curtail some S.A.C. activity, and foment a little chaos, and much politicking, however, if it forged a stronger link between the S.A.C. and the student body and increased student awareness and sense of participation, it would be worth it.

Sincerely

Rich MacDowel (III UC)

Paul Martin Speaks for Canada

By FRED OLIVER

Paul Martin Speaks for Canada: A Selection of Speeches on Foreign Policy, McClelland and Stewart, $2.75.

Paul Martin is sixty four years old. Paul Martin desperately wants to become Prime Minister of Canada. Apart from these two salient but virtually self-evident facts, this book of Collected Platitudes and Banalities has very little to offer anyone genuinely interested in Canada's foreign policy. To be fair to Mr. Martin who — what ever else he is — is not a foolish or an organically stupid man, few speeches ever come out well when read. They shouldn't: something is definitely lost when Understanding Media is read aloud; the text is simply too dense. Conversely, speeches look unbearably thin and lacking in real insight when gone over two or three times by the careful, or rather pedantic, reader like myself. Mr. Martin's speeches are scarcely an exception to this rule.

It is obviously impossible to take the fifteen speeches in turn and diligently point out where Mr. Martin is wrong and where he is right. I would propose, however, to take one or two examples to see what sort of general approach Martin takes, to explore the subtleties and rhythm of his prose, the inner working of his intellect. That Mr. Martin did not write these speeches himself should be born in mind when we examine these subtleties. They all bear the mark of his personality but not of his imagination.

I would take Mr. Martin's speech on Latin America as a prime example of his approach as a man to what he calls "foreign policy objective". We must, he says, be more aware of what is going on in Latin America: our investment there — already significant — should be increased; trade too should be continued or as he puts it:

"Furthermore, because of the economic potential of Latin America I think that the area deserves our special attention so as to establish a basis on which to build in the future ..." (p. 105) (Translation: We should build so we can keep on building).

He then grinds through the routine figures about our aid and the number of missionaries (Catholic and Protestant, French Canadian and English Canadian, from the east and the west, the north and the south. No one is left out. There is always room in Paul Martin's Inn). Then through the list of organizations of which we are a 'proud and active member', the Postal Union, observers on the UN Commission for Economic Development etc. etc.; then he drops a few names of famous Latin American statesmen 'known throughout the diplomatic world for statesmanship and forthright idealism...' Again, no one is left out; no opportunity for flattery or lip service is missed ('Argentina and Ecuador participated in the Congo, and Argentina, Chile and Ecuador in the Lebanon operation. Colombia participated in the UN action in Korea ...') Brazil, the Commonwealth, Mexico — the Olympic Games remember — and on and on.

One can almost imagine 'El Salvador yes I once knew a constituent of mine from that beautiful pearl in that important string of countries known as Central America. His wife was a French Canadian Hugenot whose father was Irish and whose brother was Polish with strong Italian blood in him etc.'

But one does not have to invent Martinese; one of his concluding paragraphs is an excellent example of the Art of Waffling:

"I can assure you that events in Latin America are now being given due weight in the conduct of Canadian foreign affairs. We are considering here today the future of our relations with a great continent of nations. Changes in these relations must, of course be made with care and deliberation. There is no doubt that many changes have already taken place but greater changes than we have yet seen will and must occur. Canada's economic and political ties with Latin America are developing rapidly. Individual Canadians are coming more and more to appreciate the importance of this area for the future of our own country. This situation presents an obvious challenge to Canada ..." (p. 111-12)

The reader goes berserk trying to get some tangible meaning out of this whole paragraph. Mr. Martin has repeated the same sentiment in every sentence, rephrasing it slightly every time. Listening to, or reading Paul Martin is like being beaten to death with a warm, wet, soft sponge. Nowhere is there candour, nowhere is there real incisiveness, nowhere the cutting away of the flabby layer of introduction and compliment, flattery and cant: we are smothered under a mountain of whipped cream thinking and whipped cream language.

Paul Martin is perhaps the most Compleat Politician living in Canada today. He is not, as I said before, a fool, nor is he unknowledgeable in foreign affairs; he is not senile, nor is he unattentive to the demands of public opinion — he is far too much the politician for that. But he is also too much the politician to be able to say anything that is really spontaneous or candid. He is not a liar, he does not purposely tell untruths: he has simply become unable to say anything that does not smack of the clichè of or oozing praise.

Some of the really critical issues that face Canada such as Vietnam, NATO, underdevelopment, are being attacked with all the style and grace of the language of ward politics. One can and does castigate the Canadian government for its unwillingness to recognize that the US government is, in fact, more than hesitant to negotiate in Vietnam, and less than honest in its recent public statements.

So much of the frustration that the general public feels stems from the hideously veiled language now so common in diplomacy of which Mr. Martin is one of the greatest masters. His whole approach, both in style and substance, is somewhat repulsive to anyone interested in direct dealings among nations. Lip service is paid to every vested interest; the unnecessary compliment is uttered whenever a Latin American dictator comes to Canada. The crucial issues — what do we do when and if revolution comes in Bolivia, Colombia or Venezuela? Will it be Time magazine and the Martinese language that mould our response? — are simply not considered. He gets so exhausted repeating the obvious that there is no energy left to attack the real questions.

In one speech, on Rhodesia, Mr. Martin spends two lengthy paragraphs saying why Ian Smith's government is illegal. But the basis of trenchant discussion on Rhodesia is not whether Ian Smith's government is illegal. If we chant 'Ian Smith is nasty' five thousand times he won't disappear. Are we going to pressure South Africa? Are we going to pressure Portugal? Will we ever use force? These are the questions. They are scarcely even considered.

Diplomacy is not necessarily an ignoble task; it is certainly a vital one; it is beyond doubt absolutely essential in any search for a world order or at least a world paying more than lip service to the rule of law. But if diplomacy is a vital task, it had better speak the language of vitality. There will have to be some incisiveness in what it says; some radically re-orientated concepts of what the conflicts in Vietnam, Rhodesia and underdevelopment really signify and what trends they reflect.

I said at the beginning that Mr. Martin was a politician and that Mr. Martin was 64 years old; but whatever the causes of his inability to realize the crisis, his own answers to the challenges of revolution and conflict are hopelessly out of date. He is a good period piece, like an eighteenth snuff box or Old Ontario furniture, speaking the mumbo jumbo oft employed by Allan Lamport and indeed a whole bevy of politicians of his — or indeed any — era; but unfortunately he is in power. What Mr. Martin writes and how he writes become the policy of a government. His marshmallow prose would be even more comic than it is were he not Secretary of State of External Affairs.

This is not comedy, this is Gilbert and Sullivan on a Wagnerian scale played to the tunes of Real Life. This book is the manifesto of a man yearning to succeed Lester Pearson; more, it is the defence of a government heavily criticized by the academic community. If this is the government's answer they had better not even bother trying to communicate; if this is Mr. Martin's answer or plea, and if he speaks for his generation, there no really is little hope for those over thirty. We aren't even talking the same language.

Crowd: Novel as Film

By MEL BRADSHAW

The biggest disappointment in seeing a beloved novel turned into film has nothing to do with the inevitable plot changes. Quite apart from the story, we have lost the story-teller.

Reading a novel, of a certain kind, is like hearing some one talk about people he knows. His manner endows with interest even the most seemingly insignificant among them and if he seems to exaggerate we can attribute it to his enthusiasm, his sympathy, and his love.

But when his book is filmed, it is as if he took us and introduced us to those people and then stepped back and let us fend for ourselves. The characters stand before us untempered by his affection. When we actually see them the incredibilities tolerated in hearsay no longer seem excusable. We are used to doubting verbal evidence, but not visual and so, deception on the screen is somehow more pretentious than in print.

Furthermore when we are introduced to some one, he must be worth meeting and his actions worth watching. Many writers who have a great deal to tell would have very little to show.

In adapting a novel for film, then, plot is what is least changed; in fact plot is sometimes all that is wanted. One bears of movie-makers ignoring the book altogether and working from story abstracts. Modest tales are inflated to make them more cinematic or are simply ignored.

The director's art in this situation is truly to conceal art, both the novelist's and his own. By tight editing and technical competence he keeps the story moving, but his presence is not generally felt by his audience. This is true not only of filmed novels but of movies in general.

Yet the last few years have seen important changes. Perhaps owing to the decentralization taking place in the American film industry and the increased interest in European films over which the metteur en scene has always exercised a greater amount of control, the public as well as the film buffs are coming to recognize the director as the author of his film. At the same time, through techniques such as rapid cuts and muted colour directors are leaving a more easily recognizable mark on their work. This affirmation of authorship is of particular relevance to the novel.

Without it I do not think a film version of Thomas Hardy's Far from the Madding Crowd would have been feasible. This is not to deny that there is a lot to be shown by John Schlesinger's picture (which opened last night at the Glendale). Sergeant Troy's (Terence Stamp) demonstration of swordsmanship for Bathsheba (Julie Christie) is splendid to see; the play of silver across Troy's scarlet tunic against the lush green of the Dorset coast. Other events such as the circus at Cornhill are amplified for maximum visual effect.

Nevertheless it is with the "every-day sort of men," typified by Gabriel Oak (Alan Bates), that this and all Hardy's works are ultimately concerned. If they are considered worthy of portrayal at all, these people will as likely be taken from life as from a novel, and will be treated realistically in small-screen black and white. How incongruous then may it seem for Schlesinger to have taken such men, blown them up to epic proportions, and have them retain their benuioeness. After all, it is spectacular roadshow productions such as this which are most often accused of being unrealistic.

It is important to distinguish here between realism and what I can only describe as sincerity. By contrast to overblown illusion, the latter means restraint. In Far from the Madding Crowd it means fidelity to the Dorset countryside where it was shot, with its beauty and its mud; it means not making everything look brand new; it means not glorifying Oak or changing his idiom of speech. As opposed to realism it means not overlooking what has been referred to in the novel as "the buzz of implication" which is absent from the brute fact; but most of all it means conveying the warmth Hardy felt towards his characters.

In a sense Schlesinger's wide-angle lens matches the novelist's own epic vision. He sympathizes with their problems, particularly their inability to cope with progress, yet at times he lays them open to ridicule in a completely un-Hardian way. We might object that Schlesinger relies rather heavily on local colour and that some of the characters, William Boldwood (Peter Finch) in particular, are not given the full understanding they merited in Hardy's eyes.

Notwithstanding Far from the Madding Crowd does manifest a controlling attitude, in addition to plot and pictures, which is essential in the treatment of any worthwhile novel. The gap left by the novelist is at last being filled by the director.

By ELIZABETH MARTIN

The Crest Theatre is now showing a well-constructed montage of Laurel and Hardy films, created by Robert Youngson. Complete with commentary and added music. The film provides a brief historical sketch of both the careers of Laurel and Hardy and of the development of the silent film.

For a number of years, Laurel and Hardy appeared together on the screen, but did not act as a team. In such early films as The Flying Elephants, Stan Laurel appears as a brash, aggressive character rather than the meek counterpart to Hardy.

Youngson, joining together sequences from early films shows all the ingredients making for comic effects. Generally the shooting was done out of doors on location, thus providing for the wide variety of fantastic stunts that guaranteed laughs. The fact that sound was lacking allowed for the development of the visual gag. Perhaps the most commonly used one was the repetition of a particular stunt so that the viewer came to predict the action until he was fooled by a new twist. The ability of an actor to develop a situation from its simplest elements was invaluable. Youngson includes a long segment from Do Your Stuff, co-starring Charlie Chase, which contains all the best elements of slapstick comedy.

The gradual change from fast slapstick to slower moving, more sophisticated comedy is well illustrated by the film. Habeus Corpus and That's My Wife mark the final stages of the Laurel and Hardy team before the advent of the talkies. Their feature length sound film Great Guns is shown on the same program as Youngson's arrangement of their earlier work.

A Social Comedy

By DAVID PAPE

This play, with the title in dialogue, is a sheep in sheep's clothing pretending to be a wolf.

After leaving the Royal Alex, my cabby turned to mugged me with questions, and concluded, "Shakespeare did not write his own plays, you know, eh, he had a driver who wrote them for him. A driver."

—You mean a cabby?

—No, they didn't have cabbies then.

In his own vigorous way, my driver was writing Pirandello's play for him. And when I asked him what he believed in, how many days there were in the week, he replied calmly, "None! They are only for your convenience."

In Right You Are, Pirandello makes the assumption that we all play the role that others think we do, and that they are quite right in their opinions. So experience is infinitely ambiguous and elusive. Whatever we think, we are correct. Prejudice, documentation, sympathy, even witnessing an event will not reveal its truth.

He clothes his argument in a social comedy of lively dialogue, mistaken identities, and repetitions of highly equivocal scenes. A whole community, from its gossips to its governor, becomes obsessed with discovering the truth about a new family in town.

Under great pressure, the old mother-in-law appears to explain away primary rumours. In her account, signor Ponza is madly in love with Lena, his wife and her daughter; so much so that he cannot stand the two women meeting. Then Ponza appears and counters her story with a sympathetic tale of her madness. He says that he is married to a second wife Giulia, and that the mother will not admit the death of Lena. When the mother, Signora Frola, appears again, she explains that really the daughter had to be taken to a sanatorium to recover from Ponza's excessive love; but that Ponza thereafter refused to believe she was alive. And so on.

The point is that with the evidence of our senses, reason can turn any situation which way it will, and that the illusions we live by are more valid than any notion of palpable truth.

Taking place in 1916, when values of honour, glory, gain and loss really had ceased to contain definite meanings, the argument is an interesting document. But it nonetheless is an essentially simple and ingenious tissue of philosophy.

Whether you left after the first, second or third act, you got Pirandello's point. The rest was a brilliant display in acting discipline and controlled direction. As you would expect from the APA the style is superb. Each act is like a dance with its fast movements and slow, in perfect balance. As directed, it unfolds in a visually crisp tableau, arranged with delicate and natural movement, wonderfully suited to the sense.

The cast of the APA have a unique naturalness about their acting. They seem to be both perfectly recognizable, and perfectly Italian, with no embarrassing accents. Somehow they have picked up the rhythms natural to the personality of the play.

Donald Moffat as Laudisi is cool and amazingly clear in his exposition, and an appropriate centre for the debate of the play. It was interesting to see how his infuriating tolerance and broadmindedness made him as biased as any other partisan.

Helen Hayes, of course, was a compelling and appropriately melodramatic presence as Signora Frola; and I suppose we must get used to it: they will clap.

One of my own favorites in the company is Miss Christine Pickles, who, as always, had a delightfully comic joy behind her cameo role.

The play itself, however, made me want to draw comparisons with Fellini, and the nature of Italian drama. In the work of both men, we find a stage cluttered with objects and tangible symbols of what the artist is getting at. And with both, what is lacking is a vitality in character. We find argument, or as Arnold put it, "the dialogue of the mind with itself," and no significant action.

Furthermore, the purpose of the play is to involve the audience until it is totally perplexed about the nature of reality. Who is mad? and who is the daughter-wife? Yet we are expected to accept a host of caricatures and their superficial craze for reputation. We anticipate their reactions. Of course Laudisi will conclude the play by pointing to all the confusion and calling it Truth.

The set, by James Tilton, was of a plush deep velvet nature, with gold trim and green velvet upholstery standing out slightly against the black walls. This is a perfect touch, harmonious with the dark nature of the play. After all, the important characters, Ponza, Signora Frola, and the wife-daughter are all in mourning blacks. There is no emergence from the darkness. I find the play a frustrating example of intellectual agnosticism.

U. C.'s Magic Theatre

By DAVID PAPE

Pray tell where is the Playres' Guild
To brother John I said
What truth is there in what I hear
The Playres' Guild is dead.

Which and where and why and what?

Three years ago the Players' Guild of University College was the most active dramatic group on campus. It produced from Dostoevsky to Othello to Beckett; Saroyan, Shaw, Congreve, N.F. Simpson. Original plays were first tried out there: as would shame the drama centre or the one-act play contest; and actors, directors, producers, crew—many too timid or inexperienced for Hart House—started with the U.C. Players' Guild.

Its theatre was in the upstairs of the Women's Union: a barrel valuted green hall, with a six-dimmer board that squeaked like crazy whenever you brought up the lights, a cramped dressing room and a smell all its own.

Here, every lunch hour, the Guild performed its one-act plays. With popularity and success, it also produced longer shows, such as this season's recent production of Waiting for Godot.

But two years ago, the fire marshal found out that fuses were blowing all through the building, and the theatre, alas! went the way of all flesh. It has been closed since. The ashcans from Endgame still sit on the stage. The place still smells the same, sturdy and usable; but it lacks a fire exit.

There was much concern last year. Operating in West Hall, the Guild ran six noon hour shows that attracted audiences from across campus as well as outside the university. They performed O'Casey and Peter Weiss and Catch-22 and W.B. Yeats. The Principal wanted to reopen the theatre, and so did a committee of vitally interested students who needed it.

But without a theatre, what do you do? When Ken Copland (Architecture) went to consult Wally Russel about designing a new theatre he said two words, "Gut it."

Gut it and rebuild from scratch. The amazing thing is that his words were taken seriously enough by the administration that the $40,000 needed just to re-open the building was made available.

The committee, under Professor Leyerle's guidance (Centre for Medieval Studies) was refining its plans for designing the place.

Last Tuesday Ken Copland presented these plans as they have been approved by the university planning department. To be completed by next fall, the new theatre will be the most flexible, imaginative, experimental and exciting little theatre in Toronto.

With moveable tiers of seats, the theatre will have innumerable configurations of playing areas, suitable to all styles of presentation. Actors will be able to emerge from nowhere and everywhere. The stage one week will be the seating area the next. Stages will be round, square, diamond shaped, diagonal, patterned elongations and thrusts. The theatre will be flexible enough to stage anything from a passion to a beauty contest, from theatre in the round to proscenium arch.

If you like the Coach House or the Central Library or the Colonnade, you ain't seen nothin' yet.

Strangely enough, these possibilities would never have arisen were it not for the delays of the fire regulations. Had the fire-marshal not kept the theatre shut, the need for redesigning never would have been urgent, and the money for re-opening the theatre never been available.

For the meantime, the theatre must remain shut. Beneath it, the women of University College have their hot lunches. Contracts have been given out to caterers, and the building will continue in its function until May. At present, the construction company is busying itself with ripping out the insides of the theatre, and separating it from the Women's Union.

Now the theatre is closed another year. There's nothing to be done for it. As for the Guild, it could use West Hall again—or amphitheatres such as Room 106 or 122. The main problem is direction within the Guild.

The Guild attracts people to it from all over campus, but without organization and incentive nothing will happen. Once the ball is rolling, all those students yearning to be on stage or to direct, will have a body in which to seek their home. With a minimum of surveillance, the Guild runs on its own enthusiasm.

Let one show be produced, and the Guild will live again. If nothing takes place, then U.C. will find itself with a brilliant new theatre, and no one to run it.

These are the garbage cans of yesteryear . . .

Britain's National Theatre

BY ALAN GORDON

What a company! Any dramatic group that can send shivers of horror up your spine one night, and then reduce that same spine to jelly the next night leaving you convulsed on the floor, helpless with laughter, has got to be great. The National Theatre Company of Great Britain is such a company.

The company didn't do this singlehanded mind you. It had the help of two great writers, but the players were in no way awed by their material, and managed to breathe a life into the text that has been unparalleled. The writers are Strindberg and Feydeau. Strindberg is the sombre Swede whose vision of life and living is so compelling in its compassion and horrible bonesty that modern theatre has never equalled his thoroughness or beauty of expression. Feydeau is the French farceur who sees life as being necessarily comic, and must be seen as such if it is to be at all liveable.

Earlier this week, Sir Laurence Olivier, the director of the company, and one of the major players said that if his company had a style, it should be its ability to produce each play in the style which the piece demands, and not bending the play to suit the talents, and limitations of the performers and the audience. This is his aim (and it should be the aim of every theatrical producer) and he has fulfilled it, beautifully.

The Dance of Death, a play which is beautiful in construction and selection of detail, terrifying in its moral and ethical implications, demands a great deal from its audiences. We must be willing to see ourselves as Strindberg sees us. In this theatre of paradox, dancing and dying fight it out in the title. Hatred and love are carefully balanced. Both are seen as destructive forces involved in a power struggle that consumes the participants and innocent bystanders. This is, according to Strindberg, the nature of our situation. The paradox of man's condition is symbolized in the nature of theatre itself, in which the unstructured becomes structured and reality must become illusion. Symbolism is an integral part of this style of theatre where action, dialogue and scenic detail all form a complex system of meaning and interpretation.

This is an evening in which symbolism threatens to run amok and reduce a problem of enormous weight and complexity to little more than an intriguing puzzle. But Strindberg and the National Theatre Company are more than aware of this possibility and nip the problem in the bud. Characters are, given the context, well drawn. Never are the relationships less than plausible and a depth of perception and enormous technical control saves the production from boredom and, the other extreme, an excessive, screaming horror-house.

Strindberg has created people. More than classroom examples of his philosophy, the Captain and his wife are living, despairing, conniving and suffering human beings, capable of great passion. The captain, Edgar and his wife, Alice, live on an island. They have managed to alienate their servants, their neighbours and after, twenty five years, themselves. This marriage is based on one thing: survival. Alice must control, and Edgar must survive with integrity. An honorable peace is impossible, so the couple has embarked on an honorable battle. There is one moment when the captain suffers a stroke, and is implored to lie down and remove his boots, he refuses. A cousin, absent from the family for several years, innocently asks, "Why, are you expecting to fight?" Oh-boy, is he expecting to fight! Peace in that family is little more than the establishing a balance of power, and that balance is, to say the least, precarious.

All becomes fair in this life of love and war. Responsibility for the innocent bystanders is almost irrelevant. Clearly, either Edgar or Alice must die. Strindberg chooses Edgar, and uses language clearly intended to evoke the martyrdom of Christ. Alice says that with his death, she feels that she too, has died. Does Strindberg intend us to feel that Edgar has died for all the family, that Edgar has died to save Alice from a hell of constant frustration? Or is Edgar the serpent-seducer that Alice claims he is?

The ambiguity of the relationship's meaning is a conscious disclaimer to the teleological "Life has an obvious Purpose" theories that were all too prevalent in Strindberg's day, not to mention our own.

Edgar, the Villain-Christ figure is brilliantly brought into focus by Sir Laurence. Never are we aware that this is a great actor portraying a desperate man. We are forced to concentrate on Edgar, the despairing. Edgar is a match for his wife, no more. He will never control her, nor will she control him. Geraldine McEwan's egocentric Alice is a triumph. We pity her and despise her, and in despising her, we hate ourselves. Kurt, the fluctuating cousin whose principles and strong ethical precepts are inadequate to cope with the struggle in which he has become an unwitting participant, is a fine portrayal by Robert Lang of despairing optimism.

The stage design is the best work I've seen by Motley, a single name that stands for a triumvirate of English designers. The colour and detail, so vital to Naturalism's selected detail are fine, in every way.

A Flea in Her Ear is ostensibly a French farce which uses as its springboard to action a wife's attempt to determine her husband's fidelity. She sends him an anonymous love letter, arranging a rendez-vous. The entire household somehow manages to attend this tryst, and confusion results.

That is apparently the argument of the play. But we know better. What the play actually is, behind all that deceptive situation development, is a huge joke on language. Puns, both monolingual and bilingual, run rampant. Ill-formed words, incomplete messages and misunderstood communiqués are behind every situation. The despair that most dramatists feel about man's inability to communicate or that man's whole problem can be traced to this basic tragic flaw is met by Feydeau's joyous reply.

"Isn't it marvellous?", he seems to say. "Man is human. He can't communicate. Look at the silly things that happen to him".

In this production, farce style is all. Comedy of reversal has never had such a work-out. Walls turn inward, doors slam, the frantic pace of speech and action are an exhilarating consequence of the attitude that action, whether purposeful or not is paramount. To act is to live, it seems. I do, therefore I am.

When action becomes so vital to the play's success, the director becomes an unusually important figure in the production. Jacques Charron of the Comedie Française rises to the occasion with brilliant success. Staging and rhythm both visual and vocal are handled with a beautifully deft touch.

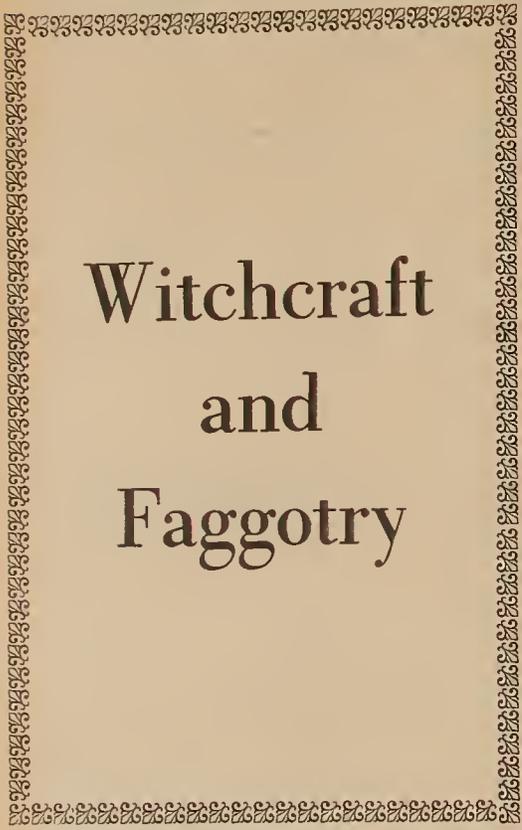

But the lion's share of the glory must go to the actors. What a collection of deformities they are. It's almost impossible to select a favorite. Edward Hardwicke's cleft palate finds a hilarious rival in Edward Petherbridge's Cathillian lisp. Robert Lang's puppy-dog porter, Poche, is a remarkable contrast to his other role in the play, the troubled naïf, Victor Emmanuel. My favorite moment in the show is Hardwicke's hairlip soliloquy, but Geraldine McEwan's personal vendetta in vowels was a consistent delight.

Everything was brilliant. The design by Andre Levasseur made all of the action as plausible as it could be. The huge Art Nouveau heart masquerading as a drawing room is one of the happiest things I've seen on the O'Keefe stage.

What Acting! What writing! What a company! What a pleasure!

Witchcraft and Faggotry

We get stuck in a barely moving block of traffic between Bloor and Wellesley. The cab driver fumes, "What the hell is the matter? On a weeknight, for Chrissakes . . ." Just south of Wellesley we pass two queens parading gorgeously in white satin. "Queers!" he explodes.

It seems he is one of the few who don't know. Halloween on Yonge Street is like an exotic Santa Claus Parade for adults. The crowds line several blocks three and four deep; roars of mixed approval and scorn greet the queens as they arrive by taxi at the St. Charles or depart in a blaze of glory for LETROS or THE PENTHOUSE or the FIVE-ELEVEN. Their glitter effaces the real girls along the street. A convertible bearing four blond and jewelled queens cruises in stately fashion under the gaze of the mob. "But Malcolm," says a girl to a puzzled and embarrassed boy, "they're proud of it." A girl in advertising watches from atop a fire hydrant: "What this city needs is a real Mardi Gras." (But what identities would these jeering crowds assume? Some would be bunnies, some monsters and demons, some angels; and some undoubtedly would dress as outrageous, flamboyant queens, regal in sequins and plumes.)

The scene outside LETROS is the same, only more so. Maybe twenty-five hundred people jamming King Street; York Mills has sent a large contingent. Camera units from CBLT and CFTO ready for action. John and Marilyn Brooks of the Unicorn arrive, and the cameras start to roll and the crowd cheers (how could they know?). Marilyn tries to object and then says, "I think I need a drink." Ricki-tik, looking very 1957 in a gown of black and white chiffon flowers and turban hat, disembarks from a panel truck. ("That," says Gigi Mills, "is class.") Cops nervously cordon off the entrance to the bar and hustle the queens inside. This evidently isn't good for public morals.

Inside there is pandemonium. Nobody can move. Boobs deflate, bushels of paillettes drop to the floor, painstakingly-applied makeup drips with perspiration. Some of the tables have been reserved two months in advance, but the occupants still had to be there at six o'clock to claim them.

Uptown, we plunge into the writhing semi-darkness of the St. Charles, and my God! the straight people almost outnumber the habitués of the place. A bouncer booms out, "O.K., clear the aisles! Let the waiters through!" but to little effect. We sit at an already-crowded table and watch the queens drifting through the bar. A tall skinny transvestite in Dorothy Parker drag: slick black hair, hard red lipstick, twenty-ish silver gown. A number of Scheherazade drags (salvaged perhaps from cheap Italian spectaculars) with smooth, bare midriffs and rhinestone G-strings over billowing harem pants. Eventually most of them will land up at the FIVE-ELEVEN, and we split.

Hallowe'en at the FIVE-ELEVEN. An extraordinary number of queens in full drag, chattering in strange men's voices or standing mutely with their escorts. Many straight couples slumming. (It's probably the best discothèque in town.) The normal gay boys, and a few young girls who hang around on the periphery of homosexual crowds.

The amateur show is called for 11.30, and at about 12.15 Gigi Mills appears on a platform at one end of the low-ceilinged, split-level room. Gigi is Toronto's most elegant drag queen; but tonight he comes on as a man, wearing an Edwardian suit and resembling an errant choir-boy with blond hair and a flashing smile. As M.C., he combines the best features of Jack Paar, Ed Sullivan, and Betty Kennedy. (The amateur show is for those who do not regularly appear in drag; there is a separate contest for showgirls at LETROS).

Gigi is describing tonight's happenings at LETROS: "Roberta looks gorgeous, Crystal looks lovely. Melba's there in gold . . . and then there's Louie but that's another story . . ." The monologue is interrupted by a resounding crash from the back stairway. Gigi says, "Crystal just arrived, and there's boxes all the way down . . . If it's Roberta, she'll be flat!" She goes backstage to check on the progress of the contestants: An apparition in multicoloured veils passes behind the gauze curtains. Gigi returns: "The place is haunted . . . dead drag queens wandering around. Sza-Sza's still sewing." He fills in time by talking about his recent trip to

It follows from the above provisions for entry into second year that some of the specialist programs could not be quite as tightly structured in second year as are those present Honour Courses that have a narrowly prescribed first year. There would not need to be any change in those specialist programs corresponding to those Honour Courses that now draw from Social and Philosophical Studies. But in the others some change would clearly be required, for they would be taking students who had had only the Basic course in the prerequisite subject(s) and those who had had the Basic and Additional courses. Since the Additional courses are intended to be different from the Basic in content rather than in level, it would be desirable that they be made available in second year to those who had not taken them in first year, and even, in some cases (e.g. where the content was essential to the degree), that they should be required in second year if not taken in first year.

It will obviously not be possible to arrange things so that all students in any one specialist program will have done the same number of courses in their specialty by the end of second year, nor will it be easy to arrange that they will all have done roughly the same amount by the end of third or even fourth year. But we do not think it important that they should have done so. To the extent the courses are deprofessionalized, it will be more possible and more desirable that, beyond the core of work which the students will all have done (which might be two courses in first year, two or three in second, and three in third), they should be able to develop their work along the lines on which their special interest develops.

We do not think it possible for this Committee from the present Honour Courses to the proposed Specialist Programs the latter would, initially at least, in most cases be built on the former: thus, for example, the Modern History Program would replace the Honour Course in Modern History, and so with most others. But in view of the greater flexibility of the Programs as compared with the Honour Courses, it is clear that not all of the particular combinations of subjects that now are organized as separate Honour Courses, or as separate divisions of an Honour Course, will need to be re-established or maintained as separate Specialist Programs or divisions thereof. We therefore recommend that departments, program directors, and committees concerned with the structure of Specialist Programs should consider, and keep under review, the possibility of reducing the present number of separately organized degree programs.

(D) Second, Third, and Fourth Year

Generalist Programs

(a) Subject Prerequisites

Since generalists are to do work of the same standard as specialists, and are not to have a separate set of first year courses (as the students in the present General Arts and General Science Courses have), the requirements for generalists' entry into specific second year courses in various subjects will have to be similar to those for specialists. Thus no first year prerequisite would be required for second year work in any of the present Social and Philosophical Studies subjects, but the same maximum prerequisite of one first year Basic course or one Combined or Collateral course might be required in the languages, mathematics, and natural sciences, with the same proviso as was made above for entry into second year specialist programs, namely, that Basic courses be not required in more than two subjects.

for intending high school teachers of science—does not seem to us to be sufficient to justify a separate program. Those who want something like that mixture can still have it within the one proposed General Program, and they could be advised in the Calendar what mixture was best for intending high school science teaching. We would be more impressed with the need for a General Science Program modelled on the present General Science Course if the latter were recognized as a sufficient qualification for a Type A certificate for science teaching, but it is not. In any case, under our proposal the quality of work in the General Program will be higher than that in either of the present General Courses, which opens the possibility that those who did the appropriate mixture of mainly science subjects would receive more recognition than the present General Science graduates.

We still have to say what specific courses the generalists are to take in their second and later years. We said above that we expected them to sit in some of the same classes as the specialists in those years. The problem is whether, after first year, there would be many courses which could ap-mittee to propose specific curricula for any of the specialist programs. These must be worked out within and between the teaching departments concerned with each of them. But we have investigated at some length the possibility of working out a suitable scheme in one of the scientific specialisms where the difficulties appeared to be greatest, and we (and those we have consulted about it) are persuaded that the difficulties are not insuperable.

We make two recommendations concerning each specialist program:

(1) that students not normally be required to carry more than five courses a year;

(2) that there be in each specialist program—in second, third, and fourth years—some completely free option. By this we mean that no specialist program should require (though it might permit) that all of a student's courses be in the subject or subjects of his specialism, but should allow each student to take one course, amounting to roughly one-fifth of his work, in an outside subject. This would not entitle the student to a choice of any course in an outside subject of his choice, since there will obviously have to be prerequisites for most upper year courses in any subject. But the student should be permitted, in exercising his option over three years, to take one or two courses from a lower year than his own.

The recommendation of one completely free option is intended to ensure that no specialist student can be required to specialize completely. The proviso that those administering any specialist program may permit the student to specialize completely—and we assume that most departments will want to do so—is intended to ensure that no student is forced to take a subject outside his main field of interest.

We have assumed that in the transition

(b) General Program

We recommend that the same principle govern students' choices in the second and later years of the General Program as we proposed for first year for all students: each student to choose five courses (but not necessarily five subjects) spread over at least two divisions, and no more than two courses in any subject as part of his regular program.

We recommend also that as a general rule students continue most of their second year subjects into third year. This is especially desirable in view of our recommendation of an examination-free second year. Such continuity would in most cases be imposed anyway by the need for second year work as a prerequisite of third year work. But we would hope that in some cases a sequence of different subjects in the same division (such as the present General Science sequence) would be possible, and also that (as in the present General Arts Course) a few subjects that could be begun in third year might be offered.

A General Program based on these principles would allow, but not require, the same degree of specialization that now goes under the name of "concentration" in the General Arts Course, and would allow, but not require, the same or less specialization than is now required in the General Science Course. Thus as far as the possible combinations of subjects is concerned the proposed rule would allow what is now done in General Arts and almost all that is now done in General Science.

In view of these possibilities, it is doubtful if a separate General Science Program needs to be established. The one ground course—that it provides the right mixture for retaining anything like the prescription of subjects in the present General Science appropriately be taken by generalists and specialists together. If there were not, and if consequently it were necessary to offer separate courses for the generalists, there would be some danger of the standards slipping back to the level of the present General Courses.

The problem is not as serious as it would seem at first sight to anyone thinking in terms of merging the present General and Honour students in single courses. For with the same first year requirements and standards for generalists and specialists, generalists entering second year would be equally as capable of taking the second year courses. There seems to be no reason therefore why they should not take at least the core courses in second and later years with the specialists. This might not give them enough courses in the case of every possible mixture of subjects. Where it would not, the other possibilities are to offer them some courses on the model of the Combined or Collateral courses already proposed for various purposes in first year, and/or to allow them to take one or two courses in a lower year than their own, and/or to offer a few courses designed especially for them. All of these involve the danger of lower standards, but this will be mitigated by the fact that the generalists enter second year with the same standards as the specialists.

(E) Transfers to and from Generalist Program after Second Year

We have considered whether any of the flexibility we have recommended at the level of entry into second year could be carried over to entry into third year, and if so, how much?

Our recommendation that there be no final examinations in second year and that third year examinations test how far the student has matured over the two years in his chosen subjects, sets up a presumption against permitting much transfer between subjects. And since any transfer to or from a generalist program would involve some change in subjects there is also a presumption against transfer between programs. Nevertheless we think that some transfer should be possible in both directions between specialist and generalist programs.

Transfer from a specialist to a general program should not present serious difficulties provided that the flexibility we have recommended for second and third year general programs can be achieved. And the possibility of such transfer would not have the harmful effect which transfer to the old four year General Course had, for there is no intention now of allowing or requiring the transfer of those who did not get the full standing that is required for staying in the specialist program.

Transfer from a general to a specialist program would have to be more limited. It would be very difficult in many of the languages and natural sciences, but in some of the social sciences and some of the other humanities, where the specialist program does not or need not become intensive until third year, it should not be impossible to allow some transfer into a specialist program at the beginning of third year.

Provisions about transfer into particular specialist programs and into a general program would have to be worked out by those in charge of each program. In some cases they might prefer not to set out rules in advance but to build on experience of individual cases dealt with by petition. Although petitioning is less convenient, both for students and faculty, than stated rules, it is to be expected that the number of students wanting to transfer would be substantially less than at present because of the greater flexibility we have proposed both for the specialist and for the general programs.

(F) Supplemental Examinations and Aegrotats

We have deferred until this chapter a consideration of policy on supplementals and aegrotats; the need for consideration arises from the proposed change from the old distinction between Honour and General Courses.

At present supplemental examinations are available in General Courses but not in Honour Courses. With the disappearance of the distinction between General and Honour Courses a decision must be made for or against supplementals in all courses. We think that it would be unduly rigid to allow no supplementals to any student, and unduly loose to allow any student any number of supplementals.

We propose that any student, in any or all of first, third, and fourth years, be entitled to a supplemental examination in one of his papers if he has the required over-all average of 60 per cent (his failed subject being included in the average), and be entitled to supplemental examinations in two of his papers if he has an over-all average of 65 per cent (his failed subjects being included in the average).

This proposal does nothing to rescue the student whose performance is poor over-all, nor will it induce any student to neglect one or two subjects all year with the intention of getting them up for a supplemental examination. But it does give a second chance to the good student who has fallen down on one or even two papers. Such a student is sometimes now rescued by the examiners, who know that he does not deserve a passing mark in one subject but are reluctant to see him lose a whole year because of it. Our proposal removes the pressure for such a recourse and requires the student to earn his standing properly. For this reason we believe that our proposal will not involve any slackening of standards and may even improve them.

We propose also that a consistent policy on aegrotat standing be established. At present aegrotat standing is granted to students unable to write final examinations in Honour Courses but rarely to students in General Courses, since the latter can write the August supplementals. With our proposed provision for supplementals for any student, it would appear reasonable to grant aegrotats to any students unable to write the regular examinations, with perhaps a requirement that he write one or two supplemental papers instead of being granted aegrotat in them.

4. The Proposed Change in Degrees: "Ordinary" (Third Year) and "Honour" (Fourth Year)

We propose that both generalists and specialists be able either to take an Ordinary B.A. or B.Sc. or B.Comm. at the end of three years, or to take an Honours B.A. or B.Sc. or B.Comm. at the end of fourth year. The fourth year, both generalist and specialist, should be open only to those with first or second-class standing at the end of third year.

Our reason for recommending that the generalist be able to stay on for a fourth year may most easily be put negatively: we see no reason why he should not. Since we believe that the educational value of a general program is potentially as great as that of a specialist program we see no reason for may be that some of those who are going on to graduate work would find it advantageous to take a three-year degree. But, if the Faculty really believes in the value of specialist work as a liberal education, it should not restrict that work to those who are prepared to invest four years of their time at university, but should open it to those who for various reasons are prepared to invest only three years. Since the unlamented demise of the old four-year General Course, which did at least provide a reasonable fourth year program for the student who had had enough specialization by the end of three years in an Honour Course, we have had the absurd situation that such a student can only get a degree by transferring to the third year of the General Course, thus repeating at a lower level a substantial part of the work he had already done in the third year of his Honour Course. Our proposal would make such an absurdity unnecessary.

We are aware that our proposal will raise a serious problem in relation to the provincial government's formula which determines the amount of its annual operating grant to each university. At present the grant per student enrolled is substantially greater for students in second, third, and fourth year "Honours Arts" (weighted 1½) and "Honours Science" (weighted 2) than for students in limiting the former to three years. The provision of a fourth general year would make it evident that the University valued general studies as highly as specialized studies. There may also be a positive advantage in a generalist fourth year, if it can be used to replace the somewhat anomalous "make-up year" that graduates of the present General Course are taking in increasing numbers.

Our recommendation that specialist students should be able to take an Ordinary degree at the end of three years is based largely on other reasons. In the first place, the quality of fourth year work would be improved by screening out at the end of third year those who were not likely to make very good use of a fourth year, i.e. those who did not attain second-class or first-class standing in their third year. They are not screened out now because it is considered, quite rightly, unfair to send them away after three years of at least satisfactory work, without a degree. The alternative of requiring them to transfer to the fourth year of a general program (which was the arrangement in operation for some years during the existence of the old four-year General Course, and which was found unsatisfactory) cannot be entertained, because it would treat the general program as a dumping-ground and so would deny the principle of the equal worth of general and specialist programs.

In the second place, given the principle of equal worth, the specialist is as much entitled to a degree after three years as is the generalist. How many specialists would choose to take a three-year degree would depend on several factors, among which their assessment of the career opportunities would presumably be an important one. It

"General Arts" and "General Science" (both weighted 1). If this weighting and nomenclature were retained while this University dropped its present nomenclature, the result would be financially disastrous, unless at least our specialists were recognized, for formula purposes, as equivalent to "Honours" students. It should not be impossible to get this recognition. But it would be anomalous to leave our generalists at less weight than our specialists, if we really mean the quality of instruction to be the same for both. The provincial formula assumes that students in the present General Courses cost less to instruct. If this University is serious in intending to give the generalists instruction of the same quality, year for year, as the specialists, it can scarcely accept a lower weight for them in the formula. Nor do we believe that any university should, or would want to, do so. Since the present weighting was established mainly in view of this University's differential treatment of its General and Honour students, our discarding of the differential treatment would constitute a strong reason for urging the removal of that differential weighting in the provincial formula.

We see some justification for weighting the upper years more heavily than first year, in that library and laboratory costs are higher in the upper years; but we see no justification for weighting specialists more heavily than generalists. We recommend, therefore, that the University press for a change in the provincial formula: all first year students in Arts and Science to remain (as now) weight 1, all second, third, and fourth year students in Arts and Science to be weight 1½ or 2.

III: The Structure of Degree Programs

Having set out the kinds of first year offerings that would be needed or welcomed, we may look at one problem which has given us much concern.

It has been represented to us that, particularly in mathematics and the physical sciences, it would be difficult if not impossible to offer a single first year Basic course which would be appropriate to the needs both of the intending specialists in that subject who were extremely good at it, and of all the others who might wish to take it. The difficulty of providing such a course is foreseen on the basis of the experience of these teaching departments under the present arrangement, where it is said that, presumably because natural differences in aptitude in these subjects are more extreme than in most other subjects, the spread between the level of work which can be successfully undertaken by the best students and that which can successfully be undertaken by the rest is so great that it would be impossible to meet the legitimate wants of all of them by a single, first year course.

Although we are not entirely persuaded that the difference in natural aptitude in these subjects is greater than in others, we recognize that there is a greater problem in these subjects than in most others. The fact that the failure rate in first year is higher in these subjects than in most others might be adduced as evidence that among those who attempt the honour work in these subjects, to say nothing of those who take only general work, there is so great a spread of aptitude that the standards set to accommodate the more able cannot be reached by many of the qualified but less able students. However, the higher failure rate in these subjects has little value as evidence of a supposed greater difference in aptitude: it may equally well be due to those departments having, more than others, professionalized their undergraduate offerings. Nevertheless, a real problem is presented by the experience of these departments in teaching the students of markedly different aptitude in the courses they now offer.

We point out, however, that the problem will be less serious, in several ways, in the measure that some of our other recommendations are implemented. In the first place, the Basic courses in mathematics, in physics, and in chemistry, will not have to cater to those who need some work in one or more of these subjects but whose aptitude and interest in the subject are likely to be least, since these are the students who will be in the Collateral Mathematics and/or in the Combined course in Physical Sciences.

In the second place, the freedom of choice which we are recommending (below) for all first year students is greater than that now provided in either the Honour Courses or the General Courses. It may be assumed that there are now some students taking a physical science and/or mathematics, both Honour and General, who are taking them only because the present requirements compel them to do so. Such students will not be in the new Basic courses, for they will not be required to take the subjects at all.

Thirdly, our recommendation (in the previous chapter) that in all subjects there should be less reliance than at present on lectures and more on independent and tutorial work, should mean that such disparities of interest and ability as are still found within the Basic course will not have the same bad effect as they otherwise would. The most able students need not be bored by so many lectures, which have to be suited to those of average ability, but could be encouraged to work at their own level.

We may point out, finally, that we would expect the Basic courses in all subjects to be at approximately the level of present Honour Courses rather than of present General Courses. This will be possible for two reasons. First, the entrance standing that is required will be the same as the present requirements for honour courses. Secondly, only five courses will be required, as compared with the six required in the present General Arts Course and General Science Course. We have not heard any complaint that the first year work in these two General Courses is now too heavy; consequently we think that the students of even the same calibre can handle a year made up of five somewhat stronger courses.

(b) Grouping of Subjects

Before setting out our proposals about the choice of subjects that should be available to first year students we must say something about the grouping of subjects. One purpose of such grouping, as is the case now with the grouping of subjects in the General Course, is to limit the combinations of subjects any student may take. Since we are not proposing a completely free elective system we have retained the grouping device. But since we are proposing a somewhat freer choice than exists at present we do not need to retain the four-group scheme that is now used in both the General and the Honour Courses.

We recommend that all the subjects now offered, or which may be offered, in the Faculty of Arts and Science be grouped in three Divisions: 1, Humanities; 2, Social Sciences; 3, Mathematics, Physical and Life Sciences.

This grouping, though simpler than the prevailing ones, still contains some difficulties, for there are some subjects which may reasonably claim to belong to two of the divisions, e.g. Psychology and Geography, each of which might find it difficult to choose between Divisions 2 and 3. And if such a subject were confined to one division the result would be anomalous, e.g. either social psychology would be treated as a natural science or experimental psychology as a social science.

The simple way out of this difficulty is to let such subjects be listed in both Divisions. But this would raise other difficulties. It would appear to defeat the purpose of grouping, which is to ensure that a student not do all his first year work in subjects falling within one division. Whether it would defeat the purpose depends on whether or not the two kinds of, say, psychology are so different that one part does properly belong with the natural sciences and one with the social sciences. If they are so different, the inclusion of Psychology x in Division 2 and Psychology y in Division 3 would not defeat the purpose, and should be allowed. This is a judgment that will have to be made from time to time, possibly about several subjects, by the Faculty. But we think that any subject not so divisible should not be listed in more than one division.

(c) Student Programs in First Year

We recommend that each student on entering choose five courses (but not necessarily five subjects) spread over at least two of the three divisions; and that he be allowed to take no more than two courses in any subject as part of his regular first year program (though students whose entrance standing was up to a certain level might be allowed to take a third course as an extra).

No other rules or limitations would be placed on the students' choices, except (as mentioned below in section (d) in a few subjects where high-school standing in the subject might be required as a prerequisite.

This range of choice would meet what we regard as the legitimate claims of students at various stages of certainty about what they wanted to do, and knew in what they wanted to specialize, and knew in what subject; those who expected to specialize but were not yet sure in what subject; those who were not sure whether they wanted to specialize; and those who intended not to specialize.

Thus, the student who intended to be a generalist, or the student who was not sure whether he wanted to be a generalist or a specialist, could choose courses in as many as five subjects spread over two or three divisions in whatever proportions he wished.

The student who intended to specialize, but was not yet certain in which subject, could choose any mixture of courses that spanned two divisions. He could, but need not, choose most of his courses from the one division which attracted him most.

The student who was confident that he knew his specialty and wanted to begin exploring it fully could choose four of his five courses from the division in which his specialty fell, and could choose two of these in one subject, if two courses in that subject were offered. Or he might take two courses in one subject, two in another subject in the same division, and one in a subject in another division. Or while taking two courses in the one subject, he could spread his other courses more widely.

A non-student studies the Arts and Science colendar. If the course alterations proposed in this section are implemented, will it be harder or easier to choose the course you want? A later section of this report calls for a simplified colendar.

As illustrations of the flexibility permitted for intending specialists we may list a few combinations that might lead to (but would not be required for) certain later specialist programs. As a first year program preceding specialism in English Language and Literature: basic English, basic French, Philosophy, Sociology, Astronomy; or, basic and additional English, basic Italian, Classics in Translation, Psychology; for Modern Languages and Literatures: basic French, basic German, History, Anthropology, Political Science; or, basic and additional French, basic German, basic Russian, Economics; for Mathematics and Physics: basic Mathematics, Physics, Geology, Philosophy, History; or, basic and additional Mathematics, Physics, Chemistry, English (this would also lead to Chemistry with Mathematics or Physics); for Life Sciences: collateral Mathematics, Physical Sciences, Biology (or Geology, if Biology taken in Grade 13), Ethics, collateral English; or, basic Mathematics, Physical Sciences, Botany, Zoology, Anthropology.

We draw attention to one feature of the proposed first year which is essential to its design. All courses, whether Basic, Additional, Collateral, or Combined, must have equal weight for the student's first year standing (except for a course taken as an extra, which would have no weight). Without the stipulation of equal weight the student's choice would not be as free as intended. We are speaking here of equal weight to be given to the marks in each course (term and examination marks together) in determining the student's standing in his whole year's work. This does not necessarily imply that the same number of hours of formal instruction be given in every course. Some language courses, for instance, may require more classroom hours than others. We think it reasonable that where the Basic course requires more classroom hours than the normal amount, the Additional course in that subject should then require fewer than the normal, for the Additional courses are designed for those with a special interest in the subject, who should be capable of more independent work.

It follows from the stipulation of equal weight that the present requirement of "Pass subjects" in Honour Courses must not be incorporated in the proposed program.

We recommend moreover that "Pass subjects" be not included in any of the higher years of either the general or the specialist programs. We do this for two reasons. First, since such courses, although required to be taken and passed, have no influence on a student's standing, they are bad for morale whether taken seriously or neglected. Secondly, the only valid reason for having them at present would no longer exist, for there would be more options available.

There remains the question whether the one-hour pass subject (Religious Knowledge or a Religious Knowledge option) now required in the Honour Courses should be retained, in the first or any higher year. We think it should not. Such educational merits as it has in the context of the highly specialized Honour Courses would be provided more amply in other ways in our proposed scheme. If, however, the non-academic reasons for its introduction are thought still to require it, it should be offered as an optional non-credit course to all students but not be required of any.

(B) Second Year Specialist Programs: Requirements for Entry

To meet the purposes of our proposed reform of the structure of degree courses, second year programs must be available for students whose first year programs had been of different degrees of specialization, and for those who revise their earlier tentative choice of subject of specialization. Thus, in addition to second year general programs for those who had intended and still intend to be generalists, specialist programs must be available for those who had not in the first year definitely chosen between generalism and specialism, those who had specialized in one of the three divisions but not in any one subject within it, those who had specialized to the permitted maximum (two courses) in one subject or in two subjects, those who had specialized in a subject to which they now thought themselves unsuited and who therefore wanted to change into another specialism.

We are not proposing that each of these Basic and an Additional course) in his subject or subjects of second year specialism, but should only require the Basic course.

(2) Entry into any specialist program in second year, with the exceptions noted immediately below, should not require more than two specified first year courses to have been taken; and even the exceptions should not require more than three.

The exceptions are: Life Sciences; possibly Chemistry; and two of the present combinations of languages and literatures which embrace classical and modern languages, namely Latin (French or Greek option) and Latin (English or Italian option). These are the only specialist programs which by their nature require first year grounding in three specific subjects. For specialization in Chemistry, first year work in mathematics and physics and chemistry appears to be essential. For specialization in Life Sciences the same three are needed and, in addition, some first year work in biology is necessary for those who have not done the Grade 13 biology. For specialization in each of the two Macpherson recommends abolition of the Religious Knowledge pass option. What about the students from St. Mike's, though, where R.K. is a compulsory subject? The denominational colleges are to oppose that recommendation.

(d) Admission Requirements for First Year

Now that the proposed first year program has been set out it is apparent that the present highly complex admission requirements can be greatly simplified. Since there would be no distinction in first year between specialist and general programs, there could be nothing corresponding to the present difference in admission requirements for General and Honour work. Only one standard would be set for admission to the Faculty. Beyond the general requirement there would have to be a high school prerequisite for courses in those subjects in which beginners' work is not offered, e.g. some of the languages and mathematics and possibly physics and chemistry. But it would negate the whole purpose of the proposed design if departments were allowed to stipulate that certain combinations of high school subjects (beyond the requirement of the prerequisite in non-beginners' subjects) must have been taken for admission to their courses, as they now do for admission to their Honour Courses. Nor could departments be allowed, with possible exceptions to be stated in a moment, to stipulate that a certain standing in a high school subject, above that required for admission to the Faculty, be required for admission to any of their courses, Basic or Additional. The possible exception is that in subjects where experience has shown that those without a high standing in their high school work have little chance of managing a lot of first year work (as appears to be the case in mathematics), it might be stipulated that a standing higher than the general level be required for admission to an Additional course in that subject.

We have spoken so far of admission requirements. It goes without saying that students applying for admission, and high school guidance officers, will want and should be given advice about the high school subjects that should be taken by those who are fairly sure that they want to specialize in a certain subject or division.

students should be able to enter any specialist program. In some subjects, particularly languages, mathematics, and the physical and life sciences, we think it will be generally agreed that some first year work should be a prerequisite of second year specialism. But the whole purpose of our proposed reform would be negated if entry into second year specialist programs were as restricted by prerequisites as is entry into second year of most of the present Honour Courses in these subjects. Specifically, we believe the purpose would be negated if entry into any specialist program at second year were made dependent on the student having taken the maximum two first year courses in his main subject of specialism, or worse, in each of two subjects of specialism. Such a requirement would exclude from any of those specialist programs, as at present, all but those who had definitely embarked on a certain specialism at the beginning of first year.

There is, fortunately, no problem about beginning second year specialism in any of the subjects in which specialization is now provided by the Honour Courses that have the common first year Social and Philosophical Studies. The departments who teach those Honour Courses have found satisfactory on the whole (although some reservations are occasionally expressed) the present arrangement, by which a student's entry into the second year specialist program is not conditional on his having done any first year work in that subject.

We should like to see this degree of freedom retained in those subjects. We do not think the same freedom can be introduced in the languages or the mathematics and physical and life sciences. But we do propose that entry into second year specialism in any one or any combination of these subjects be less restricted than it now is.

We make three specific recommendations on this proposal:

(1) Entry into any specialist program in second year should not require the student to have taken, in first year, the permitted maximum of two courses (i.e. both the language and literature combinations, first year work in three languages appears to be essential.

We believe that the minimum requisite grounding for second year specialism in the two science specialisms could be provided as follows. For specialism in Life Sciences: Basic or Collateral mathematics, plus the proposed Combined course in Physical Sciences (which would provide the grounding in physics and chemistry), plus (for those who had not done Grade 13 biology) the proposed Combined course in Biological Sciences. For specialism in Chemistry, we would hope that Basic chemistry plus a Combined course (or two half-courses) in physics and mathematics could be stipulated as the sufficient minimum: if this is not feasible, the three full Basic courses might be required.

Thus in these four exceptional cases as many as three first year courses might have to be made prerequisite to second year specialism. But we do not find any other specialist program which needs more than two first year prerequisites. We accordingly recommend that no other specialist programs be permitted to require more than two first year prerequisites unless they can demonstrate a similarly exceptional degree of need.

Without this second provision it would still be possible for departments to stipulate as prerequisites such a number of first year Basic courses as to exclude a lot of students who had not definitely decided on their subjects of specialism at the beginning of first year.

(3) Entry into any specialist program in second year should not require the student to have attained any higher mark in his first year work as a whole or in his first year prerequisite subject or subjects than is required for standing in them (e.g. 60 per cent). This provision is not intended to prevent departments recommending that certain specialist programs should only be attempted by those with better than average first year standing in the prerequisite subjects.

Montreal; LE DRUG ("a drag"), LE SMASH ("a gas"), a drag-show at THE HAWAIIAN LOUNGE where performers strip and incongruously reveal men's bodies beneath their finery "with hips that are angular and not full and flabby and everything (you know how it is) . . ." Finally Gigi points out that we're "all here to see some sort of female people that aren't," and the show begins.

Well performed, a drag show completes the ritual transformation. The exaggerated appearance and gestures of the performer compliment the hyper-femininity of a singer like Dionne Warwick. (Conversely, the queen's sexual ambiguity increases the humour of a routine by a decidedly unfeminine comedienne like Phyllis Diller or Carol Burnett.) Only five amateur queens dare to stand alone in the spotlight and mouth the words to a song. Cerise, a big mannish-looking broad with scary face and droopy breasts, faces the audience with a defiant look and her eyes proclaim she's a woman. She doesn't get much applause; drag shouldn't be taken too seriously.

A plump, bashful queen is coaxed up to the stage. Gigi tells her, "It's only nine or ten inches off the floor . . . what's nine or ten inches among friends?" and somebody calls out, "You're dreaming, Gigi." The plump queen is wearing a lavender rayon dress whose décolletage reveals an expanse of convincingly soft, white cleavage. She mouths, "Fly away, Kentucky bluebird . . ." she moves very little, she clasps her hands together, she strikingly resembles a gentle-faced Renaissance Madonna. She easily wins the contest (twenty dollars prize money). Max, last year's winner, makes the presentation: "From one big fat broad to another . . ."

Then the fashion parade: the Important Event (fifty dollars first prize), the Miss Astronaut Contest. Fifty queens (all amateurs) strut or mince or swish or wiggle across the platform. Some try to look Real, with varying degrees of success; some are fabulous—incredible female creatures; some ferociously parody the idea of femininity. A fantastic expenditure on wigs, jewels, makeup, clothes (many, obviously homemade). A slim blonde, with enviable legs and a magnificent female body barely covered by two free-floating panels of black crepe, poses ecstatically like Veruschka in Blow-Up and members of the audience shout, "Sex! Sex!" The M.C. lifts one of the panels, reports, "It's a boy." A black queen with full breasts completely exposed above a rhinestone halter. A buxom Amazon Queen in leopard-print blouse and black vinyl miniskirt. Phyllis Diller in a blonde fright wig (and she's wearing one of my mother's dresses!). Some sloppy drags with bulging crotches. Chosen by a process of elimination, the winners form a tableau straight out of the Miss America Pageant: Miss Astronaut (who looks like some attractive female cousin dressed for a Bar Mitzvah), avestruck and weeping, the two runners-up bestowing sisterly kisses on her cheek.

It is now 2.15 a.m., and the professionals have arrived from LETROS. The final parade is an extravaganza. A veritable Queen of Sheba in sequined burnoose. A party chick in silver mini-dress and silver thigh boots and cascading blonde curls. Another blonde with an idealized female body, and when she bends over you can see the wires supporting her gently curving bust. Roberta, wearing a gown of black sequin-fishnet over nothing, over impossibly high inflated boobies, strides nonchalantly around the stage and smiles and shakes her blonde mane. Crystal scores the best fashion point of the night, an evening coat made from squares of muskrat and embroidered satin, which she throws off to uncover filmy brown chiffon harem pyjamas. Her face (and the face is usually the giveaway) reminds you of a slightly rotting Candice Bergen. Roberta and Crystal share the prize: they are more than Real; they are radiant, victorious. Tonight, through some transforming magic, they are beating Real Women at their own game.

Moments of triumph, moments of despair. "The drag queens," suggests Gigi Mills, "are escaping out of themselves to avoid the frustrations of everyday," the frustrations perhaps implicit in their existence as men. An ugly queen sitting beside me says in a very natural man's voice, "I haven't been out for two years. Got these things second-hand (her red chiffon dress, her pointed witch's shoes), I felt rotten today and I decided, you know, to spit in the face of the world . . . I still feel rotten. I'll have to try something else next year."

The Ballet Rolland Petit

By GERRY CREATCHMAN

In reviewing the work of the Ballet Rolland Petit, one must take into account the fact that the production they presented at the Macmillan Theatre in the Edward Johnson Building was a necessarily reduced touring production. Thus, the company performed against a background of black curtains.

This limited their last presentation, the satirical L'Eloge de la folie (A Eulogy for Madness), whose nine sections, according to the program notes, depict "a realistic modern-day concept of madness", the ingredients being War, Advertising, Pills, Machines, among others. I am informed that this production is normally staged with sets consisting of fantastic machines and other items which, again according to the program notes, are carefully integrated into the spirit of the work. Perhaps had these sets been included, the production might have had a greater impact, but as it was, the work offered little that had not been stated elsewhere through other media much more effectively.

The only section that enunciated its theme in a way that was typical of the ballet was La Femme au pouvoir (Woman in Power), where, to the strains of Chopin's Waltz in C sharp minor, several male members of the company parodied classical ballet by trying to dance with grotesque female torsos. After struggling to support these torsos in imitations of classical arabesques and lifts, the men are ultimately vanquished by the sheer weight of the "women" and collapse under their weight to the ground.

Other sections, such as that on war, were however predictable from beginning to end. In this section, the male members of the company march on to the thunder of kettle-drums while four silent women clothed in white stand with heads bowed at the rear of the stage. As the dance progresses, the dancers' movements increase in intensity. Finally the men line up in a row and execute the four women while the chorale Ein Feste Burg ist Unser Gott is played on the organ. Here the symbolism used expressed nothing that has not been more effectively stated with greater impact by other media.

phy being pre-set. While there is much of interest to be found in this work, its length brought one to the edge of boredom, which not even the brilliant improvisations of the musicians could completely counteract. The two parts of Octandre struck me as the most successful of the entire program. Although conceived in the modern idiom, both parts approach the lyrical grace of classical ballet largely because they use as repertoire the movements of classical ballet recast into new forms, that at times even appear to parody conventional ballet.

As a company, the dancers set a very high standard, most of them possessing excellent techniques, the women especially. Among these Ghislaine Thesmar and Thérèse Thoreux stand out for both technical and artistic reasons. If there is one fault technically, it is that the ensembles have a tendency towards sloppiness, the most glaring instance being found in the section La Machine which, as its title would suggest, demands a high degree of precision if its theme is to be clearly stated.

However, the real star of the evening was the excellent Ars Nova Orchestra which accompanied the dancers. Associated with RTF, the French CBC, this group specializes in the performance of contemporary music, a specialty whose severe demands they satisfy with ease. Individually, they are extremely competent instrumentalists, a fact clearly evident in the ballet Formes where the conductor provides only cues to the individual musicians who then proceed to improvise whatever they wish, often imitating one another thus unifying what would otherwise be a formless mass of sound.

In the other ballets, Octandre by Edgar Varèse and L'Eloge de la folie by Marius Constant, (who by the way is the conductor) their playing as an ensemble is all that one could wish for, it being characterized by clean, precise, rhythmical playing. Nowhere in the performance did one ever sense the least hesitancy on the part of the orchestra, no matter how complex the music might be.

Perhaps it is not too much to hope that in the near future, this orchestra might return to tour the country on its own.

Len Chandler Is Happening

By BOB BOSSIN

Len Chandler is happening at the Riverboat until Sunday.

If you are afraid not to clap at the end of a number, or if you feel uncomfortable when an entertainer marches through the invisible screen at the edge of the stage, don't go.

However if clapping sometimes seems pretty silly, and all the actors and actresses too beautiful, then there is a mad poet you might enjoy at the Riverboat.

Chandler looks like Poor Mad Pip with his beard and his amazed flashing eyes. He laughs and bobs up and down to his own songs about Naked Fools who never grow up.

"Growing up means everything is all over, baby. I don't believe Frank Lloyd Wright ever grew up. Grown-ups are so cool. Me? I'm the antithesis of cool. "As he says it, he laughs and moves around. No grown-up could be that free with his enjoyment. And no certified professional entertainer scampers in and out of the spotlight and comes to your table and says it's good of you to come and did you like the song and did you agree with it.

If you are wondering, this is the same Chandler who was one of the most articulate members of the old civil rights movement. You can tell by the soft voice and guitar which organically flow in and around each other.

But Chandler has stopped being a negro and started being just one man. His songs don't begin with "we", just "I", and they are now about the sort of hang-ups a poet has: how to turn notebooks of unsifted silver dreamdust into love words and how to write the love words in someone else's mind.

What Could I Tell You That You'd Understand is a beautiful song. After it he asked a girl at a corner table if she was happy.

"I'd be happier," she said "if you would sing Just a Man."

"I've got so many new songs and you want to hear all the old songs. Isn't that a bitch?"

But he sang it, and well, except he wasn't swaying or bobbing so much to the music.

Then he sang about Loving People, and told how they recorded it with a chorus of New York diggers who were chosen because they were loving and sang like people sing, and how they all lay down on the studio floor and burned incense and drank wine and how one of the janitors joined them—and blew every mind at Columbia Records.

That ended the set. Some people applauded the performance and went home. Others found that somehow some love words had snuck into their minds.

Until Sunday you can happen with Len Chandler at the Riverboat if you want to.

The Tiger Makes Out

By John Hafezi and Brian Allen

"Today's word is 'Imminent.'" With this message scrawled on a blackboard in his junk-filled Greenwich Village apartment, Benjamin Harris, postman and self-taught intellectual, decides to release his sexual repressions and hatred of the Establishment by becoming a rapist.

This is the unique form of social protest delineated in the expanded screen version of Murray Schisgal's one-act play The Tiger Makes Out at the New Yorker cinema.

If you value excellent comedy, and or have any concern for the now ubiquitous themes of middle-class stagnation, suburban conformity, and the alienation of the individual in a society entangled in its own red-white-and-blue tape, this film is a must.

The spontaneous dialogue between the postman, brilliantly played by Eli Wallach, and his victim, a talkative suburban matron portrayed by Wallach's wife, Anne Jackson, is a superb display of intellectual gymnastics. As time the ad-lib quality of the repartee matches that of George and Martha in Virginia Woolf.

The characterization, not only of the co-stars, but also of the New Yorker in his many incarnations, is handled by Schisgal with startling credibility throughout. The minor characters, from an old couple who spend all day watching television cartoons from their bed, to the college registrar who interviews students from his office bathroom remain the typical nuts without becoming stereotypes, a tribute to both Canadian director Arthur Hiller and playwright Schisgal.

The colour cinematography is consistently good, often remarkable, and the jazz-oriented score is complimentary throughout. The pace is fast-moving, and can be accused of dragging only in one or two places.

Let us hope that The Tiger Make Out is indicative of a new trend in American comedy.

"Golden Eye"

Brian Keith aptly labels John Huston's Reflection in a Golden Eye (at the Cinema), when he drunkenly says to his frail wife, Alison, "what a debauch."

The original author, the late Carson McCullers, combined the evils and perversities of the society into "one immense golden eye", his novel, which John Huston has directed into "reflections of something grotesque", the screenplay. Huston has taken major sexual deviations, masochism, homosexuality and adultery to produce a rather weird and satirical film.

Following the trend of his previous movies, he tends to neglect characterization and in this movie concentrates on atmosphere. The movie opens on an ominous quotation from Carson McCullers and is followed by very music, and the forced symbolism of trees and horses. In effect the techniques convey an atmosphere of suspense.

The characters are neither fully developed nor focused.

Elizabeth Taylor gives an adequate portrayal of the voluptuous offspring of a general, who is married to the major. Miss Taylor, a normal healthy middle-aged woman denied conjugal relations of marriage, has an extra-marital relationship with her neighbour, her husband's superior, Brian Keith.

As her husband, Brando gives a rather comical, unintentionally so, portrayal of pouting major who rambles on in his class about the "measure" of leadership and the essential "direct self-confidence, the sense of pride" needed in a leader—a pride which in himself leads to a Narcissis complex. As if he hasn't got enough problems he also shows increasing signs of repressed homosexuality.

In contrast to the boisterous Miss Taylor, (Keith) the colonel gives a more than adequate performance as a rather simple, quiet man burdened with a neurotic wife.

The delicate Alison is skilfully portrayed by Julie Harris. Dignified, and cultured she provides a striking contrast to the slovenly, loud Lenore (Liz Taylor). Her love for the classics which her husband ridicules brings her closer to Anacleto, her doting, effete houseboy.

The weird acting is only coupled by the new strange photography used by Aldo Tonati. Strangely enough it seems to keep in theme with the title, "golden eye".

Although the entire scene gives an overall drab, peaceful and sometimes hazy effect, the central figure of attention is noticeably illuminated by an eerie golden light. The only true colours that come out are pinks and drab greens. The photography lends Alison an ethereal appearance and seems to exemplify the vulgarity of Liz and the bloatedness of Brando but compliments the middle-aged Keith.

Another Trip

By VOLKMAR RICHTER

Ready for another trip inside The Doors' minds? Their second album, Strange Days (Elektra EKS 74014) gives you another peek, but careful, its not an easy peek to take because the world inside those minds isn't a soft, pampering world. It's disturbing and even frightening — not so much as a reflection of where their heads are at, but for what it will tell you about yourself.

The Doors' World is a place where Jesus and a Hell's Angel aren't unrelated. Where sex and suicide can be contained in the same thought. It can be cold, and unknown and unfriendly, sending you out in a desperate search for a relationship. Where violence is an all-pervading undercurrent and ugliness threatens to envelop you at the next second. Where politics and sex are pursued through similar processes. All in a surrealistic cloud of images, thoughts, emotions, and above all, fears.

This second album is harsher than the first as the images go deeper into the mind and become even more macabre and thoughts become more frightening. There's fear in the future but the personality can't even articulate that fear and gain some assurance from such an achievement.

In individual songs on this LP, the Doors use their knowledge of human psychology for communications. Old popular songs communicated on the level of dances and dates. These new ones take the communication down to more significant levels — no date means loneliness and what you have to think about during loneliness.

Moonlight Drive may be about sex in a parked car, or it may be about suicide, or both, or neither. You never know with the Doors. But it's not important to know what they mean anyway. How it affects you, that's the thing.

I get the impression when they made their first LP, the Doors sat down and said: "Well we need a whopper to end off with. So they sang The End. This time they sing When the Music's Over, another 11-minute stream-of-consciousness piece; a narrative of sex and rape and religion and Hell's Angels and urbanized living and revolution and The End — among other things you might want to hear.

Like in a movie, the Doors switch from one side to another, panning in on scenes with strategic instrumental breaks. Sound effects are added discriminately: electronic music for effect in Horse Latitudes, space sounds to simulate the inner space of the mind in I Can't See Your Face In My Mind, agony screams of people in other songs.

The Doors are again in fine instrumental form with Robby Krieger's guitar simulating the ribbon-of-sound sound of the sitar in places, singing the guitar in harmony to the lead singer in others, showing versatility with Chicago blues influences in one song.

Ray Manzarek plays the most dramatic organ in the business, subtly underscoring the rest of the action like a good movie-music composer. His most interesting work is on the piano, when he uses it. John Densmore's drums are put more into the background than on the first LP. Instrumentally it's Krieger's LP.

But the star, of course, is Jim Morrison, one of the most exciting, dramatic, intimidating, and disturbing singers working today. He makes you pathologically dependent, and then plays around. And around.

Attila The Hunk

By PETER GODDARD

The Jimi Hendrix Experience, Jimi Hendrix.
Reprise RS-6261; stereo

His flesh and soul appear to have turned sour. He doesn't seem to be talking to us. He is talking to himself although wanting to be heard. His words are ossified with gloom and vengeance. He can't sing of anything else. Like Marcel Proust he has the tendency to tighten the bonds of the real world, which were always a little loose anyhow, to give an additional turn of the screw, to assume that there is an order among things that actually have none, to assume that there is an order among things where logic tells us none exists.

Jimi Hendrix, in effect, sounds like rock's Brecht.

Visually and audibly appalling, Hendrix's work is nevertheless incredibly thrilling, disturbing, offbeat, eloquent, violently crude, yet compelling. And what he is singing about is this: that the entire system of Western society, based on Aristotelian logic, upon a series of economic principles from Hobbes to Marx to Keynes, and the Judeo-Christian ethic, doesn't work — that it doesn't matter.

He is Bob Dylan's sideshow geek. The grotesque figure who laughs "money doesn't talk, it swears; obscenity who really cares?" With his hair puffed up on his head like a turban, his pock-marked face and concupiscent lips, his drooping moustache he looks like a latter-day Genghis Khan. And his music has all the subtlety of Attila the Hun's hoards.

"What do you mean 'Attila the Hun?'" says the secretary. "He's more like Attila the Hunk." Precisely. Whereas the Rolling Stones have a furry, rough-house sexuality, Hendrix's is cool, knowing . . . hip. His music is cool, knowing . . . hip.

Having failed to make any professional progress in the United States, Hendrix moved to England. Here, against the red-brick inevitabilities of British life, his shifting, bluesy sound gave older listeners an antidote to the friendly furry rock of the early Beatles. And it wasn't until his appearance at the Monterey rock festival, where he picked the guitar with his fingers, elbows, and teeth, (he didn't get as far as Gauguin) did the Hendrix experience start to become everybody's.

For the Rolling Stones and Bob Dylan had given up their public positions as rock's arch-evils. The time was ripe. Too many were getting too much satisfaction. Too many seemed to know that something was happening, an l

Canadian Music

By JACK McCAFFREY

If you visited Man in the Community at Expo, the first thing you did was file into a small semi-circular theatre and sit down on a bench. Suddenly in the darkness, you heard the voice of Ada Lee singing a wordless, haunting melody, a jazz plain-song. The curtains parted and two concentric stages began to rotate at different speeds. As the stages turned, twenty-four scenes—most of them plastic pop art representations of scenes or symbols of urban life—were brought into different combinations with one another. It was a total environment show in which the visual aspects were perfectly integrated with the music of Canadian composer Norm Symonds.

When playwright Jacques Languirand accepted the task of producing this show, he called his friend Norm Symonds, and together they worked out a scenario, whose purpose was to reflect the panorama of modern urban life. When they had decided on a "plot" and the timings, Symonds set out to create the music for CITERAMA. The assignment turned out to be very challenging.

Occupying five minutes of time, the music is divided into four sequences and was to be projected through a system of four speakers. With this in mind, Symonds wrote a score for four groups—percussion, jazz quintet, string quartet, and "music concrete"—which were to utilize the four different sources of sound.

Once Symonds had overcome the difficulties—such as integrating different kinds of music, making effective use of the four sources of sound, and staying within the precise time limits—inherent in writing the score, the problem then was to record the music so that all the diverse sounds would be synchronized. To handle this,

Symonds needed a conductor who could make everything happen at just the right time, and William McCauley was the man for the job.

The music was completed first, and then the rest of the production was created to fit the music.

Since the production was such a success, an abstract film of the exhibit has been made; and the music has been released on CITERAMA (KL Records, KL-201). On it you can hear Toronto tenor saxophonist Don Thompson and flugelhornist Freddy Stone, as well as singer Ada Lee. Although it is impossible to pigeon-hole this music, there are strong elements of jazz in it as well as taped sounds like automobiles colliding, explosions, and a jet airplane taking off. The music is fragmented, and through the use of many sounds and various styles of music, represents the diversity of urban life.

But, you ask, can it be that a Canadian has actually written this work? Yes, it's true. Norm Symonds, born in Nelson, B.C., and now living in Toronto, has been composing a lot of interesting music this year. Although he began his career as a jazz musician, Symonds has now explored many areas of music, having written for symphony, theatre, and film.

Right now, Symonds is working on a Centennial Commission for the Winnipeg Symphony. This New Work, a concert for jazz quartet and symphony, will involve improvisation in the orchestra—by both individual soloists, and also the sections. This improvisation will be based on specified melodic phrases, scales, and given rhythms. Meanwhile, improvising just as freely as they please will be the Freddy Stone Quartet, who are flying to Winnipeg specially for this performance.

Although there must be organic unity in this kind of music (sometimes called "third stream" music), many attempts in the past at combining jazz and symphonic music have been gimmicky, says Symonds, who hopes to succeed where others have failed.

Scheduled to open next month in Montreal is another ambitious collaboration of Symonds and Languirand. In PIERRE, a new kind of theatrical experience involving drama, film, and music, Symonds uses jazz to underscore the French dialogue, and the songs and ballet sequences.

As you can see, Mr. Symonds is doing some interesting things with music. Says Symonds: "The Centennial was a great shot in the arm for Canadian composers."

However, unless Canadians realize that there is musical talent in this country, composers will once again find it impossible to make a living writing their own music. "And who knows?" remarks Symonds, "maybe some day you'll walk into the restaurant around the corner and see me there—behind the counter."

THEATRE

U. C. Follies

By PAUL MACRAE

A dress rehearsal is hardly the best source on which to judge a production what with the jinx and all. Good dress rehearsal, bad show and all that? But when you watch a dress rehearsal as good as UC Follies', you begin to hope the old jinx just might lay off for a few performances at least. Say three.

Which is how many chances you get to see what may be the funniest campus show this year. Sort of the gut — splitting kind. Not that you can count on it, understand. Maybe those 10 or 15 people watching the dress Wednesday night were laughter-prone. Or had especially good dinners.

So out they pranced, the whole company and told us how UC Follies was 100 years old this year. Imagine. The dancing was surprisingly good, active and not too complex. The tune was bright and the score at the end stood two good jokes to one bad.

Save for the inevitable "You missed the lights that time!" and "Hold it!" and "Straighten up! Smile!", the whole of the first act went smooth as cream. A bit of satire on U.C. and Canadian traditions, a quickie on topless restaurants (really topless, no obscuring lights or anything), long skits, a few songs, and those little groaners called blackouts.

The dance number, Beate Ballet, could have been pepped up a bit. All Beate songs aren't as slow as Penny Lane and When I'm 64. However, with six scantily-clad girls and only a small amount of imagination, the number was never dull.

It is unusual enough to find a consistently funny first half in any production much less a lowly college effort. A lively second half was good beyond belief. If I had to pick a cause I'd chose Allan Price.

Actually Price isn't even a student anymore, he's out trying professional acting. He was part of the Follies '66 Dynamic Duo with Jack Newman, but this year Newman was hung up on a Hart House production and could only appear in a few skits.

To compensate, Price split himself into three parts — director, actor, and one of the writers. As a director he manufactured a flawless cast. Not ready for the Old Vic yet, but perfect for this type of show. Newman of course, and a mime expert named Howie Rosen, several other guys who hardly ever forgot lines and looked like they were having fun.

Price can't help steal any scene he is in. His sense of timing is perfect and he has an infinite number of faces.

The girls never get the good parts and are forced to run around in the skimpiest of costumes, yet one can try to view their plight manfully. Their dancing had that elusive quality of co-ordination. None of this "I thought we were supposed to leap stage right" stuff.

Follies is playing in Hart House theatre tonight and Saturday at 8:30. For the record I counted 25 good skits, 10 fair and only two dull ones. But, then, there's always the jinx.

Olivier

By ALAN GORDON

A great man gives a press conference and unusual things are bound to come out of it. The great man is Sir Laurence Olivier, whom Kenneth Tynan has labeled "the greatest actor alive". The unusual things are the greatness of scope and depth of his perception concerning things theatrical. He didn't exude a fiery theatricality, rather there was an intense concern with being understood, and with saying exactly what he thought. What he said was surprising, but a far cry from the usual sort of comments we often hear from "stars".

On Acting:

"I prefer to direct. Acting is seldom enjoyable. It is the sort of experience that brings with it a kind of ride. Does the jockey enjoy it all the time? Does the race horse?"

On Theatres:

"I prefer to work in the proscenium arch. I'm not sure that I prefer it from the point of view of the spectator. There's a dynamic to the other shape (the thrust stage) that could be very good. The major quantity of the seats are looking down at it, and from a directorial point of view, you get a more cunning kind of dynamic."

On Writers:

"If the writer is alive today, he should be used. Often writers are quite astonished to see what a good play they have written, if it's in the hands of a good director and cast. They had no idea how full their characterizations were. If it's a revival, you must try to recreate the theme in an illuminating way for your generation, without losing sight of what obviously must have been the author's intention at the time he wrote it. It depends how ancient the work is. It must be real to your people, and it mustn't lose sight of any of the beauties of the play. And you must, of course, hear exactly what the author meant to say."

On his National Theatre Company:

"I think that the phenomenon of the company, the company idea, is the most exciting thing that the theatre has to offer. It's more exciting than anything that was ever provided by the old star system. The extraordinary hot breath of unity that comes off the stage of a really highly trained, highly skilled company — all knowing each other inside out is nothing less than exhilarating. We've been together for about five years now, and we know each other terribly well. We can rehearse in front of each other without any kind of self-consciousness. We all help each other, all the time. We're very free with suggestions, very free with criticism. I think what results is far better than the star system could ever hope to produce."

On Tragedy:

"It is the office and purpose of tragedy to shock people — give them a kick in the stomach. Make them think, make them sit up. It is supposed to deal in a process called catharsis. In Othello, I try to make the audience bored with Othello almost, fed up with him, try to make the audience tickle the pin feathers of their worst side, their racism. Make them think, "You stupid, idiot, old nigger!". And then make them sorry. That's the catharsis I'm talking about. You should be against the character for a time and then so absolutely hate yourself for having been against him that you have gone through a spiritual experience. That's the nature of tragedy."

On Directors:

"What's a director for? Yes, he's to stop the actors from bumping into each other. Yes, he's to provide a point of view on a work. More than anything, he's the conductor. He's the rhythm finder, and he should spell out the rhythm to the other actors and to make absolutely certain that the author's meanings are conveyed through the rhythm, through the variation of pace. He should set the pauses, etc. very carefully. He should realize that both movements and stillness, a pause and a word, are tremendously, beautifully important. They are to be used with the utmost discretion. Different directors will find different points of view, different directions, but I think that if you're carefully attentive to the author, his intentions will make themselves apparent."

A great man spoke the poetry of his convictions. We could listen and be moved.

The Drama Centre

By ALAN GORDON

"We want to produce theatre intellectuals, the kind of men who will be aware of the practical side of theatre, yet whose approach to it would be analytical".

The man speaking is not Doctor Frankenstein dreaming of a theatre critic automaton he is Brian Parker, recently appointed head of the Graduate Centre For The Study of Drama. We were talking about what the Drama centre was trying to do and how exactly Mr. Parker saw it being done.

"Basically, our job is twofold. We exist to further the scholarly study of Drama, and to stimulate Campus theatre."

Why did he intend to further campus drama? Or even the study of Drama at all?

"That's the same as asking why study drama at all? To enlarge its scope. Scholars brought a knowledge of the Noh play to Western culture, and put Shakespeare back into his context, as a writer who wrote for a certain kind of theatre in a certain kind of society. Also, remember that modern drama is being written by intellectuals, Beckett, Brecht, Ionesco, Pinter, all of these are men whose work is influenced by the intellectual currents of their time. All of their work deals with theories of knowledge."

But why should drama be studied in preference to, say, hotel management, wine stewarding?

"Well, the more one is aware of what is going around one, the more alive, he is, the more interesting society is... he becomes less passive... not just a, uh, box watcher."

How are you going to stimulate the campus drama?

"Two ways. One, through our Hart House shows, which are interesting, and serve as a training ground in which students can learn to cope with the practical side of theatre. No one can study drama without knowing how a show is produced, and with Bob Gill's practical courses in acting and directing, as well as the Hart House shows, we give our people a fairly good acquaintance with this real world of theatre."

The problem of dilettantism fostered by such an acquaintance rather than a thorough knowledge becomes more acute when Mr. Parker admitted that academic credit wouldn't be given for taking these practical classes or for participation in campus productions, by the Hart Houseian or not.

"That is a problem that we're aware of but unless we get some kind of new degree or the style of attaining the old degree is changed, it's one that is almost impossible to overcome."

What is the other way that you stimulate campus drama.

"Oh yes. I have a small grant that enables me to financially help any serious production."

How much financial help can you give?

"No more than one hundred to two hundred dollars. And I've already decided to back the P.L.S. and the week in the Central Library for Godot. There is some money left, with no strings attached. It just depends if you can persuade me that the project is plausible and worthwhile."

Well, we've seen how the centre stimulates campus drama. How do you further the study of drama?

We act as a clearing house, breaking across traditional lines of departments and faculties. If a student wanted to study Drama before the centre, he would have had to work on either French or English or German drama, and attach himself to that department. Now, any graduate course in drama, or related to the study of drama is cross-appointed to the centre of Drama, and the students in the centre can take an enormous width of courses which they couldn't have before.

Remember, we're only two months old, and our organization is in an extremely fluid state. It's a nascent centre, at best, still trying to see what it can do. There is an area in which we can do positive work. What we have to do is discover the best way we can do it."

Canadian Furniture Books

By JOAN MURRAY

H. G. Ryder. Antique Furniture by New Brunswick Craftsmen. Rverson, 1965, 180 pages, $15.00.

Miss Ryder's book is the first collection of material on early New Brunswick craftsmen. For this reason, it is an extremely valuable reference work. Narrated by counties, the text goes through the workmen of the areas — some of whom have not discovered furniture as yet.

The text resembles, in its anecdotal, slightly clumsy, but extremely enthusiastic style, Gerald Stevens's In a Canadian Attic and other books of that genre. It is a book written with affection and thought yet slight technical faults make difficult reading. For instance, there are no footnotes for the quotations. These would have been very valuable since the material is unfamiliar to most readers. Nor are the opening plate numbers placed in the body of the text which leads to difficulty in locating them. Imperfect proof-reading has meant the loss of part of a sentence on p. 91. Furthermore, the blurb on the book's jacket speaks of end-paper maps which do not correspond with the single front-page map at the front of the book.

These difficulties can be smoothed over. The material is certainly worth it. Although there are only a few pieces of furniture as "fine" as what was being done in Philadelphia and Boston at this time, much of what was done in New Brunswick was beautifully proportioned and elegant, though less sensuous than French-Canadian furniture. It's interesting too that large quantities of N. B. furniture are probably in Maine labelled as Americana. This book should begin a distinction between the two

Many of the documents used are extremely interesting like the one on indentures which shows that a furniture apprentice earned $40 a year in 1865, plus schooling. The Journal of John Quinton had the following passage: "I went to St. John to learn a trade. My father suggested this step... I, a green and yellow cabbage, accepted, having no will of my own..." which sounds Chinese both in imagery and theme. I was also interested by the two cabinet-makers, Alexander Ross and James Hunter, who lived and worked in the Frederickton goal where they were imprisoned for debt from 1788-90.

Someday I would like to see Jasper Armstrong's chair with the vertebrae of a whale set in mahogany frame for a back. Sounds like a chair with backbone.

D. R. Stewart. A Guide to Pre-Confederation Furniture. Longmans, 1967, 150 pages, $12.00.

This text is little more than a picture book by an interested amateur. Mr. Stewart, largely using his own collection, has written a book for — naturally — collectors. Thus, handy suggestions for dating old furniture are found, using hinges, knobs, nails, and pulls as well as for detecting the use of the block plane (the fingertip feels a gently undulating surface). In this way, the author hopes you won't buy a fake.

The beautiful bowls made from wooden burls are interesting as is the captain's chair from the studio of Daniel Fowler, the early Canadian watercolorist, on Amherst Island. But it would have been helpful to have a more factual text. Documentation of the pieces is entirely lacking and sometimes one wonders why the author has dated the pieces as he has. Furthermore, if influences like that of the Pennsylvania Dutch are mentioned, some description of what the influence looks like, must appear. Otherwise, the author is simply namedropping.

The only incredible parts of the book, which fully reveal the author's gaudierie are the horrible "helpful" suggestions for the use of old Canadian furniture as coffee tables, book shelves, hi-fi cabinets, and bars!

Grim Fairy Tales For Adults

By JOHN CLUTE

Grim Fairy Tales for Adults, by Joel Wells. Collier-Mac Millan Canada, $4.75.

Here is a slim volume of parodies, with perhaps the stupidest title I've ever seen. The parodies — mostly of live American authors — are pretty good, though none of them are unkind and it's too bad that Joel Wells didn't gird himself to be a little unkind with the likes of Salinger and Bellow and Updike and God forgive us Ayn Rand. The parodies are all right but that title.

Grim Fairy Tales for Adults — Jesus. Shades of Richard Armour, remember Richard Armour in the nether regions of the Saturday Evening Post writing those cute nonsense poems, those sly jabs at mothers-in-law in the United States in 1955 with Norman Rockwell on the cover? But one must contain oneself. Maybe the title wasn't Wells' idea in the first place — and anyway it does tell us something about the parodies he has written.

His idea, almost a good one, was to retell certain fairy stories as certain authors might have written them, so that we have that poor dolt J. D. Salinger writing "Hansel and Gretel," and that passionate urban Jew Saul Bellow writing "Rumpelstiltskin the Goldmaker." Not so bad an idea, except it was a cop out.

Great parodies render not only the superficialities of manner; they are not set-pieces. Great parodies are re-workings — foreshortenings — ikons — of the very world in which their subjects live. The joke-parody, such as these retellings of fairy tales, can get its laughs — I laughed quite a bit — but because it is truly divorced from content, from the sense of compulsive juice that marks the great writer, it becomes wearisome, a fart.

The great writers of today do their own parodies, and I suppose in that sense they are protected from the likes of Joel Wells. His attempt at joking with James Joyce — Cinderella as Molly Bloom — backfires pretty dreadfully, because Molly Bloom was in the first place a figure of parody, and we were moved by her through and despite that fact. Wells' Cinderella turns into a pale Molly Bloom, and we do not laugh at her resentful lower-class daydreaming about glass slippers and princes and the like; we are moved.

Cinderella comes first in Grim Tales, and maybe it was written first, because Mr. Wells doesn't try again to do a joke-parody on a great contemporary author. He leaves Nabokov alone, and Burroughs, and Pynchon. He even leaves Durrell alone. For the most part he is content to work on the American pogo-stickers like the ones I mentioned up above somewhere — Salinger and Bellow and Updike — missing only Bernard Malamud, who is almost as overrated as Updike is.

But even here Wells ran into the problem of parodying the parody. Excluding females with three names and the author of Hawaii there may not be a writer in the world today who is not so conscious of what he is doing with words that he is not, of necessity, writing a parodic style. With writers of substance, it works, and joke-parody is subsumed under the presence of its subject. With John Updike, self-parody does not work, because the man as writer is a simpering twit, and has deposited his ten volumes over the past decade like a fall-out of rotten souffles.

Joel Well's parody of Updike is typical of the book; it's quite funny, quite sensitive to nuances of fattuity — and it's not quite as funny as the original. We will demonstrate in closing, with two examples. First, Updike as Peter Rabbit. Second, Updike as Updike, may he be forgiven, maybe.

McGregor's wall is high. Its rough bricks are held rigid by mucus-colored mortar, each strip of which seems to exude a personal malignancy so that Peter, walking close beside it, feels subjected to the bad breath of a thousand rusty mouths.

Do you remember a fragrance girls acquire in autumn? As you walk beside them after school, they tighten their arms about their books and bend their heads forward to give a more flattering attention to your words, and in the little intimate area thus formed, carved into the clear air by an implicit crescent, there is a complex fragrance woven of tobacco, powder, lipstick, rinsed hair, and that perhaps imaginary and certainly elusive scent that wool, whether in the lapels of a jacket or the nap of a sweater, seems to yield when the cloudless fall sky like the blue bell of a vacuum lifts toward itself the glad exhalations of all things.

Baby, may I sniff your implicit crescent?

MUSIC Cont'd

knew what it was. Hence The Jimi Hendrix Experience and to some extent, the Doors.

Hendrix's music broils in its own somber juices. In its bare modern realism it, like the blues, is somewhat bereft of spiritual values. Although its roots come from the blues, these are masked in electrical effects so intense that the result sounds completely original.

And although (again like the blues) Hendrix's music is frequently associated with a state of depression, of lethargy or despair it is not solely a physical or mental state.

It is not solely the endurance of suffering or a declaration of hopelessness; nor is it solely a means of ridding himself of a mood. It is all these and it is more: it is part of Hendrix's being, living within him, and with him.

The words are incidental. Only on one cut, Hey Joe, does Hendrix come close to human contact. Throughout, the rest of the album sounds like the ultimate extension of the mechanistic sound of the Beatles' Day in the Life.

Jimi Hendrix backed by Mildred Mitchell on drums and Noel Redding on guitar in actuality reworks T. S. Eliot's idea of "Between the idea/And the reality/Falls the shadow." He sings of a world partially perceived images. He is one of the few underground artists who has rarely seen the light of sophisticated hipness. He can't sing of anything else. He doesn't seem to be talking to us. His flesh and soul appear to have turned sour.

Young Poets

By BILL BARCLAY

Janis Rapoport. Within the Whirling Moment; House of Anansi; 1967.

Barry Charles. Magic From my Lungs; House of Anansi; 1967.

Janis Rapoport and Barry Charles are both very young to be calling themselves poets. Miss Rapoport graduated from New College here at Toronto very recently and Barry Charles is a 17-year-old "hippie" now working out of Rochdale College.

I suppose that a reviewer must therefore utter the clichéd inanity that their verse shows promise and that they cannot really be expected to produce significant work this early in the glorious game of calling yourself a poet. But the House of Anansi has seen to it that they are now very much on display; they will have to be prepared for the inevitable knocks.

The central poem in Miss Rapoport's Within the Whirling Moment is called "The Kiss", and is taken from the sculpture by Rodin:

Those lovers linked in bronze will not escape the wonder of their first embrace.

Today's passion is blown of the air

*not hewn in stone;
a fragmenting spiral
within the whirling moment.*

In this, and in almost every other poem in her volume, she expresses a belief that love is a fleeting thing which leaves behind at least one very hurt and potentially cynical human being. And this person needs to be loved. The problem is that this though is hardly original. It is a variation upon a variation... of a theme that was dealt with by poetic minds probably long before man learned how to write. And it is a theme that we, as modern readers, understand only too well within ourselves.

Great literature deals with new ideas understanding. The most significant writers are engaged in a bloody battle of the soul to open up new frontiers of human feeling and thought. Hopefully the rest of us who are dodging along in safe territory behind will catch up in time.

If the verse of Miss Rapoport, or of any other poet, is to be significant it must deal with what is going on in the front lines. It has to say something new to the reader based upon at least partial glimpse of the battlefield, and must endeavour to lead him to fresh insights and realizations about himself.

If a work of art fails to do this then it must be assessed on the basis of its style — the effectiveness with which the subject matter is communicated to the reader. Miss Rapoport's verse fails in this regard too. Her zeal for manipulating the sounds of words for a particular effect as they interact upon each other lacks rigorous discipline. Witness the following: "i am/ woman/ born a/ treasure/ in man's/ dark deceitful/ leisure."

These lines can be attractive at first reading, but they succeed, ultimately, only in causing the reader to question her sincerity. Her words become a game in which they cover over a genuine emotional response with the glossy enameled humour of the cynic.

Barry Charles is also concerned with love, but in his verse he penetrates more deeply into the subject. And what he has seen in his probing frightens him. For Charles is running away from the front lines — or as close as he ever came to them. He has seen more than he cares to.

In Magic from my Lungs, Charles writes of the particular destructive elements that inevitably seem to mar a potentially beautiful love experience. He finds the source of this destruction in himself, in others close to him, and in "some strange heritage... not in our textbooks." Of a woman sleeping near him he writes, "Your unconsciousness/ I disdain/ your body and/ grace/ a mountain/ with unconquerable peaks". It is his awareness of a menacing kind of ugliness which causes him to write: "Ages of sewage scar our child/ Let us choose him a name to/ end our fight."

This verse is obviously that of a disillusioned and hurting animal. And he is running away from the experience because he hasn't got the guts to keep loving. Just like the rest of us.

But in running from love he unfortunately assumes the stance of another poet who does have the guts, and who, I hope — for our sakes — is still up their dodging the shrapnel. Namely Leonard Cohen. Magic From my Lungs is permeated with Cohen's most recently published volume of poetry, Parasites Of Heaven. Charles has borrowed an appallingly large number of images from Parasites, quite flagrantly. And he has done the same with the form and style of many of his poems.

At least he is honest enough to acknowledge the source of his inspiration. One of his poems begins: "Parasites of Heaven/ you plague my poems/ and you creep into my books". Cohen can be an excellent influence on a young writer, or on a young man. But he is quite capable of writing for himself. It is only in one or two poems that Barry Charles indicates that he may have a voice of his own.

'The freedom and responsibility mean a lot to me.'

Dave Shelly, a London Life representative in Montreal

"In my last year of university I talked to recruiters from several different types of companies. All of them offered jobs with training programs which would eventually lead to a position of responsibility. But I wanted something more. I wanted something that would let me get out and meet people. I wanted a position that would give me responsibility right away and at the same time a degree of independence and freedom. In other words, I wanted something more than just a job. That's why I joined London Life."

Dave Shelly graduated from Loyola College in economics in 1966. After a three-month training course, he chose the agency he wanted to work in from among the 100 operated by London Life across Canada. After much discussion and considerable debate, we now inaugurate a new approach to the backpage. It will be a pretty variable thing, this Review in Brief, and will be able to include short reviews, observations, comments, letters,—much of the same kind of thing that the old backpage carried.

Last year, Gail Dexter designed the Backpage after John Clute pointed out that it was impossible to distinguish the last page of the Review and Page Five of the Varsity. It worked very well.

Hopefully, we will be able to have the same kind of spontaneity in the new format that we tried to have on the Backpage—with the same Backpage people writing short observations on what's happening and what's on.

After a burst of narcissistic energy on our parts, you can see what we look like. Lucky you.

Dear Sir:

I would like to make a few comments on Ian Gentles' article in Review, Oct. 27. His argument seems to be as follows: Technology has never been very beneficial and is today leading us to psychological, ecological, and nuclear disaster. He then identifies abusive technology as the causes of cancerous economic growth, which results in exploitation and exclusion, at home and abroad. The only solution, according to Mr. Gentles, is to 'halt' technology.

He has put the cart before the horse. Since he is a historian, let us reconsider the history. The standard of living in Europe rose progressively from the 12th century to the 16th century, when it began to decline. As he points out, that decline, on a global view, is still continuing.

However, when we examine the technology of the period, we do not find it non-existent or stagnant, as Mr. Gentles implies. In fact, stimulated by the prosperity and self-confidence of the small free medieval cities, the techniques and tools of construction, navigation, mining, household science, and the arts and crafts developed prodigiously, providing the experimental basis of the scientific discoveries to come, and culminating in the magnificent Gothic cathedrals.

The significant change in the 16th century that caused the technology to become oppressive and the fall in living standards, was the social-political change from independent self-governing cities, surrounded by their natural regions, to warring centralized states, with their opulent capitals and taxed and impoverished countryside. (We still have not recovered our senses.)

The lesson is that the nature and worth of an historical period's technology is a reflection of the politico-economic and social system and the values it represents. Mr. Gentles has warned us against a progressive notion of history, yet he has himself a progressive view of technology. Moreover, technology, like history, cannot be 'halted'. However, if the real causes of abusive technology can be identified, its flow can be re-directed by developing a different kind of technology as part of a better social system.

The American automobile is a remarkably functional and efficient technological machine. However, its efficient functions are in no way related to transportation, but are those of stimulating the economy and providing a chromeplated womb to assuage the psychological insecurity of the Depression generation. Modern man does indeed go to work to build a car, and build a car to go to work. However, it most emphatically is not true that the artificially created demand, centralized control, mass production, and population concentrations of our system are necessary features of an advanced and efficient technology. These simply follow from the facts that this system provides immense profits to baronial corporations and satisfies the psychological needs of a squeamish and obsessed middle class.

What are the alternatives? I could not even begin to discuss the possibilities of a liberatory technology here. The essential point is that intellectuals must not shirk their responsibilities and leave the decisions, by default, to 'experts', politicians, social engineers, and planners. These have done enough damage already.

The study of technologies (I do not mean study in the technologies) must become one of the humanities. A 'scientific' training is not necessary; even a historian can understand, for instance, what the Goodmans point out in 'Communitas', that electric power and electronic communications relaxes the Steam Age necessity of concentration of industry, and that it is easier to transport machined parts than commuters. (If such simple minded ideas were fully applied, London Bridge really would come falling down!)

The technocrats of General Motors, the Pentagon, and Washington-Moscow have made their decisions — we shall be managed, centralized, megalopolized, depersonalized, leading straight to Brave New World. If in the universities (the last dying remnant of the medieval cities), our few remaining independent scholars follow Mr. Gentles in his obscurantist and Luddite path, and fail to provide leadership and viable alternatives, we are doomed.

Yours,

R.D. Tennent (SGS)

Dear Sir:

Mr. Gilbert's presentation of the situation in South America cannot be left unchallenged. Like so many other leftists he has a yen for telling one side of the story and has an acute case of paranoia (subtype USA-CIA-itis).

It is not true that the United States has chosen to ignore poverty, hunger and disease. On the contrary, the United States spends $12 billion annually under the Alliance for Progress trying to alleviate these problems. Furthermore, in 1961, when the Alliance's Charter was signed the U.S. asked South American countries to undertake land and social reform to facilitate progress. In Chile, right wing Senator Francisco Bulnes threatened a takeover of American copper companies in retaliation for U.S. support for land reform.

South American countries are not client states of United States; they quite often criticize U.S. actions with respect to South America. For example, at this spring's Punta del Este conference, the President of Ecuador, one of the smallest and weakest South American countries, verbally flayed the U.S. in the presence of President Johnson, for devoting insufficient attention to the problems of South America while pouring billions into the Vietnamese war.

The call for equality, social progress and land reform, once monopolized by the Communist has now been taken over by several democratic South American governments. Peru, Chile, and Colombia have followed the lead of Mexico, Venezuela and Costa Rica in bringing to power governments whose platform and intention is "progress with freedom." In Peru the government is training hundreds of technicians and thousands of college students to work in remote villages helping the Indians to build schools and roads, and organizing them to demand decent wages and fair prices for what they grow.

It is interesting to note that the greatest Communist efforts at subversion have been made in countries starting to make headway against social problems, while few if any guerrillas are operating in the most conservative countries, Paraguay and Argentina.

The strongest Communist challenge was hurled at Venezuela, the most democratic and progressive country in South America. Here Communist insurgents roamed the countryside and spread terror in the streets of Caracas on election days. On one occasion saboteurs knocked out a sixth of Venezuela's oil production, the country's leading source of income. The meaning of this strange paradox is clear: Communists are more interested in seizing power than in helping people, so guerrillas consistently attack democratic and liberal countries whose programs seek to alleviate the misery and discontent on which Communism feeds.

As Castro's Cuba so amply demonstrates, Communism is no solution to Latin America's problems. Cuba is a dictatorship as absolute as any in Latin America. No elections of any kind have ever been held or promised. For years after Castro's takeover, the sugar production, the foundation of the island's economy, remained at 60 per cent of the pre-1959 level and has surpassed pre-Castro figures only recently. Without the Soviet Union's annual half-a-billion dollar support the country would have gone bankrupt. One would shudder to think what would happen to South America's undernourished multitudes if the Reds took over, considering that no Communist country, not even technologically advanced Russia fifty years after its revolution, has ever managed to become self-sufficient in foodstuffs.

The problems of South America are real enough; there is large scale poverty, injustice and malnutrition. These problems are deeply rooted in South America's geography, history and the continent's high birth rate which tends to slow down economic advance. The United States should and could do more to help. But the above facts must be noted in addition to Mr. Gilbert's one-sided account before any kind of real understanding of South America's problems can be reached, or alternate solutions to these problems can be considered.

Yours,

George Haydu

Survey predicts rapid college growth

OTTAWA (Special) — Enrolment in community colleges will reach 110,000 students by 1975, an Economic Council survey predicted Monday.

The special report on university and post-secondary enrolment said Canada is lagging behind other countries in industrial and technical education.

The 1975 enrolment figure represents a 400-per-cent increase over the 26,000 students enrolled in such institutes in 1965.

The report says, the changes underway are the most significant developments taking place in the educational system.

The report forecasts that full-time university enrolment will increase an average of 30,000 to 35,000 students each year in the next eight years.

By the mid-70's one of every six Canadians will have at least a Bachelor of Arts degree, as compared with the present one in 10.

There will be a decrease in the rate of high-school dropouts, 90 per cent of high school age youths will be in school as opposed to the present 80 per cent, the report says.

AUCC says yes to student power

MONTREAL (CUP) — Student power got the nod at the annual conference of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada Tuesday.

Most presidents said the trend toward student representation is inevitable.

They said student representation could be most significant in matters such as bookstore policy, parking, on-campus housing, and other such concerns.

They recommended student representation on university senates and senate committees, faculty councils and departments, but not on boards of governors.

G. C. Andrew, executive director of the AUCC, said there was too much emotionalism surrounding student power. Universities should be governed on a rational, rather than an emotional basis.

H. D. Hicks, president of Dalhousie University conceded that students are growing up quicker than ever, but "they still have a hell of a lot to learn."

He said student involvement in policy-making could be taken to ridiculous lengths.

Faculty brief proposes U of W changes

WATERLOO (CUP) — Extensive changes in the government of the University of Waterloo have been proposed by a faculty association brief.

The faculty suggests:

"A board of governors be replaced by a university council; the senate be limited to upper-level academics; a beefing up of faculty council and academic departments."

A five-point "bill of rights" proposed:

—Department members electing and removing department heads;

—all department members taking part in discussions concerning employment of new faculty members and new courses;

—departments writing their own constitutions and making their own requests to the university body;

—students being incorporated into the departmental meetings and taking part in the various committees.

Carleton council proposes reforms

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Carleton University students council has taken a stand on education reform within the university.

At the council meeting Wednesday, the following proposals were passed:

—class discussions instead of lectures with the distribution of lecture notes to the students;

—optional exams arranged between the student and professor, depending on the type of course;

—use of guest lecturers and instructional aids;

—more freedom for teaching assistants in the handling of auxiliary discussion groups and labs;

—large classes to break into smaller seminars and discussion groups.

The recommendations are intended as a starting point for dialogue with faculty and administration, said council president, Bert Painter.

Canadians sign oath for U. S. awards

OTTAWA (VNS) — Canadian students have been asked to sign an allegiance oath to the U.S. to qualify for certain scholarships at American universities, it was charged this week.

Dr. Lewis Brand, an MP from Saskatchewan told the House of Commons he could furnish photographic copies of documents to prove his point.

He said he knew of three University of Saskatchewan students who got the scholarships, given by the U.S. department of health, education and welfare.

Later they were sent forms containing an oath of allegiance and instructions to go to the nearest U.S. consulate to sign them, Dr. Brand said.

U of W student court tries to gain power

WATERLOO (Special) — The federation of students' judicial committee at the University of Waterloo is attempting to gain power to uphold the rights of students on campus.

At present the committee of four acts as a student court to uphold the informal rules of student council. It is empowered to act on those cases referred to it by provost for student affairs.

The committee wishes to have all student discipline problems under its authority.

"If the committee can attain full power, then all student cases will come under this group," says Stephen Flott, chief justice of the student committee.

"We must fight unilateral levying of fines and suspensions."

Walter Gordon at U of T

By LAWRENCE BRICE

Maverick Liberal Walter Gordon, urged 150 University of Toronto business graduates last night at take a stand on Vietnam.

"We know that if this savage conflict develops into war between the United States and China it will mean inevitable the use of nuclear bombs and nuclear missiles," he said.

The former finance minister reaffirmed his stand that Canada should "speak out against the policies of the United States."

He said the war "could lead to a world holocaust from which Canada could not hope to escape."

His speech touched four major Canadian issues:

—a resolution of the Vietnam conflict,

—support of medicare,

—independence of U.S. domination,

—drive for Canadian unity.

Gordon warned that Canada's future seriously depends "on our ability as Canadians to hold together and remain united."

He expressed delight that Quebec Liberals "have repudiated Mr. Levesque overwhelmingly."

On the problem of foreign investment in Canada—Gordon's pre-occupation—he said:

"Many of the key decisions that affect industry in Canada are made by absentee owners who perhaps have little knowledge of our country and in any event feel little responsibility for those who work and live here."

Mr. Gordon also suggested that by the end of the century the Canadian population should double.

"By that time, the total output of the nation should be quadrupled—and therefore the standard of living of the average Canadian by the year 2000 should be about twice as high as it is today," he said.

The young business executives who had gathered in the Granite Club's posh ballroom paying $7.50 a plate to hear Gordon, listened with deep interest to the 1 1/4-hour speech.

Gordon, now president of the Privy Council, has served on the U of T Board of Governors for 15 years, and led a stormy political life.

Yet recently he has been—like the name of his Schomberg, Ont. farm—Seldom Seen.

Ending his first major speech in six months he called for immediate legislation to provide a Canadian owned Canada.

"If we fail to do this we shall lose our economic independence—and with that, our political independence also," he said.

Western team holds second

By DOUG WOODS

The Varsity Western rugger team squeaked by York 9-8 on the back campus on Wednesday night to keep their hold on second place in the western league. The game was another mud-bowl.

George Wraw opened the scoring for Blues with a penalty kick early in the first half. A few minutes later Bob Garwood carried the ball across the York line for a try. By this time the wet conditions had made the ball difficult to kick and Paul Henry was not able to get the convert. York rounded out the scoring before the half with a converted try.

With the score 6-5 the Blues lapsed into inept passing and bad line-out play. The only reason the York team did not clean up at this point was that they were playing even worse than the Toronto squad. York finally managed a penalty kick but their hopes of a victory were squashed when George Wraw counted a try late in the game. From then on it was a question of who made fewer mistakes.

Blues didn't really deserve to win; it was just that York deserved it even less. But teams are allowed to have off days and if they win on those off days — so much the better.

This Saturday there are two games on tap. The western team plays Western University, the division leaders, at 12 noon, and the eastern team plays R.M.C. at 10. Both games are on the back campus.

At present Blues eastern team leads the eastern division with an undefeated record for the season. They need only one more victory to clinch the eastern championship and go into the final against Western University for the Turner Trophy.

As yet it is not clear who is in the second spot because the results of two McGill - R.M.C. games have not been submitted. If McGill won both those matches then they are only a game behind the Blues and the championship will hinge on the last regular season game which is a week from Saturday on the back campus between Toronto and McGill.

SMC & PHE weld each other to a draw while Engineers scare off Dentistry

By JIM MORRISON

Inter factotum

A mud-marked 1-1 deadlock yesterday between St. Mike's and PHE broke open the Mulock Cup race. This tie, coupled with the Skule victory over Dents on Wednesday (by default), leaves only Vic and Engineering on top.

The St. Mike's single came on a second quarter boot by quarterback Jim Poland. The Baby Blue tied it up right after intermission, when Gene Vincze's kickoff went into the endzone. A major fracas occurred at this point, since the ball was recovered by a Physedder after the whistle had gone. No T.D.

Discouraged, it seems, by three straight heavy losses, the Dentists fielded only three men for their match with SPS. Their future in Group I is still being debated.

SOCCER

Meds A won another soccer game Tuesday, bulldozing Pharmacy 2-0 with the help of Ray Osborne and Dave Carll.

Wednesday's games saw Sr. Eng. overturn Trinity 1-0, Forestry wreck New College 2-0, and Law bury Vic 1-3-1.

Chivone was the engineering foreman; Bill Glover and Larry Lambert hammered hard for Forestry. Dkoka, Felkai, and Boelkle for Law were replied to by Vic's Dave Sharpe.

Knox College undermined Dentistry yesterday with the scoutry of Spencer Estabrook.

LACROSSE

In Wednesday games, Vic I trampled SMC 11-6, Innis blasted Scarborough 9-3, Erindale slew Engineering 8-4, and Knox stormed by PHE B 6-3.

Al Vallillee (3), Gord James (2), Frank Blyth (4), Stew Evans and Joe Murphy vanquished the Vic victims, who were led by Bruce Ferguson (6), and John Beaudett. Six scores from Bob Besley, and three from Tony Knowles helped Innis overcome Scarborough's McCubbin and Mouncey.

Doug McKeown (4), Walt Pelech (3) and Billy Martin led the suburbanians over engineers Paul Leinonen (3) and Bruce Hamilton. Knox knockers were Grainger Cowie (4) and Brian Keys (2), while Wamuraki, B. Feauer, and D. Mockford answered athletically.

Gunn wins, Blues lose 4-1

Dave Gunn was the only winner for Varsity Blues in City League squash play which began this week. Gunn, playing in the number 4 position defeated Crawford Gordon of the Badminton and Racquet Club 3-2.

However, the rest of Varsity's "A" team was unable to match his performance as Blues lost 4-1. Frank Buck, Blues' number 1 seed almost pulled a major upset against John Bassett. Buck was leading Bassett the Ontario champion, 2-0 but Bassett came back to beat him, 3-2.

Varsity's "B" team, consisting of seeds 6 through 10 was shut out by the Granite Club 5-0.

The City League consists of the various squash clubs around Toronto and district. Matches are held two or three times each month. While Blues rarely win, the purpose is to give them experience against some of the best players in the province on regulation courts.

Win over Stangs ensures Cup

Mathematical mooncalts may marvel at the many possibilities still floating around concerning the SIFL's eventual champion this year. However, they can salt away their shiv slide-rules for good if what should happen tomorrow, does happen.

At Varsity Stadium on Saturday, our lovable front-running Blues play their last regular season game before the home folks when they take on Western Mustangs. Obviously, Blues are heavy favourites to slam 'Stangs, but the gridiron graveyard is littered with the corpses of fine football teams who have fallen victim to the dreaded weapons, overconfidence and underestimation.

In their two previous confrontations with the men of John Metras, Blues have been anything but easy victors. And in neither game were they able to play 60 minutes of good football. To add to coach Murphy's apprehensions, Western is coming to town off their best game of the season. Last Saturday against McGill, Mustangs played superbly as they waffled Redmen 47-1.

Still, Blues should win, and if Queen's goes through the motions as expected against McGill, it all adds up to a Yates Cup for Toronto.

A Varsity defeat on the other hand could mean a sudden-death playoff for the third straight year. For that eventuality, Western would have to beat Queen's next week.

But that ain't all. Should Varsity also lose next week's game with McGill (Good God!), and Queen's win their game in London, a playoff would be held between Toronto and the Golden Gaels (remember them?).

Hold on, says McGill coach Tom Mooney. Even his Redmen aren't out of the picture. They can force a playoff by sweeping their two games against Queen's and Blues. Clear, frosh?

So, dammit Blues, clear this cumbersome canal of confusion by winning on Saturday!

Meanwhile, injuries continue to plague the Varsity camp. First string offensive guard, Gord Whitaker is lost to the team for the remainder of the season with a concussion. Whitaker, a tremendous competitor, suffered the injury during the game against Queen's Natural re-placement, Doug Backnan, is on the limp so Murphy will alternate between Jack Rosati and Tom Reed at guard.

GLEN MARKLE

Always dangerous
JOHN METRAS

Halfback Glen Markle's strong performances against Gaels have removed all thought from the coach's mind of moving him back to his linebacking position. Markle gained 59 of Varsity's 68 yds. rushing on Saturday.

One change in the backfield will be the increased presence of sensational rookie Wolfgang Gut. Gut was used exclusively on punt returns against Queen's as Murph declined to tamper with his start as backfield of Markle, Mike Raham and Pete Broadhurst.

rod mickleburgh

PUTRID POT-POURRI

Believe-it-or-else-item-of-the-semaine has groped its way into the Varsity sports office. Apparently, the weekly wire of whimsy from the CIAU, which ranks Canadian college teams, has continued to ignore the holes shot through Queen's armour of invincibility by Varsity Blues.

Despite successive defeats to Blues, the Golden Gaels are still the number one collegiate team in the nation. And Varsity remains as only the fourth best, according to this titillating tidbit of information. I guess if Blues really want to hang on to that esteemed fourth place ranking, they'll have to lose their next two games. That way the sage selectors will be sure to keep them there. Two straight losses seem to be the criterion for permanence.

You can forget about Varsity participating in the College Bowl. According to Bowl mogul, Ivor Wynn, there's absolutely no chance of an SIFL team being allowed in. After begging SIFL participation in the Bowl way back last Spring, only to be haughtily spurned by the all-mighty OQAA aristocrats, Ivor says the Bowl selection committee has no option but to go ahead as planned. "Everyone would just be tickled to death to have Toronto in the College Bowl, but we can't have them refusing in the spring, and then wanting to be included in November. We tried to plan a year ahead but got no co-operation at all from the SIFL." See next Wednesday's column for the next exciting installment. But anyway Blues are out of luck.

The injury bug has spread to Tom Watt's hockey Blues. Right-winger Bryan Tompson is finished for the season after suffering a compound fracture at Tuesday night's practice. This was a particularly harsh blow to Tompson, who was returning to Blues after a year's absence.

New students at U of T must be wondering if Varsity teams ever lose. Right now, the combined record of one football team, two rugby teams, and one soccer team is an astounding 15 victories in 16 starts.

Whatever happened to the crispy bacon we had before the War?

Vampire soccer Blues out for blood as Western come here for return match

Varsity Soccer Blues are out for blood this week-end. Even though they soundly defeated Western 7-3 in their first encounter with 'Stangs, they had to overcome inept refereeing and a 3-2 deficit to do it. Saturday, they will be out to show Western the intricacies of the game and only bad luck will prevent Blues from again reaching double figures. So come out to watch Varsity display their skills tomorrow at noon. The game will be played on the front campus because of the back campus field's resemblance to "no man's land" of World War I.

Blues will not make any lineup changes from the team that buried Guelph 11-0 last week-end. Erwin Stach will be in goal. The deep backs will be Alan Cragg (2), Eric Sereda (5) and Bill Nepotiuik (3), while Ormond Mendes (10) will sweep behind them.

Midfield responsibilities will again fall on Austris Liepa (8), and Jim Laverty (14). The demoniacal front four consists of Scottish (7), Jimmy the Greek (4), Franco (9), and Speedy (11). When they take off their capes they become Ron Muir, Jim Lefkos, Frank Soppelsa, and Graham Shields respectively.

As more than able substitutes, Toronto has Dwight Taylor (12), John Gero (13), and Garth Rothwell (6). The numbers in brackets are seen on the right sleeve of the players' jerseys for identification purposes.

Blues will go into tomorrow's contest sporting an unbelievable record of thirty-two wins and four ties in their last thirty-six games against intercollegiate competition. As a matter of fact, ever since coach Ernie Glass took over the team in 1963, Blues have lost only three games, while winning 39 and tying seven. That happens to be an 86.7 per cent measure of success for all you aspiring mathematicians.

Blues success is certainly more than coincidence or luck. It is a tribute to Glass' coaching ability. To what does Glass owe his success? —he not only whips his team into shape, but continually teaches them to become better players and a better team.

TURKEYS

OFF THE WEEK

It is not often the Varsity sports department gets carried away with generosity, but, in view of extenuating circumstances, we have decided to award five (count 'em) turkeys this week to the five "officials" at last Saturday's game against Queen's. SIFL officiating has seldom reached even mild competence in the past, but it reached a new low on Saturday. Burn Farciol, Channel 11 commentator, referring to the incredible quick whistle which nullified a key Varsity fumble recovery, said sagely, "It took a lot of courage to make that call by the referee." He was wrong; it took a lot of stupidity. However, after robbing the players blind throughout the afternoon, divine (Ian Kirkpatrick?) retribution took its toll, and the officials themselves were robbed blind by various slick students.

Harriers hasten to Queens

Varsity harriers are favoured to repeat last year's win in the OQAA Harrier Championships tomorrow at Kingston. Blues' Dave Bailey especially will be trying to avenge his loss in Buffalo to Waterloo's Bob Finlay. Also in the individual running is former Blue Doug McDougall, now at Mac, who finished second to Bailey in last season's meet.

Besides Bailey, Blues will field Brian Richards, Brian Armstrong, Bob Cairns, Dave Tong, and John Loaring. Former Ottawa high school star Bruce Thompson will replace Rich Pyne, out with a frauentured patella.

Principal competition for Varsity in the seven team meet, will probably come from McMaster and Waterloo.

Rowing action in St. Kitts

For those interested in rowing, the action this week-end is in St. Catherine's where Brock University is hosting the combined OQAA and ECIRA championships.

Judging by the past two weeks training and noting in retrospect that previous successes during the season mean little in the final race, U of T crewmen stand an excellent chance of emerging as overall winners.

However, it will be no cinch. Western in particular is launching a very strong crew.

In addition to Varsity and Western, other universities competing are Brock, McMaster, Ryerson, and York. Varsity is entered in heavyweight varsity, lightweight varsity, and junior varsity.

Varsity coach is Forbes Marnoch.

Apathy digs early grave; McGill weekend bash dies

The boozing, brawling bash known as the McGill Weekend has been derailed for the first time in years.

Insufficient ticket sales are the cause of this misfortune and the train has been cancelled.

Art McIlwain (III APSC) the weekend's organizer, said yesterday 500 tickets were needed for the Student's Administrative Council to break even. McIlwain anticipated perhaps 225 sales next week, but only 185 students have bought tickets so far.

He said going through with train plans would have meant a loss of between $1,600 and $2,400 to SAC.

Cost of the Canadian National train was to be $7,560 of which SAC has already paid a $756 deposit. In addition, SAC needed $1,300 for security police, $50 for marshalls in Montreal and $120.98 for advertising.

McIlwain saw three possible reasons for the decline in interest.

Since Varsity Blues have already clinched the Yates Cup, the McGill game has ceased to be vital. Some students feared stricter enforcement of liquor laws on this year's trip. Others deplored the damage done last year, which amounted to $2,000.

Refunds to ticket holders will commence today at noon in the SAC office.

However, SAC has several buses reserved for the trip. Return tickets for the bus are $14.50.

Engineers invade with aerosol cans

By ANNE BOODY

The latest engineering caper has proved conclusively that engineers do not smell worse than artists. They just act worse.

Friday afternoon, a disgruntled group of 60 to 70 engineers, bearing cans of aerosol, invaded a class of about 200 sociology students.

"We are here to prove that artists smell more than engineers," said one of the group. "It is one thing for a professor to make remarks about engineers' clothing, but when he says that engineers smell we have a right to complain."

The trouble began the week before when sociology Professor Norman Bell had referred to engineers in society in a Sociology 120 class.

Their status in society is equal to that of other professions, he said. But university engineers were dirty and smelly, he said and they were trained to present this image to other students.

Some engineers at this lecture declared revenge.

When the sociology students entered the lecture hall of the old physics building, they were confronted by engineers.

"They were running about spraying deodorant. The odor was so strong you could hardly breathe," said Linda Sibbald (I New).

Confetti flew around the room. Mechanically-operated blackboards moved up and down. Paper darts were hurled about.

When Prof. Bell entered the hall, he was greeted with loud applause. The engineers motioned for silence.

"We've heard rumors that you think engineers smell," said their leader. "We're here to prove that it is a falsity and that, in fact, artists smell."

An engineer dressed as a doctor and carrying a magnifying glass proceeded to check an engineer's breath. "No smell, perfect breath," was the verdict. A loud cheer arose from the pranksters.

Then an artist was subjected to the test. The verdict was "Dreadful."

The engineers cheered, left the floor and headed for the balcony. Throughout the lecture they uttered catcalls, mooing and other animal sounds from the gallery.

Water was sprayed about the room. Two disgusted girls opened up umbrellas. Lights went off and on. More paper descended from the gallery.

Then the climax. Water suddenly spewed forth from somewhere in the ceiling. It hit the target — Prof. Bell. Keeping his cool, he said the lecture would continue the next week and left.

One sociology student later remarked, "It was funny at first but later their pranks became rather disgusting. Is burping in loud chorus the right way to get attention?"

The engineering society and the brute force committee immediately made it known that they were not responsible for the incident. The vice-president of the society Bob McCallum (III APSC) said "We knew nothing about the pranks."

Prof. Bell said it would be inadvisable for him to comment on the incident. "It is now being considered by the administration."

Engineers involved in the prank said it started out as a small caper but someone went too far. They stated the soaking had not been planned at all. In fact they didn't know who did it.

Ogre is prince in disguise: Bookstore not so bad

The University of Toronto Bookstore isn't the mean old ogre we thought it was. In fact, it compares favourably with university bookstore services across Canada.

So says a report submitted to the Students Administrative Council last week by Larry Monick (III UC) and David Nitkin (III New). Ten copies of the report are available in the Wallace Room of Sigmund Samuel library.

SAC commissioned the report last year to discover what the bookstore operations involved and how services could be improved.

"The basic problem the bookstore administration is faced with," says Nitkin, "is that people are too willing to criticize the services of the store without understanding the various problems the retail outlets are involved with."

In terms of books stocked and services offered, the U of T stores are among the best in Canada, says the report.

The bookstore carries approximately 7,000 titles in quantities of three to 2,000 copies.

The bookroom stocks 3,000 titles in novels and the largest selection of current Canadian books in Toronto, the report says.

The paperback department has more than 11,000 titles and more than 300 periodicals and journals. Briefcases, stationery writing materials and other supplies are also for sale in the bookroom.

Among the services provided are the special order service which enables any student or faculty member to obtain any book in print, and an interest-free credit plan.

However the report criticized the connection between the stores and the University of Toronto Press, calling it an "unhealthy relation."

Says Nitkin, "the University of Toronto bookstores operate directly as a department of the University of Toronto Press. The number of publications from the press is dependent on the retail bookselling. Therefore poor sales mean a reduction in publication by the press."

The report calls the system of discounts

"discriminatory." Students are given a five-per-cent reduction on hard-covered textbooks only, whereas faculty are given a 10-per-cent discount on all their purchases.

"Why should staff, who are in a much higher income bracket than students, be allowed greater reductions?"

Two alternatives are presented to SAC by the report:

—maintaining the status quo. This is unadvisable because of the relationship between the Press and the bookstores, and the discriminatory discounts provided by the stores;

—the formation of a co-operative bookstore. The main purpose of the co-op, says the report, would be "to accord members an opportunity to secure their books and supplies at reasonable prices and to share in the savings made possible by operating efficiently."

Co-op stores are run by a non-paid board of directors comprising faculty, alumni, senior students and a manager.

Municipal parties realistic: Saulnier

By JIM COWAN

Having political parties at the municipal level is "increasingly realistic," says the chairman of the Montreal executive committee.

Lucien Saulnier told a Convocation Hall audience Friday that there are always semi-official groups struggling for power, whether they are recognized or not.

He was addressing the final session of the Toronto Star conference on Toronto: Pressures of Growth and Forces of Change.

Mr. Saulnier said that the party system has promoted responsible government in Montreal and that the people have responded by exercising their franchise in a responsible manner.

"We have done our duty and as a consequence the people have done theirs.

Mayor Victor Copps of Hamilton disagreed, saying non-partisanship tends to be associated with good government "made up of people who do not trade favors for votes."

Sixty-one per cent of the major cities in the United States use non-partisan elections, Mayor Coppa said. Many have tried the party system and found it unsatisfactory.

"The movement has been away from partisan politics," he said because party systems tend to break down in time of crisis.

He said the party system curtails public discussion because decisions are usually made in caucus. Passage in council becomes a formality, giving no one a chance to object effectively.

Chairman Philip Givens, a former Toronto mayor, took several swings at the current Toronto system in his introductory remarks. He said the time had come for party politics in Toronto.

Student power campaigns force action

OTTAWA (CUP) — Student power campaigns now have met with success in the hierarchies of 12 Canadian universities.

Administrators, apparently eager to prevent overt student protest and disruption tactics, have been hurrying to effect basic changes in their governing structures to seat students.

There are at present student senators at three Canadian universities: the University of British Columbia (four); the University of Alberta at Edmonton (three); Simon Fraser (three).

At nine other universities student senators have been approved in principle but have not yet been seated.

The following universities have approved student senators: Saskatchewan (four), Lethbridge (two), Guelph (three), Calgary (three), Windsor (four), Sir George Williams (four), Montreal (six), and Western Ontario (five).

SPRI experiments with social change

By LARRY HAIVEN

"The poor are always with us," is a platitude that Bob Mills and other members of the Social Problems Research Institute have come to scorn.

SPRI was started last year under the sponsorship of the campus Progressive Conservative club. It is concerned with the problems arising from an urban society.

What distinguishes this group from the others doing the same sort of research is that they believe that they can do something about the problems. SPRI says it "was established to experiment with more positive means of achieving social change than those advocated by other student groups."

Their means is political affiliation. SPRI believes that by using well-documented research, it can exert pressure on decision-making levels of government to initiate social reform legislation.

The club already claims the backing of various city and provincial politicians including aldermen June Marks and Margaret Campbell and MPP's Tom Wells, Gord Carton and Jack Harris.

Evidence of the initiative and concern of SPRI is a 48-page report published earlier this year on the results of last year's research. The report submitted by 10 students deals with the problems of neighborhood centres and community building.

Mills (II Trin), who is the chairman of this year's leg of the project, worked on the report, which says community centres are necessary to relieve the frustration so common in working-class districts.

But they found legislation and organization severely lacking with regard to the building and maintenance of these centres. The report will be submitted to the government soon in the hope of bringing about action.

This year SPRI intends to investigate social problems such as the plight of immigrants in the city, and the need for the reform of birth-control and abortion laws.

What they finally decide to do depends on the response from the students and the various interests of those who volunteer to work for SPRI.

The committee offers an outlet for dissatisfaction with a positive end in mind. Those who volunteer will not be politically committed in any way.

All those seriously interested are asked to contact Ernie McCullough (IV Vic) or Mills.

McGILL TRAIN CANCELLED

The Students' Administrative Council regrets to announce that lack of student response has forced the cancellation of this year's trains to Montreal on Nov. 10. Full refunds will be made on the 185 tickets sold starting today at noon.

Alternative transportation is available by bus at $14.50 per ticket. Buses leave Convocation Hall Fri: at 5:30 p.m.

Treasure Van brings bongos, bears, boots

A dilapidated truck carrying $50,000 worth of exotic merchandise pulled up yesterday in front of Hart House.

An equally dilapidated Donald Smith (III Trin) stood outside in his shirt-sleeves calculated how many hours it would take to plow through the mountain of articles.

His problem—sorting 300 boxes of fragile, enticing items into nationalities for Treasure Van.

Brandishing a Mexican machete inscribed, "I am friend to men and scourge of the wicked," Don exported his 20 workers on. John Philpot (IV Trin), head unpacker, shuffled around in Australian Kadaitcha ceremonial murder boots with a strange gleam in his eye.

Ron Thu (SGS) had quite a percussion section going with the Japanese dinner gong, Aboriginal clapsticks, Mexican maracas and bongos, Indian cowbells, and a Spanish tambourine. And Eric Munn (IV Trin) examined a gimmicky little leather device from Barbados, called a "wife leader."

Cathy Maunsell (III Trin) and Linda Naftel (II INNIS) had to be dragged away from the cuddly Australian koala bears, the Japanese wooden kokeshi dolls, and the Russian Matryoshka "nesting" dolls.

Marion Mowatt (II Nurs) ran out of fingers and had to rely on a Japanese abacus counter. In an attempt to motivate his workers, Don passed around a Spanish wine skin with an incontaminable mouth-piece.

These and hundreds of other fascinating articles are on sale in the Hart House Debates room all this week, from 10 a.m. to 10 p.m.

At 1 p.m. Tuesday the Lady Godiva Memorial Band will preside as Miss U of T, Cathy Williams (I Meds) awards the Vanley Cup to the Varsity Blues football team.

HH debate favours draft-dodger aid

A Hart House debate Thursday came out in favor of the encouragement of draft-dodgers.

Members voted 61-28 against a resolution that "This house condemns any encouragement of U.S. draft resisters" after a spirited two-and-a-half-hour debate.

Speaking for the nays,

Gary Segal (IV UC) argued that:

"As Canadian citizens we have the right either to condone or condemn the draft resister. Across the border, potential draftees also have the right to be fully informed of the alternatives to induction into the U.S. armed forces.

"Is this not what encouragement means?"

Irving Weisdorf (III UC), a speaker for the nays, said the Canadian government had given aid to immigrant refugee groups.

"After the Hungarian revolution, refugees arriving in Canada were put on relief for one year by government agencies."

Report rejects co-op bookstore plan

The formation of the co-op, the report says, would probably mean an expansion in business. But this might mean that pressure would be placed on government to force the bookstore to pay taxes.

The report also recommends:

- differential discounts in favour of students;
- publishing of more paperback texts;
- the improvement of public relations by further publicity through The Varsity, by more prompt dealing with complaints and by devoting some of the advertising money to explanations of the structure and operations of the bookstore.

Appearance is not everything . . .

Draft-dodger interviews

Do you want to talk to a real live draft-dodger.

Tomorrow at noon is the kick-off time for a two-week campaign during which the Toronto Anti-Draft Program will be the focus of controversy.

Three draft-dodgers will be interviewed by students council president Tom Faulkner, a representative of the Edmund Burke Society and Dr. Paul Hoch.

The University College junior common room is the place. Hersh Ezrin president of the literary and athletic society will moderate the proceedings.

Hurry up! It's time

Apparently everybody on campus has accepted Eastern Standard Time except the people who run Hart House.

Every hour, the bell chimes faithfully — exactly one hour ahead of time.

"It's really beginning to bug me," commented one Trinity resident. "Every time it chimes, I think I'm late."

Blood breakdown shows a slow start

What do you have against saving a life? Are you able to give blood? Have you?

There are six days left to the campus drive. The goals is 3,770 pints—1622 pints have been collected. Thousands of students have yet to give!

"Everyone now favors a system of free education. A free school should include free equipment for the school — maps, globes, etc., etc., are now supplied free. And there seems no valid reason why text books and other school supplies should not be so provided."

—From the report of a committee on education to the Ontario legislature in 1907.

it says here, you're happy with the bookstore

Don't hold your breath waiting for charges as a result of the Students Administrative Council report on bookstore operations released last week.

As a matter of fact, by this report, it seems everything is hunky-dory between students and bookstore. Just a few minor little hitches.

The report was commissioned by SAC last term to study "the serious lack of communication and understanding between the University Bookstores and the academic community at the University of Toronto that has nurtured a climate of distrust and even hostility . . ." and to seek ways to remedy this hostility and distrust.

Larry Moncik, SAC bookstore representative, and David Nitkir, of the Services Commission were drafted to do the work.

The hostility mentioned by SAC stems from a belief widely-held among students that they are being gouged by a bookstore which makes tremendous profits from a relatively captive market.

Nothing could be further from the truth, says the report, and if the bookstore will only explain its position more fully to students, the friction will cease.

The report recommends that publishers give the store a 30 per cent discount, then admits publishers are cool to the idea. Scratch that.

Packetbooks are cheaper than hard-cover books, right? So talk to the provincial government about getting more texts in paperback, and get CUS to negotiate with publishers to the same end. This is likely to be a long, difficult process. Publishers make more money on a ten dollar hard-cover text than a $2.75 paperback.

Although St. Francis Xavier and Guelph Universities have student-run co-operative bookstores, the report says co-ops are too expensive for U of T.

The report favors the status quo in virtually all but two points.

First, it suggests ending the long-standing big-brother relationship between the bookstore and U of T Press. Because the Press absorbs bookstore losses, it is hampered financially and maybe forced to cut back on publication of low-volume scholarly articles.

In effect this proposal would result in increased bookstore costs and increased book prices to students.

Second, the report recommends that students get the same ten per cent discount as professors. Students now get five per cent on some books.

The bookstore quelled any organized discontent among students by making service faster this year. The report, therefore, had no loud issues to protest.

Yet it should have confronted the centre of the problem — money — more fully. Students shouldn't have to spend the money they now do on books.

The report — perhaps as irony, perhaps as wishful thinking, perhaps as a kind of submerged ground-swell of conscience—is dedicated to a committee which in 1907 advocated free textbooks and other school equipment for primary and high schools.

"Indeed," the committee reported to the Ontario legislature, "there are many cogent reasons which suggest themselves on a moment's reflection, why they (free equipment) should be so supplied. Objections here, as in other quarters, readily disappear before the basic principle that education is maintained in the general interests of the whole province . . ."

Why can't university texts be supplied on the same basis? Why not bring in free textbooks to be returned to the university each year for re-use?

The average student buys many texts he doesn't really want for courses he is not very interested in. At the end of each year he sells them, if he can, and takes a beating in depreciation.

If these texts were free, it would not be a great hardship to buy the few additional texts he wishes to keep.

The report, as far as it goes, has some good ideas which will change nothing. And that means the report did not go far enough.

LETTERS

an apology

An Open Letter to Professor Bell
Sir:

We wish to express our regret for the unfortunate events which occurred during your lecture on Friday, November 3rd.

While we must accept partial responsibility for the occurrences, we feel obliged to say that only the skit was planned, and that whatever else happened were the actions of misguided individuals.

Please accept our sincere apologies.

addendum

Sir:

On page S-18 of Friday's paper, there is the statement (in the captions to the pictures) that Religious Knowledge is a compulsory subject at SMC. To the best of my unofficial knowledge this is absolutely false and has been so for quite some time.

No pressure is applied at any time to have anyone take RK either as a pass option or as a full general course subject.

Sincerely,
Michael Magee,
III SMC
SMC SAC Rep.

dears self

Sir:

Re statements attributed to me in the Varsity of Oct. 30th. I thought I had made myself clear. I was neither defending Scarborough nor degrading the St. George Campus. The point was not which campus is superior but rather that the existing differences should be corrected—not used to push the campuses further apart. The comparison of campuses can only lead to the bitchy rivalry which the Varsity appears to be propagating. There is nothing to be gained from arguing about the architecture, the academic abilities or the 64% cut off point. Whether these decisions are right or wrong is immaterial, they have been made and must be lived with, at least for the present.

So may I make the suggestion that The Varsity put its considerable persuasive powers to some constructive use, that is a certain amount of profitable cooperation between the St. George campus and the satellite colleges.

Yours,
J. C. McKenacher,
(I Scar)

dance success

Sir:

This letter is in regard to the article, "Homecoming a success" — cheers B & W." I disagree with the term "success" being applied to the Hart House Dance. I used to think that if people enjoyed themselves at a dance, then the dance was called a success. However, I felt that the dance was too crowded to allow the people there to dance properly. Thus we could really not enjoy the dance as much as might have been expected from such good bands.

Mr. Low (I Law) tends to think like a corporation lawyer, i.e., he defines "success" in terms of money instead of human feelings. His "success" reasoning is nothing but an application of grade school mathematics — more tickets make more money. Unfortunately for us Mr. Low seems to be preoccupied with dollar signs and not with how the people enjoyed themselves at the dance. The Bands were great! The Hart House mood superb! But the people were too many!! If Mr. Low wants to make money, why doesn't he go out and sell lapel buttons to the Syd Smith popcorn vendors?

Disgustedly yours,
Glenn Bauberger
(III SMC)

free tuition?

Sir:

I would like to present to your readers a few ideas which are pertinent to the subject of free tuition. It is my humble opinion that free tuition will:

- Increase income tax, or municipal property tax, or both, meaning that the lower classes will be helping to pay for the education of a student body which is largely "upper income" (by CUS findings) and can better afford to pay. Even with free tuition, it is doubtful whether there would be a significant increase in the proportion of young people from low income and/or "culturally deprived" families who take post-secondary education.
- Reduce incentive and foster university bums like the kind of individuals who clutter for seven and eight years. A student who has paid six or seven hundred dollars in fees has plenty of motivation to pass. It's an old cliché, but people don't appreciate something they get for nothing.
- Mean compulsory attendance at lectures, just as in high school, since the public won't pay students to skip lectures.

As an alternative to free tuition, I would suggest what really amounts to an expansion of the "status quo":

- Continuation of the present system of bursaries, with perhaps some closer scrutiny on a student's "financial need."

- Complete availability of student-aid loans, since most persons who graduate from university will move into higher-income brackets, and can well afford to repay their loans.
- A concerted effort by the government to see that no university student is denied the opportunity of summer employment to help pay his or her own way.
- Investigation of a means to provide a reasonable salary to graduate students, so that they will not be discouraged from taking post graduate study by loan commitments which they have already accumulated, or by the lure of the big bucks after receiving their bachelor's degree.
- Maintenance or extension of the present, system of scholarships, which help provide incentive.

ouija on bum

Sir:

In your editorial of Nov. 3rd you suggest that Innis College students and their supporters "didn't really want to bring the wrath of the U.S. upon them" and feel that "draft-dodgers break laws and we shouldn't have them here." Either your 3-neuron brain is working overtime, or your ouija board is on the bum. Whatever the case, your information concerning the opposing point of view is no more correct than are Lyndon Johnson's statements concerning the Vietnam war.

As supporters of the Innis College stand, we can only offer our personal opinions and cannot hope to represent the various individual views of the Innis College student. We believe that Americans should not be discouraged from coming to Canada, but neither should they be encouraged by us to do so. There is a fine distinction between the donation of funds to actively encourage immigration and financial support to those who would have immigrated regardless of our monetary aid.

Contrary to popular belief, the U.S.A. is still a democratic country. It is every citizen's right, even his duty to protest when he cannot in all conscience follow the dictates of his elected representatives. If he cannot obey laws which were enacted by democratic processes then he must choose an alternative way of life (Canada or jail). The decision is still his, and it is not our place to encourage him to break the laws of his government. If his convictions are strong enough, he will come whether or not we give him financial aid.

5. A Change in Organization

The recommendations we have made for a reform in the structure of degree programs will require some change in the academic administration machinery. We are reluctant to recommend any addition to the formal academic administrative apparatus, but we have had enough experience, as members of the Faculty Council's various standing committees, to convince us that they cannot be expected to provide the supervision or the leadership that will be required. The committees which are now nominally in charge of the various degree Courses are not so constituted as to be able to administer the proposed programs. The standing committees on the General Course and the General Course in Science meet rarely and do little. The standing committees on Groups A, B, C, and D Honour Courses, which are charged with looking at changes in curriculum, prerequisite requirements, etc., proposed by the teaching departments who have the primary responsibility for those Courses, are, by their very existence and their powers to recommend against proposed changes, some check on the otherwise complete autonomy of departments; and so is the Committee on Undergraduate Studies, to which they report their recommendations (and which in turn reports to the Faculty Council). But anyone with experience on these committees knows that they are so reluctant to question the decisions of the departments that they seldom intervene even when close scrutiny might reveal encroachment on principles. Nor have they thought it their function to give any creative thought to innovations or improvements, either intra- or inter-disciplinary.

Our proposed structure of specialist and generalist programs will require something more effective. It will be necessary to have some bodies which can effectively watch that departments in their zeal do not exceed the stipulated number of courses required of any student, the maximum number of classroom hours (lectures, tutorials, and laboratories) required, the maximum amount of examining, the maximum permissible prerequisites, and so on. All these functions are beyond those that will have to be performed within departments, such as the planning and supervision of tutorials in relations to lectures. In addition, some more effective body to watch over the inter-department programs will be needed. And a more effective body in charge of the General Program, which now is nobody's primary concern, is clearly needed. And in all these areas it is not just supervision that is required but also active alertness to possible improvements.

It is not easy to say how all these needs should be met. An elaborate new superstructure of academic administrative committees would be, quite properly, resented and therefore ineffective and therefore wasteful. There is a limit to the amount of time professors should be expected or permitted to spend in administrative committees. Moreover any substantial increase in the number of such academic administrators as associate deans would be an undesirable drain on the teaching capabilities of the Faculty as a whole. Intra- and supra-departmental administrative duties are already encroaching heavily on professorial teaching time, and even if there is no further increase in the undergraduate enrolment in the Faculty of Arts and Science, the prospective increase in the commitments of its departments to the Graduate School is bound to increase the amount of professorial time required for departmental administration. Consequently there is every reason to be wary of any increase in the academic administrative machinery. The problem is how it may be kept to a minimum. Addressing ourselves to this question, we have concluded that the minimum is one additional associate dean and, responsible to the associate deans, some academic administrative officers whom we call program directors.

We have already recommended (in section 3A(b) of this chapter) that the work of the Faculty be arranged in three Divisions instead of the present four. We now recommend that there should be three associate deans, one for each division, instead of the present two. We recommend further that there be two "program directors" in each of the three divisions, appointed, like the associate deans, for a five-year term, and, like them, remaining professors and continuing to teach undergraduates in their respective departments but in this other capacity not responsible to the chairmen of their departments. They would be responsible, to the associate deans, for the oversight of the specialist programs, both intra- and inter-departmental, in their respective divisions.

We consider it essential that the program directors should continue to do undergraduate teaching in their departments. What proportion of their time would be required by their duties as program directors cannot be clearly laid down until the demands of the position are discovered in practice. But we recommend that not more than 50 per cent of their time be taken from their professorial work in their departments. If the position demands more than this, it would be better to increase the number of directors than to let the duties of the office use more than 50 per cent of any incumbent's time.

We think that nothing less than the institution of program directors could restrain departmental zeal sufficiently to allow the implementation of our recommendations about the maximum requirements to be made of students in the new programs, and that nothing more than this is required. We point out that this increase in the encroachments made by administrative duties on the whole professorial strength will be offset by a decrease in the quantity of time that would otherwise be required of academic administrative committees. Neither the Groups A, B, C, D Committees, nor any new program committees, will be needed to supervise the specialist programs. The recommendations of the program directors will need to be reviewed only by a standing committee of ten—the dean, the three associate deans, and the six program directors—before being presented to Council. We are, in effect, recommending the sacrifice of part of the time of six professors in place of what would otherwise have to be a comparable sacrifice of part of the time of many more professors. We point out also that our recommendation in the following chapter about the reorganization of college departments into university departments should substantially reduce the amount of professorial time devoted to administrative committee work.

One other function of the program directors might be to act as ombudsmen (in liaison with college registrars, who now to some extent perform this function), to whom students could turn for investigation of complaints.

Finally we propose that the committee of ten should be the standing committee in charge of the general program. It can be expected that this would be more effective than the present General Course Committee, which has no great concern for the academic welfare of the General program or the students in it.

It may be that the powers we are proposing for the program directors and the committee of ten, all of whom will be, in that capacity, appointed administrators, will be thought to be taking too much authority away from professors as such, even though the recommendations and rulings of the directors and the committee would still be subject to Council. Yet to accompany these academic administrators with an apparatus of elected committees would be to use more professorial time in administration than we think is necessary. It can be assumed that the program directors will normally consult widely within departments, and where this is not enough there would be no difficulty in an ad hoc committee being set up. We should prefer to rely on such informal arrangements at least at the beginning. If experience then indicated that something more formal was desirable, elected committees could be introduced.

6. Remaining Problems

While we believe that the changes recommended in this chapter would represent a substantial improvement over the present structure of degree programs, and while we hope that we have sufficiently set out the rationale of the proposals, we are fully aware that we have not probed the most fundamental problems of the nature of general and specialist education and their relation to liberal education. Nor have we considered whether changes in the structure of knowledge itself require either a redrawing of subject boundaries or a fundamental change in the accepted system of subject autarchy.

These are larger questions than the ones we have dealt with, and less susceptible of rapid consensus. But we think they are now so important as to require concerted study. We therefore recommend that a special committee be established as soon as possible to study these long-range problems and their bearing on the structure of degree programs in this Faculty.

IV. The Colleges

1. Introduction: The colleges in the faculty of arts and science

Whatever view one takes of the value of the peculiar Toronto college system—and many views are held, by the undergraduates, and by professors both within and outside the colleges — there is widespread agreement that they are, potentially at least, an extremely valuable asset in this University.

Elsewhere in North America we find other universities seeking to avoid becoming, or to rescue themselves from being, mass educational societies in which the student is an anonymous unit and the administration is monolithic, by moving towards some college system which would make the students significant members of smaller academic communities and would break up the monolithic administrative machinery of the large multi-university. The University of Toronto, in its Faculty of Arts and Science, has a college system already. The colleges exist. And every full-time undergraduate in Arts and Science must be enrolled in one of them. The four old colleges — University College and the three federated Arts colleges: Victoria, Trinity, and St. Michael's — have long traditions as teaching colleges, although they teach only a very few subjects. Of the four new colleges, all established within the last five years, two—New and Innis—have as yet almost no teaching function, whereas two — Scarborough and Erindale — which are located on their own campuses, each about twenty miles distant from the main university campus, teach (or will teach) almost the whole range of subjects offered in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

With this set of eight colleges, Toronto appears to be in a very favourable position to counteract the dangers of the monolith and the anonymous mass, dangers to which the size of the University, and even of the Faculty of Arts and Science, otherwise expose it. The ability of the colleges to serve their students in this way, to be smaller academic communities within the great university, is frequently cited as ample justification for any inefficiencies or apparently wasteful allocation of intellectual resources that may be thought inherent in a federal system or that have developed in this particular federal system.

Yet the colleges (excepting Scarborough and Erindale, which do all of the teaching of all of their students) are not, for most of the students enrolled in them, academic communities in any effective sense.

Most of their students get none, or virtually none, of their instruction from their college. Innis College as yet offers no instruction. New College teaches English and French, with a staff cross-appointed from University College. The only subjects which all four old colleges teach are Classics, English, French, and German. In addition, Ethics is taught by the three federated colleges (and nominally by University College, but its Department of Ethics is in fact simply a section of the University Department of Philosophy, and is not physically in the College; Religious Knowledge is taught by the three federated colleges; Near Eastern Studies is taught by University College, Victoria, and Trinity (although the latter two colleges have hardly any staff or students in other subjects get none or little of their ment, St. Michael's teaches Philosophy. Students whose studies are wholly or largely in toher subjects get none or little of their instruction from their college. And these students are now the great majority of all undergraduates in the Faculty of Arts and Science.

The oddity of this arrangement is fully as apparent to the college authorities as to the rest of the Faculty. The heart of the college problem lies in this division of teaching between the old colleges and the university. When the present division of teaching was established, some eighty years ago, it made a good deal of sense: the proportion of all students in the Faculty doing a substantial part of their work in one or more of the college subjects was high enough for the colleges to reach most of their students academically; and the number of students taking the subjects allotted to the colleges was generally great enough to justify the maintenance of four separate college departments in those subjects. But now that the proportion of students doing much of their work in those subjects has markedly declined, the retention of the old scheme prevents the colleges from serving most of their undergraduate members as academic communities, and also results in what is now misallocation of total intellectual resources of the faculty.

These problems, and others, have been evident for some years, and have been increasingly a subject of concern, both in the colleges and in the university. Several analyses and sets of proposals have been made in the last decade. Since a lot of thought has gone into these, and since some of them have been frequently referred to in submissions to us and at our public hearings, we think it useful to recapitulate some of them here and to develop our own arguments and recommendations in relation to them.

Before we do so it may be well to set out one or two general principles we have reached. First, we are persuaded that the central problem about the role of the colleges in the Faculty of Arts and Science is that of restoring the reality of the old colleges as academic communities serving all their students. We have treated this as much the most important objective to be sought in an reform of the college system. Other objectives, such as the removal of inefficiencies inherent in the duplication and quadruplication of teaching staffs in college subjects, we have treated as of distinctly less importance. Secondly, we are persuaded that the old colleges can become real communities to their students only if they do some significant amount of teaching of all, or as nearly as possible all, of their students, and that this change requires that they do some of the teaching in what are now university subjects. Thirdly, we find it evident that if they are to undertake such teaching they will have to relinquish to the university some of the teaching they now do, and some of their faculty who now do it.

We state these points here in order that there may be no misunderstanding of the magnitude of the change we believe to be required if the objective we have treated as the most important is to be reached, and in order that these points not be lost sight of in the necessarily technical discussion of methods of organization of teaching departments, cross-appointments, etc., which follows. Some change in the organization of teaching departments is required even to reach the objectives we have treated as secondary; the same changes will have to be carried farther in order to reach the objective we have treated as primary. We hope also that our initial emphasis on these points will enable the reader to weigh the intellectual costs and benefits of the various proposals that we shall be considering.

2. Analysis and proposals in the last decade, and comments thereon

We shall refer specifically to three analyses and proposals that have been made within the last decade: (A) a Memorandum prepared by Dr. M. St. A. Woodside, for the University's Advisory Committee on Policy and Planning, in December 1959; (B) a proposal made by the Councils of the three Federated Colleges in 1960, and made again by the Heads of those Colleges to us in November 1966; (C) the report of a special Presidential Advisory Committee on College Instruction, chaired by Principal R. S. Harris, made in January 1966.

(A) The Woodside Memorandum, 1959

This Memorandum makes a very strong case for a change in the teaching responsibilities of the colleges, on three grounds. First, the four old colleges have had an increasingly small share in the instruction of their own students. Limited as they are not to the Humanities, but to subjects representing only a segment of the Humanities, and excluded from now-populous humanistic disciplines such as history, philosophy and Spanish, they are in a sense bypassed by increasingly large numbers of students interested in the social sciences, the physical and natural sciences, and the humanities offered by non-college departments . . .

The result has been a decline in the reality of the undergraduate's membership in a college.

For undergraduates who live in college residences there is still some reality in membership in a College. It is becoming increasingly social. This is not necessarily bad provided that social significance depends on intellectual significance. But it is true that the academic connections with his college of even a student living in a college residence are increasingly tenuous. For the non-resident student, connection with his college may be non-existent or may be represented by an occasional visit to a snack-room or occasional participation in a college dance. The colleges in their desire to return to the real advantages of a college system and in their frustration by an outmoded system are obliged to turn their attention not to their central function but to the provision of bigger and better residences and student unions. College residences and student unions may be used as effective instruments in education. But a college has little of value or reality if it consists of residences and a student union (even if a library and chapel are attached), and locks the solid core of intellectual community. The present system is imperceptibly forcing the colleges to devote more and more attention and more and more rivalry to important adjuncts of the community of scholars.

ERINDALE COLLEGE

Secondly, the retention of the old division of college and university subjects while the undergraduate population has shifted away from college subjects, has resulted in a poor allocation of the whole faculty:

... some of the college departments in Humanities which in fact are authoritative but for which there is in fact small demand, are obliged to maintain very large staffs and to require each member of the staff to devote many hours per week to teaching an exceedingly small number of students. It is quite possible, for example, to have a member of the Department of Classics teach 12 or 13 hours per week and yet come in contact with a total of 25 students.

There is little doubt that the honour course in Classics in the University of Toronto is second in quality to no undergraduate course in Classics on the North American continent. Yet because Classics is a college subject, the total staff in Classics, from lecturer to professor, amounted in 1958-59 to 36. In any other university the magnitude of the staff would be welcomed because it would afford freedom for graduate instruction and research. At Toronto it does not have this effect because four separate honour courses in Classics are being offered to exceedingly small classes, and a comparatively huge staff is giving a great deal of time to undergraduate instruction.

Thirdly, the limitation of college staff to those professing the original few subjects has, with the expansion of other areas of scholarship, left the old colleges unduly narrow as communities of scholars:

The "senior common room" or the Council of an Arts College, which is the heart of the community of scholars, consists now only of scholars in English, Classics, Ethics, French, German, and Near Eastern Studies, with the addition, in the case of the Federated Colleges, of theological scholars. Scholars in the other humanities, in the social sciences, in the physical and natural sciences are excluded. Can this be justified in A.D. 1960? Is it deepening the cleavage between the humanists and the scientists which is giving concern to some? Can the great benefits to intellectual activity and to a community of scholars promoted by the close association of a "senior common room" be realized if membership is limited to scholars in a small group of disciplines selected 50 years ago?

The analysis concludes with a strong but hopeful statement:

In sum, changes have occurred in the past half century which are now thwarting the potential strength and effectiveness of the University. History has bequeathed to the University a structure which is essentially flexible and thus susceptible of changes required to meet changed conditions. But the passage of years has allowed one of the possible patterns to harden, and the need now is for a restoration of flexibility. Any proposed change will be criticized and will be difficult to bring about. But there is surely available in 1960 as much wisdom and courage as there was in 1906.

The proposals offered to remedy the situation were simple and striking: the college departments should be replaced by university departments, and the colleges should then restaff themselves by cross-appointing members of various university departments. What this would involve can best be stated in the words of the Memorandum:

The first step is to combine the present College departments, except Religion, into University departments. The new University department of Classics, for example, would thus consist of the present members of the four College departments with a Head or Chairman appointed by the Board of Governors. The salaries of all would be paid by the University. At the beginning some departments might be larger than circumstances required; in the process of time the necessary adjustments could easily be made without, of course, dropping any member of the staff. The additional cost represented by an unduly large staff at the beginning would be a small price to pay for a radical improvement in effectiveness.

The Colleges would now be left without a staff (except in Religion). The staff would be supplied by cross-appointment of members of the University departments. Thus Mr. X, Professor in the University Department of History, might by cross-appointment become also Professor of History in Trinity College; Mr. Y, Associate Professor in the University Department of Political Economy, might by cross-appointment become also Associate Professor of Political Economy in St. Michael's College; Mr. Z, Associate Professor in the University Department of Physics, might by cross-appointment become also Associate Professor of Physics in University College; and so on. It is presumed that these cross-appointments would all be of scholars of professorial rank, and that the cross-appointments would be permanent. Thus the "senior common room" and the College Council would consist of these permanent cross-appointees. Without relinquishing membership in the University department and the privileges and duties connected therewith it would be their privilege and their duty to maintain the health and welfare of their College, and it would be their privilege and their pleasure to belong to a true community of scholars not limited by arbitrary inclusion or exclusion of disciplines. In addition, seasonal cross-appointments from University Departments should be possible as circumstances required and persons so appointed enjoy for the year of appointment membership in the "senior common room" if not in the College Council.

The College staff would thus consist of a number of comparatively senior scholars and scientists appointed permanently for "part-time" College duty and a number of others (perhaps junior) appointed for "part-time" College duty for one academic session. Each would draw from the University the portion of salary appropriate to the part of his services enjoyed by the College but the College would pay this portion of his salary to the University. An easy objection is that loyalty would be divided between University Department and College. However, an analogous situation in Oxford has caused no great trouble and it seems to be the case there that loyalty is multiplied rather than divided. It is not proposed that all members of a University department should receive College cross-appointments. It is rather hoped that in time cross-appointment to a College would become a desirable honour.

How many cross-appointments should a College be permitted to make? The suggestion is that as heretofore each College should receive the tuition fees of its students and that it should be able to make as many cross-appointments as it can pay for. The appropriate portion of the cross-appointee's salary would be paid not to the man, but to the University, although the man would know the source of his salary. The most desirable principle is that as much as possible of the first year lecturing and tutorial work should be done in the College. The classes are largest in the first year and division of them into four would be most advantageous. Furthermore the undergraduate should be attached to his College as early as possible in his career and as firmly as possible. The amount of instruction within the College could properly decrease in the upper years as classes grow smaller and there is less need for attachment to the College. The proposed scheme is highly flexible, and a given College might well express its own peculiar interests and character in the nature of its cross-appointments. The existence of University staff not cross-appointed could take care of any possible vagaries in College cross-appointments.

The advantages of the scheme are for the most part obvious. It is flexible. It enables the Colleges each to develop its own character and interests. It provides for each College a broader and more stimulating "senior common room" and permanent academic body. It would permit the leading scholars to have association with the undergraduates of all colleges. It would attach undergraduates more closely to their Colleges, and bring more of them into closer academic and social contact with senior members of their Colleges.

Finally the Memorandum notes "two major difficulties" in the scheme and suggests how they might be offset or discounted:

I. Members of existing College departments would resent their extrusion from college surroundings into University Departments. This difficulty could be solved at the beginning by cross-appointments from the consolidated University Departments of many or most members to their former Colleges.

II. The federated colleges would lose their freedom in appointment. However, Federation has worked in fact because of co-operation. Under the new scheme it would always be possible for the Colleges to call to the attention of University Departments the availability of this or that good scholar and teacher. It is impossible to imagine a case where the Chairman or Head of a University Department would be ungrateful for such a offer of quality. If he was not a scholar of quality he would be unworthy of appointment in any case. And the willingness of the College to cross-appoint him would be not only an additional guarantee of his quality, but also an inducement to him to come to Toronto.

We have quoted from this Memorandum at some length because it sets out better than we could do some of the points we want to make, and because it throws into sharp relief some points which we believe need to be further explored.

We agree that the scheme as proposed would remedy the second and third of the college failings with which the Memorandum was concerned, the inefficient distribution of the whole teaching resources of the faculty, and the narrowness of the college senior communities. But it is not entirely clear that the scheme as proposed would remedy the first failing, namely the old colleges' having lost academic touch with most of their students. It is self-evident that this failing would only be remedied if the old colleges, in restaffing themselves by cross-appointments, made many of their appointments in what are now the most populous university subjects. That they should do so is implied in the statement that "the most desirable principle is that as much as possible of the first year lecturing and tutorial work (presumably in all subjects) should be done in the College." And the same implication is contained in the statement of the first major difficulty foreseen, namely, that "members of existing College departments would resent their extrusion from college surroundings into University Departments," since their extrusion would be necessary only if their places were to be filled by professors of other than the present college subjects. But the immediately following statement, that "at the beginning" the colleges could, by their cross-appointments, bring back "many or most members to their former colleges" means that there would, at least at the beginning of the scheme, be little room for professors of other subjects. And we do not see sufficient grounds for believing that the colleges, as time went on, would shift their appointments into other subjects, if their control of funds were left unconditional (as it is in this scheme). We make some proposals about financial incentives in section 4 of this chapter.

(B) The Limited Development of Cross-Appointments since 1959

Of the two main proposals of the Woodside Memorandum, the first — the super-session of college departments by university departments — has not been implemented. Nor, consequently, has the second — the restaffing of the colleges by cross-appointments in many subjects — to any substantial extent.

A very few teaching cross-appointments in university subjects have been made by two of the old colleges. Trinity has had, since 1962-63, two cross-appointees in History (reduced to one in 1966-67), conducting first year tutorials; and two in Political Economy, giving the first year honour lectures in economics and political science: in addition, one member of the Trinity staff is cross-appointed to the University Department of Philosophy. Victoria has one professor appointed jointly with the University Department of Italian and Hispanic Studies, who supervises the work of the cross-appointed teaching fellows who teach the Victoria sections of the first year course (this appointment antedates the 1959 proposal); one professor jointly appointed with History, but all of whose lectures are open to students of other colleges; a lecturer and three instructors cross-appointed in Philosophy, who teach the first year honour Victoria students; and eight tutorial assistants (two graduate and six undergraduate students) in Mathematics; and will have in 1967-68, by a happy double cross-appointment, its own Principal, who will remain a professor in the University Department of Political Economy, teaching the Victoria section of first year honour political science. University College has experimented with cross-appointments in several university subjects but in no case does the professor lecture or give classes in the college; he merely is available in the college for two hours each week for informal consultation. St. Michael's, which has an unusually high proportion of its students already taking subjects taught by the college, has not made any cross-appointments, except for three or four tutorial assistants in Mathematics.

It is not surprising that the use made of cross-appointments by the old colleges has been so slight. Little more could have been done, given that the colleges have retained their full complement of staff in the college subjects and have had to find room and funds over and above that for any cross-appointments in university subjects.

(C) The Federated Colleges' Proposal, 1960 and 1966

In June 1960, after prolonged discussion within the Federated Colleges and between college and university officers, the Federated Colleges put forward, as an alternative to the proposals of the Woodside Memorandum, their own proposals, which the Heads of the Federated Colleges have now brought forward to us.

These proposals, which at first sight might seem to be only a technical modification of the Woodside proposals, are in fact very different.

We quote the text of the proposals as submitted to us:

1. The present teaching Departments of the four colleges (University College, Victoria College, Trinity College and St. Michael's College) should continue as College Departments but in each discipline the four College Departments should be fully organized as a University Collegiate Department. The University Collegiate Department should have a chairman, and an executive committee consisting of the Chairman, and the Heads or Chairmen of the College Departments. The executive committee should have responsibility for the organization and distribution of teaching in the subject or subjects within the care of the Department at the undergraduate level.

2. The Chairmanship of the University Collegiate Department should be held by any person for a fixed period of time. (The length of the period was not agreed upon, but the period most commonly referred to in discussion was one of five years.) The Chairmanship should move from College to College, not in a fixed order which would require that a Chairman from College A be followed by a Chairman from College B but in such a way that while the principle of rotation was observed, due regard might be had to the individuals available at any time. The Chairman should not necessarily be the Head or Chairman of a College Department. The Chairman should be selected by an Appointment Board (see 3 below) and should receive his appointment as Chairman from the Board of Governors on the recommendation of the President. He should receive a portion of his salary, while holding the Chairmanship, from the University in recognition of the time and service he was devoting to the University Collegiate Department, or his College should be reimbursed by the University.

3. There should be an Appointments Board consisting of the President of the University, the Dean of the Faculty of Arts, the Dean of the School of Graduate Studies, the Principal of University College, the Heads of the Federated Universities, or in each case one of his representatives. The initiative for new appointments and for promotions might be taken either by the Chairman of the University Collegiate Department, or by the Head or Chairman of the Department in a College. Should the two agree, there should be no necessity to refer the proposal to the Appointments Board; the recommendation should be taken to the Head of the College in which the appointment or promotion was to be made. Should the two not agree the proposal should be referred to the Appointments Board. The Appointments Board should present its recommendations, for final action, to the Governing Body of the College in which the appointment or promotion was to be made through the Head of that College. This procedure should apply to all appointments and promotions to the ranks of Lecturer, Assistant Professor, Associate Professor, and Professor. For appointments to the Chairmanship of University Collegiate Departments see 2 above.

As a scheme for encouraging a more rational distribution of teaching within the present college subjects these proposals have some merit, although it is not entirely clear how the "University Collegiate Department," or its executive committee, could be expected to do much more to rationalize the distribution of teaching than the present joint departments have been able to do. For the colleges would retain virtually the whole of their present autonomy in appointing; the college departments would continue as entities; and any re-arrangement of teaching assignments would require roughly the same co-operation between the heads of the college departments (acting as members of the executive committee) as is required but has not been generally forthcoming under the present arrangements.

However, what concerns us more about these proposals is that they would do nothing to remedy what we regard as the most serious failing of the old colleges. By retaining the present distinction between college and university subjects, and retaining the present teaching departments of the four colleges, it makes no room for any teaching of other subjects to be undertaken by the colleges. Only if the reorganization of the present college teaching departments resulted in such a rationalization that their size was substantially decreased would there be room to add any teaching in the more populous subjects. Such a rationalization is not impossible, but we think it is unlikely to be secured by the organization of "University Collegiate Departments." Without such a rationalization, the old colleges would be in no position to offer any instruction in enough of the now non-college subjects to enable them to reach all, or almost all, of their students academically.

We therefore cannot regard the Federated Colleges' proposals as adequate to meet the central problem.

(D) The Report of the Presidential Advisory Committee on College Instruction, January 1, 1966

This special Advisory Committee was primarily concerned not with what we regard as the central problem of the relation of the old colleges and the university but with the possible development of teaching in the new colleges. Although it was invited to consider the present division of teaching between the colleges and the university, the committee contained no federated college representatives and consequently was not prepared to make specific recommendations about the consolidation of college departments into single university departments.

It recommended against any change in the present assignment of college and university subjects, giving as its reason that "no proposal designed to improve the health of the colleges is acceptable if it runs the risk of endangering the health of the Faculty." The "risk" presumably refers to the possibility that the assignments of any substantial teaching in university subjects to the colleges would disperse the teaching, and thus diminish the teaching effectiveness, of the university departments.

In accordance with its view of the risk (and the difficulties), the Committee on College Instruction did not recommend any effort to increase the number of cross-appointments of regular university faculty to teach more subjects in the colleges. But it did recommend in favour of a system of college-based "tutorials, groups or sections in as many as possible of the courses taught by university departments" on the grounds (a) that an increase in the proportion of tutorials to lectures now provided in most university subjects was desirable in itself, and (b) that it would be less difficult to introduce tutorial teaching than full teaching in these subjects in the colleges. Along with this it recommended a continuation of the policy now in effect in New and Innis Colleges of appointing members of university departments to the college councils, and making such university professors available for consultation by undergraduates of the college.

The introduction of college-based tutorials in conjunction with the policy already in effect of appointing members of university departments to the Council of New and Innis Colleges will, in the Committee's opinion, provide these colleges with an academic programme which will involve in a direct way a very large proportion of their students. At the point where every freshman is taking tutorials in two or three subjects from staff members directly associated with his College and where he is in a position to consult within the context of his own College with a senior member of staff from most if not all the subjects which constitute his course of study, he will hardly fail to recognize that his College is fundamentally an academic community. The ideal surely is to provide for direct and personal contact between the individual members of staff and the individual students. College-based tutorials and a widely representative college Council will go a long way in this direction.

Thus, on the question of introducing or extending college teaching in now non-college subjects, the report took a position in between the Woodside and the Federated Colleges' proposals, but much closer to the latter. It would retain the present division of subjects, and of college and university teaching departments, and would not press for more cross-appointments to provide full teaching of any new courses in the colleges. But it goes somewhat beyond the Federated Colleges' proposals in recommending more college tutorial work in university subjects.

We agree with the Committee on College Instruction that more tutorial work than is now provided in many university subjects is desirable in itself. We agree also that there would be less difficulty in having only tutorial work done in the colleges than in having lecturing as well done there. But we do not share that committee's view that this would attach the undergraduate academically to his college in a significant degree. For, as the report recognizes, most of the tutorials would presumably be conducted by junior or part-time staff. And it is not easy to see how they, being mainly temporarily appointed graduate students whose main interest would be centred in university departments, would be identified by the students as members of the college community and so would be the means by which the students would identify themselves with such a community.

The reluctance of the Committee on College Instruction to consider more extensive teaching in the colleges was due, as we have noted, to their assessment of the risk of damage to the teaching effectiveness of the university departments, and to the difficulties they foresaw in implementing any such scheme. Although they did not specify the risks, or the difficulties, they have done a service in registering the fears which are apt to assail those who consider all the implications of a substantial extension of college teaching in what are now exclusively university subjects. We shall consider these after we have given our own views on the extent of reform needed.

Macpherson report is too superficial

The author of this article, a graduate theology student at St. Michael's College, worked on a Macpherson-like Study of Education at Stanford University last year. His article will run in three parts. Our reprinting of the entire Macpherson text continues today. See center pages.

By BRUCE CAMPBELL

The Macpherson report has generally been received well because its recommendations are steps in the right direction. But, with one sentence on each section, one can call the whole report into question by showing that it considered problems within a too-limited context. When additional aspects of the same problems are considered, not only is the perspective broadened but also the old aspects are put in a new context, raising the necessity for old recommendations to be rethought and suggesting that additional, much farther-reaching ones, need to be made.

The first section of the report, for example, purports to deal with teaching and learning. In fact, only teaching is discussed, with the implication that learning is merely the reception of teaching. Thus, the committee looks at learning as part of teaching.

But it is really the other way around; teaching is one of the many ways in which students learn. Thus the real question for the committee should have been: how do we improve learning? rather than: how do we improve teaching? As part of this question, one would consider ways to improve teaching, but the discussion would be a different one because teaching would be seen in a broader context.

If teaching is seen as part of learning, the focus of inquiry is not on the subject matter or on the structure or on teaching techniques, but rather on the student: who is he and how is he changed? For example, if we really want to know how to improve teaching, we will ask some of the following questions:

- 1) Who affects students and in what ways? Student interaction and student-faculty contact outside the classroom have been found to have a stronger and more significant influence on students than what goes on in the classroom. This suggests that we need to study how students are changed; the classroom is one of the least important of these ways.
- 2) How does a student instruct himself? Knowing this may help us adjust our ways of instructing in the classroom; both cognitive dynamics (i.e. learning theory) and personality dynamics (blocks preventing learning, etc.) should be studied.
- 3) What content do we teach in the classroom? It depends on what our goals of education are; these goals are in a period of change, so an adjustment in content may soon be appropriate.
- 4) How do we respond to the need for student-centered courses and curricula? Research at several major American universities indicates that "the college student's strivings toward autonomy, self-knowledge, integration of personality, and competence that connects with inner motivation, are of such paramount significance to him that attention to his developmental needs are no mere adornment, but the essence of his education" (Joseph Katz and Nevitt Sanford). How is the university responding to these needs?
- 5) How do we teach?
  - a) Is it best to begin with theory or rather should we start with an experience and expose it to interpretation through theory? Research shows this latter method valuable.
  - b) Should we alter our teaching according to the age and maturity of the student? Is our approach to a senior different than that towards a freshman? Are different learning experiences appropriate at different age levels?
- 6) Who is the teacher? Students sometimes learn more when the professor is absent by teaching themselves and by teaching other students.

- 7) How would working with a goal in view help student motivation and performance? Seeing that work will bear fruit in a social contribution has been found to encourage good work.
- 8) How can self-direction and independence be increased? A solution to this is the basis for implementing any of the answers to the above questions.

These then are some of the questions one would want to ask about improving teaching. But in what ways can learning be improved? To answer this, we must first recognize the ways in which learning is now taking place and then see how these would be applicable to the educational structure.

The physical surroundings are educational, for example. One of the bases of education is the ability to recognize differences; a differentiated university architecture teaches people to note these.

On a more central level, students are looking for models of behavior, attitude, and value. Because parents are no longer the authority, the student must look elsewhere and, since his most frequent adult contact is with faculty, he frequently makes a faculty member his paragon. For this reason, a teacher's attitude toward his subject and toward his students is as much a source of learning as what he says. As the Teaching at U or T was discussed at length in the Macpherson Report but learning was assumed to be "merely the reception of teaching," the author of this article claims.

Muscantine report on education at Berkeley noted in its "homily on the importance of teaching":

Some of the most lasting things that we also teach are qualities, abilities, and attitudes exemplified in the way we have taught, in our stance toward the student himself. A class taught by an unprepared teacher teaches the student neglect of scholarship. A department which encourages professors to hide from students teaches the neglect of human relations.

Student participation in activities should be seen as an important source of learning. Here students learn responsibility and are often challenged to creativity in ways which do not occur in the classroom.

Perhaps the largest influence on students is other students. Much learning, especially in the early years, is done through discovering the norms that former students have set up for how education goes on.

Among the ways in which these aspects of learning could be applied to the educational structure include greater emphasis on independent study and work-study projects. The latter includes both conducting parts of courses in the field (for example, by sending students in introductory psychology out to work with culturally-deprived children and mental patients.

The central recognition which should control all discussion of how to apply "outside" learning to the structure is that students act outside the structure to define themselves. In words already cited, strivings toward autonomy, self-knowledge, integration of personality, and competence that connects with inner motivation are the essence of a student's education.

Che Guevara's spirit still lives

By DAVID FRANK
Che Guevara's ashes may have been scattered, but Friday night his spirit was still very much alive in Toronto.

More than 300 persons gathered to pay tribute to the Cuban revolutionary whose name is feared by every government in Latin America.

"He was a patriot in every country of Latin America," Rev. John Morgan intoned. "He was the champion of un-numbered millions of people."

Born in Argentina, Ernesto Che Guevara left medicine to help Fidel Castro plan the Cuban revolution which eight years ago toppled Fulgencio Batista. Two years ago he renounced his government posts and returned to his role of guerilla leader.

He died last month in Bolivia.

"Che was a doctor, and he died to kill unnecessary death," said Mr. Morgan, of the First Unitarian Congregation in Toronto.

Morgan compared Guevara to Canadian doctor Norman Bethune, who abandoned a successful career to serve in Spain and China.

In the Ontario College of Education auditorium the stage is flanked by ceremonial portraits of scholars.

But Friday night a three-cornered red scarf was pinned to the podium. And behind the speakers was a dark, blurred montage of photos of Guevara—a zippered wind-breaker, a beret, a shaggy head of hair.

"He was essentially a humanist, but a humanist with goals," says John Jamieson, who said he was a member of the campus "Latin American justice Committee." His organization was among the sponsors of the memorial meeting.

"His death weighs heavily on the youth of the world, and of Canada.

"His spirit was at the anti-war demonstrations on Oct. 21 at City Hall, and in Washington confronting the fixed bayonets."

"He is present and will shed his blood wherever man fights for his freedom," said Manuel Rodriguez, the Cuban consul in Toronto.

"The vultures will come and try to eat his memory but his real heirs are those who will follow his call to create one, two, three Vietnams."

U of T gives most to SHARE campaign

This year's SHARE campaign collected more than $12,000, an increase of $2,000 from last year.

"University of Toronto students have no reason to feel smug about this," says Peter Kell (III Trin), chairman of the campaign, "It is still short of our goal of $15,000 and represents a contribution of about 50 cents a student."

"However, U of T students should take pride in the fact that they contribute more than any other campus in North America," he added.

Varsity stings Stangs 4-0

Varsity Soccer Blues defeated Western Mustangs 4-0 Saturday in a tough, wind-blown battle. The score was not a true indication of the play as Blues were all over Stangs and should have won by ten goals. But even though Blues were so much superior, it says here that they did not play up to their true potential. The score could have been 10-0, but should have been 20-0 against the motley array fielded by Mustangs.

Western's players were not individually that bad, yet any attempt to compare them with any of Blues' players would be plainly ludicrous.

Blues started off fast as they consistently carried the ball into Western's goal-mouth but could not finish off their plays. Toronto did not break the ice until a Mustang defender, pressured into desperate action, handled the ball inside his own penalty area. Austris Liepa easily converted the ensuing penalty kick and Blues were up 1-0.

Fifteen minutes into the half, Ron Muir sent a long incisive pass towards Western's net. Graham Shiels showed a spectacular burst of speed to catch up with the ball and beat the Mustang goalie with an excellent shot to the bottom left-hand corner of the net.

Blues continued their relentless attack, but luckless shooting prevented the score from climbing. Western was lucky on three shots by Jim Lefkos, one by Shiels, and a header by Liepa. All missed by inches. Toward the end of the half Blues seemed to have lost their rhythm and were impressive though they never lost control.

A sad note in the half was the fact that Frank Soppelsa suffered a tremendous blow to the head and was taken to hospital.

Soon after the crossover, Blues suffered their second crippling injury of the game. Goalie Erwin Stach dove at the feet of Western's centre-forward Brian de Browner to save a dangerous attack, but in the process caught de Browner's foot across his nose and forehead. Stach's glasses shattered and he was taken to hospital with cuts both above and below the eye, and a feared broken nose. Lefkos replaced Stach in goal and Blues reverted to yet another system this season—a defensively-oriented 4-3-3. It produced good results. With about twenty minutes to go, Shiels, fought off two defenders before shooting low and away from the Stang goalie to make the score 3-0. John Gero then headed a Ron Muir corner-kick into the net to complete the scoring.

Blues still had a few more good scoring opportunities but bad shooting and mental errors nullified them. Western players were more than satisfied with the final result.

Korner Kicks: Jim Lefkos was victim of preferential treatment by the Western defence. He must have thought the name of the game was "My Shadow and I".

East hammers RMC 46-6

It was a win and loss week-end for Varsity's two rugger squads. In back to back games played on the swamp-like back campus, the powerhouse eastern club ran roughshod over RCM 46-6 while Blues' western representatives were outclassed by University of Western Ontario 13-0.

The lopsided victory against RMC was the fifth straight for the eastern Blues who appear to be entrenched as league champions. Al Major and Doug Phibbs led the onslaught with three tries apiece. Andy Gibson actually had the most points off one try and four conversions for 11 points. The rest of the scoring was spread out among George Wraw (5), Maris Apse (3), Bill Kyle (3), Geoff Wall (3), and one team score. Two penalty kicks were the lone counters for the beleaguered cader caddies.

Western trounced Blues' western ruggermen for the second straight time to clinch their division with no losses in seven games. Peter Norris led Stangs with seven points on a try and two conversions.

It's shaping up as a real showdown between Western and Varsity's eastern team for the Gilbert Turner trophy.

Western cops OQAA rowing

Strong Western crews won three of four races Saturday, to depose Rycrson as OQAA rowing champions. Toronto failed to place in all but one race, the varsity lightweight.

The lightweight race Toronto's lone point earner, was won by Brock, a scant second faster than the Toronto crew. The prrace favourite, Mac., finished third.

Results of the remaining races were as follows; Freshman, Western 1, Mac 2, Brock 3, Junior Varsity, Western 1, Brock 2, Mac 3. Varsity Heavyweight. Western 1, Ryerson 2, York 3.

Though Toronto's showing was disappointing, the crewmen many of whom were rookies put a lot of time and effort into training, and deserve a great deal of credit.

Flag and field goal

Western fullback Jeff Hilton (32), leans to the left, leans to the right, stands up, sits down, and then gets the hill knocked off of him by Blues' Mike Wright (33) and Jim Bennett (41). This play was typical of the hard-nosed football played by Blues' defence during the second half of 18-18 tie with Mustangs.

BLUES CLINCH YATES, JUST

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Varsity Blues gave their gregarious guru and the flock of faithful a gruesome 60 minutes Saturday, but they also gave them the Yates Cup as they rally, rally, rallied in the dying moments to tie Western Mustangs 18-18.

The hometowners waited cruelly until the last play of the game before snuffing out the flickering title hopes of John Metras' fired-up Mustangs. Trailing by a point with the ball on Western's 25, Blues gave the call and the iceman cameth in the person of (who else?) Paul McKay. Whistling a snappy version of "Clutch is my crutch", icicles McKay pounded the ball deep into the end zone for the Cup-winning single.

For Western a tie was worth about as much as a bagle in Cairo. They had to win. For coach Ron Murphy and his men, on the other hand, coupled with Queen's skimpy decision over McGill, it sufficed to unkeg the special Yates Cup 7-Up for the second time in three years in a Varsity dressing room.

Sharing the honours with McKay for Toronto was split-end Mike Eben, playing possibly his last game at Varsity Stadium. After being weirdly ignored throughout most of the game by quarterback Bob Amer, despite Western's suicidal one-on-one coverage, Eben flowered when the going got toughest as he grabbed eight passes for 96 yds and one touchdown. Three of his catches came during Toronto's clutch drive for the tying point in the final two minutes.

It was an exciting game in which Toronto had no business being close. For most of it, Blues' offense was a stuttering, staggering, slithering ineptitude. And even the defense was pushed around a bit, especially in the first half. But when the chips were down in the clutch situations, both units came up royal flush. And even Born Farcial, ace Channel 11 commentator, can tell you — that's the mark of a champion.

It snowed just before the opening kickoff, and Blues took the message to heart in the first half as they were mercilessly snowed by a Western team, brimming with cocky confidence. Bob Amer played simply terrible in the first 30 minutes; his playcalling was ragged and his passes far off the mark. Also, for the first time, Blues' offensive showed signs of its inexperience.

With Western quarterback, Bob Israel displaying excellent form, Mustangs had the ball for almost three-quarters of the half. Toronto managed only three first downs and 41 yds total offense. Yet the score at the half was only 7-0. The defense hung tough when it had to, allowing just one touchdown by Israel on a five yard bootleg.

The traumatic trend continued in the second half as Toronto just could not get untracked. Ottavio Colosimo upped the margin to 10-0 with a 24 yd field goal midway through the third quarter.

Then Bob Amer finally awoke from Rip Van Winkle state, and started to connect. Right at the end of the third quarter, Blues moved 52 yds. in 5 plays with Mike Eben scoring on a 26 yd. pass from the quarterback, undressing Mustang player Jeff Hiltan (32) clutches his chest but the ball isn't there. He missed it. Reaching out for Blues is Pete Raham (12), while Stangs' spectacular Bill Hendershot (14), and Varsity's Bill Bennett (54) and Paul McKay (who he?—29) watch and ponder.

opponent, Jim Henshall, with a furtive feint on the 15.

An interception by 'Stangs Richardson set up what seemed to be the clinching touchdown for Western — a 15 yd. fleeflicker play from Israel to Carl Lindros to Bill McTeer. Colosimo's convert made it 17-7 with about 14 minutes to play.

Toronto struck back with a 31 yd. field goal from their talented toe, Paul McKay, and it was only 17-10. And then, Amer directed a perfect, precision-made march to knot the score. Amer's playcalling was brilliant as Blues moved swiftly from Western's 50 in five plays. Glen Markle got the touchdown on a one yard plunge. McKay kicked the pressure-laden convert, of course, and Blues appeared to have salvaged their tie.

But a fumble by Mike Raham on a punt return gave Western their big opportunity. With less than two minutes remaining, punter Dennis Walker drove the ball over the deadline to put his team ahead 18-17. A thick nail thudded into the Varsity coffin.

It was ripped out by a dynamic, clutch performance from Amer and Mike Eben. Taking over on the 40, Amer displayed spectacular cool as the seconds ticked away. Pass to Eben. Zip! Pass to Ware. Zam! Pass to Eben. Zot. Pass to Eben. Zoom! Ball inside the 25. Punt by McKay. ZOWIE!!

Queen's Golden Gaels clinch Yates for Blues by edging McGill Redmen

Queen's University Golden Gaels, smarting from two successive losses to University of Toronto Blues, barely got back on the winning track with a 15-10 victory over McGill University Redmen in Kingston.

Gaels needed a fourth-quarter touchdown from halfback Heino Lilles to post their third win of the season. Lilles counted the winning major on a three-yard run.

McGill jumped into a 3-0 first-quarter lead when George Springate booted a 10-yard field goal. Queen's countered with a nine-yard scoring pass from quarterback Don Bayne to end Don McIntyre.

After a scoreless second quarter, McGill took the lead for the second time when pivot George Wall sneaked over from the one yard line. Springate converted to make the score 10-7 for Redmen at the end of three quarters.

Guy Potvin converted both Gael's TD's and added a fourth-quarter single.

The game, held on an extremely muddy field, was loosely played. McGill were guilty of five fumbles (they lost all five) while Gaels lost the handles four times without recovery. Up top, Queen's picked off two passes and Redmen intercepted three of Bayne's aerials.

Queen's powerful running attack was too much for the losers as they gained 169 yards along the ground to McGill's 104. Gaels also surpassed Redmen through the air—70 yards to 56.

As a result of the game, Queen's still holds down second place in the SIFL with a record of three wins and two losses. McGill is last with a single victory in five games. However, since Toronto tied Western 18-18, both Queen's and McGill have been eliminated from the Yates Cup race.

McGILL DAILY CHARGED WITH OBSCENITY

MONTREAL (VNS) — McGill University erupted yesterday with demonstrations protesting administrative disciplinary action against three members of the McGill Daily's editorial staff.

Early today about 250 demonstrators were camped in the administration building where they said they would remain until the administration came to speak to them and dropped charges.

The administration charged Daily editor Peter Allnutt, Pierre Fournier, editor of Flux, the Friday supplement, and John Fekete, columnist in Flux, with "participating in publication of obscene libel on campus . . . contrary to good order and incompatible with your status as students of this university."

The charges stem from Fekete's column in last Friday's Daily. In it he reprinted an article from Paul Krassner's controversial magazine, The Realist.

The article, which appeared in the May issue of The Realist, professed to be an unedited extract from William Manchester's book, The Death of a President. Krassner wrote that the extract was marked for deletion from the manuscript before the publishers acquired it.

The passage to which the McGill administration objected when it appeared in The Daily was the description of an incident in which Lyndon Johnson defiled the dead Kennedy's body. It read:

" . . . an incident on Air Force One which this writer conceives to be delirium, but which Mrs. Kennedy insists she actually saw . . . That man (Johnson) was crouching over the corpse, no longer chuckling but breathing hard and moving his body rhythmically. At first I thought he must be performing some mysterious symbolic rite he'd learned from the Mexicans or Indians as a boy. And then I realized — there is only one way to say this — he was literally fucking my husband in the throat. In the bullet wound in the front of his throat. He reached a climax and dismounted. I froze. The next thing I remember, he was being sworn in as the new President."

In a later issue of The Realist, editor Krassner said the article was a hoax and that it was not really from the Manchester manuscript. He said he had intended it as political satire.

More than 5,000 copies of the issue of The Daily in which the extract appeared disappeared from the stands Friday.

Business Manager Ely Alboim said he suspected a group of students took the copies, part of a press run of 11,500. There were no copies left on campus after 9:30 a.m.

Rumours circulating on campus Friday morning said the Montreal police morality squad had seized the copies, but police deny this.

Following the administration charge, Principal H. Rocke Robertson summoned Allnutt, Fournier and Fekete to a hearing before the senate committee on student discipline.

Robertson said the committee can recommend penalties ranging from a simple reprimand to expulsion if it finds the students guilty.

In a special meeting Monday, the McGill student council passed a motion calling for Allnutt to retract the article. Allnutt retracted yesterday and told The Varsity early today that he now feels the article should never have appeared because it was "out of context" in The Daily. He said, however, that he saw the article before it appeared.

New College donates funds to TADP

by MARY KATE ROWAN

The New College Students Council last night became the fourth campus council to appropriate money to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

After a tedious one-and-a-half-hour debate, the members voted first to support the TADP in principle.

Then they allocated $100 to the TADP after a 20-minute debate.

D'Arcy Martin (III New), in introducing the first motion said.

"The function of the TADP is primarily informational. It is essential that the student community concern itself with the free distribution of this information.

"I think that on a basic humanitarian ground we should support draft dodgers."

Tom Faulkner, president of the Students Administrative Council, said the TADP "guarantees to the individual the opportunity to make up his own mind.

"It is impossible under universal law to force a human being to stay in his own country."

He urged the members to vote as they felt.

"If you feel as individuals that you can accept the program then behave as responsible persons and look for the electorate later."

Interwoven with the draft dodger issue was a discussion of the right of a student government to involve itself in any moral issue.

Dave Nitkin (III New) said "we are members of society as we have the obligation to speak as our conscience dictates."

And Dave Grey (II New) said, "If the world goes down, we go down with it."

Bookstore report rated "A" by Bohne

By ANNE BOODY

The student report on the University of Toronto Bookstore got an A rating yesterday from the business manager of the University of Toronto Press.

"The report was right in saying that there was a breakdown in public relations," Harold Bohne said in an interview.

"This can't be helped in some cases. There are some points such as the discount allowed on textbooks and not trade books that are very difficult for the public to understand."

He praised co-authors David Nitkin (III New) and Larry Moncik (III UC) for their hard work.

"For the first time in history someone has tried to explain the situation."

The recommendations made by the report should be considered very seriously, Mr. Bohne said. This is particularly true in the area of discounts and subsidies.

He agreed with the report that a co-op would not be beneficial.

Statistics showed that co-ops at Yale and Harvard universities paid students only about $10 a year. "This really isn't very much," he said.

The co-op theory would not be fair to all students, Mr. Bohne said. A student who had to buy more books than another would get the same amount of money from the co-op.

Discounts would be a better idea, he said. They should be allotted at the time of sale.

He agreed with the report that the bookstore should not have to rely on the U of T Press for financial aid, and that the Press shouldn't be hampered by the sales of the bookstore.

"But the Press is very useful in giving advice to the store. It has had some experience with the book business, and could give better advice than the university administration."

Mr. Bohne maintained that the bookstore should not branch out into the sale of items other than textbooks. "As a bookseller and a publisher, I feel it is preferable that the store be run as an institutional store.

"It is not the management's fault that something about the stores was not done earlier.

"Every summer it is like pulling teeth to get the Student's Administrative Council to give ideas concerning the store. At last some action has been taken."

Mr. Bohne said the bookstore management would consider augmenting the store's budget and increasing and equalizing discounts.

Communications would also be improved, he promised.

"But there has been an improvement in this area this year."

University called mechanistic factory

by ANNE BOODY

The modern university was portrayed as a mechanistic factory used by big business for turning out stereotyped products at a Young Socialists conference last week-end.

"Gone are the self-sufficient undisturbing universities of the past," said Harry Kopyto, an Osgoode Hall student and a Young Socialists executive.

"Sprawling factories have taken their place. Grade A meat is stamped with approval and incorporated into the profit system.

"A student is no longer an individual. He is a product. He is moulded, read at and lectured at. At the end of three or four years he comes out drugged, ready to be used on the market."

The problem, said Kopyto is that student leaders look at campus politics as a game.

"They desire accommodation, not revolution. They are too passive in their fight for a say in the affairs of the institution that affects their lives. They want captains of industry to move over a bit, but are too timid to demand that they move out.

"The struggle must be carried seriously at all levels. It must be directed at the real enemy—big business. If not, it will be like a spear without a point.

"Students must seek allies in their struggle for a democratic university. Allies can be found among the working class. Without workers and students big business would be a failure."

Dr. Paul Hoch, a post-doctoral student who served on the Macpherson committee, called students "a passive group of trainees."

Winter of discontent nears: Careless
 By WENDY DENNIS

The problem of separatism will get worse before it gets better, says Professor J. M. S. Careless, the former chairman of the University of Toronto history department.

In a lively address to Young Liberals Monday prior to their convention at the University of Western Ontario next week, Prof. Careless warned about the perils of minimizing Quebec's complaints.

"Centennial summer is over and we are now approaching the winter of our discontent," he said.

Prof. Careless traced the background of Anglo-French relations since 1763 to the present and stressed the duality inherent in Canada's history.

He dismissed as "delusions" any hopes by French Canadians for total separation. However, he doubted that: "the French will see the error of their ways and start acting like little Englishmen."

Speaking of Quebec's newly-found "mood of assertiveness," Prof. Careless stressed the sense of urgency and fear now prevalent in that province.

"There is a definite feeling that time is running out for them," he said.

Drawing an analogy to the struggling African nations, he suggested that Quebec's economic potential is not as insignificant as one might imagine.

He urged Canadians not to challenge Quebec to separate for economic reasons because, he fears, nationalists will gladly accept the dare.

Prof. Careless said he did not foresee the continuance of the status quo in Anglo-French Canadian relations.

"Not many Canadians think that except the odd Ralph Cowan."

Cadillac crowds land with buildings

If you are a student who intends to stay in the Toronto area, expect to spend at least part of your life in a high-rise apartment, advises A. E. Diamond President of Cadillac Development Corporation.

Mr. Diamond says that if his company has its way, "we'll crowd the land with high-rise buildings, and thereby end the crowding of people in buildings."

Mr. Diamond told Toronto Star's conference on city life last week that it is "fanatic Victorian thinking" to believe that a growth in the number of single-family dwellings is the answer to the post-war housing shortage.

Alderman David Rotenberg, another panel member, warned against the polarization of the owner-tenant issue.

"One of Metro's problems is that one block, the developers, are considered evil, while the other, the home-owners, are symbolic of motherhood."

"Student power should be a means of exerting control over the decisions made by the board." This power involves active participation, he said.

The student body has to be definite in their demands. To be effective they must aim for:

- the power to facilitate a free exchange of ideas about all segments of the university;
- the power to change staff-student relations leading to staff-student control over the administration;
- the power to hire and fire staff and administrators;
- the power to insure that the curriculum structure be relevant to the students themselves, including the elimination of the grade system.

"There is too much emphasis on grading," said Dr. Hoch. "It is the stick by which the staff exercises power over the students. Without grading, freer ideas could circulate."

"The Macpherson Report moved to alleviate some aspects of the grading system, such as the abolition of exams in the second year," said Dr. Hoch.

The board of governors and senate should be combined, he asserted. This would cut out half of the business control. It would pave the way for student-staff power.

"Token representation in the governing body would mean the end of the passive views now held by students. It would also lead to greater demands of replacement of the administration."

Fromm, Faulkner debate draft-dodgers

The Students Administrative Council was branded an oligarchy with President Tom Faulkner playing God at its head at a draft-dodger discussion in University College yesterday.

The speaker was Paul Fromm (II SMC), chairman of the campus Edmund Burke Society.

Other members of the panel were Dr. Paul Hoch, a post-doctoral fellow, Faulkner, and Joe Genovese, the treasurer of the EBS.

Fromm said that SAC has an open mandate as far as "student" affairs are concerned — dances, speakers, Blue and White Society programs. This comment was greeted by jeers from the audience.

"But when SAC attempts to speak for student opinion on a moral issue it is acting outside of the bounds of its authority.

"Student opinion can best be represented by a referendum such as the Engineering Society held. SAC representatives do not run on particular issues. They cannot therefore speak for the student body on issues involving a moral judgment."

In reply Faulkner pointed out that he had already won two elections with platforms which included commitment to particular moral issues.

"The last time I was elected, I received the largest mandate any representative to SAC has ever received; to the best of my knowledge.

"I am willing to be recalled from office according to the constitutional procedure which requires a petition signed by 1,500 students of the university," he added.

In discussing the draft dodger issue specifically, one of the speakers from the Edmund Burke Society described the draft dodgers as a group of "international vagabonds."

Students for a Democratic University defend Daily

Yesterday the Students for a Democratic University, a student power movement, took up the cause. In a pamphlet distributed on campus it recommended that:

—Charges against The Daily be dropped, —The code of student discipline be replaced by a university code of discipline administered by students and faculty.

—That The Daily be free from control of any kind,

—That university government be revised by faculty, administration, and students.

At a meeting yesterday at 1 p.m., two faculty representatives—both SDU members addressed 1,000 people.

At 2 p.m., the proposed hour of the disciplinary hearing, 800 SDU members and sympathizers demonstrated outside the administration building where the hearing was to be held.

Security measures in the building were so tight, Allnutt said, that he had trouble getting past the porter to appear at the hearing. No students were to be allowed into the building.

When Allnutt finally reached the senate board room, he found 25 student demonstrators sitting there.

The committee chairman postponed the meeting until next Monday.

The charge was changed to read: "... participating in publication of an article which contravenes standards acceptable by and in this university and incompatible with your status as student."

Later in the day the demonstrators moved past the porter and got inside the building. They said they intended to stay until the administration came to speak to them and dropped charges.

By midnight the demonstrators had appointed a steering committee plus a committee for each of the six floors of the administration building. They planned to remain until their four-point program was accepted

Paul McKay "kicked off" Treasure Van yesterday as T.V. organizer Kim Graybiel held the ball under the eagle eye of World University Service chairman Don Smith. But it's surprising that all eyes are on the football and not on the ball because looking on is Miss U of T, Cathy Williams. She presented the Vanley Cup to Blues football captain Mike Wright. Miss Treasure Van, Liebes Austin, presented the Vainly Cup to the last place U of T Tiddlywinks Team. The Van's opening climaxed with an LGMB plug for Skuie Night.

Ryerson will stay in CUS

Ryerson students yesterday voted overwhelmingly in favor of staying in the Canadian Union of Students.

In a referendum in which more than 46 per cent of the student body cast ballots, 70 per cent were in favor of keeping CUS membership.

In the second part of the referendum, more than 70 per cent of the vote went against keeping Ryerson's dress regulations. Ryerson men now are required to wear shirts and ties.

how to play the really in games

And for the fashionable university student this year, there is a new game. It is being played all across the country; has been for many years now, for that matter. This year, for some reason, was chosen as the year of the results.

The game is called student representation and is played happily by students (who invoke democratic sentiments) against administrators (who cite the paper-work and legal complications).

At the University of Toronto the game took an entirely new tack this year with publication of C. B. Macpherson's report on the Faculty of Arts and Sciences. The famous political scientist advocated student representation on the arts faculty council and on its six curriculum committees. It didn't discuss representation on the U of T senate or Board of Governors. The authors of the report discussed it, but since they decided that such representation was outside their almost boundless frame of reference, it never reached the pages of the report.

To understand what the report has done for the game on this campus (and others in Canada, as the report is being widely studied), the context that created it must be understood.

Evidently Macpherson has been complaining for several years that all was not well in the arts faculty. Also evidently, no one bothered too much with his criticism until they were forced to by an event that occurred 5,000 miles away.

That event was the 1964 Berkeley disturbances in which students were rebelling against their university's depersonalised and bureaucratic character. Because Claude Bissell and other university administrators were so alarmed by this disturbance to worry about their own campus, Macpherson was appointed to make his study.

During Macpherson's deliberations a tone favorable to student participation was set, alerting administrators across campus. In the arts faculty council, Dean A. D. Allen set the machinery going to allow direct student participation.

Some weeks ago the council voted to allow students on six curriculum committees. No discussion has been given so far — as far as has been disclosed anyway — to seating students on the powerful Committee on Undergraduate Studies or the council itself.

Other sections of the university have allowed student representatives to sit in on committee or council decisions. Innis College, Erindale and the Faculty of Food Sciences all have students members on their faculty councils.

In Food Sciences the initiative came from the faculty's dean. At Erindale the faculty council invited student participation. At Innis, principal R. S. Harris said he has considered the idea ever since the college was opened but only this year has the climate been appropriate to suggest the idea to Simcoe Hall.

On first consideration, such moves by college administrations could be thought of as tokenism, giving the students something so they will keep quiet. Yet at Innis, at least, there seems to have been a genuine interest in gaining student participation for the sake of what they can contribute.

In that context, as Prof. Harris has pointed out, the responsibility to see that good things come from the participation are as much the staff's as the students'.

How it all works out has to be seen. Meanwhile, there is a danger that Macpherson's committee has channelled off student anger into some safe streams. When they organize into pressure groups to see that Macpherson's recommendations are implemented, they are fighting only half the battle. The report's recommendations are what the administration wants students to have. It is up to them to fight for something more now.

Macpherson recommended student representation. That's not the issue at all. That's a fait accompli. Student power is the issue. After students get representation, there's still a long way to go before they get actual power.

How to make the university more responsive to human needs and less to society's and the business community's, that's the big issue. It wasn't discussed in Macpherson's report.

How can students improve the climate in which they learn? How can they learn from each other? These and many questions were considered too lightly by the committee.

Macpherson recommended how to put an old system back on the road. His report was written from the point of view of an efficiency expert. The most important questions — were left out. It's up to students themselves to articulate them.

bookstore problem is inefficiency

Sir:

Having just completed reading "A report on the U of T bookstores," it seems apparent that the authors Larry Monick and David Nitkin, have put a great deal of time and effort into preparing as comprehensive a report as possible to present to S.A.C. and for this they deserve nothing short of praise, but the problem is yet unresolved. For what is the problem? In short the crisis is that the U of T bookstore is inefficient. It is being undersold by retail markets who have the same business problems plus added disadvantages such as having to pay taxes. It would seem that the report does not offer students a solution, but rather tries to "explain", "soothe", and ultimately "pass the buck." It is not valid for them to quote reasons for high book prices from publishers that refuse to reduce their graft to a reasonable and fair profit. We live in a competitive society; the course instructor may select any text. If necessary, boycott the publisher who charges exorbitant prices always conscious that we are the buyer, not the seller. Surely other universities such as Harvard, Cal. Tech and M.I.T. must use excellent texts. Such titles should, if the situation arises, be sought and recommended to us. It is not valid to maintain that text retailing is "a seasonal business". How does A & A or the S.C.M. adjust to such economic turmoil. In fact, all retail outlets tend to be seasonal, for example Eaton's and Simpsons accomplish the major part of their year's sales during a 4 week period called the Christmas rush. It is not valid to insist on maintaining an inventory in excess of $500,000 after the book buying rush is over. Is there any competitive business that chooses to tie up all its capital in inventory stock for ten months? It is not valid to accept as an excuse for delays that "by late August only 60% of these forms (text requirements issued by individual lecturers to the bookstore) have been returned", for is it not one of the functions of the store manager to rush such inconsiderate people so that such time consuming and frustrating delays do not occur? But let me not doddle further on dissecting a very shallow study. The bookstore policy should be completely revised. The university should make an attempt to regulate its bookstore operation to follow sound economic principles in order to be competitive. Certainly private enterprise should not be expected to compete with a subsidized grant, but on the other hand, the grant should not afford the absence of competition for the benefit of both publishers and retailers at the expense of the students. The bookstore must bow to market demands. The inventory by Jan. 1 (i.e. after the major selling season is over) must be reduced to as low a level as possible (found through experience) in order to carry through till the recording date some time next June. The policy must be changed so that the bookstore ceases to function as a library (in stocking more than 12,000 titles) but revert to a safe economic concept of stocking only large volume titles. Let the library carry "3 copies of a book", and let the bookstore carry 200 copies of a text. The bookstore should carry only fast moving merchandise such as ruled paper and leave costly slow turnover articles, for instance typewriters to retail outlets such as Simpsons who complement a large selection with immediate delivery and charge the same price as the bookstore. Our bookstore is an awkward and inefficient toy of the administration, and will maintain to be so until it is streamlined into an efficient business, and only then will it be possible to offer student discounts.

Skule gave more to SHARE than some

Sir:

In reviewing the contributions to SHARE we, the concerned Sons of Godiva, would like to make known the fact that the Engineering Faculty has donated more than any other single student group. Another fact that should be emphasized is that a great number of Engineering students have bought computer dating forms (for the greater glory and benefit of the rest of those that bought the computer dating). These two facts if taken in the proportion to the actual number of Engineering students will show that the APSC has donated 96.69¢ per student. This all goes to prove that we're really not such rotten eggs after-eh? So the rest of you guys — put up or shut up!!

questionable maturity

Sir:

Furious and dismayed, I am writing to express my disgust towards those Engineers at U of T who attended the Sociology 120 lecture on Fri. Nov. 3. Their unbelievably boorish and crude behaviour at this lecture was carried to the extent that the professor was forced to cancel the lecture which approximately 600 students had assembled to hear. I realize that this select group of Engineers obviously feels that it must uphold the true Engineer-image, but I feel that it is grossly unfair and arrogant of them to assume that 600 students have entered university so that they could witness the appalling antics of so-called college men. So please, Engineers, do not take this letter as a vain appeal to your questionable maturity and sense of decency — take it as a plea to act like jackasses in your OWN classes.

intelligence is no lower out here

Sir:

I am writing in regard to your article "Lower Standards but Lovable Students" which appeared in the October 30 issue of "The Varsity". The "Varsity" representative sent out to Erindale College was a very biased young lady, who by no means did justice to our argument, but took sections of it out of context, completely ignoring the main theme. This was that although the average academic standing may be lower at the satellite colleges, there should be no inference that the level of intelligence was necessarily lower. Erindale is one of the first U. of T. Colleges to have student representatives on its College Council.

Macpherson's superficial report How better to program students?

By BRUCE CAMPBELL

The author, who participated in a Macpherson-like study of education at Stanford University last year, outlines the superficialities of Macpherson's report. This is the second of three articles. The third will appear Monday.

The second section of the report (The Structure of Degree Programs) looks at education solely in terms of university structure. The questions it asks are: how better to program students?, how to adjust the structure so that students fit it better? The consequence of this is that education comes to be seen not as an end in itself but rather as a means to future ends. What would happen if we looked at education primarily in terms of the present, i.e. the effects that education has on people while they are here?

The effects of looking at education in terms of its serving other ends are two:

The Macpherson Commission looked at education solely in terms of the university structure with little regard for the humanity of the student, the author points out in this article.

an instrumental approach to education and a future orientation. In this conception, education is valuable not for what it makes a student to be, but rather for the tools that it trains him to use. The tragedy here is that man himself (his "mind" is the euphemism usually used) becomes an instrument and thus education becomes a potent force for instrumentalizing people. Looking at education primarily in terms of the present, on the other hand, leads to looking at people. By thus changing the context, one does not eliminate development of the mind, but he puts it within a broader perspective so that it is seen as one aspect of human development.

The second deleterious effect of seeing education as means to an end is that such an outlook leads to a future orientation in both the staff and the students. The staff and administration can avoid looking at students' needs and concerns with the rationalization that what they are doing is to prepare students for the future. The effects on students, however, are even more insidious. The existing norms and expectations are such as to reward students who think in terms of the future and to penalize those who wish to face basic problems now.

In summary, students who are forced to think of their education as a tool inevitably begin to conceive of themselves as tools. Students who are oriented toward future goals are encouraged to avoid facing basic questions in the present. These two negative consequences of the present educational structure are only reinforced by a report which discusses "The Structure of Degree Programs."

The university could begin to remedy this situation by studying the effects that education has on people while they are here. The university needs to look at students: how they learn, what their individual needs are, especially their individual psychological needs; how to foster students' development. The answers to all these questions, particularly to the last one, depend on an understanding of what it means to be human. With its emphasis on knowledge and critical method, the university has largely ignored this question.

The section of the report on the college system suggests the problem there is in restoring the reality of the colleges as academic communities. "Eventually," the report states, "one might hope that students would choose to enter, or transfer to, particular colleges for primarily academic rather than social reasons." But why would such a situation ever come about? The report never asks the most basic question of all about colleges: what constitutes a college, what individualizes one college from another?

The federated colleges were founded at a time when it was popularly believed that our cultural heritage was Christian and thus that religion could be the integrating factor in education. This is now anachronistic for two reasons. First, this is a secular age. In the words of John Cogley, writing in Commonweal last June on Catholic colleges in an article entitled "The Future of an Illusion": "Religion, specifically Christianity, is an important factor in the common culture, but it is no longer a presiding principle." This argues in favour of no longer having colleges organized on the basis of religion. But such a basis is anachronistic for the further reason that religion is no longer, if it ever was, the integrating factor in most students' lives. Probably most are indifferent and the rest are at best examining religion to see how it either facilitates or hinders their personal development. The question for them is no longer: how do I fit into religion? but rather: how does religion fit into my developing person?

The primary concern of students today is establishing self-identity. If religion, or any other discipline, can serve this end, students will employ it. But all activity is seen within the broader perspective of self-development. Their primary question, which underlies and motivates all their specific questions, is: what does it mean to be human, who is man? This question could serve as the new integrating factor in education at the colleges. The colleges would be integrated as a whole because they would all be focusing on the same question. But each college would be unique insofar as it approached the question from a particular perspective, i.e. that of the humanities, of the arts, of the social sciences, of the hard sciences. Provision would have to be made for members of all the major fields to be present in each college to encourage cross-fertilization and to avoid parochialism, but not in so great numbers as to preclude a college's being known as focusing on a particular perspective.

Students are asking that education focus on something it hasn't since Socrates: people. Such a focus is far less likely to fall into the pitfalls that plague education today: training students to be instruments for future social application. Focusing on people and on the question of the qualities of being human helps to keep any discussion within its natural perspective rather than allowing it to proceed in isolation from broader concerns.

Sir George strike leads To more social change

MONTREAL (CUP)—The students council at Sir George Williams University has acted to further the climate of social change resulting from the successful student strike two weeks ago.

At a council meeting last week, council President Jeff Chipman announced plans for establishment of a Laurentian Retreat House to provide facilities for "social and intellectual interchange between students and faculty on an informal basis."

Explaining the move, Chipman said: "We have accepted the philosophy of the student as an instrument of social change."

The council will also sponsor a French immersion course similar to the Berlitz programs, provide co-operative housing facilities by next September, and establish a high school information service to inform students of the programs offered by the students union.

The orientation programs are designed to complement the formal educational structures and bring the community of scholars ideal into practice.

U of W study committee Rejects open meetings

WATERLOO (Special)—A student move for open meetings of an administrative committee at the University of Waterloo was slapped down last week.

The study committee on university government rejected 8-3 a plea by three students on the committee that future meetings be opened to the public.

The committee met openly last Monday to receive the faculty association brief on university government. After the meeting, student representatives Steve Ireland and Steve Fiott moved that meetings be open because there were no lecturers, junior faculty or assistant professors on the committee.

George Atkinson of the faculty association objected, saying members would be prevented from giving frank examples of wrongdoing or inefficiency in university government.

May disband student union

QUEBEC (CUP)—The Laval University students council has called a referendum for early next month asking students if they want to disband the student union.

The referendum ballot offers three choices:

—a syndicalist student union working for its members with compulsory fees;

—a social club or association concerned only with the material welfare of its members;

—simple abolition of the student association.

Vic's Humpty Dumpty fails

by PAUL MACRAE

The so-called "theatre of the absurd" is always a representation on two levels, the literal and the abstract. These levels must be kept in careful balance or the play either sinks into a morass of mumbled cliches, or takes on a zombie-like state in which the actors mouth meaningless syllables.

Humpty Dumpty, this year's Victoria College Bob Revue playing at Hart House theatre until Saturday, has made the fatal fall into abstraction. However, it was a worthy try.

The author, Charles Douglas, has, for a campus production, struck out boldly in his staging, production and writing. At times the stage assumes a kaleidoscopic beauty as brightly-costumed characters parade against a background of shifting colors.

Douglas hasn't shrunk from the hard stuff in his choice of subject. The symbolism of Humpty Dumpty is obvious. Douglas' treatment isn't.

"Humpty Dumpty is basically about falling apart and being put back together again," says Douglas, a fourth-year English major. "This occurs on different levels—social, intellectual, political, and so on.

"Humpty is a guy confronted by 10 people—fragments of society, but not only fragments. They look insane, but they are just boiled down people."

The characters are a potentially exciting group. A paranoic, the faggiest fag I've ever seen (his name is Homeau Lewdends), the consummate whore, a soulful young couple who talk of roses.

Unfortunately, Douglas' obviously fertile imagination is way ahead of the more prosaic task of the more play.

Far too often he has forgotten the two levels. What is happening on stage must be interesting enough to keep an audience's attention fixed on the more symbolic presentation. Otherwise, while we grasp what the characters are trying to say, we don't care.

Far too often words as words, palate-produced sounds, dominate over what the play as a whole is trying to say. The frailty of existence is symbolized in a rose, a conceit far too common to be effective. At one point lights flash and the world comes to an end, and we wonder why.

Bon mots are strewn all over the stage, perhaps in an attempt to show us the emptiness of bon mots. That does not make them any less empty.

If the play fails, it fails in attempting too much. As it is for some, the first act may be too much.

the Ontario Public Service recognizes the U in opportunity

Paralleling the dramatic changes in the Province of Ontario in recent years, and often directly responsible for them, are continuing developments in government planned to keep pace with the dynamic growth of the province.

To maintain its up-front position, the Ontario Public Service must continually bring in new, young personnel with fresh ideas.

As an employer, the Ontario Public Service offers salaries equal to those of private employment; self-development programs and professional advancement; excellent vacation and other fringe benefits.

For the new graduate who wants to be involved in decision making and formulating public policy at an early stage in his career, government employment holds the answer.

It's an amazing era in which we live. A career with the Ontario Public Service will make you an important part of it.

MENTAL HEA

"not a case of you it can be strength

text: IAN HARRISON

From an on-campus survey conducted by CUS Mental Health Committees during 1964 and 1965:

"Since entering university have you ever felt a desire to seek counsel or advice regarding emotional or psychological problems?"

Answering in the affirmative:

Acadia University	69	per cent
Carleton University	57.1	per cent
University of Toronto	57	per cent
University of New Brunswick	54	per cent
Ryerson Polytechnical Institute	50	per cent
University of Western Ontario	49.5	per cent
Average	55	per cent

When you walk north or south past that old, blackened building at Huron and Bancroft — the one with those suggestive barred windows at ground level, and that crazy, spiked tower on the roof — you're probably not aware that you're being scowled upon. But you are. By a brooding, bearded stone face etched in the heavy arch over the front doorway.

The sign on the Huron St. side reads "Torontonesis," but a piece of paper on the inside of the front door window directs you around to the side. There, after passing underneath the bland stare of yet another stone visage, you come to a side door and another sign pronouncing this ancient three-storey house to be the University Health Service Annex.

But that's not all it is. The gruesome façade of this building is hiding U of T's Psychiatric Service (P.S.). It's also disguising a warm, soft-carpeted interior.

Last year 628 students, that number roughly equally divided between the sexes, spent an average of about five hours each in this building. That was 161 students more than the year before, and almost two-thirds more than the 1964-65 figure.

Who are these students, and why do they seek help? To find the answers, The Varsity interviewed Dr. Patricia White, psychiatrist and clinical teacher in the department of medicine, and Dr. John Macintyre, a psychiatrist. They are two of P.S.'s complement of four full-time psychiatrists, four half-time psychiatrists, and one full-time social worker.

The Most Common Problems

Dr. White and Dr. Macintyre listed the problems they encounter most commonly: mild depressions, identity confusion, isolation, social inhibitions, and difficulties with schoolwork.

"For instance," said Dr. White, "a girl may come to us who has done well in high school, but who cannot cope with university: the work is different, everybody seems brighter, and sexual matters may be bothering her. As a result, she may lose heart in her studies and just fail to receive any enjoyment out of university life." Depression sets in, and the student is in a tailspin.

The doctors spoke also of the difficulty some students find in resolving their identities. Dr. Macintyre said this was especially prevalent in late adolescence, the period from 18 to 22 years of age. He said it was often compounded by the student's uncertainty about his future, or by home problems. The feeling of isolation was mentioned, too, especially in connection with those students away from home for the first time.

Other students had trouble coming to grips with society. Sometimes, says Dr. Macintyre, this was manifested in an inability to cope with seminars or tutorials. "Most of these people have been able to escape social obligations in high school," the doctor added, "but now find that these things are expected of them." This problem was sometimes involved with students' attempts to define themselves in relation to their fellows.

"HELP! I—What do I do???"

Another difficulty encountered by students is typified by the student who comes to P.S. near the end of the year crying, "I haven't studied all year and my exam's next week! — What do I do?" Other students in the same boat cannot seem to get started on an essay or some project.

The doctors said this schoolwork was often a cause of anxiety. "However," said Dr. White, "it is often the other way else. The school problem is a symptom. What we do is to help the student get it out' with the student's own strength."

Dr. Macintyre interjects that not every student who comes to the P.S. is consciously bothering himself. He pointed out that many students get through grades 1 to 4 with learning work patterns.

"When they reach grade 5, they get by on an emergency basis, where maturity is not yet fully developed, and they can be easily panicked if, for example, they turn in some quite sophisticated work."

The cure: Accomplished

Just what exactly does the student who is depressed, or who just can't start, need? "It happened during the 3rd year, took place in the Barrie area."

"It's not something you can do with him," said Dr. Macintyre. "We simply discover things about him."

"We try to help him find that the students would do it on their own," added Dr. Macintyre. "It's about finding truths about yourself when you're with someone who's not all alone."

The routine at P.S. is that the student can phone or come for an appointment. The doctor does not have to be present. The latest available figures show that 50 per cent of the students referred to the building were referred by the P.S. 7 per cent were sent by the P.S. and 3.5 per cent by the P.S. said that the proportion of students has risen since.

Usually, it's not hard to get an appointment with the P.S. maintains 24-hour emergency service. The pressure really builds up.

U of T P

3. The magnitude of the problem

Having reviewed the major proposal that have been made in the last decade about the reorganization of college teaching, and about the relation of college to university teaching, we may now set out our views about the magnitude of the problem.

Given the importance we have attached to the colleges doing some of the teaching of all, or as nearly as possible all, of their undergraduate members at some time in their undergraduate careers, and given the desirability and the lesser difficulty of providing instruction in a wide variety of subjects in the students' first year, it follows that the colleges should be encouraged to provide most of the tutorials and as much as possible of the lecturing in first year courses.

We are not proposing that each of the six St. George Campus colleges should give lectures in every first year subject. We are proposing that each of them should give first year tutorials in most subjects, and should give first year lectures in at least enough of the more populous subjects to enable the college to give a significant amount of the lectures to most of its students.

We think this could be done, in a way that would minimize any inefficiency from otherwise unnecessary multiplication of lecture sections, by establishing the principle that the colleges should seek to cross-appoint (and the departments to make cross-appointees available) in those first year subjects in which the lecture classes are now, or might in future be, sufficiently sectioned that the placing of sections in all or most of the six St. George Campus colleges would not require any further sub-division. The number of subjects in which the placing of first year lecturing in the colleges would not require any further sub-division is already substantial. The most recent published figures (President's Report for 1965-66, vol. II) show that there were already then seven or more first year lecture sections (taking all the first year courses, Honour and General, together) in nine of the present university subjects, as well as in most of the present college subjects.

We therefore recommend that each college should attempt to provide most of the first year tutorials in most subject, and first year lectures in most of those subjects which are so populous that they have to be sectioned in any case.

We think it desirable also that some second, third, and fourth year courses should be offered in whatever college(s) the expert(s) may belong to, and that these courses should be open to students from any college; this arrangement would have the advantage of encouraging particular colleges to build strength in particular areas.

Since the teaching in the colleges of even much of the first year work of all of their students would require that each college have some staff in most of the most populous subjects that are now taught only by the university, and since there would be no room in the old colleges for such staff if those colleges retained the full complement of their teaching departments in the present college subjects, it follows that a considerable part of their present staffs would have to leave the colleges and become members of university departments only. We think it has not been made sufficiently clear heretofore that such a major physical relocation of a large part of the present college staffs is necessarily involved in any effective reform of the present structure. This is one of the real psychic costs of any fundamental reform. We do not wish to underestimate it or to conceal it.

There is a difference between the two college subjects—English and French—enrolment in which is so large that they are still viable departments in each of the four old colleges, and the other college departments, in which the enrolment is often so small relative to the college staffs that their continuance as separate college departments on the present scale is scarcely justifiable. If the only problem were the duplication and inefficient allocation of teaching within the present college departments, less reform would be needed in the two departments with large enrolments than in the others, though even if that were the only problem it would be both improper and impractical to propose a wholly different arrangement for these two different sorts of college departments. But in our view, that is not the only problem. When the other problem—that of enabling the colleges to do some of the teaching of all, or almost all, of their students—is brought into consideration, it is apparent that the physical relocation of some members of the larger as well as of the smaller college departments would be required to make room for new appointments in other subjects.

We see no other way of meeting what we regard as the major problem than by converting all the college departments, except possibly religion, into fully university departments in the Faculty of Arts and Science (except that Ethics should become part of the university department of Philosophy), and encouraging the colleges to re-acquire a teaching staff by cross-appointing some but not all of their previous members in what had been the college subjects, and many new members in other subjects.

What proportions of their previous members they could properly cross-appoint in what had been the college subjects would depend on two factors. The first would be how many places were needed for appointments in other subjects in order to enable the college to do some of the teaching of all or almost all of its students. This number would vary with differences in student enrolment in different subjects. But we suppose that a majority of the college places might on the average be needed for cross-appointments in the new subjects, if the colleges were to contain an appropriate balance of subjects. The second factor that would affect the proportion of its previous members a college could advantageously cross-appoint in each of its previous subjects would be the relative size of the student enrolment in those subjects. In subjects in which the enrolment was relatively large, more cross-appointments would obviously be needed than in the others.

The university departments created by the conversion of college departments would initially consist of all members of the previous college departments. Subsequent appointments and promotions would be made as now in university departments, on the recommendation of the appropriate departmental and Faculty committees, the departmental chairman, and the dean. But it would be expected that colleges would sometimes take initiatives in proposing university appointments of persons they wanted to be able to cross-appoint. In addition, of course, the colleges might on their own initiative request cross-appointments of individuals already holding university appointments. It is clearly essential, if the colleges are to be communities of scholars, that those who are to be their members shall be acceptable to them. But it is equally essential, if the main objective of having the colleges do some of the teaching of all or almost all of their students is to be reached, that the colleges should not at the beginning simply cross-appoint back to themselves all their old members, and should not continue to staff themselves by cross-appointments only in those subjects.

4. Financial incentives to more appropriate college teaching

If the principle that every college should offer some significant amount of teaching to all or almost all of its students is accepted, by the Faculty of Arts and Science as a whole, each college will have a natural incentive to make the best, and best-deployed, cross-appointments it can.

However, it seems desirable to provide also positive financial inducements for each college to do so. These cannot be provided if the colleges remain as now assured of their revenues no matter how few of their enrolled students they teach or how little they teach them.

At present, each of the constituent colleges (i.e. University, New, and Innis Colleges) gets no revenue from student fees: their budgets are provided entirely by the university, the amount being presumably determined by the cost of providing such teaching as they are required or allowed by university policy to do.

Each of the federated colleges, in addition to whatever revenue it may have from its parent body or from endowments, gets the whole of the tuition fee ($417.00) of each undergraduate enrolled in the college (except undergraduates in Commerce and Finance, of whose tuition fees the college gets approximately 40 per cent) no matter whether or how much it teaches him, plus a payment from the university in respect of teaching done in the Graduate School by members of college faculties (amounting to about 1/3 of the salary of each member who gives a graduate course), plus (down to 1966-67, after which it ceases) 40 per cent of the annual federal government grant which has been paid directly to the colleges (the other 60 per cent they have paid over to the university in token recognition of the fact that the university provides a good deal more than half of the teaching of the whole number of undergraduates enrolled in the federated colleges).

Thus the federated colleges' operating revenues are related partly to the number of undergraduates enrolled in them regardless of how much they teach them, and partly to the amount of graduate teaching their faculty members do each year. The fact that each federated college gets the whole of the tuition fees of all the undergraduate students enrolled in it (except those in Commerce and Finance), while providing only a part (originally estimated at 40 per cent), of their tuition, is a result of the fact that they have been, by a longstanding provincial government policy, not eligible to receive any provincial grant.

Whatever may have been the original rationale of the present division of revenues from all sources between the university and the federated colleges, two facts about that division are important in relation to our inquiry.

One is that the arrangement that has prevailed up to 1966-67 provides no incentive to the colleges to teach most of their students, since the amount they get from fees does not depend at all on how many of their students they teach or how much they teach them, and since the amount they have up till now retained of the federal grant, while presumably set originally to approximate the proportion they were thought to do of the whole teaching of their undergraduate body, is not related to how many of their students they teach anything at all.

The second fact is that the federal grants have been discontinued, and are to be replaced by provincial grants on a different basis. The Minister of University Affairs announced on June 5, 1967, that the Province would, beginning with the academic year 1967-68, replace the federal grants to church-related colleges by making in respect of each of them an annual operating grant equal to half of what it would get by the provincial formula* if it were not church-related, with the proviso that the 1967-68 provincial grant would in no case be less than the 1966-67 federal grant.

The provincial grants in respect of church-related colleges which are federated or affiliated with provincially assisted universities are to be paid to the universities for distribution to the colleges. The Minister's announcement further stated:

In the case of the University of Toronto, the moneys derived from the formula application will be paid to the university but an adjustment will be made before grants are channelled to the church-related colleges to allow for the present arrangements which prevail at that institution in regard to the retention of tuition fees. (Legislature of Ontario, Debates, June 5, 1967, p. 4315).

The precise nature of this adjustment has not been announced at the time of writing (June 30, 1967), but it may be assumed that it will give the federated colleges an amount similar to the amount of the 40

St. Michaels College's new student centre

For the purpose of implementing our recommendation that the federated colleges be given financial incentives to provide some teaching to all or almost all of their students, some change should be made in this allocation of student fees and government grants. If the present arrangement were continued the colleges would have no financial incentive to redistribute their teaching. Considering that there may well be strong pressures within the colleges for them to cross-appoint too high a proportion of staff in their old subjects, and thus to continue substantially their present distribution of teaching, some financial incentive to a redistribution of teaching seems to be required.

The provincial grants to the university in respect of the federated colleges will be related to the proportion which the colleges do of the total teaching of their undergraduate members, but unless some further internal change is made as a matter of university policy the provincial grant arrangement will have no effect on the distribution of subjects taught by the colleges, nor, therefore, on how many of their students the colleges teach anything at all.

Nor will it be easy to work out an adjustment which would penalize neither the colleges nor the university, as long as the col-of all or almost all of their students.

This solution might appear at first sight to be inequitable to the college. But it must be remembered that the reason the colleges are getting their grant and fee revenue is that the university requires all full-time undergraduates in the Faculty to enrol in a college. If this requirement were not in force, the colleges, with the present pattern of teaching, would lose most of their students and, therefore, most of their fee and grant revenue. And, while the requirement is in force, almost all the students in the colleges must have access to university teaching.

Given these facts, it appears that the university is in a position to re-negotiate its financial arrangements with the federated colleges, and that it should seek such arrangements as would make the colleges' main revenues conditional on their doing some of the teaching of all or almost all of their students.

5. Recommendations regarding College teaching

We recommend, therefore, as the minimum changes required to ensure that all the old colleges do some of the teaching of all or almost all of their students:

(1) that the college departments, except possibly religion, be converted to university departments;

(2) that initially all the full-time members of the college departments be appointed to university departments;

(3) that subsequent appointment and promotions and granting of university tenure be made by the usual method of university departments, with the understanding that the colleges would sometimes take initiatives in proposing new appointments to the university departments;

(4) that upon the conversion of college departments to university departments the colleges restaff themselves by making cross-appointments from the membership of the university departments, each such cross-appointment to be a person acceptable to the college;

(5) that a financial incentive be given the colleges to spread their cross-appointments over enough subjects to enable them to do a substantial part of the teaching of all or almost all of their students, at some time in each student's undergraduate career;

(6) that this incentive be provided by the university receiving all the tuition fees of students in the Faculty of Arts and Science, as well as the provincial grants in respect of all those students, and in turn making to each federated college two kinds of grants:

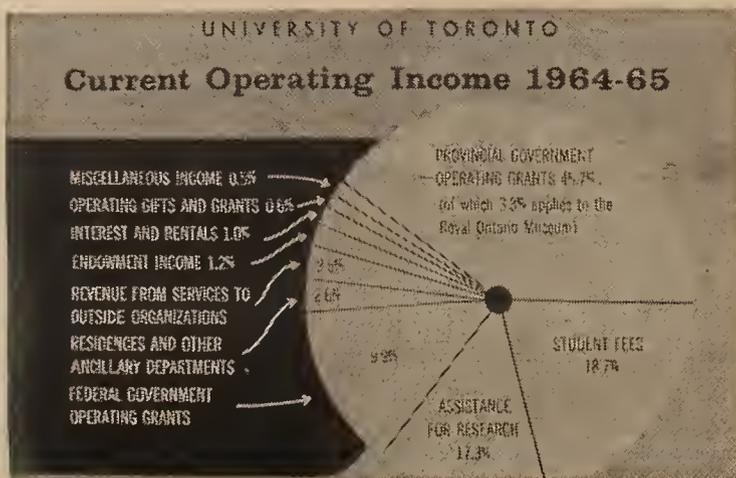

(a) a conditional grant equal to the whole formula cost of the undergraduate tuition actually given by the college, the university grant to be conditional on the college making cross-appointments in such a wide range of subject that it can do a substantial part of the teaching of all or almost all of its students, at some time in each student's undergraduate career.

It should be the duty of the program directors to advise the dean as to how many cross-appointments were needed or justified from time to time in various subjects, and to assist the dean, no doubt in consultation with the college authorities, in recommending to the university the colleges' eligibility for the conditional grant.

(b) In addition to the conditional grant, an unconditional grant equal to say 5 per cent of the amount of the conditional grant. Such a grant is recommended in order to give the colleges a margin for experimental cross-appointments independent of precedent or staff-student ratios in subjects. It would enable the colleges to build strength in subjects they wanted to develop, while maintaining their incentive to offer enough teaching in enough subjects to earn their maximum conditional (and unconditional) grant.

6. Application of these proposals to the constituent colleges

These recommendations have been framed primarily with reference to the old colleges, in accordance with our belief that per cent of the federal grant which they had retained in the previous year.

Thus for 1967-68, the federated colleges will still receive the whole of the tuition fees, plus a revenue from provincial grants similar to their previous federal grant revenue.

* The provincial grants to provincially assisted universities are, beginning with the academic year 1967-68, based on a formula which for 1967-68 provides $1,320.00 for every first year students in Arts and Science; the same for every second and third year General Arts and Science student; $1,980.00 for every second, third and fourth year student in Honour Arts and for every student in Commerce; and $2,640.00 for every second, third and fourth year Honour Science student (and similar or larger amounts for those in other faculties); in every case, less a "standard" student fee (which is virtually the same as the present "academic" fee paid by students in the Faculty of Arts and Science at Toronto).

leges continue to receive the tuition fees. For the fees paid by students in the federated colleges, to the colleges, are automatically deducted from the provincial grant paid to the university for university as well as college purposes.

It appears to us therefore that the simplest and most equitable solution would be that (a) the university should receive all the tuition fees, as well as the provincial grant, in respect of all students in the Faculty, whether enrolled in federated or in constituent colleges; and (b) the university should then make over to the federated colleges the amount to which their proportion of the teaching of their students entitles them under the formula, but should do so on condition that the colleges redistribute their teaching so as to do some of the teaching the most important problem is the restoration of the reality of those colleges as academic communities for all their members, and particularly their undergraduate members. The same main principle, of each college providing cross-appointments for some of the teaching of all or almost all of its students, can be applied to the new colleges on the St. George Campus with much less difficulty. Since their budgets and staffing are entirely matters of university policy, it would not be necessary to step up the same system of incentives for them. This is equally true of the one old College (University College) which is a constituent part of the university and whose revenues and budget are entirely within the jurisdiction of the university. In the case of all the constituent colleges (New, Innis, and U.C.), the university already receives all the student fees and all of the per-student provincial grant.

Nevertheless, if the constituent college are to have some reality as college communities, they should have the same freedom to make their own cross-appointments as the federated colleges. To do so, they should have their own revenues. We therefore recommend that the constituent colleges should each be treated by the university in a way similar to that which we have recommended in respect of the federated colleges. That is, the university should, having received the whole of the student fees and the provincial grant in respect of the constituent colleges' students, assign to each of the constituent colleges a revenue similarly dependent on what and how much they teach, thus leaving the constituent colleges as free as the federated colleges to bid for cross-appointees in various subjects. The constituent colleges should be equally free to choose their men and, within the limits set by the general principle of spreading their appointments sufficiently among subjects, to choose what subjects they would like particularly to develop. With any less freedom than this their Council would have little function, and they would have an insufficient sense of community.

7. Further recommendations regarding cross-appointments

We have already recommended that each college should seek to make cross-appointments in as many as possible of the most populous subjects, so that it can offer at least first year instruction to all or most of its students.

This arrangement will of course require that the university departments, both in the former college subjects and in the continuing university subjects, make available for cross-appointment a sufficient number of their members to meet the teaching needs of the colleges. Although this might present some difficulties initially in the case of the departments in continuing university subjects, it would not be long before these needs could be met in the natural course of recruitment. The experience of departments who have been asked to provide staff to be cross-appointed to Scarborough and Erindale Colleges indicates that there is no serious problem in this respect.

And, as with the cross-appointments to Scarborough and Erindale, it is understood that the individual member is not to be assigned by the department to such a cross-appointment but is to be free to accept or decline an offer by a college. Similarly, when a department is recruiting a new member with a view to his cross-appointment by a college, the person being offered an appointment by the university must clearly understand the intention and be free to accept or decline the university appointment on that understanding. Here also experience already in relation to Scarborough and Erindale has shown that there is no difficulty.

We recommend therefore that each university department in the Faculty of Arts and Science should as a matter of Faculty policy attempt to provide, either by recruitment or from its existing membership, such number of persons as is required to meet the teaching needs of the colleges.

We hope that the objective of these proposals can be rapidly achieved. We recognize however that there may be, at least initially, a problem of finding suitable persons in sufficient number for implementing this cross-appointment policy. We further recognize that the whole proposal would be seriously damaging both to the departments and to the colleges, and therefore to the students, if there were, or were thought to be, any element of coercion in the departments' making cross-appointees available. We do not know whether at the outset there will be enough individual members of the present university departments willing or anxious to take cross-appointments. If at first there are not, and until such times as there are, we presume that arrangements short of the full cross-appointment scheme could be devised. We hope that such arrangements might lead gradually to a full implementation of the scheme.

We recommended further that as a general principle the departments should make available some of their senior as well as junior members. This seems both appropriate and natural, inasmuch as it is already a fairly general practice for departments to have some of their first year teaching done by some of their most experienced professors, so that the undergraduate's first experience of the university should bring him into touch with mature and outstanding academic minds. Such a policy would also clearly strengthen the colleges as academic communities.

We recommend also that as a general principle the person cross-appointed to a college should, if he wishes, also do some teaching in the university department, such as, a senior undergraduate or a graduate course. Here again the experience of departments in providing staff for Scarborough and Erindale Colleges suggests that the opportunity of doing some teaching in the department is often highly valued by the college cross-appointees.

8. The size of Colleges

If the colleges are to become more effective academic communities for their undergraduate members there must be some limit to their size. This principle was recognized in the decision to create New and Innis Colleges rather than allow or require University College to expand far enough to take in all the increased number of undergraduates for whom it was known that provision would have to be made. It was recognized also in Trinity College's decision to hold its undergraduate membership to approximately 720. And it was implicit in the desire of Victoria a few years ago to create a second federated college under its own auspices rather than go on increasing its own size (to which desire the university did not accede).

But in spite of a general desire to limit the size of the colleges, we now have University College with just over 2,000 undergraduates, Victoria College with nearly 2,400, and St. Michael's with about 1,600. It would be useless for us to try to establish an ideal size, but we think it will be generally agreed that a college of 2,000 undergraduates is larger than can be expected to be a fully effective academic community for its undergraduate members.

With the new teaching role we have recommended for the colleges it seems to us both desirable and feasible to work towards an upper limit of 1,500 undergraduates. This would probably involve at some point the creation of one or possibly two more colleges. That step would present fewer difficulties under the proposed new scheme of college teaching than it did under the old. The creation of another federated college at any time up until now would have meant establishing yet another set of college departments in the college subjects, thus increasing the already extravagant sub-division and misallocation of intellectual resources. Under the proposed new system of college teaching this would no longer be the case.

9. Difficulties of implementation

Before trying to assess the intellectual benefits and costs of the reform we have proposed it will be well to look at some of the foreseeable difficulties of operating the proposed scheme.

(a) The possible difficulty of the colleges being unable to obtain from the university departments the staff they need, is we hope sufficiently taken care of by what we have said in section 7 of this chapter. It is not to be expected that every college will be able to provide all the teaching even in all the first year offerings of the Faculty. But, on the still rather limited experience of Scarborough and Erindale Colleges, it may reasonably be expected that every college on the St. George Campus could obtain the staff it needed to provide at least the first year teaching in the more populous subjects.

(b) There is however a complication to be expected from the fact that the colleges will always need to have on their staffs, primarily, professors and lecturers who are particularly competent to teach, and interested in teaching, the first year courses. Consequently it is difficult to envisage complete permanency in cross-appointments. For we find that in many departments, sometimes for different (even opposite) reasons, it is unusual to have the first year courses given for an indefinite time by the same professors. In some departments first year teaching is regarded as an especially demanding kind of work which no one should be asked to do for many years in a row. In other departments first year teaching is held to be a special privilege which no one is entitled to claim indefinitely. Wherever either of these reasons operates, it is likely either that a department will be unwilling to see its first year courses being given permanently by the same professor, or that a professor will be reluctant to accept a cross-appointment which seems to entail permanent first year teaching. In view of these problems, it may be that colleges would in some cases have to be content with (and indeed they might prefer) something less than permanent cross-appointments. However, since our proposal does not confine college teaching to first year, the permanency of cross-appointments is not precluded even in those cases where the first year teaching changes hands.

Nevertheless, we recognize that there may be a serious problem here. A college can scarcely be an intellectual community unless it has a core of fairly permanent faculty members. To seek to recreate the old colleges as effective academic communities for their undergraduate members by means which would render impossible a core of fairly permanent faculty members, would be self-defeating. But we think it may be reasonably hoped that an adequate core could be maintained. We draw attention to our proposal of a 5 per cent unconditional grant which would enable colleges to cross-appoint, fairly permanently, some professors not solely or mainly concerned with first or second year teaching. Beyond this, the professors who are cross-appointed primarily to teach first year courses could be expected to keep them up for five or ten years and/or to move into second year courses. Even if most of them did not stay more than ten years in a college — which is by no means certain, since many would presumably form a stronger attachment than that — we think that this would give a sufficiently permanent core of college faculty.

(c) Another difficulty to be anticipated is that the classes in a given subject in the different colleges might be of such uneven size as to seem inequitable, and might in some cases be so small as to be wasteful of total faculty resources. It may be feared, that is to say, that we should be creating, in what are now university subjects, the same wasteful allocation of faculty as we are seeking to remedy by our proposal to merge the present college departments in what are now college subjects. Such allegations are already made about the size of classes resulting from the very limited practice of cross-appointed teaching in the colleges now.

It would be foolish to deny that there was any possibility of such inefficient allocation of academic resources, particularly in the case of the only moderately populous subjects. We point out, however, that in all subjects in first year, what are now separate classes of Honour and General students are to be merged. The result in many cases will be that the size of the first year class in the Faculty as a whole will be doubled. This would necessitate some division of the first year lecture class in any case (even when it is not already divided), and a division by colleges is therefore much less likely to result in wasteful allocation of teaching resources. There should not be any great problem about the first year Basic courses; and provided that they were given in the colleges, the Additional courses could be given in the university departments.

(d) A further possible difficulty is that of providing the required kind and amount of teaching space in the colleges. It is indeed probable that the classroom space in colleges which would be released by the removal (to university buildings) of the classes in some of the higher years of the present college subjects would not be sufficient in amount or size to take care of the classes in the newly introduced subjects. There will be transitional difficulties here. But since it is already known that more space will have to be built for both Arts and Science departments, sufficient forward planning should make it possible to have some of this built in the colleges rather than in university departmental buildings.

(e) The transference to the colleges of any substantial part of even the first year teaching in the natural sciences may be thought to present special difficulties. There need be no special problem about transferring first year lectures to the colleges; and while it would clearly be impractical to duplicate in the colleges the present laboratory space in the university buildings, this would not be necessary provided the professor and the lectures were in the college. The problem is rather that the professor in the natural sciences generally finds it essential to have his office immediately adjacent to his lab, and wants to spend most of his time, apart from actual lecturing, in his lab or his office. This means that he cannot physically be as much a part of the college community as can his colleague in the social sciences or humanities, whose office and personal library can as well be in a college as in a university building.

So, for most of the natural scientists, membership in a college could not be quite as significant as for those in other disciplines. Cross-appointment to a college might mean no more than walking over to the college once or twice a week to give a lecture, and this would not do much to identify him with the college or to make the science students in the college feel that they were getting their teaching from the college. The situation would be somewhat better if the professor had, in addition to his lectures in the college, one or two undergraduate consultation or tutorial hours there. But even so he would not be as clearly and fully a member of the college as those in other disciplines.

We see no way around this difficulty. In view of the difficulty, we debated whether to recommend an effort to establish, in the course of development of some further colleges on the St. George Campus, one or two primarily natural science colleges. We do not so recommend, for two reasons. The first is a practical economic one: assuming, as we do, that the university will keep to its decision to hold full-time undergraduate enrolment on the St. George Campus to its present figure of approximately 8,300, and considering that there is already sufficient lab space in most of the sciences to accommodate the science students of this total, it would be wasteful to build additional lab space in science colleges. The second, and more fundamental, reason is our reluctance to forego even the imperfect mixing of the two cultures that seems possible by having some of the natural scientists in each of the colleges.

10. Intellectual benefits and costs

We may now try to make some reckoning of the balance of the intellectual benefits and costs that our proposals could be expected to bring with them.

The benefits to be expected are essentially those set out in the Woodside Memorandum. They need not be repeated at length here, but may be summarily stated. The colleges would once again be meaningful academic communities for all their undergraduate members; the misallocation of intellectual resources inherent in the present division of college and university subjects would be ended; and the college faculties would be broader communities of scholars.

Against these benefits must be set some costs.

The most obvious one has already been mentioned: the psychic cost of the dislocation of part of the present college faculties. We do not doubt that this dislocation would be painful, at least in anticipation, to many present members of college departments. But we think they will acknowledge, as scholars and teachers, that the issue should be decided on grounds of scholarship and effective teaching, and we are confident that if it is decided on those grounds it will be decided in the sense of our proposals.

A second cost is the "risk" that was cited by the Harris Committee: the risk that the transfer to the colleges of any significant amount of the teaching now done by unitary university departments would weaken the teaching effectiveness of the departments. We acknowledge that there is such a risk. But we do not think it as great as did the Harris Committee.

On a static analysis it seems evident that any move to make the colleges into broader and more effective communities of teaching and learning must be at the expense of the already existing communities of teaching and learning which are the university departments and their Honour Course students. But when one takes into account the increase in the size and complexity of the departments, which has been going on for some time and is likely to continue, the reckoning is rather different.

We are aware of the valuable sense of community that exists in the departments. We believe that we do not undervalue the esprit de corps that has been an important part of the education of the undergraduates in the several Honour Courses, closely attached as they are to particular teaching departments. Nor do we consider unimportant or dispensable the academic strength that has been imparted to the professors in each university subject by their close organization into unitary departments.

It might appear that a dangerous amount, both of the student esprit de corps, and of the faculty members' sense of commitment to their own disciplines, both of which have grown up by virtue of their organization in university departments, would be sacrificed by our proposal to disperse most of the first year teaching, and some of the higher years' teaching, among the colleges. If we had believed that the esprit de corps of the students, and of the faculty members of different disciplines, would be seriously endangered by our proposals, we should not have made them.

But we think that the fears often expressed on this score overlook one fact which is not sufficiently acknowledged, namely, that already the most populous university teaching departments (e.g. History, Philosophy, Physics, Political Economy, Psychology, Zoology) are so large, in their numbers either of students or of faculty or both, that they are no longer the close-knit organisms that they were a decade or so ago. The large departments, with 40 to 80 full-time faculty, and 1,000 or more first year students, have already moved decisively beyond the possibility of organic unity, either of staff or of students. The same may be said of the most populous of the present college departments, which are of such a size that their faculty members can no longer know each other, and their undergraduate students can no longer be cohesive bodies. Those who extol the old exclusive departmental organization of faculty and students (which we believe was exceedingly valuable in decades past), are apt to overlook the bare facts of the present size of some departments, and the probability that most departments will continue to increase in size.

Because of this change of scale, it appears to us that there is no longer the contradiction that could reasonably have been asserted, a decade or more ago, between the departmental unity of both staff and students and the extension of college teaching in university subjects. Already the larger departments, both in university subjects and in college subjects, have become so large that the faculty members cannot know each other informally. And their students, numbered in the hundreds or thousands, are hard put to develop any sense of community. Some dispersion of both faculty and students among colleges would not therefore constitute, either necessarily or probably, any great diminution of the students' or faculty's sense of commitment to the disciplines of any particular field of learning.

However, even when allowance has been made for the extent to which university departments have already exceeded or can be expected to exceed their optimum size, there may still be a genuine worry that the kind of dispersion of their teaching which our proposals require would seriously weaken them. What, it may be asked, would happen to the unity and cohesion of a department of thirty full-time staff, eight or ten of whom might have their offices in colleges rather than in the departments? Or to a department of sixty, fifteen of whom might be so removed?

Since we have no experience of dispersion on this scale, there can be no certain answer. The few who have been cross-appointed to colleges on the St. George Campus do not seem to have become less a part of their departments because of it, but they are too few, and their college attachments too uncertain, for this evidence to be worth much. Of those who have been cross-appointed to Scarborough College, our evidence is that some have remained effective members of their university departments and some have not. Considering the extent of physical distance involved in Scarborough cross-appointments, this evidence also is not decisive. In so far as the cohesiveness of a department depends on the constant physical proximity of its members in the same building it is evident that cohesiveness will be diminished by the kind of cross-appointments we have in mind. But, apart from the cases of departments that are or may become so large that proximity does not provide cohesion, it may be doubted that proximity is as important an element as is sometimes assumed in enabling members of a department to draw intellectual sustenance from their membership. We believe that the informal relations fostered by proximity are valuable, but we are not so sure that they are indispensable to the intellectual community which is the ultimate justification of departmental organization.

Finally our attention has been drawn to another probable cost of the expansion of first year teaching into the colleges. It is held by some that there is a positive academic virtue in ensuring that students from different colleges sit together and work together in mixed classes such as are provided by the university departments. This mixing may be thought important in view of the religious and socio-economic enrolment concentrations that characterize some of the colleges, particularly since the social associations formed in first year tend to set a pattern for the later years.

However, such mixing as now takes place in first year in university departments is at best inadequate. Moreover, a decrease in the mixing of undergraduates in the present university subjects in the first year would be somewhat counterbalanced by the increased mixing, in the higher years, of students taking the present college subjects. We should also expect that, to the extent that more widespread use of cross-appointments enables colleges to establish primarily academic, in contrast to social, identities, problems of socio-economic and religious concentrations and mixing will be diminished. Eventually one might hope that students would choose to enter, or transfer to, particular colleges for primarily academic rather than social reasons.

We do not know any way of quantifying such possible intellectual costs as have just been discussed, so cannot offer a demonstrable balance sheet of costs and benefits. That there will be costs is undoubted, but we think that on the whole they are outweighed by the benefits.

A P & G Brand Manager Calls It "My Brand" Here's Why

Each P&G product has a Brand Manager, responsible for creating, planning, and directing the entire consumer marketing effort for that product ... The Brand Manager operates much as if he were managing his own business, with such complete involvement the product becomes "My" brand in his thought and action ... Since consumer marketing must constantly change to be effective, a P&G Brand Manager practices the exciting profession of managing ideas that create change in the marketing of his brand!

- Out of your total budget for daytime TV, should you divert a hundred thousand dollars to nighttime television ... and if you do, what changes will you make in your pattern of daytime TV?
- Results of a new promotion in test market are satisfactory, but not outstanding. What ideas will increase its effectiveness and how will you test the changes by the time the promotion is introduced nationally a year from now?
- You expect to have an improved product ready for distribution in 6 months. What copy ideas should you be developing now in order to generate a strong positive consumer reaction to the product change?

As a Procter & Gamble Brand Manager, you make the decisions on questions like these, and many, many others as you create, plan, and direct an effective consumer marketing program for one of the Company's products. There are more than 30 such products: Ivory soap, Tide detergent, Duncan Hines cake mix, Crest toothpaste, Head & Shoulders shampoo, to name a few. For each, there is a separate Brand Group — typically 3 people — headed by a creative business leader, the Brand Manager.

A P&G PRODUCT, BUT HE CALLS IT "MY" BRAND

The Brand Manager, as leader of his Brand Group, carries the entire consumer marketing responsibility for a product. He is expected to know more about the marketing of that product than anyone else in the Company, and his management looks to him to generate the decisions and action that will increase the consumer acceptance of the product, even in the face of intense competition.

In accepting this leadership, a Brand Manager becomes very deeply and personally involved in his work, and he approaches his responsibilities much as if he were managing his own business and marketing his own product.

It is little wonder then, that he speaks and thinks of the product as "my" brand ... and is encouraged to do so by the Company!

CONSUMER MARKETING MEANS CHANGE, CHANGE!

The P&G kind of Brand Management is a tremendously exciting area of work, challenging to even the most creative marketer because consumer preferences, wants, and needs change continually. Note the word "change" appears in each of the problem questions that began this article!

To serve the consumer better, P&G is constantly improving current products and introducing new ones. Even such well-known brands as Crest toothpaste and Tide detergent are improved about once a year, and over 80% of our present domestic consumer sales is in products introduced within your lifetime! In addition, competitors introduce new products and make changes in the marketing of their brands from time to time.

All of this means that changes are frequently made in key marketing elements of P&G brands: package design, product, media mix, copy, TV production techniques, consumer promotions. These changes must grow from sound thinking and planning, and fresh new ideas.

MANAGING IDEAS THAT CREATE CHANGE

Where do the ideas that create change come from? Everywhere. From the Brand Manager. From the other two members of his team, the Assistant Brand Manager, and the Brand Assistant. From the Advertising agency. From company experts on art and packaging, copy, media, television production, and many other specialties.

It often requires a high degree of skill to reach a final "best" decision on the basis of many facts and many different points of view and shades of opinion. At P&G the Brand Manager provides the leadership in this difficult role, and in so doing demonstrates the key reason for his right to say "My" brand!

DOES P&G BRAND MANAGEMENT INTEREST YOU?

Each year, because of continued growth and diversification, we hire a limited number of new college graduates for beginning positions in Brand Management. It isn't easy work, and it requires an unusual combination of creativity, intelligence, resourcefulness and leadership ability, but if you have confidence in yourself and an interest in consumer marketing, we'd be interested in hearing from you. You would begin as Brand Assistant in a Brand Group. Advancement is on merit only, and you would determine your own rate of advancement by the quality of your work. Promotion to Brand Manager will come while you are still in your twenties; it takes about three years on the average.

Fast travel a part of better city life

By IAN HARRISON

Conveyor-belt expressways to speed cars along, bumper to bumper? Automated buses and personal transportation capsules? An "honor system" for TTC fares to enable buses to have more than one entry door and thereby speed up passenger loading?

These were some of the suggestions tossed at Convocation Hall during Friday morning's lively public session on The Transportation Dilemma: Road or Rail?, part of the Toronto Star's conference on city life.

The main speakers were urban planning expert and University of Toronto lecturer Hans Blumenfeld, William M. Spreitzer, a transportation and auto safety specialist and the head of General Motors' transportation and research department in Detroit. They conducted themselves sedately enough before the audience of about 500.

Mr. Blumenfeld criticized the "either-or" thinking that has pervaded discussion of the urban transit problem. The real question was one of the relative proportions of individual and collective transportation.

Mr. Spreitzer confined his remarks to emphasizing the need for a yardstick a public official could use to evaluate various systems in relation to that official's city.

He said the lack of such a yardstick was the reason the urban transit problem has generated "a great deal of talk and little or no action," even though the capital, incentives and technological base required to solve the problem are available.

Then the panelists, Commissioner Ford Brand of the Toronto Transit Commission, and Metro Traffic Commissioner Sam Cass, were let into the act, and the gloves came off.

Cars Too Big, Too Empty

Mr. Brand said flatly that the existing transportation system must be improved:

"We cannot provide adequate transportation for the huge cities of the future with a vehicle that takes up as much space as the car does, and carries an average of 1.5 people."

Mr. Cass scoffed at this as "a problem for our grandchildren," and said today's taxpayers' money should be used for today's problems. He then tried to prove that only one in four urban trips is made via public transit. The real city growth is in the suburbs, where subways are not justified.

"Public transit does not remove cars from the street," he declared. "The openings of the subways have been accompanied by an increase in the number of cars coming downtown, and this is logical: With the streetcars gone, the streets become more attractive for cars.

"Are we planning for people, or for the TTC? If we're planning for people, we must see what they choose when they have a choice. And, at the moment, they are indicating a preference for private motor transportation."

A Battle of Statistics

From here, the exchange became a battle of statistics. Mr. Brand read from the October TTC report which had "just happened" to be on his desk that morning (nearly 27,000,000 trips were made via TTC during the month).

And Mr. Cass lectured from a monstrous chart which purported to show that the percentage of people entering the downtown area by TTC has dropped from nearly 74 per cent in 1946 to less than 50 per cent this year.

"What do you think the TTC is," roared Mr. Brand, "but an organization devoted to serving the people? 'Are we planning for people, or for the TTC?' is a nice slogan, but it has little fact in it."

At this point, the chairman, F. Warren Hurst, president of the Bureau of Municipal Research, threw the meeting open to questions from the audience, and attractive miniskirted hostesses sifted through the crowd, carrying microphones to questioners.

A psychology student lashed out at the TTC for its "inconvenient" service and "insolent" bus-drivers.

Replied Mr. Brand: "You can't have a transit fare and a taxi system."

Then a not-so-little old lady, who had been somewhat vocal throughout the proceedings, demanded to know why the TTC didn't provide wind-shelters at its bus stops. Mr. Brand said that the TTC did put some up, but was taxed for them, so they came down again.

Limit Number of Vehicles

As the questions went on, the audience began to thin out. Mr. Blumenfeld said experts should explore the possibility of limiting the number of vehicles on a freeway to expedite the flow of all traffic.

Mr. Spreitzer described some of the futuristic conceptions being considered by his department, and said the U.S. government is offering research grants for this type of study.

He talked about an experiment in Peoria, Ill., where some workers at International Harvester were provided with personalized bus service. The commuter was picked up at his door, greeted by a charming hostess, and given his morning coffee and newspaper, while being driven straight to work.

"There's only one problem," reflected Mr. Spreitzer. "The system loses money."

Senate minutes available

The University of Toronto's highly secret senate meetings have been opened to public gaze.

At last month's meeting, the senate voted to send minutes of its meetings to the Students Administrative Council, interested faculty and alumni and The Varsity. "The Senate felt that students and staff across campus should be aware of its workings," Robin Ross, senate secretary explained.

In recognition of this historical move and to let students see what the highest academic body at U of T talks about, we are reprinting the entire minutes from last month's meeting.

1. The Senate adopted resolutions in memory of Dean Andrew Robertson Gordon and Professor Karl Schofield Bernhardt.

2. The Senate received the report of the striking committee

3. The minutes of the meeting of May 29th were approved.

4. The Senate received the following communications:

(a) Letter from Principal Harris about proposed changes in the composition of the Innis College Council;

(b) Letter from the deputy minister of education regarding the English requirement for the secondary school honor graduation diploma;

(c) Letter from the secretary of the board of governors regarding limitation of enrolment in the faculty of arts and science for the session 1967-68;

(d) Letter from the chairman of the Senate concerning the appointment of assessors to the Senate;

(e) A memorandum and statistical report on enrolment for the session 1967-68 from the director of statistics and records;

(f) A memorandum and statistical report on undergraduate admissions for the session 1967-68 from the director of admissions;

(g) A report from the director of student awards on university admission awards for the session 1967-68;

(h) A memorandum on routine changes in the membership of the Senate.

5. The Senate approved a report of the executive committee, recommending and reporting as follows:

(1) recommending that the summary of the Senate minutes be sent to: (a) all members of the academic staff, (b) the SAC and The Varsity, (c) alumni organizations;

Is there a place for idealists in business?

IBM thinks so.

If you're concerned about doing something to advance the cause of humanity, you have something in common with IBM.

Don't misunderstand us. IBM isn't an international charitable foundation. It just so happens that the nature of our business allows us to make meaningful contributions to mankind. Example: IBM and the Canadian Government recently undertook a project named "Canada Land Inventory".

The results of this joint project, designed to determine the maximum utilization of land area, may go a long way towards solving the problem of world starvation. That's the kind of work the idealists at IBM undertake.

Does your definition of an idealist coincide with that of IBM? If so, talk to your Placement Officer—make it a point to see the IBM representative on campus. Ask a lot of questions. Or, write to:

Manager of Placement and Personnel,
IBM Company Limited,
1150 Eglinton Ave. E.,
Don Mills, Ontario.

You might do us both some good.

No more booze, broads, brawls...

The McGill Weekend has traditionally been one long drunk.

But the malicious damage which has made this year's outing strictly a non-happening is a fairly recent phenomenon.

Until 1965 the unscheduled activities consisted of the usual round of college hijinks.

In 1961 several ingenious students made a hefty 250-per-cent profit on bootleg beer.

The previous year the train saw the "wildest woman-hunt since the Romans and the Sabine wenches."

Damage was restricted to a few broken windows.

Even as late as 1964 the drinking and wenching students caused only $175 damage.

But in 1965 all hell broke loose. The train was stopped half a dozen times on the way down to Montreal.

The Lady Godiva Memorial Band led students on a rampage through downtown, holding up traffic and tearing down signs.

By the time the train roiled back to Toronto "most were too exhausted to do anything but sit quietly and drink."

Last year havoc reached its highest peak. With 1,200 people aboard the train suffered more than $2,000 in damages.

Many coaches were left in darkness when fuses were thrown from the train.

Blinds and upholstery were torn up, and 75 windows were smashed. Half a dozen CN officials found themselves powerless before the bottle-toting students.

This year CN decided to crack down and imposed strict conditions before the tickets went on sale.

As a result of the unenthusiastic response the train has been cancelled and buses substituted.

But traditions die hard. Brute Force Committee chief Allan Hamilton (III APSC) has managed to reserve a coach on the CN Rapido.

A cosy good time was had by all...

THE TALKING MCGILL TRAIN BLUES

By BOB BOSSIN

This is a song about a train
That goes to Montreal for the McGill game,
Only train I know that floats for 400 miles.

The train pulled out and the party started
As many a can and its zip-top parted,
14 cars of inebriation
By the time the train hit Danforth station.

Made me feel kinda proud to be a Canadian,
To know the spirit of John A. MacDonald still stalks our railways.

The next car was dark that I walked through,
And for some reason it was quieter too,
Until I heard a girl's voice shout,
"Take your hand out
Of my sweater
No not you... you!"

I offered to help them fix the lights
But they said no it was quite all right...
Or words to that effect.

Just then some drunken man lurched forward
And fell toward the emergency cord,
I said "Quick get the marshall!"
They said "He is the marshall!"

The wildest car (and I tried them all)
Had people stacked from wall to wall,
What a party! I asked them "Whose?"
And someone says "It's the Varsity Blues!"
I said "Man, they're playing tomorrow."
He said, "Man, they're playing tonight!"

They put us on a siding while some trains went past,
And the marshall gave us an angry blast,
He said if the cord was pulled or something went wrong
They'd keep us there all night long.
But everybody cheered so they started up the train again.

Windows were the biggest casualties...

"General Foods offers you more than just Sanka"

This is the moment of truth. Here in the check-out area of a local supermarket — when the shopper unloads a GF product (or a competitor's) from her shopping-cart — our sales management and product management people will know whether they have succeeded in meeting the GF challenge: to develop a needed product and sell it at a profit.

Overly dramatic? Perhaps. Yet this silent "battle of the brands", which is responsible for the continuous creation of better and better products, contributes to a stronger Canadian economy and is the very core of our free enterprise system.

Start, Minute Breakfast and Great Shakes are GF's latest entries to the market place: three new products developed to make mealtimes more of a pleasure and less of a chore. Start, a flavour crystal product in cans, offers a good-tasting alternative to the task of defrosting frozen orange juice; Minute Breakfast, a dry mix added to milk, provides a nutritious breakfast for the 50% of Canadians who don't take the time to eat a regular, sit-down breakfast; Great Shakes brings soda-fountain milk-shakes right into the home. Strong new weapons for the battle of the brands, yet if GF's marketing men fail to get the maximum effect from advertising, merchandising and selling techniques, they could lose the battle.

As you can see, GF offers you more than just Sanka. We offer a stimulating, mind-stretching challenge, one which can be met only by exceptional people with a wide range of talents. If you like challenges, you too can enjoy...

(b) respecting the establishment of the institute for the history and philosophy of science and technology in the school of graduate studies.

Ryerson mall cancelled; Street won't be closed

Ryerson's expansion plans have suffered another setback.

Toronto Works Commissioner Ray Bremmer recommended last week that Ryerson not be permitted to close a block of Victoria Street.

Ryerson has applied to close the street so construction can begin on phase one of its expansion plans.

The city values Victoria St. as a link from Gerrard St. south to the business section in its plans for a one-way traffic system for the downtown area.

If closed, the street would become a mall between the main Ryerson building and the proposed library and administration towers in the Ryerson expansion plans.

Construction on the towers was scheduled to start two months ago.

George Wildish, Ryerson director of physical plant and planning said refusal to close the street would result in about 1,000 students being refused admission in 1969.

Football-Engineers harvest; Hockey-just beginning

By CLEM MORRISON
Interfac form-director

The cool Skulemen vaulted into the Group I lead yesterday afternoon with a 26-0 raking of St. Michael's College. The loss drops the Irish to number four spot—the last playoff position.

The Engineering harvest was reaped by Cam Hill, with a touchdown and two converts, John Bielby, Bill Leonard, and Lenny Leamankis, with a major apiece. The last three TD's were scored after three interceptions of St. Mike's passes.

In Group II encounters, Medicine split two games. On Friday, they dusted New College 14-12, only to be cowed 13-6 by Pharmacy on Monday afternoon. This loss leaves the Medsman in a first-place tie with the druggists.

RUGGER

In Friday rugger, Innis irrigated Trinity B 11-5. Tony Cosentino (2 trys), Jim Schmidt (tried once) and Herb Pirk (a conversion), combined for Innis, while Vic Harding counted and converted Trinity's effort.

Games this week saw Meds A mow down Trinity A 5-0, PHE A milk Vic I 13-0, and Engineering II saddle Innis with a 3-0 loss. Andy Davies' medical marker was cultivated (for two) by Paul Bates.

Bill Connery and Larry Bobbett planted converted scores for Phys Ed and Don Stevens added a try. Dapper Pete Blazier fertilized the Engineering seed.

SOCCER

Charlie Oomle's three goals led Meds B to a 3-0 whitewash of PHE B on Friday.

AVID INTERFAC READER

Locking horns in scoreless fashion this week, were Sr Eng and Vic I, Architecture and Forestry, and Trinity and SGS. 0-0.

In yesterday's two contests, Jr. Engineering weeded out Innis 2-0, and Emmanuel eroded PHE B by the same score. Eugenio Marotta and John Bertuccini helped bust the Innis bronc; Dogie Joblin headed in the emetic emans.

VOLLEYBALL

PhE C pitchforked PhE B 15-13. 10-15, 15-4 on Monday.

LACROSSE

League-leading Law lassoed PHE A 8-4 Friday last. Don Arthurs (3 goals), Gord Hill (2), Gary Grierson (2), and Bill Pashby overcame the efforts of John Dale (2) and Chris Rudge (2) for PHE.

Tuesday's game lofted Vic II over PHE B 4-3. Vic's Greg Hiseler, Bill Moebus, Tim Clark, and Ron Woitzik rounded up Phys Ed's Zeke Blocki (2) and Manny Mockford.

HOCKEY

Corral your equipment lads. Put away your rakes and hoes. The interfaculty hockey season is ready for harvest.

For the past few weeks intramural coaches have been out on the range trying to separate the wheat from the chaff.

In this year's first division, Trinity A will attempt to sow a few winning seeds as UC Redmen withered away to the second division after last season.

Other teams in group I are defending Jennings' Cup champs Vic I, St. Mike's A, PHE A, Sr. Engineering, and Law Lords.

Meanwhile, back on the farm, Meds A, Scarborough, Dents A, Jr. Engineering, and St. Mike's B join UC in second division competition.

East can clinch first by beating McGill But is it possible?

By DOUG WOODS

The Varsity eastern team plays the crucial game of its regular season on Saturday at McGill. Blues have put together an undefeated season so far but the McGill Redmen have done almost as well. Their only loss was to Blues in the first game of the season.

That match was highlighted by the fine kicking of Varsity flyhalf Andy Gibson. Blues' passing left something to be desired but their record since then testifies to their improvement from game to game.

Redmen were unorganized and generally uninspired but their record since then has been unblemished. They too have improved over the season. All of this makes it very difficult to predict an outcome for Saturday's match.

The standings going into Saturday's game are as close as Redmen could wish them to be under the circumstances. Blues are 5 and 6 for the season and the Redmen are 4 and 1. A win for McGill ties the eastern division and forces Blues into a semifinal.

With a team of McGill's calibre it is true to say that the more times they play a given team the easier it is to come up with a victory. That is not to say that the same is not true of Blues. But it is obviously in Varsity's interest to keep the number of games as low as possible.

If Blues win on Saturday they take the division championship, of course. The final play-off for the Turner Trophy in that event will be played at Toronto on November 18, between Toronto and Western University, who are already winners in the Western league.

The Varsity western team is at present locked in a close race for second position in the Western league with York University. Blues go into their game on Saturday here in Toronto against McMaster only one point in front of the York team. A win will give Blues a vice-like grip on second place.

Mike Eben: Poetry in motion

Yes, Virginia, Eben has claws. You might not even see Eben for heaven's sake. And yet, stretching out from the all-encompassing embrace are the famous tentacle tendons which have hauled down more than 110 passes in four SIFL seasons. Once Eben gets his fingertips on the ball, for all intents and purposes, he's made the catch.

One of the most familiar sights in the SIFL during these past four years has been the famous Eben dive.

Seldom is the gridiron graced by a sight as aesthetically satisfying (for all you arty types) as Mike Eben diving full-length after a wayward football. He seems to unfold in slow motion terminating with an elegant lunge at the vital moment when the ball arrives.

Once he's caught the ball Eben is still a threat. Deceptively fast, Ebo has left many defenders grovelling in the grass as his long legs spin and twist from their frantic grasp. Last Saturday he left Western player Jim Henshall in a writhing knot as he eluded him for a 26 yd. touchdown effort.

Eben's worth to the team is in evidence even when he's not catching the ball. Against Queen's, double and sometimes triple coverage forced him to be overlooked by Bob Amer as a primary receiver, but in the process, the men he took with him left other teammates in the open. Thus, Eben's mere presence is exceptionally valuable.

And Eben comes through in the clutch. Against Western on Saturday he caught three passes in the final two minutes to move Blues' within single point distance. Two years ago, when Blues last won the Yates Cup, the 6'2" phenomenon scored two spectacular touchdowns as Toronto stormed from behind to nip Western 21-16.

Ryerson's challenge scorned by Ernie Glass

A challenge from Ryerson Zebras of the Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association to play Varsity Soccer Blues has been scuttled by Varsity coach Ernie Glass.

Glass feels that the game would be a waste of time as Blues have already beaten Ryerson this season in an exhibition game. In fact, in four meetings of the two teams during the past four years, Ryerson has been unable to score a single goal against the powerful Blues.

Ryerson's daily newspaper, The Ryersonian quotes Glass, in reference to the analogy he drew to a Zebras-Blues championship game, as saying: "It would be like bringing the English ladies field hockey team over here to play the Toronto Maple Leafs."

Zebra team captain Val Felix was disappointed with the Varsity coach's decision but he hopes to make the challenge stick through the University of Toronto athletic department.

tic department.

Zebras have won the O1AA title for the last four seasons while Varsity has been the OQAA champion since 1963. However, during that period, Ryerson contends, Blues have never put their record or their prestige on the line in an official game outside OQAA league competition.

Could it be that Ryerson is inspired by reading The Varsity's accounts of our football Blues' exploits against Queen's. Or maybe Zebras have been eating Boston beans.

U of T Blues Lack Guts to Play
RPI Zebras — See This Page

Look closely, loyal readers. Cast your galvanizing gaze directly beneath my optic visage and directly above what you are presently perusing. There . . . see that Well . . . what "that" is a dramatic forgery, made by ace blacksmith Bluebottle, of part of The Daily Ryersonian's front page, November 3.

The stark tale as revealed on page sixteen was interesting. Blues' lack of guts (or intestinal fortitude for the squeamish), it seems, comes as a result of a "formal challenge" made by Ryerson's soccer Zebras to U of T to play a championship game for the Canadian title (sic). Blues' soccer coach, Ernie Galss, clearly and testily condemned the idea. Hence, according to Ryerson, Blues ain't got no guts 'tall.

Glass was quoted as saying, "As far as I'm concerned, there would be no contest. You would be wasting our time. It would be like bringing the English ladies field hockey team over here to play the Toronto Maple Leafs." So it appears unlikely Ryerson will get their Ernie game.

However, Zebras are ignoring Glass's caustic comments and are applying through the university athletic department for sanction of the contest. Zebra captain, catty Val Felix, was disappointed at Blues' rejection of the contest. "I still hope they play us, but I wish he (Glass) would have accepted the challenge rather than have the order come from their athletic department. I don't want to think this would be a grudge match."

In their vigilant quest to play-off against Blues, Ryerson display faulty reasoning, notwithstanding their arrogant assumption that the winner would be Canadian champion. (Nobody beats UBC.). Zebras, tops in the Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association for the past four years, appear to have forgotten an exhibition game already played against Toronto this season, and three more in the preceding three years.

In those four games, Zebras have yet to stripe (ho ho). And, while blanking their opponents, Blues have scored fourteen unanswered goals. Now, despite their mute display on the soccer field, Ryerson have suddenly become abnormally loud, ensconced in the safety of the committee room.

Varsity players echo their coach. Ormond Mendes said bluntly, "We don't have to prove anything to them," while teammate Eric Sereda muttered only: "they're nothing." Veteran Austris Liepa was a bit more loquacious: "They've got only one player capable of making Blues, goalie Jerry Halay. They have one more excellent player in centre-half Val Felix, but after that they're a motley array of have-beens at an early age."

An anonymous Ryerson student was contemptuous of his own newspaper for even raising the cry. "It was just somebody with nothing else to write about who wound up making an ass of himself. The soccer players really want to play, but this is just sensationalism."

Well said, anonymous Ryerson student. Labelling a team of Blues' calibre as lacking guts is pure bush-league reporting. Funny how a team with no guts has been able to beat Ryerson four years running.

Varsity harriers win OQAA championship

The Varsity harrier team hurried to victory Saturday over a sloppy, course of about 5½ miles, placing five runners in the top ten. Individual star in the Kingston meet, however, was Waterloo's Bob Finlay, who again beat off Blues' Dave Bailey to win in a time of 27 minutes, 52 seconds.

Bailey, who clocked a time of 28 minutes, 33 seconds, was hard pressed by Blues' Brian Armstrong (28 minutes, 38 seconds), and Waterloo's Paul Pearson (28 minutes, 50 seconds).

A Varsity win was assured by the strong showings of the other team members. Substitute Bruce Thomson surprised many by finishing sixth. He was followed over the line by Bob Cairns (seventh) and Brian Richards (ninth). This gave Blues a point count of 27, enough to stave off the Waterloo forces.

McGill 'obscene libel' charges revised as Student protest loses early support

MONTREAL (CUP) — All but 40 student demonstrators have ended a sit-in at the McGill University administration building after the phrase "obscene libel" was dropped from a charge against three McGill Daily Editors.

A late report last night said the students forced their way into the office of McGill principal H. Roche Robertson and refused to move. Mr. Robertson led the administration's action against the paper.

The editor of The Daily, Peter Allnut, and two members of his staff face disciplinary action by the administration for reprinting an article from Paul Krassner's magazine The Realist.

The article is an imaginary depiction of events following the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

Wednesday, more than 250 demonstrators crowded the building and forced administrators to close it down.

The trial, set for last Tuesday, has been postponed until Monday. The academic senate met Wednesday and recommended to the student discipline committee that the trial be conducted in public, but as yet it remains in camera.

The McGill student council Wednesday refused to send two delegates to the administration's student discipline committee, despite a concession by the administration offering them the right to vote.

As far as the council is concerned the issue has been placed in the hands of its judicial committee, a body set up to decide on legal matters.

Council urged the administration to "desist from any further action" pending the judicial committee's report.

If the committee judges The Daily "acted in bad faith" in printing the offending article, the position of Daily editor-in-chief will automatically be declared vacant.

Allnut reiterated his stand of last week saying: "I have made a mistake. All I can say is that I have done everything in my power to correct it."

Caput meets to discuss action against Varsity for McGill-Realist reprint

Caput, the campus' supreme disciplinary body, will meet Monday morning to consider possible action against The Varsity for part of Wednesday's report on the demonstrations at McGill University.

Registrar Robin Ross said yesterday that the meeting was called because of "a good deal of concern inside and outside the university about the nature of the article."

The article reproduced a Realist text which appeared in the McGill Daily last Friday and which has been called obscene by some.

Mr. Ross said Caput's secret meeting is necessary because "it is important for the university to decide what action if any they will take concerning this."

He said a full account of the meeting will be given.

Don Forester, the executive assistant to Acting President J. H. Sword, said Caput action could range from nothing to a statement to a reprimand to expulsion.

"It is yet to be decided whether anyone will appear," he said, "but if anyone does, it will be the publisher of The Varsity — SAC."

SAC President Tom Faulkner wrote Mr. Sword yesterday that SAC feels Caput action "would be inappropriate, since it would imply that students are neither adults who can deal in a responsible fashion with their own affairs nor citizens ready to accept the protection and penalties which the law affords."

The Varsity's case, Faulkner wrote, could be handled by SAC at next Wednesday's meeting or by lawyers if charges were laid.

Faulkner, as SAC president, is the individual ultimately responsible for The Varsity.

Caput's involvement came after Henry Borden, the chairman of the board of governors, was contacted by Mr. Sword, who now is out of town on a trip west.

Mr. Borden told a Globe and Mail reporter he found the article "disgusting."

"I am sure the Caput will discuss what measures should be taken."

Varsity editor Volkmar Richter and general manager Bob Parkins, who made the decision to run Wednesday's article have maintained that the Realist-Daily text had to be run to inform the campus of what the problem at McGill was.

Henry Borden, who found the article "disgusting."

"Paraphrasing would either have meant nothing or amounted to running the text," Parkins said. "We decided to run it in the interests of informing the campus."

Richter said paraphrasing might have related the reason for the furor at McGill but could not have told why the disturbance there was so intense.

"Hopefully university students are older than children and younger than squeamish adults," Richter added.

Both Parkins and Richter have said that the paragraph in question from Wednesday's Varsity is disturbing in itself but necessary and not wrong in a news context.

The university student and his environment is the subject of today's installment of the Macpherson Report. To collate the entire 36 pages, merely follow the numbers. A limited number of extra copies — if you're missing a section or two — are available at the Varsity office.

Classes are being cancelled from 10 a.m. to 11 a.m. today for a special Remembrance Day service in front of Hart House.

Talk about getting high early in the day! Yesterday morning, residents of Victoria College's Burwash Hall came in to breakfast to find this 10-foot balloon floating about the dining-room. Disgruntled members of the residence had launched the balloon and on it inscribed:

FIGHT INFLATION, DOWN WITH HIGH TABLE.

High table is the raised area where the dons and faculty take their meals.

The object, barely buoyant, bobbed around the hall during the meal, at times falling to within reaching distance, and at other times rising to the lofty rafters of the Hollowed Hall.

It was later broken by curious kitchen staff.

Drink and be married at 16: Needham

By JIM COWAN

Richard Needham, the free-wheeling columnist for the Toronto Globe and Mail, last night advocated forcing every student to leave home at the age of 16 to serve the nation.

Mr. Needham told a sedate audience of about 200 students at a St. Michael's College Honors Society gathering that young people must get more into the mainstream of Canadian life.

He proposed a formal coming of age at 16, after which the youth would be allowed to drink, drive, marry and vote.

But, Mr. Needham maintained, the chances of implementing social change are slim. "Society has complete control of the children, money, weapons of power and the voting machinery."

His main theme was alienation. He is alienated, he said, because:

"I travel a lot. And sometimes I wake up in the morning, look out the window and at the phone on the desk and ask, 'Where the hell am I?'"

Mr. Needham's alienation extends to the fields of economics and politics.

"I don't pay any attention to the ads," he said, "and I'm not a consumer. I don't vote in elections because I do not believe that any political party or government represents me.

"I am also alienated from the the structure of the law. I don't believe governments have any right to make laws about sex or drink."

In a rambling introduction that drew laughter from the audience, Needham said:

—the new national flag is "a red dollar sign against a white background which symbolizes the moral purity of George Hees;"

—the provincial anthem should be "Hello Young Lovers, You're Under Arrest;"

—the national pension plan finally gave high school students something to look forward to.

In response to a question he said he did not "consider himself to be a 55-year-old hippie."

"I think it's a good thing to leave home, but I'm not sure I approve of the hippies' 25 yard dash" (to Yorkville).

"I've earned almost $400,000 since I came to Canada and I've spent about $405,000. I guess that makes me a naturalized Canadian," he continued.

"And I've spent most of that on women, which is the only way to spend it."

COPOUT hopes to turn on UofT campus

An organization that hopes to unify student activities has been reorganized after years of inactivity.

The Council of Presidents of the University of Toronto (COPOUT) "hopes to turn on campus organizations by making students aware of what their student councils can do for them", says chairman Ken Stone, (IV Inn), the president of the Innis College student council.

COPOUT, made up of representatives of the student organizations of the colleges and faculties, met at Scarborough College last month.

The committee is to be a communicating co-ordinating body between the individual societies and the university as a whole.

Problems of the individual student societies can be brought to the council for discussion and issues raised in the council will be relayed back to the student societies.

The council will take collective action where there is a consensus of opinion.

The need to involve students in the activities of student councils was discussed at the first meeting. It was suggested that candidates should run on specific platforms to arouse interest in voting.

The council's activities will include workshops to discuss budget, social activities and communications media.

A central committee made up of chairman Stone and members-at-large Hershel Ezrin (IV UC) and Bob MacCallum (III ASPC) — was set up.

Of the 23 college and faculty organizations, nine sent representatives to the organizational meeting.

Cough syrup yields kicks for crazed

The "drug craze" is catching on. People are discovering uses for cough syrup, mixtures of paint and gasoline, and even ground nutmeg.

In fact, a well-stocked spice cupboard can yield a yearful of "highs," says Dr. Robert Smart, the speaker at the third engineering liberal arts lecture.

Dr. Smart is a member of the Alcoholism and Drug Research Foundation.

"Never before have drugs been taken in the excess they are today," he maintained. "Kids feel they are not normal if they don't sniff glue or smoke marijuana."

Dr. Smart explained that new crazes are concerned with the use of non-alcoholic drugs, and are "the province of the very young."

Young drug faddists are usually 10 to 21 years old, he said.

Marijuana was introduced in North America in the 1920's, said Dr. Smart. "At that time it was used by lower-class, indolent unemployed males. It filled some sort of social need they lacked."

Today, however, drugs are used by all intelligence strata. "Most users are more intelligent than the average college freshman, even engineers."

Marijuana does not lead to addiction, he said.

Glue-sniffing is the drug of the pre-teen set. Most users, says Dr. Smart, are boys from 10 to 13.

"In initial stages five to 10 minutes' sniffing will cause a jag. But chronic users have to use as many as 25 tubes to get high."

"Speed" — pep pills and stimulants — is becoming increasingly popular. Dr. Smart said this was due to the scarcity of heroin.

"Hippie emphasis on drugs is disturbing," claimed Dr. Smart. "If they must rebel they should be content with simply dropping out rather than turning on."

"We must educate the public of the danger of drugs. They have to be taught that it is possible to lead a successful life without the use of drugs."

Bookstore needs Press: Jeanneret

Dr. Marsh Jeanneret, the head of the University of Toronto Press, said yesterday that a financial divorce of the Press from the University of Toronto Bookstore would be "desirable."

But, he said, in an interview, the separation of the administration of the two enterprises would not be of advantage to the students and faculty who use the Stores.

Last week's Students Administrative Council report on the store proposes a curtailment of relations between the Press and the Stores.

Dr. Jeanneret, the son of F. C. A. Jeanneret, who died last year while still chancellor of the University of Toronto, said the publishing and bookselling businesses overlap in many areas, especially that of accounting.

The present relation between the two allows for considerable mobility of staff between departments. "This is a definite advantage," he said.

The relationship also helps the Bookstore in their dealings with commercial publishers, Dr. Jeanneret maintained.

He said he did not want to upset the "delicate" relationship between the Press and the Bookstore.

Treasure Van slaps light fingers

Many kinds of people come to Treasure Van during its week-long run at Hart House. Some come to buy, others just to browse. And some come to steal.

The job of frustrating the light-fingered visitors this year belongs to Ian MacMillan (III Vic). Ian is in charge of security while Treasure Van is at U of T. With the aid of student volunteers and one hired security guard he hopes to keep pilfering to a minimum.

Last year Treasure Van did $250,000 worth of business on its cross-Canada tour. It lost about $8,000 worth of merchandise to thieves. No record is kept of how much each show loses.

"I don't even know how effective our system is," Ian said. "We haven't caught anyone this year."

Ian tries to have two students for each hour the show is open acting as plain-clothes observers. If they see anything suspicious they tell the uniformed security guard who in turn detains the suspect for the Metro police.

"Any students caught would be reported to caput," Ian said, "while non-students would be turned over to the Toronto police. Children would be reported to their parents."

"The accent is on prevention," Ian said. "We make people leave their coats and books outside, and use a special purchasing system." Articles are stapled into bags after they have been paid for and anyone wandering around with unbagged items is a potential suspect.

Stan Zuly (IV UC) is sales manager for Treasure Van. "We're doing about $2,800 worth of business a day," he said, "and we hope to reach last year's total of $15,000 by the time we close at 10 p.m. Friday."

Floor manager Linda Nafel (II Innis) acts as general supervisor for the sales personnel.

Toward the end of the evening, security guard Aris Birze (II Vic) wandered by. "Haven't even seen anything suspicious," he reported. Ian MacMillan hopes it stays that way.

Nov. 11 - Rhodesia's Day too: Fromm

Remembrance Day, Nov. 11, should also be honored as the second anniversary of Rhodesian independence, says the campus Edmund Burke Society.

But, says F. Paul Fromm (II SMC), the leader of the group, "in Rhodesia's hour of need all her allies can do is to criticize and censure from afar."

"Truly," says Fromm in a press release for tomorrow's Rhodesia teach-in, "we are hypocrites."

"Rhodesia has never attacked nor threatened anyone, but it is the one nation that Canada is at war with economically."

In a two-page discussion of the last two years Fromm paints a vivid picture of an Africa festering with cannibalism, genocide and anarchy.

"The last few years have given little ammunition to people who claim that the African is ready for independence," says Fromm.

The teach-in on the 730-day-old regime of Ian Smith will start tomorrow afternoon at Sydney Smith Hall.

The society has been granted $200 by the Students Administratives Council to sponsor this teach-in.

Course committee needs General reps

A group composed of faculty and students from the department of political economy have been meeting to consider the implications of the Macpherson report.

And, says John Pepperell (IV Trin), they "have already arrived at conclusions that could drastically reorientate honors political science and economics courses."

However, members say they need to balance the committee with students from the general course. Any general student majoring in either subject can participate by applying to the political economy office by Monday.

lest we remember

There is an old Varsity tradition that today's editorial should deal with War and Remembrance Day.

Sometimes we write noble poems to duty, valor and country, and somebody praises our patriotism.

Sometimes we write about pacifism and the futility of war, and somebody tries to have us fired.

Sometimes we decide to ignore the issue completely, and somebody thinks we forgot.

The following article was written for the New York World by the British historian, essayist and journalist, H. G. Wells.

Appearing on the first Remembrance Day, it expresses what we feel about tomorrow in a manner far more lucid than we can muster at this time.

Britain, France, and Italy and now the people of the United States have honored and buried the bodies of certain Unknown Soldiers, each according to their national traditions and circumstances. Canada, I hear, is to follow suit.

So the world expresses its sense that in the Great War the only hero was the common man. Poor Hans and poor Ivan lie rotting yet under the soil of a hundred battlefields, bones and decay, rags of soiled uniforms, and fragments of accoutrements, still waiting for monuments and speeches, yet they too were mothers' sons, kept step, obeyed orders, went singing into battle, and knew the strong intoxication of soldierly friendship, fellowship and the sense of devotion to something much greater than themselves. . . .

A time will come when we shall cease to visit the crimes and blunders and misfortunes of their governments upon the common soldiers and poor folk of Germany and Russia, when our bitterness will die out and we shall mourn them as we mourn our own, as souls who gave their lives and suffered greatly in the universal misfortune. . . .

It would be possible, I suppose, to work out many things concerning him (the Unknown Soldier). We could probably find out his age and his height and suchlike particulars very nearly. We could average figures and estimates that would fix such matters within a very narrow range of uncertainty. In race and complexion, I suppose he would be mainly North European; North Russian, German, Frankish, North Italian, British and American elements would all have the same trends towards a tollish, fairish, possibly blue-eyed type. . . .

None of these factors would be strong enough to prevent his being mainly Northern and much the same mixture altogether as the American citizen of 1950 is likely to be. He would be a white man with a touch of Asia and a touch of color. And he would be young — I should guess about twenty-one or twenty-two — still boyish, probably unmarried rather than married, with a father and a mother alive and with the memories and imaginations of the home he was born in still fresh and vivid in his mind when he died. We could even, I suppose, figure in general terms how he died. He was struck in daylight amid the strange noises and confusion of a modern battlefield by something out of the unknown — bullet, shell fragment, or the like. At the moment he had been just a little scared — everyone is a little scared on a battlefield — but much more excited than scared and trying hard to remember his training and do his job properly. When he was hit he was not so much hurt at first as astonished. I should guess that the first sensation of a man hard hit on a battlefield is not so much pain as an immense chagrin. . . .

Every speech that is made beside the graves of these Unknown Soldiers who die now in the comradeship of youthful death, every speech which exalts patriotism above peace, which hints at reparations and revenge, which cries for mean alliances to sustain the tradition of the conflict, which exalts national security over the common welfare, which wags the "glorious flag" of this nation or that in the face of the universal courage and tragedy of mankind is an insult and an outrage upon the dead youth who lies below.

He sought justice and law in the world as he conceived these things, and whoever approaches his resting place unprepared to serve the establishment of a world law and a world justice, breathes the vulgar cant and catchwords of a patriotism outworn and of conflicts that he died to end, commits a monstrous sacrilege and sins against all mankind.

— November 11, 1921.

LETTERS

bookstore manager replies to critic

Sir,

Since Gerald Wiseman's letter to The Varsity so eloquently supports my statement that it is very difficult to explain the complexities of the book trade to the public, I cannot refrain from correcting a few of his statements.

(1) The University Bookstores are undersold by some retail outlets only on a highly selective basis, and this fact has been pointed out in the SAC Report. None of the Bookstore's competitors attempt to carry the large variety of textbooks which the Textbook store is forced to stock because of its responsibility to the University which these other stores do not have.

Despite Mr. Wiseman's statement, these stores also never have to cope with the seasonal demands of the University Bookstores face each year. They are busy alright, but if Mr. Wiseman were to lead a group of 1,500 undergraduates to the A & A or SCM stores during lunch time, the results would be, if anything, more chaotic than they were in the old Bookstore with its counter service and limited space. Even Mr. Wiseman must admit that the new self-service policy of the University Bookstores has greatly increased efficiency and speeded up service. To correct another frequent misconception: the SCM store does not pay taxes and does not allow a discount on textbooks.

(2) It is unfair to generalize and say the instructors are unaware of book prices and recommend books regardless of price consideration. Most professors recommend paperback editions when they are available, and the number of prescribed texts in paperback editions increases from year to year. I fail to understand Mr. Wiseman's reference to M.I.T., Cal Tech and Harvard in this connection; does he imply that textbooks in these institutions are selected on the basis of price rather than usefulness?

(3) Needless to say, the Bookstore inventory of $500,000 is an average figure and is actually much higher during August and September and considerably lower after the beginning of second term. The management of the Bookstores annually returns a large quantity of unsold textbooks to the publishers, and does make a highly conscientious effort to reduce inventories to a minimum.

What Mr. Wiseman asks for, of course, is a mere textbook distribution centre which might conceivably only operate for a period of 3 to 4 months out of the year. This would undoubtedly cut costs in certain areas, but it would also deprive the University of Toronto of what Mr. Nitkin and Mr. Monck found to be the best general book selection in Canada. In this connection, it should be emphasized that in no way does the existence of the Bookroom depend financially on the Textbook store; the fact is that, in small measure, besides making a cultural contribution to life on the campus, the Bookroom helps reduce some of the costs of operating the special order department and financing the textbook inventory.

The fact that Mr. Wiseman does not care about the availability of non-required books on the campus should no more give him cause to suggest the elimination of the Bookroom than my personal disinterest in athletic activities should tempt me to suggest the use of the football fields for the construction of restaurants, parking garages and (surprise) a new and combined bookselling operation — all undoubtedly badly needed.

The success and acceptance the Bookroom has met are some proof, at least, that it is more than an "awkward and inefficient toy of the administration." In fact, the Bookroom fills an important need on the campus which could not be filled by the kind of supermarket operation Mr. Wiseman suggests.

I fully agree with Mr. Wiseman that Messrs. Monck and Nitkin deserve praise for their report, which for the first time has put the Bookstore operation at the University of Toronto in its proper perspective. It would be foolish to suggest that there is no room for improvement, but it is the constructive criticism contained in the report and its recommendations which provide the best ground for such improvements.

H. Bohme,
Business Manager

impressions vindicated

Sir:

My conception of a university, which may be idealized and/or old-fashioned, is that it is a place where various kinds of people come together to develop, explore and transmit ideas. This does not imply that life in the university is either deadly serious nor unending fun. Further I have a conviction that society in and around the university is not irrelevant to its purposes.

Accordingly I invited my introductory class to think about the differences in image and student behavior in different faculties, particularly that of the School of Practical Sciences. This invitation sparked some interest and discussion so I attempted to give a brief overview of the engineering (and engineers) and society. This led to the demonstration and disruption of my class last Friday.

What is disturbing is that the demonstration was a response by people who did not hear what I said, and showed no signs of caring whether they were acting on fact or rumour. In the lecture in question I discussed three themes in the image which engineers seem compelled to assert and maintain; their masculinity complex, their conservatism and low sense of social responsibility, and their anti-intellectualism. I was seeking (very sympathetically, I thought) an understanding of why this image was perpetuated, even when it is false for a proportion of engineering students.

I take little pleasure in having the accuracy of my observation so dramatically confirmed. I am much more aware of the failure of an attempt to communicate across an already too-wide interfaculty gulf.

I have received, and accepted, apologies of both a self-identified member of the Engineering Society who attended the "happening," and of the Engineering Society which insists that none of its executive was aware of plans for this "prank." On this sad note I guess we should consider this incident closed. But I can't promise not to try again to lure engineering students into the arena of ideas about a subject which concerns all of us, the community and society of which we are parts.

Norman W. Bell,
Professor of Sociology,
Associate Professor of Psychiatry.

Varsity comics?

Sir,

We certainly enjoy the comic section of The Varsity. You might even say it's a mind-stretching experience. The comic strips of IBM, General Foods, and Great West Life certainly are not the banal kind of comics for the uneducated masses. Such superior comics make a meaningful contribution to mankind, especially to the university student. Keep up the good work.

Prisons... inside and outside and inside...

Item — Berlin 1962: We arrived in East Berlin, my companion and I, late in the evening off an express train from Warsaw. Our papers appeared to be in order and we were told on the train that we could spend the evening in the Eastern sector and move on to West Berlin the following day. Tired, unshaven, dirty, with packsacks on our backs we looked like two refugees who might have walked the entire distance from Warsaw.

The streets were deserted except for the soldiers who stood guarding various doorways, corners and subway exits. We wandered along the broad lonely dark avenues in search of a hotel, finding none except for one which was inhabited by a nervous clerk who told us he was completely filled up and would we please leave at once.

We finally found ourselves on a longer and narrower street, bordered on one side by brick houses and on the other by a low stone wall. A figure appeared in the shadows in front of us, hesitated, and then stepped into the glare of a street lamp. He wore a soldier's uniform and sported what I thought was a tommygun which was vaguely pointed at us. As he approached, I saw that he was nervous, and kept glancing apprehensively into the shadows as if he expected to find some support; he was about eighteen; so was I.

I was about to ask him if he could lead us to a hotel and began to do so in a somewhat angry exasperated tone when all of a sudden I noticed the VERBOTEN-type signs splashed on the wall across the street, and higher up, the rolls of barbed wire strung out along its length.

I began to understand: Soldier... tommygun... two young English speaking men, unshaven wearing packsacks apprehended along the shadows of the wrong side of the Berlin Wall; it was 1962 and they were shooting at anything that moved near the wall in those days... "Ha ha," I chuckled to myself, "ha-ha, look what we've got ourselves into" and tried to control myself until I could get to a washroom.

Another young man appeared from behind us wearing the same outfit and gun; "Hello" I said politely handing him my Canadian passport which he took with great interest; his companion looked confused.

"Ha ha, Peter," (my companion) I said casually, "look over there at that wall; guess what's happened; let's call the police Peter."

Peter, in the meantime was two steps ahead of me and was arguing indignantly with our original young friend that he lead him to the police where the whole matter would be straightened out. Meanwhile I perused my passport with the other fellow who took great delight in seeing all the different visas and stamps in the book; he asked questions about each of them — Russia, Poland, Finland, France — in German; I answered with little anecdotes about each in English. Neither of us understood the other.

As it turned out, an hour later we were being escorted by the police to the border checkpoint, where they politely informed us that our papers were not in order and a stay in East Berlin would not be permitted. We thanked them for their indulgence and proceeded down a long corridor where a customs official waited to check us out. I was still in a state of semi-shock, still trying to figure out why we weren't dead, or in some cell, so that I didn't notice Peter arguing vociferously with the customs official, waving his hands threateningly, while the official ponderously shook his head for he spoke no English. "Good Peter," I thought "now we're sure to get shot; keep it up."

Finally he succeeded in communicating to us that our entrance papers from Poland were not in order and we would not be permitted to leave East Berlin until we had them. We smiled politely at the man and walked back down the long corridor where we were politely reminded by the man who had escorted us there that we could not spend the evening in East Berlin...

We stood there silent, confused, in the middle of the corridor as the two men at either end, who worked for the same government stood smiling politely at each other.

"I speak excellent German and English," a voice informed us, "perhaps I can be of some assistance..."

I turned around half expecting to see a hookah smoking caterpillar; it was a young Indian student who proceeded to straighten out our problems. After many polite refusals, bluffs, and glares with the customs official, a long telephone call resulted which led to our release. We shook hands with our friend the Indian Student and waved goodbye to the customs officer, telling him to beware the Jabberwock; he replied with something that sounded like "Comrade" and waved politely after us.

And so, we escaped to the glossier prison of West Berlin.

Item — Three days later a young East Berliner was shot trying to cross the wall; he didn't die immediately and was left to bleed to death for several hours on the wall; a crowd of angry West Berliners gathered to watch, hooting and jeering the American guards who refused to go and help the lad who screamed in pain until he expired. The world press was indignant.

Item — A. cah driver, muttered something about Hitler being right as we drove near the remains of the headquarters of the third Reich.

Item — The next day we left West Berlin for West Germany; we were detained for four hours at the East German border and questioned in little green rooms. Our exit visas had expired of course.

We somehow bluffed our way through that one too, arriving late that afternoon in West Germany; we were picked up by a middle aged man in a Mercedes who had been a part of Hitler's military police and pointed out that the autobahn we were driving on had been built by the Fuehrer himself. We smiled politely when he asked us to send him some stamps from Canada for his daughter who collected them.

By that time I was in a hurry; I had a boat to catch in Rotterdam in five days. School had already started back home and I was anxious to get into grade thirteen.

Item — I went through grade thirteen, and politely bluffed my way into the glossier world of University. Now I sometimes think about Graduate School.

Item — Ottawa 1965 — Some sixty of us were gathered to be tried in a stately courtroom in the nation's capital; the charges had come as a result of a sit-in on the steps of the Parliament buildings after a week of teach-ins and demonstrations against Canadian complicity in the War; it was a veritable gathering of the SUPA clan in the courtroom — Jim Laxer (reporter), Art Pape, Tony Hyde, Ken Drushka, Harvey L. Shepherd, John Sealey etc.

We sat in silence as Dimitrios Rossopoulos, witness for the defence, mounted the stand to deliver a political defence of the sit-in; Dimitri was an elder member of the Movement, editor of Our Generation, and carried himself with an aristocratic ease, and spoke with a well tailored, clipped Greek accent; he touched the bible ever so slightly with his little finger as he was sworn in, and began to deliver what we all thought ((somewhat humorously) was to be the History Will Absolve Me speech of the anti-war movement. The judge, understandably was not sympathetic to the views of this budding Castro as the charges were disturbing the peace: nothing more nothing less; Fidel was cut short and we were sentenced to two days or ten dollars.

We spent that evening locked up in little green cells in the Ottawa jail; restless, sitting on my wire cot I saw the shadow of a guard pass by at 3 a.m. He stopped.

"Can't sleep son?" he asked; I replied No, and could I please have a cigarette. He gave me two and told me to try to get some sleep. I did.

We all greeted the next morning with songs and whistles; solidarity etc. etc. A beefy guard paced outside our cells every hour on the hour, admonishing us to cut out the crap. His little speech was well-rehearsed:

"FER CHRISSAKES SHADDUP! (Pause, step, step, step) YER NOT INA GODDAMN SUMMER CAMP (Pause) YER IN A JAIL! YER ALL PRISONERS (Step, step) YA KNOW WHAT YOU CAN DO WITH YER SINGING (Pause, step) YOU CAN STICK IT UP YER..."

"ASS!" we replied in unison: we knew the lines. "SHADDUP!"

Item — Jim Laxer writing his MA thesis at Queen's University in Kingston sat in a room about a half mile from the Kingston Penitentiary. On clear days the loud-speaker from the Pen carried prison announcements across the marsh to his attentive ears; one day the metallic voice went like this:

"Prison Baseball: First Base George Harris, Second Base Frank Jones, Third Base Steven Truscott..."

Item — Three days ago The Supreme Court of Canada upheld a decision sentencing a man to jail for committing homosexual acts with consenting individuals in private. This might mean that many homosexuals will in the future suffer the same fate and go to those fine institutions of heterosexuality, the prisons.

Liberals, (Capital and Small "L") will have a tough time with that one.

"It's a dreadful law; just because a man's sick . . . Why some of my best friends are..." Whoops.

Item — My friend Arnold Rubenstein went to the O'Keefe Center this week to see the Dance of Death; when the Queen was played Arnold remained sitting as he always does when the Queen is played. A voice behind him asked him if he was paralyzed; Arnold replied no and remained sitting. The voice then told him to stand up but Arnold remained silent and sat.

When it was over Arnold's mother turned to the voice and said:

"This is why we came to Canada." They are from South Africa.

Love for Love for Love

By DAVID PAPE

'This pity' 'tis true, the National Theatre of Great Britain is here for so short a stay.

Their production of Congreve's Love for Love has only one more showing. 'Tis pity for 'tis an education in the art of comedy in the eighteenth century.

All the gracefulness and charm that we expect of such pieces are presented here with superlative assurance. As directed by Peter Wood, each scene is constantly moving, never static despite the play's talkiness. And along with the mastery of such gracefulness, we find the vigour and robustness of life. Behind the polite facade is terrific energy.

As the title would indicate the play concerns a balance of types of love. Not only must the love of Valentine be returned by Angelica, but his love must emerge from the darkness of melancholy infatuation to an awareness of serious married devotion. Again, there is a balancing in the various kinds of love displayed, ranging down from Valentine and Angelica to the robust desires of Miss Prue for Tattle, and Ben for Mrs. Frail. The astrological impotence of Foresight is balanced by the adulteries of his wife. The contivings of Mrs Frail and Tattle are complemented by the overreaching lust of aged Sampson.

Thus the plot takes us through the repertoire of mistaken identities, double entendres, disguises, witty one-upsmanship, broad farce, dreadful yearnings, and plain bawdiness that gives us the comedy of love.

In the end, Valentine wins his lady and keeps his fortune too. All losses are restored; the narrative tied together; and the whole cast joins in a dance in the morning. What possible conclusion could be more charming!

Maddeningly, much of the play's texture was lost by the time I got back to Row W where I was sitting. Facial expression had to be assumed, and much dialogue was inaudible. You cannot blame a company for the theatre's faults; it is just terribly frustrating to know a good job is being done, done, and only be able to bear partial witness.

Delightful are the comic caricatures of Graham Crowden as old Foresight, Petronella Baker as the rambunctious Prue, Edward Hardwicke as the nautical Ben, and Sir Simpson, the aged and lascivious father.

Laurence Olivier, as Scandal, absolutely exudes; just oozes everywhere. And Joyce Redwan, as Mrs. Frail is the most conniving and tempting "Women of the Town" that any of us might imagine. The double — triple — quadruple take that occurs when these discover themselves accidentally wed, is worth the whole play!

John Stride, as Valentine, is perhaps too constant in his love, though wildly changeable in his manifestation of it. As written, his trial is one of constancy; and since he does not grow emotionally, we respect him most when he is mad. Playing opposite him, Geraldine McEwen as Angelica was truly angelica.

This is a superb company, a super play, and a valuable education in drama. Our opportunities to see eighteenth century drama are rare — to see it well done, rarer still. It is not to be missed.

Pantagleize: Bravo! Bravo!

By DAVID ROBERTS

One must hope that the APA's production of Pantagleize succeeds in making de Ghelderode familiar to North American audiences. He should be the dramatic force which will replace Brecht; which will claim the popularity that Ionesco had seven years ago, and Albee ten years ago. His work has the power of Dada, the dislocation of Surrealism, the fearfulness of Genet and the humanism of Camus.

Who is he? Michel de Ghelderode was a Belgian; a Medieval cultist; a manie for puppets and masks; a man who immersed himself in the paintings of Breughel and Bosch and El Greco; who lived in a world defined by the melange of arts about him, and by his imagination.

He worked with puppet theatres in his teens, and saved the scripts of their productions. The characters he creates for the stage bear resemblance to such puppets. They are of the same flatness, and the same surprise; they spend the same gratuitous effort on seeming absurdities; they have the same freedom; and the same penetrating reality. Suddenly, a comic sentiment strikes at the heart.

The characters do not attain the self-awareness that makes for tragedy; yet they are all liquidated. The hero, Pantagleize, is all things; a philosopher, boss, humble writer for a fashion magazine, failure, messiah, socialist, leader, humanist, lover, lunatic and rebel. But he is all these things unwittingly. He is an imbecile, motivated by love of life, misused by the world he does not understand.

The action of the play is in a City on the eve of one war and the morrow of another. This is a day of eternal darkness; of the eclipse; the revolution; confusion, burning and looting; of civil war; and ironically, it is May 1.

"What a lovely day," says Pantagleize, uttering the password that buries the world in darkness. The light of the sun is put out. It is the day for black man to become boss, for the servant to cast off his black clothes. Everyone wears black glasses to see the sun. In fact, everyone in the play, no matter which side they are on, wears black.

Everyone except Pantagleize, the imbecile in white, who starts the revolution without knowing it, and is its symbol of hope.

The entire play occurs in the semi-darkness of one day. The question that remains is whether there will ever be light again.

Without the sun, will mankind panic in a mania for light? Will humanity destroy itself in a pyromanic frenzy? Although the revolution is quelled, there is no emergence from it; the shooting and disorder continue. It is midnight, the dark morrow of yet another war. And it would have been the same had the battle gone otherwise.

Still, this is a farce. Despite the confused alarms of struggle and flight, Pantagleize wanders innocently through the slaughter, accomplishing missions in the wierdest fashion without even knowing why.

It is a farce even at its most sinister moments. The army is reduced to a machine: a machine which sings and marches and upholds its brainless leaders. It is a kind of comic puppet, not morally responsible for its actions. Some actually appear on strings; other merely in uniform. Indeed you cannot help laughing at the simple conceit of General McBoom; the eternal posing of the Poet who would overthrow syntax as well as institutions.

It is a dark play, which twitches into life, and in a death scene recalling Bonnie and Clyde (again!), twitches out of it. The stage is deep and dark, and bare. Sets roll on and off quickly, all of muted grays. The lighting is uniformly pure white, and often spotlight, so that the characters run and dance over a huge stage, in and out of shadows, far more confined in atmosphere than any set could make them. Technically, the play is extremely complicated, and the APA's handling of it is superlative.

The acting is a marvellous example of what a troupe working together can achieve. No role has great depth, but every role has great demands. Nat Simmons as African Bamboola, Richard Easton as the policeman, Keene Curtis as the anarchist, and Patricia Conolly as the Jewess, all attain the appropriate height of intensity. Sydney Walker as Innocent was movingly sincere, the true idealist. Joseph Bird and Richard Woods both created the mixture of fearfulness and humour their parts demand and in the fine style we have come to expect of them.

The opportunity to see Ellis Rabb, artistic director of the APA, on stage is rare and rewarding. His performance was absolutely brilliant as Pantagleize. They will be standing up for him all week.

The play has a limited run. It is no less than electrifying, undoubtedly the most important piece in the company's repertoire. Sunday matinee is perhaps the best time to get tickets.

Comedians: a simplistic view of Green's vision

By BOB RAE

Comparisons between Graham Greene's novel The Comedians and the new film of the same name at Loew's Cioema do have some validity. Greene wrote the screenplay for the film and his mark is indelibly on it.

The tale is about Haiti, the machinations of a hotel keeper played by Richard Burton, a Major Jones portrayed by Alec Guinness, a Latin American ambassador (Peter Ustinov) and his wife (Elizabeth Taylor, who is also Burton's lover. In addition to these four central characters are an American vegetarian and his wife and the Marxist Dr. Magiot, who is quietly working to overthrow the Duvalier regime, which the film portrays with extraordinary brutality and horror.

Greene's well-known tragicomic vision of life is drawn with the most simplistic and pedantic of brushes. Exaggerated irony abounds: the seedy Major Jones, masterfully played by Guinness, is made to confess to Burton in a deserted cemetery. Burton's "conversion" at the end of the film to the cause of political commitment is the most obvious, the most unconvincing, and the greatest deviation from the book. The dialogue often smacks of sentiment and is too loaded with "Meaning." Are we watching a morality play or a film? The committed novelist and screenplay writer has a hard time not sounding didactic.

Comedians

Greene's world—as Ambassador Pineda says: "I sometimes think that Haiti is no different from life anywhere"—is a little too cluttered with tragicomic symbols and ironic turns of circumstance to ring true. There is a difference between having our senses pricked by Greene's insight and being smashed over the head with some symbolic icon.

Burton and Taylor, in danger of becoming as inseparable and ubiquitous as Laurel and Hardy, perform only well; Paul Ford and Lillian Gish as the vegetarian idealist pacifist and his wife are too ridiculous to take on the dignity they are surely meant to have. But Guinness and Ustinov, as obvious but valiant "comedians" struggling with their miserable passions and desires, are very good indeed. It is in such portrayals that Greene, in his novels and in this film, really excels. These men, in the heat and squalor of the Haitian tropical inferno, sordid and undignified in their frustration, take on a paradoxical dignity all their own.

It is this atmosphere which the film is able to get across: the sweaty corruption, the mystery and savage wildness of the voodoo ceremony, the omnipresence of brutality and evil. Credit here should go not to Greene but to the director, Peter Glenville.

It is, however, the characters that have to make the mood convincing, and not all succeed. The film fails when the actors fail in their roles as comedians, when their motives are too far-fetched, their actions too wooden, their dialogue patently contrived. When this happens, unity and atmosphere break down. That this happens at the end of the film is a maddening, but not fatal, occurrence.

Algerian War

By MARTYN CLARK

What happens to a film which contains within its cast only one professional actor and technically speaking is often "guilty" of overly-fast panning, poor lighting, and bad dubbing? At first the results may seem quite remarkable, for The Battle of Algiers has been awarded the Silver Goddess, four Silver Ribbons, an Italian Oscar, and has won awards at both the Acapulco and Venice film festivals. It has also been nominated for an Academy Award as best foreign film.

All this is not quite so remarkable after one has seen the film, for the lack of professional actors and apparent lack of technique accomplish what professional acting and technique should be doing, and yet so very often fail to do: namely, presenting to the viewer with as much clarity and vitality as possible the message of the film without becoming intoxicated with their own mechanics.

A lot of the credit must go to Gillo Pontecorvo, who handles the direction and collaborates on the screenwriting and music. What he essentially gives us is a documentary-style re-enactment of the recent Algerian struggle for independence, and yet, as we are informed in the titling: "not one foot of newsreel or documentary film has been used."

The struggle takes place between the Arabs of the Casbah under the leadership of the rebel organization, and the French headed by the paratroopers of Resistance game. There is something for every one here: draft-dodging, civil disobedience, a National Liberation Front, terrorism, striking, colonialism, sabotage, anti-establishmentarianism, and torture. It cannot fail to bring to mind the political and moral issues of our own day, whether they be those of Quebec, Vietnam, or the Near East.

New Ernie, Familiar Game

By MARY OMATSU

Ernie Turner, Don Owen's hero of The Ernie Game, the N.F.B. feature premiered Wednesday on Festival is beautifully childlike. With his petulance, his naivety, his stubbornness, and his great mop of hair, Ernie is lovable. He's a wastrel: sponging off women, seeing the world through a looking glass, and living with both feet off the ground.

Yet he's so familiar. In fact, the film has an almost reminiscent quality. There is the inevitable N.F.B. standard "art" shot: a sequence with Ernie kibbitzing and mad-capping in the snow. There are scenes which evoke memories of a Taste of Honey, Breathless, and Alfie and Ernie brings to mind a curious combination of Jean-Paul Belmondo, Don Franks, and Charlie Chaplin.

Ernie's the absurd hero, lost, lonely, and moral, despairing of becoming a mere "case history," and wandering aimlessly around desperately seeking someone to talk to.

Yet what has Ernie got to say? He'd say he was a saint or a writer, and he'd tell of days spent taking pictures, climbing through back windows, robbing drug store clerks, hiding in bed because he couldn't cope with life. He'd be the little boy left clutching onto his teddy bear when all the other kids were old enough to go to school.

The Ernie Game is the first attempt at commercial film making by the C.B.C. and N.F.B. As such, it is indeed a hopeful entree into the big time film distribution market. The Ernie Game is an essentially plotless collection of vignettes—some of them are old hat, others charming and funny. The background musical score composed and performed by the Kensington Market Band, has a familiar sound. In fact, The Ernie Game is too familiar. It's a motley of the tried and true thinly covered over with a veneer of something new.

Yet there are times when The Ernie Game works, and it's funny, charming, and huggable, mostly because Ernie is funny, charming, and huggable. But unfortunately, hoping that a feature film can make it on the strength of one character's personality is expecting rather much.

PRISONER'S ENTRANCE

Notes on Fortune, Prisons and John Herbert

By DAVID PAPE

"—It's a good play!"

"—It's a good play."

"—Yes."

"—It's real life baby!"

said the producer to me after Fortune and Men's Eyes. The play is about four men in prison, one being initiated in the rules of survival. The play blatantly accepts the homosexuality we all hear about, and works within the limits of these norms.

—It's real life, baby! You can't turn your back!

Well, do I or don't I? It's not a social polemic, I said to myself. I know these characters. And look at them in the play; they are the same inside the prison as they are without. Rocky is an ordinary tough. He pimps, and sells himself to the highest bidder. Queenie is the cleverest, but which squalor is more pleasant? working in a kitchen, or hustling in the prison? Sure, he has all the ploys, but under this brilliant ever-changing facade of quips and poses, way down is the twelve year old boy locked in his closet by his foster-mother so she can drink and whore unseen, Queenie knows her way around the politicians in the prison; but the child was imprisoned long ago, by a social institution.

These are general characters. They are always in prison. Look at Mona. He was beaten up outside, but the cop sided with the gang. He is in jail for nothing. He is the scapegoat in jail too; and suffers for others. He is the eternal butt of everyone else's malice. It doesn't matter whether he is in or out of jail. As for the guard, he is as at home in the jail cell as a clerk would be at coffee break. He smokes the convicts' cigarettes. He wretches in their john. His dream of retiring to Florida is as much an impossible fancy as Rocky's boastings about Cadillacs, or Queenie's about jewels.

Sure, this is real life, and we all know it. We've met these men before. But the prison cell, like the boat in Conrad, cuts them off from all diversion. There is no escape from the pressures on them. They cannot retire to the Club for cards. There are no nice conventions to retreat into; no security. Others need them, and will use them. If unco-operative, there is the threat of physical punishment and abuse by all and sundry. It is a violent world, with nothing but evil choices. But it is also the world we live in, without the palatable formulas that appease us.

"This is the bottom rung of the ladder, and the life it depicts is interwoven with the life outside the prison.

"It was most important that all the characters be human. The guard is a man who can enjoy the fun of the convicts, but who is capable of brutality; he is limited in scope, accepts the bad pay he gets. There is no villain. No one is wholly good or bad."

If anything it is the society we live in that precipitates the drama. "If I were to educate high school students," said John Herbert, writer of Fortune etc., "I would take them to the law courts, and to the houses of Parliament and let them see our law-makers making . . . asses of themselves.

"A country gets the record it deserves. We are made by our environment, and the policies governing it are produced by the privileged. Well, Canada has earned the record it has: The worst record in NATO. Out of 100,000 citizens, 243 go to jail. It is as if we love to punish. Something Calvinistic in our makeup."

The social mentality Mr. Herbert was here describing is the mentality that creates prisons; a mentality that suppresses its emotions and spontaneity. And this mentality, which so restrains itself leads inevitably to cruelty; its negativism leads to destructiveness. "We are destroying society, and nothing is being done."

Comparative figures were at hand. Sweden, Russia (despite its regimen), The United States, Australia, none are as bad as Canada. The United Kingdom has 50 people out of 100,000 in prison; 1/5 the rate in Canada. As for returning, 85% of Canadian prisoners are repeaters. Of Queenie, Mona, Rocky, and Smitty, only Mona stands a chance of escaping the prison world — and a slim chance at that. He never should have been there in the first place.

" . . . if the law is as interpreted by the courts below, it means that every man in Canada who indulges in sexual misconduct . . . with another consenting male and who appears likely, if at liberty, to continue such misconduct, should be sentenced to preventative detention, that is, to incarceration for life."

Chief Justice John R. Cartwright

Translate this into headlines, it reads: Homosexuals can face imprisonment for life. And notice the words "consenting male".

Herbert again. "Research is needed. I would like to know how much money is being spent each year on research to rehabilitate the criminal." Bloody little, one might assume by the tenour of legal statements like the above.

"Sweden began research thirty-five years ago, and has been having great success." Their ratio of men in prison is low.

And so we lock our homosexuals up to keep them out of harm's way. But why are 85% of all men in prison repeaters? "If they are not criminal when they go in, they are when they come out." This is the obvious answer, given by Fa. G. Jones, who was chaplain of prisons in Melbourne and Sydney. The prisons, then, are the instrument by which criminality becomes self-breeding. Rather than protecting society, they undermine society. In Fortune, Smitty is the example of all this.

"Smitty will go back," said Herbert. "He will be one of the 85%. He has learned all the lessons that prison has to teach him."

I interrupted, "But the last time we see him he has reached an understanding with Mona, and now must bear the burden of his guilt; the burden of Barrabas. Mona is the one tortured in his place."

"No, that is not what I intended. We have seen Smitty's path. Despite his despair at the end. We have seen him come into the cell; at first, he can be used by others. But he quickly learns how to manipulate others, and will use anybody." In the play, it is Smitty's threat of blackmail that prompts the guard to drag Mona away in Smitty's place.

What happens to Smitty when he is released? "He gets his money and his clothes and goes home and finds himself excluded by his neighbours. Sudden it's the whole street; it happens in the entire area. He is isolated everywhere. He is unable to get a job; unwillingly, a pain

Why was this done as a drama rather than a play? "I am not new to the theatre," Mr. Herbert indeed been working with his workshop since 1960. They have done ten productions since. One act plays at the Bohemian Embassy. The popular appeal of his work, he says, is not a critic to his shows. Pleasing his audience is ignored by the "arbiters of taste". Ironical, the harshest critic, Nathan Cohen, who produced the play to take the play to New York.

The process of revision of the play, earlier plays, has been one of simplification. Herbert's work has been more on the line. Herbert's work has been more on the line. Herbert's work has been more on the line. Herbert's work has been more on the line.

This accounts for the strange effect of Herbert's drama. It is social drama, but about the power conflict of the prison cell is heightened by the pressure of an unchangeable outside Paris. This is a play as true of Kingston as of any outside Paris. It will be actable by men in every age. It is our greatest Canadian drama, one of the most significant written in s

This is the power of the theatre, the effectiveness and excitement. "When your nerve-ends should be tingling." If they drama has failed.

The trueness of Herbert's character is what makes them important. They care. Their problems become the audience's. This, for Herbert, is the theatre's responsibility. People care about themselves by showing themselves. The artist must hold up a mirror, and yet be objectively outside of it. He must be a fearful joiner. He must be within the experience of its emotions, but he must be detached; and his work must stream out like Caliban at the sight of

At present, John Herbert is reworking which he retitled, Closer to Cleveland. He implies that Canada has imported all the characters that are found in the States, and that Canada is the States most resembling Toronto. The private club society, the old and new is the same world as that of the prison. "Most of the criminal minds I bring to the private club for lunch. Just as cruel and smile at the judges over the table."

And we remember the impassioned "Judges and lawyers and cops, they're all throwing me on the mercy of the court, 'Guilty! Lock him up for six months!'"

v. The Undergraduate and his Environment

1. The undergraduate environment, human and material

Teaching and learning in a university are not confined to the classroom: they go on, or should go on, in informal discourse among students and between students and faculty, and in individual reading, study, and writing. Teaching and learning, then, are to be found, or should be found, in libraries and common rooms, in bookshops and dining halls, and wherever else members of the university can explore each others' minds and the minds acquaintance with which is to be had in books. This is to say that a student's environment, both human and material, is important to the process of teaching and learning. His human environment — his relations with other members of the university — is itself a part of the process of teaching and learning. His material environment — the rooms in which he works and lives and converses, the libraries and bookshops available to him — can evidently facilitate or impede teaching and learning.

Because of their importance we have thought it a necessary part of our inquiry to look at some of these environmental factors. In this chapter we are concerned with student-faculty relations, counselling, student housing, and student access to the printed word in libraries and bookshops. Each of these matters would deserve attention in any inquiry into the adequacy of undergraduate instruction. Attention to them in this inquiry becomes especially important because of our earlier recommendations. Thus, for instance, the reduction in the quantity of lecturing and the shift towards more independent study implied in chapter II will not fully achieve their objects unless there is adequate library and study space. The more flexible structures of degree programs proposed in chapter II will make new and different demands on departmental and college counselling, especially for first year students. Improvements in the quality of teaching will involve some changes in student-faculty relations. And the creation, or recreation, of the colleges as academic communities for all their undergraduate members invites some re-consideration of policy about student residences.

For such reasons, each of the matters considered in this chapter is of more than general concern.

2. Student-faculty relations

One of the most frequent matters of concern in students' submissions to the Committee was the possibility of improving the relation between students and faculty members. Some submissions referred encouragingly to recent improvements that had followed the establishment of joint student-faculty bodies in some departments. But there were many expressions of dissatisfaction, about the lack of adequate channels of consultation, about the remoteness of professors, and about what was felt to be, in too many professors, an inadequate interest in their undergraduate students. Indeed, all such complaints as there were about the quality of teaching might be brought under the head of complaints about student-faculty relations. For teaching is, or should be, the central relation between student and professor. And poor teaching may be regarded as a failure in a student-faculty relation, since it may be both a symptom of a lecturer's lack of concern for his students and a cause of students' lack of respect for the lecturer and his scholarship.

We have already, in chapter II, made certain recommendations designed to improve the quality of teaching. In so far as they are implemented there should be an improvement in the central relation between students and faculty. There are, however, a few aspects of student-faculty relations, other than the formal teaching relation in lectures, laboratories, and tutorials, which deserve some attention. One is the possible role of students in academic decision-making. Another is a possible improved provision for individual consultation about the student's own academic work. A third is the possible provision for more informal contacts between students and faculty. We deal with these in turn in this section.

In this University, as in many others, students have traditionally had little or no share in the making of academic policy or in university government at any level. Here, as elsewhere, student opinion in favour of student participation in university government at various levels has grown significantly in the last few years. While it would be somewhat beyond our terms of reference to go into this whole question (which we understand is in any case to be the subject of another special committee), we are concerned with student participation in policy-making at the departmental and Faculty of Arts and Science levels, because of the bearing this may have on undergraduate instruction in the Faculty.

In approaching this question we have not started from any abstract principles of democracy. We have not made any assumption as to whether or to what extent the University could or should be democratically organized, nor have we assumed that students have some sort of innate right to participate in policy-making. We have asked rather whether substantial student participation at the departmental and Faculty levels can be expected to enhance the quality of undergraduate teaching and learning. We are persuaded that it can, in several ways.

We may mention first that in the submissions and at the hearings we were repeatedly struck by the sheer lack of information possessed by students about the way decisions are actually made, on such things as curriculum changes, admission requirements and degree requirements, examinations, and much else. This lack of information was not due to apathy: these were not apathetic students. The best way to remedy the lack, and probably the only way to remedy it sufficiently to prevent its being a source of mistrust or suspicion, is to have student representatives on the departmental and Faculty committees, which make these decisions.

We expect, as well, more positive benefits from such student participation. It should result in the participants' increased awareness of and sensitivity to educational issues and practical problems of academic policy-making and administration. To the extent that this awareness spreads out to the student body, or to the various student communities concerned with different kinds of decisions, a distinct gain can be expected in the general level of understanding and respect.

And it is not the students only whose understanding and respect would be increased. Student participation on committees hitherto made up entirely of faculty can increase each group's knowledge and understanding of the other's viewpoints, and thus lead to an increased mutual respect. It can also give the Faculty members a more direct and continuous idea of the students' reactions to specific things which the faculty thinks are or would be in the interests of the students.

In this light, the arguments most often heard in opposition to student participation in academic policy-making appear rather to be arguments in favour of it. It is often said that because undergraduates are only in the university for three or four years, and are relatively inexperienced, they can have little of value to contribute to discussions of educational issues or to decisions on academic policy. It might equally well be argued that their inexperience, that is, the freshness of their contact with the university and its methods, provides a perennially new perspective which the faculty ought not to overlook. The knowledge and experience of the undergraduate are different in kind from those of the professors, but they are not without value. We think it unwise for the professor to reject such access as he can get to it.

For these reasons we believe that student participation in departmental and Faculty bodies will enhance the quality of undergraduate teaching and learning. At the departmental level we have good reports of recently established joint student-faculty committees meeting regularly in certain departments for the discussion of curriculum and other matters of concern to the students. We recommend that joint committees be established in all departments where the students request them, these to be effective decision-making bodies on such matters as curriculum and patterns of teaching.

We suppose that these may take somewhat different forms in different departments, but we wish to make certain things clear. We are not proposing mere liaison committees, by which the teaching staff of the department would hear the views of its clients before making its decisions in its own committee. Nor are we proposing that the student members of any joint committee have a veto on its decisions. Students already have a sort of veto, which they not infrequently exercise by transferring out of a department. Although that veto is imperfect we do not propose that it be increased, for we think the final responsibility must be taken by the teaching staff. We only wish to ensure that the students are enabled to participate actively at the stage where policy is being decided.

We recommend also that student representatives be made full members of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science and of at least such of its committees as are charged with making recommendations to Council on policy matters of direct concern to the undergraduates.

We recognize that there may be difficulty in finding willing and qualified undergraduates to serve in these capacities. But in a Faculty of over 8,000 undergraduates this difficulty should not be insurmountable. There is a further problem of the appropriate method of selecting student members. There should be no difficulty in selecting for the departmental committees; this we assume can readily be done by the student clubs such as now exist in relation to Honour Courses and which presumably will spring up in relation to the proposed degree programs. However, some way will have to be found of ensuring that the voice of the generalist student does not go unheard.

The method of selection of student representatives on the Faculty Council and its committees is not so obvious. The Students' Administrative Council does not seem to be the appropriate body to make the selection, since its Arts and Science members are elected by college constituencies and have other preoccupations. Moreover, if the undergraduates are seriously interested in having representative members on Council, the choice of such representatives should be a sufficiently important matter to warrant elections to those positions. We therefore recommend that the student representatives in Council be chosen by direct election by the undergraduates of the Faculty.

We think it too early to make a specific recommendation about participation of students in the work of the program directors or of the committee of deans and program directors. But we hope that student representatives would have a consultative role in that work from the beginning, and that they might take a more formal part in it as the extent and scope of the directors' operations became clearer.

The matter we have now to discuss may seem trivial in comparison with the question of student participation in academic decision-making, but we are persuaded that it is important. We were disturbed by the frequency of student complaints that essays and other written work on which they had spent a lot of time were commonly returned to them with little or no comment, that no encouragement was given them to consult the faculty member who had read them, and that if they did try to consult him he was often unavailable.

It is not easy to remedy such a situation by any single action. Student participation in departmental committees may itself be a means of securing an improvement, but only if there is a general Faculty policy departures from which can properly be noticed there. One apparently obvious step towards improvement would be the adoption of a Faculty-wide policy on office hours. We realize that the problem is not entirely, or even mainly, the unavailability of the faculty member at stated office hours: often when such hours are announced ed, and kept, the student response is small. There may be many reasons for such slight response, and it may change in any case, for the reduction in the amount of formal lecturing that we have recommended, and the increased reliance on independent study, are likely to increase the demand for individual consultation. And the development of college teaching in more subjects, in so far as it decreases the feeling of distance between student and teacher, should have a similar effect. In view of this, we confine ourselves to recommending that as a general policy members of the faculty be encouraged to announce regular office hours, to the extent of two or three a week.

Those who, as students or professors, are or have been fortunate enough to be in small college or university departments, will testify to the great benefit they have had from informal social contacts of students with Faculty. Most departments are now too large for much of this to be possible outside the university and college precincts: few professors could now hope to entertain their students at home. Nor can much be expected of specially contrived social occasions. But something could be done to increase the chances of social contact by the provision of facilities for it in some of the main university and college teaching buildings. No one would propose the disappearance of either senior or junior common rooms, both of which have valid functions to perform. But the provision of snared common rooms, meeting rooms, and coffee shops in such buildings as Sidney Smith Hall could make a great difference in the atmosphere of student-faculty relations. We recommend that steps be taken to provide such facilities.

3. Counselling

We were confronted in the course of our inquiry with a good deal of evidence of student floundering, especially in first year, which was attributable to their insufficient knowledge about university subjects, about the contents of specific courses and degree programs, and generally about what was expected of them at a university. And we heard many proposals designed to prevent such floundering in future by extensive systematic counselling and greatly increased provision of orientation periods for freshmen before the beginning of their first term.

The more we examined the problem the more we were persuaded that the root of the difficulty lay not so much in any inadequacy of the present provisions for counselling or freshman orientation as in the complexity and rigidity of the present structure of degree programs. We do not think that any conceivable expenditure of faculty energy on counselling or freshman orientation could rescue most of those students who now find themselves in quandaries about their choice of subjects, courses, and programs; and we find that it is uncertainty about these choices which is the main cause of the floundering. We have accordingly sought the main remedy in the reforms of the structure of degree programs recommended in chapter III. The simplification of requirements, the greater flexibility, and the possibility of the student making his most important choices after he has had some experience of university work instead of at the beginning of his first year, will in our view do more than any reform of counselling could do to reduce the waste of undergraduate time and energy that is now evident.

We recognize however that the increased flexibility will not reduce the need for counselling and orientation. Incoming students will still need ways of finding out what the university expects of them, what various subjects and courses are about, and what combinations of subjects they might most profitably attempt. Some of this help is now provided both in pre-registration orientation programs and in consultations, then and in the early weeks of term, with college registrars and departmental advisers. But we think something more could be done without undue demands on faculty time. We make four recommendations.

(1) The registration period for first year students should be extended to allow for more counselling by college registrars, departmental student advisers, and college staff in as many subjects as possible. An extended registration period would, we hope, allow students more time to gather information and make decisions about their courses for the year ahead; it would also provide more time for incoming freshmen to become acclimatized to their colleges in a social sense. Of course in proposing that college staffs in a wide range of subjects do some counselling, we do not envision all of them being expected to devote substantial amounts of time to it. However, we would hope that during the fall registration period, several members of the college faculties (say one in each of the most populous departments) might be available in their offices in the colleges at stated times for the purpose of counselling. It would clearly be advantageous for the college registrar, who cannot know all about all departments at first hand to be able to refer the student to departmental advisers in the college itself, and this should be possible with the extension of the cross-appointment policy we have recommended.

(2) Each university department should have one or more undergraduate advisers, or supervisors of undergraduate studies, who would have a primary responsibility for counselling. They should of course be the kind of faculty members who have a lively interest in advising students; they should retain their positions for more than a year or two, so that they can acquire and use the necessary lore; and their work in this capacity should exempt them from a comparable amount of other departmental duties. We think that this advisory function is too important to be combined, at least in large departments, with the duties of departmental academic secretary, as it now often is.

(3) The departmental undergraduate advisers should be available during a distinctly advertised period, perhaps just after the February reading week, for consultation about students' choices of options in the following academic year, and, where department programs require it, for pre-registration in such options, and for advice about summer reading. Such a pre-registration advisory period will not only facilitate better-informed student choices at autumn registration, thus allowing more time to be given then to advising first year students; it should also encourage students to make some academic use of the summer vacation.

(4) The Calendar of the Faculty of Arts and Science should be more clearly organized, and should give more meaningful descriptions of subjects and courses of study. We dismiss the cynical view we have heard suggested, that the one uniform test imposed on all students in the Faculty is their obligation to find their way through the Calendar, and that for this reason it should not be made any more easily comprehensible. We note that our recommendations about the structure of degree programs will make possible a considerable simplification of the regulations, requirements, and prescriptions that now make the Calendar so labyrinthine. Whether or not sufficient space can be saved by such simplification, we think it important that the Calendar give some description beyond the bare title or single sentence that now serves as a description of many courses of instruction.

The inadequacy of the Calendar descriptions of specific courses, and its lack of any description of whole disciplines or of the scope and purpose of the various degree Courses, were recognized a few years ago when a separate publication, entitled "Courses and Subjects in Arts and Science: A Supplement to the Calendar", was issued to fill these gaps. We think the information it contains is extremely valuable, especially to first year students and to high school students contemplating entry to university. But we find that in spite of the university's efforts to have it widely distributed it is not seen by many of those to whom it would be of most use. We think therefore that it should be dropped as a separate publication and that the substance of it should be incorporated in the Calendar; this would ensure its proper distribution, and would make the Calendar a more meaningful document.

4. Student housing

Most undergraduates at the University of Toronto live at home. This is not surprising, in that the university is situated in a large metropolitan area from which it draws over 60 per cent of its full-time students. Those who do not live at home live in college or university residences, the Campus Co-op houses, fraternity houses, apartments, or rooming houses. Although there is a full-time student enrolment at the university of about 19,000 (including graduates and undergraduates), there is university and college residence space to accommodate only about 2,800. Compared with other Faculties, undergraduates in the Faculty of Arts and Science have fared extremely well in this respect, in that about one-quarter (i.e. 2,000) of them live in college or university residences. This comparative advantage exists because most of the colleges connected with the Faculty of Arts and Science provide residence accommodation for some of their students.

The general policy of those in charge of college and university residences is to give preference to out-of-town students. This policy has an educational justification in so far as it attracts to Toronto undergraduates from a variety of geographical areas and backgrounds who under different circumstances might go elsewhere. We think, however, that in view of the educational advantages which residence living offers to students regardless of where their homes are, the existing residence policy should be reviewed.

In referring, as we have just done, to the educational advantages of residence living, we do not intend to imply that it has an absolute advantage over any other, or that all undergraduates should be in residences. We are aware that some students prefer other kinds of accommodation; and, given such preference, they may well derive more educational benefit from some other kind. But we notice also that the most obvious reason some students whose homes are in Toronto do not consider living in residence is a financial not an educational one. Thus the present actual demand for residence spaces does not necessarily correspond to the students' assessment of the educational advantages of residence living.

We shall not attempt to assess the relative educational merit of residence living as compared with all other kinds. But if one compares living on or very near the campus (whether in residences, co-ops, fraternities, or lodgings), with living at home several miles from the campus, the educational advantages of the former can be seen to be substantial.

The time spent in travelling daily to and from home, which we judge on the average to be close to two hours, is largely lost time as far as any educational purpose is concerned. Moreover the student living away from the campus will, with the decrease in the number of hours of formal instruction, increasingly be put in the position of having to decide whether it is worth two hours commuting to attend the one or two hours of classes he may have any day. The result is likely to be that more students will spend more of their time each week away from the university entirely. This may be no great disadvantage for the exceptionally independent student, but it will be for the average student, who will be denying himself instruction he needs.

The disadvantage is not just that the distant student will tend to miss some of the formal instruction; it is that he is more likely to miss some of the meeting of minds which is available to his fellows living on or near the campus. His shorter daily period on the campus gives him less access to his fellow-students, to campus meetings, to evening appearances of guest lecturers, and to the library. None of these disadvantages is insurmountable, but, other things being equal, they are disadvantages.

We do not suggest that every undergraduate should be totally immersed in a university environment. All that the university can or should do is to place a student for a prolonged and continuous period of time in a situation in which there is a variety of intellectual experiences and pursuits from which to pick and choose, and to provide guidance in this process of selection when requested. But it is clear that students living on or near the campus have greater access to these various intellectual attractions, and are exposed to some or all of them on a more continuous basis, than are those who live outside.

We have spoken of the educational advantages accruing to students who live on or near the campus. These advantages are of course not confined to those living in university or college residences: they can be had by those living in co-ops, in fraternity houses, and in other accommodation close to the campus but not provided by the university. However, we can make recommendations only about university housing. We hope we have said enough to establish that there is a case, on grounds of the academic advantage of the undergraduate, for providing residence accommodation for students whose homes are in the metropolitan area as well as for students from out-of-town.

Before considering the implications of that case we wish to consider whether first year students particularly should be encouraged to live in residence. We think that they should. The academic advantages which undergraduates in general can get from residence living are magnified for first year students. The more closely they are drawn into the university at the beginning, the more rapidly they can be expected to appreciate the ethos of the university, to sense its difference from the high school, and so to make a successful adjustment from school to university.

The advantage to the first year student can be expected to be somewhat greater from living in a college residence than in a university residence. Living in a college, his residence life will be more closely related to his intellectual development, for he will be living where most of his first year academic work is done. Living there will make him more fully a part of his academic community, as well as giving him the more general social advantages of living on the campus, whereas the university residence, separate from his academic program, can give him only the latter.

On these grounds we think that first year students should be given some special encouragement to live in residence, and particularly in college residences, so that more of them than now live in residence might do so. It appears that no encouragement short of a financial one would suffice. The colleges are not flooded with freshman applications for residence now. This is not surprising. Since many students can live at home at little or no expense, the investment of some $800 for a year in residence will often not appear justified to intending freshmen and their parents, many of whom will not be acquainted with the possible academic advantages of residence living.

We are persuaded that the academic advantages of having more students, especially in their first year, and including those whose home is in the city, spend at least a year in residence, are such as to justify an experiment in reducing the first year residence fee. Such a reduction would be a positive indication, to freshmen and their parents, of the university's belief in the academic value of residence living.

What reduction would be at once feasible and effective cannot be determined without experience, but we think that 20 per cent reduction might be effective. As to its financial feasibility, we do not suppose that either the university or the colleges could provide such a subsidy from their present revenues. That being so, our proposal would require that this university together with other Ontario universities seek, in their discussions of residence policy with the government, such a redefinition of provincial policy with the government, such a redefinition of provincial policy as would enable the proposal to be put into effect.

We recommend that the university do so. One further change in residence policy will be needed if our proposals is to have the desired effect. For in recommending that more first year students be encouraged to come into residence we do not intend that they should displace any of the present number of higher year residents. Much of the advantage of residence living for the first year student would be lost if he did not mix there with his seniors. What is required, therefore, is the provision of more residences, especially college residences. We recommend that the colleges and the university seek, in forthcoming discussions with other universities and with the government, a financial policy which will facilitate the provision of additional residence accommodation such that the charges to the students will be abated in recognition of the academic benefits of residence living.

We note that the recent Report of the Research Committee of the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario entitled From the Sixties to the Seventies recommends that a commission on student housing be established "... to consider the need for student housing, the educational objectives sought, and the financial problems involved, and to develop a comprehensive plan of capital assistance and subsidy to ensure that needs are met with due regard to conditions prevailing at each institution and over-all educational objectives" (p. 38). We hope that such a commission will be established, and we offer the foregoing analysis and recommendations for its consideration. We also hope that the question of student housing will be given consideration by the Commission on Post-Secondary Education recently announced by the Minister of University Affairs.

5. Access to books

Libraries are more severely judged by their undergraduate users than are professors or most other parts of a university, for a library's performance is more manifestly testable. Either the book you want is available or it is not; either you can find this out in a few minutes or after a seemingly endless wait; either you can have an available book for as many hours or days as you need it or you cannot; either the library is open when you want to use it or it is not.

Evidence about the services of the University Library to undergraduates in the Faculty of Arts and Science has come to us from undergraduate and faculty submissions, from minutes of the proceedings of the Library Council (which, in effect a standing committee of the University Senate, is in charge of policy governing the university library system) and from discussions with some of its members, from the published annual reports of the Chief Librarian, and from very valuable detailed statements about internal policy and organization of the library and about the operation of its undergraduate services made to us by the Chief Librarian in reply to a series of specific questions we addressed to him.

It is clear from the evidence that there have been substantial improvements both in the organization of the undergraduate section of the library and in the allotment of funds to it, within the last year or two years. It is equally clear that with its present resources in money and space the library is still not able to meet the undergraduate demand for books and study space at what we regard as a reasonable level. The recommendations we have made in chapter II, with their emphasis on less formal instruction and more individual student initiative, will greatly increase the undergraduate demand on the library system. It is important therefore not only that the gains recently made should be maintained but planning be now undertaken as to how best to meet the new demand. Some overdue improvements might also be made fairly quickly.

The adequacy of a library system to the needs of undergraduates in the Faculty of Arts and Science may be said to depend on four main factors:

- (i) the volume of book purchasing for undergraduate use;
- (ii) the accuracy of prediction of undergraduate needs;
- (iii) the distribution of the whole undergraduate collection between central, departmental, and college libraries; and

- (iv) the physical facilities for access to books and for reading and studying space.

Under each of these heads we shall consider first the present situation (and recent changes) and secondly what should be done or planned now.

This point is crucial. If there are not enough titles or not enough copies of certain titles to meet the needs, the quality of teaching and learning must suffer. There is here, of course, a problem of allocation of the university's whole annual revenue. The library, like other divisions of the university, submits an annual budget estimated to meet its requirements for the following year, and, like other divisions, it generally gets less, often substantially less, than it asks for. Two questions are relevant here: whether the shortfall in the amount the library gets is at all proportional to that of other divisions of the university, and whether, within the library's budget, the shortfall in the amount for undergraduate book purchase is proportional to that for other book purchases.

We have no assurance that the first of these questions can be answered affirmatively. We think that the Library Council should annually seek such assurance.

On the second question we are assured that the answer is affirmative, and that this has been the case since a separate allotment for the purchase of books for undergraduate locations was established in 1965-66. And the actual percentage increase in this allotment has been since then more than double that of the percentage increase in the total library budget. The establishment of a separate allotment, and the increase in its size, are two of the gains we spoke of.

However, the percentage increase may be deceptive, since it starts from a base which had to be guesswork (the amount that was thought to have been spent for this purpose out of the subject allotments for the previous years) and may well have been too low. In any case, it is evident that if our recommendations about teaching and learning are to be implemented the allotment will have to be increased still further.

For this prediction, the library is entirely dependent on the teaching departments. And their record has not been good. Since 1959 the library has asked each teaching department in the university to have each of its faculty members send in, in the spring, a list of the titles he expects to recommend in each of his courses for the following session. For some years thereafter some departments declined to send in any lists, since until 1965 undergraduate books were charged to subject allotments which had to provide for research material also in those subjects, and some departments were reluctant to endanger the building of research collections by facilitating the library's purchase of duplicate copies of books for undergraduate use. Now that a separate fund has been established for undergraduate material this danger no longer exists, and teaching departments are becoming more co-operative. Nevertheless, last year the library received only 314 lists for undergraduate courses in all Faculties. We have reason to believe that departments in the Faculty of Arts and Sciences were not the least delinquent.

We recommend that department chairmen take more seriously than all of them now apparently do the obligation of ensuring that those in charge of courses provide the information without which the library cannot estimate the needs of its undergraduate collection.

This is an unusually difficult problem in a university whose Faculty of Arts and Science comprises several federated and constituent colleges.

The present policy, agreed between the university and the federated colleges, is that the college libraries, in addition to whatever other policies they may have, should try to provide the collections needed for first-year and second-year undergraduates, leaving the central library to provide for the needs of the later years. To this end, the university library provides a subsidy to each of the federated college libraries, equal to 50 per cent of the amount spent by each college, out of college funds, in the previous year, for books in subjects within the Faculty of Arts and Science but not including purchases for special research collections. This subsidy is not expected to meet all their costs of providing first- and second-year needs. Presumably because of this, the university library does not seek to exercise any control over the purchasing of the federated college libraries. The federated college libraries make their own decision about purchasing, on the basis of their own information (which includes copies of the departmental lists received by the university library).

We doubt that this arrangement is adequate. We endorse the principle that the college libraries should try to cater for the first- and second-year undergraduates' needs. This is just what best implements our recommendations about the shift of teaching in the early years from the university to the colleges. But if the university seriously intends that the college libraries should provide for the needs of first- and second-year students, it appears to us that the university will have to provide a larger subsidy and exercise a more effective co-ordinative control over purchasing.

We recommend, accordingly, that the university increase its subsidy to the federated college libraries to such an extent that it can properly require a more effective co-ordination of purchasing for undergraduate collections than it now does expect.

We understand that the university library plans call for using the present central library (the Sigmund Samuel Library) as a central undergraduate collection as soon as the new Research Library in Humanities and Social Sciences is completed (presumably in 1917), and that plans are already in operation to provide an adequate undergraduate book collection there, chiefly for third- and fourth-year undergraduates. We applaud this policy. It, together with a more adequate college provision for first- and second-year undergraduate requirements, should go far to provide for all undergraduate needs in the Faculty.

No doubt there will still be problem of overlapping and of accessibility. Some books will be needed by students in both year groups, and ought therefore to be in both the college collections and the central undergraduate collection. And some students will occasionally want to consult or borrow books not in the collection which they generally use. We assume that students of any year will be free to use the central undergraduate collection. We think it important also that when a book is not catalogued in any of the undergraduate collections, undergraduates should have access to it in the Research Library.

There is a further problem about the distribution of undergraduate collections. At present there are a few undergraduate departmental collections whose future is in some doubt. Some of the science departments have collections of references material and current periodicals adjacent to their laboratories. These are not primarily for undergraduate use, and in view of the purposes they serve we do not think they should be displaced. Two departments in the humanities and social sciences, namely History and Political Economy, now have branch duplicate collections for undergraduate borrowing in Sidney Smith Hall. These branches were established on a temporary basis as partial substitutes for the collections and reading rooms which as partial substitutes for the collections and reading rooms which those departments had had in their previous quarters, before they were moved into that building. The branches have been, up to now, a very great service to the undergraduates in those departments: the librarians in charge of them have been able to provide a better service to the students than can be provided in the more impersonal circumstances of a central collection. It is probable, however, that, to the extent that our recommendations in chapter II are implemented, student in those departments will be spending less time in Sidney Smith Hall and more time in various libraries. We are informed that already in 1966-67 the use of these two departmental branches declined by a small percentage, whereas the use of the central undergraduate collection (in the Wallace Room of the central library) increased by some 20 per cent. In the light of this information we are willing to see the departmental duplicate collections die a natural death when and as the demand for their services so declines.

Under this head we include such matters as (1) the hours during which the libraries are open; (2) the extent to which undergraduates have access to the shelves; (3) the amount and suitability of study space; (4) the efficiency of the arrangements by which undergraduates may get books out; and (5) the provisions made to familiarize undergraduates with the resources and the intricacies of the library system.

We note with satisfaction that, as the result of an effective student presentation of their demands, the Library Council has acceded this year to request that the hours of library service be substantially extended, and that the vexed question of undergraduate access to the closed stacks in the central library be reconsidered. The re-arrangement, early in 1967, of the central undergraduate reserve collection in the Wallace Room as an open stack collection, is much to be commended.

Many suggestions might be made for further improvement in service to undergraduates, but we think these can best be made by the undergraduate representatives who are to sit on the Library Council, and best be considered by that body. The decision to have student representatives on the Council and on its executive committee seems to us a notable step forward. We hope that the Council's desire that those representatives be full members, which requires Senate action, will be rapidly fulfilled.

We may, however, make certain proposal for early improvement in the library's service to undergraduates. Two of them concern the amount and quality of study space. To the extent that our recommendations about teaching and learning are implemented, the undergraduate's day will be centred more on libraries than on classrooms which will greatly increase the demands on the already inadequate study space in libraries. We recommended therefore that steps be taken as quickly as possible to increase the number of study spaces in the library system.

We believe also that the study space provided should be of higher quality than that of several reading rooms currently used by undergraduates. To have many study tables in one large room (such as the Wallace Room) is not conducive to intensive study over prolonged periods of time, because of the many distractions. Although large study tables may appear to be a more efficient way of providing a large number of study spaces, the habit of students of spreading their books and other belonging over these tables means, in practice, that the tables are seldom used to capacity. The most serious criticism of these tables, however, is that they are not adequate for intensive study over prolonged periods of time. In North American universities generally the trend has been toward the use of carrel desks such as those in the Laidlaw Library of University College. We recommend that the Wallace and other reading rooms of the Central Library be redesigned to instal such carrel desks or some other form of isolated study space in place of the present study tables.

We suggest also that those colleges which have not already done so should try to provide more isolated study space for their students. Innis and Erindale Colleges are planning to build study carrels, each to be shared by a small number of students, and each student having a locker close to his carrel. By some such arrangement, a student may be expected to develop a closer academic affiliation with his college, and thus be incorporated more fully into the sort of intellectual community which we think each college should become.

Finally we suggest that some improvement is possible in the provisions made to familiarize undergraduates with the resources and operations of the library. At present, freshmen in the Faculty of Arts and Science are offered orientation to the central library mainly by tours arranged by the library in conjunction with the colleges at the beginning of term before the start of the formal classes. But a student is not in a position to get much from such tours until he is actually at work on his studies. It is when a student is faced with specific problems of how to get books on a particular topic, or what books relating to a topic are available, that his library orientation will be most useful.

We find that other universities have tried a variety of different approaches in acquainting their students with the library. At one extreme, one Canadian university requires its students to attend lectures, and pass a test, about the library before they may receive their degree. This requirement seems to us unduly formal. Memorial University, Newfoundland, uses series of slides, accompanied by sound tracks, run at periodic intervals during the first part of the academic year. These showings are given close to the main entrance of the library, in a location convenient for students. Three different half-hours shows are run: one for beginners, another for more advanced users, and a third for students who wish to use the library for research purposes. Under this scheme students can get answers to specific questions they have about the library, at the time when this sort of information will be of most use to them. We understand that this device has been very effective in introducing students to the library's resources, and to the uses undergraduates may make of them.

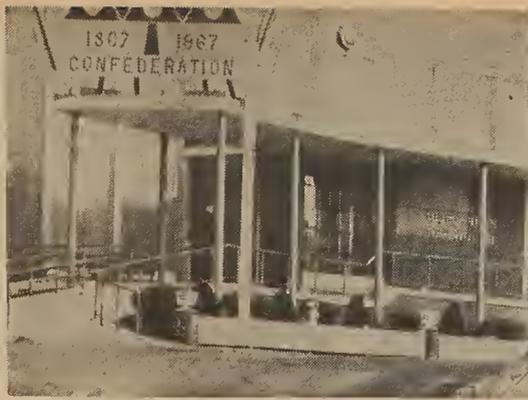

We recommend that the University of Toronto Library investigate steps that might be taken to improve its orientation program.

A frequent complaint in student submissions has been that the services of the University Bookstore are inefficient and unduly expensive. There is no simple test of efficiency in the operation of a university bookstore. It cannot be compared with a general bookstore, for unlike the latter it is expected to provide the titles and quantities required each year by all the courses of instruction in the university, and it has to cope with an extraordinary seasonal variation in demand. The recent decentralization of the University of Toronto Bookstore's operations is a major step forward: the opening of a separate large self-service store for textbook and other books listed as required reading should greatly improve the efficiency of the whole operation.

We find that part of the inefficiency complained of can be remedied only by the action of the academic departments of the university. It is plain that the bookstore cannot supply the required and recommended book to thousands of students, and have them in stock when they are wanted, unless it has adequate notice of what will be wanted. It does not always get this notice. We recommend that every academic department should regard it as an important responsibility to see that each of its members in charge of a course does furnish the necessary information.

Complaints about the cost of books to students are perennial. That does not mean that they are groundless. Although the University Bookstore is operated by the University of Toronto Press, presumably as a service to all the members of the university, and although it uses university premises, it does not generally give student discounts. The reason for this has never been entirely clear. We have not been able to ascertain definitely whether it is in part pressure from other Toronto booksellers. We do not think that such a position is in the long-run interests of the booksellers themselves. Anything that can be done to develop the habit of book buying among students will create more future clients for booksellers. And university students are peculiarly a low-income group while they are students and a high-income group for the rest of their lives.

It appears to us therefore that there is a problem of commercial policy which involves the relation of the university to the rest of the community, and which cannot readily be solved entirely within the university. We recommended that the committee of the Board of Governors of the University which is charged with oversight of the operations of the University Press should institute an investigation into the possibility of the Bookstore giving discounts to students on all book purchases.

It wasn't exactly an appointment. I was going to visit my father in the Don Jail. I wasn't sure he'd understand if I told him

It was raining, raw and knowing. I didn't want to go but I left Sydney Smith and walked down St. George to College. There were some other students at the car stop, probably on their way home, I thought, probably physics or meds students, know what they're doing, on their way home.

I wondered how far it was to the Don Jail. The visiting hours there are very strict. 9-11 mornings; 2-4 afternoons. It was already after 3. Lots of school children with muddy boots crammed into the car. Of course you could only visit for ten minutes anyway but . . . I turned to the postman next to me and asked how far it was to Broadview. He looked at me, "Quite a ways yet." And looked again. I knew he knew where I was going.

Along Carlton and down Parliament past The Hair-cut Place and flat two-story apart-ments.

Dirty filthy dirty world.
When we crossed over the Don Valley I got off. Now everyone knew for sure where I was going.

I stood immovable for a moment. Across the street on a cliff overlooking the Don Valley was an imposing structure that made me think of the Bastille. It looked like it really had been built in 1859.

I walked up the rampart past the old section . . . tiny barred windows with no glass or dirty broken glass — barred. The stone was black with age. It looked damp and clammy. Signs pointed to an entrance in the new red brick wing. It doesn't reveal very much until you get inside.

I found a door in the new wing and reached for a door knob. There wasn't one. I looked around for a bell. None. I must be too late, I thought.

"What do you want?"
To my right and above me there was a very small glass window; a man's head was peering through it. He won't hear me if I answer him.

"What do you want?"
"I want to see my father."
"Who are you?"
"I'm his daughter."

Slowly an invisible hand unlocked the door. I noticed as I pushed it open that it was about 4 inches thick. It slammed behind me and there was another similar door. It began to click. I pushed it open too. You get used to it after the third door.

Inside, there was a guard sitting behind a desk. I approached him and asked to see my father.

"Who are you?"
"I'm his daughter?"
"Show me your identification." All I had was my ATL card.
"You can't see him today."
"But . . . but why not?"
"You can't see him."
"Am I too late?"
"No. Come tomorrow."

Don't cry, don't cry. Say thank you. The doors slammed hard behind me.

I was still carrying my books when I walked down the rampart. Couldn't they have told me why? How can people be so cruel? They treat visitors like that. People on the outside.

I hadn't noticed that she'd been waiting for me — a girl with matted black hair, backcombed maybe and not combed over. Her face was scarred with acne which she had tried to camouflage with liquid make-up and eye liner unevenly applied. I noticed the black spots on her pale pink dress, her purple fish net stockings, spike heels, synthetic black fur jacket.

"Hi . . . did you just get out of jail?"
"Are you kidding . . . get serious. But I mustered up a simple "No".

"What are you doing here then?" Her voice was jittery and high-pitched.

"I came to visit someone."
"Your boy friend, eh?"
"Uh, no . . ."

She glanced around nervously, "Well, see, I just got out of jail and I don't have any money."

All I had with me was 15¢ and two car tickets. I suggested that she take the streetcar with me.

Marilyn had been picked up on a vagrancy charge. No money and no place to go. She'd spent three weeks in the Don. Vagrancy is the legal term for prostitution. But so what? She really had no money and no place to go. She had just been tossed back into the same streets from which the cops had taken her three weeks earlier. Only now she had a record. And a sordid memory of what it's like "in there!"

Marilyn was shaking and stammering as she talked to me on the streetcar. I didn't care if her story had a lot of loopholes. I felt desperately helpless — I couldn't even buy her a cup of coffee.

I tried to help her think of friends. That was stupid. She obviously didn't have any. "Well, yeh . . . there's my girlfriend . . . but she moves around a lot, you know." I thought of taking her home to my apartment, but I wasn't sure what I'd do with her. I wondered how my room-mates would react. It was still raining.

We got on the subway, and I gave Marilyn my number and the 15 cents. She said she'd call if her friend "wasn't home."

Marilyn called that evening to say she'd found a place to stay. After that, though, it was only her "friends" who called. Guys asking me where she was, or guys saying "Uh, I'm a tourist from the States, and uh . . ."

Maybe you'd have taken Marilyn home or called the Elizabeth Fry Society. I wish I had. I was wishing I had as I walked home from the subway, claspng my books against me.

PETER GODDARD

Suddenly there has been a deluge of letters. Apparently there has been some misunderstanding about musical terminology used in this column. Another complaint was of an aesthetic nature: exactly how does one approach a concert, or more directly, how does one give the impression that one has been to and understood a performance given by the Toronto Symphony?

So with a little help from my friends — a certain dentist in Alberta, the Faculty of Engineering and a defunct Muse to be exact — I will explain the subtleties involved. Caveat auditor.

I will assume that I am talking to males, for if you are not of that sex you must be a girl. If you are neither then you probably work as an usher at the O'Keefe Center or some such place and see enough art anyway.

The first step, then, is to make sure that your wife and/or girl-friend has a mink. This emblem establishes you as a Patron of Culture, as one having unquestionable panache in the Appreciation of Great Music. This is why theatre foyers look like the mink run at Lac La Biche. However, the degree of understanding usually runs inversely proportional to the amount of fur worn.

The lobby terrify you? It may help to face your fellow furriers to know that they don't know anything more about the music than you do. Do not penetrate this facade. And if ever asked a question more direct than "What did you think of it?" content yourself with defensive ploys only.

Step one: never say anything disparaging about a composer whose name starts with B. It is also standard practice to say something slashing about Tchaikovsky. Rachmaninoff is also out this year, and Richard Strauss is camp. Incidentally if you get into real trouble you can make a comeback by betting someone that they don't know how to spell Tchaikovsky. By the way, Rimsky-Korsakov is only one man, so don't fall into that trap.

You have past obstacle one and are now seated at behind your usual Tuesday night post. If the program says that you are about to hear Bach (see step one) it will very likely sound to you as if the different parts of the orchestra started in different places in the music. They often do this regardless of the composer, but it is more noticeable in Bach. Don't worry about it. This is exactly what happens.

As time goes by you will be convinced that they have passed the ending several times. They have. Luckily for all concerned those that get there first have to doodle around until the others catch up. Sometimes they do.

If the piece sounds as if everyone started not only in different places but in different keys it is not Bach. It's not necessarily modern. It's wrong. And it never works out. This is done on purpose.

If you are pressed for a comment on a contemporary work the safest remarks are:

- a) it was interesting...
- b) it wasn't interesting...
- c) the work gained in aesthetic import after the harmonic sub-structure in the third cadential phrase of the recapitulatory section.
- d) the work lost in aesthetic import after the harmonic sub-structure in the third cadential phrase of the recapitulatory section.

Or, and this is only for the most daring,

- e) well, I thought his first one was much better.

At this point, a few comments on composers may be helpful. Liszt was sort of an early Liberace (aristically anyway.) Wagner liked Beethoven, Debussy hated Wagner and Hitler disliked Debussy. Strauss wrote music principally for skating. Never say anything unkind about Mendelssohn or you will be accused of anti-Semitism. Beethoven sounds like a woman passing through menopause. Mozart was rather bland . . . a powdered Lombardo. Shostakovich composes in Russia where it is very cold so he does it with his mitts on. This leads to certain inaccuracies and is the reason for his success. The suggestion that he composes with his elbows is quite inaccurate. It is Stravinsky who does that.

The first work has just finished. Never be the first to start clapping. In fact play it safe and be the last. The reason for this is that you may clap in the wrong place. I've known families who've had to move to Aklavick because father clapped in a Grand Pause. Symphonies are liberally sprinkled with booby-traps of this kind for the unwary. (A symphony, I should mention, is a collection of four works stuck together by program notes. There are gaps between each piece to allow the trombonists to blow out the slush.)

At this point the function of the conductor may puzzle you. Often it does him, so don't worry. It has been demonstrated that orchestras get along very well without a conductor at all but the union insists that there be one. There has to be someone to take the blame and to talk to dowagers so as not to waste the time of the real musicians.

Also it will be of value to you to be able to distinguish

With performances from the age of powdered wigs to Clairmont at the University of Toronto more or less officially started last week with the opening concerts given by the Hart House Orchestra and the Contemporary Music Group.

The two are more easily one instrument from another so that you won't comment on the excellence of the third horn in a certain number when actually he was off-stage shooting craps in the furnace room.

The trombones are the easiest. They are the only instrument with a slide that goes in and out. There is also a bass-trombone which is the same only more so. I also must assume that you know what a violin must look like. The second violin looks exactly like a first violin except in the eyes of the first violin players. Then it appears much smaller.

A viola looks like a pregnant violin. The viola section is the most neurotic section in the orchestra. They are people who flunked out of violins — it has made them bitter. They therefore always go at a slightly different pace than the violins. The cello is the sexiest instrument in the orchestra. It is frequently played by women in the orchestra although it is ill-adapted for them since it necessitates a postural intimacy that they would usually reserve for close friends. (Although I do hear that some are playing it side saddle.)

Nobody outside the woodwind section itself knows the difference between a bassoon and an oboe. Yet they don't look, and usually don't sound alike. The oboe looks and sounds like an asthmatic whooping crane. The bassoon looks like a pogo stick with extra handles and is sometimes described by snivelling second clarinet players as a burping bed-post. It can be identified readily in the orchestra because it sticks up like a submarine periscope out of a sea of lesser instruments. The obo can be identified by a nasty buzzing in ones head. (If a migraine were ever set to music, the oboe would play it.)

Two other instruments that are often confused are the French horn and the English horn. The former is a brass instrument that usually plays with the woodwinds. It looks like a cancerous pretzel. French horns usually come in groups of four and are given to sad bovine sounds like a group of moose mooing in a muddy muskeg.

The English horn is the result of a bad eugenic experiment involving a virginal oboe and a bassoon. From this the bad qualities of the former were carried by dominant genes. While the right hand of the French hornist must be stuck in the bell of the instrument to prevent impromptu pinhole games, the English horn is played with both hands except when it isn't played at all. The English horn, to clarify the matter even further looks like a clarinet with tumour. Remember: the French horn is brass and the English horn is a double reed. Or possibly it's the other way around.

To return to basic principles. Be sure you know the difference between a baton and a podium. These are both within the domain of the conductor and you certainly must not confuse them. One of them he stands on and the other is the stick he waves around that no one in the orchestra pays any attention to. They don't look at all alike and serve very different function. Once you know which is which you won't have any problem. The terms are baton and podium so be sure you get them straight.

The flute sticks out sideways and is called an ocarina. Or is it the ocarina that sounds like a flute? Anyway, the flute player is called a flautist. This is silly but much is made of it by the foyer set. Calling a flute player a flute is a social solecism equal to calling a baton a podium.

If, after the concert, you want to go about developing your musical facade seriously, then buy a record. Any record will do, but preferably one with a good title like "The Satyr and the Maiden," or "Alexium in Galanous." Then no matter what comments come up you can compare the number under discussion with your record . . . it is reminiscent of it . . . it lacks the virility or depth . . . it is even more lyrical and so forth.

If you want to go all out buy two records. You are then a collector and are a force to be reckoned with. I've known people who couldn't tell a quarter note from a kumquat who were conversational tyrants in musical circles on the basis of a few records at home.

Another gimmick is to buy a second-hand instrument of some kind. At every opportunity refer to your instrument admitting modestly that you really don't play very much . . . any more.

Or there is always Granny's...

contrasted than characterized. The Hart House Orchestra's concert of last Sunday night in the Great Hall was a reincarnation of mid-eighteenth century musak that seemed academically tight-lipped in intent and humorless in performance. And the contemporary concert needed tightening up in both concept and performance.

In performances of Vivaldi, Locatelli Cimarosa and Stradella—the "Italian School" of that period—the expressivity of the HHO was too tenuous, too introspective, too standardized. Even with conductor Boyd Neel prodding the pace along at moderate tempos, intonation, notably on the part of the first violins was dubious, and oboe soloist Stanley Wood (in the Cimarosa concerto) floundered navigating upper-register virtuoso passages. With the demise of the Ten Centuries series, the Contemporary Music concerts in the concert hall of the Edward Johnson Bldg. every second Tuesday remains the only constant source of modern chamber works.

As evidenced by the student performances Hovannes, Harry Somers and William Walton last Tuesday the level of presentations was satisfying in its emotional sincerity and intellectual honesty. None of the performers' reaches exceeded their grasp. What was lacking, if anything, was confidence and intensity in performance.

Notable was Ward Cole's reading of sections from Walton's Facade (1922). Precise boldly colored, frequently outrageous, blatantly and beautifully camp, but always penetrating, the performance evoked the very era that produced the work.

In Facade, the composer's musical borrowings range from Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Satie, Hindemith and jazz. Scored for chamber orchestra and recited from a series of poems by Edith Sitwell the music had an impact equivalent to reading Wyndham Lewis Apes of God.

blues

The Paul Butterfield Blues Band cast its Massey Hall audience last night into a ninth band member by reducing the distance between it and the audience to point-absolute-zero. Their sound shot out of the loudspeakers located around the hall, to bounce off the laquered wood and envelop everyone in a giant wrap-around sheet of tactile music.

People, if you hear me humming on this song both day and night. There was little grace but much noisy subtlety as the Butterfield octet burst through their hybrid rhythm 'n' blues-jazz-soul thoughts. I'm just a poor boy in trouble, trying to drive the blues away.

"Awk!" Yelps the purist. "That wasn't the blues. It wasn't jazz. It didn't sound like Sonny Boy or Mississippi John Hurt or Buddy Guy or Junior Wells or..."

Exactly. For what resulted was one of the most dazzling displays of the potential in pop electronic music. The stigma of being white in a colored art had little effect on the performance. For since 1955 (Elvis Presley. Remember?) the blues have become noticeably paler in complexion.

But not paler in inventiveness as witnessed by the Butterfield band of last night.

jazz

By JACK McCAFFREY

Words fail me. Well... not quite. It was disgusting, embarrassing, inane, and as the late Evelyn Waugh would have it, too rather sick-making.

There you have it folks... Jazz at the Symphony—the only conceivable concert where Rossini's Lone Ranger Theme could be the most substantial, musically satisfying work on the program (oh, you gasp, i can't even IMAGINE that). After doing up William Tell, Ozawa and the TS showed that at least for this one occasion, they were willing to ignore the Freudian dictum that "the coprophilic elements in the instinct have proved incompatible with our aesthetic ideas, probably since the time when man developed an upright posture and so removed his organ of smell from the ground."

As a convincing demonstration of this waywardness, the TS played "Jazz Suite for Unfamiliar Instruments" by the comedian (that's what Ozawa called him) Yamamoto. After the instruments had been cutely introduced by a little tuning-up exercise, the tuba plodded through something called "Midnight Blues" (which, of course, was not a blues at all), followed by the English horn, which minced through "Hummoresque." For the grand finale, "Mack the Knife," the double bassoon went through a limited repertoire of vulgar noises which sounded like the blowing of noses and the breaking of wind. Also featured in this section was "lush" string phrasing, punctuated by brass blaring out some hackneyed old cliches.

To show that he really knew what jazz is all about, Mr. Yamamoto even included bongos and tambourine to give us that groovy old down-home backbeat. Needless to say, the orchestra's attempt to "swing" was absolutely pathetic.

Next, we squirmed through "King David Suite," which was composed (?) by Lionel Hampton. You remember Hampton—the vibraphonist who came to prominence (as much for his sheep-like bleating while he performs as for his musical accomplishment) with the Benny Goodman Quartet in the Swing Era, and then became famous for his outrageous "showmanship." For many years, Hampton led a big band which did things like walk around the room wearing Bermuda shorts, and goldfish bowls on their heads, while playing "When the Saints Come Marchin' In."

It is even alleged that one time, while playing on a boat sailing the Potomac River, the band climaxed their performance of "Flying Home" by jumping into the river, instruments and all.

Now that you have some idea of the depth of Hampton's thought you may begin to appreciate what we suffered through. The piece consisted of three sections, notable for the dearth of thematic interest and lack of development and for the excruciating insipidity of the harmony. In the first two sections, Hampton's didn't do too much, except tinkle out a few bars of the themes. In the third section, a 32-bar pop song, he improvised a bit and bleated a lot. Again, the symphony just couldn't swing to save its life.

Like the preceding piece, "King David Suite" featured orchestral writing that would make Mantovani's hackers cringe in shame; and needless to say, there was no organic unity within the sections. The suite just had little fragments of this and that, with no direction or sense of structure or development.

At the end of all this, the audience went wild. They loved it. It was just incredible. They clapped and clapped and finally Ozawa and Hampton returned and did an encore yet! Struggling through the last couple of choruses of the finale, the orchestra just fell apart—they didn't know where they were. Disintegration and chaos were the distinguishing marks of the encore. But again everyone clapped like mad for a seemingly interminable length of time.

Finally, when intermission arrived, members of the orchestra slunk off into the night, leaving "The Lionel Hampton Inner Circle Octet" to play the second half of the program.

The group had organ, two saxophones, trumpet, and guitar. With this instrumentation something interesting might have happened. But all the other musicians did was provide a backdrop for Hampton's vibes and vocal "effects." When they did get a chance to solo, none of the sidemen showed much originality or imagination.

And unless you are a confirmed Hampton fan, his vibes solos don't have much to hold your interest. And to see him jumping up and down and saying "Yeah, man that maestro, he's the swingin'est conductor it has ever been my honour to play under... what a gas... yeah bop-bop-a-rooty..." and other equally intelligent comments in this vein was just too much.

A few questions: 1 — What is the purpose of this concert series? If it is to get jazz people interested in the symphony or vice versa, it has obviously failed. By their enthusiastic response, the audience proved that were hardly any people present who liked either jazz or symphony music.

If the purpose is to be adventurous and experiment with combinations of different kinds of music, then Ozawa showed that he has not any idea how to do this. Perhaps when the Modern Jazz Quartet comes, John Lewis will be able to put him on the right track. And why, when there are so many great jazz musicians that Toronto never gets to hear — Sonny Rollins, Miles Davis, Charles Mingus, for instance — does some ill-formed clown line up a series with the likes of Hampton, Benny Goodman, and (dig this) NANCY WILSON? 3 — And finally, how could Ozawa possibly consent to play the garbage we heard Saturday night?

Frye's Moral Attack On Modernism

By STEPHEN BORNSTEIN

The Modern Century: The Whidden Lectures, 1967, by Northrop Frye. Oxford, 123 pp. $3.00.

These three lectures which Professor Northrop Frye delivered at McMaster University last January could hardly have been what the organizers of the Whidden Lectures expected when they selected a Canadian scholar for Centennial year. Professor Frye must have shocked McMaster officialdom at least slightly when instead of the scholarly analysis of Canadian literary culture he was expected to present, he chose a topic of universal rather than narrowly Canadian relevance, when he mentioned Canadian culture but peripherally and then only to deny the feasibility of its aspirations to a distinctive existence, and when, most iconoclastically of all, he praised Canada not for a hundred years of nationhood but rather for a hundred years of successful effort in submerging its national consciousness in a deeper post-national awareness.

The organizers of the Whidden Lectures certainly do not get what they expect from Professor Frye. Nor, I suppose, will the unsuspecting reader find The Modern Century to be precisely what he expected from the pen of one of the English-speaking world's most brilliant and renowned students of literature.

For, in these lectures, the systematic analysis of literature and art plays only a peripheral and secondary role, being almost entirely reduced to the service of the eloquent hortatory and ethical message which Professor Frye expounds in tones much more redolent of the pulpit than of the academic lectern. Frye's central theme—moral in orientation, religious in undertone and regenerative in intent—consists essentially of the assertion of the appalling hideousness of modern existence and of the potentially crucial role of the arts in the regeneration of North American life. In The Modern Century, literary theory and analysis are not ends in themselves but merely tools facilitating the exposition of Frye's major theme.

Alienation of Progress

According to Professor Frye, the fundamental and most pernicious malady of contemporary industrial and technological society is something he calls the "alienation of progress." In this state man is seen as "obsessed by a compulsion to keep up, reduced to despair by the steadily increasing speed of the total movement." Pathologically gripped by the "panic of change", helplessly aware of having lost control over his own destiny to an invisible enemy submerged within his own psyche, disillusioned with his former optimistic belief in constant and autonomous progress, modern man is reduced to passive acceptance of the illusory world of propaganda and advertising, to a totally passive response to the dehumanizing mass media which threaten to reduce him to abject uniformity and to immerse him in a sterile and oppressive world which "like . . . a prison would be both completely introverted and completely without privacy." (p. 38)

The most vicious feature of modern society for Professor Frye is what he styles "the passive state of mind," that tendency among the victims of the alienation of progress to accept as given the "stupid realism" of the anti-artistic mass media. It is this passive attitude which he feels has produced the hideous image of modern man which he describes in his first lecture, the image of a mind which has "lost its dignity, its freedom, its creative power, and its sense of the present, with nothing left except a fearful apprehension of the future." (p.49)

The predicament of modern man, so eloquently described by Frye, can, he asserts, be remedied by the arts whose essence, he demonstrates in his second lecture, has always been an active search for reality and a conscious and explicit opposition to the anti-arts of propaganda and persuasion. The duty of the arts is to carve out a new mythology of modern man, a new set of values and assumptions, a new self-image for the human mind.

Need for New Self-Image

This new mythology is to create a new focus for the loyalty of alienated man by postulating a new and more realistic ideal of progress based not on the autonomous evolution of progressive social forces, but on the belief in the ability of intense human activity to improve the human condition. The arts properly conceived can thus, according to Professor Frye regenerate modern society by creating a new self-image for man to replace the gruesome self-image of alienation and anxiety which now baunts the modern consciousness.

In The Modern Century, literary criticism thus takes a back seat to moral exhortation. Yet despite the fact that it serves merely as a means to a different end and not, as is customary, as an end in itself, Frye's literary analysis is characteristically brilliant. With an encyclopedic virtuosity reminiscent of his remarkable work, The Anatomy of Criticism, Frye ranges gracefully over the entire scope of Western literature, music, and visual art producing a masterly synthesis of the evolution of modern culture. Under Frye's expert hand, all the various forms of artistic expression can be seen to move together in a comprehensible and parallel pattern of development from the Middle Ages to the present. Frye's analysis, however, though synoptic, seems neither oversimplified nor artificial but is constantly inspired by that sense of proportion which Frye considers typically Canadian.

Frye's Utilitarianism

One limitation, however, of Frye's historic analysis of western culture seems to me to derive directly from his utilitarian approach to the arts. Because he demands that art serve a crucial regenerative function in society, Frye is led to reject the anti-social art of such writers as Norman Mailer, LeRoi Jones, D. H. Lawrence, and Jean Genet as, in whole or in part, reactionary and undesirable. Utilitarianism in literary criticism tends, even in great scholars, towards a value-ridden eclecticism reminiscent of the Marxist distinction between socially useful and socially useless art.

Frye's analysis of the plight of modern man is similarly incisive, comprehensive and provocative. Frye's great literary skill enables him to describe the nature of alienation and the brutality of the modern city in terms seldom rivalled in the literature of social criticism. He decries the evils of modern society with all the moral intensity and indignation of Karl Marx at his best. Witness the following portrait of the modern city, a description which echoes the intense moral fervour of the Hebrew prophets:

No longer a community, it seems more like a community turned inside out, with its expressways taking its thousands of self-enclosed nomadic units in a head-long flight into greater solitude, ants in the body of a dying dragon, breathing its polluted air and passing its polluted water.

Throughout The Modern Century, Frye's critique of contemporary society is not that of the detached, empirical social scientist but rather that of the enflamed moralist, the concerned humanist whose analysis is predicted on a value-ridden, ethically-oriented point of view. Frye's normative position, his religious humanism, voluntarism and idealism are central to an understanding of the major themes of his book. His critique of the ideal of inevitable progress derives from his humanism and voluntarism. Progress, conceived as the inevitable unfolding of progressive forces independent of human will and control is a vapid concept for Professor Frye who asserts that "no improvement in the human situation can take place independently of the human will."

Frye On McLuhan

This emphasis on the centrality of the human will also informs Frye's valuable and perceptive critique of Marshall McLuhan whom he considers as a technological determinist who mistakenly asserts the primacy of the medium over its human inventor and blithely converts his undoubtedly keen insight into the impact of the mass media into an insouciant and morally insensitive glorification of that impact. For Frye, McLuhanism is merely "the latest of the illusions of progress," ignoring the dependence of the media on the direction of the human will. In Frye's more realistic and more reassuring scheme of things it is the conscious human element which is or can be, the determining factor in the evolution of the technological society. Frye's humanistic tendency to emphasize human problems over purely technical facts enables him to transcend McLuhan's blithe fascination with the glories of a world dominated by mass media and to discover the frightening human implications of the McLuhanesque dream. A world of total environment, Frye warns, would be a world of total uniformity and a world without true communication. For, "where communication forms a total environment, there is nothing to be communicated." (p. 38)

Such a sober, and sobering, critique of McLuhanism should be carefully evaluated by his many loyal but uncritical devotees on this campus.

Frye's Idealism

A final element of Frye's thought which I should like to discuss is his fundamental philosophical idealism, for it is this idealism, this emphasis on the mental nature of reality, which forms the foundation for the major theme of The Modern Century: the regeneration of modern society through the arts. Frye, as we have seen, conceives of the predicament of modern man not as a physical condition imposed upon him by the institutional structure of his social, economic or political environment, but rather as the result of a distorted self-image a faulty mythology through which man perceives himself and his destiny.

When the plight of modern man is thus conceived as an intellectual rather than an external problem, it can be solved by intellectual rather than institutional means. In order to abolish or at least to mitigate the alienation of progress, one need go no further than to reshape the mythology, the self-image of contemporary society through the concerted effort of dedicated artists and and writers.

This mythological determinism is perhaps somewhat far-fetched and unrealistic being a direct application to social analysis of methods derived from, and most relevant to the study of literature. Yet, perhaps, it can serve as a much-needed antidote to the dangerous technological determinism of McLuhanism.

More Recent Canadian Art Books

By JOAN MURRAY

W. Colgate. Canadian Art. Ryerson, 278 pages, $3.95.

Colgate's book, originally published in 1943, has been brought out in a pocketbook edition by Ryerson because of the growing interest in Canadian art. This book was one of the landmarks in the development of Canadian art history when it first appeared. At present, though handy for reference, it shows many holes in its analysis.

The book opens with a foreword by Charles W. Jefferys, Canadian artist, which obligingly tells us that the book "serves no propaganda... supports no theory, ... is not morbidly anxious to be 'in the movement.'" This is amusing because, in contrast to these statements, Colgate's work has an aggressive thesis. For him, Canadian art is insular, shows no influences from anywhere else (except occasionally England), and burst like Athena from Zeus' head—or, like Topsy, Canadian art 'just grew'. Because of this, Colgate places extra stress on the Group of Seven ("so Canadian.") He also puts special stress on Jefferys, who, we remember, wrote the introduction, because he was "the first to preach the doctrine of the pine and the spruce as themes fit for the painter."

Later Canadian art books have begun to handle this myth of the north and this hell-bent nationalistic Canadianism in a more temperate way.

Colgate showed imbalances in his handling of French-Canadian art (Oziac Leduc is never mentioned) but then this was 1943, well before Borduas had made his Refus Global. On the other hand, even if Colgate was writing later he would never have mentioned the contemporary Montreal scene because he was thoroughly anti-modern.

Other problems abound in the book but perhaps the most important, is the lack of critical analysis and the purple prose. One gets sick of the "treasures in the virgin field of unending vistas, so far untrodden." Oddly enough, Colgate felt that "the artistic feeling, which is so evident in the Oriental, the European, the Indian tribes of our West Coast and in nearly all savage races, is a thing unknown to us as a nation."

However, he does include a wider range of "art" than ever before. One finds interesting sections on bookplates, bookbinding and illustrations for magazines, books and newspapers. This book is also the best source for an examination of the founding of Canadian art groups, like the Canadian Society of Watercolor Painters, formed in 1925.

G. Robert. Ecole de Montreal. Centre de Psychologie et de Pedagogie, 1967, 150 pages $7.00.

The only guide at the present moment, in book-form, to the exciting school of Montreal painters is Guy Robert's Ecole de Montreal. The text is brief and gives a slight background to the development of this group, presumably named after the modern "Ecole de Paris", by illustrating (in terrible plates) some of the nineteenth century Montreal painters. However, the photographs of the modern section are excellent. There's an interesting photo of Borduas as a younger man than he is usually seen, holding a cigarette like a gun.

The text for the modern period is unfortunately composed in typical French art historical fashion and so we find the "jewelled words" that blandly assert excellence but say little.

In his introduction, the author insisted on the "real autonomy of most Canadian approaches to the plastic arts." He wanted to focus on the differences displayed by Canadian art, like Colgate did in 1943. This worthy aim was never attempted in the book. The photos certainly suggest some of the characteristics which mark the Montreal school: its vast sense of scale (though less vast than Kline), its dynamism and vitality, its basic attachments to abstraction and the strong influence of New York. But even what makes its distinctively French-Canadian was not stressed enough. The enormous influence of Borduas was scarcely mentioned, and this was odd, because Guy Robert, an artist himself, surely felt it in his work.

However, perhaps this is all we can expect from a book which opens the field. We are lucky to have any roadmap at all into this promising land.

G. Stevens. In A Canadian Attic. Ryerson, 1963, 267 pages, $4.95.

Gerald Steven's In A Canadian Attic continues to be the indispensable reference book for Canadian stamps, coins, textiles, silver, china, glass and other paraphernalia of Canadiana. It is the one place you can go immediately and be sure that you can identify your "find". Furthermore, it gives prices. Most of these have more than doubled. For instance, the Maple Leaf water pitcher which originally sold for $2.00, sells for $17.00 today, though Stevens saw it sold for $7.50 in 1962. Marius Barbeau's book on Kriegerhoff sold for $45 (Stevens). I saw it go at auction last year for $130. Yet Stevens does provide some basis for comparison so you won't go too far wrong.

A fair bibliography accompanies the book.

Incidentally, you can tell how useful this book is by the fact that it has been reprinted every year since 1963, when it appeared.

The Canadian Collector, a monthly journal, 75c.

The "Canadian Collector" is a good newly created magazine devoted mainly to Canadian antique and the decorative arts. For a very nominal fee ($7.00 a year), you can enjoy this compendium of articles on such varied topics as trade silver, early kitchen utensils, clock collecting, caddy spoons, pottery, and pioneer living. Marion Adams, an old habitué of the Royal Ontario Museum, is the dynamic editor of this magazine, and she has managed to have many of her articles written by Museum staff members, notably Harold Burnham, Ed Rogers, Walter Kenyon (of T. V. fame), and from the Canadiana Gallery, D. B. Webster. These articles are invariably the best in the publication.

Pratley at UC

At a UC dean's evening last Tuesday, Gerald Pratley in a perfectly nice way blasted nearly everything in sight in the world of film. Bergman, Fellini, and Godard he termed "self-indulgent" and of Jean-Luc he added: "He is not brilliant enough to overcome his lack of discipline." His feelings on underground film-makers: "Half of them don't know what they're doing." Films at Expo also came under fire when he called them nothing more than amusing novelties; he particularly regretted that Chris Chapman had wasted his time on the Ontario film, A Place to Stand.

The general irresponsibility of film critics was also alleged. The critics and the public he felt to be major causes of the ruination of artists in that they always require that a director surpass his last film.

He praised men like Hitchcock for the consistency and discipline of their work and also signalled The Naked Runner and Our Mother's House as examples of well made recent films.

Retold like this his opinions sound exaggerated and wildly reactionary. That they hurt as much as they do indicates that they contain a good deal of truth.

Pratley put himself in the difficult position of trying to criticize his colleagues without appearing vain, and he acquitted himself very well indeed.

Unfortunate Comedy

Trinity College opened its dramatic season with a comedy by William Shakespeare. A Comedy of Errors deals with the hilarious results of mistaken identity. Two sets of twins run around the stage bumping into each other with wild abandon, each twin with his own accompanying circumstances and problems. The laughs in the play come when the circumstances and the individual are mixed and one man's mate becomes another man's poison.

The play is an earlier work by Shakespeare. He lifted the idea from Plautus. But Shakespeare being Shakespeare, he couldn't leave his source stand on its own two feet. Shakespeare has to give The Twin Menaechmi extra complications and drag the joke out, until any delight that the basic situation once had is obscured in repetition and confusion.

The problem with the production which is currently at St. Hilda's is that the text is further obscured by acting and directorial inadequacies. Southern accents are met head-on with Italian. Hungarian is mistaken for Spanish, and Havana is mistaken for Syracuse. The last mistake is intentional. We are told in the program that the producers want to heighten the effect of the play by "cloaking its humour in a more contemporary idiom." If humor and delight is the basic effect of the play, how can it possibly be heightened by cloaking it?

Errors compound errors in Trinity's production. Shakespeare's text is lost to indifferent acting (to use a euphemism.) The actors are given extraneous pieces of business which serve only to distract the audience from the actors, and therefore the text, which is, of course, a further complicating of a simple Roman comedy which is... well, you get the idea.

The production on display at St. Hilda's is just unfortunate. It is crippled by irrelevancies and confusion. It is at best, boring, at worst, embarrassing.

Poetry

It occurred to me while listening to Charles Douglas, Alistair Sweeney, and Barry Charles (Review, Nov. 3) reading their poetry at Hart House yesterday, that the Vic poets have not yet realized that T.S. Eliot and W. H. Auden were not writing for our generation as much as their own. There are questions to be confronted in our own generation which neither of them are capable of doing (though Auden is still living in a way.) To Barry Charles' credit, he is attempting to come to terms with what is going on, today, November 10, in the year 1967. Neither one of the other two are. Like man, the Beatles have and are happening, and Che Che, and the Fugs, and Robert Creeley, and love ...

And I am tired of hearing poetry subdivided in to poems of love, of time, of birds, of oranges, and of poets who work that way as if they had their first volume already planned and the critical reviews well digested. Let's hear it for Norie Frye and the archetypal poets who worship him.

Why are so many of our competent and not-so-competent Canadian poets afraid of their own guts?

BILL BARCLAY

Black Pied Piper

It's been a long time since the Riverboat was filled on a Tuesday night. I had forgotten how human the place could be when people are sitting six to a table and cigarette smoke hangs in patterns along the ceiling. It was filled this week with people who came to see Ritchie Havens.

Not really to see him. He is a stooped figure with an Othello face who hunches over his guitar. He wears an old stretched sweater that makes him look almost crippled. His eyes are closed most of the time he is on stage.

But whatever power music has, Havens has.

His guitar mesmerizes: under a song it begins softly, then turns harsher and races ahead, infinitely varying time. It plays the volleys of fire that have killed all the Handsome Johnnies that marched off to all the wars. It weaves into music the lonely emptiness that you feel when you think back on The Things I Used to Do, But Don't Do No More.

Havens' is a hoarse lisping voice that can rise to an anguished shout and still be gentle.

It unravels the tongue-twisting San Francisco Bay Blues until nothing is left but a man with no place to hide from his loneliness. It shows that Just Like a Woman, when stripped of the electricity and drums, details and innuendos, has tender anguished people inside.

By the third number his whole face glistened sweat. It formed blue crystal beads in his beard and fell on his guitar.

In front of him a girl was shaking her head in time and a boy in rimless glasses was delicately fingering an invisible guitar. A man was softly singing just behind me. I soothed my throat with lemonade and honey and found myself no longer taking notes but swaying, relaxed in the flow of music from the bent black Pied Piper.

To quote Pete Seeger, "Ritchie Havens is one of the few guitar players I know who makes full guitar chords sound rhythmically interesting. With him it's not just 'wham, wham, wham.' He uses a flat pick. No single strings, just beautiful chords, but accented with great variety and superb taste."

Whatever Havens touches, whatever song he sings, it changes. His style has no derivations. Although he is a Negro and ex-slum tenant the blues have little importance in his repertoire, yet all his material is amazingly evocative of both in execution and idea.

In short, Havens is possibly the most exciting folk singer today.

And we recommend ...

Dame Edith Evans and Brigitte Bardot arrive in town today in The Whisperers at the International and Two Weeks in September at the Capri, (BB's first film in English). Maurice Chevalier sings tonight at Massey Hall which whatever its detractors maintain beats the Expo Autostade where he sang this summer. The Ice Capades are on at the Gardens starting at 8:00.

M. B.

There's a lot going on. Pantagleize, which everyone talks about and few have seen, is at the Alex; the National Theatre (directed by Olivier) is at the O'Keefe with a strangely ponderous version of Love for Love and the delightful A Flea in her Ear. Charlie Brown is cute and over-priced at the Playhouse.

On campus, the Vic Bob Review is a parade of unattached symbolism at Hart House, and at St. Hilda's, Trinity presents an irresponsible alteration of that Shakespearean trifle, A Comedy of Errors. (The review above, it should be mentioned, is based on a viewing of the first act, after which this reviewer walked out. People tell me that it got better in the second act, but only slightly.)

East York Collegiate will be the home of a real French touring company, Nov. 22nd and 23rd. Le Treteau de Paris, the only European company to tour this continent annually, will perform the 18th. C. comedy Tu-carot. Tickets can be ordered from the UC French Dept., 928-4009.

The Drama Centre is sponsoring two lectures by James Laver, an outstanding authority and author on theatre costumes. Mr. Laver is the embodiment of what the Centre stands for. He is both a brilliant scholar and an invaluable practitioner of the theatre arts. The lectures will be in the Hart House Theatre, next Tuesday at 4:30. Anyone interested in theatre production should attend.

Ryerson's version of the Calgary Eyeopener

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

The Calgary Eyeopener was an original journal of satire, slanted news and good entertainment. It appeared as often as its editor was sober, which was maybe once a month, between 1902 and 1924.

Editor Bob Edwards made no bones about his bias. But no politician could be assured of Eyeopener support unless he was a personal friend of this maverick dean of early Western Canadian journalism.

Many prominent people read the Calgary Eyeopener although few would admit it publicly. Like a high school teacher reading Mad magazine.

Last March a cartoonist-columnist at The Daily Ryersonian became disenchanted with the state of journalism at Ryerson and quit.

Last summer Tom Thorne, 26 tuned in to the idea of a journalistic Hyde Park for the Ryerson community.

Thorne felt that The Daily Ryersonian was not a reflection of ideas and opinions on Ryerson's campus, but rather a laboratory for the journalism course.

The head of the journalism department had decided to formalize the classroom atmosphere of the Ryersonian and institute the position of a managing editor appointed from the faculty.

The Canadian University Press suspected possible editorial interference from the faculty and dropped The Ryersonian from CUP.

But the final straw came for Thorne after the Ryerson POSAP march on Queen's Park. The Ryersonian had published a centre spread that could be lifted from the paper and used as a placard in the protest march against Robarts's fortress.

This shocked Ryerson officials and a Ryersonian board was set up to decide what constitutes "good taste" and "professional standards" in the newspaper.

To bearded jovial Tom Thorne this is the journalistic evil of evils — censorship.

Meanwhile Thorne had been turning on to Bob Edwards's Calgary Eyeopener brand of journalism. Unknown to Thorne at about the same time the Ryerson student council was plotting to field their own student newspaper. (The Ryersonian is responsible to Ryerson Polytechnical Institute and not the students.)

On Tuesday, Sept. 26 Thorne began publishing his own Eyeopener — a four — page weekly with a circulation of just less than 5,000.

The Ryerson student council pays for it and it is a refreshing departure from the homogenized news from official news sources.

For instance on Tuesday, Oct. 17, the day of the provincial election, The Eyeopener ran the headline "NDP SWEEP." As Ryerson students went to the polls they could read five well-written stories on NDP victory in the election they were at that moment voting in.

One of the front-page stories depicted the John Robarts regime burning all the records to prevent any scandals from being charged to the former government.

TOM THORNE

Thorne quotes long-time Ontario bureaucrat Herman Hogg as saying "There's just too much to burn... 23 years of graft and lobbying... we were caught with our pants down and our files open!"

Thorne's humor is entertaining and reasonably subtle and intelligent. He manages to avoid the inane babbings upon which many four-page weeklies on our campus seem to thrive.

Today The Eyeopener has a staff of about 15 and is experiencing the necessary growth pains to expand to eight pages and receive an autonomous budget from the student council.

Most of Thorne's staff, like himself, are enrolled in radio and television arts. Thorne criticizes The Ryersonian for recruiting its staff, with few exceptions, from the journalism course.

But a lot of Thorne's friends are on the Ryersonian staff, despite his criticism of the journalism lab.

Thorne, a five-year veteran of the Canadian Army, reads The Realist and likes it, and thinks newspapers in general are "getting too organized."

But Thorne isn't overly fond of the underground press either. "You've got to move in establishment circles and satirize them if you're going to learn anything," he said.

He likes to keep people guessing on his political views but he admits that he voted in favor of supporting the Canadian Union of Students in a recent referendum at Ryerson.

The Canadian Army is perhaps the last occupation a subversive to the Ryerson establishment would ever pursue.

But Tom Thorne didn't enjoy his term of service there and it is unlikely he will return.

"After five years in the army you know what bullshit is, and you have a right to be an anarchist."

How's your conscience? Give blood!

Thursday, Oct. 10, 1957. In a front page story The Varsity appealed to students for blood donations to help a fellow student injured in a traffic accident.

Mrs. Leslie Dolin, a University College student, had been struck by a car at Bloor and Avenue Rd. By Oct. 10 she had required six blood transfusions and was listed in "only fair condition" in Toronto General Hospital.

As a result UC registrar D. M. Haynes posted a notice asking for student blood donations. The appeal produced more donors than needed and by the next day The Varsity reported that Mrs. Dolin was "making good progress."

The students 10 years ago were concerned about the welfare of one of their own number. Since 1957, however, they have been demanding a voice in world affairs. They want student representation on university councils; they approve aid to draft-resistors.

But many of them hesitate at giving anything back to society.

U of T has about 27,000 students in its various courses and faculties. And yet its goal is a scant 3,700 pints of blood.

A little basic arithmetic shows that this means only about one student in seven gives blood on campus. How can this lack of concern for their fellows be reconciled with their professed concern for the human race?

To those who have given, congratulations. You at least have practised some real form of social responsibility. To the other 20,000, ask yourselves if you would refuse a transfusion if your life depended on it. How would you feel if there were none available because some one else didn't care?

How's your conscience?

There will also be a clinic at 67 College St. until next Tuesday night. Your college or faculty will be credited regardless of where blood is given.

Dents defer to Doomsday

By JIM MORRISON
Inter splinter

Defaulting Dentistry gave Vic Scarlet and Gold their easiest two points of the season yesterday afternoon. Despite the fact that 22 Dents players had signed a list promising to play, only one team member showed up, a fact which caused considerable consternation at the intra-mural office.

The Vic win gave them first place in the Group 1 final standings, and a bye into the semi-finals.

In the other two games played this week, PHE throttled UC 35-0, and New College edged Forestry 7-4. Rick Johnston led Phys Ed with two TD's, and single scores went to Don Plastina, Bill Rowland, and Ken Chapman. Gene Vincze added five converts.

In quarter-final action next week, Phys Ed and St. Mike's play off for the right to meet Vic in the semis. Meds and Pharmacy, tied for first place in Group II, meet to choose an opponent for Engineering.

Semi-final winners meet for the Mulock Cup on Wednesday, November 29, at Varsity Stadium.

HOCKEY

Three Group 1 encounters marked the beginning of inter-terfac hockey week. St. Mike's A matched defending Jennings Cup champs Vic I on Wednesday, while Law Lords unsettled Trinity A 1-0. Sr. Engineering assaulted PHE A 2-0 in a match played yesterday.

Mark Emin and Dave Sharpe were viable for Vic; Jim Hurley and Tom Donovan replied for the Irish. Dan Moorhouse slipped in the lawyers' marker, while Bill Graham and Bill Snowball supplied succour for the senior engineers.

SQUASH

The incredible variety began its season this week with six games. On Tuesday, Law A vanquished Trinity A, Innis had the better of Forestry, and Vic 1 disposed of Dentistry.

Wednesday's jousts saw Meds A unhorse PHE, Trinity C finish off Eng. II, and Knox advantageously avenge themselves on St. Mike's.

VOLLEYBALL

Smallball sets on Wednesday witnessed Senior Eng's triumph over Innis 1, 15-5, 16-14, Dent B's success over Meds C, 15-13, 13-15, 15-10. PHE A's victory over Meds B, 15-2, 9-15, 15-13, and Erindale's thrashing of Pharmacy 15-9, 15-11.

On Thursday Vic I soundly whipped Trinity 15-6, 15-4.

SOCCER

Gene Vincze sparked PHE A to a 1-0 victory over UC on Wednesday, while Jack Gibbons duplicated that feat in PHE B's 1-0 squeeze of Forestry, yesterday.

RUGGER

In rugger races this week UC defaulted to Meds B, and PHE B demolished Architecture 18-0. Trying for Phys Ed. were McEachern (2), Taylor and Katzsch; Coulson added three conversions to the cause.

LACROSSE

Wednesday webbed weaponry saw Innis and Erindale deadlock 4-4, and Engineering and Scarborough finish 2-2.

Wally Pelech had three of Erindale's four tallies, the fourth going to Doug McKeown. In it for Innis were Bob Besley, Norm Okihiro, Rick Scott, and Merv Krill.

Jim McCubbin's suburbanian scores were matched by Maynes and Hamilton for the engers on.

Blues win first in City Squash League

Varsity Blues won their first match of the season in the "B" division of the City Squash League.

Blues defeated the Carlton Club 3-2 on the strength of victories by Terry Swinton, Mike Zimmerman and Harvey Darrington.

Blues' "B" team record is now 1-1.

SQUASH NIGHT

The annual squash night will be held this Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. in the Debates room of Hart House.

Varsity Blues' coach Ralph Rimmer will give a lecture and show slides. Refreshments will be served.

Women wage interfac war

History rests on the future in women's interfaculty basketball as the teams begin the final battles. The championship is still anyone's race.

Meds, who in the past have shied away from the limelight, are now waging war on last year's champs, Vic, under the firm hand of Commander Violet Shadd. Although Lieutenant Anne Thompson of the Vicettes is trying desperately to fight off the Meds barrage, she is being hampered by an assault from Private Mary Rocket and her SMC team.

In other leagues, Sergeant Sue Russell and her P&OT's appear to be mopping up on all teams in sight. However, Basketbells must never lose sight of the dreaded PHE superstars. Luckily for them, the five PHE regiments are still fighting for the supremacy of their own league.

But remember regiments, this is only a taste of battle.

Wait until the top two teams of each league start fighting for the victor's spoils. The war is not over yet.

SWIMMING

In other Women's activities PHE again won the interfaculty swimming meet with a total of 77 points. UC was second with 24 points.

The individual overall champion was Reggie Morgan (PHE III) who received 17 points and will be awarded the Isabel Robertson Cup for her feat.

Blues close out successful season against McGill; swan song for some

A certain tinge of sadness surrounds Varsity Blues' final football game of the 1967 season. When Blues arrive at Molson Stadium in Montreal tomorrow afternoon for their game against McGill, more than a few veterans will be donning U of T football togs for the last time.

Probably end Jim Ware will feel the nostalgia of retirement most of all. Ware has pounded the turf with surpassing competence for six SIFL seasons, four of which were spent in the affable atmosphere of a Yates Cup winner (two with Toronto, two with Queen's). The genial vet has always performed in a mild but excellent manner; this year has been no exception. Ware's experience also had an important settling effect on Blues' relatively green offense this year.

Other players slated for 'retirement' include hard-hitting offensive guard Ron Wakelin, opportunist galorist Dave Church, tiger Mike Wright, one of the big reasons for Blues' solid defense this year, and Ylo Korgemagi, who had an excellent game against Western last Saturday.

From the offensive backfield, the scythe of graduation hacks fullback Glen Markle and Mike Eben. Markle was pressed into offensive duty when that horrible plague of injuries struck the Varsity camp. Despite an exasperating tendency to run into the opposition instead of around them, Markle has accounted for more than half of Varsity's rushing yardage in the past three games. Of course, everyone knows what a loss Mike Eben will be. But the SIFL's loss will probably be the CFL's gain. Eben, right now is one of the best pass catchers in the country.

As consolation, these ball-players have the pleasant satisfaction of having gone out with a winner (no snickers please). Toronto has already cemented the Yates Cup to its bountiful bosom, so tomorrow's game against McGill is something of a formality.

Of course, coach Ron Murphy doesn't see it that way. He wants this game badly in order to maintain his team's unbeaten record. Varsity hasn't had a no-loss season since 1958. Murphy isn't overly happy with the team's attitude so far.

"I'm a little worried, yes. This is a tough game to get up for now that we've already won the cup. I'm hoping pride alone will be enough."

One of the interesting features of the game will be the friendly duel between Eben and teammate Paul McKay for league scoring honours. Both players are currently tied for the lead with 30 points. Murph isn't playing any favourites. "If Eben gets a touchdown, we will just have to let McKay kick two field goals."

Murphy has promised to make one change in his line-up which will "shock a lot of people" but at the moment he isn't saying what it is. However one alternative from the Western game will definitely be Wolfgang Gut's insertion into the starting offensive backfield replacing Pete Broadhurst.

Last year repeats itself as ice Blues face Voyageurs

By PHIL BINGLEY

At the beginning of last season, Varsity Blues opened their road exhibition schedule with a successful 4-2 decision over Laurentian University Voyageurs in Sudbury. During March, in Varsity's last game of the season, they clinched their second consecutive Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union title with a win over these same Voyageurs—this time 16-2.

Sunday afternoon, at 2:30. Blues start all over again. And, just as last year, the Sudbury game will be their first road test of the season.

The improvement of twelve goals Blues made over Laurentian during the course of the season was impressive by any standards. However, the fact that the blue and white were held to the initial 4-2 count indicates the major problem which will be facing coach Tom Watt and his troops on Sunday—that of early conditioning.

While Blues were not in bad shape last year at the time of the first game, Laurentian was almost in mid-season form. Their programme features a fast start and by the time Blues arrived there last year, they had been practicing for over a month and had played five or six exhibition games to Varsity's one.

Reports from Sudbury indicate that Voyageurs have been working out since late September. However, Blues have been working hard (two hours a day for the past two weeks) and look to be in excellent shape.

Making the Sudbury jaunt, will be netminders John Wrigley and Peter Adamson. On defence, Peter Speler and Jim Miles will form one pairing while Bob Hamilton will make the scene with either Al Jones or Doug Jones.

Up front, Paul Laurent will centre Ward Passi and Gord Cunningham, Murray Stroud will get the nod between Bob McClelland and former defenceman Brian Jones, and Brian St. John will be in the slot for wingers John Gordon and Mike Riddell.

Forwards Paul McCann and Fred Pollard, both newcomers to this year's team, will also make the trip.

AROUND THE NET ... Coach Tom Watt will be a busy man this week-end. After spotting for the football team in Montreal, he will catch an overnight train to Sudbury to coach the hockey team for the Laurentian game ... Football and hockey trainer Howie Ringham is also keeping occupied these days. On top of his training duties, Howie has been pressed into service as the teams' cook. Seems the regular cook split with the crackers ... Winger Bryan Tompson, who suffered a broken leg last week, may not be lost to the team for the whole year as originally expected. He may be back after Christmas vacation.

Soccer Blues on to Montreal after 2-0 win

Varsity soccer Blues close out their regular season tomorrow when the team travels to Montreal to take on McGill Redmen. As Queen's have already clinched the Eastern division laurels, this match against McGill will be merely a matter of prestige.

Last Wednesday afternoon,

Blues coasted to a 2-0 victory over McMaster Marauders.

The game must have been disappointing to Mac players who played a good, aggressive match, and seemed to beat Blues to the ball. The Varsity squad had one of their 'lazy, hazy' days; their play lacked desire and their passing was woefully short on accuracy.

During the first few minutes of play, John Gero broke through the Maroon defence on crisp passes from Jim Lefkos and Dwight Taylor plus good individual effort, but just failed to put the ball into the net.

Soon, however, Gero tipped a pass to Ron Muir who neatly placed a hard shot into the bottom corner of the net to put Blues in front.

Minutes later, Frank Soppelsa upped the score to 2-0 as he coolly gathered in Gero's rebound to blast the ball past the helpless goalie.

For the rest of the half, both teams had anxious moments around the net but neither were able to finish off their plays. 'Tippy-toe' passing and the 'Are you going to shoot or should I?' attitudes by the forwards were the main reasons for the low score.

The second-half of the game continued as a hard-fought, mid-field battle with occasional chances for both sides. Blues' defensive wall of Allan Cragg, Eric Sereda, and Bill Nepotuk forced play into McMaster territory while Stan Bogucki did an excellent job in goal.

Good bursts of energy and playmaking were shown by Varsity wingers as they displayed occasional flashes of Blues' potent offence. However, play up the centre of the forward line was marred oftentimes by late, punishing tackling from the Mac defence.

Korner Kicks. Blues' sadly impressive list of injuries this year continues to mount as Ormond Mendes suffered an injured knee ... Irwin Stach is definitely out for the rest of the season with a broken nose, as well as Tom Johnston with an injured leg ... Frank Soppelsa played well Wednesday despite the knock received to his head last Saturday.

Inter-campus co-operation possible: college presidents

A University of Ontario need not be created, says the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario.

The Committee said in its first annual report, issued Saturday, that it can provide the necessary inter-university co-ordination by voluntary action.

The report says the committee aims: "To promote co-operation among the provincially-assisted universities of Ontario and between them and the government of the province and generally to work for the improvement of higher education for the people of Ontario."

The committee was formed in 1962 by the government advisory committee on university affairs to discuss the enrollment crisis.

Sub-committees were set up to study such problems as multiple applications, educational television and student grants.

The new admissions procedure to be initiated in the 1968-69 academic year was recommended by one of these committees. The system will use a common general application form so that qualified applicants will not be refused university admission when there are places available.

A program of co-operative use of scarce library collections is currently being implemented.

The committee on graduate studies suggests that doctoral programs be restricted to a small number of institutions with adequate funds and facilities. Proposed and existing graduate programs should be appraised and co-ordinated.

Formula financing was developed on the advice of CPUO. Each university receives a grant based on the number of students enrolled in each course of instruction.

The emerging universities will receive further grants to cover initial operating costs, says the report.

Because of the withdrawal of federal support for church-related institutions, the province has approved a committee recommendation making operating grants to these schools equal to half the grant they would have received if they had no religious affiliation.

On university government: "The minister of university affairs made it clear that the government had no objection to student representation on university boards of governors but he said that in the interest of preserving university autonomy the government felt it should be left to the universities to settle questions relating to the manner of their governance."

CPUO now is researching the question of student participation.

The government advisory committee on the student awards program for 1967-68 included two members of CPUO.

It simplified application forms, widened the bases of student independence from parents, decentralized the administration of the program, and provided for a reimbursement of $4.50 per application to the universities.

The committee also reduced the loan-grant proportion and placed a ceiling of $600 on the amount of loan taken by a student in any one year.

For the support of graduate students, CPUO recommended to the government that Ontario universities be permitted to use a formula-type method to provide fellowships.

The upper limits of such fellowships would be $1,000 for a student in a pre-requisite year, $4,000 for a student in the first year of graduate study, and $5,000 for a student in the second or subsequent years.

Because CPUO is "deeply concerned about the problem of providing student residence places at reasonable rates," it is now researching student housing.

McGill protest ends in mixed atmosphere

MONTREAL (VNS) — Promises of a greater student voice in university government mingled with charges of police brutality Friday as a week of demonstrations at McGill University came to an end.

Three McGill Daily editors are to face the senate disciplinary committee this afternoon over the allegedly obscene article which prompted administrative charges and the student society's judicial committee is to meet tonight on the same issue.

The campus demonstrations began a week ago when Students for a Democratic University reacted against charges laid against the Daily editors by the administration.

They came to a climax late Thursday when 64 demonstrators broke into the office of McGill principal Dr. H. Rocke Robertson.

Police were called in and two persons were arrested on assault charges in the resulting melee.

There were charges of police brutality—some reports said constables used night sticks to break up the crowd—but a joint statement by Dr. Robertson and students society president Peter Smith said police reported that an officer took "physical action" only after he himself was struck twice.

The joint statement also promised that the student role in the university will be immediately subject to reform.

Dr. Robertson said he will withhold administration action against the three student journalists until the student judicial committee reaches a decision.

There is a general meeting of the student society Wednesday to vote on the judicial committee's recommendations.

The joint statement was circulated on campus to head off further protests against the administration decision to discipline Daily editor Peter Allnut, Pierre Fournier, editor of the Friday supplement Flux, and John Fekete, in whose column the controversial Realist magazine reprint appeared 10 days ago.

Despite Dr. Robertson's statement, about 1,000 students were on hand Friday for a rally on campus Friday afternoon.

Administration officials responded to brutality charges by claiming that police only carried students from the principal's office after they did not heed verbal requests.

After the administration building was cleared of demonstrators it was shut down completely.

Varsity Storm

Student reaction ranges from apathy to hostility

The storm raging in Toronto over The Varsity's coverage Wednesday of the McGill controversy seems to have barely rippled the surface of campus opinion.

A random survey conducted among U of T students shows most students to be indifferent to the affair.

And most of the students who did care one way or another admitted that their reactions were largely provoked by the front-page report Thursday in The Globe and Mail.

These students professed to be shocked and revolted by the controversial passage. But their attitudes towards its appearance in The Once upon a time there used to be a McGill weekend and Varsity students had so much fun. They boozed and wenched and everything. But in 1967 something happened - they plyed cards, drank c*ke, and had only four girls. Hohum ...

Varsity varied. "Richter and Parkins should be fired and the $7,000 granted to The Varsity by the Students Administrative Council should be cut off," said Ray Carnvale (IV APSC).

"I believe in the freedom of the press but this article was a little too much."

"This whole fuss is absolutely shameful," said Mark Freiman (III UC). "The only way The Varsity could report what is a perfectly legitimate news story is to tell us what it's all about — and that's what it's all about."

"It is ridiculous that Caput should step in. If they were looking for sensationalist obscenity, where were they when the Gar-more obscenity to far less purpose."

Jerry Richmond (II UC) said Caput should give a severe warning for the incident. If the same thing happens again, Caput should take drastic action.

"If you want to read pornographic material you should not have to go to The Varsity," he said. "The remarks were worse than the ones you would find in Playboy."

Bruce Lewis, a former Director of the SAC printing bureau, said he was "very surprised and disappointed" by the administra-

The controversy over last Wednesday's Varsity coverage of the demonstration crisis at McGill University has brought 17 letters to our offices. Today's Varsity carries most of these letters, covering viewpoints from that of news editor Tim Colton, who dissociates himself from the article but finds he must support the editors; to that of former Varsity editor Harvey Shephard, who cannot fault either The Realist or the McGill Daily — let alone The Varsity — for carrying the "offending" passage, to others claiming the editors were wrong altogether. Letters and comment are on pages four and five, along with an editorial examining McGill's crisis and what produced it.

Profs ask student bookstore discounts

By KATHY ADAMS

A random sample of University of Toronto faculty agree that student discounts at the bookstore should be increased.

Faculty now receive a 10 per cent discount and students a five per cent discount. A recent Students Administrative Council report on bookstore operations recommends the discount balance be tipped in favor of the students.

Professor G. D. Scott of the physics department said: "I've always thought the bookstore should do better by the students."

"Books should be made as accessible as possible, but a reduction of the staff discount is not necessary."

Prof. J. E. Smyth, the acting chairman of the political economy department, agreed that the present discount system is discriminatory. He would not oppose a reduction in the staff discount.

Prof. C. D. Creelman of the psychology department said the bookstore would lose a lot of business if the staff discount was decreased because professors can get discounts of 10 per cent or more from publishers.

Chemistry professor S. C. Nyburg said: "The bookstore should encourage students to buy as many books as possible. Students should get the same discount as faculty."

Prof. D. R. Campbell of political economy agreed. However, many professors contacted refused to comment or couldn't because they had never heard of the report.

Real plums available: Housing Service

The University Housing Service isn't dead — it's just deserted.

It's still at 134 St. George and the offices are almost empty. The files, however, are not. Every day, someone phones Mary Jaffary to list a room or apartment.

Now that the rush is over, Mrs. Jaffary has a chance to visit individual landlords and inspect their accommodation.

"Some of these are real plums," she says. "One man just offered students six bachelor apartments at $100 a month. They're just beautiful, with wood panelling and wallpaper and private four-piece baths."

Usually Mrs. Jaffary sees the accommodation first and can give the student a description of the facilities before he goes to see the room.

So anyone who is thinking of moving, or who is dissatisfied with his present accommodation, would be well advised to pay a visit to 134 St. George.

Mass media controls consumers minds Customers' only weapon: feedback

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

*Advertising signs they con
You into thinking you're the one
That can do what's never been done.
That can win what's never been won.
Meantime life outside goes on all around you.*

—Bob Dylan, Bringing it all Back Home.

This fall the fashion czars have blessed Canadian women with square-toed shoes. In fact, style-conscious gals have been so well blessed with blunt-end footwear that they couldn't buy another style even if they wanted to.

"Pig farmers wouldn't wear those ugly, unfeminine square-toed shoes," Norma Carrier told a Psychology Club discussion Thursday.

She smokes Player's Mild and is national chairman of membership promotion for the Consumer's Association of Canada.

On her right sat smiling, silver-haired Jack Milne, the confident managing director of the Institute of Canadian Advertising.

The topic was Mind control: the role of the mass media in influencing opinion. But the discussion centred mainly around the ethics of modern advertisers.

Mrs. Carrier and Mr. Milne argued about packaging and whether the consumer buys a product for the content or for the bright, attention-grabbing package.

"No matter how attractive the package is, the consumer won't buy the product a second time unless the content is good," said Mr. Milne, reflecting his apparently unshakable faith in the quality of consumer products and the fairness of the free enterprise system.

Presumably Mr. Milne meant that if the consumer discovers a product isn't as good as its package leads you to believe it is, he has the power to purchase a competing product the next time.

But what if the package of the second product is just as colorful and exciting as the first and the contents are just as mediocre and disappointing?

And if all the products on the market are packaged like the first two but don't deliver the consumer his true dollar value, where does the consumer turn?

CONSUMER FEEDBACK

Later in the discussion Dr. David Abbey of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education suggested a new weapon that would give the vulnerable consumer more power.

The weapon is consumer feedback: when consumers are dissatisfied with a product or a market situation, they flood the company in question with complaints.

For example, Dr. Abbey said he could evoke extensive changes in CBC programming if he had a budget and a year to work on it. He singled out Stanley Burke's presentation of the 11 p.m. national news.

He said that under a systematized feedback system he would have several people phoning the CBC at regular intervals after 11:20 p.m. to complain about Mr. Burke.

Dr. Abbey was sure that CBC would react to such a system.

Personally I have tried the feedback system and found it works.

Last summer I found that about every 20th Craven M cigarette that I smoked turned out to be a dud.

The filter turned mud brown and the smoke tasted like salt petre.

Fearing lung cancer, I sent a letter and one of the faulty cigarettes to Rothman's of Canada (the makers of Craven M) on Toronto Daily Star stationery.

As soon as Rothman's received my complaint, they sent a very pleasant representative to tell me diplomatically that I had been slobbering on the filter accidentally and this caused a reaction in the filter that produced the dark brown color.

However I acknowledged my lack of oral co-ordination to the Rothman's representative. With a broad grin, he said he was happy I had inquired on the matter because Rothman's always wants to know what the consumer thinks of their products.

As he left he presented me with a complimentary carton of Craven M's.

Which only goes to prove that feedback can work even if you're wrong.

Rhodesia combats communism: Teach-In

By DAVE FRANK
and BRIAN JOHNSON

Rhodesia is a front-line in the battle against Communism, said speakers at the teach-in on Rhodesia sponsored by the Edmund Burke Society Saturday.

They charged that the news media are making no attempt to tell the whole truth about Rhodesia.

"It was a miracle," roared Pat Walsh, the secretary of Friends of Rhodesia. "It looked as if the entire world would be engulfed by the red tide of Communism." His voice was practically at the breaking point.

"Southward it moved, and at the Zambesi River it was halted." He brought his fist down in a tremendous descending arc and struck the wooden podium with a crunch.

His outburst received as much uncontrollable chuckling as applause from the audience of more than 75.

Earlier the whole tone of the teach-in had been set by a 20-minute propaganda film. It featured an interview with a black Rhodesian who said, "There are no barriers to equal opportunity. You just have to work hard."

Campus presents varied viewpoint

(continued from page 1) he had looked forward to seeing the alleged "obscenity" in The Varsity so that he could make up his own mind about the issue.

"Isn't it wonderful?" I said to myself, that our university authorities are mature enough to accept the truths necessary to a news story.

Ted Burnett (III UC) remarked that The Varsity should have used much more discretion. "All this fuss is not justified, but The Varsity does need its knuckles wrapped."

"I don't see any difference between what The Varsity and what the Motion picture industry did," David Freeman (IV UC) maintained.

Margy Wald (I New) expressed surprise "that The Glove and Mail reacted as if The Varsity was the instigator of all the trouble."

"The whole thing was in very bad taste," said Peter Storins (II New), "but it would be a shame to crucify those who are potentially good journalists."

"The Varsity shouldn't have done it," said one St. Michael's student. "Think of the effect this will have on the Kennedy family."

Irv Weisdorf (III UC) said he agreed completely with The Varsity's inclusion of the passage.

"If Caput takes any action, I hope students will rise up in arms against it. Freedom of speech and of the press is involved here."

"Was the student uprising the harbinger, as so many persons hoped, of a higher student ethic? The facts provide a melancholy refutation."

Prof. L. S. Feuer, in The Atlantic, Sept., 1966

"Participatory democracy is often like a chronic and contagious disease. Once caught, it permeates one's whole life and the lives of those around us. Its effect is disruptive in a total sense. And within a manipulative and bureaucratic system, its articulation and expression amounts to sabotage."
Carl Davidson, SDS paper Towards a Student Syndicalist Movement

mcgill furor: the tactics and ethics of student power

Those who saw John Fekete and Dr. Michael Oliver two weeks ago debating the problems confronting McGill University still marvel at the scene. That a student should be debating the university's vice-president of academic affairs was understandable, but those who were there say Fekete actually seemed to know more than Oliver.

McGill students more knowledgeable in local political affairs than the casual visitor claim that Fekete has an immense political shrewdness which he uses in every circle within which he moves. One minute you will see him talking with his campus radical and UGEO friends. The next you may hear of the sherry party he attended the night before to tell McGill administrators how to run their university.

But events came fast on the McGill campus the last two weeks. First Fekete reprinted a shocking Realist article, with no statement that it was intended as satire. The next day, two editors and Fekete were charged with publishing an obscene libel by the university's principal H. Racke Robertson and told to appear at a disciplinary hearing, which had to be postponed, because the student sit-in that had evolved over the issue blocked entry into the main administration building.

After a week of campus demonstrations, the university has made two concessions: it altered the charge against the editors to publishing material "which contravenes standards acceptable by and in this university" and announced that more student participation would be allowed in the running of the university.

That second concession came as a major surprise since the sit-in and student demonstrations seemed to have dwindled by Thursday night. What sympathy the mass of the student body had for the Students for a Democratic University types early in the week, drifted away when the demonstrators forced their way into the principal's office and refused to move.

The SDU was able to turn an issue of alleged obscenity into a wider one of the student's role in society. Faithful to Quebec student syndicalist philosophy, the SDU claimed the students themselves should deal with the controversy.

The demonstrations themselves came as no surprise since the mood of the campus was such that many students were waiting for some issue on which they could act. It was the previous week that students at the sister university, Sir George Williams, staged a successful strike on an issue of book store prices and won the right to elect four students to the university senate.

All that brings us back to the original issue: Why was that Realist article reprinted? Why at that particular time? Why was it printed in full — including the actually libellous and potentially dangerous material that precedes that notorious necrophilia scene? The answers to these and the many other questions that come out of this McGill controversy may have a great deal to say about student movements, the methods employed by their leaders and the objectives they seek.

Fekete — much more a politician than a writer — may have wanted to shock his readers for the same political and satirical reasons Paul Krossner used when he wrote the original article. Those reasons have been clearly enough explained by Krossner himself and offer an explanation that we can't avoid when considering the McGill Daily's motives.

Or, the article may have been reprinted because the editors of The Daily are dirty young men shouting filthy invectives against North American society, which they have strongly criticized in their pages. There's always the chance that students let malicious anarchism govern their actions but the editors and writers on The Daily seem above all that.

Or, they might have reprinted the article for political reasons to cause a storm on campus and force a confrontation with the McGill administration.

What is necessary, though, is to think more widely about this issue and look at student movements in general, keeping in mind that the McGill fuss is a particular case that shouldn't be too fully associated with other student agitation — for example the Sir George Williams strike, the Simon Fraser University demonstrations of last year or even the grand-daddy of them all, the Berkeley disturbance in 1964.

editor must resign

Sir: The students of the University of Toronto have been repulsed and disgraced by the filth published in Wednesday's Varsity in the guise of news. We would be doubly dishonoured if any students protest the disciplinary action to be taken by Caput.

As a student of this university for eight years, this is the first time I have felt compelled to protest. The Varsity printing material so unquestionably disgusting, and justified by no redeeming value whatsoever.

As the editor so incompetent as to have permitted its publication you have no honorable alternative but to resign.

E. Valeriate (SGS)

helped me understand

Sir: I wish to express my approval of your action in quoting that very offensive extract from the recent controversial article in the McGill student newspaper. I had heard and read reports of the controversy, but until I read that very offensive passage, I had not understood clearly why so much heat was generated in that controversy.

You helped me to understand the situation, and thus did what I regard as a good piece of reporting which would otherwise have been weakened.

I would not approve of reporting in this fashion in a family newspaper. However, in a newspaper restricted to an adult readership, I regard your reporting of this situation as appropriate.

Ray McCulloch (S.G.S.)

unequivocal support

Sir: In the wake of all the attempts to get out from under in the recent McGill Krossner Reprint Controversy, I must state unequivocally that I support The Varsity's decision to run "that" paragraph.

In fact, I support the content of the entire Nov. 8 issue.

I read the McGill article the night before it was published and at the time it made little impression on me. I certainly didn't register any protest.

I can't equivocate. I can't back down now that the going is getting a bit rough. I can't ask you to dissociate me from the content of one article.

I won't work for a SAC or administration-appointed editor. I couldn't spend 30-40 hours a week working (for nothing) for a "mouthpiece" paper.

There's plenty of time for that after I graduate.

Sherry Brydson,
Varsity Reporter

filthiest piece ever

Sir: Since you are reported in The Globe and Mail as saying that there was practically no reaction to your revolting Johnson-Kennedy story in Wednesday's Varsity I feel constrained to write to express my own. I thought it was the filthiest piece I had ever read and it depressed me greatly that the editor of The Varsity could see no objection to printing it. I think that this is a matter for the Students Administrative Council to deal with but if I were a member of that body I would take the view that The Varsity is a paper subscribed to by all the students and that they should not have to put up with such obscenities.

Your story was equally objectionable, and I would have thought open to a criminal libel suit in the words and actions it attributed to living people. Are there no standards of decency left, no limits to the insults we may direct at people in public life? The defence that you were merely reporting what someone else wrote is no defence in the eyes of those who believe in the maintenance of certain minimum standards of reporting.

quote gave credence

Due to a misunderstanding this letter was not printed Friday.

Sir:

I would like to clarify my position on the printing of the passage from The Realist that appeared in Wednesday's McGill story.

First, I opposed the printing of the passage. The Realist "satire" struck me then, as it does now, as gross and indecent to the point of perversion. Carrying the now-infamous passage seemed unnecessary and dangerous to me, and I said so. But I was over-ruled by the editor and general manager of The Varsity.

However, I must stress here that Mr. Richter and Mr. Parkins argued in favor of printing the passage because, they said, it would give students here a full view of the controversy at McGill. They did not advocate printing it to "shake up the campus" or to fabricate any kind of test case. They ran it for its news value and nothing else. The fact or degree of its obscenity was ignored.

While I cannot be so ambivalent as to defend an action I opposed in the first place, I hope the foregoing remarks have helped establish the spirit in which the article was printed.

I could not remain on the masthead of The Varsity if the passage were printed in any other than the context it was. But neither can I now abandon Mr. Richter and Mr. Parkins to the merities of those who would malign them as the unscrupulous propagators of smut.

Tim Colton,
Varsity News Editor

an unfortunate incident

Sir:

As managing director of University of Toronto Radio I have found it my unpleasant task to write an editorial statement regarding Wednesday's issue of The Varsity and have it aired on Radio Varsity. As I said in our editorial, we do not wish to add fuel to the controversy caused by your printing an extract from the McGill Daily regarding the late President Kennedy. I feel sure that the flames will grow with no further assistance from us.

However, I feel that I must, as a student concerned, pass on to you and your readers the radio's feelings about your actions. We cannot help but feel that you acted in extremely poor taste — admittedly you were only reprinting something already published to provide your readers with an idea of what was happening at another university, but this was still in poor taste and showed a lack of responsibility towards your readers. We hope Caput realizes that it has no authority to take disciplinary action in this case and will act accordingly; we also hope that the students at U of T realize that they DO have the authority to act in this case and will do so by writing their comments to the communications commission.

It was an unfortunate incident — best forgotten — we urge you not to let it happen again.

R. D. Payne,
Managing Director,
University of Toronto Radio.

What Johnson does daily is worse horror

Sir:

As the 1964-65 editor of The Varsity, I want to state my approval of The Varsity's handling of the Realist-McGill Daily story, and to offer a few of my own opinions on the subject.

For The Realist to have printed, and for The McGill Daily to reprint, a fictitious article imputing to President Lyndon B. Johnson outrages against the corpse of John F. Kennedy is defensible.

Certainly people ought not normally to be treated in print as President Johnson was treated. But he presides over and is the symbol of a society which wages war against the people of Vietnam, which maintains disguised imperialist policies towards the peoples of many nations in Asia, Africa and Latin America, and which sacrifices human values to economic "progress" within its own boundaries. It is a society in which consciousness is deprived: people do not react as they ought to react to ordinary words and pictures or to rational argument. The administration even permits publication of pictures of its own atrocities — something I believe even Nazi Germany did not dare do — for it knows that the ability of its people to respond in a human way has been sapped. Gentle dissent, too, is ineffective, and is therefore permitted. The society can not respond to what is before its eyes.

In this situation, tactics can not be condemned which might jolt people into awareness of truths which were always there and plain to see, although not seen. The horror of what Johnson does daily and openly is far worse than the horror of what he was fictitiously represented as doing in The Realist; if it is only by the latter that we are horrified, then our sensibilities are in need of some drastic corrective.

For individuals and groups in a society which as a whole is as depraved as ours, ordinarily praiseworthy acts — paying one's taxes, earning one's living, defending

Sir:

I believe that the use of the quote from the Realist subsequently published in Wednesday's Varsity (McGill Daily Story) was in highly questionable taste. Nevertheless, its inclusion in the Varsity story was necessary to give credence and a better understanding of why action was being taken against the McGill Daily staff.

The policy of The Varsity during the years I have been at this university has always been to reprint those portions of articles or statements, oftentimes highly controversial, from other sources, in order to allow the student reader an opportunity to judge for himself the propriety of the remarks made.

I question the taste of the editor of The Varsity in this matter but I do not question his right to publish this material.

Hershell Ezrin (IV UC)

not free to offend

Sir:

I have never believed in the hindrance of free speech but I am totally opposed to such when it is exercised without regard for others. You may be free to say what you want but you are not free to offend the dignity of those who inadvertently read what you say. This might not be so if your publication were distributed to the fringe few who may have such an interest. But you must remember that The Varsity is read by many and read not in the expectation of such garbage. I fail to see what was gained by the printing (Nov. 8) of the extract concerning the supposed incident after President Kennedy's death which had appeared earlier in the student newspaper of McGill University. It left me in a state of nausea. This is not what the majority of students want to read. The space would have been better left blank for it merely showed your lack of responsibility and maturity.

Gordon K. Harrison (III Vic)

error in judgment

Sir:

Obviously, the offending paragraph in Wednesday's McGill story, when standing by itself, is perverse and obscene.

However, when it appears in the context of a tightly written news story, the situation is slightly different.

I agree with the senior editors that responsible coverage of the McGill situation necessitated reprinting part of the Realist article.

However, in my opinion the editors made a serious error in judgement in their choice of this particular passage.

It is commendable that the editors deliberately attempted to play down all sensationalist overtones attached to this particular passage; however, they should have realized that the mere publication of the passage in any form would inevitably lead to unfortunate and unnecessary repercussions.

In deciding to publish this particular passage, the editors were guided by their conception of responsible journalism. They decided the campus has a right to be fully informed, even if the particular facts are distasteful to many students and faculty.

The editors have not been motivated by any desire for sensationalism.

I fully sympathize with those who consider this particular passage as nothing but cheap obscene sensationalism.

However, as this was not the intention of our editors, I intend to support Messrs. Richter and Parkins in the proceedings Caput has instituted against them.

Paul Carson,
Varsity Executive Editor

it's beyond me

Sir:

Why charges of libel should have arisen out of the paragraph from The Realist printed in The Varsity is beyond me. That paragraph is the only part of Krassner's article which could not be used for libel since it is so fantastic as to be absurd to any rational person. The rest of the article is close enough to believable truth to prompt a libel suit if President Johnson were so inclined. Strange that he isn't, isn't it?

Paul MacRae,
Varsity City Editor

spirals to new depths

Sir:

It is hard to believe that you would allow the printing of such libellous material as that from the McGill Daily of a week ago Friday. This merely confirms further what is heard around campus that The Varsity is little more than a forum for sensationalism of the cheapest variety by those people on the editorial staff.

One has to say that reprinting this "material" of Krassner's has sent The Varsity spiraling to new depths of irresponsibility in reporting. This charge probably could not be justified if the article did not simultaneously include Krassner's own admissions that the excerpt was a hoax as well as editor Allnut of The Daily having said that the article should never have appeared because it was "out of context."

Surely, Mr. Editor, in the world of this university there must be a great deal more to print than a few articles containing four letter words and slanderous items such as this. Maybe even something of interest, real interest, that is, to students as a whole.

Cal MacInnis (III Knox)

i question The Varsity

Sir:

As a member of The Varsity staff, I wish to express my concern with the obscene remarks printed on the front page of the Wednesday issue. Not only do I feel the remarks were of bad taste, but I don't see that the remarks were necessary to the story.

If the management feels that publishing such a remark is a way of insuring public attention to the paper, then I'm afraid they will have to accept the fact that The Varsity will be regarded as a low-quality sensational paper.

I feel that Caput has every right to interfere when such trash (and there is no other word for it), is printed in a paper that caters to such a large number of people.

If the freedom to print such remarks is what is called the new morality, I fully understand why our elders are against it.

I am curious to know why the management went ahead and printed the same words that caused so much controversy at McGill. Surely they were aware that some disciplinary action would be taken against them. Maybe they were trying to test the degree of censorship on the campus. But certainly there must be a more respectable way to do this.

I wonder too, why the rest of the staff was not told of the intention of the management to print such a controversial remark.

I was proud to be a staff member. But now I question my own opinion of The Varsity. It is a shame that the staff has allowed The Varsity to present such a low-brow quality. A lot of good material will have to be printed in order to regain a presentable image.

Anne Boody,
Varsity reporter

rash and unfortunate

Sir:

Your decision to publish the Realist extract in your Wednesday story on The McGill Daily was rash, unfortunate, and in decidedly poor taste. The extract itself was disgusting, and its publication was neither informative nor necessary. It was, I fear, nothing more nor less than a deliberate attempt to stir up publicity for The Varsity, an attempt which says little for the paper's ability to discover and process hard news.

The really unfortunate aspect of the incident, though, is that the unfavorable publicity generated by it will probably reflect on the student body as a whole, to the detriment of all, at the very time when we are trying to convince society to relinquish some of its control over our destinies.

The damage, however, has been done, and no amount of disciplinary action or firing of the editors, etc., will rectify it. Any such understandable yet excessive impulses on the part of the Caput will serve only to torment and weaken a newspaper which, in its moments of glory, has proven that it has what it takes to be an outstanding journalistic adventure.

The issue should be allowed to ride; it will blow over. And let us hope that, in future, The Varsity shows more respect for and appreciation of the fact that the larger community regards it as the voice of the U of T students, and naturally will tend to judge us on that basis.

Krassner: McGill Daily disciplined For a crime without victims

By ARNOLD ZEMAN

Special to Canadian University Press

MONTREAL — The McGill Daily 10 days ago reprinted an article written by Paul Krassner, the editor of the American magazine The Realist. The article purported to be parts of William Manchester's original manuscript of Death of a President. Public reaction to the article ranged from the outcries of Montreal open-line broadcaster Pat Burns to its labelling as obscene libel.

In an interview with The Georgian of Sir George Williams University Monday, Krassner said that the article was entirely satirical and that no legal action had ever been taken against him. When asked if he was surprised by the McGill reaction, Krassner replied, "Not at all.

"When Fekete called me to ask for permission to run the piece, I told him he'd have to expect this kind of thing. He told me he realized the risks involved and so I told him to go ahead and print it. He called me over the weekend and filled me in on what was happening and I wrote a letter saying the article was entirely fictional."

In a statement released at the time, Daily editor Peter Alnutt declared that in retrospect the article "should not have appeared in the McGill Daily." Krassner felt it was hard to determine whether the decision was influenced by external pressures.

"As editor, publisher, and ringleader of The Realist, I have no one to answer to but myself. Alnutt's in a different position. College newspapers don't have that type of independence.

"It all comes down to he who pays the piper calls the tune. There are no objective standards to decide whether or not they were wise or unwise in printing the piece. It depends on a number of things."

When told that both the students' council and the senate would meet to consider disciplinary action, Krassner answered, "That's absurd. The Realist isn't trash... it is assigned as reading on some English courses in different colleges in the States. To take disciplinary action means to punish people for committing crimes without victims."

I asked him if it was wise to employ real persons in satirical comment.

"I see nothing at all wrong with it. One of America's most respected satirists Art Buchwald, wrote an article about the death of J. Edgar Hoover... The use of real persons in satire often determines the impact the piece will have upon readers. I think it's up to the individual writer to decide whether or not to use real people to add to the verisimilitude of his satire."

As far as Krassner is concerned the whole controversy created in Montreal by his article is based on "irrationality" and "emotion."

"The cries for censorship and suppression of such material is a dangerous symptom of the sick society we live in. It is, in part, this sick society which I was trying to satirize in that now famous piece of mine... censorship can only take place when there is a clear and present danger such as preventing the manufacture of firecrackers resembling popcorn balls."

Charging that the Students for a Democratic University attempted to implicate more people in the controversy, thereby forcing the university to take action against people not associated with The Daily, Krassner commented that it reflected a "healthy sense of community.

"I see the role of satire in society as being very important. Picasso said: 'Art is a lie that makes people see the truth'. Satire as an art form should give us another glimpse of reality."

One of the most highly controversial pieces of the article was the reference to necrophilia. When asked if there was a chance of necrophilia becoming an accepted norm in the American society Krassner responded solemnly, "Yes, this is increasingly likely but I could only morally accept it between two consenting adults."

Rhodesians defend their actions

"The African was 500 years behind in sociological development," ran the commentary, "but progress has been achieved and can be credited to an enlightened administration."

"Discrimination on the grounds of race is prohibited," said Mr. Healy Ballons in defence of Rhodesia's system of land ownership.

Mr. Ballons, the first speaker, was a farmer in Uganda and Rhodesia before moving to Canada this year.

"For many Africans the vote has no practical value and is not understood in the least."

He lashed out at the British government—"Words fail me to describe the despicable acts of British diplomacy.

"Rhodesia is being attacked by black mercenaries trained, supplied, and indoctrinated by the Communists."

"Sit down you bloody liar," said an African student in a tolerant tone of voice.

When questions were allowed Mr. Ballons appeared either unable to hear or unwilling to answer the question of another African student.

F. Paul Fromm (II SMC), the EBS chairman, was unable to bring the questioning under control. When he introduced Mr. Walsh, the hanöful of Negro students walked out.

The theme of Mr. Walsh's tirade was "the global strategy of Communism."

"Evidence of it can be seen everywhere," he warned, "in the schools, inside the community, in the universities — I repeat — in the universities."

Jean Howson, a Toronto high-school librarian, insisted on comparing the black Rhodesian to the Ontario Indian.

"Imagine," she repeated several times, "imagine 7,000,000 Ontarians bearing the economic burden of educating 112,000,000 Indians."

She said one of every seven Bantu people are in school compared to one out of four in Ontario. She estimated the number of Indians in school as one in 45.

Miss Howson predicted every Bantu child would have a primary school education by 1969.

The final speaker was Cedric Greenhill, a former Rhodesian farmer. He defended the Ian Smith regime in Rhodesia by harshly condemning the actions of Britain and the United Nations.

He drew loud guffaws from the Negroes in the audience when he said: "Since independence, the Rhodesian government has received support of about 98 per cent of the African people.

"Although the Europeans are outnumbered 15 to one, the police do not have to go around armed like the police in Toronto."

In the following question period an indignant Negro asked, "If representation in Rhodesia is 15 to one, why are they not represented?"

Mr. Greenhill replied: "Rhodesians believe in democracy and..." he was interrupted by laughter, "...and if you give everyone in the country a vote that will be the end of democracy."

Fromm relieved Mr. Greenhill of his dilemma by declaring a "tea break."

Back inside, the bearded Negro student, who declined to give his name but said he was from Chicago, was making tempers flare.

"The truth about Rhodesia is racism. Let's talk about racism, the systematic degradation of people's minds. I want to talk about people suffering."

He later said he thought the teach-in was very superficial.

Fromm said he was pleased with the Teach-in, although disappointed at the bickering.

"It presented a side that has not been presented before. It was educational," he added.

"The Teach-in was a success mainly because it happened."

Macpherson report ignores circumstantial problems

Following is the third in a series of three articles in which the author, who participated in a Macpherson-like study of education at Stanford University last year, finds superficialities in Macpherson's report.

By BRUCE CAMPBELL

The environment is important to the process of teaching and learning, the report concedes. But how is the environment humanizing? The report never faces the question.

Teaching is the central relation between student and professor, the report states. Did the committee consider the non-structural ways in which students learn from the faculty, such as through seeing a faculty member as a model for values and attitudes? A recent five-year study at Stanford and Berkeley revealed, among many things, that freshmen women to a small extent and freshmen men almost not at all conceived of their teachers as human beings. When asked to describe them, they revealed that they saw them only in terms of their classroom function. Is it right that teaching be the central relation between student and professor if the price paid is each one's humanness?

The report, in speaking of counselling, notes that there is a good deal of student floundering, especially in first year, due to insufficient knowledge about university subjects and degree programs. It recommends various measures be taken to remedy the situation. But the report fails to treat the floundering caused by personal reasons. This is where the brunt of advising should be directed, if only for the pragmatic consideration of preventing the floundering described in the report which is frequently caused, research shows, by personal floundering. But more importantly, such a shift in counselling attention would more honestly reflect the importance of personal counselling vis a vis academic advising.

The report encourages student housing as facilitating "the meeting of minds." But does not housing also, and more importantly, encourage the meeting of persons?

If the report were interested in the student as a person, it would have asked how the environment fosters human qualities. How does it encourage self-awareness, curiosity, responsibility, creativity, sensitivity, autonomy, openness, trust, wonder? In what ways are these encouraged by the non-classroom aspects of the environment? How can these be applied to the educational structure? The report is silent.

One cannot be too harsh on the Macpherson report, because it is a product of the educational structure that initiated it, and this structure in turn reflects the dominant modes of thought in our society.

The rather sketchy fourth section of the report discusses the influence of the college environment on the student. But never does the report examine the effect of the environment on the student as a person. The report sees the student only as a learner, but not as a human being.

Our society is dominated by the rationality of exclusion. It tends to focus on certain questions and problems, but to ignore others. There is rationality within the system but also there is an inevitable warping of the questions we ask, because they are not asked in their full context. When we ignore the most basic of all questions, the magnitude of our dilemma is multiplied.

We have mis-prioritized ourselves; what should be the fundamental human project has been abandoned, and secondary and tertiary projects have come to receive the central focus of our attention. We attend to the instrumental, but we ignore the human. Man's basic project, to make himself a whole, flexible, open human being, is lost because we focus on activity aimed toward secondary and tertiary projects. Because these other projects are not considered in their proper relation to the primary project, attention to them distorts man's perspective on everything, including those other projects. Because we ignore our basic project, we are miscontexted as well as misprioritized.

The context which dominated our thought and life is manifested through the root question we ask. "For the older generation," Stanford philosopher Michael Novak has said, "the key words which unlock the meaning of life are How To: how to make money, how to win friends and influence people, how to win at bridge, how to master the secrets of nature, how to predict and to control, how to make a contribution to society, how to live a productive life." The outlook which produces How To as its most important question is an instrumental one. It conceives of man as a machine, a tool, but ignores any qualities in him which are distinctly human.

This outlook is inadequate to many young people and for them the question How To is secondary. Their primary attention is given not to the instruments of change but to the qualities of being human.

"How To is an important, even indispensable, question for students to master. Many younger people, nevertheless, now have the opportunity to ask a further and also indispensable question. Their primary question is not How To, but Who? Who am I? Who are we, we North Americans, with immense power and wealth and guilt and restlessness? Where are we going? What are we doing, here under those stars, here in the wind?"

"The question How To makes man a machine and nature a raw material. The question Who makes man a self and the world a thou; it opens a man to beauty, to wonder, and to joy . . . The ethic of how to is losing its appeal. It is not sufficiently human."

The university's problems are parallel to and a reflection of society's. The university, too, ignores the basic human project and thereby warps all its activity by not seeing it in its complete perspective. Rigorous attention to facts and a focus on the development of skills are not evil in themselves, but they serve inhuman ends unless they are seen in their whole perspective, i.e. as ways to facilitate people's becoming human.

Separating training in method, for example, from the end to which it is to be put leads inexorably to its becoming a force for dehumanization, because students will come to think of themselves as instruments, as machines for processing knowledge for society's use. The university warps students and prostitutes training in method because it ignores the basic human project and thus what it considers is seen in isolation from the basic project.

The Macpherson report is a product of the view of education predominant today. It was suggested at the beginning of the article that the greatest fault of the report was its too limited frame of reference. The refocusing suggested in this article as ways to broaden the perspective in which the committee's problems are seen all have the same basic theme: the time has come to look at students as human beings. What the university needs is to broaden its context so that the study of knowledge or training in method are seen as means to a new and more human end: that of helping students to bring themselves into being as free and mature human beings.

Only then will the work of evaluation begun by the committee be complete.

Computers reveal annual virgin count

By SHERRY BRYDSON

Female virginity has gone up 20 per cent over last year, according to the results of the engineers' computer dating forms.

John Pullam (SGS), who wrote up the program last year as his graduating thesis says 80 per cent of female applicants this year claimed virginity, compared to 60 per cent last year.

"That's quite a feat," said Pullam. "Personally I don't believe it."

Results of the computer's match-making efforts, released Friday, are posted in the Engineering Stores, at the entrance to the Sigmund Samuel Library and in the foyer of the Galbraith Building.

Antipathy to inter-racial dating was a notable feature of the applications. Of the men, 508, said they would date a girl of another race and 609 would not. Of women, 203 would date outside their race and 631 would not.

Some of the applicants had strange names. Girls will be either dismayed or delighted to discover they have been matched with men nicknamed Shack, Stud, Syph, Suds, Lushwell, Boor, Blew, Bunk, Attila, Fornicator, The Furrer and Chubby Mudwamp.

Men, on the other hand, have been matched with girls like Anastazia and Aphrodite.

One man, identified only as Jeffrey, was programmed as a girl and received four male dates.

"This could be due to the fact that he filled out his form incorrectly on that one question," said Tony Patt (IV APSC), the business manager of the program.

The scheme brought in $2,251 for SHARE. The programming was handled by Pullam and Dennis Smith (SGS), who worked for pizza and beer. The key-punching was done free by the Fich Institute of Data Processing, International Business Machines and Simcoe Hall.

Added to the other engineering contributions, the total comes to about 25 per cent of total SHARE donations.

Twice as many forms were sold this year—about 2,200 in all. Of these, 2,088 were returned in time to be processed.

However, at least 15 per cent were ruined and could not be processed.

FROM THE HINTERLANDS

Vietnam industry recruiters hit

WATERLOO (CUP) — About 25 University of Waterloo students last week protested job recruiting by companies selling war materials to the U. S. for possible use in Vietnam.

The companies were scheduled to hold job interviews for co-operative program students on the library's sixth floor.

Students from the Students for a Democratic University and some professors were to hold a sit-in there but campus police prevented them from entering.

Protestors then marched around the door, and handed out leaflets outlining their reasons for the demonstration.

The protests were directed mainly against Dow Chemical company, a producer of napalm, Litton Systems, Canadian Marconi Ltd., Valcartier Industries Ltd., United Aircraft of Canada and others.

Some co-op students started heckling and throwing snowballs. Protestors ignored the taunts and continued handing out their leaflets and displaying their signs. The co-op students then began a counter protest.

Posters appeared supporting the right of any company to come out to the campus to interview students. Signs read, "We like Dow" and "Don't let a minority misrepresent our views."

Girls choose men for co-ed co-op

MONTREAL (Special) — A group of McGill University students are planning to set up co-educational co-op housing by the beginning of December.

Organizers say the project is not intended primarily as a solution to student housing problems, but as an opportunity for social, cultural, and personal development of the members.

Present plans call for groups of six to 10 students to live together in private houses at a projected monthly rent of $70 a member.

"Male-female relationships in the university are inadequate," said one organizer. "We wish to establish deeper relationships at a greater proximity."

"We are searching for an alternative to the present marital set-up. As it exists today, marriage is narrow, restrictive, limited, monotonous, and inimical to personal growth."

Plans are to admit girls first and let them select the men of their choice.

University staff shortage forecast

VICTORIA (Special) — Canada will face a serious shortage of university staff in the near future warns Dr. Harry Scargill, the head of the University of Victoria's graduate school.

While it is still relatively easy to obtain teaching staff from foreign sources, the brain drain may deplete the alien supply, Dr. Scargill said.

Half of the teaching staff at the University was trained outside Canada, he pointed out.

He said extremely rapid expansion of undergraduate schools has meant a lack of government attention for the financing of graduate schools.

"How long can we expect American universities to throw open their doors to Canadians when their own students are clamoring to get in?" he asked.

Canadian graduate schools must expand quickly to prevent undergraduate programs from suffering, said Dr. Scargill.

Grads ignore business; Prefer the professions

Graduates are by-passing careers in business for teaching and the professions, says a report prepared by the Alumni Association of the University of Toronto school of business.

The professions were chosen by 48 per cent of the sample of 466 students graduating last year.

Teaching was selected by 26 per cent of the students.

But only eight per cent said they intended to seek a career in business.

Students considered "interesting and varied work" the most important quality of the professions and teaching, but about three of 10 students could not pick a most important quality for business jobs.

Security was picked by only 11 per cent as the most important motive in the choice of an occupation. Interesting work and people was a more important consideration.

The report says students appeared poorly informed about the nature of business jobs in such fields as accounting, marketing, finance, sales, production and advertising.

Journalism was chosen by two per cent and the civil service by four per cent of the polled students.

Allan Wilson, whose association undertook the study, said he hoped the report would help change the approach of recruiters, who are currently in the process of interviewing on the campus.

The Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada also sponsored the study.

Looking for an air of adventure?

Breathe deeply at IBM.

A sense of challenge and adventure is something that seems to be lacking from a lot of jobs these days. Not so with jobs at IBM.

We're involved in one of the biggest, most exciting adventures going . . . progress!

Basically—IBM creates, builds and sells information processing systems. Because the "information explosion" is revolutionizing practically every aspect of man's activity, IBM is intimately involved in some very exciting activities: education . . . medicine . . . space . . . defense . . . urban planning . . . just to name a few.

As an IBM employee, you will be concerned with one or more of these fast-changing areas, right in the course of your job. You'll get involved—really involved. Because of your abilities and training, you will have the opportunity to make things happen for people—revolutionary things—in a way and at a speed that was considered impossible just a few years ago. This will be your business career.

Naturally, there are other benefits: good salary; continued education; room for personal growth and achievement; recognition. Combine these with the personal satisfaction you'll get from doing a vital job well—and you have what adds up to a pretty unusual career opportunity.

Talk to your Placement Officer—make it a point to see the IBM representative on campus. Ask a lot of questions.

Find out how you can become part of the greatest adventure the world has ever seen. Or if you can't do that, just write:

York U gets the pill

York University has joined the three other Ontario campuses where the birth-control pill is available.

Dr. H. J. Wheeler, the director of the university health service, said he would follow the same procedure as in his private practice.

"I do give out birth control information and tablets to those desiring it," he said, "but this is based on my discretion, having an interview with the patient and conducting an examination."

In a poll of York students, 78 per cent said they favored the distribution of pills from a campus outlet. None opposed free access to birth control information.

Water polo squad starts season with 13-1 rout over Mac

By AQUAE PUER

Varsity's championship water polo squad outclassed McMaster 13-1 in an exhibition game played Saturday night in the Hart House pool.

Leading the Blues' attack were Bruce Wartburton (6 goals), Chris McNaught (4 goals) and Alan Pyle (2 goals).

After allowing an early goal, Varsity netminder Hartley Garfield kept the Mac shooters off the score-sheet.

Making effective use of a pressing defense, Blues limited Mac to but 7 shots on goal.

Meanwhile, the powerful Varsity offense fired 27 shots at the beleaguered McMaster twinnerman.

Despite the lopsided score, Blues missed several excellent scoring opportunities and displayed a well-developed talent in hitting the crossbar and goalposts.

The Varsity swimmers have two weeks to sharpen their accuracy before beginning the Herschorn Cup competition against McGill.

Hockey Blues launch season; overpower Laurentian 10-2

By AMPER SAND

SUDBURY—Varsity Blues launched defense of their Canadian intercollegiate hockey championship Sunday afternoon with a convincing 10-2 victory over Laurentian Voyageurs.

Last November, Blues were hard pressed by Laurentian in a similar exhibition tilt before emerging with a 4-2 win. In the CIAU finals Blues clobbered the hapless Voyageurs 16-2.

From the opening faceoff, it was obvious that Laurentian's edge on conditioning would be of little advantage as Blues' superior ability indicated a rout was virtually inevitable.

In fact, Blues main opposition came not from the Voyageurs but from the gross ineptitude of the officials.

The referee and linesmen, who couldn't skate and were possessed of various visionary vicissitudes, continually found themselves out of position and away from the play.

In the third period, an errant Voyageur slap shot ricocheted off the boards behind the Varsity net.

To Blues' amazement, the referee blew his whistle and ruled the puck bad gone into the stands. It was lying about two feet beside the Varsity net.

Early in the first period, Blues center Murray Stroud was attacked by a beefy Laurentian defenseman.

Outweighed by over 30 pounds, Stroud had no chance to retaliate and the officials merely stood by and allowed the hometown player to continue punching at will.

Finally, Blues' defenseman Peter Speyer intervened to stop the obvious mis-match. The referee rewarded his efforts with a game misconduct for "being the third player involved in a fight."

In the rare moments when they weren't under the domination of the incompetent officials, Blues completely controlled the play.

Led by the veteran first line of center Paul Laurent plus wingers Ward Passi and Gord Cunningham, Blues struck for three first period goals within four minutes.

Passi, who always plays well in his hometown, finished with three goals, Laurent had two, and Cunningham contributed three assists.

Rookie Fred Pollard, who played last year at York, scored his first goal as a Blue midway through the second period. Pollard played a regular shift as coach Tom Watt reorganized the lineup following Speyer's ejection.

Laurentian gradually withered under Blues' powerful attack, and Varsity wingers Bob McClelland and Mike Riddell notched two quick markers in the last minute of the period.

Varsity maintained the attack in the third period and counted two more goals in the first 90 seconds.

Paul McCann, who has experience in the Metro Jr. B league tallied first, then assisted as Pollard collected his second goal of the day.

Laurentian goals were recorded by Ray Potvin and Phil Laurence.

Varsity goaltending chores were shared by Pete Adamson and last year's regular netminder John Wrigley. Each allowed one goal.

Voyageur goalie Norm Ccutti played a solid game and had little or no chances on the shots which beat him. Receiving only token support from a porous defense, he faced 65 Varsity shots.

BLUENOTES: Voyageur's fired 28 shots on the Varsity net... Blues took six minors plus cheap misconducts to Cunningham and Bob Hamilton plus Speyer's game misconduct... Laurentian was assessed a major and two minors... the second and third lines played exceptionally well.

Varsity ruggerite Andy Bethell (dark shirt) struggles against McGill players during a line-out in Saturday's game. Blues defeated the Redmen 8-6 to finish an undefeated season in the Eastern Division. After a try by Andy Gibson, Blues fell behind as McGill notched two penalty kicks Varsity veteran Doug Phibbs tied the game with a late try and Andy Gibson's convert accounted for the winning margin. Soccer Blues rounded out a winning weekend defeating tenacious McGill squad 2-1. Alas, the injury-riddled Western rugger team came a cropper against McMaster, losing 26-0 but still holding fast in second place.

Blues over McGill in finale 38-7

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Mike Raham said it and the results showed it. "It just seemed that we put everything together; our offense and defense were both great." That was the story Saturday afternoon as Varsity Blues stormed to an undefeated season by thrashing McGill Redmen 38-7 at Molson (chuckle) Stadium.

On the muddy morain before a ridiculously small crowd, Blues effortlessly churned to victory in a game of grind and toeses. Mike Raham did the grinding and Paul McKay's pedal extremity contained the illustrious "toeses."

Raham turned in an awesome performance, scoring all four Varsity touchdowns as "he came from nowhere" (as hockey announcer Shril Hewart would say) to win league scoring honours with 42 points. Last year Raham tied for the lead with Western's Dave Garland.

A bare point behind Raham was McKay who capped a tremendous season by waving his magic toe for 11 points, including two field goals to tie the SIFL's oldest record of seven placements in one season. Back in 1923, drop-kick specialist Pep Leadley sliced that number goals over the bar to set the standard which went unmatched till now.

McKay had a chance to break the old-timer's mark late in the game but a roughing penalty moved the ball too far back, and his attempt staggered just beneath the cross-bar.

Blues' defense was its usual superb self as they rigorously muddled McGill ball carriers with affable aplomb. In the second half, the munificent Redmen mustered minus nine yards rushing. Only a rather nifty shotgun formation made any headway at all against the rugged Varsity stop-squad. They even made the scoreboard as Mike Wright nailed embattled McGill quarterback George Wall deep in the end zone for a safety touch.

Varsity opened the scoring the first time they had the ball with Bob Amer directing his longest march of the season—80 yards. Raham applied the coup de grace from one yard out.

Less than a minute later, the redoubtable Raham rambled 95 yards for a touchdown on perfectly executed punt return. He made it on his own for 10 yards and then four lovely blocks sprung him for the six points.

In the second quarter, after a single by McKay and Wright's rouge, Raham upped the score to 23-0 on a wonderfully weaving 46 yd. run from scrimmage. The sloppy gridiron resembled a World War I battlefield as Raham crossed the line with McGill bodies littering the field—mute victims to the Varsity halfback's elusiveness.

Toronto's final points in the half came from Bill Stan-kovic's gigantic 80 yard kickoff for a single and McKay's 29 yard field goal.

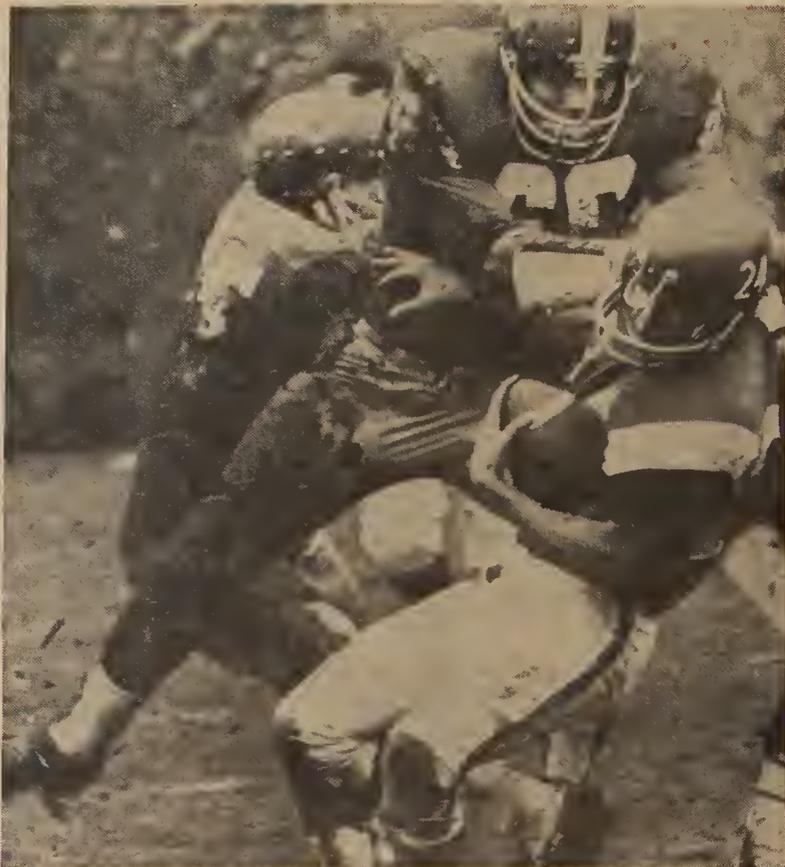

The third quarter contained only a single and the record-tying field goal by McKay. McGill averted shutout disgrace as some fine passing by Wall ended in a nine yard touchdown toss to veteran George Springate. Raham scored his fourth touchdown on a 19 yard dodgem burst and another McKay single completed the scoring.

The season ended fittingly with McKay making a great play on the goalline to bat away a prospective Redmen touchdown pass.

Sub McGill quarterback Steve Reid found his favourite receiver Riivo Ives once again as he completed his fourth pass of the season to the Varsity backfielder late in the fourth quarter.

Varsity halfback Mike Raham turns on the jets for one of his several fine runs against McGill. Raham had four touchdowns and piled up over 100 yards rushing.

Blues gigantic twosome Jim Kellom (66) and Arnie Carefoote (65) show the type of defensive play which highlighted Varsity's 38-7 win over McGill. Kellom hommers fleet-footed Redman Pete Bender (24) while Carefoote decks a would-be blocker.

Queens over Mustangs in rain 10-5 McMaster sports undefeated season

By PAUL HASTINGS

Queens Golden Gaels concluded the season on a winning note with a rain-drenched 10-5 victory over Western Saturday afternoon in London.

The game, played in a driving rainstorm, was featured by a succession of unusual fumbles and interceptions.

Ironically, the winning touchdown was a direct result of a Queens fumble.

In the fourth quarter with Western leading 5-4, Queen's attempted a field goal from the Mustang 25.

The snap went awry, but kicker Guy Potvin recovered the muddy ball and tossed a desperation pass.

The soft floater was snared by Queen's end Don McIntyre, who was pushed out of bounds on the Western seven.

Two plays later Heino Lilles bulled over for the winning marker.

Potvin and punter Jim McKeen each counted two singles for the other Queens points.

For the luckless Mustangs, Ottavio Colosimo contributed a field goal and Dennis Walker punted a 55-yard single.

Queens, which relied on fumble recoveries and an onside kick to set up its scoring, amassed 150 yards in total offense.

Mustang quarterbacks Bob Israel and Joe Cipparone completed 11 of 22 passes as Western piled up over 200 net yards on the greasy field.

In the Central Canada Conference, McMaster Marauders completed an undefeated and untied season by whitewashing last year's champs Waterloo Lutheran 18-0.

The surprising University of Ottawa Gee-Gees climbed into second place in the CIBC by edging Waterloo Warriors 15-7.

RMC took out its accumulated frustrations on hapless Loyola 53-0.

St. Francis Xavier swept to yet another undefeated season in the Bluenose Conference.

Bolstered by many American imports, the X-Men trampled St. Dunstons 53-10.

In other conference fixtures, University of New Brunswick edged Dalhousie 35-28 and Acadia topped St. Mary's 19-13.

McMaster travels to Halifax on Saturday to meet SFX in the Atlantic Bowl. The winner will receive a berth in the College Bowl, scheduled for Nov. 25 at Varsity Stadium.

Western representation in what is billed as the Canadian collegiate football championship game is the University of Alberta in Edmonton.

Alberta completed a 6-1 season in the Western Canada Conference with a resounding 29-0 battering of UBC Thunderbirds.

Harriers cop national title

The U of T harrier team won its third consecutive Canadian championship Saturday over the 5.7 mile course at the University of Alberta in Edmonton.

Varsity narrowly edged Alberta 27-36. New Brunswick was third with 90 points, and York (98) and RMC (129) rounded out the top five.

The Varsity victory was paced by Dave Bailey who took the individual title with a time of 29:03.

Other members of the Varsity champs are Brian Armstrong (29:28, third), Brian Richards (30:13, fourth), Dave Tong (31:07, eighth), and Bob Cairns (31:28, eleventh).

Chancellor defends plant on pollution charge

By MIKE KESTERTON

The chancellor of the University of Toronto says charges of a spread of fluorosis poisoning from a plant of a company of which he is an executive have been given "unduly sensational coverage."

Dr. O. M. Solandt, who is vice-chairman of the board of the Electric Reduction Co., was replying in an interview to allegations made concerning the firm's Dunnville plant.

"There has never been a case of fluorosis reported to have occurred from air pollution before," he said. "The diagnosis of fluorosis poisoning was made by Stanley Burke of the CBC."

Professing concern that farmers in the area may be suffering from the disease, Ontario Health Minister Matthew Dymond has ordered an investigation.

The government investigation now underway will seek to evaluate charges made by the CBC that some area farmers are suffering from the fluorosis disease.

Area farmers have complained that the three-man committee, headed by Dr. G. E. Hall, former president of the University of Western Ontario, will do a "white wash" job.

Dr. Hall is former honorary advisory director of the Health League, called "Canada's major fluoridation promotion agency" by Dr. George Waldbott, who first uncovered the suspected fluorosis cases.

Dr. Solandt conceded that $207,000 had been paid by Electric Reduction in compensation to county farmers for crop damage.

"In matters of air pollution control, two factors must be taken into account," he said. "The first, of course, is human safety. The second is economic feasibility."

These considerations have led Electric Reduction to cut down as much as possible on escaping fluorine gas, he said. The company has accepted that plants, more sensitive than humans to air pollution, will be affected and compensation will be paid.

"The problem of fluorine gas as a by-product is widespread," Dr. Solandt said, "not only in the fertilizer but also the aluminum industry."

Phosphate minerals, a component of fertilizers, contain fluorine, he said. Much of the fluorine is trapped and resold in commercially useful compounds.

"Several times in the past the government has demanded stricter control over pollution from the plant, and Electric Reduction has complied."

Faculty council seats for students approved by SMC

By TIM COLTON

The seating of students on the St. Michael's College faculty council was approved "in principle" Monday.

A purposefully vague resolution, which passed the council after several hours of lively debate and note-passing, reads:

"Be it resolved that this council accepts in principle that students be invited to meeting of the faculty council with the right to speak and to move motions."

The 120-member council, comprising all SMC faculty ranking at the lecturer level or higher, legislates on "professional" matters. Academic affairs are the domain of the college Senate.

St. Michael's would become the third college on campus to make the move, following Innis and Erindale.

The motion left undecided the more pragmatic aspects of seating students—how many students, who should choose them, should they be voting or auditory members?

These matters will be discussed at an open meeting of college students and faculty a week from today.

After this meeting, the 10-member SMC student-faculty committee will draft specific recommendations to be acted on at the faculty council meeting next month.

Several faculty council members said later that the fuzziness of the resolution was not due to hesitation at granting the students a voice but to uncertainty as to what kind of voice they wanted.

The student-faculty committee is itself the result of an effort three years to get a student representative on the council. At that time, the council rejected student membership and gave its blessing to the formation of the committee, which comprises five students and five faculty.

Student council President Donall Healy (IV SMC), hailed Monday's decision as "a pleasant surprise."

"The reaction was three to one in our favor at the meeting. It exemplifies the excellent student-faculty relations here."

"We needed no pressure tactics or threat of a strike to get what we wanted here."

Terrance O'Sullivan (III SMC), a student council member, commented:

"I think it's long overdue. We're just pleased that the faculty took the initiative themselves."

Engineers-York rivalry results in ridiculous roosters and red paint

By ANNE BOODY

A silent but violent paint and feathers war has been raging between University of Toronto engineers and York University.

T. D. Lawson, U of T's assistant chief of security, says it all started Oct. 28 when York held a dance. Engineers attended in full regalia, including hard hats.

The next morning, said Mr. Lawson, York authorities found a number of parking huts smeared with paint and most of the reserved parking signs had been stolen.

Some York students assumed that the engineers were the instigators of the deed.

A week later York let chickens out of a coop and several live squawking fowl were released in campus buildings.

"This was only the curtain raiser for the evening's events," said Lawson.

At midnight the same day, the university was again visited by vengeful York students. New College, the Gailbraith Building and parking huts were only a few of the buildings defaced with York propaganda.

The profanities were quickly cleaned up and the incident went unnoticed by most.

The same night construction fencing around the new medical building was defaced. But the engineers

Caput leaves Varsity issue to SAC

The supreme disciplinary body of the University of Toronto decided Monday not to take action itself against The Varsity for printing an allegedly obscene paragraph, and tossed the whole matter over to the Students' Administrative Council.

In a statement issued after the meeting, Caput strongly condemned The Varsity for printing the paragraph in its Nov. 8 issue. The paragraph describes an imaginary incident involving President Johnson and former president John F. Kennedy.

"The Caput wishes to express in the strongest possible terms its disgust and revulsion at the article," the statement said. "Caput believes this disgust is widely shared by members of the University and by the community at large."

"Responsibility for The Varsity rests primarily and initially with the Students' Administrative Council, and means exist through which the authority of the SAC may be made effective."

"In this connection the Caput has been informed by the president of the SAC that the Council intends to consider this matter at their meeting on the 15th of November."

"Member of the staff of The Varsity are also responsible in law for what is printed in the newspaper," the statement continued.

"It is not the intention of Caput to institute legal proceedings nor, on the other hand, to intervene in any way to protect the members of the staff of The Varsity from any legal liability they may have."

McGill student committee listens as both sides argue in Daily dispute

MONTREAL (CUP)—A seven-man student judicial committee heard testimony Monday from both sides in the McGill Daily dispute.

The charge against editor Peter Allnutt is that he "acted in bad faith" in publishing an extract from The Realist, a U.S. magazine.

Late yesterday the judges, all law students, were in conference. No final decision had yet been announced.

At the trial, Allnutt said that several days prior to publication he had voiced no strong objection to the article.

When the paper came out Friday, Nov. 3, he said he "began to read the column—skimmed through it—and right away it hit me that it shouldn't have been run."

"I made an error of judgment," he said.

He said that he had not read the article when it originally appeared in The Realist and that he was not aware of the reaction to it.

Meanwhile, the McGill Senate reversed a previous decision and decided to hold its hearings into the affair in closed session.

Editor Allnutt, supplement editor Pierre Fournier and columnist John Fekete were told to appear before the committee on charges of "obscene libel."

The charges were later altered to "breaking the standard of decency at McGill."

Allnutt and Fournier will be allowed to bring two observers each to future meetings to insure a fair hearing of the case.

New creates staff-student liason

New College has formed a student-staff committee to act as a liaison group between students' council and staff council.

The committee was created late last month and surprises New College Principal D. G. Ivey; Dr. E. W. Domville and Dr. O. J. Miller, two members of the staff; students council President Pat Armstrong (III NEW); SAC representative D'Arcy Martin (III NEW); and Brian Schnurr (II NEW), council treasurer.

At present the committee is discussing the possibility of having students on the faculty council. This proposal would be submitted to both student and staff-councils for approval.

Another topic under discussion is the practicability of the multi-faculty system and how well it is working at New.

"It's a sort of thinkers conference," says Armstrong. "It is a forum — an opportunity — to get something done peacefully."

Rotary starts undergrad scholarships

The Rotary Foundation is celebrating its 50th anniversary by inaugurating a program of undergraduate scholarships to promote international understanding.

The 50 scholarships are tenable for a year of undergraduate study in a foreign university, beginning in the academic year 1968-1969.

Applicants must have completed two years of undergraduate work and be in the upper quarter of their class. They must be between 18 and 24 years of age as of July 1, 1968, and single.

The scholarships will cover transportation, tuition, living and incidental expenses for the 50 students chosen from across the world each year.

Scholarship winners will have an opportunity to study the culture of the country they are visiting and speak to local Rotary groups.

In addition, Rotary will continue its program of graduate fellowships, technical training assistance and group study exchanges.

The deadline for scholarship applications to local Rotary clubs is today.

Catalyst Krassner says obscenity lies in the mind of the beholder

MONTREAL (CUP)—Obscenity was the topic and Paul Krassner the speaker.

Krassner, editor of The Realist, a U.S. satirical revue was in Montreal Monday to speak to students at Sir George Williams and McGill universities.

Speaking of recent events at McGill, Krassner said: "I am honored I could be a catalyst to this kind of community."

He said the role of his magazine and of media in general is "to communicate and entertain without compromise."

He did not feel his fictitious article on the events following President Ken-edy's death was in any way obscene.

"The only obscenity is coercion. Bad taste is a risk of democracy, whether in newsprint or in the White House."

"An act of free human beings is to read and accept or reject voluntarily. People have a right to go to hell in their own way."

When questioned about the sincerity of his article, Krassner said he was not concerned about crudeness as such, but rather the context in which it was presented. He was concerned with "the megalomania of Lyndon Johnson."

One student suggested he be respectful of the dead, specifically of Mr. Kennedy. Krassner replied: "I have great respect for the living, and that's what this article is all about."

Earlier in the day Krassner told 800 Sir George Williams students: "Censorship is silly, censorship is obscene."

"It violates all concepts of education which is supposedly to teach students to think for themselves."

"There is no objective standard for obscenity. Obscenity lies in the mind of the beholder."

Krassner received a standing ovation at the end of the Sir George meeting.

We could have told you in this space that Varsity columnist Ampersand found he got some "real dogs" in computer dating. Or we could have said he's being dozzled by Brydson's smile. Or again, we could have tricked you into believing he was a spartsie (it was too believable). But all we wanted to do was get a picture on this page, and now we've done it. Cioo.

Mock trial tumbles into name-calling

The mock trial yesterday of the Students Administrative Council for abelishing the Blue and White Society degenerated into a name-calling session.

SAC President Tom Faulkner said he wouldn't endure a $3,000 loss "to prove I'm a nice guy and have faith" and to cater to a minority of students.

But Ray Carnovale (IV APSC), the chairman of the festivals committee of the now defunct society objected:

"Why did you endure a $3,000 loss last year for a smaller minority—Radio Varsity?" Marty Lowe (I Law), the chairman of the Band W, said, "SAC has put us in one hell of a position last year.

"SAC are up the creek if they want any kind of social activity. It bombs without us."

When asked after the meeting if the discussion had any value, Faulkner replied a flat "no."

Skulemen smear Snoopy on Meds boards

gave themselves away. Their Blind Dog sign (Snoopy with a blindfold) was smeared on the boards.

The following Monday, York students were on the receiving end. The Bust of Robert Winters, in Robert Winters College, was painted a shocking red. The sidewalks and the main entrance to the university were also battle-scarred with slogans ranging from Yea Skule to Down with Pork University.

In an effort to save face, York students again returned to U of T armed with their trusty paint tins.

"Dear Skulemen," their decree read. "This is in retribution for your vandalism at York University. This evens our score — and let this be the end of the malicious and purposeless destruction of property. In this case two wrongs make a right."

It was signed "two patriotic York men."

"The bird episode was a lark," said Mr. Lawson, "but the painting was a little ridiculous. They could have at least been gentlemanly in their slogans like the Queens students."

Costs for cleaning up the mess totalled about $1,000.

But it appears that the rivalry has not died.

Yesterday two roosters were let loose in a second-year Political Science class at the Sidney Smith Building.

U of T debaters triumph

OTTAWA (VNS)—Teams from the University of Toronto dominated the annual St. Patrick's College international debating tournament last weekend.

A University of Toronto Debating Union team of Alan Rubia (III UC) and Ron Veale (I Law) swept undefeated through the 17-team competition to capture first place in the overall standings.

Mary Pat Whalen (III SMC) and Chester Grysk (III SMC), of the St. Michael's Senate Club took second place, losing to Rubia and Veale in the all-Toronto finals.

Miss Whalen gained the judges' nod as best speaker of the tournament.

UGEQ, COMFU, SDU — their role in the McGill controversy

Human nature being what it is, it is of course natural that the alleged obscenity issue would overshadow everything else in the recent student-administration confrontation at McGill University. But the political climate that produced the crisis and the political aftermath are far more important and should be studied carefully.

Unfortunately at this point, the more you study the crisis, the more questions are raised and the harder the obvious questions are to answer. What, for instance, was UGEQ's involvement in all the fuss? What about the SDU (Students for a Democratic University) and its counterpart at Sir George Williams University, The Committee for a Free University? The SDU, which has 50 members, is about two years old, while COMFU was formed this summer. COMFU is strong and militant despite its short existence, having played a major part in the successful student-faculty strike at Sir George two weeks ago.

UGEQ, L'Union des Etudiants du Quebec, is the Quebec counterpart of the Canadian Union of Students, but far more radical than CUS. UGEQ was formed in the fall of 1964 after several universities pulled out of CUS protesting its service (and not action) orientation.

As you might expect, UGEQ soon found it had to cope with the stresses acting against its strong syndicalist policies, based on the philosophy of students as a distinct social class of intellectual workers. By the spring of this year, radicals were accusing UGEQ of selling out its principles to widen its power base among students.

UGEQ has been accused of becoming depoliticized, too business-union oriented, too compromising and even of playing co-operation games with the Quebec government. The radicals' solution is for UGEQ to return to the classic revolutionary model of the small organization of tough militants drawing students into its affairs by organizing its operations.

At present UGEQ is said to have scattered its effectiveness through a regionalization policy adopted in November, 1965. Evidently organization through regional groups has not worked — only three of the 13 regions actually exist.

McGill and Sir George universities in Montreal are central to UGEQ's aims. To bargain strongly with the Quebec government it has to have all Quebec universities within its membership. In fact the previous education minister, Paul Gerin-Lajoie, flatly told UGEQ's leaders he wouldn't talk with them until McGill and Sir George joined.

McGill went through long hard struggles fighting the English-Montreal conservatism of many of its students before it could join. Sir George will take a referendum on the issue Nov. 29 and 30. That makes it clear why UGEQ supported the Sir George strike morally and financially.

In the present McGill fuss, UGEQ has again been in close touch, participating in strategy meetings with the Students for a Democratic University and other activists involved in last week's demonstrations. UGEQ's vice-president Victor Rabinovitch has said the various groups should keep in contact throughout.

That's after the McGill Daily touched off the fuss with its publication of the Realist article. UGEQ involvement before that is in doubt, of course. It is known that John Fekete, who reprinted the article in his column in The Daily, has very close contact with the more radical members of UGEQ as well as with SDU and other groups.

But that's not to suggest that he reprinted the article just to cause the student-administration confrontation, even though there is much evidence pointing to that conclusion.

Fekete's column was tending towards the extremity of that article anyway, both in its tone, its words and its suggestions. In the right conditions, his earlier articles could have touched off the fuss too.

The McGill students' society has told The Daily to fire Fekete, leading one to believe that the society may believe he did it all deliberately. At last report The Daily had not fired him, but had in fact taken him on staff. He merely wrote a column before the controversy.

Less ambiguous are the actions of the SDU in reprinting the Realist article after The Daily had come into trouble over it. But that's a full story in itself; one we'll tell Friday.

LETTERS

obscenity must be printed

Sir:

Phil Givens (or Larry Solway) says you are children who should have your noses wiped. Larry Solway (or Phil Givens) says, with reason, that what you published was not so much an obscenity as a disgusting comment. But he goes on to say that he had the paragraph read to him, and if he repeated it on the radio, CHUM would likely lose its license.

In describing the comment as such, surely he only whetted his listeners' curiosity. Surely the Toronto dailies, in reporting the incident and referring to the strength of the words, have done the same thing for their readers. How many newspaper readers in Toronto are now wishing they could get a hold of a Realist, a McGill Daily or a Varsity just to see what the hell the fuss is about? Solway (or Givens) at least went to the trouble of listening to the paragraph on the telephone. (Did it suddenly turn up on the other end of the line, or did he have to go looking for it before he could tell his listeners that he couldn't tell them what he heard?) Dr. Paul Hoch, as reported in the Star, has a point when he says (in a surprisingly undergraduate way) that "this whole phony controversy is just a tempest in a teapot."

But I can't agree with his contention that the fuss is over "the publication of a certain supposed, obscene four-letter word." The fuss is over the concept — we may be coming accustomed to seeing fuck and shit in print (for some reason or other) daily excusable in a university publication) but necrophilia bears down on the line. Straight sex in print is fine ("Well everybody does it . . . Don't they?") but it's all those Awful Deviations. ("Nobody I know") But most important in this case is the characters. If it had been Myrtle talking about her husband Fred and some upstart Harvey, it would have passed. It would have been called "senseless," perhaps "appalling," and, if the papers had made an issue of it, "irresponsible journalism on the part of the Varsity." Which (of course) "is setting standards" for every person who reads the 16,000 copies (20,000—Ed.).

But it was more — it played around with the Western world's royal family. Made light (in theory, my — crudest fashion possible, we might add) of the poor widow who couldn't do anything wrong unless she ran off with Eddie Fisher. Even that Esquire cover was deemed daring, and therefore became the talk of all the right people.

All that is NOT enough to cause condemnation of your publication of the paragraph in question. In a sense, it's the very reason for your publishing it. I should think the basic consideration facing an editor, as he considers how to handle a report of the happenings at McGill, is whether the very violence of the paragraph should convince him to leave it out of his story. In which case he would be bound to convey to his readers, somehow, that the subject of the fuss is one of the most violent combinations of 115 words that could be put together in November, 1967. Which is exactly the reason for printing it and saying, in effect: "This is what the fuss is about." The editor may wonder why the paragraph exists in the first place; why the Realist felt in necessary to "parody" Manchester in such a way. And he may wonder why the McGill Daily felt it necessary to reprint it (and in a box, bird-faced, so I hear).

But these things had happened. As a result students were sitting in at McGill's administrative offices. That is a news story which no university newspaper in Canada could afford to ignore. And how, how, how could that story be told without including the whole reason for what is happening? Should one really have to reduce that reason, as did the Star, to "a passage . . . describing an imaginary necrophiliac incident involving President Johnson and the body of President Kennedy, following his assassination?"

You people are fond of using the word "hypocrisy" in your defence. Rather an over-worked word; surely avoiding hypocrisy was only a part of your motive for publishing, but it was a part. When Kenneth Tynan said "fuck" on BBC, I was working for a news agency in London. There was a fuss, fanned by "tempest in a teapot" statements, a fuss with repercussions in Parliament, etc. It was a good news story, of course, and we used it, referring to a "common four-letter word." (Which common four-letter word? said readers in Toledo, Bangkok, Manila, Delhi, Naples, Flin Flon.) Somebody suggested, seriously, calling it a "four-letter word beginning with P." So others wanted to call it "a four-letter word beginning with F and ending with K, with a U and a C in it somewhere." And a parrot called somebody a "bitch" so it became a "five-letter, four-letter" word.

When a man is taken to court for shouting obscenities at a policeman, the cop doesn't testify that the defendant "maintained that I was an illegitimate child having sexual relations with my mother, at the same time placing my mouth on the reproductive organs of a man." The magistrate asks the cop what the man said, the cop repeats the man's words, and the man is sentenced. And the court reporters write, and the papers print, that the man was fined so much on such and such a charge "because he shouted obscenities at a policeman." The court section of a newspaper exists, supposedly, so that readers can know what is happening in the courts — what a convicted man DID to deserve the punishment he was awarded. If the event of a man being fined for shouting obscenities at a policeman is worth reporting, then so is what he said.

If the event of a university newspaper facing disciplinary action for printing 115 words is worth repeating, then so are the 115 words.

obscene or essential: more campus comment

an irrelevant issue

Sir:

The annual administration-student brouhaha is upon us early this year. As usual, the issue involves the last area in which anyone would expect the two parties to quarrel. It was universally agreed that this year's Varsity staff was as professional and competent as any ever assembled; and the administration seemed favourable to the idea of incorporating the paper according to the provisions of the Shepherd report.

The issue chosen is, as usual, irrelevant and the arguments are absurd. In fact, I would not even comment on it if we were not faced with a dangerous precedent that the Varsity may be punished by Caput for actions for which it likely will not be charged in court under the law of the land.

In fact, it is a good thing that charges have not been laid. If they had been, several members of the administration might have been in some trouble for commenting on a sub-judice issue. At least two prominent members of the administration have stated flatly that the item published by the Varsity was an obscene libel. This, gentlemen, is a legal issue, and has not been established in court. The worst charge that could be laid against the Varsity staff is that of disseminating a libel, for the item did not originate with this paper. Since the item appeared in a news story, the penalty involved would likely be light. In any case, it would have to be established that this is a libel; to do this, one of the parties involved would have to file suit.

Under the circumstances this seems quite unlikely, so we will never know whether or not this was, legally, a libel. As for obscenity, the head of the police morality squad said in Saturday's Globe that he doubted if The Varsity could be successfully prosecuted under the existing obscenity laws. Yet the members of the administration referred to above continue merrily to treat the issue as if it had been decided already, and make statements to the public press that The Varsity is guilty of publishing an obscene libel. Of course, the public, not knowing the nature of the article, can be led to a false conclusion.

In fact, this is the whole issue. A reader of the Star or of the Globe simply does not know what is going on—these papers refuse to print the story in question. Yet the Varsity, for performing for its readers the service of giving all the news, is on the carpet. When I read the news story about the disturbances at McGill, I, as I imagine most students, was curious as to what could spark such a furore. Having read the excerpt, I knew. I thought the section of the Realist article quoted disgusting, but I am a big boy now, and I would rather know all the facts of a story than be shielded from the cruel world by a smothering, censoring press. The people of Toronto, not knowing what the fuss is about, must be extremely mystified.

Thus we come to the threatened Caput action. I find the behaviour of a certain member of the Board of Governors puzzling in the extreme. If he was so disgusted, why did he not lay charges under the law against The Varsity? If, on the other hand, he wanted to keep the whole thing in the university, why did he see to it that the issue was widely covered on press, radio, and television? Caput is a lot of things, but it should not be a kangaroo court punishing offenses, which, as I have pointed out, will probably never be brought up in court. The secrecy and "closed doors" approach of Caput is strangely incongruous with the publicity the issue has already received at the instigation of the administration. What gives?

Press has mishandled obscenity case

Sir:

Canada's latest alarm about obscenity has a new twist. Unlike the Dorothy Cameron case no one is arguing the artistic merit or 'redeeming social importance' of Paul Krassner's necrophilic fantasy. Henry Borden can be complimented on his literary judgment if not on his tactics. . . . Disgusting . . . completely disgusting . . . was the worthy governor's reaction to excerpts from Krassner's 'satire' (?) which appeared in last Wednesday's Varsity.

Obscenity is like Vietnam. Wise and gentle people say such silly things about both. The Globe and Mail editorial on the McGill Daily-Varsity controversy is a case in point. In their solemn and carpeted eyrie overlooking King Street, the editors somehow decided that the action of the McGill and U of T newsmen called into question the right of students to take part in university government. Because student editors have acted irresponsibly, the Globe editorial argued, the right of students to participate in university government is a 'hoax and a sham'. Editorial irresponsibility and 'student democracy' should not even remotely be connected in this controversy.

The McGill student leaders are as intellectually sloppy as The Globe. The leaders were reported as saying that the issue has "developed into a wider question of whether students have the right to administer their own affairs." For God's sake keep the student participation in university government and the obscenity issues apart. Flogging one to achieve the other ends up in emotionalizing both and winning neither. If the university administration hadn't intervened the Montreal police would have.

The issue is obscenity, not administrative tyranny, and the action of both McGill and U of T administration should be judged on the issue of whether it is wise to suppress obscenity rather than on the issue of whether it is wise for the administration to intervene.

To their credit, those responsible for the Wednesday piece in The Varsity didn't defend themselves by attacking the administration or by saying they wanted to agitate the issue of free speech. The Varsity editors pointed to the heart of the U of T controversy: How can one accurately report an obscenity controversy with-

I hope this petty issue, which shocked few on campus, which has attracted no letters to the editors of any Toronto papers, and which has already been publicized far more than it deserves (through no fault of the editors of The Varsity) will not affect the worthwhile project of implementing the Shepherd report. And if students are to stage a mass protest over the arbitrary actions of the university administration, I hope that the issue will not have to be one as squalid and juvenile as this.

Caput, which should have let the matter drop, has made the right decision in turning the case over to SAC. However, again it has prejudiced the issue by handing it on in such a way as to imply that the SAC should punish the "wrongdoers."

Mr. Sword is quoted in Tuesday's Globe as saying that "means exist through which the authority of the council may be made effective." The Globe reporter took this as "a veiled hint that the council should at the very least, censure (the Varsity editor . . . and general manager . . ." Further, though Sword refused to say whether the Caput would take any action if SAC failed to do so, he did not think his colleagues would "withdraw from the matter completely."

This approach is really holding a gun to SAC's head. They are simply put in the position of doing Caput's dirty work, since, if they refuse to punish the members of the Varsity staff, Caput reserves the right to do so. SAC is in a dilemma. Do they censure the editor and general manager, even if they think they have not done anything wrong, in order to avoid Caput action? Would this be "taking the responsibility as publisher of The Varsity?"

Caput cannot have it both ways. It must either turn the whole issue over to Council, or act itself. Moreover, it is taking on itself (or SAC) powers which rightfully belong to the courts and legal system. When do the Varsity staffers get their say, or are they merely shuffled into the background in an "after-you-Alphonse" routine of passing back and forth the "duty" of punishing them? If SAC is really responsible, it will resist all such pressures. It will recognize that this issue was created and publicized by certain members of the administration, and that these people should either finish what they started or let the matter drop.

In any case, that is what SAC should do. Let it drop.

shouldn't attack johnson

Sir:

I agree with Harvey L. Shepherd that this society is beginning to become a little depraved, but for a different reason. The reason is that people like the editors of The Realist can actually develop the gall to abuse the freedom of the press with such an attack on the man most responsible for any freedom remaining in Southeast Asia today in the face of continued communist aggression. If the U.S. had pulled out of South Vietnam when it appeared that U.S. troops would have to do more than just advise, the whole region would now be under communist control after bitter fighting. And now, when a fledgling democracy in South Vietnam cries out for help in the face of communist aggression, one publication tries to say "NO" with gross pornography aimed at the leader of the society trying to give aid. Yes, when a society begins to think that maybe freedom isn't as important as peace, it is beginning to become a little depraved.

Roderick A. L. Ross, (II APSC)

(Ed. note: Pornography (f. as prec. + -Y.) Description of the life, manners, etc. of prostitutes and their out citing the work considered obscene? As The Varsity realized, the situation at McGill is meaningless unless you have read the passage which started it all. Only by reading the quotation do you understand why administration and students feel so bitterly and act so violently. Could you understand why McGill was in arms from the Globe report on the situation? The Globe said: "The trouble at McGill started last Friday when the Daily reprinted an article from The Realist, which give a fictitious and highly sexual account of events that allegedly took place after the assassination of U.S. President Kennedy in Dallas."

If the interests of accurate, meaningful journalism were served by the insertion of the Krassner quote, did The Varsity have the right to use the quote? The question of right hinges on motive. Being a student editor can be depressing. As Parkins mused, "People just don't react to The Varsity . . ." The temptation to create big-time controversy is great. Because of the reasonable, even quiet explanation of the editors it is possible that they acted in the interests of accurate journalism rather than in the interests of sensationalism.

Assuming that The Varsity editors' motives were decent, was their action right?

Evil exists. Men such as Krassner do and say dirty things. But should we be protected from evil? Perhaps more dangerous than Krassner's obscenities is our capacity to anaesthetize ourselves to unpleasantness. The Krassner quote reminded many of the evil we intellectually accept but don't do anything about. It shocked many out of subconscious assumptions about the goodness of 'les plain folks' and exposed for a sheltered university community the really fearful bitterness which rages beneath the placid, enervated exterior of our society. And by exposure to this evil and obscenity, we may be moved to act, to help those who commit evil, and those who suffer from evil. But will we DO anything about the wickedness in us all by not permitting anyone to mention it in polite university society? I share Henry Borden and Dean Allen's horrified reaction to evil. But do we combat evil by punishing those who have brought it to our attention?

a case of banality

Sir:

I feel the ineluctable need to indite my humble opinion on your dubious action of reprinting a section of Mr. Krassner's verbal offal.

It is a fact that Mr. Krassner's beligerent views are in antipathy to those of the Johnson Administration. To express his venal incompatibility in an article which can logically only be designated as lewd carrion is his American constitutional right.

However, for the McGill Daily to print it is utterly unjustifiable on any grounds be they journalistic, informative or otherwise. And for The Varsity to follow suit under the preposterous pretext of reporting news is beyond all liberal-minded cognition.

Unfortunately, this just verifies that at least two University newspapers will go to the most absurd and banal lengths to show their homologous disapprobation of present American political men and policy.

monsters thankful

Sir:

On behalf of the monsters on campus, may I say that I enjoyed the offensive passage very much.

Mike Kersterson, Varsity reporter

must look at entire story

Sir:

The people who have written letters to The Varsity are, I think, not taking the whole story as it should be taken. My conclusion from the letters printed is that they don't care about the whole article of Nov. 8, only about "that paragraph".

The paragraph was not written (to my knowledge) to "offend the dignity of those who inadvertently read what you say" (G. K. Harrison—III Vic). It was written, as a paper should be written, to tell the students and subscribers of what is happening at McGill.

I do not think it is "low brow quality" (Anne Boody—Varsity reporter) nor was it "rash, unfortunate, and in decidedly poor taste," nor was it meant to "stir up publicity for The Varsity" (Ian Harrison—Varsity Features editor).

I myself am behind The Varsity all the way, but not so much the ones who seem to be backing down when the going gets rough. If these people are such good reporters then they should not get their backs up, but they should face the facts and try to better the paper, not help people drag it down. If The Varsity backs down, the people who have read the articles printed in many newspapers, will get on their backs and stay on to make things miserable for Mr. Parkins and Mr. Richter.

The way I look at it is that any person who has lived in this up and coming society for any length of time, should not react to that paragraph. They should not be afraid to hear, see or read about such an act because there are hordes of films and books with more obscene sections in them than this. If these people do react to this paragraph to any large extreme (sic), then I think that they should face life, grow up and mature an awful lot more than they think they are now (sic).

If so many people's thoughts are swayed by this paragraph and public opinion then I feel sorry for them.

never any justification

Sir:

As a student of this university, I feel compelled to comment on the justification of The Varsity staff for reprinting an excerpt from the McGill Daily which appeared in The Varsity on November 8th.

The point is this: there was, is and never will be any justification for it. By reprinting such an obscene, sick and perverted article, you have shown no more court or decorum than have the McGill editors.

In Friday's edition of The Varsity Volkmar Richter, editor, was quoted as stating his justification as such: "to inform the campus of what the problem at McGill was" and that "Paraphrasing would have meant nothing."

As a University of Toronto student, I am completely uninterested in the McGill Daily, as such, and the trouble they can muster by printing such matter. It is not important that I be informed of their "business", and if the article had never appeared, I likely would not have suffered any repercussions. How can it interest students when it makes you sick to even read it. I am "older than children and younger than squeamish adults," but I have not, I hope, lost my sense of balance.

Many times I have read letters from people who have been disillusioned and dissatisfied with The Varsity. Now, I feel, I must join their ranks. I would rather the pages were blank or the pages dissolved than filled with such sickness. Are you that hard up for articles?

A Political Prisoner in Rwanda, Central Africa

You live in Canada. If you want to protest and march down Yonge Street and call Mike Pearson a bastard, the police keep the traffic out of your way. Luis Maria Sanavria lives in Venezuela. He is a doctor. He is probably a Marxist, though he is not an advocate of violence.

One day two years ago Sanavria was stopped on the highway by a squad of police armed with machine guns. They handcuffed him. They insulted him. They beat him. They took him to police headquarters. There they bung him by his handcuffs for seven hours over a bath tub and beat him again.

Treatment: The Carpet of Truth

Then they took Sanavria to the prison for guerrillas in Cachipo, and began the treatment known as "The Carpet of Truth." First he was threatened with death by starvation and reprisals against his family. Then he was kept seated on a block for two days, a light bulb constantly beside his head. Next Sanavria was tied to the floor and tortured for several hours by three prison guards.

One hit him with a blackjack, another with a heavy plaster cast. All three kicked him. He lost consciousness twice. They finished the "treatment" with a series of electric shocks. Sanavria was then dragged to a cell where he was left for three weeks in solitary confinement, with two broken ribs and assorted internal injuries.

At the same time, Sanavria's house was taken over by the police, and his wife was spirited away to a prison. Two young children were left uncared for.

This took place two years ago. Dr. Sanavria is still in a prison hospital, recovering from that beating. The Venezuelan regime, considered by Western observers to be liberal and moderate, has not yet decided to bring him to trial.

Sanavria has been accused of the crime of "military rebellion," though it is doubtful that he knows of the charge. This makes him liable to be tried by a military tribunal, though he is not a soldier.

It is a sad commentary on governments and their humanity that the case of Dr. Sanavria is not a rare and isolated incident. Few governments are hesitant about using their monopoly on legal violence to silence dissent.

The numbers of men abused, locked away, or killed for their beliefs is large, but statistics have little meaning. Yet the plight of one man, the plight of a Doctor Sanavria, evokes a response from Ken Golby, a 27-year-old Spanish lecturer at York University.

Golby has never suffered injustices like these. He has never seen Luis Maria Sanavria. The letter describing the doctor's treatment at the hands of the police is the only communication Golby has received from him.

Yet Golby writes letters to Sanavria and his wife. And he writes letters to the Venezuelan Justice Department in the hope that the doctor will be released or at least have the conditions of his detention improved.

Golby is president of the Toronto branch of Amnesty International, an organization founded six years ago for the purpose of co-ordinating aid to "prisoners of conscience," men and women who, like Dr. Sanavria, have been persecuted for their political or religious beliefs. The organization was started by Peter Benenson, an English barrister, after he read of two Portuguese students who had been sentenced to eight years in prison for drinking to freedom in a tavern.

Now Amnesty has more than 10,000 members in 23 countries, and is helping prisoners in 60 nations. It is not concerned with figures, however, but with individuals.

Dr. Sanavria Evokes a Response

Often prisoners are assigned to particular groups for tactical reasons. Canadian groups frequently are given Chinese prisoners to work for, because the memory of Canadian Dr. Norman Bethune evokes warm response in China. And the French group working for Yuli Daniel contains several communists, in order to obtain greater leverage in dealing with the Russian authorities.

The ten members of the Toronto branch of Amnesty have been working for the release of other prisoners besides Dr. Sanavria. Spyros Kotsakis, a Greek leftist, was released just before the latest army coup after pressure was exerted by the Toronto group.

Mrs. Savan, however, has tried in vain for two years to obtain the release of Father Bonney, a French Catholic priest in Burma. She has received not even an acknowledgement of her letters. Father Bonney was arrested for giving food and shelter to an army deserter, apparently for purely humanitarian reasons.

"Burma has few outside contacts and doesn't seem to care about world opinion," said Mrs. Savan.

She has also been working on behalf of a Hungarian priest who has been in jail for two years for practising his religion. That has been an illegal act in Hungary since 1950.

Some Countries More Brutal than Most

While there are Amnesty prisoners just about every- where in the world, (Canada, Britain, Australia and Scan- dinavia, where the organization is the strongest, are ex- ceptions) the governments of some countries exhibit an intolerance more widespread and brutal than most.

In Portugal, for example, political prisoners can be sent at the whim of the Minister of Justice to a prison on the Cape Verde Islands, where conditions are so abomin- able that the Americans forced it to be closed for a time just after the second world war.

According to Golby, prisoners there are beaten daily. They are given only bread and coffee and allowed to urinate only once a day. Last year, the Portuguese com- munity in Toronto joined other such groups all over the world in holding a rally to protest such political perse- cution.

For people who cannot spare the one or two hours a week for the regular Amnesty program, there is a "Post- cards for Prisoners" campaign, of which Mrs. Savan is a member.

"Each month three hard-pressed prisoners are chosen and the officials concerned are deluged with a few thou- sand Amnesty postcards from all over the world, plead- ing for release," she said. "Not surprisingly, a great many have immediately been set free."

Prisoner of the Year

In addition, a "Prisoner of the Year" is chosen every year. Every member in the entire Amnesty organization writes to the authorities asking for leniency. The first four such prisoners were immediately released.

However, last year's prisoner, a Guinean teacher sen- tenced to ten years of solitary confinement for writing to the Minister of Education to complain about tight educa- tional restrictions, was not released and has been re-des- ignated Prisoner of the Year for 1967.

Notwithstanding such large-scale campaigns, Amnes- ty is still a matter of individuals helping individuals.

"You get a warm feeling about establishing contact and helping another person," said Golby.

"I suppose it's ego-building, but at least now Dr. San- avria knows that somewhere somebody cares."

Ken Golby: "at least somebody cares"

A Man Determines His Own Progress In P & G Brand Management

P&G hires college graduates with an interest in Marketing and the ability and drive to assume substantial management responsibility right away . . . puts them in a unique atmosphere that encourages rapid personal growth . . . gives plenty of responsibility and the opportunity to demonstrate and development skills . . . lets them learn by doing — on the job . . . promotes only on performance.

RESPONSIBILITY — RIGHT AWAY!

At P&G, the responsibility for the consumer marketing of each product is lodged with a Brand Manager, who leads a three-man group.

As soon as you are hired, you become a member of one of these groups and immediately take responsibility for a major part of your brand's marketing effort. You may actually know very little about your first project at the start, but by the time you do it yourself, you will have demonstrated your ability and gained in knowledge at the same time. You will also have accelerated your personal development toward a successful career in brand management.

LET'S TAKE AN EXAMPLE . . .

Let's assume you join the Company after your graduation in June. Your first assignment may be to recommend a complete national promotion for your brand! In many companies, a project of this importance would be reserved for an experienced Marketing Manager; at P&G it is a means of giving you experience quickly. Your Brand Manager will suggest a pattern of attack on the problem. Then, you're on your own. Of course, help is available as often as you ask for it, but the project is yours . . . all yours. You begin by asking such questions as; What kind of special promotion should yours be? . . . a premium offer, a special price offer, a price-off, coupon, a product sample, or what? What would be the best, and why? You'll find that you need to gather facts, advice, and opinions from others. You may talk to other brand groups who have had experience in various kinds of promotions. You'll want to ask your advertising agency for their recommendation. You'll want to talk to the Promotion specialists in the Company, and get their thinking. Will a special package be needed? If so, you'll need to work with the Art & Package Design people and Manufacturing. Will the promotion be effective for the Sales Department? — talk to them.

Out of all this probing, planning and expert opinion, one man must come up with a final definite recommendation: You. You must sell it to your Brand Manager and make it work — in the market place.

THE OPPORTUNITY TO GROW

Projects like this, and others, are all opportunities to grow.

You will assume increasing levels of responsibility just as fast as your performance demonstrates that you can handle them. Your Brand Manager will be watching your progress closely, just as anxious as you are that you go forward as fast as you can.

After showing early progress you will spend some time in the field as a P&G salesman. Your marketing work will be closely bound up with the Sales effort so it is necessary to understand the Sales organization and how it functions. Following this, you will return as an Assistant Brand Manager, and will be assigned to another brand in order to broaden your experience.

HOW LONG DOES IT TAKE TO BECOME A BRAND MANAGER?

Individual skills and performances vary, so the rate of your development is up to you. To reach full Brand Manager status will take about three years.

Mr. R. A. Moore,
The Procter & Gamble Company of Canada Ltd.,
Box 355, Terminal A,
Toronto, Ontario.

I will receive my . . . . . degree

(Month, year)
about brand work of Procter & Gamble.

Ryerson expansion planners may move Victoria street

Moving Victoria Street 20 feet east may be the answer to problems that have stalled Ryerson's $27,000,000 expansion project.

Director of planning George Wildish announced the big move last weekend. It is expected that completion of the project will be delayed at least a year, forcing cutbacks in plans for expanded enrollment for 1969.

Original plans called for the tower on the corner of Gould and Victoria to overhang on Victoria Street. At that time administration officials were assured that the street would be closed.

The city council now claims sewer and hydro lines present problems that make it impossible to close the street.

J. D. Near, the director of engineering for the city, explained moving of the street will require relocation of the pavement at a cost to the school of $15 a square yard for new pavement alone, passing of a by-law allowing the street to be moved, purchase and exchange of land with the city and a winter delay until April.

The first step is passing in principle by city council, which will take at least two months.

Ryerson's expansion now will not be complete by the fall of 1969 and will cost much more than the expected $27,000,000.

Administration spokesmen said that despite the setbacks, every effort will be made to provide for more students next fall. Pre-fab units may be brought in to handle the overflow.

Four students may sit on York senate

York University students may get four representatives on their academic senate.

The York Senate has endorsed a motion from Glendon College Principal Escott Reid to give direct student representation on the 80-man Senate. A senate committee recommendation for a non-student rector sitting for students was rejected.

Senate committee Chairman Professor John Yolton opposed Reid's proposal as "not worthwhile."

"Eighty per cent of the problems discussed in the Senate will be of little or no significance to the students," he said.

Commenting on the senate decision, York Vice-President J. M. Gillies said:

"The educational procedure is so involved you need the advice of everyone concerned. The question is whether or not student membership will improve the educational process."

The senate committee is to report this month on the number of students to be seated on the senate.

Dow napalm protest bombs out at UWO

LONDON, Ont. (VNS)—A protest against the Dow Chemical Company, manufacturers of napalm, bombed out last week.

Only 10 demonstrators turned up to protest Dow recruiting interviews on the Western campus. The demonstration had no effect as Dow finished its interviews and left.

The protest organized at short notice by the UWO Committee to End the War in Vietnam, was intended to make people aware of Dow's presence at the university.

Scott Moddle, chairman of the committee, said a letter would be sent to the university students council asking them to suggest to the administration that Dow not be allowed onto the campus.

"Industry has to be responsible: it has to have a conscience; the people have to have a conscience. The Dow Chemical Company of Canada represents the war machine coming to Canada."

U of M ends housing discrimination

WINNIPEG (Special)—The Board of Governors at the University of Manitoba has responded to student protest and abolished the two-list policy for off-campus housing.

Early in September, students union President Chris Westdal charged that the university was condoning racial discrimination by listing names of landlords who discriminated on the basis of race, color or nationality.

A landlord asking to be included on the university's lists of private accommodation now must agree to the following terms:

"The University of Manitoba accepts students for its classes and residences without distinction as to race, creed or color, and desires that all student living accommodation shall be available on these terms."

Yale replaces grades with categories

NEW HAVEN, N.J. (CUP-CPS)—The numerical grading system at Yale University is to be replaced by a system of four designations—fail, pass, high pass and honors—beginning next year.

The new system will continue on an experimental basis for at least five years. The present system of cumulative averages for each student will be replaced by a rating in each department.

It is hoped that more concern for the quality of a student's work will be generated. Graduate schools should have a better idea of a student's ability.

SHUFFLES GALORE AS

Tom Watt Varsity dealer

By PHIL BINGLEY

When training camp opened for Varsity Blues at the beginning of the last year's hockey season, coach Tom Watt was pleasantly surprised to find three veteran forward lines ready to open the schedule. And there was but one defensive position to fill.

However, this year Watt, with five of last year's starting forwards lost through graduation, was faced with the problem of making major shuffles in his lineup.

The result has been a complete overhaul of the forward units, a change in the defense (although both veteran pairings have returned), and the addition of a new goaltender.

Wingers Ward Passi and Gord Cunningham, both of whom played with Murray Stroud during the past two seasons, have taken over the flanks for all-star centre and SIHP scoring champ Paul

TOM WATT

Laurent.

If Sunday's 10-2 score over Laurentian (which incidentally flattered Voyageurs) is any indication, this line will be the deadliest trio of shooters since Wyatt Earp, Jesse James, and Quick Draw McGraw. Passi, Laurent and Cunningham accounted for five goals in the Sudbury game.

Blues' second unit has got to be the one with the most variety. Centre Murray Stroud will have Brian Jones, a starting defenseman last season, and Bob McClelland, a converted centreman, on the right and left wings respectively.

Watt considers this line the most versatile of the three. "All three can put the puck in the net and with two of the best forecheckers on the team in Stroud and McClelland, and Jones who can play either forward or move back to the blue-line if needed, they should score a lot of goals and be our strongest defensive line at the same time."

The only offensive question mark at the moment is the other front line. Newcomer Brian St. John appears to have won the pivot position while second-year man Mike Riddell is almost a certain starter on one of wings. This leaves but one opening with three candidates, all of whom would be shoo-ins for a spot on any other team in the league, trying to make the squad.

Fred Pollard, a member of York University's intercollegiate team last season, Paul McCann, and John Gordon are the players fighting for a berth and Watt frankly admits that this is his biggest headache at the moment. All three were impressive in the Laurentian game as Pollard had two goals, McCann had one, and Gordon played an excellent game going both ways.

Watt's decision to move Brian Jones up front has created another minor dilemma. Brian's brother Al Jones and veteran Doug Jones, (no relation) just to make things confusing, are fighting for the opening left open by Brian's switch.

Returnees Peter Speyer, Jim Miles, and Bob Hamilton are firmly entrenched in the other blue-line berths.

"We got a team that's gonna win a few games and score a couple of goals in the process," suggests SIHL manager of the year Mike Killoran. Then again, Killoran predicted that Bobby Hull might score more goals than Allan Stanley this year.

UC and Junior Engineering put on 3-3 happening

By JIM MORRISON

Fac Slack

Group II hockey on Friday featured a 3-3 happening between University College I and Junior Engineering. The Ross act, Mike and Gary, contributed two UC tallies, and Jim Clelland added the third. Brian Kamiec potted two Engineering goals, with the third going to Bob Story.

RUGGER

Five consecutive shutouts paced this week's rugby races. Vic controlled Law 3-0 on Friday, thanks to Smokey Knox's try. Law lost to Meds A by an identical score of 3-0 on Monday. This time it was Andy Davies who provided the margin of medical victory.

Other Monday masochism saw Trinity B destroy Architecture 15-0, and Innis confound Meds B 9-0. Vic Harding amazed the addled architects with three converted tries while Tony Cosentino provided all three Innis scores.

Vic won again yesterday, putting away Wycliffe 9-0. Glenn Doswell and John Geals (2) took care of the scoring.

Shutouts were also the story in soccer this week. Monday matches perceived the 1-0 Trinity triumph over UC, and 2-0 victories by SGS over Vic, and Innis over Meds A.

Ken Bell's tribute was enough for Trinity's win. Toko Oshinowo and Bibhuti Mohanty were Vic's downfall. Milan Herreg and Bill Usher led Innis to their sabotage of previously unbeaten Meds.

In a game played yesterday, Knox College overcame Trinity B 5-0. Dave Stewart (2), Al Glean (2) and J. Brex were the Knox Knockers.

Eben takes Omega, Wright wins Copp

Varsity Blues won the Yates Cup this year mainly on their defensive merit, and the hard-nosed hub of the exceptionally rugged defense was its captain, Mike Wright. In recognition of his tremendous play during the season, Wright's teammates have voted him the Johnny Copp Trophy, awarded to the player who, in their opinion, by his sportsmanship, character and playing ability, proves himself the most valuable member of the team.

Wright, shown above in typical ferocious action, consistently brilliant all year. He never had a bad game as he remorselessly patrolled great gobs of playing field from his corner linebacking position. One play would find him hurtling toward a harassed enemy quarterback while the next would have him pop the ball loose from a downfield receiver with one of his thumping tackles. Wright was probably the league's best at causing dropped passes.

Varsity Blues' magnificent end, Mike Eben, has been awarded the league's highest honour. As a fitting close to his brilliant four-year career, Eben was voted the Omega Trophy which goes to the SIFL's most valuable player. Voting is done by those who should know — members of the opposing teams.

From his very first season with Blues (1964) the name Mike Eben has been synonymous with spectacular. Shown at right is one of the patented lunging grabs which were his trademark throughout the league.

Everyone has a favourite 'Eben catch' to rave about, but often ignored is Mike's running ability. In his final game with Blues against McGill last Saturday, Eben scored probably his most sensational touchdown as he caught a short pass from Bob Amer and then proceeded to spin, weave, and burst through five frantic McGill defenders for 68 yds, minus any blocking aid. Unfortunately, Eben's own illegal motion nullified his superlative effort.

Blues prep for Queen's with 7-1 rout

Varsity Soccer Blues yesterday played their first game since walloping Guelph 11-0, when they demolished the resurgent Waterloo Warriors 7-1. It was probably Toronto's finest hour at home this season, and bodes well for this Saturday's championship final against Queens.

Blues' solid effort was a welcome change from their last two lacklustre performances against McMaster and McGill, where players seemed to be dragging their asses on the ground.

Right from the opening whistle Varsity forced play into the Warrior end of the field and caused numerous anxious moments around the net but couldn't score. With fifteen minutes gone in the half, Warriors moved down the field and forced a corner kick. As four Varsity defenders watched curiously Waterloo's Harry Grossman headed the ball into a corner far from the reach of Stan Bogucki and Blues were down 1-0.

Blues went right back on attack, however, and blew a couple of excellent scoring chances before Soppelsa passed to Lefkos who drove the ball into the net.

A hard shot by Lefkos was too much for Waterloo's overworked goalie, and Soppelsa banged in Varsity's second goal. John Gero finished off an excellent passing play to put Blues ahead 3-1 at the end of the half.

The Varsity charge continued after the crossover. Gero got the first goal of the game when he was put on his own rebound. Another Gero shot later on was only partially caught by the opposing goalie. The ball fell at Frank Soppelsa's feet and he had to just walk across the goal line to score.

Gero got his third goal of the game when he was put in the clear by an Austris Liepa pass. Liepa completed the scoring when he headed in a Ron Muir corner kick off a Waterloo defenseman.

The Battle of the Undeatable takes place Saturday morning at 10:30 a.m. at Varsity Stadium, when Queens will attempt to halt Blues' winning streak at thirteen. Superstitious, anyone?

Swim team inaugurate season at York

By DAVE POWELL

The Varsity Blues swimming team will make its first showing of the year tomorrow night in an exhibition meet against York University and Ryerson at York's Keele and Steele campus. Blues will have their first opportunity to swim metric distances in York's new 25 meter pool.

York are highly rated after their fine performance at last year's Canadian Intercollegiate Championships, and they should provide U of T with some stiff competition, especially with their talented distance star, Murray Young.

This meet will give coach Juri Daniel a good chance to evaluate his rookies, especially promising newcomers Terry Bryon, a butterflyer, and George Goldsmith, a breaststroker. Former Ryerson breaststroke star Maurice Vaillancourt is also one of the top prospects for a berth on the team.

This exhibition contest will also serve as a warmup for the Olympic Development meet to be held at the University Settlement on Saturday. Blues are entering as a team for the first time this year, and will face their toughest competition of the season before the Intercollegiate finals in the spring. Top swimmers from both Canada and the United States, including possibly some world champions, will be competing.

Pool Patter ... finals of the Development meet begin at 7 p.m. on Saturday, and should provide some exciting races for interested spectators ... Blues' team captain this season is veteran, Robin Campbell ...

Eastern ruggerites also win

Varsity rugger Blues (eastern division) also tuned up for their big championship game on Saturday as they struggled to an 8-6 victory over McGill Redmen in Montreal during the week-end. This left Blues undefeated, and they face Western Mustangs, also undefeated, in a sudden-death contest at Varsity Stadium Saturday afternoon for OQAA supremacy.

Blues had already won their division before the McGill game and so had nothing to lose but their pride. They almost did as McGill put on a fine team performance to nearly upset the usually high-scoring Blues.

Despite atrocious field conditions Blues started well but stout defensive work by Redmen and a happy knack of winning the ball in the loose kept them off the scoresheet. The first half ended in a scoreless tie.

The second half was a different story. Blues' fly-half Andy Gibson opened the scoring by diving on a loose ball in the endzone. McGill evened the match on a penalty kick, and then took the lead on an amazing 35 yd. drop kick by their fly-half.

Trailing 6-3, Blues buckled down to the business at hand and finally prevailed with a crashing try from Doug Phibbs and Gibson's conversion.

Cash crisis threatens UC Literary Society

By JIM COWAN

The University College Literary and Athletic Society is threatened by a cash shortage because of a delay in the auditing of last year's financial statement.

Each year Simcoe Hall remits some of the money received as student fees to the Lit. But it does so only after the books for the previous year have been audited and approved by Clarkson, Gordon Co., a Toronto chartered accountant firm.

Lit Treasurer Bill Sklar (II UC) said last night that the society still hasn't received any money from Simcoe Hall.

"We've been operating on funds left over from last year and receipts from the UC Follies. Now we're getting bills for the Follies and there is no money available."

Lit President Hershell Ezrin (IV UC) stressed that there was no immediate crisis but that a rash of bills could cause problems.

"Everything is paid up to now—we don't owe anything," he said.

Ezrin said the difficulties arose because last year's books were not submitted until the end of Oct. This did not leave enough time for the audit to be completed, Simcoe Hall informed and the funds transferred to the Lit. account. Books are usually ready for auditing by July 31.

Ezrin hopes to get the first installment of about $20,000 "in the very near future," SAC accountant D.C. Tinker advised him to apply directly to the director of finances for the funds.

Mr. Tinker said he did not think the Lit was in any serious financial trouble.

"They're solvent but the money is in the wrong place," he said. "If they apply to the proper people they should have no trouble getting their money."

Treasurer Sklar hopes to have the money in the Lit account within two weeks. "Until then we may have to delay payment on some of our bills."

Last year's treasurer, Ian Sadinsky (IV UC), said he knew of no problems.

"To my knowledge the books were balanced two weeks ago. There may have been some difficulty in auditing out the formal audit."

Most faculties grant student voice on council

By KATHY ADAMS and HARRIET KIDECKEL

Students at most faculties and colleges on campus have a voice in their faculty decisions, if not a vote.

Some faculties have voting student members on councils. Others have representatives who present recommendations but do not vote.

Those who do not have members on their faculty council have set up staff-student committees to discuss proposals to be later approved by both student and staff councils.

The faculty of architecture has ten voting student members on its faculty council as well as a staff-student committee.

The school of business has one voting student on the curriculum committee as well as two students—one from each year—who meet with Dr. O. W. Main, the chairman of the faculty council.

Students in medicine have representatives on the student affairs and curriculum committees.

The faculty of food sciences has just decided to sit an elected student member on its council but it is as yet undecided as to whether he will have a vote. Previously, academic representatives made their recommendations to the dean.

The seating of students on the St. Michael's College faculty council was approved in principle Monday. The number of student representatives and whether they will be voting members has not been decided.

New College, which has recently set up a student-staff committee, will soon present a proposal to the faculty and student councils concerning student representation.

The student-staff committee of the school of nursing is looking into the possibility of having students on the faculty council. Now the committee, composed of nine students and six staff members makes recommendations to be put to the council.

Innis students were the first to have student representatives on a faculty council. Five students were granted membership with full privileges in October.

The mathematics and physics society has an effective student-staff curriculum committee whose recommendations have been closely followed.

Scarborough, University College and Forestry are currently discussing proposals for student representation although they have no definite committees.

The exceptions are Dentistry and Engineering, where students have no voice in faculty decisions and are apparently not interested.

SAC supports Varsity in Realist controversy

By DAVID FRANK

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday supported the Varsity's printing last week of the now-controversial passage from the McGill Daily.

The motion, which passed 29-8, labelled the passage "distasteful," but said printing it was necessary for "a fuller understanding of the intensity of the controversy at McGill."

Many members felt the whole incident had been blown up out of proportion.

"There was virtually no reaction the day it was published," said Vice-President John Treleven (SGS).

He lashed out at Henry Borden, the chairman of the board of governors, for his involvement in the affair.

He said Mr. Borden had never seen fit to comment on any of the issues relevant to the university student.

"Is it his role to look after the morals when he doesn't concern himself with the real physical needs of the students?"

"Has he ever spoken out on the need for residences? Where was he when residence fees went up and has he ever spoken out on the tuition fees?"

Treleven's speech drew loud applause

The following is a statement by Tam Faulkner, president of the Students Administrative Council. It was passed unanimously at Wednesday's meeting:

The SAC believes its action with regard to the substance of the Varsity reprint is sufficient.

There is, however, a wider issue involved: student responsibility in discipline within the university community.

It is regrettable that the editors of The Globe and Mail and of The Telegram, while expressing regret that this incident will harm the cause of those who advocate a responsible role for students in the government of their university, failed to recommend that the SAC, which is legally the publisher, deal with the issue.

The Globe's subsequent editorial comment that, "it is far more satisfactory for a student body to discipline campus newspapers than to have this task undertaken by the administration" came four days after their initial statement which suggested that student democracy was a hoax and a sham.

Most readers will remember the earlier remarks.

McGill senate delays Daily decision

MONTREAL (VNS) — McGill Daily editor Peter Allnutt has been granted at least a temporary reprieve from the McGill University senate and students council.

The senate adjourned late yesterday until next week without deciding what to do about the printing Nov. 8 of a passage from the U. S. magazine The Realist which has since been labelled obscene.

When it met it was faced by a demand from the students council that the charges against Allnutt and student journalists Pierre Fournier and John Fekete be dropped.

Wednesday the students council tabled until next week a motion to fire Allnutt. The same day the council's judicial committee handed down a unanimous decision that the publication of the passage "did not constitute an act of bad faith" on Allnutt's part.

The consensus was that, "the decision to print the article was extremely irresponsible."

But the judges said: "Any suggestion that the editor may only be dismissed because of an act of bad faith appears erroneous to this committee."

Residence program draws few students

Students not living in residence don't seem to want to participate in residence life.

McCaul House, in University College's Sir Danial Wilson men's residence, is discovering this as only two students have applied for their associate membership plan.

The associate program was started about two weeks ago when posters and notices were put up in central locations of the university, inviting UC men to affiliate with the residence.

Associate members would be able to attend House Council meetings, use all the house facilities such as the music room, common room, TV and go to house parties.

Membership fees for these privileges are $10 a year. George Strazinski, the McCaul House president, says these "are less than the house fee a full resident pays."

The idea for such a program was discussed last year in the UC men's residence council. Each house was given the option of deciding whether it would adopt the plan.

So far only McCaul House has decided in favor of it. The five other houses have expressed no interest in doing the same.

Other colleges who have had affiliate memberships find that students are not using the residence privileges.

St. Michael's College girls choose to affiliate with one of the two women's residences when they register in first year.

However, now that the student-faculty building has been built, Sister St. Stephan, the dean of St. Joseph's women's residence, says "there isn't the need there was before for facilities such as residences of-fer."

Campus blood drive ends in success

The blood drive this year was one of the most successful in the history of the university.

The announcement of the winners of the Blood Cup will be made Sunday.

The drive collected 3,399 pints of blood. Organizers had set a goal of 3,840.

Legal aid service: students puzzle position under new Ontario plan

The student legal aid service is having legal problems with the official Ontario legal service.

Set up several weeks ago by the Students Administrative Council in conjunction with the faculty of law, the plan was one of several run by law students in the five Ontario law schools.

But since the creation of the official Ontario Legal Aid Plan under new legislation, the students have been left wondering where they fit.

Many who used to go to them for legal assistance can now get the services of professional lawyers under the new legal aid plan.

The students' scheme's organizers have also been reprimanded for unprofessional conduct in advertising their services in Monday's Varsity. Such unauthorized conduct could bring $200 or up to one year's imprisonment, says one of the students.

The scheme will continue to operate until a final decision is taken on its legality. "Student lawyers have always given legal advice to their friends," said Professor Bradley Crawford, the faculty advisor on student legal aid schemes.

"When such advice is given on a personal basis it is clearly unobjectionable. However, the present scheme appears to go beyond this."

Brothel business thrives at UBC

VANCOUVER (Special) — A thriving brothel has been discovered at the University of British Columbia, says the campus newspaper The Ubysey.

The alleged owner of the establishment agreed to an interview only on condition that its exact address not be published, the article says.

"At the moment only a select few know about us," she said. "We've only been going for a month."

"As the pressure of mid-term exams increases, we may spread the word around more."

In an interview, one of the house girls said she was not a student of UBC, but three of the eight girls were.

"Some of them do it to get money for fees," she said.

She added that many girls were coming in from downtown Vancouver in search of work.

"Mrs. Maxwell pays us very well — about $150 a week. It's better than working in the city."

The house was full at the time of a Ubysey reporter's visit, but the lady interviewed refused to say anything about her patrons.

Acting UBC President Walter Gage declined comment on the situation.

Luciano: students should force reform

Only university students can shatter the grip of the establishment and force social reform, a Social Research Institute meeting was told yesterday.

Renato Luciano, the executive director of Woodgreen Community Centre in downtown Toronto, said he can do little about the problems of Toronto's deprived because his own organization is so steeped in bureaucratic regimen.

Woodgreen, by the United Appeal and the city, provides a recreational and educational program for young people and serves as an adult service centre.

Mr. Luciano said the University of Toronto campus, which he called a melting pot of social protest, can become a catalyst for social reform.

He called on students to organize the community "to fight city hall" and to participate as volunteers in the Woodgreen program.

By providing gym and library facilities Woodgreen has filled in two deficiencies of local schools. But at the same time an apathetic Metro board has been let off the hook, he said.

The board, he charged, has refused to back a hot lunch program or gear its curriculum to the special needs of the slum children.

Expropriation without adequate new housing available, created resentment in the area that led to Woodgreen-sponsored meetings and protests. These were quickly stifled by the centre's "establishment" board of directors, Mr. Luciano said. The public now has lost faith in the centre as a sounding board for its problems.

Campus response not violent: Martin

"It offended the sense of morality of the vast majority of people on campus."

But D'Arcy Martin (III New), who introduced the successful motion, thought "the response on campus has not been violent."

"On the whole people didn't care," added Bob Bossin (III Inn).

After the motion had been defeated by a two-to-one margin, Brian Greenspan (III UC) introduced a milder rebuke which merely expressed "distaste and objection to the offensive paragraph."

The resolution was narrowly defeated.

Jan Duinker (SGS) said he felt Martin's resolution best summed up the feelings of the campus.

Professor G. E. Johnson, a faculty member of SAC, tried to cast a broader light on the issue.

"The real question at McGill was who decides on disciplinary action. This should have been the Varsity story," he said.

He warned that the controversy could have a bad effect on the campaign for a greater part in university government.

"Several colleagues have told me that if SAC condones this type of journalism they would have to reassess their attitude.

"There are more important things for SAC to do than decide on a definition of obscenity."

Another Varsity protests discipline

CAPETOWN, South Africa — (CUPI) — Canadian student editors are not the only ones facing administrative disciplinary action.

The editor of The Varsity at the University of Capetown, Chris Pritchard, was expelled last month for "bringing discredit on the university."

Two editorials, a report of a Swedish happening and a report of a campus religious symposium led to the expulsion.

Protests against the expulsion have been registered by the Student Council president and the South African Student Press Association. A Capetown Sunday paper said it could not see any justification for the expulsion.

Although Pritchard may return to classes next year he is prohibited by a vote of the student council from ever holding a student office again during his academic career.

CYC budget reduced

OTTAWA (CUP) — Cutbacks in federal spending will mean a reduction of Company of Young Canadians budget from a requested $3,000,000 to $2,400,000 for the coming fiscal year, a company spokesman said yesterday.

This will mean a curtailment in the company's plan to expand field workers to between 750 and 1,000. The company now plans to aim at 400 field workers for the coming year. There are currently 180.

"The Schwarz Report on student health services in Canada states: There is a new generation of students on Canadian campuses which refuses to swallow irrelevant courses dished out by incompetent lecturers. The report calmly admits that if only negative signs are read into the new discontent, more destructive forms of student protest will be generated in Canada. And not only that. But one can also fail to recognize the power which students have to contribute to the growth of universities." Canadian University Press, Jan. 20, 1967

it seems that mcgill is still confused

"Everyone was dealt an unplayable hand and proceeded to play it rather than throw it in," a McGill Daily editorial said this week describing the events that rocked that campus the week before.

It was the Daily's sly way of admitting they didn't know what was going on, what had gone and why and what it all means. All they could conclude was that a lack of communications clouded by an abundance of rumor and mistatement left everyone there wondering "Wha' happened?"

"Confrontation goes on in one form or another while everyone waits it out," the editorial claimed. "What we will get out of this is either a superpowerful administration or a student power group flushed with success." The Daily also concluded that confrontations are far too "rigid and mindless."

So apparently events moved too fast at McGill last week for anyone to understand, let alone plan ahead or help cool down the crisis.

Of course the situation had all the classic ingredients to come to that kind of violent crisis — a powerful and seemingly indiscriminately active student power group, Students for a Democratic University, and a rigid and uncaredful administration.

After the Daily published that controversial Realist article H. Locke Robertson set the stage for the confrontation with his strong actions. Charging the McGill Daily editors with spreading an obscene libel, gave the SDU all the material they needed to force a confrontation.

The issue was student discipline; who should have the power to discipline the student editors? Robertson obviously reserved the administration's right to hold that power. Student leaders have constantly accused him of acting under outside pressure from the businessmen who run the university.

The SDU, a small but very powerful and spirited group, held a sit-in to back up their demands that students be allowed to handle the matter. They also reprinted the contentious article in a four page newspaper with a front-page inscription "There's an Obscene Libel in Here." The sit-in caused the disciplinary meeting to be postponed.

These demonstrations led Robertson to reduce the charge against the editors to one of publishing material "which contravenes standards acceptable by and in this university." He said the administration would not handle the issue until after it heard what the student society would do.

That, of course, left enough of an issue for the SDU to continue. In that statement the administration implied it would discipline the students after the student society was through with them.

So during a week of large gatherings and rallies of 2,000 or 3,000 McGill students, the SDU members and supporters sat. Robertson finally said students would be given a greater voice in the administration.

That statement was so weak, however, that a small group of students remained in the administration building even after the SDU officially ended the sit-in. It was that group that finally broke into the principal's office Thursday night — an action that prompted the administration to call in the Montreal police. Police on a university campus has always been a drastic last resort, one that usually causes a demonstration to grow.

At McGill, by that time, most of the students had had it with the crisis. When the sit-in types were ejected from the building, some 2,000 students watched and shouted for them to wash occasionally.

Blame for all this? Well, how does one place blame in a crisis?

Surely Robertson didn't help ease the situation by his sudden and strong action. Not that he should have done nothing, but the way he did it helped the crisis grow.

Looking back to the model, the 1964 Berkeley disturbances, it's obvious that one of the biggest grievances students had was not free speech, the right to political action or all that. The biggest cause of that crisis was the series of inopportune actions taken by the Roger Heys administration.

The SDU, on the other hand, took advantage of the crisis to push student demands. They were in a powerful position to do so and may have just been able to pull off a student victory. No word yet, though.

Meanwhile, Stan Gray, the SDU leader and another man face criminal charges for assaulting an officer during the police arrests. A professor in the political economy department where Gray is a lecturer, has organized a committee to collect money for their defense.

The SDU was able to mobilize the forces they did because they played on the powerlessness of students in the university. Students were members of committees but they had no real votes on the McGill senate and no real power anywhere.

The SDU grew up two years ago when many SUPA members became turned off with that organization's policies. They considered SUPA members too weak in their analysis of society. Montreal left groups have always been more old left in their leanings than the left in English Canada. The English left in Montreal two years ago split away from the left in the rest of Canada and started doing their own thing.

Their own thing involved a very sophisticated analysis and strategical planning, much more sophisticated than the left in the rest of Canada has been able to muster so far. The Marxist analysis of the university, with the young intellectuals forming a class group in confrontation with the rigid business-tinged administration resulted.

Stan Gray went to Oxford for two years and when he returned this fall was taken on the staff of the McGill political economy department. The 23-year-old lecturer gave two courses, Marxist Theory and the History of Political Thought.

In his Marxism class, Gray is said to have constantly used the university as a case study to draw his examples of structuring, and lack of democracy.

Well, when the leftists on campus heard that Gray was teaching that fourth-year course, they all gathered to take it. The political economy department — a very conservative group — is said to have been very surprised when a class that expected an enrolment of 10-15 people, suddenly had 25 or 30.

So, Gray's SDU did add to the crisis situation, but it's up to you to decide whether his actions were just or not. When do student groups justly use their organized power? Do they use it at the most advantageous time, like at McGill, when the administration is really in a dilemma as to what to do? Are the ends they desire important enough to justify these means?

he criticized us

Sir:

Contrary to popular opinion, the Faculty of Engineering is normally a very easy going, friendly, but proud group of young men. Thus it is only natural that the foolish remarks of Prof. Bell in his Sociology 120 class would arouse this sense of pride. The Engineers, along with the other professional faculties, are probably the most clean-cut group of individuals on campus.

Prof. Bell was heard by an Engineer to say that "Engineers have to be told how to put on a tie when they reach fourth year." Remarks such as these are very childish when said by a man of Prof. Bell's position. It was my opinion that the purpose of an Arts course was to teach the student to form his own opinions and conclusions rather than to have some immature adult brain-wash him with falsehoods.

It is true that a rivalry exists between the Engineers and Artsmen but this rivalry can be upheld without the help of the staff members. The Engineers that attended the demonstration of Friday, Nov. 3, did not intend to put Prof. Bell in his place. They succeeded!

I feel very strongly that if any action is taken over this incident that it should be taken against Prof. Norman M. M. Bell and not against the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering.

harvard's co-op store

Sir:

In the Nov. 8 issue, Harold Bohne stated that a co-operative bookstore would not be fair to all students, since a student who had to buy more books than another would get the same amount of money from the co-op.

This is not the way the Harvard-Massachusetts Institute of Technology co-op works (unless it has changed its procedure in the last few years). Every member of that co-op receives an identification number which he gives to the clerk each time he makes a purchase. At the end of the year, a certain percentage (about 10 per cent) of his total purchases is refunded to him.

draft aid at new college

Sir:

Last week in donating $100.00 to the Draft dodger program, the New College council seemed to overlook some very important points. Who's money is the council spending? Surely if it is the students' money, the students should decide to what charitable organization it should be sent. It would seem if this council really desired to promote moral kindness, the Society for Crippled Children would be a more appropriate organization. Moreover, it would appear that this council, not only did not introduce a referendum, but did not even organize a discussion, as was done with SAC elections, to gather the opinions of all students. A better idea should have been, the placing of receptacles in the common room and lunch room where all individuals desiring to donate money to this cause, could have done so.

Whether the cause is just or not is not the question, but rather whether the New College council will take the trouble to ask those people whom they supposedly represent, for their feeling about major issues of this type.

The creation of non-issues

by Michael Ignatieff

TIME / NBC / NEWSWEEK / GLOBE / HARPER'S / ESQUIRE / REALIST / NEW YORK REVIEW / CBS / STAR / CHUM / TELY / VARSITY / RAMPARTS / NEW YORK TIMES / PARIS MATCH / ATLAS / CBC / MACLEAN'S / SATURDAY NIGHT / ENCOUNTER / CANADIAN FORUM / POST / CBL / ARTS CANADA / CHFI . . . We are under relentless and indiscriminate bombardment. Facts, non-facts. Opinions, counter-opinions. Analyses. Descriptions. Polemics.

Vietnam. Bihar. China. Lyndon. Mao. Parliament. Pollution. Riots. Revolution. Worry.

But we are too overwhelmed to be concerned. Every opinion is important, every crisis explosive, every problem complex. We retreat to clichés and to our own personal problems, because we cannot comprehend. We are asked to judge so often that we finally do not judge at all.

Surveys of newspaper readers show that the most popular sections of dailies are the worry columns (Anne Landers) and the crime and court stories (rape, man-bites-dog, juvenile delinquency, murder). These we can understand. We can relate ourselves to individual acts of murder and bestiality, but not to mass murder and mass bestiality. In the deluge of crisis which our media presents, evil becomes banal. Death is only made more impersonal and distant when we see the killing in Vietnam on television. The screaming wounded Marine becomes absurd and unreal when he is flashed on the screen between unctuous commercials and Western fantasies where Marshall Dillon never dies.

The age of interface, of instantaneous sensory contact through media with men's struggle everywhere, should have made the world into a global village of concern and involvement. But McLuhan's promise has not been realized.

The intensity of our bombardment by the media only increases our anxiety to withdraw, to struggle with our personal problems and to let the managers of our administrative civilization deal with the crises which they tell us are so 'complex'.

So media is contributing to the impending death of democracy. Mass apathy towards politics can be partly explained by the fact that individuals only see their political impotence and insignificance more clearly when the media read the dreadful roll-call of our problems.

In a world of violent crisis, it is inevitable that we should be bombarded by the media, and that this bombardment should bewilder and cow the majority. The central problem is whether the press help the managers of our civilization to make their decisions and whether the press adequately explain these decisions to the passive majority. They do neither.

The managers have complex solutions to the complex crises. And the press, by its very nature, has to simplify both the problems and their solutions. Because every story has to have a lead, startling but often peripheral details of these solutions are given ridiculous emphasis. A story about a report on solutions for the housing crisis leads off with the idea that houses should be made out of interchangeable, plastic panels, despite the fact that this idea was a footnote in the report. Because stories have to be short and because reporters are never particularly erudite, the thoughts of a prophet of our society, such as McLuhan, are condensed, and distorted. Whereas the managers of society are reading McLuhan, Galbraith and the other prophets in the original and are calling them in to influence their decisions, the press popularizes and perpetuates myths about these prophets. The press then writes about the myths, about McLuhan's incomprehensibility for example, and the public has no idea of McLuhan's real meaning, or why he is having such an influence on the technocrats.

Because the problems of society are complex, the managers are becoming secretive so that they can avoid making 'public' mistakes. Press accounts and 'in depth analyses' of contemporary government decisions are less and less true to the realities of the inner circles of power. Because the true motives for decision are contained in the piles of secret documents on Robert MacNamera and Lyndon Johnson's bed-side tables, speculation about negotiations, escalations, bombing pauses etc. in Vietnam becomes an increasingly senseless game. We have none of the essential information. The press has been reduced to announcing each Administration step and then trying to explain it with usually less than more accuracy. Shrewd and able men like Walter Lippman find Washington intolerable because they know that their insights are no better than Press Officer McLoskey's announcements or Lyndon Johnson's cryptic remarks at press conferences.

Those who argue that the best defence against 'secret' government is an alert and sceptical press must realize that despite the press, 'secret' government by technocrats is increasing and will continue to increase.

It was observed earlier that the press 'perpetuates myths'. Part of this process is the creation of the non-event. The 'hippy movement' was a non-event. The press discovered a tiny group in California genuinely devoted to a hippy philosophy and life-style. For those not fully integrated into our essentially conservative and cautious generation, the life-style had tremendous appeal and the press responded with an incredible barrage of publicity, which in the end effectively destroyed the movement the publicity created. (How can you continue to be a real TIME magazine hippy if you are, like the poster sellers and the singers in the Jefferson Airplane making a million dollars a year?)

The publicity brought the insincere and the gawkers and it drove the real hippies off to forest retreats and Mexico etc. The 16 year-olds ran away from home, as they have been doing since Adam, imitated, with means as superficial as wearing beads and long hair, the media-popularized life-style, caught venereal disease, got cold come winter and returned to suburbia. Sic transit non-event, TIME did not admit in its most recent hippy fantasy that there were only 60 people at the most recent hippy ceremony in Haight-Ashbury as compared to 10,000 during the summer. The press didn't want the fantasy to die.

The Edmund Burke Society is the Varsity's own particular non-event. The tiny, unrepresentative and incoherent exists for, and therefore has been given existence by the Varsity's publicity.

The press create an event, give it meaning and then fill column after column with it, one is tempted to think, because the real events are so complex that the passive majority including the journalists don't want to face their complexity.

LOOKING AT THE PRESS 2

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

The Globe and Mail is really telling the truth when it advertises "Tomorrow's Paper Tonight" on its early edition boxes.

Regarding news items and not feature articles, The Globe is the leader of the three Toronto dailies. The early edition of The Globe is the best single news source for the other dailies, The Toronto Telegram and The Toronto Daily Star.

When The Globe hits the street at about 9:30 p.m., the Star and Tely night editors are the first to read it. Then the bulk of their reporting staffs are subjected to the most uncreative process in the field of journalism—the game of match and scalp.

Match and scalp, although boring and unpleasant for the reporter, is a relatively easy game for him to play. The night editor gives him a news item from The Globe and the reporter is expected to "match" it. Which in many cases amounts to phoning a senior civil servant, dragging him out of bed and getting him to say "yes" after each sentence as you read him the Globe story.

The phone call of confirmation includes an attempt to acquire additional information (but which the reporter rarely gets because the party being questioned probably left all his information at the office, quite sensibly).

Then the reporter writes his "match" story in brighter Star or Tely style.

What this really means is that the lead is rewritten to include the same main point as The Globe story but also typically unGlobe and Mail expressions like "blow your cool" or a verb (any verb it doesn't matter) with the suffix "-in."

This is the "match" process. The only difference between it and the "scalp" process is that in the latter, the appropriate authorities could not be reached to confirm the Globe story.

There is very little difference between the "match" and "scalp", except in the former, the Star or Tely reporter knows the news item did in fact take place.

Perhaps someday The Globe will run a purposely fictitious story in their first edition and then read The Star and Tely next day to see how long the story stands.

The prominence The Globe gives certain news items is very similar to the treatment The Star and Tely give the same stories. This is especially true of Globe and Mail front page stories and the front page stories in Star and Tely first editions, which come out around 10:30 a.m.

In later editions of the afternoon newspapers, breaking stories usually force these Globe "matches" and "scalps" off the front page. Curiously enough by this time the Star and Tely editors realize The Globe stories weren't so important after all and instead of shifting them to page three of the Metro front, they are often buried at the end of the Classified Ads.

It is perhaps unfair to criticize the afternoon newspapers so much and leave The Globe as the sole guardian of journalistic integrity. The Star and Tely produce many stories during the day that a Globe reader won't see until the next morning.

But the Globe starts the cycle every night at 9:30 and the afternoon papers are forced to follow her lead if they are to pursue their policies of giving the readers everything The Globe runs and more.

All of this is a back-door approach to the quality of newspapers in Toronto. The three dailies have been hailed as outstanding in their field in Canada. Toronto is unique in having three newspapers that compete for roughly the same readership without one paper dominating the market.

But the competitive nature of the newspapers induces the match and scalp game which results in all papers carrying the same news for fear the reader will reject one if it misses something the others carry.

However the competitive nature of Toronto dailies does encourage complete coverage of news items that are carried. The Toronto dailies amplify wire service news wherever possible.

Because news coverage is similar, The Globe, Star and Tely attempt to differentiate themselves with flashy feature articles, special supplements and promotion campaigns. The Globe is automatically differentiated by being a morning newspaper and by attempting to be Canada's national newspaper.

The Star and Tely are closer competitors, concentrating on Metro and suburbs, and pretending to be newspapers for the people. The Globe takes advantage of this distinction and exploits its obvious appeal to businessmen and academics with the promotion slogan "People in the know read The Globe and Mail."

The Star and Tely vastly outpace The Globe with regard to sections of a paper that are oriented to particular interests. The Women's, Entertainment and Sports sections of The Globe are far below the standards set by the same sections in the afternoon newspapers.

However The Star and Tely expose themselves as commercial enterprises and not proverbial protectors of freedom of speech when they engage in promotion tactics to whittle away at each other's circulation.

The Tely builds the image of a McLuhan happening within its pages and takes every opportunity to exploit Yorkville, LSD and vague rumours in Parliament to boost its circulation.

The Star promotes itself a little less sensationally. However, recently they have been doing it in a most nauseating way.

For the past two weeks every time I walked into a subway there would be at least three bright white signs proclaiming: "The first—that's what we like to be. Especially now, for our 75th birthday."

So we all know that The Star's circulation is highest in Toronto. What does a large circulation mean anyway? The right to charge a lot of money for advertisements.

Recently they have been running innumerable column inches, feet and yards on the Atkinson family and how the Toronto Star made Metro safe for democracy. Reading the continuous stream of propaganda about The Star sometimes make me wonder if Joseph E. Atkinson founded Canada.

In promoting self-images of newspapers for the people, the Star and Tely use up large portions of the news space on stories about the families of people who recently met violent death, reunited immigrants who haven't seen each other for at least 20 years, or children who can't go to summer camp because their parents spend the family allowance cheques on beer.

The only justification for this sort of story is that the Star and Tely publishers are giving near-illiterates something they can understand. Therefore the near-illiterates will make a decision to buy one of the peoples' newspapers, thus boosting the circulation of either The Star or The Tely.

Both afternoon papers run ombudsman columns daily to aid the little man in his fight against unjust collection agencies.

However The Tely's Action Line and The Star's Johnny-come-lately Help Wanted are popular and boost circulation. What they have to do with journalism is rather obscure.

And poor Ron Haggart of The Star has been reduced from being author of one of Toronto's most incisive, stimulating, well-read columns to chief switchboard operator for Help Wanted. I wonder if Haggart is ever tempted to call up Action Line and ask them what he can do about getting decent employment.

Advertising determines the number of column inches that are available for news on any particular day, most newspapers working on set news-to-advertising ratios.

Of course advertisements are important to newspapers—we would have to pay 50 cents for a paper if it had no ads, so the ad men say.

But advertisements pre-determine the amount of space for news and that amount of space will not change come assassinations, wars or floods.

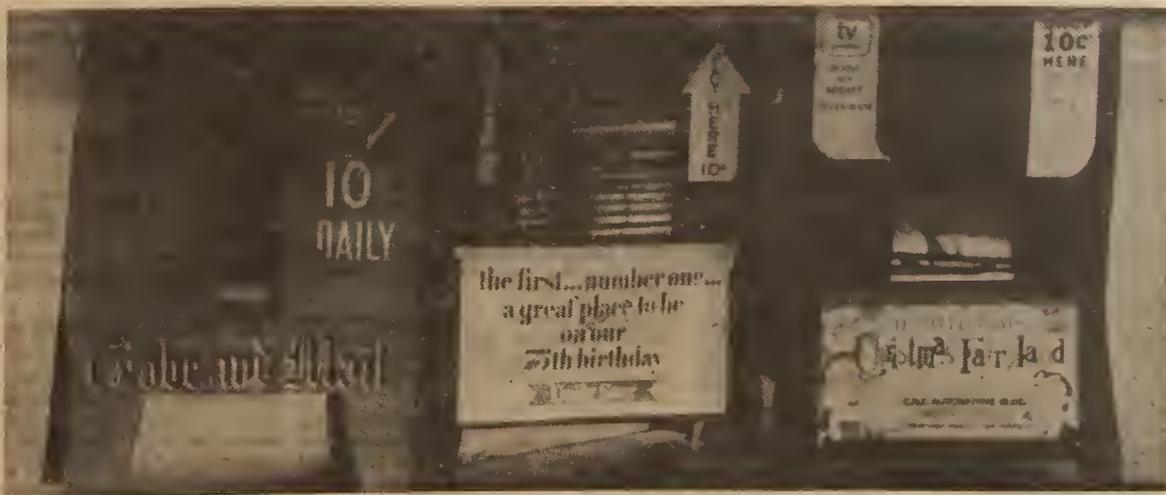

Consequently on one day your big news story of the day might be a war in the Middle-East that might bring the U.S. and Russia to grips, or it might be Judy LaMarsh wearing a mini-skirt to a cabinet meeting.

Perhaps we would have a healthier perspective on life if we avoided newspapers on certain no-news days. But that would break our reading habit and decrease newspaper circulation.

Our three Toronto dailies maintain a certain standard of excellence because of their competitive nature. But at the same time the competition breeds their own mediocrity.

However The Globe, Tely and Star are miles ahead of almost all other Canadian journals that publish daily.

But being satisfied with our Toronto newspapers is like being happy you have a cold and not pneumonia.

By LAURENCE REDMAN

DAVID DEPOE: Company of Young Canadians, University College dropout, 23, a foremost creation of the Toronto press.

I caught him this week after he had spent an exhausting four hours before an overflow of students in the Thornhill Secondary School library. In Murray's a balding, portly man of fifty dawdled over his coffee a half hour before demanding of Dave, "Tell me your name. I'm sure I've seen your picture before, but I just want to know whether I'm right. Tell me your name."

"People come to you defining you by what they've read," says Dave. "Inasmuch as I understand that process, that fact of pre-conception, then I can deal with it. The most common reaction I get is 'you're not such a bad guy after all.'"

Monday afternoon Dave was on the Betty Kennedy Show. Wednesday night he was a panel member at a meeting of the Young Liberals. He has become a touring lecturer from the school of hippiedom. Does he not feel the demands of the mass media compromise his own values and his own life?

"No. I've become a public figure. I'll say as much as I can while I can . . . The only trouble is, as a public figure, I've got to make sure I don't start believing what is written about me.

"The thing newspapers all too often do is set themselves up as objective when they're not. I wish they'd come out and admit their bias. Then people wouldn't believe what they're reading is objective truth, when in fact it's based on the reporter's preconceptions."

Dave asserts that he is not the Stephen Shorter (Privilege) stereotyped creation and puppet of the press. He admits that the press has made him "superhippie" in the Canadian context, but he enjoys using the position it has given him; "It gives me a chance to talk about what I think.

"The very act of labeling me superhippie conjures up a tremendous image through which people filter everything they read of me. It sells newspapers, but it's irresponsible."

"News isn't about people any more, it's about labels," says Crawdaddy! magazine editor Paul Williams. "The journalist sees the world as a big political cartoon, a guy in a tall hat with 'U.S.' on his back, a guy with an olive-leaf with 'dove' on his back, and what-have-you. A dove does what he does simply because he's a dove; a taxpayer because he's a taxpayer; a bureaucrat because he's a bureaucrat. Don't confuse me with individuals."

The press isn't interested in people, says Depoe. "They're interested in stereotypes." "Don't people want stereotyping in what they read?"

"No," he exploded. "The public doesn't demand stereotypes. It's given stereotypes, that's what it gets. It's the biggest myth there is that they want stereotypes. Part of the reason people are prejudiced, is the way they receive their information. If they are given stereotypes, they're gonna think in stereotypes."

Depoe says that it is the responsibility of the press to be "probing, critical, questioning." Applying stereotypes to a situation is "a way of avoiding thinking, and then writing off the problem. Surely to God that's a large part of what's wrong with society, that people are led to think in stereotypes."

Williams applies this tendency of the press to neatly package everything under an appropriate label to the breakdown of American society. "Nothing that goes on in the U.S. can be put in perspective, because there's no framework left. We've built up a system of irrelevancies based on misinterpretation based on inaccuracies, and we can't get back to Start to try again. Every day's newspaper is funnier than the last, because it's all serious reporting in a ridiculous context."

The funnier side of the abdication by the press and the public of their responsibility to find reality, Depoe finds in his own press clippings. "The papers are talking about somebody else," he says. "If I were the general public, I would have no idea what I'm like."

The darker side of the relationship between the press and the public, Depoe finds in the recent obscenity controversy.

"Everybody on the entire campus missed the point of the Krassner article. It doesn't have anything to do with news worthiness. Part of why people reacted is because The Varsity printed only an excerpt. I think it was a really well done piece of satire because it was almost believable. After you finish reading it, you believe it was possible.

"The response to the article really showed me a lot about where the level of American society was at. The reaction was absolute hysteria on the part of a lot of people, yet who cares what they're doing to Kennedy's body. There are too many people getting far, far worse deals in this world. Their reaction shows they're uptight about sex, but don't give a shit about far worse things, such as what's going on in Viet Nam."

The function of the student newspaper, says Depoe, "is to serve as an event information medium of the university. But it must also provide a forum for dissent, for it's the only thing that can. If a student newspaper doesn't have radical ideas then it's an abdication of responsibility. He would like to see a more radical Varsity which would also start treating the campus as a whole with more attention paid to the faculty. "Humanize the professors," he says.

"I think there's a place for the Village Voice, or something like it, in Toronto," says Depoe. "It would give a voice to dissent. There's an awful lot of alienated people, hippies, social workers, etc. This that includes university radicals, good media people in Toronto, especially young people; paper would give them an opportunity to speak to each other, since the dailies are always far behind changing ideas."

By SUE HELWIG

Somewhere within the architectural patchwork which houses the CBC on Jarvis street you will find a man who has devoted a great deal of careful thought to the merits and shortcomings of journalism.

This man is Ken Lefolli, executive producer of "The Way It Is" and former editor of Maclean's magazine.

As far as personal interest is concerned Ken does not feel that any of the three media discussed — T.V., newspapers, and magazines, is obviously more valuable than the next.

For him the question was quite simple: "I wound up editing 'T.V. magazine' because I was out of a job in 'print magazine.' Seven Days was the kind of work I could do and a job that I could get."

In a small cluttered office on the fifth floor of the Maitland Street building, Ken talked about news media for an hour in between a filming session which ended at 6 o'clock and a 9 o'clock flight to New York.

Right now he is most interested in exploring the whole "fascinating question" of using the resources of T.V. via satellite. Another of his experiments will be an attempt at developing for T.V. a magazine-type series on major national events.

His office for "The Way It Is" is bare of decoration except for two small items. Taped to the wall beside his desk is a bright pink oriental print. And farther along, spearheaded onto a bulletin board, a small card with orange and white lettering on it spells out quite simply "REVOLUTION".

But the fact that he is working with the T.V. medium has not transformed Ken's immediate response to news. He thinks of his job in classical terms for a journalist: "I am trying to find out how T.V. can be used to tell people what they are not finding out."

Since graduation from the University of British Columbia, Ken has always earned his living as a journalist.

After working for the now defunct News Herald in Vancouver, he spent a year or so wandering around the world on his own. Back in Canada he worked for Liberty magazine for a few years before moving to Macleans.

In 1964 he resigned as editor of Macleans because of a disagreement on the question of an editorial decision he challenged.

Right now, in spite of a full-time job as editor of "The Way It Is," Lefolii has by no means cut himself off from other fields of writing. In January, McClelland and Stewart will publish a book on the press he wrote this year, "The Bad News", subtitled "An Angry Letter from Inside the Mass Media."

S.H.: One of your criticisms of the press is that it never examines itself. Would you care to comment?

Lefolii: The press attitude towards itself may be described as frivolous. The press doesn't take itself as seriously as it does just about everything else. Newspapers have become competitive advertising vehicles.

S.H.: What do you think the press should see in itself?

Lefolii: The principal point is that in a democracy, one of the checks on the official power structures is a press that examines everything and reports the lapses within the official bureaucracy.

The problem is that now we are dealing with the corporate press which inevitably assumes the values and interests of the order it or its owners belong to.

S.H.: How does this relate to the freedom of the press?

Lefolii: The press is free only in the debating team sense that it is possible to print opposing views.

But the problem is that the independent press is no longer available. Not too long ago an individual could aspire to ownership because he could finance a paper by himself.

Now the ownership of the press is restricted to the only sources which have the concentration of capital necessary to the publishing of a paper—the corporation.

The Toronto Star is owned by a corporation and the Telegram is in effect owned by a mercantile empire associated with name of one man.

S.H.: Is there any chance of changing this situation?

Lefolii: The press is not to be condemned on all scores.

For instance, a large organization like the New York Times is able to carry out deep full-scale reporting because of its size. As far as Canadian papers are concerned, the large operations are able to give more thought to what they print. I feel that editing has become more thoughtful.

S.H.: How do you explain this.

Lefolii: The new press is essentially a monopoly press. Lord Thompson has found that the small town (50,000) paper is financially very successful.

The classic view of journalism holds that a monopoly press is an undesirable situation. But the results of monopoly are good in one sense.

Monopoly leaves the papers free to stop worrying over what combination of words on sex, crime, or curiosity will sell more papers on any one day. They are now able to reach and concentrate on major social and political issues.

But despite freedom from competitive pressures and despite their relative wealth, papers still publish from a single point of view—that of the ruling bureaucracy.

All dimensions of choice that a public might want to consider have no access to the national press unless they happen to coincide with the interests of the ruling bureaucracy.

The newspaperman is caught in a situation where he has control without ownership. In this case I question the legitimacy of having the ownership men have the final say.

S.H.: Do you have any suggestions as to what could be done about this?

Lefolii: I see no reason why editors should not insist on having final control of content. I don't expect to achieve this although it has happened in several cases.

I suggest that one can legislate editorial control within boards of editors. This would remove from editors the necessity of staying in tune with the views of corporations. Promotions, hiring, and firing would require the consent of the editorial department.

S.H.: How would you compare the relative merits of T.V. and newspapers as news media?

Lefolii: T.V. is merely different and can provide some kinds of documentation which are impossible in print. Sunday and The Way It Is are examples of what I mean.

For instance, in print you can give a carefully documented analysis of a fairly complicated issue. But T.V. is not involved with cold facts. It deals essentially with people and impressions.

In some senses T.V. may be more objective—in introducing a personality for example. In print the product becomes, of necessity, a mixture of the reporter and the person being interviewed. You are dependent on the skill of the reporter, but even if he is a good writer he may not be presenting a true picture.

The interviewer on T.V. can give you a very clear picture of a person because when he is on the air, he cannot rely on a manufactured vision.

In reporting instant news, T.V. has not yet begun to show people what it can do as a medium of record. Because the television camera has the possibility of moving right up to viewers it can include actual details of activity to a degree far beyond that of print.

S.H.: How has this affected the newspapers?

Lefolii: Some people argue that newspapers are changing towards the use of specialization. The stated reason for this is fear of competition with T.V.

I don't think that T.V. has taken over from news reporting as done in a paper. In fact the New York Herald Tribune which attempted to follow this analysis to its logical conclusion was forced to go out of business.

What it did was to replace the traditional front page news stories with theme stories. It was trying to tell why rather than what assuming that the reader already had the background information.

Newspapermen are primarily interested in getting next to breaking news. They are after the undisclosed, hard story.

S.H.: Canada seems to have some difficulty in supporting national magazines. Is there any explanation for this?

Lefolii: I have never been certain that this was distinctly a Canadian failure. There is some substance to the claim that unfair competition from the States has something to do with it.

What is true is that in the fifties when Canadian magazines were failing, magazines in the United States and the United Kingdom were also in difficulty. In U.K. there were no good general magazines left by the end of the 50's.

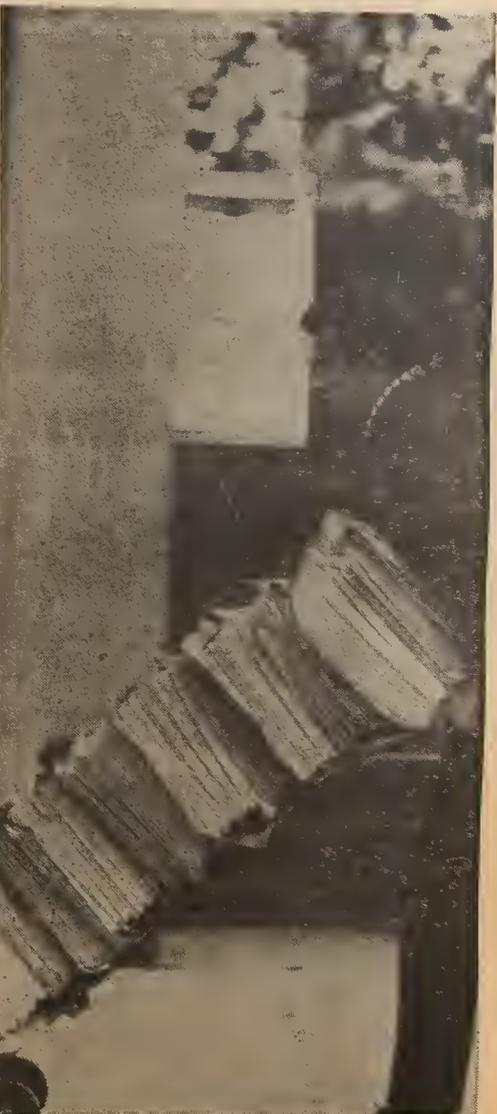

There are at least two explanations for this. Publishers had been sitting around and counting money for the last fifty years and in the meantime, T.V. replaced magazines as a source of entertainment.

They are now making a comeback with an appeal to a specialized readership. Playboy and Scientific American are part of this rationale.

But the magazine is not mass media by any means. It preaches to those who are already converted.

The possibility of changing the shape of national consensus on any issue lies in the hands of mass media alone which has the wide and varied audience.

Perhaps the journalism schools could do something about this if they chose to take a critical look at the press. As it is they restrict themselves to their own superbly comfortable position.

Dame Edith Evans and The Static Loneliness of Age

By CARL LAUPPE

Bryan Forbes' film The Whisperers is currently playing at the International Cinema. Edith Evans and Eric Portman head a cast which gives, without exception, a set of very fine performances.

In many ways this film is an excellent one indeed: directing, acting, camera work, incidental music, etc. are all well done, both individually and in relation to each other. However, during the course of the film a serious problem arises which will bother every thoughtful viewer.

The Whisperers is a quasi-documentary about old age. Dame Edith plays a lonely, senile old woman who is plagued with fantasies of unfulfilled hopes and fears. When we first see her as Mrs. Ross, she is destitute, abandoned by her husband, used by her son, and totally at odds with the world outside of her imaginings. For a brief moment there is a fleeting chance that some of her hopes may be fulfilled, but she is further abused, robbed, and left exposed. She becomes severely ill physically and almost totally withdraws from the world around her.

During her illness, Mrs. Ross is helped by a social worker who cherishes a real concern and affection for her. The social worker attempts to reconstruct a normal, emotionally rewarding life for her. Mr. Ross is found and induced to care for his wife again; her small flat is cleared of twenty years of psychotic clutter. Mrs. Ross leaves the hospital, and we are led to believe once again, that she has some chance for a few happy years before death.

Shortly, however, Mr. Ross once again disappears into the night, and Mrs. Ross relapses into her improvised universe, bothered by the ever growing cancer of her own thoughts. She is not even allowed the grace of death, but lives on painfully in a world that has no spirit of youth or life, no change for betterment.

The Whisperers is a uniquely depressing film. Time after time we are cruelly disabused and stripped of our sentimentality. We leave the theatre whipped and bleeding, without illusion, comfort, without hope.

The relationships that exist in this film between the artist, the work of art, and the audience are very strange ones. The artist, unlike Wordsworth, no longer shows us unsuspected relations and levels in the everyday world. Unlike Dante's Vergil, he no longer leads us through worlds we had only vaguely imagined. The director of this film takes a position that is particular to both the twentieth century and the cinema: "I record." Even more unsettling is the realization that behind this artistic posture there is a real man who believes this to be the right way to approach art.

The work of art, or more precisely, the complex of the artistic creation, has also undergone a metamorphosis: there is no longer movement towards or away from something. There is no tragic ending in any traditional sense; there is no comic movement; there is no tragic-comic movement. What is of some importance in this is that the world of the film never really changes. It suffers disturbances which, like unpleasant memories, are acutely painful and soon past.

The audience too assumes a new role in this kind of film. We no longer have the sense that we, together with the artist, are focusing our attention on the primary object of interest and importance—the work of art itself, the projected movement to or away from suffering. Rather we are impinged upon, we suffer. Our very sensibilities make it impossible for us to live a full, comfortable life within the terms of the film. In a sense, we, the audience, become the heroes in this conjunction of artist, work of art, and audience—and in the case of The Whisperers, we become something very like tragic heroes.

This, then, is how the roles have shifted in Mr. Forbes' film: we, the audience, are the focus of attention, the tragic heroes, being sped full force to an emotional destruction because of that quality which we prize the most, our human sensitivity. The artist has become the passive member of the trilogy, assuming the character usually reserved for the audience—the character of witnessing an action. Finally, the work of art itself becomes a kind of artist, working wonders of the imagination on both us and the film's director.

What are we to think of this? How are we to react to such an intensely painful experience as The Whisperers? There is a natural inclination to avoid pain, but to avoid pain on the single ground that it is pain is not only cowardice, but is also a direct rejection of most of human experience.

On the other hand, can we really believe that this film is a valuable artistic experience because it is painful? Mr. Forbes has achieved a notable success in his reworking of cinematic art, but the film has the faults of its virtues. In centring the artistic experience around us as the audience, the director has effectively destroyed the distinction between art and life.

While we can be grateful to Bryan Forbes for offering us an unusual and effective film—one that is a substantially different kind of artistic experience—we should be concerned that this new view tends to limit our artistic endeavours as much as it liberates them. The film is interesting and moving, but it is not necessarily a better kind of film. The Whisperers should be experienced and admired, but its peculiarities should be seen for what they are; these peculiarities should not be allowed the total domination of one's emotional awareness that they seem to demand—and get.

Neither Camp Nor Kitsch

By MEL BRADSHAW

One would like to be able to laugh The Day the Fish Came Out (now at the Towne) off as camp, or kitsch, or simply bad slapstick.

Inspired by the loss of the atomic bombs in Spain, the film recounts a similar incident, involving also a mysterious Container-Q, on the rocky Greek isle of Karos. For security reasons the recovery squad arrive in outlandish tourist attire and proceed to comb the shore in swim trunks while the pilot and co-pilot (Tom Courtenay) of the wrecked bomber wander around the island nude, not recognizing their disguised comrades.

Facetiously we might call the picture Dr. Strangelove Meets the Beach Boys. Outworn sight gags and a dialogue riddled with space-age clichés do little to discourage flippancy. Furthermore, poor old Beethoven, an apparently unending source of laughter, is unwillingly forced to supplement the otherwise adequate but undistinguished score.

If this is all there is to be said about the film, why mention it at all? Because it happens to bear the name Michael Cacoyannis; any resemblance to the director of Electra and Zorba the Greek would seem purely coincidental.

It appears that Cacoyannis is the victim of two trends in film-making. The first, represented by Polansky and Antonioni, is the production of films in English for a western audience. Now while The Day the Fish Came Out, like Zorba is bilingual in Greek and English, and while Cacoyannis, unlike the other directors named, has not left his native land, his latest film definitely bears the stamp of Hollywood. Whereas in Zorba the Englishman was shown the gaily, cruelty, and nobility of the Hellenic character, here our glimpses of the Greeks frequently offer little more than caricature and local colour.

In the second place, directors tend to feel increasingly like second-class artists if they do not write their own films; when you have been working with material by Euripides and Kazantzakis this is obviously a great mistake.

Given that this is Cacoyannis' film (in addition to writing and directing he also designed the flashy costumes) we should consider it as a serious work and not mere popular comedy. There are indications that the picture be paints of the pleasure seeking tourists is deliberately exaggerated to the point of being sinister: the sadism of the girl archeologist (Candice Bergen) for example,, and the all-day all-night dances in the town square. Undoubtedly he feels uneasy about our disregard of the threat of annihilation and tries to express these feelings, as in Strangelove, with black humour. But it would be cheating for him to ask us to write off the movie's triteness as purely intentional.

In addition to Cacoyannis', Tom Courtenay's talent is wasted in this film. After his controlled and intelligent performances in such films as King Rat and Doctor Zhivago he deserves better than a buffoon's part.

In view of the amount of ability gone wrong, The Day the Fish Came Out must rank as a major disappointment.

(Newspapers always do reaction stories, phoning up anyone involved or who have ever commented on an issue. They usually know what the reaction will be, but they phone and write it up.

(In the case of alleged obscenity, by reading the story over the phone, the press is really spreading it further. By writing about it, the press actually whets people's appetites for it. The problem is obvious.)

THE ANATOMY OF BOB VOLKMAN

One of the main things to keep in mind about the press is that unless you're working inside it or have been the subject of a news story and therefore contacted by the press, you have very little idea of how it really works. Where stories come from. What processes the reporter has to go through to get his story. What the techniques of reporting are. What considerations govern your decisions.

After The Review started planning this issue on the press, we became brief celebrities — or its opposite — in the press, radio and TV. What we learned from that experience taught us a lot about the press, from a side even a reporter doesn't see.

The Varsity obscenity case broke quietly during Nov. 8. Most students seemed to let the matter pass; one letter arrived.

Richter had been into the office at 1 p.m. to check that day's paper, and mumbled to himself that it seemed to be the best looking paper so far this year. He noticed that The Realist paragraph had not caused a fuss and while not making too large a point of that, wasn't surprised.

Parkins also found virtually no reaction during the day. He had only one telephone call — from a member of the medical faculty who appeared more interested in a friendly chat about the offending paragraph than in either condemning or complimenting us.

The first indication of the storm ahead came at 5:30 p.m. when The Globe's John Burns called Parkins at the office. They talked for nearly 25 minutes; it was more a conversation than an interview but The Globe's subtle insistence that the decision to run the paragraph was part of a sensationalist conspiracy showed through.

Richter, after spending the afternoon searching for a birthday gift for his girl friend, first learned that The Globe was anxious to talk about the matter when Parkins reached him about 6:30 p.m.

A few phone calls later (to his girl friend, Review editor Graham Fraser and others, on other matters) The Globe finally reached him. It was reporter Barry Craig.

Craig: "I'm calling about a story that appeared in today's Varsity."

Richter: One particular paragraph, I'll bet.

Craig: What? Oh, yes. One paragraph, I guess. I'm calling to ask what you think of that paragraph, you being Varsity editor. When was the decision made to print that paragraph? Was it reached a long time before, a day, two days?

(Craig was working under the assumption here that we had published to deliberately shock people. This bears out with what John Burns told us later. He had looked through The Varsity that day, found nothing interesting and put it down. Some time later city editor Rod Goodman came over and told him he hears The Varsity is going to reprint The Realist article to deliberately shock. Burns said he would watch for it and when he searched through the paper again (much later) he saw it. He took it to Goodman who took it to Clark Davey and both of them took it to Dick Doyle's office where decisions were made to rewrite that night's editorial charging that we printed it under the guise of news and to deploy several reporters to phone up everybody in the world for comment.

Richter: We decided to publish it when we worked on the story on publication night. It wasn't a very hard decision to make. We had the story from McGill and had to decide whether to quote from it. So we decided, well, let's quote from it. You see you've got to see it in the context of the university, where people are older than children and younger than squeamish adults. I think they can take such a paragraph intellectually and with it try to understand what's happening at McGill. It would have been hypocritical not to print it.

Craig: You say then that students are older than children and younger than adults.

Richter: Did you say squeamish?

Craig: No I didn't say squeamish.

Richter: Yes, but I did. I didn't say students are younger than adults.

Craig: But you said you thought they wouldn't be offended.

Richter: I hoped they wouldn't be. It wasn't printed to offend. See The Realist came out in June or July with this and there was a lot of talk about it then and since. Many people have read that article and have accepted it intellectually as satire. So by the time we got hold of it, there's surely been enough time to see that people look past the shock value of that article to what it tells about North America right now, the exploitation of the Kennedy death, people's desire to read and see gory details about the death (any death as a matter of fact). We used it for what it tells about McGill right now.

Craig: June or July? Your paper said The Realist came out in May.

Richter: It might have been May. I can't remember to offend. See The Realist came out in June or July with this and there was a lot of talk about it then and since. Many people have read that article and have accepted it intellectually as satire. So by the time we got hold of it, there's surely been enough time to see that people look past the shock value of that article to what it tells about North America right now, the exploitation of the Kennedy death, people's desire to read and see gory details about the death (any death as a matter of fact). We used it for what it tells about McGill right now.

Craig: There hasn't been much campus reaction then?

Richter: I can't say whether there was or not. I was away this afternoon looking for a present.

Craig: Well, I guess that's about it then.

Richter: Yes, I suppose. Are you going to mention I used to work for The Globe?

Craig: What? Ah, well, ah, I guess that's up to The Globe, isn't it?

Richter: Yes, but are you going to put it into your article.

Craig: Well, ah, . . . well maybe I will just for a laugh. Oh, one more thing. We want to send a photographer over and get your picture.

Richter: I'm going to my girlfriend's place to celebrate her birthday and before that I have to drop over to the library to read an essay for a class tomorrow.

Craig: Well, if we had a photographer at the library would you stand still for him? It would only take a couple of minutes.

Richter: No I don't want my picture to go with this. You'll just blow up the story bigger.

Craig: OK, then.

Richter: Listen I just got home and except for a phone call from Parkins, I don't know what's going on. What's in the rest of your story?

Craig: Well, Borden is angry; Dean Allen is too but thinks the whole matter should be handled by students. The cops said they probably won't do anything when we read the story to them. Claude Bissell said he wouldn't comment. He wouldn't even let us read the story to him.

Craig had talked to Parkins earlier and been told pretty well the same things as Burns. (The conversation hard to resolve in a free society, though. If the press becomes morally incensed at an instance of what it considers a lack of morality, it helps spread that lack of morality. Or, as was the case with much of the press comment on this particular issue, the issue can be used to fight another battle: hence obscenity to The Globe and The Tely shows that students should not be allowed more power).

OF A NEWS STORY

BY PARKINS AND

was regularly interrupted with reminiscences about the days, years ago, when Craig and Parkins were roommates working in the professional press in Winnipeg). Parkins' third conversation with Burns, about 8:30 p.m., was the first time he learned that Caput was involved, although Henry Borden had spoken much earlier in the day. Richter was told by Parkins immediately afterwards.

The Globe didn't mention that Richter used to work for them. Neither did the other two papers, but they got into the story late. Andy Szende at The Star knew it wouldn't be a major campus fuss when he first saw The Varsity story at noon; The Globe's major action on the story made it imperative that he match it. Sue Swann at The Telegram came in at 8 a.m. Thursday, when she phoned Parkins, asked only why he and Richter had run the article, said thank you and hung up.

At 9:50 p.m. Wednesday night, Richter had a visitor — Burns from The Globe. It was obvious what he was there for but he began by avoiding the main issue:

Burns: Has The Globe contacted you yet?

Richter: Yes.

Burns: What did they ask you?

Richter: What sort of decision we had to go through to publish that paragraph.

Burns: Good. What I'm here for is your picture.

Richter: I don't have any recent pictures.

Burns: Ah, but I have a photographer.

Richter: But as I've already explained on the phone, I'm not going to help The Globe blow this up any bigger.

Burns: Well, you know Alan Dawson is already blowing it up very big. (The story appeared as a three column head on the front page that night).

Richter: That's his business. I don't have to co-operate so he can drag my name through the mud further.

Burns: Well, you know what he might do. He might just put in a paragraph saying you refused to have your picture taken. That won't look good.

Richter: It will look silly for The Globe to have that paragraph among extensive quotes from me. First I wasn't even going to comment. But then I thought I'd better because that's the story people will be forming their first impression on.

Burns: You've handled yourself well so far but this might not look good.

Richter: I don't think so. (The Globe that morning had a three-year-old picture snipped out of an old Toronto-nensis, yearbook.)

Burns: Now remember I don't have any stake in this. I'm just doing a news story, which this is, and I was told to get a picture and I thought that you being in the business and all would understand this.

Richter: I see the point, but that still doesn't mean I have to co-operate anymore than I already have. (Being in the business made Richter realize the tactics of getting a picture. You try to convince the subject its in his best interest to have it taken.)

Burns: Borden is mad about this. It's a legitimate news story. It's not something The Globe has cooked up. It was all over the papers in Montreal and now its obviously moved here. (Burns said a day later: Well you know that two-thirds of the stories we print, we create).

Richter: I see that. But what you're making out of the story is an ugly affair that will better be forgotten. You'll have everybody in Toronto wondering what we printed. Right now I don't think it's that big a story and

I won't help you make it any bigger. Anyway Caput is meeting on this issue and the bigger the story the worse it'll be for me.

(Richter didn't bother pointing out to Burns that he's also pretty shy. In newspapers, it doesn't matter what a person is like. Only what he does.)

The Globe's Nov. 9 report had Henry Borden's opinion — "totally disgusting" — in the second paragraph. After going into some background it looked at the views of Parkins and Richter which were put together from the various interviews of Wednesday evening.

Parkins: I really don't know what all the fuss is about. We're not concerned about it, and the students don't seem to be.

Richter: ("surprised"): In the past we've printed material with bad words in it and there hasn't been a fuss. (It was) necessary in the context of a news story.

After The Globe comes out, the other news media go to work. Radio and television take stories from it (as they do from The Star and Tely). The Canadian Press puts the story on the wire to its daily paper members across Canada, to the New York Times and to The Associated Press, which distributes it all over the United States. We're not sure how far the story actually got, but obscenity is always a popular topic.

Next morning, the story was all over the radio, where, because of the type of medium radio is, it was so simplified that it was half wrong. The CFRB story read:

"Students at the University of Toronto responsible for the publication of The Varsity, the student newspaper, are in trouble with the university top brass for an article they republished from a U.S. satirical magazine, The Realist."

They used the furor of another paper's publication of the same article to reprint it in The Varsity. The heads of the university's colleges and faculties have called a special meeting to discuss the issue Monday.

Henry Borden, chairman of the university's board of governors called the article "disgraceful and thoroughly disgusting." (9 o'clock news, Nov. 9, 1967).

Thursday was hectic: radio stations phoning for comment and coming to the office; Channel 9 coming down to shoot an interview with Parkins; the downtown dailies making regular checks for our comments: Burns dropping in to get reaction from Varsity staff; a live TV interview on Channel 6 in the evening.

Different stations and media handled it differently. CFTO was generally sympathetic during the interview, although late at night the film clip was run after an introduction talking about the "trash" The Varsity had run. Channel 6's Warren Davis gave Richter and Parkins a rough session, and their interview was preceded by a short introduction which talked about "... a passage which is, by any definition, obscene." CBC Radio was much easier to get along with.

What it all meant was that on Nov. 9 Parkins and Richter were Toronto's central news figures. But their fame was brief: next day they could both sleep in, they could take The Varsity dog to the veterinarian, they could go for a few drinks with an old friend, they could drive about the city unnoticed. And what appeared for a while to have "story of the year" possibilities faded into oblivion. Unless, of course, the Press decides to keep it alive.

Hollywood Blues

By PETER GODDARD

"The level of the music here is very high, and it's getting better all the time. Everybody's writing the best he can. Where else can you write good music for a living these days? I'm writing closer to what I want than I ever have in my life."

Stravinsky speaking? Paul McCartney? No, it's Quincy Jones on the subject of American film music.

Honnegger, Auric, Milaud and Sauguet in France, William Walton in England, Kurt Weil in Germany, Prokofiev and Shostakovich in Soviet Russia have all composed film music that was more than a worthy contribution to film drama. Yet on this continent it has only been privately produced or government-produced documentaries that have occasionally made film music history.

That is, until recently. And one of the reasons for the new sound in motion picture scoring, and for the influx of acceptable young composers, is a change in the way the pictures themselves are made. Al Bart, an agent with General Artists Corporation who handles more than seventy composers, points out that in the days of the big studios "sometimes they would get a picture finished and find they had only $5,000 left for music. So the producer would call the head of the music department and say 'Get me a $5,000 composer.'

"Today that's all changed, with the rise of the independent producer, who brings in the whole package for the picture—the star, the director, the writer and often the composer. The independent producer has more control over his product, often total control, and he'll frequently have very specific ideas about what he wants in the way of music."

Henry Mancini is perhaps the best example of this trend. Mancini's fortunes rose with those of producer-director Blake Edwards, who used his scores for his television series Peter Gunn. When Edwards went on to make bigger budgeted pictures, Mancini went with him. But before the composer received professional and public acclaim for such films as Arabesque, Breakfast at Tiffany's and The Pink Panther, he laboured at Universal studios stamping out scores to nearly one hundred pictures such as Francis Joins the Army.

In many respects this was a similar position the baroque Kappellmeister found himself in. Having to churn out scores for numerous court or church functions, he did so with amazing alacrity and, too often, with a concomitant paucity of ideas. And like his seventeenth-century counterpart, many Hollywood composers have become better craftsmen because of the demands of their situation. But many have quit. Many are hacks. Many are opportunists. And many have gone, and will go unnoticed.

What is left is a small coterie of musicians who get the big, the important and probably what's most important, the lucrative scores to write. Quincy Jones, Lalo Schiffrin, and Johnny Mandel, three former jazz arrangers with extensive training in classical composition, are now established film composers. Recently, Iliver Nelson, Billy Byers and Gerry Mulligan each have written a Hollywood score.

Jazz musician Benny Carter has been in the field for years, though he is only now coming into any prominence. From popular music have come Nelson Riddle, Dave Grusin, Percy Faith and Don Costa. From rock, Paul McCartney (with more than a little help from his friend and producer George Martin), Johnnie Keating, from Britain, an another superior jazz-and-pop writer, is now in Hollywood. From India, Ravi Shankar heard in Ray's Apu Trilogy and in some of Norman McLaren's work.

But remaining in London is saxophonist and jazz composer Johnnie Dankworth who has emerged as a force in British film music with his scores for Darling and The Servant. Also in heavy demand is another Englishman, John Barry. In Sweden, Bergt Hallberg and Bengt-Arne Wallin, ex jazzmen have written for pictures.

Where Big Business snarled at Culture, it now se-duces it. Soundtrack albums and well-defined tunes from film scores have become potent factors in the commercial exploitation of pictures. The biggest popular song in the last twenty years is The Shadow of Your Smile from Johnnie Mandel's score to The Sandpiper. In eighteen months there accumulated more than 250 recorded versions.

The most common irritant to film composers is the inferior quality of recorded sound in the movie industry. Little money has been invested in new sound equipment. In fact, American productions are far behind the English in this regard. Because of this, many composers use commercial studios—some of the best are located in California—and re-record their scores for release on discs.

Here, there is an additional advantage in that the musical effects can be heightened. Movie underscores, after all, are necessarily subsidiary to dialogue and scenes. For the screened version there is usually a deliberate reticence in the readings of the music. Re-recording it for disc, the composer (who in many cases is also the conductor and perhaps even a performer) can make it more assertive, more immediate. "Besides," said Quincy Jones, "if you don't do it, you're stuck with the form of the picture—without the picture to help you."

Producer and composer seem as far apart as before. There has been no Hollywood movie comparable to British director, Peter Brook's 1955 production of Titus Andronicus at Stratford-on-Avon where the intentions of Mr. Brook the director were met by "an eerie throbbing of musique concrète" by Mr. Brook the composer. Few Hollywood composers, to quote Hugo Friedhofer (composer), "remember now that there's an extra instrument in their orchestra—the dialogue. Two extra instruments, really, because you also have sound effects. You can handle the problem in one of two ways. You can ignore it, as Dimitry Tiomkin used to do: or you can labor to figure out how to get things heard."

But while the close collaboration between composer and producer isn't yet evident on any wide scale, the music keeps improving. While many of the new composers have their roots in jazz and dance music, classical influences are also noticeable. In fact, Hollywood's musical eclecticism, which produce such pseudo-Russian ba-nalities as Lara's Theme, is its most distinguishing feature.

Mancini studied with Ernst Krenek, Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, and Alfred Sandry. Schiffrin studied with Juan-Carlos Paz in Argentina, and later, at the Paris Conservatory, with Oliver Messiaen and Charles Kocchlin. Quincy Jones studied for three years with Nadia Boulanger.

Most of these men are interested in serial composition; some write in the idiom used by the Claude Thornston Band; others use recent jazz ideas as for Jack Sheldon's trumpet work in The Sandpiper, Sonny Rollin's excellent tenor solos in Alfie.

But no matter how great the musician's technique, it is impossible to write real music about an unreal emotion. In a movie, music, like sound proper, has a tendency to stimulate the listener's receptiveness in general. It draws the spectator into the very center of the silent images and has him experience their photographic life.

"Music," writes Siegfried Krachauer in his Theory of Film, "makes the silent images partake of its continuity. Besides creating that brightness which keeps them close to us, it incorporates them into the inner time in which we grasp significant contexts. Ghostly shadows, as volatile as clouds, thus become trustworthy shapes."

(Thus the off-key color of John Barry's score in The Whisperers which calls for harpsichord, makes the music's pathos even quaint. In the case the music became a criticism on the poignancy of Mrs. Ross' plight. It suggested degeneration rather than loneliness).

But while there is the discrepancy between what might be and what is being done, most of the younger Hollywood musicians share Quincy Jones' outlook: The classical people are still brainwashed by the European tradition. They're such snobbish bastards that they haven't tapped one-tenth of America's musical resources. There have been exceptions, of course, such as Leonard Bernstein, on Broadway, and Aaron Copland. But there's so much that most of the people don't know about.

jazz

By JACK McCAFFREY

"Nothing's happening, man. How about getting into your Ornette Coleman - Eric Dolphy thing?" John Norris had just buttonholed Bernie Pilch, who was lugging his saxophone and flute into the library of Casa Loma, scene of the Fourth Annual Canadian Jazz Festival.

Up to that point, the evening had been devoid of musical interest. Ron Rully, an ageing hipster, led his group through a pretty routine rehash of music in the mode of Art Blakey's Jazz Misanthropists, although occasionally there emerged some intriguing sounds from the flugelhorn of Freddy Stone and the bass of Doug Willson.

In the Great Hall of the old castle, Jim Mcharg and his Metro Stompers alternated with Ray Sikora's Latin-rock band. Accompanying this was a so-called "psychedelic light show" which looked like high school biology slides projected onto the wall; the sight of various tiny creatures, tissues, organs, etc. undulating, expanding, contracting, and quivering did not heighten the music or stimulate the consciousness.

Scurrying around from room to room, the swing-in' tailor Dave Caplan succeeded in intruding after almost every number of the four groups alternating in the two rooms. Perhaps having a sycophantic "M.C." foisted on them helps to explain why musicians are not too keen about participating in this alleged festival. Another reason may be the lack of organization—chairs were not set up in time, and people just wandered around between the bar, the library and the Great Hall, talking, drinking, filling the place up with cigarette smoke, not paying any attention to the groups. The musicians responded with an equal amount of enthusiasm for the music. It's a pity, because a real Canadian Jazz Festival could be an opportunity for musicians to really play and reach an audience.

Finally, around midnight, Freddy Stone assembled his big band and shook the place up a bit. Unfortunately, although the music was ambitious, and the musicians attacked it enthusiastically, the approach to each tune tended to be too much the same—fast, loud and frenetic. However the band has much potential, and with more work could be the most exciting jazz band in Canada.

And so, although Bernie Pilch did dip into his Ornette bag to produce some ear-opening solos in the Stone eusemble, he could not rescue the evening, which, on the whole was a drag.

Let Us Now Praise Famous Men.

Bob Parkin's dog just urinated in the Review office for the second time in two days; we let him do it of course not so much because we like the dog (we do) but because Bob Parkins has yet to learn that dogs have to do it too, and he never gets taken out for a walk.

It's a nice dog, Bob's doggy — you might have seen it at the last SAC meeting barking away as the honourable members pounded their tables as they debated whether or not they liked Volkmar Richter, Bob Parkins and necrophilia, in that order. One member who didn't seem to like any of them also objected to the dog's presence in the august chamber of council and seriously asserted that "Mr. Parkins" should refrain from bringing along his dog.

The next thing I saw was Bob's lanky figure running wildly around the tables trying to catch his dog who didn't want to be caught. He was barking furiously by that time, and I thought it was sort of nice to hear something intelligent, instead of a speech.

The poor dog probably wanted to get the speaker's attention so he could be recognized on the floor. As it was, someone else got up and barked about something else.

Anyway, the dog and I have come to an agreement about using the Review office for his natural functions; we're going to take it to Hart House for a walk the next time Council meets there; natural functions deserve natural settings. Of course Parkins might get charged for contributing to gross indecency; I wonder how the resolution will be worded:

"It is resolved that Council fully agrees with the right of Mr. Parkins dog 'Sandy,' to go wee-wee whenever it must; we express however, our strongest disapproval and disgust, etc, etc."

Woof.

For the self-righteous element on this campus who are confused about obscenity and the Varsity-McGill-Realist story, I reprint a quote from James Agee's Let Us Now Praise Famous Men:

“Above all else: In God's name don't think of it as Art.

Every fury on earth has been absorbed in time, as art, or as religion or as authority in one form or another. The deadliest blow the enemy of the human soul can strike is to do fury honor. Swift, Blake, Beethoven, Christ, Joyce, Kafka, name me a one who has not been thus castrated. Official acceptance is the one unmistakable symptom that salvation is beaten again, and is the one surest sign of fatal misunderstanding, and is the kiss of Judas.

Really it should be possible to hope that this be recognized as so, and as a mortal and inevitably recurrent danger. It is scientific fact. It is disease. It is avoidable. Let a start be made. And then exercise your perception of it on work that has more to tell you than mine has. See how respectable Beethoven is; and by what right any wall in museum, gallery or home presumes to wear a Cezanne, and by what idiocy Blake or wwork even of such intention as mine is ever published and sold. I will tell you a test. It is unfair. It is untrue. It stacks all the cards. It is out of line with what the composer intended. All so much the better.

Get a radio or a phonograph capable of the most extreme loudness possible, and sit down to listen to a performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony or of Schubert's C-Major Symphony. But I don't mean just sit down and listen. I mean this: Turn it on as loud as you can get it. Then get down on the floor and jam your ear as close to the loudspeaker as you can get it and stay there, breathing as lightly as possible, and not moving, and neither eating nor smoking nor drinking. Concentrate everything you can into your hearing and into your body. You won't hear it nicely. If it hurts you, be glao of it. As near as you will ever get, you are it; your body is no longer your shape and substance, it is the shape and substance of the music.

Is what you hear pretty? or beautiful? or legal? or acceptable in polite or any other society? It is beyond any calculation savage and dangerous and murderous to all equilibrium in human life as human life is; and nothing can equal the rape it does on all that death; nothing except anything, anything in existence or dream, perceived anywhere remotely toward its true dimension.

'Beethoven said a thing as rash and noble as the best of his work. By my memory, he said: "He who understands my music can never know unhappiness again." I believe it. And I would be a liar and a coward and one of your safe world if I should fear to say the same words of my best perception, and of my best intention.

Performance, in which the whole fate and terror rests, is another matter.”

Now that people have stopped beating their breasts in anger and self-righteousness about the Varsity scandal, perhaps we can draw it to a close with an unearthed manuscript which Varsity Sports editor Rod Mickleburgh just handed to me; quite apart from writing the best sports column the Varsity has seen in many years, the lad has a sense of wit:

In the interests of good journalism, Mickleburgh feels that the following extract, previously alluded to in the press, must not go unpublished. The book, called "Birth of a Touch Football Player," was written by Manchester at an early age after observing the young president-to-be at play:

"... an incident in Playroom One which this writer conceives to be delerium, but which an old gardener insists he actually saw ... The scamp was crouching over the Horse, no longer chuckling, but breathing hard and moving it back and forth rhythmically. At first I thought he must be performing some mysterious family rite he'd learned from Joseph P. as a boy. And then I realized —there is only one way to say this—he was literally sucking his thumb. In the hole in the front of his face. He reached a climax and dismounted. I froze. The next thing I remember, he was swearing in his rocking horse as Trigger.

High Swinging Dagoes and Shiftless Hunkies

By ALAN GORDON

A sweet old lady in Philadelphia manages, with no apparent effort, to reduce all Italians to high-singing Dagoes, all Jews to overpaid doctors, and all people from Hungary to shiftless Hunkies. And we laugh along.

In the same evening, a boisterous, Ralph Kramden type character, whose life is a bluff and whose philosophy is akin to a leech's, manages to destroy a family, a car, and all previous judgements made by us on his character.

This evening is The Show Off, a 1920's comedy by George Kelly. It was written in a time when the Calvin ethic of success only coming from hard work was being questioned.

In the Show Off, the hard workers collapse. Honesty is rewarded with exploitation. Idealism is censured by the sensible. In a world of deceit and hypocrisy, it is the liars and the deceivers that survive. The meek inherit the dirt. Kelly is as critical of the American Dream as Arthur Miller and Sinclair Lewis were, but he criticizes Americana with laughter. We laugh at Aubrey Piper, the show off. We chorle with the sweet-old-lady-bigot as she assumes her own inevitable rightness and distorts evidence to the contrary to such an extent that it serves as roof ... and we realize that we are laughing at ourselves.

These are the people that live in our house, that eat with us, speak with us, and inadvertently shape our minds until unconsciously, we react as they do, laugh in approval of all they do.

The Show Off pretends to be a winning low-key comedy about life 'as it is' just like at home. Its a little more daring than I Remember Mama. It is peopled with characters as winning as Arthur Godfrey at his most unctuous and pandering.

The A.P.A. repertory company once again covers itself with glory. Helen Hayes presents us with a fully realized Mrs. Fisher. She's a subtle Maud Frickert, who can suffer pain at the possible loss of her husband, but is just as capable or ruthlessly reducing her son-in-law's idealism to foolishness, his dreams to 'nonsense'. He is, she maintains, 'a damn fool'. Clayton Corzette offers a sensitive reading of the damn fool, Audrey Piper. Corzatte as Piper manages to annoy both a family and entire audience with his horse-laughing, backslapping "personality". Corzatte is always in control, never does he broaden the part into caricature. The girls in the show are excellent. Gwyda Donhowe makes an innovation of the character of Clara, the girl who has married sensibility and loneliness.

She's found all kinds of new things in this usually stereotypical role.

Amy is another ingenue role. She's a gal who loves her man no matter what, but author George Kelly and Actress Pamela Payton-Wright have managed to create a person of great depth and believability. She isn't the breathless cute-young-thing of the Natalie Wood, Sandra Dee variety. Amy has stuff. She stays with Aubrey despite the constant barrage of threats, insults and wholehearted, half-truthed slurs. The company is brilliant. There isn't a bad actor up there. The characters are given the ligaments and muscle of life by a splendid cast.

On Theatre and Off

BY DAVID PAPE

Burn yourself out; the old ashes are stirring into life. With the Players' Guild still hoping to revive itself, the U.T.D.C. — Phoenix (U. of T. Drama Club) is back in action.

The U.T.D.C. (Sac sponsored) has so far held a playwriting contest, and has a one-act play festival ready to go on Monday night. Winning plays from the contest are also to be performed in the new year. By the way, there were between eleven and fourteen entries.

Why the fuss? Because the U.T.D.C. is worth it. Two years ago it brought great actors from the Canadian Players to direct workshops in acting. Similar arrangements could be made with the new Theatre Toronto.

The U.T.D.C. and the Players' Guild revive together. They ought to be able to combine their aims; and the result could be arrangements for shows to tour various colleges or faculties (how many of you wanted to see Waiting for Godot but couldn't get in?). Or, with Sac money, we could hold a one-act festival including other universities. Why not bring Yale, Harvard, Michigan? The lure of a silver prize. Or, we might even establish a student repertory company!

An old Players' Guild custom was to provide lunch for visiting stars if they would speak to an audience between mouthfuls. Remember Burton's Hamlet? It was Hume Cronin and Jessica Tandy then, up on the Women's Union stage.

On Wednesday, the U.T.D.C. followed suit, bringing Gordon Gould of the APA to speak, although at tea-time, in a classroom, and there was no tea to steep.

Gould stressed that the great thing about a rep company is that it can drag an old play out of its repertoire, simply because it needs the public airing. If the Players' Guild became a kind of rep company, we could do The Investigation again when nothing else was scheduled. About a thousand saw it last year; and the play hasn't lost its challenge.

Having a growing repertoire of one-act plays for the noon-hour shows would be a help in the organisation of the Guild each difficult autumn. It would give directors a framework to rely on. And more important, it would make experimental theatre really experimental. Experiments prove nothing when they occur in a void. A repertoire would supply the necessary background for experiment. Innovation would add to an existing tradition, rather than supply a production gimmick. There is no reason why our directors must work with respect to a tradition that is not their own. The people at Stratford, Ontario, are not interested in commenting on what goes on at Stratford, Connecticut.

Let the U.T.D.C. continue to bring us guests. I'd love to meet Helen Hayes. Or get John Colicos to speak on Lear, his last magnificent role at Stratford. The university is a relaxing place; and judging by Gordon Gould, it provides a disguise he was most happy to put on again after all these years outside. Invite these people, and see how they'll come.

It was interesting to compare the origins of the APA with our own Drama Centre. The APA was first sponsored in the States by universities: Princeton and then Michigan (where it still resides). The APA has always had its own control of the programme. Get that! This year, the Drama Centre has already had to drop one play because the planning committee failed to see that production costs would be one figure and the allotted budget was another and there was $7,000 between.

Not only is budget overlooked, but casting too. An independent company chooses its play by considering its talent. The Drama Centre is partly professional because it has to be. Last year's production of Strinberg's The Father was forced to go off campus for its cast. Ibsen's John Gabriel Borkman will no doubt be semi-professional for the same reason. Plays are chosen with no consideration of who on campus can play what. As Gould said, "You don't schedule King Lear if no one can do the part."

At Yale, at Michigan, and most recently at Minnesota (The Tyrone Guthrie Theatre), they have found it necessary to keep the professional and the student companies apart. Students were not content with walk-ons; and they could never really become one with the company. If Barry Morse and Irene Worth are to act on campus, I will gladly be their audience. Let them at least have a good strong company to play against.

As it is, the Drama Centre has too many conflicting aims. It wants to produce little known plays of importance to the history of the theatre. It wants to give students good parts; to stage productions studded with professionals, and of high calibre, but within a limited budget.

The example of the Yanks is there to be followed or ignored. Keep the pros away from the students. Have two separate companies. Draw up their seasons with consideration to talent as well as literary interest. The pros will be able to help the drama students in their work; the students will have the example of professional productions; and the university itself will emerge as an educated audience. Surely this is possible in a city that now supports successfully five (count 'em, five) professional groups.

With all the talk of new theatres, two stable locations have to be found. Perhaps the renovated Women's Union could serve one of these companies, and the church on Glen Morris continue to serve as rehearsal hall. The present set-up is unsatisfactory to everyone.

Exhibitions on Campus: Teitelbaum At HH and Donges At SMC

By JOAN MURRAY

Maschel Teitelbaum is having an outstanding retrospective show at Hart House (till Weds). The works range over ten years. "Untitled" of 1955 seems to look forward to the artist's future abstract works in its verve and fragmented depth (the 'in-and-out' surface). However, the small strokes suggest the tentativeness of the young artist. In 1957, a number of figurative works appear — all violently emotional, like "Three generations" and "Dark Self".

These pictures show the probable influence of Max Beckman, whom Teitelbaum studied under in 1951. Conservative as these pictures seem to be in contrast to the rest, they lack Beckman's characteristic symbolism and his dry, iconic style. Actually, these works by Teitelbaum, especially the unlabelled expressionist nude, are already more dynamic, active and more powerfully scaled than anything Beckman ever did.

By 1962, Teitelbaum was under the full influence of Jackson Pollock — witness pictures like "Discourse with Painter Anonymous" and "Subterranean Passage." These two works have the netlike Pollock surface, filled to the furthest interstices of the canvas.

Later works draw away from this position and by 1964, the artist is creating plainer, more active signs. This is the period when Teitelbaum came into his own: his richly dramatic, emotional, dynamic style asserts itself in pulsating rhythms and richly painted surfaces. The moods vary from that of mystery in the "Visionary Night" of the Zacks Collection to ritual dances. Some weird and humorous compositional motifs may also appear like the little white blob, a perfect exclamation point, in "Visionary Night."

The artist's most recent work is even more "purist" than before, consisting of two or three lines abruptly scrapped across a surface. These, like all the works, are powerful though scarcely serene.

One of the masterpieces of the show is "Sarabane Red and Black" and it more than anything else reveals what Teitelbaum has to say. Through its explosive, gorgeous filling of the surface, it tells us about the excitement of painting — and of living.

Some critics have felt that this dynamic "gesture" painting lacks enough "thought" but after all, these are like ritual dances. Do you think when you dance? And how? Furthermore, there does happen to be a distinct element of thought in the pictures, but it is thought of a special kind: the Zen-Buddhist thinking which seeks to cleave to the center of the problem of a problem through acute questions like "What is the sound of one hand clapping?" Teitelbaum's "Sound of One Hand" makes it clear that this was what he was working out.

DONGES AT SMC

The show of Langley Donges at St. Michael's could not be more different from that of Teitelbaum's but is very good in its own way. The artist, a graduate of O.C.A. and an original member of the Ontario Institute of Painters, studies under J. E. H. Macdonald, Beatty, Haines, Lismer, and others. His landscapes display an excellent sense of color, and a distinct feeling for the Canadianness of the scene. Incidentally, the students like them a great deal, I was informed.

This show is on for two weeks.

XMAS BOOKS

Two little books which would make charming Christmas presents are The Cherry Tree Legend, drawn and lettered by Ben Shahn, MOMA (Doubleday publishers), $1.25, and Roy Kiyooka's Nevertheless These Eyes, Coach House Press, $2.50.

The first of these books is of Christmas card size, and relates a legend about Cherry Trees, Mary, Joseph, and Christ child. Illustrated by Ben Shahn, the legend is exquisitely told. Shahn's lettering resembles Christmas stars, and his drawings, Byzantine and medieval-like, strike just the right note.

Roy Kiyooka's poems are especially interesting because he is an outstanding modern Canadian artist. Unlike his paintings which tend to be "world landscapes" of the Op Art school, his poems are personal, lyrical, evocative and tender, all dealing with a myth-like Beloved. Much of his imagery is — naturally — visual and there is a single overtone of Dylan Thomas in "the lights of summerland shine in the orchard where I died." Some of Kiyooka's notes on painting are touching, like his comment on Munch's Cry of 1893.

The Coach House Press continues to do the top publishing job for poets in Canada; this book is elegant and inexpensive. It will be a collector's item in a few years, since only a limited edition is being printed.

CORRECTION

Two weeks ago in my article on Canadian Furniture books, I called D. R. Stewart who wrote A Guide to Pre-Confederation Furniture of English Canada an "interested amateur." It has been pointed out to me that Mr. Stewart is "not an amateur since he has been dealing in antiques for many, many years" specializing for the last ten years in Canadian hand-made furniture prior to 1867. He did operate an antique shop in Rockwood, but now devotes his time to restoring old Canadian houses.

My apologies to Mr. Stewart for this misunderstanding. I did not mean any denigration of his undoubtedly real capacities and background; I was using the term in, I admit, an extremely restricted sense. For me, a professional in the field of Canadian furniture is an individual like Mrs. Ryder, the Curator of the New Brunswick Museum. Whom I reviewed in the same review.

Ralph Allen: A Pioneer, But Less Than Fresh To Us

By CHARLES MARTIN

When Christina Newman was compiling The Best of Ralph Allen (McClelland and Stewart, 1967, 184 pp.), Blair Fraser was asked to look over some of the Maclean's editorials to make sure that none of the ones he wrote would be included by mistake. It turned out that sure enough, some of the editorials being considered were written by Fraser.

In fact, this rather trivial point is a comment on the writings of a man who was perhaps the best-loved journalist among the working press today. Allen was not an outstanding, or rather, particularly distinctive journalist to read for someone who did not know him.

Like most of the older journalists in this country, Allen was shaped by the depression. Like Hugh MacLennan's memorable George Stewart, the saddened journalist of The Watch That Ends the Night, these men had (and in many cases still have) a kind of saddened, battered liberal (some insist that it's Liberal) idealism; a sense of humour and a warm, often folksy human quality that glows through a nostalgia that often sounds like defeat.

And yet, this was the generation that made post-war Canada, and post-war Canadian journalism, Christina Newman, in her introduction, writes of the awe in which she held the staff at Maclean's—good ol' Maclean's which at one time or another has employed nearly all of the Toronto journalist set, from Pierre Berton to Robert Fulford, Peter Gzowski and many others.

"When I look back with the staler eyes of thirty-two, I realize that they cannot possibly have been as fabulous as I thought them then; that they were, in fact, an odd and untidy crew. But I do not suppose that I will ever regard with anything but affectionate respect the people who worked for Ralph Allen in those days; that I will ever again think of anyone as having as exciting and as germinal a journalistic mind as Pierre Berton displayed; or as much personal grace as Blair Fraser possessed; ... or as much daring as Sidney Katz who talked to criminals and call girls and swallowed LSD, a drug nobody had heard of, all in the name of Maclean's; ... or as much caustic civility as McKenzie Porter who knew about wines and wore suede shoes in an era when Canadians drank in beer parlors and were addicted to Sunday suits."

It is difficult for us to feel this kind of awe when Pierre Berton is packaging and selling slick televised and printed versions of his own liberal superficiality, and McKenzie Porter has turned his "caustic civility" into a gossip column for The Telegram.

And yet, this proves our own jadedness as much as it reflects on Allen and his generation. Allen, with his predecessor Arthur Irwin, re-made Maclean's from a tired and irrelevant magazine into what Newman calls "a first-class magazine produced by Canadians for Canadians, but without any of the diffidence or self-consciousness with which Canadian enterprises had so long been cursed."

Allen was also a warm and loveable man; the awe and love that Canadian journalists everywhere had for him emerges in this kind and affectionate book.

Allen started out as a sports writer at the age of sixteen, arriving in Winnipeg in 1930 with five dollars and some clippings from the home-town paper in Oxbow Sask. His family could not afford to help him go to university, and like many reporters, before him, he started writing on sports for fifteen dollars a week.

The warm human quality that Allen's writing had, the quiet blend of cheerfulness, toughness, folksiness pessimism and nostalgia are the qualities of top-flight sports writers and war correspondents—both of which Allen was. However, perhaps unfortunately, it has less appeal to our more jaded eyes.

Best Articles 1967: An Incisive Literate Delight

By GRAHAM FRASER

Best Magazine Articles: 1967, edited by Gerald Walker; Crown Publishers, Inc.; New York, 1967.

Since the publication and great popularity of Tom Wolfe's book, the impact of Truman Capote's In Cold Blood, and the use of his term "non-fiction novel," and the change in style in magazines like Esquire and Ramparts, people have begun to speak differently about journalism. There is something that people call "New Journalism"; a vivid, detailed, demanding kind of journalism that is often as remote from the traditional Who-What-When-Where-Why style of reporting, written in the "inverted pyramid" (which means that the important things are at the beginning so readers can stop reading as soon as they want, and editors can cut from the bottom) as Leonard Cohen is from Anthony Trollope.

Tom Wolfe, the baroque virtuoso of New Journalism, commented recently, "Every technique of fiction is now available to us. Stream of consciousness and subjective truth is the next breakthrough. Gay Talese's article in Esquire in 1958, "Joe Louis at 50," is a classic in this direction; Truman Capote, who in my opinion is not a first-rate writer, was only doing in In Cold Blood what Talese had done six or seven years before."

Seymour Krim, in a brilliant article on the New Journalism in the August Evergreen Review, writes "Perhaps there was a time, really, truly, down in the belly, when fiction in America shed more light on the outlook of a generation than non-fiction; but today the application of fictional and avant-garde prose techniques to the actual scene before us seems much more crucially necessary ... The average piece of New Journalism ...

keeps moving into this universe of unreality and exposing it with the zest that Sinclair Lewis once used to tear the hide off Main Street."

Best Magazine Articles: 1967 (and its accompanying Honor Roll) is a proof that American journalism has hit a period of excitement and skill that makes one think of the legends of Harold Ross's New Yorker in the thirties. (In fact, one doesn't need a book to learn this; any copy of Esquire, or Ramparts—or, for that matter, Sports Illustrated should be evidence enough.)

Some of the anticipated Crown Princes of the new, hip, young journalism are there: Gay Talese, Tom Wolfe and Warren Hinkle. Many more are in the Honor Roll: Jimmy Breslin, Robert Cristgau (a columnist for Esquire), Robert Coles (the angry psychiatrist who is an associate editor of The New Republic, Nat Hentoff (one of the most articulate jazz critics, and perceptive radical journalists writing), Pauline Kael (NR's iconoclastic film critic), Andrew Kopkind, Richard Rovere ...

But the remarkable thing about the book and the honor roll are the number of writers that one has never heard, all of whom write very well.

There is an immediacy about the writing in this book which is gripping and incisive. But more than mere sensation-mongering, these articles share a sensitivity and a perception that equals the art of the so-called "creative writer," and an intellectual rigorosity that puts the academic writers to shame.

The challenge of magazine writing, as anyone who has tried it will testify, is demanding, and often frightening. As Krim says, "(The journalist) is playing the most potentially dangerous game of all, writing about real, observable, aftermath-ridden life situations; and yet—to the extent that he is a writer equal in skill and ambition to the good novelist—he has to invest this living material with every bit of his artistic sense, his concern for language, mood, insight, suspense, moral value."

One of the surprising things about this book is that, in reading the articles, it is impossible to guess the publication. There are selections from magazines as different as The New York Review of Books and True and Ramparts, Life and Dissent. And yet the quality of each piece is such that any magazine would print it. My rather snobbish disdain for magazines like Life, True, Look, and Saturday Evening Post melted in embarrassment. (The inclusion of a Sports Illustrated article didn't surprise me; it has always been the one Luce publication that I have consistently enjoyed and admired).

The most consistent sign of artistry in these articles—and the most difficult thing to write in a large, vivid magazine piece—is in the endings. In each—Gay Talese's piece on the middle-aged Joe DiMaggio, Tom Wolfe on an urban crowding in Manhattan, Conrad Knickerbocker on Malcolm Lowry as remembered by his friends, William P. Fox jr. on a Miami Hotel,—in each, the writer is able, somehow, in a photographic instant, to catch a moment that distills the graphic progression of the whole article.

Perhaps the best example is the ending of T.V. LoCicero's article in Commentary on the murder of Rabbi Adler in Detroit. After a long fascinating profile of Richard Wisnietzky's psychic decay, LoCicero concludes with the note that Richard left concerning what he intended to do, written in the past tense:

"My distorted, disoriented voice, either barely uttered or tremendously violent, gives you a slight horrifying glimpse into the dehumanized future that awaits you and your unfortunate children, who will be healthy, comfortable and secure beyond your fondest dreams and just as diseased. Since I feel that I am no longer able to make any creative contributions I shall make a destructive one ... Listen to my voice, you deaf ones. Listen to how sick, sad, lonely and farlarn it is."

And that sums up a great deal.

Reston: The Owl's Dilemma

By BOB RAE

The Artillery of the Press by James Reston, Harvard Colophon Books $2.25.

A series of lectures given to the Council on Foreign Relations, this book is neither piercingly original nor brilliantly perceptive. It does, however, point out the obvious and, at times, the not-so-obvious, facts about the role of the press in making foreign policy in a skillful and utterly respectable way. It is, in short, quite typical of what one has come to expect from old-fashioned liberalism in general and James Reston in particular.

David Levine once drew a caricature of Reston holding a hot dog in one hand and a wholesome slice of apple pie in the other. In the best traditions of Horatio Alger himself, Reston worked his way up from a cup sports reporter to the center of power in Washington. He is now generally recognized as one of the most respected and 'reliable' of Washington pundits. In this book, there is this emphasis on reliability and old-fashioned honesty; on where to get the news, and who to tap in the States Department and the diplomatic corps. It is an approach refreshing not for its originality, but for its tweedy professionalism. It is a reaffirmation of basic liberal values about the duty and function of the press that is almost reassuring.

Reston manages, at one time or other in the book, to ask some of the more difficult questions on power in Washington and the conduct of foreign policy. He is perceptive enough, and professional enough, to know the great dangers of being used by sources, of being managed by the President, of being compromised by his position in the establishment.

But mentioning the dangers is surely not enough, and his answers simply do not match the questions. So his too-constant hammering away at the theme of 'responsibility' and the 'vast complexity of foreign policy' become somewhat annoying; the war in Vietnam is often explained away simply by pointing to the fact that there are no easy solutions. Complexity easily becomes an excuse for non-action.

Reston's conclusions about the influence of the press on Presidential power is that it is very small indeed, and decreasing daily. It is a conclusion which Reston understates and underemphasizes. What he is really driving at is a question more significant than perhaps he himself wants to admit.

And that question, quite obviously, is one of power, and of decision-making. It is a truism to say that Presidential power has been increasing, and that the influence of Congress and 'the responsible press' is on the decline, particularly in wartime government. And this is precisely why Reston's 'modest proposals' about how to refine and improve the artillery of the press seem so inadequate.

Fulbright's hearings on China obviously had an educational function, as do at least some of Reston's articles on other aspects of American foreign policy, but both have had scant effect on actual policy. There is an almost incredible sterility in the earnest, frustrated suggestions coming from would be liberal critics of Administration policy. It was Walter Lippman who had to leave Washington, and not Dean Rusk, though most of Lippman's statements over the past three or four years have been somewhat wiser and more reasoned than those of the Secretary of State.

The old liberal belief that 'everything will be all right' or that somehow an educational process will eventually change foreign policy does not come to grips with the problem of how to deter Executive power, how to make it less arbitrary. Reston's owlish Vietnam outlook simply does not match the strength of the hawks.

Reston's personal artillery, for all its erudition and skill, is compromised by factors implicit in his position in Washington. Any reporter relies on official sources for information: for the most part, these sources are State Department officials, special advisors to the President, and, occasionally, when the blessing is given, the President Himself. And herein lies the danger. Particularly in the present political situation, government officials are only going to give special information and ideas to those they can trust.

While Reston obviously has many personal friends in Washington, his orthodoxy, or lack of it, is a governing factor in whether or not he can be given information. Walter Lippman left Washington because no one

Academic Gutlessness

By BILL BARCLAY

Well, the academics have finally labelled Leonard Cohen. They have managed to reduce him to so many words of innocuous literary criticism. And there he lies, formulated and apparently harmless on the page.

It is safe, now, for you Eng. Lang. & Lit. types to read him. Now you can accept the validity of his existence without being affected by him—provided you read the academics first. For they will arm you with the critical jargon and appropriate labels that will enable you to keep him at a safe distance.

In the latest issue of the respectable scholarly quarterly, Canadian Literature, Desmond Pacey and Sandra Djwa have erected in fine academic fashion two systematized literary theories explaining Cohen's poetry and novels. Their essays are well-written and, for the most part, sound in judgment. (Both praise the achievement of his writing).

But like most castrated academics, they have left the guts of Cohen out of their essays. They have once again affirmed the academic precept that a writer, whether it be Baudelaire, or Whitman, or Eliot, or Cohen, can be explained and accounted for in 10,000 or more words of literary jargon.

Djwa fits Cohen into the European and American traditions of the black romantics, citing Genet, Grass, Burroughs, and others, as fellow inhabitants of the darker side of the soul. Pacey notes Cohen's debt to Christian, Judaic, Greek, Indian, and Oriental mythologies. My God! Can't you just see Leonard Cohen and Northrop Fryc walking hand in hand down the Main in Montreal!

What is sad about Pacey and Djwa is that they spend all their energy in trying to fit Cohen into patterns, traditions, and mythologies—albeit, probably the right ones—as if the essential significance of his writings and life can be explained in categories.

And that is precisely what is wrong with too many academics. In their minds, literature becomes detached, organized, labelled. The formation of their theories, the cataloguing of their facts, is supervised by the objective intellect, that sacred cow of the universities. Their knowledge, as Scott Symons notes in Place d'Armes, become "still-life" that offends no one.

Obsessed with the desperate need to classify, the academics have forgotten that the guts of literature is our own personal response to it. They have forgotten that literature is not scholarship, but life. And to be honest with ourselves we have to respond to it, not with our minds, but with our own guts.

Many scholars, in professing to approach a work of literature closely, inevitably manage to distance both themselves and the reader from the writer—or the viewer from the artist, or the listener from the composer. Instead of creating a link of understanding between the reader and the writer, the critic creates a barrier that prevents a sensitive response.

English Lit. profs in particular seem to have a paranoid fear of emotional involvement in a book, and of having to cope with a subjective approach within themselves, let alone with their students. So they cease to ask the important questions, and even help their students avoid such questions. They immerse themselves in the peripheral irrelevancies of style, form, and mythology, refusing to allow themselves to be vulnerable to a book that might challenge their minds and assault their emotions.

For to respond with intimate honesty to such hooks as Cohen's Beautiful Losers or Scott Symons Place d'Armes can be a terrifying experience. It is upsetting to many of us to have to concede that an apparently ugly homosexual relationship can be beautiful. And it is profoundly disturbing to know, within our gut, that if we did not deny the possibility of such an act in our own minds, we too might be capable of a similar act of love. We use objectivity to shield us from such upset. We employ the mind to deny the body. That is the real perversion.

The guts of Leonard Cohen is that he moves us with his words and with his life, that he is saying and living what many of us would like to be saying and living if we had the courage. His guts is his awareness that "the poem is a dirty, bloody, burning thing that has to be grabbed first with bare hands." And no amount of literary theorizing can destroy the fact that Cohen is saying something compelling and vitally important to our generation.

was talking to him. All the old sources, like the Pedernales itself, had dried up. As officials become more defensive — and helligerent — about foreign policy (and here I am obviously speaking of Vietnam) 'loyalty' and orthodoxy become that much more important: those who fall out of sympathy with the party line are left out in newsless limbo.

Again, one fears that owls like Reston, as well as doves, like Lippman, have lost any of the influence they might once have had on a peacetime administration. This is particularly true of the Kennan-George Ball-old diplomacy for which Reston shows a considerable affinity.

It is, then a dilemma of power, and not so much one of education or improvement in the quality of reporting as Reston would suggest. The President — but particularly this President with his extraordinary jealousy and his peculiar way of dealing with individual 'chosen' press members rather than with press conferences — always has the power to pull the strings, and to control official news, however indirectly. Reston, unfortunately, has not really come to grips with this question, though he himself raises it.

A reporter as traditional and as established as Reston is not going to come up with any blazingly radical analyses of a political issue, nor with sparkingly new interpretations of what relationships should exist in the government power structure. His is an old-fashioned, common-sensical approach: President Johnson is not the end of the world, Vietnam will not unmake or break the U.S., most State Department officials are honest, bright and scrupulous observers of foreign affairs. There is no cause for hysterical concern. Better reporters, more in-depth commentary, more attempts at professional reporting by diplomats, scientists and academics will provide the basis for improvement.

Reston thus expresses a confidence in the corporate structure which is becoming difficult to accept: one would like to think that he is right, but the strength of military-industrialist power establishment makes old liberalism's approach somewhat dated and inadequate.

Variant on Ripley

By MEL BRADSHAW

Beyond Language: Adventures in Word and Thought, Dmitri A. Borgmann, New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1967.

Publishing a collection of puzzles in hardback involves a degree of pretention: there seems to be no book one will want to reread less, or for that matter keep as a reference work. Such pretention is consistent with Dmitri A. Borgmann's attitude towards his Beyond Language. In the introduction he warns us that his creation will teach us to think (italics his) if we are not careful and that it will help equip us "mentally and emotionally" to cope with our times. After so exalting what he calls "recreational linguistics" at the outset he turns around in the afterword to reduce all human pursuits to the status of word games.

Beyond Language consists of four main parts: Problems, Hints, Solutions, and a section of Bafflers, problems for which no solution has yet been found. Paradoxically it is the bafflers which appear the most satisfactory as problems; they appear to be as helpfully and clearly stated as possible while the answered questions often seem unfair and deliberately obscure. Many are not linguistic problems but demand knowledge of recherché historical and geographical details. Moreover, the hints are seldom helpful; rather they pose additional questions.

The main value of Borgmann's book, to my mind, is as a collection of engaging trivia. While many of the questions seem merely rhetorical the answers make good reading. For example, did you know that Illinois comes from the French ile noire, that a swastika may also be called a cross potent rebated or a cross of Thor, that aidiomania, clitoromania, and hysteromania are all synonyms for nymphomania, that the devil is also known as King of the Army of Demon Locusts? Borgmann has also culled the most amusing pseudonyms from advice to the lovelorn columns, including such gems as Fractionated, Still single but wearing a ring, and Valley of indecision; he has found a word of 1185 letters, five lands which are not in any time zone, and a witch's prayer which reads as a prayer forwards and a curse backward. In addition he proposes amusing theories on questions from why some place names are preceded by the definite article to how postal revenue can be increased without changing the rate per ounce.

While boasting of the "peerlessness" of his work, Mr. Borgmann has presented us with an entertaining variant of Ripley's Believe It or Not.

Crisp - Charming

In a town inundated with Rhythm and Blues, and post-R&B psychedelia and electronics, the clean but hip upbeat skill of The Other Day, a folk-rock fivesome at The Penny Farthing, comes as a refreshing change.

The Other Day combines the lyricism of urban folk with striking musical inagination, gripping contralto-baritone harmonies reminiscent of Ian and Sylvia at their best, and a casual friendly stage-manner.

As leader Ian Gunther admitted later, the popularity of a "standard version," like Judy Collins' rendition of Suzanne is a rather frightening challenge to any other group. Wednesday night, they played one of the most moving versions of the Cohen song that I have ever heard—with Gunther accompanying Lorraine Jackson with a violin, and Frank Winterman harmonizing.

As a group, The Other Day is arriving just as The Stormy Clovers are breaking up—and play the same kind of music with roughly the same hip, folk-rock sound.

The background that The Other Day's musicians use for their writing and playing (one third of their material is original) is varied: Gunther has had some ten years of training on the violin, Drummer Dave Graziano studied in Oscar Peterson's school, and guitarist-vocalist Frank Winterman is a skilled aficionado of bluegrass.

The Other Day is an exciting and refreshing group with an engaging manner. Their combination of casual charm and crisp, tight, very competent performance makes for a very enjoyable evening. They will be at The Penny Farthing over the weekend, and possibly through next week.

Gordon Recommends

Well, we recommend the A.P.A.'s production of The Show-off, which I like but Nathan didn't. I haven't seen the Luscombe workshops latest piece, The Captain of Kopenick, but all reports seem to indicate that the usual self-indulgent vitality is very much a part of the piece. Turcaret, a French comedy by a French company will play next Wednesday and Thursday at East York Collegiate. Tickets are available through the U.C. French department. Next Friday, The Devils opens at the Hart House theatre and Underpants the expressionist play, for those of you who haven't seen an expressionist play will start at the Coach House.

This past week, the Drama Centre has sponsored a couple of lectures by James Laver. They were fascinating accounts of the development of scenery and costumes in the theatre. The one regret we have is the Centre's insistence on calling these talks part of a series of ANNUAL lectures. Surely speakers can come in more frequently than that. If the Drama Centre can't bring them in, why not the U.T. D.C.?

Next week, the A.P.A. does Ionesco's Exit the King. Alec Guinness played the King in England, but this is the North American Debut. Rabb will play the King and Eva La Galliene, known to most of us as a translator of some Ibsen plays will play the queen, who watches her husband all of us, die.

Balordo

"You are antimusical!" screamed the conductor, "We do again."

The Tenor missed his entrance cue. Balordo* muttered Maestro Ernesto Barbini and blew him a kiss from the Orchestra Pit.

Rehearsals were on for the Opera school's production of Oedipus Rex by Stravinsky. Across the stage of the Edward Johnson building were hung great abstract forms patterned out of silver and gold foil and sumptuously lit in sombre reds. The actors similarly robed in dull metallic cloth moved slowly across the stage making stylized movements.

Heinar Piller, the stage director for the production, explained how he was presenting the show.

The action takes place on three levels.

The Nobility have stylized movements and act on a high raised platform. The lesser characters are slightly below them on another raised platform and move more naturally. A Mime chorus composed of ballet students wearing masks and black tights act out the mood and thoughts of the main characters and supply details of the story line. And the singing chorus is hidden in the orchestra pit.

The show goes on tonight and runs until Tuesday evening.

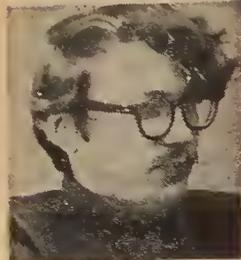

Tickets are available from the offices of the Edward Johnson Building with proceeds going into a scholarship fund for music students.

In unity lies strength. To test this unity, and to clarify once and for all that the University of Toronto is, in fact as well as theory, a true community of scholars we sent a number of reporters to find out how the different colleges feel about each other. Here are some results:

STUDENTS LOOK AROUND...

NEW COLLEGE

Some New College students think the college is a melting pot for those who don't fit or don't want to fit in anywhere else.

"Maybe that's why we are all so warm and friendly even though we are Jewish," said one New-type modestly. "Because we are multi-faculty you meet all types. And I mean all types literally."

While one student thought you can't type the other colleges — ("Blanket generalizations keep nobody warm") — a few generalizations did emerge.

University College is a conglomeration of kids from Forest Hill and Downsview. Students were once forced to go there but now they go because they want to.

The select few at Trinity, the Establishment, are stuffed shirts, not because they were brought up that way.

If you can't bear to part from your high school friends, if you like to play bridge and you detest being different, then Vic is the place for you, one New College student observed.

St. Mike's is too religious for me, said another.

Innis is a hole for non-conformists. But if Ken Stone is a true representative of the inhabitants of Innis, one said, then they are a pretty spirited bunch.

One New student said she didn't care what college she was in. "I'm just happy to be at the University of Toronto. As far as I am concerned we are all alike no matter what college we are at."

ST. MICHAEL'S

We're gregarious, friendly and college-spirited, say students at St. Michael's College.

A survey of several students in the SMC Coop found that St. Mike's students see Vic as the college "closest in spirit" to themselves.

One first-year student says Vic girls are the best looking on campus.

Attitudes to Trinity, on the other hand, were mainly negative. Students felt Trinity was "snobbish", "cliquish", "unfriendly", and "prudish."

University College was described as "Jewish," "impersonal" and "rich." But others thought UC was "very friendly" and that UC people are "the most real and natural people on campus."

SMC students are least aware of Scarborough and Erindale. A second year student called Scarborough the 'Siberia' of U of T.

One co-ed says Scarborough students have an inferiority complex, but that Erindale has a lot of spirit for a new college.

Innis and New were barely mentioned. Two students described New as "sticking to itself."

Attitudes towards Engineers seemed to separate along sexual lines. Girls described them as "spirited", "nice", and "a breed apart." One boy, however, called them: "idiots, clowns—they express the sexual deficiencies of university life."

Students congregate in the Brennan Hall student lounge at St. Michael's College

VICTORIA COLLEGE

Victoria College students think engineers are slobs and UC types are Jewish. And they see themselves as "nice and normal."

Impressions varied but general agreement in the carpeted comfort of Wymilwood's Terrace Room saw engineers as "rowdy, uncouth slobs." Example — "You get the odd good one, but together they're sort of morons."

Apart from being Jewish, UC students are "rich," "cliquey," "beatniks" or combinations of these three.

"I was on a tour of UC once," said Karen Adamthwaite (I Vic). "It's so dark and cold — like a dungeon."

"Vic has tradition, but it's not cold. I like the ivy on the walls."

Trinityites were tabbed as "sophisticated" and "exclusive."

"They're fine when they're alone," said one Vic co-ed. "But when they get together they put on their phony English accents and get snobbish."

All Vic students seem to know about St. Mike's students is that they are Catholic. Most had hardly met their fellow residents of the east side of Queen's Park.

New College students are either "friendly" or "standoffish," depending on your informant. Nobody seemed to know anybody from Innis.

Sit-ins:

Daring, determination Accompany demands

WASHINGTON (CPS-Special) — Some months ago The New Yorker magazine published a cartoon showing a university president sitting sadly powerless at his desk surrounded by 46 scruffy students staging a sit-in.

A newsman quietly interviewing him asks: "As president of a great university, sir, what would you say is the most significant change you have observed in the last 20 years?"

Two American university presidents might have thought back to that cartoon last week when they found themselves in the midst of just such a situation.

At Howard University here about 150 students sat-in Thursday in the office of Dr. James Nabrit protesting compulsory Reserve Officers' Training Corps requirements.

Every male student at Howard must take four semesters of ROTC before he can graduate. Students receive one credit for each semester.

The sit-in ended after three hours when Dr. Nabrit announced he would call a special meeting of the school's board of trustees within 10 days to consider the question.

"We are going to get rid of compulsory ROTC one way or another," said freshman class leader Michael Harris, one of the protest leaders. "If the school doesn't drop it, then we will abolish it ourselves by not going to classes or drills."

In Dayton, Ohio, President Harry Groves of Central State University of Ohio was freed Wednesday by sheriff's deputies after several hundred students held him prisoner in his office for several hours.

Students at the predominantly Negro college chanted black power slogans and "We want Groves" after they took over the bottom two floors of the administration building of Central State.

They were demonstrating in sympathy with non-teaching employees of the university. The university local of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees has threatened strike action if bargaining with the university does not show results.

Groves claims the benefits asked by the union would cost each of the college's 2,600 students $90 a year and has refused concessions.

How to take the joy out of cutting class

COLLEGE PARK, Pa. (CPS) — Four professors at Pennsylvania State University are taping lectures for students who miss classes "because of late registration or illness or because work in another course requires that they be away from the campus at the time the lecture is presented."

Sixteen listening stations for the general education course have been set up in a lab on campus, and an attendant is on hand to help students with the tape files. Taped lectures are edited so that details are given of blackboard illustration.

U of M students start "free schools"

WINNIPEG (Special — A committee of students at the University of Manitoba are instituting a "free school" for high school drop-outs.

Gordon Mackie, the chairman of the committee, says education should be a liberating experience rather than the limiting experience it is now. The school is "free" in the sense that students will have a free choice in what they learn.

Jerry Fast, a committee member, said the "free school" philosophy is that a person is always being educated because he is always experiencing things and reacting to them. Education must be emotional and sensory, as well as intellectual.

For example, a student interested in conservation in a high school would receive lectures on conservation. In the "free school" a student would talk to an expert on conservation. He would go on field trips in the woods and learn from the environment.

Mr. Fast said there is no room in the school for lazy students. There will be no exams — the student will be working for himself.

Sir George will vote on UGEQ membership Nov. 29

MONTREAL (VNS) — A referendum on membership in the Union General des Etudiants du Quebec is to be conducted Nov. 29 at Sir George Williams University.

The referendum motion was discussed and passed overwhelmingly at an open meeting of the student association last week.

Pro-referendum speakers stressed the undesirability of UGEQ's political activity and the necessity of Sir George exercising its right to a referendum.

The anti-referendum speakers warned students of the implications involved in Sir George alienating itself from the union representing all other universities in the province. They said that the educational system in Quebec could best be reformed from within UGEQ.

The final vote was announced as 632 for the referendum and 98 against with eight abstentions.

U of S starts campaign to raise $11,000,000

SASKATOON (Special) — J. W. T. Spinks, president of the University of Saskatchewan has announced a seven year $11,000,000 fund-raising campaign to get into full swing next year.

The campaign is being undertaken to help meet capital requirements that are expected to total $105,000,000 between now and 1975. During that period, full-time undergraduate enrolment at the Saskatoon and Regina campuses of the U of S will rise to an estimated 19,500 compared with 11,800 at present.

Dr. Spinks said the $11,000,000 campaign objective is the difference between the total needed for capital purposes and the amount the university expects from other sources.

He added that if the university fails to meet its requirements for capital funds, the building program will be reduced and enrolment will have to be curtailed.

B Ballers hammer Ryerson; Pucksters head East

by JIM MORRISON

Varsity basket Blues wended their way to Ryerson Wednesday night for an exhibition tilt with the Rams, and came out on the long end of a 74-50 decision.

Bruce Dempster was high man for Blues with 14 points, followed by Arvo Neidre and John Hadden, who dropped in 13 apiece. Rams were led by Dave Oxley with 14, and Eddie Kowal with 13.

Blues jumped off to an early lead, and after ten minutes were ahead 19-4. Their early burst took most of the fight out of Ryerson, who checked and rehouuded fairly well throughout the game, but were consistently unable to score.

Varsity had their troubles shooting in the second half as lack of conditioning began to show, and the loosely-played game became a sloppily-played encounter. However Rams couldn't close the gap because of their own anemic shooting.

Coach McManus was basically satisfied with the performance of his charges. "The team didn't play too badly, but we weren't overly sharp. Don't forget it was only an exhibition game and our first game of the season. We shouldn't really have played this early at all."

Seventeen players were dressed for Blues, and all saw some action, as McManus experimented with his personnel.

Blues' Arvo Neidre was easily the best player on the floor with his accurate shooting from sidcourt. Also impressive at forward was newcomer Ron Voak, an American graduate student, who added much muscle under the basket.

Holdover centers John Hadden and Mike Kirby both played strong games. Kirby showed surprising form defensively, hlocking many Ryerson shots.

Decidedly sub-par for the evening however was guard Bruce Dempster, who, despite his fourteen points, had traumatic hallhanding trouhles.

Next game for Blues is an exhibition clash with Toronto YMHA on Monday night. The rookies will get their final chance to impress the coach, as McManus plans to trim the roster to twelve.

MIKE KIRBY

PETER SPEYER

With only three exhibition games in all before they open the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League season, Varsity Blues will be trying all combinations and permutations in order to come up with a starting lineup before next Friday's opener in Quebec City.

Blues take to the skies early tomorrow morning for a whirlwind visit to Halifax, Nova Scotia where they play a two-game series — Saturday night and Sunday afternoon — against Halifax Junior Canadians of the Maritime Junior 'A' loop.

Varsity coach Tom Watt plans to use all of his players as much as possible in an effort to give each a fair opportunity to show his wares. For the present, Watt is carrying sixteen forwards and defensemen and two goaltenders. He will have to trim two members of the initial group to get down to the SIHL quota of sixteen players plus two goaltenders.

This week-end's double-header coupled with last Sunday's Laurentian game and intervening practices means Blues have had either a game or a practice each day since last Saturday and will continue to work on such a schedule until next Thursday.

And, on top of this, the team spent a good part of last week-end travelling to and from Sudbury by bus, are flying to Halifax and back tomorrow and Sunday, and then have a rough train trip to Quebec City and Montreal beginning Thursday.

All in all, it adds up to twenty-six consecutive days Blues will either play or travel — a hectic schedule by even professional sports' standards.

AROUND THE NET . . . Blues open their SIHL schedule against Laval University in Quebec City on Friday night before hacktracking to Montreal for a Saturday night encounter with McGill Redmen . . . First home game of the year is Friday, December 1. Queen's Golden Gaels are here for that one . . . Peter Speyer's game misconduct penalty in Sudbury last Sunday was the first of his hockey career. Although he may or may not have deserved the penalty, the fact is that he had the guts to do what none of the officials did — break up a senseless fight.

INTERCOARSE ROUNDUP

Meds, PHE gain semifinals

By JIM MORRISON

Interfac hack

The race for the Mulock Cup has narrowed down to a four team show as Meds and PHE both won their quarter-final games and now advance to the semi-finals against Engineering and Vic respectively.

Denys Symons paced Meds to a convincing 21-13 win over Pharmacy as he scored one touchdown and kicked two converts. Nick Malakis and Craig Retter had the doctors' other majors and Chet Collins hoofed a single point to round out the scoring.

Wilson Peckett was the big gun in a losing way for the medicine-mixers as he counted both TD's. Margene Mausen was good on one of two convert attempts.

PHE gained their semi-final berth with an exciting 9-6 win over St. Mike's. A last minute rally by the Irish was halted on third down at the PHE 30 yard line.

Hal Martin's major and Gene Vincez's field goal for the Hart House stompers was enough to overcome Maxy Walker's lone Double Blue counter.

SOCCER

Playoff action began Wednesday in interfac soccer with Knox College's 3-2 win over Scarborough. Kabush kicked in two to pace the Knockers, and the single went to Stewart. Bardinello and Toman were not quite sublime for the suburbians.

In preliminary games played yesterday, Forestry mastered Medicine 3-1, and St. Mike's took Dentistry by an identical 3-1 score. Bill Glover, Larry Lambert, and Al Cameron fed Forestry; Fred Gentilli replied. Angelo Del-fino notched two for the Irish and Don Palma added the other. Roger Batesou dalled briefly for the Dentists.

Forestry now meets Trinity A in one quarter-final, and St. Mike's meets Engineering in another. The winner of the latter match plays Knox in the semis.

OQAA SUDDEN-DEATH RUGGER AND SOCCER

Opportunities to view two sudden-death championship games in one day involving four unbeaten teams come around about as often as Haley's Comet. But Varsity sports fans (there must be some of you out there) have such an opportunity on Saturday.

In possibly the best bit of scheduling ever undertaken, the OQAA has selected Varsity Stadium as the host of both its rugger and soccer finals. That Toronto teams are involved in both, of course, helped immeasurably.

At 10:30 in the morning Varsity's powerhouse soccer Blues, undefeated in two years, face their strongest challenge in quite some time as they play off against Queen's, who also went unbeaten over the season. Queen's has a strong unit, and boasted a much better defensive record than Varsity over the year. This game will be no mere formality for Ernie Glass's men.

Following this game, at 2:00 in the afternoon, comes the rugger showdown between Varsity's eastern team and Western Mustang's, last year's champions. Both these teams, as well, come into the game without having lost a game all year. For those who have never seen a rugger game, this match will be a tremendous initiation. Blues have one of the most exciting intercollegiate squads in years.

Make a note! Both games are at Varsity Stadium, 10:30 and 2:00 o'clock. There is no admission charge.

Soccer team ready for Golden Gaels

The first Battle of the Undefeated takes place tomorrow morning at 10:30 at Varsity Stadium as the home-town soccer Blues take on Queen's Golden Gaels.

Sporting the best defensive record in the OQAA, Gaels will be all out to wrest the Blackwood Trophy, emblematic of league supremacy, from Varsity who have held or shared it for the past five years. Both teams went undefeated in their respective divisions.

Since Blues had far and away the most powerful offense in the league, the match may boil down to this: can a superlative defense stop a fantastic offense? It appears doubtful.

Blues have looked sharp in their preparation for the sudden-death final, and many of the players feel they'll play their best intercollegiate game ever. For some of Blues' veterans this match will provide a climactic finish to their intercollegiate careers. Among these are Alan Cragg, Eric Sereda, Austris Liepa, and Garth Rothwell.

In their only previous encounter, Varsity defeated Queen's 6-1 in another championship game. But that was two years ago. Each side seems stronger this year, and, weather and field conditions permitting, should provide the large crowd expected to a spectacular show. And Channel Eleven decided to televise a Santa Claus parade!

Blues' main worry may be unfamiliarity with the wider and longer confines of Varsity Stadium, compared to the smaller back or front campus. To offset this, the team has done considerable work on long passing. From all reports, Blues are ready. Korner Kicks. For a few members, the game will provide their first taste of championship competition. . . . John Gero, for instance, feels nervous deep down inside, but doesn't show it. . . . Admission is free to Varsity Stadium for this, the best and most important soccer match of the season.

Each of Blues' socko soccermen and rugged ruggerites have reached the OQAA finals without losing a game all year. Should they emerge laborious, glorious, and above all, victorious, it will mean an undefeated season for all three of Varsity's pitball squads. (You may remember a certain gridiron collection coached by Ron Murphy also went unscathed through the rigor of seasonal competition.) As far as league archive searching permits, such feats are unparalleled. Nor has Varsity ever won all three championships in one year, irregardless of being undefeated, since 1933.

However before we get completely carried away this remorseless revealing of records, let us take pause and reflect: 'Tis when the hurly-burly's done, that the battle then is done." And there's a bit of hurly-burly left before we can crow about our school being so marvelous and wonderful, etc.

First hurly-burly takes place at the Stadium in mid-morning when the soccer Blues take on Queen's with the bituinous Blackwood Trophy at stake. It would be a shame to disturb the deluge of dust collected by the trophy during its long stay at Hart House, but Gaels have a strong outfit this year. They are also undefeated with an impressive defensive record. Blues' slick sharpshooters will probably have their toughest nut of the season to crack tomorrow.

As far as the rugger hurly-burly is concerned. Blues are confident of victory despite their role as slight underdogs to Western Mustangs. When play starts at 2:00 p.m. at Varsity Stadium (clever plug, eh?), coach Jim Hamilton plans to have his team establish a strong running game right off the bat. This is crowd-pleasing football, and Hamilton hopes it prevails against the bigger, but hence slower, Western team. Hamilton feels Blues have to dominate the game up front, where they are most solid, and retain the "lion's share of possession." Once they do this, victory is virtually theirs.

Mustangs are defending OQAA champions, and appear even stronger than last year. They have an advantage in size over Blues, but their backs are not quite as versatile, says Hamilton.

From the spectator point of view, Saturday's rugger match should be a classic. Both teams "hustle like hell", and play hard football. Blues, especially, are an exciting, wide-open squad. Just as in the preceding soccer contest, it will be a question of a good offense pitted against a good defense. Varsity scored 115 points in six games to Western's 98 in eight, while D 'Stangs allowed only 11 to 32 against Blues. Man, it should be quite a struggle! Be there.

Meet the rugger Blues - OQAA finalists

Varsity rugger squads are traditionally an unknown, anonymous mass to the spectators ringing the field. Usually all they know about the team and its players is who scored the points—after reading tomorrow's paper.

So with Blues heading into their crucial match against Western at the Stadium tomorrow, here is their line-up by position and a tidbit of info about each player:

Fullback: Geoffrey Wall—in his first year with Blues, Wall is a rugger veteran, having played with University of Leeds, and for Trinity College at Cambridge, England.

L. Wing: John Holmes—a rookie, playing rugger for the first time in his life. Quite a promising player, Holmes scored a try in his very first game.

L. Centre: Peter Sutherland—an ex-football player, Sutherland is also playing rugger for the first time. He is fast with good moves.

R. Centre: Scott McClure—in his last year with Blues, McClure will be out to avenge himself of some of his old teammates at Western.

R. Wing: Douglas Phibbs—another ex-footballer playing rugger for the first time. Phibbs is a hard runner and tackler, and has matured considerably in the last few games.

Fly Half: Andrew Gibson—the leading scorer on the club by virtue of his talented toe on conversion attempts.

Scrum half: George Wraw—In his second year, George is small but fast, a good kicker, and exceptionally fit.

Prop David Imrie—Blues' line-out thrower, in his second year with the club after playing 7-aside rugger previously.

Hooker: David Ledson—a real veteran, he has always been note for steadiness on the rugger field.

Prop: William Kyle—another durable veteran in his third year with Blues. He hopes to close out his career in style with a win tomorrow against Western.

Lock: Andrew Bethel—lots of experience and height, he uses them to advantage as the main jumper in the line-outs.

Lock: Terry McBride—in his first year playing rugger, he has really caught on. He's tall (6'3") and heavy (200 lb.).

8: Maris Apse—top fight ruggerite, he has played for Ontario against England and for Eastern Canada against New Zealand.

W. Forward: Peter Hand—a real "muncher," always turning in a hard, tough game. A blistering tackler.

W. Forward: Alan Major (Capt.)—another top veteran with the club, he plays for Nomads in the city league.

Trinity students relax in the Buttery, after a hord day's morning at lectures. They may even be discussing their college, included in the second installment of student profiles on page 9.

Dow job interviews provoke protest

by PAUL MACRAE

Students and faculty will demonstrate outside the University of Toronto Placement Service today and tomorrow to prevent representatives of Dow Chemical of Canada from recruiting on this campus for summer employment.

A pamphlet released by the University of Toronto Committee to End the War in Vietnam says Dow, parent of Dow Chemical of Canada, produces almost all of the napalm used in Vietnam.

David Hemblen, a teaching fellow in English and a spokesman for the organizers of the demonstration, said last night he expected "hundreds" of persons to picket the U of T Placement Service at Spadina Ave. and Willcocks, where the interviews will be carried out. The demonstration will start at 9 a.m.

If recruiting does not stop, he said, a sit-in will be organized at 2 p.m. to block the building.

However, U of T police have promised that "anyone who wishes to see the Dow interviewers will be able to see them."

Assistant Chief of security T. D. Lawson said the U of T police had the names of those being interviewed by the Dow recruiters and that no one else would be allowed in the placement building.

A. W. Headrick, head of the Placement Service, said yesterday he knew very little about the protest. He said he would meet with organizers of the demonstration at noon today.

The CEWV pamphlet calls on the Students Administrative Council to prevent recruiting on campus by Canadian companies complicit in the Vietnam war.

"Students themselves should control job recruitment at the U of T," the pamphlet says. "SAC, not the administration, should invite interviewers to this campus."

The pamphlet demands that the administration suspend Dow recruiting until the matter is brought under SAC's control, and that all further on-campus recruiting be under the direct supervision of SAC.

SAC president Tom Faulkner could not be reached for comment on the CEWV proposals.

Similar demonstrations at the University of Western Ontario and Waterloo have fizzled. Only ten protesters showed up in London and 25 Waterloo demonstrators were pelted with snowballs.

Prof. Kenneth McNaught, chairman of the Faculty Committee to End the War in Vietnam, said the committee was not officially behind the demonstration, but only because there had not been time to call a meeting on the issue.

However, he said faculty were free to go as individuals to the demonstration and added that he would be there.

Prof. Chandler Davis of the mathematics department urged the university to refuse use of its facilities to Dow Chemical interviewers.

In a statement last night he said: "The professor's life is good. It is fortunate that we are not only allowed to do research and teach, but even be paid for it.

"But, if this study and teaching are made part of a training service for the Pentagon's war machine, they are corrupted and our paycheck is corrupted.

"As we would not invade Vietnam, we should not be a cog in a machine which is invading Vietnam."

Torches light flame of UGEQ protest

MONTREAL (VNS) — Two thousand student-led demonstrators battled police for two hours Friday night as they besieged the United States consulate in a protest against the war in Vietnam.

The demonstration, organized by the Union General des Etudiants du Quebec, was held to climax a day of lectures and discussions on the war at McGill, Sir George Williams and Montreal universities.

Chanting students wielded torches and French and English placards that condemned the Vietnam conflict and advocated Quebec separatism.

Fifty-two were arrested after the demonstration assumed a violent tone. Bottles of red ink flew at the consulate's walls, smashing windows of the building and police cars.

Flaming torches and placards were tossed at policemen and nearby buildings.

Policemen on horseback charged into the crowd and pushed the demonstrators to the sidewalks across the street from the consulate. Then they dispersed the crowd on foot.

Some demonstrators were injured slightly and taken away in ambulances. Many others were loaded into police paddy wagons, kicking and screaming. Five policemen were also hurt slightly.

Student spokesmen later accused police of using brutal tactics with their horses and clubs.

The Montreal demonstration was the most violent of 10 peace marches staged throughout Quebec.

A demonstration in Ottawa was so peaceful that employees of the U.S. embassy weren't aware a march was being staged.

What's wrong with OCA?

by SAL AMENTA

Sal Amenta is a third year OCA student enrolled in advertising design. In a two-part series he analyzes the merits and the defects of that institution. Mr. Amenta believes that publication of these articles could result in his expulsion.

Three years ago, when I first stepped into OCA, my anticipations were fantastic and my desire to drain the school of knowledge was insatiable. Years of disciplined school-years and meaningless assimilation of knowledge had starved me of artistic expression. The College of Art, I thought, would be the place where I would be encouraged to develop myself more than anywhere else. The "foundation year" fulfilled and completed the basic art education that had begun in high-school. The versatility of the multi-faceted year developed within me a desire to learn more and an eagerness to take in as much as possible of everything.

Now, however, I find myself in an altogether different disposition. The nature of the set-up of the school has stilled my attempts to fill great gaps of learning which I consider to be important in my plans of education. More and more I find myself in fits of depression and unexplainable moods of disgust. The school has gradually taken the shape of an inhospitable fiend; home a solace to a lamenting despair.

I looked at the students around me to find the evidence I needed I thought, "Is it because they are artists that they behave as I do, or is it because they are in the same predicament as I am?"

There was plenty of evidence. The core of the student body, the administrative council, showed the anaemic spirit of an apathetic mass. Frequented by a handful of eager and desperate characters like me, it convened and discussed problems which had beset the school for the past decade, but all the time lamenting the fact that this democratic oligarchy did not have an enthusiastic student body to back up and strengthen the meaning of its "students' council".

Carleton drops WUSC Treasure Van

OTTAWA (CUP) — Treasure Van was scrapped last week by Carleton University Students Council.

The council's treasurer Barry McPeake, said the World University Service of Canada, sponsors of the travelling boutique of exotic items, has become an "unwarranted cost."

"Treasure Van is no longer worthwhile because most of the items now can be bought downtown," he said.

"Anyway, most of the profits go into the administrative costs of WUSC."

WUSC has come under fire over the last three months from the Canadian Union of Students and other student leaders.

The September CUS congress in London, Ont., accepted a report condemning WUSC as an "establishment" of "remarkable inertia".

McPeake said WUSC was founded 30 years ago to increase understanding within the world university community.

But it has become, "a welfare organization rather than an agent of social change," he said.

CUS has withdrawn from participation in the organization's national assembly and national committee.

Evening students view own problems

Student government — the exclusive realm of the day university student? Not so, say the International Association of Evening Student Councils.

IAESC, a non-profit organization, which held a conference on campus last weekend, is devoted to developing and strengthening evening student governments on the campus.

Through various projects and international and regional business meetings, IAESC hopes to inform evening students, evening educators, businessmen and others of the particular problems of evening students.

IAESC attempts to articulate the special needs of the evening student by participating in meetings sponsored by other educational organizations.

To assist evening students in providing more effective leadership for their student bodies, the IAESC sponsors its own conferences.

Undergrad reserve training changed

A new program for training university undergraduates in the Canadian armed forces' reserve components is planned for next year.

Officers are currently trained through the University Naval Training Divisions, the Canadian Officer's Training Corps, and the Air Forces' University Training Program (AFURTP).

The Regular Officer Training Plan, the primary source of career officers through services, colleges and universities, will not be changed.

To foster a new program of military studies at the university level, the national defence department will introduce military courses, post-graduate fellowships and research grants. It will finance the project.

Forestry flows — and wins Blood Cup

The three-week long blood bath that has engulfed the University of Toronto campus ended yesterday with the faculty of forestry taking the Blood Cup.

Complicated calculations showed that the forestry men had the greatest percentage increase over their donations in the last blood drive.

The Cup will be presented Wednesday in the Forestry Common Room by R. A. Cottrill of Carling's Breweries, the sponsors of the competition.

The published goals of the colleges and faculties had nothing to do with selecting the winner. They were chosen arbitrarily by each group.

The runner-up to Forestry was the faculty of food science and third place went to physical and occupational therapy. Music was fourth and New College ranked fifth.

Helen Shapinko (I New) and Carolyn Keytone (I Pharm), co-chairman of the drive, termed it one of the most successful ever held on this campus. The complete totals (in pints) are shown below.

Cappon ponders: are ballet fans more sensual than baseball buffs?

Are people who attend the performing arts more sensual than people who go to movies and sports events?

Professor Daniel Cappon of the department of psychiatry and a member of Dr. Marshall McLuhan's centre of culture and technology is doing research to find out.

He is comparing the sensory background of persons who attend concerts, ballet, theatre, movies and sports events.

Age, sex, marital status,

IQ, education, length of occupation and social background are the factors considered.

The most important factor is the sensory quotient, a measurement invented by Prof. Cappon. It is determined by visual, auditory and active and passive tactile tests.

Prof. Cappon used four populations for his research—a sample of industrial workers, a random telephone survey, a group of frequent theatre-goers and some habitual movie-goers.

Research for the project now is complete and the data is being processed by computer.

The SQ test was standardized from a study of people who attended Expo's Man and His Community pavilion, which Prof. Cappon helped to design.

"I'm probably Canada's most widely read poet," he said. "Three hundred thousand and people have copies of the poem I wrote on the wall of the pavilion."

CUSO holds official week at U of T

This week is Canadian University Students Overseas week at the University of Toronto.

The program will examine the role of Canadians in the developing countries and try to present a balanced view of CUSO's work.

"The aid is to interest and inform the general public about what is going on in developing countries, and perhaps interest some people in becoming CUSO volunteers," says Jean Mayo (OCE), a former CUSO volunteer.

This afternoon a panel of four African students will discuss Education in Developing Countries — What Can We Do? at the Ontario College of Education auditorium.

Another panel composed of Professors Cranford Pratt and Keith Spicer and journalist Clyde Sanger will discuss Canada's Commitment to Developing Nations Thursday night at Carr Hall, St. Michael's College.

Information desk will be set up on campus tomorrow and two information meetings will be held at the International Student Centre Wednesday. The week will be climaxed by a dance at ISC Friday night.

HSU elections tomorrow

The campus history student's union will hold elections tomorrow for second and third-year honor course positions. Three positions must be filled for each year.

Polling stations will be set up in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall during the whole day.

The positions for second and third-year general arts, fourth year honors, school of graduate studies and special students were all filled by acclamation.

Students plan protest against Dow

Prof. David Gauthier, a member of the executive of the faculty committee to end the war, and Frank Cunningham, a philosophy lecturer, issued a joint statement on the demonstration.

"Having discussed the forthcoming Dow recruitment with many staff members, we and they feel that the presence of a recruiter is a cause for faculty as well as student concern.

"We urge that all faculty members who oppose the use of this university to recruit for a company which helps provide the U.S. Vietnam forces with this abhorrent weapon (napalm) devote as many of their free hours Monday and Tuesday as possible to join the general demonstration outside the recruiting office."

"You must be careful not to become great moralists on the Vietnam issue . . . because you are benefiting from it. Part of your education is being paid for by Transport Minister Paul Hellyer to a meeting of the U of T Liberal Club, Nov. 3, 1967.

Dow offers you more than just saran wrap

Anyone who saw the color photographs of napalm-burned children printed in Ramparts magazine some months ago had ample reason to wonder just exactly what the United States military involvement in Vietnam has become.

Napalm was described by four American physicians in these terms: ". . . a highly sticky, inflammable jelly which clings to anything it touches and burns with such heat that all oxygen in the area is exhausted within moments.

"Death is either by roasting or by suffocation. Napalm wounds are often fatal (estimates are 90 per cent). Those who survive face a living death. The victims are frequently children."

Napalm is dropped every day on Vietnamese villages in hopes that the people it kills are Viet Cong. This bombing is one of the cruelest acts ever perpetrated by any nation one that can't be justified even in military terms.

The medical results were described by Dr. Richard Perry, an American doctor, in the January, 1967 issue of Redbook. He wrote: "I have been an orthopedic surgeon for a good number of years, with rather a wide range of medical experience. But nothing could have prepared me for my encounters with Vietnamese women and children burned by napalm.

"It was shocking and sickening, even for a physician, to see and smell the burning flesh."

And yet the Dow Chemical Corp., the chief manufacturer of and profiter from napalm, is allowed to recruit personnel on university campuses. The company's recruiting team is expected on campus today.

And yet university administrators talk quietly about the situation as if Dow were merely another of the many companies that come here to find employees.

And yet, the American Association of University Professors condemns the actions of students and faculty who attempt to block such recruiting.

That is all madness of the greatest kind. Dow attempted to sneak on campus this year, probably in the light of at least two sit-ins at other universities in Canada — Waterloo and London, Ont. — and many in the United States. Recently some 2,000 students in Wisconsin clashed with police during such a protest. Dow might still con-cel today's and Tuesday's recruiting attempts.

If they don't, the actions of a group of students and faculty sitting-in at the Placement Service are fully justified.

The university administrators should not only refrain from calling the police to stop the sit-in but should join into the action by bonning Dow from campus.

There's nothing students and the university can do to prevent Dow from manufacturing napalm. But they can lodge their objections in the most effective way at their disposal — preventing the company from drawing trained employees from here.

This sit-in does not involve an infraction of Dow's civil rights. The company is being allowed to express its views on the matter at any time. The sit-in can be seen as a form of corporate control lodged by the people. Neither the U.S. nor the Canadian governments are doing anything to ban the manufacture of napalm and therefore the people are fully justified in doing whatever they can.

It may involve breaking a law—probably the creating of a disturbance by impeding other persons—but manufacture and use of napalm breaks a much higher law.

We sympathized with the U.S. Negroes' lunch-counter sit-ins, freedom bus rides and demonstrations for voting rights. We ever sympathize with incidents in which housewives block off traffic on a street to protect the lives of their children. Dow sit-ins are no different.

When there is no other way to gain redress of grievances, direct action is often justifiable.

Going on to the role of the university, then, it is clear that the university should see the necessity of taking a moral stand on this issue too. The fact that the Dow recruiter has only an indirect connection with the napalm dropped in Vietnam doesn't eliminate the moral issue. U of T should have nothing whatsoever to do with a company that profits from such a crime.

And most important of all, are the students who are thinking of applying for a job with Dow. It might pay you well but look what you get involved in. You might never have any direct connection with napalm. You might be working on a better formula for Saran Wrap the rest of your life.

That's fine, but Saran Wrap is clear and doesn't block out the sight of a burned Vietnamese child.

I question student support of draft aid program

Sir:

Tom Faulkner thinks he is acting on behalf of the students in the Draft Dodger Affair? On Wednesday Nov. 8, 1967, the students of third year General Science answered the following question: "Should SAC use student funds to support TADP?" The results were as follows:

- 185 students answered the question;
- 142 were against SAC using their money;
- 4 of these wanted their money back;
- 21 people were for it;
- 7 people were apathetic and didn't "give a damn" what SAC did with their money;
- 13 people were undecided as they did not yet have sufficient information on the subject;
- and 2 people thought the whole thing was a joke.

I don't know how the rest of the university students feel about this matter but if these results are any indication I hope Mr. Faulkner will reconsider his stand.

Frank Saliannis (III UC)

Up with U of T news!

Sir:

Why are students denied complete information in stories concerning their own campus?

After reporting the failure of Sir Daniel Wilson's associate membership program on page two of Friday's edition, you state that "other colleges who have had affiliate memberships find that students are not using the residence privileges." Burwash Hall at Victoria this year has some 55 to 65 associate members, many of whom are active participants in residence life.

A page one article in the same edition reports the progress toward student representation on faculty and college councils. That article ignored the largest arts college on this campus. Here at Victoria, students are represented on various committees of the College Council, the Board of Regents and the Senate, including the President's Advisory Committee.

On the other hand, when a Varsity reporter does stumble across Victoria College, the result is an article such as that entitled "Students Look Around . . ." also in Friday's Varsity. I question the statement that "Victoria College Students think engineers are slobs and UC types are Jewish." Unless you aim to have found a representative sample, the only purpose I can see in printing that article was to ensure that the stereotypes and clichés, in which The Varsity takes delight, are perpetuated.

John C. Kirkpatrick, SAC Rep, Victoria College

?????

Sir:

That no one in Vietnam is angelic is evident, but what are the implications when one of the belligerents, apparent high example of world civilization and technological advancement, is guilty of the same barbarism as the small bands of guerillas in black pajamas?

In all the hysteria over the war I have not once heard this question raised, though it is necessarily of primary concern.

Are we still caught up in our little reality bags of white and black, communism: bad, capitalism: good, ec., or are we going to have to come to a new realization that before Johnny and Ivan and Ying Chi can have their new toys, they're going to have to learn that there's a hell of a lot more to life than just new toys, that it's not enough to have intelligence, but necessary also to have intellect and compassion, the maturity to make tools for the new instead of remaking the conceptual toys of the nineteenth century: McLuhan's car driven through the rear view mirror could be heading for a wall.

John Ayre (S. & P.S.)

Engineers and staff unite!

Sir:

As a student in the Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering, I must take exception to comments made in the article "Most Faculties Grant Student Voice on Council". (Varsity Nov. 17)

Surprising as it may seem, a great number of students in Engineering DO care and ARE interested in what they are learning. This interest has found expression in the creation of student-staff committees in most departments in the faculty. Because discussions are held at a much more local level, the chances of success in accomplishing anything are much greater than on a faculty-wide basis. As far as I can determine, the staff welcomes this opportunity of dialogue with students because it provides an avenue towards a better understanding and appreciation of students' opinions.

Most of these staff-student committees have been working actively for at least the past two years and have resulted in the students and staff going forward together.

Before closing, I would like to ask how much research and background information did your reporters obtain before writing their article. It would seem clear to Engineering students at least, that this is yet another typical example of arbitrary comments made by badly informed students.

Miro Forest (III APSC)

blood drive a bloody failure

Sir:

I cannot see how Miss Keystone can call the blood drive a success when less than one sixth of the campus donated blood. I am shocked that the ridiculously low goal of 3,840 pints wasn't doubled, and yet it wasn't even reached. Students keep clamouring for more responsibility and more voice in faculty matters, and yet when one of the most painless (literally, figuratively, and monetarily) ways to demonstrate it comes along, it is ignored. When students begin to show more social responsibility, perhaps the administration will be more responsive to suggestions of further student involvement. I would suggest that the goals be doubled for the next drive — and surpassed. Artificially low goals won't fool anyone, attained or surpassed.

Nominations for the Board of Governors

The Varsity hereby opens nominations to fill five vacancies on the University of Toronto board of governors.

Send in your suggestions for nominations (five possible ones are listed below).

Students may be nominated. The University of Toronto Act doesn't actually say students may be appointed to the Board, but it doesn't disallow students either.

Its only stipulations are: —Chapter 112, sec. 18: "No person shall be eligible for appointment as a member of the Board unless he is a British subject and his customary place of residence is in the province of Ontario."

—Chapter 112, sec. 26: "The head of University College, the head of a federated university or an affiliated college, a member of the teaching or administrative staff of the university, of University College, of a federated university, or of a federated or affiliated college, shall not be eligible to be appointed as a member of the Board."

We would suggest you choose only persons with wide experience in student affairs or student government, since the purpose of all this is to show possible ways to make this university more responsive to student needs.

Most members of the present Board are businessmen or lawyers, or prominent members of the Progressive Conservative party.

If you can suggest a large slate of nominees, perhaps the Students' Administrative Council could run an election to arrive at five student choices.

Oh, one more thing: all this has to be unofficial, of course, because governors aren't elected; nor do students and faculty members have a say in their appointment. That's reserved for the provincial government.

Unofficial or not, such nominations could be very effective in telling the government what students want.

HOWARD ADELMAN: Regarded as the driving force behind the remarkable growth of co-operative student housing, Mr. Adelman is General Manager of Co-op College Residences. He graduated from University College in 1960, earned his Masters in 1963 and now lectures in Philosophy at York University. He served as Finance Commissioner on SAC in 1964-5. Last year he was the unsuccessful choice of Queen's students for the position of rector at that University.

DOUGLAS WARD: A graduate of Trinity and Emmanuel Colleges, Mr. Ward was president of SAC in 1963-64 and president of the Canadian Union of Students in 1966-67. Before his term as CUS president, he served as assistant in the office of the U of T registrar, Robin Ross. Mr. Ward has had close connections with the Student Union for Peace Action and is now an advisor to the Company of Young Canadians. He is also a production assistant in the public affairs department of the Canadian Broadcasting Corp.

DAVID HUNTER: A 24-year-old sociology graduate now working on his Masters, Mr. Hunter was SAC vice-president during Mary Brewin's term as president. As all the persons on this list, Mr. Hunter has a wide knowledge of the university and wants to start some official discussion on how to democratize it. Last year he worked as director of the U of T housing service.

OCA: 'an inho

In class, teachers were forever waging a losing battle with their students as they quizzed, projects to be handed in on time and as they had indicated. On the student side, it was a battle of wit and patience as they tried their best to get out of doing something, or tried to do it the easiest way possible, or with another week's extension.

The courses which pertain most to meaning and influence of art — the psychology and social effect of art and artists — least enthused the OCA student. To sit and listen, to pay attention was a great burden of boredom. And yet their reaction was a violent diatribe against the lecturer followed with silence and reversion to passive apathy. It did not occur to them that it would require effort on their behalf to make the courses intriguing and mystifying. They would rather take the coward's way out, do themselves the pleasures of intelligent thinking, of active participation and change, of refreshing thoughts.

Many courses provoke boredom and apathy

Poor lost souls! They can't remember where they come from, what they are doing there, nor what they will do when they leave. Such, regrettably, are the students of the Ontario College of Art. Have I offended some? Then why haven't I seen them at student council meetings? Why haven't they done something about the perverse conditions? How will THEY explain that we are not getting what we DESERVE?

But should we be this critical of the students? After all in many ways they are victims of their environment. Surely some of the fault must be shared by the other parties involved, namely the staff, the chairman, the administration, and the OCA council. If the leaves are decaying and dying, then perhaps the branches, trunk, and roots are partially to blame.

The teachers (or "instructors" as they distastefully titled) are those who come in closest contact with the students and they have the most profound influence upon them. I know the enriching experience of understanding and concerned teacher; that is God's gift to education.

Some of my closest friends have been still are teachers who give a damn about how I feel and think. The friendships are my rewards for sincere effort and desire for fulfillment. When I attended East York I severely criticized the apparent quality of this. And yet, how it pains me to realize that the number of such relationships outnumbered that of the College of Art. Perhaps some of the fault is mine for not having pursued such relationships.... perhaps there was no stimulus to do so.

Teachers should have more freedom to innovate

I do believe that the odd teacher at OCA has the inspired ability to spark the students' interests and to encourage innovation and discovery. I also believe that there are more teachers who would let loose such ability were they given the freedom to compose their curriculum within a certain framework. Many teachers are good thinkers, have great ideas, and have much concern for the administration of this school — but they feel hamstrung by the authority of their superiors.

Although, diversity in opinion is stimulating, especially among teachers, there are certain kinds of disagreements which lead to the student wondering and in a precarious position. For instance, some teachers praise one medium and speak of it as wonderful and necessary in today's advertising world while another will praise another medium in the same terms. Surely one must be wrong; one must be behind the times.

This brings another point into light. Some teachers in our school, with the exception of free-lance work, or part-time activity, are not in complete touch with the outside world. Even in high-school teachers are given sabbaticals in which to refresh their knowledge and pursue certain interests. At OCA their positions are constant until the moment when they are lowered seven feet.

They maintain that they continue to work and that teaching at OCA is only a hobby. Well we don't want amateur instructors;

spitable fiend'

want professional teachers! I do free-lance work too but I would never call myself a professional advertising artist, nor would I call myself a professional painter or sculptor simply because I have sold representative works. It seems to me that this is simply a case of honesty — are we sincere when we say that our teachers are bringing us the freshest and most recent influence?

Administration believes in 'splendid isolation'

So much for the teaching staff, what of the administration and chairman of the school? What has grieved me most about this group is their utter failure in creating a rapport and a general awareness of the existing faculties. Too often the indication is one of splendid isolation—a haven of safety where private interests are cultivated and protected. In an age when specialization becomes more acute there comes a dire need for generalization. There must be harmony between the units. Petty knowledge is of no value to anyone while the coordination of specialized facets becomes a key to sanity. If art and design are to suffer this anatomical dissection, then there is created within every artist the need to be aware of all these facets to a general degree.

Yet it seems, when one looks around, that a student is identified with his course and not with his interests; he is forced to fill a pigeon hole and is expected to abide by the rules in peace. (In fact, according to the student handbook issued to OCA students this year, I am liable to expulsion on account of having written this article!) Well, I reject this notion! I refuse to be classified and INSIST on being catered to. I KNOW what I want in education and will not be denied it. If the school will not supply it I will search elsewhere... there is no question about this!

Students must get their money's worth

But, I ask, why should I have to search elsewhere on my own time and expense when I am a full-time student at OCA paying a tuition fee of $330 and running an expense of another $200 on art supplies? It is my duty to get my money's worth — this is common sense and good business. Petty and frail arguments of inconvenience in the bureaucratic set-up of the college will not douse my feelings. As far as I am concerned, the one and only interest of the administration and the chairman is that of our interests. Let all their silly and misguided notions of equality and inconvenience go to hell!

And anyway, who is the Ontario College of Art Council? In the OCA annual report one will find a list of names that are supposed to be on top of the hierarchy of authority as far as the college is concerned. They are on top all right . . . of cloud 9. I beg the indulgence of these people of notoriety for to them I am forced to say, "I don't know you . . . what is your function?" If they have a great deal to do with the running of our college why are they never seen and why do they never come and let themselves be known? Why don't they communicate with us?

OK, OK, so what can we do about it?

P & G Brand Managers - Where Do They Come From? - What Are They Like?

They come from everywhere . . . From B.C. to the Maritimes . . . With degrees ranging from Humanities BA's to MBA's. Then, they develop within the Company since P&G promotes only from within . . . But they all have in common the intelligence, drive and ambition to succeed . . . These traits, sharpened by on-the-job training, result in rapid advancement in brand management.

Procter & Gamble makes and sells a wide variety of important consumer products. Duncan Hines Cake Mix, Head & Shoulders Shampoo, Crest toothpaste, Safeguard soap, Tide detergent and Secret deodorant are a few of them. For each product, there is a Brand Manager, responsible for the national marketing effort of his brand. This is a major assignment and a key position in P&G management, yet it is often possible for a college graduate with ability and drive to reach this level of responsibility in less than three years.

WHERE DO P&G BRAND MEN COME FROM?

From literally anywhere and everywhere — large and small schools, graduates and undergraduate degrees, majors in business and liberal arts. But that's not important! What is important is what they come to P&G with — an enormous desire to demonstrate that they have the ability to assume substantial marketing responsibility right away.

WHAT BASIC SKILLS DO YOU NEED?

You must have the ability to persuade and to lead others. As a well motivated person yourself, you will be constantly stimulating, guiding, and coordinating the efforts of those who work with you.

A good Brand Manager bases his marketing plans and recommendations on many kinds of data. You'll need to have, or develop, the ability to quickly formulate reliable conclusions from a study of many kinds of data.

Personal relationships are important; you must be able to work effectively with a broad range of people both in and out of the Company;

You must be skilled in planning and organizing your time. This means the ability to delegate responsibility, and also to single out the more important parts of a project yourself.

A Brand Manager must have a high level of oral and written communication skills.

And, of course, a Brand Manager must bring to his job a distinct element of creativity . . . the desire and the ability to think for himself and to find imaginative solutions to difficult problems.

How do you stack up on these qualifications?

DO YOU NEED A MAJOR IN MARKETING?

No, you do not. Courses in Marketing are helpful but we have successful Brand Managers with degrees in such diverse fields as History and the Sciences. An understanding of marketing comes fast if you have intelligence, drive and ambition.

Again, it's what you bring with you that counts: a desire to assume as much responsibility as you can handle, and to be rewarded for your contribution.

This is the second article of a series on how students in the various colleges view each other and themselves.

Trinityite: The facade is everything

"We're no different," says a Trinity co-ed. "Others may have the idea Trinity is filled with snobs, but we are no different from the other colleges."

But some Trinityites thought differently. "We tend to be smug," admitted a former Trinity co-ed now in SGS. "The facade is everything at Trinity."

"Trinity is a closed college," said another Trinity graduate. "There are lots of snobs, but in the class room this atmosphere can be great."

"Vic may be suffering from a type of inverse snobbery," says Vicki Dickenson (I Trin). "They talk down Trinity because they are really suffering from an inferiority complex. To boost their ego they must tear down someone else's."

Some Trinity students had anxieties about the UC refectory. They felt someone might jump and tackle them if they entered the "pit" with a tie on.

They also believed they would have to elbow their way through the crowd and sit on the floor because of lack of space.

Innis: Not just a hole in the ground

Most Innis students like the college's close-knit, friendly atmosphere. Some comments: "People just don't know about Innis; it looks like a shack but it is not just a hole in the ground."

"The second and third year students welcomed me right away."

"Innis is one of the few colleges that can't be stereotyped, it has different people but in a small group."

About New College: New is a separate entity which sticks together, said Chuck Hutchings I (Inn).

Hena Greisman (II Inn) noted, "New is a first-year college because all the hangouts are populated by freshmen."

Many Innis students felt that being Jewish was a main factor in getting along at New. A few, however, said New College types compared in warmth and diversity to Innis students.

UC appeared to Innis as a tight restrictive group. The refectory has a closed atmosphere where it is hard to meet people or feel a part. Susan Stoess (II Inn) observed: "You see some really odd people and 'weirdies' there."

A few students mentioned that SMC is quite American. Mike Stiege (I APSC) said, "It seemed like an American outpost in Canada".

Many students were reluctant to make any judgment.

"All the colleges are filled with basically the same type of people," said David Cooper (IV Trin).

He added that most of the colleges were filled with "the mass mediocrity of Southern Ontario."

Pot possession prevents university completion

LONDON, Ont. (VNS) — A University of Western Ontario student charged with possession of marijuana may not be allowed to complete his course.

Magistrate D. B. Menzies, who gave 18-year-old Mark Kirk two years probation, warned the youth that he had little chance of continuing at university.

The magistrate said university authorities have indicated that strong action will be taken to curtail the use of drugs on campus.

"I am satisfied that the authorities at the university will take appropriate steps . . . to deter students from using drugs."

Varsity icemen trim Junior Canadians

While the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League was opening its 1967-68 season schedule, Varsity Blues were out on the east coast (Nova Scotia to be more specific) teaching Halifax Junior Canadians a few lessons in hockey fundamentals.

Blues came from behind Saturday to edge the baby Habs 5-4 before turning around and hammering them 10-4 on Sunday.

Paul Laurent was the scoring hero for Blues as he scored twice on Saturday and added a hat trick on Sunday. Gord Cunningham and Bob McClelland also found the Maritime climate to their taste as they each scored three goals during the two game series.

Newcomer Paul McCann

continued his steady play as he registered a singleton in each game. McCann also scored in last Sunday's game against Laurentian.

Murray Stroud and Brian St. John rounded out Varsity's scoring as they had single goals in the second game.

In SIHL openers, McMaster University jumped off to an excellent start as they bombed University of Montreal 13-4 before squeaking by Queen's 4-3 in Kingston.

BOB McCLELLAND

In other action, Guelph got off to a rather poor beginning as they lost 6-1 to McGill in Montreal and 9-3 to Laval University in Quebec City.

In the McGill-Guelph contest, Peter Burgess was the big gun for the winning Redmen as he fired two goals and assisted on a third. Courtney Pratt, Terry Harron, Mike Stacey and Harry Griffiths also bulged the twine for McGill.

Mike Cummins counted Guelph's only marker as the losers failed for the third year in as many tries to win their first game of the season.

Swimmers open with victory

The Varsity swimming team started the season on a winning note with a convincing victory over York University and Ryerson in an exhibition meet last Thursday night at York. Despite the fact that many of their veterans swam exhibition in their specialties, Blues swept all but one event in compiling 139 points to York's total of 86, and Ryerson's 69.

This impressive performance against a highly rated York squad demonstrates that Toronto again have the depth and the individual stars which together should assure them of their ninth consecutive OQAA and third straight Canadian Intercollegiate Championships.

After their victory on Thursday night, Blues moved on to face their strongest opposition of the season, before the intercollegiate finals, at the Olympic Development meet on Saturday, at the University Settlement. This annual contest brings together top teams from throughout Canada and the United States. Although Varsity did not receive an official placement in the standings because they did not have a women's squad, they fared extremely well both individually and as a team.

Gaye Stratten was outstanding in whipping all comers in the 100 and 200 yard backstroke events. Stratten's winning times were his best ever as a Blue; an amazing performance so early in the year. Theo van Ryn also displayed excellent early season form by setting a meet record of 50.0 seconds in the 100 yard freestyle. Van Ryn placed fourth in the 100 yard butterfly, and Toronto's Bob Heatley gave a strong showing in coming fifth in the same race.

A Varsity team of Chris Fisher, Robin Campbell, Van Ryn, and Stratten, set a meet record of 1 min. 32.4 sec. in the 200 yard freestyle relay, and in the most exciting race of the night, a foursome of Fisher, Warburton, van Ryn and Stratten came from behind to win the 400 yard individual medley relay by a whisker on a judges' decision.

Blues dominate all-stars

If there was any lingering scepticism concerning Varsity Blues' worthiness as SIFL champions, it has ceased to exist after the announcement Saturday of league all-star selections. Blues dominated these selections just as they dominated SIFL competition all season.

In a poll, conducted by Canadian Press (sic), of coaches and writers in four big cities (but not us under-poverished, partisan sportsies) Toronto placed 11 players on the laud-squad to overwhelm the other three teams. Western was next with seven stars, while runner-up Queen's had five and last-place McGill Redmen two. Twenty-five players were named because of a tie.

Offensively Blues had five star stalwarts, including four repeats from last year. Scoring champion Mike Raham made it again at halfback while Mike Eben, of course, caught on for the third consecutive season at end. Three of Blues' unsung heroes made it on the offensive line — guard Ron Wakelin, and the gigantic tackle duo of Jim Kellam and Arnie Carefoote, who are glory boys for the second year in a row.

Blues' stellar defensive unit was rewarded with six selections. Paul McKay and deadly Riivo Ilves made it in the defensive backfield, while linemen Mike Wright, Ylo Korgemagi, Alex Squires, and Alex Topps nailed down the other spots.

Great day for Varsity as Queen's and Western fall

By DAVID ADAM

A UTRFC Syndicated Service

Stalwart work by Varsity Blues' forwards was the dominating aspect of the 11-6 Toronto victory over Western Mustangs which regained the Turner Cup for U of T after a three year absence.

Led by pack-leader and captain Alan Major, the Varsity forwards maintained possession of the ball in the scrum and lineouts as Andy Bethel and Maris Apse worked very effectively. As a result the home side was given the opportunity to exert overwhelming pressure throughout the match. The relatively close score by no means reflected Toronto's control of the play.

Early in the match, winger John Holmes ran through the Western wing three-quarter and counted Blues' initial 3 points by finishing a well-executed play from centre Peter Sutherland. Thereafter, despite some very intelligent running from former footballers Sutherland and Doug Phibbs, who continually sliced through the opposition, the Varsity backs were hampered in their effectiveness by some inopportune kicking, indicating perhaps a weakness in their overall game strategy.

Ill-placed kicks going to Western fullback Peter Norris allowed him to demonstrate his devastating kicking ability much to the chagrin of Blues' forwards, who had strived so masterfully to obtain the ball in the loose. Norris, who otherwise had a disappointing day, kicked two penalty goals for the Western scoring, and Andy Gibson contributed one penalty goal worth three more points for Toronto.

The Blues pack supplied the final 5 points of the match late in the closing moments. As the partisan crowd roared for a score, the forwards moved the ball to the Western 5 yard line; a scrum resulted and George Wray, Varsity scrum-half, called for the pack to carry the ball over. Al Major fell on it for a well-earned try and Bill Kyle completed the scoring with the 2 point convert.

Blues played the final 15 minutes without Terry McBride, Scott McClure and John Holmes, who all received such punishment that they were prevented from continuing in the match. McBride received a separated shoulder, McClure suffered a severe concussion and Holmes fell victim to a serious charley horse.

This heroic victory over the previously unbeaten Western team was achieved only through the magnificent morale of Blues' side. This quality developed only gradually through the season but coalesced finally and necessarily to create a matchless side of players.

James Hamilton, the Blues' hard-working coach, deserves many thanks for his efforts in training this fine side.

Varsity Soccer Blues showed their true class in beating an excellent Queen's Golden Gael's team 4-0, Saturday morning at Varsity Stadium. As a result of the win, Varsity retained the Blackwood Trophy, emblematic of soccer supremacy in the OAAA, for the fourth consecutive year.

Blues were in control throughout the game, never allowing Gaels the upper hand. Proof of this is the fact that Stan Bogucki, who tended the nets for Blues, handled but three shots, all from long range, during the entire game.

All of Blues' players came up with a great effort and to single out one would be an injustice to the rest. Let us just say that the defense was impenetrable, the halfline solid, and the forward line devastating, though luckless.

Queen's also must be applauded on their effort. Even though outplayed by Varsity, never once did they give up while a lesser team may have folded under the tremendous pressure applied to them.

It was unfortunate that the weatherman refused to cooperate Saturday morning. The cold and rain cut down the size of the crowd to about a hundred stoic fans. However, these brave souls were treated to quite an exhibition of soccer.

Blues forged to the attack from the opening whistle and were it not for the excellent goaltending of Fred Hausen and a couple of close misses by Ron Muir and Frank Soppelsa, the game would have been an easy rout. That it was not. Varsity kept up the pressure and at the fifteen minute mark, a hard cross by Soppelsa was deflected by Jim Lefkos into the enemy net.

Queen's tried to fight back but excellent defensive work by Bill Nepotiuk, Eric Sereda, Dwight Taylor and sweeper Allan Cragg spoiled most of Gael's attempts. Their most dangerous chance was a passing combination culminating with a Ian Jones's shot that came within a whisker of the right post.

Varsity's supremacy was evident, nevertheless, and a sense of danger pervaded every time Blues closed in on the Queen's goalmouth. Lefkos, Soppelsa, and Shiels had close misses, and Hausen made good saves on two Jim Laverty shots. The half ended, however, with Blues leading 1-0.

After the changeover, the same pattern prevailed — Blues always pressing while Gaels attempted to counterattack now and then. Ten minutes into the half, Austris Liepa brought down a rebound off a Shiels corner kick and banged it into a corner of the net to up the count to two zip. Five minutes later, Liepa put across a high ball that Soppelsa headed beautifully into the twine. The floodgates seemed to have opened but Queen's refused to fold. They came back and had an excellent opportunity when Jones headed a corner kick just wide. But that was it. Fifteen minutes from the end Soppelsa scored his second and Blues fourth with a stellar shot that clearly beat Hausen.

The last minutes of the game saw Blues trying to up the score, often having seven men on the attack. All to no avail. The final count stayed at 4-0 and Blues were once again champions.

According to many of the Varsity players, Queen's was the best team they faced all season. Their outstanding individuals were goaltender Fred Hausen, Jim Pirie, Ojo Nwaakesi, and Ian Jones. It is no wonder they went undefeated until they met the powerful Blues.

JIM LEFKOS

SQUASH NEWS

Varsity Blues' Mike Gardiner has gained a berth in the final of the Toronto and District "C" squash championship by defeating Steve Moyscy of the Granite Club 3-2.

Gardiner, down 2-1 in games, rallied to take the next two games 15-5, 15-11, in the semi-final match played at the Badminton and Racquet Club, Friday evening.

These were the first two games Gardiner lost in five rounds of tournament play.

Gardiner meets Dave Body of the Toronto Cricket, Skating and Curling Club tonight at 6:00 to decide the championship.

Gardiner, who captained last year's Varsity team, is ranked third on the team this season. He is defending undergraduate champion.

College Bowl berth for Mac

Prospects for a successful College Bowl next weekend were given a scintillating incision of adrenalin on Saturday as McMaster Marauders earned a berth by groping past St. Francis Xavier, 7-0.

McMaster now meets University of Alberta Golden Bears in Toronto on Nov. 25 for the Canadian college championship (sic). The near-presence of Mac's horde of rabid fans will ensure a good crowd for the game. Toronto football fanatics should not let the absence of a Varsity squad hamper their ducat purchases. A good football game is a good football game no matter who's playing.

Playing with eight members of last year's runner-up to St. Francis in the Bowl, Marauders held the powerhouse Bluenosers to nine first downs and less than 200 yards total offense.

Mac's superlative quarterback, Dick Waring, was the main cog in the victory machine as he scored the only touchdown on an eight-yard run in the second quarter to cap a 100 yd. drive in six plays. Waring is far and away the best pivot in Canadian college football this year. Tom Allen added the other Mac point on a 39 yd. single.

The game was played on a gruesome gridiron which X-men coach Don Looney termed "the worst 18 I've seen in ten years."

Sit-in sparks SAC debate on employment recruiting

By PAUL MACRAE

Monday's shouting, straining, sprawling sit-in has sparked a Students Administrative Council debate on a student voice in the operations of the university's Placement Service.

In the wake of the protests against the conducting of interviews by Dow Chemical of Canada, whose parent firm manufactures napalm, the council will debate a motion proposed by the campus Committee to End the War in Vietnam.

The motion calls for:

- an advisory board on the Placement Service with student, faculty, administration and alumni representation, to be convened immediately;
- giving this board the power to authorize use of university facilities for companies wishing to recruit students;

- instructing SAC members on the board to oppose any requests from companies involved in supplying U.S. forces in the Vietnam war.

The motion was formulated at a meeting after yesterday's sit-in on the steps of Simcoe Hall was ignored by the administration. Protestors demanded that the administration suspend the use of university facilities to a Dow recruiter pending a decision on the matter by SAC.

There were also hints at the meeting of a larger demonstration Friday that would involve hundreds or even thousands of students.

The first sit-in Monday was at the Placement Service. It aimed to suspend Dow interviews until SAC could legislate on their desirability, and to place all further campus recruiting under SAC's supervision.

Eighty students and a sprinkling of faculty blocked both entrances to the Placement Service building on Willcocks St. after both demands were refused.

For three hours the sit-in virtually imprisoned Registrar Robin Ross and the Dow representative, William White.

To get out they would have had to crawl across the inert bodies of the demonstrators, who were sprawled over every inch of the building's porch and out onto the sidewalk.

After two hours, organizers David Hemblen, Marlie Ritchie and Professor Chandler Davis of the philosophy department were admitted into the building to see Mr. White.

They emerged 45 minutes later and said White had agreed not to recruit Tuesday or Wednesday.

But Mr. Ross, they said, had not agreed to suspend any use of university facilities until SAC had decided the matter, and he did not favor giving SAC sole control of recruitment decisions.

"Our first demand has been met," said Hemblen. "Our second has not."

At a stormy three-hour meeting after the protest broke up at 5 p.m., yesterday's sit-in was planned to press the second demand.

After considerable debate and discussion the Dow representative was forced to run a "gauntlet," a line of students with arms joined to make an arch.

Flanked by two plain-clothes policemen, Mr. White scuttled out to his car, bowling over a demonstrator as he ran.

"Blocking Dow is no use in furthering our purpose now," said Pat Stenberg (11 New). "Let's transfer the protest to Simcoe Hall and make it hard for them."

Mr. Ross was detained for a half hour after White was released. The strain showed on his face as he was questioned and sometimes heckled by demonstrators.

"The Dow representative has made it clear he does not wish to conduct interviews tomorrow (Tuesday) or Wednesday," he said quietly.

"The matter will be placed under review and the views of SAC regarding the presence of Dow on this campus will be discussed."

A path was cleared and Mr. Ross walked out.

Ryerson's 'Booxodus' empties library

By SHERRY BRYDSON

A "Booxodus" by 500 Ryerson students yesterday left the institute's library in a state of turmoil — and minus at least 3,000 books.

The move was a protest against what students and administrators agree is a totally inadequate library service. In order to point out that Ryerson has the lowest number of books a student (4.8) of any such institution in Canada, organizers of the demonstration urged all students to take out six books each, hopefully leaving the shelves bare.

The Daily Ryersonian ran front-page editorials Monday and yesterday urging all students to take part. The movement was supported by journalism professor Richard Lunn, the students council, and most of the other campus organizations.

At 1 p.m. yesterday, 500 students marched to the library and began to take out their six books each. By 3 p.m. the library was almost quiet again and a number of shelves were standing bare.

Lynn Raeburn, a SAC vice-president said: "I'm not directly involved in the Booxodus but I'm very concerned."

"I never use this library — in fact I haven't been here this year — because it's much easier to use the central library or Sigmund Samuel Library."

She pointed out a number of books in the library that have little relevance to the courses taught at Ryerson: Stories that Sing, Tip Toe Tunes, Truck Shop Manual 1958, Breast Feeding, and I Was a House Detective.

"There is only one school in Toronto with a lower ratio of books than Ryerson," said Miss Raeburn, "and it's a high school."

The University of Toronto has a ratio of 120 books a student. Carlton University, the same size as Ryerson, has 37 books a student.

The administration has pointed out repeatedly that services will be improved when the Ryerson library moves to its new quarters. Peggy Kinsella, the head reference librarian, said she didn't know when the library would be moved.

"First it was to be moved last fall," she said. "Then it was December. Now it's January."

Plans for an 18 storey building on the site of the present library have been discussed. "But we want action now," said Miss Raeburn.

"In a couple of years I'll be an alumnus and a new library won't do me any good. The board of governors knows the problem is there. The principal knows the problem is there.

"But nobody will get going and do something."

Daily columnist Fekete will take McGill discipline committee to court

MONTREAL (CUP)—John Fekete, a columnist for the McGill Daily, says he is taking the principal and the senate discipline committee of McGill University to court.

Fekete is to face the discipline committee, along with editor Peter Allnutt and supplement editor Pierre Fournier. They are charged with "participating in the publication of an article which contravenes standards of decency acceptable by and in this university."

The charges arise from the publication earlier this month of an article from The Realist, a U.S. magazine.

A court writ issued Monday asks the university to halt any further proceedings against Fekete. It names McGill Principal H. Locke Robertson and the members of the discipline committee to appear in court Friday.

Fekete says his lawyers are challenging the committee's jurisdiction in disciplining students, under the articles of Quebec's code of civil procedure.

Principal Robertson announced last week that the administration will not comply with a student council request that it drop charges against the three students.

"The Senate committee on student discipline cannot withdraw the charges," he said in a letter to Peter Smith, the president of the student union.

"The Senate will give no instruction to the committee, in whose fairness to judge the problems involved it has complete confidence."

The letter cited university statutes giving the senate "general disciplinary authority" over the student body.

"Let fair men, duly appointed, do their difficult duty. Afterwards we will speak of change."

GSU holds new executive elections

The Graduate Students Union will elect a new executive Friday to fill positions left vacant by the resignation of its former executive.

The treasurer and vice-president resigned following a vote of non-confidence Nov. 1. The president and the secretary had previously resigned.

The positions to be filled are president, vice-president, secretary, treasurer and eight executive representatives. Nominations must be deposited with the GSU secretary before 5 p.m. tomorrow.

Voting will take place Friday at the GSU and the concourse of the Sigmund Samuel Library between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m.

Any graduate department located outside the Bay-Bloor-Spadina-College area can obtain a separate ballot box by applying to the GSU secretary or a member of the election committee.

There will be a general meeting to hear the candidates' policy statements today at 4 p.m. in the GSU, 16 Bancroft Street.

HSU votes for executive positions

About 60 per cent of the eligible electorate voted yesterday for the executive of the newly-founded History Students Union.

Engineers want Dow back on campus

By MIKE KESTERTON

A motion to support chemical engineers wanting to bring back Dow interviewers was passed by the engineering society last night.

The 15-9 vote ended a noisy three-hour debate which saw spectators outnumbering members.

John Morris the society president, who took part in the sit-in against Dow, said, "I'm just sick at this motion."

A motion deploring the use of "physical force" by demonstrators in preventing job-seekers from talking to Dow was unanimously passed.

In debating the use of napalm in war, Marinus Hus (IV APSC) said, "It's a little nasty, perhaps."

"But we live in a country where we produce what we can sell."

"Dow Canada's polystyrene isn't used for napalm," Art McIlwain (II APSC) said. "It's used to make saran wrap."

"I'm in favor of napalm," said Rick Salvador (IV APSC) "because it makes war horrible."

"And war should be horrible."

Two faculty members on the sit-in committee arrived and were questioned by council members.

"We apologize for any inconvenience we may have caused," Dr. Paul Hoch said. "We just wanted to postpone the interviews until a decision could be made by students as to whether or not they want Dow representatives on campus."

Assailing the "muddle-headed" "long-haired" faculty, McIlwain said: "What they are really fighting against is man's inhumanity to man. Why not also be in favor of apple pie and motherhood?"

Andy Weiner (SGS) added a note of humor by saying "I'm for peace in Vietnam."

"I propose we adopt the slogan 'Kill for Peace'" he added, sitting down amid laughter and applause from the chemical engineers at the meeting.

Ryerson student heckles Dow march easy to get in or out of the building.

An engineer fought his way to the door and was met by a boiling wall of demonstrators. "Let him in you idiots!" a demonstrator called out.

"It's my building tool" the engineer said. "Do you deny me the right to an interview?"

On the crowd's edge several members of the right-wing Edmund Burke Society held a counter demonstration. Their signs read: We Dig Dow—Bomb to Win in Vietnam and Attention Dow—Peace Creeps do not Speak for U of T Students.

The only real violence during the demonstration erupted when a Ryerson student, who had come to heckle, took a swing at a Burkite. Two policemen moved in and broke it up. There were no arrests.

"We have made tremendous progress," Dr. Paul Hoch, a post-doctoral physics fellow and one of the organizers of the demonstration, said after it was over.

"Many students were made aware of the problem of companies complicit in the war recruiting on campus, and we have embarrassed Dow and driven it from the campus.

"We now will try to consolidate our position by getting specific action from the administration and a commitment from SAC."

As he left the placement building, Mr. Ross was asked how he felt about the demonstration.

"Nothing ever shakes my belief in students," he replied.

New appoints students to council

The New College student council last night approved the appointment of five students to the New college council.

There was little debate as the council's invitation was accepted. The five students will be the president and two other members of the student council, and two other students.

A motion was also passed favoring the appointment of a committee to choose the non-student-council members. They will be chosen on the basis of written applications and personal interviews.

The student council members to sit on the college council are Pat Armstrong (II New), the student president, Dave Gray (II New) and Bernie Zuckerman (II New).

Gray commented: "We want discussion, not conflict."

"There are other reasons for this than just student power."

Parade publicizes Mikites musical

Miss Toronto, Debbie Berkart (I SMC) and a bevy of other St. Michael's College beauties yesterday heralded the coming of this year's Mikites theatrical production, How To Succeed in Business Without Really Trying.

First stop for the lively cavalcade of five cars was Hart House. "Mes amis, I am here to spread the word about the great extravaganza being produced by the Mikites," sputtered a spastic imitator of John Diefenbaker.

Crawling through engineering territory, the Mikites met little opposition—mainly because there were no engineers sauntering about at class time.

In fact until 3 p.m. there was not much audience reaction except from bleary-eyed construction workers and shivering protesters at the Placement Centre.

With a couple of bumps and lots of grinds, the procession stopped in front of Sidney Smith Hall. As awestruck students gaped, swarming Mikites plastered posters on doors, sidewalks, cars and traffic meters.

Then in a cloud of ticker tape and balloons they were up and away.

The musical comedy will be presented at the Ryerson Theatre Nov. 30 to Dec. 2. Tickets are being sold at booths in the main library, Sid Smith and at SMC.

when human life becomes a matter of convenience

Acting-President Sword emerged from the inconveniences of Monday and Tuesday's demonstrations with a totally predictable reaction. He affirmed the right of the students and the staff of the University to speak out and demonstrate an "any . . . subject of concern to them." Added Acting-President Sword, "The University stands for open and widespread discussion."

But, added the Acting-President, students and staff have no right to restrain the freedom of others; "Demonstrations in which physical force or anything resembling it is used cannot be permitted because this way of settling issues is contrary to everything the university stands for."

It is tempting to enter into arguments based on hairsplitting legalism and philosophical debate concerning the nature of a university, the rights and responsibilities of its members, and whether or not the presence of Dow recruiters on the campus is or is not "contrary to everything the university stands for."

However honorable and justifiable these arguments may be and sincere the demonstrators may have been in their demands for student control over the presence of job interviewers on the campus (and we feel that they were), we nonetheless think that these arguments are not crucial to the reasons for the demonstration, and the reasons for our supporting it.

The fundamental question is whether or not one accepts the use of napalm in a war being waged upon civilians.

By now, we all know the effects of na-palms. We also know of the "improvements" that Dow's research has made on the efficiency of this weapon: it now burns right through the body, and is sufficiently adhesive that it is virtually impossible to remove it.

We also know that the purpose to which it is being put is roughly the same as the purpose to which poison gas was put by the Germans in the concentration camps of World War II: civilian extermination and intimidation.

Albert Camus defined rebellion in terms of limits; there comes a point at which a situation can no longer be endured, and when a situation passes the point where enough people refuse to accept the status quo, rebellion occurs. The idea that this university, on whatever grounds of "freedom of expression or movement," as Acting President Sword put it, would permit Dow representatives to use university facilities was morally repugnant to a significant number of people. Not content with merely "speaking out," "demonstrating," or "voicing their disapproval," they rebelled. Napalm, its production, sole and use, simply is not a matter for "open and widespread discussion."

But, predictably, in the name of "freedom of expression and movement," and affirming the University's concern with "open and widespread discussion," the Administration has condemned the non-violent demonstration on Monday.

The University Administration is, of course, legally within its rights. In committing civil disobedience, the demonstrations were repasing within the comforts of little or no legal protection, and they knew it.

However, in the Administration's bland assumption that everything, even napalm, is a matter for "open and widespread discussion," it is implying a moral abdication that reveals, as perhaps few other Administration statements have, what the university really stands for . . . and what it refuses to stand against.

Analyzed properly, this statement shows that the university has come out in favor of convenience: convenience of Dow and of the seven or eight students who wanted to meet the Dow man for job interviews.

Dow's convenience, we aren't too worried about. Dow of Canada's convenience is no different. To argue that the Canadian company set up by and wholly-owned by the parent U.S. is not morally involved in the manufacture of napalm, is ludicrous.

The convenience of the students is a different matter. Our support goes to the sit-in because we think the people participating in it are right; and the students applying for jobs with Dow are wrong. It all boils down to that, doesn't it?

But justifying the physical impediment of students wanting to apply for a job with Dow is impossible in terms other than we have already used. It becomes a matter of making a choice between one (a student's job) and the other (rejection of human death and suffering). In other words, the end is so important that the means are justifiable.

What must be done on this campus, and what the university has failed to do, is educate. We mean real education involving the beauty of human life and the ugliness of mass disrespect for life. And mass disrespect in the face of the mass slaughter. Instead we are taught to sit back calmly and discuss the issues involved. Maybe the problem will go away itself while we're talking.

SAC tonight is faced with the tough problem of having to consider if the student body should have control over which companies are allowed to recruit here. The council could forget the whole thing, of course, because the matter is not on the agenda and there are no proper ways to add it to the agenda at this time.

j. h. sword's statement

The following is a statement issued yesterday on the Dow protest by J. H. Sword, the acting president of the University of Toronto.

Individually or in groups, staff and students at the University of Toronto have the right to speak out and to demonstrate in connection with national or international issues or on any other subject of concern to them. The University stands for open and widespread discussion. By this means we arrive at most of our policy decisions.

But the right to be heard and to demonstrate does not carry with it the right to restrain freedom of expression or movement by others who may hold different views. Demonstrations in which physical force or anything resembling it is used cannot be permitted because this way of settling issues is contrary to everything a university stands for. In a recent resolution the council of the American Association of University Professors declared: "All components of the academic community are under a strong obligation to protect its processes from these tactics."

Following yesterday's demonstration at the University Placement Service office, the representative of the Dow Chemical Company stated publicly that his company had suspended the employment interviews scheduled to take place at the University today.

The University is considering the next steps in connection with this matter. In these deliberations the views expressed by the group of students and faculty who took part in yesterday's demonstration and any views that may be expressed by the Students' Administrative Council will be given sober and serious consideration.

For the past four months the whole nature, purpose and functioning of the Placement Service has been under study by a committee consisting of academic and administrative staff and the President of the Students' Administrative Council. At no stage in the deliberations of this committee has the President of the SAC indicated that the SAC wishes to exert any veto power on the companies to be permitted to recruit on this campus.

LETTERS

Sir:

In recent weeks your paper and others have carried articles which have referred to Erindale and Scarborough Colleges as "dumping grounds" with inferior standards for inferior students. It just isn't so. In fact, if anything, Erindale and Scarborough Colleges have a superior academic atmosphere. Instead of subjecting the undergraduate to gigantic classes which leave him no opportunity to ask questions and to discuss issues, classes at the satellite colleges are generally much smaller and allow a much greater communication between student and professor. In addition, Erindale and Scarborough Colleges have the same standard of teaching because they have the SAME professors as the main campus. For years there has been an outcry for smaller classes, more tutorials, and greater communication between student and teacher. This exists at Erindale and Scarborough now.

Turning to the question of the students themselves, yes, some students who originally applied for the main campus were told they had to go to the satellite colleges. But a much larger percentage are attending the satellite colleges, not because they would not have been accepted by the main campus, but because they would avoid the problems of parking, city traffic, and large classes which have plagued the main campus for years. This has been pointed out on more than one occasion by the principal of Erindale, Dr. Wilson, who is certainly in a better position to comment on the situation than many who do.

It is a pity that there are still some who do not realize what an asset the satellite colleges are and can be in the future. Both are relatively new, however, and anything which is printed about them can have a great effect on their future development and their, as yet, unestablished reputation. It is for this reason and for the students who may in future years wish to enter Erindale or Scarborough that we request that you print this letter.

WHY I SAT IN...

By LAUREL LIMPUS

Monday I sat down in front of the Placement Service and blocked the door with my body so that job interviews for Dow recruiting could not take place. A boy stepped on my back and on my hand. He also stepped directly upon the stomach of the girl next to me causing her to vomit, but not to relinquish her place in the sit-in. We were there because we thought that the whole student body, and not just those boys applying for jobs, should decide if Dow should come here. The whole university is implicated in this decision.

It is true that we did our best to stop them from entering the building. It is true that we kept them in the building for two hours after they had climbed in over us. I am willing to admit that, in a certain light, I was abridging their freedom to see the Dow interviewer. I did this, however, because of a moral decision, because I believe that in some cases more general considerations outweigh what is often called a man's individual freedom.

Dow Chemical makes napalm. Napalm is very like poison gas; it inflicts a cruel, long, unnatural and horrible death on its victims. It is used indiscriminately in the Vietnamese countryside by the Americans, and 50 pounds a month of it falls on men, women and children. The number of children in Vietnam who have been disfigured, burned and killed by napalm is staggering, as is attested to by articles in Ramparts and the Star Weekly, to name only two magazines.

Dow Chemical refuses to assume any responsibility for this suffering, contending that it only fills government orders, and that it is not a company's place to dictate government policy. Similarly Adolf Eichmann, when confronted with his role in the destruction of thousands of Jews, answered: "I only provided the lorries."

NUREMBERG

It was decided at Nuremberg that individual men do have moral responsibility when they help to commit mass crimes. What should we think of people whose salaries are paid by a company profiting from the burning flesh of the Vietnamese people?

GENOCIDE

Dow Chemical is engaged in genocide. The rights of the Vietnamese people not to be burned, mutilated and killed by napalm are being violated by the actions of Dow Chemical. Where are the profits that pay me coming from, and whose blood are they drenched in?

DRAW THE LINE

We sat down yesterday because we would like to begin to draw the line at the university. This is the students' university, and the students should have the right to decide what purposes it serves. They should be able to choose if the Placement Service facilities should be used by companies like Dow Chemical which are involved in the war machine. The administration, several of its members associated with complex companies, is not an impartial judge of this matter. More than this, it simply does not have the right to dictate to the students how student services will be used. Students use the placement service; students should decide what goes on there.

TEMPORARY SUSPENSION

We asked the university for a temporary suspension of Dow recruiting until SAC could consider the matter. We asked them to stop the interviews for two days yesterday and today, until the students could voice their opinion. This was not a great abridgement of a boy's right to see the interviewers, since in these two days hundreds of people were burned by napalm.

SAC is meeting tonight. I hope that it will vote in favor of ending the university's complicity in the slaughter of other human beings.

... WHAT OTHERS THOUGHT

napalm doesn't burn Vietnamese children

Sir: I don't know whether our Varsity editor practices deliberate distortion and falsification or he is just ignorant. In any case it seems assinine to wrap oneself in self-righteous wrath about something that isn't borne out by facts and to demand an equally sanctimonious stand from the whole university.

If our editor had bothered to read anything more than Ramparts magazine, he just might have noticed the comments on napalm and burning babies by New York Times medical columnist, Dr. Howard Rusk, during the week of March 21, 1967.

After a painstaking investigation Rusk was unable to find a single case of a child who had been burned by napalm and he heard of only a few.

The doctor is not a man to close his eyes to human suffering and would certainly have caused an outcry if he had found some evidence of napalm child casualties.

Your very truly, Juris Dreifelds (SGS)

(Ed. note: What's this, Mr. Dreifelds?)

the wrong method

Sir: Monday's demonstration at the Placement Service illustrates the dedication of members of our university to find new means to stop the agony of a cruel and unjust war. As such it can lead all of us, students, administrators, and professors, to think afresh about what our relation is to the immoral use of military might. Further, the question of whether we want to encourage students to take jobs with a firm which manufactures napalm is just a poignant and urgent case of the more general problem of work in our society. How long can we go on thinking about work as if all that counted was the money? As if we didn't care whether work was joyless, dull, destructive?

It is to the honour of the demonstration to have posed this problem dramatically.

On the other hand, it was dishonourable, self-defeating and gratuitous for some members of the demonstration to try to humiliate the Dow representative at his departure. Many of us in the demonstration, faculty and students, think that humiliation is a primitive tactic.

It leads to mindless conformity, never to thought, analysis and courageous engagement. A crowd humiliating a man is cowardly and warlike. That's not the way to keep the Vietnamese from being burned.

Natalie Zemon Davis
Associate Professor of History.

respect freedoms

Sir: On Monday, November 20, members of the CEWW protested the presence on the campus of the Dow Chemical Limited representative, whose parent company, in the U.S. manufactures napalm, a chemical used in the Vietnamese War. As the body of students most affected by the demonstration, it is our opinion that this group has every right to express its views on Vietnam. But when these demonstrations interfere with the rights of individuals, namely those who have an interview with Dow, then their action cannot be condoned. It is the right of every person to have the freedom of opinion and the freedom of speech. Those demonstrators at 45 Willcocks Ave. were not denied these rights. However, by their actions, this group denied those individuals who wished to enter the building, THEIR RIGHTS.

We respect your freedoms, CEWW and feel that you should have the courtesy to respect ours.

Members of the Third Year Chemical Engineering Class.

what does sac know?

Sir: I find it necessary to express my objection to the view expressed by the Toronto Committee to End the War in Vietnam in a recent pamphlet that "SAC, not the administration, should invite interviewers to this campus." This statement, provoked by the appearance of Dow Chemical of Canada, contains the implication that SAC possesses some superior capacity for judging the "morality" of a particular company and whether or not students ought to be able to easily meet these companies for interviews.

Few would deny and many support the right of the CEWW to express their revulsion to the thought of a civilized company profiteering from the manufacture of napalm. Nevertheless, I resent the implication that SAC, or anyone else, would prevent my meeting an employer recruiting on the campus because it is, so to speak, "morally unfit" to do so. Certainly, by graduation each individual ought to be capable of making these choices entirely on his own. I seriously doubt SAC's ability to make these decisions.

Thomas Hards (II Vic)

COMPACT CONTACT

Why carry around a whole chemistry set full of potions for wetting, cleaning and soaking contact lenses? Lensine is here! It's an all-purpose solution for complete lens care, made by the Murine Company. So what else is new? Well, the removable lens carrying case on the bottom of every bottle, that's new, too. And it's exclusive with Lensine, the solution for all your contact lens problems.

Dow sit-in freezes out as demons

By PAUL MACRAE and SHERRY BRYDSON

A sit-in is always a cosy thing, and after Monday's demonstration turned into a sit-out, cuddling became a necessity.

Young Communists suddenly became friendly with CEWV-types. People introduced themselves — after sharing scarves, coffee and cigarettes. It was frigid on the steps of the placement service, and the press of 80 bodies did little to alleviate the cold.

It was an eight-hour freeze-out for some demonstrators. Picketing started at 9 a.m. as a sparse 15 persons paced back and forth along Willcocks, turning the fresh snow and dying lawn into muddy puddles.

By 11 a.m. 30 demonstrators were churning the lawn

Paul Hoch, one of the sit-in leaders addresses the crowd at yesterday's demonstration.

Prospective Dow employees may be able to avoid the complications of an interview at the Placement Service.

"I am perfectly willing to arrange an interview in my office at any time for any of my students," Professor W. F. Graydon of the faculty of engineering said in an interview last night.

"There is no question students have the right to the interviews. I will do anything necessary to achieve that end.

"But it is my hope and expectation that the interviews will be resumed in their proper course."

A. W. Headrick, the assistant director of the Placement Service, says the fate of the interviews is "still very much up in the air."

He confirmed last night that Dow recruiters would not be conducting interviews today.

"To my knowledge they are waiting until some decisions are made by SAC and the administration," he said.

Registrar Robin Ross, speaks to the protesters, as David Hemblen smiles serenely at the speech.

in front of the placement building.

A girl, very embarrassed, crossed not a scab!" she laughed. "I'm only with General Foods!"

Two girls shook their heads at placement Service. "Dow shall not kill! Dow here today? That's embarrassing."

Two freshmen watched from the palm as a military weapon," said nuclear weapons."

Six or seven engineers marched Dow!" and "Wouldn't a Dow go to the moon?"

Engineer: "Give us a 'D!' Chorus: 'O!' 'O!' 'Give us a 'double-ya!' 'dya got?'" "BEER!"

Meanwhile a picketer put on a skull mask. He carried a briefcase on one side and a "bomb" protruding from the other.

A luncheon meeting failed to stop the demonstrators, now 80-strong, pushed their way onto the building porch, steps, and out onto the street.

Soon after, an enthusiastic picketer perched on top of the building, waving his sign, Napalm Burns Babs. He was seen phantly.

No one told him to get down. He was too busy sitting to notice.

At one point a parade of cars turned off Spadina onto Willcocks, and a St. Michael's College product line in Business.

"Kill for money," a squatter said. A group of third and fourth-year students appeared with a petition asking that Dow respect their rights to see the Dow report.

They couldn't get the petition sheet in the building, so they hung it from a cable on the side of the building hauled it, hand over hand, to the second storey window.

In the New College women's area, cement mixers rumbled like a parade making a run.

After four o'clock the solidarity of the protest began to shatter. Debates arose over what to do with the sit-in now that he had agreed to leave campus.

As the temperature dropped and the protesters wanted to call it a day, they decided to walk.

Six or seven demonstrators walked into the warm building sent out a message: "be willing to sit-in" until hell freezes over and greet their note.

Eventually, a majority decided to end the sit-in and try again Tuesday.

It was cold again Tuesday morning.

UWO council vetoes non-student rector

LONDON, Ont. (CUP) — The students council of the University of Western Ontario has decided to reject indirect participation on the board of governors.

Peter Larson, the president of the council, announced last week that participation of a non-student rector on the lay board as proposed in the new university act is unacceptable.

Western students lost a battle in the Ontario legislature this summer to have a student directly elected to the board. The university had recommended a change in the university act allowing for a non-student, but the private bills committee changed this to allow a student to sit.

Amid political wrangling the legislature ignored the committee's decision and legislated in favor of the university board of governor's non-student rector recommendation.

Larson said a non-student rector does not have the same day-to-day experiences as the student, and so cannot substitute for him on the board of governors.

"This is not to be construed as a fit of anger or sulking," said Larson. "We feel that students can be better represented by writing to the board and negotiating on issues as they arise. We really believe the rector is worse than nothing."

CUS abandons secret field work reports

OTTAWA (CUP)—The Canadian Union of Students is abandoning its policy of writing confidential field work reports.

The decision follows sharp criticism of the reports last weekend by Shawn Sullivan, the president of the University of British Columbia students council.

Sullivan told the CUS board of directors meeting the reports were "crap."

CUS attacks secrecy in university government, he said, and should not practice itself.

CUS Vice-President Don Mitchell explained the reports were for the use of other field workers returning to a campus and that they were confidential because they discussed personalities on campus in frank terms.

Chris Westdal, the student president at the University of Manitoba, said that if field workers find deficiencies in the work being done by the local elected students the field worker should let them know.

Sullivan said later that he was puzzled because a field worker had spent a week on the UBC campus and did not give any kind of feedback to the elected student government.

"Field workers should work for the campus," he said, "not for themselves."

CIA won't recruit on nearby campuses

WASHINGTON (CPS-CUP)

In the interest of "maintaining a peaceful academic atmosphere," the Central Intelligence Agency has decided not to recruit on campuses that lie near one of the agency's regional recruiting offices.

A spokesman noted that in some cases interviews would be conducted in a downtown area of cities that do not have CIA offices.

The CIA has met with protests, on several campuses.

"Heresy" too risqué for Kingston printers

KINGSTON (Special)—A new campus magazine, Heresy, will be shipped to Toronto for publication because it is too "controversial" to be printed in Kingston.

Co-editors Peter Ladner and Hamar Foster said Kingston printers have turned it down because "certain words which are commonly considered obscene" appeared in two articles.

"The words aren't there to make people giggle," said Ladner. "They are there to make a point."

Joe Paul, the owner of Bo-Flan Engraving Ltd. here, described the material as "just plain filth" and said he would not "aid in pornography."

The co-editors expect to have less trouble printing the material in Toronto.

Ryerson council requests fee raise

Ryerson students council is petitioning the board of governors for a fee hike to go into effect next September.

The requested raise includes a $1-a-student contribution to the centennial fund (Indian-Eskimo bursary), and a $1 raise for "expanding students facilities."

A SAC brief discussed Ryerson's future costs when the expansion program is completed, and stated the need for having a surplus on hand. Academic and service reforms involving such projects as teacher-courses evaluation and co-op housing formed the basis of the study.

Commission considers university relations with governments: Ward

OTTAWA (CUP) — A commission sponsored by student, faculty and administrative national organizations will report on relationships between universities and governments.

Doug Ward, past president of the Canadian Union of Students, told the CUS board Sunday that the commission is a breakthrough for students, marking the first time students have a veto over any suggestions for commissioners. This is the first time the voice of students has been recognized in decisions of co-operating national organizations.

The three commissioners, to be appointed within a month will:

- define the distinctive role of a university in a changing Canadian society,
- study the competing necessities of academic freedom and public control,
- define the instruments needed for university-government relations.

The Ford Foundation has given the group $150,000 to finance the study.

Interfactus homo

Emmanuel, by dexterously praising the Lord and passing the puck, defeated Music, 3-2. Doug Joblin, Fred Joblin, and Jim Peacock, the left wing of God, scored for Emmanuel, Eason and Dave (Vladimir) Richards for Music.

St. Michael's E obliterated Innis II, 3-0. Bob Bedard, Ted Paupst, M. Scisizzi, F. Paci and Chris Pinto — struck fell terror into the hearts of the brave sons of Innis and also, incidentally, scored the goals.

St. Michael's D rent Trinity C limb from limb, 5-2, aided by the fine play of St. Jude at rover. Rafty with 2 goals, Fibber McGee, Power, and Marks spearheaded the savage Irish onslaught. Adamson and Swift replied in kind for Trin C.

Jr. Engineering beat St. Michael's B 4-2. Sumayama, Polk, Higashi, and MacCallum scored for the Practically Scientists, Langday and Christianson for St. Mike's.

Goals by the Great Buruh and far-ranging Moffat sparked Meds A to a 2-1 victory over Dents A. McLeod scored for Dents.

Olivo scored the only goal as Scarborough defeated degenerate, UC 1-0. Donofrio successfully protected the purity of the Suburbanites nets.

Vic. I over PHE A in Battle of the Jocks, 2-1. Jim Van Wyck and Mark Emin scored for Vic. Alves replied in the usual articulate PHE manner.

In layoff action, Trin A cut down Forestry, 3-0, Loat, Grynock, and Nixon scoring the goals; and St. Mike's A outlasted Engineering (so to speak) 2-1. Palma and Palermo counted for the Irish (?) and Okechirny led the star-Studded Engineers.

In further play, St. Mike's white-WASPED Trinity A 3-0. McNally earned the shut-out while Donovan, Hurlley, and Cengarle led the attack. The goalie Trinity.

LACROSSE

PHE A utterly wiped Vic I from the face of the earth, 7-5. Alexander and Dale each had the hat-trick for PHE; Wright added the other. Rudy Vaillillee with 3 (note emphatic rhyme), Murphy and Eleker scored for Vic.

PHE D crushed Meds C 4-0 leaving not a wraith behind (actually, there was a wraith but it went to the swift). Powell Tom Taylor, Mockford, and Emery put them in for PHE.

BASKETBALL

Another intramural basketball season got under way Tuesday with the ritual sacrifice of Law I at the hands of Innis I by the score of 43-23. High-priest Harsh hit for 20 points for Innis; Shivas was tops for Law with 9.

RUGGER

Herb Pirik tried, and then he tried again, to give Innis a 6-3 victory over PHE B. Terry Colson got the PHE points.

Meds. B topped Architecture 5-0 on D. Carvell's try and conversion. UC basely failed to show up for their game with Trin B, forcing the officials, more in sorrow than in anger, to award the match to the latter (Trinity; see above).

Blues' Mike Gardiner wins T&D "C" squash tournament

Varsity Blues' Mike Gardiner won the Toronto and District "C" squash tournament Monday by defeating Dave Body of the Toronto Cricket Skating and Curling Club, 3-1.

Scores in the games played at the Badminton and Racquet Club were 15-10, 11-15, 15-14, and 15-11.

Gardiner defeated Body by stroking the ball deep along the forehand and backhand walls. His well-placed lob serve to the backhand had Body in trouble throughout the match.

But it was Gardiner's superior forehand that eventually proved the difference. He forced Body into errors by applying pressure to his week forehand.

Like most winners, Gardiner had more than his share of the breaks. With the score tied 14-14 in the third game, Gardiner took a full stroke but caught the ball on the wood and hit it into the corner for a perfect point.

He also got four points on woods in the final game as he began to tire. After the fourth wood Body threw his racquet in disgust. In six rounds of tournament play Gardiner lost only three games.

The tournament victory gives Gardiner an "B" ranking. He is the only member of Blues with such a ranking.

Gardiner, who captained last year's Varsity team, is ranked third on the club this season. He is in his fifth year on the team.

Meds stun Skule: face Vic

By JIM MORRISON
and AMPERSAND

Who woulda thunk it? I mean Meds 31 (31!) — Engineering 26. Well Suzy Creamcheese, those medsmen really did it yesterday afternoon, in the greatest interfac sbow for many moons. There were the mighty Skulemen, second in lofty Group I, the image of sartorial elegance in Bleu et Or. And there were the Medsmen, otherwise known as the Motley Crew—all 23 of them (or was it 22?) who bad fought, yea died, to reach that semi-final plateau.

The excitement began early in the first quarter, when Denys Symons scored for the physicians on a one-yard run. His convert was good, and Meds led 7-0. Then Tom Loumankis ran four yards for a Skule score after two consecutive penalties to the other side. But the conversion was missed and Meds still led, 7-6.

It was the second half that contained the real sbow.

Nick Malakis upped the margin to 13-6 with a 20 yard sprint around right end, but the convert was missed. Then the Engineers came right back with Loumankis's second T.D. of the day, to narrow the margin.

Seesaw went the scoring as Denys Symons dashed over for his second major of the day, and the (motley) array were ahead 19-12. But on came the Engineers on the ensuing kickoff, and Glen Katsuyama travelled 85 yards for six points. The successful convert made it 19 apiece.

It seemed that time was running out for the Heroic Few under a late Skule Charge. Cam Hill trotted 64 yards to the end zone, and after the convert, Engineers were ahead for the first time. All was not lost, however, for Meds Q.B. Paul Dedumets fired a 26 yard bullet towards another score. The missed convert left it 26-25, for Skule.

Then came THE PLAY. Only 1:19 sbowed on the scoreboard clock when Dedumets and Craig Rectter combined for an 87 yard pass-and-run play to cap the scoring in an unbelievable game. The final score: 31-26.

In the other semi-final, Victoria College headed for its tenth straight Mulock final by pounding out a 17-9 victory over PHE.

Vic started early as quarterback Don Karn combined with flanker Pete Fairgrieve for an 80 yard pass and run touchdown on the first play from scrimmage.

Both teams spent most of the second half mired in the midfield morass, and the only scoring came from a 35 yard single by Chris Punter.

Phys Ed fought back gamely but the sturdy Vic defense held Chapman on third down with three minutes left to snuff out the last PHE threat.

The Mulock Cup Battle will take place on Wednesday, November 29, at 1:00 p.m. in Varsity Stadium. How about Meds for their first championship since 1938?

WHY U OF T STUDENTS SHOULD SUPPORT THE COLLEGE BOWL

In two precarious years of existence, the Canadian College Bowl has managed to alienate just about everyone at the University of Toronto. Rare is the campus soul prepared to utter even the feeblest word of support for this, Canada's venture into the Yankee yahoo syndrome of gridiron bowl games.

Howie Fluxgold, reporter for the Toronto Daily Star and former Varsity Sports Editor, said bluntly, "I don't even want to talk about it. Those guys are just a bunch of hustlers!" And the director of athletics at U of T, Warren Stevens, complained recently that the College Bowl committee had Toronto over a barrel: "They want to use all our facilities, including our students, and then when we squawk about anything, it's branded in the press as 'sour grapes'."

PAST MISTAKES

What happened in the last two years to arouse such an outburst of chagrin? Well, in 1965, in their initial attempt, the College Bowl actually made a wise choice of teams with Varsity Blues and Alberta Golden Bears taking part. Unfortunately, this stroke was brutally nullified by unreasonably high ticket prices, not feasible even in the interests of charity.

Then last year, the bitter taste left by the previous fiasco became acrimonious acid in the mouths of U of T students. After reconsidering so nobly and lowering admission standards, the Bowl people waxed completely ridiculous in their team selection. Blindly ignoring the SIFL, they chose a pair of inferior squads from Waterloo and St. Francis Xavier.

AT LAST SOME SENSE

So all right. Wearing an O for 2 collar, the College Bowl, this year, finally made a legitimate bid for a base bit. Ticket prices remained low for students, and the SIFL was guaranteed a berth in the game, way back in the goey climes of spring. Toronto reacted favourably to this sudden birth of reason by the Bowl committee and tried strenuously to pass a motion of participation through its fellow OQAA members (Western, McGill and Queen's). The motion failed, and the OQAA, in effect, spurned the College Bowl, paying back in full last year's irksome insult.

However, the Bowl selection committee, after one more futile plea to the OQAA, showed surprising lack of panic in the face of their apparent misfortune. They struck out determinedly, giving Alberta a bye and arranging a playoff between the Central Ontario champion and the top collegiate Bluenoser. Also, very significantly, the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union officially billed the game as the "Canadian college championship."

Ergo, on Sat. November 25 at Varsity Stadium, playing off for "all the marbles" in Canadian college football will be McMaster Marauders and Alberta Golden Bears. The team ranked number one collegiately, Varsity Blues, is conspicuous only by its absence. In the face of this alarming discrepancy, does the College Bowl deserve the support of Blues' most rabid followers, the student body at U of T? It does . . . most definitely!

WHY?

In the first place, the idea of an annual Bowl game with national collegiate football supremacy at stake is an excellent one. Too good an idea to be left withering from lack of support. Students should not let past mistakes dictate their refusal to support the College Bowl. This year, the SIFL has ruled itself out, so why penalize the Bowl's worth as an annual institution because the SIFL is wrong?

Telecast nationally for the second successive year, the College Bowl shows signs of becoming one of the nation's top sporting events. If it can survive these few rocky years of initiation, it may eventually rival the Grey Cup for hoopla, high-jinks, general excitement, and interest. The College Bowl does not deserve to die early.

Secondly, looking specifically at Saturday's game, it's going to be a damned good football match. The teams are evenly matched, and Mac quarterback, Dick Waring, is himself worth the price of admission. After three years at Bowling Green University in Ohio, where he earned little All-America mention, Waring's sophisticated cool at the helm is something to behold. Not spectacular — just cool.

And finally, after all, the game is played for charity. This in itself should not make you feel obligated to attend, but if you've even thought about going, it should make your decision for you. Bickering between the SIFL and the College Bowl makes good copy, but a starving kid couldn't care less who's right. The Canadian Save the Children Fund needs money.

So go to the game, soothe your sweetie, and save your conscience. The College Bowl needs you!

PUCKSTER PREVIEW

Varsity still No. 1 in SIHL

By PHIL BINGLEY

With the 1967-68 Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League schedule already underway, and Varsity Blues preparing to open their season this Friday night in Quebec City, it's time for our yearly expert opinions on who will finish where — and why.

VARSITY BLUES

1966-67 Record: 14-1-1 (First Place)
Coach: Tom Watt

Blues have lost all-star wingers Steve and Henry Monteith as well as Don Fuller, Peter Burwasb, and Pat Monahan. Although these five players contributed a total of 63 goals among them last year, Blues appear strong enough to fill the gaps left by the quintet's departure.

Top-scorer Paul Laurent, Ward Passi, and Gord Cunningham form one unit, Murray Stroud will centre converted defenceman Brian Jones and converted Bob McClelland, and newcomer Brian St. John will pivot Mike Riddell and one of John Gordon, Paul McCann or Fred Pollard.

Defensively, Blues are as strong as ever. With veterans Peter Sayer, Bob Hamilton and Jim Miles heading up the blue-line brigade and Doug and Al Jones fighting for the fourth spot, enemy forwards won't have too many opportunities to fatten their scoring averages.

In goal, Varsity will have two of the best in the business in the persons of John Wrigley and Peter Adamson.

They said the Red Sox would never win the pennant, and the football Blues would never beat Queen's. That's enough in the upset department for one year. Blues are number 1.

WESTERN MUSTANGS

1966-67 Record: 10-6-0 (Third Place)
Coach: Ron Watson

Western started off weakly at the beginning of last season, got progressively better, and then progressively worse as the schedule closed.

Mustangs' strongest point is their defence. Along with goaltenders Gary Bonney and Alyn Patterson, 'Stangs have six competent defencemen. Dave Field, Bill L'Heureux, Earnie McLaughlin, Dick Lauzon, Bob Blackburn and Brian Domelle should be enough to keep opposing forwards honest.

'Stangs are weak on the forward lines with loss of all their right-wingers from last year as well as top scorer and centre Rich Clark.

Brent Imlach, a former junior with Toronto Marlboros, and London Nats, will be the man in the soup. If Imlach doesn't produce, Mustangs are dead, baby, dead.

Other returning forwards include John Hospodar, John Heslop, Warren Sweeney, and Jim Dent. These players will have to score well or Western may find themselves in a sweat to make the playoffs.

QUEEN'S GOLDEN GAELS

1966-67 Record: 8-5-3 (Fourth Place)
Coach: Bob Carnegie

With only seven experienced players returning from last year's squad, Gaels will need some strong individual efforts and a lot of hustle if they are to retain their playoff position.

Among the returnees are goal-terners Norm Douglas and Bart Lackie, defenceman Bob Thomson, and forwards Bob Clayton, George Corn, Laird McConvey, and John Quayle.

Graduation hit Gaels hard as they lost their two top snipers from last season in the persons of Bob Pond and Bob Tait.

McMASTER MARLINS

1966-67 Record: 7-9-0 (Fifth Place)
Coach: Bill Mahoney

Of all the 1966-67 second division teams, Marlins appear to have the best chance of any to make the top four this year.

Marlins have ten returning lettermen in their lineup as well as some promising newcomers. Graeme Taylor, Max Hichox, Bill Chapenko, Gary Spoar, Mike Lynch and John Dediana head the list of returnees while newcomers Vic Conte, Bruce Kelley, Jack Parn (who played interfac hockey for Vic last year) and goaltender Jim Cooper look to have nailed down starting berths.

Vietnam war suppliers not welcome at U of T: SAC

By DAVE FRANK

Recruiters for firms profiting from the Vietnam war are not welcome on the University of Toronto campus, the Students Administrative Council decided Wednesday night.

After an orderly two-and-a-half-hour debate the council agreed 24-14 on a motion proposed by Steve Langdon (III Trin) and Toni McNamara (III SMC). Ian Sadinsky (IV UC) and Allan Bruce (III APSC) abstained.

The motion:

● called for the immediate convening of an advisory board on campus employment services to authorize the use of facilities;

● instructed the SAC representatives on the board to oppose requests "from companies supplying materials to parties for use directly in military action in Vietnam."

The board, which was recommended to President Claude Bissell this summer, would include representatives of SAC, faculty, administration and alumni.

"The war shades off into smaller degrees of involvement," mathematics professor Chandler Davis told SAC members.

"But the guilt filters through. Somewhere we have to start to sever our ties with the war."

"There is no automatic right for an outside organization to use the university facilities," said Langdon. "It depends on the decision of the community."

SAC also voted to send a letter of regret and apology to William White, the Dow recruiter who was forced to run a "gauntlet" at Monday's sit-in at the Placement Service.

The opposition to Langdon's motion was led by Art McIlwain (II APSC), who was loudly applauded by fellow engineering students in the capacity audience.

"Our rights are being violated," he charged. "The motion smacks not of self-sacrifice, but of preaching. It is mightily hollow."

"If you are not qualified to apply," he told non-engineers at the meeting, "what right have you to tell me I can't work there?"

Several other members argued it was "essentially an individual moral decision" and that adopting the motion would be "an infringement of students' rights."

But SAC President Tom Faulkner drew an analogy with the Housing Service, which will not accept landlords who discriminate on the basis of race.

"Are we infringing on the rights of students who would like a 'white' accommodation listing?"

"It would increase the number of listings by about 20 per cent," he added.

Irv Weisdorf (III UC) referred to a recent article in The Globe and Mail which quoted Dr. O. M. Solandt, the chancellor of U. of T., as urging Canada to become the leading specialist in the application of modern science to the problems of triphibious warfare.

"Such a program," Weisdorf quoted from the article, "would also provide weapons for which there might well be a substantial market in other countries'."

"I don't want such a man deciding who should be allowed to come on campus to recruit students," Weisdorf declared.

"Every company is in some way complicit," pointed out Shelly Goodman (III APSC). "They all manufacture something that is used in Vietnam."

"This can be taken to ridiculous extremes," said John Treleaven (SGS), "but there are several clearer cases of Canadian complicity."

"Canada is trying to look like a peacemaker, but acting like a powdermonkey."

Professor Chandler Davis addresses the SAC meeting, which debated Dow recruiters on campus,

"Somewhere we have to start to sever our ties with the war."

McGill Daily plebiscite supports administration against editor Allnutt

MONTREAL (CUP) — McGill University students voted Wednesday to support the university administration's decision to press charges against McGill Daily editor Peter Allnutt and two of his staff.

In a campus-wide plebiscite conducted by the student council executive, students favored administration action by a vote of 2,964 to 2,443.

In a second section of the plebiscite, billed as an "opinion poll," students voted against the strike on the McGill Daily issue by a vote of 4,117 to 1,296.

In grappling with the results Wednesday night student council declared, after two and a half hours of debate, that the plebiscite was "a true statement of campus opinion."

Council members attacked the executive for calling the vote without consulting council.

But council President Peter Smith said, "This is the only way we know what the campus thinks."

Allnutt and supplement editor Fournier appeared before the Senate Disciplinary Committee yesterday.

The committee is not expected to take action until after several more weeks of hearings.

Petitioners Pursue Faulkner's Resignation

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

A petition calling for the immediate resignation of Tom Faulkner is circulating throughout the campus.

More than a dozen students from the faculties of Engineering and Medicine and University, Victoria and St. Michael's Colleges are attempting to put 1,500 names on the petition before next Wednesday's Students Administrative Council meeting.

The petition organizers, the Ad Hoc Committee for Representative Student Government, said last night that, "Faulkner, SAC president, no longer represents the students of this university."

"This is the final straw—when SAC decided to legislate individual morality," committee spokesman Ron Thompson (IV APSC) said last night referring to the motion SAC passed Wednesday night.

That motion instructs SAC representatives on a placement service advisory board to prevent "companies supplying war materials for Vietnam" from conducting interviews on campus.

Thompson said SAC is moving away from representing students and becoming a "group that does what it likes."

"This petition will give the campus a chance to voice their opinion on SAC," he said.

Faulkner was unavailable for comment.

SAC briefs

The Students Administrative Council voted Wednesday to sponsor the next conference of the Canadian Union of Students, after May exams.

The conference theme will be Universal Accessibility to Higher Education.

Plans for the conference will not be finalized until the board of governors decides whether to finance the project.

SAC also voted $500 to assist in the initial publicity and organization of course unions.

Education Commissioner Bob Bossin (III Inn) explained that the unions will provide an "opportunity for students to become involved in more than a curriculum club."

John Kirkpatrick (II Vic) was elected communications commissioner. He replaces Harry Oussoren (III APSC) who is resigning.

Andrews will design Harvard school

John Andrews, the chairman of the University of Toronto department of architecture, has been named to design Harvard University's $6,000,000 graduate school of design.

In announcing the commission Harvard Dean J. L. Sert said Mr. Andrews is considered to be one of Harvard's most brilliant graduates of recent years.

Canadian graduates hope to raise $100,000 towards the Harvard program.

Mr. Andrews designed the U of T Campus Centre and Scarborough College.

Vietnamese steals JCR Dow debate

By ANNE BOODY

Right- and left-wingers met head-on in a three-hour debate Wednesday on whether SAC should decide if companies complicit in the Vietnam war should recruit on campus.

Paul Hoch, an organizer of the Monday sit-in against Dow Chemical of Canada, and Paul Fromm (II SMC), chairman of the Edmund Burke Society, were the protagonists in a debate which began in New College and moved to University College.

But the real show-stealer was a Vietnamese political science student who held an audience of 175 spellbound for five minutes as he spoke.

"I came to Canada to study the freedom and humanity of the country," he said. "I'm not preventing any engineers or other students from being interviewed by Dow, but I do beg of you to practice humanity.

"My own village was bombed. The Americans did not know if we were communists or not. But they went ahead and slaughtered many villagers anyway."

Hoch and Fromm were at each other's throats for much of the three-hour marathon.

Fromm: "SAC has no right to decide which companies recruit here. This is discrimination against a minority such as the engineers.

Hoch: "We have been accused of being a dictating minority. If you try to prevent this issue from being brought up at the SAC meeting, you will be the same. The problem lies with the student body and SAC is the representative of this body."

Fromm: "If the motion is carried by SAC, many students will be denied the right to exercise their freedom."

"Why attack Dow which is only one of many companies producing war materials, asked Bill Doakes (SGS). The pressure should be placed on the American government."

Hoch said Dow was chosen as a symbol of all such companies.

"If SAC defeats the motion, we will change our tactics," said Hoch. "Further sit-ins will only alienate more people.

"My aim is to end this war and I will do whatever is effective to achieve this end."

"The dramatic Burning Baby propaganda is pure rot," returned Fromm. "You can't speak of American atrocities alone. There are atrocities on both sides.

"Napalm is better than the incredible butchering of the Communist devils. The aim of the Americans is to win the war fast and get out. If napalm can do this, then it is the lesser of the two evils."

St. Michael's council condemns sit-in

The St. Michael's College student council has condemned the actions of student and faculty who blocked entry to the Placement Service building during Monday's sit-in.

A resolution passed overwhelmingly Tuesday night states:

"This council, while recognizing the right of dissent through peaceful and orderly methods, for example picketing and boycotting, abhors violence and the restriction of the rights of students to decide for themselves what companies they wish to work for."

In a letter to Tom Faulkner, the president of the Students Administrative Council, SMC student president Donal Healy (IV SMC) said:

"The actions of the demonstrators against Dow's recruitment interviews on this campus were rather revolting.

"To see a gentleman like Robin Ross (registrar of the University of Toronto), a man who has shown great respect for the students of this university, publicly humiliated and pushed around by students is intolerable."

"And to see students of this university prevented from exercising their right to decide for themselves what is right and wrong is just as intolerable."

Battle won, but struggle ahead: Hoch

No further demonstrations are planned against Dow Chemical of Canada recruiters, says Paul Hoch, one of the organizers of Monday's sit-in against the company.

"I don't think we have won by any means," he declared yesterday, referring to the motion passed Wednesday by the Students Administrative Council opposing recruiting by companies supplying the U.S. war effort in Vietnam.

"We have won the battle but we will have a long and difficult war."

He said that if the administration approves a student-faculty administration-alumni committee proposed by SAC, it "will attempt to pack the committee with members favorable to the business interests.

"I'm playing it by ear. I don't think the administration will give credence to the SAC decision.

"The student body is in for a long and difficult period of grappling with the administration.

"We will not stand by while this issue gets lost in a maze of Simcoe Hall stalling.

"At the appropriate time we will make a move."

SMC student representation approved

Student representation in the St. Michael's College faculty council was generally approved by students and faculty at an open meeting of the council Wednesday.

Seventy-five students and staff turned out at Brennan Hall for the first open meeting ever of the SMC faculty council.

The meeting was set up to discuss recommendations passed at Tuesday night's five-hour SMC student council meeting.

The council recommended that students should be represented on the faculty council to:

- express a student viewpoint in discussions;
- participate in making decisions, i.e. vote;
- serve on various Faculty Council committees;
- communicate regularly to the student body in writing.

The faculty, not students, originally suggested students be on the council.

At Wednesday's meeting philosophy professor Rev. E. A. Synan expressed fear that the faculty council would be "swamped by the most popular students in third year."

"The student council would select the applicants by careful interviews," replied council president Don Healy (IV SMC).

Professor R. O'Driscoll of the English department said some faculty matters have to be discussed in private.

"How would you like it if the staff interfered with the Mike in the Student council?"

"The staff has a veto," said Healy.

"But they've never used it," said Prof. O'Driscoll.

"Neither would students on the Faculty Council."

Prof. Synan said the students on the council must vote, although their purpose is not to represent the student body but to help the faculty.

"Even if the vote has little weight, without it the students feel as if they are being treated as children."

The student vote in the Faculty Council will approximate student government, Rev. J. F. Madden said, because "it is the body with which, for all practical purposes, SMC is governed."

The meeting's highlight was a fiery speech by SMC President Rev. J. M. Kelly who said student recommendations were fine — if St. Mike could afford them.

He said recommendations for scholarships, and a new library easily pass through the faculty council, but cannot be paid for.

"To keep me from going crazy, take these things into consideration."

we should have added...

It was bound to happen, of course, because (a) we didn't properly explain ourselves; and (b) using a phrase such as the end justifies the means always leads to intellectual trouble.

So, we wrote: "The end is so important that the means are justifiable," in discussing Monday's sit-in at the Placement Service. And the letters came in asking how we can possibly say that when students were actually blocked from entering the Placement Service, thereby denying a freedom of movement and a freedom of choice. If students are adults they should be allowed to make their own choice as to which company they can work for.

No disagreement from us, and we weren't advocating that anyone should let a group of people sitting on the Placement Service porch make up their minds for them. In fact, tactically speaking, the blocking attempts cause only a backlash among the people who react against that sort of thing. That leads to two conclusions, that the people who did block the porch don't know anything about tactics and that they should reconsider if they weren't actually acting with an excess of authoritarianism — that is forcing their views on others.

What we said was that only in terms of the ends the sitters had in view is the blocking attempt justifiable and that brings the whole issue down to right and wrong: who was right and who was wrong in their interpretation of what moral complicity Dow Chemical has in the use of napalm in Vietnam. We said we thought the interpretation of the sit-in participants was right and that of the students wanting jobs with Dow wrong. We're not speaking for anyone when we say that.

Tactically the sit-in should have thought more in terms of persuasion; teaching the students after jobs that their own future security and employment is a selfish angle in the whole issue and that they should look further than that.

Morally, however, even the action taken by the sit-in participants (those who actually blocked, that is) is justifiable in terms of the means, and we still think that. In a sense, worrying about the student after employment in this issue is the same as worrying about the rights of Dow. They're both morally implicated.

But let's look at the end we are talking about. At no time, except in the most subtle fascist leanings of some of the sit-in participants, did the end involve forcing someone else's decisions on the applying students. What we condoned was a sit-in to delay recruitment by Dow until the matter could be discussed by the Students Administrative Council and by the U of T administration. Even though the applying students were inconvenienced, there was no real harm done was there?

There was some embarrassment for Dow's recruiter and for U of T registrar Robin Ross, and that we don't condone. Neither would we condone the actions of the sitters if the end were more serious.

It is heartening that SAC come out in favor of some student and faculty control over what companies are accommodated on this campus. That is a real step forward, one the administration should consider seriously. It will be tough for the administrators, mind you, because part of the raison d'être of the modern university is to make it easy for any and all companies to find trained personnel here.

The underlying questions raised here, including the authoritarianism too often found in any group striving for a moral end and the role and character of student power, will be discussed in a later editorial.

LETTERS

negated integrity

Sir:

The demonstration concerning the Dow Chemical Company was supported by the majority of the student body in as far as it expressed the feelings of this university concerning the manufacture of napalm. However the blockade of the Placement Service negated completely the moral integrity of the protest. The Varsity feels that in this case the means were justified by the end. While The Varsity accuses Simcoe Hall of "moral abdication", they advocate that the individuals attempting to apply for jobs should not be allowed their right to do so because they were "wrong."

If The Varsity is more interested in propagating their own versions of student morality than in recognizing the absolute necessity of minority rights in a democratic community, can we not accuse it of moral totalitarianism? Perhaps, on second thought, we can not for the editorial policies of The Varsity do not follow any consistent or constructive pattern. They generally seem to self-righteously attack for the sake of attacking, to negate for the sake of negation, to protest for the sake of protesting. Perhaps in future the policy may revert to intellectual and editorial responsibility, qualities which are presently in short supply.

F. David Rounthwaite (II Trin)

he didn't do it

Sir:

In Wednesday's Varsity, it was reported that I participated in the sit-in against Dow at the Placement Service. This is incorrect. I did demonstrate at the Placement Service and I feel strongly that Dow should not be allowed on campus, but I did not take part in the sit-in. Nor do I condone any physical obstructionism connected with such incidents.

John Morris (IV APSC)

napalm necessary

Sir:

In The Varsity of Nov. 22, both the editor and Miss Lampus resort to the argument that the end justifies the means in attempting to vindicate the curtailment of individual and corporate liberties on campus. The only end they can hope to achieve is to force Dow to hold its interviews elsewhere. Is it all worthwhile?

The ends and means argument is more realistically applied in justifying the U.S. presence and the use of napalm in Vietnam. Conceivably a small number of civilians do fall victim to Dow napalm, but if the use of this weapon is going to hasten the arrest of communist expansion in South-east Asia it is a necessary evil.

The consequences of communist takeover are recorded in the histories of numerous eastern European and Asian countries and the personal lives of their people. The Red regimes have had no concept of the beauty of human life and disrespect for life has been the order of the day. General considerations have nearly always outweighed a man's individual freedom. Hopefully, the combined efforts of the United States and Dow Chemical Co. will prevent a similar situation from occurring here.

I feel that the demonstrators do not reflect the general attitude of the student body but that the agitators are misguided individuals driven by a neurotic need to "do something concrete and dangerous", to quote a prominent activist.

As for the evidence you presented showing an alleged Vietnamese napalm victim: "What is it?"

is a good question and "Where did you get it?" is perhaps a better one.

Gunars Rundans (SGS)

save the children

Sir:

I wonder how many of the demonstrators who are so concerned about napalm-burned children will be supporting the Canadian Save the Children Fund this weekend?

Tom Kingsbury (SGS)

sac had no right

Sir:

The feelings of the engineers concerning SAC's decision to screen companies using the Placement Service have not been made clear. This is in part because we are the people most directly affected by this decision. Has SAC, with only four engineering representatives, the right to decide on an issue affecting such a minority?

Chandler Davis and the boys merely wish to assert their views on the Vietnam issue in some positive manner. By choosing companies such as Dow Chemical as a means to their end they are literally stamping on the toes of engineers seeking employment. Should SAC support such bunk!

It cannot be disputed that the large majority of companies using the Placement Service are interested solely in recruiting engineers. The very nature of engineering implies that any work in such a field can be directly or indirectly connected with aiding the United States in the Vietnam effort. Has anyone the right to rubber stamp these companies good or 'bad'?

The privileges of SAC members should not be allowed to infringe on OUR rights to be interviewed by the companies of OUR choice. We will not be inconvenienced by having to arrange job interviews off campus.

Marinus Hus, Chairman, Chemical Engineering

force doesn't help

Sir:

Force has not gained the Americans popularity in Vietnam neither will it help in protests against the use of napalm in the war or, more specifically, against Dow Chemical's recruiting on campus.

Information given out to students Monday carried a statement to the effect that demonstrators would not directly interfere with Dow's activities nor would they prevent job-seekers from meeting with representative, Mr. White. Somehow these peaceful objectives were bypassed. The rowdiness of the demonstration reduced the effectiveness of an otherwise sincere expression of dissent and must surely have directed the sympathies of formerly neutral persons — if there are any such — to the side of Dow representatives. Many other students who support the cause against napalm may now be reluctant to involve themselves in a protest which is likely to use physical coercion to prove a point.

The aim of the coordinators is, naturally, to have an overwhelming turnout. Yet, in view of Monday's results, one could only suspect that such a turnout would mean more chaos, ugly heckling and use of physical force — as has occurred on many American campuses recently — all of which hinder the cause of the movement.

Doesn't the only real power of organized protest lie in its valid commitment to non-violent means?

Cathie O'Neill (I SMC)

Ebert Ecstatic About Devils

By ALAN GORDON

Peter Ebert has the deepest voice I've ever heard. This may be because I haven't heard a lot of bass singers talk, nor bassoons for that matter. Now this voice may be the reason that his talk on The Devils was so compelling. More probably, it was the subject matter. Ebert called it the "best play ever written." If it's half as good as he says it is, it should make for fascinating theatre.

John Whiting based his play on a novel by Aldous Huxley who based his novel on an actual event. The play concerns itself with the conflict a worldly priest has with his conscience and his God. A small provincial French town, complete with gossips and politicians, Sister Jeanne, a nun with a physical impairment causing great psychological distress, and Grandier, the priest with less than holy things on his mind, do battle with their consciences and the shallow "but fascinating" inhabitants of the 17th century French community. The effects of society on these two people who, incidentally, don't meet until the last moments of the final act, are what comprise the action of the play.

Why did Mr. Ebert consider this play such a masterpiece?

The organ tones stopped for a moment, as he took a breath, and pondered the problem.

"There's a combination of reasons. The play is so economical, both in structure and in language."

He hit a low F. "I found it quite difficult to cut any part of the play without making the action ridiculous and unmotivated. I did cut some of the exorcism scene, only because I think Whiting went a little too far intellectually, bringing in politics, etc. It's a very tough scene to get right. You can't go overboard, with out losing the theatricality of the piece." The words stopped, but the voice seemed to go on.

"It's not a pretty play. There's great deal of violence to it, but I much prefer to achieve the impact of the idea and the violent atmosphere without spilling a lot of ox-blood all over the stage. The play is difficult enough technically. There are fourteen scenes over three acts and the flow of the language has to be maintained. Scenes should almost melt into each other. Murray Lauffer, the designer, and I have spent a great deal of hours on devising a setting that would serve the play economically. It would be very easy to over-produce the play. Economy is the keynote to the structure and to the production."

The voice stopped. The talk was over. The Devils opens tonight.

UTDC Rolling Again

By DAVID PAPE

There wasn't room enough at Cartwright Hall Monday Night for all the students who showed up at the U of T Drama Society's first one-act competition.

The three comedies presented were all by living authors; all entertaining; and all part of a rare experience on campus nowadays. It is seldom that humble productions even have a theatre anymore. My thanks to Sharon Salsberg, the real force behind the UTDS, for organizing the whole thing.

Despite the solemnity of the adjudication, none of the plays had the quality to represent this campus in any larger play competition. Without fail, they were inadequately directed, although some of the acting was as good as can be expected.

The Dumb Waiter, by Harold Pinter, required the most disciplined acting and staging. It almost got it. In Pinter, however, silence is a weapon, a barbed dagger in the battle of one-upmanship.

There were too many pauses and lots of silence; but these were empty pauses, especially at the beginning of the play. Save in the debate about whether you 'light the kettle' or 'put the kettle on', Pinter's dialectic never received the vicious stridency it needed.

Albee's The Sandbox as presented by New College, is really no more than a brief comic scene that plays itself quite well. This production was blocked simply and run well. The key role of Grandma was vigorously done by Yolanda Goudekting. Though not necessarily a skillful production, it was the most successful of the evening.

A Phoenix too Frequent, the Christopher Fry adaptation of Petronius' delicious short story, needed editing and careful blocking. This comedy of wit must have much and various movement to enliven dramatically its debates. Sight lines were totally disregarded. Alan Rubin, as the soldier, was a human delight, enjoying his own jokes as much as the audience. Susan Keachie was a fetching but inaudible matron. In Margaret Reid as Doto, we may have a very fine actress. Her performance was tellingly comic.

It seems that small theatre on campus always has humble beginnings. Good to see things rolling again.

The King Is Dying — Long Live The King

By ALAN GORDON

At last a show that doesn't find truth obsolete. It's been a long haul, these last few weeks, watching playwrights tell us that communication is dead, that distinctions between reality and appearance are dead, that, in fact, reality is dead. Now, finally, we find out for sure that the only thing to be guaranteed true is, death.

The conceit of having a protagonist fall from the heights of a fools paradise to the depths of complete knowledge is as old as Oedipus Rex... What Ionesco does to his Beranger Rex is present him with the truth very early in the play and then watch him try to cope with it.

The king is going to die.

"Well, naturally, we all are... eventually."

But you're going to die soon.

"Nonsense!"

Beranger Rex refuses to believe that he is mortal. Perhaps the fact that he has lived for four-hundred years has led him to that conclusion. He was told that he could chose to die whenever he wished, but, as his first queen archly mentions, "They never dreamed you'd put it off for so long!"

King Beranger then curses his makers. "If they knew I would die, why did they make me?" Hardly the words of a great man faced with death. But why should he speak like a great man? He is a man, and he's too selfish to abdicate, to give up his world, no matter how decrepit it is, to something else. Eventually, with the help of his first queen Marguerite whose duty it is to help him to die, just as she attempted to help him live, he dies. The impediments that have formed a life of senseless obligation and trapped him in an existence of trivia are sloughed off. He dies, on schedule, ninety minutes after the play opened. Just as we knew he would.

In Oedipus Rex, the irony of the plot was that, at any turn of events, Oedipus could possibly have avoided his fate. What broke our hearts was our awareness that his lust for knowledge was in fact, an ignorant lust for destruction. In Beranger Rex, the situation is reversed. Beranger's lust for ignorance is what is doing him the most harm.

Exit the King could be seen as a huge pun on Sophocles' tragedy. Instead of people trying to prevent the king from the inevitable recognition of his condition, people are bent on having it revealed to him in all of its ludicrous splendour. The chorus is reduced to a soldier who gives doctor's bulletins to the public. Oedipus' desire for saving his people is transformed into Beranger's concern for himself.

If I have given you the idea that the play is a sombre autopsy of life, then I have blundered. Ionesco is too much of an old vaudevillian for that. He has an unerring sense of the absurd or should I say, silly. The king orders to have a soldier arrested and sure enough he is arrested. He is struck motionless and dumb. In a bid to demonstrate his power, Beranger demands that the same put-upon soldier have his head cut off. The head wobbles on the neck, but remains, to the King's frustration. In one of several whimsical moments worthy of Giraudoux, Oedipus' plague is reduced to the amazing situation in which schools and streams are swallowed up into the earth... erosion. And cows are reported to be calving twice a day... mystically at noon and at 5 p.m.... hmmm.

Once again, the A.P.A. has done a brilliant job. Director Ellis Rabb has let Ionesco make every one of his points, both the whimsical and the weighty, hit home with amazing accuracy. His staging always found the careful balance between slapstick and stateliness that the show requires. His actors were perfectly cast. His visual production was a revelation. How he came up with the idea of a palace of invisible walls, of a throne with no back-bone, is a mystery. That he did it is a pleasure.

Richard Easton essays the tragical-comical King Beranger with stunning power. We are impatient with the self-pitying monarch as he pretends to find meaning in the maid's drudgery. We are scornful when he refuses to accept his mortality, and we are moved when, all submission, he "goes back where he came from" and physically abdicates. Caught in a pose similar to those Egyptian tomb carvings, he dies, an example to the ages.

Eva Le Gallienne has the almost impossible role of an earthly angel of death. She is over-whelming, phantom of steel. The rest of the cast is only magnificent.

A.P.A. has saved their newest and most exciting play for the end, and we are grateful for their showing us theatre at its most involving, most impressive, most, well, theatrical. It has been a heady experience, and we look forward to their next season with great excitement.

We used to call this next tune "A Night in Tunisia" but since the French had to split fast from Algeria, we have a new title—"A Night—Fast — From Viet Nam."

Russell George began to set up a throbbing ostinato pattern on the electric bass; Candy Finch beat out triplets on his closed high hat cymbals; James Moody repeated an exciting phrase, obtaining a big, vibrant tone from his flute.

Finally, with the way well prepared, Dizzy Gillespie announced the theme with restraint and absolute assurance. Then, suddenly, everything stopped, and Dizzy leaped up to a piercing high note, held it for a few seconds, then swooped down on a tumbling rush of 16th notes.

Dizzy Gillespie Good to Hear

With the rest of the group back in motion, Gillespie, his cheeks and neck distended to an extent that you would think anatomically impossible, deliberately proceeded to construct his solo. Rather than burst out impetuously in all directions, Gillespie built thoughtfully to several climaxes. He was so cool that some might have thought him merely indifferent; but Gillespie, instead of just showering us with fireworks, was thinking and playing with concentrated care.

Following Gillespie's trumpet work, James Moody lashed out with his alto saxophone; but, although he played passionately, it was again obvious that a fine musical mind was at work, planning the development of the solo. Moody is one of the most exciting and consistently satisfying saxophonists to be heard anywhere these days, and besides playing beautifully, prods Gillespie to show what he can really do. The last time Dizzy was at the Colonial, he didn't have Moody with him, and consequently he sounded pretty sad, as if he just did not feel like blowing. But last week, with Moody back in the band, things were groovy again.

This time around, the band sounded very tightly integrated, with good, solid, well-rehearsed arrangements. And it was good to hear Dizzy playing "Groovin' High" instead of one Bossa Nova after another. As he has sown many times before, Gillespie can take relatively unknown musicians like Candy Finch and pianist Michael Longo and make them into a band, a real unit.

Although he is now 50 years old, the Clown Prince of bop has not grown musically stagnant, nor has he lost his 'joie de vivre' or his sense of humour. When the clouds that customarily float across the stage at the Colonial disappeared, Gillespie stamped his foot like an angry child, clenched his fists, pouted, and plaintively cried out, "The clouds, I want the clouds!" Like a little kid who has lost his candy, he kept it up until they finally gave him back his clouds. Always ready to put anyone on, Gillespie once responded to an autograph hunter's request by scrawling something which, if anything, looked like "Sonny Rollins."

Jumping and dancing wildly when the fancy strikes him, playing some fine tambourine (the percussionist from the TS should take lessons from him) and still blowing some of the best jazz you can hear, Dizzy Gillespie is one of the few musicians left from the revolutionary times of the '40's who has managed to survive and continue to grow. It's too bad he was in Toronto for only a week. If he comes back soon, be sure not to miss him.

ART

Letendre, Teitelbaum, Duchamp

By JOAN MURRAY

Rita Letendre is showing at Gallery Pascal till Dec. 5. This exhibition is tremendously exciting, vibrant and an eye-opener. It's something of a breakthrough too, because it's one of the first times in recent years that an artist of her calibre has offered the public a major show of prints.

Serigraphs are done using silk-screens: a separate screen is used for each color. Stencils produce the shapes that we see. As Mr. Pascal pointed out to me, it's a very difficult process to control and get fine lines. Letendre has used the medium perfectly. Angle formed by the rush through space are the basic forms we see.

Part of the "hard edge" school, the works still retain that very elegant, vibrant French-Canadian coloring that is the backbone of Letendre's power as an artist. This show is a "must". Incidentally, the works are surprisingly cheap, even within student range.

As I was reconnoitering Teitelbaum's show at Gallery Moos, Mr. Teitelbaum came up to me and offered a few pointers on what he was doing. First of all, he's finished his "mini-markings" period (the period of two or three abrupt lines on a canvas) and now he's doing public art, "art for people to come and have fun". His "Made Ready" 1 and 2 are manufactured products. The packager of 2, a skin-packaged bagel, is real (as is the bagel): it's Peter Storm, whom Teitelbaum says is the "most swinging packaging artist in Toronto". I asked the artist how he found Storm. "Yellow pages 'Arv' said Teitelbaum.

There are other manufactured products too, like "Mirror, Mirror on the Wall", which was done by Hot Leaf Stamping, a process for stamping foil. This work wasn't intended as a multiple, though it looks that way. Cheap as it is ($21.00), the work isn't selling well, mostly because people mistake this particular one for "bathroom tiles."

As for influences, they strictly come on "air waves", nothing more specific. Duchamp, of course, is the one "source" for the whole thing. He was the first to do Readymades. Teitelbaum has now produced the first Made Ready. One work even has Duchamp written on it. And Duchamp too is the source for the kind of funniness we find in paintings like Teitelbaum's "Ceiling-Walking Piece" where the artists' footprints extend from the painting on the wall to the ceiling above. "It's a very personal foot" said the artist, and he added, "People go out of here happy".

This is the time to discuss Duchamp. A book recently updated, R. Lebel's Marcel Duchamp, (Fitzhenry and Whiteside, 205 pages, $4.95), is the best source of information about the artist who is one of the most complex subjects in modern art. His painting career, over six years after it had begun, Duchamp managed to do major works in the Cubist style. From here, he became an important Surrealist artist, creating "proto-Pop" objects, like the readymades and mechanical art.

Legendary in the United States since the Armoury Show, Duchamp is the first artist to have dealt with the implications of the twentieth century's mechanical, impersonal society. He's not only been a source for Teitelbaum but for many of the modern Abstract Expressionists, whose work has a strong Surrealist base, and for modern sculptors like Tinguely, since Duchamp was the first to treat "Art" objects as transitory breakables. Furthermore, Duchamp's legend has made him a powerful source of inspiration for modern: an artist who refused to create art, who was in fact anti-art.

Duchamp came from an artistic family. His two older brothers were Gaston Duchamp who painted under the pseudonym of Jacques Villon and Raymond (Raymond Duchamp-Villon, the sculptor). He also had an artistic sister, Suzanne.

His art evolved very rapidly. About 1907 he was experimenting with Cezanne. His Fauve period lasted till the middle of 1910. The Chess Players of 1910 is still expressionist but The Sonata of 1911 shows the influence of Cubism. The picture he exhibited in the Salon d'Automne of 1911, Spring, is fully Cubist except that it shows a juxtaposition of successive phases of movement of a single body a feature Duchamp was to continue. Duchamp had seen the woman in Spring passing by and loved her without ever meeting her, a story reminiscent of the later surrealist novel Nadja by Andre Breton. The fact that Spring may be a pun on Duchamp's probable sexual excitement is also characteristic of the artist's later work, which is strongly erotic.

The Nude Descending a Staircase (1912) is Duchamp's most famous painting, and it is interesting to realize that poetry was the source of inspiration. Duchamp combined Jules Laforgue with Roussel's Impressions d'Afrique (a universe governed solely by words), added the plastic dynamism, lines of force, and interpenetration of planes found in Futurism, worked up memories of the cinema and action photos and voilà, the picture. Much is new, and one of the new features is the work's autobiographic character. As Lebel pointed out, all of the artist's works of this period have something of the character of a personal legend.

From this Cubist phase Duchamp moved rapidly to Dadaism. At his time, his works tend to involve sexual organs painted in an impersonal way. Mechanical elements appear and other oddities, including verbal puns.

Duchamp indeed became master of the pun, both formal and verbal. In "The Chocolate Grinder" of 1913, Duchamp saw in the apparatus the mechanical representation of the masculine sex. Grinding chocolate is the secretion of sperm, the bayonet is the phallus, and there is more.

Frudian verbal puns were among Duchamp's happiest creations. A famous example is the following: "Rose Selavy (a feminine 'mask' for the artist) and I believe that an incesticide must sleep with his mother before he kills her; bed bugs are indispensable."

All this may sound a little infantile but Duchamp would not care. He enjoyed being suspended in "the perpetual rapture of childhood, in the ambiguity of play and the delightful ecstasy of disdain".

The "Readymades" were objects chosen from everyday reality and then wittily labelled to challenge our ideas of value. The first American one was a snow shovel labelled "In advance of the Broken Arm." In 1917, there was the urinal called "Fountain" signed 'R. Mutt'. And then, of course, there was the Mona Lisa with moustache and goatee.

Light, witty and amusing, these readymades could have disturbing and provocative connotations, just as his pictures of sex were disturbing. Love as a mechanic which does not imply union is a curious conception. Perhaps it was all the fault of World War I where Duchamp lost both his brother Raymond and his faith in his tradition.

This excellent and cheap book contains not only some unusual plates, a catalogue raisonnee, and complete bibliography, but photos of Duchamp dressed up as a woman, as Mephistopheles with horns of soap suds, or nude in the nude ballet Relache (1924).

One small point: much of what is taken for novel in Duchamp appeared in Picasso before him. It was Picasso who first was interested in art as a game of chance, probably due to the influence of Mallarme. Picasso too, was the first to use collages as "read" messages, private jokes on private parts.

EL FARIDA AND THE YOUTH KICK

THE SHOW AT THE SILVER DOLLAR:

The last show has begun when I walk in. Go-go girls at either end of the stage: wearing black fishnet stockings and bikinis outlined in silver sequins with flesh wobbling in between (not quite nude, but this isn't San Francisco). They share the stage with a singer, Guerilla Belle "direct from the Copa" and a sort of jazz trio. An expressionless young man plays boogly-boogly-doo on the electric organ, like Charles Aznavour in Shoot the Piano Player; the sad aloof piano playing hack who has thrown away a brilliant career as a concert pianist. The saxophonist gets up on the stand with Mary-Lynn à-go-go and does an improvisation to her navel. Behind them a poster proclaims: IT'S EL FARIDA, illustrated with a buxom woman in Spanish-Mexican get-up, her right breast pointing the way to Guadalajara (across the river and into the trees).

EL FARIDA ENTERS:

The singer finishes to meagre applause and clears the stage with Mary-Lynn and her cohort. The band continues to boogly-do innocuously but I am wondering if El Farida will appear and if not why am I here.

Then, accompanied by a feeble sort of roll on the snares she bears down on the stage from one end of the room whooping and swivelling her hips and raising her skirt over the kind of thighs and bottom that might have graced the dance-halls of Toulouse-Lautrec's Paris. Her feet perform a complicated charleston as she removes her dress, her bra, her panties, she stops dancing momentarily to let two gentlemen at a ringside table roll down her stockings. There's nothing sordid about her performance. El Farida is, as they say, no spring chicken: not a nervous nymphet taking off her clothes to titillate an audience of old men masturbating in the dark. She's obviously Been Around: her body, like the eternal earth-mother, radiates joy and freedom and vitality.

(When I ask her how she would classify her act she says unhesitatingly it is "entertainment for young, for middle, and for old" — so bring the kiddies). She prances around for a while, her pasties and g-string glowing under the ultra-violet lights, toys with some ostrich feathers, and suddenly sweeping up her clothes with both arms she is gone.

LOBBY OF THE WAVELY HOTEL

I am talking to El Farida on the house phone. She is pleased that I enjoyed the show and apologizes that she did not do her celebrated halloon dance "because it was a so small house. I did not know you were there." She asks me to wait while she puts some clothes on. We sit down in the lobby, there's a shabby, nondescript couple at the desk, and I try to imagine that the equally nondescript room is permeated with an atmosphere of crime and violence. A few years ago, a negro pimp was the victim of a small-time gangland killing in one of the Waverly rooms (Jewish crooks get blown up at the Sutton Place).

A PRIVATE CONVERSATION WITH EL FARIDA:

El Farida materializes beside me in a fake ocelot coat and tight purple pants. Up close, she looks — well, Experienced: lines around her eyes, pink lipstick, hair defiantly black. A purple sequin is still pasted on her cheek. But the face is not hard; it resounds, changes expression as I speak to her. There is no bitterness, none of the expected contempt for the men who watch her disrobe. The desk-clerk informs us that she carries her panties home in her purse, and she demonstrates conclusively that tonight she does not.

She sits beside me on a sofa and announces that she does not talk so well but she has so many things to tell me. The apology is unnecessary: she expresses herself with her body, like a dancer, moving continually, gesturing with her arms, touching, shifting intimately toward the person she is addressing. Her whole attitude is one of expansiveness, warmth, spontaneity. I am charmed.

She speaks with an indeterminate accent and I ask where she is from. From Vienna, she says. (Her name is wisely chosen: I cannot see her as Theresa the Viennese Creampuff). Her craft springs from a show biz tradition, as her parents were also entertainers; her mother sang and her father played the accordion. She travelled around Europe with them, learned songs and dances from the gypsies.

She has also travelled extensively in Canada. What cities does she like best? "I like them all. I have worked in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Edmonton, Moose Jaw, the Lakehead — I like them all." She lives like a gypsy in a "coach" now parked at a trailer camp near Cooksville: "It is so beautiful and cozy (she draws her shoulders together) . . . It has such a cute little living-room and such a cute little kitchen and such a cute little bedroom . . ."

When did she start taking off her clothes in public?

"Six months ago I start doing hurlesque. (Take heart girls — no need to hesitate for lack of experience.) Before I do International Dancing — dances of all countries, helly-dancing, all types of dancing . . . I do this one show with the grapefruits — it is so funny; in the hurlesque theatre I put two grapefruits in my brassiere so I am big! — that is how they are there, fifty-two inches and — then when I am dancing I let one fall out as if it is a mistake, and then they think they are cheated . . ."

Her appeal is precisely that she jokes about sex, parodies the hump-and-grind hurlesque queens of a more suppressed generation. "I love to make people smile, to make them laugh — that is the best thing."

El Farida is enthusiastic about young people. "I love the young people today. They are so . . ."

"Free," suggests my photographer. "Yes, free! The young people stand up for something — all the kids together. They fight for something they want and they get it. They will not listen to these old hasters — they are so old-fashioned and they do not want the kids to be young and do the things they could not do." She looks around furtively to make sure none of the old hasters is eavesdropping.

Farida has a loyal following among the architects who hooze up regularly at the Silver Dollar. She returns their affection; "They are so gorgeous. The one with the little glasses — he is so cute — when he said to me, 'These people around us — they are all architects,' I think he say acrobats . . . I call them now the acrobats."

She is enthusiastic about men, but thinks some of them wear such dull clothes. "I love the silk and satin . . . the shirt with lace here and here." I tell her about my velvet suit and she says she would love it. "You see these business-men walking down the street and they all wear the same suit and the same shirt and the same tie — it is so dull, like a uniform."

WE SAY GOOD-BYE

The conversation is over. On the way out, Farida promises to marry the desk-clerk when she has enough money.

Then we are outside, with snowflakes falling cold and wet, and she reiterates her affection for young people and her acrobats and their girl-friends. "If I were ten years younger!" she says.

FILM

Lee Marvin: The Brutal Hero

BY ELIZABETH MARTIN

In evaluating any form of art, whether it is literature, painting or film, the extent to which the artist reflects the prevailing ideas and moods of his time and the perceptiveness with which he comments upon them, is usually considered a decisive factor. This is a useful criterion for judging the relevance and merits of the work. Certain films produced in recent years have had a common tendency to reflect man's growing awareness of the complexities of life and his resultant confusion. For film makers such as Michaelangelo Antonioni, Jean Luc Godard and Alan Renais, the world is not easy to understand. Their heroes are immersed in the same struggles. Yet in almost direct contradiction to this, there is another kind of hero who in his swift mechanical action, asserts that these considerations either non-existent or totally irrelevant. Such a hero we find in Lee Marvin's portrayal of Walker in Point Blank.

The story begins with Walker's regaining consciousness in a deserted cell in Alcatraz. Through a series of flashbacks we learn that his wife and his friend have betrayed him by cutting him out of his share of hijacked loot that was for some reason delivered by helicopter to the prison. Despite his wounds, he is able to swim to the mainland, and from there we follow him on his crusade to get back his share — some $93,000. With the help of his sister-in-law, played by Angie Dickinson, he battles his way to the top of crime syndicate's hierarchy to demand payment. On his way up, he leaves a trail of murdered and beaten thugs behind him. So much for the plot.

Marvin's image on the screen as Walker is static to the point of producing almost total boredom. He appears as an automaton vitalized and motivated by only one concern—that of getting his money. The best that may be said of him is that he appears as the self-sufficient man who knows his way around and how to get what he wants. His single minded determination and his methodical approach may induce us to take his side against the heavies, but it also succeeds in boring us. He is an essentially flat character, yet he possesses such dynamic qualities as decisiveness and the capacity to act.

Marvin is not new to such roles as these. In The Professionals, he plays the man of action, who knows his business well, and asks few questions. In this sense he may be compared to Humphrey Bogart, whose roles epitomized just such a man. Marvin is also the supreme "tough guy". Who else could be expected to train twelve unco-operative psychopaths into an efficient killing machine as seen in the Dirty Dozen?

It is difficult to conceive of this type of hero ever floundering, due to some defect in his nature. He is on the screen infallible and unassailable. In contrast to Marvin's image, is that of Thomas, the photographer in Blow-Up. He is a man who lacks control of himself, his world, and his fate. While Thomas is still figuring out what it's all about, Walker has long since known what he wants, and how to get it, and is already counting his money. But then the world in which Walker moves is that of fantasy where there are no obstacles which force cannot overcome.

On the other hand, Antonioni sees man in society controlled by its forces rather than man as a controlling force himself. These are the images of two different heroes which both enjoy popularity.

Another aspect of the Marvin image is the violence. In Point Blank the hero methodically, even mechanically, beats up and murders people without the slightest trace of emotion, not even anger. We have seen all this before with the James Bond movies. But while we know that Bond cripples his opponents with equal dexterity and swiftness, we also know that he is on the right side, fighting for noble causes whereas in Point Blank there is no justifying cause other than a criminal's obsession with gaining his share to the stolen loot.

The style in which Point Blank is presented adds interest to the stereotyped subject matter. The English director John Boorman has adopted numerous stylistic devices. While the editing, with its jump cuts, repeated use of flash back, overlapping images and sound track is all well done from the point of technical accomplishment, it simply is not suited to the type of subject matter. The flashback used to suggest Walker's recollection of the initial betrayal, gives us the false impression that he is haunted by a great injustice, when really his only motivation is the desire for his $93,000. It is difficult to judge whether Boorman is trying to add depth to his essentially flat character or whether he is simply engrossed in the possibilities of these stylistic devices. The frame freezes and the slow motion shots used in certain scenes have little connection with the film content. Yet if these devices were not used, there would be little left to the movie, since the plot line and character-cannot hold our interest alone. These techniques, which enliven a dull story and emphasize its most brutal elements, actually save the film from disaster. But the technical skill which is evident is not incorporated into the fabric of the film, but rather stands apart from it as an added attraction.

Nonetheless, films such as Point Blank and the Dirty Dozen usually do well at the box office. The reason for their popular appeal seems largely based on the man and the image. Marvin, the man of courage, decisiveness and action, has a very definite and persuasive appeal. There has always been a market for the man who is free and answerable only to himself and consequently makes it on his own, through reliance on his own abilities. The epitome of such an image was often played by Bogart, but in Marvin's role as Walker we see the extent to which the image has degenerated. He is just another hood who happens to be smarter and faster than the other hoods.

This type of hero contrasts sharply with the confused man who has greater battles than Walker, in trying to interpret his own world. On the one hand Antonioni's photographer is shown as an identifiable reflection of ourselves, while Walker is a projection of all our fantasies. He stands for an uncluttered uncomplicated approach to life which is in the end improbable. The questions raised by the other type of hero, never occur to Walker, or if they do, are considered irrelevant. In the end we are left with only one question: "Why bother making such a film?". The answer, of course, is money. Point Blank is not a film which reflects the "real" world with much accuracy or the prevailing mood of the time but rather seems to be an attempt to capitalize on the most sensational elements of violence.

The Subtle Changes and New Trends in Hollywood Films

By KEN DANCYGER

In 1967, American films changed; they no longer took an unquestioned hackseat to foreign films. This subtle change has many sources, not least of which is the shifting tastes and growing sophistication of North American audiences.

The most common criticisms of American films for the past decade have been, in order: their commercialism; their low sense of aesthetic values and their insistence that everything have a happy ending, in colour. Exceptions such as High Noon, From Here to Eternity and The Defiant Ones were produced by a hard core of filmmakers such as Stanley Kramer and Fred Zinneman, who valued integrity over steady employment. Sophisticated filmgoers and critics, as a result, dismissed American films and turned their attention and praise toward foreign films. Bergman, Fellini, Kurosawa became the standard against which other films were measured.

This was, in my opinion, understandable but nevertheless unfair to American filmmakers.

Film critics overlooked two important qualifications. The majority of American moviegoers were not very sophisticated; the artistic level of films had to follow suit if producers were to recoup their investment. The people wanted entertainment and escape, not reality and truth. Otto Preminger's film The Moon is Blue in 1953 was censored and condemned because it contained the word "virgin." Another important point is discussed by William Fadiman in the August 5, 1967 issue of Saturday Review in his article "Should American Films be subsidized?" (as are the films of other countries) He says:

"It is true that the foreign films we see are indeed frequently superior in many ways to American films. But it is essential to realize that we are seeing only a small percentage of the hundreds of films produced abroad, all methodically culled and chosen especially for American viewers."

American films have changed because film is becoming an international art form and business. American films are shot in Spain, Taiwan, Canada. The latest films of Francois Truffaut (Fahrenheit 451), Philippe de Broca (King of Hearts), Michelangelo Antonioni (Blow Up) and Roman Polanski (Cul de sac, The Vampire Killers) were all financed by American capital. Talent and resources should be international; Antonioni of Italy, MGM of Hollywood and London of England came together to create Blow Up the most talked about film of 1967. Its financial success reflects the changing tastes of film audiences, and Hollywood's acknowledgement that philosophies, as well as fantasies, can be treated on the screen.

But American filmmakers have also changed. The exciting filming is being done by young writers and directors, spawned by television and various film schools. John Frankenheimer (Grand Prix), Sidney Lumet (Pawnbroker), Elliot Silverstein (Cat Ballou. The Happening), Francis Ford Coppola (Big Boy Now, Finian's Rainbow) are just a few. Expatriates such as Richard Lester (A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Office) and Sidney Furie of Toronto (The IPCress File, The Naked Runner) consolidate the growing ranks of fresh young directors making American films.

Adultery (Two For the Road) impotence (The Family Way) racism (In the Heat of the Night), sadism (Marat-Sade) inane corporate behavior (How To Succeed), lack of individuality and the role of the state (Fahrenheit 451, Privilege), rape (The Tiger makes out), momism (Big Boy Now) larceny (Flim-Flam Man) prison and its effects (Cool Hand Luke) and homosexuality and masochism (Reflections in a Golden Eye) have all been equally represented and have found audience in 1967. It's as if Hollywood decided that these otherwise "clandestine" matter deserve some examination — look at the "problems" of today rather than the "glory" of yesterday. The marked decline in westerns and comedies attest to this fact.

A most interesting and important trend in American film this year has been their preoccupation with violence at a national level (Bonnie and Clyde, Cool Hand Luke, Point Blank) and internationally (Dirty Dozen, Sand Pebbles, How I Won The War). This could be a reaction to America's internal problems in its cities and its external involvement in Viet Nam. This is an interesting speculation but somewhat limited. I prefer to believe it part of a more encompassing reaction to a rapidly changing society (as so well expressed in Ian Ewing's article on violence in The Review October 8, 1967). It may reflect the growing level of frustration prevalent in North American society. Violence is necessary to tear down the old set of values, and bridge the gap to the new.

A less dramatic, but nevertheless important trend is the unglamorous foci in some American films. Films have in the past centered on superpies or total tragedies, seldom on the middleman. This year The Tiger Makes Out was about a frustrated postman. To Sir With Love and Up The Down Staircase were about teachers. The Family Way about a working-class family, Barefoot In The Park an unexciting lawyer. Fahrenheit 451 a fireman. This concern with "people" reflects a declaration away from superhumans. This can be quite traumatic when one is in the habit of comparing oneself unconsciously to Charlton Heston or Gregory Peck, as I have done for most of my life.

More generally, this has been a year of exceptional films. We have seen sophistication return to the screen in Two For The Road, intelligence (A Man For All Seasons) humour (Barefoot In The Park) originality (The Happening, Cul De Sac) and Charlie Chaplin (The Countess From Hong Kong). Of major importance however is the fact that Doris Day made only one film this year Caprice and will star next year in her own television series.

Outside of the film societies few foreign films of note have been seen in Toronto. Exceptions are Persona, Battle Of Algiers and La Guerre Est Finie. Japanese representation has all but disappeared with the exception of Woody Allen's What's Up Tiger Lily. The fact that these films have all had relatively short runs in Toronto could reflect a growing satisfaction with American films. The portent of foreign film festivals at art houses such as the New Yorker are encouraging but reflect the presence of only a hard core audience for these films.

What we have then in American films is a cautious move towards realism on the one hand and a more sensitive appraisal of filmgoer tastes on the other. In-measurable credit for this trend goes to television, which has taken over the role films played in the 1950's. Film is no longer entertainment. It facilitates passive interaction and can become an important learning experience. Hollywood knows this. The times are changing.

The Dangers of Criticizing James Brown

By PETER GODDARD

It was on King street. She was waiting on the corner in a pair of those stretch nylon denims that looked like they were designed by some leering old tailor who had spent five years, like Da Vinci, studying nothing but the ischia, the gemelli and the maximi.

She came toward me. No streetcars. No taxis. Cornered! "Peter Goddard?" Still no sign of a taxi. "You're . . .

"Patrick Scott."

"C'mon, You're both crummy critics, anyways . . . I've seen you before." (Some fame. It was like dreaming about eating marshmallows and, waking up, finding your pillow gone. It's not what you expected to be.)

Her furry sweater bristled, "Listen you creep. Are you stupid. God. Where did you get your ideas about James Brown in The Globe this morning? Don't you like Negroes?"

(Item: there is no such thing as a BAD Negro. c.f. Sidney Poitier).

"Lookit," he was on stage an hour-and-a-half. He sang all his hits. Everybody at the Gardens screamed. Were those six thousand kids wrong. You don't like the blues. You probably didn't even like his go-go dancers. Faggot."

I tried to explain that Brown's anthropoid antics did leave me a bit cold; that I was there to see a blues-singer not Darwin's missing link; that I dug the fact that he is one of the hardest working performers and that if were The Globe's phys-ed critic I'm sure he would have gotten a good revue; and that her look-back-in-angst attitude was a bit naive.

We talked and froze for about twenty minutes. I explained. She pouted, fumed, fixed her bouffant, straightened her distracting sweater and told me that Negro guys were in this year.

Brown had put on a slick show all right. The pseudo-psychedelic lights had flashed in all the right places, his band had bobbed impressively around the stage. But the singer's histrionics did not altogether conceal the fact that he was but an average bluesman.

The disrobing, the gospel excitement in his voice, the bawdy lyrics were all aimed at the women. But his music was internally disjointed striving for a hollow, predictable climax.

His voice had matured since his previous visits to Toronto. But Brown hadn't. The fourteen-piece orchestra behind him laid out a sound foundation for his material, singers Vicki Anderson and Bobby Byrd provided suitable contrast for their employer but nothing happened musically.

With Brown, unlike B. B. King or Bobby Blue Bland emotionalism masked, rather than underlined, the songs. And whereas this singer could be chilling, sexy, maniacal, and outrageous at any given moment, he rarely combined these sentiments with musical ones.

In a lifetime of lectures, you'd never learn what the world is really like. You have to see it — the laboratory with three billion teachers. You might learn political economy from a Muscovite (or English from a Cockney bartender). Discover high finance in a Caribbean marketplace (or sales psychology in a Paris souvenir shop). Get a refresher course in ancient history (or just about anything) from a cabbie in Rome. Or be taught something new and unforgettable somewhere on your own continent. When you're ready to take the lab course in learning (and living it up), call Air Canada. We've got a good way to get you to class.

Ancelr, Plunking, Coughing, and Brahms

By PAUL DARBY

There is a rumour that the word has been given and Massey Hall will be scrapped. There is no rumour about any replacement. And meanwhile they plaster over the cracks, modernizing, hiding the original swinging girders.

Karel Ancelr, guest conductor for last week's TS concert, is music director of the Czech Philharmonic, graduate of the Prague Conservatory and therefore, steeped in middle European musical tradition.

He is not widely known as a travelling conductor but has gained recognition for his recordings with the Czech. I have some of his admirable recordings of Bartok and Stravinsky (on Parliament and Turnabout — both in the $2.50 bracket) and thus was hoping to hear how his twentieth century interpretations varied from Ozawa.

No such luck. We were given instead a substantial serving of the late Romanics.

Ancelr conducted from memory, which suited his extremely lyrical baton technique. He extends his conducting field to full spread of his arms in every direction; a music stand would only get in the way. This degree of amplitude hampered the back desk strings who tended to contribute muddy playing when unable to discern the end of the beat.

But Ancelr understood the music he conducted. He extracted the emotional potential, of the strings especially, and left the structural framework to the judgement of the players. His conducting approached vocal techniques, losing the strict definition one expects to see in an orchestral conductor. The outcome was very good Dvorak and Smetana.

Otbello, by Dvorak, is third in the cycle of concert overtures "Nature, Life and Love." Though it is true that this work can be analysed as a representation of the love and jealousy of the Shakespearean tragedy, I consider such analysis as musically unrealistic.

For music is capable of a subjectivity and emotion unparalleled in literature. The Romanics were striving for an intangible dream world and any close parallel with formalized literature is a falling away from this ideal.

The failure of so much Romantic music (for example, Sarka on the same program) derives from too close involvement on the part of the composer with literature. Music has a much stronger emotional evocation than any other art but its sustaining power is short. Music must be an absolute art, free from the strictures of other disciplines. This pertains to both objective and subjective music.

Ancelr was successful in drawing almost sentimental sounds from the strings but failed to obtain precision from the winds, this mainly because of his sometimes indefinite beat pattern but also because of his overuse of the conductor's cueing privilege. He pointed and nodded so often that the winds may have felt intimidated at times such over cueing is a European tendency.

Sarka and Tabor by Smetana can be dealt with as one. They are both tone poems from the cycle "My Fatherland" (1875, 1879).

They are both programmatic to a fault and try to incorporate popular Czech historical myths of religious and military significance.

Perhaps a twentieth century Canadian audience, unmoved by the heroic sagas, ignorant of the borrowed folk tunes, cannot properly appreciate this medieval touch of Bohemia.

The fourth and last of Brahms's symphonies is more strictly formal than his earlier efforts. He has replaced the third movement intermezzo with a buoyant scherzo and employed the instrumentation of Beethoven.

The first three movements of this work with their dramatic activity are only an emotional introduction to the finale.

The sonata form, like the sonnet in literature, provides a classical framework and a disciplinary force. It is a good vehicle for logical development in the early movement but too often becomes a denouement in the finale, where the degree of organization detracts from the continually spiralling climaxes of great tragedy.

In this symphony Brahms found a solution in the ancient variation from the pasacaglia, which has simplicity without standardization. By these thirty variations on a ground bass he was able to direct his attention to a series of emotional crises building to the powerful close.

The real success of this last movement derives from the so-called scherzo which is actually treated much like a sonata form first movement and serves admirably as an overture to the final dramatic act.

It was in his interpretation of the third movement that Ancelr fell short. While recognizing the terseness and energy of the movement, I felt he wanted it to stand on its own. And in fact, he allowed precious seconds for coughing and plunking and swabbing between the last two movements.

And so we came away, excited by this, the most powerful of Brahms's works, with the memory of haunting melody in the opening movements and emotional climax in the last, but with a dreadful caesura where the third movement should have been.

WYMILWOOD TERRACE ROOM

Notes on a sit-in, SAC, Dow, etc...

The ground was muddy outside the old house where Dow was interviewing and I wondered where people were going to sit-in. It was cold and the ground should have been solid but all the people crossing the lawn had softened it, melting the snow with their boots. It will probably need some re-sodding in the spring.

Beside the wet concrete front-walk leading from Willocks Street to the veranda of the house was a pile of placards (planks or broomsticks with signs stapled on). They lay on the ground with their handles splayed out, so picketers could grab one up and join the march or throw it down when they left for class.

About twenty people picketed. Another forty or so were gathered on the veranda around someone with a loud-hailer. I couldn't hear what he was saying. Behind me Radio Varsity was interviewing an engineer who wanted the freedom to apply for whatever job he wanted. He was well-dressed and wore a button that said World Conference of Free Ukrainians.

Some people came with "support-the-war" placards and shouted something about killing Ho Chi Minh. The people on the veranda shouted "Dow shalt not kill."

They were starting to sit-in on the porch and the steps. I thought about anyone's right to talk and na-alm, about Becket and how to act is to suffer and to suffer is to act, and Thomas More qui tacit consentire, and Mario Savio who said that there is a time when the workings of the machine become so stinking and odious that you have to throw yourself in the wheels.

It was warmer when we were all crowded together. The wood porch was cold but it was dry. My feet were on the top step and I could lean my back against someone's knees, so I was really pretty comfortable. Henry Tarvainen's face was very close and I watched his breath get out of his nostrils and get tangled in his mustache, forming a cloud around his mouth. He is very good at blowing smoke-rings and I wondered if he could do it with his breath. A professor I had in second year sat beside me. His tie had crests of some other university on it. We talked a bit about Henry VII but neither of us were very interested.

About six feet away I could see Grahams Fraser's face between some people on the steps. His hair was blowing and he was gazing back towards the street. He seemed quiet and involved. Periodically, when the bodies would shift, I would see him again. His expression was always the same. Michael Ignatieff looked too well-dressed to be sitting-in. He saw me and we smiled at each other.

People passed around sheets to get everybody's name and address in case we needed bail.

They passed the loudhailer around and several people talked about Viet Nam and student power. One girl with short hair and a harsh voice described habies with their eyes burned out for five minutes. She was going to sit-in until the administration agreed to some demand I didn't catch.

Someone asked "Wouldn't a Dow go good now?" Most of us laughed.

One of the engineers had worked his way up the steps to the porch, and tried to get us to stop. He didn't like what Dow was doing, he wouldn't work for them, but we shouldn't stop people from going in. We should talk to them as they went by or go to their lab in the Galbraith Building but this only gets people mad and hurts the cause. Please listen to him. Few listened and a few made wise-cracks. He kept trying. I had to crane my head to see him so I looked out to the street again.

The first interviewee arrived and the professor and someone else locked arms with me. This is always done but it seemed friendly. I held my brief-case over the head of the girl on the step below me so she wouldn't get hit as the boy walked over us. He stepped on my leg but it didn't hurt.

A scuffle broke out at the door to the building. Paul Hoch had the loud-hailer and was shouting not to resist. Henry Tarvainen yelled at Hoch to tell people how to relax if stepped on so no-one gets hurt. Hoch didn't say it, so Henry took the loud hailer and talked about how to sit-in. People at the side-lines heckled him about being a professional demonstrator but he went on talking about not getting bones broken.

I knew the next engineer who came over us so I said hi. He said hi and didn't step on me.

At five it was dark and people were generally shifted around. The professor left. Mike Ignatieff sent a message to some meeting he was supposed to be at saying that he would be late, something had come up.

A girl beside me asked if she could have half of my scarf. She hadn't sat-in before either and she was a little scared. She had been on the bottom step and one of the engineers had said, "Please move, I don't want to hurt you." She sat there and he stepped in her lap as he went up. I put my arm around her because we were both cold.

Then the Dow interviewer came out and we formed a gauntlet for him to walk through by holding hands in the air like an arch.

Some shouted "Dow shalt not kill" while others were silent.

We sat down again and then Rohin Ross, the University Registrar came out. He was tall and dignified. "May I ask why you won't let me leave," he said. The leaders wanted a guarantee from the administration that Dow would not be allowed back. He could give none. No-one moved. They asked him all sorts of questions all really saying the same thing. He answered but gave no guarantees. They liked him. Henry Tarvainen announced "what he's saying in hurcaurateze is that a lot of phones will be ringing tonight." We stood and parted for him.

The girl in the other half of my scarf and I left behind him. On the porch there were motions and amendements about how and when to continue the protest, whether to sit-in Simcoe Hall — at 8:30 or at 9? There was a lot of shouting. I noticed that the footprints had frozen into the lawn and I started to feel very cold again.

BOB BOSSIN

Wednesday night's SAC debate on job recruitment at the placement Service by Vietnam War suppliers was undoubtedly the most crucial issue to come before the student government this year, and has far reaching implications both for the anti-war movement and the student power struggle.

As far as the anti-war movement is concerned, SAC's 24 to 14 vote to boot the war suppliers off the campus strikes directly at the most sensitive citadel of the military-industrial complex: namely, the cherished corporate images of the individual companies involved. Of course, SAC's action also makes it more difficult to recruit some of the cogs who will keep the Machine smashing along.

It is by no means a coincidence that only yesterday the Chairman of the Board of Dow Chemical said that his corporation was seriously considering dropping its government contract for napalm production. In a very literal sense, student protestors and concerned student governments are beginning to hit the individual corporate gears of the War Machine where it hurts them most—in the pocketbook. This is a long step from mere demonstrations and petitions, and marks an important commitment by our SAC reps to some higher morality than the "business-as-usual" mentality present at some corners of Simcoe Hall.

Wednesday night's decision to accept moral responsibility for the conduct of the Placement Service also represents tremendous progress on the student power front, because a necessary prerequisite of student power is the willingness to accept student responsibility. Meaningful student participation in the administration of the University is ludicrous unless the students, as part of a community, are prepared to accept responsibility for what goes on in their community.

This means that the recruiting of an engineer by a firm like Dow is just as much the moral concern of an artsman as of the engineer himself. All students pay fees which go toward the operation of the Placement Service; therefore all students are responsible for what goes on there.

On a somewhat deeper level, we the staff and students are the University. We cannot abdicate our individual and collective responsibilities for what goes on here to a few gray-haired, cigar smokers in Simcoe Hall. It is for all of us to decide if the accomplices of the war makers are to use our facilities. And we cannot and should not try to weasel out of, or duck, the issue, for "the sin of omission is as great as that of commission."

By balancing off the inconvenience to the few engineers (who will have to go a few blocks off campus to be recruited by companies like Dow) against our moral commitment as a community for all that goes on here, SAC has met its responsibilities.

PAUL HOCH

Since there are no sit-ins this week-end, we recommend...

The A.P.A. is leaving. The last show for this season will have five performances this weekend. You owe it to yourself to see Exit the King at least once. Opening tonight are two productions. John Whiting's The Devils starts at Hart House for eight performances and Underpants opens at the Coach House Theatre. Next Week, The New Canadian Theatre starts a run at the Central Library Theatre of Fortune, My Foe by Robertson Davies... Students are welcome to that and will get in for half price. How to Succeed in Business is St. Mike's entry to the campus show field. Its a terrific show and I hope they do a job of it. It's written by the same people responsible for Guys and Dolls.

So much for the news and now for the whether: I'm wondering whether the Drama Centre has come up with a good reason for using professional designers while maintaining that the purpose of the Student productions at Hart House are to give students experience. Surely there's some kind of inconsistency there.

A. G.
Waiting for Caroline, a second NFB-CBC co-production, will be shown next Wednesday on Channel 6 at 9:30. Shirley Clarke's The Connection is on tomorrow at Cinecity starting at 11:30. The Elektra features two Marcello Mastroianni films next week: The Tenth Victim and Bell'Antonio. Tonight the National Film Theatre, at the Music Library, St. Clair and Avenue Rd., starts a series of films by the Japanese director Kenji Mizoguchi while the Crest is presenting a Festival of the Arts, Olivier's Othello, La Scala's La Boheme, and the Royal Ballet's Romeo and Juliet. The New Yorker's series of Russian films looks excellent. Of those to be shown next week Don Quixote is remarkable as a cruel, concentrated version of a very un-Russian classic.

M. B.
Apologies to the opera school. Due to academic overtures on the part of professors the review on Oedipus Rex will be in next week.

The opera school is planning to mount five fully staged productions this year in the MacMillan Theatre including the Christmas production of Mozart's Magic Flute, sponsored by the Opera Junior Women's Committee.

For TS followers, Series B opening concert Tuesday and Wednesday Nov. 28-29 will have Van Cliburn (8:25)

Joni Mitchell will be at the Riverboat for two more weeks. After her Tom Rush. P. G.

Engineers and UC look at the campus

SPS

Most engineers seem to have no concrete ideas concerning artsmen.

The majority of engineers interviewed were unable to describe any image or feeling they had towards artsmen. A few engineers said that they had never even thought about the members of arts colleges.

Dal Carioni (IV APSC) said that he found it difficult to describe just what went to arts colleges.

Joe Incorvaja (III APSC) thought that artsies were very uninteresting and made him believe the University of Toronto is a degree factory.

Doug Bain (I APSC) was of the opinion that artsmen were "a bunch of coffee drinkers."

Hans Jendrasch (III APSC) said artsmen take easier courses to dodge work. "But some of my best friends are artsies."

Concerning themselves most of the engineers agreed that they had an image of a noisy, obnoxious, fun loving high spirited mob. There was disagreement as to whether this was good or bad.

Boh Groves (III APSC) said: "Artsies think we are dirty filthy people and are jealous of us."

Les Townsend (II APSC) thought that the image clearly conveyed the idea of a bunch of sexy, virile handsome inebriates.

Peter Aust (III APSC) said the engineering image was that of a masculine BFC drunk. "It's something definite."

Ron Horton (III APSC) and Mrs. F. Simons (IV APSC) both thought that engineers had had their image spoiled by a couple of bad apples in the barrel.

UC

You can classify the other colleges, say University College students, but not UC.

"You meet people at UC you don't meet anyplace else," said an habitue of the junior common room. "It's a gathering place."

But others thought UC was less of a melting pot.

"We're all Jews," laughed one. "I've passed for white before, though," said a UC co-ed.

Who goes to Vic? "Hyper-Wasp-types," says a UC-type. "When you walk into Wymilwood they look to see how expensive your shoes are."

"I suppose Vic people are Wasps," said another, "but stereotypes really aren't valid."

Trinity? "At Trinity they all wear gowns."

Trinity guys are "good-looking," says a UC co-ed, but "hatched from Upper Canada College. The girls are from Haver-gal and Bishop Strachan's."

And St. Mike's was seen only as "Catholic."

"But the colleges don't mean anything to people in sciences," said one student, "I came to UC because it was convenient."

"I don't belong," confessed a UC co-ed. "It's a nice building but I'm not emotionally attached."

Student wins Epstein prize for play

A University of Toronto student has taken one of the top prizes in the biennial Inter-University Epstein competition.

Frank McEnaney (IV UC) was awarded $500 for his three-act play, a Bedtime Story. The announcement was made Tuesday by the Creative Writing Committee of University College.

The competition, which includes almost all Canadian universities, drew 55 entries, 20 of them from U of T. David Weissstuh (SGS) received an honourable mention for his poetry entry.

The Norma Epstein Foundation Awards are the gift of Mr. and Mrs. M. H. Epstein in memory of their daughter Norma, of the class of 1945. There are two competitions, an annual one open to undergraduates of University College, and the biennial competition, open to undergraduates and graduates in all Canadian universities.

McEnaney is no stranger to the Epstein Competition. He has won three previous awards for short stories and an essay.

A Bedtime Story is an allegory of the Vietnam war. It involves a young married couple and an older man.

When asked if it would be produced, he would only say he had some "promising nibbles."

there is no point in having a constitution."

He suggested that the BNA Act be amended to transfer control of resources to the federal government from the provincial government. Then Ottawa could set up minimal national standards to control the problem.

Without a transfer of jurisdiction to the federal government, Mr. O'Donohue claimed, air pollution will double in 15 years.

Sixty per cent of air pollution comes from autos, he said. These pollutants are cancer-causers, he warned.

The city of Toronto and Ontario Hydro use sulfur, he said, a cheap but dirty fuel. The audience gasped when O'Donohue said sulfur dioxide can turn into a sulfuric acid mist in a damp climate.

These users must be convinced to use a cleaner fuel, he said. "It's going to cost them money and they've got to be prepared to pay it."

Asked if he wanted a demonstration, he replied: "I'd love it."

Amend BNA to end pollution: O'Donohue

The British North America Act may have to be altered before air pollution can be countered, a Toronto alderman said Wednesday.

Ald. Anthony O'Donohue told a Progressive Conservative club meeting:

"If you can't do anything because of the constitution,

If you have a penchant for popular music, then the Concord Project may be of service to you.

Every Wednesday evening at 7:30 p.m., a small group of musicians meet in the Sir Daniel Wilson Residence lower lounge, under the auspices of the Concord Project. They discuss the current music scene, form interest groups, or just play their instruments and drink coffee.

Since Concord is subsidized by the Students Administrative Council, it will sponsor any musical endeavors of its members by supplying necessary instruments, speakers, equipment and music.

"Concord's main purpose is to register as many people as possible and get them in touch with others who share their musical interests" says Brad Stackhouse (I Vic). "So far we have folk rock, bluegrass, country and wetsern and jug band and we are always looking for new categories."

Tens of thousands of U of T interfaculty soccer fans were dumbfounded yesterday as the teams which finished 3rd and 4th in scheduled play won their semifinal matches. St. Michael's, due to a superior amount of grease, squeezed by the school of hard Knox 3-1. Palma, Lombardo, and Palermo kicked Knox out of the running; Doug Codling was the only Knock to score. In the other game, Iozzo's early goal stood up (a fascinating sight) to enable UC to trim Trin A 1-0.

HOCKEY

Sr. Engineering and St. Mike's battled to a hard-fought 2-2 draw. Don Treen and Craig Simpson scored for Skule; Merlocco and Hurley replied for St. Mike's.

LACROSSE

In the Intermediate League final, PHE D, with Glen Mathews scoring 5 goals edged Trinity 8-7. Noah Webster, Embrey, and Taylor added other PHE goals. Murry had 4, Hall 2, and I. Storey one for Trinity.

Meds A led by Kempston, who scored twice, Howes, Shapero, and Muronaghan, performed a pre-frontal lobotomy on Vic III, 5-4. Aris Birze (2), Reid, and Bill Moebus scored for Vic.

Knox outlasted PHE B, 6-5. Louie Lowie scored 3 for Knox; Keys, Estrabrook, and Riddell added the others. Nelson had 2, Zbigniew Blocki, Gibbons and Muraki one each for PHE.

Innis destroyed Scarborough and then trampled on the corpse, 19-4. The Innis goals went to Bob Bisley (6), Knowles (5) Okihiro (3), Kril (2), Scott, Andreychuk.

BASKETBALL

PHE A struck down Vic I 30-25 and there was wailing and gnashing (g silent) of teeth. Crouter and MacKenzie swished the cords for 7 for the winners, while Evans, Long and Symk had 6 each for Vic.

St. Mike's A emerged victorious over Sr. Engineering, 43-39. Longpre (long field, simultaneous translation courtesy Varsity Sports) hit for 11 for the Micks; O'Connor led Skule with 14 points. UC II edged PHE B 21-16.

Markowitz had 4 points for the winners (UC q.v.) Various people had 3 for PHE B.

RUGGER

In playoff action PHE A, led by Sloan (2 conversions), Taylor and Bobbett (a try each) blanked Innis, 10-0. Harry Brown scored all the points as Scarborough topped Trin A, 5-0.

For some reason, U of T doesn't believe in majority rule. It tried to enter the College Bowl picture but was ruled out. For once the CIAU had an intelligent reason for its decision. The SIFL had indicated it wasn't interested at the beginning of the season and the CIAU had every reason to believe that decision was final.

I'M NOT AGAINST SAYING THE CHILDREN BUT . . .

One of the things that has irritated me almost as much as the blatant incompetence of paid athletic administrators is the sinister implication that if you don't support the College Bowl your letting down a lot of starving kids.

This is nonsense. If you're worried about the kids . . . and we should be . . . send a donation directly to the Fund. The College Bowl people have said they depend on U of T support for the game. But the only reason I, as a student, have for supporting this game is the fact that it's for charity. That's not good enough. The charity is a worthy cause, as are all charities; but buying a ticket for the game doesn't indicate support for the charity rather a vote of confidence for the bungling.

THE INFAMOUS QUOTE

The quote that was attributed to me in Wednesday's sports column was out of context. Furthermore there was never any indication that my comments to a friend would be published. What I was referring to was the tendency of the College Bowl people to bend the truth slightly regarding ticket sales.

And just one thing more. As to any further questions you may have regarding the College Bowl, my answer is, "No comment." This time, you can quote me.

Bowl hosts Mac and Alberta

Amid snickers of derision from the SIFL, our nation's first officially-sanctioned collegiate football championship takes place tomorrow at Varsity Stadium, 'round about one-ish. (N.B. 1 of the clock.) Otherwise, and more honestly known as the College Bowl, the contest matches near-by McMaster Marauders and some winsome warriors from the west, Alberta Golden Bears.

For the gilded bruins (golden bears?), the Toronto excursion, is a bit of aged chapeau. Two years ago they played in the first College Bowl here and drowned in the rain, 14-7 to Varsity Blues.

In the interests of providing erotic (or is it exotic?) entertainment for the fair to middling crowd expected, Bowl organizers have managed to come up with two relatively even teams. In a previous encounter between the clubs early in September, Alberta eked out an 11-1 victory, but exhibition games count only at the CNE.

What the game will probably boil down to is an exciting duel between Mac's ruggedly competent quarterback, Dick Waring, and Bears' tough defense.

During their season out west, Bears bore a strong resemblance to our own Blues. They held sway with a tremendous defense which managed to overcome the team's basically stuttering offense. And Bears, like Blues, possess a good field goal kicker in Dick Benbow.

According to their genial freshman coach, Clare Drake, the key to their defensive strength comes from a talented trio of linebackers—Bob Baumbach (54), Dave Wray (51), and capt. John Wilson (50). "We got really good mileage from these guys during the season," Drake affirmed.

Drake's main worry stems from the two-week layoff his team has had since clinching a Bowl berth. But he's counting on his defense to pull him through. "If we can score 20 points, we're laughing." Alberta is mainly a running team, built around ace fullback Les Sorenson (33). Their big weakness is at quarterback where Terry Lampert (14) has yet to show consistency.

Over at Mac, coach Jack Kennedy is fairly unperturbed. "We're slowly building our spirit towards this game," said Kennedy. "It may be a bit tough, though, to attain the tremendous emotional peak we had last week against St. Francis in the Atlantic Bowl."

McMaster also boasts a stout defense, having allowed only 24 points in eight games, and their offensive strength, thanks to Waring, will probably mean the difference in the game.

However Mac's defense will be altered (that's a pun!) after the first half as halfback Vern Lucyk has an alternate (that's another!) engagement at 3 o'clock. He's getting married. (get the puns, sons?)

Mac by five points, okay?

Varsity Blues at Laval for ice opener; meet NHL old-timers on December 5.

By PHIL BINGLEY

QUEBEC — La Belle Province — and a beautiful province it has been for Varsity Blues during the past three years. During that time, Blues have played eleven straight games without a loss in Montreal and Quebec City.

This weekend, Blues are off on their third consecutive weekend road trip as they open the 1967-68 Intercollegiate Hockey season tonight against Laval, prior to a Saturday evening encounter with McGill.

Coach Tom Watt has trimmed the squad to the six-teen man (including two goaltenders) limit.

Making the Quebec trip as starting forwards are Paul Laurent, Ward Passi, Gord Cunningham, Murray Stroud, Bob McClelland, Brian Jones, Brian St. John, Mike Riddell, Paul McCann and Fred Pollard.

Watt decided to carry a tenth forward instead of the usual fifth defenceman for this particular trip.

"I think we're better off with the extra forward for the time being," he commented. "Anyway, both Jones and Passi can move back and play defence if need be."

Doug Jones, a real jack-of-all-trades, appears to have won the fourth blue-line berth. He'll team up with Bob Hamilton while the duo of Peter Speyer and Jim Miles complete Blues' defence corps.

John Wrigley will start in goal for both games with Pete Adamson available in reserve.

BLUES TO PLAY NHL OLDTIMERS

Meanwhile, back at the ranch, things are really popping for what could be the most entertaining game of the year at Varsity Arena.

On December 5 (that's a Tuesday night) at 8 p.m.

MURRAY STROUD

Blues will play an exhibition game against the NHL Old-Timers.

After games with international and Junior A competition during the past two years, this will be Blues' first shot at the pros. The oldies but goodies may be a bit short on conditioning but they still play a solid, heady game of perfect positional hockey.

Tickets, while they last, go on sale next Tuesday (Nov. 28) at both Hart House and Varsity Arena.

Admission will be one dollar — that's right, baby, a single buck.

Proceeds from the game will go towards defraying the cost of Blues' trip to Austria in January 1968 for the World University games at Innsbruck.

AROUND THE NET . . .

Peter Speyer has been chosen Blues' captain for the '67-68 season with Paul Laurent and Murray Stroud as alternates . . . Ward Passi has an early lead in the "Red" Stephens Suture Trophy race as he collected 17 stitches during the last two weeks . . . the remaining 1,500 books of student hockey coupons go on sale Monday at Hart House on a proportional faculty basis—happy lineups, jocks . . . Blues open the home season next Friday (Dec. 1) at eight chimes . . .

Poloists at McGill

Varsity water polo Blues will be after their fourth straight Herschorn Cup when the season begins Saturday at McGill. Prominent among Coach Eddie Szakazs charges are forwards Alan Pyle, Chris McNaught, and Bruce Warburton. Backing them up are defencemen Slip Bergman and Steve Gerring, and net mender Hartley Garfield.

WHY I DON'T LIKE THE COLLEGE BOWL

For me, the Canadian Save the Children College Bowl is the showcase of incompetence on the part of those who administer college sports both on a national and local level. Those people being the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Association (CIAU) and its local body, the Ontario Quebec Athletic Association (OQAA).

It is my contention that the majority of members on these two bodies are selfishly self-interested persons who rarely move their posteriors from their well-padded chairs unless and until some issue directly concerns their own little domain. These people lack initiative and imagination.

In my four years of close connection with college athletics, the College Bowl is the prime, but by no means the only, example of this attitude.

About three years ago Peter Gorman (Chairman of the College Bowl) came to the CIAU and said in effect: "I'd like to have a football game between the best eastern and western colleges—sort of a college Grey Cup or Rose Bowl.

I and my associates will put up the money for the game, organize the publicity, rent the stadium and choose the teams for the game. Any profit we make will go to charity—The Canadian Save the Children Fund. All you have to do is let us use your teams."

The CIAU thought it was a good idea; and the idea of an east-west college football game is a good idea. But why was it such a good idea in 1965 that the CIAU decided to accept it? Surely such an obvious idea must have come up in meetings prior to 1965. Queen's, in fact did travel to Alberta to play the Golden Bears after winning one of its numerous Yates Cups.

The reasons were that it would cost the CIAU no money and they wouldn't have to bother with any of the organizational aspects of the game. They said in effect: "It's all yours, Pete, baby, do a job!"

WHY NOT A CIAU HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIP FOR CHARITY?

The College Bowl is the only CIAU championship organized by interests outside the CIAU. And it's the only championship whose profits go to charity.

I have a proposal to put to the CIAU: The national college hockey final hasn't appeared to be a great financial success these past two years. It probably cost the CIAU money. I will personally take on the task of organizing and financing a national college hockey final and donate all profits to the Canadian Cancer Society. You don't have to do anything but supply the teams.

There is really no way the CIAU can reject such a proposal without being open to the charge that they refuse to support the Canadian Cancer Society. Why should the Save the Children Fund hold such a privileged position in the CIAU? The relative merits of one charity as opposed to another is surely not a matter for discussion.

By the precedent set by the College Bowl decision, the CIAU must allow its other national championships to be played for charitable organizations.

YEAR II OF THE COLLEGE BOWL

Last year's pre-bowl game fuss appears to have been caused by a clash of personalities which turned the selection process into a petty feud. AFTER seeing the mess the Gorman Gang had made of the first game the CIAU decided they'd better get in on the action. Among other things there was a CIAU selection committee to decide who plays in the game.

At the beginning of the 1966 football season when it looked like Queen's were not going to win the Yates Cup they decided not to enter the Bowl game. The closeness of the game to exams was the excuse given. About a month later, somehow the powers that be at Queen's were willing to overlook these exams in favor of the Bowl game.

It was also about this time that it looked like Queen's might win the Yates Cup.

The selection committee said Queen's had made its decision too late. They refused probably the best college football team in favor of an inferior Waterloo team and an inferior game.

Queen's change of mind wasn't really too late. The selectors had made no selection at the time. The immovable object had moved but the irresistible force stood firm in righteous indignation. One wrong was compounded by another.

This year the Senior Intercollegiate Football League, the football branch of the OQAA, voted by a 3-1 count against entering the Bowl. It was a typical, childish, selfish, self-interested move. Instead of the best, and best-established colleges and their teams taking the lead in this matter, they opted out.

TOM FAULKNER WILL RESIGN FROM SAC

By MIKE KESTERTON

Students Council President Tom Faulkner will resign. In a statement released late last night he said the resignation will be announced at the SAC meeting Wednesday and will take effect on the day of the next presidential election, to be determined by the SAC elections committee.

Faulkner's move was in response to a petition being circulated by the Ad Hoc Committee on Responsible Government, calling for his resignation.

"I've been informed that eight or nine hundred students have signed a statement that I no longer represent the interests of the students of the University of Toronto" he said

"This statement has been widely circulated on campus and in the city newspapers and I feel that it must be challenged now."

Faulkner privately admitted that he had been disturbed by headlines such as the one appearing in the Globe and Mail: "Students Ask Campus Chief to Resign"

"I believe in a responsible student leadership," he said, "one that has the support of the students. It disturbed me greatly that no other candidate challenged me in last year's election, since I would have welcomed the opportunity to demonstrate the support upon which I believe I can call, and I look upon this petition as a chance to establish that support clearly."

The Ad Hoc Committee has already chosen a candidate: Bill Charlton (II Law).

"Many students have asked me this weekend," Faulkner continued, "if there is anything they can do to help, but there is nothing they can do without an election."

"Moreover, an election would be an excellent opportunity to debate the issues we face on campus."

"Finally the Christmas break is not too far off and it is important that, if an election is to be held," he said, "and the proper time given to it, it be called as soon as possible."

Previously Ron Thompson (IV APSC), president of the Committee demanding Faulkner's resignation, had expressed confidence that they would get the 1500 names necessary to force his recall if a proposed SAC by-law is passed, as it almost certainly will be this Wednesday.

Charlton, opposing Faulkner, has said: "the SAC this year has chosen to speak on certain issues, including draft-dodgers, Vietnam, and Dow Chemical, and they have claimed to speak as the voice of the University of Toronto."

Charlton said his objection to SAC is that it has been deciding on "moral and political" issues for which, he says, it was not elected.

"The fact that Mr. Faulkner thinks his prime responsibility is to do just that," he said, "implies that he fundamentally fails to understand his function."

"While we respect his right to say things about Vietnam, napalm and the draft, his right is only a private right; he speaks for no other person. Just as it is right that any person should be able to denounce Dow Chemical, so too it is right that any student here should be able to seek employment with that company."

"The person who runs the SAC should not be paid," he said, "and should be a student."

Faulkner and Charlton have squared off before. They debated before last year's Harvard Exchange on "the role of the university" and on CBC television this year on "student power."

President Faulkner expressed little concern over the actual numbers who signed the petition.

"In the last election I got 900 votes from Victoria College alone," he said. The election for SAC president is across-campus. "It was I who suggested Charlton's name," he said, "when the CBC contacted me about appearing on their panel program."

Faulkner said the proposed by-law that will be voted on Wednesday demands that a petition have 2,000 names, but he had earlier proposed an amendment reducing it to 1,500 names.

Thompson, who instigated the move to dump Faulkner, said, "I'm against napalming babies, too. But SAC should not pass moral decisions."

Quebec independent in 1970: Gregoire

By DAVE FRANK

Confederation as we know it is a thing of the past, announced speakers at this weekend's "Quebec: Year 8" conference held at York University's Glendon College.

The more than 500 students and observers were told that the break-up of Confederation was inevitable and irreversible.

"I am convinced the independence of Quebec is coming soon," said Gilles Gregoire, the only separatist MP. "Not in 20, 15, or 10 years, but before or in 1970."

Mr. Gregoire is a short, almost dwarfish man.

He dresses impeccably in a conservative grey suit and vest, with wide starched cuffs and heavy cuff-links.

"The independence of Quebec will be profitable, economically, socially, and politically, to both English and French Canada."

But Mr. Gregoire was only saying what he has said for more than a year and a half.

The man of the hour was Rene Levesque, who last month left the Quebec Liberal party.

"Within three or four years French Canada will vote with a clear majority that they want out of con- (see YORK CONFERENCE on Page 8)

local boy makes good

"Mommy, there is Cornelius. Why does he look so sad?"

Mommy put her finger to her lips to say "Sh-sh-sh" but never moved her eyes from Cornelius then approaching the Convocation Hall platform.

This was a strange world Mommy had entered, she might have thought, as she watched Cornelius kneel on a stool before Chancellor O. M. Solandt. He placed his hands within the Chancellor's.

"Admitto te ad gradum," the Chancellor pronounced and Cornelius found himself admitted to the degree. After the Bedel had held a hood to his shoulders for a second, the successful candidate was free to proceed to the south corridor where he received the paper that put it all into writing.

"This ceremony is an academic happening," Acting President John Sword had told the convocation earlier, he, as all the academic officials on the platform, wearing the robe befitting his office.

"It is a sonnet whose formal structure embodies a sentimental binge with your families and an affirmation of the value of your accomplishment.

"It is an old-fashioned ceremony. But it represents a linking of personal and intellectual values — a truthful image of what the University really is."

Before that he had addressed the Chancellor. "Insignissime Cancellarie: Praesento tibi hosce scholares ut admittantur ad gradus varios, testorque eos quoad omnia quae statuta requirunt aptos et idoneos esse," he murmured solemnly.

"Ad profectum Britannii Imperii Provinciaeque ego auctoritate mea et totius Universitatis admitto vos ad gradus varios, licentiamque vobis do omnia ea faciendi quae ad illos gradus pertinent," the Chancellor replied.

Matrons sporting mock mini-skirts, sprinkled throughout the audience, didn't seem to understand. Some cursed jammed cameras; others unleashed restless youngsters to dance a jig in the aisle; some worked at crossword puzzles.

Grandmothers, fathers, mothers, sisters and brothers wanted only to see their own Cornelius go through the ceremony with the hundreds of candidates gathered.

Luckily for them not all the 829 successful candidates (76 Ph.D.s, 430 Masters, 282 Bachelors, 41 Diploma winners) had shown up.

Murray Reiss, who is now Murray Reiss, B.A., who wears long hair and a beard and smiles as softly as he speaks, was looking over the book selection in Mac's at 8:05, unaware of the "happening" that had started five minutes earlier.

Murray, more interested in the play he is writing, had arrived from Montreal earlier that day to see a play at Hart House.

He still went to see the play thereby forcing the Chancellor to confer his degree through Registrar Robin Ross acting as his proxy.

"Varsity will ever praise thee", the Hart House Glee Club chanted in farewell to the successful candidates.

Drooping eyes in the audience perked up when refreshments at Hart House were announced.

And so, with vastly different intentions, Cornelius and Murray both ended up in the same building at the same time Friday night.

GSU elects completely new executive

History was made Friday at the elections of the Graduate Students Union when a complete slate of representatives was elected.

The new president, Joe DePazza, said that by their vote the students had expressed a desire to see changes made. "They have manifested a decided lack of confidence in the extremist policies of former president John Bradford. We shall get the GSU moving again."

John Winter, the new vice-president, said, "Bradford's policies have been reversed. The accent is now on social functions. Politics will take a back seat."

Fifteen per cent of the students voted and they were overwhelmingly in favor of the new slate.

Besides DePazza, the successful candidates are John Winter, vice-president; David MacCare, treasurer; Gerard Neave, secretary; Hugh Barr, Howard White, Morimitsu Inaba, Michael Vaughan, D. Brunette, Scott McClure, Manuel Nunez-de-Cela, Charles Zabrowski.

The new representatives plan to refrain from using funds to support such controversial groups as hippies and draft-resistors.

Their major plank is to improve the interdepartmental relationships among the students.

Establishing a permanent bar and refurbishing the union building are two methods which will be used to attract more students.

Various committees have already been set up including one which plans to take the new constitution to Caput.

When questioned about the results of the election, former president Bradford said: "A lot of their policies are contradictory, and the things that will be going on will be just as distasteful as mine. The students voted against my methods rather than my policies."

"I ran because I didn't think DePazza should be president and I didn't want him to run unopposed."

The GSU students also voted their opinion on U of T's membership in the Canadian Union of Students. The results will be announced Wednesday at the SAC debate at Victoria College.

MANPOWER

The Federal Department of Manpower and Immigration has been assigned the task of achieving better and more efficient use of our manpower resources.

As a part of this plan we require a number of University graduates, interested in working with people, who will be located in Canada Manpower Centres throughout Ontario.

They will assess the potential of employees and the needs of employers. They will assist employees to attain their maximum potential either through re-training or assistance in geographical mobility. No written examination is required and successful applicants will have the satisfaction of knowing that they are making a significant contribution to the prosperity of their fellow Canadians and of Canada as a whole. Remuneration and opportunities for advancement are comparable to those offered by business and industry. Interviews will be held shortly in your area. For further information see your University Placement Officer.

SAC wants more student involvement

A group set up by the Students Administrative Council to attempt to make student representatives a truly non-elite group goes into action today.

Several weeks ago SAC moved to organize a manpower committee to involve students in the work the SAC is doing.

"Our first aim is to make students aware that we welcome their ideas and involvement," said committee Chair-an Leslie Gary (III New).

"SAC reps are making more of an effort this year than ever before to communicate with the students. But with the number of duties they are assuming on the increase, they need help.

"Our job is to work with the reps and the Commissions to make our goal of student involvement a reality."

There is an ad in today's Varsity listing SAC commission and committee meetings for the week, with times and locations. SAC reps hope that interested students will attend these meetings to voice their opinions and become active in some of the dozens of SAC projects.

A service has also been set up in the SAC office so that any student wanting to work on SAC can fill out a form indicating his interests and he will be contacted by the rep working in that area.

Refugee's rights based on citizenship

"The Universal Declaration of Human Rights does not exist for the refugee," Dr. Sandra Wallman, a professor of anthropology at the University of Toronto, declared last week.

"Human rights at present depend largely upon the citizenship of the individual and the policy of the state of which he is a member," she explained.

Dr. Wallman was speaking in the second of a United Nations lecture series at Scarborough College.

Her definition of refugees comprised political objects, the economically handicapped and welcome ethnic groups and war victims.

The major obstacle, she said, is the attitude of receiving countries. Quota systems were ignored for Hungarians in 1956 but due only to political expedience.

Dr. Wallman proposed two measures, the first being ratification of international covenants on human rights with local enforcement. As an alternative she suggested an international authority to take care of all refugees.

She saw little chance of success for the second of these but appealed to Canada and similar countries to ameliorate the situation.

Kathy captures College Bowl crown

The Varsity Blues didn't make the College Bowl but Varsity carried the day when Kathy Williams, Miss U of T, won the Miss College Bowl crown.

Friday's victory brought Kathy (III Vic) the use of a Jeepster for a year.

This red and white convertible, complete with four-wheel drive and bucket seats, is a mod version of the old jeep.

"It'll be great transportation for my beginners' efforts at skiing," said Kathy.

During the contest she went through spurts of being nervous, panicky, uncaring, calm, tired, stunned, unbelieving, shaking and finally very happy.

With her mod jeepster, Kathy got a parka, a sun lamp, cosmetics and an electric tooth brush.

The Miss College Bowl judging was held at the Royal York Hotel. Kathy and nine other contestants from across Canada stood up under rapid-fire questioning from four judges in a panel discussion.

The final coronation ceremonies took place at the dignitary dinner at city hall last Friday night.

The queen-ettes formed the traditional line-up for final scrutiny there.

With the age-old drum roll and mounting excitement, Kathy received her sceptre, bouquet of roses and crown.

There was no lack of admirers with both College Bowl football teams present, making for a ratio of 200 men to 10 girls.

The next challenge for Kathy will be at the Waterloo University winter carnival where she will compete for Miss Canadiao University.

Kathy says she has had "no barrage of phone calls" because of her success but she has had a queen's share of dates.

Sit-in mass communication catalyst

Ten established campus groups ranging from the Student Christian Movement to political organizations are to meet today in Hart House for what might be labelled a "mass communication" meeting.

No one seems to know exactly what the purposes of the meeting are.

"The meeting has arisen as a result of the Dow sit-in last week," said Professor Chandler Davis representing the Faculty Committee on Vietnam.

"Canadian complicity in the Vietnam war will be discussed."

"Now that SAC has passed a motion advising that companies complicit in the Vietnam war be prohibited from recruiting on campus, we're unsure what we will do if these companies come back," said Marie Richie of the Committee to End the War in Vietnam.

"Perhaps research into different aspects of Canadian complicity will result from this meeting."

"Student power, the Macpherson commission report and education in general will be among the topics for discussion," said Dr. Paul Hoch, one of the organizers of the meeting.

"The students from course unions will probably want to discuss student representation on the department councils," he added.

Bob Bossin SAC education commissioner, said he knew nothing about the meeting. "I've only overheard talk about it in the SAC office."

"We hope to find out what other groups are interested in and avoid duplication by working together," declared Ernie McColloch, the president of the Progressive Conservative club.

"I hope the meeting won't be entirely about Vietnam," he said. "Air pollution is one of the issues our group wants to discuss."

The organizations invited to the meeting include the Faculty Committee on Vietnam, the Committee to End the War in Vietnam, Friends of the Toronto Anti-Draft Program, the SAC education committee, SCM, the political clubs, the course unions and the Ad Hoc Committee against Campus Complicity.

The meeting is in the Hart House debates room at 3 p.m. Everyone is welcome.

Opinion split on SAC's Dow decision

Does the Students Administrative Council have the right to ban companies "complicit" in the Vietnam War from recruiting employees on campus?

Student interviews conducted Friday show the campus divided on this issue.

Opinions varied from that of Bob Harris (II UC) who said "Hurrah I'm all for it!" to the view of Larry Morro (I SMC) who said: "SAC has nothing to do with it. It's a matter of personal involvement."

Some saw SAC's action as a violation of their basic democratic rights.

Terry Silva (I UC) felt that: "The freedom to assent is of equal importance to the freedom to dissent."

Graham Clinton (III UC) added: "People should be able to seek their employer without harassment from pressure groups."

And John Burroughs (III APSC) said: "Any firm should be able to recruit on the U of T campus.

"SAC is putting its own moral ideas ahead of the feelings of the students."

Harry Krakowsky (I Pre-Meds) agreed. He saw the vote as "just a matter of emotions on behalf of the people voting, to show how humanitarian they are."

Don Andrijiv (I APSC) questioned the nature of the restriction. "Cars kill. Why not petition General Motors?"

"The restriction is ridiculous. It will cover every industry in Canada" said Marvin Harris (III APSC).

But SAC was not condemned by all.

Mark Freiman (III UC) defended SAC's position on the grounds that "If the U of T facilities are to be used, SAC has the right to say which companies are to be allowed."

"I'm for the resolution" said Joan Winesanker (I UC). "Dow should not use napalm to destroy life."

A few students agreed with Dave Norgrove (II APSC) who dismissed the issue by saying "I don't give a damn one way or another."

Governors say pub's O.K.

SUDBURY (CUP) — Laurentian University students will get a pub on campus.

The board of governors, which had previously refused permission, decided recently that they would consider incorporating a pub into the proposed student centre.

The pub has the support of Sudbury clergymen, politicians and businessmen, as well as a vocal student committee.

a waste of time

Henry David Thoreau once wrote that men who let other people make their decisions for them — and who accept everything their governments do — are no better than machines.

For the past few days a group of engineers and law students have expressed in the strongest possible terms that they do question what their government, the Students' Administrative Council does. And so they have been collecting names on a petition to ask SAC president Tom Faulkner to resign.

The fact that they are politically active is good, because heaven knows its hard enough finding a political engineer or law student.

But this particular movement they have embarked upon is badly misguided and shows that they are acting without much knowledge of the situation.

The basis of their objection is that Faulkner's conception of a student council differs from theirs. They deny the council the right to make decisions on controversial or moral issues. They say SAC doesn't represent the students' views.

Council does seem to have moved a little fast this year, from the time it defeated a motion to give money to draft-dodgers to last week when it called for a student-staff committee to control recruiting corporate employees on campus. The absolute final straw, the petition leaders say, is that SAC suggested that companies supplying war materials for use in Vietnam should not be allowed accommodation on this campus. This, they say, is a moral decision which SAC should have left to the individual student.

But now let's analyze how this all came about.

The Dow debate lasted for two and a half hours and before Faulkner made a speech people were set in their opinions. His speech came late in the debate and didn't sway votes. Therefore a council of some 50 people made the decisions there, not Faulkner.

During the Varsity debate, Faulkner spoke late and then on a subtle point that again didn't sway anyone's opinions. He was opposed to the motion that finally passed.

Back to draft-dodgers then. Here Faulkner did make an important speech. He did try to sway council. But the council voted down the motion.

So, in all three cases alluded by the petitioners, Faulkner had little to do with the final decision. Faulkner is a president who has great respect in the democratic decisions of an elected body. He doesn't try to be authoritarian and impose his view on that body.

And yet, being the head of SAC, he is an authority figure and it is that figure the petitioners are attacking. Their attack is misguided because what they complain about wasn't done by Faulkner. It doesn't deserve to succeed because the people behind it don't know what they are talking about.

It is also unfortunate that Faulkner has dignified their attack by giving in. He announced last night he would resign and go through an election. Apparently he was moved by the criticism and wants to go back to the people and see exactly what his stature is among them.

This is understandable because Faulkner, an unopposed candidate last year when the SAC presidency was made a full-time one-year job, didn't have to fight an election and was acclaimed. This may have troubled his conscience. It may have given him doubts as to the legitimacy of his authority.

An election in mid-term will cause people to think about some issues and about SAC. Faulkner is a great believer in the power the people give to an elected office and he wants them to be informed.

The unfortunate aspect is that the whole thing will be a waste of time. SAC has more important things to do. It may strengthen the legitimacy of the president's authority, but no matter who wins, the election won't have much effect on the council. That makes it a waste of time.

reaction of the gsu

The Graduate Student Union will become an efficient, relating-to-the-public body now that the University-Wide slate of candidates is in power. It won during the GSU's election Friday.

The Graduate Student Union will also become an unexciting, do-nothing-worth-while body. This is also as a result of the U-W slate's win.

Its platform, nicely mimeographed off and spread everywhere on campus in a well-organized and strong campaign, shows that the U-W members will be public relations people who will run social organizations but nothing else.

They will speed up construction of the new GSU, make a thorough appraisal of "the heavily paid education consultant" (if they mean fire him, why don't they say so), work for the installation of a bar in the GSU, hire a house manager to implement social programs, be in contact with every graduate student and see to it that no money will be given to "such controversial groups as hippies and draft-resisters." (If by controversial they mean objectionable, why don't they say it?)

The slate is, of course, in reaction to the policies of past-president John Bradford who hired the consultant, gave money to hippies and draft-resisters and bought the mimeograph machine.

Bradford wasn't the public relations type and did not communicate with his constituents. Some say his actions were, in their secret nature, authoritarian, and it's too bad that he didn't become more of a politician after he was attacked for his actions in an open meeting. He was supported by the meeting but later resigned.

But even his excesses didn't merit the U-W type of reaction.

Try a bourbon Manhattan. They say all the fashionable people are turning on to bourbon these days.

LETTERS

objections irrelevant

Sir:

The recent Dow sit-in produced a great chorus of bleating protests from students, professors, and newspapers. I probably didn't see every such expression of shocked indignation, but almost all of those I did see made the same points — that the Dow man's rights were violated, that the job-seekers' rights were violated, that academic freedom was violated.

These objections, however, are irrelevant if one of the main points the sit-inners were making is accepted. If the use of burning napalm on living humans really is a crime against humanity, then every employee of Dow is an accessory.

Surely no one believes that there is such a thing as 'right' to recruit accessories to crimes against humanity.

The question of whether burning people alive is humane must therefore be decided before condemnations are issued.

Maybe napalming really is as American as apple pie. Only one of the criticisms I saw, however, discussed that point. Gunars Rundans (letter to The Varsity, Nov. 24) argues that the use of napalm is justified because it is a lesser evil than the spread of communism — after all, Mr. Rundans writes, the Reds "have no concept of the beauty of human life . . ." (emphasis his).

While I fail to see how burning people alive helps them appreciate the beauty of which Mr. Rundans speaks, he has at least not fallen into the same logical trap which ensnared his fellow critics.

As for the rest of them — their failure to discuss the necessary preliminary question of the morality of napalming is an instance of the kind of slipshod thinking I have come to expect from certain professors and newspapers. I am, however, disturbed to see so many supposedly critical students imitate the mistakes of their elders.

honest but frightening

Sir:

The question posed by Miss Limpus' November 22 article in The Varsity, "Why I sat in . . ." transcends even the pressing moral and ethical problems raised by Dow Chemical and the Vietnam war. Although she regrets that she had used coercion to abridge individual freedom, she justifies this by saying ". . . I believe that in some cases more general considerations outweigh what is often called a man's individual freedom." This is a clear, unequivocal statement of the totalitarian assumption that the end justifies the means. This confusion of ends and means is the fallacy that underlies the American participation in the Vietnam war to preserve peace; it is the fallacy behind Nazi genocide to arrive at their final solution, behind the atrocities of the Inquisition and the Stalinist purges to protect men from heresy, behind any attempt to coerce men "for their own good."

I am not questioning Miss Limpus' genuine moral fervor and honest belief that she is right.

But Miss Limpus' social and political application of her beliefs is a total negation of the humanitarian and democratic ideals she attempts to preserve.

Frankly, Miss Limpus' attitude is even more frightening than napalm.

Sword's stand on Dow right

Sir:

I wish to take issue with your editorial of Wednesday, Nov. 22, in which you give support for the Dow sit-in and the proposal to limit recruitment on campus by commercial enterprises.

Your editorial simply dismissed President Sword's statement by saying that it is "tempting to enter into arguments based on hairsplitting legalism and philosophical debate concerning the nature of the university, the rights and responsibilities of its members . . ." Instead the editorial argues that "The fundamental question is whether or not one accepts the use of a napalm in a war being waged upon civilians."

Your unsound position reminded me of an incident which took place several years ago at a small college I attended in "up-state" New York. At that time a campus organization invited a avowed communist to speak at a public meeting on campus. The local community was absolutely outraged. The townspeople were full of wrath. The town newspapers preached against it in front page editorials. Several local civic groups attempted to have the meeting blocked through a court injunction. The American Legion threatened trouble.

In defense of their invitation to the communist, the students involved argued that they were simply exercising their right to free speech. Furthermore they argued that it was part of the notion of a university to expose its students to as many points of view as possible. This seemed to me then and now also to be the correct position to take. The "townies" however, thought differently. They argued that freedom of speech and such was one thing, but that it did not really apply to the communist because the communist was wrong. Furthermore, they argued, he was immoral. Furthermore he was "our enemy."

I was reminded of this narrow undemocratic point of view by The Varsity's appraisal of the Dow situation, i.e. "The fundamental question is whether or not one accepts the use of napalm in a war being waged upon civilians. And "Our support goes to the sit in because we think that the people participating in it are right; and the students applying for job with Dow are wrong. It all boils down to that, doesn't it?" How reminiscent of those arch conservatives in New York State who argued that communists should not be allowed to speak because they are wrong.

It seems to me that President Sword's statement that "The University stands for open and widespread discussion" is the correct view to take. It is correct because the alternative view is untenable. The alternative is untenable because it violates certain basic principles we hold to be true. The alternative allows for and even provides for the situation in which a group, on campus or off campus, has the right to tell the rest of the campus what it may or may not be exposed to, what it may or may not participate in. Can a university really operate as a university when its exposure to certain alternatives has been closed because these alternatives are "morally repugnant to a significant number of people?" I think not. To play such a game is indeed very dangerous. In the States, at least, we see new threats to freedom of speech and dissent; are we in the university to respond to this situation by an act which while different in intention will have the same consequences, namely censorship and a consequent loss of freedom?

The students who sat in against Dow have taken upon themselves the right to determine what their fellow students may and may not participate in. As members of the university community this is beyond their legitimate rights. Members of the university community do not have the right to "close" the university. I think clearly this was President Sword's intention in his statement, a statement rather badly mutilated by The Varsity editorial.

I want to clarify that I am not against the idea of demonstrating against Dow, Nor am I against the idea of attempting to make those who apply to Dow and even the workers of Dow itself aware of their moral responsibilities. I agree with The Varsity that we are responsible for the products of our labor. But for The Varsity to assert that President Sword's statement amounts to a "moral abdication" on the part of the university is really reflective of the apparent fact that The Varsity has abdicated the role of responsible intelligent criticism and has instead taken refuge in the coddling and self righteous blandness of highly charged emotional statements. For instance, "What must be done on this campus, and what the university has failed to do, is to educate. We mean real education involving the beauty of human life and ugliness of mass disrespect for life." This is very nice. In one sense however, it is even truer.

It is true that the university is really concerned with producing sophisticated mechanics for society's chores, and not with awakening people to their basic humanity and the implications of this understanding for the way in which they conduct their lives. But in a more important sense it is wrong. For clearly The Varsity's editorial also wants us to believe that this statement, at least in part if not in entirety, stands as an acceptable interpretation of the Vietnam war. Presumably had the U.S. government been educated to appreciate the "beauty of human life," the U.S. would not have gotten involved in Vietnam.

I am an American. I think that the war in Vietnam is savage and completely unjust. But I find The Varsity's treatment of the War (at least in this editorial) dangerously approaching the level of a simple minded fantasy. (I might add that the editorial is a good example of the road much Vietnam dissent has taken in recent months.) The War, The Varsity implies, is a "war waged upon civilians," devised, no doubt by men who don't understand the beauty of human life, and who are imbued with the ugliness of "mass disrespect for life." I can't really understand how people can think that a complicated situation like Vietnam can be understood in such wholly simplistic terms. Is the War simply an American military exercise against civilians? Does the NLF have military exercise against civilians? Do the NLF have soldiers? Do the North Vietnamese have soldiers. It appears that both groups do. Does the NLF kill civilians?

Apparently they do (although in nothing like the numbers the U.S. does). Do you really suggest that the U.S. is waging a war for no other reason than to wage a war? Perhaps the U.S. is unsympathetic to Asians, but do you thing they are also unsympathetic to the 100,000 American casualties the War has produced? Do you really think that the government of the United States, as limited and wrong as it is, would put 500,000 men and over 20 billion dollars a year into Vietnam simply because it wanted to wage a war against civilians? Do you think that Johnson would risk his popularity, his possible reelection and his "place in history" just to preserve the opportunity to kill Asian civilians? This view is clearly absurd, especially when it is also considered that the U.S.'s involvement in Vietnam has truly nullified its already feeble attempt to do something about the ever pressing and increasingly explosive situation in its cities throughout the country.

As a difficult task of emotional restraint and intellectual acuity as it might be — it is clear that the U.S. is in Vietnam for a reason, and that this reason is in some way tied up with the government's view on the nature of "international communism," the nature of "Communist China," the nature of "wars of liberation," the nature of the "underdeveloped world," (among others). I think that the government's reasoning is for the most part false. But I think that the American position must be understood in terms of these considerations and not emotional vagaries.

R. Zev Friedman, SGS—Philosophy

I, of the majority, protest

Sir:

In view of the fact that certain campus groups have, in the last few days, received a great deal of publicity and notice from their actions, I feel that to keep the record fair it should be made clear that there is still a great number of students at this university that are not wild-eyed radicals, who do not sit-in to protest employment recruiters, who do keep a sensible eye for campus and world issues. There is unfortunately a number of students who are out to "save the world" right now, with no intention of letting anything, from the U. of T. police to plain rationale, make any difference to their crusade. I would like to point out, as should be blatantly obvious, that these people are in the minority.

As an example: the Dow Chemical incident of the last few days. Here we have the classic example of the "big lie" and the phony issue. No one can produce any facts to show that, as the promotion leaflet read, "Dow Chemicals Burns Babies". These people assume that since napalm is being used as a tactical weapon in Vietnam, and since there are children in Vietnam, by simple logic "Dow Chemical Burns Babies". No attempt was made to show supporting data to anyone on campus. The headline alone was enough to set off these 250 students on a phony, ridiculous witch-hunt!

The fact that these students were duped is a sad affair, but that is their concern, not mine. What is my concern is that they were then able to catapult themselves into the forefront of public attention and able to have their opinions sanctioned by the SAC, which has now gone on record as demanding student control over which companies shall or shall not be allowed to recruit graduates on this campus! The idea that perhaps 300 students who feel this way is sufficient to overcome the other 20,000 who may or may not be so inclined is repulsive to the democratic tradition and repugnant to the credo of free expression of opinion which these students attempt to fool us into believing that they support. The SAC vote on the issue was not at all in proportion to any reasonable division of thought on campus. In all their audacity, these campus radicals make no attempt to hide this fact, content to be secure in their belief that they, and only they, are right.

These people have been duped, they totally believe in the rightness of what they are doing, and they have no concern for the opinions of any other campus faction, no matter how large. Perhaps the more responsible members of the university community should allow this type of movement to die on its own, but who matters reach their present state it is time we made ourselves heard . . . heard that we will not allow our university to be dragged into some phony mire by immature and misled activists.

Charles F. Scott, (III Vic)

My blood boils

Sir:

The CEWV demonstrations and The Varsity's suggestion to ban Dow from the campus made my blood boil. Students seeking employment were blockaded by fellow students as the campus paper watched on and applauded. The right of an individual to make a personal decision on where his moral commitment of Vietnam lies has been usurped. No group of demonstrators should be permitted as they were to decide on issues of this complexity for any individual. How sadly ironic that the CEWV and The Varsity exist by virtue of that same freedom which they are undermining.

D. B. Harrison (III APSC)

War is not only American

Sir:

The fundamental question is not "whether or not one accepts the use of napalm in a war being waged upon civilians." As far as I'm concerned there is no difference if a child is burned by napalm (and The Varsity has failed to give a reputable source for its facts and pictures) or is dismembered by a Viet Cong.

It seems to me that all the charges of immorality are directed solely against the U.S. and anyone faintly connected or not violently opposed to its policy. The fact still remains that whether or not the U.S. is in Vietnam there will still be war. Does it then become moral? Are we absolved from all responsibility and complicity? Or, as we have been so eloquently told there must not be "mass disconcert in the face of mass slaughter."

Perhaps Miss Limpou and her group would like to stage a sit-in in Hanói. I'm sure more than her hand will get stepped on.

Miss Mary Goldman, St. Mike's (III)

Voters get what they seek

Sir:

The petition currently being circulated in opposition to Mr. Faulkner is quite revealing, in fact it demonstrates that the voters get what they deserve. If these same petitioners and their sympathizers had investigated the candidate's platforms and political leanings at election time, they would have no cause to be up in arms today.

While I am in disagreement with Mr. Faulkner's pink policies, I do feel that he serves a useful purpose: to demonstrate lucidly to university people that the consequence of apathy is irresponsible government. It is helpful that this lesson can be learned at the "kiddie parliament" level (where no serious harm can be done), so that on graduation, a student is aware of his responsibilities as a voter.

R. D. Stickney (Eng. Grad.)

Why pick on Dow?

Sir:

Picketing Dow Chemical at the U of T Placement Service in the interests of ending the Vietnam war is about as effective as picketing a liquor control board outlet in the interests of legalizing marijuana.

Why pick on poor old Dow anyway? The committee to End the War in Vietnam would reply quickly "because Dow produces that inhuman substance napalm which kills people in Vietnam inhumanely."

So napalm is a war material. But so is everything the U.S. troops in south-east Asia wear, eat, fire or smoke while they are over there.

The napalm couldn't be used unless there were bombers to drop it and men to pilot those bombers and food to feed the men.

Practically everything produced in Canada that is in any way related to the United States is used indirectly to kill Vietnamese peasants.

General Electric and General Motors produce war materials and they have subsidiaries in Canada.

Why doesn't the CEWV picket Canadian farmers who export wheat to the United States that is used to feed the troops in Vietnam?

Or why doesn't the CEWV picket the Viet Cong for selling marijuana to U.S. troops. Recent reports indicate that marijuana is a big cash crop in North Vietnam.

All businesses contribute to the war if the U.S. government happens to be one of their customers. It's the whole hoody system that's killing Vietnamese children with napalm — not just Dow chemical.

Incidentally, Dow of Canada is small compared to its parent company in the United States. No napalm is produced in Canada. Dow of Canada has nothing to say about napalm production.

If CEWV wants to picket Dow for producing napalm why don't they do it at a Dow plant. There's one in Toronto but it only produces coffee cups and it's out in the suburbs so it's doubtful if the attendance would be as large as last week's protest.

In advocating that a "broadly based advisory board" oversee the operation of the Placement Service and in urging SAC members to oppose the use of university facilities by companies complicit in the war, the CEWV has created a non-issue.

If this is what student power is coming to, I'm glad I'm graduating this year.

Restricting certain companies from interviewing students on campus is discriminatory. And who can tell whether a company is "complicit in the Vietnam war" or not, and what degree of complicity will evoke censure?

It is admirable that about 200 U of T students have enough courage in their anti-war stand to brave cold weather and heavy-footed engineers seeking Dow interviews.

But if they really care about Vietnam why don't they put pressure on government and not business?

Giggling nuns, suicidal priest fea

By ALAN GORDON

John Whiting's The Devils is a kind of Freudian version of Arthur Miller's The Crucible. Whiting has included all of the theatrical effects that would seem, at a cursory glance, to be the basis of Miller's hit. He has distorted them, however, until they have taken on a perverse life of their own. In The Crucible, screaming children from Salem form an hysterical choir of accusation, accompanying an unending line to the gallows made up of respected elders. In The Devils, the frightened children become giggling nuns, revelling in their new fame brought about by their spiritual name-calling. John Proctor, Miller's protagonist who sacrifices himself to preserve his name and individuality becomes, in Whiting's show, a priest who is bent on self-destruction. Whiting realizes that mere masochism is hardly sufficient motivation for action, even in this faint replica of a great play, so we are told (we have to be told) that our priest seeks his self-destruction as a means — and get this! — of returning to God!

Grandier, the priest, is so bent on joining his maker that he sleeps with a widow (she needed comforting) and a young daughter of a town official (she wanted to learn).

While all of this is going on in Loudun, the Prioress of a convent is feeling some stirrings within herself. No, they are not anything so simple as masochisms and the Death wish. In Sister Jeanne, we have a classic case, gentlemen, of sexual repression and deep-rooted insecurity. Not only is the lady a nun, but she has, alas, been afflicted with a slight physical deformity which plays havoc with her psyche. In these two characters, we have an actor's and analyst's paradise.

They are the two major false notes in Peter Ebert's creditable production of an incredible play. The show purports to be an understanding of man's attempt to find God. It is really best described as an answer to the curious questions of the "What does the Scotsman wear under his kilt?" ilk. Or, what does the nun wear under her habit? Whiting's answer seems to be, "A hump, and a neurosis you wouldn't believe!"

Not only does her neurosis lack credibility, but so does Whiting's helter-skelter handling of the elements of the town. What exactly is going on with the business of the walls coming down? What are the reasons for taking them down? There is certainly enough time spent on the problem, but never does it clearly relate more than tenuously with the Grandier — politics plot.

And surely there can be a greater motivation for the clergy's concern in the plight of Sister Jeanne than the 'I told you so' posture struck by Father Barré. Arthur Miller makes Reverend Hale compassionately concerned with the welfare of "witches". Was politics the sole concern of the

OCA the inhospitable fiend: O

By SAL AMENTA

Last Monday, in the first part of his article, the author gave a detailed criticism of teaching and administration at the Ontario College of Art. This article suggests some solutions. The cartoon is by an OCA student.

From the students' handbook and reports made in the past, the College has repeatedly stated that its function is to fill positions in industry and to engage in fine arts and crafts. How has it lived up to these standards?

First of all, I've found that in the drawing and painting department students have found themselves denied of self-expression and ingenuity in favour of pass-marks. There have also been complaints that some teachers are behind times and are thus unwilling to accept new ideas.

In the advertising side, I feel that there has been a grave misunderstanding and misinterpretation of this creed. Students graduate with a diploma in advertising art (with perhaps certain emphasis on certain subjects) and then find their diplomas meaningless when they leave OCA. They find that agencies and art department heads are more interested in their portfolios and what they can do... not their O.C.A. initials!

It is my contention that every individual who enters OCA has something unique to cultivate. This, I feel, coupled with the College's efforts to help him cultivate his ability, should be the basic and fundamental creed of the staff, the administration, the chairmen, and the governing council. ALL ELSE SHOULD BE SUBORDINATE TO THIS. Naturally the student must be convinced of his abilities and interests so as to be able to pursue them. The individual's capacity to think for himself should not be understressed and if the individual does nothing else more constructive than this during his stay at OCA, then four years will have been put to good use.

Provided that the student has undergone the foundation year course (an introduction to the various subjects in art) and convinced both himself and the school authorities that his ideas are strong and can stand up to argument, the student should be allowed to pattern out his next three years on his own. There should be, however, a counselling department set up within the school whose sole function would be to help a student make course decisions and give him permission to do what he has decided.

This department should be designed as an integral part of the college with full authority to design course selections for the students personally, and should have within it representatives of the teaching staff most knowledgeable of the outside world as well as the college. During the foundation year the students would have full access to this department and would make a decision by the end of the courses to be taken during bert does as much his' simple-minded blocking is always is development nf ere exciting oases confused ramblings There was, how- the actinn. If the play is to get off the ground at all there should be a constant awareness of the two protagonists. The characters should be portrayed with such force that their presence is always felt, whether or not they are onstage. Unfortunately this never happened. Neither James Bradford's portrayal of Grandier nor Angela Fusco's version of Sister Jeanne had the conviction that is the minimum requirement for this show.

Bradford seems to be convinced that he can get through the part on voice alone. He is blessed with a brooding baritone that has let him get away with a minimum of effort in the past. Grandier requires more than a furrowed brow and appropriate changes of volume. There is one moment in the third act when Grandier describes staying with a dying man in which Bradford gives an indication of what he is capable of doing, and how much we are missing in the rest of his performance. The moment becomes real to him, and becomes real to us. We experience the pity and disgust he feels for the 'obscene' struggle: It is the one time that Bradford breaks out of his sound barrier and becomes a human being.

Angela Fusco is just as guilty of playing for the moment. Her big "scene" comes early in the play, and we are all too aware that this is her chance. But even in this one instance, we are never provided with anything more than a nodding acquaintance of her character. A manic chortle and a strange glassy stare are all Miss Fusco allows us to see before she discreetly withdraws into herself, producing a polite indication instead of a deeply-felt portrait of horror and self-disgust that the part requires.

In the lesser roles, Charles Dennis as Laubardemont and Claire Coulter as Sister Gabrielle distinguish themselves with incisive flair. I don't know what play Henry Tarvainen thought he was in, but he was doing a very enticing portrayal of something. He may have been auditioning for J.B. Pat Saul was a little too intelligent for the part of D'Armagnac for my taste, but he served as an effective foil to what Bradford could make of Grandier.

The shape of the production technically was quite good. Murray Laufer came up with a flexible set of considerable beauty. The paint job was a little eccentric, however, as was the erratic lighting, executed by Ken Radburn. Crossfades became blackouts and scenes that were meant to melt into each other were related only by some half-hearted laughs in the dark.

Director Ebert has presented a fine production frame work, and the show should settle down after a couple of more runs at it. The script, sorry to say, will not improve. Now, if we could only have a Hart House production in which a good director like Peter Ebert can join up with a play that suits his talents, we'd have something to be proud of.

choosing. The teachers on the other hand could still keep track of the efforts of their students and treat them on an individual basis. Teachers would get personal reports from the guidance department which would outline the student's character, aims, subject selection, and time table (all such information taken by interview). Further correction and personal attention could be arranged between the students and their teachers.

In regard to accreditation or marking, the present categorical marking scheme of A-F should be discarded. There should be instituted instead a qualitative form of appraisal, possibly under the three estimations of excellent, fair and poor. Such criticism and appraisal should be open to the comment of any other teacher other than the one presiding in the course (indeed, this should be encouraged for there are as many pros as cons). Every month or so, a general meeting could be called of students of particular inclination (such as sculpture, painting, advertising, etc.) in which a critique of the students' best works within the past period may be handled by several teachers.

There would be regular meetings between the teachers and the guidance departments in order to appraise the situation and size up decisions about new courses, grievances from any direction, and to allow any interchange of ideas. Students should be welcome at these meetings. The governing council should attend at regular intervals and make its views, functions, and activities known. In effect, under such a system, the college would become a highly sophisticated organization of continuous change, renewal, discussion, clarification and elaboration.

Professionals from the outside world would be welcome to the regular meetings as their opinions and criticism would be taken to heart.

Since there would be a collection of students with diversified interests in the same class taking the same subjects, there would be a wonderful opportunity of exchanging ideas and stimulating thought. Also, as the teacher has personal files which give him keener understanding of the individual, he may give personal consideration to each student as well as general consideration to the whole class. In such a way, oriented and meaningful criticism could be given to students taking the subject for his particular reason. This type of criticism will not only create a more personal relationship between student and teacher, but will also encourage the student rather than discourage him from taking a course for general interest's sake.

And so ends my dream. Every night, before going to bed, I wish upon a star. I wonder if that goddam star will make my dream come true?

L'AFRIQUE T'ATTENT MALI - SENEGAL - COTE D'IVOIRE INTERESSE?

Chaque année, depuis 1948, WORLD UNIVERSITY SERVICE (WUS) du Canada organise un séminaire dans un pays étranger. Depuis cette époque, des séminaires eurent lieu dans les pays suivants: Allemagne, Hollande, France, Inde, Angleterre, Japon, Ghana, Yougoslavie, les Caraïbes, Israël, Suède, Pologne, Pakistan, Algérie, Chili, et Turquie.

Chaque séminaire comprend une période préparatoire où les participants doivent lire et résumer des livres, rédiger un mémoire de recherche; un programme d'orientation au Canada; des sessions d'intraduction dans le pays visité; des tournées et des visites d'institutions, d'industries, de fermes, etc. . . et, finalement, un séminaire régional où participent les délégués canadiens ainsi qu'étudiants et professeurs du pays visité.

Durant l'été, le WUS invitera étudiants et professeurs canadiens à observer les coutumes et le développement de trois pays africains que sont la Côte d'Ivoire, le Mali et le Sénégal. Environ quarante étudiants et cinq professeurs canadiens seront ainsi invités. A condition qu'un candidat valable ait été nommé, le Comité de WUS de l'Université de Toronto est assuré d'au moins la participation d'un délégué au séminaire international de 1968.

Si vous êtes choisi, votre transport aller-retour vous sera fourni de votre université au point de rassemblement à Montréal ou New York. A partir de l'assemblée jusqu'à ce que le séminaire prenne fin à Abidjan, le WUS du Canada sera responsable de votre logement et repas, voyage trans-atlantique, et voyage en Afrique.

QUALIFICATIONS:

Des conditions suivantes sont des qualifications minimales.

1. Etre citoyen Canadien par naissance ou naturalisation, ou être domicilié de façon permanente au Canada.
2. Etre étudiant universitaire depuis au moins deux ans (en Juin 1968) et retourner à la même université à titre d'étudiant à plein temps pour l'année 1968-69.
3. Maturité; qualités de chef, et avoir un excellent dossier académique.
4. Pouvoir s'exprimer facilement en français et pouvoir comprendre parfaitement cette langue. La langue française sera la seule langue utilisée au cours de ce séminaire.

Les étudiants qualifiés sont requis de poser leur candidature. Les candidats doivent obtenir, remplir, leur formule de mise en candidature avant le anze decembre. La commission des désignations siégera le quatorze decembre. On peut se procurer sa formule de mise en candidature au S.A.C. Building.

York hosts conference on Quebec

federation," he declared. As he spoke his voice showed occasional signs of strain. From time to time he would rub his palm in his left eye or light another cigarette. When he ran out of his French cigarettes, he smoked Buckingham's.

"Quebec was content when she was ignorant, but now we have the competence, the tools. For the first time now Quebec can afford to break away.

"But although we have to get out, we should find enough wisdom to remain economic partners while political neighbours."

Mr. Levesque suggested an economic union along the lines of the European Common Market, but also said Quebec was a viable economic unit on her own.

The only spokesman for the federal government was Jean-Luc Pepin, the minister of energy and mineral resources.

"I believe in a bi-cultural, fairly decentralized Canada," he said. "I believe it is possible to have two nations at peace in the bosom of a single state."

He said it was impossible to divide the economic from the political, and that Canada was richest as a single political entity.

Eric Kierans, the president of the Quebec Liberal Federation, argued for Canadian unity, saying: "Canada can build something neither of us can build alone."

He added that the economic argument was the worst to use against separatism "because as Canadians we choose every day not to join the United States."

Robert Cliche, leader of the Quebec wing of the NDP, was a hit with his audience, although he has as yet failed to win a seat in the provincial legislature.

"I applauded and laughed my head off when De Gaulle said 'Vive Quebec Libre'. Personally I'm prepared to stop looking over to France provided you stop looking over to England.

"We are not naturally united," he added, "We can find unity only in our common purpose."

Later Saturday night Mr. Gregoire and Mr. Levesque sat side by side at a press conference.

Mr. Gregoire sat calmly, with his feet crossed at the ankles. He has a solid face which occasionally relaxes into a toothy smile. Balding, greying, Mr. Levesque looks something like a weary Ilya Kuryakin.

"It's a wastage of energy," said Mr. Levesque. "Quebec will keep demanding more and more. Except for the fear of change, Quebec could become a dynamic, progressive country."

He nodded his assent as Mr. Gregoire evaded a question about the possible leadership of an independence party.

"It is up to the supporters of our movement for political sovereignty to decide the eldership," said Mr. Levesque. This time Mr. Gregoire nodded.

"This is the first time I've met Mr. Gregoire since I left the Liberal Party," said Mr. Levesque coyly.

But Mr. Gregoire was more aggressive.

"Men of goodwill can reach an understanding," he said. "I don't see any major policy differences between us." His eyes were hard, and sparkled under the TV lights. Mr. Levesque has turquoise eyes too, but they're duller softer.

"I would prefer to second someone else as a leader," Mr. Gregoire admitted after further questioning.

Vic's Barefoot' enjoys busy beginning

A new coffee house with the comfortable name of Barefoot After Hours opened Friday night in Wymilwood's Terrace Room at Victoria College.

About the only thing different from its more affluent counterparts north of Bloor St. are the prices. The Barefoot's are much lower. Everything else — the smokey room, dim lights and folk music — is there.

And crowds! People lined up from the 11 p.m. opening until well after midnight Friday and the house was about three-quarters full for most of Saturday evening.

The Barefoot is being run under the auspices of the Vic student council, the Wymilwood house committee and a special coffee house committee. Its operating budget is supplied by the Victoria College Union Council.

Manager Geoff Brooks (II Vic) described the operation as "non-profit, run by students." Talent will be drawn from the Vic Folk Club and from campus-wide auditions.

Doug Long (IV Vic) provided the folk music for the opening. He was ably backed by Andy MacRae (III Vic) on guitar and John Gosselin (II Vic) on bass. Eleanor Aitken (III Vic) joined Doug for several songs both nights.

Although the group was hampered by sound system difficulties the audience indicated they would be glad to see them back any time.

The traditional cafeteria tables were disguised under plain white paper tablecloths. Patrons were invited to express their artistic talents on the paper. The best efforts will be displayed in Wymilwood during the week.

The idea of a coffee house was incorporated in VCUC President Glen Brownlee's (IV Vic) election platform last year. The aim is to provide a meeting place for resident and city students and to make Vic more than just an academic institution.

VCUC member Steve Grant (I Vic) said last night that he was "really pleased" with the opening. "We've had lots of offers from people who want to perform."

The Barefoot After Hours is open to all university students every Friday and Saturday night from 11 p.m. to 2 a.m.

Mickities serenade the Stock Exchange

By ANNE BOODY

Bay Street barons were given a lesson in how to succeed in business Friday morning by about 50 eager St. Michael's College students.

Burdened with posters, cameras, flowers and a red carpet, the cast of Mickities' annual production—How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying—staged a sit-out in front of the Toronto Stock Exchange.

"We love Toronto Business," Barry McGee told reporters.

"We aren't sitting in—we're sitting out. The last thing we want is to get in anyone's way."

McGee (III SMC) is co-producer of How to Succeed, which opens Thursday for a three-day run at the Ryerson theatre with the highest budget of any campus production.

The crowd drew the attention of not only local newspapers, but Toronto police.

Suspicious-looking officers circled about apparently ex-

A Mickities' cost member couldn't resist pinning a flower on one of Toronto's finest.

"If I can't take my coffee break . . . something within me dies."

Police suspected picket line

pecting an eruption of contempt from disgruntled citizens in view of the current inflation crisis.

"We were afraid that this was a picket line," one remarked.

Instead, the police were honored along with the big wheels of the exchange. Smiling gay maidens greeted them individually with fresh flowers and a "bon chance" for the day.

As employees approached, they were serenaded into the building with songs from the show.

But when one man came out instead of going in the chorus immediately broke forth with It's Been a Long Day. Later, when he reappeared, I've Returned filled the air.

Three blushing secretaries dared step out. Gentlemen, a Secretary is Not a Toy, sang Stan Morris, the male lead in the musical.

A young woman seeing the "mob" approached anyway. In the middle of the crowd she seemed to lose her self-control:

"Let me out" she screamed, "let me out for heaven's sake."

Two Brinks trucks pulled up alongside the curb. Where Will I Find the Treasure, pealed forth the group.

A march into the visitor's gallery was planned for 10 a.m. But someone spoiled the fun.

Twelve students were allowed to go up only on the condition that none of the posters or songs went with them.

With that the group left to sing for subway passengers.

Carleton Council recommends reform

OTTAWA (Special)—Carleton University students will participate in their university's government next year if their senate agrees to implement proposals submitted by the students' council last week.

Council recommendations call for reform of university government based on last year's Duff-Berdahl report on Canadian university government.

Student participation is advocated in all governing bodies of the university from the department level to the board of governors.

In an opinion poll of 600 Carleton students conducted earlier this year, the students favored students' representatives on the Senate and the board of governors by a ratio of five to one.

the Ontario Public Service recognizes the U in opportunity

Paralleling the dramatic changes in the Province of Ontario in recent years, and often directly responsible for them, are continuing developments in government planned to keep pace with the dynamic growth of the province.

To maintain its up-front position, the Ontario Public Service must continually bring in new, young personnel with fresh ideas.

As an employer, the Ontario Public Service offers salaries equal to those of private employment; self-development programs and professional advancement; excellent vacation and other fringe benefits.

For the new graduate who wants to be involved in decision making and formulating public policy at an early stage in his career, government employment holds the answer.

It's an amazing era in which we live. A career with the Ontario Public Service will make you an important part of it.

Campus interviews of interest to graduates and undergraduates in ARTS and SCIENCE will be conducted:

Waterpolo Blues win opener

By AQUAE PUER

Varsity Waterpolo Blues fought off a late rally by the McGill Redmen in the opening contest of the Herschorn Cup Playoffs Saturday to win 17-11.

After only 57 seconds of the first quarter, Varsity was on the Scoreboard 1-0, as Bruce Warhurton converted a pass from Chris McNaught. Later, McNaught rifled the ball into the lower right corner to put Varsity up 2-0.

McGill countered quickly with a four-man attack, and before Toronto could adjust its defense, forward Glen Reuter blazed one by netman Hartley Garfield to put McGill on the scoreboard 2-1, with two minutes remaining in the first quarter.

An intercepted pass by Steve Gerring initiated another of the many power plays used by Toronto to take advantage of McGill miscues.

A quick pass to Gerring, a relay to Pyle. Pyle and Stratton again outspint their defenders. Pyle passes to McNaught and McNaught rifles his second shot. Add a goal by Alan Pyle and Toronto leads at the quarter 4-1.

The game seemed destined to be a rout as Gerring and Skip Bergman intercepted passes and scuttled the Redmen offensive. Pyle and Stratton dominated the centre pool with their constant breaking and play making, and McNaught and Warburton placed withering shots in the corners.

At half time Toronto led 10-3. And midway through the third quarter, 14-4. Even Blues coach and former Hungarian star Eddie Szakacs was reported to have been pleased.

But as often occurs in waterpolo, the game can and did completely reverse itself in a matter of seconds.

The McGill offense came alive, breaking in with three and four men on power plays, putting the 350 spectators on the edges of their seats as McGill dominated play.

Gabor Zinner and Glen Reuter each put in two more goals and cut Varsity's lead to 14-11 before the Blues' could regain the initiative.

Although the final score showed that Toronto had the upper hand throughout most of the game, McGill took advantage of the Blues late game lapse and never gave up. The intense rivalry between these two teams for the Herschorn Cup showed up in the penalty department with both teams incessantly indulging in subsurface skirmishes.

The second game of the playoffs will be at Hart House, Saturday, Dec. 9.

Excitement in women's sport

By JOAN STEVENSON

The regular season in women's interfaculty basketball came to an exciting close as playoff herths were not decided until the final games of the schedule.

A valiant group from St. Mikes made a gallant bid for post-season honours but fell short by the margin of two missed baskets.

As the two-game total points quarterfinals commence, PHE D led by Karen Empey will try to contain Violet Shadd and her high-flying Medsgirls.

It's impossible to predict the outcome of VIC II against POTS B as both squads can swish the basket from anywhere on the floor.

In the third playoff pairing, PHE G sparked by Hilda Faye have drawn the dubious honour of hantling high-scoring Pharmacy and its scoring champion, Joan Farquharson.

Hockey books on sale today at 10:00 a.m. at Hart House

"Who organized this mess? demanded the disgruntled, dishevelled Dentsman.

"Nobody!" screamed a frustrated engineer, as he hurtled his horrendous hulk into the midst of the milo milling mob.

The scene was stately Sigsam library way back one September morning as a few million U of T students (give or take a few million . . . U of T . . . students) were striving separately, in the face of abominable anarchy, to gather unto themselves those precious hooks of hockey tickets which (hallowed by thy name) "admit owner to a Student Section seat at Varsity Arena upon surrender of the appropriate coupon at Entrance No. 1 on the West Side of the Arena."

Eventually chaos entered into order when the sale was removed to Varsity Stadium. However by three o'clock nary a shiny ducat remained, and sad was the sombre student who arrived late.

But smile on, sad sombre student! Today you have your chance to recoup. Starting at ten o'clock this morning in the Athletic Office at Hart House, an additional 1500 hockey tickets are going on sale.

They will be sold in proportion to faculty, so Food Science people best not tarry. And, in a very wise move, no more than three ATL cards may be presented by one person, and each ATL card will be worth only two books. Last September, if you remember ("try to remember that time in September"), sales reached ridiculous heights as students with a cool hundred smackers on them would present about thirty ATL cards on behalf of all their friends and sundry. Tickets are $3.00 for a brace of books man.

Alberta's defensive heat too much for Waring

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Alberta Golden Bears came up with an antidote for Mac quarterback Dick Waring Saturday, and its stern application provided them with a 10-9 victory over Marauders in the third annual College Bowl played at Varsity Stadium.

Faced with Waring's redoubtable cool, Alberta merely applied lots of heat. It worked to abundance as Waring wilted disparagingly under a red-hot pass rush, completing less than half his passes and blowing the game in the final ninety seconds with a horrible toss straight at Bear's John Wilson on the Alberta eight yard line.

Wilson was the resolute anchor of an extremely tough Alberta defense. He intercepted two passes from his middle guard position, completely throttled Mac's all-star fullback, John Watson, and barred Waring on innumerable occasions.

The Ted Morris trophy for the game's most valuable player went to versatile Bear, Val Schneider, but Wilson was the big man.

Waring's faux pas, for which he was savagely second-guessed once it turned out so miserably, came after Mac had driven to Bear's 17, with the ball right in front of the beckoning goalposts. Instead of playing safe for a winning field goal or at the very least a single point to send the game into overtime, Waring elected to throw on first down. As Alberta's front four charged, Waring threw hurriedly into Wilson's waiting arms. With only fifty seconds remaining, the Mac groove groggily ground to a halt. In the quiet dressing room after the game, Waring could only shake his head and mumble "no comment."

As many had predicted the game was predominantly a defensive struggle, which would to excitement only in the closing moments, Alberta took control of the game right from the opening kickoff but could not convert their mastery into seven points until late in the first quarter. Quarterback Terry Lampert, who had his shaky moments during the afternoon, sped over the goal-line from six yards out. Dave Benbow's convert made it 7-0.

Mac stolidly moved to even the score only five plays later, aided by a very questionable pass interference call which nullified an Alberta interception. Speedster Jay Graydon, Marauders' top threat throughout the game, caught a Dick Waring pass for a beautiful 26 yd. touchdown play. The convert by Greg McQueen knotted the contest 7-7 with only 25 seconds gone in the second quarter.

Mac took the lead for the first time four minutes into the third quarter on a 40 yd. single by Tom Allan. They upped their margin to 9-7 when Cass Quinn missed an 18 yd. field goal two minutes later, following an interception by McQueen. That one point instead of three loomed large in the final analysis.

The next three plays provided intrigue for the spectators. Bears fumbled, Mac recovered; Mac fumbled, Bears recovered; Bears then threw an interception. The ball seemed as unpopular as a white man at Stokely Carmichael's birthday bash.

The ultimate fumble which gave Alberta their winning points came at the end of the quarter when Mac's John Watson, at his own 38 let loose into the grasp of Big Bob Baumbach. A short drive ensued, then faltered, and Benbow kicked the important field goal from the 18 yd. line, making the score 10-9, where it ended.

Ice Blues (yawn) still winning

By PHIL BINGLEY

MONTREAL—A few new faces, a few new wrinkles, but the beat goes on—the winning beat of Varsity Blues. Blues opened their Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League season with an 11-3 bombing of Laval Rouge et Or on Friday night and then whipped McGill Redmen 7-1 on Saturday.

Blues, who opened the schedule with three rookies among their lineup, showed all the skating and finesse which has made them the best intercollegiate hockey team in the country during the past two years. Although only the defense pairing of Peter Speyer and Jim Miles along with goaltender John Wrigley remain intact from last year's lineup, coach Tom Watt appears to have found the keys to a strong scoring attack and a tough defensive setup.

Best example for the new Blues is left winger Bob McClelland. While small in stature, McClelland, who played centre last season, showed all the moves of a Lionel Conacher as he had four goals—two in each game—to become the team's top scorer.

Doug Jones, playing his first league games as a starting defenseman, also came up with a strong performance. Usually noted for his hitting ability rather than his goal scoring, Jones found the Quebec climate to his liking as he hit for a single tally in each contest and played well on defense to boot.

While both Jones and McClelland performed extremely well, it would be unfair to overshadow them over the rest of the players. Blues came up with solid efforts in both games and could have had more goals than they did in either contest.

At McGill, Blues jumped into a 3-0 lead at the end of twenty minutes with Gord Cunningham, McClelland, and Ward Passi scoring. From then on they coasted as Cunningham, McClelland, Doug Jones and Peter Speyer completed the scoring for Varsity and Jack Walker garnered Redmen's only tally.

John Wrigley made two or untracked it was simply no contest. They counted six unanswered second period goals—four within a span of less than three minutes—and then added three more during the final twenty minutes.

Bob McClelland, Paul Laurent and Ward Passi each had a pair to lead the way. Peter Speyer, Paul McCann, Bob Hamilton, Gord Cunningham and Doug Jones had Blues' other Markers while Yvon Gagnon, Marcel LaPointe and Jean Rioux countered for Laval.

Speyer and Brian St. John each set up three goals to lead the playmakers.

Another feature of the weekend trip was the play of the line of Mike Riddell, Paul McCann and St. John. Although held to one goal in all, they skated well and played strong defensive hockey.

AROUND THE NET ...

Blues came out of the weekend without any serious casualties. Only injury was a bruised foot suffered by Ward Passi when he stopped a hard shot while playing defense in the Laval game ... Varsity scored four goals while they were playing short-handed against Laval ... The penalty killing of Murray Stroud and Bob McClelland was superb in the two games ... Blues now get a rest from travel for a couple of weeks. After three straight week-ends on the road, they host Queen's Golden Gaels on Friday night at Varsity Arena ... Don't forget ticket sales for the Blues — NHL old-timers begin tomorrow morning at 9:30 a.m. at Hart House and Varsity Arena. All tickets for this game are one dollar.

DOUG JONES

three saves that bordered on the unbelievable. On one occasion he kicked out a blistering point blank shot to the bottom right hand corner of the goal right after a faceoff to the left of the net.

On Friday, Blues got off to a slow start against Laval and came out of the first period tied at 2-2. The traveling involved to get to Quebec seemed to leave the visitors tired as they appeared leg-weary during that initial frame.

However, once Varsity got

Faulkner will announce resignation to SAC tonight

Some time after 7 p.m. tonight, Tom Faulkner will stand before the Students Administrative Council and offer his resignation. This relatively simple act will spark a series of events described as "structurally difficult" by David Nitkin (111 New) of the elections committee.

The election machinery should be no problem, says Nitkin, because it was set out last year by SAC.

"Copies of the election rules will be available from 9 a.m. Wednesday in the SAC office," he said. "However, the council will have to approve them before they become official."

"We didn't have to use the new rules last year because Faulkner was the only candidate," he added.

Basically, the rules are simple:

- Each candidate must be nominated by 100 students.
- The candidate must be a fee-paying student.
- Each candidate must make a deposit of $20 with his nomination, which is returned if he receives at least a third of the number of votes received by the winning candidate.

- Each candidate will be provided with $150 of SAC funds for his campaign.
- Nominations will start 9 a.m. Thursday, Nov. 30 and close 5 p.m., Tuesday, Dec. 5.
- Campaigning is to begin 9 a.m. Wednesday, Dec. 6, and will close 5 p.m. Wednesday, Dec. 13.
- The election will be held from 8:30 a.m. to 6 p.m. Thursday, Dec. 14.

The new rules will not affect Faulkner if he decides to run. He is enrolled in the school of graduate studies and holds an ATL card.

"The election committee tried to schedule everything as conveniently as possible," said Nitkin, "but of course we had to hurry it up a bit because term ends on Dec. 20."

"It poses a tremendous problem because the next election will have to be held a couple of months after we come back in January.

"Structurally, it's going to be difficult," Nitkin continued, "because it's not much time for all the students to hear all the issues. Personally, I would favor an election committee which had the power to call an all-candidates meeting — at Hart House, for example — so that students would have an opportunity to see the candidates."

"But the elections committee feels we should remain impartial."

Nitkin said there might be a "severe problem" getting people to man the ballot boxes Dec. 14. Most students will be rushing to complete essays or study for tests.

"However, there is some concern over this issue, so we may be all right," he said.

Nitkin has heard rumors that as many as four persons may run for SAC president.

"If so, it would be a real strain on the budget, especially when we have to run another election in March."

Arts and Science faculty council wants student representatives

Students may soon be sitting on the arts and science faculty council, Associate Dean Hallett announced yesterday.

A recommendation passed Monday by the council calls for 16 student representatives to be selected as council members.

The resolution recommends that students be drawn from various student-staff committees into electoral colleges. The electoral colleges then would meet as a body to elect the council representatives.

The difficulty, Dean Hallett pointed out, is that the University Act does not allow for such student representation. It is up to the board of governors, therefore, to change the Act on the council's recommendation.

The council, Dean Hallett said, is acting on the assumption that the board of governors will comply. The council hopes to approach the student-faculty committees now being formed for the names of students elected to the electoral colleges by next February.

The council declared that the presence of students on faculty councils could be beneficial to the academic health of the faculty, especially on curriculum committees.

Student representatives on the council, Dean Hallett explained, would be eligible to serve on all council committees.

Anti-complicity campaign on campus

By DAVE FRANK

Plans are underway to launch a broad-based campaign against alleged campus complicity in the Vietnam war.

"Some sort of loose alliance" was the objective Monday afternoon as participants in last week's sit-in at the Placement Service met with members of half a dozen established groups.

"We may have diverse outlooks," said one student, "but there are issues on which we have common feeling."

But for two hours the 50 students couldn't decide whether to talk about issues or tactics. Attendance dwindled until only 20 were left, most of them sit-in participants.

"The Dow sit-in was a beginning step in ending campus complicity in the war," said Marlie Ritchie (III Vic), one of its organizers. "If Dow comes back in January, we should have not 100, but 500 protestors.

"We have to build mass student support."

Volunteers were signed up to look into the research being done at the university to see if any of it was connected with the war.

There was a general feeling that the upcoming Students Administrative Council presidential election would be fought on the issue of whether SAC should take moral decisions. Several students indicated they would work to re-elect Tom Faulkner, who is resigning but seeking re-election.

But F. Paul Fromm (II SMC), chairman of the campus Edmund Burke Society, challenged SAC's right to get involved in political questions.

"The next step will be the impeachment of individual SAC reps," he predicted.

"Why don't you run for president yourself," was the suggestion of one of the laughing students.

Charlton: the student who wants Faulkner's job

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

"I am a student," says Bill Charlton, SAC presidential candidate.

Charlton believes that the president of the Students Administrative Council should be a student and not a full-time paid executive like Tom Faulkner.

Faulkner is expected to announce his resignation tonight in response to a petition that has been circulated by the Ad Hoc Committee for Representative Student Government.

Charlton, who announced his candidacy Sunday evening, wants to meet Faulkner in an open debate before the election, which will likely fall on Thursday Dec. 14.

Charlton wants the debate to be held in the evening in Convocation Hall.

"I don't want to go on a noon-hour common room crawl with Faulkner. He's got the time for that; I've got courses to worry about."

(Faulkner is registered in the school of graduate studies and takes one course.)

Most people in law are careful to keep themselves away from too many extra-curricular activities.

But Charlton, a second-year student in law, is an exception.

He is editor of the Law School weekly newspaper, The Advocate, and pays his way through school by leading tutorials on British and American government and by holding a donship at New College.

While Charlton has never been a member of SAC, he has been active in student affairs for some time. This is his eighth consecutive year as a university student.

He graduated from political science and economics in 1964 and received an MA in philosophy, politics and economics from Oxford in 1966.

Bill Charlton is a big man — over six feet tall, 210 pounds, but he doesn't talk like a football player.

He is known in debating

Independence is inevitable: Lapierre

"Quebec is too poor not to separate," Laurier Lapierre declared Monday.

"A guy who makes $2,500 a year hasn't much to lose," he said. "Quebec's economic situation is an indictment against the whole system."

Mr. Lapierre, a vice-president of the national NDP, professor at McGill University and former co-host of This Hour Has Seven Days, was delivering a campus address on Quebec in Conflict.

"There is no doubt that independence is inevitable for Quebec and this means breaking up your country," he warned.

He said he did not advocate separatism as a solution, but was pessimistic about the future of a united Canada. "We are buying time because we are only part of the American destiny, anyway."

Mr. Lapierre said little progress has been made in the past 100 years in promoting the rights of French Canadians.

"It took a century to get grade 1 education in French in Manitoba. In another hundreds years we'll have grade 2."

"It is a sad commentary on the system that I speak in my own country as an immigrant . . . The minority complex must disappear . . . People are culturally assassinated every day."

.... Mr. Lapierre called for a rewrite of the BNA Act. "The educational clauses were meant to protect English Protestants, not the French," he said.

"Although the calibre of recent French representatives in Ottawa has improved there has been no increase in their political power."

"We want co-presidency over our own destiny, but this cannot be achieved within the present framework," Mr. Lapierre said.

"It is better to be a free man in your own house than a parasite in another's."

Engineer Goodman resigns from SAC

Sheldon Goodman (IV APSC) has resigned from the Students Administrative Council over its action last week declaring companies "complicit" in the Vietnam war not welcome on campus.

Goodman, in his second year on SAC, sent his formal letter of resignation yesterday to President Tom Faulkner. "It was apparent from the debate during the Placement Service question at the SAC meeting of Nov. 22 that this council is quite willing to curtail individual students' freedom to gain a specific end."

Goodman felt SAC had not only limited the freedom of companies wishing to recruit on campus, but also the freedom of a number of students.

The draft-dodger debate was yet another indication of the failure of SAC to represent popular student opinions, he said. "Seventy-five per cent of the student body was in disagreement with the resolution to support draft dodgers; 95 per cent of the engineering faculty was against it also."

He said his resignation will give him more time to visit engineers and instigate engineering opinions on various issues that arise around campus.

"On SAC I was only a voting body and not very effective. My vote could never swing the decisions of SAC."

While Goodman said Faulkner was a good administrator, he believed Faulkner had done the right thing in resigning.

"He was the only one they could remove from office. I'd like to see more representatives resign."

"At last people are becoming aware of who their representatives are. It is too bad they feel they have to impeach them, but at least they are taking an interest in the affairs of SAC."

Another APSC representative will be elected as soon as an election can be called. "It will probably be in about two weeks," Goodman said.

He said he had heard rumors that other SAC reps were thinking of submitting their resignations.

Quality of education not good: Bossin

By KATHY BARCZA

The education commission of the Students Administrative Council will present a revolutionary four-point educational program at the SAC meeting tonight.

Bob Bossin, education commissioner said the series of resolutions is concerned with "the quality of education generally — and the quality ain't good."

The main motion will call for the adoption of a Canadian Union of Students motion entitled Student-Centred Teaching. This motion is based on the assumption that "the goal of education in a democratic society should be to assist students to become individuals."

It goes on to say, "learning must therefore be a process of self-enhancement in which the individual learns because he wants to learn, not because of coercion. The student must have ultimate responsibility for his own education.

It also calls for a program aimed at reform of "the classroom situation in the educational system," with its goal, "a situation in which the professor acts as a resource person, honestly presenting alternatives at the outset of the course leaving the situation open for the students to determine, in conjunction with him, the form of the course, its content, the method of instruction and the method of evaluation to be employed."

"It is on this crucial point," said Bossin, "that the Macpherson report is quiet."

The second motion will recommend the establishment of a summer high-school program on campus for under-privileged students who can't identify with their present system of education.

The third motion will call for the setting-up of an experimental educational program at Tartu College, the residence administered by the SAC.

"Hopefully," said Bossin, "this experiment in education will prove to be more relevant than much of what is offered at U of T."

The fourth motion will recommend that the university accept no scholarship funds above $150. It says that the money is urgently needed elsewhere and that academic merit may be rewarded in other ways.

Bossin pointed out the educational significance of the commission's report.

"I really believe nobody here is satisfied with the system as it exists. But most people accept it, because they aren't aware of any alternatives."

A sunny late fall Saturday afternoon and where are the U of T students? Not watching football games, or watching TV or even watching girls . . . instead all are keenly flocking to where the action is — Sigmund Samuel library, of course.

Anti-Faulkner petition signed by 1600

The petition asking for the removal of Students Council President Tom Faulkner has received more than 1,600 signatures.

The petition, was still being circulated yesterday, although Faulkner has already announced his intention to resign at tonight's SAC meeting.

Ron Thompson (IV APSC), a member of the committee that organized the petition, said that since Faulkner's resignation had not yet been accepted by SAC, the petition is still valid.

Faulkner had said he would resign if a petition endorsed by 1,500 students censured him.

The petition objects to "the general trend council is taking towards alienating itself from students," said Thompson.

"The council is being asked to impeach Faulkner by a two-thirds vote because he is the president of SAC and he is the only council member to run on a cross-campus basis."

The organizers of the petition at the faculty of law, where 150 of 423 students signed the petition yesterday, expressed doubts that Faulkner would really resign.

"We believe he just said it to slow the petition," said a student.

Faulkner will have a chance to explain his position today when he speaks to the general meeting of the engineering society at noon in Convocation Hall.

The meeting, originally scheduled to discuss changes in the society constitution now will likely offer a forum for dialogue between Faulkner and some of his more vocal constituents.

Independence is inevitable: Lapierre

"Quebec is too poor not to separate," Laurier Lapierre declared Monday.

"A guy who makes $2,500 a year hasn't much to lose," he said. "Quebec's economic situation is an indictment against the whole system."

Mr. Lapierre, a vice-president of the national NDP, professor at McGill University and former co-host of This Hour Has Seven Days, was delivering a campus address on Quebec in Conflict.

"There is no doubt that independence is inevitable for Quebec and this means breaking up your country," he warned.

He said he did not advocate separatism as a solution, but was pessimistic about the future of a united Canada. "We are buying time because we are only part of the American destiny, anyway."

Mr. Lapierre said little progress has been made in the past 100 years in promoting the rights of French Canadians.

"It took a century to get grade 1 education in French in Manitoba. In another hundreds years we'll have grade 2."

"It is a sad commentary on the system that I speak in my own country as an immigrant . . . The minority complex must disappear . . . People are culturally assassinated every day."

.... Mr. Lapierre called for a rewrite of the BNA Act. "The educational clauses were meant to protect English Protestants, not the French," he said.

"Although the calibre of recent French representatives in Ottawa has improved there has been no increase in their political power."

"We want co-presidency over our own destiny, but this cannot be achieved within the present framework," Mr. Lapierre said.

"It is better to be a free man in your own house than a parasite in another's."

Engineer Goodman resigns from SAC

Sheldon Goodman (IV APSC) has resigned from the Students Administrative Council over its action last week declaring companies "complicit" in the Vietnam war not welcome on campus.

Goodman, in his second year on SAC, sent his formal letter of resignation yesterday to President Tom Faulkner: "It was apparent from the debate during the Placement Service question at the SAC meeting of Nov. 22 that this council is quite willing to curtail individual students' freedom to gain a specific end."

Goodman felt SAC had not only limited the freedom of companies wishing to recruit on campus, but also the freedom of a number of students.

The draft-dodger debate was yet another indication of the failure of SAC to represent popular student opinions, he said. "Seventy-five per cent of the student body was in disagreement with the resolution to support draft dodgers; 95 per cent of the engineering faculty was against it also."

He said his resignation will give him more time to visit engineers and instigate engineering opinions on various issues that arise around campus.

"On SAC I was only a voting body and not very effective. My vote could never swing the decisions of SAC."

While Goodman said Faulkner was a good administrator, he believed Faulkner had done the right thing in resigning.

"He was the only one they could remove from office. I'd like to see more representatives resign."

"At last people are becoming aware of who their representatives are. It is too bad they feel they have to impeach them, but at least they are taking an interest in the affairs of SAC."

Another APSC representative will be elected as soon as an election can be called. "It will probably be in about two weeks," Goodman said.

He said he had heard rumors that other SAC reps were thinking of submitting their resignations.

Quality of education not good: Bossin

By KATHY BARCZA

The education commission of the Students Administrative Council will present a revolutionary four-point educational program at the SAC meeting tonight.

Bob Bossin, education commissioner said the series of resolutions is concerned with "the quality of education generally — and the quality ain't good."

The main motion will call for the adoption of a Canadian Union of Students motion entitled Student-Centred Teaching. This motion is based on the assumption that "the goal of education in a democratic society should be to assist students to become individuals."

It goes on to say, "learning must therefore be a process of self-enhancement in which the individual learns because he wants to learn, not because of coercion. The student must have ultimate responsibility for his own education.

It also calls for a program aimed at reform of "the classroom situation in the educational system," with its goal, "a situation in which the professor acts as a resource person, honestly presenting alternatives at the outset of the course leaving the situation open for the students to determine, in conjunction with him, the form of the course, its content, the method of instruction and the method of evaluation to be employed."

"It is on this crucial point," said Bossin, "that the Macpherson report is quiet."

The second motion will recommend the establishment of a summer high-school program on campus for under-privileged students who can't identify with their present system of education.

The third motion will call for the setting-up of an experimental educational program at Tartu College, the residence administered by the SAC.

"Hopefully," said Bossin, "this experiment in education will prove to be more relevant than much of what is offered at U of T."

The fourth motion will recommend that the university accept no scholarship funds above $150. It says that the money is urgently needed elsewhere and that academic merit may be rewarded in other ways.

Bossin pointed out the educational significance of the commission's report.

"I really believe nobody here is satisfied with the system as it exists. But most people accept it, because they aren't aware of any alternatives."

A sunny late fall Saturday afternoon and where are the U of T students? Not watching football games, or watching TV or even watching girls . . . instead all are keenly flocking to where the action is — Sigmund Samuel library, of course.

Anti-Faulkner petition signed by 1600

The petition asking for the removal of Students Council President Tom Faulkner has received more than 1,600 signatures.

The petition, was still being circulated yesterday, although Faulkner has already announced his intention to resign at tonight's SAC meeting.

Ron Thompson (IV APSC), a member of the committee that organized the petition, said that since Faulkner's resignation had not yet been accepted by SAC, the petition is still valid.

Faulkner had said he would resign if a petition endorsed by 1,500 students censured him.

The petition objects to "the general trend council is taking towards alienating itself from students," said Thompson.

"The council is being asked to impeach Faulkner by a two-thirds vote because he is the president of SAC and he is the only council member to run on a cross-campus basis."

The organizers of the petition at the faculty of law, where 150 of 423 students signed the petition yesterday, expressed doubts that Faulkner would really resign.

"We believe he just said it to slow the petition," said a student.

Faulkner will have a chance to explain his position today when he speaks to the general meeting of the engineering society at noon in Convocation Hall.

The meeting, originally scheduled to discuss changes in the society constitution now will likely offer a forum for dialogue between Faulkner and some of his more vocal constituents.

SAC and moral issues

One of the chief characteristics of campus politics is its lack of permanence. There are really no precedents, much as some of the more wily politicians try to use them.

In campus politics, issues do not carry over; they start over.

Thus, we again find the campus in the midst of a debate and election centering around the right (or non-right) of the Students' Administrative Council to pass resolutions on moral issues.

Those looking for precedents may look back to the great SAC South Africa debate during the fall of 1964, when because of a successful motion by council, SAC advocated a boycott of South African goods.

The campus controversy that motion stirred up was similar to the current one—except those who objected to SAC's action also denied the council the power to pass resolutions on political and "large issues." Presumably "large" means complicated or controversial.

Most everybody agreed at that time that South Africa by following a policy of apartheid was violating basic human rights and should therefore be censured and economically boycotted.

Then the division. Some people, the most famous was a SAC representative from Trinity College, said SAC shouldn't concern itself with that at all. Others said, yes, South Africa is wrong but SAC shouldn't do anything—SAC action would be on the basis of a moral decision that the council has no right to make for U of T students.

Other campus councils agreed with SAC's action but not all with SAC's methods. The Student Medical Society said less-clear issues, such as Medicare or unilateral disarmament, would find divided campus opinion and, therefore, SAC should always operate on the basis of a referendum when they come up.

The Victoria College student council said SAC has an obligation to take stands on moral issues but should have done more education on the South African matter before voting on it.

The UC Literary and Athletic Society gave a blanket endorsement while the Engineering Society approved of SAC taking a moral stand on that issue.

Sound familiar? The same debate right down the line. Moral issues; SAC as a representative body; everything.

The Medical Society resolution referred to above was most accurate in the problem it pointed out. South Africa, yes everyone agrees on that, but wait till you come to an issue people don't agree on. Then all your precedents fall apart.

Or, turned around somewhat this means: "SAC can take moral stands as long as these stands are non-controversial and we agree with them." That's really the underlying thinking here, isn't it? Yours, ours, theirs...

Therefore resolutions on discrimination in housing offered to students are fine. Resolutions on draft-dodgers or Dow Chemical are not.

All this may be pretty straightforward stuff but some of the discussions on this upcoming SAC-president election miss this altogether.

Tom Faulkner, for instance, feels if he wins the election the students will have given him a mandate to let the council act on social and moral issues. A victory for him will give him nothing of the sort. Wait until the next moral issue comes up and see.

Some people say that a win for Bill Charlton will deprive SAC of any rights its members think it might have to legislate on social and moral issues. This is also incorrect.

The SAC president is one member of council. There are more than 50 others. The 50 others this year have voted on moral issues and there is no reason to assume that this election will change that.

The simple fact that many people have failed to grasp is that recent resolutions passed by council are the result of a democratic vote following a debate. Whether the result comes out with a liberal or a conservative tinge depends on the group character of the council. Next year, for instance, it is very likely there will be a reaction and council will become more conservative. It depends on the new members elected.

SAC, in trying to represent such diverse political opinions as we find on this campus and such diverse interests as the Engineers and the Ph.D. student, will probably always encounter the current type of controversy when it acts on moral issues.

This fact alone means that it will probably never be very effective on such action. But people shouldn't go all the way back and say that means the council has no right to speak up on these issues. It has as much a right and an obligation as every other individual and organization has.

But, given that the inevitable controversy will probably always put a check on SAC's effectiveness in these areas, a separate, well-organized student action, group's necessary. In it the person sincerely interested in acting on controversial issues can be accommodated because the organization will have to represent no one but himself and others like him.

LETTERS

enemy of the student

Sir:

In my last letter I talked about responsibility and the student. I can now pinpoint 26 of the most irresponsible students on campus — the 24 who voted for SAC's double blow at freedom and the 2 who abstained and thus did not help vote it down. The motion passed last Wednesday attempts to hinder the United States in their defense of the freedom of the South Vietnamese people, and, striking closer to home, attempts to limit the students' right to use the Placement Service. This hurts the Engineer more than anyone from any other faculty, because it is the Engineer who makes the most use of the service. Furthermore, it attempts to force a moral decision on those (like me) who may be totally opposed to it. SAC has NO right to do that, no matter how many of the student body support the view. I do not know what SAC-Almighty thinks it is, but I am beginning to look on it as the enemy of the student, rather than his champion, a feeling started when they disbanded the Blue and White Society, thus eliminating the one thing that ties the student body together into a university, and compounded when they pushed for aid for the TADM in spite of student opposition (a drive which was defeated). Because of this anti-student trend, I am supporting the move to impeach Mr. Faulkner, and I urge all others to support it. Let's try to convert SAC into an organization which acts in the best interests of the student. In conclusion, let me say that neither I nor any other Engineer intend to have any moral decision pressed on us, nor do we intend to have our chances for summer or permanent employment jeopardized by a renegade organization drunk in the false assumption that it can and may do anything. I propose that the Engineering Society provide facilities to any organization unable to find them through the Placement Service because of their connection with the Vietnamese war. This will assure everyone the right to make up their own mind on whether or not to reply to a company on the grounds of what they produce.

Roderick A. L. Ross (II APSC)

reorganize sac structure

Sir:

The structure of SAC does not appear to be ideal in tune with the plurality of views on the campus in regard to political and moral issues. A more democratic structure seems to be in demand as SAC steps beyond the uninteresting and apathy-inducing campus functions. Moreover, the president seems to be at odds with the council; this is the focal point of campus discussion and the recent petition to dislodge Faulkner.

It seems to me that the president should speak either as a spokesman for the viewpoint of the representative council or as an individual divorced from this position; any other ground seems untenable. No single viewpoint should overshadow a democratic one when representation of a campus-wide standpoint is considered. The ambivalence seems to lie in the fact that the President is elected by a popular mandate. Does this not create confusion?

Furthermore, a closer link between SAC reps and the opinions of the students they represent needs to be established. As in the Draft-Dodger case, referendums on important political and moral issues must take place. Being a monolithic body of representatives as SAC now stands, a slate of people with only one viewpoint could control policy direction. With the recent concern for Faulkner's position, the problem, however obscured, has been felt by the students, and not just the Engineers and Law students. The only alternative to referendum on these issues is the more difficult structure of party politics.

George A. Godwin (U.C. Mod. Hist. IV)

demonstrate on own time

Sir:

The right of the staff and student body of this University to demonstrate was recognized (as indeed it should have been) and admirably respected by those involved in the Dow controversy; on the other hand, the conduct of many of those involved in the demonstration cannot be condoned. After Mr. David Hemblen had called upon the demonstrators to engage in "civil disobedience" and exercise their right to enter a public University building, that group proceeded to deny the same right to others; at the same time the Registrar of the University was insulted and mistreated (I refer both to the detention of Mr. Ross in the Placement Service building and to the rather undignified exit, pictured in one of the Toronto newspapers, which Mr. Ross was forced to make).

That is not all. The Varsity (Nov. 22) carried a front-page picture of a scene reminiscent of some theatrical production, i.e. (and I quote) "Teacher-cum-protester David Hemblen" courageously conducting "his nine o'clock Anglo Saxon class on the steps of Simcoe Hall." If The Varsity was indeed representing fact, one must ask certain questions. What has happened to the rights of Mr. Hemblen's students? What has happened to the responsibility which he owes to them and to his employer? Was it necessary for Mr. Hemblen to hold class "in the cold"? Could he not have arrived at the demonstration after his class? Although they may have enjoyed that so-called "class," how much did those five co-eds actually learn under conditions which must have been much less than excellent? And what of the other students in Mr. Hemblen's class (if in fact there are more than five) who chose not to suffer for their teacher's convictions, not to sit and freeze in the cold? Do they merely miss what somehow might have been taught? Surely the education which we are trying to give at Toronto has not become this much of a farce!

If The Varsity has not misrepresented what occurred Monday morning, then Mr. Hemblen's conduct must be regarded as no less than prejudicial to the interests of the students assigned to him; if he must demonstrate, let him do so on his own time, not on that of his students and the University. It is time that this University cease to let itself be placed on the defensive; it must recognize, that its officials and its students still deserve some consideration.

The road to student representation at Innis

During October, Innis College was granted permission to seat five students as full members of its faculty council. In this article, Mr. Harris outlines the sequence of events that preceded this important event and reaches a "rather different conclusion" than given in a Varsity editorial published at the time.

By ROBIN S. HARRIS
Principal of Innis College

1. "The decision represents the culmination of a two-year campaign by Innis student council and its dynamic president, Ken Stone. Under Stone's leadership, the Council convinced Innis Principal Robin Harris that students should be granted a voice in the operation of the college."
—Varsity, Oct. 27

The only accurate statement here is the description of Mr. Stone — he is a dynamic person. The campaign has been waged for three and a half years, not two and it has involved all members of the College and not merely the executive of the Innis College Student Society.

I have been convinced that students should be granted a voice in the operation of the College since the day in January 1964 when I was named principal. A fortnight later at the first meeting of the Advisory Committee which at my request was appointed to act as a Council until the formal establishment of the College, it was apparent that this view was shared by all members of the committee.

"I have been convinced that students should be granted a voice in the operation of the college . . ."

That students should be involved in all decisions relating to the welfare of the College was a basic principle underlining all arrangements made by the Advisory Committee during the five months of its existence, for example the decision to restrict admission in September, 1964 to entering freshmen.

A number of matters would have been simplified if we had drafted a number of second, third and fourth year students from existing colleges to provide guidance for the entering freshmen, but the Committee believed that Innis College students should have the privilege and the responsibility of working out themselves the role which students should play in the operation of the College. I may add that our confidence that first-year students were capable of doing the job required has been more than justified.

A Council for Innis College was established on July 1, 1964 — the President of the University, the Principal and Registrar of the College, and eight professors from various faculties, some of whom had served on the Advisory Committee. At the first regular meeting, held on September 18, 1964 — one week after the first student registered — a Student-Staff Committee was established to consist of several Council members, the Administrative Assistant, who was not a member of Council, and several co-opted students.

At the second meeting (October 14) one of the co-opted students, Robert Patrick, attended the meeting for the presentation of and discussion of the Student-Staff Committee Report. At all subsequent meetings of the Council where there has been a student-Staff Committee report, one of the student members has been in attendance and normally has presented the report.

Students were accorded a voice from the outset

It has also become customary so to arrange the agenda of the meeting that other matters of direct concern to students are considered immediately after the presentation of the Student-Staff Committee Report and the student representative has been asked to remain in attendance and participate in the discussion.

In the course of the 1964-65 session it became so obvious to the Council that it was benefitting greatly from the presence of one or more students at this portion of its meetings that as early as the spring of 1965 the question of having students as full members of the Council was informally discussed. It was formally discussed in the spring of 1966, but it was decided to postpone action until the session 1966-67 principally because a proposal by Innis College at this time was likely to be rejected since the idea, being a relatively new one, was one to which no other Council appeared to be giving any attention. It was felt that other Councils should be given time to come to grips with the question.

During the fall of 1966 the Council was so preoccupied with matters bearing on the Innis College building and in preparing a brief for the Macpherson Committee that it had no time to consider the membership question. In January, however, the matter was raised and it was placed on the agenda for the February meeting.

At the February meeting Mr. Stone, in presenting the Student-Staff Committee report, suggest-

Innis College Principal
Robin Harris

ed that the Council consider the matter of student representation. He was advised to make this suggestion formally at the March meeting. This he did and the Council struck a special committee, to consist of five Council members and two co-opted students, to report on all matters bearing on Council membership.

The report of this Committee recommended the addition of two types of persons not presently eligible — students and administrative staff who did not hold academic appointment. The Council considered this report at the regular April meeting and at a special meeting a week later called for this purpose, at the conclusion of which the report was approved. The following day, I reported this action to the President of the University and requested that authority be granted to implement it.

"Council members have also been active and for a longer period of time."

From the above it is apparent that many people have been involved in this campaign over a long period of time. The executive of the Innis College Student Society has played an important role and so have both its presidents, Mr. Stone and his predecessor John Bayly. But the Council members have also been active and for a longer period of time.

2. "In mid-September, acting President J. H. Sword vetoed the proposal because it represented some kind of 'precedent' . . . However, the University administration finally changed its tune and council president Stone plus four elected student representatives will join the Faculty Council at its next meeting."

My request for authority to implement the Council's recommendation on membership of the Council was referred by Dr. Bissell to the President's Council. At a meeting of the President's Council on June 22 the proposal was approved in principle, but it was felt that formal approval was required of either the Board of Governors or the Senate or both.

The matter proved not to be within the jurisdiction of the Senate. What Mr. Sword did in mid-September was not to veto the proposal but to explain why he was reluctant at that time to bring the matter to the Board. His view was that similar proposals were likely to be forthcoming from other divisions of the University and that there was much to be said for developing a general policy before dealing with a particular application.

Innis wanted to be judged on its own merits

Mr. Sword's reply was reported to the Council at its meeting on September 18, 1967 and the Council decided to request the President to reconsider his decision on the grounds that the proposal concerned only Innis College and ought to be accepted or rejected without reference to any other division of the University. This was consistent with the view adopted by the Council in approving the Committee's report in April; the report clearly stated that the recommendations applied only to Innis College and in no way implied that the members of Council, individually or collectively, advocated that students should be seated on other Councils or on the Senate or on the Board of Governors.

If the University administration can be said to have changed its tune, it is presumably because the Council's second request convinced Mr. Sword that the position was different than had been thought in September.

The conclusion I reach from all this is that it is not merely the student representatives on the Innis College Council who "are now confronted with great challenges as well as great potentialities" and that it is not only their performance "which will determine the future for student representation on all faculty councils."

The challenge is equally to the professional and administrative staff members of the Council. Other councils are likely to follow Innis' lead if

Innis Council President
Ken Stone

— and perhaps only if — it is demonstrated that a Council which includes students works effectively. The question is, will the Innis College Council work effectively under the new arrangement. It is the responsibility of all members of the Council, and not just the student members to see that it does.

One evening last winter, just before the Christmas exams, a person or persons unknown mysteriously took advantage of some construction signs on Devonshire Place, in a successful attempt to re-route cars past a drenching hose-pipe outside Devonshire House. The first car through was being driven by a man going to a wedding. He was wearing a tuxedo. He had his window down.

Within 15 minutes, 18 Metro police officers had converged on the scene, and they were quickly followed by one of our very own U of T police. That was just one of the wild messes the campus gendarmes had to unscramble last year.

There were plenty others, too—enough to help keep 15 full-time constables on the move and to justify the addition of six more men to the force last April. The 19 officers, one chief constable and one deputy chief constable, with their one cruiser (a new stationwagon), one utility vehicle (a '66 Chev with more than 58,000 miles on it) and one ancient, depressing building constitute the U of T Police—not much, really, but a far cry from the force of four which patrolled the grounds some 30 years ago.

"We're such a mixed bag," said Chief Constable J. B. West, a former RAF pilot who served at one time with the Wakefield, England city police. "There are representatives among us from England, Scotland, Ireland, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and British Columbia. I think we even have one from Ontario." Most, but not all, of them have a military or police background, and their average age is "about 45-ish. We're not as old as you think," laughed West, "but we may look it because of the cares and burdens we have to endure from student pranks."

Although they carry no guns, the members of that prematurely-aging "mixed bag" are all sworn-in peace officers; they have the same authority on U of T property as Metro police have outside the campus. Why no guns "We're like the British bobbies," said Tom Lawson, U of T assistant safety and security officer, "—we don't need them. We're not here to shoot people up."

"The population here is a group of intellectuals," said West, "so the powers-that-be have not felt the need for an armed police."

KEEP THINGS WITHIN THE FAMILY

The U of T Police have no lock-up, either; should they wish to arrest anyone, they call on the facilities of their Metro colleagues. But they do that only when pressed to the limit. As West put it: "We try to keep things within the university family as far as possible. In some cases, matters would go more seriously for a student's future if he were formally charged. Don't forget: a person with a criminal record can be barred from law, from the civil service, from a visa, from several things."

"The way I see it," said Lawson, "it costs a lot of money to put a kid through school. If he does something stupid, and gets nailed by the Metro police, his career may be ruined. Then all that taxpayers' money will have gone down the drain."

It is partly this philosophy that prompts the campus police to take an understanding view of student activities. Both U of T and Metro officers police Varsity football and hockey games. If you intend to drink at the next game, and must get caught in the act, just be sure it's a U of T constable who catches you. During a Western football game last year, 15 students brazenly guzzled away in front of Metro's finest. "And it took some talking to get them released," said Lawson.

He also pointed out that the practice some men follow of getting their girls to smuggle handbag liquor into games can have unfortunate results for the young ladies concerned. The only policemen on duty belong to Metro, and they're obliged to charge.

All in all, liaison with municipal law enforcers is good and the U of T Police try to help students as much as their uniforms permit. A few years ago, they got some U of T people out of difficulties in Montreal on a McGill weekend, and last year Lawson's

Another problem is the perennial students' prank. "We try to treat them as pranks as long as we can," said West. And Lawson revealed that the notorious engineering Brute Force Committee isn't too brutal after all: It meekly clears all its stunts beforehand through his office, so he can warn Metro Police to let the hi-jinks go.

CAMPUS POLICE IMAGE BLACKENED BY BERKELEY

One thing Lawson seems happy about is the absence at U of T of Berkeley-style student riots: "We've been fortunate here—there have been only two sit-ins." He feels that the image of campus police everywhere has been blackened by the Berkeley incidents where, in one instance, nearly 800 students were arrested and carted off to jail.

"The cracking of all those heads at Berkeley was completely nuts," he said. "You cannot simply dress a guy up in a uniform and strap a gun on him."

He feels that, for effective operation, there must be mutual trust and co-operation between the police and the students, and would like to see "more contact" between the two groups. The problem, though, is that the force of 21 police (soon, if Lawson gets his way, to be expanded to 30) has little or no contact with the average student.

"When I started here nearly nine years ago," said West, "it was possible to get to know a few students in each faculty. Now, since the university has grown so much, this type of communication is impossible. We know only about 50 of the 20,000 students—and then usually just the ones who get themselves into trouble.
We're seen simply as awkward obstructionists, like any police force."

"However," added Lawson, "student groups do ask for us (for policing dances and things like the McGill Weekend) and this is a good sign." An off-duty U of T policeman can be hired for $3.00 an hour, but student organizations are by no means unanimous in their use of this service. During the interview for this article, Lawson was visibly disappointed to learn that the Blue and White Society had hired outside people to police its boat dance.

WEST: "LISTEN ... PLEASE?"

Chief Constable West, on the other hand, would like to try to increase police-student understanding by sending each individual student a pamphlet asking him simply to listen to a U of T officer if ever approached by one. "Our officers normally stop a student only with a reason, and are polite. If a student argues, it's only human nature to argue back. When we ask someone to move, or to park somewhere else, we're not trying to upset or embarrass anyone; we're just doing a job."

Financial considerations, however, will no doubt ensure that his propaganda scheme never gets off the grounds. Already the U of T Police budget consumes "quite an enormous" amount of money, according to him (neither he nor Lawson would attempt an estimate), even though its constables are, by Metro standards, poorly-paid.

So it looks as though the "mixed bag" of U of T Police will just have to get its chin up and struggle through life life the rest of us: misrepresented, misquoted and misunderstood.

Government still manages U of S money

REGINA (CUP) — Government financial control over the University of Saskatchewan will be maintained despite protests.

Premier Ross Thatcher announced last Wednesday that the legislature would vote on several sub-budgets when the university budget is examined.

Mr. Thatcher's proposal will mean six or seven sub-votes on the university's budget, which will cover areas such as salaries and building costs.

Mr. Thatcher announced the plan to have the department of public works control university building and to set up a special department for the university either independently or under the treasury board.

Mr. Thatcher is also Saskatchewan's minister of finance.

The faculty association considers the institution of sub-votes unacceptable. It would provide a formal mechanism by which the government would directly influence internal university affairs, faculty representatives said.

"This procedure undermines the university's power to set its own priorities," said Professor Jim Naylor, the chairman of the Saskatoon faculty association.

"Everyone would be far better off if Prof. Naylor would forget politics and concern himself more with university affairs," replied Mr. Thatcher.

E. M. Culliton, the chancellor of the university, told the two campus faculty associations, employees unions and student unions, that the board of governors would not tolerate any interference by the government.

Queens vetoes student rector concept

KINGSTON (CUP) — The Queen's University administration has vetoed the suggestion that a student act as rector on the board of trustees.

The rector would have represented the students' interests on the board.

A committee of the Queen's university council, including senate members, trustees and alumni, released the following statement:

"The students of the university continue to be represented on the board by the rector who should not be a student nor a member of faculty at any university. The charter should be amended to set forth the disqualification of students.

"The student body should have two representatives on the senate, appointed by the executive of the Alma Mater Society (student union) neither of whom shall be an undergraduate."

The Ontario Universities Act stipulates a faculty member cannot be a rector, but it does not specifically exclude a student as rector.

Candidates for next Wednesday's rector election are Senator Gratton O'Leary and George Carson, the president of the Queen's student union.

Dow may cancel recruitment at Queens

KINGSTON (Special) — A harassed recruiter from the Dow Chemical Company of Canada says he may not visit Queen's University this week as scheduled.

The Dow recruitment officer, William White, who was barricaded inside the placement service building at the University of Toronto last week, was to interview Queen's students for jobs tomorrow and Friday.

Queen's placement officer G. O. Saunders said yesterday that he expected no problems. But, he added, Mr. White notified him he will not come if there are any rumours of trouble.

Dow recruiters have already been to Queen's this year. They conducted interviews for three days without attracting any attention three weeks ago.

U of M considers students on senate

WINNIPEG (Special) — The University Government Committee at the University of Manitoba has recommended that students be appointed to the senate, says university president Dr. H. H. Saunderson.

Dr. Saunderson said that there would be between three and five students on the 80-man senate.

Student union President Chris Westdal said this would be "a fair step towards some significant degree of democracy within the university community."

The duties of the senate include setting entrance requirements, determining methods of instruction, appointing examiners and determining degrees.

Besides the placing of students on the senate, Dr. Saunderson had recommended that the powers of the senate be increased especially financial matters and the faculty councils be allowed to elect representatives to the board of governors.

College councils called "road to power"

Saudents may be bored sitting on college councils, but the councils are a necessary road to power the University College Literary and Athletic Society decided in an equally boring meeting Monday.

The Lit passed almost unanimously a resolution calling for student representation on the UC college council.

Before passing the resolution, Lit members listened respectfully as UC Principal Douglas V. LePan explained that the college council, made up of the UC Teaching staff members, does virtually nothing.

Principal LePan said the Council's functions consisted largely of doling out scholarship funds, recommendations for the Epstein literary prizes, buying the odd objet d'art for the college and so on.

The Lit resolution states:

"A basic premise of our argument is that the (college) council has in the past been active in formulating and carrying out policies in the interests of the College.

"Otherwise there would be no justification for the existence of any such organization."

Literary director Bob Rae (III UC) warned that students had better be prepared to wake up because the day-to-day business of running a college will be extremely boring.

"But," he said, "student representation is vital—a necessary way to exhibit interest in the college."

Lit treasurer Bill Sklar (II U.C.) objected: "There is no purpose sitting students on a useless board just so we can say we're there."

Mark Freiman (III UC) disagreed. "I favor student representation on the Council just so we can say we're there. It's a good precedent. It says students have a place in running the university."

The resolution calls for one-third student representation on the Council's nine committees, and about 40 students on the council itself.

Principal LePan said the council would meet in December and would likely discuss the Lit resolution.

If the council approves, students could probably become members almost immediately, said Lit President Herschell Ezrin (IV UC).

Debaters take filth into own hands

By LINDA WALDMAN

"SAC, The Gargoyle, and the engineers have blazed a very fertile area for penetration in universities by their use of obscenities," Peter Grant (II Trin) told a Hart House noon-hour debate yesterday.

Grant was supporting the resolution: This House Stands Erect for Obscenities.

"But we must take the matter into our own hands. Only this way can we reach true fruition and come upon ourselves as members of society. And I can't think of a better way to celebrate centennial.

"I expect numerous jocular in defence of virginity, purity, purity, mom's apple pie and the Union Jack forever from the opposition. Out of this very semination flows Western thought. It is a very difficult point to grasp."

Don Short (II New) presented an erector set," toy of mechanical engineers," as exhibit A for the nays.

It included one issue of the Gargoyle, one copy of the latest issue of the Toke Oike, Miss January, the Story of O, and a copy of the Nov. 8 Varsity.

Speaking for the affirmative, Bob Radford (III, Law) pointed out that to take a stand we must expand the issue.

"Everyone knows that the definition of a university student is intelligent, honest and obscene but never more than two of these at a time," Radford said.

"The affirmative stood erect for this issue as if they were standing for God Save the Queen. But knowing their obscene minds they are asking God Save the Queen for what!" Steven Luxton (III, New) said for the nays.

"The spreading out and dissemination of material is changing our nation into wandering thinkers," Luxton said.

"Even Bell Telephone insists we let our fingers do the walking through the yellow pages."

Grant admitted that it was a pretty stiff proposition. "But I can't think of a better way to blow off steam. It's a good organ for self-expression."

Convocation an "academic happening"

The Fall Convocation ceremony Friday was described as a "truthful image of what the university really is" by Acting-President John H. Sword.

"Today the university is recognizing its very great moral responsibilities to its students and to the society of which it is a part," he declared.

"This ceremony is an academic 'happening.' It represents a linking of personal and intellectual values.

"It is our responsibility to try to bridge the gulf of mistrust that exists between the generations, to establish within the academic community a discipline, not based on the outmoded paternalism of the past, but rather on the rationality, humanity and courage that the future so greatly needs."

Mr. Sword referred to three recent speeches which also demonstrate a pre-occupation with moral values.

Professor Marshall McLuhan in the Marfleet lectures "emphasized the totality of the involvement of the TV generation."

Professor Northrop Frye pointed out in the Whidden lectures that the artist's revolt was as rooted in morality as the conventions he opposes.

And principal Douglas LePan of University College in the Dunning lectures at Queen's University, traced the effects of the decay of religious and philosophical systems and emphasized the need for moral courage.

NLF meets in HH

Canadians for the NLF, a group supporting the South Vietnamese National Liberation Front, is holding its first on-campus meeting in the Hart House Music Room at 4 p.m. today.

The meeting will feature Professor Don Wilmott of the sociology department speaking on the origins of the NLF, plus movies of NLF military actions and life in NLF-controlled villages. Prof. Wilmott, who grew up in China, is an expert on Southeast Asia.

The meeting is formally sponsored by the Faculty Committee on Vietnam.

U of W to have highest residence fees

LONDON, Ont. (CUP)—Students of the University of Western Ontario will be faced with the highest residence fees in Canada next year.

Fees will jump from the present $825 to $1,000. The board of governors said the increase was essential because of rising interest rates on mortgages and the construction of a 1,600-unit residence which began last year.

D. Carleton Williams, the president of the university stated that another Canadian university has announced its residences fees will also be $1,000.

Mr. Williams said the university is trying to get a better deal from the government.

John Yokum, the student council housing committee chairman, said that enough pressure has not been brought to bear on the government.

Ryerson "Booxodus" loses 250 volumes

At least 250 library books are missing from the Ryerson library after last Tuesday's Booxodus," says chief librarian Arthur Paulaitis. Official counters reported 2,300 books left the library during the protest over library services at Ryerson. Mr. Paulaitis said the library would take a complete stock check to estimate the final number of lost and damaged books in about two weeks.

He said each book missing would have an average cost of about $15.

"We didn't have that many books to start," admitted Mr. Paulaitis, "but obviously we are going to have even less now. It's the students who are going to suffer."

Some students put all the red books on one shelf, all the blue books on another shelf and all the green books on a third shelf.

Mr. Paulaitis said the protest damaged Ryerson's image for future employers.

Meanwhile the students council has disclaimed all responsibility for the Booxodus on the grounds that it was not a SAC-organized function.

At last Wednesday's executive meeting, Gord Jackson said, "There might be SAC individuals involved, but SAC did not ratify a library demonstration.

"It merely authorized the writing of letters, protesting the inadequacies of the library. SAC should not assume responsibility."

SAC members hoped the statement will absolve it from financial responsibility if a charge is made for damages.

Xaverian blamed for low standards

ANTIGONISH, N.S. (CUP) — The Xaverian Weekly, the campus newspaper at St. Francis Xavier University, has come under heavy fire for alleged irresponsibility and low moral standards.

At a council meeting Thursday, the student council was blamed for not exercising enough control over the paper.

Rev. G. Mackinnon attacked the paper for "lack of moral standard coupled with a lack of respect for language with any kind of taste."

Professor J. Sears advocated an advisory board to tell The Xaverian what to print, judge the quality of journalism and dictate the paper's editorial policy.

Jim Merchant the editor of the paper, replied: "There is more to running a newspaper than choosing who runs it."

SMC bagles UC in soccer

By GELLIUS

St. Michael's won the Interfaculty Soccer Championship for the second time in 73 years Monday, defeating UC by the deceptively decisive score of 4-1. UC held a 1-0 lead until quite late in the second half by virtue of a goal from Bob Allen but tired suddenly, and the Irish and Luciano Lombardi, who scored three, dominated the final 15 minutes. Angelo Del-fino scored the other goal.

HOCKEY

The Omnipotent Law Lords took two games over the last week. They first edged Vic I 2-1. Mike Fitzpatrick scoring twice and Jim Beamish replying for Vic. And then they viciously mauled PHE A, 5-2. Moorhouse, Warc, Arthurs, Fitzpatrick and Davies led the winners; Willoughby and Hannaz scored for PHE A.

Vic I cleverly doubled the score on Trinity A, 4-2. Emin (2), McLelland, and Sharpe counted for Vic. Trin goals were authored by Denison and the rangy Moffat.

The Great Buruh, Prentice and Lenczner led Meds A past UC, 3-1. Hanna scored for UC.

Architecture laid low (cheap Varsity sensationalism) Erindale, 2-1. Steven and Hamilton (for Arch) and Roy Robb (for Erindale) gained undying glory by scoring goals.

Erindale in turn, emasculated Knox, 2-0 in front of the gallant Kochberg between the pipes (as we say in the trade). Martin and Delija Scored the markers.

Jr. Engineering slithered by Scarborough, 1-0 on Gary Suwayama's goal. Goalie Rick Lint was picked as the outstanding performer (by many).

St. Mike's B gleefully trampled on Dents A, 5-1. Ross Harrison scored 2 for SMB; Christenson, Rae and Counter collected the others. Glazier replied for Dents.

BASKETBALL

UC I, led by Joel Feldman, scion of a great Ottawa athletic family, who scored 14 points, breezed by Vic I, 51-34 (end of sentence). Doug Long led Vic with 8. Feldman also shone in the Redmen's (=UC; affectionate nickname) 31-29 win over Meds A. Lloyd Rossman, whose flashy moves drew many appreciative comments (Hey! What flashy moves! A. Fan, I ASPC) and Eric Barker, who scored 7, led Meds.

Trinity paced by Bowen's 13 points, outhooped Pharmacy A, 28-20. Milan Kaiser had 7 (sc. "points") for Pharmacy.

School of Business capitalized on their opportunities to edge Innis, 37-35. Molinari had 20 points for SOB; Glas-cowicz had 14 points and seven consonants for Innis.

Steve Overgaard's 10 helped Jr. Engineering by Dents A, 36-26. Tom Kent had 12 for Dents.

New, applying the David Stager approach to better living (self-control, not birth-control) to basketball committed only 4 personal fouls and trimmed Architecture, 44-26. Fine scored 11 for New.

RUGGER

In further play-off action, PHE, with Paul Stean scoring all the points in the usual mystifying, though picturesque manner intrinsic to rugger, blanked Engineering I. Score mattereth not.

SPECIAL EVENTS

The New College Bread-Eating team has challenged any interested aggregations of athletes to a bread-eating match. Prospective opponents should contact Jaek McCaffery (renowned student of Merkyon literature, Varsity jazz critic, and author of the Food Sciences textbook "man can live by bread alone") at 927-9416. Teams will consist of four people of either sex or any combination thereof.

Blues' spectacular back, Mike Raham, shown here, led the SIFL in three departments, according to final league statistics released late last week. Raham led the scoring with 42 points from seven touchdowns; he was the league's top rusher with 322 yards in 67 carries; and he dominated punt return specialists, gallaping 317 yards in 21 attempts. Taranta players also led in punting (Paul McKay: 38.4 average) and interceptions (Riiva Ilves: 4).

Should be a great one: Blues vs. NHL Oldtimers

By PHIL BINGLEY and ROD MICKLEBURGH

Remember when Varsity hockey fans in an undramatic display of non-support stayed away in droves from the SIHL playoffs held at Varsity Arena at the end of last season? While Blues were inside winning the league title, groups of teenyboppers stood outside the rink trying to hustle handfuls of reserved ducats at two bits apiece.

Well now's your chance to do something about it. For the price of a dollar (that's one hundred cents) you can put your support behind Blues both vocally and financially, see what may well turn out to be the most entertaining game of the season at Varsity Arena, and maybe even win a wristwatch in the process.

Maybe by now you are interested in how you can become involved in this great happening. The answer is that the NHL old-timers are coming to the Bloor Street gardens Tuesday next (December 5) to play Blues in an exhibition game beginning at 8 p.m. The money raised will go towards expenses for Varsity's Austrian trip and a sellout crowd is essential to make the venture a success.

On top of this, the sponsors of the old-timers, Gruen Watches, are donating a wristwatch to be given away to some lucky fan during one of the period intermissions.

The NHL Oldtimers have been in existence for several years now, and rarely have they suffered defeat. It is no exaggeration to rate them at a par with Junior A hockey. The vets may be outskated but they compensate with tremendous hockey noggins. They know what to do with the puck, and mistakes just never happen.

Heading the creaking but crack contingent of Oldtimers are such former stars as Bob Goldham (still a very sound defenseman; he could play in the AHL with no trouble), Ed Litzenberg (yeah man, remember fast Eddie?), smiling Sid Smith (a beautiful playmaker), and slick Danny Lewicki. The Cullen brothers (Barry and Brian) are no slouch either. Around for comic relief (now that twistin' goalie, Long John Henderson has departed) is 'Fat Jack' Hamilton, who retired from Leafs more than 20 years ago. Jack's got a lot of poundage but he's also Meadowlark Lemon of the team. Hamilton can do a lot of nifty shifting with the puck.

Next Tuesday's game is one not to miss. Blues are certainly no shoo-ins. The Oldtimers will easily be their toughest competition of the season. Both Blues and Oldtimers have been faced with the same problem of lack of competition over the years. Now at last there's worthy confrontation for them.

Tickets for this exciting match are on sale at Hart House for $1.00 each. There are no reserved seats, and proceeds go to the worthiest cause of the year—Blues' trip to Innsbruck for the Student Winter Olympics. The game is Tuesday, December 5, Varsity Arena, 8:00 p.m.

MULOCK CUP

Meds after upset of the century over Vic

By SLIM MORRISON

Who needs the Grey Cup? The granddaddy of them all, the Mulock Cup, goes on the line today at 1:00 at Varsity Stadium, with Vic and Meds providing the action.

Interfac football at Toronto dates back to the fall of 1894, making the league the oldest still in existence in Canada. The championship that year was won, coincidentally enough, by Senior Meds. However, the Meds have not won the Mulock Match now since 1938.

Vic Scarlet and Gold have by far the most successful record of any team in interfac intercourse. Owners of the Mulock for the past nine years, the Vic types have held the trophy twenty-six times since the league began operation.

The key to the Vic attack this year has been the hard running of Dave Webb and Pete Fairgrieve, plus the battery combination of QB Don Karn and end Bryce Mo-nick. Add to this the pedal proficiency of punter Pete Marshall, and the stellar defensive work of the likes of Dave Gee, Bill Moebus and Don Sharpe, and you come up with a competent crew.

The Meds are hoping that the emotional charge generated by their astonishing victory over Skule will carry them past the Golden Boys. The wide-open medical offense is headed by QB Paul Dedumets, ably abetted by Nick Malakis, Andy Davies and versatile Denys Symons.

MUKLUK MATTERS:

Meds are a much stronger team than many people realize. Lack of practice time due to a heavy course was their chief seasonal disadvantage . . . Admission to the match is free . . . Congrats to chief referee Brian McKee and his crew for a fine job over the season . . . this is the first year in many that only interfac refs are being used in the championship game.

Engineers condemn Dow sit-in and impeach Bruce

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

When engineers get together they make no bones about getting what they want done in a hurry.

In one hour Wednesday in Convocation Hall, 400 engineers impeached Allan Bruce (III APSC), one of their Students Administrative Council representatives, and supported a resolution condemning the Dow sit-in last week.

Joe Peters (IV APSC) presented Ron Thompson (IV APSC), chairman of a general meeting of the Engineering Society, with a 250-name petition asking for Bruce's resignation.

Peters charged that Bruce "was voting for himself and not caring about the engineering faculty." Bruce had voted in favor of supporting the Toronto Anti-Draft Program in principle while an engineering referendum had been overwhelmingly against it. He abstained from the vote on the Placement Service.

Bruce was not entirely unprepared for his impeachment. Wearing a three-piece black suit, he took the stage and answered questions after delivering a speech.

"Today I stand before you on trial," Bruce said as he began a six-minute speech he had written the night before.

He justified the Dow sit-in by saying engineers should take a stand to halt the U.S. war economy. He pointed to Canada's neutrality and finished with a quote from John Donne:

"Ask not for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

While answering questions, Bruce, a member of last year's engineering society, admitted that he didn't represent engineers in spirit and that he was going to resign anyway.

Roger Garrjock (II APSC) said Bruce's thinking had been "muddled by wanting to stop the war in Vietnam."

Bruce was an extremely competent student representative. He was university committee co-chairman.

On Oct. 24 the society executive failed by four votes to impeach Bruce. On Wednesday the undergraduates voted for his resignation 285-50.

Fewer than two dozen engineers voted against a motion by Ernest Pearson (IV APSC), condemning last week's Placement Service sit-in.

Pearson was seeking a mandate from the engineers to present his motion to Acting-President ENGINEERS page 3

McGill columnist takes writ to court

MONTREAL (CUP)—McGill University went to court Wednesday to contest an application for a writ of evocation by John Fekete, in whose McGill Daily column an allegedly obscene reprint appeared.

The writ would prohibit the McGill senate committee on student discipline from taking action until the question of jurisdiction could be settled by the courts.

The reprint earlier this month, was from The Realist, a U.S. magazine.

Fekete's lawyers questioned the jurisdiction of the committee to summon him to answer charges of "contravening standards of decency acceptable by and in this university."

Lawyers for the university say the court is not permitted to intervene in this case since the charters of McGill specify that the governor-general, in his capacity of "visitor" to the university, has final jurisdiction on all internal matters and is not subject to review by the courts.

They warned that to issue a writ of evocation would set a precedent throughout the world.

No action against faculty sitters

Faculty members who participated in the Dow Chemical sit-in last week cannot be disciplined by the university administration.

A two-hour meeting yesterday between representatives of the engineering society and Acting-President John Sword brought no firm statement on what action might be taken.

Ernest Pearson (IV APSC) said later: "The president suggested we could take the matter before the president of Caput. To do this we need the testimony of the fellows who were obstructed and perhaps the names of some of the demonstrators."

Pearson said the president was "somewhat against this action because it would punish only a third of those involved."

Mr. Sword told Pearson that at the present time the faculty is immune from university discipline. However, Pearson said, he will propose that the engineering society consider civil action against them.

The University Placement Service will continue to operate without interference until the recommendations of the forthcoming advisory committee on the service have been made.

"We were promised a decision before Christmas," Pearson said, "but this is impossible because the Students Council has not yet named its representatives."

A motion passed Wednesday called for the engineering society to take over the Placement Service as it related to engineers if no guarantees against interference are forthcoming.

The meeting also touched on the place of the engineers in the university community. Mr. Sword wanted to know if the engineers were going to try to be a force in the university or if they (see placement on p. 3)

SAC accepts Faulkner's resignation

By INGRID VABALIS

Students Administrative Council members gave resigning president Tom Faulkner "best wishes for re-election" when they accepted his resignation Wednesday night.

These phrases were amendments in spirit if not in fact to the motion that SAC accept Faulkner's resignation and call an election. The motion passed 36-3, with two abstentions.

Faulkner decided to quit after a petition was circulated calling for his immediate resignation because he "no longer represents the students of this university."

The petition, with 2,385 signatures, was presented to council by Ron Thompson (IV APSC) of the Ad Hoc Committee for Representative Student Government.

Led by engineering students, the committee represents a backlash against recent SAC decisions on "moral issues" such as the Dow Chemical of Canada recruitment and the draft-dodger-aid program.

The motion to acknowledge the petition was carried after some debate as to the validity of some of the document's signatures.

One council member said he saw the petition circulated in his class and insisted "It was signed by two students I'm not sure are even members of this University—Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck."

Mike McGee (III SMC) countered with: "I would say at least half of the students signed it themselves."

"Some students are unhappy" said Art McIlwain (II APSC), arguing for receiving the petition, accepting Faulkner's resignation and calling an election.

"A campus-wide election will let them make their unhappiness be felt," he added.

Others felt there was no need to call an election with only three months left in the school year. Council could legally ignore the petition.

However split council members were on this point, they rallied almost unanimously in support of Faulkner and made it clear they did not wish him to resign.

Many felt that if Faulkner did not have the support of a majority of students, SAC did not have such support either and should resign.

The petition, said John Carlisle (II Meds) is a "mis-directed procedure." It attacks Tom Faulkner as being responsible for SAC decisions.

Joe Merber (IV APSC) said "the subject under attack should not be Mr. Faulkner but the council itself."

SAC decisions are the responsibility of the whole council and not of Faulkner, who is just "a minority voice."

Nevertheless, Faulkner feels he must fight an election to see where student support really stands.

"If he desires that his resignation be accepted we have no alternative but to accept it," said Cliff Lax (III Law), to the tune of general applause.

Thursday, Dec. 14, is the date set for the special election. To date Faulkner is opposed only by Bill Charlton (II Law).

Solandt defends Globe and Mail quote

Chancellor O. M. Solandt of the University of Toronto says he was quoted "completely out of context" in a recent Toronto Globe and Mail article on his speech to the Defense Research Board.

The Globe article quotes Dr. Solandt as saying, "Canada's armed forces should become the leading specialists in the application of modern science to the problems of land, sea and air warfare."

The Globe says Dr. Solandt advocated this measure as a boost to Canada's economy.

"Naturally, more weight will be given to improvements which are likely to result in export sales either of military equipment," the article quotes Dr. Solandt "or of products for the civilian market to which newly acquired technology can easily be transferred."

At last Wednesday's Student Council debate on whether Dow Chemical should recruit on campus, representative Irv Weisdorf (III UC) attacked Dr. Solandt on this issue.

"I don't want such a man deciding who should be allowed to come on campus to recruit students," Weisdorf declared.

Dr. Solandt said the SAC resolution was impractical.

"It is not practicable to decide that some businesses can recruit on campus while others can't," he said.

"Either you let them all on or there is no placement service."

Commission will discuss course unions

The Students Administrative Council education commission has called an open meeting for Monday to discuss the formation of course unions.

"This is an important meeting," Dave Keane (III Vic) of the history students union said.

"Students must take the initiative in this matter. Otherwise the faculty will be 10 steps ahead of us and will be able to dictate terms."

"Course unions try to get students involved in their education," said Martha Tracy, a member of the commission.

"The only time the average student takes part in university affairs is when he elects a student representative.

"Course unions should encourage discussion of why students are in the course, what they want to learn and whether that is what they are learning.

"The meeting is to get people from all areas of study interested in forming unions. Later we hope to form a council of course unions across campus."

The meeting is at 7:30 p.m. in the common room of Sir Daniel Wilson residence.

Committee will define Placement service role

A committee will be formed immediately to "advise" the director of the Placement Service on the functioning of the service, says the university's vice-president and registrar, Robin Ross.

Mr. Ross informed the Students Administrative Council this week that the committee, formed at the request of Acting-President John Sword, will be composed of 14 members: five students nominated by SAC, five faculty members nominated by the staff, Mr. Ross, Vice Provost Don Forster, Dean J. Mottam of the faculty of applied science and engineering, and one alumnus of the university.

At Mr. Sword's suggestion, Mr. Ross will be the chairman of the committee.

Grads want to stay in CUS

Graduate students support continued membership in the Canadian Union of Students.

In a referendum last Friday, the vote was 45 per cent in favor, 28 per cent against membership. Of the 552 graduate students who voted, 148 were undecided on participation in CUS.

Bossin presents education reforms

Professors' Office Area: Please do not Enter Except on Business. So reads a sign in Scarborough College.

"This is indicative, not an exception," says Bob Bossin (III Inn), the education commissioner of the Students Administrative Council.

Bossin presented SAC Wednesday with a Canadian Union of Students resolution on the general nature of our educational system and the new directions that should be explored.

The resolution outlines the goal of education in a democratic society.

"Learning must be a process of self enhancement in which the individual learns because he wants to learn, not because of coercion . . . The student must have ultimate responsibility for his own education."

The resolution goes on to propose that "members of the Union at the various campuses would encourage the setting up of experimental educational situations that will try to bring into practice the above principles."

Bossin suggested that Council consider such questions as the assumptions that underlie scholarships awarding and educational experiments in Tartu College.

"Controversial issues are preventative measures," Bossin said Wednesday night, "but education can get at the source."

He urged SAC to do some logical thinking on the matter, and not to turn it into a "motherhood" issue.

Vice-president John Treleaven (SGS) read from a biting editorial, "We must consider whether it may ever be possible for students to come up from slavery."

Professor G. E. Johnson, the faculty representative on SAC, called the resolution "wide-eyed, airy, useless philosophy."

"For this sort of thing" he added, "you need a good staff-student ratio. It is impossible in Canada where, for example, there are 30 pharmacologists who must staff 10 medical schools."

Steve Langdon (III Trin) stressed the need for subjective assessment in education. Students should be asking "What do I think I know about this?" rather than "What do they think I know?"

CUS pres. protests pot expulsion

LONDON, Ont. (CUP) — Hugh Armstrong, the president of the Canadian Union of Students, has strongly protested the expulsion of a student having been convicted of marijuana possession.

The student is freshman Mark Kirk, 18, from the University of Western Ontario. He was convicted in London magistrate's court Nov. 15 and put on two years' probation.

His expulsion came after a special meeting of the board of governors.

Armstrong said Tuesday: "If a student commits an offence against the law, he should be punished by the state and the state alone."

"I protest strongly the placing of students under double jeopardy by Canadian academic institutions."

Armstrong said press reports had suggested collusion between the magistrate and the university administration.

Before handing down sentence, Magistrate D. B. Menzies said the university had indicated to him they would take strong action to curtail the use of drugs on campus.

"You may not be permitted to continue your studies," the magistrate told Kirk.

Armstrong said students should receive the same treatment before the law as other Canadians.

A special meeting of the Western faculty association was called for yesterday to consider the expulsion.

Engineers were hostile to Faulkner

dent J. H. Sword today.

The motion asked that: ". . . the acts of the demonstrators against our students be viewed (by the administration) as a breach of discipline . . . Dow Chemical be officially invited back to campus to complete their interview schedule . . . if a firm guarantee of unhindered employment interviews cannot be granted the engineering society will assume all duties of the Placement Service that affect engineering student job opportunities."

Dow recruiter William White has received a letter of apology from SAC and an invitation to come back on campus endorsed by the engineering society.

But he refuses to return until he receives a letter of invitation from the university administration.

SAC President Tom Faulkner was invited to the meeting to answer questions from the engineering student body.

Most of the questions were hostile demanding explanations of what World University Service and Canadian Union of Students are.

When the engineers didn't like Faulkner's answers they booed like mooing cattle or folded the sit-in resolutions into paper planes.

Bill Charlton (II Law), an announced candidate for Faulkner's job, was sitting in the second row, occasionally gesticulating expansively as he disagreed with a Faulknerism.

Miro Forest (III APSC) shouted several times for Charlton to speak but chairman Thompson ruled him out of order.

Finally a motion was passed recognizing Charlton as a speaker.

At that point Charlton stood up, pointed to his watch, and walked out of the meeting.

Placement service should stay same

would try to separate from it.

Pearson said: "It's too early to tell that yet. A lot depends on what happens in this issue. Most engineers would be satisfied if the Placement Service continued as it has in the past, and if any future demonstrations were broken up.

"We are pleased that they understand our position but disappointed that we didn't get any firm statement."

Graduate students want a rector

LONDON (CUP) — The society of graduate students at the University of Western Ontario has accepted proxy representation on the board of governors one week after undergraduates rejected the same proposal.

The grads are prepared to be represented by a rector who is a former student or faculty member.

The undergraduates have been waging a campaign for direct student representation on the board of governors.

Two SAC seats vacated

Nominations will be held next week for two Students Administrative Council positions left vacant by the resignations of engineers Allan Bruce (III APSC) and Sheldon Goodman (III APSC).

Art McIlwain (II APSC) and Richard Seppala (IV APSC), the other engineering reps, have said they have no intention of resigning.

All nominations must be submitted to the executive assistant by 5 p.m. Tuesday.

the important things are tabled

It was with great but controlled pride that Ron Thompson presented a three-inch-thick stack of petitions to Wednesday's meeting of the Students' Administrative Council. Nearly 2,400 persons had affixed their signatures calling for Tom Faulkner's resignation on the grounds the president no longer represents the interests of the students.

After a fortunately short debate on what it all means, whether all the signatures were of students or not and whether all SAC's 54 members were being attacked, the council accepted Faulkner's resignation and made plans for an election.

After that Thompson left, not concerned with what came after. He also didn't seem to care what had come before his brief confrontation with the enemy.

But, there, immediately before the election and resignation talk, SAC had a brief stab at something that may be the council's most important contribution of the year.

But few noticed it while they concerned themselves with the witch-hunt — a vindictive campaign, council agreed, that was not only misdirected but would delay important work.

The other shame of it all is that the hunt was over an issue of such great emotional but such small concrete importance. What after all do you suppose will be the effect of a resolution passed by student politicians calling for the banning of war manufacturing companies from the campus? Idealism made it necessary for them to speak up but really, when Simcoe Hall and the Ontario Government come to make decisions on all this, do you really think they won't laugh?

But there Wednesday night was mild little Bob Bossin, SAC education commissioner, with a real contribution: one that should be so controversial that everyone should be talking about it because it could actually affect every student.

First Bossin proposed adoption of a statement of education principles based on student-centered teaching in which the student is taken as an individual, not a commodity.

Second was a report outlining plans for a summer school for inner-city high-school students to be run at U of T, under the direction of the SAC. In this school the students would be responsible for their own curriculum and discipline.

Third was a motion calling for an educational experiment at Tartu College, SAC's proposed student residence.

Fourth was a motion asking the university not to accept scholarships over $150 so that people won't be working for money but for real learning. Money should be directed to the people who need it, Bossin thinks.

He held up a sign which tells no one to enter the professor's office area except on business, quoted from a few printed sources and expressed his determination to get council talking about education. What might have been the beginning of a good debate followed.

But then council's most pressing interest at the moment intervened. Everything had to be tabled until next time because Thompson wanted to present his petition.

Earlier in the day 400 engineers gathered at Convocation Hall to impeach their SAC member Allan Bruce.

Bruce may have been one of the best members on the council this year but he wasn't an Engineering type and they dumped him.

LETTERS

students like hemblen

Sir:

In Wednesday's Varsity a letter appeared maligning Mr. David Hemblen, an Anglo-Saxon teacher at this university. It questioned the rights of Mr. Hemblen's students, his responsibility to them, and his capabilities as a representative of the teaching standards at this University.

I am a student of Mr. Hemblen's and belong to that same class which was held on the steps of Cody Hall. First of all let me state that I would have been there, had I known, for several reasons, both political and personal. But that is not the central issue in that letter. The author of that pompous masterpiece seems to have been pointing a finger declaring incompetence on Mr. Hemblen's part.

That is rubbish. Mr. Hemblen, in his teaching of Anglo-Saxon, a subject which by itself is lacking in intrinsic stimulation to say the least, has brought an active personality which gives a life, a stimulation and a feeling of value to an otherwise lifeless and seemingly valueless exercise. He has created for me and in me an interest which other students in other classes seem to be lacking.

It is therefore my opinion that Mr. Hemblen and his capabilities as a teacher, and what is more, as a man and individual, more than adequately represents the standards of this University.

This view is a consensus of the opinion that is generally held in our class. We do not feel that our rights have been violated, or in any way sacrificed by the procedure taken on the steps of Cody Hall. We in fact thank our lucky stars for having been fortunate enough to have Mr. Hemblen as an instructor.

William N. Reoch

an unfair election

Sir:

The current controversy surrounding the presidency of SAC did not have to be unsavory. The bad management of the affair, however, will have far reaching detrimental effects on both SAC and the U of T.

It is doubtful that those who are disillusioned with Mr. Faulkner's leadership intended to embroil the campus in the process of sharp division in which it now finds itself. The University of Toronto draws its strength from its diversity, from the spectrum of opinion that is always available. But now we see on the one hand an unrepresentative consolidation of the small disparate groups, which held their "meeting of togetherness" on Monday, and on the other the disgruntled engineers in association with their political allies.

Unfairness seems the order of the day. Tom Faulkner resigned. But the SAC election committee had already fixed the election date (subject to council approval) for December 14. What sort of an opportunity does this give Bill Charlton to mount his campaign.

The Ad Hoc Committee on Responsible Government is not blameless. Its action against Mr. Faulkner may easily be deemed inconsiderate at the least and irresponsible at worst. Surely they need not have asked for his resignation. Instead, he could have been presented with a list of grievances — over the same 1,600 signatures. After all, there are only three months remaining and whoever is elected now will be immaterial with respect to the regular (annual) Presidential election.

Finally, it is irresponsible on both parts to hold a significant election while claiming that campus politics are in a state of emergency. To capitalize on the current state of affairs will represent a cheap victory for either side, and undermine the validity of the next Presidential election while relevant issues could be better aired in a calmer atmosphere.

Peter Szekely (III UC)

wants full-time prexy

Sir:

I was a little concerned to read that Bill Charlton does not have the time for noon-hour campaigning because of his academic commitments, and also that he is so busy with his numerous extra-curricular activities.

It seems to me that a man who is too busy to campaign will also be too busy to serve. I want a man as SAC President who has the time to do the job.

Tony Pargerter (II UC)

logic of complicity

Sir:

We have fully seen the light and we agree 100%. Complicity at this university must end.

Napalm burns babies! Napalm is made by Dow Chemical. Chemists are employed by Dow Chemical. Organic chemists do research for Dow Chemical.

Ergo organic chemists burn babies! We therefore demand the immediate cessation of all instruction in organic chemistry at this university.

Since we do not wish to be complicit in the burning of babies, we intend to protest by not doing our organic chemistry problem sets. (They were too hard anyway.)

M. Finkelman (III P&C)
D. Martell (II P&C)

rights in perspective

Sir:

In the face of the engineers' vociferous demand for their rights, it is easy to lose a sense of perspective. Of course, they have the right to an interview — but does their self-righteous little world encompass nothing but the accumulation of money, regardless of the use to which their services are put? Perhaps there are other rights involved—such as the right of the Vietnamese peasants not to have napalm dropped on them.

Dave Priest (I New)

the real issue

Sir:

Your editorial entitled "a waste of time" proves that your stay at university has been just that, a waste of time. Since you have so totally missed the point of the coming election, I think someone must point out what is at stake.

Your comment "And yet, being the head of SAC, he is an authority figure and it is that figure the petitioners are attacking. Their attack is misguided because what they complain about wasn't done by Faulkner," shows that you have missed the entire point. The whole point is that Tom Faulkner is "an authority figure" and it is that very authority that the petitioners are attacking. Personally I think Tom Faulkner is one of the best men on SAC and a good administrator. But Tom Faulkner stands for SAC and what SAC does. For this reason he will lose the election. It is not Tom Faulkner but SAC which is facing an election. If Tom Faulkner loses the election, SAC loses the election. The students' lack of faith in SAC and what it does will clearly be shown.

The only danger involved is that the campaign will not be fought on this issue (you have already tried to ignore it). If it is not, Tom will easily win. However Tom Faulkner is too honourable to avoid the issue.

Prospero and Caliban.....

By MARTHA MACNEILL

O. Mannoni: Prospero and Caliban—The Psychology of Colonization; Praeger University Series, New York, 1964. $2.40.

Mannoni is neither a political theorist nor a social critic; he is not interested in justifying the colonial situation nor in suggesting to Europe foolproof methods of easing the pangs of decolonization. He is a psychoanalyst, and he is interested in presenting the personal aspect of the colonial situation. And it seems that the harassed and neurotic European is even incapable of dealing with the confrontation of "higher" and "lower" cultures in a direct manner. For, according to Mannoni.

Colonial problems stem from conflicts within European civilization itself, and the racialist reactions of the white man to the black are the products of elements already present in his psyche.

This generalization is examined in the light of a particular situation — the Malagasies of the French colony of Madagascar.

Many psychologists would claim that the driving force behind European civilization is an individual and collective inferiority complex. It is the need to prove his adequacy, in the face of maladjustment or failure at home, that leads the white man into the non-European world, in the first place.

In the colonial situation, the European finds ready-made superiority — "and whether he accepts it passively or seizes upon it greedily, the relationship changes him more than he it.... the colonial is not looking for profit only; he is also greedy for certain other — psychological — satisfactions, and that is much more dangerous". Colonials, whether "good" men or "bad", are not taking cognizance of real men but of their own conceptions of the "primitive"; therefore even the "dogooders" are harmful.

To illustrate his argument concerning the "colonial mentality," Mannoni turns to literature; to Robinson Crusoe and Shakespeare's The Tempest. Dafoe's story allegorizes the colonial vocation — it is "the cure of a misanthropic neurosis. His hero, who is at first at odds with his environment, gradually recovers psychological health in solitude".

Prospero represents another type of colonial European, and psychology has been presented with a new label — the Prospero complex. This a picture of "the paternalist colonial with his pride, his neurotic impatience, and his desire to dominate", and a lack of awareness of a world where others are as worthy of respect as he is.

Ariel and Caliban represent the "good" or Westernized, and the "bad" or ignorant; native, as do Man Friday and the cannihals.

Mannoni's point is that these fictional accounts are manifestations of the suppressed proto-colonial complexes latent in any one of us. In the proper social and economic situation, these complexes can no longer be suppressed. This explains the phenomenon of why so many nice, humanitarian people at home became rabid racialists and oppressors in the colonies.

But the credibility of Mannoni's understanding of the psyches at work in a colony seems to fade when he comes to analyse the native. In contrast with the European's inferiority complex, he had given the Malagasy — and by analogy all colonized "primitive" peoples — the dependence complex.

The Malagasy world is an ordered hierarchical one with authority coming from customs and one's dead ancestors. European conquerors removed the authority of the old ways, and took that authority onto themselves. The Malagasy happily accepts this new protection.

But Westernization has killed the old ways, and when the Europeans leave, the native is left in a void. Decolonization is not freedom, it is abandonment. The result is chaos — mental alienation and physical violence.

A White Psychoanalyst Looks at Colonizer and Colonized

(cont. from R-2)

Most of the natives, searching for a "father-figure" to depend on, blindly follow this or nationalist leader. And nationalism, to the mass of natives, is simply a means of restoring the ancient pattern of dependencies.

Mannoni is here trying to justify the violence of 1948 Malagasy revolution by pouring the guilt onto the European, thereby perhaps responding to his own latent "Christian" need to make atonement for all guilt.

The core of the colonial problem is not political independence or economic exploitation, but racialism. Racialism does not occur automatically when two different races meet; it develops gradually.

Surprisingly, it is European women who are the strongest racialists according to Mannoni. True to Freud, he attempts to explain this phenomenon by the sexual attraction between white men and native women, often resulting in intermarriage, and causing jealousy and resentment among the few but influential white women of the colony. But this seems a rather petty way to explain such a far-reaching and powerful emotion.

He continues that racialism really becomes manifest only when the native shows signs of breaking off his bonds of dependence on the white man:

We are perfectly happy if we can project the fantasies of our unconscious onto the outside world, but if we suddenly find that these creatures are not pure projections but real beings with claims to liberty, we consider it outrageous, however modest their claims. Further, it is not the claims themselves which makes us indignant, but the very desire for freedom.

The racialism of the native, on the other hand, is "more like the isolationism of someone looking for a new form of security than it is like the European's over-compensation for an inferiority complex". The isolationism exists as the demand for political independence — not as an end in itself, but as means to nationalism and restoration of the old dependency systems.

Half-breeds and natives who have been educated in Europe are especially dangerous because they are in an inescapable no-man's-land, never fully accepted by either coloured or white society, and therefore they become resentful of the European intruders. These men become the leaders of revolution.

Finally the "colonial psychology" has come full circle:

Today the Malagasy wants to project upon us his shortcomings and his ill intentions; he wants to find other leaders with whom to identify himself... they no longer reproach us for imposing our civilization upon them; they now accuse us of withholding it from them and of barring the path we opened up for them.

As far as the future of colonialism goes, Mannoni makes no predictions and few practical suggestions — such is not the psychologist's nor sociologist's task. This is frustrating to the reader, yet the suggestions he does advance are even more frustrating, for they show that even an objective analyst cannot escape his own prejudices.

For example, in promoting the growth of democracy, "we shall not only be liberating the Malagasy politically; we shall be contributing to his psychological liberation." In other words, psychological maturity and emancipation will come to the native only when adopts the "ideal institutions" of Europe, which Europeans themselves seem unable to handle.

Mannoni examines colonialism and decolonization from the white European's point of view, although he tries to see it as the native sees it through his analysis of dreams, poetry, etc. Frantz Fanon, a Negro in the same profession as Mannoni and a self-appointed spokesman for colonized peoples, has a radically different view.

His chapter on Mannoni in Black Skin White Masks (Grove Press, 1967) is a highly emotional one; he criticizes Mannoni for being too objective and particular in dealing with an explosive human situation, for not trying to "feel himself into the despair of the man of colour confronting the white man". He attacks Mannoni's concept of racialism — the latter says:

European civilization and its best representatives are not, for instance, responsible for colonial racialism; that is the work of petty officials, small traders, and colonials who have toiled much without great success.

The strongest racialists, that is, are those who are made to feel inferior to white men above them, and who in turn satisfy their psychological needs on the "inferior" natives.

Social position and economics have nothing to do with the case, claims Fanon — all white men are racists, and always have been, and there is no difference between colonial racism and any other kind.

Further, Mannoni leaves the colonized native with no future except the choice between dependence and inferiority. But according to Fanon, he "applies his conclusions to a bilateral totality — deliberately ignoring the fact that... the Malagasy has ceased to exist".

That is, since their conquest the Malagasies have lost their psychological separateness and become natives-with-Europeans. And they need not remain impaled on the horns of the dilemma "turn white or disappear"; they can change the social structure, through violence if necessary.

Finally, to Mannoni's idea that the Malagasy dependency complex has always been part of the native psychology, Fanon argues that only the arrival of the stronger, prouder white man produced dependency and inferiority. He is not a determinist about colonization, as Mannoni is when he states that colonized peoples have a vocation for it, a deep psychological need to be colonized, as evinced by their enthusiastic welcome of the first white men — as if curiosity needed to be thus explained by the sub-conscious.

In short, Mannoni is a white man and understands as no non-white can the inner conflicts and neuroses and seemingly irrational actions of the white colonial. And Fanon is a Negro and understand as no white man can the inner frustrations and violence and actions of the colonized native. The emotional reactions of the latter should be used as a counter to the penetrating analyses of the former to give true insight into the human effect of decolonization.

Will this be a mini or a maxi winter for you?

Will you master all the things you've wanted to (including the highest ski slopes or the most difficult figures on ice)—or will you just let winter slip by unnoticed?

There's one way to help you get the most out of winter. Use Tampax tampons. Worn internally, they're just the thing with short skating skirts or tight stretch pants. Because there's never a bulge to show. When it comes to any winter sports, you never need miss out on a day of fun.

Another great thing about Tampax tampons is that they're so easy to use, anywhere. The silken-smooth container-applier makes insertion easy; then flushes away just as the tampon does. You can carry spares without a lot of fuss and bother, too. They readily slip into your purse.

The Mothers of Invention

By AL KAMIN

There is a strong possibility that the rock group "The Mothers" (their record company curiously made them add "of Invention" to their name) will be coming to the U.C. Festival in late January.

"The Mothers" qualify as definitely the "freakiest" of the groups which are presently big on the American music scene. Led by ex-ad-man Frank Zappa, "The Mothers" come on as biting satirists of everything American—in fact, of everything human or inhuman—from Vietnam to night-clubs to sex to that "psychedelic bullshit". The only thing positive that they ever get into is instrumental excellence.

The number of "Mothers" varies from performance to performance (sometimes they bring along their children, too), and their performance is as likely to consist of an hour of jazz improvisation as it is to be an hour of verbal freakout, complete with the tossing of toys and fruit to the audience (they're really hung on prunes).

An example of their touch was to call their New York show "Absolutely Free", and then chuckle as a legion of "straights" from the suburbs collided with a man demanding $2.50 admission at the door.

Their forte is insulting their audience to its collective, stereotyped face, and then chucking at the audience, getting right into the spirit of being cool, laps it up.

Examples: "Plastic people; O, baby, you're such a drag", and "If your children found out what you're really all about, they'd kill you in your sleep."

Media (Mixed)

By JACK McCAFFREY

The first Swahili rock band in Toronto was just finishing its bit as we entered the high-ceilinged sculpture court of the Art Gallery of Ontario. Then, amid banks of flowers and flickering candles and the flashing of stroboscopic lights, we heard the tinkling of triangles and the chiming of bells, thoughtfully provided by the Stu Broomer Kinetic Ensemble.

Meanwhile, girls were passing out incense to the crowd. Finally, when all was in readiness, the happy ringing ceased.

On the movie screen in the centre of the wall appeared the main event: BILL'S HAT, a film in which various people stand before the camera and do whatever they want with this fur hat. At the same time, slides were projected onto sheets strung up around the room.

Suddenly, Broomer started banging away at the piano, repeating the same note over and over. At the same time, the tape which he had prepared began to blast through the speakers placed throughout the room.

For the first few minutes, this experiment in "expanded cinema", created by Joyce Weiland, Canadian artist and wife of Michael Snow, was mildly interesting. Incense, strobe lights, flowers, film, slides, wild electronic music, weird people — a total sensation theatre happening, right?

Unfortunately, the event went on for an hour and a half. The same images re-cured on the slides. The film was necessarily of very limited interest ((watching people wearing a hat soon becomes tiresome). The sound produced by Broomer was an unceasing roar of unremitting intensity — damn near deafening in fact. After a while, another rock group joined in to help raise the decibel count even further.

One began to fear that it would never end. But finally, one after another, the projectors were turned off, the strobe lights ceased flashing, and the candles were extinguished. And at last, the din stopped, and after a few minutes we were able to hear again.

The experience was boring and tedious. One of the problems with these so-called total sensation events is that, although the artists feel they should have complete freedom, they nonetheless impose upon the audience the restrictions of a formal concert. While the artists are free to do whatever they please, without being tied down to conventional forms, the audience is expected to just sit there and watch and listen. Perhaps if the audience were invited to actively participate in the happening, it would be interesting and exciting for them.

But, as they are now done, these events can not have any real meaning for the spectators. The very nature of a happening demands that all those who wish to take active part should have the opportunity to do so. Until the artists recognize the rights of the audience, these events are bound to be failures.

Chart Music by Contemporary Group

By PETER GODDARD

At the Faculty of Music's Concert Hall last Tuesday the Contemporary Music Group presented its second concert. Works by student composers were featured. But the most modern idiom used was by John Rea in his two chart compositions.

Chart Music allows the performer a maximum of freedom from notes, tempi, expression—in other words, from the composer. The soloists can choose not only style but content from the many possibilities present.

Opera School — Something is Always Missing

The case of University Of Toronto's Opera School is perennially absorbing. As with last week's productions of Stravinsky's Oedipus Rex, they constantly set new problems for them to solve. Bursting with will and intelligence they constantly come within a hair's breadth of an entirely perfected performance.

Yet something is always missing. One admires, but is not involved. As a group they are too technically competent to be considered amateurs; at the same time, too awed by their parts, too emotionally introverted they failed to communicate with audience. And although the production of Oedipus this year was more polished than previous works performed, the same problems existed. It left one unmoved I'm afraid to the point of paralysis.

This, perhaps, was the point of their Oedipus. With their stark, bronze-tinted sets and static stage action, the company's stylized performance remained tastefully immobile and modern. While broiling in its own somber juices, their Oedipus had not aged unbecomingly like the composer's L'Histoire d'un soldat (1917) or Ragtime (1919). In this their success lay.

But also their failure. The work is described as an opera-oratorio. Its characters are costumed but restricted in their movements: Oedipus, Creon and Jocasta use masks and move only their arms and heads. Casting his opera in an even more strict stylized mold, Stravinsky set Cocteau's version of Sophocles' play in Latin — a language which the composer described as "a medium not dead, but turned to stone, and so monumentalized as to have become immune from all risks of vulgarization."

Why then, would a predominately female chorus sing when the score called for men? For what other reason would several of the minor parts — Tiresias, Creon, and the Messenger — be better sung than the two leads? Or the orchestra botch many of its entrant-ces? Or would render the blinded king's last scene make-up to look like ketchup instead of blood?

The composer's Oedipus deals directly with the ego's pride; and with the ego's insufficiency. Having unknowingly killed his father, he has married his mother. He is begged by the people of Thebes to save them from the plague, which is destroying the city. He boasts: "Ego Oedipus" — I, Oedipus will free you. Oedipus becomes an icon, a part of the scenery, a symbol of modern man.

Perhaps the open expression of emotion is alien to Mr. Astor. For dramatically, his entire performance was a huge shrug. His face expressed desperation and strangulation but little else. Vocally, he waded through important passages with as little care for pitch and tone as for nuance.

With David Astor lost in a maze of notes, all the more importance fell upon the other lead, Nancy Greenwood as Jocasta. The strain seemed too much. Her full contralto voice was unusually subdued; the low notes just didn't sound. But while her portrayal of the Queen was more niminy-piminy than thundery-blundery, it was quite competent in a small way.

Bottom-heavy due to orchestral sloth, its top dramatically light-weight, Heinar Pillar's production was rescued by its one performer of middling importance to plot; Peter Milne as Oedipus' brother-in-law, Creon.

Milne almost succeeded in turning the performance inside out, of making it a thing of mounting and not waning excitement. For the musician, one could speak of his excellent vocal sound, a sure sense of timing, of warmth, of restraint.

On hearing Milne, one almost forgot the superficial anguish of the de facto ruler, Oedipus, his wife's inner torment, and Arnold Rubenstein's sanctimonious narration of the plot. Almost, but not quite.

"We must face the fact that, in the past, what we called the movement has not really questioned the middle class values and institutions of this country. If anything it has accepted those values and institutions without fully realizing their racist nature. Reorientation means an emphasis on the dignity of man, not on the sanctity of property."

Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America, Stokely Carmichael and Charles V. Hamilton, Vintage Books, $2.25.

There are few people in SNCC or any of the other militant black liberation movements of America, who will deny that the euphoric, romantic civil rights movement of the early sixties played a significant role in the development of black power, and the consciousness of black power. It is equally true that the continued existence of that movement,—with its emphasis on "integration," "equality" and black and white bands joined together in the belief that happiness was a freedom song, voter registration and the right to urinate beside a white cracker in his own washroom,—was a genuine threat and obstacle to fundamental cultural, economic and political liberation for the black man in America.

The movement was, perhaps, a necessary evil, in that its failure to achieve its limited goals revealed the necessity to re-evaluate the efficacy of its methods; more important, it called into question the value and worth of the goals themselves, as they were the rhetoric of a white middle class America whose ardent liberals had some faith in the American myth and invited black America to take part in that myth.

If the movement accomplished anything, it revealed the fundamental hoax of that myth, and the intransigence of its perpetrators when confronted with the prospect of a black movement which denied the validity of that myth, and spoke of liberation in its own terms, and not those formulated for them by white America. Quite simply, it seemed that white America was saying to the black man, "Your grievances are just and I will support your struggle for freedom; I will even send my sons and daughters to Mississippi; I will give you money, write letters to my Congressman and carry a sign in a march when things get tough. Freedom now! — er, but one thing brother, Freedom means the same thing to both of us, right?"

Wrong. It became clear that the right to define the implications of freedom was in itself the most fundamental of rights; the civil rights movement as understood by most white Americans naturally presupposed a definition of freedom whose ultimate fulfillment was equality and integration — or assimilation. Black Americans—who have traditionally been excluded from the decision making processes of American life, whose history as a people in America is unique as they were once considered legal property, and who still suffer the implications of that history both in

"We are speaking, rather, of those whites who see the need for basic change and have hooked up with the black liberation movement because it seemed the most promising agent of change. Yet they often admonish black people to be non-violent. They should preach non-violence in the white community. Where possible, they might also educate other white people to the need for Black Power."

NO VIETNAMESE EVER AND NEITHER DID

Harlem and Mississippi,— may have some questions about the basic tenets of the system which failed to include them as equals. It may be that they have some different ideas — i.e. their own — about what freedom will mean for them, and the methods they should adopt for achieving it. It becomes a question of whether the black man should accept the bits and pieces of freedom which the white man is willing to give him (and even they are woefully few), or to create his own concept of freedom, based on his own needs — even if that freedom is at odds with the interests of the established structures of power in America.

The whole ethos which surrounded the days of civil rights was seen in retrospect by many black Americans as one of charity — as if support for integration and assimilation was a charitable gesture by white America. Many people speak of the Democratic Party of the United States as the one which gave the Negro the right to vote, yet the reality is more clearly expressed by Hamilton and Carmichael in Black Power "But the Democratic Party did not give black people the right to vote; it simply stopped denying black people the right to vote." It was a gesture surrounded with the sentiment of charity, much as is the benevolence of the middle-class businessmen of our communities in the Kiwanis clubs who take around Christmas turkeys to those "less fortunate."

Black Power is the expression of the thinking black man who says "We don't want your turkey. As a matter of fact we don't even need it."

Thus, white America looks around to-day with a sense of bewilderment and betrayal as the movement for Black liberation begins to create its own language and its own terms. The bewilderment is much the same which a well meaning parent feels when his favourite son leaves home to find responsibility on his own terms, and not those of his parents. It is the paternalism of the civil rights movement which white liberals have yet to outgrow, and which the advocates of Black Power must seek to dispel among their own people.

The concept of Black Power, then, does not emerge as a retaliatory measure because the civil rights movement failed to give more than a minimum assurance of certain goals — despite the rhetoric and legislation from Congress, — but as an expression of genuine self determination which does not seek to impose a reverse racism, but to take up where the white man failed in America. Malcom X found white Arabs in Africa with whom he was able establish bonds of mutual

How To Succeed? A Qualified Success

By ALAN GORDON

There are very few musical comedies around that can boast an intelligent book. Little Me is one, Guys and Dolls is another, but as far as I'm concerned, the champion of them all is How To Succeed in Business Without Really Trying. Abe Burrows, the mastermind behind the script, has seen to it that the story of Finch's blithe rise from window-washer to chairman of the board, made possible with a little instruction manual, is as economical as possible. All laugh lines contribute to both plot and character. The characters are as winning and representative of the businessman and his situation as were the Broadway types that populated Guys and Dolls. There is the same plausible, coherent insanity running through both shows. The reason these shows stand up so well, and have the same basic ingredients is due in no small part to the fact that the composer and lyricist, Frank Leasser and writer-director Abe Burrows served on both shows.

So, the raw material that the St. Michael's College students had to work with was perfect for the college show set-up. What the kids lacked in technical proficiency, we assumed, they would more than make up for with their innate animal vitality, high spirits or whatever. Judging from the dress rehearsal on Wednesday night, just the opposite has happened. The singing voices were excellent, the dancing numbers came off with amazing skill, and very few lines were lost. The show was audible. No one made any mistakes. Everyone did, it seems, just what they were asked to do. No more.

And that I think is where the canker gnaws. There were few moments of madness, of any real exploring into the comic possibilities of the text. Instead of a wicked gleam in Finch's eye, we were given a glassy stare. Instead of the frantic egocentric scramblings that a Frump requires, we get a polite, almost subservient office boy. The text requires broad, cartoon-like overstatement, but here, the audience is subjected to careful, greyish hedging. Hedy, the sexy secretary responsible for Finch's downfall is required to have orange hair, not mousey brown. That one little shortcoming in the St. Michael's production is symptomatic of the whole of the show. The play is written as a caricature and is produced here like an underdeveloped photograph.

There are some delightful performances, however. As Hedy La Rue, Mary Schlueter finds most of the humor in the text and John McAndrew generally is quite good as J. B. Biggley. But the one performer who managed to find the madness and manic geniality that his part required was Greg Haber in the dual role of Twimble/Womper. Linda Flitton overcame some of the silly choreography given her in the New Rochelle number to give us a convincing sketch of Rosemarv.

Stanton Morris as Finch is a study of alchemy in reverse. He has turned a part of gold into brass and robbed the role of all its vitality and charm. The boy can sing, but his terrific singing voice is unfortunately no substitute for acting ability.

Luckily, the show is indestructible. It is so tight broad, and clean, that there is hardly any room for error. As a result of this, as well as the excellent work done by David Warrack, the musical director who has fashioned an orchestra and chorus of astonishing ability, the evening is a qualified success.

Underpants — Let Down

By DAVID PAPE

What could be worse! Her underpants fell down just as the Kaiser went by, inviting upon Frau Maske the wrath of a husband, the scorn of the town, the ardent seductions of a writer and one insipid barber, and the pandaring lasciviousness of an ugly and frustrated neighbour. What could be worse.

The Underpants by Carl Sternheim, and now at the Coach House, is meant — according to Sternheim — to teach a brutal lesson, to expose outdated clichés. Eric Bentley, the translator says "nothing in literature shows more clearly . . . the social roots of Nazism".

Underpants taught no brutal social lesson. What was exposed was an ignorant egotistical society with flimsy and complacent standards; a society unconcerned with human feelings as much as its overblown egotism; a society with recourse to schnaps, Nietzsche, mutton, and Wagner, but rarely to life.

The play seems always just to miss the point. It is no more about underpants than Othello is about handkerchief.

The expose, as you can tell, is superficial. The characters only hint of believability. But then again, perhaps they really were unbelievable!

The acting threw only momentary light on the script. The show was well-paced by Wendy Butler. Parts were genuinely laughable, and sometimes touching. The love proclamation by David Rowe as Scarron, to Judy Darragh as Luise Maske had real life. Keith Melville's nervousness was often well handled and provided good smugness to the bovine smugness of the others. Phyllis Benvenuto as the neighbour had a laugh that condensed all the disgusting bourgeois filthiness of the play.

However the acting was usually stiff and unsure. Repeatedly actors called each other by the wrong name. Bill Butler, as the obtuse civil servant and husband, made little contact with anyone else on stage, despite all his shouting.

Frankly I am unsympathetic to this sort of play. I chuckle at the jokes, at the deceit and buffoonery. But I leave, and wonder why I've bothered. If theatre is to continue to be meaningful, then producers must ask themselves carefully "Why bother?"

Perhaps more sense of the period was necessary. Perhaps less distracted acting. Perhaps more poetry from the writer, Scarron. Or perhaps the U of T Alumnae ought to choose a better play for their efforts.

FILM

Notes From The Underground

By K. KLONSKY

Two of the most notable "underground" films are now showing quite above ground to packed houses at Cinecity. The first is Kenneth Anger's "Scorpio Rising," and the second, Robert Downey's "Chafed Elbows."

"Scorpio Rising" is an explicit and horrifying film. The darting camera traces a few hours in the life of an American motorcycle gang. Anger's thesis, and he makes it a plausible one, is that these animals are actually the most religious members of their society. They have their appropriate gods: Marlon Brando, James Dean, and, of course, Adolph Hitler, the latter associated with power, sadism and death. This new religions blares with cheap rock and roll music and glares with skulls and gaudy colors, while the old religion, Jesus and his apostles performing miracles, flashes on meekly in black and white. The gang, meanwhile, performs sick and blatant acts of homosexual sado-masochism. It is true that they are creatures of arrested development closely perusing the Sunday funnies and worshipping their own bodies, but it is also true, as it was of Hitler, that they are unmatched today for total and unthinking commitment to a creed. There lies Anger's basis for the religious parallels throughout the film. "Scorpio Rising" is a chilling and grotesque view of the Second Coming.

Robert Downey's "Chafed Elbows" is a lopsided "Catcher in the Rye." Perversion is banded so flippantly that one views it as a commonplace. Walter Dinsmore is the central character who, like Holden Caulfield, is prone to periodic nervous breakdowns. But the people in Walter's life are blown completely out of proportion so as to satirize the various institutions they represent. Walter sleeps with his toothless mother, visits a chrome-domed psychiatrist who has a sign in his office: "Triple Orgasm Makes Double Hernia," and bribes unwashed policemen. The church (one never sees a clergyman) is empty except for Walter, a sleeping youth and a girl who is fixated on sniffing dirty sweat socks. The sharpest cut is a Long Island Bar Mitzvah at which Walter is hired by the caterer to distribute olives. Instead, he copulates with a guest on the roof. There is some deft camera work in "Chafed Elbows," especially some expressive still shots. The only near approximation that Hollywood has made to this film is "Lord Love A Duck" but the Hollywood version has neither the improvisations nor the subtlety of "Chafed Elbows."

The underground films, in their disregard for linear plot and other such conventions, are performing a needed service to the art of film. It is probable that Anger and Downey are doing for the "talkies" what the German Expressionists did for the modern theatre. Cinema history can now be seen at Cinecity.

Frantz Fanon: Human Power Advocate

By GEORGINA STEINSKY

Come then comrades, it would be as well to decide at once to change our ways. We must shake off the heavy darkness in which we are plunged and leave it behind . . . What we want is to go forward all the time, night and day, in the company of Man, in the company of all men . . . It is a question of the Third World starting a new history of man . . . For Europe, for ourselves and for humanity, comrades, we must turn over a new leaf, we must work out new concepts and try to set afoot a new man.

—The Wretched of the Earth

These are the charismatic pleas of one who fervently believes in the power of Man to shape and improve his destiny. Yet, it is significant that these messianic cries with their reference to Europe and the third world of emerging nations evoke political and social realities of the last two decades. How, one might ask, can commentary on these realities be transformed into a prescription for the salvation of the human spirit?

This was the personal undertaking of Frantz Fanon, the author of the words cited above. Both in his writings and in the events of his life Fanon is, in some ways, reminiscent of the ideal Renaissance figure; he was a peculiar blend of the poet-scholar and scientist, of the contemplator of life and active participant in it. But this was not human totality of the 1600 or 1700's: Fanon considered himself very much a man of the twentieth century, and as such, saw in new nationalism the potential for the development of an ideological base for a new humanism. Born in 1925 in the then-French colony of Martinique in the Antilles, Fanon was educated and moulded in a French cultural and intellectual tradition. After the second world war, when 10,000 white refugees flooded into his home islands, having been trained as a psychiatrist he became interested in the consciousness of 'Negro-ness' that this immigration brought to himself and his fellow members of the black population. In this experience originated a medical thesis on the psycho-pathology of the Negro which in 1952 was elaborated in a book entitled Peau Noire, Masques Blancs. (Black Faces, White Masks).

Shortly afterward, Fanon's medical profession took him as a French civil servant to Algeria. Within a year of his arrival the Algerian uprising began. It was in the African colonial context that Fanon's understanding of the black man's dilemma took a structural reality; in the nationalist struggles for freedom from colonial power he envisioned a possible solution to the race problem. For him, such movements as Algeria's National Liberation Front could constitute forces of the Revolution that would "transform men and bring about a new society". (L'An V de la Revolution Algerienne). In 1956 he renounced his status as a civil servant. From then, until 1960 he became an urgent voice and force in the fight for African independence. As an intellectual who made frequent public appearances and participated in the formation of a distinctly African culture, he attempted to render comprehensible and give direction to the social, economic, and political situations in which the Africans found themselves. As a political militant his activities included journalism for the El Moujahid, the organ of the Algerian National Liberation Front; medical work in Algerian army field camps in Tunis; and the organization of aid for guerrilla warriors in Angola. But the conferring of independence on all French colonies in 1960 represented a savage betrayal of the Revolution for Fanon. By the failure of the new nationalists to understand the essence of de-colonization, an era of neo-colonialism would be born, in which the progressive processes of human history would be frustrated. As his last written mission — The Wretched of the Earth — Fanon attempted to point out their errors and propose correctives that could make of the third world a truly renewed one. In 1961 he died of leukemia.

Equipment for a lab course

In a lifetime of lectures, you'd never learn what the world is really like. You have to see it — the laboratory with three billion teachers. You might learn political economy from a Muscovite (or English from a Cockney bartender). Discover high finance in a Caribbean marketplace (or sales psychology in a Paris souvenir shop). Get a fresher course in ancient history (or just about anything) from a cabbie in Rome. Or be taught something new and unforgettable somewhere on your own continent. When you're ready to take the lab course in learning (and living it up), call Air Canada. We've got a good way to get you to class.

It is interesting to trace the interrelationship between Fanon's humanistic aspirations and the empirical and theoretical arguments which he provides to assure his readers that these hopes are realizable. The opening pages of his first book, "the psychoanalytical interpretation of the black problem" (Fanon) clearly do not reflect the cold, impersonal man of science:

*Why write this book?
Toward a new humanism...
Understanding among men...
Our coloured brothers...
Mankind I believe in you...
Race prejudice...
To understand and to love...*

Nevertheless empirical evidence abounds. Using analytic materials of the pre-war "American sociology of race-relations", Fanon seeks to demonstrate that "Negrophobia arises from the sexual repression Europeans (as a collectivity) underwent in the process of striving for high achievement". (A. S. Zolberg, "Frantz Fanon," Encounter, November, 1966 (Blackness of skin as an outlet for this repression became identified as being evil, ugly, and sinful. Through contact with the European, the Negro becomes a "victim of the white civilization" (Fanon); that civilization imposes upon his psychic being its own manicheistic collective unconscious of "Good-Evil, Beauty-Ugliness, White-Black". (Fanon) Subsequently, the Negro race acquires a "collective neurosis"; its psychological existence is white; but its skin is black.

Once Fanon puts forward this thesis and documents it through the invocation of scholarly authorities and actual experiments, he moves into that indefinable realm of a-racial, "universal" values in proposing a means to overcome the dilemma he has graphically outlined:

In order to terminate this neurotic situation, in which I am compelled to choose an unhealthy, conflictual solution, fed on fantasies, hostile, inhuman in short, I have only one solution: to rise above this absurd drama that others have staged round me, to reject the two terms that are equally unacceptable, and, through one human being, to reach out for the universal.

Although such conclusions may be spiritually and aesthetically inspiring, they seem too intellectualized and philosophic to be concretely convincing.

However, in The Wretched of the Earth, the theoretical musings of the first tome blend with the author's understanding of actual circumstances and become embodied in militant political ideology. Transition from the psychiatrist's to the ideologue's pen can be detected in a speech Fanon delivered in 1956. There racism is viewed as a "necessary ideological weapon that accompanies domination". (Racism and Culture) Evidently, Fanon's Algerian days enabled him to transfer his concept of the black man's collective neurosis into a colonial setting where the colonized natives were tyrannized human beings at the economic and psychic mercy of the colonizer. Theoretically, both books are the same: the European colonial imposes a neurotic Manichean world view on the colonized.

Yet in a colony with liberation fronts and organizations for freedom, Fanon no longer needs to propose vague, existential, rise-to-the-challenge-as-a-man solutions. Here, the neurotics themselves, the wretched of the earth are capable not only of overthrowing the colonial system, but more importantly, rising to new manhood in the course of the fight.

This is why Fanon saw 1960 as a betrayal of the Revolution. For, spiritual catharsis of the colonized entails more than mere national consciousness. A clear understanding of the intellectual, institutional, economic, as well as psychic nature of colonialism is required. Consequently, Fanon's dismal view of European society in essentially Marxian terms, leads him to conclude that the bourgeoisie and proletariat classes of urban colonial centres are corrupt extensions of the rottenness of Westernized life. Hope for purgation lies in the awakening of political consciousness of the uncontaminated populations of rural areas and in the fringes of the city. The vehicle for their activation is conflict against the force which has suppressed them. Violence, then, becomes a sacred necessity for human cleansing. In these terms, the Revolution does become a spiritual liberation of man; at its heart is the psychological rebirth it brings about.

And yet, Fanon's significance as an ideologue is difficult to assess. His intense humanism in thought and deed make him an appealing personality. Moreover, his emphasis on the necessity of violence to curtail the subjugation of man by man, has a contemporary North American ring, when one considers the bewilderment of American liberal politicians at the failure of their jobs-and-food policies to assimilate the Negro into the "American way of life". On the other hand, can the violence which he advocates remain an entirely "pure" phenomenon as he and his intellectual predecessor Sorel (Reflections Concerning Violence) believed it would? Or, is it possible that the ambiguities of human egotism could undermine its sacramental nature, so that Fanon's "fiercely humanistic spirit" would be "consumed in a final tragic irony" (Zolberg).

FILM

A great week-end for silents! The Memory Lane Film Club, 602A Markham St, 923-2838, presents Eisenstein's Potemkin Sunday and kicks off a D. W. Griffith festival with Birth of a Nation at the little Queen Victoria Cinema, 801 Yonge St., 929-3027, today and tomorrow. The Elektra, 362 College, has an excellent December line-up of films starting Monday with The Face of Another by Hiroshi Teshigahara, director of Woman in the Dunes, and Georges Franju's Eyes Without a Face. Olivier's Othello will be shown Saturday and Sunday in The Crest's Festival of the Arts.

THEATRE

So Metro is now in show-biz. We can own the O'Keefe Centre. And it's a good deal, because the LAND is valuable! Not while the O'Keefe Centre is on it and losing money it isn't! Does this mean that prices are going to be lower and everyone in Metro can to the O'Keefe whenever they want? Does this mean that Metro is going to insure high-quality theatre? I doubt it. It probably means that the place will be torn down to make room for a parking lot ... or something that pays its way. Why does everyone expect Theatre to pay its way? The beauty of subsidized theatre, and that's what this recent development is, is that daring things can be attempted. Can you see that kind of thing happening in Toronto, where prurience reigns supreme?

Anyway, The Devils is at Hart House theatre, Underpants is at the Coach House, How to Succeed is at Ryerson theatre. Next week Cartwright Hall hosts the Trinity College Dramatic Society's Tom Thumb and The Babies Evenings.

Next week, Married Alive! moves into the O'Keefe Centre, and Tiger at the Gates enters Hart House Theatre.

This weekend also will have Martin Brenzell's production of Ghosts in Scarborough (call 261-3053 for tickets) and at Scarborough College. Look Back in Anger will be on view. Busy.

MUSIC

Whatever The Sights and Sounds of Ferrante and Teichner might be, they will be revealed this Saturday at 8:25 p.m. with the TS at Massey Hall. Sunday, violinist David Oistrakh will be at Massey Hall. The same day, the U of T Concert Band will give its initial concert at the Edward Johnson Bldg's MacMillan Theatre. And Elmer Eisler's Festival Singers will give a choral concert, at Hart House. The band concert is in the afternoon, the choral, Sunday evening. But perhaps the most significant thing to happen musically for Toronto was evident in New York's reception of U of T's Orford Quartet Carnegie Hall concert. The Times' review, although perfunctory, was favourable. "There suddenly is half a dozen absolutely world-class young groups in action," it ran, "and to that heartening list the name of the Orford String Quartet may now be added." z boehm

MISC.

Tonight, the School of Architecture will be presenting a sensory bonanza: a light show at 8:30 by Michael Haydn (designer of the UC Psych-Fest Environment Rooms last year), with exhibitions, environments, refreshments and music by The Sun Cycle. If the architects maintain their usual Insanity Quotient, is should be a wild night.

Random, after a very disappointing start this year, with two unattractive, not very readable 24 page issues, has become a weekly.

At the risk of sounding like sour grapes (as an editor of Random) I was even more disappointed by the weekly version than I was by the magazines. I seriously wonder what the point is of a four-page weekly offset paper.

The only apparent point seems to be to give Mike Ignatieff and John Caulfield a mouthpiece to write weekly editorials. However, Ignatieff's articulate moderation-cum-angry liberal realism may soon conflict with Caulfield's angrier, often more radical point of view.

Even aside from this, though, it seems a shame that magazine journalism should be abandoned for weekly editorializing. G. F.

BLOC - NOTES

A LETTER TO THE EDITOR

Sir:

Brian Cruchley's article on Toronto newspapers (Review Nov. 17) neglected to mention the main reason The Star found itself matching The Globe so frequently last summer:

The Star, to provide on-job training for journalism students, gave jobs to 16 students last summer, among them Brian Cruchley. Not all of them covered their assignments as well as they should, something we were reminded of nightly when The Globe came out.

But, as The Star's training supervisor, I wouldn't want to make the same mistake of sweeping generalization that Mr. Cruchley made. I am proud of many of last summer's students.

But any reporter — senior or junior — who admits that his method of "matching" an opposition story is to read it to a contact, having that contact say "yes" after each sentence, is in effect making a public announcement that he's following the wrong career.

Frank Kennedy,
Assistant City Editor,
TORONTO DAILY STAR

A REPLY

Perhaps in evaluating Toronto newspapers, I was guilty of overstating my point to project a convincing argument, but not more guilty than Mr. Kennedy is in attempting to refute one small part of that argument.

I feel there is value in a certain amount of matching and scalping at The Star. Since Canada's largest newspaper has more column inches to devote to the news, there's no reason why The Star shouldn't cover all the worthwhile news items The Globe carries.

However many paranoid assistant city editors at The Star feel that they should cover everything The Globe covers.

As an example: last summer on a sleepy afternoon I covered a committee meeting at City Hall and wrote an inconsequential story about three women who were upset at a moving company that had damaged their furniture.

I handed the story in at six p.m. and went home thinking the story would be, at best, a filler.

The Globe ran a story on the women and the movers on page one in the 10 p.m. first edition. The Star rewrite men phoned me, asked me what went on at the meeting, then read me The Globe story asking if it was correct.

I replied it was, but said I felt The Globe had approached the story from the wrong angle.

Next day the first edition of The Star ran the story on page one, written like The Globe story and not mine, even though I had been at the meeting.

In later editions of The Star, some editor finally realized there was little news value in the story, took it off page one, and put it in an obscure position in the paper. B.C.

AN EPISODIC FILM

By STEPHEN KATZ

Since the book Don Quixote is a diffuse thousand pages in length any movie version of it must necessarily be episodic. The Russian film shown last week in the New Yorker's current series omits many of the more humorous peripheral adventures, and concentrates on the major theme; it is a more concentrated, less rambling narrative, and consequently more powerful than the original novel.

The Russian tendency towards high theatricality is wholly appropriate here. The lampooning and slapstick are replaced by biting, bitter satire, with particular emphasis laid on the social aspects. The characterization is laid in with broad, rich strokes and even the least important characters are memorable.

One of the first colour movies to come out of Russia, the film is shot in strange, drab tones which are initially disturbing but which eventually seem to enhance the mood of the picture.

Don Quixote has never received the recognition it deserves. It is interesting to see how the Russians have treated a classic from a society so different to their own. Their treatment is modern in concept but extraordinarily close, in total effect, to the novel. A masterful piece of work.

Montreal translates Realist passage

MONTREAL (CUP) — "That" paragraph has hit the University of Montreal.

Le Quartier Latin, the university's student newspaper, has published a French translation of the paragraph from Paul Krassner's U.S. magazine The Realist.

The paragraph caused a stir when published in The McGill Daily and the University of Toronto's Varsity earlier this month.

The passage was reprinted in the same format as it appeared in The Daily, as part of an article entitled Pornography. The article explained the context in which The Realist originally published it.

"Habitual pornography has a social function of diversion (particularly in American society)," said the article. "It makes palatable the problems and platitudes of daily life."

Since pornography is so widespread it loses its effect, the article explains.

"On the contrary, Krassner uses common pornographic techniques and ties it into a political critique."

This increases the shock value of the satire, says the article.

Bertrand Lapalme, managing editor of the Quartier Latin, reported yesterday that there has been no campus reaction to the article.

Students may pay for 'Booxodus' damage

Ryerson President F. C. Jorgenson hinted Monday that students may have to pay for damage to books and facilities that took place during last week's "Booxodus."

The chief librarian said last week that as many as 300 books were missing after the student protest and estimated their average cost at $15 per book.

In a letter addressed to the Daily Ryersonian editor, President Jorgenson stated, "I am not prepared to ask the taxpayers of Ontario to pay the cost of overtime work and lost and damaged books which resulted from the irresponsible and destructive demonstration."

He called the demonstration "an insult to library staff."

The letter raps students council President Janet Weir, CUS chairman Carol Garfinkle, and Ryersonian editors John Hewer and Matt Radz and "other persons connected with the demonstration" for not formally consulting the director of student affairs, David Crombie.

Mr. Crombie has been asked to determine how the cost of book damage and over time can be recovered.

Asked how he intends to recoup the losses if the taxpayer isn't asked, Mr. Crombie replied, "Somebody has to pay for it."

"I'll call a meeting of the people involved and try and work it out," he said.

"The budget for the 1968-69 fiscal year has already been approved and it is hard to change it," he explained. "This year would be impossible."

He said the timing of the protest was bad because nothing more could be done about the library now. To be successful, it would have to have taken place 18 months in advance of the present library budget.

BC rally raises money for education

VANCOUVER (VNS)—A rally to raise money for higher education in British Columbia was kicked off Wednesday by speakers blasting the provincial government for denying money to post-secondary institutions.

The 1,000 student rally is part of a 10-point education action program proposed by the Alma Mater Society at the University of British Columbia.

The program calls for students to meet with government representatives, to petition for support for education, and to write letters to the provincial parliament.

Don Munton, education committee chairman, says higher education in B.C. is facing a real crisis.

"It is predicted that university enrolment in Canada will double in the next 10 years. Instead of meeting this challenge, UBC has announced enrollment may be cut next year," he said.

Munton hopes the rally will gain the support of students and the public, thereby exerting pressure on the government.

Speaking against the Social Credit government, Dr. Pat McGeer, a Liberal MLA said, "I'm good and mad at the way the government has treated education."

"Education should command the highest priority, but it doesn't due to the ingrained prejudice of those in political power." NDP member Dave Barrett agreed with McGeer that the need for more money was real and immediate.

"Education is the key to the future," Barrett said. "But in this province it's only a political priority."

"Students don't threaten the government politically, so their needs are minimized by the government."

Secord member Herb Capozzi disagreed: "I am not here to make excuses. I don't have to because I feel education is top priority in BC."

"Money must be spent on the development of the province if there are to be jobs for students when they graduate."

"I don't feel sorry for you," he told the students. "You are very lucky, getting an education in a beautiful institution like this."

"No student with the proper qualifications will ever be turned away from an institution of higher education in B.C.," said Capozzi. "I'll write that down for you if you like."

An unidentified student copied the statement down and asked Capozzi to sign it. He refused.

York committees approve student reps

Student representation has been approved on three faculty administration committees at York University following a secret meeting of the advisory committee on student affairs.

The students will be chosen by Henry Best, the director of student affairs, and will sit on the campus planning advisory committee, the presidential committee, the committee on the use and allocation of university facilities, and the subcommittee on parking.

Mr. Best said he will ask for volunteers from each of the college councils.

Senator O'Leary is new Queens rector

KINGSTON (CUP) — Senator Gratton O'Leary has been acclaimed rector of Queen's University.

George Carson, student union president and the only student left in the race for the position, dropped out Tuesday night.

As rector, Senator O'Leary will represent the students' interests on the board of trustees.

This was the first year the position of rector was contested by a student.

VANCOUVER (Special) — The University of British Columbia is considering adopting a subjective system of grading similar to that recently instituted at Yale University.

Yale University abolishing numerical grading in favor of a system of grading students in four categories: honours, high pass, pass and fail.

Acting UBC President Walter Gage says four categories would not be sufficient for UBC.

Dean of science Vladimir Okulitch protested that subjects such as mathematics aren't conducive to a subjective marking system.

Dean of arts Dennis Healey said: "We're making increasing use of computers now and you can't feed letters into a computer." Acting-President Gage said: It would become hard to decide winners of scholarships. We might lose some very important scholarships because we had no way of deciding on the winners." Students transferring to another university would have to get faculty evaluations. UBC consultant psychiatrist Dr. Conrad Schwarz maintained that a more general system of grading would help to relieve competition pressure.

PHE 7-a-side rugger champs

By GELLIUS

Inter practice

RUGGER

The suspense is over; yes, the 7-a-side rugger championship has been decided and U of T students, caught up in the play-off drama, can once again return to making love, expecting rain, burning babies, and playing 23-a-side rugger and indulging in the other intellectual activities that keep U of T velutting like a tree with age. PHE blanked Scarborough 11-0 to take the title. Paul Slean scored two tries, one of which he converted, for PHE; Bobbett had the other three points.

LACROSSE

Law, led by Don Arthurs' sparkling 5-goal performance, ate PHE B alive in Thursday's semi-final Gary Grierson (4), Hill (2), Davies (2), Pashby (2), and Major rounded out Law's scoring. Gibbins with 2, Muraki, Mackay and Karrandas! scored for PHE B (pr. Phoebe). In other games, Vic defeated Knox 13-3 and PHE A felled Forestry 11-2. PHE A meets Vic to-day in the other semi-final.

HOCKEY

Trin A, led by Akiyama, Denison, and Llewellyn (pr. Phoebe), edged Sr. Eng., 3-2. Dave Snowball, the coolest player on the ice, and Leonard scored for Skule.

Murray Brunskill's 2 goals

Varsity Inkmen after 7th straight

As the main attraction to Friday night's hockey action at Varsity Arena, is an obvious mismatch between the Varsity Inkmen (us scribes) and the tubemen upstairs, Radio Varsity.

Heading the prospective onslaught is leftwinger, backroom Bob Parkins, centered by persistent Pawl Carson, and on the extreme right, ace wrestler, football player, what have you, pale-face Laurie Redman.

Other secret weapons for Inksters, undefeated in six years, are Brian Cruchley at the extreme center, monster Mike Kesterton, frank Dave Rank, putrid Paul Macrae, Cim Tolten, intellect Jim Cowan, and delightful distaf-sparkled UC to a 4-1 win over Dents, Werbicki and Nabeta (UC) and Glazier (Dents) also scored goals.

Meds A and Jr. Eng., on goals by Myers and Lenczer respectively, fought to a 1-1 draw.

Vic II lambasted New, 4-1, on goals by the Wright, Bromnlee, Clark and Ouchterlony. Ireland scored for New.

Law II emasculated Forestry, 2-0, on goals by Danson and Major.

BASKETBALL

Sr. Eng. took a tight one from Meds A 27-24, led by Slekys with 7 points. Lloyd Rossman (who, according to a usually reliable source in the State Department will probably go on the next Harlem Globetrotters good-will tour to Tierra del Fuego, Carp, and Malagasy) had 8 for Meds.

Trinity just squeezed by the surprisingly strong New Gnus (a gnu is a small South African antelope, cousin to the ipanema), 37-33. Bowen had 11 for Trin; Anderson led New with 10.

Agar and Walt Bahis scored 8 each, making 16 in all, as Dents A topped SMC B, 43-40.

Erindale appeared out of nowhere i.e. Mississauga Road, to crush Meds B, 43-25. Lochinvar Sprogs came out of the West with 16 points for Erindale.

Blues shuffle off to Buffalo

By JIM MORRISON

Varsity basketball Blues head south of the border this weekend for their annual humiliation at the hands of quality American opposition. Friday night, Buffalo will provide the opposition, and on Saturday Buffalo State.

Coach John McManus intends to field the maximum ten man unit for the excursion. Starting at the guard position will be veterans Bruce Dempster and Mark White; they will be backed up by rookies Joe Faust and Larry Trafford, plus Albie Garbe, who played for Blues two seasons ago.

Lanky John Hadden starts the game at the centre slot, with rookie Brian Shaw as backup man. Arvo Neidre will work from forward spot, and either Mark Slater or Mike Kirby will try the other. Kirby is also available for pivot service.

A major blow to Blues' aspirations this year was the injury suffered a week ago by newcomer Ron Voake. Voake, a San Diego native and graduate of Pomona College, will be lost until after Christmas with a badly burned arm. Until the injury, his experience and steady play had won him a starting role at forward.

Blues' chief liability this year is their scoring, or lack of it. This was demonstrated in their 77-67 victory Wed. night over Ryerson, a basically mediocre team. Mark White led Toronto scorers with 23 points, but the other Blues, with the exception of Albie Garbe, had off nights.

Blues so far have not found anyone to take up the scoring slack created by the loss of Jim Holowacubuk and Nolan Kane, who between them averaged some 35 points a game last year. Unless Blues uncover a hot hand to take the scoring burden from Dempster, White and Neidre, it could be a long season.

COURT CHATTER: University of Buffalo have their "best team ever" according to press release . . . last year's scores were, Buffalo 88- Varsity 55, and Buffalo State 92-Varsity 69 . . . Windsor Lancers opened the SIBL season with a 107-79 victory over Guelph . . . Bob Navetta led Lancers with 25-Hammond had 34 for Guelph . . . Windsor are without Kwiatkowski, Mazzuchin, and Tarasuck this year—all three were starters on last year's championship squad.

fers Donni Bohnen and Apathy Adams. Between the grips is phosphorescent Phil Bingley.

Howie Fluxgold will play. The mismatch takes place following the preliminary contest between Blues and Queen's. Party following of course. Even nonparticipant staffers are welcome at the party.

Rag-tag and bobtail, Meds try to no avail: Vic wins

By JIM MORRISON

Meds scored 12 points in the Mulock Cup game played Wednesday, all in the first half. Their opponents could manage no points in the first half. Meds quarterback, Paul Dedumets, was simply superb throughout the game as his roll-out patterns and pro-bullet passes left the enemy defenses befuddled.

Meds piled up more than 300 yds. total offense as their attack ground out yardage throughout the game. Despite their motleyness they played inspired football for the entire 60 minutes. Coming from the second division into the Mulock Cup was a tremendous achievement for the doctors, and to play so well was illustrious icing on the cake. Vic won the game 15-12.

The villain's name was Roger Giroux, and his powerful running almost singlehandedly salvaged the victory for the Scarlet and Gold. Trailing 12-8 with four minutes to play, Vic exploded into the lead on a Giroux plunge of eight yards, set up by Giroux runs of 33 and 28 yards. Pete Marshall added the convert.

Meds opened the scoring on the first play of the second quarter with an eight yard TD toss from Paul Dedumets to Craig Retter. This was followed by a thirteen yard pass-and-run play featuring Dedumets and Nick Malakis, which gave the doctors their commanding lead.

But in the second half, Vic's superior conditioning began to pay off, as medsmen bobbled on and off the field with every play. Desperate for valuable field position, Dedumets, with third down on the Vic five yard line, conceded a safety touch.

But the move didn't succeed. Vic took over the ball at midfield after a Meds punt, and with a penalty, advanced to the Meds 41 yard line. From there Vic QB Don Karn threw his next-to-only pass of the game, a 41 yard scoring bomb to ex-Blue Tony Speciale (the other pass went for a two yard loss). The score was 12-8, and Giroux began to move . . .

Meds did not go down without a fight, however, as they summoned their remaining courage for three suicide charges.

Once, they ran out of downs and punted; twice, they fumbled on the Vic 45 after marching from their own one; thrice, they tried a desperation pass with Vic in a super-vent defense (seven deep backs) and it was intercepted.

And that's how Vic wins the Mulock: a well-drilled offense plus a tough defense topped off by the uncanny ability to come through with the big play just when its needed.

But we loved Meds anyway (so did most of the fans, including those members of the championship 1938 team who were present). Any team that couldn't afford oranges at half-time (said one grief-stricken Meds spotter) had to be sentimental favourites (sob).

HOME OPENER TONITE

Blues monolith ready to harvest Gaels

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity Blues open their home Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League schedule tonight when they host Queen's Golden Gaels at Varsity Arena.

Old and new cheap-seat hecklers alike will get their first look at the lineup that has been almost completely overhauled since last year's Canadian finals in Alberta.

Blues strongest line is made up of veterans Paul Laurent, Ward Passi, and Gord Cunningham. They should make life miserable for Queen's defense and even worse if Gael's forwards are unable to forecheck the fast-breaking trio. The three scored a total of eight goals in the two games against Laval and McGill last weekend.

Murray Stroud will centre Bob McClelland and Brian Jones to form Blues second and most versatile unit. Stroud, who has been doing a great job killing penalties, will get his first chance on Varsity's potent power-play setup. Coach Tom Watt commented "Stroud has worked hard while we've been a man short and I think he deserves an opportunity to score a few goals while we have the odd man."

McClelland is off to his best start ever with four goals in two games and Jones, although he has yet to score, has improved greatly with each progressing game. "Joner" is making the tough conversion from defense to the forward line and it will only be a matter of time before he starts triggering the red light.

Blues "rookie" line of newcomers Paul McCann, Brian St. John, and sophomore Mike Riddell has impressed with its hustle and heads-up hockey to date. McCann's booming shot, St. John's steady playmaking, and Riddell's speed, have enabled coach Watt to put together a line with excellent balance.

Defensively, Varsity are again the strongest in the league. With goaltenders John Wrigley and Peter Adamson providing a brick wall in the nets, goal-hungry for-Queen's recent 4-3 loss to McMaster.

Goaltenders Norm Douglas and Bart Lackie are among the seven returns coach Bob Carnegie will have to work. Other lettermen include defencemen Bob Thomson and forwards George Corn, Laird McConvey, John Quayle and Clayton.

Tonight's game could be a good one providing Gaels are able to stay close for the first two periods. If not, look for a rout as the tricolor policy for the past few years has been to bench their big guns during the final twenty minutes if they fall too far behind.

AROUND THE NET . . . Footballer Mike Eben will be presented with a wristwatch during the intermission between the first and second periods of tonight's game. The watch goes along with the Hec Crighton Trophy which Eben won as the most outstanding intercollegiate football player in Canada this season . . . Veteran Scorekeeper Paul Carson will be starting his seventh season in the stat seat tonight . . . Ward Passi and captain Peter Speyer are currently tied for the lead in Varsity scoring with six points each . . . Paul Laurent and Bob McClelland are tied for second place a single point back . . . McClelland is the top triggerman with his four goals . . . Game time is 8 p.m. tonight. Don't forget tickets for the Old-timers game are still available.

John Gordon will dress as the extra forward for tonight's game and will kill penalties as well as being available for spot assignments.

Gaels, on the other hand, appear to be weaker than the team that finished fourth in the league last season. With top-scorers Bob Pond and Bob Tait lost to the Great-Graduator, Gaels will have to rely heavily on the talents of Bob Clayton. Clayton, Gaels captain this year, scored all three goals in

G.S.U. fires Anttila

By ANNE BOODY and JIM HAMILTON
Eric Anttila, the education consultant for the Graduate Students Union, has been fired officially.

In a letter from Joseph DePazza, the newly elected president of the GSU, Anttila was accused of "not performing satisfactorily during his tenure of office."

Last Sunday Anttila was asked for a report on his accomplishments as consultant. The deadline was noon Monday. When Anttila appeared at 1 p.m. with his statement, DePazza refused to accept it.

In an interview last night, DePazza said he had been appointed by the GSU executive to fire Anttila, employed by John Bradford, the former GSU president for about six months.

"Surely in that time he should have accomplished something worthwhile. He is in fact bound to report to the GSU a full report of his accomplishments as consultant. The new officers suggested to him he submit to them the report which was recently due."

DePazza said the GSU quite logically asked Anttila for the full report that he was obliged to submit.

"He failed to turn in any past report to the new officers. One can only conclude that he did not submit anything or had nothing constructive to report."

DePazza called the report submitted Monday an insult to the graduate students who had paid him $3,000 or $4,000 for his efforts.

"It was nothing more than a five-page travelogue and timetable."

"He said nothing about the education processes or educational theories never mind offering any positive recommendations on post graduate education."

Anttila said last night that in theory he had been asked to write a major thesis in 24 hours. "If I had not been under such heavy time pressure I could have done a much better job."

DePazza said in an interview last night that the GSU could not afford to have a consultant who was not fulfilling his duties properly.

"All our funds are depleted. We can not afford to spend one third of our budget on someone who is not fully dedicated or qualified for the job."

Bradford, said by DePazza to be a close friend of Anttila, hired him. There is no record of Bradford having interviewed any other educational consultant, DePazza said in the interview.

"He should have at least scouted the psychology department for perspective consultants, who would be interested in the job."

DePazza said the fact that Anttila was holding another job at the same time — with an architecture firm — proved he was not giving his fullest attention to his duty as consultant.

"He only held an arts degree in mathematics from Waterloo."

He had no undergraduate or graduate degree in education or psychology."

Asked what Anttila's job entailed, DePazza said no one really knew. "Not even Mr. Anttila could tell you what he was being paid for."

Anttila said there was no shred of truth to DePazza's accusations.

"DePazza has avoided talking to me. I was never invited to speak to the new executive so I could not give the reports."

Bradford insisted that the rejected report should have been studied. It was of value, he said, and the refusal was an irrational move.

See page 5 for an interview with Anttila.

POTHEAD EXPELLED

Western investigates student conduct

LONDON, Ont. (Special)—A public inquiry is to look into the social conduct of students at the University of Western Ontario.

Few details were given when UWO President D. Carlton Williams announced the inquiry last week but observers point to recent stories of marijuana and LSD use and of drinking parties on campus for the cause. A five-man committee will conduct the inquiry Jan. 15.

The immediate cause of Dr. Williams' announcement is the controversy surrounding the expulsion of Mark Kirk, 18, of Richmond Hill, a first-year arts student.

Kirk pleaded guilty in a London court Nov. 15 to possession of marijuana and received a two-year suspended sentence. Magistrate D. B. Menzies said he was being lenient because he expected the university would take disciplinary action. (Most first-offenders in narcotics possession cases are being given suspended sentences).

The university, after a secret disciplinary hearing expelled Kirk. Because of agreements among universities, this means that Kirk will be unable to attend any university in Canada.

And immigration laws bar most persons with criminal records from entering the United States.

The matter became controversial when the UWO student council took it up and discussed a motion from its president Peter Larson calling for the university to reverse its stand.

The motion said Kirk should not have been expelled because he had already been punished by the court and because the university re-tried him secretly.

When the motion was defeated Larson resigned his post saying he couldn't be president of a council that had no confidence in him. He remains on council as a regular member.

Peter Schwartz, vice-president and one of the members who agreed with the administration's action because the image of the university was at stake, has taken over Larson's duties.

President Williams is in his first year as UWO's president. Last year he was vice-president in charge of Erindale and Scarborough Colleges at U of T and principal of Erindale.

The Varsity will appear as usual on Wednesday and Friday of this week. However, next week we will publish only on Friday, December 15—Our special Christmas Issue. Advertisers and publicity chairman please take note.

Feteke wins 10-day delay

MONTREAL (CUP)—The Quebec Superior Court Thursday suspended for 10 days proceedings in the case of John Feteke until the court renders a judgment on the university's right to discipline him.

Feteke is charged with behaviour incompatible with his status as a McGill student for printing in his column an allegedly obscene article from The Realist, a U.S. magazine.

Feteke's lawyer submitted the motion Wednesday, asking the court to "order the suspension of all proceedings in the case of John Feteke" until the court renders a judgment on the university's right to discipline him.

The 10-day suspension was the longest possible under the law.

The stop order is viewed as a precedent since never before has any Canadian court taken comparable action against a university.

The Engineer of Faulkner's resignation

By JIM COWAN

Ronald Thompson (IV APSC) is a soft-spoken, pipe-smoking liberal, secretary of the Hart House debates committee and Engineering Society member.

And he is the man who engineered Tom Faulkner's resignation.

Thompson was one of the instigators of the petition presented to the Students' Administrative Council last Wednesday calling on Faulkner to resign as SAC president.

This was not Thompson's first attempt at student activism. He ran for the Engineering Society this year, because "I didn't like the way things on the Engineering Society were going and wanted to raise hell."

Thompson feels SAC has not been acting in a responsible manner this year. "I want SAC to have a reputation so that people will listen to them.

"When they start passing motions like the one on Dow they aren't helping themselves."

Council could more profitably spend its time dealing with student housing and course evaluations, he says. "SAC has to show people it has adults on its council."

Thompson believes SAC cannot effectively work for student power as it is presently set up.

"Student power means the students are behind the government they have elected. One reason SAC can't get student power is because they are only getting 10 or 12 per cent of the students voting in elections."

The best way of achieving student power would be to set up a two-party system in the Students Council, he says. This would stir up more interest and more people would vote in the elections.

Thompson said he had thought of running against Faulkner but doesn't "think the campus is ready for an engineer yet."

SAC shouldn't try to present its views as being representative of the whole campus, he says. "There is no absolute right. If SAC tries to say there is, they are really not a part of the university."

But he thinks SAC should still try to fulfil a leadership role on the university.

"The leader should be ahead of the masses, but when he gets too far ahead he ceases to be a leader and the masses cut him down."

Thompson cited Alan Bruce, the SAC member impeached by the engineers last week, as a good example of this.

Although he would "hate to see the engineers separate," Thompson said any attempt to enforce the Dow resolution could result in engineers leaving SAC.

"If we aren't getting anything out of SAC we should get out, especially when they are passing motions directly contrary to what we believe."

"And if we try to go, a lot would follow."

SAC sponsors housing needs survey

Do you live in a residence? A fraternity house? A boarding house? What is your family's income? How much does living away from home cost you? Have you ever failed?

These are just a few of the questions being asked by the Students Administrative Council's housing commission in a survey designed to correlate students' accommodations to their socio-economic background.

The questionnaire is being mailed to a random sample of students not living at home. The respondents will be completely anonymous.

The questionnaire is part of a larger study to determine what type of accommodations may be needed by the university in the future. It should be published sometime next month.

"We have no specific aims for the questionnaire," says commission chairman Ed Clark (III UC). "We really don't know what to expect."

Clark hopes to have a large proportion of the forms returned.

"It should take about five minutes to fill out, and we've given them a stamped pre-addressed envelope."

Volunteers will be needed to help punch the information on data processing cards. Anyone willing to help can contact, Ed Clark (928-3467) or Roy Smythe (241-2244).

Legal "Defenders" help charged students

The student legal aid service is running smoothly after settling its organizational difficulties.

The name has been changed to Student Defenders because it is not a branch of the official Ontario Legal Service.

Beside student cases, Student Defenders is handling cases referred to it by the OLS.

The student lawyers are allowed to defend people in court if the penalty for conviction is less than two years. This allows them to defend people on charges of causing a disturbance, wilful damage, traffic and drinking offences.

"We've had six or seven student cases mostly dealing with landlord-tenant problems," said John Tomlinson, one of the student lawyers.

Presidents view the election

What do student leaders think of the Dec. 14 election for a president of the Students Administrative Council? We asked leaders of student councils and organizations whether they preferred incumbent president Tom Faulkner or his challenger Bill Charlton (II Law). Nominations for the post close tomorrow.

Ken Stone (IV Inn), president of the Innis Student Council, says he is in full agreement with Faulkner and his policies.

"I think Tom is a great person. His plans for and the building of the new student centre are only one of the many examples of the constructive work he is undertaking for the benefit of the students.

"I supported his stand on the Dow affair and the draft dodger issue."

Stone said that never before in the history of the university had SAC done so much for the students.

"I've never met Bill Charlton, but I know after reading his views that I could never support him. I don't see how it is possible to draw lines between campus and moral issues as he does."

Stone said he has no intentions of running for the position of president.

"Tom would make a much better leader than I would."

"It is ludicrous to say Tom Faulkner was not representing the student body," says Rory Sinclair (IV Trin), the president of the Trinity Student Council.

"There were bound to be people against his methods, but then there are many who are in agreement with him. I think he was a good man for the job."

What Sinclair opposed was the way Faulkner was forced to resign.

"To my thinking Bill Charlton, presidential nominee, is an equally good man for the job. I only hope the best man wins."

Sinclair said he had no intentions of running against Faulkner.

Herh Ezrin (IV UC), the president of the University College Literary and Athletic Society, will support Faulkner in the forthcoming election because he agrees with Faulkner's policies.

Ezrin is especially enthusiastic about Faulkner's student housing proposals. Faulkner's opponents, said Ezrin, "don't have all the issues at hand."

The moral and political issues which have aroused controversy on campus cannot be separated from the other areas of SAC involvement, he said. "They are all part of what Faulkner stands for."

Ezrin believes Charlton is an impressive debator, but disagrees with his political views.

"Student government has become a complex issue," said Ezrin. "It can't be run on a 5 p.m. to 7 p.m. basis."

Partick Armstrong, the president of the New College Student Council, said he is not actively supporting anyone in the coming election.

Joe DePazza, (SGS), the new president of the Graduate Students Union, says he opposes Faulkner, who "has used SAC as a tool for his personal political projects and has flouted his responsibility to represent students."

"Mr. Charlton is certainly a better choice than Mr. Faulkner," said DePazza. However I will not endorse any candidate until I have studied all platforms.

"These are my personal opinions and not necessarily those of the GSU. However, I know that several other officers are opposed to Mr. Faulkner's candidacy."

Glen Brownlee (IV Vic), the president of the Victoria College Student Council, says Faulkner shouldn't be the victim of "this recent smear" on SAC actions.

Brownlee said responsibility for moral actions are of secondary importance to Faulkner. Academic issues, which should be and are Faulkner's primary concern, are "too dull for The Varsity to print."

"Tom Faulkner's belief that student council should be engaged in moral and political affairs is wrong," says Paul Fromm (II SMC), the president of the campus Edmund Burke Society.

Fromm believes Faulkner's opponent, Bill Charlton (II Law), stands for what he stands for and is the best man for the SAC presidency.

Faulkner has spent time 'rousing opinions about moral and political issues,' says Fromm, while Charlton will 'stick to student affairs.' He will therefore have time to do the job along with his academic work.

Dow protestors prepared for encore

If the administration invites Dow Chemical of Canada recruiters back to the campus there will be another demonstration, says Paul Hoch, a member of the Ad Hoc Committee Against Campus Complicity.

The committee organized the original anti-Dow demonstration two weeks ago.

In a statement the committee questions the propriety of the administration's issuing an invitation asking Dow to return to campus.

The objection was raised because the matter has been placed in the hands of an advisory committee to the placement service, Hoch said last night.

The committee also stated its disapproval of naming Vice-President Robin Ross to chair the advisory committee.

"This is seen as a serious threat to the body's presumed independence of action and an unwarranted assumption of administrative control over what is, after all, a student activity," said Hoch.

Another factor to consider in re-inviting Dow to the campus, Hoch added, is a threat of physical violence against the demonstrators made by members of the engineering faculty.

"We understand that a bail fund has been set up by the engineers," said Hoch. This points to an increased probability of violence against anti-war activists.

However, Art McIlwain (II APSC), an engineering SAC representative, said he knew of no such fund.

Hoch said the university community must draw a line on what it will permit.

However, if the advisory committee on the placement service, representing all segments of the university community, decides to endorse Dow recruitment, Hoch said he would be willing to abide by the decision.

Faulkner, Charlton launch campaigns

Tom Faulkner and Bill Charlton will speak at Scarborough College Tuesday at 1 p.m. This is the first head-on engagement between the two candidates for student president.

Faulkner is holding an open meeting at Sidney

please remember

This week the official campaign speeches start with a kick-off meeting at Scarborough College.

Before you go to listen to the speakers' summation of the issues in this campaign, please get the facts straight. Maybe it's too early, maybe it's the result of political shenanigans, whatever the reason, there's an incredible amount of misinformation among the electorate right now.

DRAFT DODGERS: SAC did not (repeat, not) vote money to support draft-dodger programs although The Varsity urged the council to do so. Tom Faulkner personally supported aid to draft-dodgers and said so at the SAC meeting and at the meetings of other college organizations later.

Criticism of Faulkner on the draft-dodger issue amounts to an attempt to curtail his freedom of speech.

The Varsity at the time criticized—quite wrongly—Tom Faulkner, suggesting he may not have the courage to put his job on the line in support of his views.

BLUE AND WHITE: SAC did not abolish the Blue and White but disbanded it until it could be restructured. The B&W was losing money and its organizational failures were evident in the Otis Redding Show sche.nozzle.

A week ago SAC advertised for a new Blue and White director and if no one comes along to fill the position will set up a committee to do the job. Cultural Affairs Commissioner D'Arcy Martin has five names ready for the committee but won't announce them until the next SAC meeting.

The Blue and White failure comes into sharper focus when you look at what the University of Western Ontario has done this year. Already they've had five big-name acts there this year. Queen's has had two. Even Guelph has done more than our B&W.

THE VARSITY AFFAIR: This involved the Realist reprint which SAC and CAPUT found objectionable. SAC, however, supported our reasons for printing that paragraph after a motion of censure was defeated overwhelmingly.

Tom Faulkner didn't know where to stand personally in that issue and left it all up to council.

DOW SIT-IN: Neither SAC nor The Varsity had any part in organizing the sit-in, although The Varsity supported the participants' motives. SAC then had to decide what should be the place of recruiting companies on this campus and recommended to the administration that a joint faculty-student administration committee be formed to control the service. SAC said companies supplying materials directly for use in Vietnam should not be accommodated here.

Putting aside the fact that SAC's motion probably won't have much effect on recruitment on this campus, SAC should be reprimanded for not going far enough.

The joint committee proposed would be made up of three students, three faculty members and three members of the administration, an arrangement that would make it possible for the students to be outnumbered.

Supplying war materials for use in Vietnam means about as much as Paul Martin's speeches. Canada doesn't ship war materials to Vietnam. Canada ships them to the United States. What the U.S. does with them we neither know nor care, Paul Martin says.

SAC, in its loosely-worded motion may have been guilty of the same type of double talk.

One more thing, you were duped when you signed that petition if you believed it was only to register a strong protest with SAC's policies. Many of the people taking the petition around misrepresented their case. They were after not protest but power.

listen here B&W

What can they do to top that, some people asked two years ago after University College's successful Pop Festival. The same question was repeated last year after the successful psych fest officially called Perception '67.

Well, look Marty Low and other Blue and White types, UC is off and running again and just may top everything they've done before.

This year it's an insanity fest which may eventually be dubbed Psychosis '68 or something like that. At any rate, anyone who saw the light demonstration at the last UC Literary and Athletic Society meeting couldn't help but be impressed. The Mothers of Invention will probably be the featured group for the show.

Over at St. Michael's College, meanwhile, plans are being made to bring in Charles Lloyd, one of the most advanced of the jazz-men.

And the Blue and White lost money consistently, didn't have anything imaginative to offer and is only now getting back on the road. UC has a lot to teach them.

UC also will be putting an absurd but fitting conclusion to this entire year.

LETTERS

charlton is the best

Sir:

Anne Mizen (II SMC)

the university, the province the nation, world & beyond

Sir:
In its so-called news report on the elections at the Graduate Students' Union that took place last Friday, the Monday issue of The Varsity did not reach even the minimal level of objectivity demanded of a newspaper, for it misquoted a statement by John Winter, the successful vice-presidential candidate on the University-Wide slate. The article was also completely and deliberately mute about the headline-deserving fact that last Friday's GSU election had the largest turnout of any election in GSU history — a turnout that was more than ten times greater than the one that put Mr. Bradford in office last May. Further, the report ignored the very news-worthy fact that the successful University-Wide slate consisted of twelve candidates from eleven different departments in the School of Graduate Studies; this fact indicated the very broad scope of viewpoints and representation marking our slate and manifested that the U-W slate was the antithesis of a clique or special-interest group.

Your editorial (on the same day), with the loaded title, "Reaction at the GSU", succeeded only in adding more evidence to the adage widely accepted by U of T students, both undergraduate and graduate: "Every knock by The Varsity is a boost." You prophesied that the new GSU will be a "social organization but nothing else." Behind this obvious misreading of the joint policy-statement of the U-W candidates was the implied attitude of the pseudo-activist that one must heap scorn on all things social in order to qualify as a concerned student.

(Ed. note: Not our position, remember how we pleaded with the Blue and White to become more efficient and imaginative?)

The U-W's philosophy is much more balanced: how can people come together to talk about politics, academics, or anything else, unless they first have a fitting place to which to go, and why not have fitting refreshments on hand as well? Then, after people have profited from the interaction and sharing of each others' experience and views that are part and parcel of the process of dialogue, they can initiate fitting programmes of action for academia and the polis.

The author of the editorial conveniently omitted facts and statements that did not substantiate his pre-conceived indictment of the GSU. (Ed. note: then how come the editorial agreed substantially with Random's editorial written by a graduate student?)

For instance, one aim explicitly stated in the U-W policy statement, which the author ignored, was "to be politically active and politically responsible." Clearly, the new GSU shall be more than a social centre. Each U-W candidate joined our slate of his own accord, and is still a free agent; he is free to comment upon and influence the affairs of the university, the province, the nation, the world and beyond — with the common-sense stipulation that he prefix his political remarks with an indication of whether what he is saying is the attitude of the graduate students as a whole or represents only his personal position. (This letter is of course my personal reply to The Varsity's misguided editorial.) I think that The Varsity's editor and the SAC executive have dismally failed to adhere to this reasonable restriction.

The Varsity, Mr. Faulkner and his disciples claim graciously to be moral messiahs of the student body; the fact of the matter is that they are would-be dictators of the moral and political attitudes of the students, both undergraduate and graduate. On thing that the U-W slate meant by their aim, "to be politically responsible," was to refrain from foisting our individual views upon our constituents. The Varsity and the SAC executive have failed to meet this requirement for political responsibility. In fact The Varsity, the SAC executive and the former GSU president all seem to identify political vitality with political irresponsibility, political concern with recklessness and view student organizations merely as tools for their pet political projects and, as a result, have flouted their responsibility to represent their constituents. (The Varsity's editor was wondering whether or not I would make any political statements; I hope the above fills the bill. But I know that he will deny that it is a political statement because it is not also an irresponsible statement.)

The University-Wide slate was fighting for a return to a balance of attitudes and interests — intellectual, political and social — in the GSU executive; it was the former GSU president, Mr. Bradford, who was the extremist. Totally ignoring the intellectual and social dimensions to the GSU (and the need for repairs of the GSU building), he used without their permission other people's money (the GSU funds, i.e.) to finance his pet political projects (aid to hippies and draft-resisters) and his pet pseudo-educational program, namely, the hiring of a so-called education consultant who impressed many graduate students as being unqualified and unproductive, at an extravagant cost of over $9,000. The GSU members, as graduate students, cannot possibly be accused of being against education; we seek the services of fully qualified educators, which is the reason why we are at U of T's graduate school. However Mr. Bradford and The Varsity seem to define education as a completely unstructured process and from this point of view they logically damn everything at U of T. I thought the

the man the GSU fired

By PAUL MACRAE

Eric Anttila can afford better than the blue jeans and cheap blue denim shirts he wears on his lean, six-foot frame. And he doesn't have to smoke Exports.

Until the recent Graduate Student Union sweep-out he was drawing $7,000 a year as an "educational consultant" to former GSU president John Bradford.

But expensive suits and Dunhills aren't his bag. He's more interested in people, especially people being educated.

"My personal philosophy involves dealing with people," he says. "I don't like direct confrontation, I prefer to circulate on an informal basis. That's why I wear these clothes. They're informal."

ERIC ANTILA

Circulating made up a large part of his job as GSU educational consultant, but he did have a more formal program in mind.

This involved a study of education in the past and present to provide insights into the future, with a focus on university and graduate education. So far he doesn't like what he sees.

"The educational system is 50 years behind the times," he says. "It doesn't fulfill the needs of the individual. It's based on status and money, not knowledge and experiences."

Anttila believes the basic failure of the system is a result of the fragmented nature of education today.

"I think we need an educational process which produces, almost, jacks-of-all-trades. There's a definite need for new Renaissance people — people with a wide breadth of experience.

"At least the educational process should show people how to deal with others."

Anttila thinks he got the educational consultant job because he does know how to deal with others.

While he oiled toward a B.Sc. in mathematics at University of Waterloo, he was president of the campus co-operatives there.

Through his co-op contacts he was hired by the Company of Young Canadians as a program consultant, and was for several months general manager of This Magazine is About Schools.

ROCHDALE

At present he is director of admissions and on the board of directors of Rochdale College.

Anttila disagrees with many of the left-wing formulas for social change.

"I never could agree with the SUPA approach," he says. "Their idea is to flip the structure around, invert it. This is fine, but it won't work.

"You've got to understand what is happening to society, get the feel of it. Understand what will happen in 10 years and make plans to change the society to fit the new situation. This isn't easy."

KINDERGARTEN

Anttila is 22 but looks older. With his short, curly beard, high forehead and rather blunt features, he resembles a Greek philosopher.

He considers the new GSU a "kindergarten".

"When the new executive were elected they told me to write a report on what I'd done so far," he says in his soft, well-modulated voice.

"I handed it in one hour late and they wouldn't accept it. Just like in kindergarten."

He knew it was just a matter of time before he was fired. "The new executive is a reaction group to what went before. They couldn't keep me."

WILL CONTINUE

A major factor in the attack on Bradford's administration was Anttila's appointment to the $7,000 position. This was viewed as political favoritism since the two are friends.

Anttila says he only met Bradford last May and got the job in July.

"Bradford and the executive of the GSU wanted to change the emphasis of the GSU from purely social aspects to more far-reaching intellectual and educational projects."

He doesn't want to give up the project and says he will continue his research informally. He hopes to create a cadre of five to 10 people who share his ideas on education, and may still succeed.

His immediate plans? He's just gotten a job as educational consultant with a government study looking into the relationship of housing and education.

After that he may come back to university. As a graduate student.

letter from the GSU president

Deweyite let-the-students-do-whatever-they-like philosophy of education died shortly after the first sputnik was launched.

The Varsity, the SAC executive and Mr. Bradford seem to act on the pre-teen principle: I must be rebellious and naughty or nobody will pay attention to me. Perhaps these pseudo-liberals should try making constructive suggestions and initiating responsible policies — as the new slate of GSU officers have been doing; and then they might receive the landslide of student support that the University-Wide candidates did in the recent GSU elections. Last May Mr. Bradford won an election at which about 50 students turned out (and I must add that I myself failed to vote on that occasion). Certainly, the graduate students who did not vote then have paid dearly for their apathy in suffering through Mr. Bradford's chaotic, retrogressive tenure. (I have mentioned the defeated presidential candidate by name only because The Varsity, in its editorial, cited his name and championed his extremist policies, and so I was forced to set the record straight in my letter.) Many graduate students, indeed, had to be lured into action by the radicalism of Mr. Bradford. But they did respond — in favour of a new responsible leadership. The Varsity in its recent editorial called the U-W candidates public-relations men, giving a derogatory twist to that appellation. Well, I ask, are the above remarks those of a public-relations character?

Lastly, I am hard-pressed to discover what The Varsity editor has against "bourbon manhattens", to which he referred in his anything but sober editorial. I hereby invite him to the Graduate Students' Union for some very interesting and stimulating conversation and a bourbon manhattan (or rye, if he prefers); I am sure such an experience will be totally new to him. Hopefully it will help to solve his problem. But, then again the poor boy might not be old enough to accept my invitation.

Joseph DePazza,

President of the Graduate Students' Union

P.S. Kindly publish this letter in its entirety or not at all, to prevent any editorial distortions of its contents. There is some chance that I would agree to your publishing an abbreviated version of my letter, as long as beforehand you telephone me and recite the shortened version verbatim and I then give my permission for its publication as truly representing my thought. I have kept several photocopies of this letter. Regarding the article in Random today on the GSU elections, it is so erroneous as to deserve no comment whatsoever.

CUS wants refundable tax credits

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Students has asked the federal government to extend the Carter Commission recommendations to pick up the student's part of the cost of his education.

In a brief submitted to Finance Minister Mitchell
Sharp Wednesday, CUS asked for "refundable tax credits," a concept considered by Mr. Carter but declared to be out of his terms of reference.

Refundable tax credits would refund to the student the difference between his assets and the costs of his education, removing the need for loans and bursaries. Or, the student could apply this tax credit to taxable income in future years.

CUS President Hugh Armstrong estimated it would cost the government between $400,000,000 and $500, 000,000 to implement the plan.

The CUS brief said refundable tax credits "would provide an immediate cash benefit for those most in need of financial assistance — the potential student from lower income families."

The brief recommended that the following costs be assessed for students: $1,935 for a student living away from home; $1,410 for a student living at home; $1,200 for dependent students living at home.

The brief also recommended adjustments for students who could benefit more if they were not automatically lumped with the family as the basic tax unit. This applies particularly to independent students younger than 21.

Armstrong said Mr. Sharp was "not overly eager to accept our recommendations immediately" after Wednesday's meeting.

If you satisfy certain qualifications, such as a required fluency in French,
you are eligible.

The World University Service of Canada will send about 40 students and five professors from Canada to take part in an international seminar in Ivory Coast, Mali and Senegal June 25 to Aug.
5.

Since 1948 WUSC has organized 16 such seminars in overseas countries, enabling more than 800 students to encounter foreign peoples and institutions.

Each seminar program in the past has included intrapreparatory reading and essay-writing; an orientation program in Canada; introductory sessions in the country visited; study tours and visits to institutions, factories and farms; and a final residential seminar together with students and professors from the host country.

Interested students may obtain application kits at the SAC building, to be filled out and returned by Dec. 11.
The nominating board will meet Dec. 14.

Varsity shuffled in Buffalo

By JIM MORRISON

Sparkling play by guard Mark White was the silver lining in the cloud of Varsity's two weekend losses to American outfits. On Friday night Blues lost to Buffalo 87-63, and then were demolished 120-71 by Buffalo State on Saturday.

Superior Buffalo bench strength gave them the Friday win, as a tired Varsity squad could not keep up in the second half. Blues had jumped into an early lead and were down only 38-34 at halftime.

White was Blues' key man in the game with his fine ball-handling and his twelve points. The Iliion, New York native had the opposition off balance throughout with his ball-stealing antics.

Bruce Dempster and Arvo

Neidre also played well Friday night, scoring fifteen and nine points respectively.

But Saturday night Blues attack was all White. Playing his best game in two years at Varsity, he potted 23 points and checked superbly on defense.

The principal reason for Toronto's loss to State, a better team than Buffalo, was the latter's great rebounding. Varsity was beaten on the boards 64-34, principally by 6'6" Charlie Davis, and State killed them with the fast break.

Encouraging to Coach McManus, however, was the fact that Buffalo only out-rebounded Blues by seven on Friday.

HOOP HELPING: Next game for the Varsity squad is an exhibition tilt with York University on Tuesday night . . . Windsor Lancers also lost to Buffalo State — by a 98-74 score on Friday night. Western Mustangs took an 88-67 decision from Guelph Redman Friday in their opening game of the season. That was Guelph's best road performance ever.

VARSITY SCORING

At BUFFALO: Neidre 9, Slater 6, Hadden 10, White 12, Dempster 15, McNaughton 2, Garbe 5, Kirby 3, Wilkie 1.

Varsity fencers, fencettes take Ontario team titles

U of T fencers, male and female, had a successful weekend as they both captured the top prize in the Ontario junior team foil competition held in Toronto on Saturday.

Varsity's feminine foilers put on a strong show to edge a powerful squadette from McMaster and a team from the Canadian-Germany Harmony Club. Members of the team were Phyllis Sherrin, Sandi Anderson, and Barb Bourns.

The men matched opposite sex counterparts (?) as U of T's A team swept 18 straight matches to coast to victory. Joseph Chung, Martin Peros, and Richard Wong were the victorious trio.

Blues' B team, composed of Joseph Cain, Henry Lee, and Ray Pierce, decisoned York 6-3, but went down to the A team 9-0.

Coaching fencing Blues again is veteran mentor, Imre Henyey. Next week Blues take on Rochester.

Curlers cop Second Event

A team representing U of T and playing out of the Terrace Curling Club in Toronto, was victorious in the Second Event of the Intercollegiate Men's Invitational Bonspiel hosted recently by the University of Western Ontario.

Members of the winning team were John Mather (1 Dents), skip, Alex Segall (SGS), vice-skip, Dave Murphy (1 Trin), second, and Doug Paterson (1 Knox), lead.

All four players on the team are curling for the first time at U of T though the unit has a combined total of over 30 years experience. Mather and Segall are veterans of Men's League competitions in Saskatchewan and Manitoba respectively, and Murphy and Paterson have past experience in Ontario Schoolboy and Ontario Junior Tankard competitions.

The other U of T team, Skipped by John Hart, was eliminated in the third round.

Blues deflate win(d)less Gaels 6-1

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity Blues were planning to play their wide-open high-scoring brand of hockey against Queen's Golden Gaels Friday night. But Norm Douglas said no, Bob Clayton said no, and the rest of the tricolor seemed to agree.

As a result, the much stronger Blues were held to a 6-1 win over Gaels in Varsity's SIHL home opener before 3900 fans.

Douglas put on a tremendous display of goaltending as he repeatedly frustrated Varsity would-be scorers. The slender puck-stopper made a total of fifty-two saves in a game which was played principally within Queen's defensive zone.

Clayton, by far Gaels' best forward, played over three-quarters of the game, skated and checked tirelessly, and set up his team's only goal by George Corn.

However, the big story of the game was the play of Blues' rookie Brian St. John. St. John, starting his first game in Varsity Arena, scored three goals (his first of the regular season) and was the best player on the ice.

Queen's never once showed any interest in winning the game. From the opening whistle, they seemed content to play a tight defensive game in an effort to keep the score respectable.

When Blues attacked Gaels clustered around their net dropping in front of shots and generally attempting to clear the puck out of danger. Even when they had the puck themselves, Queen's refused to rush more than one or two men up ice. They just hung back and let Blues carry the play to them.

Blues tried everything but just couldn't get loose to put the puck in the net. Gaels stuck to their checks like gum on the seat of your pants and as one frustrated Blues complained after the game, "I was going to skate into a corner away from the play to see if my shadow would come too. He followed me everywhere else."

Blues did not have a great game by any means, but they certainly played well enough to win. And any team that scores six goals and completely dominates the play can't be all bad.

Along with St. John's three goals, Bob Hamilton (his second of the year), Bob McClelland (his fifth) and Ward Passi (his fourth) had Blues' other markers. The latter's score with only twenty seconds left in the game was the prettiest of the evening. Gord Cunningham took a neat passout from Paul Laurent, and put over a perfect pass to Passi who was standing on the edge of the crease. He flicked the puck into the net, the red light flashed, and a night of sheer despair ended on a happy note for the best line in the league.

Peter Speyer, though not chosen as a star, put on a brilliant exhibition of his 'winkin', blinkin' and nod routine as he shifted and stick-handled Gaels to their knees on several occasions.

Best example of Blues penalty-killing power came in the second period when defencemen Bob Hamilton and Doug Jones were both given charging penalties on the same play. Passi, Laurent, Speyer, Murray Stroud took turns in preventing Gaels from getting a single shot on goal. In fact, Gaels couldn't muster one scoring threat after the five-minute mark of the second period.

Stroud and Mike Riddeil each had two assists to lead the playmaking department.

AROUND THE NET ... The game was marred by the antics of an idiot mid-way through the second periods. An unidentified jackass (that's long for drunken fan) threw an empty beer bottle which smashed to bits on the ice in front of Blues' netminder John Wrigley. Hats on for our vote for turkey of the year. ... Three stars of Friday's game were Brian St. John, Norm Douglas, and Murray Stroud.

Youth of Varsity Blues is pitted against the age and experience of the NHL Oldtimers tomorrow night at 8 p.m. at Varsity Arena. Tickets are a buck apiece.

Blues vs. NHL Oldtimers

By ROD M'CKLEBURGH

Varsity Sports Editor

Somewhere in Varsity Arena is a special cupboard. Hanging within that cupboard is a set of blue hockey uniforms which have still to drape a human form. These uniforms are the property of Varsity Blues.

They are being hopefully and carefully nurtured for a trip which will bring immeasurable credit and respect to our own University of Toronto, and carry "velut arbor aevo" to the universities of the world. The trip is all the way to Innsbruck, Austria where Blues have been selected to represent Canada in the winter version of the World's Student Games.

Unfortunately such an honour, and it is an honour of the highest order to bear your country's aspiration, comes not without cost. Various bodies, from SAC to the Physical Fitness Council, have rallied to Blues' cause, but much of the financial burden remains to be shouldered. This is where you, as a student, come into the picture.

Tomorrow night, you can repay in full the debt you owe Blues for the superb hockey entertainment they've given you week after week over the years. It's been cheap, too. Exactly 14¢ a game. Now, Blues are asking you to help them a bit more substantially with your pocketbook, as they desperately strive to make the jaunt to Austria.

At Varsity Arena tomorrow night is a game between Blues and the NHL Oldtimers, a contest which has a tremendous curiosity factor about it. The admission is one dollar, with all proceeds going towards Blues' trip. At this point, it is imperative that U of T students fill the arena, or the whole thing may die a truly tragic death. Tickets are on sale now at Hart House.

However, as unpleasant as it sounds, the cause of this exhibition game overshadows its undoubted spectator appeal. If you're a Varsity fan, it is your duty to be able to come to class Wednesday morning, nudge a crony, and query, "Did you see the hockey game last night?" If you can't attend buy a ticket anyway, and send a friend. And if you don't feel like supporting Blues tomorrow night, and show up at the Arena on Friday, tightly clutching your 14¢ coupon ticket, sink in the back way, please.

Scarborough sets stage for Faulkner-Charlton duel

By BRIAN CRUCHLEY

Campus Centre with no capital cost to the students.

The money is coming from the government, the Bank of Montreal and the U of T Board of Governors.

Faulkner said SAC made "a moral decision" when it determined that the whole campus should be able to make use of the campus centre and not just students.

(Last spring when the name of this building was debated by council, Faulkner was insistent that it be called "the campus centre" and not "the student centre".)

University-sponsored residences are costing $10,000 or $13,000 a bed while the SAC sponsored residence, Tartu College, is costing only $4,500 a bed, he said.

Faulkner felt SAC had a duty to act on issues that are brought up by students (the Dow issue) and not "stick its head in the sand".

Faulkner climaxed his argument over the responsibility of SAC to involve itself in moral issues with a quote from Dante:

"The hottest places in Hell are reserved for those who, when faced with a moral decision, remain neutral."

Bill Charlton said yesterday that he is running for president of the Students Administrative Council on one "serious" issue — he is against SAC making moral decisions for others.

Debating with Tom Faulkner before more than 300 Scarborough College students, Charlton denied that his stand was negative.

"What I'm offering you is freedom, and what can be more positive than that?" he asked.

Earlier in his speech he said, "The university should be a place where all people can cultivate their own tastes without interference from others."

He was referring to the recent Placement Service sit-in when demonstrators blocked the way of engineers seeking job interviews with Dow Chemical of Canada Ltd.

"I do not have a bigger and better platform than Mr. Faulkner has," he said.

Faulkner devoted most of his speech to the issues of the campus centre, student housing and the quality of education.

He pointed out that SAC has financed the

Only two hats in the ring...

As expected, Tom Faulkner (SGS) and Bill Charlton (II Law) are the only candidates who filed their nomination papers for the SAC Presidential election by yesterday's 5 p.m. deadline.

Faulkner's nomination papers were signed by 221 students. Charlton had 116 signatures.

"We will try to set up an advance poll for the election if there is a significant demand," said Dave Nitkin, SAC election commissioner, last night.

"The school of social work, for example, will be out on field work all election day."

There will be a meeting to explain procedures to poll clerks of the various colleges and faculties Friday at 5:15 p.m. in Room 75, New College.

Questions about the election should be addressed to the chief returning officer, David Hoffman, at ME 0-2916.

Faulkner and Charlton will debate today at noon in the Mechanical Building, at 1 p.m. at Convocation Hall; at 6:30 p.m. in Victoria College's Burwash Hall.

Other speaking engagements for Faulkner on Thursday include: noon, faculty of dentistry; 1 p.m., Nursing; 5:30 p.m. Whitney Hall; UC and 8:30 p.m. Devonshire House.

Charlton's engagements include for today: 2 p.m., St. Michael's College; 5:45 p.m., Sir Daniel Wilson Residence (JCR). Thursday: noon, faculty of dentistry; 12:45 p.m. Trinity Buttery; 1:30 p.m. SMC (committee room.); 6 p.m. Whitney Hall and 10 p.m., Devonshire House.

Next Wednesday, at the day before the election, Charlton and Faulkner will debate at 7 p.m. in Hart House on the CBC television show The Day It Is.

York may protest campus recruitment

Anti-war groups at York University plan to sit-in at campus' placement service if Hawker-Siddeley of Canada Ltd. recruits there.

Hawker Siddeley makes airplanes and airplane parts that are sold in the United States.

Joe Young, a York student and head of the student wing of the Ontario Committee to End the War in Vietnam, said last night: "We will try to prevent recruitment, but won't block the placement service entrance forcibly."

Last week York President Murray Ross suspended Hawker-Siddeley recruiting at the request of the anti-war group until the matter could be examined by the faculty advisory committee on student affairs.

"If the ACSA decides this company should be banned, I will take action," he promised.

"Personally I couldn't agree with you more about the war," Dr. Ross told the peace group at the ACSA meeting.

"But as administrative head of the university I have to protect the interests of all the students."

He said Hawker-Siddeley had little to do with the suppliers of war materials to the U.S. "The problem is, where do you draw the line of involvement? You can't make an arbitrary ruling."

The advisory committee voted to allow the company to recruit on the York campus, but the date the company will be at York is being withheld.

"We have inside information and we'll find out when they'll be here," said Young. "We plan to organize a demonstration at the placement service when they come."

We expect Hawker-Siddeley on campus either next week or soon after Christmas.

Predecessor mismanaged GSU funds: De Pazza

By TIM COLTON
Varsity News Editor

Joseph DePazza, the newly-elected president of the Graduate Students Union, has accused his predecessor, John Bradford, of "gross mismanagement" of GSU funds.

Interviewed Monday night, DePazza said the union's financial records were left "in a state of complete chaos" by Bradford, whom he defeated in the Nov. 27 GSU election.

Joseph De Pazza

"We are unsure as to whether the records represent a case of gross management only—which is certainly bad enough—or more.

"I feel this information has to be revealed now, even though the investigation isn't complete.

"Only a complete audit, which is a very time-consuming process, will answer the many presently open questions."

Bradford, disturbed from a sound sleep last night, called the charges "pretty silly."

"I find his comments very strange and that he's releasing this to The Varsity."

"He's convinced that my whole tenure is dishonest and that I'm not a clean-cut, all-American boy," he said in the telephone interview.

His voice rose perceptibly as he declared, "I don't understand why, and I don't particularly care."

DePazza, a 25-year-old philosophy student, looked drawn after his first week in office. He spoke wearily stopping often to rub his eyes.

He apologized for the stubbly patch on his chin. "A beard," he explained. "I didn't want to start it before the election."

The GSU president had a lengthy list of specific allegations against the Bradford administration:

1. that the GSU's business during Bradford's tenure was conducted on blank cheques. The GSU treasurer, said DePazza spent the summer at Carleton University in Ottawa and was in Toronto "a day or two a month."

"Then he used to sign blank cheques, which were supposed to be co-signed by any other executive member."

Bradford dismissed this as "false." The GSU secretary, John Thompson, didn't go to Carleton until Oct 1, he said.

"There were two or three blank cheques signed," Bradford said at first, "but never for any major expenditure."

Then he changed his mind somewhat: "I don't really know how many blank cheques there were. Certainly no more than five.

"And they were never used for anything other than what was specifically authorized by the executive—in other words, not for anything shady."

Charlton and Faulkner meet once again

By JOHN SWAIGEN

Tom Faulkner and Bill Charlton are no strangers. Twice in the past year they have found themselves face to face on student issues.

The first encounter occurred during a panel discussion on the nature of the university as part of last year's Harvard Exchange.

On the far left of the stage of the law school's Moot Court sat Charlton, on the far right sat Faulkner. In between sat the other panel members, Prof. Chandler Davis and lecturer Peter Russell. Above them, Professor Forster, who chaired the meeting.

At that time, Faulkner recalls, he maintained that the university was no longer an ivory tower. He said the role of the modern university was not only to gather and disseminate knowledge, but to apply that knowledge, not indiscriminately but as wisely as possible.

He said that the universities were to the development of civilization in the twentieth century what the railways were to the nineteenth century.

Charlton was reluctant to discuss the two panel discussions. "The content of those debates was irrelevant to the election," he said.

But observers remember one encounter in the Harvard Exchange debate when Charlton, sarcastic and quick, shot at Faulkner: "Would you give university grants to a bunch of unwashed beatniks on Spadina?" (referring to SUPA).

Faulkner, who at times throughout the discussion seemed a little amused by Charlton, said, quietly, "No, I would give it to Dr. Norman Allcock of the Canadian Peace Research Institute."

Early this fall on the TV program "Take Thirty," Faulkner and Charlton found themselves chosen again as spokesmen for opposing views, this time on student power.

Student power, said Faulkner, means students playing a responsible role in the university, not dominating it.

The positive aspects of student power, he said, were the building of residences by the students themselves, students helping to decide what would be taught them and helping to decide how the university's money would be spent. He pointed out that these roles would demand great responsibility of the students placed in them.

His major example was the building of a student centre, financed and developed exclusively by the students of U of T. Although the University was willing to give the students complete control over this centre, the students asked to have it under the direction of a joint committee of members of the Board of Governors, university employees, and students.

Charlton recalled that on this program Faulkner had called the students "apathetic," and that he had disagreed, saying that they were not apathetic, just not interested in the same things as Faulkner.

Faulkner and Charlton meet again with the presidency at stake and the result should be fireworks.

Charlton, the man with the acid tongue, who never uses a bandaid where a bludgeon will do and Tom Faulkner the quiet, reasonable, sincere politician whom you might even want to marry your sister, make a show worth watching.

Blue and White may not be dead

The Blue and White Society will rise again—maybe.

The Students Administrative Council will vote next week on a new constitution for the society, which was temporarily abolished five weeks ago.

Darcy Martin (111 New), SAC cultural affairs commissioner, said Sunday that the new system would give the head of the B and W greater financial autonomy and a more representative organization to work with.

Under the new constitution candidates for B and W president will present SAC with a program and a slate of candidates. SAC will then choose on the basis of the slate's overall ability and dispersion across campus.

Formerly B and W representatives were chosen by each college council.

The drafters of the new constitution were helped by the results of questionnaires about social organizations sent out to other campuses.

So far there have been no applications for B and W president although nominations are open until Friday.

If this continues, SAC will set up an interim directorate to operate for the rest of the year. Martin said he already had co-opted, a few people to do the job if necessary.

Possible change in U of W arts system

WATERLOO (Special)—The arts faculty at the University of Waterloo may soon change its year system for a course system as recommended in a report passed by the undergraduate affairs committee of the arts faculty council.

The system will include changes whereby students will be measured in terms of courses rather than in years. Standing will be determined by the number of courses passed and by the accumulative average marks in all courses taken, including courses which the students has failed.

Supplementary examinations are to be abolished. Make-up exams will be allowed under special circumstances.

More campus leaders speak out . . .

This is the second of a series of articles spotlighting campus opinion on the Dec. 14 contest for president of the Students Administrative Council. The two candidates are Tom Faulkner and Bill Charlton.

Tim Johnson (IV Dents), the president of the Dental Students Society, said he had not heard both candidates and would not make up his mind until he had. However, he said he did sign the petition calling for Faulkner's resignation.

John Morris, the president of the Engineering Society, said he supports Faulkner.

"No part-time president can adequately perform the job," he said.

"While I feel that SAC has made some erroneous decisions, I believe that SAC should be influenced by constructive rather than destructive actions," he explained.

"Representative government entails the necessity of making moral decisions. More particularly, SAC has the obligation to inform students of their activities and listen to their opinions."

Ernie McCullough, Progressive Conservative club president, believes Faulkner has done a good job, but is unhappy over the idea of restricting campus facilities.

He would like to see a referendum on the Dow issue along with the presidential election.

Cal MacInnis, the student president of Knox College, said he will vote for Faulkner.

"I feel that Faulkner has done a very creditable job in a difficult position," MacInnis said.

"He ought to have a chance to complete at least this term on the basis of his record."

Asked about Charlton he said, "I know nothing of him except what I read in the recent Varsity article."

Mark Sydney (III UC), the president of the campus Communist club said, "Tom Faulkner isn't my spokesman, and I don't think he ever will be. But he's the best spokesman for the university at the present time."

Mavis Fignell, the president of the Physical and Occupational Therapy Undergraduate Society, supports Faulkner.

"I know him and have worked with him on council. He stimulates the thought of those around him."

"I've only read about Bill Charlton but I think his ideas are too narrowly confined to campus issues."

DePazza claims cheque sent to unknown

2. that Bradford and the three other former GSU executives "used to dip into the cash book at the GSU for loans, which they listed each other to return."

"A rather risky practice," DePazza smiled.

"This we have to eventually report to the students; especially if the books don't balance."

"That's true," Bradford conceded. "But it's all been returned."

Bradford said the amount borrowed never exceeded $10.

"By the way," he sighed, "this practice is not unique to my executive."

3. that sometime during the summer Bradford gave a $225 check to a Miss Naomi Smith, whom Bradford had said belonged to "a Toronto draft-dodger organization."

"We can find no record of this Miss Smith belonging to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program, or any other SUPA-type organization," DePazza declared.

Not so, replied Bradford. The girl who received the check was Naomi Wall, a member of the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

"We gave it to her as a representative of TADP," Bradford said. "It said so on the cheque. And it's the amount the executive voted for them."

Mrs. Wall confirmed last night it was she who received the cheque from Bradford, "sometime during the summer."

"I endorsed it and gave it to Mark Satin, head of the TADP," she said in a telephone interview.

4. that Bradford's first paid secretary "flew the coop with her first month's salary."

"That's true," says Bradford. "The first secretary (he refused to give her name) was paid for a month but didn't do any work."

"But I don't see how that is financial mismanagement." 5. that this same secretary was given a $300 loan out of GSU funds, and that "no ar-rangeents were made for her to repay it."

Here the plot thickens Bradford admitted a $300 loan was made, but it was to his second secretary, Carol Shannon.

"Arrangements to repay it were made with myself, Vice-President Faye Martin and Treasurer Thompson," Bradford asserted.

"It's being repaid now in installments with interest being charged." (The original agreement, says Bradford, was interest-free.)

DePazza's statements Monday followed the firing last week of Eric Anttila, who was hired as an educational consultant by Bradford and his executive.

DePazza refused to speculate during the interview whether there was any collusion between Anttila and Bradford, who lived together during the summer.

"This is something we can't be sure of. It smells, but I'd rather let students judge the odor for themselves.

"I don't know if I trust Bradford. In a lot of cases it's his word against everything else."

He denied rumors that the school of graduate studies had frozen the GSU's assets:

"The graduate school has been very co-operative in providing funds for our programs."

DePazza at first appeared reluctant to talk to me, as a reporter for The Varsity, which he accused of "distorting" a great deal of the news it carries.

He called for the establishment of a second campus newspaper.

"When The Varsity steps out of line, misquotes people, distorts the facts and editorializes in its typically assinine and pusillifashon, the other paper can put the spotlight on The Varsity's antics."

Faulkner defends SAC at Wycliffe

By SUE HELWIG

Can one make a distinction between the kinds of issues that the Students Administrative Council can deal with?

An informal discussion between Tom Faulkner and students at Wycliffe College last night focussed again and again on this issue.

"Most of us want to have our opinions respected on certain issues—for example, moral issues such as capital punishment," one student declared.

"On issues that are going to affect the university, we want to be able to say whether we approve," another added.

Faulkner defended SAC by asking, "Do you think that there are any issues that are not moral?"

"The decision to disband the Blue and White Society as it existed was just as much a moral decision as the Placement Service decision."

The discussion led into an examination of the individual responsibility of a SAC representative.

One speaker insisted that a representative must consider the opinion of a minority.

"If the representative believes that he should give money on a point of personal principle, do you think he should refuse to do so?" Faulkner replied.

"Yes," the student answered.

One student said SAC has changed its area of concern from "such things as the campus centre" to "such issues as the draft dodger controversy."

"But that is simple, not true," Faulkner retorted.

"The vast majority of my time is spent on student projects. Less than one per cent of SAC's budget of $600,000 is spent on projects dealing with off-campus issues."

BOTTLES UP AT THE BULL AND THE BEAR.

There's just enough room for you and your friends at Toronto's newest pub. A stone's throw from campus on Wellesley, just east of Bay (part of The Sutton Place Hotel). So come as you are!

... we have lost an understanding that a valid social concern for family cohesion supports chastity, that hope for a reasonable world requires sobriety, and that the need to cope with the real rather than a fanciful world is behind our restrictions on the use of drugs. We must somehow re-establish the social purposes behind the private rules of morality, and this is primarily the responsibility of the adult world. When this responsibility is accepted, we shall be able to effect both the doctrine and the pattern of individual student behaviour, but not before.

correct authority

We don't know anything about Mark Kirk, what he thinks, what type of person he is, what he does. All we know is that he was convicted of a marijuana possession charge in a London, Ont. court Nov. 15 and that two days later the University of Western Ontario expelled him for an indefinite time and in no event less than the academic year 1967-68."

The injustice in all this has been pointed out in detail before but briefly: Kirk, an 18-year-old first-year student, pleaded guilty to the charge and was given a two-year suspended sentence after Magistrate D. B. Menzies had consulted with the university on the official attitude towards pot smoking.

"You may not be permitted to remain in Sydenham Hall (the UWO residence Kirk was arrested in Oct. 17) and continue your studies at the university . . . chances are very slim for you, young man," the magistrate told Kirk when he pronounced the sentence. The magistrate said the sentence was a lenient one because he understood the university would take some action.

Clearly this action by the university is a case of adding punishment where the criminal courts have already punished. Magistrate Menzies' smug statement that he was being lenient doesn't call for extra punishment. For one thing, a two years suspended sentence — two years of probation—is not a lenient sentence. It still involves a criminal record. Secondly, since the summer the courts have usually given suspended sentences to first offenders in marijuana possession cases.

This is the result of a major Ontario Appeal Court decision this summer involving a convicted marijuana pusher's first offence. The pusher was given four years and the appeal court ruled that this was a vindictive sentence that would do nothing to remove the essential problem of disrespect for the law and would in fact further alienate people from the law.

No such good sense was evident in Magistrate Menzies' court-room nor in the in-camera disciplinary hearing which the university ran to pass further sentence on Kirk. The type of vindictive action shown by the university can only further alienate the UWO students from the administration's authority.

Mao tse-tung once wrote that the only proper authority exerted over others is the authority of example and suggestion. Respect for authority comes naturally if that authority is used wisely.

The problem is, everybody wants to be a parent. When the Globe and Mail writes editorials on the Dow sit-in headlined An Example to Their Elders, the editorial writers are assuming the parental role. When the UWO board of governors ratified the disciplinary decision it too was assuming the parental role. The term in loco parentis (in place of the parent) is used in this respect. UWO has even initiated a public inquiry into the social conduct of its students.

We recognize that UWO is in a tough position when stories about marijuana and LSD use abound and when outside forces call for action to clear those involved out of the campus. What is hard to understand is how UWO could actually make such an incredibly stupid move as expelling Kirk even within their assumption of the in loco parentis role.

That role is one we don't agree with but assuming that the university has taken it in this case, the action is still not justified. Driving potheads out of the university's residences may be necessary considering the political position the university is in. Breaking Kirk's future (expulsion from any university means, because of an agreement made some years ago, that no other university will accept Kirk) was totally uncalled for.

Isn't the major part of the parental role giving a good example to the child? How will the children react when the parent acts in such a vindictive way? Especially at a time when even anti-marijuana thinkers are conceding that maybe pot isn't that bad after all.

UWO president D. Carleton Williams said Kirk was suspended on the basis of a regulation printed in the university's general information booklet. The regulation reads: "All students are expected to conduct themselves in a manner becoming scholars and ladies and gentlemen." Ponder that a while

equal publicity

Before anyone starts making the usual charges of bias in our coverage of this election, please study these figures.

From Nov. 24 to Dec. 4 we published 43 3-8 column inches of news that could be considered publicity for Faulkner. We published 85 7-8 inches of Charlton publicity and 12.5 inches of news that gives both publicity. All this is separate from the stories on the anti-Faulkner petition: 26.5 inches.

The Charlton publicity is justified, we think, because he was unknown and fighting against a president who has received a great deal of publicity before the election. The difference in the figures is in no way to be construed as favoritism on our part either for or against Charlton. It is evidence that we are being perfectly neutral — going out of our way to be so, in fact.

Both candidates are being given equal publicity. The reporter assigned to cover Charlton has said he is on that candidate's side. The reporter assigned to Faulkner hasn't made her position as clear, but seems to be on Faulkner's side.

correcting figures

When we said Monday that the proposed Placement Service committee will have nine members equally divided among students, faculty and administration, we were, of course, wrong.

The committee will have 14 members: five students, five faculty members, three administration people and one alumnus.

Our point still holds: that this arrangement does not necessarily mean that students will have control of the Placement Service.

LETTERS

who's an ostrich?

Sir:
Having read the accounts of the latest events at the Graduate Student Union and especially the amusing letter by Joseph DePazza in Monday's Varsity, I have decided the GSU is not an ostrich (Random, Nov. 30). Joseph DePazza is an ostrich.
Bob Bossin (III Innis)

the campus police

Sir:
In Ian Harrison's article on the University of Toronto campus police, Tom Lawson was reported to have said that the bad reputation of campus police was "blackened" by the "Berkeley incidents," and the "cracking of all those heads."

For the record, we know of no head cracking or of other particularly offensive behaviour on the part of the Berkeley campus police. The real mischief occurred when Governor Brown intervened, and called in police from nearby cities and state troopers. Relations between students and campus police have in general been good despite trying circumstances. What head cracking there has been at Berkeley has occurred off-campus during various student-led demonstrations.

American police in general seem to be more prone to violence than their Canadian counterparts, but we see no value in singling out an innocent group to explain away one's bad press.

engineers on caput

Sir:
At the general meeting of the Engineering Society held on November 29th in Convocation Hall a motion was passed which asked that the behaviour of students and members of the faculty who recently demonstrated against Dow Chemical in front of the Placement Service be regarded as a "breach of discipline as defined in the university statutes."

Effectively this motion requested that Caput take action against the organizers of and the participants in the "placement-service affair" comparable to the action taken against the entire Engineering Society after the fiasco ensuing from the mock opening of the Bloor-Danforth subway in the spring of 1966.

During the debate on this motion an amendment was introduced which suggested that the words "a breach of discipline as defined in the university statutes" be deleted and replaced by the words "breach of (Canadian) law." As the proposers of the motion pointed out, by making the change the Society would not be in the position of appealing to a group, (i.e. Caput), whose deliberations are secret and whose decisions are inaccessible to appeal, but instead would be asking that the behaviour of the demonstrators be judged by public trial in Canadian courts as any other citizen, not a member of the University community, would be judged. This amendment elicited considerable support from "Engineers", still smarting from the imposition of an unchallengeable $1,000 fine after the subway caper. However, once it was pointed out that the remainder of the loosely-worded motion would be ineffectual if action by the University were not requested it was suggested that in the interests of expediency (i.e. to avoid re-drafting the entire motion while the meeting degenerated into a shambles) the original motion would be amended to read "a breach of (Canadian) law and a breach of discipline as defined in the Statutes of the university." In this form the motion passed.

The one unfortunate aspect of this particular wording is that it allows one to construe that the Engineering Society endorses the special wide-ranging powers that Caput has over student behaviour under the definition of "breach of discipline." Personal experience has shown me that engineering students do not agree with the humiliating idea that the University administration acts "in loco parentis" and do not believe that the entire Engineering Society should not be required to pay "cash-money" without any means of appeal, for the actions of a few irresponsible individuals who were suspected, but never proven to be members of the Society.

It is my hope that the Engineering Society executive will make its position clear on this matter in the near future.

more comment on DOW, SAC, Skule, St. Mikes...

st. mike's missed

Sir:

An article in Monday's Varsity presented comments about the upcoming campus election from the presidents of the councils of New, Innis, Victoria, Trinity and University colleges, the president of the Graduate Students' Union and the president of the Edmund Burke Society. The coincidental facts of St. Michael's conspicuous absence (all other downtown arts colleges are included) and Mr. Fromm's residence at St. Michael's suggest your reporter is of the erroneous notion that Mr. Fromm can or does speak for the students of that college. (Ed. note: All it suggests is that Donall Healy was unavailable for comment Sunday night. See today's page 3).

To my knowledge the only person at St. Michael's empowered to do so is the council president or his delegate. Since Mr. Healy did initiate rather immediate council debate on the merits of the Dow sit-in and wrote a personal letter to Mr. Faulkner concerning SAC reaction to that matter, it is clear he has an opinion concerning at least the events which precipitated the election.

No criticism of Mr. Fromm's views per se is intended. Indeed it is far less difficult to understand the consistent way in which Mr. Fromm reached his position on this issue than the rather over-reactive way Mr. Healy reached his.

A list of St. Michael's problems, flaws, faults and ills might fill this page. It is, on the other hand, not so backward and parochial a school as all that — or merely Catholic, Catholic and Catholic as respondents to a recent Varsity questionnaire have suggested. In some senses the college has been ahead of its time as a component of this university.

J. F. C. (SGS)

fromm and st. mike's

Sir:

We particularly resent your attempts in various past issues to characterize the students at St. Mikes as following the line of Paul Fromm's idiot group. Many of us, especially the undersigned disagree completely with all his views.

—Signed by nine SMC men

fromm and charlton

Sir:

Well, I see from Monday's Varsity that Paul Fromm (II SMC) President of the Edmund Jerke Society is supporting SAC Presidential hopeful Bill Charlton (II Law) on the grounds that Charlton stands "for what he stands for". Is this the kiss of death?

Ashley Thomson (IV Vic)

full-time president

Sir:

Bill Charlton has said: "the president of the SAC should be a student and not a full-time paid executive like Tom Faulkner". I cannot subscribe to this view in the least and I could not see how anyone who has fully considered the implications of this suggestion take it seriously.

The truth lies before us. Faulkner is at the present time a devoted scholar. Adequate proof of this has been his continuous high academic standing in his course (Pol. Science and Economics) when he was here as an undergraduate. To many of those who are at present working beside him in his day to day tasks within the SAC and elsewhere he has often expressed regret at the fact that he has not been able to spend more time at his academic endeavours. He is certainly very much a student at heart and I believe he would take on as much academically as he possibly could at any given time.

This university is huge and complex. The person who is the SAC president must show the initiative to properly gauge what the students' needs are and then work constantly to fulfill these needs. Be these needs new residences, a student centre, staff-student academic committees or educational programmes, the president must undertake these responsibilities. The obvious complexities of such programmes require much more than a "two hour a day president". Much of the research behind such schemes may of course be delegated, but delegation involves co-ordination and a general knowledge of what is being done at all times. This task alone could very well devour at least a few hours each day.

What about all the meetings, committees and social gatherings which the president must attend and keep fully informed about? These are just other responsibilities that consume time to be sure, but is there not another function of the president, one which to me is perhaps his most important function?

This function of which I speak is of course his representation of this University to the outside world. If the reputation of this institution is to be upheld we must have a president who is tremendously well informed and up to date on all affairs which take place within the university and without.

How could any student fulfill this position adequately even if he were in the least demanding course at the University. Actually no such course exists. It is totally unrealistic today to demand that the SAC president be a full time student. If the presidents of huge corporations should be paid $175,000.00 a year for their functions why should the SAC president not be paid the little he is for serving over 20,000 students?

Glen Brownlee, President, VCUC

would you be so quick?

Sir:

Would you be so quick to editorialize SAC's right to legislate for the whole student body on moral issues, as you did Wednesday, if SAC had decided: to bar from campus companies carrying on an immoral trade with Red China, undermining the Free-World effort in Vietnam; or pharmaceutical companies producing birth control pills, threatening to compromise co-ed morality by substituting birth control for self control; or if SAC had decided to contribute from student funds to the Friends of Rhodesia organization (supporters of Ian Smith) or the Congo Mercenaries' Relief Fund. Or is it alright for SAC to legislate morality so long as it coincides with your indescribable moral standards.

Jaanus Proos (I Vic)

(Ed. note: We sure would be as quick. We would however, point out why the stands you suggest are wrong).

verbal gymnastics

Sir:

I was quite entertained by the amusing rhetorical gymnastics of the writer of a letter which you titled "the real issue" (Varsity, Dec. 1). In the true tradition of any great political debator, he succeeded in distorting the issue with a boldness that would have been admired by any King or MacDonald! As soon as "honour" comes in, so does the red herring — because honour implies only good intentions, not correctness.

I doubt anyone would impeach the honour of Tom Faulkner, and at any rate, his character is irrelevant to what is the 'real issue'.

The issue is as follows. The U.S., it is contended, exceeds its rights when it decrees that its soldiers should go out and kill Vietnamese communists, and when it (on a larger scale) meddles in another country's own affairs. The symbol of such a breach of proper powers seems to be the emotional image of napalm. So far, I agree with the theme — likely the U.S. government is in the wrong.

But, the so-called 'answer' to this is not that the SAC should bar representatives of a napalm-producing firm from the campus. To protest one government's encroaching on the right of moral decision of its electors the SAC (student government) wants to do the same thing to the Engineers. Also, it wants to meddle in the affairs of another government, the U.S. The issue, then has already been badly managed, because the SAC has already set a precedent of such moral encroachment in even voting on the Dow question. It would have been the same precedent if they had voted the other way, too. Still there would have been a moral legislation.

Faulkner, then, may well be a great guy, but he was wrong — or at least he was wrong in the light of the view which I have outlined, and which I gather the majority of thinking students would accept.

John Sivell (III Trin)

engineers immature

Sir:

Ah! May we all bend down and kiss the sweet rosy ass of the American Corporation! May we all be complacent in the sweet embrace of our future patrons, guarantors of endless football games on colour TV.

Yet it is strange that I do not find morality in the arguments of those that would make SAC a mere expedient of the problems that concern only students in the way of housing and immediate material advantage. If we can't get accustomed to thinking and acting in the matter of personal morality, and if we think that governments, whether student or otherwise, are only instruments of advancing ourselves materially, then I would suggest that Madison Avenue stands victorious, goddess of an army of faceless, well-trained, but ill-educated mass that stands at a sagging breast for the next drop of vitiating milk.

If the engineers et al are so worried about a leftist plot foisting views down their throats, then there is nothing to stop them, if they actually have views, from screaming at SAC council meetings, and, within the constitutional structure of the administration, affecting the policy that is democratically arrived at. Or are the engineers interested in democracy? Already the engineer spokesman, Ron Thompson, is talking of opting out of SAC unless the majority decision of the council concerning Dow is reversed.

The whole reaction of the engineers and reactionaries to the Dow controversy typifies the boyish immaturity of those who are concerned with only their own advancement (jobs), and who are disturbed when a majority of the presently constituted government of the students actually has the audacity to make a moral decision that runs counter to their own basically selfish views. In short, let's hear a little less whining from the engineers, and more of what they think, and how it grabs them to work for a company like Dow. It may be revealing.

THE INTERNATIONAL

At 10 p.m. one evening a few months ago, Pramila Sami arrived in Toronto. She had come a long way—from Bombay, India—to study political science at U of T, and now she was stranded with no-one to contact and nowhere to go.

Finally someone directed her to the International Student Centre (ISC) on St. George St., and there she went, hoping for a room for the night.

"And then everything happened so fast. Immo (Weinrich, a student volunteer) told me to just sit there and everything would be taken care of. And Mrs. Riddell (director of the house) was so wonderful to me — she let me stay two days with her until another place was found. She is a very nice lady."

Pramila is now living with a Dutch couple on Duplex Avenue and she is "very happy and pleased" with the arrangements.

Accommodation aid is one way in which ISC helps overseas students arriving in Canada, but it is only a small part of the story. Foreign students are made aware of ISC while still in their native countries. After a student has been formally accepted by the university, he is sent student-prepared ISC pamphlets on cost of living, currency and financial aid, on climate, clothing and food, and on employment possibilities, health requirements and accommodation problems.

In this way a Brazilian, or a student from southern India (where, says Pramila, the weather is "hot and hotter"), is given an idea of the type of clothing needed to combat snow, and of the benefits of a heated room during Canada's cold winters. By the same token, a South African, black or white, is given some conception of the fully-integrated society, which he will have to get accustomed to.

The students who compile the information for the ISC pamphlets draw on their own experiences to illuminate the peculiarities and difficulties involved with each individual case. With this information, the overseas students' indoctrination into the Canadian way of life commences.

But this is just the beginning. Throughout Canada the Canadian Service for Overseas Students and Trainees and, in Toronto particularly the Overseas arrivals during the month of September. In headquarters, arrange for volunteers to meet overseas arrivals during the month of September in Toronto these university representatives set up booths at the airport, the bus terminal, the train station, and the Royal York Hotel. The volunteers answer any queries from incoming students, help them with immediate problems, and escort them to their Toronto accommodation. Special arrangements are made to welcome students not arriving during the reception month of September.

The many volunteers take an active interest in helping their fellow overseas students, and this friendliness continues and grows at ISC. Nancy Mott (III Vic) says that it is this "friendly attitude" which attracts her to ISC, even though her studies don't allow her to participate in much more than lunch there.

"You can't help but meet people here," she says. "It's not like U C or Wymilwood where they ignore you and everyone is immersed in his own little problems. It's hard to explain, but people are more interested in each other here. Here you are surrounded by people and it's much easier to get into a conversation. And, the coffee is only five cents a cup."

Mr. Ron Atkinson, assistant director of ISC, estimates that the house caters anywhere from three to 500 student each day. Lunch-hour, however, is the busiest time. Noon lectures on just about any topic, followed possibly by panel discussions or poetry readings, or someone's strumming on the house-owned guitar, are activities arranged to engage the lunch bunch.

Throughout the year at all times of the day or evening, documentary films on Canada's way of life and informative discussions are often aranged. At various times guest speakers present views on subjects ranging from life in Canada to the Vietnam War. Excursions like the recent exploration of the IBM plant in Toronto are arranged to show the overseas students, and the native Canadians, points of interest in and around Toronto's community.

These activities are well attended for the most part, and numbers are usually equally divided between Canadian students and overseas students. In this way a forum is presented where students can meet fellow students from other countries.

The overseas students also form clubs of their own nationalities. There are over twenty of these national clubs, one of which is the Hong Kong club that includes the more than 350 Hong Kong students enrolled at the university. These clubs present a place where a student can meet with others of his own nationality and with basically same mutual interests as himself. Many of these clubs' activities are national days or evenings of entertainment, planned solely by the club for the community at large. Recently, for example, a few Indian students presented a sitar concert during the evening. And sometimes the West Indian Steel Drum band plays in the basement studio.

A national day at ISC usually begins at lunchtime with a display of articles from the country concerned, and sometimes, as on the recent China day, with samples of native foods. In the evening, festivities may continue with native dancers, more native food, and social dancing.

Native food, in fact, seems to command a revered spot in the ISC mosaic. At the international banquets which occur a few times each year, a wide variety of dishes is presented, all prepared by the students. A recent sumptuous feast, an International Christmas Banquet, included Indian curries, spicy West African stews, and a bland vegetarian dish favoured by Buddhist monks. According to director Mrs. Riddell, it is this type of activity which produces the camaraderie that entices most people once associated with ISC to return and help plan and participate in even more activities.

Part of that camaraderie must come from within the wall of ISC's warm, impressive structure on St. George St. The building, Cumberland House, is named after Joseph Cumberland, a member of the Ontario legislature in the late 1800's who advocated international understanding.

The old mansion had been incorporated into the U of T system many years ago and was used mainly for some engineering classes. The university then recognized the need for a home for ISC and donated the house to that cause. Although the mansion was in bad need of repair, committees of the Rotary Club restored it to excellent condition.

The main lounge, called Pendarvus—"meeting place"—contains sculptures and paintings from around the world, and it is in this room that the displays for the national days are presented. In the basement are a steel drum band studio and two ping-pong tables.

ISC's activities are planned mainly by volunteers, but with so much happening, a full-time executive headed by Mrs. Riddell, has been appointed to keep the planners out of total confusion. All costs and upkeep of the house are assumed by the University Student Services.

ISC is eminently successful: not only has an international attitude been sown among the students; the house has also developed into a community affair. Many Toronto families are regular visitors to ISC. They come for a social evening, usually on Sunday, to meet overseas students, discuss differences in their ways of life, and perhaps invite a student home for a home-cooked meal.

ISC is a community house. As the people there put it, here one "is welcome to enjoy the fellowship and facilities ... and to share in the responsibility of working towards our goal of creative interaction and communication."

U of T scientists study saucers

By KATHY ADAMS

Mathematical and chemical formulas aren't the only things research scientists are interested in. Flying saucers, hibernation and artificial faces are some of the things University of Toronto scientists are studying.

Dr. W. G. Bigelow is studying hibernation in connection with heart surgery. Hibernating animals require less oxygen because their body temperature is lowered.

He has found that by lowering a person's body temperature before open-heart surgery, chemical activity in the body is slowed and longer operations are possible.

The institute of aerospace studies has set up a committee to study flying saucers. The committee refuses to give any information on its research until it has reached some conclusions.

The institute is also examining airplane crashes, including factors affecting a pilot's sense of balance, methods of determining air currents and mechanical problems.

The department of physics is studying the formation of clouds to determine if clouds form as ice particles that then melt and fall as rain.

The Connaught medical research laboratories have developed a vaccine against measles which is now being tested on animals and children. A new vaccine against rabies is also being tested.

U of T scientists are studying ways of replacing huma-corneas with ones made of teflon. Teflon corneas are being used in rabbits because the substance is very inert and not readily rejected by the body.

The U of T prosthetics unit at St. Margaret's Hospital is developing artificial faces for people who have had part of their faces removed because of cancer. These artificial faces are held in place with glasses.

One of the main problems was developing an artificial eye that would blink at the same time as the real eye. This is done by a small motor with a tiny switch connected to the real eye.

U of T scientists are renowned for their work in heart surgery. Dr. Raymond Heinbecker received a gold medal early this year for showing that parts of the heart disabled by a coronary blockage should be removed.

Premier faces President over finances

SASKATOON (VNS) — Saskatchewan Premier Ross Thatcher and University of Saskatchewan President J. W. T. Spinks are at odds over government control of the university's financial affairs.

In a Nov. 21 report, Dr. Spinks said Mr. Thatcher had backed down, but in a later report, Mr. Thatcher stated a department of university affairs would be created.

Premier Thatcher recommended "six or seven sub-votes" that would be introduced to legislature scrutiny of university expenses. He said one sub-vote will refer to salaries, another to the furnishings and fixtures the university is allowed.

He did not elaborate on the rest of the sub-votes.

President Spinks and the board of governors issued a joint statement Nov. 25 saying: "the board will not accept any conditions that in its opinion compromise the autonomy of the university."

Mr. Thatcher, the statement said, emphasized the principle that the government would not interfere in the internal operation of the university.

"Staff members of the treasury board and the university administration are to sit down together immediately and work out the mechanics of the budget presentation."

Girl's feet attacked by Yale nibbler

NEWHAVEN, Conn. (CUP-CPS) — A phantom foot-nibbler has attacked at least four women in the stacks of the Yale University library during the past month.

According to descriptions the assailant crawls up on all fours and attempts to kiss or bite the feet of girls studying in the stacks. In at least one incident, a girl's shoe fell off, and the attacker began biting at her toes.

Campus police are looking for a "white male, six feet tall, 160 to 170 pounds, with dark blond hair and a fair complexion."

It is believed that the attacker is "probably an emotionally disturbed person."

The nibbler reportedly chooses the nibbles indiscriminately. One observer who is acquainted with several of the women involved says "he knows how to pick them."

Sir George still in UGEQ

MONTREAL, (CUP) — Students at Sir George Williams University voted last week to retain membership in the Union General des Etudiants du Quebec.

The vote was carried by a narrow margin of 1095-971. Only 38 per cent of the students voted.

Student Council President Jeff Chipman expressed disappointment at the narrow margin. He felt this indicated that the student body was still split on the issue.

A day in the life of a SAC president

Last January the Students' Administrative Council decided to give its president the option of dropping his studies and taking office on a full-time basis.

Tom Faulkner took that option and became SAC's first full-time president. He is paid $75 a week.

How does he spend his time as an employee of U of T students? A run-down of one day last month goes like this.

He arrived at the SAC office around 8:30 a.m. He spent most of the morning dealing with letters, writing reports and making phone calls.

Noon is the usual time for SAC commission meetings. Faulkner is an ex-officio member of all the commissions and tries to attend as many as he has time for.

But on this particular day he travelled out to Scarborough College to speak on the Macpherson report. He makes a practice of accepting speaking invitations, such as this one from the Scarborough students society.

He returned for a 4 p.m. debate on the Blue and White Society, and finished off with a meeting on Tartu College in the evening.

On another day he might have been representing students on one of the presidential advisory committees or consulting with administration officials about the latest crisis.

Faulkner is one of three student members of the Ontario Committee on Student Awards as well as other provincial government committees.

"It's certainly a job that needs a full-time president," says Jan Duinker, SAC finance commissioner. "The trend is inevitable in a big university.

"If you want a good student voice, the president has to keep in touch."

"Meeting place" draped with listeners

The Scarborough students sat on chairs, the floor, leaned against the walls and hung over the balcony or "the meeting place," hub of activity in the arts college.

Both Charlton and Faulkner spoke well, receiving equal applause and smiles, handshakes and encouragement after the lunch hour meeting.

Many students, unconvinced by Charlton's presentation of what the extent of SAC involvement should be, challenged him with questions that sought rhetorical impact rather than information.

But Charlton's own rhetoric overpowered them.

One student said he supported the right of student councils to make moral decisions for him.

Charlton bellowed back at him: "If you need people to make moral decisions for you, you are not a man."

Faulkner added another slant to the moral question debate with the legal maxim "silence means consent."

Charlton didn't refute this point directly but defended a student's right to be apathetic about SAC, the same as he might be apathetic about rugby and not turn out to watch every game.

In debating what the involvement of SAC should be, Faulkner preferred examples like the former university housing service policy of racial discrimination and Trefann Court, where students helped the poor help themselves.

Charlton stuck with the Placement Service issue and even touched on Vietnam.

"The war in Vietnam is being fought because both sides are imposing moral truths on others."

Presidents talk about the election

Joey Steiner (IV UC), a former president of the University College Literary and Athletic Society, puts his support behind Faulkner.

"I agree with his views on the extent to which government should get involved in issues outside campus."

He said Charlton would turn SAC into a tea dance committee. "He's not serious. He's just making a debating point and if he hasn't got the time for a full campaign he can't do Faulkner's job."

Harry Brown, the president of the Scarborough College student council, said that, as an individual, he supports Faulkner in the coming election.

But he pointed out that the council, like the college, is "split right down the middle."

"This election is going to be a terribly significant one.

"First, because the organized rightist reaction will lead to a clarification of issues, which is a good thing.

"And secondly, because this will be a general election on a general principle. If Faulkner wins, every U of T student council will have indirectly gained a mandate to take stands on moral issues. On the other hand, if he loses . . .

"I think student councils should have the right to take moral stands. That's why I'm hoping Faulkner wins."

Donall Healy, the president of the St. Michael's College Student Council, said he hasn't made up his mind yet about the two candidates, and won't till after he's heard Charlton speak.

"While I am generally pleased with Tom Faulkner's policies, I have to disagree with the recent actions of the SAC.

"SAC has a right to discuss moral issues, but should not attempt to impose their views on the rest of the campus.

Shelly Wagner, the president of the Medical Society and last year's SAC vice-president, refused to support or reject either candidate.

"I haven't heard either of their platforms. However, I think government should say out of individual concerns.

"I am not commenting directly on the SAC situation though, and I'll vote for whoever will do the best job."
