And in order to succeed in preaching to the converted, as this play is, of course, it's got to hit the gut. The opening night audience was quite different than the usual one (and I credit myself with being a connoisseur of opening night audiences). These were your "revolutionaries with tenure", your "cocktail radicals". One well dressed young man, standing in the lobby at intermission time, holding his drink, was holding forth on the jungle: "You don't know what it's like, in the jungle. You're all alone. It's terrible."

I don't know whether this fellow had been in the jungle or not. (It looked highly unlikely). But the play certainly never hit the audience with Che's reality, the utter loneliness at the end, on the edge of the jungle, about to be shot, questioning very deeply the future of the revolution.

Just as the church and its fine paintings have taken the anguish out of the death of Christ, so the final scenes in the play gloss over the sordidness of the death of Che. It's not enough that the standard bearers carry the message all over the world. They're all too ready to make martyrs. Martyrs, it is true, die for our sins if we immortalize them. But by immortalizing them, and casting our sins onto them, we lose the best part of ourselves.

And so, in Mario Fratti's play, it was more than easy for the audience to cast their sins, the shortcomings onto Che.

Sure the questions were asked Can the guerrilla revolution co-exist with the established communist parties in the countries? Violence now for its own sake, or lenience, as Che equivocated? Can those ignorant masses ever be moved to start a revolution? Why does a man like Che Guevara give his life for the cause? What is the cause? Is it worth it?

But what we got is stuff for books, stuff for the minds of "revolutionaries with tenure", to be discussed in the universities and the Communist clubs in the backrooms. What we need is something that raises leftist intellectuals by the seat of their pants and confronts them with basic questions like punches to the midsection, undisguised by rhetoric, unsoftened by platitudes.

Preaching to the converted is cozy. It gives one a sense of warmth in the cold world. That's what makes the San Francisco Mime Troupe less than powerful when it speaks to the New Left.

Che Guevara was well acted, well produced and very slickly directed. One can find very few faults with the production that are not trivial. It can be said that George Luscombe, in a smart combination of dance and voice has come up with a fast-moving, exciting adventure story, one that deserves to be acclaimed. Cedric Smith played Che with confidence.

But this very smartness and the play's shallowness saved the audience from a night of confrontation.

euripides' hippolytus

Any reviewer of a Greek play has one major problem: what to review. He can't very well talk about the play itself. After all, if it's lasted 2,500 years it must be good. This isn't really true. Anything written in Greek is treasured.

Greek tragedies are given in Modern Greek with the result that neither Euripides nor myself can understand them. Modern Greeks were quite conspicuous Friday night from the way they nudged each other in all the right places, immediately distinguished Phaedra from the Nurse and called Theseus a fascist monarchist under their breath. So when Theseus asks the chorus (at line 844) what the Hell they're doing, the befuddled critic doesn't even know enough to shout, "hear, hear"

Euripides is especially unamenable to review. He is often quite purposely blah, interested in cutting the ground out from under heroic characters. This is rather a subtle process and one which is quite incomprehensible if you don't speak the language. Theseus, for example, is one of Athens' greatest heroes, but Euripides won't even let him kill a minotaur or an Amazon. All he kills is Hippolytus and he has some silly bull of Poseidon's do it for him offstage. Aeschylus might well have put the bull on stage.

Seneca has a scene in which Thyestes tries to piece together the chopped-up remnants of his slaughtered sons (Just the gift for the jigsaw fanatic who has everything.) All we get in Hippolytus is a messenger speech, very moving no doubt — all the Modern Greeks in the audience were panting away — but hard to follow. I've learned more from quite unarticulate sea-shells than I learned from that messenger.

So I can't really review "Hippolytus". If you're interested in Greek or in the theatre, do see it. You'll like the singing in some of the choruses and you'll adore the way Theseus' eyes flash. And you'll like the people. With my usual other-worldliness, I had ignored the fact that it was opening night I put on a jacket and a pair of jeans and Sue honored the occasion with her first-ever pony tail. One woman put on a mink coat and if she was wearing jeans you couldn't see them because the coat reached to the floor. There were so many dinner jackets the theatre looked like Penguin Island. Robertson Davies was there; John Roberts said "Hello" to us as we left. Why the Hell would John Roberts go to a Greek tragedy? Well, the Piraiikon Theatron is a private troupe but the Greek ambassador was there too. So were young men handing out leaflets informing Toronto society that Greece is ruled by a fascist military junta. There was a ball afterwards and a reception for the ambassador. We weren't invited and I don't suppose the leaflet people were either.

Sitting Bull's last words were 'Custer pissed his pants.' ... Lionel Douglas.

Until a year ago, Christmas 1967, the world was accustomed to look upon young Frederick Verner Mozart, age sixteen, as the next likely — and most promising — heir to the genius of his forefather, Wolfgang Amadeus.

When George and Ingrid Mozart, citizens of Switzerland, announced in 1950 the birth of their first son Frederick Verner, to a small group of friends and relatives in Geneva, it was noted as a matter of curiosity in the European journals that Ingrid's maiden name was also Mozart, and that the child was a direct lineal descendant of the great Wolfgang from both his mother's and father's side.

This particular branch of the Mozart lineage came into official existence when one Greta Heineman, a serving maid proclaimed to a startled Viennese society in 1788 that her recent male child was sired by the revered composer himself and that henceforth her child would be surnamed after his father.

And so it was in 1950, that George and Ingrid prudently vowed to themselves that no aspect of the lately arrived Frederick's musical education should be lacking. As all generations of the Mozart lineage since the eighteenth century, he was closely watched for any sign of the same lucid sparks which carried Wolfgang Amadeus into eternity.

Until his arrival, however, the long and extensive progeny, carefully nurtured by parents and other genetic gardeners, had produced a respectable but uninspiring crew to the world of music — largely unknown to the world at large; the list includes two conductors, five concert pianists, a composer of obtuse cantatas and a senior professor of electronic music in Swedenborg.

It appeared, however, that the aspiring Ingrid had more cause for hope than might be expected, for the young Frederick's physical appearance recalled a striking similarity of expression and countenance to the description of the young Wolfgang given us by his biographer Vilhelm Steinhager:

... the child was a reticent and curious creature. He was quite pleased to sit quietly in a corner, unobserved, observing; his eyes were always wide and staring, never blinking. His face assumed a somewhat cynical, yet gentle smile which he rarely relaxed. His hair at first grew unevenly, in patches on his crown but as he grew it filled out into thick brown curls. His nose was sharp, the nostrils merely slits. He forever had the air of supreme, relaxed smugness which was not entirely unpleasant...

To punctuate his parents' avid curiosity, Paris Match published an intriguing blurb by an eminent Italian historian and genealogist alongside a photograph of young Frederick and a line drawing of Wolfgang by his assiduous biographer. The similarity was too pointed to be ignored.

Although the representatives of the worlds of science and music were as yet unwilling to commit themselves to drawing any conclusions, they were sufficiently interested to urge an early and extensive musical exposure for Frederick Verner Mozart.

A small piano, a guitar and a set of cymbals were placed in his nursery at an early age to facilitate and hasten the propitious hour when the world might again recognize and welcome the master in-earnate. Two large stereo speakers piped in a constant stream of the finest recordings so that the child was never without music, from the moment of waking until sleep; and while he slept, his subconscious mind was prodded with recordings of the earlier work of Wolfgang Amadeus.

During the first five years of his life, audiences at concerts, lectures, private recitals and films, became accustomed to seeing the prodigal tyke sitting quietly with his nurse in the front rows.

It should also be mentioned at this point, that the boy was in no way hostile to his programmed existence, although he was an occasional source of embarrassment to his guardians whenever he happened to fall asleep during a concert as he did in London in 1956 just as the audience rose to its feet for the Hallelujah Chorus of The Messiah.

The following year at the age of seven, he was given to the foremost instructors of the French and German conservatories; an added bonus was an offer, quickly accepted by Ingrid, to have the child enrolled as a special summer student in the Leningrad Academy of Art.

It was then that George and Ingrid felt a touch of apprehension as they drove young Frederick to the airport for his first meeting with Von Brunswieg, the German classicist. During the introductions he was polite enough but persisted in a few annoying habits which Ingrid had been unsuccessful in purging, such as picking his nose with an unusual zest with one hand, and pursuing an imaginary flea in his crotch with the other. The professor, fortunately, regarded these as the natural antics of a precocious, gifted child.

Ingrid's fears were, however, soon dissipated as the preliminary reports arrived from his German instructor — the child was undoubtedly fate's darling, a true and worthy successor to the name of Mozart. In the following months the Paris Conservatory and the Leningrad Academy concurred with Von Brunswieg's laudatory proclamation.

And thus the child passed his formative years and early adolescence in a strenuous environment of pedantry and practice studios. His visits to Geneva were limited to three weeks at Christmas and even then the lad was afforded little rest as George and Ingrid took extraordinary pride in presenting Frederick Verner at the best soirees and social functions.

By now his inveterate nose-picking and crotch scratching which he practised in even the politest of company, was discreetly regarded as a quaint trademark of the flowering genius. Indeed it was widely held that the austere Wolfgang Amadeus himself had been given to similar habits.

Our interest in this stage of Frederick's life, however, rises in the fact that he quite consciously and deliberately deprived the world of any concrete example of his much heralded genius. Although his professors were fond of reminding the international press that he was, at age twelve, capable of sitting down at the keyboard of any concert hall in Europe, they were at a loss to explain why, in fact, he did not do so.

Furthermore, not even the professors had an inkling as to the scope or range of his creative genius, for the lad refused to show anyone his own compositions. All that was known was that young Frederick had been for the last four years "preparing his work."

All attempts at cracking the cloud of mystery failed. It is reported that a group of American entrepreneurs in 1965 offered Frederick, age fifteen, a one performance a child's christ

mas in poland

concert at Town Hall; the offer was accompanied with a certified cheque for an extraordinary sum of money and a blank contract from RCA Victor to record the event.

The contract was returned immediately without explanation, the concert offer rejected, but, strange to relate, the cheque was cashed in a Swiss bank. Further efforts at communicating from the Americans were unsuccessful and the entrepreneurs declared themselves bankrupt.

A year later, Christmas 1966, an astonished world press carried the following wire-service report:

GENEVA (Reuters) — George and Ingrid Mozart, citizens of Geneva, announced today the first public performance of the work of Frederick Verner Mozart, their son.

A prepared statement by Mrs. Mozart contained the following information: the concert would take place next Christmas (1967) in Warsaw and would begin Christmas Eve and terminate a week later, New Year's Eve; for the duration of the concert the doors of the Palace of Culture will remain locked; luxury accommodation (beds and meals) will be provided for members of the audience in the Palace itself; admission by application to George and Ingrid Mozart, Geneva. Price of admission, five thousand American dollars.

World reaction throughout the following year was understandably agitated; the prodigious Frederick was the centre of controversy in editorials, speeches, government policy declarations and a resolution of 'concern' was passed unanimously in the General Assembly of the United Nations. The premier of the Soviet Union was heard to utter an unprintable Russian curse and promptly terminated the prestigious scholarship at the Leningrad Academy; the American president responded with an unsavoury remark about 'Kraut queers and perverts'; the Pope issued a fiat declaring Frederick's concert as 'Un-Christian' and declared that any Catholic attending the unholy event during the holy season should find himself outside the jurisdiction of the Church.

At the same time, the eminent Three applied, along with millions of others, for admission to the Christmas Concert, as it came to be known. Along with millions of others, they were rejected, the two thousand who were finally graced with certificates of admission took no small pride in recognizing that they now constituted the elite of the world social register.

Unfortunately for their egos, it was a stipulation of admission that their identity as a member of the audience be held secret until Christmas Eve itself.

And so, Christmas Eve, 1967, Jean-Luc Godard set up his cameras outside the main doors of the Palace of Culture in Warsaw, (he too was refused admission) to record the entrances and, much later, the exits Andy Warhol (another reject) was there to film the locked doors for the six days between the entrances and exits. The CBC was there to bring us the highlights, and American Television was there to bring us the whole thing, live.

Unfortunately no members of the world press, radio and television were allowed into the Palace itself. Unfortunately too, it was later discovered that the true entrance to the palace for those of the audience was through an underground storm sewer from a Warsaw suburb. As a result, nothing happened outside the doors to the palace, and for all intents and purposes, what happened inside is known only to those who were there.

Young Frederick Verner Mozart was indeed the master of his house Christmas Eve 1967, the thronging crowd of thousands stood quietly in the falling snow of Stanislawsky Square waiting to hear even the faintest strains of what would surely be the greatest single work of music to issue from the heart of man.

For six days nothing happened, no sounds were heard although the faint shadows at the windows suggested a great deal of activity inside.

On the evening of the sixth day, New Year's Eve, the fire began; witnesses in Stanislawsky Square later testified that it was seen to begin in the basement of the Palace and spread with such a rapidity that it seemed as if kerosene or some other flammable agent was sprinkled to hasten its progress. The crowd outside, rushing to beat down the doors and save the inhabitants, who could be clearly heard screaming in pain, were driven back by a volley of shots from the upper windows.

As the fire spread in its greedy meal of the Palace, the screams of the inhabitants roaring inside became more voluminous, like a mighty choir; they were joined by the roar of a huge organ within the palace adding spontaneous counterpoint to their screams; at that moment also, so accurate was Frederick's timing, all the church bells of Warsaw began ringing in the New Year; a mighty cheer arose from the crowd watching the burning palace as they grew to awareness of the Mozart Carol — to it they added their laughter and whistles until ashes alone remained.

Of the previous six days, nothing is known save that a charred, pencil-written fragment of a notebook discovered by demolition workers, indicated that all members of the audience of the Christmas Concert themselves took part in the Concert; furthermore they all knew the projected finale would be their last; and furthermore, all were given the opportunity to leave if they so wished — an opportunity which they rejected to a man, they had, in fact, manned the guns themselves which drove back the astonished crowd outside.

In the days following reports appeared in the press of mysterious disappearances of a number of eminent artists; the Beatles, the Moscow State Theatre, Bergman, Brando, entire symphony orchestras, Picasso, Chaplin, Ulanova, Bruhn, Tarnopolsky, the Peking Opera Company, Muddy Waters — the list goes on; some two hundred names in all. It seems that the cream of twentieth century artistry had given of itself in Warsaw Christmas Eve.

One survives the Mozart Carol of course, Frederick Verner himself who now lives comfortably in the Bronx; since Christmas Eve 1967 he has made no statement other than "I did it for the money", and generally follows an isolated existence; some observers report that he has given up his nose picking and crotch scratching and sits quietly listening to a recording of the Mozart Carol from the time of the fire, captured by an assiduous portable RCA crew, entitled simply Frederick Mozart: Opus Number One.

Mr. and Mrs. George Mozart, his proud parents, are unavailable for comment — in fact they too have not been seen since December 24, 1967.

the fixer no mere patchwork film

No less than six new films open in Toronto this weekend, just in time to fill your holiday time and mind, and empty your Christmas pocket. Besides the can't-miss Beatles' Alice in Wonderland adventure "Yellow Submarine", reserve an evening to be put through "The Fixer". Reserve an entire evening. With a starry cast and first rate direction, it's a film that resonates through your system long after the viewing experience.

It resonates because it describes a man's quest for identity, a search that carries his endurance far beyond the limits of average men like you and I. It is at first a very private quest for innocence and expression, a tortuous one, just as was Thomas More's in "A Man For All Seasons". The barriers fly up in the face of the quest, much the same as any culture, or time, or bureaucracy constructs its barriers. Yet the determined and exceptional man probes his own mind against the jagged walls, and emerges, to his own deep satisfaction. He refuses to allow his mind to be stepped on.

The image takes on even more depth and radiation when the quest becomes not only private but corporate and all-involving (to borrow McLuhanese). Both Yakov Bok in "The Fixer" and Thomas More in "A Man For All Seasons" present images of men who put the public on as environment. The story is not at all important. The quest becomes a public probe into the very material of the culture. It faces Czarist Russia in 1911 as its barriers, and in the process retells its denouement. Bok emerges free from his private quest to involve the whole apparatus of Eastern European bureaucracy, in a corporate quest.

The film traps you in the first scene, as charging Russian Cossacks playfully pillage and slice at a Jewish "shtetl", or village; a ruthless pogrom that was a common occurrence in most of Eastern Europe. We are thrust into the feeling of helplessness that characterized the period. From that hurried, and confusing scene onward, there is no time to ease up and reflect. The forces of government, mass barriers and human anxieties, the "mind-forged manacles" of organized behaviour close in on the center of our attention: — Yakov Bok (Alan Bates) — Jew. The East European horrors that directed Kafka's nightmares begin to grind at him.

He chances to work outside the Jewish ghetto in Kiev, after coming to the aid of Lebedev (Hugh Griffith), a notorious Russian anti-Semite, eyes bulging jewels quivering. Before long Bok is accused and then dismissed of raping Lebedev's sickly daughter Zinaida (Elizabeth Hartman). The alternating thrusts of pain and relief that circulate throughout the film begin to take shape. Rumors of Jewish passover rituals which use Christian blood pick up, and Bok is singled out and accused as the one responsible for the "39 Jewish stabs" in the body of a Catholic child. He is unjustifiably arrested and the machinery grinds even faster.

For the remainder of the film the audience is enclosed in the prison cell with Bok, disgraced and tormented by the guards. Even in prison Alan Bates, as Bok evokes the intelligence and presence of mind to be one up on his tormentors. His mind is active, he searches for meaning.

A confession to the crime from Bok would satisfy the anxieties of a hostile populace who must hate someone other than the state for their suffering. The pattern is familiar. The Russian Minister of Justice (David Warner) insists on obtaining the confession, for there is "unity in hate". Bok is a Jew and he necessarily becomes victim to the fate of the Jewish nation, in addition to the weight of Russian bureaucracy.

The film advances to a quite different level when Bok's plea for innocence and dignity becomes more than a private quest. He realizes that justice itself is being denied him when his defense attorney (Dirk Bogarde) is murdered in his cell. As the case attracts international attention the Czar offers Bok a pardon, he can go free. Bok refuses, and demands a trial for the sake of his conscience. From this point onward the quest for dignity and expression takes on the entire structure of Russian bureaucracy.

Based on Bernard Malamud's prize-winning novel, the film manages to throw off the aura of Jewish suffering that pervades the book. The long Jewish history of persecution is a symbol in itself, of man's defiant struggle for dignity in the face of arrogance. To some directors the symbolic Jew may have been sufficient to carry the theme. Recent American novels abound with this image of man's struggle. Malamud's novel certainly rests more firmly on that symbol. In it the author dwells on Bok's religious upbringing and his personal Jewish identity dilemma.

Yet director John Frankenheimer ("Manchurian Candidate", "Bird Man of Alcatraz", "Candidate") transcends the symbol of the suffering Jew, to get right at the core of the quest in human terms. Bok cries out during periods of intense suffering, "I am a man, I am a man". His mind and human dignity cannot be blotted out. The fact that Yakov Bok is a Jew is incidental; although as my friend Frank says, "it doesn't hurt". Alan Bates does not look or sound like a poor Russian Jew, not the one, at least that Malamud described.

Bok finally emerges from his cell amid the blinding light of the public eye to be tried and the film ends. He has found dignity in himself. For interest's sake, the book was based on the true story of Mendel Beiliss, a Russian Jew, who in fact was acquitted at that trial. —arny wise

this is neither bob nor rae

Well my friends it's Christmas agin. On voit la neige qui tombe les enfants attaquant les vieillards dans les allées noires l'odeur des pissoirs puants ah Noël Noël. Je me souviens. Ou sont les neiges d'antan? Nostalgia, as they say, ain't what it used to be.

Holidays are essentially hypocritical, in that we feel and say and do friendly things that we hate doing the rest of the year. Freud has said that tribal holidays represented an institutionalized form of de-repression. In other words you could make love to your neighbour's wife one day a year, but never on any other day. Hence the mistletoe. A pretty unsatisfactory replacement I'd say.

That's my nasty paragraph. Here's my merry one. Christmas for most of us has lost whatever religious significance it ever had, but as a secular humanistic form of human renewal, of faith in what evidence of good there is in mankind, of the realization that we have failed to control the evil in man — it's still a worthwhile institution.

So not good cheer, so much as calm reflection. I'm supposed to be the book editor, so I should try and bring this altogether in a peroration about the greatness of the written word and the Canadian publishing business and the coffee table glossy glitzy travel books ((Can't you see them in a few years 'Oshawa, valhalla on the lake'; or 'Moose Jaw, prairie flower of the plains' etc.?)

I won't, but books next term might try and do something on the problem of books in Canada and Toronto, a few more political pieces on political prose, and more on poetry, short stories, and the (is it dying or merely dormant?) novel.

So don't make love to your neighbour's wife (anymore than you would anyway). Be no less, or more, cheery than you normally are. And as they say in television, keep those letters and post cards coming.

OTIS REDDING. Live in Europe. Volt 116

Otis Redding's albums repeat the same material too often, and this one is no exception. At the most, only two songs don't appear on one of his other records, but he sings them best on this one. The excitement that a large audience brings to his performance is far greater than anything Otis Redding and his band ever cooked up in a studio session.

WILSON PICKETT. The Midnight Mover. Atlantic 8183

The finest Pickett album in some time, rivalled only by Wicked Pickett. It captures a lot of his excitement, though not up to a live performance. Excellent accompaniment, especially by lead guitar. The songs are generally good, and there's one which is a bit unusual for him, "Deborah," sung partly in Italian. It's surprisingly good.

THE ROOTS OF AMERICA'S MUSIC. Arhoolie 2001-2002

Something has held up this set, so that it isn't going to be distributed in Canada in time for Christmas. If you're going down to the States, you might be able to find a copy. Arhoolie, along with its subsidiaries, Blues Classics and Old Timey, has built up the world's greatest library of American music. These two records are made up of cuts from the Arhoolie catalogue alone. The four sides cover country blues, city blues, gospel & jazz, and country, cajun & folk. Artists include Bukka White, Lightning Hopkins, Mercy Dee Walton, Big Joe Williams, Big Mama Thornton and 26 others. Altogether a tremendous introduction to the real folk music of the U.S. Also a great value. The two volume set lists for the price of one.

BIG JOE WILLIAMS & SONNY BOY WILLIAMSON. Blues Classics 21

Big Joe sings and plays the guitar, Sonny Boy Williamson (the original), plays harmonica. This is a reissue of 14 sides from the 78s that these two Mississippi blues greats turned out together. You can't get away with playing these songs as background music; they have to be listened to. Not great hi-fi or anything like that, but if you know someone who really likes to sit and soak up great country blues, this is an excellent record.

FRED MCDOWELL. Vol. 2. Arhoolie 1027

A second excellent album by the world's greatest living bottle-neck guitar player. If Fred McDowell had been recorded by the race record companies in the '20s and '30s, collectors would be paying fancy prices for beat up copies of his old records, but he didn't get on a record until about 1960. The best traditions of the rough, beautiful Mississippi style blues are very much alive in Fred McDowell. Highly recommended to blues fanciers.

CLIFTON CHENIER. Louisiana Blues and Zydeco. Arhoolie 1024

This one goes back a couple of years, but it isn't as well known as it ought to be. Maybe a lot of people share my prejudice against the accordion and are put off by the big one on the cover. As it happens, Clifton Chenier has an exciting blues band with a really different sound. You may think blues accordion is a joke, but this man really knows what it's about. Fine, fine piano from Elmore Nixon, and guitar from Cleveland Keyes. For those interested in the two cultures, Clifton Chenier sings in both French and English. If you like great blues bands but would never guess that blues can be sung in French and played on an accordion, try this record.

LUTHER GEORGIA BOY SNAKE JOHNSON. The Muddy Waters Blues Band. Douglas 781

The best record by Muddy Water's latest band. Not much from Muddy himself because his contract with Chess won't let him play lead or sing for other labels, but there's nothing holding back the rest of the band. The real star of the album is harmonica player, Mojo Buford, who does the vocals on side two. Great guitar playing by Sammy Langhorn, and generally some tight Chicago blues.

MA RAINEY. Immortal. Milestone 2001; Blues the World Forgot. Biograph 12001

After several years when no Ma Rainey reissue was available on this side of the Atlantic, here are two excellent ones. The material doesn't overlap, and the sound is as good as the old 78s will allow. Both recommended for anyone who likes the classic blues singers or wants to hear the voice of the woman who showed Bessie Smith how it was done.

ETTA JAMES. Tell Mama. Cadet 802

Etta James is the queen of soul singers. On her good records, she makes Aretha Franklin sound dull, and this record is her best. She has put out some poor albums, but there's hardly a bad tune on this one, and there are some great ones. For outstanding soul singing by an artist who is not quite as well known as some of the rest, this is the record to get.

down and out in xmas fairyland

I suppose I could say we wandered into Simpson's Christmas Fairyland by accident. But we didn't. We went to see the electric trains because I'd been frustrated as a kid and never had one.

Getting off at the fourth floor was rather an experience. We were carried off the escalator by a wave of screaming little children with manically twisted faces and washed up right in front of the friction toys where a small man rather like a thrush regarded us nervously. Long hair (well, long for Christmas Fairyland), Hudson Bay bush jackets, dirty caps, unshaven, chain-smoking Pall Mall. The man in charge of friction toys obviously had none of the Christmas spirit. I bowed deeply, blew some cigarette smoke towards him, and we walked on.

The place is like something out of a mechanical Charles Dickens. Decked out in garish colours which the psychologists have obviously told them has an effect on the impulse to buy, signs everywhere, reminding you that if you don't get into the spirit of the thing pretty soon, there's little hope left, and you might as well be an atheist.

It's an opulent year for toys. Guns that do everything but kill, dolls that do everything but copulate, perfect scale models of practically anything with moving parts, and every conceivable game. If I was a kid again, I'd be so glutted, I wouldn't know what to ask for. I would probably have raised hell because I couldn't have everything. It's rather sad. Christmas now means the time when kids are more or less given a carte blanche to extort what they can from their parents while their parents' hearts are artificially softened, and their cynical lives are momentarily sentimental. (Remember when we were kids, Mary? Let's get the kid a Constructo set.)

We walked around, lost among the toys, looking for Santa Claus. Finally, Dave walked up to the man peddling Eldon Road Races, and asked him where we could find Santa. He looked at us dumbly and I dropped my cigarette on the floor and stepped on it.

"Yeh, down this aisle and to your left. I think he's on now." He was on all right. Performing. Theatrical makeup, glaring lights, and a child on each knee.

"Ho, Ho, Ho..." Really, that's what he was saying. I noted that his eyeliner was smudged.

"And what do you want for Christmas, little girl?" I didn't catch the reply. It was high-pitched and unintelligible with glee. The little girl reached out and began to play with the old man's beard.

"Ho, Ho, Ho..." Some eight feet in front of them, a little bald-headed man with a camera was snapping pictures from the "Have your picture taken with Santa" booth. He had a polaroid, and a beautiful blond assistant, looking bored with it all, was peddling them to dutifully smiling parents.

Then a red-faced matron was climbing up on Santa's knee to have her picture taken. She must have been two hundred pounds — two hundred pounds of giggling and embarrassed maternal parent up on Santa's knee. All in a day's work

"Ho, Ho, Ho," said Santa, shifting uncomfortably. Even the kids sensed the absurdity of it. They screamed with laughter.

Christmas is absurd. It is an annual feast, no longer having any religious significance, when you exchange presents with people you think you like, and Christmas cards with people you don't want anything to do with. You can't escape it either. Even the Jews have Christmas trees. And St. Nicholas is ubiquitous. Every department store, every office, every street corner has its fat little man in red pandering to the greed of the little children. Suffer the little children to come unto me.

At Malabar's, the Theatrical costumers, there are three entire racks of Santa Claus outfits for rent. Three different qualities, three different prices, depending on who you want to fool.

Santa Claus was still at it — makeup still impeccable, the stream of imaginative children endless.

Dave and I stood there, looking as cynical and jaded as we possibly could, but I still felt like a little kid again.

"Let's come back here tomorrow with a photographer."

"What, and go into business for ourselves?"

"Well..."

"Well, let's go and look at the electric trains..."

CUG agrees on open meetings

The nine men who will spend the next half year deciding how to reform the university got together last Friday afternoon and cautiously examined each other.

The first meeting of the commission on university government proved to be a polite affair, with many pauses in which to listen to the echo of pins dropping in the Senate chambers.

They agreed — after apologetically groping their way through the details — on a policy of openness which would allow observers to attend all meetings of the commission. If invited by the commission observers could make remarks, but otherwise public opinion on the various aspects of the university would be heard at special hearings. On occasion the commission could decide to go in camera.

The commission, which includes four students and four faculty representatives plus President Claude Bissell as voting members, chose student Gary Webster (SGS) and philosophy Prof. Lawrence Lynch as co-chairmen.

They plan to hold sessions each week, Friday mornings at 10 a.m. in the Senate chambers at Simcoe Hall. If more meetings are needed they will be scheduled.

Dr. Bissell has agreed to check with the University Archives as to whether they would be interested in tape recording the proceedings of the commission.

"Perhaps," suggested board of governors member John Ashe, a non-voting member of the commission, "I would then be able to play the proceedings on the tape recorder in my ear, instead of Mozart."

The board of governors will be asked tomorrow to approve a budget of $35,000 for the first six months of the commission's work.

How are we teaching our teachers?—part III

By MARINA KOVRIG

You asked for comments by students of COE on last week's article (by Kevin Riee and Charles Kahn) on the situation at the college. Normally I prefer to act in an effort to remedy evils around me, but when action is thwarted or not feasible, writing to newspapers is one way of protesting.

Behind the hundred and one evils of COE lie two main hindrances of producing excellent teachers: There are too many second-and third-rate professors, and twice as many second and third-rate students. Since it is conventional to criticize the former, let's stick to convention.

In his article, Charles Kahn said, "We have found the professors genuinely concerned in us and in making us better teachers. They are open to suggestion and prepared to incorporate new ideas into their courses."

Mr. Kahn, you astound me! We both happen to share one professor who is not only not concerned with making us better teachers, but totally unqualified to do so. This man has never taught in a school and when he came to watch our proactive practice teaching it was his first encounter with a high school since the day he himself graduated from one.

He is supposedly teaching a methodology course and yet he has never touched upon methods of teaching the subject in any of his classes and his own disorganized means of imparting knowledge are a prime example of how never to teach. The many suggestions made to him by members of his class have all been completely ignored or received a flat no.

The head of the department who should be encouraging, who should welcome improvements and suggestions made by the experienced members of the class, is as unapproachable as a dragon and acts as if every suggestion or plea for change were an act of insubordination, a threat to his position. Mr. Kahn, do you call this "concerned in making us better teachers"?

I say that when a college of education employs people who are unqualified or second-rate educators, it is committing a grave crime against all the young people who will have to suffer under the teachers produced by that institution. I am not saying that there are no great men (and women) at COE. Many of the professors are not only challenging but provide marvellous examples for us to emulate. There should be no room among these great men for mediocrity and ineffective teaching.

The calibre of student at COE does not make the task of turning out superior teachers very easy for those professors who are sincerely trying. In one course, when the professor was accused of spoon-feeding us, he defended himself by explaining that most of the students would otherwise not be able to keep up because their background lacked any philosophy. The fact that there are students at COE who never heard of Plato, never came across the term "existentialism", never heard of Aristotle, is appalling. That someone can go through university and receive a degree, and yet never meet up with some of our culture's greatest thinkers, doesn't say much for the university or for the students' ability to educate themselves.

By lowering its standards to accommodate uninformed, unread characters such as these, COE is only completing the vicious circle—for the sake of quantity, quality is sacrificed and second-rate teachers will in turn produce second-rate high school graduates. The role of education in society is too important to allow just anyone to teach.

If the professors at COE are not enthusiastic enough for change and improvement in the institution and in themselves, the students are even less enthusiastic. It is doubtful that any other place of learning contains such a large group of apathetic, conservative, unquestioning students who, for fear of jeopardizing their job opportunities, refuse to raise a finger in opposition, refuse to voice an opinion above a whisper.

They are all so absorbed with "playing the game" and "getting through" that they seldom stop to ask whether the game they are playing is preparing them for the role they have chosen. They question the relevance of philosophy to education without having any knowledge of philosophy, and yet they never question their submissive role as students, taking whatever the great institution dishes out. Until the students as a body become concerned with the deficiencies of the COE system, until we all desire a higher set of standards in the courses and ourselves, then it is ridiculous to expect changes.

Liberalism surpasses ideology?

Radicals squeezed in Poli Ec elections

By ART MOSES

Three well-known radical leftist students went down to defeat Monday as three lesser-known "liberals" were elected to the executive of the Political Economy Course Union.

David Forte (SGS) defeated Irv Weisdorf (IV UC) for chairman 93 to 79. Richard Macy (SGS) defeated Phil Resnick (SGS) 26 to 18 for graduate rep. Andy Wernick (SGS) came third in his quest for one of the two member-at-large seats. He got 85 votes while Anne-Marie Hutchison (II SMC) polled 105 and David Brown (II Vic) 118. Fenno Von Zwannenburg (II Vic) was elected Economics rep in the only contest where ideological differences were not apparent.

Of the more than 4,000 students taking one or more courses from the political economy department, only 172 turned out to vote. Because of this, any analysis of the significance of the election may not be entirely valid.

"The election definitely did display the type of attitude which students in the department hold," claims David Forte the newly elected chairman.

"Those who voted for the winning candidates thought a more efficient and productive method of achieving student ends would be through negotiation and persuasion on the merits of our case rather than through confrontation. Students thought we could gain much more in building a community of interest between faculty and students than by the methods of confrontation, exhibited by Poli Sci students at McGill and Carleton.

"One of the objectives of the new executive will be to seek out the opinions of students in the department as much as possible, which is difficult when you are dealing with almost 5,000 people. After finding out what students think we will transmit and channel this opinion to the Department.

"We are not a group with a political axe to grind," he adds.

Phil Resnick the defeated graduate candidate, agreed with this general line of interpretation.

"I think you are being generous to call Forte and Macy 'liberals'. I consider them conservatives if not reactionaries.

"There is no question the election reflected a polarization of opinion on ideological grounds, no question that the left lost. But at the same time it was a relative defeat, not an overwhelming rejection of our position. The leftist candidates received substantial support.

"Though I am not ready to concede that the overwhelming majority of students in the department are reactionary, it is clear that a great number feel confrontation politics is not a good way to proceed.

"But I do feel these people can be won over to our point of view if we do more work. The major decision-making body of the Course Union is the general assembly of students, not the executive, and in the critical month of January, we can turn this apparent defeat into a victory."

Successful candidate David Brown, who describes himself as a "radical liberal," felt the voting was not motivated by any one factor.

"Many of my votes came from friends, not people acting on ideological lines. We just waged a better campaign than the leftist candidates."

Irv Weisdorf generally agreed. "The results are not a matter of major importance. The low voting turnout and the lack of publicity of any of the candidates' platforms, means the election doesn't merit an ideological analysis of a swing to the right.

"The students are still basically united on such issues as advocating an "open curriculum" for all years (in which second year students could take fourth year subjects for instance), the abolition of the year system and a student voice in curriculum and teaching methods.

"Furthermore, the curriculum committee of the Union has discovered that it is hard to make decisions on curriculum without having a corresponding say in the hiring of faculty so the course union will have to press for staff student equality on hiring committees in the future.

"Now that the executive has been elected we should be able to act on these issues efficiently, especially since the ultimate power in the Course Union resides in the general assembly."

Married? Rejoice

The housing problems of most married students and especially those with children may be solved when the University Housing Service opens the doors of their latest project on New Years Day.

This apartment complex, consisting of two 20-storey buildings located on Charles St. just east of St. Michael's College will contain 713 suites, half of which will be ready Jan. 1.

The lower floors will house a restaurant, shopping mall, recreation room, lounge, laundry and nursery.

Three levels of underground parking are provided.

The rents are fairly competitive, with a bachelor apartment on the fourth floor costing $111 and a two bedroom apartment on the top floor going for $176 a month.

Priority will be given to married students but chances of finding vacancies are good for others too.

All tenants must sign a full year lease and pay a refundable $25 security deposit.

Inquiries and applications may be made at the U of T Housing Service, 49 St. George St.

Trin and PHE A drew, 2-2. Hutchinson had both Trin goals: Stevens and Runciman ("The runciman will get you if you don't watch out.") hit for PHE A.

Dents (Glazier, Pollard, Skelton, Kautsaris, (2), and Akiyama) blanked Erin, 6-0.

Lennard, Watts, Currie, and Zabolotny (a type of Silesian sausage) led Sr. Eng. to a 4-1 win over SMC. Donovan scored for SMC.

Berry's goal, Ont., gave Vic II a 1-0 victory over Law II. Umney-Gray was the Vic goalie. Law has protested the use of two goalies at once.

New beat Meds B, 25-22. Fine scored 5 for Gms. (The gnu is a small South African antelope related to the istanbul.) Quinlan (a drug used in treating malaria) scored 10 for the losers.

UC II (Lazar and Koach, 6 each) beat Vic II ("Knit one, Vic II"), 31-25 Sanderson had 8 for Vic II.

Wrestlers drop Mac

(Varsity taps Macmaster Wrestlers)
By THE GRAPPLER

Varsity wrestling Blues won seven out of nine bouts, including three pins, to win over Mac 31-8 last Saturday at Hart House. The entire team exhibited considerable skill throughout the afternoon as Ted Sauer at 137, Bill Allison at 167, and Ylo Korgemagi in the heavyweight division all scored pins.

Mac's Bertrum took the 123 pound class by default, as did Toronto's Whitey and Dipascale at 130 and 145 respectively.

In the opening bout Sauer's pin came at 6:53 of the third period, after he had consistently maintained control throughout the bout.

Dave Simms in his first year of intercollegiate competition scored an impressive 12-2 victory over MacIver.

Probably the closest match of the afternoon pitted Varsity's tired new coach Paul Beswick against an experienced Cadegan at 160. Cadegan won 8-7.

Veteran Bill Allison outclassed another experienced opponent, Morrison, pinning him after 4:00 minutes of very fast action.

Neither team was represented in the 177 pound class.

Larry Barron several times intercollegiate champion while at McGill, outpointed Holmes 5-4. Barron's experience kept him out of trouble and he held control quite handily.

Ylo Korgemagi capped a fine afternoon with a fast pin at 1:09 of the first period in the heavyweight division.

In exhibition bouts Toronto's Ken White pinned Bertrum at 4:25 of the second period.

Former Varsity gymnast turned wrestler, Mauro Dipascale was outpointed 6-3 by Mac's Zajacz in his debut fight.

Varsity's Broadway won 4-2 over MacIver.

Don Stevens pinned Morrison. Greg Rokosh lost 10-3.

BLUES DIVIDED FOR FLIGHT TO MINNESOTA CLASSIC

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity Blues' hockey coach Tom Watt has become a believer in the old saying (relatively old that is) that "a team that flies together lands together." (cf page 397 in the 1968-69 Funk and Wagnall)

Reason for Watt's new belief is the fact that Blues will have to make it to St. Paul, Minnesota in two shifts. The team is scheduled to compete in the Minnesota Classic Tourney which begins on Friday evening.

The first load of players will leave Toronto International Airport early tomorrow morning and arrive via Chicago in the gopher state at high noon. Because of law final exams, five other members of the starting lineup — Paul Laurent, Ward Passi, Steve Monteith, Gord Cunningham and Bill L'Heureux — will not take off until Friday.

Should weather conditions turn foul and either postpone or cancel the lawyer's flight, Blues would be severely undermanned when they meet University of North Dakota Sioux on Friday evening.

Fortunately, however, the weatherman has promised good weather and the airline carrying the players is United. They promise every Sunday afternoon during the American football telecasts that their passengers always fly in "friendly skies." (Sorry about that gang).

Meanwhile back at the rink, Watt admits he is extremely satisfied with the way Blues have been putting out of late. The work of his defence and centremen came in for the largest share of the plaudits during a recent discussion.

"We've been frustrated a couple of times by teams that I don't think should have defeated us. On the other hand, our guys have played well and beaten some pretty fair hockey clubs.

"Our defensive work has been excellent, especially when you consider the fact that Dave Field has missed several games because of injuries. Speaking of injuries, I can't remember a year in the four since I've been here that we've had so many.

"Another thing that really pleases me is the play of our three centres. Paul (Laurent), John (Wright) and Brian (St. John) are leading the team in scoring (they've counted 17 of Blues' 28 goals in four league games) and have been very strong in their checking."

Blues will also play in a tournament in Montreal at the Forum during the two week vacation period. At stake will be the Molson Trophy — an award Varsity has captured in the two years it has been presented.

Loyola University is the host tour-team for the three day tourney January 3-5 and as usual have set things up so that they will have an easy draw. Blues meet Michigan Tech in the opener and likely the winner of the Boston College - Laval University game in the second round.

BLUES WIN 7-2

Merry Christmas Mustangs

By JIM COWAN

It was business as usual at Varsity Arena last Friday as University of Toronto Blues cashed in the Western Mustangs 7-2, ringing up their second victory in as many nights over the hobbled horse-men from London.

The only surprise of the evening came before the game when the Lady Godiva Memorial Band played "O, Canada" all the way through, catching everyone, including the officials, unawares.

Blues defenseman Dave Field, who played a strong game against his former mates from Western, scored the winning goal at 15:25 of the opening period on a power play, rifling the puck past Western goalie Brian Simmons from just inside the blue line. Brian St. John and Mike Boland assisted on the goal.

"Stangs opened the scoring at 1:48 of the first period when Brent Imlach skated through the entire Blue team before passing to Greg Care, who deposited the puck behind Blues rookie goalie Adrian Watson. The Care-Imlach-Wayne Heasman unit was the only line to give Blues any trouble during the game.

Watson had a good game, turning aside 25 Western shots. He was particularly sharp in the opening moments of the second period, when Blues defense sagged and he was called upon to make several hand-and-foot saves.

Paul Laurent, who scored five goals against the horse-men in London on Thursday night, added two more Friday. Other Varsity scorers were John Wright, Brian St. John, Mike Boland and Gord Cunningham. St. John also picked up two assists.

Twenty-four penalties were evenly split between the teams in a game characterized by Western's refusal to settle down and play hockey. The 'Stangs, finding they couldn't beat Blues on the ice, tried to beat them in the alley. They failed there too, once again proving Connie Smyth right.

NOTES ... Blues don't play again at the Arena until January 10, against McMaster ... Brent's daddy, Punch Imlach attended the game ... his hat was stolen by some recalcitrant Blues fan with the initials P.P. ... pen by george boyce ... Football-type Mike Raham received the Omega Watch award from Tom Watt before the second period ... the award is for the most valuable player to his team in the OQAA loop ...

Varsity head football coach Ron Murphy presents Omega watch to Blues football star Mike Rohom during intermission of Friday's hockey match. Merry Xmas sportsies near and far.

Blues' dynamic trio of Paul Laurent (8), Ward Passi (9) and Steve Monteith (elbows in) move in on Western net during Friday night's 7-2 win over Western Mustangs.

SASKATCHEWAN LAUNCHES CRUSADE AGAINST CARILLON

REGINA (CUP) — The University of Saskatchewan administration is making a strong attempt to strangle the campus student union by refusing to collect this term's fees from the students.

It was the latest administration move in a two-year campaign to gain control over the Carillon, the student newspaper on the Regina campus.

Administration President W. A. Riddell made the announcement Dec. 31. In effect the move was made to attempt to starve the union into imposing editorial control over the paper.

The decision to stop fee collection was made without consultation with either students or faculty.

A board of governors press release explained the action by claiming the Carillon "has pursued an editorial policy clearly aimed at undermining confidence in the senate, board of governors and the administration of the university.

The board has tried to pressure the council for over a year a student union statement explains, but the council has resisted, claiming the board has no right to interfere in student affairs the allegations against the paper are untrue, and control of the Carillon by the council might be used for undemocratic purposes.

The student council has warned the board action may be the result of pressure from the provincial government of Ross Thatcher "It is no secret that Ross Thatcher has little love for students," the statement said.

By George Russell
Canadian University Press

REGINA (CUP) — People who advocate censorship usually have something to hide.

The board of governors of the University of Saskatchewan is blackmailing the Regina campus student council into establishing editorial control over the student newspaper. The Carillon — for the greater good of the university, of course.

It's the most naked form of blackmail — the board has even issued press statements about it. Shut up the Carillon or we won't collect student union fees. No student union fees, no student union.

According to the board's press release, The Carillon must be controlled because the paper "has pursued an editorial policy clearly aimed at undermining confidence in the senate board of governors and the administration of the university.

The board has shown no willingness to discuss whether or not the editorial policy is justified. Instead, a cloud of supplementary reasons for censorship of The Carillon have been tossed at the public none of them substantiated.

Administration Principal W. A. Riddell says The Carillon must be censored to halt a ground swell of popular indignation directed against the university.

Riddell also claims The Carillon must be censored because it's "obscene." He was quoted on the obscenity charge in the Regina Leader-Post but told this writer in a subsequent interview the charge was a red herring.

Riddell also says censorship must be established because the community is not contributing enough money to a university fund drive.

No one is willing to discuss the possibility that The Carillon must be censored because it has been telling the truth.

Within a few miles of the Regina campus are the legislative buildings of the Province of Saskatchewan — and the offices of Liberal Premier Ross Thatcher.

The history of the conflict between Ross Thatcher and the Regina campus spans a couple of years, culminating this October when 1,500 students marched to the legislature, where they confronted Thatcher and Pierre-Elliott Trudeau over the inadequacy of the student loan system in Saskatchewan.

Thatcher refused to discuss the matter publicly at all.

Student loans have been one of The Carillon's favorite topics during the last two years — especially since they broke a story last February, explaining how Allan Guy, currently Minister of Public Works with the Thatcher government, had claimed and received a $1,000 student loan while drawing a salary in excess of $16,000. The story understandably drew national interest.

It also drew intense local interest from Riddell, who attempted to stop the story from breaking by first trying to contact Carillon Editor Don Kossick and then trying to get to the printer. Neither attempt worked.

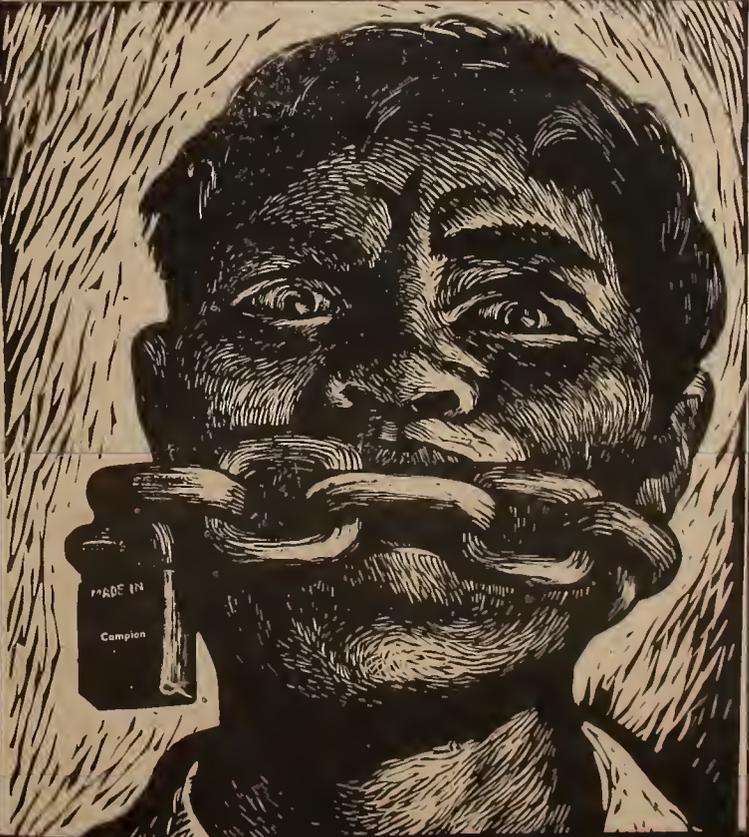

Within two weeks, the president of the Regina student council received a letter from Riddell, asking why the Students Union should be allowed to continue using the name of the university, and, significantly, why the university should continue to pro-

Graduation, registration reformed

Starting next fall, you can be an atheist and your college registrar will never know.

The U of T Senate December 13, approved a decision to "delete questions regarding religious preference from all registration forms".

In the past, many students have neglected to state their religion on the registration form.

Also breathing its last gasp is the graduation diploma printed in Latin. "The tradition goes back to the 1850's," said Robin Ross, University Registrar, "but it's a part of our history that seems to have outlived its purpose."

At last month's meeting, the Senate, the university's supreme academic body, took a small step towards opening up its proceedings to the public.

The Senate's executive committee was instructed to consider "the desirability and feasibility of holding Senate meetings that are open to the public."

Although the structure of the Senate will eventually undergo reform, it still has "a statutory job to do," commented University vice-president Robin Ross. He added that open Senate meetings will enable students to find out more about the Senate as it exists now.

Borrowing Privileges for Undergraduate Students at College Libraries

The various colleges have libraries which cater specifically to the needs of their own students, particularly those in first and second year. However, as a rule, only members of a college may use its facilities. A special arrangement has been made for other students to have access to material which is unique to a particular college library. If upon consulting the Old and New Catalogues, you find that the only copy of a book is in a college library at which you don't have borrowing privileges, and if you wish to borrow that book, you should

1. fill out a regular call slip
2. take it to the Catalogue Information Desk to have it verified and stamped as a unique copy
3. present this call slip to the College Library between 9 a.m. — 5 p.m. Monday to Friday

On doing so, you will be given access to that material on the same terms as a regular borrower of that college library. These procedures are in effect at Inns College (temporarily housed in Laidlaw Library), Knox College Library, Laidlaw Library of University College, New College Library, St. Michael's College Library, Trinity College Library and Victoria University Library.

Any student registered in a degree course at the University of Toronto, whether he is on the St. George Campus, or at Scarborough or Eglinton, may borrow from the Central Library.

Student award $$$ coming soon

The majority of student award cheques will be received by U of T students before their second term instalment of fees is due Jan. 20, says Lois Reimer, student award officer for U of T.

"If a person still owes his second instalment and he has an award outstanding, the university will not bother him," Miss Reimer said yesterday.

"The average OSAP award for U of T students this year will be remarkably similar to last year's figures," she explained.

"It looks as though there were 1,000 more applicants than last year when there were around 8,000. Last year 6,983 loans were awarded; this includes 6,133 awards of both loan and grant."

Miss Reimer expects 7,500 students, of the 9,000 who applied this year will get help. She estimated that the loans to date average around $500 and the grants are similar, which compares favorably with the figures for last year.

Why then the ruckus over OSAP which culminated in the march on Queen's Park last November? Miss Reimer explained that "a fair number" of the students who received OSAP awards last year were excluded this year due to a change in regulations.

"I don't feel anyone who once did qualify for a loan should be disqualified simply because of a change of rules," she said.

Miss Reimer went on to explain that the new regulations led to the inclusion of students not previously eligible such as many married students.

"You won't find any married students complaining about OSAP. Now they are doing very well. In general some students are now worse off and some are better off."

In Ontario this year 43,000 students will receive student aid cheques. Of 55,000 applications processed some 5,000 did not qualify and an additional 7,000 students in private or foreign schools received only the Canada Student Loan. The estimated total loans approved so far is $24,200,000 (average loan $484). For grants, $22,230,000 has been approved (average $511).

CARILLON

vide space on campus for The Carillon.

The answer to all three questions was presumably contained in a suggestion by Riddell that a 'policy board' be created to direct editorial policy for the paper — exactly what is being 'suggested' by the board now.

Kossick took the entire matter before a faculty committee on academic freedom. The chairman of the committee, Jim McRorie, now a sociology professor at Calgary, recalls the board's threats faded after the committee began its hearings. The hearings were never completed and the committee never reported.

Fears at Regina deepened when Thatcher announced last year the government would approve the university budget section by section rather than all at once — a procedure allowing direct political intervention in university affairs.

Riddell announced that the government had changed its mind regarding the second decision, but failed to convince The Carillon that the autonomy of the university was in any less danger. He also failed to convince Alwyn Berland, Dean of Arts and Science, who resigned last September.

His registration statement covered the front page of The Carillon, expressing fears that Regina's autonomy had been completely undermined by Thatcher's actions of the year before.

He also condemned the silence of the Regina administration in failing to respond to the attacks. The administration, Berland said, had also refused to defend him when he attempted to point out the financial straits of the university and was attacked by a provincial minister for his pains.

Riddell also launched an extensive campaign against the poor showing of faculty and students at Regina in contributing to the 'good image' of the university in the community. Community reaction showed up, he said, in a poor response to a university capital fund drive.

The fund drive was necessary because the provincial government refused to allocate sufficient funds to the university for capital expansion.

Riddell also accused faculty of contributing to the poor public image by not donating enough money to the United Fund.

On November 15, the next week, Riddell escalated the conflict by stating The Carillon might adversely affect the university budget if it wasn't cleaned up. He referred to the board's threats against the student council of the previous year, and hinted darkly that 'the business oflice has to have some direction' before the second semester at Regina would begin.

Sure enough as The Carillon revealed in a special issue within the week, the budget was adversely affected — to the tune of $2,000,000. The paper rather unnecessarily pointed out that the provincial government set the final budget figures.

The real question at Regina is a political one: The Carillon has displayed an unhealthy and positively unstudent-like interest in exposing the provincial government's unfairness to faculty and students alike, and the government will not allow it to continue.

In retrospect, The Carillon's gravest "irresponsibility" probably lay in reprinting the election platform of the Thatcher government — a year after the election.

They should have known that wasn't allowed.

The attempt to kill the Carillon

The Regina Carillon is the most radical English-language campus newspaper in Canada; it revels in calling a spade a spade. After Simon Fraser University president Ken Strand called in the RCMP to clear his administration building, the Carillon wrote:

"Strand . . . through his recent actions has proven himself to be no more than a clumsy fool. He has removed the velvet gloves and revealed the blood-lusting iron claws which hitherto were hidden. He has revealed, for all Canadian students to see, that behind the facade of the liberal administrator, there is hidden a pig-like equivalent of Chicago's Mayor Daley."

Language like that doesn't endear student newspapers to their administrations, no matter how apt. But the Carillon has been guilty of other breaches of what the University of Saskatchewan officials would like to consider decency.

For one, it recently revealed a secret memo preparing university departments for a cutback of $2,000,000 or more in the 69-70 academic year.

The Carillon has been remorseless with the Liberal government of Premier Ross Thatcher as he has attempted to establish a financial stranglehold on the university through budgetary allocations.

Thatcher would like even more control if possible.

"Nobody's going to tell us how to run the university!" he exclaimed at one point, and at another, said he'd close down the university at the first sign of student unrest.

DEMONSTRATION

Thatcher wasn't very happy with the Carillon's part in a 1,500-man demonstration that caused some embarrassment when Trudeau was paying a visit. The demonstration called for more student loans, another one of the Carillon favorite subjects.

The Carillon has been harsh with its administration for pussyfooting about the budget cuts instead of standing up to fight, and the newspaper's investigations into the corporate backgrounds of its board of governors have been thorough.

The Carillon has made a lot of enemies in Saskatchewan, and the current attempts to suppress the newspaper are predictable.

Of course, the administration and Board of Governors really didn't have much choice about attempting to control the Carillon's editorial policy by refusing to collect student fees. The student council has taken a hands off policy toward Carillon policy, and gives the newspaper implicit support.

The administration couldn't look to the faculty for much help either—one dean had already resigned over their mishandling of the budgetary budget situation and refusal to deal strongly Thatcher's attempts to control the university.

So the administration, senate and Board of Governors decided to suppress the newspaper themselves without consulting students or faculty. It says a lot about the kind of mind that runs universities and sits on boards of governors.

CRITICISM

They don't like criticism, especially potent criticism—criticism that is true. And reporters know how reluctant businessmen are to taste the limelight in any way. The corporate mentality thrives on secrecy, not openness.

Above all, they don't like democracy unless it suits their purposes. On the national level, this means manipulating the political parties, donating money in return for favors later on. (Government returns these favors by failing to institute a capital gains tax, for example.)

They manipulate the public by making it believe that what is good for the businessman is good for everybody.

Consulting students and faculty on decisions is something new for the corporation mind—the recent incident of the secret brief is a good example right in Toronto.

So if the student newspaper offends their sensibilities, their taste, it's bad and should be crushed if possible. They consult the students later. (The public outcry, as administrator W. A. Riddell explains it, came from some people he met in the community and many students, unspecified, yet again. The Carillon has student council support.)

This happens in Toronto, too. Ever-time The Varsity does something they don't like, they meet in their little boards and Caputs and cadres and wonder how they can shut us up without causing any outcry.

OUTCRY

They've tried that in Regina, and the outcry should be considerable. But perhaps we can learn something from the outcome:

Boards of Governors and administrators are unsuitable as vehicles for making university policy. They are out of touch with what their "constituency" wants, and in most cases, don't care.

Out of the Carillon affair will arise, we hope, a realization that students and faculty only are the proper groups to make decisions of this sort.

Just because they're more careful here in Toronto, just because they haven't used their power, shouldn't mean they are allowed to keep this power.

It's there, ready to be used. It's being used in Regina.

high schools

Let's hope the recent high school demonstrations against a longer school year are just the beginning of a revolt against an educational system which is oppressive, stultifying, and has nothing whatever to do with learning.

And let's hear an end to the snide remarks about the unruly turn the demonstrations took (throwing fruit at Mayor Dennison, remember?).

The fact that some students may have behaved like idiots is more a proof of the failure of high schools to educate than an indictment of the student movement growing in those schools.

When you are treated like a brainless, will-less idiot all your school life, you'll act like one. The behavior of a huge number of university students bears this out—apathetic, completely indifferent to learning as such, they go through the motions of getting an education.

The high school movement is going to have to learn, to organize—these take time. There are bound to be a few mistakes at first.

But maybe the movement now can establish the principle that high school students should decide on changes in the school year because they are affected, not Education Minister William Davis.

Scarboro college

From conception Scarborough College has been a somewhat suspect member of a most distinguished parent. Suspect to the extent that every day at 5 p.m. classes are dismissed and at 5:15 there isn't a native in sight. A scene quite commonly associated with any middle class mirage run on a 9-5 basis. University, however, doesn't fall into a neat little 9-5 package and neither does Scarborough Collegé.

Students at Scarborough College are missing their chance at everything but bookwork. With a residence the college would have a resident nucleus necessary to make these things possible. It would provide an atmosphere where students would feel free to express themselves in a healthy surrounding. Apathy, the real tomatoe worm of university, would be eradicated and in its stead a healthy, stimulating atmosphere.

So far at Scarborough College we have but four houses which board 35 men. (A possible 70 if the women were more accommodating.) This is not enough for the college since only 40 per cent of our students live within commuting distance.

We can't afford to put these residences up ourselves. The government will have to do it for us. Up until now the government has been rather complacent. They justify their complacency by saying Scarborough is a commuter college, and doesn't need residences.

—Peter Crippen

strikes

In regard to the unsigned article on page four of your Dec. 11 newspaper, I wonder if you are supporting the right group?

Two years ago I went to Sault Ste. Marie to work but was unable to because a small union of 300 men struck a 3,000 man plant and everyone was put out of work until the strike ended. The strikers of course received strike pay from the union but myself (with a wife and two children) received nothing. Neither did the others who were out of work.

Seven years ago our factory was closed down because another union struck another company 300 miles away who supplied us with a critical part and caused our company to temporarily lay off 500 men. Again, the strikers from the other company received strike pay from the union but the 500 men did not receive anything.

Why can't a worker have the right to work if he wants to? I believe the union should have the right to strike, but why should it prevent me from earning my living? Are picket lines sacred?

Am I a scab because I want to earn a living for my family?

Sir:
When the President made a statement on the subject of the University's condoning of the threat of force to the campus...

The Board of Governors do so. It is the duty of the Board, ratified by the student representatives, to ensure that the initiation of force is always immoral.

THREAT OF FORCE

Because the Board of Governors surrendered to the threat of force the first time the threat was heard, a new, and obviously powerful weapon was placed in the hands of the student activists. Do not think this weapon will not be used. It places the entire University at the mercy of the a university campus, and immediately on the initiation of force they should be suspended. If any laws are broken, they must be prosecuted. Students are not privileged individuals before the law, endowed with some special immunity. Criminal actions must be treated as such, and as nothing else. This does not constitute double jeopardy. An individual or an institution has the perfect right to eschew a person whom they consider morally reprehensible, whether he tance to anyone whose expressed and demonstrated purpose is to destroy it.

My contention is that the Administration's attitude should be in favour of suspension or expulsion and prosecution of all student lawbreakers, condemnation of all attempts to initiate force, coupled with the resolution to resist all student moves backed by this threat, and finally, that the University remain in control of those unless these guidelines are implemented. Life in this university will become as intolerable as it has become in San Francisco, Simon Fraser and the Sorbonne

Yours sincerely,

I am writing in response to Art Moses' article in the last issue titled "Radicals squeezed in Poli. Ec. elections" (Wed. Dec. 18-68).

(1) You gave half the space to the comments of Weisdorf and Resnick, who were defeated, and ignored all but the names of 5 of the 7 elected candidates. This suggests that the losers are more important than the people who will wield power and to a large extent shape the Course Union for the next year! Surely a short interview or biographical sketch of each executive member would have been more to the point? Also, the representatives for Commerce and Finance and Political Science were elected by acclamation. Where are their names?

(2) The tone of the article, to most students I talked to, seems to be 'sour grapes'. It says — alright, we lost the election but it wasn't important anyway and we can still control the rest of the students and the guys who got in are dumbbells anyway. Quoth Resnick, "I consider them . . . reactionaries: (the student body) can be won over to our point of view if we do more work . . . in the critical month of January we can turn this apparent defeat into a victory . . ."

(3) The turnout — about 5 per cent of eligible voters — was not encouraging. I wonder if it was necessary to print the specific numbers of votes cast. At the meeting of the Curriculum Committee that same night the staff members were rather nasty in asking whether the student reps were really authorized representatives — i.e. whether we had any right to voice an opinion at all! Some of the reasons for the light vote — inadequate publicity, some have left on holidays, and the wide-spread feeling that the course unions have little effective power in the university structure — might have been explored.

But fundamentally the article exposes the real weaknesses of The Varsity which have cost it most of its credibility and influence, to wit

- Running stories almost exclusively by, for, and about the small clique of organizations and individuals — Wernick is blown up 10 times life size — who fancy that they're running student affairs, and who seem to live in your office.

- Taking a political line on almost any issue i.e. the provincial government, job recruiting, and Black Power which defeats itself — students will act contrary to it just to 'screw the Varsity'. I am not just talking about the editorials; many of your articles can only be classified as 'propaganda by interested parties'. If you are preaching to the converted that's your business, but the student body whose fees pay for it shouldn't have to subsidize this.

I hope that you can accept this criticism in a constructive way and will reply to it either in print or at an open meeting

Fenno Van Zwanenburg (H VIC)
Executive Member
Pol. Ec. Course Union

moses replies

Mr Van Zwanenburg's analysis of my article is badly taken on many counts

Let me make it clear that the purpose of the article was to explore whether there was any ideological significance in the defeat of three radical students by three lesser known "liberals" in the Political Economy Course Union elections in December

I ignored the fact that All Chaiton (H New) and Mel Cappe (H New) were chosen by acclamation for Political Science and Commerce reps because this bore no relevance to the theme and purpose of the article.

I did mention, however, Mr Van Zwanenburg's election as Economics rep, even though strictly speaking it also bore little relevance to the theme of the article as ideological differences were not explicit

Surely, Fenno, a biographical sketch of each executive member would be boring

In the main point of the letters Fenno accuses me of 'sour grapes' in the article. This charge amazes me! What he considers to be the general tone of the article is merely a direct quotation from Phil Resnick, one of four persons quoted (including elected Union Chairman David Forte). Fenno may consider Resnick's statement 'sour grapes', but how can he make the charge about the whole article?

As for reporting the small voter turnout in the election, I mentioned it because all the candidates I interviewed saw fit to include that point in their own analyses of the election results. I regret if publicizing the turnout figures, injured the Course Union's position with the faculty, but after all, Fenno, I merely reported "the fact" that only 5 per cent voted. It has been for facts and not for biased opinion and propaganda that critics of The Varsity have consistently clamoured, from the tenor of his remarks I must classify Fenno among those critics.

In conclusion, the article in question was not intended as a public relations blurb for the Political Economy Course Union executive. Nor was it to be a brief for either one of the two factions involved in the election. It was to be an analysis of the election stressing its liberal vs radical confrontation if any, using the reactions of the candidates involved.

Surely it is impossible for such an article to appear as "propaganda by interested parties". How Mr. van Zwanenburg could see it in this light amazes me. His attempt to tie this article in with the wider issue of "the real weaknesses of the Varsity" is absurd.

Hong Kong flu bug bites U of T too

BY NOEL STECKLEY

Hong Kong flu has finally arrived in Ontario and U of T.

Last Thursday an assistant professor of psychology at Scarborough College died of complications apparently resulting from the flu.

Dr. G. E. Wodehouse, University Health Service director, says there does not appear to be any great outbreak of flu on campus as yet.

"Maybe they are all at home suffering," he said. "But we haven't had a great influx of people at the health Centre."

There isn't very much you can do to keep from getting the flu. Dr. Wodehouse suggested: "Stay away from everyone."

Dr. Vivian Paskal, an assistant professor of psychology at Scarborough College died last Thursday.

A graduate of McGill and the University of Pennsylvania Dr. Paskal had taught at U of T since the summer of 1966.

Dr. Paskal was well known for her work with young children, and at the time of her death held a $15,000 Canada Council grant.

Toronto General Hospital reported that death was caused by bilateral bronchial pneumonia caused by staphylococcus aureus, the flu virus.

The bug will keep you down four to 10 days, says Wodehouse. Don't count on vaccine to help you through the winter — it's not available.

"If it does become available it will be assigned to elderly people," Wodehouse said.

On the other hand, Telegram columnist Dennis Braithwaite has advice to prevent catching the bug.

"First thing I do is pour myself a drink of Scotch; this is the basic defense."

A SAC and its Rock Pile are easily parted

BY MARY BASTEDO

The Students Administrative Council plans to sue the Rock Pile, Toronto's rock music centre, unless the $250 SAC put up for an October Nova concert is returned.

The SAC says the cheque SAC wrote out as an instrument bond was returned to Ars Nova by mistake. SAC accountant Dave Tinker says he understood through customs officials that it had been re-says the cheque has been cashed.

"SAC can bloody well wait," says Taylor, he says the Rock Pile hasn't got its $250 share back yet either.

A petition to put the Rock Pile into bankruptcy was

"We were $26,000 down when we opened this fall. You don't make up that kind of money overnight.

It costs money to get groups in here and we had to redecorate the place," he said.

A sign of relief

Have you lived? Have you seen the U of T Community Chest?

The Community Chest plans to hold dances, raffles and sell oddities all across campus in order to raise $10,000 during 1969.

One of the first projects of this fledgling organization is to relieve students on campus of the burden of carrying loose change about in their pockets.

For this purpose special containers will be set up around campus.

Students interested in aiding the growth of this organization should trot down to the Mill Building (105) or watch the Here and Now.

Did you know that the University of Toronto Chorus and the Hart House Orchestra will perform Gluck's opera Orpheus and Eurydice Sunday in the Great Hall?

No? It's in English and student tickets are $1.50.

Informal conference blasts CUS

Unofficial delegations from 25 Canadian campuses met at Waterloo Lutheran University over the holiday, and agreed they were unhappy with the present direction of the Canadian Union of Students.

They decided a decentralized national student union would best accommodate all universities and aid dealings with French universities and provincial governments.

The representatives discussed questions such as areas of student interest, education, services a national union could provide, and the role of local student governments.

By HELEN FORESTELL

The Medical Faculty Council Monday approved the appointment of a small committee to study a proposal by Ontario Health Minister Matthew Dymond for a crash program to relieve the shortage of medical manpower.

In a letter to the province's medical school deans Nov. 29, the minister suggested that the schools might be able to double an individual class to help solve the problem.

Dean A. L. Chute of the faculty of medicine said the problem would have to be studied carefully before the Medical Faculty could come up with a response to Dymond's proposal.

Dean Chute says students may be considered for membership in the committee.

filed Nov. 22 by Masonry Cleaning. Methods who cleaned the building at Yonge and Davenport but have not yet been paid for the job. A second hearing is scheduled for tomorrow morning, but the Rock Pile is disputing the petition.

"We're better off now than we've ever been," says Taylor.

Such progressive groups include the Chills, the McCoys, Muddy Waters, the Mothers of Invention, the Ohio Express and Procol Harum are slated to perform at the Rock Pile during the next few weeks.

The Rock Pile owes several thousand dollars in addition to a disputed $250 SAC cheque.

Mass Peterboro picket mobilizes as students charged reach court

office of the newspaper guild. Movies and speakers will discuss unionism in Canada and student radicalism.

The reporters and editors of the Examiner have been on strike since the beginning of November, protesting a new contract which reduces salaries for recruits. Lord Thomson took over the paper last year from Massey College Master Robertson Davies.

The student picket line marks the first time in the history of the Canadian student movement that students have turned out en masse to picket in a labor dispute.

The organizers hope the mass picket will discourage the non-striking printers' union from entering the plant, thereby preventing the paper from publishing on the weekend. They also hope the teach-in will discourage subscribers, purchasers and advertisers from further dealings with the paper.

Prof Judy has assisted the Faculty of Medicine in developing computer-based tools to explore such problems as the cost of training more doctors. He said that what is necessary is a more ambitious study of the need for more health professionals in this country.

son is director of the university's health sciences functional planning unit which could answer questions such as how many extra teachers, lecture theatres, and labs would be needed to double the medicine class.

SAC vice-president Norm Schachar (III Meds) says he is "excited at the possibility of change within the doctor training program.

He feels that in a lot of fields practitioners are over-educated. Schachar thinks trained medical teams with the individual members skilled in one aspect of health care are needed.

He says it is inevitable that the role of the doctor change. He has to become more of a consultant to the "health-care team" and to the patient.

Strange stories have been coming out of New College since Monday, so the Varsity decided to check it out. What we saw when we got there was something less than a thriving new cafeteria.

One table was occupied, Peggy Marshall (III NEW) likes the new cafeteria, especially the milkshakes, but she doesn't like the small tables. Karen Young (II NEW), on the other hand, thinks the round tables make the cafeteria more homey and intimate. Karen hopes that the selection of food is as wide as the cafeteria's nice wide counter. "This cafeteria is brighter than the Gnu Room," said Karen.

Mike Doucet (III SMC) says "The hot dogs are much better here." He likes the idea of having extra chairs along the wall. Nancy Howden (III SMC) was not so unreserved in her praise. "It's too small and too cold," she said, as we looked around at all the empty seats. But Nancy likes the partition that divides the large room, and the bench seats which line the partition.

At this point, Robert Coleman (SGS) a dan at New College, walked in, looked around, and exclaimed, "Isn't this place ever open?"

The proposed committee is to be established just as soon as Dean Chute can form a group of faculty members.

Socialists support French Quebec, SFU demonstrators

"We are part of a process which is international," said Gary Porter, executive secretary of the U of T Young Socialist Club. He was discussing the first Canadian Socialist Student Conference, held at Hart House Dec. 27-29.

The conference was attended by approximately 150 university and high school students from all provinces except Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland (apparently left in the grip of capitalism). Speakers, films, workshops, and a panel on student power were included in the program.

Quebec's position was articulated by Raymond Lemieux, leader of the Mouvement pour l'Integration Scolaire (MIS), and Michel Mill, one of the leaders in the occupation of the University of Montreal, and a candidate in the provincial constituency of Bagot, won by Education Minister Jean-Guy Cardinale. Mill has since been instrumental in the formation of the Ligue des Jeunes Socialistes (LJS).

Lemieux advocated that French be made the language of Quebec. He used statistics, purportedly obtained by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism and brought to light by the Montreal newspaper La Presse to show that French workers who learn English cannot go as far as unilingual English workers.

Mill wanted more effective leadership and less "spontaneity" than offered by the Union generale des etudiants de Quebec (UGEQ)—thus the formation of the LJS.

Ken Hiebert, one of the 114

American socialist Kipp Dawson reviewed 1968 with particular reference to student turmoil, another speaker, John Riddell, spoke about the League for Socialist Action.

The conference voted unanimously to initiate Hiebert's plan to defend the 114 and ensure that policemen are not allowed to interfere in campus disputes.

This group will be again circulating a petition to have a referendum on the problem of campus recruiting, especially recruitment by companies which produce "war materials".

Complete a year's required reading in 10 weeks.

Whatever you're studying, from first year English to fifth year medicine, there are a lot of texts you should read, a large number of books you have to read. Now, by reading three times faster, you can cover all of your required reading in less than one third of the normal time. Or read three times as much as the average student.

The Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics course teaches you to read faster, with improved comprehension. To retain more of what you read, and to concentrate more easily. If you don't at least triple your reading speed, your tuition fee will be refunded.

Give yourself two-thirds more time to read more, learn more, be more. Call us now at 923-4681 and enroll in one of the dynamic reading courses starting next week. Or attend a free "Mini-lesson" at one of the locations listed below. Discover in fifteen minutes your potential as a dynamic reader. # Blues win Minn. also-ran final.

By PHIL BINGLEY

BLOOMINGTON, Minn. Varsity hockey Blues ended a so-so first half of their 1968-69 schedule when they whipped a U.S. college all-star team 7-3 in the consolation final of the Minnesota Hockey Classic Tourney held here. Blues were eliminated from the championship bracket when they dropped a 2-0 opening game decision to University of North Dakota Sioux — the eventual winner of the tournament.

Varsity was not impressive in either of their two starts but coach Tom Watt managed to remain optimistic. "The loss to North Dakota was certainly a disappointment but I don't feel as bad as when we lost to Clarkson Tech and York. They (Dakota) are an excellent hockey team and played a better game than we did on this particular night."

While Blues have not played up to their touted potential, Watt does not plan to employ any severe lineup switches.

"I'm going to try Steve Monteith on a line with Brian St. John and John Gordon and give Terry Parsons a shot at a regular defence position. Many coaches like to juggle their personnel quite a bit when things aren't going well. However, I subscribe more to the theory of trying to keep the lines together and the lineup intact. That way individuals get used to each other and play more as a team."

Bright lights for the team in Minnesota were goaler Adrian Watson and centres John Wright and St. John. Watson and Wright were selected to the tourney all-star team while St. John simply played great hockey.

Wright and Gord Cunningham were the top scorers in the consolation with two goals each. St. John, Ward Passi and Dave Field added singles.

Tom Little who was scheduled to start the Dakota game missed the tournament when a warmup shot smashed through his face mask cutting him for several stitches.

NOTES ... Dakota won the final when they edged University of Minnesota 5-4. The winning goal came midway through the fifth overtime period... About 5,000 fans showed up for the two day tournament... Tourney organizers provided Tom Watt with a 1969 Chrysler for bombing around town... Blues did manage to pick up some silverware when they were awarded the Classic's sportsmanship trophy.

TONIGHT

Varsity Blues resume play in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League tonight when they meet University of Guelph Gryphons in the Guelph Auditorium.

Blues currently are tied for first place in the Western Division with University of Western Mustangs. Stangs however, have played two more games (both were losses to Varsity) while each team has eight points.

Last time Blues and Gryphons met (November 27 in Guelph) Varsity skated off with a 6-2 victory. Gryphons are winless in three starts this season.

BLUES TAKE THIRD STRAIGHT CENTENNIAL TOURNEY

By PHIL BINGLEY

MONTREAL. "A hockey team so strong, so fast, so explosive and so self-confident, that sportswriters will soon be wagging their pens in search of a suitable and catching and definitive collective phrase."

This is the way publicity officials at Loyola College have tabbed this year's version of that school's hockey Warriors. The statement appears in a handbook prepared by the Loyola athletic department.

However, after watching Varsity Blues dump Loyola 5-2 Sunday in the deciding game of the Centennial Tournament, the wagging pen of this writer has come up with a suitable label — "not bad" — for the losing Warriors.

Blues, who have had problems putting together good successive efforts this season, were by far the most competent and consistent entry in the three day tournament. Combining crisp offensive plays with an aggressive defence, Blues outplayed each of their three opponents by a fairly wide margin.

Gord Cunningham was the scoring hero for Varsity when he scored three goals and set up three others to lead a 9-3 opening round victory over Laval, added two goals and assisted on two more as Blues eliminated Michigan Tech in the semi-finals and won the tourney point leadership with a total of 10.

Terry Parsons, who recently won a starting berth and was playing his first games as a regular defenceman, played brilliantly on the blue-line and added five scoring points (including two goals) to boot.

In the Loyola-Toronto final, Blues seemed the stronger of the two over the first two periods but the scoreboard read 2-2 heading into the final 20 minutes.

Then Brian St. John, who continues to be the team's best two-way player, all but clinched the runnerup award for Loyola when his perfect slapshot whizzed past Warrior netminder Brian Hughes at 2:56 of the third period.

That goal seemed to sap any willpower Warriors had left (they played two tough games in advancing to the final) and Ward Passi put the final touches on Blues' fine display with two pretty scoring plays which came within four minutes of each other.

John Wright, second in the series scoring parade to linemate Cunningham, counted the only marker of the second period when he faked Hughes and slipped the puck through the falling goaler's legs.

The biggest single factor responsible for Blues overall improvement was the play of defencemen Parsons, Jim Miles, Bill L'Heureux and Dave Field. Earlier in the season, they lost much of their effectiveness when they hacked in on netminders Varsity Blues form a wall in front of Adrian Watson during their recent consolation victory over the U.S. College All-stars in the Minnesota Hockey Classic. Blues were eliminated in the opening round by University of North Dakota Sioux 2-0 but came back to take the consolation title 7-3. Above (l. to r.) Bob McClelland, Terry Parsons, John Wright and Jim Miles move in to thwart a scoring bid by all-stars George Konig. Both Wright and Watson were selected to the tourney all-star squad.

Adrian Watson and Tom Little. However, in this series, they stood up at their own blue-line and moved out to meet oncoming forwards.

As a result, opponents rarely were able to make a play in Toronto's end of the rink. Their usual move was to circle and try to mount another attack or simply dump the puck in and chase it.

As an added bonus, the above foursome contributed a healthy share of scoring points to the Varsity offence. L'Heureux, Blues' steadiest rearguard in Blues 18 games to date, was the top playmaker in the tournament with his six assists. (Paul Laurent and Cunningham each had five assists.)

Following the final game, J. David Molson, the organizer of the three-year old tourney, visited Blues' noisy but happy dressing room to offer his congratulations. Of the trophy given annually in his name, Mr. Molson told Tom Watt and his players, "You have won it three times in a row now so I guess it's yours to keep. You have a very good team — an excellent skating team — and you should be proud of yourselves. Congratulations."

NOTES... Adrian Watson started both the second and third games of the tournament but was forced to leave early (the flu and an injury suffered in a collision were responsible) on each occasion. Tom Little replaced Adrian in each game and started the first game on his own. Tom was solid and unflappable as usual... Dave Field intimidated several enemy attackers with his tough body-checking... Blues outshot Loyola 27-24 in the decider.

Blues' centre Brian St. John moves in an All-star net to score Varsity's second goal in 7-3 victory. The play originated in the corner where Ward Passi beat two opponents to the puck and centred out to St. John. Brian in turn made no mistake with his low wrist shot.

Stager quits Gnu-Land for teaching (and research)

New College's Dean of Men, David Stager, has resigned his post, effective July 1.

After three years at the job, Stager, 31, plans to return to a more active academic life.

"The administrative work is very heavy, even in the summer," he said last night. "I found I had no time for research at all.

"I enjoyed the administrative work, but living in residence I found I had no place to 'retreat' to as other scholars have."

Stager will be teaching in the department of political economy and doing research in the Institute of Quantitative Analysis for Social and Political Economy. His specialty is labour economics.

He holds degrees in political economy from Johns Hopkins, Oxford and Princeton.

New College Principal D. G. Ivey said last night "it's time for him to move on and try other things.

"He's been doing academic administration for a stretch now, and he would like to move to a purely research and teaching job," he added.

U of T boycott only a half-squeeze

By LIZ WILICK

Does the University of Toronto observe the California Grape Boycott? Well parts of it do — in a vague sort of way.

For over three years now Delano, California farm workers have been striking for union recognition. The Grape Boycott was organized to put pressure on the growers and assist the struggling workers.

Toronto is the fifth largest grape market in North America. Many stores have stopped selling California grapes — including some of the major chain stores.

But, generally speaking, there doesn't seem to be much awareness of the situation among the dietary personnel on campus.

An even less known issue is the five or six year boycott on apartheid-produced South African "Outspan" oranges.

Asked if California grapes were used at Hart House supervisor of food services Rosemary Bolitho replied "No. Not consciously — anyway we use very few. Again, oranges are something we seldom use and we certainly wouldn't buy South African!"

Interestingly enough, grapes appeared at the cocktail party in Warden E. A. Wilkinson's apartments before the opening of "Stop the World I want to get Off". When a reporter asked the Warden's wife if she was serving California grapes, she replied 'of course' The reporter politely refused to partake.

A spokesman for Beaver Foods at Trinity College said the question "came up in a food committee meeting a few weeks ago."

Trinity bursar G. O. Shepherd said "We have no particular policy. We have used them on occasion. As I understand it, there's really no other kind available."

When asked whether students were aware that they could affect the decision to use the grapes, Mr. Shepherd said this had been explained in a letter to one student who protested the presence of the grapes.

When asked about South African oranges, Mr. Shepherd laughed and commented "Well, frankly, I don't know. That's one that's never come up."

University College dietician Phyllis West said "UC doesn't use California grapes. The students don't want us to buy them so we don't." And the South African boycott? "I don't know anything about that but we don't buy South African oranges anyway."

A spokeswoman for food services at Victoria College answered the question indirectly, saying "We do use some grapes as requested. Not South African oranges necessarily — just whatever's available on the market that's to our advantage."

F. Amorin, assistant manager of food services at St. Michael's College stated, "We don't use grapes since the boycott." Asked whether the decision was in response to student requests, he replied "Students don't get grapes anyway — they're for the faculty tables" (!)

Manager at New College, Otto Hoffman is one of the few people really enthused about the boycott "So far as principles are concerned, I certainly wouldn't be buying them. We're ordering exclusively non-California grapes." He occasionally receives the California grapes regardless of his request and doesn't send them back His suggestion for promoting the boycott was "Get onto the buyers and wholesale houses and try to twist their arms." And New College serves Sunkist oranges.

Here are the facts. Relating to the faculty of arts and science.

There are 9,266 students enrolled in day classes and 3,506 in evening classes on the St. George campus.

Scarborough College this year has a total enrolment of 2,092, and Erindale has an enrolment of 825.

This makes a grand total arts and science registration this year of 15,689, an increase of 1,834 over last year.

Of these, 4,055 are in first year, 3,090 are in second year, 2,598 in third and 820 are in fourth year.

The biggest college is Victoria, with 2,456, with UC and St. Mike's following closely behind with 2,044 and 1,924 students respectively.

Grads open meetings

The Council of The School of Graduate Studies joined the openness bandwagon last month, when it approved a resolution to open meetings to outsiders.

But there's a hitch.

Visitors can't participate — unless invited by the Chairman. And don't be too sure that you'll get in at all. Council may still shut you out entirely by voting for a closed session.

Other Council resolutions depend on the good will of the Senate. The latter will study recommendations that two Graduate students be included on the Executive Committee of each Division. One of these students must be elected to Council from that Division; the second, who must receive the next highest number of votes, should be enrolled in a different department.

A student assessor present also had several requests.

Among these was a recommendation that Council consider a survey conducted by the G.S.U. last summer concerning the aims of the Graduate school and the problems facing graduate students.

Council meets at 4.10 p.m. on the third Tuesday of every month in the Council Chamber, Galbraith Building.

Gnu residents demand 'open weekend'

By ART MOSES

New College residents Wednesday demanded that weekend visiting hours for women be abolished in the men's residence, but drew an unfavorable response from David Stager, dean of men, who said: "My reaction? Ha!"

Dean Stager said that "generally" he could not agree with the policy adopted by the New College Residence Committee, and that the matter would have to be discussed further.

In a rare mood of determined unanimity the Residence Committee agreed Wednesday night to recognize "women's visiting to be Friday 4 p.m. to Sunday midnight. These hours will be effective as of Friday, January 10." The motion was introduced by Doug Gonyou (I APSC) and seconded by David Hager (II New).

The Committee had expected Dean Stager would oppose the move.

"Aw, why can't you stay all weekend?"

Stager based his objections on his belief that a residence such as New College, where the majority of students are freshmen, cannot have such liberal rules as the Committee suggested.

They would be more appropriate for a residence of senior students, he said.

"I am worried about whether people could deal with this type of situation psychologically. I am not concerned about sex, but about the noise and psychological disturbances involved to New College residents."

In ensuring that Committee members were aware before passing the motion of its ramifications in possibly forcing a confrontation with Stager, Committee Chairman Peter Heath (III New) offered to convey the opinion of the members to Stager in a private meeting before the Committee declared its policy officially.

"Let's not forget that the Dean still has the ultimate ratifying power," he warned.

But the Committee members demanded that before any such meeting take place Heath have a policy behind him, and that the motion be passed immediately.

"We've fooled around long enough" declared Rick Lehan (I New). "We can't go half way now."

"Before the holidays we were told we should wait until the girls were settled in their new residence before deciding on women's hours" explained Jim Deutsch (II Meds). "Now they're settled; we can't put it off any further."

Other U of T residences have restricted women's visiting hours similar to New College. St. Mike's prohibits women at all times. No U of T residences have open weekends.

One student suggested that some parents would not approve of their boys living under such liberal conditions, but Scott Tiffen (II APSC) replied that "Morals are changing; there is no reason why we can't break new ground."

When informed of the Dean's comments, Chairman Heath pointed out that he saw the motion as an expression of policy, a clarification of the Committee's stand, "not an ultimatum for ultimatum's sake," and the matter was negotiable.

His concern was whether in any confrontation with the Dean the mass of residents at New College would back the decision of their committee.

25% OF STUDENTS STRIKE

St. Lawrence teachers dismissed

One quarter of the students at the St. Lawrence College of Applied Arts boycotted classes yesterday in an effort to force the administration to conduct an investigation into dismissals from the teaching staff.

Student president Paul Brisebois claims there were nine dismissals in the college's 15-month life.

The firing of English department head Peter Kingston triggered the walkout.

No open support for the demonstrators has been shown by the college's teachers, but one (who wished to remain anonymous) said Kingston had been fired against his will.

President R. C. Short said the college's staff turnover was normal for so young an institute.

He disputed the students' claim and said that only two teachers had been fired.

Kingston, an Anglican priest, claimed that he and Dr. John de Kock, the head of the applied arts division, differed on academic matters.

He received a letter on Dec. 20 from Dr. de Kock saying that "since you chose not to resign" he was dismissed.

The students have sent a telegram to education minister William Davis stating their demands.

They want outside arbitration in future dismissals, a special board of students and teachers to review the recent dismissals, one student seat on the college's executive, and no reprisals against the demonstrators.

The Ontario Civil Service Association yesterday came out in favour of the students' demands and asked for President Short's resignation.

student power - who won?

There's no doubt that the big winner in the last few months of student power politics is Claude Bissell.

Borrowing from a long-established Canadian tradition, he's managed to shuffle every grievance, every complaint, every suggestion for radical change into a committee. There, through sheer force of dilution, the university is assured a few liberal reforms here and there, but nothing major.

Yet major change is what the student movement aimed for this year.

We wanted staff-student control of the university. (We've said before that any suggestions along that line will be fended off by the Ontario legislature.)

We wanted a critical university, one which does a bit more than publish reports on social ills. We're no nearer that than before, and we'll never get there if the administration continues to get its way.

We wanted a university where "learning" meant more than jumping academic hoops so employers wouldn't have to do their own grading. Instead we got the Allen Report and the same old system in new bottles. We also wasted a lot of time trying to get meaningful student participation in preparing and approving the report.

All along the line we've been out-CUGged, out-PACed, out-changed.

When we do emerge from all the committees we're on, when we've read all the reports, we'll notice the university looks remarkably similar to what it does now.

In effect, we've seen what Marcuse calls "repressive tolerance" in action—an overt receptivity to change masking an attitude which says, simply, the university is fine the way it is.

But above all, we're wasting valuable manpower—people now sitting in committees who could be pressing for new ideas, new reforms.

If we're really serious about producing a new university, we have to start again. Areas we should hit:

- Elimination of evaluation of students. All evaluation does is give the professor unlimited power over his students, and corrupt the real purpose of education. If employers want marks, they can give the exams themselves.

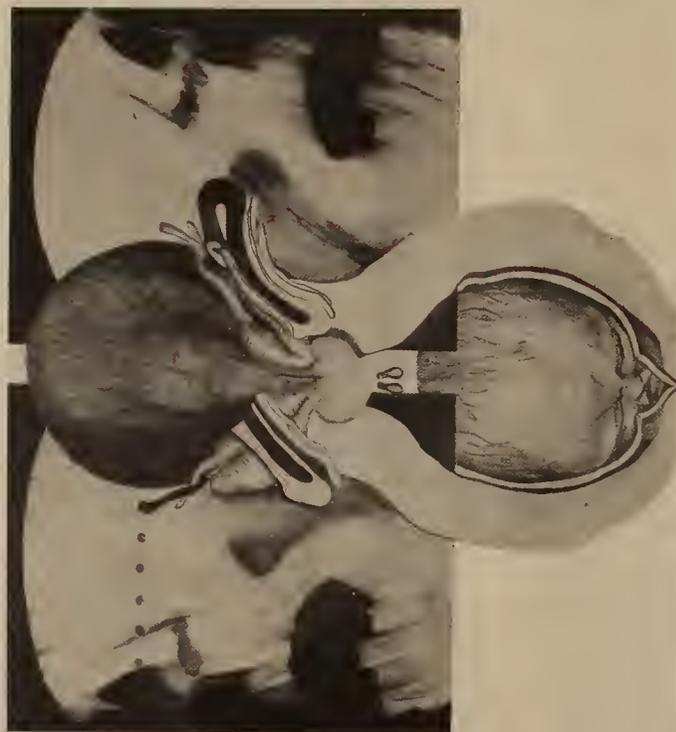

- Student control over the content of their education, and an end to the belief that "daddy knows best". How can a professor possibly know better than the student what the student should or wants to learn? The professor is at best an equal partner in the learning process.

- At least an equal voice with staff in hiring and firing of faculty. This aspect is crucial in attracting and keeping the kind of professor who wants a new kind of university.

- An educational policy at least as advanced as the Hall-Dennis report. In an age when even primary schools recognize the futility of trying to teach people by talking to them in rows, it seems strange the university still clings to this concept.

And as we aim for these things, if we do, we should keep in mind that progressive educational practice and theory are not opposed to these reforms—we don't need committees to prove them sound.

We won't be shunted into committee any more. Not if we're serious.

The Review

new rules at New

New College Residence Committee has finally declared for open weekend visiting hours for women.

Acting with the knowledge that the majority of New College residents support a policy of open weekends, the Committee has declared that students shall make such decisions, not Dean David "in loco parentis" Stager.

Stager's objections to the new hours should turn a few stomachs. What he says essentially is that freshmen are too immature to cope psychologically with a situation in which they are allowed to have women in their rooms throughout the weekend.

There's an old argument to that — if people 18 and 19 years old are old enough to die for their country etc, they're old enough to have women over night.

(And knowing the situation of freshmen generally, their main problem will be finding a willing woman at all.)

The Committee hasn't gotten approval yet, but if it does, it will be a significant development toward abolishing the outposts of puritanical self-righteousness that still infest most U of T residences. It may also establish the principle that those affected by rules should make them.

This weekend there will be two sets of rules in effect at New College: Dean Stager's official rules, and the Residence Committee's unofficial rules. We hope New College residents, and Dean Stager himself, will recognize that the unofficial rules speak for the people.

another Examiner picket line

The strike at the Peterboro Examiner enters its third month. Journalists striking against an attempt by the new Thomson management to smash their union have not yet succeeded in closing down the paper.

Without wide support the prospects of winning the strike look bleak. The journalists' union is only one of three at the plant, and the other two are not permitted by their contract to join the strike.

The journalists appealed to student newspapers for support and already students from across Ontario have twice joined the picket line.

Next week a major effort is being attempted. SDU's and other student groups from across the province are planning to help man the picket lines from Wednesday to Friday.

The point is not only to help a strike with which students sympathize; organizers hope that it will also provide an opportunity for students to talk to workers about areas of common concern. A fluid teach-in situation is envisaged, and some resource people will be brought in.

Most workers write off students as people who either openly identify with management or who just don't care about anything outside their campuses and careers.

Anyone interested in going up to Peterboro next week for one, two, or three days should contact Andy Werner (920-3874) or Jenny Penny (925-7560).

We welcome letters and comment articles on all subjects. Typewritten submissions get first preference and for legal reasons we have to know who you are, although you can use a pseudonym for publication. Letters and articles may be edited for length.

The Varsity regrets the passing of The Review for this issue. Review editor Mike Ignatieff has promised us a Review next week as soon as the staff returns from Acapulco, Newmarket and Hang Kang.

The gathering storm in the political science dept.

By PHILIP RESNICK

Philip Resnick is a graduate student in political science and one of those participating in a counter-seminar to Prof. Stephen Clarkson's course on Ideology.

Matters are rapidly coming to a head in the Department of Political Science between graduate students on the one hand, and a largely reactionary faculty on the other. Two events in the last month have made it patently clear that the Department has no intention of moving on student demands, and that the Associate Chairman of the Department, Jean Edward Smith, and his cronies, are counting on student apathy to allow them to preserve their power untrammelled.

The first regards a committee set up early this year to investigate changes in the graduate program. Chaired by Sandy Lakoff, a fellow American brought in by Smith and largely disliked for his pomposity and arrogance by both students and other faculty members, this committee met with students on two occasions in October and has not been heard from since. During its sessions, almost all graduate students united in pressing for the abolition of comprehensives, and for a British-type system in which primary emphasis would be placed on the thesis.

OTHER IDEAS

It became rapidly clear that Lakoff had other ideas in mind, that he was interested in modelling graduate studies as much as possible on the American model, with professionalism entailing rigorous seminar and comprehensive requirements. The man had no comprehension of the tradition of political science in this country, and could only define Canadian political science in terms of the standards that prevail in the imperialist power from which he comes and to which he will probably return.

In any event, a promised report of this committee, scheduled to appear by Dec. 15th last, has not been submitted. Graduate students, several of whom took the trouble of presenting written briefs to this committee, are thoroughly angry.

The second event concerns the Counter-Seminar on Ideology, set up by graduate students discontented with a seminar being offered by Stephen Clarkson and ostensibly on the same topic. The Counter-Seminar has thus far dealt with theories of consciousness from Hegel to George Lukacs, and is preparing this term to undertake a systematic study of the biases of contemporary American political science, as well as one or two concrete studies of liberal capitalism in Canada. Participation has thus far been enthusiastic, with up to 30 people, including several faculty members, attending sessions. In short, the Counter-Seminar is a functioning reality.

ACCREDITATION DENIED

But it has now become patently clear that accreditation is to be denied the group, that Clarkson and the Department will only sanction work done in his seminar, according to his liberal biases, with no student control. A provisional agreement worked out with Clarkson earlier this year has proved worthless, and we are back to the old academic authoritarianism of yesterday.

The Department refuses to sanction a student-run seminar, even though its subject matter is superior to most of the crap it passes off as scholarship. More concretely, the Department cannot accept the concept of a radical critique of political science as it is (i.e. a rationaliser of the liberal capitalist system) and seeks to banish all intellectual dissent to the periphery of the university.

For many graduate students, these two events have revealed the complete bad faith of the Department and the need for vigorous student action, if anything is to change. The demand for student parity in all decision-making, not least over hiring and firing, is beginning to gain support, much as it has at McGill, Ottawa, and Simon Fraser. Rejection of American behaviorism and "professionalism" is widespread, not least because that professionalism has turned American social science since World War II into an agent of repressive liberalism both in the American Empire and at home. That is not the kind of political science which we want here, celebrating American "democracy" and the American way.

But it is not Jean Edward Smith, until 1961 a full-time official in the US Department of Defense, and since then, intermittently a consultant, or Sandy Lakoff, or T. L. Thorson, an apologist for Daley's actions in Chicago, who will bring that about.

The Counter-Seminar will be meeting today at 2 p.m. as usual, at the Textbookstore on Huron St., Room 332, to map out the course of action to be pursued in the weeks ahead. All graduate students in Political Science, and all students of political science wanting substantial change in the running of this Department, are invited to this important meeting.

ends and means

I should like to make a brief comment on Geoffrey Nathan's "open letter" to the Varsity of Jan. 8. He is quite right in characterizing even non-violent sit-ins as a use of force, and quite right in deploring the toleration of any force by university administrators. I disagree with him, however, on two counts.

"Force is always immoral" as a categorical statement (which is surely what it is) is quite in error. In many situations force is undoubtedly acceptable — it just depends what the ends are. Though I have no use for the thoughts and aims of V. I. Lenin, I have to concede that his exasperation at similar remarks is much to the point. If the ends don't justify the means — what in heavens name does? The correct position as I see it is "Only the ends justify the means" and it is an empirical question as to when they do.

This brings me to my second point and that is the reason I am opposed to the use of force is precisely because the ends in this case do not justify the implication of the means. The use of force to achieve ones ends destroys the basic principles of an ordered and democratic society and sets up precedents that could, were they followed, lead to a state of anarchy and the rule of force. This is what happened in Chicago and I think it is too high a price to pay for whatever goals student radicals seem to be championing.

Open letter to Geoffrey Nathan

Dear Mr. Nathan,

I wish to express my disagreement with your analysis of SAC's actions on the Board of Governors' brief to the Committee on University Affairs. You have managed to distort and confuse practically every issue you dealt with in your open letter to Dr. Bissell. (Jan. 8).

You claimed that the "University Administration . . . surrenders to threats of physical force on the campus". I submit that a "non-obstructive sit-in" can hardly be called physical force. And the fact that the "student body in general . . . ratified" this move shows that most students support the "students in power".

If as you say, "the entire university is at the mercy of the whims of the students in power", certainly the students who put them in power agree with their views. If not, they had a chance last spring to vote into power the students they felt truly represented their views.

What truly is at stake here is freedom itself, which you seem to have taken for granted. The basis of a free society, or a university, is NOT "a community where the initiation of force or the threat of force is not permitted."

The fact that the Board of Governors and the President's Council would even consider presenting a secret brief which will affect our education and our children's is in effect a corruption of freedom. It is suppressing information. The Board of Governors made a mistake; they knew it; they gave in willingly.

Then you raise the question of who should run the university. It should "remain in control of those who own it," you say. But those who own it, whom you call "the taxpayers", do not, in fact, control it. The Board of Governors and the administration control it. By preparing secret briefs, they keep secret from the so-called "owners" their actions in controlling it.

And if an owner should be in complete control of what he owns, there would be very little freedom in our society at all. Let me draw one example: the apartment building.

One man, or corporation or company of men, owns it. Yet they are forbidden by law to completely control it — thank heaven. They cannot discriminate against tenants according to race. They cannot evict someone without a valid reason. They cannot tell the people in the building how to live (outside of certain health regulations and fire regulations, of course.)

So you see, Mr. Nathan, that the public release of the brief is more significant than the brief, itself, or any briefs at all. It is a question of freedom.

Students, like apartment tenants, inhabit the university. A person in a free society has at least a right to a voice and a vote, if not total control, over his own environment. And I submit that within the next year or two, Mr. Nathan, you will find this university a quite oppressive environment. And I also submit that it would be a great deal worse if some students were not concerned about having some control over this environment.

SAN FRANCISCO - Over 1,000 students and union professors faced 200 clubwielding riot policemen in front of the entrance to San Francisco's State College yesterday.

The demonstrators were continuing their protest against the firing of Black Panther George Murray for allegedly inciting the students to riot.

The protestors are also demanding the formation of a black college and amnesty for all those arrested.

Another 500 students at San Fernando State College clashed with police on their campus demanding amnesty for students arrested Dec. 4 when they occupied an administration building.

Literary Notes

Attention all aspiring writers, poets and literary types in general! Bob Weaver of the CBC Radio program Anthology will be broadcasting a number of shows, based on the works submitted to him (by YOU). In fact he will even have a few authors on to talk about their works. Submit anything of this nature to Jack Ludwig at Massey College, before the end of January.

Jack Ludwig would like to form a group from those who submit writing for the above mentioned show.

Also very noteworthy: Robert Lowell, American poet, will be coming to U of T the week of Jan. 21.

ad, to further the revolution through talks for university students.

As a representative of the South African Liberation Movement he spent two years in China at the Afro-Asian Journalists Association, thus escaping the execution planned for him by the Vostroy regime of Azania (the correct name for South Africa).

The Great Proletarian Revolution is his topic at 8:00 tonight, when he speaks in the International Student Center. His second lecture revolution by the Chinese Imperialist press" is one of the main reasons Ebrahim gives for his efforts to publicize the conflict.

He sees the struggle in China as directly attributable to revisionist line of restored capitalism clashing with Chairman Mao's revolutionary policies. "Any return to capitalism as advocated by Liu Shao-chi will merely force China to follow in the footsteps of Soviet Russia," he states, leading to a new ruling class instead of true socialism.

Franklin Arbuckle, near on the advertising department at OCA, says: "The bill is very good because it provides opportunity for change in the future. Our job now is to try it and see if it works."

Arbuckle said that the bill closely follows the Wright Report, commissioned after last spring's student boycott of classes.

Arbuckle feels it would be practically impossible to put the new Council into effect before the end of this term as it will take some time before the Act is passed.

"I think a precipitate change would create anarchy. However, he realizes the students are anxious and he is not opposed to the College being changed as quickly as possible.

Early next week, an Advisory Committee composed of the Principal, two council members, four faculty, and two students, will present its suggestions for the creation the bill. Amenta feels the Council should come into effect at the first meeting after the Act is passed. He is displeased with the phrase "within two months" as he feels this is needless delay. This way he fears it will not get off the ground until next year.

Amenta is also opposed to the object of the College being studied in the Bill. He feels this needs to be studied. The policy committee recommended by the Advisory Committee has as one of its concerns the research involved in discovering and redefining College objectives.

Amenta suggests that the Student Council and the Faculty Association conduct an election now. Then as soon as the Act is passed, the new Council could go into effect. He says some student nations have already been made.

napalm is "a fantastically useful strategic weapon. There's only one tactical weapon that can turn back the human wave and that's napalm," he said. This liquid fire bomb is the only way to keep death into concrete bunkers and heavily protected troop emplacements.

Doan also said he believed the American soldier would have been pushed out of South Viet Nam in military defeat without napalm.

With napalm representing less than one-half of one per cent of total Dow sales, the decision to continue making the sticky and fiery gasoline could be little more than a principle.

Dow is not forced by any governmental pressures to continue making napalm either. Government contracts represent less than five per cent of total sales.

But Dow does have an image problem. Citing a recent student sur-produced it only since 1965, when the Air Force changed its specifications to include a thicker gelatin base for its active ingredient, gasoline.

The thicker base became styrene, a basic building block for most plastics. Styrene was developed and first patented by Dow. Company officials confirmed that Dow is the best equipped major chemical firm to produce styrene.

According to company recruiters, response of top students to Dow campus interviews has not been affected, despite the more than 180 demonstrations in the last year.

Doan says the company feels a "right and a responsibility to be on campus for those students who want to discuss job opportunities, and we have always supported the right of others to debate the issue, to demonstrate peacefully, and I hope we always will."

The student council earlier dismissed this argument by pointing out the university's calendar urges students to carry on a continuing examination of institutions and ideas.

The calendar adds: "This constant critique must be applied first to the structure and function of the university itself."

The student council at the U of S campus at Saskatoon also condemned the Governor's action, demanding in a meeting Tuesday that the board reverse its decision and guarantee the autonomy of student press and student government at both campuses.

The Saskatoon council demanded a response by Monday, although a general student meeting called Wednesday failed to gain a quorum. Those present however, overwhelmingly supported their council's action.

SAC should develop student housing: report

By GEOFF MEGGS

SAC should sponsor a student housing building program, says a 31-page report on student housing released by the Students Administrative Council yesterday.

The reasons for an SAC program are the necessity for "a superior alternative" to housing programs undertaken by universities and governments, and "a focus for SAC activity."

The Report, in preparation since November 1967 at a total cost of $18,040 proposes 29 specific recommendations and 20 general recommendations covering every area of student housing from facilities to rents.

Emphasizing the need to establish a set of basic concepts as the groundwork for a good housing program, which would "provide an environment in which people maintain a community through interaction" Hunter puts forward the following general recommendations:

- no special facilities for married students.
- incorporation of residential units to allow operation on a cooperative basis in groups of six or eight.
- planning of one and two bedroom apartments to appeal to wide ranges of student.
- expansion of room size for study purposes and additional living space at the expense of common facilities.
- interspersal of common facilities unit types, and inclusion of low-cost indoor sports facilities, • co-educational residences with no system of dons or deans.

• an attempt to provide services for the entire community

Implementation would be by a system of committees set up to discuss administration and specific aspects of the program such as cost control and financing, under the control of a fulltime project director responsible to SAC.

While the Report favors a location at the present site on College St. west of Spadina for its access to shops, enter-

The Hunter Report on Student Housing, prepared over the last year by David Hunter, a graduate sociology student was originally financed by $15,000 by SAC. This summer an Executive Meeting voted an additional $3,040. The Report studies present student needs and establishes guidelines for an SAC student housing building program. Labour and Principals Time — $11,144.00. IBM Machine Usage— 2,449.18. Office Expenses — 2,205.11. Miscellaneous — 28.25; Total — 15,826.54 tainment, and varied community, it questions the wisdom of building in an area which may become a slum without immediate development.

"If nothing is achieved by way of redevelopment or the establishment of the area to a low level residential area, then I would predict that it will take on the properties of a slum area," writes Hunter.

The Report found off-campus students generally satisfied with their present accommodation because of the independence, and privacy it offers.

In this case it recommends a self-contained apartments at $60-$70 monthly rent. Buildings would have a minimum of formal structure.

The text contains few statistics but concentrates instead on description and discussion of the findings. The majority of the SAC allocation was spent on labor and computer costs.

Macro out, micro in.. Langdon

By BRIAN JOHNSON
VARSITY SAC EDITOR

Report to the final confrontation over the "secret" brief.

"I really think we've won the university government battle," said student council President Steven Langdon. "Now we've got to talk to students, involve more people, raise more questions."

Langdon leaned back in his chair and surveyed his poster-filled office as he reflected on the successes and failures of last term and contemplated changes for this term.

"I want to spend less time negotiating with the administration this year," he said, "and spend more time in talking to students."

Langdon wants to talk to students on the "micro level" of informal, small groups. Last term the "macro level" didn't work, he admitted.

"The whole Tent City thing was a disaster," he said. "It could have been a total disaster, but the mass meetings started to pull it out of the fire. But generally we really blew it."

The Tent City campaign was meant to hit students with the concrete issue of housing at the beginning of term, to dramatize the issue and to provide temporary accommodation. But few students were interested, the project fizzled and money was lost. Some useful mass meetings, a blue paper on housing, and "the-site-of-Tent-City" appellation for the area in front of Hart House were all that emerged from the project.

But SAC recovered to win some major victories.

Langdon singled out SAC's success in formulating the CUG structure as a keynote of the year.

It happened at a meeting of the Association of Teaching Staff. Bob Rae (IV UC) was there to present SAC's formula that would eliminate the Board of Governors from CUG and establish equal student-faculty representation. President Claude Bissell was there to present his plan whereby students would be overshadowed by faculty, alumni, and board representatives.

In a dramatic speech, Rae refuted Bissell's argument and swayed the ATS to accept the SAC proposal—a great moral victory for SAC.

Last term's policy showed a slow evolution of student involvement—from the faculty council meetings on the Macpherson

"I am not satisfied with what came out of the Macpherson Report," says Langdon, "but it was valuable to have the precedent of a student-faculty committee instituted. And for the 300 to 400 students who saw the first meeting of the faculty council, it must have been a real mind-blowing experience."

"OSAP was important psychologically for us. People got activated enough to march," Langdon feels. SAC organizers attracted 1,000 people to march on Queen's Park.

Student involvement culminated in the much-publicized incident of the "secret" brief.

"The brief was the big thing," says Langdon. "We found we could mobilize the council. And there was wide support from right across the student body."

Langdon feared the danger of co-option, which he defines as "beginning to play by the rules that already exist, to relate only to the structures that already exist."

That kind of sublimation of ideas makes basic change impossible.

"There was a drift towards that at the end of the term," he added. "We're going to review our whole university government policy this term—partly because of CUG. Now we've had more experience in dealing with university governing bodies."

SAC only has two months to work with this term, but its program is heavy: a decision on whether or not to go ahead with the College St. housing project; investigation into university research; forming the bookstore committee; spending more time and money on community and social action; a review of the Student Information Bureau; negotiation for the campus centre; a continuation of the FU of T.

SAC is also initiating a new program called Agitprop, an organized attempt to contact and talk to students.

expressions which (if you could see them from the back row ZZ) showed another human being, a bit funnier than most, but completely natural and innocent. George Backman as Guildenstern withdrew into himself and William Brydon as the Player King spat out his lines as if he were in a continual tantrum. Douglas Norwick as Alfred, one of the tragedians, made the most of his small part as did all of the players.

Is Stoppard trying to make us sit up and take notice that we will die or is he simply playing little games of intelligence with idea? That's the problem when putting on the play. You can only tell a person so many times that he will die and then it becomes a dead issue. So you have to concentrate on the games.

But the play becomes very serious near the end. R & G have lost the last commitment they were given, (taking Hamlet to England) and they are alone on a boat that is, by sheer momentum, taking them toward eternity. This is when they really start to rebel but it is too late. They are trapped.

The question remains: Who is better off, Hamlet or our two un-heroes? That's something the play never answers. At least in Waiting for Godot, all the characters were equally lost. All of the characters there were equally absurd. You could read what you wanted into it. But in R & G, neither Hamlet nor R & G is totally absurd; who do we identify with?

It's probably the best play to hit Toronto for a long time. (Che Guevara is Mickey Mouse compared to it). Go see it for a brilliant example of words, if for anything. It's quite an experience.

Complete a year's required reading in 10 weeks.

Whatever you're studying, from first year English to fifth year medicine, there are a lot of texts you should read, a large number of books you have to read. Now, by reading three times faster, you can cover all of your required reading in less than one third of the normal time. Or read three times as much as the average student.

The Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics course teaches you to read faster, with improved comprehension. To retain more of what you read, and to concentrate more easily. If you don't at least triple your reading speed, your tuition fee will be refunded.

Give yourself two-thirds more time to read more, learn more, be more. Call us now at 923-4681 and enroll in one of the dynamic reading courses starting next week. Or attend a free "Mini-lesson" at one of the locations listed below. Discover in fifteen minutes your potential as a dynamic reader. And how with some applied study you too can become an Evelyn Wood graduate.

ICEMEN HOME TONIGHT AFTER ZAPPING GUELPH 15-2

John Wright (blurred 4) moves in for shot on Guelph net during Blues 15-2 drubbing of Gryphons on Wednesday night. Here goaler Jim Horton moves out to cut down the angle on Wright while defencemen Jim Forbes (2) and Barry Poag (4) move in to lend assistance. Many similar situations did not have such a happy ending for Gryphons as Wright, Gord Cunningham, Paul Laurent and Steve Monteith managed to score three goals each.

By PHIL BINGLEY

It's home sweet home for Tom Watt and his Varsity hockey Blues this evening when they meet winless McMaster Marlins in a 8:00 p.m. tilt. Blues, who have not had the smell of a home crowd since December 13 (they pasted Mustern Mustangs 7-2 that night), return to Varsity Arena after a series of successful road trips — latest of which was a 15-2 trouncing of Guelph Gryphons on Wednesday night.

The shiny credentials of tonight's visiting Marlins are suspect if past performances this season are any indication. McMaster has dropped each of their three league starts, including an embarrassing 6-4 decision to Windsor Lancers.

Gary Spoor, Marlin's ageless warrior, is again the premier member of coach Bill Mahoney's charges. Spoor annually ranks among the most consistent scorers in the SIHL and has collected four of the team's 10 goals so far this year.

Other noteworthy returnees include defencemen Mike Briery and Bill Chalpenko and forwards Mac Hickox, Frank Hincks and Mike Lynch.

Marlin netminder Ian Budge is best characterized by his inconsistency. When he is hot he is very, very hot and when he is cold, bring out the computers.

In the Varsity camp, attempts to field a complete unit have been thwarted by flak from the Hong Kong flue (cf; Hong Kong Bong). Bill L'Heureux and Mike Boland both missed Wednesday's Guelph game because of the bug and their status for tonight is uncertain.

Tom Little, who along with Adrian Watson possesses the league's best goals against average, will guard the home cage this evening. Tom has played in each of Blues' last five starts while Adrian is recovering from a shoulder injury suffered in the Centennial tournament.

HE SHOOTS, HE SCORES

Connoisseurs of wide open hockey would certainly have thrilled to the Varsity-Guelph display on Wednesday. In all, 17 goals were scored in the contest — 15 of them by the good guy visitors.

The letdown that was anticipated after three big efforts in the Montreal tournament lasted only until the 19:03 mark of the first period. Up until that point Guelph held a t-0 lead and Blues appeared sloppy and listless.

However, Steve Monteith brought the team alive with a quick wrist shot that found the mark behind Gryphon goaler Jim Horton. Seconds later, Steve put linemate Paul Laurent in the clear for a high backhand marker and Blues skated to their change room with a 2-1 lead.

For the final forty minutes Varsity concentrated on improving their point totals while the Guelph skaters battled frustration and waited for the final siren. Toronto counted six unanswered goals in the second period and seven more in the third before showering and leaving for home.

John Wright and Monteith shared scoring honors with three goals and four assists each. Paul Laurent was superb as always with his three goals and three assists while Gord Cunningham picked up where he stopped in Montreal with three goals and a pair of setups.

Brian St. John had a pair, one of which came on a gorgeous two-way passing play with Monteith, and Bob McClelland added single. McClelland and the Big Bopper Dave Field each chipped in with four assists.

Tom Little made several fine stops in the Toronto net despite his relegation to the role of an interested spectator for much of the match.

NOTES . . . Fred Merlocco moved up from St. Mike's of the interfaculty league to fill in for Bill L'Heureux. Merlocco turned in a creditable performance and earned an assist on Paul Laurent's first goal . . . John Weatherstone scored both goals for Gryphons . . .

VARSITY SPORTS

Murph joins wrestlers

Varsity wrestling Blues travel to McMaster tomorrow for a tri-meet with Mac and University of Guelph. However, the big news in the mat room is the announcement that head football coach Ron Murphy will join the team Monday and fill a similar role.

Paul Beswick, who currently shares coaching duties with fellow wrestler Bill Allison informed The Varsity of the move last evening. "Murph was around yesterday and Thursday getting the lay of the land and he will take over on Monday. He has never coached wrestling before but he has taught the sport in phys-ed. classes."

Blues will have their hands full in Hamilton tomorrow. So far the team has had a half-serious scrimmage with Guelph and a meet with Mac which they won. However, Beswick is not overly optimistic about Varsity's chances tomorrow.

"Guelph always has a strong team (they're defending OQAA champions) and the Mac squad we beat the first time bears little resemblance to the one we wrestle tomorrow. When we met them before Christmas, most of their best wrestlers were writing exams."

RON MURPHY

To add to Toronto's troubles, first-stringers Bill Allison (on tour in Winnipeg) and Larry Barron will be missing for tomorrow's meet. Allison competes in the 167 lb. class while Barron is in the 191 lb. grouping.

Teach-in takes a long, hard look at Hall-Dennis Ignores technicians: Downes

By ART MOSES

The Hall Dennis Report could give Ontario one of the greatest educational systems in the world, a Boston University professor told the third session.

Prof. Theodore Brameld urged the audience not to let the report be dropped.

But the white-haired philosophy of education professor found several weaknesses, in the report, including the failure to amply consider cultural changes in society.

"Not enough attention has been given to the crucial question of teacher training. A teacher should be as thoroughly prepared as a doctor or lawyer.

"I have too much respect for our profession to settle for any second-rate preparation. At the moment it is extremely poor. The fundamental core of such training should be the behavioural sciences." Prof. Brameld felt insufficient emphasis is now being placed on this area.

"Furthermore all prospective teachers should have at a minimum one year of internship." He drew applause when he termed the present system of practical teacher training "absurd".

Brameld also took the Hall-Dennis Report to task for paying too little attention to adult education.

"This field is just as fundamental to our critical and revolutionary age as any other level. One of the problems of getting the people of Ontario to agree on the need for educational reform is that the majority of parents are ignorant of what is going on in education because they left school many years ago."

Finally, Brameld criticised Hall-Dennis for inadequate treatment of the curriculum which would replace the old one if the Report is implemented.

"We must realize in drawing it up that virtually all aspects of life are open to question. We now know less about ourselves than we know about the atom and how to send a man to the moon. The entire curriculum must be a controversial curriculum, nothing must be taught as a final truth.

"Everything which we teach must be concerned with the future of man. We must challenge our young people to relate to this, to the problem of the fulfillment of man," he said.

"Teachers are now scared to death of controversial issues such as politics, religion and sex, that in the midst of a sexual revolution, sex education has only begun." If education is to deal with the problems of man we are being hypocritical if we don't recognize that reproduction is only part of sex education."

Part of the unrest in education can be traced to the outdated hierarchical structures of the schools, which must be radically overhauled, he said.

He also found fault with the concept of autonomy for individual schools. If this were to happen, he said, some schools would fall far behind others.

Larry Cherns, another College of Education student, praised the report for recommending short courses for parents and others on child development as related to schooling. "Students are more cognizant than their parents — which fact is part of the underlying cause of the so-called "generation gap."

Frank Balmer, principal of William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute in Downsview said that "under such a system, the good students

Proponents and critics of the Ontario government's Hall-Dennis Report on education closed head on at a teach-in held at the College of Education Saturday.

More than 600 teachers, students and administrators from the Toronto area attended the full day of sessions. Complete proceedings were taped and will be published by the College.

Sterility still possible despite report

By GEOFF MEGGS

At the second session some speakers termed the report impractical and Utopian, others hailed it as the beginning of the end for the "subtle fascism" in the present system.

"It is no more restrictive to say that there must be grades, marks, examination, and prescribed courses of study than it is to say that there must not be any of these," said Dr. J. R. H. Morgan a special assistant to U of T president Claude Biswell.

Dr. Morgan attributed the conservatism of his remarks to old age, a desire to show both sides, and the fact that his opinions were his own and honest.

"One might adopt every one of the recommendations and still have a very sterile and structured type of learning situation," he charged.

Dr. Morgan was supported in his criticism by Joan Morse, Head of History at

Report will survive only as myth and social poetry: J.O. O'Neill

By BARB WITT

"If the Hall-Dennis Report is going to survive it is going to survive as myth and social poetry," J.O. O'Neill, associate professor of Sociology at York University said at the fourth session.

"Our first responsibility is to protect children from the world, second to protect children from ourselves, and third to grow old together," he continued.

"What the report has done is to set up a straw man and then attack him," insisted Robert Saunders, assistant secretary of the Ontario Secondary School Teacher's Federation.

He also expressed disagreement with the child-centered concept of education put forth by the report, and pointed to the importance of the subject matter in determining what is taught

M. F. Grapko, head of the Institute of Child Study said the report should be more thoroughly researched, citing the instance of Saskatchewan which is now having second thoughts about its ungraded schools.

But Hank Hedges, a member of the commission who sat in for flu-bound co-author Lloyd Dennis, sounded an optimistic note, saying that in many schools the report has already been implemented, and in many more is in the process of being implemented.

The exciting part of the teach-in came when the audience was invited to participate. Longhaired Lee Tepperman, a student from Forest Hill Collegiate made an impassioned plea for student participation in the decision-making process.

"We were not consulted about the two-week extension," he cried. "We don't want to be protected. Vietnam and Biafra are all around us. We want a new education system now, not 20 years from now."

Ont. schools could be world's best: U.S. prof.

By LARRY HAIVEN

An architectural draftsman severely criticized the Hall-Dennis report at the first session, chiefly for ignoring the technical teacher and student.

Lionel Downes, a student in the technical wing of the College of Education compared the report to new homes given to Indians on reservations.

"They move from their hovels into these big, beautiful homes. But they are not allowed to take power from the power lines and they move all their hovels into the new homes. So they live in these places with no heat and no electricity."

Winston Churchill high school in Hamilton.

"Hall-Dennis offered me
Utopia but did not show me how to get there," said Mrs.
Morse, questioning its practicality.

She questioned the effectiveness of innovations which can be stifled by parents who "call the tune," and the ability of the teacher to be a social, moral and emotional guide as well as an educator.

Speaking in defense of the Report were Dr. Charles Phillips, member of the Hall-
Dennis Committee, and Paul Speck, Head of English at Western Tech.

Dr. Phillips opened an impassioned rebuttal by saying, "the chief result of the report has been to cultivate the satirical gifts of secondary school teachers."

"The teacher would no longer retain information but help and guide," said Phillips.

He described the recommendation calling for student participation in choice of curriculum "a reasonable response to current student revolt which we should be doing anyway."

"Curriculum should be a dynamic process of everything that goes on all the time. There are no courses, but learning experiences," he said.

Speaking more as a critic of present systems than in defense of the Report, Mr.
Speck said, "the Report has made us aware that process, emotion, and initiative from kindergarten to the B.A. are of the essence."

"Many ideas presently current will win the Report slow acceptance," said Speck.

His criticism centred on the strong position of bureaucracy and education for the sake of a degree.

"A subtle fascism constitutes a great deal of what goes on in the institution when the freedom and dignity of the individual must be sacrificed to the system," he stated.

The F.U. of T was formed to provide learning opportunities unavailable at U. of T.: interdisciplinary or contemporary subjects, different approaches to existing subjects, meetings of people from different disciplines.

The most important aspect, however is that of "free": freedom from the marks and exam rat-race, pre-defined curricula, pre-ordained hours of meeting. Some people discovered that they could not work in this unfamiliar atmosphere ("but who will tell me what to do"); some while curious, were incapable of organizing or administering within a group (small wonder); some set up lecture-seminar systems in the traditional manner; others developed different approaches. All these, of course, are learnings.

New hours at New: Gnus now happy

By STEVE COWLEY

New College residents see the recent relaxation in visiting hours as a breakthrough in their struggle with the administration.

Pete Heath (III New), Chairman of the Residence Committee, denied suggestions that students had been intimidated by the administration into accepting watered-down proposals.

Heath describes the committee's initial demand for "open weekends" as a "factual move." Insisting that students were aiming for some kind of compromise in the first place, Heath said yesterday that the administration was forced to make major concessions.

"Any change in visiting hours would have been unthinkable, even two months ago," said Heath.

Bernie Wolos (II Meds) said the Residence Committee at its Jan. 9 meeting informed the administration that unless changes were made, it would no longer fulfill its responsibility of enforcing visiting hours.

Policing of the residence would then be forced on the prefects and dons who, according to Wolos, told Principal Ivey they could not accept the responsibility.

Other New College residents have expressed support for the compromise proposal.

Mike Morgan (I New) called the compromise "a mild victory, and said although residents generally favored completely open weekends the compromise was acceptable because

"that's what they were shooting for in the first place."

Morgan pointed out that 90-95 per cent of the residents opted for an open weekend in a vote last month.

Students disagreed with Dean of Men David Stager's contention that open weekends would have a poor psychological effect on residents.

Commenting on Stager's remark, Heath said simply, "that's crap."

Bill Brunton (II APSC) also felt suggestions that some parents would object to liberal regulations were unfounded.

"At this stage, parents expect us to use our own discretion," he said. "If they haven't been able to influence us by now they never will."

The fight is not over yet. Heath indicated that the committee's next goal is to open residences during the week from noon to midnight. Dean Stager's retirement July 1 may advance the cause, he speculated.

"I'm going to volunteer myself for the job", smiled Heath wryly.

underneath the silky-smooth

Even University of Toronto's silky-smooth administrators show their true colors sometimes, and the latest incident is at New College.

There the students decided they wanted "open weekends" so women could stay overnight. Administrators Principal D. G. Ivey and Dean David Stager decided this wouldn't do and beat the Residence Committee down to a 3:30 curfew for female visitors.

The question is, why have a curfew at all? The students didn't want one (if that matters), there isn't any more noise or inconvenience having women in the residence at 3:30 than, say, 4:30, and the college opens again about 9 a.m. so the curfew applies to only five hours.

For the same reasons, the administrator's excuse that an open weekend would be bad for the college's image is sheerest hypocrisy unworthy of anyone in a position of power. But while we're sure this small-mindedness is quite genuine, there is another reason.

By imposing a curfew of 3:30 the administration has reinforced two very important principles:

- obedience to authority, a principle carefully implanted from kindergarten and still religiously followed at university;

- — that students are incompetent to make decisions regarding their own lives. If Ivey and Stager admitted students could control their sex lives without interference, they might have to admit students could control their academic lives as well. This would be hell for bad teachers and administrators because they'd be ignored.

Now, Ivey and Stager undoubtedly thought they were imposing their curfew for the good of the students, and they probably weren't consciously implementing the principles.

But, then, the unconscious always has been the master of petty men.

chicken and egg

After the teach-in on the Hall Dennis report, a teacher at the College of Education told one of our reporters that the enrollment of the College had doubled in the last year.

Why? Because of the scarcity of jobs. Students go into teaching because there is nothing else to do. He also told the reporter that there were certain people in his class that were "out to get somebody, and that somebody will be the students."

When asked why the students at the College just weren't interested in the philosophy of education or other related topics, he answered, "If you'll allow me to be frank, it's just the kind of person we get coming into teaching. They have absolutely no idea why they are teaching. They don't care."

Students in the audience expressed impatience with the implementation of the report. We are faced with the question of "How can we most quickly and best bring about reform in our schools? Which comes first, the chicken or the egg?"

The College of Education and the various Teachers' Colleges could be time bombs. The teachers, after learning about the new kind of education would go into the schools and explode. This is the crux of the whole problem.

But with the teacher-training methods now, and the kind of person who is drawn into teaching the situation seems hopeless. The Hall-Dennis report, if implemented without this drastic overhaul in teacher-education will be almost useless.

Principal power is a well-established fact in Ontario schools. The principal decides which course in education his school will take, obtains approval from his local board of education, and then hires and fires teachers accordingly. A reactionary principal can make implementation of the report almost impossible, especially if the teachers do not challenge his authority.

The report can't be dropped into schools without the radical education of teachers beforehand.

Not many of the future teachers were at the teach-in on Saturday.

MISSIVES

reply to harriet kideckel

I read with interest your reply to my open letter to Dr. Bissell, and I wish to clarify several points.

You state that a non-obstructive sit-in is not a threat of physical force. I stated that occupying a building to which one does not have total, unlimited access (i.e. that one does not own outright) is force. When a gunman occupies your living room, or a student occupies a building, whether he gets in your way or not, he is still initiating force against you.

You stated that most students support the students in power. This unfortunately may be quite true. However, I do not accept a morality dictated by numbers. The Nuremberg decisions (and all anti-war protests) are based on the premise that morality is not determined by popular opinion. A great philosopher once said that even if only one man in a society is possessed of the truth, he constitutes a majority of one.

Your discussion on the basis of freedom is interesting. You state that the basis of a free society is not a community where force or the threat of force is not permitted? You do not expand on this assertion, so I shall expand on mine.

Freedom is the ability to take any action an individual chooses, provided he does not injure any other individual. This state is established by prohibiting the use of force.

When you talk about apartment buildings, you are talking not about freedom, but about the problem of equality and property rights. This question, liberty vs equality, is unfortunately too large a subject to discuss in a short letter.

To restate my point, I simply hold that surrendering to the threat of force, of any kind, is a dangerous precedent.

Finally, in reference to your statement that I might find the university oppressive, I am not entirely clear to what you are referring.

If you are referring to the status quo, I can only say that I do not find a situation oppressive where no one is permitted to use force against me or anyone else.

If you are referring to possible future developments in the direction you obviously desire, I totally agree with you, and I thank you for confirming my prognosis.

"erroneous interpretations"

Please allow me to correct the erroneous interpretation placed by the Varsity (10/1/69) on the openness of the Graduate Council meetings. This interpretation was due to poor Council minutes and to your reporter not checking the facts with any Graduate Council member.

Vice-President Sirluck's motion states: "Be it further resolved that visitors may not participate in the proceedings of Council, but this resolution shall not be construed to limit the right of the Chairman, by pre-arrangement, to invite persons to address Council."

President Bissell interpreted this motion as requiring visitors to give notice to him in writing of a desire to speak. He would then "invite" them to speak during the relevant debate. Thus a visitor (graduate, undergraduate, faculty, public, newspaper reporter, etc.) can hand President Bissell a slip of paper stating his wish to speak at 4:09 p.m.

(but not at 4:11 p.m.) for a meeting beginning at 4:10 p.m. to fulfill the intent of the motion.

I would like to draw your attention to the next Graduate Council meeting on January 21, 4:10 p.m., Council Chamber of the Galbraith Building. Two topics of particular interest to graduate students will be discussed. It is proposed in Division III (Physical Sciences) to relax the language requirements, with departments having the choice of abolishing the exams entirely. Also the G.S.U. is proposing a relaxation of the ten hour work rule for graduate students in residence.

If any graduate students wish to address Council on these topics, they can get in touch with me (928-2391, 927-8915) so that the necessary formalities are carried out.

SAC urges student support of Peterboro Examiner pickets

The Students Administrative Council yesterday called on U of T students to join picket lines at the strike-bound Peterborough Examiner this week.

At an executive meeting SAC passed a motion urging students to join this week's attempt by Ontario students to stop the paper from publishing Wednesday, Thursday and Friday.

Organizers of the Peterborough Strike Committee hope to attract 500 student pickets from Ontario universities to join the lines outside the Examiner building in an attempt to persuade non-striking printers and pressmen to honor the lines.

Twenty reporters and editors have been on strike since early November against a contract offering them a minimum wage lower than they received before Thomson Newspapers took over the Examiner last spring.

They also want wage parity with Examiner printers and pressmen, time and a half for overtime, and guarantees against transfers to non-union Thomson newspapers. The Examiner reporters recently formed a local of the Toronto Newspaper Guild, which is throwing its support behind the strike.

Negotiations between strikers and the Toronto-based Thomson Organization are virtually non-existent. Thomson's men, who are anti-union, have refused even to talk with the newspaper guild.

Strike organizers hope that enough students will go to Peterborough Wednesday to Friday to stop the paper from publishing. In two previous attempts police made 17 arrests and the newspaper went out on schedule.

Students will be bussed to Peterborough the night before they are to join the lines in order to become familiar with picket-line tactics and with reasons for the Peterborough student-worker alliance. Between crucial line times—a few hours in the morning, at noon, and in the late afternoon—the strike committee will provide seminars and speakers.

Buses will leave from 91 St. George at 8 p.m. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday nights, returning the next evening.

Students end St. Lawrence strike

CORNWALL — (Special) A secret agreement between student leaders and administrators at the St. Lawrence College of Applied Arts and Technology Friday ended a three-day student strike over dismissals of faculty members.

A student spokesman said after the talks that "until such time that an investigation proves it is not warranted, we will support the administration and give it our fullest confidence."

About one-fifth of the 500 students at the college participated in the boycott of classes.

considers position of students and staff in U of T structure

Theoretical arguments for an equal student voice in university government have been rejected by U of T President Claude Bissell and faculty representatives on the Commission on University Government, splitting the student commissioners from the faculty and administration after only four meetings.

The rejection came near the end of a two and a half hour debate Friday, exploring the role of students at all levels of the university structure. The need for such representation was accepted by all commissioners, but they could not agree on the degree of student participation in the upper levels.

"The student cannot be expected to bring the same wisdom and experience to bear as a professor," maintained Dr. Bernard Etkin of the Institute of Aerospace Studies. "The commitment of the student is transient."

Student member D'Arcy Martin responded that "experience can develop into a lively sense of the possible and become inertia."

He criticised the image of the student as a hobo who no stake in the university community.

"Many students have such a stake they simply haven't time to let their feelings be known," objected Dr. J. S. Thompson.

Members agreed professional students should be given more time to take an interest in the political life of the university and society.

"In an unequal structure we are dealing with an undemocratic university," said Bob Rae, (IV UC) speaking in support of equal representation at all levels.

"Dr. Etkin's model university would be run by men all over 80," he went on. "We must regard the students as citizens in a community."

Rae urged the use of political analogies in developing a model of the university.

President Claude Bissell countered that the idea of a political university was a recent one not in tune with the traditional outlook of "an institution concerned with the advancement of learning."

Dr. Thompson also objected on the grounds that decision-making would become a process of political expediency.

"Once you accept representation why put students at a numerical and psychological disadvantage?" demanded Rae.

Before closing debate the Commission discussed bicameral and unitary systems of government.

VARSITY MISFITS? LAURENT AND FIELD BELIE SIZE

By PHIL BINGLEY

Athletes in various sports are often stereotyped as to style of play because of their physical size. But following Varsity Blues' 8-3 victory over University of McMaster Marlins Friday night at Varsity Arena, two players have emerged as non-conformists to their particular stereotype.

Blues' defenceman Dave Field probably the biggest player in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League and certainly the kingsized model in coach Tom Watt's crew, is rated a fine defensive hody-checker and a hard and accurate shooter. Handling the puck is just not supposed to be his Dave's bag.

Yet Friday evening, there was Field mesmerizing Marlin defenders with his stick-handling finesse and delicate body fakes. By the end of the game, Dave had set up four goals, (he also had four assists in Wednesday's 15-2 win over Guelph) played his defense position flawlessly, and won acclaim from most of the 4300 fans in attendance as the star performer of the evening.

At the other end of the scale is centre Paul Laurent, one of the smaller members of Varsity and the SIHL. Noted for his speed, agility and puck control, Paul is not supposed to be at his best when play gets rough. So who do you think has never backed away from an opponent or shyed away from mob scenes in the corners during his four years in the league?

And, who do you think came back after being decked by a high stick to the chin (the damage was a seven-stitch cut) in the second period to score his second goal of the night and his 12th in Blues' last four league starts? Mr. Laurent of course!

The game itself went pretty well as expected with McMaster showing little poise in their effort to upset Varsity. Blues were not as sharp as they might have been but considering the poor condition of the ice surface — Watt said after the second period, "It looks like everyone is skating in sand out there — their eight goal output was more than acceptable."

John Ritchie, who made his second start of the schedule and first home appearance, matched Laurent with two goals. Bob McClelland, John Wright (he also had two assists), Brian St. John and Gord Cunningham had Blues' other markers.

John Smalling, Marlins' best skater throughout, was also their top scorer with his pair. Don Locke had the other McMaster goal.

Blues outshot Marlins 58-26 over three periods and were assessed nine of the 15 penalties handed out by referee Zip Thompson.

NOTES. . . Three stars were Dave Field, Paul Laurent and John Wright. Blues have a hectic week coming up with three league games scheduled. Waterloo will be at Varsity Arena on Wednesday evening to challenge Blues for first place. Warriors have lost only once this season and a win would move them back into a first place tie with Varsity. . .

Thursday evening, Blues are at Western for their third tilt of the season with Mustangs while on Saturday afternoon, Coach Watt and his players will visit University of Windsor Lancers.

Varsity Blues remained undefeated in local action with weekend exhibition victories over Ryerson and Osgoode of the Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association. The Ryersonians were felled 82-67 on Friday night, while the Owls, currently in first place in the OIAA, tumbled 81-64 on Saturday afternoon.

John McManus's charges get their first taste of league competition on Wednesday night with a game against Gryphons in Guelph.

The Osgoode encounter was marked in the later stages by the type of heavy hitting usually reserved for the hockey arena. As Blues, who were never behind in the game, began to widen their margin, the larger Owls turned on the muscle. The climax was a full-fledged fistfight between former Western star Marv Morten and Blues' Jay MacDonald.

Coach McManus gave each player ample floor time, and the team balance was reflected in the scoring statistics. Bruce Dempster and John Hadden contributed 14 points apiece, while Dale Crouter and Larry Trafford each had 12.

Volleyballer Jay MacDonald showed himself to be a capable rebounder, and guard Peter Burton impressed with his ball-handling skill. Both players should be important additions to the team.

Stan Raphael led Owls with 19 points, followed by Sol Sloher, SIBL leading scorer last season, with 17.

Ross MacNaughton and John Hadden led Blues to their victory over Ryerson Rams, netting 14 points apiece and collecting a range of rebounds. Bruce Dempster added 11 points.

Rams were helped by Dave Oxley with 20 and Gary Balogh with 18 points.

Balls: Comic relief in the Osgoode match was provided by footballer Al Irwin who leaned on Mark Slater during one foul-shooting episode, and only to crash to the floor when Slater stepped aside. . . John Hadden now looks sinister at centre court with Bill Russell goatee and wire-frame glasses. . . also prominent for Osgoode were former Blue Ron Kimel and Varsity football great Gerry Sternberg. . . Blues first home game is at York this Saturday against Western, time 3 p.m.

And where were you Saturday afternoon while Varsity fencing Blues were effortlessly effusing efficiency at Hart House against Royal Military College from ("I feel no pain") Kingston, and it being their first home meet of the season, too?

Little did you know as you spun oolhadiolhada for the umpteenth time that our heroic fencers were felling the beleaguered caddies, 18-9.

And you missed three win performances by Ron Rice and Richard Wong in foil and Rowland Griffin and Irv Snitman in epee, plus two win displays by Martin Peros and Martin Moskovits in sabre. Newcomers Alex Lee and Steve Jorgensen (foil), and Andrew Beney (sahre) were none the worse for wear, improving with each bout as the afternoon wound its glorious way to enriching conclusion.

Residence is not an island: David Stager

By ALF CHAITON

"I was once extremely idealistic, but I have become more and more pragmatic. It's not that I dropped these ideals, but I began to realise that many of the ideals I believed in were wrong."

The speaker: David Stager, 31-year-old Dean of Men at New College, who plans to end his three-year career as an administrator and go back to academic work after this term.

Dean Stager is presently in the middle of a controversy over women's visiting hours at the college.

He complains that the Residence Committee didn't really want unrestricted weekend hours, but only wanted to establish the principle of deciding such questions by themselves. Last Wednesday the committee demanded abolition of all restrictions on weekend visiting, but agreed to a compromise Thursday night.

"Their basic assumption is that no one is affected by the rules except members of the residence," said Stager.

Based on this assumption, the Committee is right. But I don't believe that's valid.

"A residence is not an island, but an integral part of the university, as well as social, community. On this assumption, no residence can make rules on its own, rules that affect the rest of the

MEETING TONIGHT

SAC reconsiders President's Council

By BRIAN JOHNSON

The Students' Administrative Council may refuse seats on the President's Council, even under conditions of openness, if an executive suggestion passes at tonight's SAC meeting.

The executive decided Friday to carry on no further negotiations with the administration over the question of the President's Council, until SAC has undertaken a complete review of its position on university government.

Only eight members of the executive were at the meeting, and the body was split down the middle on the issue. Steve Langdon, Bob Barkwell (III Meds), Mark Freiman (IV UC), and George Biggar (III Law) opposed accepting the seats under any condition. Don Ross (IV Trin), Toni MacNamara (IV SMC), Norm Schachar (III Meds), and Bob Rae (IV UC) were in favor of accepting the seats.

After a heated debate, Rae broke the deadlock by abstaining from the vote.

The executive immediately enforced the new policy when it turned down an invitation by President Claude Bissell to meet with him yesterday.

If SAC accepts the executive's new policy of non-negotiation, it will not be a complete reversal of its former stand.

This summer Dr. Bissell offered SAC seven seats on the council, an unofficial long-term policy advisory body.

At its summer meeting SAC decided to accept the seats only if three conditions were met:

- that the President's Council meetings be open;
- that the number of student representatives be equal to the number of faculty representatives;

- that SAC decide how to choose the student members.

Although these conditions might be met, other factors have cropped up.

Langdon says he was not aware before that there were such a large number of administrators on the Council. The seven student members would be outnumbered by 14 administrators and five faculty. Although 11 of those administrators are termed "ex officio," they still are voting members.

"It would be very difficult for students to get their positions adopted by the Council," said Langdon. "The main thing you spend time on is working on administrative hang-ups instead of principles."

Langdon said the policy of non-negotiation resulted from a general reaction to SAC's experience with the administration last term.

He also feels that the Commission on University Government has assumed much of SAC's role in pressing for changes in the formal structure of university government. The President's Council could be an irrelevant body under a new system.

When President Bissell originated the Council in 1965, he regarded it as a possible prototype for a wider representation on the Board of Governors.

"The great urgency in university government now is to make sure that decisions are made carefully and with a comprehensive background of information," he said in 1965. "This means the continuous involvement of academics in these decisions."

Students would play no part in Dr. Bissell's original concept of the Council.

If the staff and students are integrated into a new governing body next year, the SAC President Steve Langdon predicts a new governing structure for the University of Toronto by next year. He is optimistic that student members of the Commission on University Government will achieve their goals.

"There is no doubt that within a year we will have a position on the supreme governing body of the university," he says, "whatever that body may be. And the chances are excellent for getting 50 per cent staff-student representation on that body."

President's Council would be obsolete under Dr. Bissell's definition of its function.

If tonight's SAC meeting accepts Langdon's approach, a total review of SAC's university government policy would precede any further negotiation over the Council. It would also provide a focus of discussion for SAC's formal submission to CUG.

The SAC meeting takes place at 7 p.m. in the Victoria College Union Building.

community, which doesn't have any say in the decisions.

"For example, suppose the residents decide to have common-rooms on each floor, and being fairly well-to-do, vote to raise residence fees by $50 to build them. I would probably say no to this, because the increase may mean that some students who want to live in New College will not be able to because they can't afford the extra cost. That's what I mean when I say that the residence is not an island."

He explained that the reason for having a curfew was to keep New College quiet, so that those who wanted to work could do so. Late hours generally mean noisy parties with records and loud conversations, he said.

The Committee has promised to keep down the noise after 1:30 p.m., but the Dean expressed the view that they hadn't done a very satisfactory job of enforcement up to the present time and didn't expect them to improve much.

Another reason for a curfew, he explained, is that the university residence is a public concern, as distinct from Rochdale, and therefore must be concerned with the general norms of society.

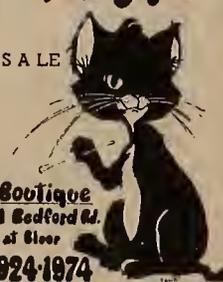

"We should be last, not first, in changing public norms of social behaviour."

Dean Stager feels that the responsibility of a dean is "the integration of residents and non-residents," and "the development of a college life."

The most difficult aspect of the job is that the dean will be "constructively critical" of other administrative sectors on behalf of students, and vice versa, said Stager. He also has to be co-operative in dealing with each.

"I sometimes feel like a bruised buffer," he concluded with a smile.

Carillon still alive despite continuing student fees crisis

REGINA (CUP) — The Carillon, student newspaper at the University of Saskatchewan's Regina campus, continues to publish today despite the fact that the administration still refuses to collect this term's student union fees.

Student presidents from both University of Saskatchewan campuses are to meet administration heads today to work out a method for settling the fees crises which has spread to both schools.

Friday the two student councils decided to press for written contracts directing the Board of Governors to collect their fees and turn them over to the union unconditionally.

The action was at first limited to Regina, where students last week voted by referendum to demand the administration collect their union fees. The demand was in response to the Board's Dec. 31 announcement that it would not collect union fees at Regina this term because of council support of the Carillon.

Today's meeting will include ment of student loans. The agency has nabbed 60 per cent of the delinquent 2,400 who owe a total of $2,228,000. It has made a bundle in that work since the organization charges five per cent on debts collected within the first 14 days with increasing rates as time goes by. It once chased a debtor for 12 years.

Regulations stipulate that repayment of loans must begin six months after a student leaves school.

involve student presidents Dave Sheard of Regina and Eric Olson of Saskatoon, and Principals W. Riddell of Regina and R. W. Begg of Saskatoon.

The Regina student council has said it will negotiate only how and when the board will begin collecting fees. Should the Board be unable to collect fees for this semester, it will expect a Board grant to cover the losses.

The council, demanding the Board session be open, says it will not discuss the Carillon with the administration. It has prepared a five-year contract for Board ratification.

At Saskatoon, the push for a contractual agreement is complicated by the fact that Olson's council is not incorporated. Olson is expected to arrange the incorporation similar to Regina's as soon as possible.

Meetings on the Board's action have uncovered some ill feeling toward The Carillon among students but they have let the matter drop until the issue of fees collection is settled.

What did you learn in school today?

By ERROL YOUNG

If you continue to study psychology at this university, you will be forced to specialize until you lose sight of your original goals, a graduate teaching assistant told 500 students taking Psychology 100-120 Monday.

Richard Tiberious started his special lecture by saying he realized most students in the course felt somewhat disillusioned with the subject of psychology because the course was too experimental and "did not relate to life."

"How could a prof who is running rats in a maze in the basement of Sidney Smith remember that the reason he started to take psychology was to cure his uncle Charley or solve the problem of juvenile delinquency?" Tiberious asked the packed lecture hall.

As he sees it people take psychology for two main reasons.

"Many students are taking this course in order to avoid taking English or history."

Others have a more progressive attitude and are interested in studying mental disorders or theories about the meaning of knowledge or of good and evil, he said.

But since the serious student has to make a series of choices he finds himself streamed into more specialist branches of study.

First he must choose whether he wants to take a scientific approach or a nonscientific one as in the study of art, literature or music.

If he chooses the scientific way and takes psychology he must learn the precise jargon involved and therefore sacrifice the impact and beauty found in art.

Then he must further restrict himself by choosing one of the many theories in the discipline he wants to use as his basis for further study.

He must also decide whether he wants to work with men or animals.

After making hundreds of choices the researcher loses sight of his first motives in taking psychology: the eventual cure to Uncle Charley's kleptomania.

According to Tiberious, most experimenters forget about the other half of their science, the relationship between their work and the whole fund of human knowledge.

The regular lecturer, assistant professor Martin Wall said yesterday he agreed with what Tiberious said generally but he could not comment further since he had not attended the lecture.

A random sampling of students in the class was asked what they thought of the talk. Most of them enjoyed it since it was a nice break from their regular lectures.

WINTER UOFT CARNIVAL

"I think the students should only be allowed to select the faculty, if the faculty are allowed to select the students."

-Pierre Elliott Trudeau, to Canadian students in London

it'll mean no lunch money ...

What kind of game is the Commission on University Government playing?

After deciding that all the meeting of the Commission were to be open to the public and to the press it seems that the Commission doesn't want the public or the press to know everything that's going on.

The Varsity approached the Commission to obtain copies of reports that CUG was studying, all in the interests of presenting accurate reports of what they were doing.

An interesting run-around then developed. It seems that the Commission has decided that all reprints and reports that are in the "public domain" will not be given out. Reports that are prepared by the Commission will be, if the Commission feels that the public should see them.

A case in point was the Elkin Model. This was supposed to be a rough outline from which the members could direct their discussions on the structure of the university.

If the Model were nothing more than that why, gentlemen, has it not been made available to the public? It was a report prepared by a member of the Commission.... wasn't it?

Robin Ross, secretary to the Commission, has said that the Commission is now spending $500 per month on xerox and other types of printing. At last night's meeting it was decided that two researchers were needed, and that a part-time reader was needed.

It doesn't sound like money is that tight.

In the interests of informing the public of the Commission's work the Varsity would like to offer 20 cents every now and then to pay for xerox copies of Commission papers.

We're only students, but we think that we can scrape together that much.

wrong track?

High School students may be on the wrong track in threatening to strike if their school year isn't cut by two weeks.

The important issue here is not that Education Minister William Davis has lengthened their school year, but that high school students were not consulted in the change.

Instead of striking for a shortened year, high school students should be demanding a vote in such decisions so that the same situation won't come up next year.

They should also aim for a say in the content of their courses, in picking their teachers, in every facet of their education.

Arguments (such as that put forth by the Globe and Mail) that students are getting an extra two weeks of "education" are ludicrous. Anyone who has been through high school knows the lie of that.

But there is no reason why schools can't stay open on a voluntary basis those two weeks, or the rest of the summer for that matter. Then students who wanted the extra two weeks could go, the rest could quit.

Varsity Awards

This week's "We're Not Madest Award" goes to United States president Lyndon B. Johnson who told Congress last night:

"The war (between Israel and the Arab States) is a threat to every one of us, and the entire world as well."

The Varsity Windfields Farm Award for Bullshit goes to Dr. J. R. H. Morgan, special assistant to U of T president Claude Bissell, for his memorable line during a debate on the Hall-Dennis Report:

"It is no more restrictive to say that there must be grades, marks, examinations and prescribed courses than it is to say that there must not be any of these."

COMMENT

Student power: solution or problem?

By ROBERT VAN DER LINDE (SGS)

The recent editorial "Student Power — Who Won?" is a clear expression of students' frustration, not with the failures of the university, but with their own inability to meet the challenge of education. They desire a 'system' in which the student makes his own rules, does whatever little he feels like doing, and evaluates his own performance. This is a system, in fact, where everyone, regardless of what he does or does not do, obtains a university degree. Clearly the students who seriously believe this to be the solution to education would be much better off staying at home, setting their own courses and typing up their own graduation diplomas.

Let us examine the "areas we should hit" in greater detail.

Point I: 1) Eliminating evaluation of students removes the only means of checking whether the student leaves the university with any more knowledge than he came with.

2) A professor does not have unlimited power over his students, nor would he exercise this power if he had it. The students who believe this to be true are those who are thoroughly convinced of their own proven or impending failure.

3) The only ones corrupting the real purpose of education are the students themselves. No student is forced to restrict his learning to the content of required courses. Only the poorest of students find that they do not have time to pursue non-course subjects. The fact is that most students are generally more interested in other non-course activities.

4) It puzzles me that there is any concern over employers at all. It is most doubtful that any employer would even consider hiring a graduate of an institution based on the 'we-do-whatever-we-feel-like' system in the first place.

Point II: Only a student completely obsessed with his own brilliance (or with a severe inferiority complex) would claim: a) that daddy never knows best, b) that he already knows more about the content and requirements of a discipline than his professors, and c) that he is already an equal or better partner in the learning process. Such attempts to belittle faculty only prove that a great mental gap does exist. By degrading faculty and administration the radical students are indeed creating enough ill feeling toward students to prevent any form of friendly cooperation. The fact that students have not always obtained what they asked for is more due to the unreasonable demands than to the uncooperativeness of faculty and administration.

Point III: To allow students an equal voice in hiring and firing of faculty assumes the same degree of brilliance already covered under point II. Only students whose knowledge, judgement and experience equal that of deans and department heads would qualify as equal partners in these rather vital decisions. Frankly, I have yet to see the student who meets these requirements.

Two additional facts completely discourage giving students equal power in running the university. First, the distribution of student votes heavily favours those students least qualified to control the university. Approximately 70 percent of the student body is in 1st and 2nd year. Secondly, the prevailing attitude, not limited to the university, is that opinions which do not express a desire for total change are trite and old-fashioned. This radical attitude takes the place of efforts to make some real improvements in university education. It has been adequately proven that faculty and administration will listen to suggestions and, if plausible, implement them.

Clearly, the power movement is not concerned with educational improvement, but with a hunger for power prompted by a juvenile frustration at having to work to accomplish something.

It is no longer satisfactory to ask

"Can it be built?"

The engineer must ask "why?"

This article is a paper written for the Engineering Congress at the University of Toronto Feb. 14-16. The authors are H. Jacobsen (III Electrical), R. Garrock (II Civil), R. Kanko (IV Chem), R. T. Lake (II Eng. Sci.), W. Richardson (III Mech).

To facilitate any discussion on the Engineer and his moral conscience it is first necessary to discuss the engineer's role in Society and the constraints within which he works. In doing this the bounds of this so-called moral conscience will become self evident. Society is all based upon the profit motive — the engineer is no exception. The government, the engineer and the private company are all responsible for where a product is used, how it is used, when it is used and why it is used.

Can the government impose rules on the Engineer? Even though the engineer is only one part of a long chain of product development from science to the shop or factory, he holds the greatest responsibility for application to humanity — design and implementation. It is no longer satisfactory to ask "Can it be built?", the engineer must ask "why?"

The whole artistic basis of engineering today appears to be the moral of "progress is good". We cannot accept this without a complete examination of the implications of so bold and broad a statement.

We, as engineers, must question the long range results of what we do in the realms of social and environmental development. Is something being done because it maximizes profits, is more marketable and seems to be good? It's new! It's progress! Therefore it has to be right, because "progress is good!". But is "progress" good? General Electric seems to think so — do we? The whole artistic basis of engineering today appears to be the moral of "progress is good". We cannot accept this without a complete examination of the implications of so bold and broad a statement.

Technology seems hell bent on replacing human action with machine action and automata, but where is technology's overall goal? Are we in a blind race to nowhere? Technology is using all of our natural environment and disproducing something as yet undecided — either a machine controlled environment or a man controlled environment. This is being done without consideration of effects or goals.

The goals should be towards a magic automatic environment without a clumsy, obtrusive middle man (i.e. machines). Magic and automata have fascinated man since time began for him. Must we technicize man and human values on the way to our never to be achieved ideal? Must we deplete our resources and the natural beauty of the earth? Must we lose our closeness to and our contact with nature? It is our duty to see that this does not happen.

We must not become mere tools of technology. We have to maintain the human relationship in our efforts.

Basic resources of water and air are being and have been polluted with noise, chemicals and waste by ignorance and now by maximum profit margins. This is now causing great public outcry and engineers who have been lax in controlling pollution must now investigate problems not solely motivated by profit, but also by investment in the future.

We must investigate technological interfaces such as physical versus psychological and we must put forth a great effort now. Noise is getting near the danger levels in our large cities. The United States has polluted most of their water supplies and are now turning to Canada, without a real effort to revamp their own resources.

After the raping of forests near row seeding is done as "reforestation". This is a very simple, efficient design, but not a very natural one. In nature there is a relation between things that are alive. We seem to be losing this, and worship more and more our own inanimate creations. Parkland, such as Ontario's great Algonquin Park, should not be lumbered. Engineers should not allow their equipment to be used in such undertakings.

Land and mineral resources are being destroyed solely for profit (the proposed enormous strip coal mining operation in British Columbia). Insecticides are also poisoning the land and animals. No detailed projection of the results of such things as man's spraying techniques has been undertaken.

The basic values and goals of human beings are: spiritual interaction with other objects; emotional interaction with other people; a happy, contented family and home life. Somehow we seem to have drifted from this environment. With our overall goal of technology a return to the original familiarity of small groups of people will be allowed, but everyone will be involved over the entire globe. Will it be the same or will it be completely artificial?

McLuhan illustrates the best of this idea very well with his multi-dimensional man. A man not controlled by his technology, and living in many societies at the same time. We must not become mere tools of technology. We have to maintain the human relationship in our efforts. Human experience of feelings and emotionalism must not be corrupted and must be kept personal.

The only constraints on the engineer from outside his own self can be government legislation in such fields as pollution control and war materials. It would be up to the various professional engineering groups to make sure such legislation was obeyed. It is to be hoped that engineers within the professions should actively attempt to develop such attitudes that the engineer would not allow himself to pollute resources or utilize and destroy resources without considering the effects of his actions.

Ideally, war is completely morally indefensible. However, the only way to prevent war is to have all those making weapons of any kind to stop producing arms for any government.

In the reality of our world the engineer is only a tool of political systems with respect to war. The idea that the individual is powerless has so far been very popular. Nothing has been done! We must start. Whatever we determine will only be successful if it is universally applied, and thus we speak in terms of universality.

The engineer, faced with working on and developing war materials at his job has only one reason for acceptance — if his very existence is threatened (as in World Wars). Universality is allowed today because the world has shrunk — has it come to the point where a universal effort to end wars is feasible? Not yet. As socially aware engineers however we should do what we can towards this goal — in real and ideal situations, there should be the same moral standard as the ideal.

By JULIE WIERZBICKI

Once upon a time was birthed Brenda the Broad, out of her mommy's womb. Well, actually was birthed a child, whose mum and da-da, out of their vast prenatal no-knowledge labelled this childlike substance, Brenda.

Brenda was birthed and reared in a lovely sloburban household by lovey-dovey sloburban pregnants, whose sole concerns were muddled-class virtues — virginity, marriage, a gude job and mo' paie, and lots and lots and lots of muddled-class education. Brenda, an unwitting accomplice to her socialization, was slowly but surely learning all the good and righteous facts of life.

What did our heroine learn? You bet! She learned to luv her mommy and daddy, to get compassion and understanding from the mummy, to respect the authority (read "power") of the daddy, at school — spool — stool (read "shit"), Brenda was given dollies to ply with, girlies to cry with, and boyies to be scared of.

Why was Brenda 'scareded boys? ah! the plot coagulates. You see, when Brendy-bahy became eight ears old, she learned that she should plague with goils, and not with hoils. She learned goils were different from boils. Goils were raised, cultivated, groomed and trimmed to bud into nice, quiet, submissive, obedient, gentle and sweet sugary spice pliable, plastic posies.

On the other foot, boils were taught-to-be or produced-into or socialized-as strong, virile, aggressive, pugnaious and independent tails (as in puppy dogs' tails, of course) inspiring an awesome fearfulness in those of their colleagues upon whom fell the burden of being their help-mates and supportive personnel — GIRLS — for ever and ever. Amen.

Poor Brendy was learned and was burned f-a-a-s-t, f-a-s-t, f-a-s-t, fast! and there weren't nuthin she could DO! She was weaved into the Invisible Bag that her barrents, her leachers, and her so-piety decreed her to be weaved into.

Because Brenda dinna know, and cunna see the Invisible Bagel, she truly believed what her barrents, her leachers and her so-piety decreed were the right things, the proper things, the responsible and mature things. Add to that: the "responsible" actions, the "correct" looks, the "proper" hemline, the "intelligent" talking, wording, mounthing, noising nothing.

Brenda, out of high school, acclimatized and socialized, was prepared to "do something with her life" (read "get married-harried, teach-leach, nurse-curse, or enter the big, bad, bumhling, beaurocratic, banal, husinuss bored-board burld).

Good-luckily, being of muddled-class pregnants, Brenda cudafforda university education (read "more socialization, more propaganda, more mediocrity, more uninspiring disstimulation").

Next weak, weekly I begin to trace Brenda Bright's mte-lite flight into plight at UpTite, denouncing similarly her hassles within her Invisible Bagel. Comc with us bretheren, and unite in joining together, circling around, and stomping through Brenda's cruses at UpTite.

"Varsity distorts facts"

Allow me to correct the injustice done by The Varsity in its recent "editorial" on the change of women's hours at the New College Men's Residence. By the application of what is becoming the only consistent and obvious editorial policy of the Varsity, it has once again distorted the facts beyond all semblance of truth. While it is true that the Residence Committee initially decided to have open weekends and subsequently altered its position after having a meeting with Dr. Ivey and Dean Stager, any "silky-smooth administrators" who "beat the Residence Committee down" are complete fabrications on the part of the Varsity and unjust innuendoes against two well-respected men.

A university is not to be established as a retreat where one may exist in defiance of the rest of society. It's a public institution owing its viability to public funds and is furthermore vulnerable to all opinions and reactions of the community. A college, a university cannot invoke the noble phrases "academic freedom" or "educated enlightenment" to justify an attitude of indifference towards those outside these "hallowed halls". Although one does not have an obligation to succumb to the values of his society, an educated conscience will not allow disregard of such considerations. It was in this spirit that the Residence Committee deliberated.

Thus, without any of the "small mindedness", "hypocrisy", or ulterior motives alleged by your paper, the Residence Committee reached its decision. Although the new hours as stated by the Varsity were correct, this was virtually the only valid statement appearing in Monday's editorial.

To set a deadline of 3:30 a.m. instead of opening the weekend because of "society" is sheer hypocrisy and a submission to the values of one of the meanest sections of society — the hienosed prudes who regularly spill their filth into the letters to the editor columns of the daily newspapers. What happens in New College between the hours of 3:30 and 9 a.m. is nobody's business but your own. Society has no place in the bedrooms of New College or anywhere else for that matter. It is sod and sick to see administrators stoop to this kind of argument to impose their will. Ed.

grape boycott

I would like to commend the Varsity and Liz Willick on the excellent article on Friday about the failure of some parts of the university in supporting the California grape boycott. However, I would like to point out two errors in the story regarding the boycott in general.

First, Toronto is not the fifth largest grape market in North America, it is the third largest. Only New York and Los Angeles consume more California grapes than Toronto. This makes the success of the Toronto boycott crucial to the fate of the farm workers.

Second, the article states that "many stores have stopped selling California grapes — including some of the major chain stores." None of the major chains have stopped selling California Grapes. Steinberg's put a sign over the grape counters expressing sympathy with the boycott. Loblaw's took a survey of customers, but, in spite of the fact that about 80 percent of the replies were in favor of the boycott, Loblaw's has decided to continue carrying the grapes. Dominion has not cooperated with the boycott in any way, and in the week before Christmas, several Dominion store managers called the police to prevent peaceful picketing and leafleting at the stores.

I think it is important that everyone is informed of the failure of the stores in Toronto to respond in any meaningful way to moral appeals to support the farm workers in California. The success of the strike is important for all the farm workers in the United States and Canada, and has received support from many church and Labour organizations.

"make me sick"

This year York University has had to turn away seven hundred qualified applicants, and other Ontario universities are finding themselves equally crowded.

In my class here at the University of Toronto there is a significant number of foreign students. Why should Canadians contribute two-thirds of their educational costs while our own young people are being turned away?

In the Dec. 9 issue of the Varsity an article appeared in the centrefold by Brian Johnson concerning the arrest of student pickets in Peterboro. Another article tells of 250 students joining the strike. Don't these students have classes to attend, or are we paying for their education so that they can run all over the country on any little whim they please?

"Student Power" makes me sick!

better late than never

This letter concerns Steve Langdon's review of the Dissecting Academy, Varsity, November 15th. I hope that you will print it.

Steve Langdon deplores "value free" academic rigor and professionalism. Quantitative analysis, says he, strengthens the status quo. What rot!

To argue that rigorous, quantitative analysis is an instrument of reaction because some reactionaries use it is about as logical as to argue that sloppy thinking is progressive because Steve Langdon uses it. Mr. Langdon may eventually tire of simple demagoguery and wish to play God seriously by implementing his nostrums. If he does, he will find the rigorous analytical techniques as useful to him as to any reactionary. The tools really are politically neutral.

Langdon has missed a very basic point of micro economic theory. He evidently thinks the behavioral postulate of optimisation is identical with that of profit maximisation. In fact, the latter is merely a special case of the former. Rigorous academic economics is capable of handling any alternative optimising behavioral postulate that Mr. Langdon or anyone else might care to suggest.

In alleging the dearth of courses on or study of socialist economics at this University, Mr. Langdon speaks again from ignorance. We offer Economics 427, The Economy of the USSR, and Economics 3002, Special Course in the Economics of Socialist Countries. It is not too late for you to enrol, Mr. Langdon, and we will make it as rigorous as you can take.

French gov't sends ticket to former U of T student arrested in summer riots

A vacationing U of T engineer was beaten up and arrested by French riot police, while walking around the block from his hotel in Toulouse last June.

He was hurled into a paddywaggon, questioned, fingerprinted, shackled, and then, still covered in blood, thrown into a cell.

After 60 hours in jail, he was loaded onto a train with other student prisoners and transported to Paris. He had lost 14 pounds in the previous three days.

That may not be your idea of a summer vacation, but that's the way it was with Shelley Goodman last June.

Goodman, now a Brock University economics student, was deported by the French government without being charged, convicted or given any chance to defend himself.

Now the French government has apparently regretted its rash decision and sent Goodman — through the Canadian government — an offer of a free return Toronto-Paris airline ticket, tourist class.

His expulsion from France has also been lifted. Goodman says he gets some "moral satisfaction" from the French government's move, which he estimates will cost them $400.

But he still thinks his experience — while "interesting" — wasn't exactly worth the free trip.

"It wasn't fun getting arrested; it wasn't fun getting beaten up," he says. "It was a terrible experience."

Goodman doesn't know whether the French government's action is part of a general amnesty. He was the only Canadian arrested in France during the June disturbances.

Goodman plans to make use of his gift airline ticket this summer, returning to France for several weeks at the end of August.

"I suppose maybe there is some kind of world justice," he speculated.

He is fairly sure the French gift — which he has been notified of but hasn't yet received — is not a ruse to get him back into the country to face charges.

MONCTON (CUP) — Students at the University of Moncton have forced their administration to stop classes as they continue to hold the science and administration building.

About 125 of the school's 1,600 students moved into the building with food and bedding at midnight Saturday vowing to stay until the Federal or Provincial govern-

Buses for students interested in joining the picket lines outside the Peterborough Examiner will be at the University offices at 91 St. George tonight, Thursday and Friday at 8 p.m. returning the next day at midnight. Accommodation and food will be provided in Peterborough.

HAMILTON (CUP) — up sessions of the senate, its supreme academic body, to McMaster University yesterday became the fifteenth Canadian university to open ment increases grants to their French-speaking school. The students, armed with the building's fire hoses, patrol the centre in 25-man shifts. They say arrangements have been made to replenish their food supplies when necessary and they will hold the building until their demands are granted.

A spokesman said the group is demanding $32-

002,000 during its first five years, and we'll only get $200,000 in the next two years.

The student council and the faculty have both issued statements of support for the students' aims, but have declined comment on the occupation.

The protest is the second shutdown at Moncton in a year. Last February a 17-day boycott of classes was staged to protest increases in tuition fees.

That protest was unsuccessful.

strike for shorter year

By NOEL STECKLEY

Toronto high school students have threatened to strike if Education Minister William Davis does not re- send his order to extend the school year.

The Ontario Union of Students has backed the high school students, and extended some of the demands.

Davis has said that the students won't actually be in school longer, it just seems that way.

A communique from Davis' office states, "that the present school year has not been lengthened, but at 194 days, is in fact four days shorter than the school year 1967-68 which was 198 days."

OUS has accused the government of using the high school students to help reduce the unemployment problem. "One of the functions," OUS says, "of the schools is to keep students off the labor market."

The extended demands suggested by OUS included, "agitation for elimination of tuition fees... organization for a planned, socialized economy, and demand for jobs."

Francis McInerney of Lawrence Park Collegiate, chairman of the newly formed Intercollegiate Students' Council, opposed setting a Jan. 22 strike deadline. He proposed that it might be advisable to suggest the possibility of strikes and walkouts to Davis.

The Davis statement said that, "last year it is fair to state students were out of actual classroom situations more than at any time in the past and this is a fortunate educational development."

He is not conscious of areas to turn to for advice and authorization."

Bissell said he was discussing the presidency itself and not his personal experience. "The power of the president depends on his influence and how he wields it," said faculty member J. E. Hodgkett.

"He is the centre of a series of concentric circles reacting and responding to the forces close to him as well as the periphery," he continued.

All commissioners agreed that the era of the president controlling and shaping the university was over. "He is conscious of being at the confluence of disparate forces," said Dr. Bissell.

more reasonable but stressed it was "not to be reviewed every five years by some students."

Rae and D'Arcy Martin envisaged a more creative aspect to the president's role in initiating new ideas and policies into the community. The Commission also spent a short time discussing the role of administrators.

There was general disagreement on the degree of decision-making power that should be allocated to academic and non-academic administrators.

Martin suggested their ex-officio status in decision-making bodies would suffice but conceded the difficulties in asking men to implement policy they personally had not supported.

"Israel will live de Spitz de Gaulle!" "De Gaulle gets rich at Israel's expense!"

Approximately 300 university students were protesting de Gaulle's recent refusal to send 50 fighter jets and valuable spare parts to Israel which has already paid France $100 million in advance.

U of T and York Hillel members first assembled at Sidney Smith Hall at noon yesterday and marched to the Consulate at Bay and Front Streets. They were joined there by Jewish secondary school students.

After singing Hatikvah, the Israeli National Anthem, the students unfurled a large banner bearing the words "Israel" in Hebrew and in English, and began to march in a circle in front of the Consulate. Proprietors of neighboring stores watched with interest as the students sang Israeli folk songs to the accompaniment of a spirited York science student, read a letter of condemnation in English. Sima Godfrey (New) read the document in French.

"De Gaulle's action encourages Arab belligerency and strengthens their hope to destroy Israel," Clarfield read. "He acts with anger and hostility about the destruction of Arab metal while he is silent when Jewish blood is shed."

"This reminds us of the callous indifference to the plight of the Jews in Hitler Europe."

But Clarfield, organizer of the demonstration, Abie Pesses (SGS), president of Hillel, and Alan Rubin (IV UC) vice-president of Hillel, encouraged resistance from the Consulate secretary when they tried to present the letter to the French Consul.

She said that Consul Marcelle Campana had refused entrance not only to the local and national news media, but was also unwilling to speak to all three Hillel representatives together.

Clarfield read her statement, and then discussed the meeting with reporters outside. The Consul would at no time speak directly to the press.

"I read Miss Campana the letter," explained Clarfield, "and she told me she was not in the position to represent her government in this matter."

"When I asked her to at least give her opinion to the hundreds of students waiting downstairs, she said they were ill-informed. So I asked her to inform the students but she refused."

"Miss Campana said that all we could do is send a letter to the French Government. When I asked her whether we would get a reply, she answered 'Perhaps...'"

Clarfield then told the crowd of the Consul's reply to exclamations of disappointment and disgust. Pesses later said he intends to send a letter of condemnation to the French Government.

It was better when there were just the two of us, says new ATS chief

By MARY KATE ROWAN

When Professor Frederick Winter was an undergraduate at McGill University his classes often consisted of two people, himself and the professor.

Because few students were studying both Latin and Greek, classes in classics were small.

Winter, now a professor of Fine Art and Chairman of U of T's Association of Teaching Staff strongly dislikes the impersonal lecture system.

"With the best will in the world, I can't give students in a class of even 40 or so the learning situation I enjoyed," he says.

"If you must have large classes they should be broken down into small manageable have time to discover the individual's potential."

Winter sees the ideal university as a "community of people" in which "ideas are discussed and attitudes promoted which would help to rectify society's wrongs."

"Antiquity should not be pursued unceasingly unless given some sort of relation to the contemporary scene."

He adds that a faculty member's survival in the system should not depend on the amount of material he has published.

"I think publishing often bulks larger than it should in deciding the future of a person who has the makings of a first-rate teacher

"The university has a real place for productive scholars but you must also have a substantial number of people interested in students as individuals, and interested in teaching."

Winter, elected chairman of the Association of Teaching Staff in December, sees the organization as "an association to which four-fifths of the teaching staff belong."

All full-time members of the teaching staff are eligible.

During the last 15 years the concern of the ATS has expanded from salaries, pensions and fringe benefits to long-range planning of the university.

According to Prof. Winter, the role of the ATS now depends on the future structure of the university.

"I would regard as ideal governing situation in the university in which administrative, staff and student opinion were equally represented," he says.

If such a governing body outvoted an administrative policy, the policy would effectively be blocked, he points out.

"In that situation, the ATS would stand behind the decision of the staff representatives.

"If there is not equal representation, the ATS is better off outside the government structure to assess, criticize and express opinions."

Fine Arts Prof. Frederick Winter, chairman of the Association of the Teaching Staff, favours a university structure with an equal say for faculty, students and administration.

Expel reporter: York prof

DOWNVIEW (CUP) — An upset chemistry professor wants the senate of York University to expel a student newspaper reporter in response to an article criticizing the university's administration.

Larry Goldstein, in an open letter to Ontario Education Minister William Davis, published in the Excalibur, told Davis to "seriously investigate" future requests for funds for York. Goldstein contended "millions of taxpayers' dollars are being spent to give numerous students a non-education."

The waste of resources, Goldstein said, was appalling. Combined with the "authoritarian nature of the regime", it would eventually push responsible students to open rebellion.

H. O. Pritchard, chairman of the chemistry department, will present a motion to the York senate on Jan. 23 which proposes that Goldstein be expelled for the letter.

Labelling the criticism "unwarranted, and not in the best interests of the university," Pritchard said: "The professors know best how the university should run. Students are transients in this place: They don't warrant equal rights."

"Goldstein doesn't understand the university — he doesn't know much about democracy or democratic policies. He is biting the hand that feeds the university."

Goldstein is somewhat taken aback by Pritchard's move: "I'm glad I wrote the letter, and I am willing to defend it to the fullest. But I never foresaw that anyone would be really upset by it. I couldn't see anyone in such an exalted position as Pritchard doing this."

York Administration President Murray Ross has refused to comment on the matter, saying he will speak when it comes to senate.

Intros play Labs to one-all tie

By ERROL YOUNG

It was bourgeois-baiting night at the International Student Center last Friday and you couldn't tell the good guys from the bad guys without a program.

The game was played on the home ice of the Canadian Internationalists — Intros for short — who sponsored the meeting. Star performer was Comrade A. Gora Ebrahim, a South African member of a Peking based Afro-Asian journalist association.

Ebrahim opened the game with a report of the latest Good News about the counter-counter-revolution taking place in Red China.

The opposing team, the Canadian Party of Labour (or Labs) led by Bill Lewis, allowed the Intros to control the play in the first half.

Comrade Gora's speech outlined how the corrupting forces of Liu Shao-chi needed to be purged from the Party.

Liu was accused of committing many crimes against the purity of the revolutionary ideology of Chairman Mao, and of failing to identify with the working class.

Gora felt the achievement of the Cultural Revolution in China was summed up in that memorable poster composed by Chairman Mao himself, "Bombard the Bourgeois Headquarters."

The real action started in the question period when Lewis of the Labs hit the Intros where it hurt, right in their ideological makeup.

Lewis' accused one of the leaders of the Intros, John Kelsey, a Globe and Mail reporter, of being a strikebreaker.

He was referring to the four year old strike against Toronto's dailies by the International Typographers Union.

"He crosses that picket line every day when he goes to work," said Lewis.

"Do you think it is right for you to speak at a meeting run by an organization that supports a man who is working against the working man?" he asked Comrad Gora.

The attack was parried by meeting chairman Bob Cruise, a real standout for the Intros.

He said it was an inopportune time to bring up such an internal matter.

As the voices in the room got louder, poor Comrade Gora, the featured speaker, withdrew further and further into his Little Red Book.

Cruise finally lost his temper and yelled, "If you do not sit down and be quiet we will force you to leave."

BILL LEWIS

"I'd like to see you try," said Lewis.

By this time the fans in the audience, who had remained quiet until now, started to press the chair for a response to the charges.

When the voices finally quieted Comrade Gora promised to look into the matter before the next day's meeting.

The question was debated Saturday morning in the Music Room of Hart House and Kelsey said a conclusion was reached, but added he would not reveal the outcome to The Varsity.

The burst of energy exhausted both teams.

Comrade Gora was asked if Shakespeare could be studied by a follower of Mao.

"No," he replied. "Since Shakespeare wrote for a bourgeois society and therefore a true follower of the Chairman could not identify with the plays' characters."

The questioner then asked if love was not the true theme of much of Shakespeare's work.

Comrade Gora replied by pointing out the relationship between love and a nation's economy, using the high American divorce rate as an example.

He also included Bach and Beethoven in his criticism since to a good Marxist-Leninist all art is a means and not an end.

When the game ended the final score was one all.

The only one who lost ground was Shakespeare and he didn't seem to mind.

Grad political science students still waiting for Lakoff report

By ART MOSES

A report on graduate instruction in the Department of Political Economy will "absolutely" be issued in time for recommended changes to be included in next year's calendar, says Professor J. E. Smith, Associate Chairman of the Department of Political Economy.

The Committee working on the report is chaired by Political Science Prof. S. A. Lakoff.

At a Friday meeting of a graduate counter-seminar on Ideology, set up opposite a recognized course (Poli Sci 2403) taught by Prof. Stephen Clarkson, members of the seminar decided to wait until publication of the report before proceeding further towards obtaining accreditation for the counter course.

All present were concerned that the report, originally expected before Christmas, would appear too late to affect next year's program.

During the meeting, Prof. Clarkson said his position had been indicated in a letter to Andy Wernick (SGS) in October. Wernick is a member of the counter-seminar.

Clarkson explained he was willing to allow the counter seminar to do its own work and recognize that the group itself would evaluate each individual's paper, provided he would retain the right to disagree with the group's evaluation.

Phil Resnick (SGS) said he could not accept this concept.

"This means that the principle of a student centred seminar has gone by the boards," he said. He is seeking group evaluation by the counter seminar without faculty interference.

Wernick claimed that the two seminars are entirely different. He felt the only way the idea of recognizing the legitimacy of a student centred seminar would be by accrediting both seminars.

"I want two credits for the two seminars. If I want to do work in both, and can only get credit in one, I can't do the best work in the other."

Prof. Clarkson stated that under the present structure of the graduate school a grade is required for each student.

"I still have to say formally what the grade is. I could still disagree with the group evaluation. You are far from the ideal."

Resnick agreed that the issue could not be resolved within the seminar, but only within the Department and the graduate school. Hence his concern over the delay in publishing the Lakoff Report.

The 20 students at the Friday meeting agreed on forming a graduate caucus to work within the Political Economy Course Union

Winter blasts CUG on 'equal representation'.

By GEOFF MEGGS

Objections to equal student participation in university government voiced at last Friday's CUG meeting have been described as "untenable" by GSU President John Winter.

The remark was contained in an open letter to President Bissell written in response to Varsity reports that Dr. Bissell questioned the theory of equal representation.

Pres. Hare quits UBC

VANCOUVER (Special) — The president of the University of British Columbia, Dr. Kenneth Hare, has resigned his post.

In a letter of resignation released this week Hare said he found the job — which he had held for seven months — "impossible for a man of my temperament."

Hare, 49, had been in ill health for some time. Dean Walter Gage has been appointed acting president until a permanent successor is appointed.

At Friday's meeting Dr Bissell said he "could not see theoretical arguments for equal student participation."

The remark came up in open and informal discussion aimed at delineating opposing views rather than hammering out commission policy.

Winter also described as "fatuous" remarks made by Dr. Bernard Etkin that faculty deserved more representation because of longer experience.

"The art of government is an entirely different matter requiring different personal attributes and perhaps a different form of mind," Winter wrote.

He also criticized the faculty opinion that students have a smaller stake in the university community than the student, especially graduate students.

"Two-thirds of graduate students intend to follow a career in an educational profession," he said quoting statistics from a recent GSU study of graduate students.

"The statements by Dr. Etkin and yourself are untenable as far as the graduate students are concerned," Winter concluded.

HH serves business faculty, students for AISEC lunch

Our reporter was "cordially invited" to a luncheon yesterday in the south dining room at Hart House. The affair was held by AISEC, an international organization of commerce and economics students which sponsors job exchanges.

Of the 45 people present, most were students and faculty, with a handful of Toronto businessmen interested in AISEC's program. Roust beef and Yorkshire pudding were served. Our reporter took the opportunity to talk things over with her fellow diners.

By LEAH ADAM

"Students are not competent to say what should be taught at the university, nor how it should be taught," says J. M. McAvity, President of the Canadian Export Association.

Students haven't the experience to be able to judge their courses, he said, but faculty should have greater influence on the makeup of courses and there should be meaningful dialogue between the business community and the university.

He maintained that businessmen enter the university on invitation only and have little say in selection of courses and faculty. He said business courses in the university do not keep up with the present trend towards internationalization and should be changed.

In informal conversation representatives of a handful of leading Toronto businesses revealed their views of the modern student and the business community.

They all agreed that things have changed since their university days. In 1928, said R. Kettle, Vice President in charge of Public Relations for Massey-Ferguson, a girl could not even visit a man's room for tea without a chaperone.

But student dissent, he added, was not unknown then, and it was in 1928 that the Oxford Union resolved "not to fight for King and country." The present agitation for change seems more permanent, said Kettle.

It is very difficult to establish a basis for discussion with many radicals, since they refuse to answer questions which assume the continuation of the existing order, he said. "They want to turn the whole structure upside-down."

Another symptom of the changing times is business's attitude towards long hair. Beards and longer hair are acceptable now, as long as they are "neat and tidy." And it seems that almost anything goes in jobs that do not entail meeting the public.

The businessmen also indicated that although a BA is mandatory, it is no longer a guarantee of a good job, and most companies are requiring post-graduate work of their applicants for management positions.

Complete a year's required reading in 10 weeks.

Whatever you're studying, from first year English to fifth year medicine, there are a lot of texts you should read, a large number of books you have to read. Now, by reading three times faster, you can cover all of your required reading in less than one third of the normal time. Or read three times as much as the average student.

The Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics course teaches you to read faster, with improved comprehension. To retain more of what you read, and to concentrate more easily. If you don't at least triple your reading speed, your tuition fee will be refunded.

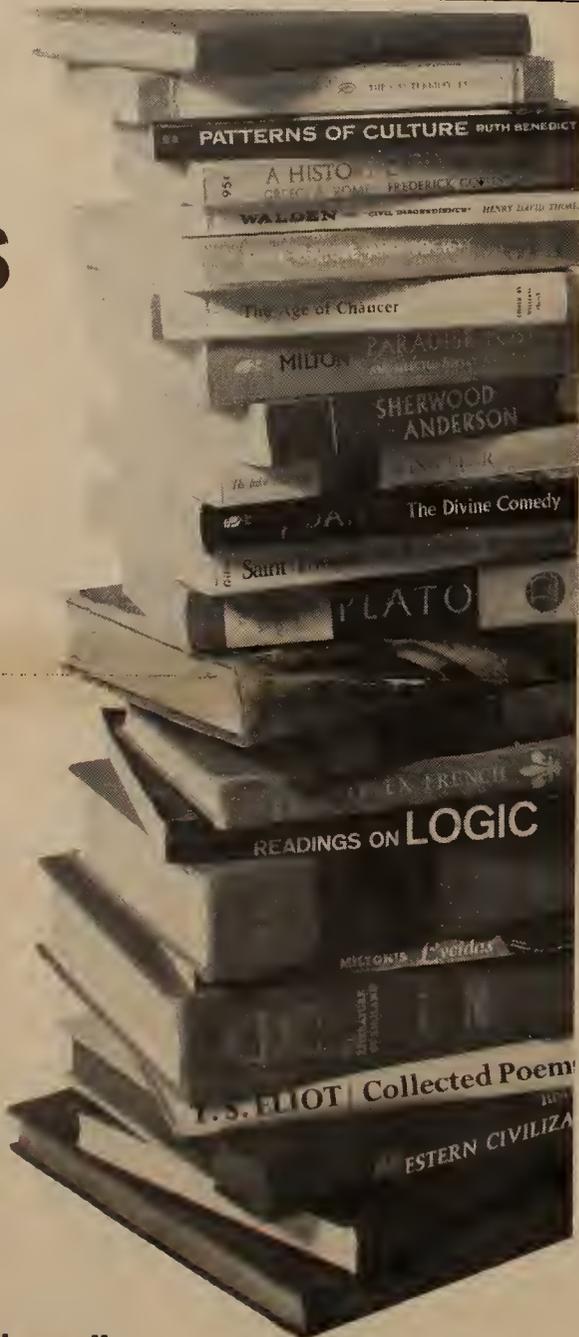

Give yourself two-thirds more time to read more, learn more, be more. Call us now at 923-4681 and enroll in one of the dynamic reading courses starting next week. Or attend a free "Mini-lesson" at one of the locations listed below. Discover in fifteen minutes your potential as a dynamic reader. ## WOMEN'S SPORTS

Last weekend, the Senior Intercollegiate Volleyball Team travelled to Western where they faced the following Universities: Waterloo, Waterloo Lutheran, MacMaster, Guelph, New York State at Cortland, Carleton, Windsor and Western.

By a supreme team effort, Toronto managed to win 20 of their 21 games, giving them first place in the tournament and the coveted Volleyball trophy. The perennial rivals of Toronto, the Western team, handed Toronto their only loss; however, Toronto managed to take the other two games of the match, to defeat Western.

The Intermediate Volleyball Team played their first exhibition games of this season last weekend in Toronto against the Plast team. The Toronto team lost all three games by scores of 15-3, 15-5 and 15-4.

CONTEST

Uncle R. Mickleburgh, spokesman for Count Michael Ignatieff, Chief judge for Varsity Sports contests, today announced that Don Short (III New) has won the recent Contest. Mr. Short's reply to the query, "Is this a dagger I see before me" was, "No, but his grandfather was Italian", and he has been awarded a suitably Zen prize, viz., the UC II Hockey team.

The Senior Intercollegiate Basketball team was defeated by Western on the weekend by a convincing score of 53-29. At the end of the first half, Western was ahead of Toronto by only 4 points. However, in the second half, the Toronto team's play gradually dropped off, and their passes just didn't end up in other Toronto players hands!

The Toronto team feels that it was not so much that the Western team's play declined which resulted in the Western victory. The team is confident that their next encounter with Western will result in a Toronto victory.

The Intermediate team from Western also managed to give Toronto's Intermediate Team their first loss of the season by a score of 47-20.

FLU-BUGGED BLUES BATTLE WARRIORS FOR TOP SPOT

Varsity Blues begin a series of three games in four days this evening when they host University of Waterloo Warriors at Varsity Arena. Tom Watt and his crew also face Western Mustangs in London on Thursday night and then move into Windsor for a Saturday matinee game with U of W Lancers.

ARLON POPKEY

Blues, who lead Waterloo by two points after an equal number of starts, could take a long stride toward clinching first place in the six-team Western Division. A win would move them four points ahead of Warriors and force the latter to take the next two meetings (one here and one in Waterloo) between the two clubs. On the other hand, a two point Warrior victory would leave the two teams deadlocked and everything that has taken place up until now would be neutralized. In essence, the battle for first place simply boils down to the results of the best of three Toronto-Waterloo series.

Warriors, who lost all but five of last year's players, appear a little strong than the 1967-68 unit. Arlon Popkey, the 1966-67 SIHL second team all-star goaler and current leader in the goals against derby, is one improvement coach Don Hayes has over last season. Popkey was academically ineligible last year and his replacements while adequate, were not as good.

On the forward lines, Hayes has recruited two players with Junior 'A' experience. Ken Laidlaw put in four seasons with St. Catharines Jr. Black Hawks and a year with the Ottawa based Canadian Nationals before moving to Waterloo this fall.

Centre Bob Reade, also a newcomer, has had experience with Peterboro Petes and Montreal Baby Canadians of the OHA league and spent last season with Michigan Tech. Reade is currently the team's leading scorer.

Blues, if last night's practice session was any indication, will have trouble fielding a full lineup. The flu is starting to make the rounds and several players are on the doubtful starters list. Bill L'Heureux, who has been out

GUELPH FIRST

Wrestlers drop tri-meet

The winning lustre of new Varsity wrestling coach, Ron Murphy, failed to rub off on his matmen last Friday as Blues trailed in a tri-meet involving U of T, McMaster and University of Guelph.

The grappling grabfest took place at Mac.

However, Blues had several of their top wrestlers missing, most notably Bill Allison at 167 pounds and ruggerer Larry Barron at 177. They will mat a much stronger team this Saturday for a home meet against perennially-strong Western.

Ex-coach, Paul Beswick, competing at 160 pounds, was the only Varsity entrant to win both his matches, a 12-6 decision over Curry of Guelph and a pin of McIver of Mac. (as it weré).

Dave Simms (see pic) also recorded a pin of his opponent at 152 pounds, a Mifsud from McMaster, but lost his opening match by a close 2-0 count to Guelph's veteran, Tom Oblink Oblinski.

Other Varsity victories were choked up by Don Stevens (167), Ernie Friedrich (177) and Ken White (130).

Toronto wrestlers who made the trip, tried hard, but dropped tough decisions to more experienced opposition were rookie Tom Taylor (130), and Ted Sauer (145).

One encouraging result of the meet was the fact that there were no pins applied to the Blue and White grapplers.

Generally, the team is looking much stronger now than it did before Christmas, and, at full strength, has an excellent chance in the intercollegiate championships at McGill next month.

Black activism almost a defence mechanism says US prof.

By GRANT SCHUYLER

Black power doesn't frighten 34-year-old Negro historian Hollis R. Lynch. He understands it.

He sits relaxed, smiling, and incredibly friendly as we talk in the restaurant at the Park Plaza.

"Insofar as blacks are trying to promote group interests by group solidarity, black power is both good and essential. America is not the melting pot claimed for it, but is made up of ethnic interests displaying group interests. By organizing, blacks are simply following the paths of other minority groups."

The professor from the State University of New York at Buffalo easily cites an example from American history: the rising to political prominence and power of the Irish in Boston.

Former U.S. president John F. Kennedy went back to Ireland in 1963, he says, to re-establish contact with the old sod. Black power is like that, important and necessary when peaceful.

"Blacks know they can't possibly take over the United States."

"I think that the institutionalized racism has been somewhat alleviated for the black middle class. Their opportunities are considerably greater. But one has to remember that the number of middle-class blacks is smaller than any other comparable ethnic group."

In the United States, secondary schools are rated nationally for the quality of their teaching, Negroes, since they most often go to schools in the slums, get their education in schools with low ratings.

Consequently their admission to universities, which lean heavily on school ratings to determine applicability, has been difficult in the past.

What does Lynch think of Black student activists?

"I think they are not so much concerned with results, but with assertion. They operate in a predominantly white atmosphere. Activism is almost a defence mechanism."

But their situation is far from hopeless. They often have the opportunity peacefully to gain their demands from the white administrations, even though white administrators "do not fully empathize with the black students."

When a student, Lynch himself studied at predominantly white universities: University of British Columbia and the University of London's School of Oriental and Asian Studies. At UBC he studied Canadian history and met his wife Sharon. At London he became fascinated with black history, particu-

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday night asked the university to abolish compulsory gym classes for first year women.

The motion was made in response to a letter from Irene Bowman (I UC), who has collected 190 names on a petition that is still being circulated among first year students.

Miss Bowman says seven out of ten students she asks sign the petition

Under the existing rules, first year women must attend gym classes or be fined $50. Any woman failing to fulfill one of these alternatives will not be eligible for degree requirements.

There are too many to handle.

Sociology head Clark may resign

BY PAUL MACRAE

Prof. S. D. Clark may resign as chairman of the sociology department following bitter disagreements within the department.

Several sociology professors say Clark made the announcement at a closed faculty meeting Wednesday. Clark yesterday refused to confirm or deny the report, labelling it "rumor." He added he would not be leaving the university in any case.

A. D. Allen, dean of Arts and Science, said Prof. Clark told him he was thinking of resigning. The dean said he had "not made up his mind" what he would recommend to university President Claude Bissell.

According to reports from the Wednesday meeting, Clark said his resignation would be effective June 30. He has been chairman of the department since it was separated from the political science department five years ago.

The disagreements arose out of what one observer called the "Tammany Hall" atmosphere in the department, an atmosphere which he said had already caused one professor to resign and might lead to the resignation of others.

This dissension broke into the open at a Jan. 8 meeting of the Undergraduate Curriculum committee, made up of students and faculty. Clark almost walked out of the meeting when Prof. Lewis Feuer proposed a motion demanding vote counts of committee decisions.

Feuer's motion said in part that "the right to vote is inherent in every organized group", provided the voting is consistent with university rules.

A graduate student in the department said Dr. Clark had sometimes used his no-vote policy to make decisions without discussion, over the wishes of faculty and students.

At a meeting with graduate and undergraduate students yesterday, Clark said he had no "strong objections" to voting, but preferred trying to work out situations without voting.

"The final responsibility (for decisions) is the chairman's," he added. "I hoped to avoid the issue of voting because it can lead to irresponsible actions like we saw last Wednesday (Jan. 8)."

Following the Jan. 8 meeting Clark prepared a series of recommendations for restructuring the department to be presented to Wednesday's staff meeting. He proposed a system of four committees. Only the two student committees would have had formal voting procedures.

At Wednesday's meeting, according to reports, Clark announced his intention to resign and these recommendations never came up. Instead a resolution prepared by three professors was passed 25 to 1.

This resolution called for a 12-man committee made up of six faculty and six students to recommend structural changes which would democratize the department. The committee is to report before March 1.

The proposal was accepted almost unanimously by the graduate-undergraduate meeting. The students will meet at 1 p.m. today to discuss mechanisms for electing their six members

The Victoria College Board of Regents accepted the principle of openness yesterday in response to a proposal from a student member of Vic's President's Advisory Council.

The Board is the college's equivalent of the U of T Board of Governors. Since Vic is a federated college, the Board is an independent body that handles financial affairs such as setting the budget and establishing salary scales.

The Regents adopted openness only in principle, and a subcommittee composed of staff, students, and administrators will define the procedure of running open meetings.

When the policy is implemented, it is believed Victoria College will become the first university or college in Canada to have open meetings.

Meetings of the U of T Board are still held in camera and the minutes are not made public.

Vic President the Reverend Mr. A. B. B. Moore said he was pleased with the decision, which follows the opening of the College Council and the Vic Senate in December.

But Rev. Moore said he did not expect to see any immediate restructuring or abolition of the Board of Regents.

"Our present situation is that we will wait until the report of the Commission on University Government and see what it decides, before we consider changes," he added.

The Ladie Gaida Memorable Bland traoped into the new (but nameless) cafeteria next to the Galbraith Building Wednesday afternoon to tie up the ceremonial ribbon minutes after dignitaries, led by executive vice-president non-academic A. G. Ronkin, had just finished cutting it. The Bland artistic director, Mel Solomon (III APSC) told the gathering the new eatery lacked "chairs for comfort for relaxing or other sporting activities."

About 100 students picketed the offices of the Peterborough Examiner Wednesday and yesterday in support of striking Newspaper Guild reporters, but they failed to stop typographers and pressmen from crossing the line to publish the newspaper.

The 20 Examiner reporters have been on strike since Nov. 2 for better wages, time and a half for overtime and guarantees against transfers to other members of the Thomson Newspapers chain.

This marked the third effort by students to help the reporters. A total of 17 arrests marred the earlier attempts. This time there have been no arrests.

The Toronto Newspaper Guild is providing free buses leaving from 91 St. George St. at 8 p.m. tonight.

SAC refuses seats on Pres Council

By MARY BASTEDO

The Students Administrative Council decided Wednesday night it isn't interested in accepting seats on Claude Bissell's 29-member President's Council, and doesn't want to talk about it any more.

The council voted Wednesday night to reject Bissell's August offer of seven seats and end negotiation with the administration on the issue.

Bissell had offered students seven seats on a council including seven faculty, 12 administrators and three board of governors members. SAC decided at its summer meeting to accept the seats if openness and equality with faculty were guaranteed. The system now proposed by Bissell is that meetings would be open, but closeable by a majority vote. The chairman could call closed sessions to decide whether to move in camera.

SAC President Steve Langdon related the move to his New Year's resolution to concentrate more on what he calls "micro-action" politics.

"We have to put our time and our energy into working with students," he said. "If that's our priority, we can't spend hours and hours negotiating."

"We've been relating to too great an extent to the University administration and its patterns of assumptions and relationships," Langdon said.

The value of the President's Council was also questioned.

"It's an exercise in legitimization and nothing else," said Cultural Affairs Commissioner Mark Freiman (IV UC).

Many members also felt the President's Council would become irrelevant when the Commission on University Government, which has equal student-faculty representation, comes out with plans for restructuring university government in September.

Bob Rae (IV UC), a CUG member, was less confident.

"I would argue very strongly against facile optimism," he said.

"Equality has not been accepted as a general principle at this university."

Rae finally abstained in the voting.

"It's a very touchy issue," he said. "It won't be solved either by reversing our attitude of August or by setting a dangerous precedent in accepting seven seats out of 29."

U of T Senate opens up

The University of Toronto Senate last Friday decided to open its monthly meetings to the public. The decision was announced yesterday.

The 199-member body will allow the public to observe proceedings from a separate area in the chamber, but not to enter debate or vote. The Senate reserved the right to go into closed session by a simple majority vote.

Matters may be complicated by lack of space in the Senate Chamber where the members wish to continue meeting. If another place cannot be found, tickets may be issued to the public.

"The senate has been inclined to have open meetings for some time," said William Kent, Executive Assistant to Registrar Robin Ross. "The delay was caused by their hesitancy about where to hold the meeting."

Although SAC rejected a Senate offer for seven student seats last spring, council president Steve Langdon welcomed the openness decision.

"People will be able to see just what sort of a foolish body the Senate is to get involved in," he commented.

The place and agenda of the next meeting on Feb. 14, will be decided by the Executive and announced at a later date.

WINNIPEG (CUP) — The much delayed election of student senators at the University of Manitoba has finally been set in motion after the school's Board of Governors acceded to student council demands for an open board session to discuss the possibility of permanent open meetings.

University government has been complicated all term by student refusal to accept senate seats until senate and Board sessions were opened, students were granted seats on the Board, and student council had the right to determine the method of selection of student senators.

The administration last term opened senate and gave the selection process to the students. They also promised that at least one senator elected to the Board would be a student.

The Board granted the open session after the student council had demanded in late December that the Board either make this commitment or resign.

larly with Edward Wilmot Blyden, a West Indian black who became a Liberian ambassador to Britain. Lynch calls him a pan-Negro patriot.

"They were intellectuals who thought there was no hope in a local approach to Negro-American problems. They sought to identify with Negroes as a whole, and to set up a flow of ideas back and forth across the Atlantic. They were interested in global black unity."

In a speech to history students on campus Wednesday, Lynch traced the history of American Negroes who attempted to find their African heritage, some by emigration and others by building, in Stokely Carmichael's words, "a new Africa in America."

Lynch sees the Vietnamese war as a "disillusioning experience" for Americans.

"It has demonstrated that military power is mitigated by political considerations, that the strongest military power in the world cannot win against a popular guerilla force." Lower-class Negroes, "who see the army as employment for social and economic advancement," differ from black college graduates, who think the war unjust.

What are Lynch's political views?

He laughs out loud. "I'm not particularly politically active. I'm liberal-pragmatic. These days that combination isn't very exciting."

Behind the liberal side of the dialogue...

By BRIAN MOSSOP
(IV NEW)

Geoffrey Nathan states (Jan. 8) that "the basis of a free society is a community where the initiative of force or the threat of force is not permitted." On Jan. 13 he renders thanks to the status quo as a situation "where no one is permitted to use force against me or any one else."

I agree completely that in a free society violence could not be tolerated. But the question is whether our society is "basically free" in the first place. Does it just have a few "small problems" which can be ironed out on the liberal assumption (illusion I would say) that under our system all conflicting interests are only apparent and can be reconciled by legal democratic process. (Some can, such as conflicts between students and faculty)

If this is not so, then opposing interests can only be maintained by force or the threat of force.

The assumption behind statements like Mr. Nathan's is that "force" is something initiated by the opponents of existing law and order, an order which is that of a free society. Now, besides the various occurrences of outright violence on the part of the legal forces of order (cops in Chicago, Peterborough, just defending, of course, our democratic institutions, blah, blah) another type of violence is exercised by the rules of our society — political and economic violence.

As Lenin, who had several interesting ideas on such things, said: politics is an extension of war. This has a non-violent and legal appearance which makes it easy for defenders of the status quo to point the finger at radicals when it comes to physical violence.

But behind Prime Minister Trudeau's side of the dialogue with the people, there is the RCMP and the armed forces and the provincial police and the local police and the well-filled Liberal Party money chests.

Of course, fascism could never happen here, in a bastion of liberalism and the golden middle path that avoids all extremes and which radicals can't seem to appreciate! But would anyone care to call President Johnson or Lord Thomson "liberal"? And who if not them represent the status quo which liberals include in the few "small things" that must be improved?

It is certainly curious that when the armed forces of loyalty do show their faces, it is on the side of the Lord Thomson rather than on the side of newspaper workers. Naturally, it is all in the name of law and order. And, obviously, it does protect the existing laws and the existing order in the matters. The question is whether that is a good thing.

The newspaper workers at Peterborough do the work and are at present only demanding their share of the produce in the form of higher wages (a synonym for 'salary' for those who think of workers as 'they'). Lord T's only claim to fame and profit is that he OWNS the paper. (That must be hard work). It wouldn't hurt his pocketbook to pay higher wages but it would be a dangerous precedent because it would infringe on his 'right' to profits. Mind you, everyone is guaranteed this 'right', but who has the opportunity?

If we are to remain "free" (and it is not easy to be "free" we hear; far easier to be a slave, so we must force people to be "free"), then there is no alternative to "liberal" capitalism, so we hear.

In fact, as we hear thanks to the diligent efforts of Lord Thomson — who owns almost all the media in Peterborough and so can give a really well-balanced picture of things to the people — and to the efforts of other newspaper moguls with the community interests at heart (who "care"); thanks to them, we know that we don't know how lucky we are! You have to be a really far-out idealist to want change in this society, or be suffering from some frustration or other, because any normal person...

(This is the sentiment of Robert van der Linde's letter of Jan. 15th which is little more than a space waster. I'd love to hear a real defence of the conservative view. All that letter did was give a caricature of radical demands without facing any real issues. It did not put forward a rational conservative analysis based on specific issues and justifying the status quo. Surely the conservatives can do better than that. If not, then, I guess it'll just be more of the same. If anyone thinks my view of the liberal attitude is a caricature, please enlighten me about its true nature.)

In conclusion on the Peterborough strike and student power, the argument goes that all this upsets the economy and endangers the public interest. But who is the "public" if not the workers and students — Lord Thomson and the Board of Governors?

And how many people reading this letter including Mr. Nathan, who feels no 'force' is or will be used against him if only our 'free' society is maintained, are not going to work for wages to live?

returning to basic principles

The Students Administrative Council's decision to refuse seven seats on the President Bissell's Advisory Council should not be seen as a petulant gesture of defiance, but as a return to fundamental principles.

So far much of SAC's energy, and some of its best people, have gotten drawn into the administrative tangle of running a university. That's not what SAC should be primarily interested in.

SAC's main concern should be the kind of education we're getting here, and sitting on all the administrative committees in the world isn't going to do much about changing that.

For one thing these committees don't seem to deal with directly what happens in the classroom. But more important, even when they do, SAC has had to fight what Steve Langdon calls the "basic assumptions" inherent in Establishment committees.

There's not much you can do about entrenched "don't rock the boat, things are fine the way they are" attitudes, especially when you are heavily outvoted as the seven SAC members on the President's Council would be.

For example, how would the Council react to a motion calling for the abolition of marks and grading of students? The answer would almost certainly be "no".

That's not surprising. There's a good deal of evidence to suggest that students are being invited to administrative committees precisely because so little of the educational process will be changed.

The administration looks at education in one way — how many trained people are coming out of university

SAC looks at education another way — how many educated people are coming out.

That may be an over-simplification, but the evidence in the case of marks, for example, seems to show them as gauges of training, not education.

Refusing the PAC seats may signal a return to the politics of confrontation, but that may be the only way to bring about the overhaul of the basic principles of education that SAC wants.

why wait for spring?

A couple of years ago Hart House decided to abolish its compulsory sports program for first-year men. Ostensibly the reason was overcrowding. A better reason would have been useless overcrowding.

The "compulsory" athletics for most freshmen seemed to consist of tugging at pulleys for five minutes or puffing once around the track, then waiting out the next 45 minutes until somebody came to tick them off.

And of course all this non-activity got in the way of people who were really interested in exercise. Abolishing the compulsory credits was a good thing all around.

Even if the Benson Building isn't as crowded as Hart House, it seems odd to continue compulsory athletics for women and not for men. It seems almost discriminatory.

We think women are just as capable of deciding how much exercise they want as men. It's time compulsory women's athletics were abandoned too.

Review WV

There are some moments when you are walking alone which are so true that you know can never tell them, moments when a sharp wind blows through you and you think and feel nothing but that moment and then the sun breaks through and stops you dead. Kerry Heath is like that.

Standing there, Wales lies west, a clouded tomb across the River Dee, while all about you thorns and hawks, walls with teeth and wind-blown heather drown the matted grass.

But especially the wind whips through you, a cold wind winding up the craggy footpath with the sea all around and if you wait the sun will awake and break through on county greens and across the river, Wales.

A dog turns in the yellow flowers and suddenly your heart leaps at that sight, a dog bursting through the heath and you feel and smell the freedom in the air as clearly as you feel and smell the water on the wind.

And your teeth are like ice because you suck in the wind and you cannot keep your eyes from Wales across the Dee.

There the sea breaks in long sunbroken shadows and the whitecaps touch the fishing boats with teeth like ice, and the crying of the gulls breaks the sky and you must grit your teeth for your tears.

The matted leaves walk down to the road and as you turn nothing marks your parting for you cannot leave that which is part of you, and so the gulls and the whitecaps are forever crying hello.

When they arrived at the cottage no one was there. He parked the car on the lawn beneath the pink blossoms which fell in the wind. The cottage was clean and perfect in the dappled shadows of the oaks which bent together, and for a moment as the engine died they heard no sound. Then the oak trees murmured in the wind, and she sighed happily when he kissed her.

"And now we're all alone," she said.

"Home at last."

"And we'll go swimming and drink wine and I'll feed you like a great beast so that I'll have to carry you to bed."

He laughed

"And then we'll wake up and I'll cook you bacon and spoil you like a darlin' girl and we'll make amour in the woods," he said.

"Oh God."

Her eyes fell from him as he kissed her.

"Yep," he said. "In the woods. This is Canada. Canadian girls are robust ... my darlin' girl."

"Wicked man."

He laughed. "All right love, out. We'll take everything in."

The styrofoam cooler contained the grill, axe, ice, and the steaks and he held it underneath so that the handle

"We'll leave it all here and go swimming okay?"

"Maybe we'll take the wine?" she asked.

"Aha, the wine. Well we'll have to cool it. Remember what happens to us on warm wine in the sun Aud. We'll take the whole cooler."

"Okay."

He kissed her.

"Let's go get our bathing suits on," he said.

sleeping bag."

It was a Saiffish, a small light boat made of styrofoam and one had to sit quite low or lie to avoid the boom. It was made for very light weather. He could carry it with one hand and he placed it on top of the car. The girl rolled down her window and, folding the towel beneath her, she sat up on the car door and held the sailboat in place.

He drove very slowly down the two tracks which wandered into the woods, two brown and padded tracks covered with tiny twigs and leaves and the girl had to him swinging the aluminum mast about which she had wound the sail. The rise over the tracks was hot and as they looked down the steel arcs burning in the sun he said, "Did you ever hop trains?"

"No."

The lake was not far now and he walked quickly down into the gully past the deserted shack and turned the last corner. The lake curved into view and he laughed and yelled as she ran to him.

"Aren't we happy Aud," he said.

"Oh it's so calm and beautiful and no one here but us."

"No debauchery now. We'll sail. We don't need much wind with these little bastards anyway."

"Rude."

"And if we do you'll blow while I wield the lash."

"God I really think you are perverted."

And she threw her arms around him and hugged until he finally had to pull her away.

"Oh my poor love, my loathsome winsome Johnny," she said, laughing and eager and shy.

They eased out into the wind and as they cleared the calm circle of the bay a gust caught them and suddenly the water was lapping at the bow and the sail was fluttering and she dipped her hand into the clear current and smiled whoopee-doo.

"Whoopee-doo!"

"Whoopee-doo! Whoopee-doo!"

The lake was perhaps a mile wide and they sailed across it many times. Then he saw a clearing and they sailed straight into shore. She pulled up the centreboard and at the last second he came about so that they were floating perfectly calm a few feet out.

Bending branches and kicking back dirt they pulled themselves up the bank and he saw that the clearing was flat and treeless and had a good wind. He climbed down to the boat and took out the wine and wrapped the sail which she had lowered. Then he pulled up the boat and climbed back to the clearing saying this is perfect as she drank from the bottle.

The sun was still high and they lay together in the clearing with their eyes closed and their hands touching. They

Walter Bauer-dishwasher to poet

Not many men of forty-eight leave an established and famed literary career to wash dishes in another country, whose language they do not speak. But not many men are Walter Bauer.

In 1929, Herman Hesse wrote a review praising Bauer's novel, "The Inevitable Journey", but reminded him that even though the hero goes off to form a new world with a party of the working class, there are basic decisions that he must make within himself, that nobody else can make. This was Hesse's philosophy and it must have stuck with Bauer.

So, in 1952, as Germany was beginning to experience the first effects of the "economic miracle" called cynically by some critics, "the hollow miracle", Walter Bauer packed his bags, left behind a reputation as a poet, biographer, author, playwright and social critic and came to Canada — to stay.

Four years later, after various jobs as dishwasher, and factory worker, he enrolled as an undergraduate at the University of Toronto. He was fifty-two at the time. Four years after that, he became a professor of German literature.

"It's funny," he says with a wistful grin, "but the older I get, the more exciting life becomes, the more chances there are. . ."

By the time he was twenty-nine, he had published two books of poetry and three novels and was recognized by such famous men as Hesse and Stefan Zweig. The world seemed to be opening up for him.

But 1933 was the year that Hitler took power and Bauer's books were banned. The Nazis were hunting his friends and Bauer knew that he himself was in great danger for his socialistic commitments. He remembers being interrogated thoroughly by the SS after coming back from visiting Zweig, a Jew, in Switzerland. From then on, he knew the terror and the anguish he would suffer through those years and later.

Nevertheless, just after Hitler came to power, he wrote a letter to the Jewish publisher, Max Tau, saying, "Only Germans could stage such anti-Semitic witch-hunts; by comparison, the ghetto of the Middle Ages was human. It is our task to stand together more closely and to bear witness that the madness of mass instincts is the product of the intoxication with nationalism; let us be fellow humans. . . " A bit foolhardy and naive, maybe, but Bauer decided to stay in Germany and see the thing through. He still tried to write and edit dissenting publications, but these were quickly suppressed.

"Could we have done more?" he says. "That is a question that still haunts us. One could never understand the conditions at the time." There were times that Bauer felt he would be sent to a concentration camp for his dissent, or killed, but finally, in 1940, he was drafted into the army. Not to have gone would have meant the firing squad.

"You could not know what it was like, for five years, wishing your own defeat, hating every minute of it, fearing for your own life." Finally he was captured by the British and put in a prison camp in Italy.

And then the war was over. Bauer felt great shame and great guilt that he had survived. For years he was preoccupied with the disgrace and the humiliation.

Few felt the same despair that Bauer felt. After the war, Germany promised to boom. Expatriates came flocking back to bask in the economic miracle. At first Bauer felt that a new age had begun, that Germany would bear the burden of responsibility for the war years and become a truly democratic state.

It didn't work out that way. As Bauer describes in one of his poems:

The others came back, mode their nests, strutted about, proved their innocence, enjoyed patronage everywhere.

*He could fight no longer;
he saw truth lacerated and torn apart;
he felt himself betrayed by time which always betrays.
So he left — for this land of the mope leaf.*

"I started a new life in Canada; I got — how do you call it, my second wind here," says Bauer, "I met a class of people that was new, people who worked in factories for a living. I will never regret those years."

Bauer has a totally fresh and vigorous feeling towards this country:

*Here you receive another kind of wisdom,
Bitter and icy and not to everybody's taste
This earth says:
I was here long before you and the likes of you came;
Unmolested I conversed with wind and rivers,
Don't forget that, my friend.*

*The wind blows cold from Labrador:
I have a message for you
from the ice age,
But I shall not decode it for
you. —*

Today Bauer teaches German at University College here at U of T and the first translation of his poems into English has just been published, translated by Henry Beissel, a compatriot, who emigrated to Canada in 1951 and is the founder and editor of "Edge" magazine and a teacher of English at Sir George Williams University.

Bauer still writes in German and his books still sell well in Germany. An autobiography of Sieur de la Salle, written in 1956, sold 25,000 copies. His biography of the explorer Nansen won him the Albert Schweitzer Prize while he was still an undergraduate at Toronto.

But he is beginning to have some doubts. "Somehow I feel as if I am not giving to my friends as much as they are giving to me. I am writing in German and many of them do not understand the language. I should like to be considered a Canadian poet."

The translation is a breakthrough but Bauer hopes to begin writing by himself in English. "I don't think that it will be difficult to start writing in English the same way as German. My poetry is very simple, not sophisticated."

Particularly good are his poems written about students in the university. "I have a great love for young people, and I know their problems."
*I sow a young co-ed, Surround by books like honey-combs,
She was gazing into space,
one finger she possessed
Over her fresh lips, she ran her hand
Through her hair, perplexed, she looked Over to the others without seeing.
She stared at her slightly raised left hand
As if something were coming
To settle upon it, something
She was waiting for.*

*It come.
The idea came.*

Throughout the book you can see the workings of his conscience, a conscience that he says he received from his parents — poor labourers in a small town "they were decent people, they suffered, they endured."

This conscience, tempered with a warm humanity fills his poems:

*Besides, I thought too often Of sweat, agony, of the trying conditions of those Who wrote books, plays and poems,
Too often I heard the screams of living people
In their log books.*

Reviewers of his book have made much of the humanity in these poems, but really this is only a small part of what makes them so effective.

*At two I hardly remember anything
And wipe the leftovers of my life
Into the gorboge con.
At three I clean up the kitchen till it shines
In odourless light.
At four I step into the sharp lonely wind
And before the Milky Way fades
I drink from it my freedom.*

As a man, Walter Bauer has a keen and lively interest in people and ideas and a wealth of anecdotes, knowledge and insights into European literature of the twentieth century.

Not many men of sixty-five can boast of having had two careers in two countries, and still look forward to more. As Walter Bauer says, "I still hope to do new things". Perhaps his second career will eclipse his first.

more than pretty pictures at hart house

"Now here's what I call art — real pictures — none of that abstract stuff."

This is the kind of comment one expects to hear from viewers at Christiane Pflug's exhibition of twelve paintings and six lithographs which will be at the Hart House Gallery until Jan. 25.

She is a self-taught painter who was born in Berlin in 1936 and has been living and working here in Toronto since 1959.

The collection does at first seem like a respite from abstraction, but anyone who thinks that this is merely a collection of pretty pictures is missing the point. It is true that they can be easily classified as 'realist' paintings, but that label alone doesn't do them justice.

A good realist painter, instead of employing 'abstraction' in the painting, induces it in the viewer. Although the images themselves are starkly real, their meaning — the impression which the artist is communicating — is highly abstract. Christiane Pflug's work does indeed have this quality, and it is this which distinguishes realist painting from a pretty picture.

Her paintings have the hard-edged reality of photographs and seem almost like a collection of snapshots taken through the windows and doors of someone's apartment. Windows and doors divide the world into inside and outside, and their prominence in this series of paintings gives an impression of someone confined to a room, merely watching the world. They convey a mood of loneliness.

The abstraction in her work is one of technique, and through it she carefully alters the viewer's normal sense of space and time. The perspective is from a low vantage point so that one sees the world like a child, looking up at objects like door-knobs rather than down at them.

One's sense of time is also altered, and in some of the paintings the seasons change at a glance from one part to another.

Every object in the paintings stands out starkly. This, along with the bright richness of the colours, and the subtle distortions of space and time, imparts a very sharp tension to all the paintings. The tension is enhanced by the great attention she gives to detail.

The life depicted in this collection seems like one of isolation, but the emphatic clarity, the three-dimensional reality through which it is portrayed makes the viewer feel as if he could step right into these paintings — right into this world of watching by windows and waiting by doors

hagbard and signe: romantic scandinavian confection

It has become a fashionable cliché that film is not real life, and that, in order to keep the audience from mistaking the two, directors such as Godard and Bergman resort to various film devices. Godard, for example, shows the characters in Weekend discussing the movie, and films the crew which is making La Chinoise. Bergman's method is to simulate the snapping and unwinding of the film in Persona, and preface the credits in Hour of the Wolf with the noises of a sound-stage.

The cry 'remember reality' has even been taken up by Esquire magazine, which cited Persona for the importance of the 'reality-device' which they presumed this was.

Bunk. The self-awareness of characters and consciousness of the film relates to the film in itself, and doesn't act as a tethering umbilicus which passes from film to viewer to 'ground', neutralizing the film's effect. It adds extra dimension to the characters by making them appear totally wilful and self-determining, as in Weekend, or entirely the creatures of some power, greater than the director, as in Persona.

In each case, consciousness enhances the dramatic power of the characters; it's not simply a message to the audience, "I'm only a character held captive in a Swedish film can". If anyone is mistaking film for reality, he is in need of greater assistance than directors' devices can afford.

One's observations in life are much more dilute than anything we experience in Bergman, and if we say, "Yes, that's just how it is", we compare, and are surprised that such a close approximation has been made. In holding up a strip of film against natural light, you are already conscious of its artificial origin.

Should you still insist on a safety belt to keep the viewer from being sucked into the 'reality' on the screen, see Hagbard and Signe, a film without a vestige of the real one whose events even you will admit are transpiring on the flat screen.

Hagbard and Signe is a legend made into film without surrendering any of the improbability, the exaggeration, the immutability and inexorability of the narrative. The characters have no dimensions but the most obvious; their motives are the apparent ones, and woe to him who searches beyond the most rudimentary explanations of their origins.

The overall success of this

Scandinavian tale of a pure love between Hagbard, son of the late king of Hamund and Signe, daughter of King Sigvor, the man who slew him, is that it does not aspire to be anything but improbable.

The success of legend depends on the manner of recounting, and Gabriel Axel has directed his crew to create the tale visually, with minimal recourse to acting or plot. Thus, what would make for an infuriating, obvious, and un-actable stageplay comes off quite nicely due to the director's realization of what film is about. The acting is appalling and the pacing early in the film almost caused me to walk out, but when I accepted the fact that acting was secondary, I began to enjoy the manipulation of the very obvious symbols on the legend's chessboard. I must admit that it took me some time to warm to the film, but that may have been because the style of the story, the flat, empty sets, and wooden acting, reminded me of the ethnic theatre, peripherally Scandinavian, to which I had been subjected in defenseless earlier year.

But for the loss of some striking Scandinavian faces, Hagbard and Signe might just as well have been played in masks, in the style of Greek tragedy, for the characterizations of innocence and evil are rigid, devoid of any subtlety, and have no need of real, mobile faces to express them. The source of the tragedy is the German prince who aspires to the favours of Signe; he acts only with his eyes and jaw, bulging and protruding, in a fashion whose malevolence is as comprehensible to a five year old Abyssinian as to a twelve year old North American used to the reflex acting of characters in television Westerns.

Most of the film is pastoral, but when the action comes, it makes up for any dullness. There are not more than half a dozen corpses littering the film's footage, but almost each of these is given a studied, individual death, with fine anatomical articulation and full savour for each man's precious moment.

Those enamoured of Bergman's actors won't want to see Gunnar Bjornstrand and Eva Dahlbeck in this film, as they have no range of expression permitted whatever. You may have seen Bjornstrand play the perfect ice-blooded Scandinavian marionette-husband, but he outdoes himself as King Sigvor, a man whose aloofness would put to shame a wooden DeGaulle.

Hagbard and Signe is a pleasant confection for all romantics. It has also provided me with the year's first Immortal line: Signe, after making love, says, "He will have your strength and your intrepid gaze".

bullitt of high calibre

Bullitt, now playing at the Imperial, is a dandy picture. The territory is familiar. Put simply: The Detective Gets His Man. Yet, while the subject matter is hardly new, like all interesting movies it has its own distinctive quality. For one thing it has the decency to take itself seriously and be aware of its own limitations. For another, it is a very 'new' type of movie for a 'commercial' film in that it eschews the linear for the visual: the narrative for the most part relies on images with Alan Trustman and Harry Kleiner's spare dialogue a kind of secondary expositional peg.

Heretofore, the classic detective film has been personified by such as The Big Sleep with its extremely intricate plot convolutions and an im-PLICIT command to follow the soundtrack or you'll really be lost. Harper, until Bullitt the best recent film of the genre, took the lead from that earlier Bogart saga. Now, with Bullitt, the tac is to place Steve McQueen in a situation and allow that situation to unfold with a mind of its own, as it were, with neither McQueen nor the audience knowing what the hell they're getting into.

The essential premise is pretty straightforward. Bullitt (McQueen) is assigned the task of safeguarding a rackets informer who is to serve as star witness before a senate crime committee. The opportunistic politico who is spear-heading the investigation (slickly played by Robert Vaughn) regards the stoolpigeon's protection as vital: not only as being a factor in helping to crack The Organization but as providing a raison d'être for the investigation itself and thus giving Vaughn much newspaper coverage. For Bullitt this is simply a job. When the witness is murdered, therefore, it is his professionalism which eggs him on to track down the killers, all the while being harassed by police red tape on the one hand and the unscrupulous Vaughn on the other who wishes to realize some tangible return on his investment in calling the investigation.

The gripping conclusion, played out at night on the landing strip of San Francisco airport, reveals a surprise twist which makes any further attempt at narrative delineation slightly unethical.

However, you don't give anything away by saying that the film has an eleven minute car chase sequence that is the most electrifying one of its kind which this viewer can remember. The famous Cinerama roller coaster ride probably comes closest to it in wet-palm impact. The violence in Bullitt, moreover, is exceptionally well-handled: the moments of gore are few and far between but when presented there is a realistic messiness about them that packs a strong visceral clout.

Peter Yates' direction sustains the pulsating momentum throughout and William Faulkner's photography is superb. Much credit, of course, must be given Steve McQueen. A limited actor and liable to glide on his status as one of the leading celluloid fixtures in the iconography of anti-Establishmentarianism, he creates here, under Yates' controlling hand, an interesting and thoughtful study of the highly individualistic cop struggling to maintain his integrity against the inducements of the Vaughns of the world and his humanity against the sordidness and horror that play so great a part in his life.

boffo boobs bring bobbies

Motion-picture makers have finally put to rest the old fiction that vaudeville died and was replaced by movies because it became crude and out-of-date. The Night They Raided Minsky's is a thoroughly enjoyable comedy about a burlesque theatre that rolls present-day audiences in the aisles with boffo laffs, fast women and top bananas.

It's a story about an Amish girl who escapes to New York to become a dancer. She gets mixed up with Minsky's and accidentally creates the strip tease by tearing off her clothing and letting her boobs hang out.

The recreation of the 1920's atmosphere is good — too good in fact. Original film clips of the lower east side are mixed in with modern sequences that suddenly turn into colour pictures. After being fooled by this technique several times, you start looking for anachronisms in the main story. There aren't many.

The burlesque acts are fast-paced; there's no lull in the action while someone trots out a song or dance, as usually happens in today's musicals. The music and comedy advances the action and the burlesque spills out onto the streets between shows.

The casting is dead-on. For instance, Norman Wisdom plays the pathetic-little-guy role that he has given us ad nauseam in dozens of films.

This time it was just what was needed.

Britt Ekland, the Amish girl, looked fabulous. The other girls looked like real floozies in their 1920's stage make-up and very obvious lack of girdles. Ekland, of course, was given all the benefits of 1960's motion-picture make up and cosmetic techniques. I though this spoiled the realism, but the women in the audience identified with her completely. She gave a very convincing performance as carnality-in-innocence.

There is a real audience with real laughter in this film.

By the way, how did vaudeville die? Probably through the good old American custom of black-listing. Around the turn of the century, when vaudeville was booming, a handful of business managers tried to build up theatre chains across country. They indulged in cut-throat fights and "acts" took sides by signing with one manager or another. When a man caved in, his acts were black-listed or relegated to third-rate circuits. The acts subsequently went into flicker pictures or retired lay together on the sleeping bag and nothing touched them but the wind which was cool on their legs. They felt they were in a sea of air spinning freely under the warm sun. He leaned easily to kiss her parted lips and her breasts were warm in the sun.

But after they had made love and were hot with sex the mosquitoes converged and so they both took long drags on the wine and pushed out into their little lake.

About sixty yards off shore they again lowered the sail and dove into the cool water. They swam kicking, kicking their legs and he felt her body, smooth and plastic as she kicked away from him.

"Jesus Aud, watch where you're kicking!"

"Oh I'm sorry. Did I hurt you?"

"No. But Jesus Aud." He smiled admiringly. "Take my bloody nuts off."

And she laughed.

"All right," he said, and grabbed for her legs.

He felt a toe in his chin as she kicked away from him.

"Michael!"

"Oh no!"

"Oh no Michael, nooo!"

"Aha ha ha ha!"

Dunk.

Dunk dunk.

"You bastard."

"ahaha!"

"No more love for you," she said, pulling herself into the boat. And stuck out her tongue.

When he pulled himself up she pushed him back in. Then, revenged, she helped him into the boat and kissed him.

There they lay, still upon the water, watching the sun go down in a sky pierced by melancholy pines. While there was a glimmer of light they sailed back to their bay and he pulled up the boat, shaking the water from it. She shivered drawing deeply on the wine.

"Oooo . . . that's good," she said.

She smiled leaning against him, and they walked very slowly back to the car. Across the tracks they could hear the loud song of crickets in a dusky field. They were very tired, more tired than they had thought and they walked slowly while the woods raced about them. Chipmunks singing birds and shadows sang and fell about them and they did not speak until they had retraced the dark tracks through the woods and had reached the cottage.

That night they lay wine drowsy and warm in bed and he said to her that this is like a place in Wales except that now we are together.

The next morning they lay in the hazy sunlight which glanced through the severed shades, stretching easily and kissing each other awake. The light fell through and spread fading shadows on the golden down of her high cheekbones and he turned and brushed her cheek and blew into her ear.

"Ah you love it Aud," he said when she flickered and made from the bed.

He tried to pull her back, his arms about her waist, but she slipped loose and scampered out of the room. In a few minutes she was back, out of her dressing gown and into bed like a little beast. She had mixed a quart of orange juice and it lay beside the bed.

"Now you go make breakfast," she said as she handed him a glass.

"No. Make babies."

"No. Breakfast. Be nice, or I'll pound you."

He laughed, "O.K. . . . my darling greedy gut."

Downstairs he scrambled six eggs in a chipped porcelain bowl while she buttered his toast and cooked the bacon. Since there was only one frying pan Audrey used it first. Her bacon would stay hot while Michael cooked the eggs. When she had cooked the bacon Michael poured the yokes into the pan and watched them tighten into a sluggish omelette.

"This is a nice table," Audrey said. "This is what we have when we're married and have some screaming brats."

"Yeah, a great slab of a table. Something you can stick a dagger into and spill beer on."

"God if we ever do get married our house will be such an impossible collection of bric a brac that people will think we're eccentric millionaires."

"Ah, we will be."

Towards the end of that summer they were always walking over the burning rails and down that path to the water. The good weather held and while they lay in the wind tasting the water she would say don't say that because she did not want to hear it.

"Look at the sky Aud. How fast do you think those clouds are travelling?"

"Oh, well slowly."

"No no. They're going about a hundred miles an hour."

"No they're not."

"Well they must be for chrissake it's like anything from a distance."

"No you're wrong."

"Jesus fuck Aud, you contradict me?"

She pounded on his back as he held her down.

"Not tick-l-l-l-l-l," she gasped. "no-o-o-o."

She pounded harder. He stopped.

"Ohhhh. I really don't like that Michael," she said.

"But you laugh so hard."

"But I really don't like it.

It's like when I was little and my father used to take me into the water when we were at the sea and he would hold me in the waves and lift me up whenever I was about to drown. And I hated it and he thought I loved it because I just couldn't stop laughing. And every time we went I used to dread it but I couldn't talk so I couldn't tell him and he thought I just loved it."

Michael laughed.

"Maybe that's what I should do with you here. Hold you in the water until you're about to drown and then drag you out and tell you to build sandcastles or it's the whip. The Lash."

"God I'm going to be such a ruined woman. You're so cruel."

"Ah, my love."

"You are."

"My true true love."

iii

He had looked across to Wales and thought of himself as a child flying the sun. And he had thought of her and how she was truly one of the things in his life.

Now he thought of her lying beneath the white sky of Wales and saying I'm so happy and himself chewing a blade of grass and squinting at the wall of hard rocks across the bay where the ocean played. He saw her cover her eyes to turn to him and felt her hand upon his leg and as he turned his heart remembered her and ached.

He looked across to Wales and thought of that past summer.

He thought too of a church which had gone into memory like a pointed lance. That had been in Montreal. They had entered Notre Dame side by side and had seen the blue and gold pattern deep in shadows on the far wall.

The church rose in darkness and he had wondered at the mystery of the silent candles and the columns which disappeared into the shadows overhead. He stared at the deep blue pattern suffused with fantastic dim light and he wanted to feel himself lost in this light and darkness, transfigured, purged, an element of stone or water. He felt his head suddenly clear and remembered childhood when he had hated the sonorous ritual of those Sunday mornings.

She was standing by the pew unconscious of his eyes and he saw in her the woman that had lived and fused the centuries with her blood, the blood that filled his veins, that filled this church with prayers and shadows. And he wanted to weep for that which he should never understand, that unuttered wisdom which she carried in her womb. He took her hand and she looked up frankly and without emotion. And he felt the lie within himself that he should have tried to instill a sanctitude where there was none but only honest disbelief.

He had looked back at Notre Dame as they crossed the square and had tried to arrest that image in his mind, those dirty columns leading to the dim blue light, the rounded old steps mounting from the cobbled square, and the strong architecture of which he did not know the name. But later all he could recall was that he had loved her there and then he was not even sure of that.

And he looked across to Wales. There was Ireland beyond, and Dublin in its winter gloom and the riverside pubs filled with faces and the thick Guinness and he thought of that night when he had finally asked the taxidriver if there were no girls around.

The taxidriver had laughed and said yes we have girls.

"But the only place you'll find them tonight is — hey shut that door — the only place is about seven miles from here."

"And where would that be?"

"Well it's out by the Dublin Airport. Fifteen shillings."

The bar was a country shed and nothing more standing in dark and somber shadows beside the road. The wooden door creaked like a ceiling and inside the local crowd was drunk and noisy. He drank a pint of bitter and the men were friendly and sang.

'Oh! Love and porter make young men older

And love and whiskey make old men decay

So what can't be cured, love, must be endured love,

And so I am off to Americay.

For love is teasing, first hot, then freezing.

Love is a wonder when first got new;

But as love grows older, it soon grows colder,

And fades away with the morning dew.'

And later that night the girls had come out from the city in taxis. Two or three came together and when about fifteen had arrived they cleared out the back room and began to dance. These girls wore their skirts low and said who the hell are you kidding when he suggested bed. And when they kissed he felt their fingers at his back and the hot laughter in their throats. Who the hell are you kidding? He pulled them in and the hot fingers were at his back and they said what d'y want to do but stand in one place all night.

"Oh Ah saw you with that toter. Twas disgustin."

"Ah but I was waiting for you."

"Ah and yer upstairs fer dancin." and she pointed with a curling finger to her ear.

He laughed.

"And what are you?" he asked.

"Ah'm upstairs fer thinkin. Not fer the likes a you."

He laughed again.

"Ah no." he said, "I'm upstairs for thinkin like you never saw."

"Oh! Who're you kiddin?" But she laughed.

"Will you have a beer love?"

"I thought you were buyin f her."

"Well I was but. Will you have a beer?"

"Will you stay with me?" her mouth winked.

"Will you stay with me?" he asked.

"Oh it's you n me tonight dear."

"Ah. Right."

"Who're you kiddin?" And she laughed and kissed him hard.

They drank together, she giving him long warm kisses, her hands playing on his leg, but when he said he wanted her she said I'm not the one.

"Jesus Christ died fer me. What did you ever do?"

"Oh Jesus. I bought you a fuckin beer. That's more than He ever did!"

"Are you goin t leave me now?" she asked.

"I'm afraid so," he said. "You see. I. Want. Well have one more beer."

And she drank and kissed him hard and said that last night she had tried but she could not.

Later they took a taxi with her friends baek into Dublin.

"Who's payin?" her girl-friend asked.

"He's payin half."

They drove into town under the white stars and she sat on his lap giving him long kisses with her tongue. He felt for her breast beneath the coat but she held his hand back and forced her tongue farther into his mouth.

"Ah this fuckin door's in my way," she said.

They drove through the city streets and he felt for her breast and she said no. He was quite drunk and he said something about morality and sex but he immediately felt stupid and would not repeat it when she said what. She tongued him and swore for him and when they arrived the other girl said who's payin.

"I am for fuck's sake," he said.

"Well let's get out. Is he comin in?"

He was silent.

"Is your friend comin in?"

"Would you like to eome in?"

"I don't think so."

"Ah come in now."

"No. Thanks."

"Is he comin in?"

"Come."

"No. Thanks."

"Ah and it's the first time I ever asked anyone."

She lumbered from the ear and stood in the street.

He was silent. The first time.

"Goodbye my true love," she said.

"Goodbye."

The taxi drove down Amiens Street and stopped at the North Star Hotel. He gave the driver a big tip. Then he walked down to the River Liffey and followed the huge North Wall which rose on his left. He walked to one end of the pier and breathed in the cold air which smelled of the water. He waited there a long while watching the river earry things away, and then he spat into the darkness. The snow floated down and made the faroff lights twinkle. He wondered if she would remember him and imagined her walking purposefully through Dublin and suddenly stopping at a thought. The lights were cold and shining in the night and he felt his head clear. Goodbye my true love. Goodbye. Who the hell are you kidding? The snow fell lightly on his face and he turned for the hotel.

There are some moments when you are walking alone. He had to laugh. He had actually written that. Moments when the sun grabs you by the balls and bites. And stops you dead. Moments when a strong sharp pointed lance spills your guts and the wind blows them down the street. And you are not even sure of that.

So here he was back on that English heath which looks across the River Dee to Wales. There are some moments. There are some moments. Truth is a sensation. A swinging of the balls. He walked up that craggy footpath beside the wall of rocks, up around the corner of the wall where the ground slips into rocky shelves, and he came to the sundial. There the wind blew from the north and he turned toward the sea and waited for the sun to break. But the clouds were eoming fast across the sky and the sun was hidden. There were no fishing boats today, no knock of oars or whitecapped sea but only the ealm wrinkle of the water before the rain.

And yet it had all been part of him. These moments he had known, they were all part of him and it did not matter that nothing lasted, that nothing could last. It did not matter. Today you were this and this and you hurt and tomorrow you did not. It did not matter. He knew he would be happy if he could believe this but then his eyes glazed in thought.

The clouds from the north were heavy and blaek now and he looked out to sea and where the elouds faded into a dark horizon he knew it was raining. In the village below the red roofed cottages piped out smoke which rose clean and forlorn in a hollow of leaves and branches. He heard a dog's bark and the faint cry of children.

A sailboat swung out into the river and he thought of that Sailfish they had used on the little lake. And he remembered how she had dipped her hand and smiled whoopee-doo. He watched the sail clean and white against the water and he sucked in the wind so that it hurt his teeth. Did you ever hop trains? The sail was white and alone on the ocean's finger and as it came about and the boom swung he smiled. No I never hopped trains. You are my good love. Goodbye my true true love goodbye. The river was about a mile wide at the mouth and without the sun Wales was only a dark tomb against the sky. The sail blew out until it was a solitary whitecap on the wind and he watched the dark horizon moving down the sea. The rain was coming. The wind was beginning to die. Tomorrow perhaps the weather would turn His legs brushed the thorns and he stooped to see if the flowers had a fragrance. No. The cry of elildren was gone.

He stood on the plinth of the sundial's column and fingered the surface where the lines were drawn. Again he breathed the water on the wind but it did not touch the loneliness he felt, it did not touch him although he breathed hard. It was like trying to breathe in the sky. When you are angry at yourself you do not know why. But you stumble through and reach the other side and although everything is gone it does not matter. It does not matter because everything is part of you and to become so it must die in you. But least of all are you sure of that.

He looked out to the sea and watched the rain begin its ceaseless patterns. It eame in sheets which wound across the river. Now Wales was almost gone. He thought of that summer by the lake beyond the burning rails and felt the lonely fingers at his back and the impossible collection of babies made in a shack and nothing more by the two and three of them and every lonely finger floating out to sea and welcomed by the gulls when the ceiling below creaked at the entrance of her womb. The faroff tomb of tears and love's own hammer.

He bent for the flowers and watched the rain curl from the petals. The rain came hard now and as he turned he heard a cry so faint that he did not know if it were child or bird and he did not care.

He slipped off the plinth and walked back to the wall following it down to the road where the heath ends. There he turned for a last look at Wales and as he stood watching that black hill sink in the late afternoon he knew that something in him had not forgotten her, that she lay still beneath the blue sky of Wales, that his heart still moved with the water and the burning rails.

She lay in a cool clearing beneath a blue sky. With her eyes closed and her hand stretched out like a child. The branches bent with the wind from the lake and she touched his leg and said I'm so happy. He watched her for a long time and when he turned to kiss her parted lips her breasts were warm in the sun. ■

going to slug's

You hear some scary stories about New York's lower east side. Black people will stab you. You can't get a cab to take you there. Etc.

But Slug's is in the worst part of this place with the bad reputation. And since Slug's is where the jazz is happening, naturally I had to go there. However, since I had never been anywhere in my life (except Newmarket) it seemed a good idea to find Slug's before it got dark and fright-making.

Walking up the Bowery on a cold, clear Friday afternoon, I saw all the poor old buggers right out of it on the sidewalk. They just lay there, completely still, surrounded by empty bottles of Pete's white port. (5 star, Calif.)

What struck me about these old guys was that, although it was freezing out, they had no socks, and their ankles were livid red.

At the corner of East 3rd St. and Avenue B, some ragged old ruffian was burning a big pile of garbage in the street. Lying around the blaze was another old derelict, similarly sockless, for the moment not in danger of freezing to death. Just a few steps down Avenue B, there was a store which had had a fire, or its windows kicked in, or something. A huge pile of refuse spilled out through the window, across the sidewalk, and out onto the pavement.

Walking further east on 3rd St., things only got worse. I was gawking and craning my neck and being amazed by the desperation of it all, when suddenly this enormous black man lurched up to me. He was obviously stoned.

He stopped right in front of me and blocked my way and said, "Well, when I saw you from 50 feet down the street, I was getting ready to say, 'Hello, Miss.'"

I didn't get it. What does he want, my money, my blood, what? So I got him to repeat it 3 times. When I finally got the joke, I went "Ha, ha, ha, ha." Gulp.

Finally, there was Slug's, announced by a small wooden sign. On both sides were places that used to be stores. Their windows were now smashed and it seemed obvious that no one was in a hurry to reopen a business there. The windows on Slug's had bars on them.

The session next day started at 5 p.m. When I got there, there was one musician, walking up and down in front of Slug's. It was 5:10.

"Hey, are you Charles McPherson?" I asked. "Gee, I came all the way from Toronto to hear the music at Slug's."

He looked at me, as if to say, what kind of nut is this, anyway.

"Oh, are you going to be in New York very long? Why don't you come up to hear us at Minton's? Do you know anything about New York?"

Minton's is in Harlem. I knew that much, but I said no.

"Oh, well just remember, that if you come uptown, take a cab, 'cause you gotta be good in that part of town."

About 5:20, the man came to open up the club. A couple of musicians and a customer or two were waiting. We paid two dollars to get past the door.

A the front of Slug's is a solid-looking wooden bar with a big mirror up behind it. As you walk down the narrow room you come to an area with little round tables and old wooden chairs. The stage runs along the back wall.

I sat down and this young black man walked up and said "Hey man, you a beer drinker? Well, how'd you like to buy me a nail?"

Nail, I thought, nail, nail. That must be a new term for joint or something. Since I was still the only white person there, I thought I'd better be cool.

So I had to pay for his ale. Then, he sat there for four hours while a collection of alto saxophonists fought a drummer for decibel supremacy on stage. A young white saxophonist came in and looked nervous, but he practically blew everyone off the stand. He was very good, but no one mentioned his name.

Meanwhile, my companion kept saying, "Hey man, how about giving me a dollar so I can get a cab and go uptown and get me a sweet hot sausage?"

Finally, after watching him combing his mustache with a toothbrush and listening to how he had just got out of Bellevue after 5 months, I got up and made a little speech about what a drag it was that he was doing this to me. I mean, he just demanded the money because he was black and I was white. I slipped him half a buck and left.

By Sunday afternoon, I had hung around the lower east side so much that I felt like a regular. So I went back to Slug's, paid my two dollars, and stayed from 6 p.m. to 2 a.m.

Frank Foster's excellent band of eight men played to a like number of customers. Foster was witty and lucid in his introductions, and his writing was wild but disciplined, and the band played with spirit. They loved the music, you could tell.

Around 10 o'clock, Yusef Lateef started to play. He had left all his middle eastern things at home, and played mostly tenor sax, sounding like a cross between Ben Webster and Sonny Rollins. And to think I used to say, Yusef Lateef, who cares. He is a very fine musician. And his bassist, Cecil Mcbee, is great.

They were slated to keep playing until 4 o'clock, Monday morning, so I left early.

Outside, they had just finished loading Billy Higgins' drums into a car. I was standing around wondering why Higgins had left his stuff there all week (his gig had ended a week earlier.) One of Higgins' soul brothers came up to me and said "Hey man, are you a piano player?"

"Yes, how did you know?" I said.

"Well, didn't I see you playing up on East 10th St.?"

"No, I just came down from Canada for the week to hear some jazz."

"How would you like to buy a kilo?"

I said I didn't think so, thanks.

"I dig, man, I dig. Where are you staying?"

"Sloane House, on 34th St."

"Yeah? That's where I stayed when I came here from San Francisco in '59. I'm a piano player too . . ."

We talked for another five minutes and then the black man, who limped, said, "Well, man I gotta split. Got a record date with Billy in the morning. So be beautiful, baby, be beautiful."

And he walked away down Avenue B, and around a pile of garbage which was still spilling out through the broken store window across the sidewalk, and finally out of sight.

edward as marlowe would have played him

Can a modern theatrical company present an Elizabethan drama in a moving and polished manner? This question is presently being answered with a resounding yes at the Royal Alex. But unfortunately, the question, "is a modern theatre audience capable of responding to same in a very big way?" is still very much up in the air.

Christopher Marlowe's Edward II which opens the 1969 Theatre Toronto season is a long play — even with cuts it is far too long for modern audiences. It is also a ponderous, humourless play, only seldom exciting theatrically. People try to make something of its modern relevance to human psychology in general, but even that is very much in doubt as far as I'm concerned.

Edward II is (predictably) the story of a bad king, whose disastrous reign tumbles his country into the throes of bitter civil war. It is a story of statecraft, and the corruption and pride of the individuals who seek to rule. It is a story of Fortune's Wheel which crushes all those who seek to rise too high. It is also a story of love — Queen Isabella's love for her husband and Edward's homosexual relations with his court favourite, Gaveston.

Those in the audience who came to see the revelation of King Edward's illicit love were sadly disappointed. Director Clifford Williams elects to accord Edward's homosexuality no more attention than Marlowe intended. It is strongly suggested throughout but never explicit or exploited. What is central to Williams' production is the throne which dominates the stage throughout, and the crown which is invested with an almost mystical aura. It is the reverence for kingship which holds this play together and gives it whatever relevance it may have.

Purists will rejoice at Clifford Williams' interpretation of Edward II — because there is almost no interpretation at all. Williams directs Marlowe, as Marlowe might have directed himself. He allows a fine, experienced cast to draw the beauty and poetry from the lines. He lets the glory of royal pageantry speak for itself, and avoids the artificial effects of lighting and sound which we usually associate with modern readings of old plays. In this respect Williams remains faithful to Marlowe, but cruelly neglects his audience, because he has undoubtedly chosen the dulllest interpretation of a number of dull alternatives.

Luckily what the players did on stage justifies Williams' approach. Always majestic and prideful, sometimes petulant and petty, William Hutt is every inch a king even in his humiliation and death. Queen Isabella is played in a fascinating way by Moya Fenwick. The supple features of her face can express all emotions remarkably. But a bogus French accent nearly ruins her fine performance.

Theatre Toronto's Edward II is not what you would call a 'theatrical happening', neither will it be called one of the most novel or exciting plays of the year. The production is however a simple and faithful reading of Marlowe's play by a fine cast. Unfortunately this is not enough. In an age when novelty and entertainment are the highest criteria by which audiences judge plays, Christopher Marlowe's Edward II (no matter how good the production) offers neither. Productions Theatre Toronto's production succeeds artistically in my opinion, but only vigorous staging and theatrical gimmickry can keep modern audiences from eventually relegating Marlowe's masterpieces to the shelves of archives and museums

FACULTY!

University level teaching specialists required on a part time basis to edit and complete existing course outlines into suitable format for publication. Material may require reorganization, correction, or supplementary information in keeping with accepted University courses. Subject matter under construction is in the fields of Art, Architecture, Astronomy, Chemistry, Physics, Economics, Political Science, Philosophy, Geology, History, English, Psychology, Mathematics and Sociology.

This is an excellent opportunity to supplement your income by working in your own field.

Please write outlining particulars of qualification — TO: Mr. G. Matthews, ## cohn-bendit doomed -----to romantic existence

This is quite an extraordinary book. One is left with mixed feelings of intense dislike of the author's megalomania and pomposity, admiration for his toughness and intelligence, a mild distrust of his tactics and basic pomposity. The author is on an ego trip. Beware of ego trippers.

The book has limitations; Cohn-Bendit does not simply attack the universities, the French Communist Party, and the Bolshevik role in the Russian Revolution. He pulverizes them. It is essentially a rhetorical book, a powerful polemic; he is out to prove the basic of the Communist bureaucratic 'counterrevolutionaries', the total depravity of bourgeois society and its soft underbelly, the universities, and with such a goal in mind he marshals the weaponry of master debater, fire and thunder preacher, buffoon, Marxist intellectual, revolutionary hero.

The disadvantages of this approach are basically twofold. The first is overkill. Cohn-Bendit's opponents are attacked with all the finesse and subtlety (and fairness) of an onslaught of sledge hammers on a gang of unarmed children. This is the problem of all Marxist internecine quarrels: one is either a running dog, a Fascist pig, or a treacherous traitor to the glorious revolution. There is little room for mere incompetence, honest disagreement, or misjudgement. The approach lacks, to say the least, a basic humanity.

The other disadvantage is that the narrator is so belligerent and obtrusive that the reader's response is almost inevitable. This is, of course, more or less the case with every book one reads (until books are produced by computers for mass and Review consumption.) More or less. But take these first few sentences: "publishers now come chasing after me, begging me to write about anything I choose, good or bad, exciting or dull; all they want is something they can sell — a revolutionary gadget with marketable qualities.

Strange, isn't it, this Cohn-Bendit myth, this legend of the 'cherubic Danton.' This, my friends, is not a modest man.

But great books are not always written by modest men, and this book has an importance that demands something more than a critique of Daniel Cohn-Bendit's personality flaws.

Cohn-Bendit's approach is essentially anarchistic, in the tradition of Luxemburg, Liebknecht, and German Spartacists: spontaneity and participation are the bases of his revolutionary thought. The sin of organized Communism since 1917 has been its determination to bureaucratize the Revolution. Two of the best chapters of the book deal with the Makhno revolt in 1917 and the Kronstadt revolt in 1921-22: Cohn-Bendit is obviously interested in purifying his own intellectual tradition, but nevertheless these chapters represent the most powerful criticism in the book.

Cohn-Bendit's influence, on students as on European and western politics, will be limited. He is, in many ways, an instant personality, a plastic personality, as much the product of the media as Pierre Trudeau. As government legislates reform, and as a genuine and revived movement of the traditional left develops, the influence of the spontaneous Marxists as an organized movement, as the recognized leaders of the students, will decline.

Cohn-Bendit, therefore, is doomed to a romantic existence. He will become the conscience of the Marxist left, but never the leader. One cannot become as optimistic as he is about the possibility of revolutionizing and liberating society. Life styles do not change that easily. His last chapter, 'c'est tout toi que tu fais revolution' is an eloquent — if frequently rhetorical — revolutionary credo. A realistic appraisal of 'what is to be done' it is not.

But read the book. Its analysis is tough, uncompromising, and persuasive. And much of the talk of participation, community control, the sterility of the bourgeois university, and attempts to de-alienate the Organization Man will begin to make more sense after reading his critique.

livesay's poetry of social comment

Dorothy Livesay, The Documentaries, Ryerson Press, Toronto, $4.95.

The poetry here under review represents something rare in Canadian literature, poetry of social commentary, poetry which goes beyond the purely personal or the abstractly metaphysical. To be sure, there is no dearth of writers today to declaim on the horrors of the Vietnam War, as in that collection of self-righteous emotion, The New Romans. But there are few Canadian poets indeed, for whom social commentary flows out of their real-life experience, who see poetically and not just cerebrally or rhetorically, the repressive reality in the society around them.

The 1930's was a period in which that repression was obvious, as real as the nearest dole line or vacant farm. For poets such as Dorothy Livesay, the old lyrical preoccupations no longer sufficed, for poetry had to become political. She was "fired with the desire to set down in documentary form what was happening to my Canadian generation, historically and socially." The results are these documentary poems, republished twenty and thirty years later, when youth is again astir with political radicalism.

Livesay writes in a very traditional style, iambics and all, yet it is somehow very appropriate to the period. The starkness of life calls for a certain starkness in form; experiment is somehow the luxury of more prosperous times.

We prayed for miracles:
the prairie dry,
Our bread became a blister
in the sun;
We watched the serene untouchable vault of sky
—In vain our bitter labour had been done.

For the Outrider, the prophet, returning to a rural Ontario he had once known, the bitterness of drought matches the bitterness and nostalgia he experiences for a rural life now destroyed. Yet figuratively it is life itself that has been destroyed in the 1930's; the Depression hangs like a blister in the sky.

In "Day and Night"! Livesay focuses on the drab industrial world she had come to know as a social worker in both Montreal and New Jersey.

One step forward
Two steps back

Shove the lever,
Push it back is a conscious reversal of Lenin's formula. Day and night pass, but there is scarcely time for reflection, let alone for peace (double entendre). Sings the Negro stoker:

'Boss, I'm smothered in the darkness Boss, I'm shrivellin' in the flames Boss, I'm blacker than my brother Blow your breath down here.

In the Inferno of the factory, the bosses' profit makes the world go round.

But there is hope, as the workers' fury mounts; each at his machine sees the Inferno blowing, waits for the opportunity to exploit a foreman's temporary weakness. Reality is repressive, but the revolution breeds hope.

The finest poem in the book relates not to the 1930's, however, but to the Second World War, and to the uprooting of the Japanese from the West Coast. For in her documentary, "Call My People Home", Livesay captures the despair of an innocent people, whom political repression suddenly strikes out of the blue.

Home was my boat: T.K.
2930 - Wintering on the Skeena with my nets
Cast up and down the river, to lure and haul
The dogfish.

So sang the fisherman, until one day an order arrives, instructing all boats to report to the nearest authorities.

How speak about the long trip south, the last
We ever made, in the last of our boats?
The time my life turned over, love went under
Into the cold unruly sea.
Those waves
Washing the cabin's walls
Lashed hate in me.

The documentary goes on to trace the varying reactions of Japanese-born, and native-born Japanese-Canadians, the cold hostility, modified only by the occasional generosity, of the population of British Columbia. The mood is not all hatred or bitterness; even in transplantation the love of life can win out, or the memory of good times lost bring solace.

In fact, exile is in the end ennobling. Beyond their fishing fleets or villages, the Japanese-Canadians come to see their experience in cosmic terms:

Home is labour, with the hand and heart,
The hard doing, and the rest when done:
A rougher ocean than we knew, a tougher earth,
A more magnetic sun.

Consciousness, political and philosophical, is something that comes out of life itself.

Other poems in the book, such as "Ontario Story" and "Roots", convey Livesay's love for the land, the traditional preoccupation of Canadian poetry. Yet it is not a cloying love which comes through here, rather one mediated through the same prism of acceptance and rejection which underlies her social poetry.

Documentaries does not contain great poetry, but it has good poetry in it, clearly and cleanly expressed. More importantly, it deals with subject matter which only infrequently finds its way into Canadian literature, but which is absolutely crucial for any radical poetic or political sensibility. There is no absence of poets on ego-trips in this country; indeed, the political culture of liberal capitalism does everything to encourage this tendency. What is required, now as thirty years ago, are poets with social consciousness. Dorothy Livesay helps show the way.

FILM CANADA

David Cronenberg's first two films, Transfer and From the Drain, received relatively little attention when they were first screened. But now, word filtered up from a usually reliable source that he was currently finishing a more ambitious 35 mm. feature (called Stereo) shot in Toronto and to be released early this year. That was the extent of my knowledge of David Cronenberg.

On a cold night, when the snow blown up from the railway yards is blackened before it hits the pavement, Front Street is a depressingly desolate place. I went to interview Cronenberg at Film House opposite Union Station that evening where he was cutting the negative for Stereo. From somewhere on the darkened second floor a tiny transistor radio was pumping out the electronic shriek of some rock station. Room 4 in which he was working is all clean fluorescent light and white paint. Cronenberg was standing at the work table in a brown corduroy suit and plaid shirt spooling film onto an empty reel. He clicked off the radio and the ventilation system hummed away in the silence.

When he looks at you his eyes have this way of boring themselves into yours not out of maliciousness but from a sense of curiosity. You find yourself compelled to believe in his sincerity — something he calls his attitude of "wide-eyed cynicism".

Cronenberg had been in Room 4 for eight solid hours when I arrived, and intended to be there for the rest of the night to justify the rental cost of the editing facilities. One reel had already been completed but a dozen strips of film hung from editing clips while above his head an unfinished stack of un-spooled rolls sat on a shelf. A menu for a nearby take-out restaurant had been taped up on one wall.

"When I started making films, I graduated straight into 16 mm. colour. I just looked up in the encyclopaedia 'camera' and 'lens' and started shooting with very sophisticated equipment. Stereo is a little beyond that underground sort of thing but I still feel like an alien in the house of film . . ." (then a quick glance at the work table) ". . . but not Film House."

Then, silence, with that look of amused curiosity or perhaps toleration.

Cronenberg's latest film follows the pattern of many independently produced Canadian features. Shot exclusively at Scarborough College with a small cast of friends, Stereo was financed largely by Cronenberg himself as his ticket to ride into the art-house circuit. Distribution is being handled by Film Canada, about the only agency with wide enough connections to make a Canadian release economically feasible. As Cronenberg admits, if Film Canada rejects a film the maker is pretty well screwed commercially in Canada. However, all is now groovy and secure and the film has admittedly been "kind of a nice experience".

Canada rejects a film the maker is pretty well screwed commercially in Canada. However, all is now groovy and secure and the film has admittedly been "kind of a nice experience".

As the title indicates, the plot of Stereo is multi-dimensional. The inspiration for the film arose from nothing specifically other than Cronenberg's general distaste for the blunt approach towards anything. It concerns the activity within a community of telepathists isolated from any other environmental influences. Communication between the characters is so cerebral as to be unspoken, and the entire film is constructed like an educational film for children with an underlying pseudo-scientific soundtrack interspersed with complete verbal blackouts. A definite narrative line does exist, although it cannot be revealed to the public at this time. Beware one danger.

"I'm going to really hate it if some critic sees Stereo as a documentary. It's not. It's educational. I didn't put everything in it so everyone can't take whatever they want out of it. It's not ambiguous although there are enough volatile elements within it so that it has an organic life of its own."

Like any independent filmmaker, a lot of creative aggressiveness lies behind Cronenberg's perpetual gaze of curiosity.

"Actually this . . ." (with a quick gesture around the room) ". . . is a complete drag. It's like with all the boring, had and stupid things Godard leaves in his films just so that he can get on to the next one. But everything's still got to fit. In a way it's good because it means that thinking about a second film makes me see everything in this one completely fresh."

I find myself stumbling around with another question but there really isn't any need for one now. Somehow questions become unnecessary when you're talking to Cronenberg — sort of pointless formality. After talking for a while things become hyper-low key.

"A lot of people have been putting a great price on creativity and a lot of people have become frustrated because of it. They live in a creative or non-creative ghetto. I don't believe in a complete surrendering of oneself to the medium and I don't emulate any particular minor or major film-maker. But as creative spirits go I do admire Nabokov."

Another pause and then with only a half-joking smile he adds, "You could say that it's going to be the best film ever made in Canada."

I thank him for the interview, he smiles to himself, and I walk away from Room 4. Behind me I can hear rock music echoing down the hall.

ET CETERA

The Review's favourite rock men, Its All Meat, are playing Saturday night at the Rock Pile in between Muddy Waters and the regular Pile house band. Jed McKay on the organ, Rick McKim on the drums, and a couple of others at lead and guitars make up Meat. They have been blasting the Kapp house and the Buttery with practice sounds, but they are ready now and they are good, good, good, good, so good . . . See them.

MUSIC

Buddy Guy's band doesn't have the sort of sheer, overwhelming power that the James Cotton blues band displayed at the Riverboat a while back — and thank God. It's about time a band realized what a small place the Riverboat is, and played accordingly. Buddy Guy's voice isn't very loud, but it is very interesting, and it can actually be heard.

Part of this can be attributed to the kind of band Buddy Guy has put together. Many Chicago bands — many of the greatest ones — generate their excitement from a sort of controlled free-for-all effect, with every member of the group having about equal importance. Buddy Guy's band lives for its soloist. He pretty well carries the whole show.

This isn't to say that he doesn't have good men with him. Honest Johnson and Charles Hicks give him extremely fine backing in the rhythm section, and A.C. Reed (Sax) and J.C. States (trumpet) do a good job of complementing Guy's guitar playing, with Reed also filling in some nice jazz-style blues vocals. But this is in the tradition of the B.B. King and T-Bone Walker bands with the focus deservedly on the guitarist.

And what a guitarist Buddy Guy is. His timing and his technique are breathtaking. He's moving and changing the Chicago style. When he played in the Junior Wells band, he used many more of the usual Chicago cliches, but now he is becoming more and more his own man and his playing is almost entirely his own ideas.

ART

Michael Snow, Mr. "Walking Women" is exhibiting at the Isaacs Gallery; Oldenburg, father of the oldenburger, is showing some of his prints at the Pollock Gallery, phase two. The Royal Ontario Museum has some great Tunisian mosaics which quite impressed this reviewer.

It has been suggested that art criticism is futile and pretentious and that my column would better serve the public if photographs of currently-exhibited works were simply displayed without comment, or if the column became a forum for art students and interested public. How about it?

BLUES

Buddy Guy's extraordinary, searing guitar leads his group at the Riverboat this weekend and all next week. He's modern and tough, with a mean blues sound and a guitar style that has to be heard. It's pretty much a solo effort, but he has a tight Chicago band helping him out. The sound doesn't overpower his singing which is a welcome change. Altogether a recommended event.

There aren't too many Chicago blues players who could take on Buddy Guy, and even if it were only one, it would have to be Muddy Waters. He'll be here for one night only, Saturday, at the Rock Pile. His present band has been getting better and better on records, and a recent communication from a knowledgeable blues enthusiast in England is full of praise for the hands' engagement over there. Muddy Waters hasn't been in Toronto for quite a while and he may not be back again soon, so don't miss the opportunity to hear him.

His singing is also changing. When he first set up his own band, his singing was very closely modeled on Junior Wells' — too much so for my taste. He still uses the Junior Wells style to some extent especially in a highly mannered approach to "Stormy Monday", which was saved from sounding like a straight imitation only by an abrupt change of mood at the end and some extraordinary guitar playing, unlike anything that ever came out of a Junior Wells band.

The outstanding number of the set, though, was a brilliant version of "Hoochie Coochie Man" sung in very much his own voice. He has the kind of blues voice that can make familiar words suddenly hit you. When he says, "I'm gonna make you little girls lead me by the hand," you know that he has something on his mind.

The only criticism I have, is that some of the material wasn't good enough. There were too many long instrumental segments. They had some exciting moments, but there were also some flat ones. But the first set of a two week engagement is probably the worst time to hear any band, and the problem of the material may very well work its way out.

We're all psychologically immature: Ivey

By ALF CHAITON

The adoption of revised residence rules at New College was the result of a natural desire among students for greater responsibility, says Principal Donald G. Ivey.

The recent controversy over women's visiting hours at the College was unfortunate, he feels, because The Varsity tended to play up the issue of confrontation. He does not believe there were two distinct, opposing sides to the question.

"The incident — as you call it — at New College, was resolved on the basis of amicable discussion, by the parties most directly concerned, to the satisfaction of the majority of those involved."

Principal Ivey said he accepts the necessity for authority, for himself as well as others, since he believes the alternative is anarchy.

"I do not believe students are incompetent to make the decisions regarding their own lives," he said, "but neither do I believe they (nor any other group society) are totally competent in the sense that they are free to make all decisions without consultation and without considering the implications for society.

"Everyone seems loath to raise the point that absolute liberty is a contradiction," he said.

He went on to remark that

New College has "the reputation of a quiet residence." This reputation has not been "imposed from above", but has "evolved."

"To achieve results, we need a consensus," he said.

Dr. Ivey feels that his role in the College is a matter of education — not only in the scholastic field, but also in the development of the psychological maturity of the residents.

As for the incident at New, Dr. Ivey explained that most residents never have female guests up to their rooms anyway. He said even the Residence Committee admitted it is a minority who do so.

He feels that it was not for the basic interests of the majority of residents that the Committee demanded open weekends, but that they wanted to establish the principle of deciding the rules for themselves.

"The Committee said they would refuse to enforce women's hours," he added. "But the rules were still there. Either we could enforce them in some other way, or we could seek to change them. It was in the best interests of all concerned to choose the latter. Thus new rules have come into existence, and the steady evolution continues."

He feels that a basic part

of the educational process is the development of maturity. "Maturity," he said, "implies responsibility, not only for yourself, but for others.

"We are all in a sense psychologically immature."

1/3 not enough says Lit pres. He wants half.

By STEVE COWLEY

The University College Literary and Athletic Society is angry with an administration refusal to allow 50-50 student-faculty representation on UC's studentless Residence and Property Planning Committee.

Lit President Howard Goldblatt (IV UC) says the one-third student representation offered by the administration is "totally unacceptable."

Goldblatt says the committee last year turned down a request to abolish women's visiting hours at Sir Daniel Wilson men's residence despite the fact that a referendum called for it.

"Ideally a residence committee should consist entirely of students," Goldblatt says. "Anything less than 50-50 representation is unjustifiable."

Goldblatt said student representation is particularly important at this time since plans for mass renovation of UC are under way.

UC Principal D. V. LePan said last night Goldblatt was overemphasizing the importance of the residence committee question.

He termed the administrative offer of one-third student representation on the committee an "improvement," but refused to comment on the proposed 50-50 split.

EVEN SWIM BLUES LOSE! (GASP)

The University of Toronto swimming Blues suffered their first dual meet loss to a Canadian college in ten years Wednesday night. Blues fell victim to the host University of Guelph in a meet that wasn't decided until the final relay of the evening.

One of the bright lights for Blues was rookie Mike Guinness, a triple winner in the 1,000, 500 and 100 freestyle.

Other event winners for Toronto were Terry Bryon, 200 butterfly, Gaye Stratten, 200 back, and Barry Bowerman, 200 breaststroke.

The 400 medley relay team of Stratten, Bowerman, Bob Heatly and Doug MacIntosh was also victorious.

Pool records were set in the 1,000 freestyle, 200 fly, and 200 back.

Blues have the opportunity to avenge their loss this Saturday, when they host the University of Western Ontario in the Hart House pool. The meet starts at 2:00 p.m.

Spectators are welcome.

NAPOLEONIC BLUES REBOUND FROM WATERLOO DEFEAT

Special to The Varsity

LONDON — Varsity Blues moved back into first place in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League last night as they recorded a hard-fought 7-5 victory over the hometown Western Mustangs.

The win moved Blues two points ahead of Waterloo Warriors, who upset them 3-2 Wednesday night at Varsity Arena. However Warriors have a game in hand.

Varsity completes a tiring three-games-in-four-days schedule Saturday afternoon with a game against fourth-place Windsor Lancers.

The game against Mustangs was in doubt until the final minutes when Blues' Paul Laurent scored his second goal of the night into an empty net at 19:43.

Western had roared back from a 6-2 deficit to narrow the gap to 6-5 with three goals in the last ten minutes as Blues tired understandably after their tough contest the previous night.

Varsity netminder Tom Little lent a huge helping hand to the victory, despite being cut twice in the second period, each time from wild scrambles in front of the Toronto net. The latter was the more serious, requiring three stitches on the top of his head and suspending the last minute and a half of play until the beginning of the third period.

Western outshot Blues 44-40, and Little was especially sharp in the middle stanza when Mustangs were outscored 4-1 despite an 18-13 edge in shots.

In addition to Laurent's two goals for Toronto, Ward Passi also had a pair, with singletons coming from Paul McCann, Gord Cunningham and Bob McClelland.

Brent Imlach and John Makins each had two goals for Mustangs with Paul Richards getting the other.

Wednesday night's game at Varsity Arena was far and away the best of the year. Action was fast and furious throughout, and the goaltending at both ends of the rink spectacular.

Waterloo's victory was their first over Toronto since entering the league in 1964. It was also Blues' first loss on home ice since Dec. 10, 1965 when they dropped a 6-5 decision to Laval.

Warriors were full measure for their exciting win. They outplayed Blues most of the way, and but for the work of netminder Tom Little might have won by two or three goals.

The arena was in a constant uproar as the teams flashed from end to end, dishing out bodychecks galore and whizzing the puck by countless open corners. Hordes of Waterloo fans who drove down for the game added to the din with their incessant nattering.

Rick Bacon gave Waterloo a 1-0 lead in a bruising first period, which yielded 36 minutes in penalties including a major-minor each to Blues' Paul Laurent and Warriors' Dick Oudekerk.

Goals by Bob McClelland and Ward Passi gave Toronto a brief 2-1 lead in the second period, but Waterloo came back for the victory on goals by Ken Laidlaw and captain Ron Robinson before the period ended.

The linesmen do their job with rugged efficiency during Wednesday night's game with Waterloo. The occasion was a first period brawl between Blues' Paul Laurent (8) and Warriors' Dick Oudekerk (5).

Morrison says he'll be back. Phoey!

By JIM MORRISON

Varsity Blues' status in the Senior Intercollegiate Basketball League should be obvious after their home opener this Saturday afternoon at York. Blues face league-leading Western Mustangs, a team already being touted as potential national champions on the strength of exhibition wins over 1968 national winners Waterloo Lutheran and SIBL Eastern leader Carleton University. Game time at the Keele and Steeles campus is 3 p.m.

Sophomore guard Larry Trafford played his finest game yet for Varsity on Wednesday night, contributing defensive skill and 19 points to Toronto's 84-74 decision over Guelph Gryphons in Blues' league opener.

"We played well in spots, but slipped towards the end", said Coach McManus. Blues led by 26 points with four minutes left in the game.

Varsity's principal weakness is shooting skill at the forward position. Aside from center John Hadden, who collected 14 points and 8 rebounds, and Dale Crouter, with 10 points, Blues had to rely on the marksmanship of guards Trafford, Bruce Dempster (16 points) and Peter Burton (14 points).

Mustangs arrive on the heels of what Coach Gerry Conser deemed their finest effort yet — a 77-59 trouncing of Waterloo Warriors Wednesday evening.

Heading the Western roster is former Varsity great Jim Holowachuk, who has been scoring and rebounding with aplomb at the center slot. He, along with veteran Bob Larose, give Mustangs the most muscular forward combination in the League.

Additional scoring ability is provided by all-star forward Dave McGuffin and forward Doug Morton, who seems to reserve his best games for Varsity consumption. Greg Poole, also a 1968 all-star, rounds out the roster at guard.

Western's only visible weakness, and the one Blues are sure to pick on, is the lack, aside from Poole, of quality guards.

I'll be back, Mickleburgh.

MURPH SELECTS CAST FOR NEW MAT ROLE

By JIM COWAN

Football-cum-wrestling coach Ron Murphy has been on the job less than a week and already the rigors of his new position have caught up with him.

It seems Murphy decided to join the boys on the mats Wednesday. Now he's known as Hop-a-long Murphy, the fastest crutch in the east.

"I was working out with our heavyweight," he said last night. "I did something, then he did something, and we didn't do it right. My knee went."

So Hop-a-long's, er... Ron's right leg will be in an ankle-to-hip cast for the next five weeks, while the ligaments in his knee heal.

Murphy says he's not really the wrestling coach. "Paul Bewick is still coach," he explains, "I'm just helping out."

The football Blue's mentor was brought in to help when Beswick, a Royal Military College graduate, found he couldn't coach the team and wrestle at the same time. So now he's the playing coach.

Murphy has taught wrestling — both at Toronto and McGill. Comparing it to football, he says, "You have to be in a hell of a lot better shape for wrestling than for football. In football you get that break, but in wrestling it's continuous action."

Blues will need all their coaching experience this Saturday when they host the perennially powerful Western Mustangs in the Hart House gym at 2 p.m. Western and Guelph usually battle it out for the OQAA wrestling title.

But Larry Baron, five year veteran from McGill, figures Blues could pull an upset. "The guys have been working hard enough," he said at last night's practice. "There aren't many injuries."

Baron himself adds strength to Varsity's squad. He has been OQAA champ three times, and runner-up twice. Tomorrow he'll be wrestling in the 191 lb. class.

"He's an excellent wrestler," says Murphy. "He's willing to work with the new guys. It's like having an extra coach on the team."

Blues also expect good efforts from Beswick and Bill Allison, in the 160 and 167 lb. classes respectively. The rest of the team will be: Ken White (130 lb.), Ted Sauer (137), Mauro Dipasquale (145), Dave Simms (152), Ernie Friedrich (177), and Ylo Korgemagi (heavyweight).

And with Hop-a-long Murphy riding the range, Mustangs had better beware.

Wearing a blue collar at U of T

BY LOUIS ERICHMAN

The old man in the rumpled blue shirt and baggy pants who mops the floors in the Trinity College residence makes $1.25 an hour.

His counterpart at University College makes $2.29 an hour for the same job. The U.C. man belongs to a union. The Trinity employee does not.

For non-academic employees on campus — people who wash the floors, prepare the food, find the books, rake the leaves, run the furnaces and even tag the cars — this situation is indicative.

Of the 6,000 people like this only about 600 are unionized. Their working situation ranges from adequate to deplorable.

The largest group of unionized workers is the local of building employees. This includes all maintenance staff on university buildings and grounds, except for the three federated colleges: Trinity, Victoria and St. Mike's. Maintenance workers at University and New College residences are also members of the union.

Union scales are $2.29—$2.36/hr. for male cleaners, watchmen and groundsmen (Women cleaners are paid $1.86—$1.93/hr.) Workers in the University stores get $2.39/hr., bus drivers and "key" men (the men who open and lock the buildings and work 44 hour weeks — others are generally 40 hours) get $2.44/hr., garbage men get $2.50/hr. while trades helpers get $2.80/hr. Caretakers in charge of buildings are paid monthly, and receive up to $7000 a year, depending on the size of the building and the work they do.

Each of the three federated colleges hires its own staff, none of whom is unionized. All three were unwilling to give out salary scales for their employees.

At St. Michael's College, janitors and cleaners seem to earn $1.70-$2.20/hr. (receiving probably at least 20 cents below the unions scale), while carpenters and tradesmen earn $2.10-2.30/hr. (a minimum of 50 cents below union scale.)

The colleges' maintenance workers made several complaints. The college takes advantage of a regulation exempting it from paying unemployment insurance premiums, so that its employees are not covered. (The university pays unemployment insurance for its employees). Overtime is paid at a straight rate. Cases were cited of accumulated sick leave not paid. A man with 30 days accumulated over three years was paid for only two weeks, though ill for 45 days. The college's private insurance plan pays only 50 per cent of wages for a limited time, instead of 75 per cent which is paid by Workmen's Compensation.

St. Michael's College employs a very high percentage of Portuguese immigrants.

"As soon as they begin to understand English and see now badly they're doing, they leave and get a better job," one worker said. "The large turnover leaves the college perpetually understaffed."

At Victoria College controller K. M. Dinsmore says the wage scale of the college, being a private institution is a matter between the administration and its employees alone. "But", he said, "we are in competition with the university and the other colleges and have to keep our wages in line."

The competition seems to be less than vigorous. A cleaner in the college earns $2.04/hr., 25 cents less than the university rate. Residence workers' salaries are much lower. A maid in the women's residence starts at $1.25/hr and only works a six-hour day.

Vic also does not cover its employees with unemployment insurance. One 60-year-old cleaner who had worked there for two years, complained that he could not get into the college pension scheme, but he felt that the college would let him keep working after 65.

George Shepherd, the bursar of Trinity College, said that the college was too small to have real wage scale, but that competition with the university and other colleges keeps salaries "pretty much in line."

At any rate, Trinity seems to believe in promoting the classic virtues of sacrifice and self-denial, for its employees at least. Cleaners in the residence are paid $1.25/hr.

The college employees seem to be locked into their jobs, for they are mostly old and unskilled. A Victoria cleaner expressed the opinion they preferred to hire older men "because they are more reliable."

A plumber at St. Mike's said that, at 54, he was too old to keep pace in private construction work.

Most of the workers seemed to believe they could have their jobs as long as they wanted them, but they may find security of tenure is likely more tenuous than they expect, since both Victoria and St. Hilda's residences have fired a number of people within the last year.

WORKERS

Many of the workers are immigrants who do not speak enough English to get another job. Many are fairly satisfied with their conditions and their job. One maid said that her hours (7.30 a.m.-2.30 p.m.) allowed her to be home with her children. For some the wages and job are better than those they had previously. For others, the university is just a more interesting place to be.

Many of them have worked there for years and have developed sentimentalities. Some workers even live in the basement of the Vic residence.

All this adds up to an almost universal eagerness to hold on to their job. The chances of an

Third student attempt to stop Peterboro presses ends in failure

Student participation in the 11-week old Peterborough Examiner strike came to an end Friday as approximately 150 students decided to leave the picket lines around 10:30 that morning, just four hours after they had begun to picket.

This was the third time that students had joined with the guild workers in an attempt to keep typographers and pressman from entering the plant and producing the paper.

On Wednesday about 80 students from the Universities of Waterloo, Carleton, Toronto, Windsor, York, and Ryerson were out on the lines.

By Thursday they were joined by about 30 more students. Most of Thursday was spent in other Peterborough plants handing out leaflets asking for the co-operation of other union workers.

By Friday the number of students had increased to 150, but they were only "token" pickets. The guild had advised them to not engage in any militant action, and they were required to step out of line every time someone wanted to enter the Examiner building.

A busload of pressmen from the Toronto area joined the lines around 9 a.m. Friday, but failed to persuade the Peterborough pressmen to honor the line.

CNLF trials begin today

The trial of 32 persons arrested during the Canadians for the National Liberation Front demonstration Oct. 26 begins today in the Council Chambers of old City Hall.

A special court under Judge Crawford Guest has been arranged to last as long as necessary.

Among those on trial are Prof. Peter Rosenthal, a University of Toronto mathematics professor, Daniel Drache, a lecturer in political economy, Steven Moore, a graduate student in history, Laurel Limpus, graduate in sociology, and Ken Stone, vice-president of Ontario Union of Students.

A table will be set up in the Sidney Smith lobby to distribute information about the arrests and take donations to pay for legal help.

PSU presents Insanity '69

Insanity strikes next week. Or, more to the actual truth, the Psychology Student Union is sponsoring Insanity '69, a teach-in presenting Marat-Sade to Northrop Frye.

In the form of panels and films, the teach-in will explore sanity and insanity in our society. Among the panel discussions will be such topics as Lust Murderers, Warrendale, and Why People Crack Up, with panelists from the Clarke Institute, criminologists and the aforementioned Northrop Frye.

Other attractions are the two films "Warrendale" and "Marat-Sade", the first for free, and the second for a small fee of 50 cents.

The teach-in is a development of the counter-courses offered by the Psychology Students Union to remedy the lack of abnormal psychology in the formal courses.

May God rest ye sane: it will be held from Jan. 27 to Feb. 3.

Canada's suppressed minorities

A group of Toronto Indians and concerned university students are picketing the King Edward Hotel this morning, hoping to persuade 28 Indian chiefs and councillors to stop negotiations with the federal government over changes in the Indian Act of 1951.

The issue is complicated, but the message is simple: the Indians want the government to clean up its house before they will deal with it on a matter so vital as revision of the Indian Act.

The dissident Indians, who now live in Toronto (most for educational reasons), come from bands scattered all across the country, but their main bone of contention is an issue currently troubling the St. Regis Reserve in southwestern Ontario.

Under the Jay Treaty, concluded between the government of the United States and Her Majesty's (Queen Victoria) Government in the days when history books still referred to the Indians as "savages", Indians may cross the borders between the United States and Canada at will.

They are exempt from military duties and other legal responsibilities such as visas and work permits.

Part of the St. Regis reservation is in the United States. St. Regis has long been accused of being through the customs of Cornwall Island, where they are located, without a permit from customs officials.

Things have changed since the Canadian government has been checking up on the reservation to pass through the statute books of Indian Affairs. Wilf Pelletier, "they can't have any more."

Indians see this violation of the Treaty as a clear-cut case which they can rally to the 5-day federal election being held at the King Edward Hotel.

The sessions began with the presence of Trudeau and Robert K. Andras, a portfolio to whom Trudeau has assigned the responsibility of formulating the Indian Act to arrive at noon.

The Indians intend that the federal government is not talking about the Indian Act when it does its much older copy of the Jay Treaty is a current federal government attitude to treaties with Indians general.

It is not the only government has failed.

There are disputes over treaties concluded in which the Indians by no means consider a closed book. There are also federal promises of land grants and medical protection which Indians across Canada are waiting for the government to honor.

The protesting Indians hope to show the government that they will be willing to talk — if and when the government brings a little honor to the negotiating table.

The government's attitude to the Indian hasn't changed substantially since confederation. Despite a 1965 Globe and Mail story labelling them Canada's "super-citizens", the Indians remain basically a suppressed people, not quite citizens and not quite niggers. And unless the government can see its way clear to forgetting the "Indian problem" in favor of treating them like human beings there is likely to be no common ground for rational negotiations.

What relation does all this have to U of T students? Most of us, as citizens of Canada, are indirectly playing a part in helping to suppress these people. We can go to the King Edward and join the picket line, to show the federal government there are some whites in this country who are against the suppression of minorities.

And in a more pragmatic way, we can help Marion Packham (see centre) to build a teenage centre on the Christian Island reserve. Contributions can go to: Miss Marion Packham, Indian Day School, Christian Island via Penetang, Ont.

original goals... The sentence could be misinterpreted.

It is not that there are no students in our department that you specialize, nor is it the graduate school unwary student from his own the path to meaning. It is rather in the sense that you may gain to do as "public knowledge only by sacrificing original goals" are usually not very interesting and curing "emotional probability". One feels these but cannot make anyone in the same way. By debbling carefully you can do it with more people, but a result, becomes so far mediate experience and appears alien to you.

The class asked me after I point, if I thought psychology. No. Psychology is not in trouble. Nor are our faculty failing in search scientists. A sci-is in trouble it is culture which can be viewed as a balance between the specializing forces pushing us out to the frontiers of knowledge and the integrating forces pulling together the fragments into the more general ideas that all of us can share.

What can we do if the integrating forces seem to have given up their side of the tug of war? Should we force the pros, who are doing excellent science, to do a little less science so that they can spend some time thinking about the meaning of their work in the world? Probably a more realistic approach is to encourage and support some pros in every department whose main interest is teaching. Of course, they won't put the department "on the map" with their discoveries and publications, and they won't carry their weight financially in terms of research grants they bring in. But they may be what the under-stimulated undergraduates need.

Do we have to choose between competent researchers and competent teachers? Can't our university reward both? Can't the slogan become, "Publish, teach or perish?"

Richard Tiberius (SGS)

phys. ed. requirement "unjust"

I would like to make two points in support of Irene Bowman in her effort to abolish the physical education requirement for freshmen women.

First is the unjust application of the rule — any freshman girl with $50.00 can buy her way out of the requirement while the girl on a restricted budget must suffer through hours on the badminton court or whatever.

Secondly is the fact that graduate women are not allowed to enroll in the courses at all. (They can, however, participate in tennis and the splash hour on Monday nights.)

participate in tennis and the splash hour on Monday nights.)

If all women students were given freedom of choice in physical education courses, the facilities might be available to all who have a real desire to use them. But more importantly, it would in small measure lessen the authority structure of the university which so arbitrarily governs the lives of all the student body.

M. Dachslager (SGS)

endorsement of Gerald Dickson

I most heartily endorse the remarks of Gerald Dickson (Student power makes me sick — Jan. 15). I think it's perfectly ridiculous that Canadians should contribute to the education of foreigners. This belief should be carried to a full conclusion: we should bar from our universities all foreigners, landed immigrants, Jews, Negroes, and other similar groups, so that our resources may be devoted to the education of true Canadians.

Further economies could also be made by barring those who have shown their lack of interest in education by displaying horizons extending beyond their proper bounds, the classroom and the Placement Service. Such "students" should not be allowed at the University. In fact, it would be best if all arts students, who waste their time thinking instead of learning as they should, were cut off.

Hopefully, the time will come when technology will devise a method whereby all the necessary facts and figures for a constructive life's work can be consumed in the form of a pill or a one-week rapid-reading course. Then we can do away with expensive and wasteful universities altogether.

I also applaud the remarks of Dean Stager in the same issue, that the university "should be the last, not the first, in changing public norms of social behavior." Enough of this nonsense about the university as a source of social criticism! To ensure a proper attitude, I suggest a governing body made up of 80-year-old grandmothers, who must be able to prove 96 years' paid-up membership in the Conservative Party, with preference going to those holding shares in Dow Chemical or other socially useful corporations.

What students learned

By SUSAN REISLER and JIM COWAN

When students left the picket lines around the Thomson-held Peterborough Examiner at 10:30 last Friday morning, they ended the first concerted attempt this province has seen at a student-worker alliance.

The alliance was formed November 27, when 150 student journalists from Toronto and Waterloo joined the picket lines of striking Examiner newsmen. The newsmen were, and still are, negotiating their first contract with the Thomson organization, and had invited the students to join them to back up their demands.

On that first occasion, two Waterloo students were arrested for blocking the publisher's car as it tried to enter the plant parking lot.

On December 5, 250 students again joined the journalists. This time the pickets were far more militant in their attempts to stop the press and typographical workers and at the end of the day there had been 15 arrests. The charges ranged from disturbing the peace to assaulting police.

Last week's effort, slated to last three consecutive days, was to combine a mass picket line with teach-ins and discussions between workers and students.

The teach-ins were considered quite successful. Spontaneous and planned meetings drew people together to discuss their conceptions of why they were there and the connection between labour and capitalist economics. The students then tried to relate their discussion to what is taught on their campuses.

TACTICS AND MORALE

On the picket lines the students became discouraged. It was important to stop the paper from publishing both from a tactical point of view in the guild's struggle to win the strike, and from a morale point of view for the students. It just didn't make sense to stand all day in the cold, stepping aside as each worker crossed the line.

The students recognized this futility by 10:30 Friday morning. At the guild's request they had not engaged in any militant action during their three days of picketing, and they realized that little or nothing was being accomplished by their presence on the lines.

Graduate student Philip Resnick, one of the original student supporters of the strike summed up the student position: "It was a romantic myth that students could win the strike."

One reason that the Examiner strike is failing is that the labour movement in Peterborough is split, a situation over which the students had no control.

Previously the Examiner had come out very anti-union. This was especially evident during the Telco strike when the Examiner gave the workers no support.

LABOR SPLIT

In the Examiner itself there is a split. There are two unions, each with a separate contract which obliges one to cross the other's picket line. This causes hard feelings among the workers and there is an absence of staff solidarity.

For the 23 members of the newspaper guild the issue is basically one of wages and professional standing. The students looked at the strike in much broader terms — they considered a basic issue to be the content and democratization of the paper. They felt the citizens of Peterborough should have control over the content of their own city newspaper. The content should not be dictated by a newspaper baron some few thousand miles away.

Students learned much from this first experience, and the doors are in no way closed for further student-labor alliances. In fact, students should be playing a greater role in these fights in the future.

But one of the first lessons students have learned from the Examiner strike is the necessity to pick your strikes.

BLUE-COLLAR STRIKES

By turning to labor disputes involving industrial unions—blue-collar as opposed to white-collar—student pickets can learn much more about Canadian producer relationships. And workers faced with tasks far less appealing than the reporters could prove much more cooperative, or at least less cynical, in dealing with student-labor alliances.

Secondly the students have learned that it is better to stick to your own community. It is easier to relate and communicate with the people you live with.

And thirdly, the students know that strikes should not be one of the priorities of the student movement. First they must build up strong bases on their campuses. Then, if they support strikes, there must be an articulated student interest.

The students lost nothing in joining the strikers in Peterborough. They got stirred into concrete action and can now look more realistically at the jobs that have to be done and their own role in seeing them accomplished.

The unfavorable student image has been broken down. Workers can now feel that students do have something in common with them. All students are not at school to learn the ins of being a big corporation president and exploiting the workers.

So Peterborough, though a short term loss, was a long term gain. Students all across Ontario who joined in this strike came to some very important conclusions this weekend, and they will be coming across much stronger in the future.

Col um and a half

By MIKE "144" KESTERTON

I got a telephone call yesterday. "Hello, my name is Myrna Clapper."

"Ah. That name rings a bell," I said "Aren't you in Proletarian College?"

"Yes. I'm Dr. Chrtieu's secretary. I called to tell you that he'll be pleased to be interviewed."

I was anxious to talk to the controversial Branislav Chrtieu, well-known for his views on contemporary matters.

"You aren't just whistling dixie, Four-eyes," averred Dr. Chrtieu when I asked him if Proletarian College was a new direction in Western inter-media confrontation-education.

"For one thing, The Grauniad, our principal and only building on campus, is a converted Cafeteria. So it's always had an atmosphere of 'where it's at'."

Chrtieu lit his pipe and squinted as he looked out the window of his office, high atop an abandoned smokestack rented from the Crown Trust Corporation.

"We teach all subjects. All about Nuclear Physics. All about Life. All about The Watchtower Non-authoritarian Library Science. Introductory and Advanced Phallus."

"Do you have fees?"

"No. I'm wearing a fec collar," said Dr. Chrtieu "Actually, that's a joke. We don't have any tuition. The college is open to any working-class child who can support himself for four years without working."

"Does your college have any political bias?"

"Yes. we all read Chairman Mao's Kama Sutra religiously."

"Oh yeah? What's Chairman Mao's position on women?"

"It varies."

"Speaking of sex, I hear you teach nursing courses for men only. Is it true that men make the best nurses?"

"No, men make the easiest nurses."

"You also teach a lot of psychology courses here, I understand. What's your position on mental health?"

"Well, I wouldn't like to commit myself."

At this point Splash Torso, a resource person, lumbered in.

"Say, Branislav," said Torso, "What'll I do with this oak board?"

"Don't ask me. I'm not writing this."

"Hey, you're Splash Torso of the House of Anancy, aren't you?"

"Well, I s'pose. I don't tell all, you know."

"Tell me. Splash, what courses do you conduct?"

"Well, I give a course in 'The poetry of Splash Torso', 'The novels of Splash Torso', 'The philosophy of Splash Torso' and 'How to Make Money As an English Professor.'"

"Fascinating," I said. "Obviously you are providing students with something they couldn't get in structured courses. What about Shakespeare, and so on?"

"Not relevant. We don't publish him."

Grads can opt in/out of SAC next year

Graduate students who don't want to belong to SAC won't have to next year.

Upon registration, graduate students will be allowed to choose whether or not to pay the $12 fee to become members of SAC. They would continue to be required to pay a $10 fee as members of the Graduate Students Union.

This is the solution agreed upon by the Board of Governors at its December meeting. Details were released yesterday.

In a referendum conducted in September graduate students voted 1,949 to 642 in favor of withdrawing from the Students Administrative Council.

GSU president John Winter says he is satisfied with the solution, which he feels effectively ends SAC's role as a "superbody" claiming to speak for all students on campus.

Not belonging to SAC will mean graduates won't be eligible for charter flights and some of the "esoteric activities" run by SAC, admits Winter.

But he does not feel an overwhelming number of graduate students will opt for voluntary membership in SAC, at least until SAC eliminates the cause for separate organizations.

The basic reasons for the withdrawal, according to Winter, are that the graduate voice was not strongly enough represented in dealings with the university administration and that SAC sponsored few activities of interest to graduate students.

"Certainly there isn't $12 worth," says Winter, "maybe two or three dollars."

Under the new arrangement Winter suggests the GSU would make separate grants to such campus services as The Varsity, Random and Radio Varsity.

SAC President Steve Langdon hopes graduate students will eventually reverse their decision to withdraw from SAC.

He says he is "not very satisfied" with the outcome of the controversy, but "considering it was the Board of Governors making the decision, it was the best possible."

He feels the decision to separate was "a real mistake" and that there is a real need for a campus-wide student union.

All of U of T's approximately 5,000 graduate students. Graduates who have completed their residence requirements — three years post-graduate work — were previously not required to join SAC. This meant only two-thirds of the graduate population was represented in SAC.

All graduates will continue to pay the $10 GSU fee, doubled from $5 last year. Winter says the increase was planned to pay for services which would be needed after separation from SAC.

Since the separation doesn't come into effect until next fall, Winter plans to ask the GSU to apply the money to building the new GSU bar. Construction of that emblemishment of the GSU building will cost from $12,000 to $15,000.

Hate — real live hatred in action — was the mood at New College Dining Hall yesterday afternoon. The players: a panel of five and a capacity crowd of some 350.

"How Can Canada Help Solve the Middle East Crisis" was the topic under discussion. But you never would have known it.

The five panelists, with the notable exception of Mid-East businessman William Pogson and CBC news reporter Stanley Burke, ignored the debate topic in favor of emotional diatribes to support their respective positions.

Audience reaction to the speakers verged on violence. Several Arab spectators, who described themselves as members of the Palestine Liberation Front, selected Rabbi S. Rosenberg of Beth Tzedec Synagogue as chief object of their attacks.

Rosenberg felt that Vatican II represented a major breakthrough in Christian understanding and tolerances towards other religions.

"The great powers also are becoming aware that room must be made for minorities," he continued, passionately demanding "Is there no room for Israel?"

PLF reaction to this statement was vitriolic. Members of the audience compared Rosenberg to Hitler, and cries of "Blood!" could be heard.

Reaction to other speakers was more subdued. J. Peters, president of the Canadian Arab Federation, described Canada's Middle East policy as "immoral".

"The issues are clear and easy to understand," he said. "Canada is supporting one set of participants. We should be showing more support for the Arabs."

CBC newsman Stanley Burke said there are two rights in the Middle East, and described the Arab-Israeli dispute as "the clash of two

"Canadians should attempt to achieve communication with Jews and Arabs," said Burke, noting that new means of communication should be used for this purpose.

Julius Hayman, chairman of the Zionist Organization of Canada disagreed with Burke's contention that a forced settlement was the only viable solution.

Hayman said any settlement depends on direct negotiations between Israel and the Arab countries. He made it clear, however, that the occupation of Jerusalem was not negotiable.

Middle East expert William Pogson showed support for the Arab position. He criticized press reporting of the Middle East situation.

"The distortion and lies in the Western press are equal to Dr. Goebbels at his best" he said, adding that it was impossible for him as a freelance writer to publish pro-Arab or anti-Zionist news reports and editorials in any Canadian newspapers.

Canadian newspapers are under Zionist control", Pogson declared. "With the exception of Le Devoir they all censor their news reports."

In reply to questions after the meeting Stanley Burke denied any overt pro-Jewish bias in the news media. Rabbi Rosenberg was angered by Pogson's accusations.

"You are seeing here the beginnings of anti-Semitism," said Rosenberg.

"When Jews are accused of controlling the media, you are not far from initiating Jew-hating."

U of M students to strike

MONCTON (CUP) — Students at L'Universite de Moncton voted Saturday to strike "until administration president Adelar Savoie and four of his executives resign."

The student council decision came at 3:15 p.m., six hours after 62 city police and a number of RCMP officers called by Savoie moved over 100 occupants out of the Science building, ending a week-long occupation. The removal was without incident.

Students occupied the building last Saturday to back demands for more government aid for the French-language university.

The police evacuation surprised students who were prepared to leave the building Friday night if Savoie agreed to a faculty proposal for an arbitration commission.

After their first meeting since the occupation on Friday, the faculty recommended formation of a committee of three students and three administrators with mutual acceptable members.

One important demand has already been met: the financial information requested by students and faculty had been made public.

Students also want half the provincial education budget set aside for French language education. Some 35 per cent of the New Brunswick population speaks French.

The odds that the voluntary $10,000. If all goes well, it's probably more equitable since it will apply to next two months.

University president Claude Bissell says the new voluntary arrangement for graduate student membership in SAC is "a helpful compromise."

In letters to SAC President Steve Langdon and GSU President John Winter, Bissell says he hopes the Board of Governors' solution will meet with the approval of both the GSU and SAC.

Indian picket: cause Jay's Treaty

A group of disconcerted Indians will picket the King Edward Hotel today in an attempt to stop negotiations on the Indian Act of 1951 between the federal government and representatives of 28 southern and central Ontario Indian bands. They are concerned about the federal government's neglect of treaties — some reaching back to pre-Confederation days — and specifically Jay's Treaty, which they claim the Canadian government does not honor.

Students from York, Ryerson and the U of T plan to join the picket which begins today at 8 a.m. in front of the hotel. Spokesman Delta Opokokew, of the Canoe Lake Band of Saskatchewan, says the federal government "has to gain the confidence of the Indian people before they talk about the Indian Act. The treaties are all the Indians have talked about at these meetings. The whole (treaty) thing has never been finished with."

By MARY BASTEDO

"I was going to be the Saviour of the Indian people, but they wouldn't be saved."

"My first reaction was anger," said 20-year-old Marion Packham, who since September has been teaching elementary school on the Indian reserve of Christian Island.

"If you try to teach them middle class values they will laugh you right down," she said.

"But there's a lot to be said for Indian values. In what they accept people for by superficial standards; they don't try to keep up with or impress people. They believe in sharing. Everyone should have the same amount. You give when you have for when you need. They see no value in money, physical appearance or dress. They can't see the importance of education."

"I see things more clearly and objectively now, being alone there with them. In town it's people that stare and taunt. "Why don't you go back to the reserve?" Christian Island is an extremely isolated reserve, separated from Penetang, the nearest town, by four miles of Georgian Bay and about 20 miles of bush.

Restlessness and frustration on Christian Island

constable picks them up for a petty offence or the parents decide to send them away to foster homes, training schools or detention homes. "It's a vicious circle," 12 people in a two or three room house) and drinking that starts at age 12 or 13. "There's no family ambition. The young person feels restless. He resents his economic dependence on the government. Old traditions, like the one that requires a girl to prove her fertility by having two or three babies before marriage, hang on." Marion is working right now to raise money for a recreation centre on the island for the teenagers to use and run themselves. The Department of Agriculture has promised to match 50 per cent if they raise at least $1,000. Marion learned Indian beadwork and porcupine quilling on sweet grass from an old woman on the reserve and is now teaching these arts to the older girls at the Day School. They plan to raise money for the centre by selling them to handicraft shops in the city. Marion has also made appeals on radio and T.V. and to various church groups. "It's very important to me that those kids don't end up in the Galt Training school," she told me in conclusion. "We need a teenage centre on the reserve and we need it now, or the cycle will never be broken."

ational five-year fee collection contract and will not discuss the Carillon, the student newspaper at Regina. The administration decided in early January not to collect fees in an attempt to muzzle the Carillon, a paper they feel does not have the best interests of the school at heart.

Round two in Saskatchewan fees fight

REGINA (CUP) — The student position at the University of Saskatchewan has hardened on the eve of negotiations between student leaders and the school's board of governors over the bitter fee dispute here. The negotiations are scheduled to begin today and will pit an eight-man student contingent against an equal number of government.

On Friday a general meeting of some 900 Regina students voted overwhelmingly (890-5) to begin negotiations and to have the sessions open to observers. The assembly also sounded a threatening note when it voted to call another general meeting to take a strike vote should the student representatives decide the talks were going nowhere.

The students are pressing for an unconditional five-year fee collection contract and will not discuss the Carillon, the student newspaper at Regina. The administration decided in early January not to collect fees in an attempt to muzzle the Carillon, a paper they feel does not have the best interests of the school at heart.

The Carillon is still publishing regularly and appeared Friday. Sources say funds are running low at Regina and all club and social activities have been cancelled during the crisis.

The administration, for the first time ever, is footing the bill for inter-varsity athletics. It has decided to honor the commitments made earlier to the Western Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Association, normally paid for out of student fees.

Other student demands from administration include parity on all university government decision-making bodies including the board of governors.

Exiles pick Cleaver over Nixon

Eldridge Cleaver will be inaugurated as the President of the United States today at 3:30 p.m.

The ceremony will be performed at 44 St. George St., headquarters of the Union of American Exiles. The Exiles will then march to the US consulate on University Avenue, where they will present a list of demands to be forwarded as quickly as possible to Washington.

Specifically, the UAE is advancing the following demands: "All troops be ordered immediate withdrawal from Vietnam.

"Richard Nixon and his henchmen be arrested and required to stand trial on charges of conspiracy to defraud the people of the United States by deception and intent by self-admission to suppress revolutionary movements throughout the United States and the world.

"Lyndon Baines Johnson be ordered held on charges of conspiracy to assassinate the developing democratic movements in Vietnam, the Dominican Republic, Greece, the black communities in the United States, and in other parts of the world where US aid has been used to suppress democratic and anti-imperialistic movements."

Marion learned Indian beadwork and porcupine quilling on sweet grass from an old woman on the reserve and is now teaching these arts to the older girls at the Day School. They plan to raise money for the centre by selling them to handicraft shops in the city. Marion has also made appeals on radio and T.V. and to various church groups.

"It's very important to me that those kids don't end up in the Galt Training school," she told me in conclusion. "We need a teenage centre on the reserve and we need it now, or the cycle will never be broken."

North America judged a violent society

North American society is based on violence, Judge Peter Hall (I Trin) ruled Wednesday night in the first UC vs UTDU (U of T Debating Union) debating match this term.

Supporting the resolution Jules Grajower (II UC) told an empty room in UC that North America was permeated with violence, "like a piece of soggy bread." He cited violence in T.V., the slayings of the Kennedys and the inability to pass adequate gun legislation.

Elliot Berlin (II UC), also in support, defined "basis" as "that which supports," adamantly contending that violence supports the political status quo. He cited Vietnam and the suppression of Civil Rights workers as evidence. He denounced burps and table-banging from the Opposition as "violent rebuttals."

Herman Siegel (II UC), for the Opposition, said the basis was not violence but liberalism, the rights to "life, liberty, and property." Violence is contrary to these rights, he explained, eloquently quoting Lord John Russell's definition of liberalism as "mildness and affection."

Opposing the resolution, Art Moses (II UC) explained that violence was merely a consequence of the profit motive on which society is based. Gesticulating wildly, he said that violence resulted from a desire to protect one's economic interests. This was the cause of violence in T.V., Vietnam, and civil rights affairs, he said.

Judge Hall, in ruling, said the Opposition had failed to rebut the problem of gun legislation raised by the Govern-

By MARY BASTEDO

I took the elevator to the third floor of South Regent's Place and walked down the dim barren hall to visit Harry Sisson, a janitor at Trinity College.

He was home sitting quietly with his wife and two teenage children in the living room of the five room apartment. The T.V. was on. Budgies were chirping and jingling the trinkets in their cages. An indolent, listless, empty Saturday afternoon.

"I'm contented," he said, speaking quietly, absently. "I've got a job that I like. I've been at the college for four years, doing cleaning and maintenance work."

Trinity College pays Harry Sisson $1.35 an hour, $255 a month.

"They're talking about a $10 raise," he said, "but with rising income tax it won't make any difference."

"They don't break their hearts — or their pocketbooks," he muttered.

"I guess we'd be better off with unions," he said, in answer to my question. "But I'm against unions going on strike. They make a habit of it and the more they strike the more the cost of living goes up."

Sisson's 14-year-old son sat quietly on the arm of his mother's chair. He is mentally retarded.

"Part of my pay goes into Canada Pension and hospitalization. Then income taxes takes off about $25."

"No, it's $15 twice a month," interrupted his wife, as she sat back in her chair. She had the figures straight — $4 twice a month for pension, $11 once for hospitalization. I noticed her leg — it was wooden.

Her daughter was absorbed in the television, a pale, shy girl. Last year when they lived in a house in the slums, she was ill and missed a year at school.

Harry Sisson has lived in Cabbagetown all his life. He doesn't socialize much. He's not a drinker. "What can you do at a party if you don't drink?" Mrs. Sisson asks. He takes his family to church every Sunday. He doesn't complain. He accepts his life the way it comes.

In the face of such a situation union efforts to organize the college building employees have been weak and unsuccessful.

Bill Bain of the Building Employees Union said, "They're scared to talk to us. They want us to get them better jobs, but they don't want to move with us. We can't create a union for them."

None of the workers interviewed, however, had ever met anyone trying to organize a union. The reactions to a union varied from a feeling that it would change nothing to "It would be good to have a union. Then if something goes wrong, the union can work for you." Positive zeal was nowhere evident.

The Building Trades, Carpenters, Machinists, and Operating Engineers all have a small number of union members on campus.

The gravest threat to modern society...

Six campus political clubs will have a chance to tear into each other this week in a series of debates sponsored by the U of T Debating Union.

Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday in the foyer of Sid Smith the Politithon will take off from the resolution "The gravest threat to modern society is..."

Tuesday the Socialists will argue against the Conservatives that capitalism rather than revolution is the greatest threat to society. Wednesday the Liberals and the NDP will debate the threats of political bureaucracy and corporate business. Thursday the Edmund Burke Society will warn of the failure of traditions against the United Nations Club's Contention that traditions endanger basic human rights.

This is the first time that campus political clubs have been thrown together in this way.

"Political clubs will perform far more usefully if there's some sort of contact between them," said Derek Allen (IV Trin), "and the Debating Union is the logical group to bring them together."

The Debating Union is also organizing an eight-team Interfaculty Debating League on the campus and sponsoring a high school debating tournament Feb. 15.

Gymnasts impress in final tuneup

The U of T Gymnastics Blues scored an impressive victory over four teams in Saturday's annual RMC Invitational Meet at Kingston.

In their second tune-up for the OQAA championships in as many weeks, the Blues started strongly in the opening free calisthenics event, taking 2nd, 4th, 5th and 6th places to finish as top team. They went on to win all six events and defeat runnerup York University by a whopping (for gymnastics) 7.2 points.

The win was sweet revenge for the slim one point loss suffered at York one week earlier.

Veteran performer Brian McVey led the effort, placing first overall in the individual all-around competition with wins in vaulting, parallel bars, rings and horizontal bar. Seconds in the only other two events rounded out a spectacular afternoon.

Newcomer Al Forest also had a great day, placing third behind York's Tom Kinsman in the all-around results. And John Kortwright finished a most respectable eighth, despite being disqualified in the vaulting competition. He picked up a second place ribbon on the horizontal bar and thirds on the parallel bars, rings, and (gasp!) pommel horse.

But it was specialist Philip Michaelis who cinched the meet merely by being the fourth Varsity vaulter. When John Kortwright was disqualified Michaelis' points became the third set to count, giving Blues the event.

Following the meet, Coach Julio Roncon was enthusiastic about the team's chances in the championships on February 15. He emphasized the depth the team had displayed in every event. But he added that he hopes specialists Mauro Di Pasquale (rings) and Arthur Stein (pommel horse) will be able to return. With Phil Michaelis, they will provide a cushion in each event behind the three capable all-around performers.

CURLING

Toronto curlers took second and eighth places Saturday at the first Brock University Invitational Bonspiel. Varsity teams skipped by George Carr and Lex Mackenzie were undefeated in the games played, but ties proved their undoing, and Osgoode Hall, with three wins, took home the trophy.

Carr, playing with Bob Quinn, Cliff Ball, and Dave Richardson, won his first two games — 9-1 over the Brock B-Team, and 6-5 against R.M.C. — but a tie against the Brock A-Team, a tight 6-6 decision, prevented them from taking the trophy. Tie games were not played off, so Carr had no chance to improve on his final standing.

Mackenzie, supported by his brother Rick, Jim Stanko, and Josh Devon, finished with two ties and a win. After a 5-5 stand-off with Waterloo, and a close 6-6 game with the McMaster B-Team, Mackenzie upset favoured Dave Abraham's McMaster A-Team 6-4 in their final game. The bonspiel attracted entries from Waterloo, Queen's, Osgoode, R.M.C., Brock, McMaster, Trent, Toronto, Guelph, Niagara College and Mohawk College.

DRIBBLERS FALL SHORT IN BID TO UPSET WESTERN

By VLADIMIR PAVEZKA

University of Western Ontario Mustangs retained first place in the Senior Intercollegiate Basketball League with an 83-77 victory over Varsity Blues on Saturday afternoon at York.

Blues made a game of it until the final minutes of the second half, when they seemed to tire, and Mustangs were able to pull away.

A half-court press worked well for Varsity in the first twenty minutes, principally because of guards Larry Trafford and Bruce Dempster, and rookie forward Dale Crouter, and Blues went out at intermission with a 46-44 lead. Toronto managed an excellent 51 per cent shooting average in that first half.

At the beginning of the second half, Blues were very strong and ran the score to 58-51 before Mustangs recovered. But deadly shooting on the part of Jim Holowachuk and Greg Poole pulled Western ahead to stay.

Holowachuk fouled out at the end of the third quarter with 18 points but Varsity was unable to take advantage of his absence. Toronto's last gasp came with eight minutes left, when they narrowed the Mustang margin to 69-68.

Blues shot a miserable 28 per cent in the second half compared to 40 per cent for Western. Principal culprits were John Hadden and Peter Burton, who both missed far too many shots.

Greg Poole also had 18 points for Western, rarely missing with his outside shot, and displaying some excellent ballhandling. Dave McGuffin followed with 17 points, while Ron Zanin had 15.

Dale Crouter played an excellent game for Varsity, collecting 12 rebounds and 18 points. Bruce Dempster got Blues out of trouble many times with his ballhandling skill and scored 15 points. Larry Trafford had 10 points, and continued to display great defensive ability, stealing the ball repeatedly from Mustangs.

Baseliners: Mustang center Bob Larose sprained his ankle in practice on Thursday, and will be out for 8-10 days. . . Western was 25 for 31 from the foul line—Blues were 15 for 24. . . Blues outrebounded Mustangs 36-29.

Western's Greg Poole (32) shoots on Varsity basket during Saturday's home opener at York University. Blues' Bruce Dempster (41) and Larry Trafford (35) move in for rebound while Rudolph Nuyerev (striped shirt) looks on. Western won 88-73.

FENCING

The thaw did not lift the fencing doldrums for Queen's and the Royal Military College at Kingston. Varsity blanked RMC in foil and epee and dominated the sabre 6 bouts to 3 finishing victors 24 wins to 3. Queen's had no answer to the Varsity class losing the foil 7:2, epee 8:1, sabre 7:2 and the match 22 wins to 5.

The grapevine will warn other teams that Nan Sung Ho and Ron Rice (foil), Mike Kerwin and Rowland Griffin (epee) won all their bouts. Richard Wong (foil), Irv Snitman (epee), Martin Peros and Martin Moskowitz (sabre) won all their fights except one while Mark Pfeiffer split his bouts 3:3.

Blues settle for tie with Lancers

WINDSOR (FTL) Ups and downs are part and parcel of life for any team involved in a long and rigorous schedule. And, at the moment, Varsity Blues are floundering in the downs following three games played last week.

Wednesday evening, Blues suffered their first home loss since December 1965 when they dropped a 3-2 decision to University of Waterloo Warriors.

Thursday evening, Tom Watt and his players moved into London where they were not impressive in posting a 7-5 decision over Western Mustangs.

And so Saturday when the team moved into Windsor for a game with U of W Lancers, the resulting 2-2 tie while disappointing to Watt and his skaters was not unexpected.

Blues led 2-0 on goals by Brian St. John and John Wright before they simply ran out of gas in the latter stages of the third period. Wayne Tye narrowed the gap to 2-1 with less than six minutes to go and Hank Brand scored the equalizer for Lancers at the 17:43 mark.

Blues will now have a full week off before they travel to Sudbury next Sunday for an exhibition tilt with Laurentian University Voyageurs. The rest will certainly be a welcome one for all involved since Wednesday January 29 (that's a week this coming Wednesday) Blues will start another three-games-in-four days series. They play Waterloo, Guelph and Windsor again in that stretch.

NOTES. . . Blues outshot Windsor 42-24 in the Saturday afternoon game. . . Varsity is currently alone in first place in the SIHL on the strength of their 7-1-1 record. Waterloo is one point behind but have a game in hand. . . Warriors defeated McMaster 5-3 over the week-end. . . Bob McClelland missed the Windsor trip because of the flu while Bryan Tompson played with a broken toe. . .

WRESTLING

A horrible start cost Varsity matmen an upset victory over the highly-touted University of Western Ontario Saturday afternoon at ye olde Harte House.

Mustangs won the meet 26-18, after holding a 23-0 lead after the first five bouts.

From then on, Blues overpowered Western, as they won four of the last five (three pins).

However, perhaps the biggest surprise of ye whole affair was the defeat of Toronto's Bill Allison in the 167 pound division. The veteran wrestler lost 4-2 to Corrina Corin of Western.

Mat mentor Ron Murphy looked on from the sidelines and evoked great merriment from ye olde crowd when Heavyweight Ylo Korgemagi took the floor. Raising his crutch, Murph boomed, "Get 'im, Ylo!", in obvious reference to his own wrestling experience with Korgemagi which resulted in torn knee ligaments.

Korgemagi went right to work and pinned his opponent in the second period (coff).

Other Varsity wins went to Paul Beswick (160 lb—pin), Ernie Friedrich (177 lb.), and Larry Barron (191 lb—pin).

Dale Crouter (42) scores on jump shot to break 34-34 tie during second quarter. Crouter was Blues top shooter with his 18 points. He also had 12 rebounds.

Robert Lowell — a Yankee still dreaming

By SUSAN PERLY

Robert Lowell is almost shy and extremely gentle in his handshake. Tall, gaunt, yet hardly as overpowering as expected.

His voice is soft with a rich accent that comes from being brought up in Boston. He teaches at Harvard now, although he dropped out during second year in 1937.

Last year he lived next door to U of T's Claude Bissell, who struck him as "a perfect university president."

But when he's not teaching Lowell spends his time in New York.

"In New York you have no neighbors. You can go for months without seeing anyone."

"One out of every 10 people you meet in London are intellectuals. In New York it's 11 out of 10."

Lowell arrived at U of T yesterday for a series of seminars and a major reading Thursday night. His room at Massey College is full of bar-ren wood bookshelves and brickwork. Lowell glances around, decides that the room needs to be filled with books, paintings and ... a stuffed duck ...

"The Charles River was turning silver. In the ebb-light of morning, we stuck the duck's web-foot, like a candle, in a quart of gin we'd killed."

... just like the one that his friend Delmore Schwarz had back at college.

"Poor Delmore became so paranoid, he thought that all his friends were conspiring and died thinking Governor Rockefeller had raped his wife. Very sad."

Lowell has been one of the most outspoken opponents of the Vietnam war. In 1965 he turned down a request from President Lyndon Johnson to attend a White House garden party and read poetry.

The first real challenge to his pacifist convictions came in the Second World War. As a conscientious objector he was sentenced to five months in prison and seven months mopping floors. "Most people got three years. I guess the judge was sympathetic. He thought I was sincere. But those who spent their time clearing a swamp that didn't have to be cleared — they never recovered from the feeling that they'd lost those years."

"There probably aren't more C.O.'s now than there were then, but we didn't get much publicity."

"I was a fire-breathing Catholic C.O., and made my manic statement, telling off the sane and president, and then sat waiting sentence in the bull pen beside a Negro boy with curls of marijuana in his hair."

As Robert Lowell speaks, his hands move rhythmically in circles, palms out, like a conductor in a chamber music recital. An easy calming motion.

"Pacifism can become extremely boring," he says. "There is no excitement, no sense of intensity."

"That's one of the things that must have excited the SDS at Columbia. The surge of occupying a building. A lot of kids merely enjoy the theatrics of riots. If they took over it would probably be the same, only they would have their own gang around."

"At Duke University in North Carolina, after Martin Luther King was killed, they had a protest to get minimum wages for the workers. They sat in front of the Chapel, about 1,000, until they got what they wanted. Actually, they found out they didn't get it — then they went back and got it. Nothing was broken. An almost perfect protest."

He smiles with a twinkle. Robert Lowell, who really

White collar unions almost non-existent at U of T

By LOUIS ERUCHMAN

None of the office employees on campus are unionized. The fact that they are scattered all over campus, in addition to the general white-collar resistance to unions, has made organizing virtually impossible. The university alone employs about 900 clerical workers.

While all university hiring should theoretically be made through the central personnel offices, it is bypassed in some cases.

In order to be certified, a union would have to organize all the clerical employees on campus. An attempt to form a local by the 16 office workers at the Institute of Aerospace Studies was rejected by the Labour Relations Board.

Since most clerical workers are not unionized, the salaries offered by the university and the colleges are fairly competitive with non-campus employees.

The university scale for typists is $3410 - $4450 per year (based on a 36¼ hour week), for stenographers $3600 - $4450, and for secretaries $4240 - $7010. One of President Claude Bissell's secretaries earns $6,250-yr. So the lowest typist starts at $68 wk. (before deductions) and can hope to reach about $140-wk. after several years' service.

Not surprisingly, these rates are quite similar to those paid student council employees. The 12 SAC clerical workers earn from $70 to $130-wk.

Fringe benefits are fairly generous, so that the Canadian Union of Public Employees has had little success in enlisting support for its organizing efforts.

A secretary at Vic said: "We don't need a union. What would we ask for? We have a beautiful building, free parking lovely holidays, good wages, sick leave pay, group insurance, PSI, hospitalization and a pension."

The one place where CUPE has been actively organizing is the library, where they have spent a year and a half seeking certification to represent its 280 employees.

Carl Reisley of CUPE describes it as "a long and frustrating experience." The university has opposed the union's application on the grounds that the library is not an appropriate bargaining unit, and that all 2,000 clerical workers on campus should be required. A decision on certification should be forthcoming from the Labour Relations Board in the near future.

The task of organizing library workers has been made difficult by the many branches, and the transience of the staff, which Mr. Reisley attributes to "lousy wages". Organizing all clerical workers on campus would be considerably harder.

"There has to be a desire to join," Reisley said, "we can't twist arms."

Non-professional library employees make between wants a nice quiet revolution, where everything is peaceful. A person who still dreams of Utopia. The lights are dimming through the windows of Massey College.

Lowell was in Chicago at the Democratic Convention and stayed in his hotel room most of the time.

"I saw what was happening outside though, hitting them over the head with those sticks. No one got killed. I guess they make them that way... I saw them breaking the sticks over the kids' heads.

"After Chicago I had nightmares for ten days. When I would hear a voice in the hall, I'd imagine armies and police marching in. Terrifying."

And recalling the McCarthy workers who were attacked in their rooms, Lowell sets the scene — "Like a group of intellectuals discussing Jefferson — oh Jefferson as an anarchist or a pacifist — and then suddenly kids lying on the bed bleeding."

The 51-year-old Lowell rumples his grey hair and continues:

"I remember I was in Mexico at this time last year, and I thought about how much different and better it was there. How nobody got killed. But in the riots this fall many were killed."

His voice grew softer as he recalled the campfire in the park across the street from his hotel in Chicago. "The grass was covered with Mace, but you could still sit on it. There were a lot of peaceful people there..."

Lowell says he often gets fed up with the "polemic", with politics.

"You go to a political meeting. The speakers sit in the front row and get up and talk. None of them are listening to what the other says. Only looking cynically at each other. Mostly they have nothing to say."

When Eisenhower was inaugurated in 1953 as president of the United States Lowell wrote:

"Look the fixed stars, all just alike as lack-land atoms, split apart, and the Republic summons Ike, the mausoleum in her heart."

But he is not unoptimistic about Nixon. "Everyone is exhausted from the Johnson administration. Nixon is fresh, things will probably be quiet for a while. Hopefully he will end the war in Vietnam."

Hope. The food of the poet.

Later we sat in Massey College Lounge. Robert Lowell leaned back onto the soft couch, whiskey sour in hand, and admired the architecture.

"It could be in any age." His long fingers point to the spires. "So delicate, so fine. Yes. You imagine Teutonic soldiers marching in."

Cleaver inaugurated as President of United States

Black Panther leader Eldridge Cleaver was inaugurated as president of the United States in the cramped offices of the Union of American Exiles on St. George St. Monday afternoon.

Cleaver, who is wanted by police for violation of parole, did not turn up for the ceremony, but Wayne Lawrence, a member of the Afro-American Progressive Association, stood in for Cleaver, stepping solemnly up onto the wooden podium to take the oath of office as "president-in-exile."

"I do solemnly swear I'll faithfully execute the office of president of the United States and will do the best of my ability to preserve protect and defend the people of the United States," he swore, hand on a tattered bible.

His first shot into the air. "If Cleaver were here today he'd feel this was a step forward in relieving the repression in the United States."

"Everything Nixon and his henchmen try to get from us they'll have to take and it won't be easy," Lawrence said emphatically.

Doyle Abernathy, chairman of the Union, stressed the chaotic conditions prevailing in the U.S.

"What is Nixon doing about the poverty program in the ghettos? He is attempting to coerce them into the corporate system they've been trying to escape.

27-year-old President-in-exile Wayne Lawrence

"Eldridge Cleaver represents those who stand for equality, those liberation movements in Cuba, Vietnam, Chicago and Watts," he said.

"Out of chaos by electoral law, Richard Nixon has been elected president. But by human law we've elected president-in-exile Eldridge Cleaver," Abernathy said.

Following the brief inaugural ceremony 50 exiles led by their stand-in president marched to the American Consulate to present a list of demands: the withdrawal of troops from Vietnam; the arrest and trial of Richard Nixon and his administration; that Lyndon Johnson be held on charges of conspiracy to assassinate true revolutionary leaders around the world.

No one at the consulate answered the door and after an hour of picketing the marchers dispersed.

Most of the American exiles are young men who have fled from the draft and suppression in the United States. They are estimated to number about 7,000 in the Toronto area.

U of S backs down on open meeting

REGINA (CUP) — University of Saskatchewan students here reversed themselves yesterday at an emergency meeting called over continuing negotiations with their administration.

About a quarter of the 4,000-student campus voted to come down slightly in favor of closing the negotiating sessions as their union and the administration try for a settlement in the fees fight here.

Last week the campus voted for open meetings. However, the administration replied that open sessions would force it to maintain its position on refusing to collect student union fees because of student union support of the newspaper; The Carillon.

In a complicated supplementary motion, the students also enabled the union to break off negotiations if it wishes.

The motion also authorized the union to collect its second-term fees on an interim basis to operate a reduced program of activities and continue publication of The Carillon.

With the student stand clearified, negotiations were to continue behind closed doors today. The openness question brought Monday's opening session to a halt.

Eight Regina campus students and eight administrators are involved in the talks. There were threats of a student strike last week if no agreement was reached.

Meanwhile at the university's sister campus in Saskatoon, student leaders were awaiting more concrete action from Regina before responding to the Board of Governors Dec. 31 statement on the Regina union and its paper.

you win some, you lose most

Graduate Students' Union President John Winter had the conservative pie he helped bake thrown back in his face yesterday.

He came to a meeting of the Graduate Council as one of four student assessors to ask for a change in the rule that full-time graduate PhD and MA students may not work with pay for more than 10 hours a week inside or outside the university.

He had a valid cause: students, particularly those mature enough to be graduate students, should be able to make decisions for themselves what they can do in their spare time.

If a student can fulfill 'x' degree requirements in 'y' number of years, how he organizes his time should be his own decision.

But the council decided to keep the ten-hour per week rule. To add insult to injury, it is considering applying the rule for all graduate programs. And it's Winter's own damn fault.

For when he asked for student participation on the Council last September, he did not appear to want any influence, or was very pessimistic of getting it. He asked for only four student representatives — weighed against 24 faculty members and 8 administrators. The council consented to the four-student addition for obvious reasons; "tokenism" would be a euphemism for such representation.

To make matters worse, those four students, who participated in the first open meeting yesterday, are not yet voting members, nor can they even introduce motions from the floor. Their membership has to be passed by the Senate, and for the moment they are assessors — they can talk.

Even if the four students could have voted yesterday, they would have been overruled by a majority of faculty and administrators. From discussion at the meeting, Dean Sir-luck and his confreres seem to value graduate students as "investment" — the Dean used that word — rather than something more humanitarian or educational.

Graduate student interests would be genuinely represented only in a council of half-and-half faculty-student representation. And that's what Winter should have sought in September. He tells us there was no point going after such reform, since the Commission on University Government would supercede the attempt. And he knew the attempt would be ill-received.

But, even so, there is no logic in going for half-reform as a paper-mache surrogate.

"Co-option" — jargon ... but aren't the time, effort, and principles of those student assessors being co-opted?

"Politics of confrontation" — more jargon ... but wouldn't a more ambitious proposal and a firm adherence to it — i.e. confrontation — have produced at least some useful debate. At least the four assessors wouldn't be wasting their time if the attempt failed.

Now that the politics of reconciliation have already been ineffective in the case of the ten-hour work rule, will John Winter try confrontation to plead his cause? We doubt it. But it's about time he learned.

"Hey, haven't I seen you somewhere before!"

LETTERS

"paternalism" at New College

As a past member of New College Residence, I'm very interested in the controversy over women's visiting rights. Dean Stager, in his characteristic paternal manner, has stated that he alone knows the true wishes of the majority of the residents and hence has ruled against the 'open weekend'. His argument is that the university is the last place where changes in the social norms should be allowed. This view is unacceptable to those of us who believe that the university should be an institution where the student is allowed to make up his own mind on issues that concern him and him alone.

Dean Stager's attempts to integrate the residents and non-residents are not helped by his dictating rules of conduct to one group and not the other.

His objection that the 'open-weekend' would lead to excessive noise is rather weak in view of the fact that he has agreed to extend women's hours to 3:30 a.m. Maybe he feels that the kind of noise likely to be heard after 3:30 in the morning is more disturbing than other kinds.

GSU's Winter gets congratulations

We must congratulate John Winter's politicking in steering his GSU out of SAC with so little flurry and so little loss of prestige. He has managed to make it optional for graduate students to pay their $12 SAC fee, but has managed to keep the compulsory $10 GSU fee. He admits that his students will not be eligible for the SAC-sponsored flights to Europe, but, after all, the GSU building will be getting a new $12,000 - $16,000 bar — and that's really much better, isn't it? Besides, the GSU will continue to give grants to services which are valid to the graduate student — such as The Varsity, Random, and Radio Varsity — subject to the consideration, of course, that they represent "strongly enough" the graduate student side of the question.

I wonder. Wouldn't it be only logical to make GSU fees optional along with those for SAC? And wouldn't it be more profitable in the long run to get some more graduate students involved in the work of SAC to change it from within? But this would only work if he were really serious in his arguments.

Pargeter may regret that letter

I wish to register my absolute disgust with some of the comments made in the endorsement by Mr. Pargeter in the Jan. 20 issue of The Varsity.

I feel that his comments on barring "all foreigners" from getting an education in Canada are "perfectly ridiculous". I must express my utter disbelief at those comments, for as Canadians we live in one of the most cosmopolitan populations in the world.

Who is to say who is foreign; who should get an education; and who is a "true Canadian"? You? or George Wallace? or perhaps the Ku Klux Klan?

Perhaps you should be wasting your time thinking like the arts and science students, Mr. Pargeter, for your remarks are sick and stupid.

Alan Takeda
(1 VIC)

We suspect that Mr. Pargeter's letter was intended to be a sarcastic response to a letter attacking foreign students, rather than a bigoted support for it. Ed

What's the government doing about:

- summer jobs?
- unemployment?
- student aid?

That probably says something about Maritime economic underdevelopment, but it says much more about job opportunities for all university students this year.

Right yment g unice a A few hand-suffer ation ll go school and ut in ploy-per the Can-em-mings large pool of unemployed persons will be available for many of the short-term positions that are open.

ELIMINATION OF STUDENT JOBS

This immediate condition relates to a long-run trend in our economy — the progressive elimination of many of the unskilled jobs which university students are able to do in the summer. Jobs are becoming much more complex; training periods become longer; and the untrained university student, especially after first or second year, is in bad shape. Available jobs will likely go first to the technically-trained student from a Community College.

will High : a omly, ally lp in r, a The point of all this is not to demand a more job-oriented technical education, but to show the growing failure of the conventional approach to financing higher-level learning: that is, the view that self-financing from summer jobs is central, and that one will get such a high-paying job on graduation that loans are easy to pay back quickly and therefore fair.

The consequence, then of the employment problem must be a much better system of financial aid, beginning at the federal government level where the Student Loans Act sets the broad criteria for individual provincial plans.

OSAP MARCH

Some 1,200 - 1,500 students marched on Queen's Park to protest the Ontario loan plan in November; the result has been virtually nil. There has been no attempt to lessen emphasis on loans or on summer employment; nor have independence regulations been liberalized; the plan is likely to become more rather than less standardized and bureaucratic next year. The government has done nothing to remove some of the social barriers to university.

Unemployment, then, must cause great reliance on student aid for financing education. And that, in turn, means higher taxes. We have to look at where these taxes will have to fall so that we middleclass students aren't being subsidized by increasing taxes on low-income groups.

CARTER REPORT

The Carter Report on taxation tells us a few things. Most disturbingly, it points out that many persons making below $5,000 per year are now paying a higher percentage of their wages in taxes than those in more prosperous income brackets. Thus, not only do new tax revenues have to come from other sectors of the community, but the present tax structure should probably be changed so that lower income groups pay a smaller percentage in taxes from their already limited budgets.

Carter is even more useful, however, for it isolates areas where increased taxation is not only possible but just. Taxes on resource based industries, and on certain financial institutions are now unfairly low. If a man makes thousands in land speculation or playing the stock-market, he isn't even taxed. The taxation rates of the great corporations which so benefit from present-day education have barely risen at all in the last decade. These are the areas from which we must demand greater tax resources, not the Canadian working class. I stress again the need to deal with the taxation issue if students are going to have their financial aid demands taken seriously.

The costs which we have to meet, especially for housing, are of related concern. Several hundred residence students here are withholding second-installment fees in protest against their rising housing costs. Again a major responsibility rests with the federal government.

FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY

That is a crucial point, — the overall responsibility of the federal government on all these issues. Students across this country face these economic difficulties from a similar perspective, only by acting together are they likely to get results. That is the purpose of National Union Day. The Canadian Union of Students has set Wednesday, February 12th aside as a day to raise these issues and have the public consider and act on them. By putting them in a national context, we can also consider how overall national factors such as United State's domination of our economy affect such issues, i.e. directly affect us and the education we are getting.

Unemployment, student aid, taxation and housing affect us all; they also affect non-students. National Union Day will have to stress this fact as well. The Day will be a focus for much S.A.C. work this term, as we discuss how to raise and deal with these problems. Those within and without the university have to hear about these issues — and do something about them — from Vancouver, to Toronto, to Halifax.

SGS keeps 10 hour a week work limit

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Full-time graduate students may not do more than 10 hours of paid work a week either inside or outside the university, according to a long-standing administration rule.

Graduate students yesterday tried to change or abolish the rule, but their attempt backfired.

The Graduate Council, a controlling body composed of 24 faculty, eight administrators, and four non-voting student assessors, overwhelmingly turned down the student request yesterday.

James D. Wood presented a brief to the council that the rule be removed. Mr. Wood is taking a PhD in educative theory while on part time staff at the Ontario College of Education.

Mr. Wood called the rule "degrading" and said graduate students should be able to decide for themselves how much time they allot to paid work.

The brief says the rationale behind the rule "ignores the moral, social, and political activities of students, and makes the weak assumption that a student will be profitably engaged in those hours when he may not work."

Mr. Wood has no position on the council, and no council member was willing to put his proposal into the form of a motion. His suggestion died.

What next? CUG as T-group

By NOEL STECKLEY

You've got this Commission on University Government, see. So how do you make sure that the members are communicating?

Well, how about a week-end T-Group? That was Prof. Bernard Etkin's suggestion to last night's CUG meeting.

Etkin's suggestion was expanded upon by Prof. Farrell Toombs and Dr. D. J. McCulloch who have had experience in conducting such retreats.

Dr. McCulloch pointed out some of the apparent problems of communication that CUG was facing. President Claude Bissell, he pointed out, had said at one meeting that there were now seven vice-presidents but there would soon be five.

After the proposal was put forth objections came, fast and furious.

Prof. J. S. Thompson was the first commissioner to object. He felt that by going off for a week-end the commission would lose its openness with its audience.

The first student member to object was Gary Webster. We don't want our constituents to think that we are off "cosying up to the administration and faculty" and selling our people out, he said.

Student commissioner Bob Rae also opposed the idea of a week-end retreat. He pointed out that part of the commission's work was political.

Wallace McCutcheon, B of G observer, observed that the students were political and were responsible to their constituents.

"There would be a good deal of advantage to the retreat," said Robin Ross. He pointed out that there were only five more working months for the commission.

Since President Bissell and W.M.V. Ash were not at last night's meeting the commission deferred the question until its Friday meeting.

The Conservative and Socialist Clubs squared off yesterday in the foyer of Sid Smith. They debated the proposition that "Revolution is the gravest threat to modern society". In support Conservative Ted Robertson (I Law) and Rob Lee (II Trin) claimed revolutions destroy individual freedom and basic liberties. But Socialist Gary Porter (III UC) and Harry Kapyto (II Law) disagreed, holding it was the capitalist system which trampled on human freedom and it should be overthrown by revolution. Judge Ed Bridge (II Law) awarded his decision to the Conservatives. The debates sponsored by the U of T Debating Union continue this week, with the NDP and Liberals meeting at 1 p.m. today, and the United Nations club meeting the Edmund Burke Society tomorrow.

Coughs up $750 for anti-war marchers

and $500 respectively.

The money will be given to the Canadian Rights Defence Committee, which is organizing financial aid to cover the legal expenses of 16 of the 39 defendants.

The UC Lit motion, passed at a meeting Monday night, does not commit the Society may be needed to cover legal expenses, which may go as high as $4,000.

SAC gave $500 to the CRDC last Wednesday after hearing speeches by delegates from the Committee.

One of them, political economy Prof. Melville Watkins asked for the grant on four grounds:

- that the persons charged should be defended;
- to establish the democratic rights of the demonstrators;
- to establish that people have the right to demonstrate against such a cause as the war in Vietnam;
- that the collective action of the council in voting the grant would constitute evidence that could be used in court — i.e. that the students of the U of T endorse the defendants.

Edmund Burke Society President Paul Fromm (III SMC) disagreed. "Students would have a better chance of winning if they defend themselves," he said, "rather than being taken by some slick lawyer — you know how these capitalists are."

A total of $750 has been pledged for the defence of student demonstrators arrested in an anti-war march on the United States Consulate last October.

The University College Literary and Athletic Society and the Students Administrative Council will donate $250 and $500 respectively.

The money will be given to the Canadian Rights Defence Committee, which is organizing financial aid to cover the legal expenses of 16 of the 39 defendants.

The UC Lit motion, passed at a meeting Monday night, does not commit the Society to any future support.

"The motion was designed to allow people to vote for it for whatever reason — whether for humanitarian reasons or for defense of free speech," said Manny Gordon (IUC).

By SHERRY BRYDSON

In the year 1887, a public school geography text printed for use in Ontario declared: "The Indians of Ontario, and of the provinces eastward, are, for the most part, civilized. Christianity prevails everywhere throughout all Canada except among some still savage tribes, and even among these Christian missionaries are now successfully labouring".

Substitute "Americanization" (anglo-saxonization? conformity?) for Christianity and "federal government representatives" for Christian missionaries and you will have a perfect picture of the Indian Affairs Department's attitude to the Indian in the 1960's.

Take, for example, a civil service-produced book circulated in 1961 by the Indian Affairs Branch (then under the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration). Titled "The Indian in Transition — Learning for Earning," it shows pictures of Indians presumably happy (and very Americanized) in such roles as "Announcer, Secretary, Housewife (as opposed to tepee wife, one welder), Lab Technician, Welder, Foreman" — ad nauseum.

This reflects the consistent policy of Indian affairs departments since Confederation to remake the Indian into a white man. The big push has always centered around making the Indian a productive, conforming member of Canadian society.

"There is a real source of gold ore in these people," Arthur Laing, then minister in charge of Indian affairs, told a Kitchener audience on May 13, 1968.

"If an Indian child is given the same environment as any other Canadian child he would be no different."

This attempt to destroy the Indians' culture by making them "one of us" has taken its toll. Indians, long accustomed to the paternalistic attitudes of the federal agents who dole out welfare cheques on the reserves, have given up all hope of ever communicating with that epithemeral thing known as "the government".

The attempt to anglo-saxonize the Indian has resulted in a conflict: unable to adjust to a white culture imposed on him by the government, the Indian becomes confused and disoriented.

His own culture is all-important to him, but he must make certain concessions to the white Indian agent who represents the government on his reserve.

Interested in preserving his own ways, the Indian ways, the Indian often watches helplessly while federal officials berate him for his inability or unwillingness to accept white culture.

Consider statements made by Arthur Laing in a CBC radio broadcast in Montreal on Jan. 2, 1968. Laing accused the Indians of self-pity and suggested there would be no solution to the "Indian problem" until they got down to work and took some responsibility for their own affairs.

On Jan. 9, reports the Globe and Mail, the president and vice-president of the Union of Ontario Indians — representing 50,000 Ontario Indians — charged there would be no solution to government-Indian disputes and the government's inaction in the face of clear-cut issues until Laing was relieved of most of his responsibility for Indian Affairs. President Omer Peters further charged that the Department keeps a file on outspoken Indians.

This prompted Walter Dieter, head of the Canadian Indian Brotherhood, to add that Laing thought of Indians as "less than people, less than human."

NEW MINISTER Things have not changed much since then. The Indians have a new minister, in the person of Jean Chretien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. They have a new-found ally in Robert Andros, Minister without Portfolio to whom Pierre Trudeau has assigned special responsibility for formulating Indian policy.

But they have the same civil servants — the same information officer, the same speech writers, the same staff. In other words, the department has a new head, but its composition remains essentially the same: civil mandarins — career civil servants — run the department.

And, looking at this collection of mandarins, it becomes painfully obvious just why the government has never been able to engage in meaningful dialogue with the Indian people.

In an attempt to gain some understanding of how the Department works, I recently asked one of the Department's 8,500 employees what qualifications a prospective applicant should have. Should he have studied anthropology? Social work? Should he have practical experience in the field?

"Are you kidding?" my friend snorted. "The best recommendation is military service."

"The place is full of ex-colonels, ex-commanders, former military personnel." We speculated for some time on the implications of this, but were unable to come up with a rational connection between military service and the welfare of the Indian people.

KEY JOB Take, for example, the appointment of ex-air force squadron leader Eric Boyd as director of the Indian-Eskimo Bureau. The appointment was announced Dec. 16, 1968.

The job is described by the Indian Affairs department as a key position for Indian-white affairs. As director, the job description reads, Boyd will "hold consultations with the native people and make major policy changes in line with the wishes of these people. He will review the treaties to ensure that all commitments to these people are met." The director is also head of the Social Affairs Branch of the department.

It is easy to see why Indian leaders were quick to criticize the government for appointing Boyd to the $13,300-a-year post.

They fail to see how 37-year-old Boyd's career has made him an expert on Indian problems. After finishing his term in the air force, Boyd served as military secretary to Paul Hellyer.

He told the Canadian Press News Service that he favored "full consultation with Indians except on internal matters involving administrative changes."

Andros: he has Indians' trust.

Boyd, who came to the Department in 1967, got the job on a "promotion without competition" designed by civil service to restrict applicants to those already in the department. A spokesman for the department said this type of promotion prevents civil servants from being "adversely affected by outside applicants."

Indian spokesmen felt it was particularly important to have a director who knows the Indian language and culture. Northern Indians don't speak English, and combined with the cultural differences, they felt Boyd did not have the proper background to assume such heavy responsibilities.

NO CHANCES But under the promotion-without-competition system, Indians have no chance of getting their people appointed to any of these key positions. The mandarins win every time.

Although Robert Andros has been faithfully attending the "consultations with the Indian people," the federal government has been bolder since early August in an effort to rewrite the Indian Act of 1951, the consultations are still by and large run by the mandarins.

They sit at the front of the consultation meetings, these mandarins, these specialists in their respective fields, and give forth such a spew of legalese that Indians time and time again feel moved to relinquish them for their paternalistic attitudes.

At Toronto's first consultation meeting on Aug. 12, Chief Fred Plain, Union of Ontario Indians representative, commented in sheer exasperation: "This simply is not a democratic process of real representation."

"There's too much authority residing in the Indian Affairs branch. No matter what we come up with, the branch can veto it."

REPORT SAVES IMAGE Curiously, this remark (and others like it) does not appear in the department's official minutes of the consultation meeting. Neatly typed and bound in a red cover, the report is all done in indirect speech and somehow fails to capture the acrimony with which the 28 delegates often spoke.

The report was compiled from tape recordings by the DIA in Ottawa. Probably no one knows who gave the order to transcribe in indirect speech, but you can bet your bottom dollar it was some mandarin fretting about the department's "image."

Indian delegates to the second Toronto consultation, which runs all this week, found themselves confronted Monday at the King Edward Hotel with a "panel" of big-gun mandarins, real technocrats.

Seated at the head table were: Bill Mussell, assistant to Jean Chretien; Gordon Poupore, chief of the lands and forests division of the Department of Indian Affairs; John McGill, Ontario regional director of the DIA; Cy Fairholm, director of policy and planning, DIA; and Al Butler, head of the organization and administration branch of Ontario's Department of Municipal Affairs — mandarins all.

An Indian would ask a specific panelist a question. The panelist would hum and haw, but say "that's really in Mr. Butler's (or someone else's) field."

JARGON The designated mandarin would then come up with five minutes of jargon, hard to follow and impossible to understand.

The Indians could only take so much. Finally Omer Peter, this time as chief of the Moravian of the Thames band, got the floor.

"You people think to yourselves, you (Indians) are too dumb to talk to us, but you don't want to say it that way. So you use fancy words and say it in another way so we don't understand."

"Let's settle down and get a dialogue going," Peters continued. "Let's talk together like human beings. Lookin' at all the figures and surveys we're the worst people off in the whole world, practically."

"You people," he told the mandarins, "don't talk quite plain enough when you talk."

"We haven't got enough power here. I don't like doing things this way," he said, referring to the mandarins' insistence on continuing the panel discussion despite the fact the Indians were desperate to talk to Andros about treaty rights.

"We're just tryin' to get what we think are our due rights," Peters concluded. "To our way of thinking, the government is stealing from our Indian people."

Later, despite the best efforts of Chief Fred Plain, the delegates were unable to steer the dialogue back to the topic of treaty rights.

Andros watched helplessly as the mandarins kept the discussion strictly within the confines of the Indian Act. He left the meeting at 5 p.m. without having said anything meaningful.

The Indians watched him go with some consternation. They had earlier asked him if he could be present Thursday, when the talks finally get around to the matter of treaties.

(Throughout the round of talks, Andros has been the only federal government official able to gain an understanding of the Indians' problems. Rather than disappearing as soon as formal talks end at 5 p.m., each night, Andros hangs around, stays up all night if necessary, listening to the delegates' special problems, trying desperately to find solutions to the almost-impossible legal tangles the Indians often find themselves in.

(He is the only federal representative the Indians are willing to talk to.)

It developed that Andros will not be present Thursday because Chretien himself intends to attend Thursday and Friday's sessions.

Chretien does not have the Indians' ear.

One reason may be that Chretien has the same staff Laing had — the same petty administrators, the same paternalistic speech-writers who so irritated the Indians during Laing's rule.

"To clean up the Department of Indian Affairs," said a source within the department, "you'd have to fire the top third and the bottom third and rebuild from there."

WORKERS

$3600 - $7010 a year, while professional librarians are paid a minimum of $7000.

Most of the complaints come from the non-professional "library assistants". The division between the professionals and non-professionals creates a gulf both of salary and authority.

"Library assistants with B.A.s and M.A.s do almost the same jobs as professionals and yet start at the same salaries as Grade 10 graduates," one girl said. "People with degrees from other countries doing complicated translation work are poorly paid."

There were complaints of lack of rights when dealing with supervisory staff. There was no recourse after a department head had gone through several staff desks. Requests for time off to go to medical and dental appointments have to be made a week in advance and the time made up later, a situation felt to be worse than that faced by other university clerical workers.

It is apparently very easy to remain for long periods at the lowest salary rate. "You have to be outspoken to be promoted," one worker said. But feelings towards the union are still mixed, and certification is still up in the air.

The most poorly-paid people on campus are the cafeteria workers, regardless of whether they work for the institution or for an outside catering firm.

Whitney Hall, the only unionized cafeteria, affiliated with the Building Employees Union, pays cooks $77.40-wk. plus board, and waitresses $60-wk.

Most cafeterias are only in full operation for eight months of the year, and employ mostly middle-aged married women.

The U.C. Refectory, the New College cafeteria and the New Medical Building cafeteria are all run by Commercial Caterers. Their wage scale seems to run from $1.20-hr. for a busboy, to $1.35 hr. for waitresses, $1.50-hr. for dishwashers, $1.60-hr. for supervisors, and $1.70-$1.90 for assistant chefs and chefs. Fifty cents is deducted for lunch

These rates, according to one supervisor, are fairly good within the industry, where scales are generally at a depressed level. There was some dissatisfaction but once again no positive enthusiasm for unions.

At the Trinity Buttery, run by Beaver Food, the only comment was "We get enough, more than some places."

At the Vic Coffee Shop, run by the College itself, pay was described as "about minimum wage".

In spite of the low wages and seasonal work, staff, particularly married women, is very stable. The supervisor of the Arbor Room of Hart House has worked there for 34 years. The supervisor of the U.C. Refectory has been on the same job since she first came to Canada 11 years ago.

Most of the cafeteria workers expressed a liking for their work.

"I feel like a mother to these kids," the supervisor of the U.C. Refectory said. "of the thousands of kids that have come through here in all the years I've been here, I've only had a beef with one."

Some of the women find the hours suitable for their child-rearing. At any rate, most of them could not likely get other employment.

Among the 600 technicians hired by the university, a dichotomy similar to that in the library appears. Technicians are paid between $4240 and $8120 according to category and grade.

In some sections, like Anatomy, the technicians have learned their work on the job, often starting as caretakers, with low educational levels. They are generally opposed to unions, which, they feel, would lower their salaries, or even put them out of work, since they lack certification. Their jobs are stable, and while they are not quite happy with their status with respect to professionals they are relatively pleased with their situation.

Officially trained and certified technicians seem to be more amenable to unions. Dental technicians tried to organize but were declared too small a bargaining unit. Not only do they look for better wages and conditions, but they would like more recognition in their dealings with the holders of degrees and more acceptance as a part of a team by professors.

Another group on campus which does not have collective bargaining rights is the teaching staff. The Association of the Teaching Staff is a voluntary association, and any staff member may opt out.

In spite of recent demands to strike for higher wages, the Association, a member of the also-voluntary Canadian Association of University Professors, cannot legally bargain with the university and only presents a suggested salary brief each year.

Prof. F. E. Winter of the Department of Fine Art, chairman of A.T.S., said that while "many teachers have no strong feeling about the association" the great respect for the C.A.U.T. was made evident by the election of Prof. C. B. Macpherson as president. The association's voluntary nature, however, hampers the effectiveness of actions such as last year's boycott of Simon Fraser University.

The U. of T. Police would also appear to be a fertile ground for union organizing. The Building Employees Union mistakenly thought they were members of a Police Association, and therefore not eligible to be unionized. But according to Matthew Lawson, University Head of Security, they are just normal university employees, with only a specific right of arrest.

The picture for university employees is none too bright. Wages for the majority are low. Fringe benefits range from adequate to bad. Most of the employees are locked into their jobs, and have few hopes for alternative employment. In spite of this, the possibilities of successfully organizing to improve conditions are slim, and the reason lies mostly in the attitudes of the workers themselves.

VOLLEYBALL PLAYOFFS

Eng II took their best of five series with For in straight games and Vic took Scar, 3-1. Eng II now faces Eng I and Vic will go against Erindale. They played last night; and play will resume at Hart House Thursday at 7:30. Forget about a baby-sitter: bring the whole family.

HOCKEY

Raino (2), Aiken (3), Houson (2), and Muczinski led Scar to an 8-2 squeegie of Jr. Eng. Newland and Read hit for Jr. Eng.

Sr. Eng. (Treen 3, Pitts, Currie) utterly meggsed PHE, 5-1. Duncan replied for PHE.

School of Busyth (abstract noun - "business") blanked New, 3-0. Ferguson, Arends ("arends"; something you make when you're sorry) and Corcoran were SoB scorers.

J. McCarthy, G. McCarthy and Dean paced SMC's 3-1 victory over PHE (Nepotik; Bobby Kennedy owed his position as Attorney General to nepotikism.)

Stack had the hat trick as Law II beat Colgrave and Devonshire, 3-1.

SPORTETTE

The Intercollegiate Volleyball and Basketball teams travelled to Queen's last weekend to participate in a Trimeet featuring Queen's, McMaster and Toronto. The Volleyball team continued its undefeated season by defeating McMaster by scores of 15-7, 15-5 and 15-5. Queen's fell to Toronto by scores of 15-2, 15-7, and 15-7.

The Basketbells played their first game of the weekend against McMaster to whom Toronto lost by a score of 35-25. Ann Thompson, Vic IV, was the top scorer of this game, sinking 12 points. In a hard fought, closely matched game, Toronto defeated Queens by the score of 26-25. In the dieing moments of the game, Karen Empey, Phe II, sunk the tie breaking free sbot to give Toronto the victory. Top scorer of this game was Violet Shadd, Meds II.

Innis (Toman 2, Tanaka) 3; Arcentina (Kindree; "nepotikism" is giving jobs to your kitb and kindree. Spragge) 2.

BASKETBALL

Vic got 14 points from Eben to down PHE A, 38-30. Baker's 10 led the losers.

Meds beat SMC, 50-40. Lloyd Rossman selflessly took a back seat allowing Lewis ("Are you Lewis? Funny, you don't look Lewis'") to lead Meds scorers with 15. Rossman (great team man that he is) still scored 4 points. Laglia had 9 for SMC.

Erin (Shaw 21) 47; Innis (Lockhart 14) 44.

Lendrum had 6 and Jr. Eng. bore the palm of victory, beating Pharm. 28-26. Cuthbert (Bert; "you bath-dard'!) and Bayliff each scored 6 for Pharm.

UC II got 18 points from Lazar and 17 from Koach to impregnate Arch, 57-18. King Kohn replied with 6 for Arch.

SCORE WITHHELD IN ROUSING BLUE-RED ENCOUNTER

By PHIL BINGLEY

Last evening at Varsity Arena one of the most exciting tilts in years was played. The redshirts led by Steve Monteith and Bob McClelland showed more moves than a Hong Kong flu germ under microscope analysis while the blueshirts sparkled too.

The final score and shots on goal were not announced so as to prevent the heaping of criticism on the losers and the goalers. Suffice it to say that there were many goals scored and the final count was close.

The game itself was a dirty one as the Queen's rules of amateur ice hockey were openly flaunted. The play became even rougher following the first minute of play when referee Imay Puttawn was hit by a high-flying puck and forced to retire with a badly lacerated fingernail.

McClelland led all scorers with a bunch, many of them coming on shots. He was asked in the visitor's dressing room after the game why he had been so successful. "I came back to wheaties," said Bob. "And I'm glad I did."

Tom 'Rocket' Watt, on loan from the Yellow Submarine Torpedoes, also added two goals for the redshirts. His first marker came on a blazing dribbler through the goaltender's legs while his second followed a brilliant play on which the Rocket outguessed the empty net perfectly and beat the goalcrease with a nifty slider.

Bill L'Heureux was chosen the game's most valuable player midway through the second period when he scored a beautiful goal on a behind-the-back-wrist shot. Observers at rinkside were amazed by L'Heureux's beautiful effort and many of them claimed they hadn't seen such a play since the days when Henny Yungman played in the now defunct Uxbridge Ball Hockey Loop.

Members of the women's press corps made a special presentation to Gord Cunningham just prior to the third period as the game's "best-dressed participant". Cunningham wore navy blue sweat pants (with white trim down the outside seams) and a matching blue top with white lettering. His outfit, designed by M. Killoran of Toronto, was modelled after the official uniform of the Russian speedskating team.

Ward Passi also wore blue sweatpants — baggy ones — and looked like a sloppy Russian speedskater. Passi protested the decision after the game. "I couldn't find my regular size and there just wasn't time to change," said Ward.

Best actor of the game award went to ringer Dave Copp for his portrayal of "Red Kelly on defence". Copp announced at a press reception which followed the game that he now plans to run for parliament in the next election.

The contest, although not sanctioned by the Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association was a gala event for all involved. The players enjoyed themselves thoroughly, the crowd (officially announced as four) thought it was great entertainment and the press happily had a brief rest from writing a midweek story about the serious business of intercollegiate hockey.

NOTES ... Blues resume regular workouts this evening in preparation for Sunday's exhibition game with Laurentian University Voyageurs in Sudbury.

BOXING

When most members of the highly esteemed, but sodden, Varsity sports staff were mere leather-jacketed yearlings, Tony Canzano put in his first year as boxing coach at the University of Toronto.

Twenty-one years later, Canzano's still on the job, and he unveils his latest band of Varsity boxers tonight at Hart House, starting at 8 p.m.

An eight bout card of exhibition matches is scheduled which will feature such ring rhinos as Mike D'Ornellas (150 lb. titleholder) and Joe Donohue (heavyweight champeen).

Varsity's next activity comes February 1 at Hart House when they meet Royal Military College.

VIETNAM CONSULATE MARCH

Math prof charged $50

A U of T math professor charged in connection with the October Vietnam march on the United States Consulate was convicted and fined $50 in provincial court yesterday.

Prof. Peter Rosenthal, who has one month to pay the fine or spend 10 days in jail, plans to appeal the verdict.

Judge Joseph Addison's summary indicated he felt the presence of the demonstrators may have hampered access to the consulate and thus constituted a disturbance.

In the course of his examination Rosenthal asked the two police witnesses and Police Inspector Walter Magahey if there was any way one could address such a crowd without being arrested.

All refused to answer and Judge Addison did not respond when the question was redirected at him.

Must support pickets: Bridgewood

By HELEN FORESTELL

"The key to student-worker unity," says Jim Bridgewood, who works on the assembly line of the Ford Company's Oakville plant, "is student support of the workers on the picket line."

Bridgewood was speaking Wednesday afternoon, at the invitation of the U of T Communist Club.

He is an average looking man of 39 with dark brush-cut hair turning gray. He wears a brown corduroy jacket over a white shirt and tie. It's not how you would expect a communist to look. Bridgewood was a Communist Party candidate in the last federal election.

Bridgewood, who served on the Human Rights Committee of his local, told an interested audience of about 30 students how workers were being exploited and "dehumanized" by the Ford Company's efforts to make production more efficient. The lines are being speeded up, he says, and the space between cars shortened.

When a man complains about work overload, the grievance procedure may take up to 28 days. "You wonder why workers wildcat and have spontaneous eruptions," says Bridgewood. "It's basically because the collective agreements of today will not answer the problems of the workers."

This past fall, the Ontario Government granted Ford a permit to put the workers on excessive overtime in order to fill a fleet or orders. The workers argue that they should not have to suffer under the strain of overtime, but that the company should hire more men.

But, said Bridgewood, in terms of retraining and fringe benefits, it doesn't pay Ford to hire more men.

Bridgewood also complained about supervisors whom he described as "neo-Nazis and anti-Semites who have no scruples about them whatsoever. Their job," says Bridgewood, "is to intimidate and harass the workers."

Speaking calmly and eloquently, Bridgewood told of men driven to drink on the job and how in the last 18 months there were six suicides by people who worked in the Oakville plant. He said that if a man has a serious accident the company gives him a softer job. Eventually it tries to work him into as hard a job as it can rather than have the worker report for compensation. "Sometimes it looks like a hospital," said Bridgewood, "with people walking around with broken arms and legs."

Bridgewood says workers would welcome student support in their struggles, as in the Peterborough Examiner strike. The co-operation shown during this strike "is going to start a great unity between workers and students," Bridgewood maintains.

"And I think this will snowball within the next year, especially in Toronto, Vancouver, and Montreal."

"I know my union and the education chairman of my local would gladly try and work out some kind of relationship with students," says Bridgewood. "Whether it will be educational classes, seminars, a demonstration or a strike, it is just around the corner."

TAPS, NOT STRAPS, BANNED

Abolishing the strap in Metro schools was to have been discussed in the trustees' meeting of the Toronto Board of Education last night.

Instead, it was postponed for two weeks as members discussed the year's estimates and found time to pass a resolution condemning a Planning Board proposal to allow a tavern to go up just two blocks from Northern Secondary School.

Open weeks? No, just from 3 to 9

New College Dean David Stager has called a students recommendation for women's visiting hours on weekdays a "bec in a bonnet."

Tuesday night the residence committee requested that weekday women's hours be from 3 p.m. to 9 p.m. The move would be reviewed after two weeks.

"They wanted a fight," said Stager. "They thought that we would oppose women's hours on weekdays and they wanted to confront authority."

"But the committee has lost sight of who is their enemy. It was Dr. Ivey (New College Principal) and I who first suggested that weekday women's hours be established."

"If 3 p.m. to 9 p.m. are the weekday hours that the residence committee wants, then these hours will be established. I would not be surprised if after trying them out the residents decided to rescind them."

He said he suspected students would find the increased noise distracting during the week.

Stager pointed out that in a referendum on the issue last week, 35 percent of the residents voted against having any weekday women's hours at all.

Two weeks ago, the residents were unsuccessful in achieving abolition of visiting restrictions on weekends. Dean Stager and Principal Ivey agreed to extend the weekend hours but refused open weekends.

Residence committee chairman Peter Heath (III New) reported at the time that an overwhelming majority of residents wanted such open weekends.

the Rosenthal trial

Toronto police may have carte blanche to break up any protest march or demonstration they wish due to a recent decision by Judge Joseph Addison.

Addison yesterday convicted University of Toronto mathematics professor Peter Rosenthal of violating Section 160 of the Criminal Code by "causing a disturbance by impeding" at an anti-war demonstration outside the United States Consulate Oct. 26 last year.

Rosenthal was arrested while trying to speak to the demonstrators because, according to police witnesses, the crowd that gathered to hear him blocked the sidewalk.

Arresting officer Walter Magahey, chief of Metro's Emergency Tactical Force (riot squad), agreed with defense witnesses that until Rosenthal was arrested the demonstration had been orderly.

Addison even pointed out that Rosenthal had "contributed strongly to maintaining that order" by asking demonstrators to keep a pathway clear for passers-by.

But Addison convicted Rosenthal and fined him $50, ruling that even if there had been a pathway, police could break up an orderly demonstration because pedestrians might be "frightened" to walk into such a demonstration. They might be "impeded" by having to cross the street. And the demonstrators could then be convicted of "causing a disturbance by impeding."

It hasn't always been so, as Rosenthal tried to demonstrate citing previous cases from appellate courts.

One of Rosenthal's examples was Regina vs. Buhay, which took place in Toronto back in 1929 and was almost identical to his. A woman was charged with "causing a disturbance by impeding" by addressing a crowd. She was warned by police to stop, then arrested and ultimately convicted in magistrate's court.

The conviction was overturned in appeal court because, the judge ruled, a "disturbance" must accompany such "impeding" to make a conviction under Section 160. For example, he added, a Christmas parade might involve a great deal of impeding, but was not illegal because there was no disturbance.

During the Rosenthal trial no direct evidence came out to show that anyone was, in fact, impeded, although police witnesses said someone might have been.

The Crown Attorney, in his summation, said that he had given much thought to what constituted "disturbance". He said some individuals might have been disturbed by the mere presence of the demonstrators, and these individuals might even be the nearby police.

They might have been disturbed, the Crown Attorney continued, by what is happening in Vietnam or the use of the word "American imperialism".

Rosenthal asked Inspector Magahey and Judge Addison if there was any way a person could address a crowd, like that gathered at the Consulate, without being arrested. Magahey replied he couldn't say, Addison had no comment.

When Rosenthal asked Magahey whether arrest was particularly likely at the Consulate, Magahey answered, "There are better places."

The offence is not serious and the $50 penalty small, but if Rosenthal is ever arrested at a future demonstration, even for the same charge, he faces the possibility of heavy fines or jail.

But more important, Judge Addison's ruling makes it impossible to hold a legal demonstration in Toronto. Unless Rosenthal's conviction is successfully appealed, police can now break up any demonstration, no matter how orderly, no matter how much of a pathway is left, if they think "someone" might be "frightened" by the crowd.

When that happens free speech and freedom of assembly will be dead in this city.

To appeal the conviction, Rosenthal will have to lay out $1.25 a page for a transcript of his trial, plus 40 cents a page for extra copies. He needs three copies for an appeal, and his was a long trial with more than 20 witnesses. The costs could go into hundreds of dollars, not counting lawyer's fees.

If you want to help with the appeal, you can send money to the Canadian Rights Defense Committee, care of Prof. Melville Watkins, Political Economy Department, University of Toronto.

Workers: Part III

The student as employer

By LOUIS ERLICHMAN

When you do articles like those on U. of T. workers in Monday's and Wednesday's papers, your moralizing, editorialing, normative instincts drive you irresistably into asking the question, "What should be done?"

If there were some obvious clear-cut action to be taken, some struggling, united group of proletarians we could march out with our banners in support of, this would be one of those righteous indignation editorials you are used to.

The problem is that there's nothing simple to do. A lot of the employees are hard done by maybe (their children's bellies are not swollen, nobody drops napalm) on them, and there are people worse off in Toronto, but their conditions are still pretty poor.

Unionization, despite the standard images of corruption and alienated leadership, would improve their situations.

But unions are hard to organize: workers are scared, or skeptical, or both; management is hostile, and has several legal and practical advantages.

The unions are making tentative efforts to organize college employees. This time it isn't those mythical capitalist bastards who are exploiting the workers; it's us. St. Michael's College wage rates are passed on by a student-staff committee. If it is our university, they are also our employees.

It is so much easier for us to carry banners against Vietnam or Biafra than to pay the Rochdale restaurant workers a decent wage.

But there's very little you can "go out and do", although some Rochdale people are trying to organize their restaurant workers.

You can talk to the people that work in your residence or building or department and "support" them (whatever that means) if matters ever get to that stage, or if you ever get within talking distance of the centres of power.

Except that they probably won't be too enthused about the whole union idea. SAC employees have resisted several attempts at organization in spite of a sympathetic "employer".

So maybe it's something for you to do when you finally get control of the university. Until then, it's not a problem that will overwhelm you. But it won't go away either. It just lies there, breathing quietly.

LETTERS

bigot Pargeter tries to wriggle out

The amount of hate mail received in reply to my letter (Endorsement of Gerald Dickson — Jan. 20), shows that many people are either very dumb or else do not read carefully.

When I read Dickson's original letter, urging that foreign students not be supported at Canadian universities and hurling abuse at student radicals, I was so shocked and amazed that some reply seemed necessary. I did not want to dignify Dickson's narrow provincialism and stupidity with a serious argument, and thought that heavy sarcasm would suitably expose his ridiculous attitude. I certainly did not expect that anyone would take seriously such a suggestion as "a governing body made up of 80-year-old grandmothers."

If my remarks offended anyone because of his unfamiliarity with the English language, I sincerely apologize. To most, however, I owe no apology; they simply failed to read beyond the first two lines.

"no dust at Old Favourites"

The article BARGAIN BOOK BASEMENTS in your November 15th issue seems to have missed the point entirely of what the Search Service is all about. The author evidently thinks he is supposed to do the work when he says it's "not for anyone allergic to dust". Our Search Service is for finding OUT-OF-PRINT books which we do not have in our stock. We advertise among second-hand dealers in Canada, the U.S., and England. This does not obligate the customer in any way. If we locate the book we advise by mail of the price and condition. Then the customer decides if the price and condition are acceptable. It usually takes about a month depending on the book's point of origin. As soon as the book arrives we mail it to the customer or he may pick it up, whichever he prefers. No dust in that.

A more serious error in the article is that it completely overlooked two well-known bookstores in Toronto. One is quite close to the University — Dora Hood's Book Room at 34 Ross Street, and the other Joseph Patrick Books at 7 Wellington Street West — both free of dust. We hope the writer's research in his chosen profession increases in depth with the passing years.

Richard P. Havens, 1983, Ritchie Havens, Verve-Forecast $7.90

Who Knows Where the Time Goes, Judy Collins, Electra, $3.95

While there is no point in comparing their styles (as an apple is to an orange, so . . .) Ritchie Havens and Judy Collins are in the same sort of public position. They both began singing folksongs and then branched out, taking with them a loyal, if small, group of followers. But outside of the sort of people who call A&A's to find out when the next album is coming out, they are pretty well ignored. Pity.

Both had new albums come out just before Christmas that were lost in the rush to buy the Beatles' new one ("Maybe the nude picture of Paul and Yoko is on the inside"! ). Again, pity.

In Havens' case it is understandable, for he is more of a concert performer than a studio man. His earlier records told that the style and sense were there, but it was really a sort of pointing out — rather deadily, like one of those movies of a live performance by the Old Vic. The drums and electric guitars packaged everything too neatly. In a couple of cuts on Something Else Again (the second album) the performer came through, but only on a couple of cuts.

Havens, live, is like the Pied Piper (who mercifully never signed with Columbia. Would that Leonard Cohen hadn't.). The stooped concentration, totally inarticulate introductions and wild, free rhythm shifts on guitar form a kind of vortex. He also has a gear ear for lyric meanings, hearing San Francisco Bay Blues as a blues, though the rest of the world understands it as a rag. In the same way he discovered a humane, sad undercurrent in Dylan's Just Like A Woman. Any piece Havens plays, becomes unmistakably his.

His third album (fifth if you count two on Douglas) comes closest to catching this. Some of the cuts still sound boxed, but Cohen's Priests, the Beatles' She's Leaving Home and Havens' own Prairie of Ramon come through with an almost eerie suggestibility.

The best side is the last—the album contains two records—recorded in concert. A Little Help From My Friends just comes off very happy, which is what it should do. Donovan's Wear Your Love Like Heaven follows with a headier kind of celebration. It's a pleasant and interesting combination.

The last track, Shaker Life/Do You Feel Good reveals Havens' in-person power.

It happens rarely that music becomes compulsive for an audience ("Not since the Hallelujah Chorus has . . ."). I've seen it once, although on the three or four occasions I've watched Havens, he has always been skirting on the edge of it. The Rev. Gary Davis was on stage, several Mariposa's back, outside, having performed abominably several nights previous. (He had been dead drunk, so the word went.) It had more saddened than displeased, like watching an old athlete. (Except that folk fans are less cruel than sports fans, witness the recent response to Johnny Bower). However by Sunday, the Reverend had atoned, sobered up and was at his funky best. During his last number rhythmic hand-clapping and response singing were happening all over the audience. Shouting, singing, some crying: all the features that people find so frighteningly stupid about a revival meeting. This was not response that was asked for, as in the old Hootenanny "Clap now" sign, but something that just had to come out. And out of white kids, no less.

This exact process is captured, in so far as tape-recorders can, on the last cut of the Havens album. Try just listening to the audience. Although, once I made that recommendation to a friend who said, "I am the audience", and I had to slink back to the kitchen to make coffee.

REVIEW 2

As free as Havens' sound is, Judy Collins' is perfected. Her last album, Wildflowers made a beautiful foil for Magical Mystery Tour, Their Satanic Majesties' Request, The Doors and the other always-played-ones of a year ago. It was like Bach after Beethoven. The sound was as meticulous as Czech glasswork.

Collins' voice itself is exceptionally clear (none of the tiring wispyness of Joan Baez or the strain of Joni Mitchell), a sort of common denominator of songs. She changes very little, or perhaps one should say very subtly, and still sounds right by the mood of each piece. Like Havens, she also has exquisite taste, or at least taste that somehow agrees precisely with my own.

Who Knows Where The Time Goes, the new album, is a substantial change from Wildflowers. It fulfills the second, more violent promise of In My Life, a very ambivalent collection of the delicate (Suzanne, the arrangement of Tom Thumb's Blues) and the rough (Weill-Brecht's Pirate Jenny, Cohen's Dress Rehearsal Rag). It's as if she decided, we've done with the sublime, now let's get down to the erotic.

Joshua Rifkin's baroque orchestrations have been replaced by a small rock band and even a taste of the new country sound that is cropping up everywhere. Mercifully, this rock group realizes its purpose is to accompany: to provide hard rhythm, nice bridge passages, and otherwise, stay the hell out of the way.

Fortunately, the same lyric taste that distinguished good ornate verse from flowery crap has sorted out the powerfully simple from the mundane. Witness, from the album:

The door it opened slowly and my father he came in,

I was nine years old.

And he said "I've had a vision and you know I'm strong and holy,

I must do what I've been told.

So we started up the mountain,

He was running I was walking

And his axe was made of gold.

(Cohen)

*We parted so hard, me rushing round Britain with a guitar, making love to people
I didn't even like to see.*

*Oh, I would think of you,
yes I mean in the sick sad morning, and in the lonely midnight,
try and hold your face before me.*

(Robin Williamson, the Incredible String Band)

These are all songs of experience, and one misses the innocence of Wildflowers. But then one can always put Wildflowers above it on the changer, which is probably what the gods meant for us to do.

However, if you are still looking for a synthesis, there is a remark she made once to one of those magazines for hip teenage girls (Eye, Cheetah or the like). The question was "What is the first thing you would do if you were elected President?", and she replied, "I'd appoint Leonard Cohen Minister of Defence", which sums things up pretty well.

muddy at the rock

Kneeling on the floor of a hot theater with a couple of thousand other people is hardly a good way to enjoy anything, but it did little to diminish the effect of Muddy Water's band at the Rock Pile last Saturday night.

I hadn't realized what a solid following Muddy Waters has in this town. The place was packed and there was a healthy line around the corner outside. With virtually no advertising, there must have been a lot of talk about the show to get that sort of crowd. And the performance was well worth the crush and the heat.

Muddy Waters is without a rival in the blues world in his ability to put together great bands. He has long had one of the best band pianists in the business in the person of his half brother Otis Spann, but aside from Spann, the personnel frequently changes. At the moment, Peewee Madison is playing the second guitar, Paul Oscher is the harmonica player, the rhythm section is Sonny Wimberley on bass and Willie Smith, drums, and of course there is Otis Spann on piano or organ. Most of these musicians have played Chicago style blues for many years. Peewee Madison in particular has been a member of many good groups. Paul Oscher is too young to have been playing for very long, but he has obviously listened hard to the harmonica of James Cotton, and he turns out a good enough replica to fit into a tight band.

Muddy Waters himself is a man of style. There's none of the forced bluesmanship that some of the stars display, especially on the road. He just stands up and plays his music, and when the mood is on him, it's the best blues you can hope to find. He doesn't need to add anything in the hope of creating excitement. He's the acknowledged master and his stage presence shows all the dignity of that position.

Buddy Guy is said to play his blues straight when he's in Chicago, although he adds a measure of what looks like stage blues fervor at the Riverboat. When he joined the band at the Rock Pile during the first set and played first guitar while Muddy sang, he toned down his approach and just provided some good solid backing. If you listened carefully, you could hear that he was playing some beautiful music, but there was none of the dazzling guitar work he knows how to turn on.

I think that for the most part the largely white audiences which the blues bands play to on the road are much more attuned to the music now than they were a few years ago. This is due partly to Muddy Waters' success and partly to the large number of imitative pop-blues groups, and I think that more of the blues singers should become aware of the fact and just stick to playing the music. There was certainly nothing last Saturday to indicate that the crowd at the Rock Pile would have been any more enthusiastic if Muddy Waters had left about. They loved it just the way it was.

whimsical scattertail

The press release says "Joanna" is a film about today, about a beautiful young girl, a strange creature of whim and imagination, with a relentless desire to escape from the harshness of life."

In other words, it's one more movie about "Swinging London". Joanna is the modern woman, better called a scattertail than a scatterbrain. The question the movie poses is whether a sweet, 18 year old English profligate from the Royal Academy of Art can find fulfillment as the true love of a tough but to-his-own-self-true swinger from Sierra Leone.

The greatest entertainment experience which can be had is open to those with enough money to exist as hippies. This elite of the moneyed upper middle classes is able to partake of all the psychological, sensuous, and sensual pleasures that are available. Joanna is such a hippy, or flower child; the rest of us live vicariously hippy lives by either paying a two dollar escape fee at the movies, or slipping an occasional dime to the nearest pusher.

Joanna retails all the favourite current myths, as well as some of the more classic ones, including a cynical but true artist who is awaiting his big break in art, a dying, heart-and-pocket-of-gold nobleman who has figured out what life is all about: lovers in expensive foreign cars (Iso Grifo), posh, top-of-the-town apartments, and anonymous rustic retreats.

The only innovation in Joanna is the genteel crossing of the colour barrier, which provides the audience with the chance to push their sexual daydreams to the last unexplored frontiers. But it's none of your Uncle Sidney Poitier, sexy as deodorant sex; this is sexy as Playboy cum Lady's Home Journal living for modern swingers. The flavours are the same; only the names have been changed to dupe the innocent. We have already satiated our sexual imaginations with nymphets and teenyboppers in Lolita and Candy, older women in The Graduate, with German shepherds (four-legged) in 491. Boston Strangler gave you a chance to kill for the psychosis of killing, and I Love You, Alice B. Toklas let even the biggest squares drop out. Where do we go from here?

Perhaps, follow the lead of home movie-makers everywhere and record, each of us, our own dreams. Norman Mailer has made something called Moonstone, which is his personal fantasy along the lines of "if I were the President of the U.S.A.", in 25,000 feet of film or less, just fill in the blank frames.

Joanna tries a little too hard for the sweet-sour wistful air of a fresh young girl's initiation into the realities of life, realities being things which are not fun, not even un-fun, or a drag, but simply painful. Joanna is like uptempo, up-dated Judy Garland, though Joanna herself, played by Genevieve Waite, does not have that ponderous "love me or you hurt me" air which I have always associated with old Judy. Joanna has the contentment of an automaton, doing what she does best in the best of all possible beds, getting caught by the occasional wife and slapped around by the odd square boyfriend who believes in excess but with only one person at a time.

However, this innocent time cannot last, as two of Joanna's friends are addicted to some freak trip called thinking, and they do a fine job of complicating her simple life.

One of these two is Lord Peter Sanderson, played by Donald Sutherland, a person so nice, simple, and helpful, that he restores your faith in humanity, until you leave the theatre.

The pleasant escapism is marred by the mawkish sentiment of the last third of the film, which only goes to show that Joanna would make a wonderful opera, especially in Italian, which we wouldn't understand.

fine, art

Perhaps one summer you've been up north enjoying the weather and the water sports. Then some guy next to you leans over and shouts in your ear: "It's a nice day!"

Perhaps you've been in bed with someone and your partner shouts in your ear: "This is fun!"

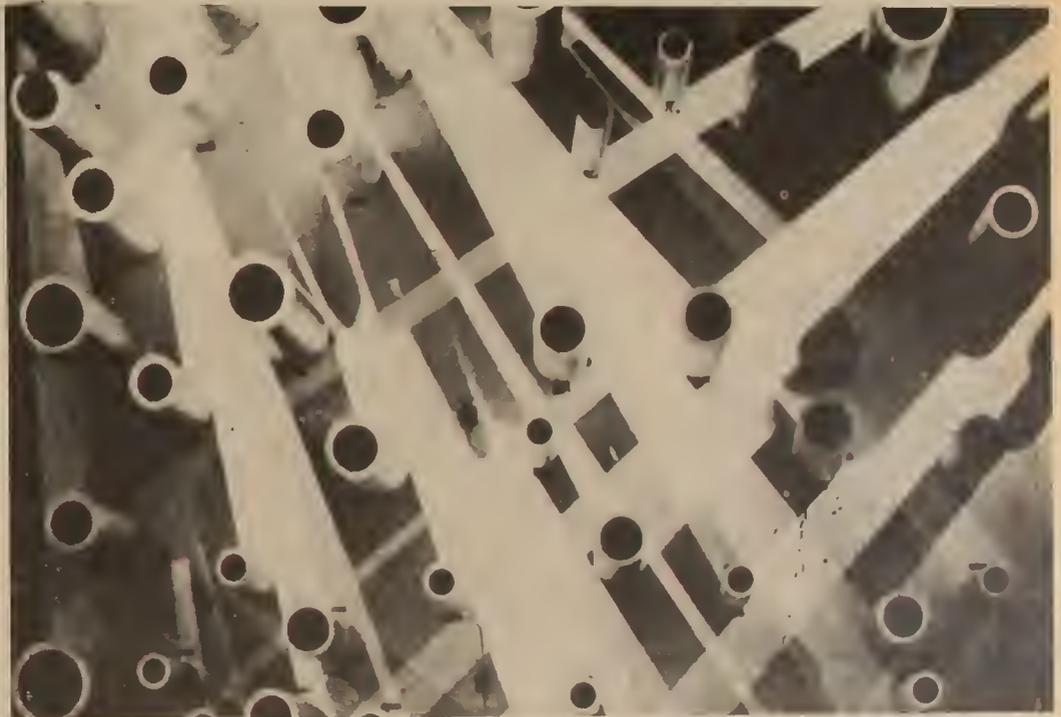

Perhaps you've had a parent die and one of your relatives comes up and says: "Your poor mother is dead! It's very sad!"

Perhaps you've read one of my art columns and then gone to see the show reviewed and you've heard me shout in your ear: "This is good! You're enjoying it!"

Lately I've been struck with the futility of telling people (assuming that they listen) what's what in art or anything. What's the point of saying "painter X has 12 good canvasses in this show and 12 poor ones", "... subtle distortions of time and space make advantageous use of the resultant textural anomalies ...", "painter X was born in 1936"?

Being an inveterate gallery-goer, I leapt at the chance of being opinionated in an art column, but it has worked a subtle change on my visits. Instead of going to galleries to enjoy, I now go to galleries to decide whether or not I should enjoy. And when I leave I'm faced with the problem of finding the right words to shout in your ear with.

This is not to say that art criticism should not exist. There is good and bad in art; everyone agrees to that. We just disagree about which paintings belong to which group. Furthermore, art historians have pointed out the fact that the public has to be continually re-educated to new ways of seeing; artists are notoriously reluctant to do this, so the job falls to critics.

Earlier this week I went down to see "Three by Noland - Three By Stella" at the AGO. One of the paintings by Kenneth Noland, called "Resta", is eight feet high and 30 feet long. It is all horizontal lines of pale acrylic colours. In the past I have contemptuously dismissed such simple works as fraud; this time I finally saw what artists are getting at when they create these giant shapes.

But how to express it? A little grey picture instead of a written review? An exhortation for you to go and see it? I didn't and don't know.

In the future I am turning this column into a forum, a place for examining art criticism instead of art itself. I have invited artists, fine art students and art critics to express their views here. You're welcome to have your ideas published here too if you think you can show me a way out of my dilemma

2,000 A.D.

Raphael awoke before the sun rose, when the mists were still blotting everything from sight except the elegant trunks of trees standing beyond the clearing and the squat shapes of the two round shelters and a low platform resting on stakes within it. He raised his hand, his head still resting on the mattress, and peered at its gray color, a color of mouse flavor, gray as the skin of the body on the platform. Raphael was never happy with this hour of the morning. He had not yet gone over the dream images of his night's sleep with his comrades (a communal procedure in their camp—the image of each one's dream drawn out every morning with great effort of memory into the consciousness of the whole camp) and they troubled him now, as they very often did before this ritual. Of course, it was also the hour of all the twenty-four when death was most congruent with the day, and when enemies most delighted to strike: for who could be ready at such an hour to ward off a blow or not be mesmerized by the sight of one's own blood?

It was the dream which troubled him most on this morning, however. Since he knew if he continued to lie on the mattress the memory of it and the shape on the platform (that shape representing the source and substance of the dream) would con-world, might wish to reveal to his brain. Another mark of the obsession was that the muffled swish of some vegetation being lightly brushed aside not far from the clearing, also went ignored for at least four seconds after it had been reported somewhere deep inside Raphael's head.

When it was acknowledged, it was not with a good deal of speed that Raphael then looked up and stared into the mist directly in front of him. He had trouble seeing, after trying so hard to jam his eyes shut. He was not sure, either, that what he would see would be definite or if it would merely conform to the outlines of a fear in his throat, for mist made things as vague as a child's vision roused in the night. It was as a blessing then that he finally perceived that there was a body moving in the mist, and that it was moving lightly on four feet. Gray the body appeared through the mist, too, but its movements were graceful enough to make the colorlessness appear promising.

Above the thin shoulders of the body Raphael began to make out a deer's head, large enough to be a male's, though it was not large in itself - and yet certainly prominent as it moved about among the invisible lower limbs of a tree. It made him think of another deer seen earlier, one he had helped drive into the range of a boy huntsman in the she came up to Raphael, and to the circle where the ashes of a recent fire lay. When she had reached the circle she spoke:

—Have you been up long, Raphael?

—Ob, long enough to see it clear up a bit. I was just watching a deer grazing near those trees over there.

—Is he gone?
—Yup. He left when you stepped out of the hut.
—Do you think we could start a fire now?

Raphael stood up, nodding his head. He walked over by Greta's side, knelt and poked with a switch among a few embers carefully packed inside a ring of large stones. Greta, who had begun to sow tinder amidst the ashes, brought him a few strips of birch bark to light it with.

—I dreamed about Jonathan last night, Greta. Greta glanced briefly at the platform. She had been with them long enough to be able to receive this telegram with the respect due to it. No one's dream was unimportant to the life of the camp, especially one dealing with slain member - perhaps sent by him.

—Do you want to tell me about it?
—Yes. Let's get the fire going first.

Greta immediately gathered some kindling together to lay over the tinder as soon as it was ignited. She stood holding it in her arms, over on the doom of dying in waters like that. But whether be was quickening the canoe himself I don't know. Whether be held a last authority over my will, a last charm against a slow decay, I don't know. Perhaps some night after this, after we've found a decent place to lay him in, he'll come back and say.

Raphael paused after this, opening his eyes again—the flames were reaching fairly high now, and the two faces were getting uncomfortably warm. Raphael got up on his feet.

—Just after I woke, Greta, I could feel nothing else but the strength of that water, that scum. I felt like decay had been sprinkled over all of us while we'd been sleeping in the night. And that we'd end up sucked into a compost heap one freezing morning, us useless as all that metal and brick they used to suck the spirit out of, before the revolution. But I think it might have been unfair to Jonathan. His own strength must be lying around somewhere, it just couldn't have disappeared—or be decaying on that platform now. I have a feeling it might have seeped into his clothes before the last spurt of blood trickled down his neck.

—Are you going to wear the clothes, Raphael?
Raphael looked at Greta and then at the platform and shrugged his shoulders as if such a question was useless, powerful to shake off, he threw aside his blankets with the hand he had just examined, and raised himself so that he was sitting on the edge of the mattress. There he remained for a few moments, resting his chin on arms crossed above knees which he had pulled up close to his chest. The September air had not attained that chill yet which would soon make the ground glisten beneath the morning mist, but Raphael felt cold just the same. His clothes were thin enough — they and the mattress being poor booty from one of the last bourgeois settlements to be razed — and a canvas jacket and a pair of threadbare Levi's (blessed corporation!) such as he wore now were hardly adequate even for late summer. But it was the silence and the preternatural movement of the mist (the threat of the obsession implicit in the intimacy of the mist with everything in Raphael's sight) which made the cold air painful. Raphael could not release himself from his posture, he could not make a noise of his own to frighten his own bearing.

Without thinking about turning his head, he found himself staring at his blankets. And, as he might have suddenly discovered a sourness in his stomach and realized that he was nauseous despite all his own long insistence on the contrary, he also found himself comparing his blankets, damp and cold to the touch, to the rags covering the body on the platform. He turned his gaze back to his knees, finally pressing his forehead directly against them. It was the mark of an obsession that it could narrow the blankness behind his furiously closed eyes to the circumference of some crumpled bits of cloth. It was as if the dewy stiffness of those rags alone was palpable to the optic nerves, that and nothing else which an eye, open to the whole finally, by that boy's good arrow. The deer had lain on the grass with a deep arc of blood running across his throat, a thin stream with its source in a neat, wide slit near the ear. Afterwards they cut the meat from the carcass of the buck in long strips, they had carried these strips, tender and dripping, to the cooking fires, lain them across reverently fashioned spits, and roasted them slowly with a reverence which was even finer. It was no regret to have consumed the gratefulness and (Raphael would insist) the not insignificant courage of such an animal, in the form of his well-cooked and well-seasoned flesh.

Raphael continued to sit on the edge of the mattress, with his knees no longer pulled up so close, cradling his arms, now, over his stomach. The deer had not turned his eyes to him, his animal indifference was large indeed, and pretty, while Raphael himself kept looking at him. It was in this way that the two would be aware of each other for portions of an hour, while the air stirred like the deepened breath of an infant awakening, and colors began to emerge. The coat of the deer was tawny, fine and well-fitting enough to make Raphael reflect for a second on the canvas and dungaree he was wearing; and one large dark eye seemed to glint green as he examined it.

A rustling noise from within one of the shelters was a subtle tap on the deer's shoulder, and the deer took it subtly, walking off slowly in a tangent to the clearing. He was moving out of Raphael's vision as politely as a friend edging out of a conversation in a party. Raphael turned and saw Greta coming out of the low but uncertainly, her head bowed slightly. She was feeling her long dark hair with a solicitous hand, passing its warmth over the wetting of the hair's length as forming in his heart, the small bundle of clothes at the foot of the dead man, and he knew that the desire was a true one that might bear good fruit in time. He suggested to Greta that she wake the others, and as she got up and walked to the huts, he started off in the opposite direction to visit his friend. The first thing that he did when he stooped over the platform was to reach over to touch that bundle lying at one end of it, and to gently unroll it. He did not turn his head towards the body covered with rags while he did this, either, feeling perhaps that a certain indifference was more respectful than anything else at this moment, and feeling, too, a greater confidence in the possible good auspices of the dream. At the least, they would make sure that his burying place was good.

When the bundle was unrolled he saw the clothes lying before him: a coat of leather shaped somewhat like a jerkin, beaten and worn so thoroughly it was almost soft, but with a color light and unfaded, and with a heaviness undiminished; and a pair of trousers with thick, dark cords running through them. Raphael picked up the coat and held it with one hand in front of him. Within a few seconds he felt, through a secret of circulation, the faintest hum from the coat, felt the benediction of a spirit of courage running through the leather and vibrating brilliantly through its new release into a form and a use. It was a hum as perfect, in fact, as the hum produced by the lines on a Japanese vase, when such a vase was held in the hand. Raphael laid down the coat immediately afraid to prolong the exaltation when the time for it was not yet at hand. He knew, however, with a certainty that a channel had been opened, and that he would not meet with this knowledge a satisfaction more complete while he lived.

bent over the tinder, sending up tiny wisps of smoke. She did not say a word, she was solemn, as he performed with the burning edge of the tinder under her gaze. When a sizeable heap of tinder took flame she carefully deposited her burden over it and took pleasure when the first soft crackles arose.

She knelt by Raphael's side, and Raphael reached over with an arm to draw her close, and to feel her damp cheek against his.

— What was it like?
Raphael paused before answering, closing his eyes against the small flames rising before him.

— We were in a canoe together, Jonathan and I — he was standing in it beside me. We were floating on some pond and I was trying to paddle, trying to reach the shore. It was night and I couldn't see the shore very well but I could make out that huge camp fire — I think they were camp fires — were burning out there. I was terrified of them of whoever must have lit them and danced around them. But the worse fire — worse by far, it was the worse terror I ever felt in a dream — was the muck on the pond. Somehow I knew there were bodies decaying miles beneath the surface of that pond, and those bodies had never even reached the bottom of the slime. It was not so much drowning but smothering in it that terrified me, as if it was quicksand instead of some scum-covered water we were drifting over. I wanted to paddle so bad, to get to the shore even if something was lying in wait, but I had nothing to paddle with except my hands, and I couldn't bring myself to look down on the water, to see whatever horrors were rising up, much less stick my hands in it.

— What was Jonathan doing?

— I don't know Greta. I wish I did. I'm sure he wasn't there as a final curse, a seal

burton and tinkletoy

Gary Burton looks like a sort of hip General Custer, thrusting his left leg out behind him as he fends off a toothless Sitting Bull. Burton's long hair is artfully arranged so that it will fall in front of his eyes, giving him the chance to make the gracious little gesture of flinging it back. He wears the very latest vines, don't you know (a black Nehru suit with a gold medallion), and sports a nice mustache. He is very hip. Just like his fans.

Actually, you know, it wasn't so long ago that Burton was a rather creepy looking, teenage prodigy. With his enormous spectacles and his very eager, scrubbed face, he looked like the class brain/brown. But now the new image Burton has arrived in a very big way (number one in down beat this year) and instead of appearing eager for praise, he now appears very self-important and certain that he is going to get what he wants.

Now that the personal abuse is out of the way, we can mention that Burton is extremely proficient at his instrument, which happens to be the tinkletoy (known in certain concentric circles as vibes.) Other vibists have expressed admiration and even awe for his musical ability. Particularly remarkable is his simultaneous use of four mallets.

But of course the reason that a large number of people are excited about him has less to do with how musical he is than with the fact that for a while he had a guitar player called Larry Coryell in his group. Coryell was previously in a rock band. When he joined Burton's group, people said, "Oh, how marvellous. Now we are going to witness the fusion of rock and jazz which is the very latest thing, after all. How exciting and groovy it will all be — boundaries will disappear, and all things will merge into a new kind of music which will not be hung up on structures, definitions, and other mean and wicked instruments of repression."

Well, all that happened, really, was that Burton played his jazz and Coryell played his rock guitar, and there they were on the same stage together. Nonetheless, even with Coryell's departure, the group has been hailed as the "most significant group in jazz today."

But there just isn't any reason to believe this hail (which is now on view in the glass case in front of the Colonial, where, coincidentally, the Burton four are playing for a couple of weeks.) In fact, although the music is pleasant enough, there is very little that is exceptional about it. "Mellifluous stuff," as the New Yorker tags Burton's music, seems a fair description.

Of course, all the musicians are very capable; but almost all well known jazzmen today are expert practitioners on their instruments. So where do you go from there?

The general sense one has of this music is of something rather light and insubstantial, wafting vaguely over one's head. There are not many hard edges, nor is there a sharply defined structure wherein all the airily drifting sounds can fit. Of course it is very difficult to improvise an inevitable sequence of notes. Yet when a truly great jazzman plays, he does create a feeling of inevitability, of each note being in exactly the right place by itself, and of all the notes forming an ine-luctable structure.

Of course there are a lot of people around these days who have the notion that all structure is evil. I suspect that, to some extent anyway, Burton is one of these. But when this notion is put into practice, a music results which is just hazy and which merely washes over you, almost without your awareness.

But there they were, down at the Colonial, thinking it was just the greatest thing in years. One wonders if, had Burton not employed Coryell the rocker for a while, and had he not become hip, would anyone have noticed him at all?

mailer politics

Miami and the Siege of Chicago, by Norman Mailer, New American Library, $ .95

For those who conceive of Norman Mailer as nothing more than the purveyor of four letter words, Miami and the Siege of Chicago comes as something of a surprise. In a combination of restraint and rather unusual perception, Mailer sees and describes America as a schizophrenic's nightmare.

Despite the radical differences in the political conventions of Miami and Chicago, Mailer is able to draw a startling amount of parallelism between the two conventions.

The same feeling of hopelessness that pervades Rockefeller's futile bid for the nomination is felt with McCarthy's. The hint of failure in Rocky's campaign speeches, the irrelevance of his pre-convention bash are all too well mirrored in McCarthy's frustrated taciturnity and lack of emotion. And naturally enough, Nixon's and Humphrey's respective victories are based on the same discordancy (there's no other word for it) of the electorate. As Mailer tersely observes: "In America the uniform always finished first, the production expert second and Christ was welcome to come in third."

Mailer dwells at considerable length on the roots of contemporary Republicanism, "a party with a philosophy rather than a program." The American faith mystique, the heritage of the American middle-class are as familiar to readers of Sinclair Lewis as apple pie and baseball. The feeling of impending doom is always felt first by those most severely affected, those too atrophied to bend and yet too hopeful to change. The philosophy is culminated in Miami by the revival of that long-standing hope of a save-the-land - America-first leader who will unerringly lead the flock back to Jesu-land.

In the second half of the book the leader, like the rights in the Declaration of Independence, becomes self-evident — disguised with crash-helmets, police badges and embodies in the jowls of Richard Daley. Mailer's description of the riots themselves, a mixture of his own and others' observations, illustrates one of the basic conclusions of Republican, or rather American philosophy.

The police-mania in the Great American City is as much a result of the American cult as the air exuded by the Republican fat-cats "... in the maintenance of the muscles of the mouth forever locked in readiness to bite the tough meat of resistance. ... loins and mind cut away from each other by some abyss between navel and hip."

The second logical conclusion is the attitude of property. Everything, it seems, is negotiable, from basic human emotions to delegates' votes. The synthesis of politics and property is a fact that every politician becomes grudgingly aware of, especially if he does not have access to any. And so we have Hubert Horatio. In contrast, a man like L.B.J. was all too aware of the meaning of property and its importance to others. That is why after four years of "creeping Lyndonism" it was LBJ's convention and that is why Sweet Hubert was nothing more than Pinocchio's hand servant.

Mailer's discourse on politics as property is perhaps the most relevant part of the book. With property comes not only power, as opposed to merely influence and authority, but equally as important, the retention of one's own ego. The human condition is appropriately summed up by Mailer: "A politician in (such) trouble can give away the last of his soul in order not to be forced to witness how much he has given away already."

Of the two main protagonists, Humphrey fares far the worse. He appears as one all too anxious to kiss Unca' Baines' feet and herald in another era of vacuous impotence reminiscent of Warren G. Harding.

Richard Nixon, however, remains something of an enigma to Mailer. Despite Nixon's shortcomings there is a feeling that he just may have risen above his "tricky-Dicky", snake-oil salesman qualities. After all, "a man who could produce daughters like that could not be all bad."

Mailer's book serves not so much to illustrate the nature of American convention behaviour as it does to elucidate the reasons behind many American social and political attitudes. Its limitation resides in the fact that it leaves the reader with a slightly

the naked truth

The Doukhobors, by George Woodcock & Ivan Avakumovic, Oxford. $7.50.

Anyone who has been acquainted with the Doukhobors knows they are much more than the occasional sensational reports in the public press make them out to be. Most important, most Doukhobors are ardent pacifists, not the terrorists that one is often led to believe. It is for capturing this quality that George Woodcock and Ivan Avakumovic are to be most commended.

Doukhobor history has known no shortage of hardships. Governments consider their refusal to submit to any hierarchical authority a threat to their existence; their reaction to sects such as the Doukhobors has been characterized by insecurity and panic.

The Doukhobors have also suffered from weak, and sometimes corrupt leadership. The most notable progress of the Doukhobor communities has generally been under the rule of a few strong and effective leaders.

The entire history of the Doukhobors is one of conflict with governments both here and in tsarist Russia. With the possible exception of the ultra-liberal (for his time) Tsar Alexander I (1801-25) no national leader, Russian or Canadian, has shown any understanding of the Doukhobors.

Added to the problems of unpredictable tsarist policies, and ineffective leadership among the Doukhobors themselves, are those of periodic Doukhobor migrations which have been frequent since 1800. They were required to till previously untamed land which even after clearing would provide for only the most menial existence. It is to the credit of the Doukhobors, that they have on each of these forced occasions been able to find the spirit and unity to set themselves anew with vigour to rebuilding their lives from nothing.

The story of the Doukhobor migration to Canada is as exciting an adventure as any they have undertaken in their history. The list of people who assisted with the Doukhobor migration is an impressive one: Lev Tolstoy, the novelist; George Cadbury, the chocolate manufacturer, and Peter Kropotkin, the anarchist. Woodcock is able to view this unusual migration with the eyes of an uninvolved outsider, and to display a hindsight not available to previous histories.

It is in dealing with the conflicts with Canadian government and civilization that Woodcock most excels, as he can draw upon twenty years direct experience with the Doukhobors.

The first of these conflicts is the question of swearing allegiance to the crown. The swearing of allegiance to any country is quite contrary to the religious tenets of the Doukhobors, and was one of their reasons for their conflict with the government of Russia.

Woodcock also tries to explain some of the more unorthodox activities of the vocal minorities among the Doukhobors. Among these are the nude marches (which were never undertaken before their coming to Canada, and which, contrary to popular belief, have taken place in the middle of winter), the burnings, the failure to observe registration laws, and the frequently chaotic question of their own leadership.

A few words should be said about the state of Doukhoborism today. It has never really recovered from the depression. Since then the toll of social assimilation has been evident, even among the most ardent fanatics. Neither the present leader of the Orthodox Doukhobors (Union of Spiritual Communities of Christ), John J. Verigin, nor his son and probable successor, appear to have the charisma that will again make the Doukhobors a proud independent and idealistic people. The independent Doukhobors have long been assimilated, and have completely fallen prey to the materialism they once abhorred. Even the Sons of Freedom are rapidly losing the vigour that once made them the most obstinate proponents of the Doukhobors' ideals.

The study of the struggles of the Doukhobors is valuable to more people than those who simply prefer to call themselves historians or students of religious sects. It is also of value to the pacifist revolutionary who seeks to implement ideals in a rigidly hostile environment. In this regard, the centuries long experience of the Doukhobors is an inspiration to the true revolutionary who maintains his struggle for what he feels to be right without being affected by his numerous defeats.

In 1965 when I heard that Woodcock was going to be doing a major work on the Doukhobors, I was already pleased with his approach in the small amount he has already written on the subject, and I looked forward to seeing his book. Now that it is out, even those expectations have been surpassed. In his preface he writes, "The history of the Doukhobors therefore alerts us to the existence of an element in common between past autocracies and modern democracies, which makes them, in some cases at least, share the same enemies." In the course of the book this point is amply illustrated. It surpasses anything written previously on the Doukhobors, and upholds its claim to be the definitive work on the subject. I would highly recommend it to anyone.

pretty poison -- perkin's performance parallels psycho

Pretty Poison (opening Jan. 29th at the Eglinton) has had a brief but rather interesting history. Ready for release last summer, it was reportedly shelved because of the King and Kennedy assassinations and the ensuing public outcry against the use of violence by the mass media. Then, in November, with an ad campaign along the lines of one of those "I Nymphed for the Hell's Angels" items generally churned out by the gnomes at American International, it was flogged indiscriminately via the multiple theatre circuit - usually to die an unnatural death after one week. That was the case in Toronto.

The reason it is coming back complete with new ad policy is due largely to the praise it received from a small but increasingly influential claue of New York critics who, in an unusual move, made special note of the movie's bone-headed publicity - the distributor's failure to understand what he was distributing. Last year this group performed similar word of mouth resuscitation on Bonnie and Clyde which, in its earliest release dates, threatened to wither on the vine, especially after a thunderous condemnation from O' Bosley Crowther, at that time still sending down tablets from his lofty summit at the New York Times.

Pretty Poison, is in neither the artistic nor the potential commercial league of Bonnie and Clyde. It is, though, an uncommonly good little black comedy - a mixture of O. Henry, Alfred Hitchcock and Max Schulman - told with deftness and economy by Noel Black, a young American director making his feature film debut. If it were foreign it would be called an 'art' film. Because it's American and has as its principals Anthony Perkins and Tuesday Weld it falls into a kind of categorical limbo and, hence, could be - and was - conveniently ignored.

Perkins is cast as a youth who is living continually in his own fantasy world. The opening sequences of the film establish that he has skipped parole from the asylum where he was quartered and has found himself a job working for a dye manufacturer in a small Massachusetts town. Here he encounters and becomes entranced by the nubile and apparently ingenuous drum majorette played by Tuesday Weld. After convincing her that he is working for the C.I.A. and that his employer is part of an alien plot to pollute the rivers of America, they happily set about planning to sabotage the dye plant.

Unhappily for Perkins, she takes the whole charade in deadly earnest. When they are discovered by the company night-watchman, little Sue Ann, as she's called, gives him a lethal whack on the head with the nearest available wrench. And, as the story progresses, she bags yet another victim, this one closer to home. The fascination of the film is in watching this subtle reversal of roles. Perkins had been the instigator and taken the lead, but he is supplanted by Sue Ann who shows how childish his game was. The ironic, nicely nasty, ending while not obvious is fairly predictable.

This is a fragile little story which, with lesser skills could have missed badly. That it did not is a credit to Black and screenwriter Lorenzo Semple Jr., who sustains beautifully a balance between the elements of tension and satire.

Perkins turns in his best work since Psycho. His performance in the initial sequences is crucial as he must establish strongly this added and boyish fantasy world for the necessary contrast later on with that of Miss Weld, who is moving in an entirely different orbit. Unlike Perkins, Tuesday Weld has always been under-rated. There is her ridiculous name and her precocious, gurgly, Be-bop acting style which she so effectively employed (perhaps unintentionally) as the redoubtable Thalia Menninger on the Doble Gillis series. She still retains traces of these earlier days, but now you have the feeling that she controls the affectation more than the other way around.

Her forte is the All-American chick. The 'good' girl posing as the 'nice' girl. Rumpled bed-sheets and a Dr. Pepper. Tops in her Bible class but better in the hay. Ambitious and rather devious. Nabokov wrote a book about this singularly American creature as did, on a lesser level Terry Southern. Tuesday Weld has been the only actress so far, I think, who's been able to capture in a performance the satirical qualities which they described

beware surprise birthday parties

Some years ago - no-one is quite sure how, the adjective 'Pinteresque' crept into the English language. It became a handy catch word for theatre critics and pseudo-intellectuals to hang on anything strange, bizarre or just plain incomprehensible in the modern theatre of the absurd. And every once in a while it's refreshing to get back to this fellow Harold Pinter who started it all, and see just what it was that he started. The U. of T. Alumni group down at the Coach House are giving us just such an opportunity this week in their production of The Birthday Party - one of Pinter's earlier works.

I could not in all truthfulness attempt to figure out the mechanics of Pinter's dramas. Judging from the way Pinter has been praised, damned, interpreted and generally misunderstood the method to his madness must remain a mystery. What he aims at essentially is the glorification of the ordinary man. Any average Joe placed in the proper situation can become a great tragic figure who inspires terror and pity in the audience. Pinter's Birthday Party provides just st... a situation.

Pete and Meg are an ordinary couple at a British seaside resort. He is a deck-chair attendant on the beach, she runs a boarding house which never has any boarders. Their daily routines are ordinary, their conversations are ordinary - in short they are ordinary. Stanley, who is the birthday boy, (and the only other resident of the boarding house,) is not really ordinary, but we're never quite sure what is wrong with him. He seems to have most of the standard delusions, neuroses and Freudian hang-ups which we associate with modern society. But he seems to be harmless. The setting is realistic, everyday and well within our realm of experience. The arrival of two new boarders, McCann and Goldberg, (funny he didn't look it,) catapult the world of reality into a realm somewhere beyond. No-one knows where they came from, no-one knows why they have come. They are not crazy, (although that's the first thing that comes to your mind,) they are terrifying and bizarre. The suggestion to throw a surprise party for Stanley, (he claims it isn't even his birthday) ushers us into a surrealist and terrifying experience. Together with Meg and Lulu, the girl next door, Goldberg and McCann isolate Stanley, victimize him and play several party games which produce the most startling results.

The boarders leave as mysteriously as they came and one is never quite sure whether the whole thing ever happened or not.

The Coach House production, directed by Herbert

Whittaker comes quite close to the proper mixture of the real and surreal. Unfortunately I attended the dress rehearsal which was beset with interruptions, but I suspect that when the wrinkles are removed the production flows quite well. The scenes of reality which flank the party are hum-drum, but the party itself, played by a fine cast is a gripping piece of theatre. Neville Dawkins and Michael Polley as the boarders catch most of the spirit of the lightning dialogue which is the essence of Pinter's genius. Ian Orr as Pete only has to shuffle on the stage and give a sad look to be a hit, but his skilful portrayal of the 'average man' is a startling contrast to the bizarre actions of the others. Robert McKenna as Stanley, the boy who doesn't have a very happy birthday is superb in his role. Disillusioned and militant at first, he becomes a tragic everyman figure whose suffering is portrayed in his every action.

At times the production lags; most of the time it moves at a vigorous pace. Sometimes it is so vigorous that one fears that the rather flimsy set is going to fall to pieces. It would be a shame if it did, because it would spoil what could be a fine theatrical evening.

Plays such as Pinter's Birthday Party have set a much imitated but seldom understood pattern in theatre today. I do enjoy Pinter; I don't understand him, but I will in the future beware of surprise birthday parties.

MUSIC

Buddy Guy continues to play over the weekend at the Riverboat, so there's still time to catch one of the great young Chicago bluesmen. If you want other blues, you may be able to catch Lonnie Johnson at The Gaslight. Give them a call.

The casual voice on the Rock Pile telephone tape says that Rhinoceros appears Saturday night. Tonight it's somebody called the Churls and the house band. Sunday — ?

The Colonial has the modern sounds of vibraphonist Gary Burton and his group. There's dixieland at La Maison Dore tonight, and Art Ayre and Moe Kaufmann are on at George's Spaghetti House for the week.

THEATRE

The Visit, directed by Henry Tarvainen, will open tonight in the church on Glen Morris. This marks the most ambitious effort yet to be undertaken in the Church theatre, a full length play with a cast and crew of close to fifty. Seating is limited, so come early.

Old Wives Tale by George Peele, directed by David Blostein and featuring Jim Morrison opened last night at Vic New Academic Building room 3.

The Coach House opened last night with The Birthday Party by Harold Pinter. It will play into February. (See review by Lorne Fienberg).

Theatre a la Carte, opens on Jan. 24 at St. Mikes.

The Fantastiks by Theatre Mickitys opens Feb. 1 at St. Mikes.

FILM

Toronto moviehouses are still choked with Christmas leftovers, most of which are worth missing. But if you haven't yet seen Faces, the film by John (Rosemary's Baby) Cassavettes playing at the New Yorker see it now, as it may be the vanguard of a very interesting period for American film. Faces examines the almost wilful fragmentation of a marriage, treating characters and events which have their origins in many television soaps and dramas with the intelligence and sensitivity which that medium has always sought to avoid. The acting is very good indeed, and even the secondary characters are developed, given dimension and human form. Faces seems like a visit to people you had previously known from afar, people you heard much about, but never had any reason to believe the stories told about them.

The Lion in Winter has been awarded the appellation 'Best Picture of the Year' by the New York film critics. No doubt when these same critics grow up and leave their provincial home for the big city, they will look back upon their decision and wonder why. The outstanding feature in Lion is the acerbic and witty repartee between King Henry II (played by Peter O'Toole, who has somehow confused Henry with Papa Hemingway) and his captive Queen Eleanor, portrayed in all the lavish excesses of female emotion by Katherine Hepburn.

The come-on for Carmen, Baby calls her the 'total female animal'. Not quite true; animals aren't so gross, and they don't find the unusual uses for Chianti bottles with foot-long necks that Carmen does. What else may happen in the film I don't know, for I walked out.

ET CETERA

Howard Cronis seems like an actor doing a very careful portrayal of a 'Film-maker', as if he had appointed himself the unofficial 'Director-in-Residence' at Victoria College.

But despite this impression he gives of merely playing a role, he is making a film as systematically as possible. He is dedicated to making it good.

The Victoria College Union Council gave him $1500 to make a documentary film about their college for them — a kind of kinetic yearbook. Fortunately he has had the good sense to recognize his own limitations and has therefore surrounded himself with experienced people.

In order to divide the work so that he could meet his June 1 deadline for the film, he has a professional cameraman and a producer collaborating with him on the project.

The cameraman, Robert Rouvery, has a great deal of experience in public affairs television as well as feature work. His prime responsibility is the technical quality of the film, but he is also helpful in, as he puts it, "Keeping Howard down to earth, keeping him from getting too 'artsy' "

The producer, Matt Segal, has the job of dealing with the chief hassle faced by a filmmaker — money. Because a finished film costs approximately $100 per minute, they can only make about fifteen minutes of film for the Council. But through an arrangement with CTV which will pay for the film stock, they will be able to make a long film.

Cronis's process of film making seems almost like film by committee. He has only done two days of filming so far, and isn't planning to resume until the beginning of February. Meanwhile he has scheduled meetings with every available group of people at Vic in order to do a truly representative portrait of the college.

At a meeting last Saturday, for example, he talked of doing a sociological survey so that he would have a true cross-section of Vic students. This does seem like carrying a desire to be truthful to an almost absurd point, but it does illustrate his systematic approach to film making. Cronis was able to provide a rationale for this: "We've got to get beyond our own circle of friends."

Lowell

The city and its cruising cars surround the Public Garden All's alive—

His view of the world, as his view of the audience, is interrupted by distance and reclusion.

The fountain's falling waters flash around the garden. Nothing catches fire.

Robert Lowell is the first poet I've heard who often interrupts a poem several times to comment on meaning, to explain a name or situation. But when he finishes the last line it's done with, and on to another preamble.

One time he spends a silent minute shuffling through a book to find a poem. He senses the awkwardness. "I'm giving you time to take in what I've read while I look in the contents for a poem I'm going to read," he explains.

Lowell gradually begins to inject more politics into the readings.

"If there's one thing you want to be against in this world, it's violence," he says.

Terse. Epigrammatic. He emotes wisdom with a humility derived from fear.

Lowell escapes into poetry and humor. Bissell smiles as he hears poetry about Columbia, and then Leader of the Left, Kirk of Columbia, De Gaulle. At the mention of Kirk, Bissell throws his head back and chuckles in the direction of Robertson Davies in the front row.

Lowell doesn't like the violent right or the violent left, as he recalls the demonstrations. "In the office of the administration, all the unopened letters have been answered," but the extreme Left — "Machiavellian and utopian" — is removed from his humanity.

A progression of new-unpublished fourteen-line-unrhymed poems has been building up to something, and in the final preambles the regret and bitterness emerges before the River God, despair against the background of Red China.

"The lepers didn't pull the weight in the state and they had enough people anyway. . . Mao had to find ways . . . a leper for every family . . . Mao asked the people to plan for leprosy."

Stalin and his hundred hues of green that form the state — "the state, if we could see behind the walls, is woven of perishable vegetation." Stalin and Mao and Norman Mailer finish the readings. It ends and there are no afterwords.

The audience files out and I hear one girl complain, "I didn't know when he was serious."

You can't separate the sadness of Lowell from his humor. He is like Mark Twain — a sentimentalist who loves the individual and a bitter, cynic in his regard for "the damned human race."

UN and NDP triumph in Politithon

By ART MOSES

Politithon, the series of confrontations between campus political clubs, concluded yesterday with the United Nations Club triumphing over the Edmund Burke Society. UN'ers Richard Sutton (IV VIC) and Mike Taylor (IV APSC) contended that the greatest threat to modern society is the failure of governments to abide by the UN Charter of Human Rights. In opposition, Paul Fromm (III SMC) and Joe Genovese (III SMC) declared that the greatest threat lay in modern man himself, in his "tragic idealism" and blind devotion to democracy. Judge J. S. Cunningham, Hart House chaplain, considered Fromm's presentation the best, but felt the UN argument was the strongest.

On Wednesday, the NDP Club maintained that the greatest threat to modern society was American corporations. Opposition was voiced by the Liberal Club. The eloquence and debating acumen of NDPers Art Moses (II UC) who gesticulated wildly and Mike Nobrega (III SMC) were surpassed only by the eloquence and debating acumen of Liberals Stephen Luxton (IV New) and Jack Heath (II Vic) who were awarded the decision of Judge G. Patterson, a history professor.

A women's liberation group will demonstrate at noon tomorrow against a beauty contest being staged by a Toronto appliance store chain.

The contest, involving fifteen university students, requires the girls to parade in front of the Colonade (Bloor and Avenue Road) wearing skimpy bikinis.

The winner will be awarded a $300 "educational scholarship" on the basis of physical attributes.

The liberation group says it will attack the idea of using university girls to display their bodies at a time when tuition fees are due and student awards are not available.

FU of T-group

The Free University of Toronto will sponsor two "T-Groups" this February, according to mild-mannered hippy registrar Bob Bossin. They will be held on a farm near Peterborough the week-end of Feb. 7th and on the weekend of Feb. 21st.

A T-group is an intensive lab exercise in communication, built on the premise that people ordinarily do not make much of an attempt to understand each other or themselves.

Each weekend will have two groups limited to 12 members each.

"Some people claim to have come away with some of the most meaningful experiences of their lives. Others say that the groups are useless or worse," said Bossin, smiling warmly.

There will be a meeting of those interested Friday in the Bickersteth Room, Hart House. Applications can be picked up at the SAC office. The cost will be $6.

York University's Senate yesterday rejected a proposal calling for the expulsion of Excalibur columnist Larry Goldstein.

Prof. H. O. Pritchard, Chairman of the Chemistry Department introduced a motion to the Senate December 9, requesting Goldstein's expulsion for a letter written to Minister of Education William Davis. The letter called for an investigation of teaching conditions at York before the granting of funds for expansion.

"You have a low batting average today," remarked a Senate member to Pritchard.

Bob Harmer builds old buildings

You may think someone has flipped their hard hat, but it's true. Bob Harmer is a professional engineer who is the Construction Manager on the Fortress of Louisbourg restoration project in Nova Scotia. Working from original plans found in Paris archives, Bob and his staff of engineers, who work for the National and Historic Parks Branch of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, are restoring the famous fortress as it was in the mid 1700s. Louisbourg and other historical sites are being restored to preserve great chapters of history for future generations of Canadians.

Bob Harmer is part of the new breed of people in public service... college educated, ambitious and dedicated. In Government service he has found a rewarding and responsible future in the mainstream of Canadian development. The Public Service of Canada has career opportunities for men and women like Bob. # Swimmers drown Western 75-20

The Varsity swimming team bounced back from their surprising upset at the hands of the University of Guelph last week, by clobbering Western last weekend in an OQAA dual meet. Blues won every event as they piled up 75 points to the Mustangs 20.

The outstanding swimmer for Toronto was their talented rookie, Mike Guinness, who tied the OQAA record of 1:54.5" in the 200 yard free style as well as winning the 500 free.

Versatile star, Terry Bryon, won the 200 fly and the 200 individual medley. Theo van Ryn, top intercollegiate free style sprinter, outclassed his opposition in taking the 50 and 100 free. Bob Heatley won the grueling 1000 free and placed second in the 500.

Barry Bowerman showed his best form ever in winning the 200 breaststroke, and intercollegiate swimming's top competitor last year, Gaye Strathon, displayed great early season conditioning, by almost cracking the OQAA record in the 200 backstroke.

Good performances were also turned in by Doug MacIntosh (second in 100 and 200 free), Klaus Koch (second in 200 fly), Cliff Gentle (third in 200 individual medley), Bob Watt (third in the 50 free), and Don Carr (third in the 200 back).

In the relays, Watt, MacIntosh, Bryon, and Guinness won the 400 free, and Strathon, George Goldsmith, Heatley and van Ryn won the 400 medley.

Blues swim against York up at the Steeles campus tonight, and then take on Queens and USAC in a tri-meet at 7:00 pm on Saturday night in Hart House. Queens and USAC should provide stiff competition in all events. The west doors will be open to interested spectators.

Injuries galore in mat camp

Lloyd's of London promise to insure even risks as abominable as Jim Morrison's presence in the Varsity sports office on Thursday evenings. However, there's one risk around campus that's become so bad recently that director Grypptype Thinn of the esteemed company was moved to comment, "I wouldn't insure a Varsity wrestling coach against injury for all the people of Newmarket!"

First, coach Ron Murphy won himself a nice big cast for his impersonation of torn knee ligaments, and now, playing-coach Paul Beswick wrenched a muscle in practice this week and will be out of action for at least one week.

But both Beseick Beswick and Murph will be on the sideline in Guelph Saturday urging on their wrestlers as U of T takes part in the annual Guelph Invitational Wrestling Tournament.

The team doesn't expect to come up with much in the way of trophies since lots of top-flight Yanks come up each year from Detroit and Buffalo. And the host Guelph team have won the OQAA championship for the past three years.

Making the jaunt for Toronto are Gerry Baker (123), Ken White (130), Mauro Di Pasquale (145), Bill Allison (160), Don Stevens (167), Ernie Friedrich (177), Larry Barron (177), Ylo Korgemagi (heavy), Ted Sauer (137), Dave Simms (152), Richard Souter (167) and Dennis Boadway (152).

MONCTON, N.B. (Special) — Students at the University of Moncton voted Wednesday to end their week-long strike and went back to classes yesterday.

The students were protesting lack of provincial aid to the French-language university. Student spokesman Paul Eugene LeBlanc said a boycott will be reconsidered if the provincial government does not meet the university's demand for a minimal budget of $35,000,000 over a five-year period.

"THE AMAZING MR. ARMSTRONG"

It was natural that the first thing Ed Armstrong should ask about was hockey.

"Hey, is that right about Waterloo tying Guelph seven all? I think that was in the paper this morning."

Ed, a full time trainer with Varsity Blues football and hockey squads, has plenty of time to read and think about hockey these days. He's home recuperating from a December 9 operation in which his left leg was amputated below the knee.

Earlier in December, the main artery in the leg ruptured, cutting off the blood supply to the foot. Before circulation could be restored, gangrene set in and the surgeons at St. Michael's Hospital found it necessary to operate.

Since then, his recovery has been nothing short of spectacular. The staff at St. Mikes dubbed him "The Amazing Mr. Armstrong" when he walked only two days after the operation.

"I was really down in the dumps after the operation, but a lot of the guys came in to see me. It's a long day sitting around the hospital, and you can get depressed really easy."

Ed estimates he had over a hundred visitors in the two weeks he was in hospital after the operation, and many of them came back more than once. He says they "really picked me up" and helped him get through the initial slump.

"They had me down at a clinic three days after the operation to show them how I was walking. There was another guy there who had the same operation I had. He told me in the corridor afterwards that he wouldn't come down again because they had set him back three months. He'd been there since October."

Next step in the recovery process is the fitting of a permanent artificial limb after the leg heals fully. At present he has a temporary leg and foot, and he complains that the cast irritates his leg. "It's like having pins and needles all the time," he says.

The serious incident is not without its light side. When Ed's wife, notified the insurance company of the disability, the adjuster asked, "Has he seen a doctor yet?" And a Victoria Order Nurse who visited him asked if he was having trouble wiggling his toes.

Ed figures that once he gets the permanent fitting he'll be able to return to normal activities quickly. He hopes to be running by the spring. "It's all over now," he says, "I have to live with it for the rest of my life, and I'm sure I can." Then he added, with a smile, "But, it's my football kicking foot. What'll I do now?"

Ed's friends (and that seems to include everyone who's ever met him) have been taking good care of him since the operation. The football team collected close to $300 for him and the hockey team kicked in another $200. "I just don't know how to thank everyone at the university," he said.

He's had plenty of visitors since he's been home. Mark Slater, football and basketball player, came dressed as Santa Claus on Christmas Eve with presents for the two Armstrong boys, age 5 and 8. "A bunch of the guys were up last night and we played poker until 4 in the morning. I won a buck," Ed added.

Right now Ed's biggest hope is that he will be back before the end of the hockey season. He takes it for granted that the Blues will win the OQAA title and go on to the national finals in Edmonton.

His friends have nicknamed him Fast Ed. They hope it applies to his return to U of T sports scene.

INTERFAC ROUNDUP

By GELLIUS
VOLLEYBALL SEMI-FINALS

Vic downed Erindale, 15-3, 15-4, 6-15, 15-10; and Eng I took three straight matches from Eng II, 15-7, 15-6, 15-8. (Cribbage anyone?) Vic and Eng I will now meet in the final; you thought Humphrey and Nixon was a tough choice?

HOCKEY

Dale, Murray, and Hutchison scored as Trin edged Sr. Eng., 3-2. Skule scorers were Lennard and Sweet Six Treen.

IV Civil B lost to PHE C, 8-1. Tanguchi, the rash Civil who was responsible for the offensive lapse that caused the goal marring his team's perfect record, has been relegated to limbo, a small town near Smiths Falls.

BASKETBALL

Meds got 14 points from Barker and 13 from the able Kane to trip up Vic, 48-46. Lloyd Rossman's two first period points so excited the envy of his teammates that he was benched for the rest of the game. Tammehagi had II for Vic.

SMC (Laglin 15) 47; Sr. Eng. 21 (Grace 12.)

Deeney's 15 led Dents over Erin, 44-41 (Shaw 15, Sprogis 14.

Heart of a Sprogis is a famous culinary delicacy.) Oleszkowicz and Innis (TV Comedy team) beat Law (Pyne 14), 36-31. Oleszkowicz had 12 of the 36.

Hoo was that masked man. Yes, George Hoo scored 11 as SMC B beat Scar, 48-36. Carter's 9 was tops for Scar.

Corinna Karina (no relation to Tolstoy's Anna Karina) scored 14 points to give Vic II a 47-24 kolloobfack of Jr. Eng. (Holms 12.)

PHE B 31 (Kleiberg 7); Business 25 (Brean 6, Johnston 6.)

INSIDE TRACK

Indoor Track has commenced and will continue to do so every Tuesday at 5:30 at Hart House. Results to date:

	600 yards
1. B. Franklin PHE	1:17.9
2. M. Miller, SMC	1:19.4
3. M. Duncan PHARM	1:20.6

two miles

1. B. Richards, VIC	9:27.1
2. D. Tong, APSC	9:46.3
3. B. Armstrong, VIC	9:53.5

Watch for the 880 yards, coming soon (Tuesday) at Massey's Mausoleum.

CONTEST

This weeks contest, viz., "How now brown cow" has been won by Robert F ! (for factor) Factor, whose answer was, "Just as good as I ever was, you Honkie pig ! !" Mr. Factor has been appointed executive assistant to Spiro Agnew for a week as his prize.

WINDSOR LANCERS INVADE T.O.

If any of you out there have some extra muddy water and hollow logs around, you might offer them to our poor ol' basketball Blues, who are feeling pretty down and out these days.

And they hop right out of the cassock pan and into the friar (as it were) tonight with a game against undefeated Windsor Lancers as the featured attraction of a big athletic night out at York.

Wednesday night Blues went down to ignominious defeat in Waterloo, dropping a 79-63 decision to the previously unheralded Warriors. The loss dropped Blues into fourth place in the league standings.

Bruce Dempster had 13 points to lead Varsity's 27% accuracy attack that managed only two points in the final four and a half minutes of the game.

Lancers, with new coach Eddie Chittaro at the helm replacing superman Bob Samaras, are as good as ever. They knocked off West-er Tuesday night 94-89.

Andy Auch is Lancers' warm gun — a typical Windsor product: stuck on the bench for two years to sap up experience and then unleashed to the applause of all.

Coach McManus plans no change in the Varsity line-up.

Also on tap, besides the b-ball ballyhoo, is an intercollegiate swim meet between York and U of T at 8 p.m., a high school basketball game at 6:30, intercollegiate girls volleyball at 7:30, high school wrestling at 8:00 p.m., and a gymnastics display featuring Canadian Olympic gymnasts at half time of the Blues' game.

Varsity game-time is 8:15, Keele and Steele campus. Admission is 50¢.

Pucksters on road at Laurention U.

Varsity Blues swing back into action this Sunday when they travel to Sudbury for an exhibition game with Laurentian University Voyageurs. Blues, who have been off since last Saturday when they played to a 2-2 draw with Windsor Lancers, are currently tied for first place in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League with Waterloo Warriors.

Warriors had an excellent opportunity to take over undisputed possession of the top spot on Thursday evening but failed to do so when they were held to a 7-7 tie with winless Guelph Gryphons. Both Warriors and Blues boast identical 7-1-1 records.

Blues resume league play on Wednesday night when they meet Warriors in the latter's home rink. Seventy-five tickets for that game are now on sale at the Hart House ticket office.

Next Friday evening, Varsity will be at home for a tilt with Guelph while on Saturday they will head for Windsor for their third and final encounter with Lancers.

NOTES...John Ritchie suffered a possible fractured arm last evening when he fell heavily to the ice. The freak injury occurred just before the end of the practice session.

Graduates gripe: pay, housing laughably inadequate

By MARY BASTEDO

Graduate students at U of T are a frustrated, dissatisfied lot, according to a 34-page report published by the Graduate Students' Union.

The report based on the results of a survey taken last April, quotes statements like:

• "The School of Graduate Studies is not an ethos, not a community of scholars, not a place of light, liberty, learning and peace. It's a low-paying job that keeps its employees on the margin of poverty in a big city rat race."

• "The University of Toronto's provisions for graduate students are laughably inadequate — virtually no housing, low pay for teaching assistants, virtually no athletic facilities ..."

• "There is almost no such thing as a graduate community outside the limited facilities of Massey College."

Those answering the survey showed greatest dissatisfaction with their financial situations. Fellowships from the Ontario Government do not exceed $1,500. Income for teaching assistants is low and there are no consistent salary scales from department to department. U of T Fellowships are also felt to be inadequate.

It was estimated that all those in the lower quartile income bracket are living in serious financial difficulty. The average yearly income for single graduate students is $4,297.

Yearly income figures for married students showed that only 33 per cent of the graduate students made more than $5,000 on their own but combined with their spouse's income 78 per cent made over $5,000.

"It seems to be true," commented GSU President John Winter, "that the way to go to graduate school is to get married and have your wife support you."

The report shows 37 per cent of male graduate students are married, while only seven per cent of the females are.

The report urges the establishment of a guaranteed minimum income for graduate students, which could be adjusted to marital and family status and related to fellowships and teaching assistantships.

"If I were desperate, I'm sure I could live on much less than $2,000," one graduate commented. "However I wouldn't. In fact, if my income fell below $2,000 for 8 months, I would quit, my desire for a Ph.D. not being that strong."

Dissatisfaction with the academic program was also apparent. The commonest complaint was that the honors programs were "inflexible" and "outmoded." Three people wrote they thought a Ph.D. was no longer worth the effort.

Graduate students were also cynical about their fellow students.

"I find a lot of graduate students, especially the ones that frequent the GSU, too pseudo-intellectual, overtly academic, if not 'queer' or even totally boring," one student said.

They also complained about the

GSU

"The GSU has been completely irrelevant to my life and I expect no improvements."

About the GSU house itself one comment was, "It's that rare thing — an old house without charm."

The report will be presented to a GSU general meeting tomorrow and to the Graduate Council early in February.

"We hope it will shape some of the policy of the graduate students," said Winter.

"Details like these have never before been available on such a large scale."

"If the Graduate Council is not going to allow us to work for more than 10 hours a week and it is genuinely concerned for the graduate student's welfare, it will see that money is made available for him through the University. This report has certainly demonstrated his need."

Bad Boy stood up at Colonnade as bikiniless girl infiltrates

By LARRY HAIVEN

"It's really cold outside, but we're going to warm you fellows up with some luscious goodies, here they are, seven gorgeous university girls, competing in the world's first outdoor winter bikini contest."

The Toronto weather office reports that the downtown temperature at Saturday noon was 18 degrees, with 20 m.p.h. winds giving a chill factor of six below zero.

One by one, the girls shivered across the platform, undoing their huge fur coats, giving a glimpse of shoulder, breast and thigh to the 500 people gathered outside the Colonnade on Bloor Street. That was until Pat Conacher, a pretty, blonde, second year U of T student undid her coat.

Instead of a bikini, out popped a large red and white banner reading, "I Have a Mind".

"I'd like to tell everybody," she said, grabbing the microphone, "that I'm doing this as a protest against what's happening here. University students are made to parade half-naked in the cold to make money to get through school. It's degrading and grotesque."

Cheers arose from a group of around 25 men and women picketing and carrying white mannequins, bearing cut marks such as "spare rib, tenderloin." They were protesting the contest sponsored by the Bad Boy Department stores, which offered a $300 scholarship to the winner of the contest. Men in the group were carrying signs saying, "Playboy Mentality Degrades Men Too." The crowd at the Colonnade also began to voice its approval of Miss Conacher's action.

If the morality officer wants to tell me that what I'm doing is wrong, he can go right ahead," she added.

The announcer, Helen McCabe, took the microphone, somewhat flustered. "Isn't it wonderful that we live in a free society, where everyone has the right to speak his mind?"

Mel Lastman, the "Bad Boy" himself, resplendent in striped convict's uniform, pillbox cap and dark tan, spoke. "I applaud Miss Conacher's courage in saying what she felt." Later he added "And we're going to offer her a special scholarship, which I'd like to announce she has accepted."

It was later learned she decided not to accept the scholarship.

Winner of the contest was Elaine Denby, a 20-year-old McMaster University student, whose measurements are 34-24-35. The rest of the contestants, from Ryerson, York, U of T and various Metro area high schools, each received a Bad Boy doll for their pains.

Mrs. Molly Moore a U of T anthropology student, and spokeswoman for the protestors (who were thought by many in the crowd to be part of a Bad Boy publicity stunt), emphasized that the group was not protesting for puritanical reasons.

"There's no sexuality in this. It's not humane. These girls are cajoled into making a spectacle of their bodies in order to further their education." Apparently few people in the audience knew that there were educational scholarships involved. "They really played that part of it down," she added.

Later, Pat Conacher told of what had happened before the girls came on stage.

"It was completely disorganized. They told us that

COMMUNITY CHEST TEST

Balex begins marathon on Radio Varsity

By PEGGY DUNCAN

At 8 a.m. this morning Byron Alexandroff (III APSC) embarked on a 62-hour endurance test for Radio Varsity.

He has pledged to stay awake at his microphone until 10 p.m. Wednesday night to keep U of T's largest public address system on the air continuously as it kicks off a campaign to raise funds for U of T's Community Chest.

"I'm doing this totally straight," he says, "no bennies, wake up pills or dozing in between records. Just coffee."

Bryon has had experience at this kind of masochism. Two years ago, he led a group of engineers in a tiddly-wink marathon and managed a centennial 67 hours worth of fine fingered trickery establishing a record. This year, he's after the World University Radio Station Non-Stop Broadcasting Record.

"I'm expecting the same sensory blast at 50 hours I got the last time - heightened sensitivity to light colours, weird noises."

How does he plan to keep awake? He'll be interviewing people - Pete Griggin of CHUM, John Wilson of CKEY, Steve Langdon - as well as announcing records, accepting dedications from those who call in, and giving away free LP's.

The purpose behind all this is the University of Toronto's Community Chest. There will be an auction on Wednesday afternoon, with Miss U of T on the block, along with two dinners at Tom Jones' Steak House and two tickets to see Jacques Brel (who is reported alive and well).

Bryon will continue broadcasting from a trailer in front of University College. He welcomes everybody to come and see him, bringing friends, lovers, parents and children.

And a lovely time will be had by all, with the possible exception of Bryon.

AIESEC finds foreign jobs

Do you want a paying summer job in Europe? Are you a graduate or undergraduate student who has taken at least one course in economics? Then join AIESEC.

AIESEC is an international organization of economic and commercial students, formed in 1949, which sponsors 5,000 exchanges among its 44 member countries (including some behind the Iron Curtain) every year.

The positions in Europe involve very little work as such, since most Canadian students are unfamiliar with European business methods and few speak the native language of the country to which they are sent. The trainees are shown how the business works and allowed to familiarize themselves with the language and the people.

Dave Potter a U of T graduate who is now president of AIESEC, says, "These students are in a privileged position, treated with more consideration than even local trainees. They are exposed to European society while gaining practical business experience."

The organization finds the trainees accommodation in student residences for the eight week period of employ. Pay averages about $60 Canadian weekly.

To join AIESEC, go to the office on the second floor of Sidney Smith Hall Rm 2001 or attend one of the meetings announced in the Here and Now of The Varsity.

Winter carnival calls off Ochs

Phil Ochs will not appear in concert at U of T Feb. 2.

The Blue and White Society cancelled the American folksinger's engagement after a "totally apathetic" response to publicity last week.

By Friday night only 42 tickets had been sold for the Winter Carnival. The Ochs concert was to be free to Carnival ticket-holders.

Tickets for the nine-day Winter Carnival which starts this Friday have been reduced to $3. The Blue and White is still negotiating for a "name" performer for the free Feb. 2 concert.

Society Chairman Abe Mudrik says it's no use using student money to subsidize events they won't support.

The Winter Carnival kicks off after the Friday hockey game with broom-ball contest between the cheerleaders and CKFH disc jockey team.

Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau was invited to the festivities, but has declined.

In a telegram he wishes the Carnival success.

rhetoric and the residence

We wouldn't expect New College Dean David Stager to crusade against puritanical residence rules, nor could we expect him to denounce "in loco parentis" as a way to govern residence students. After all, the university "should be the last, not the first, in changing public norms of behavior".

But we can ask him to be consistent in his arguments against complete democratization of his residence.

Commenting on the recent move by New residents to establish women's visiting hours on weekdays, Dean Stager pointed out that 35 per cent voted against weekday visiting. He expected the majority to adopt this position after a few weeks of inconvenience and noise from female visitors. Then Stager indicated, the new hours would be revoked in compli-

sex and eu stral bedfel

Bad Boy stores probably thought Saturday's One inch Bikini contest was a pretty good idea. Sex has always been used to sell refrigerators and stoves—combine it with education and you should have a blockbuster.

So—why not have university girls in bikinis (one-inch bikinis, in this case, as a further gimmick) and offer an "educational scholarship" of $300 to whoever fills her's the best?

It was pretty crude. We knew that right from the moment one of the band members on stage whispered into the microphone, "The girls are probably taking off their dresses right now." The girls were, of course, being used, just as other women are used to make men and women buy consumer goods.

It happens all the time and seems quite natural. We rarely notice how dehumanizing this kind of sex-sell is. We noticed on Saturday.

how about - "Napalm Alley?"

The Globe and Mail has stopped running Gasoline Alley because it was getting "too political" in content.

The sample we ran last issue shows Chipper as a U.S. Seabee in Vietnam "building in these people (the Vietnamese?) a faith and trust in America."

Gasoline Alley is usually a rather dull, dry comic strip. It was just beginning to reach into the bag of satirical humor.

And if a comic strip artist has to pretend the American presence in Vietnam is benevolent to get laughs, we should salute his audacity, not cut him off.

We haven't had such a good chuckle from Gasoline Alley in a long time.

Sid Smith should be speaking arena

The Politithon sponsored last week by the U. of T. Debating Union set two important precedents. It marked an attempt to adapt debating to multi-lateral discussion and, as the Toronto Student Movement was quick to point out, it made use of the Sid Smith foyer as a "free speech area".

The value of debating is reasonably disputed on the grounds that the meaning of an issue is obscured by approaching it from rigidly defined affirmative and negative positions. All too often this is the case. The topic of the Politithon tried to overcome this difficulty by requiring each side to assess the relative gravity of separate phenomena understood by each to endanger society.

Whether the clash of political perspectives which resulted was valuable is less important than that it occurred as the result of an open-ended resolution and a format of cross-examination which forced confrontation. Unlike other media which allow participants to skirt issues or develop them one-sidedly, debating demands their clear definition and critical examination. If, as the TSM suggested, the Politithon was no more than a ritualistic talk shop, the fault was not the format but the failure to exploit opportunities the structure offered for illuminating analysis.

The second precedent is the more important. Our campus is deformed by the lack of a "free speech area". It is unlikely that the Berkeley student protests would have occurred without the public debates on the steps of Sproul Hall before large informal gatherings. Taken to the market place, the issues assumed concreteness and urgency.

On our campus equally crucial issues have failed to galvanize widespread feeling largely because students have not been confronted with them. SAC's declared intention of involving students in its policy making has been hobbled by the lack of forums for public discussion. The Tent City area is impractical in winter. Simcoe Hall is frequently unavailable and not central for most students.

Lacking a student centre, we should make the best of what we have. The Sid Smith foyer is better than nothing. Prior to the Politithon, permission to use it for "political activity" was not granted. But, as two associate deans of the Faculty of Arts and Science who attended the Politithon stated, the foyer should be furnished and become an auditorium for student debate.

The Politithon, despite its demagoguery, defined public student-centered debate as an important means of overcoming the disadvantages of a fragmented student body. It wasn't particularly imaginative, as the TSM noted, but it was an initiative that SAC and any other group interested in relating to students should not overlook.

Derek Allen (IV Trin)
President, U of T Debating Union

"students are essentially leeches"

Tony Pargeter has called me stupid and my attitude ridiculous. ("Letters", January 24) Like most of these "student radicals" he has resorted to name calling when he saw that he could not refute my arguments.

In my first letter, I was attacking not foreign students, but the attitude of Canadians in allowing these people to enrol in our already overcrowded universities and paying two thirds of their costs at the same time.

Student Power, student radicals," and the so-called "student-worker unity" are jokes, and nothing more. Students are essentially leeches on society until they do benefit it by getting a job with a socially useful corporation like Dow Chemical. (This is definitely not more of Mr. Pargeter's "heavy sarcasm".)

One day society is going to wake up to the fact that it is subsidizing things like the lippy haven of Rochdale College and "student radicals" will find themselves in a very radical situation.

Student as . . . what? Concerned human being? Politically aware citizen? Agent of social change?

The University of Windsor student newspaper, the Lance, showed students on their campus a newspaper article in which a 21-year-old youth was sentenced to 10 days in jail for giving a bottle of beer to an 18-year-old girl. Here are some of their comments.

Dan Howard 2 Sci.
It just makes me cry in my beer. I guess he will have to try a nineteen year old next time.

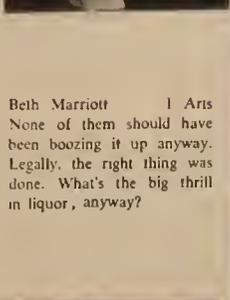

Bob George 3 Eng.
The Police were in the right. He was guilty; he admitted it. I'm not against it myself. If you're caught there is nothing you can do about it.

Roger Clark 1 Law
Ten days isn't very much. They took the consequences when they took the chance. The law is there and we are not here to interpret it.

Charlene Vaillancourt 2 Arts
It's not really fair. The age should be dropped to eighteen for beer, twenty-one for hard liquor. The twenty-one year old in this case should take all the blame.

Beth Marriott 1 Arts
None of them should have been boozing it up anyway. Legally, the right thing was done. What's the big thrill in liquor, anyway?

Darlene Fortier 1 Arts
I think a lot of kids don't think this kind of thing goes on, and when it appears in the paper, it shows them it does. This guy is being used as an example to deter the others.

Wanted: a 'total environment' engineer

The following was written by a University of Waterloo engineering student for the Engineering Congress in Montreal Feb. 14-16.

The status of the "professional engineer" must be raised to that of a true professional. He must take his place as a leader in our modern complex socio-technological society. As technology continues to reach out and force its influence onto every facet of contemporary living, the destiny of the professional engineer becomes more clear: The engineer is being challenged to take the initiative in controlling and managing a technical society.

To meet this challenge, as a leader and policy-maker for any form of society, he must have an open mind, that encompasses both the necessary physical disciplines and the invaluable social sciences and humanities.

At present the engineer is given a technical training with the expectation that society, experience, and time will supply the "liberal" phase of education. By this time it becomes obvious to him that courses in the humanities are essential. However, the solution to the problem of social leadership participation is not so readily apparent. If social experience is necessary then the university must become a community.

Universities of today are controlled jointly by the provincial government and by the corporate establishment using the Board of Governors as its vehicle for exercising its influence. The universities' potential ability to reflect upon our society is effectively negated. Students, staff, and to a lesser extent, faculty, do not have a strong voice in matters concerning the "raison d'être" of the universities. A realistic community of scholars cannot exist under such circumstances.

Many students and academics all across Canada are calling for the institution of a single-tiered horizontal form of University government: a main Senate composed jointly of all groups concerned with the university community: students, staff, faculty, administration, and outside society. If it can be assumed that engineering students would become a full partner in the university, then this new system would be a step towards preparation of the engineer as a leader.

A process must be found through which engineering students are made aware of our social problems. The Engineering faculty of tomorrow must not funnel students into a single sphere of scholastic endeavours. This action would negate the liberal and free-thinking background of students that are products of our more 'liberal' primary and secondary schools.

In preparation, then, engineering schools must begin to integrate social science courses of relevant interest and context into the present curriculum framework. Discussions, debates, and the importance of individual opinions must be stressed. The interactions of society's problems and engineering problems must be drawn to the attention of engineering students early, in order to initiate the evolution of a new breed of professional engineer who is socially and aesthetically aware of his total environment.

Perhaps this would entail a graduate in engineering leaving university with the degree of Master Engineer after seven years of a semi-co-operative course, with heavy emphasis, during the first five years, on humanities and extensive freedom of technical options based around an ever diminishing core course requirement. The first five years would make him a broad-minded individual — the last two years make him a specialist — a true engineer; socio-technological designer who is capable of integrating people and machinery for the betterment of society in general.

The length of this course may seem extreme but according to facts gathered by the American Society for Engineering Education, 65 of all engineers interviewed indicated a master's degree in their chosen field was the optimal level of training and education necessary. This course would naturally graduate men who did have this now optimal and, in the future, necessary degree of education.

The work periods would provide the student with realisms about what his role in society could be when he has graduated.

WHEREAS: It is necessary that universities be autonomous, and that all members of the university should be given an equal voice in decision affecting the university as a whole.

AND WHEREAS: Involvement of the student in the university community will evolve a system catering, where necessary, to the development of a creative, free-thinking individual.

AND WHEREAS: Engineers must become involved in total environment and must bear responsibility for decisions other than technical.

AND WHEREAS: It is universally accepted by practising professional engineers today that a master's degree is optimal and will be necessary in the future.

BE IT RESOLVED THAT: This congress recommend that all universities abolish their Board of Governors and Senates and replace them with a new single-tiered Senate, composed equally of students, staff, faculty, administration, and representatives of the society at large.

AND FURTHER THAT: The undergraduate educational process be changed to a seven year course.

KATARINA KORTAN

By AGI LUKACS

Jan Stodola, 25, is a well-dressed, sensitive young chemical engineering student. He was on a holiday in Switzerland when the Russians entered his native Czechoslovakia. He waited there for six weeks for his fiancée, and then came with her to Toronto.

His fiancée, who speaks better English, got a job, while Jan, after looking for work in his field, became a grad student here at the beginning of December.

He is one of nine newly-arrived Czechoslovak students now registered at U of T. About a hundred will enrol next September.

"In Prague we talk of politics, though without any results," recalls Hanna Prochaska, now a third year U of T History student. "Here students don't speak about political life or death.

"Students in Prague are more skeptical about life, more realistic. They know that their idealism can be misused."

How did she account for the student demands of the past year?

"They asked for things that you take for granted ... things necessary for life ... freedom."

"In the 1960's, protest inside the university was tolerated," explains Jan Stodola. "But not outside it. Protest papers sent to the government were ignored.

"In 1967, protests about bad heating and lighting facilities in student residences led to arrests and expulsions. But they also led to a meeting with the government to discuss student dissatisfaction with the findings of a commission on housing. After January of this year, food became better and cheaper.

"Living conditions must be better here" comments Stodola. "In Prague one often has to study in a small room shared by three people."

"Students felt there had to be change in government before there could be change in the university", says Katarina Kortan, a third-year student. But real student-worker solidarity is lacking in Czechoslovakia, she explains, because of the workers' memories of their domination by the intellectual class.

"Czech students are not as split into radical splinter groups as here", notes Miss Prochaska.

"There is more fear in demonstrations, though there may also be an element of fun," feels Miss Kortan.

Until April 1967, the only political organization with student membership was the Pioneers, a nation-wide youth group with no relevance to the university. Then a student group was set up to arrange for jobs or cheaper trips to West and East, and to organize demonstrations. "It lasted four months".

Students in Czechoslovakia don't have much trouble with money, explains Stodola. Tuition is free and books are much cheaper. Even science books come in paperback.

Government scholarships, stipends for students with lower-income backgrounds, and contracts with factories (to work with them for five years after graduations) pay for food, housing and entertainment. Summer work brings in a little money, too.

Exams are almost wholly oral. Exam questions are submitted up to an hour before they have to be answered. "Perhaps this is harder than a written exam", comments Jan, "because with them you can think over each answer slowly".

If a student fails an exam, he can take it again until he passes. The main exam periods are in January and June, though good students can take them earlier. A professor posts exam times in Czechoslovakia like he posts office hours here, and a student can arrange his own exam schedules. He can take a holiday after a lecture series, and return for an exam.

Attendance at lectures for the first three years of the five-year program was checked when Stodola was an undergrad, but he says this may have changed since 1965. Lecture notes can be bought. "Here", says Katarina Kortan, "you have to do more research from different books to get information."

Even if you use lecture notes to study, says Jan Stodola, it's a good idea to have a prof know who you are before you take an oral exam with him.

It's also a good idea to dress well for such an exam, says Katarina. Students wear a lot of Western clothing—blue jeans, and miniskirts.

Student-teacher relationships are more casual here than in Europe, say the Czech students.

"The professors are distant ... you have to be very polite to them," says Hanna Prochaska. "Here you don't feel like you are disturbing them when you approach them with problems". Jan Stodola, who was used to this show of respect, was shocked to see a student eating during a lecture.

"We came to Canada instead of Sweden or Switzerland, which were also accepting immigrants, because here an immigrant doesn't feel like a foreigner all his life," says Hanna Prochaska.

"Students have been very kind", adds Katarina Kortan. "Canada is a very good country ... it's much more still here ... they have less to fight against"

Miss Kortan is in third year of a four-year chemical engineering course here, after completing three out of five years for a degree in Czechoslovakia. She heard of the Russian invasion while visiting here last summer, and decided to stay. About two months after enrolling in September she realized the organic chemistry she had been studying came under the faculty of arts and science, rather than chemical engineering as at the University of Prague, but decided to stay with the new course in order not to lose a year.

More theory is taught to chemistry students in Prague than here. Katarina isn't sure which system is better.

Also, undergrads spend more time with experiments in Prague's technical school than here, she says. Laboratory work is more efficiently organized. Students work full days in the labs, and so can set up apparatus for one experiment while waiting for the results of another.

"Canadian engineers have a more general base," notes Jan Stodola. "They would make good designers, and do routine work well, but they are not taught to think independently".

Stodola considers English his greatest problem, because of a limited vocabulary and rate of speaking—though all three students underestimate their English. It's no problem to catch up on course content, he says, after six years at the U. of Prague.

"One thing I miss very much" said Miss Kortan, "is not being able to get so much enjoyment from books". She took English privately, and doesn't think it's good enough yet. Her 19-year-old brother, who has studied one year of medicine, will enter second-year general science next year because the credit is not accepted here. He is studying English to avoid the compulsory English option of first-year science.

Neither Miss Kortan or Stodola have been to the theater here. Students go often in Prague, where tickets were inexpensive, they say. Jan Stodola spoke with nostalgia of the "good atmosphere in the old pubs" where students below or above the legal age of 18 often gathered. Use of drugs is not widespread.

Miss Prochaska talked about the much-debated status of women. She noticed, when she applied for civil engineering, that there was only one other woman enrolled—this is different. "And the treatment of women by men. Not much different", she answered with a smile.

Abortion and birth control are both legal in Czechoslovakia. "Prohibitions are crazy" says Miss Prochaska. "There is no reason for them".

Indians call talks "a lesson in futility"

By SHERRY BRYDSON

On Friday afternoon, Indian Affairs minister Jean Chretien, 28 southern and central Ontario Indians, and a super-smooth team of civil servants wound up a five-day conference on the Indian Act. It ended a bit earlier than scheduled, in the face of a continuous barrage of criticism from some of the more vocal delegates.

The Indians had become increasingly impatient in the face of the experts' double-talk and the arrival of Chretien for the final few hours of negotiations only served to frustrate them further.

Under the bright not television lights (CBC video-taped the entire afternoon) the Indians rose as Chretien made his way to the head table, and listened politely as he made his introductory remarks.

They exchanged a few knowing glances as he apologized for being unable to attend all the meetings. "But my judgment, is basically what I want for myself as a member of a minority group.

"In the past we have been inclined, perhaps, to make decisions for you... I know there are anachronisms in the Indian Act... we must decentralize... give a new pride in your history and a sense of participation in legislation affecting you."

Chretien stressed the importance of education: "I know you do not want to live in tents, in shacks... we must concentrate on better education, to give the Indian mobility."

"But... the minister continued, "As members of a minority group you are concerned with preserving your culture. Remember that others will not preserve it for you. It is something you will have to preserve for yourselves."

The delegates did not seem overly impressed with Chretien's efforts to equate the French problem with the Indian problem. Perhaps, one delegate suggested privately, that's because for all their talk about minority rights, the French are just as anxious to make the Indians good French-Canadians as the English are to make them good Anglo-Canadians.

And for all Chretien's remarks about the importance of education and the importance of bringing industry onto the reserves (the "let's make these guys into taxpayers" syndrome), the delegates stuck to their guns and kept the discussion on a practical level.

there was nothing to be ashamed about. One woman said it was just like running around in the house in your underwear. They were very, very worried about not being obscene, and so we had to practice posing. I can't even describe how inane the whole thing was."

"If you could have seen these girls fooling with their bodies, wondering how to make their legs look thin, trying to cover up warts and marks on their legs, it was all very sad."

In order not to appear suspicious, Pat had brought two sets of clothing with her, one to leave in the dressing room, suit on. But it was so disgrvanized. I think I could have done anything."

"The woman kept on telling us that she knew that we weren't dumb, that we were intelligent university students, but she spent over an hour explaining again and again how to make out the forms and how to act on stage."

A tense moment came when the girls were ready to go on stage. "They wanted me to go first, but I didn't want to embarrass any of them, so I pretended I was shy and made sure I came last. Actually it's not really their fault they were in the contest."

"Sometimes protest marches are not so effective and I wanted to show the people there that women are treated as objects in our society. I'll bet half the fellows were there to gawk at girls in bikinis, even though they were freezing too."

It is the first time students have gained equal representation on a staff-student committee of this type.

Guyana to be second Cuba

By GEOFFREY NATHAN

The leader of the parliamentary opposition in Guyana told students Saturday a second Cuba should be established in his homeland.

Cheddi Jagan told a capacity audience at the International Student Centre that Guyana, like Cuba, should nationalize foreign industries to prevent needed money from leaving the country. China, he said, had done the same thing and thus rapidly become a superpower. Jagan attacked the policies of Forbes Burnham, who suc-price supports and freight subsidies.

Dr. Jagan said he thought practical foreign aid such as factories was of far greater value than money gifts and loans.

He noted that the public debt in the Third World had risen from 10 to 40 billion dollars in a 10 year period.

Jagan accused the Guyanese government of forcing legislation through Parliament without regard to rules of procedure and predicted that as the government became more unpopular it would invest more money in

UofW plans to make one body of board and senate

WATERLOO (CUP) — The University of Waterloo is proposing a structural change replacing its board of governors and senate with a single body.

Administration spokesmen told a press conference Friday that the new body will be the final authority for both financial and academic matters. An exact definition of its responsibilities is still to be worked out.

No date for the switch has been set, but the administration has indicated it hopes to have the system included in the University of Waterloo Act at the 1969-70 session of the Ontario legislature.

The new body would have representatives from faculty, administration students, alumni and the community as well as representatives from the board of governors and the senate. But the precise composition of the "board", one of the most contentious areas, has not been determined.

Student president John Bergsma called the announcement a step in the right direction toward giving "students more equal representation".

"As it stands now we really know nothing about the new idea except that it will be called single-tier government," said Tom Patterson, a former council vice president.

He and other councillors have attacked Bergsma's participation in the press conference at which the proposal was announced.

Bergsma did not discuss the idea with his council or its executive before the conference and his support is being labelled improper.

Helpaheart - canvass

Heart and blood vessel diseases are the nation's number one killer, says the Ontario Heart Foundation. The foundation is conducting its annual campaign to raise funds to combat these diseases throughout February.

University of Toronto students will get their chance to help the Heart Fund on Sunday Feb. 2, (Feb. 9, for Engineering and Physical and Occupational Therapy).

Students wishing to do volunteer canvassing on either Sunday will be supplied with transportation to and from canvassing areas. Coffee and donuts will be served to volunteers on their return.

Last year over 600 students participated in the Heart Fund campaign collecting about $13,000. New College collected the most, over $1,500.

Times and meeting places for volunteers will be announced later this week.

Who is Dick Lucas?

By STEVE COWLEY

Dick Lucas gives the impression of a contented, solid man. He speaks with a cultured Cambridge accent, choosing his words carefully, making sure that each phrase conveys its intended meaning.

The man who will deliver what he calls "five lectures" at Convocation Hall this week emphasizes that he is not holding an evangelistic campaign or mission.

"I am trying to appeal to the intellect," he says. "No one will be asked to walk the sawdust trail."

But Lucas, who will lecture on the topic "Who is this Jesus?" has another side to him.

"I am basically a pessimist," he says. "Unless student radicals and all those who look for major social reform return to the question of 'what is man?' I see very little reason to hope any of these reforms will succeed."

Lucas, rector of an old "rather anachronistic" church in the centre of London, England, says the purpose of his lectures will be an attempt to answer this question.

"Much as we may strive for social justice we must realize that man's basic selfishness makes a workable humanism impossible," he says.

Lucas, a Cambridge graduate in History, says he has come to believe Western democracy is based on the idea that power corrupts.

But he is quick to point out that he rejects the anarchist solution as unworkable.

"Much as we would like to do away with power structures we must realize that man can not and will not act in an enlightened way. I want to see what people think of man before they start meddling with him."

Theologically Lucas simply describes himself as a believer in the supernatural who regards New Testament revelation as the Christian norm.

"There is now a distinct division between the clergy regarding the question of the supernatural

"Without such beliefs I am convinced that the Christian ethic is too high for human mortals to achieve," he adds.

Lucas says he finds his meetings with students "refreshing."

"Most of my parishioners are businessmen," he continues. "I find that people over 40 are usually rather complacent. Students are idealists. They are intellectually alive."

For these reasons he feels Christianity is of particular importance to the student, who is trying to find some point or purpose in life.

"Christianity," says Lucas, "is not properly understood by the average student. He is not aware how Christianity affects him and how it can answer the questions he is asking about life."

"When one becomes aware of its implications one realizes that Christianity can not be divorced from social concern. Any such divorcement is criminal."

"But social concerns are not a substitute for man's concern with regard to his own make-up. And this concern is one which involves us all."

mandarins

"The Indian Act was originally legislated for a people who became dispossessed of their heritage," he told Chretien as the CBC cameras continued to roll. "We were driven into exile onto the reserves - I call them the wilderness ghettos.

"Treaties in the world today are affected between nations of people. Our Indian treaties must have been recognized by the British crown as between nations of people. . .

"If in the course of history these people were recognized as entities, I ask you - where, when, how did the courts decide that lands granted in these treaties were no longer Indian lands? When did they cease to be sovereign Indian lands?"

VAGUE ANSWERS

Plain turned to Chretien, seated beside him at the head table. "With all due respect to the representatives of the federal government, some of the answers we got here this week were very vague, sir."

"How can we proceed with the normal course of government," Plain demanded, "if anything we do can be vetoed by the Indian Act, by the minister, or by an Act of Parliament?"

Plain concluded by announcing a resolution passed the day before and saved specially for Chretien's arrival. It called for a suspension of talks on revision of the Indian Act on two grounds: it does not guarantee the Indian any protection in his dealings with the government, and no revision of the Act would be complete without full consideration of treaty rights, many of which are superceded by the Act.

Plain compared negotiations between the government and the Indian to summit talks between the communist powers and the free world.

Implicit in his analogy was the contention that the government must recognize the Indian as a human being before negotiations can continue with any honesty.

"I ask you," he appealed to Chretien, "as the representative head of a department - part of the Canadian government structure - to go back and tell Parliament that these Indian Act consultations are meaningless."

LESSON IN FUTILITY

If Parliament refuses to consider the Indian Act and the treaties as one problem, Chief Plain concluded, "Then I submit that all our consultations may be written in our history pages as a gigantic lesson in futility."

But Chretien was not having any of that. Despite efforts to have the meeting adjourned for coffee break, he took the floor to reply. He insisted that treaty rights and Indian Act inequities were in fact two separate problems, "a completely different matter."

He hammered at the social welfare aspects of retaining the Indian Act. "Your sons, your children, need a good education. We have problems with welfare. We cannot set these things aside while we negotiate these treaties."

Progress. Mobility. Working within the system. The delegates had heard enough of this line from the mandarins, not only in the course of the week-long negotiations, but every time they went to Ottawa.

Plain was not arguing from theory. He is convinced the Indian Act preserves and perpetuates a system which in every clause is devoid of human values. The mandarins - the civil servants in Ottawa, in Toronto, on the reserves themselves - are frozen into a system in which one must play by the rules.

An eloquent spokesman for other Indians not so well versed in the ways of the bureaucracy and an untiring champion of justice for all Indians, Plain himself was recently a victim of the system he is trying to fight.

He and his wife were obliged to rent a home some miles from the boundaries of their reserve while some (government-sponsored) renovations were being done to their home. During that time, his wife needed medical attention, and applied to her reserve's agent for federal aid.

Some mandarin somewhere in the rank-and-file of the civil service hierarchy noticed in processing Mrs. Plain's form that she was not residing on her reserve. Invoking the rules, the mandarin, the form-processor, decreed that Mrs. Plain, the chief's wife was not eligible for federal aid because she had "left" the reserve.

RULES ARE RULES

Chief Plain appealed the case, stating the special circumstances and explaining that the move was of a strictly temporary nature. But rules are rules.

In the same township, the lowliest unwed mother, - white mother - on welfare qualified for provincial aid as a Canadian citizen. But Mrs. Plain, being (temporarily) neither Indian nor citizen, was denied all rights.

I chose this example, not because it is the worst of inequities under the Indian Act, but perhaps because it is the least of them. What is most shocking is that it happened next door to the City of Sarnia, which has the third highest per capita income of any city in Canada. What happens in the north, away from enlightened southern Ontario, is another story, to be recounted in a later issue.

Faced with a constant barrage of these examples of the injustices of the system, one would think even the most thick-skinned mandarin would begin to wonder if perhaps the Indian Act could be approached another way. But there is no humanness in the system, and the system encourages the people within it to become hardened, to think of everything in terms of the rules.

Those who don't like it, get out. A young fellow with a pleasant smile came up to me during the coffee break, while we were all having trouble reacting to Chretien's speech. (I had asked the minister about treaty rights and he had responded by telling me that 10 years ago 15 per cent of Canada's Indians had gone beyond Grade 5, but that today 95 per cent of them had gone beyond that level).

The fellow was attached to one of the department's many branches, and he "just wanted to tell me how accurate" my Wednesday article had been. He wanted to slip away, but I asked him what he was doing in the branch at all and why hadn't he done anything about all this?

LOCKED IN THE SYSTEM

He smiled. He shrugged. He didn't want to be quoted. "I came into this to try to do something for these people," he said sadly.

"But I'm locked into the system. There is no way out of the bureaucracy. You just can't do anything."

When the meeting reconvened, Mike Mitchell, 20-year-old St. Regis Indian, brought the delegates a beaded wampum message and appealed to them to forget their differences and face the government as one.

He tried to explain to the mandarins and to the ever-present CBC just why the Indian regards his treaty rights as important.

"Our forefathers negotiated those treaties so we could have some place to stay. At least we have the reserves left.

"The reserves are our land. They are all we have left of North America.

"I have a little child. I see him running around on the reserve and I wonder if he'll have a reserve when he grows up."

This, from a man who spoke nothing but Mohawk until the age of 12. Mike Mitchell is a traditional Indian, educated in the old ways as well as the white ways. He is more fortunate than most, for as troubled as his reserve may be, he still has land he can fight for, that he can legally claim.

But he knows there are entire bands of Indians, in southern Ontario as well as in the north whose lands are barren of game and unsuitable for farming. If these Indians leave their reserves unoccupied to follow the game, to move closer to a one-horse town or a railway spur, the federal government reclaims the entire reserve, on the assumption that the band doesn't want it any more.

HITLER COMPLEX

There is very little an "unseated" band can do, legally speaking, to get its reserve back. It has nothing but the welfare dole and the Indian agent. "What kind of man would you think serves those northern Indians?" a department attache asked me. "Some guy with a Grade 9 education and a Hitler complex, that's what kind of man."

The mandarins, uncomfortable under the television lights and wary of the cameras, were anxious to cut the Friday session short, but they couldn't prevent Chief Plain from getting in a few final digs at the bureaucracy.

"The minister should be here with us — Mr. Andras or Mr. Chretien — these consultations are not only with the civil servants of Indian Affairs," he said.

"We should be talking with the elected members of Parliament. These meetings should go beyond a mere dialogue with the established system."

Chretien said he and Andras had "other commitments" but pointed out that Andras had attended the Monday session, "So we have been around for two days."

Someone tried to point out that since each had only attended the afternoon session, the ministers had in reality been around for only one day.

His microphone was off and Chretien continued, pointing out that things were better today than they were ten years ago.

But Plain was off again: "Who analyses these comments (from the consultation meetings), Mr. Minister? Who reports to you?"

"Experts in the department," Chretien began. He tried to elaborate, but Plain cut him off.

"Thank you, Mr. Minister, that's all I wanted to know."

Mandarins again.

St. Mike's debater wins at Syracuse

A debater from St. Mike's won first prize in the University of Syracuse Debating tournament over the weekend.

The team from the University of Toronto Debating Union placed second in the overall team points standings.

Mike Downing (III SMC) was named the best debater on the basis of points accumulated during the two day tournament.

Other members of the St. Mike's team were Dan Leckie (I SMC), Ted Mcgee (II SMC) and Tony Kaloustian (III SMC).

UTDU was represented by Herman (II UC), Art Moses (II UC), Mike Scherk (II UC) and Brian Morgan (I Trin).

By far the most profound statement of the tourney, which included eight Canadian and four American schools, was uttered by Herman Seigel of UTDU, in discussing man's never ending concern for slum clearance. Seigel pointed out that God's admonition "How goodly are thy tents, Oh Jacob," could only have been a sarcastic reference to the need for urban renewal in biblical Canaan.

The Old Wives Tales, starring Jim Morrison and directed by David Blostein, opens tomorrow night at Victoria College's New Academic Building, Room 3. It was erroneously reported in Friday's Review that it opened last Thursday.

Art Moses wishes to apologize to the Liberal Club and anyone else interested for an erroneous headline on page 17 in Friday's Varsity. It was the Liberals, not the NDP, who won the debate last week.

BLUES' BILL ALLISON WINS DIVISION AND FELLOW GRAPPLERS ALSO GLIMMER

Varsity wrestler Bill Allison had one of the biggest days of his career Saturday as he won the 160 pound division of the prestigious Guelph Invitational Wrestling Tournament.

Allison, who normally wrestles at 167 pounds, pinned Rick Bryant, a former British Commonwealth gold medalist, in the final to take his event.

Other members of Blues' team also did well. In fact, Varsity placed more men in the finals than either powerhouse Guelph or Western. As usual the meet was dominated by wrestlers from the United States, especially from the Michigan Wrestling Club.

Both Larry Barron (191 lbs.) and Dave Simms (152 lb.) were runners-up in their respective divisions while Don Stevens (167 lb.) came third.

Barron lost an exciting 9-6 decision in the final to his arch-rival, Nick Shori, from Guelph. Shori defeated Barron last year in the OQAA finals.

Simms lost an extremely tense 1-0 decision to high school sensation, Finkin Zeller from London. Finkin Zeller hasn't lost a match in three years.

Stevens, who finished third in a wrestle-off, was a semi-final victim of the eventual winner in his category, Symons of Guelph.

Both Ted Sauer (137 lb.) and Ken White (130 lb.) of Varsity were put out in the first round by eventual winners.

White, in particular, had a tough draw as he had to fight Mari Hatta from the Michigan Wrestling Club. Hatta was once ranked third in the world.

Ernie Friedrich (177 lb.), despite an ankle injury, won his first bout but then lost to Hey Ward of Guelph, who later finished second.

Other Varsity wrestlers who made the trip but found the going a bit rough were Ron Wilson (145 lb.), Mauro Di Pasqual (145 lb.), Dennis Boadway (152 lb.), Rich Sauter (167 lb.) and Ylo Korge-magi (heavyweight).

Playing coach, Paul Beswick, forced to the sidelines by a knee ailment was enthusiastic over his team's showing, and also over the high calibre of the meet.

He, and fellow mat mentor, Ron Murphy, hope to have films of the tourney made available for study.

SWORD, KNIFE SCYTHE

University of Toronto fencers outstuffed Rochester Institute of Technology 18-9 in the Upper Gym of Hart House Saturday. Rochester's team is admittedly weak this year, but most of Toronto's first-line men were in Ottawa competing for the Governor General's Trophy.

Varsity's foil team was foiled again as they dropped the event 4-5, with rookie Oscar Wong's cliff-hanger against Chris Cummings going the wrong way by one hit.

Veteran Richard Wong (same last name) took his three bouts and rookie Vlad Gettler added one for the total.

Irv "The Sword" Snitman and Mike "The Knife" Kerwin each had perfect scores in the epee, while newcomer Ken "The Scythe" Chan added one for a total score of 7-2.

The sabre team slashed and cut their way to a 7-2 victory. Andrew "The Sabre" Benyei won all three and Rick "The Butterknife" Kry added a victory. Mark "The Fork" Pfeiffer was seen slipping the Director "expense money", and he somehow added three victories to Benyei's and Kry's for the winning total in sabre.

BLUES' BOIL PRICKED BY LANCER THRUST, 83-61

By RICH PYNE

When hockey teams don't finish off their plays and are sloppy around the net, they lose. Such criticisms are not usually made of basketball teams but they applied Friday night when Windsor's new coach, Ed Cittaro, brought his Windsor Lancers into town and were handed an 83-61 victory by the Varsity Blues.

Toronto's lack of polish didn't really show until the second half when Lancers outscored them 51-26, although Blue's first half lead was more a result of Lancer lapses than brilliance on the part of Blues. Once Lancers got rolling it was Russia and Canada all over again.

What the Windsor team lacked in the big name stars they have enjoyed in the past, they made up for in a well-drilled attack and consistent team play. An indication of their balance showed up in the point count. Chris Wydrzynski, Andy Auch, Jack Orange and Tino Lenti, who came off the bench in the second half, all dropped in 12 points while Ed Lanktree had 10. Every Lancer hit the scoresheet.

The visitors pressed full court on and off throughout the evening but weren't noticeably successful in forcing many turnovers. What their press might have done, however, is wear Blues down. Toward the end of the game some Varsity players were too tired to put their hands up on the zone defense they employed or to chase the Lancer fast break back down the floor.

Such defensive lapses were compounded by excessive sloppiness around the offensive boards. While Blues missed the muscle of Mark Slater who fouled out with a minute to play in the first half, they still got more than enough chances to make the game close. John Hadden, tallest man on the floor, was somewhat myopic under the Lancer basket but his 11 second half points were about all Blues had going for them. No one else scored more than two in the latter 20 minutes except Bruce Dempster who had four.

Best Blue on the court was Dale Crouter. The fourth year phys-ed student showed once again that his past talents were mis-employed in the interfac league. His play in the first half was the big reason for Varsity's early lead, but after picking up a fourth foul early in the second half, the slim forward saw only limited action.

The fact Varsity's loss was number three in league play doesn't necessarily mean it's time to start composing their requiem. Blues have the horses and should make the still distant playoffs, but if they saddle themselves with further losses of the Friday night variety, they may handicap themselves right out of the race.

Scoring: Lancers, Wydrzynski 12; Auch 12; Orange 12; Lenti 12; Lanktree 10; Salvador 8; Bunce 7; Tonelli 5; Grant 2; Crowe 2

Varsity, Hadden 15; Crouter 13; Burton 8; MacNaughton 7; Trafford 6; MacDonald 4; Dempster 4; Slater 2; Feldman 2; Evans

There are a lot of feet off the ground in this picture taken at Saturday's Blues-Lancer game. Count them, gang, and send your answer to Contest, 91 St. George. Graovy. Among the group shown are Windsor's Mike Crowe (41), Andy Auch (45), Ed Lanktree (31), and Chris Wydrzynski (25), and Varsity's Garth Evons (34), Ross MacNaughtan (52), and Dale Crouter (42). Yeoh.

A late splurge sponges off

SUDBURY — A late third period splurge carried Varsity Blues to a 7-5 victory over Laurentian Voyageurs in an exhibition hockey match played here yesterday afternoon.

Blues went into the final stanza in arrears 4-3 but scored three goals in the last five minutes for the win.

Bob McClelland scored the winner at 17:12 after Paul Laurent had tied the score a minute and a half earlier.

Ward Passi launched an insurance goal into an empty net with nine seconds left to complete the scoring.

Voyageurs proved considerably tougher this year than they have in the past. Blues defeated them 16-2 two years ago in the Canadian intercollegiate final and trounced them last year 10-2 in Sudbury.

Laurentian play in the Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association (OIAA) and are undefeated so far. They have a good hockey team and could be tough come Canadian championship time.

However, before a large crowd of 1,500 which filled the Sudbury rink to capacity, Blues skated to a 3-1 lead in the first period on power play goals by Len Burman, McClelland and defenseman Dave Field. Field's goal came on a brilliant end-to-end rush, all by himself no less.

Mike Jakubo, one of Voyageurs' top players, tallied for Laurentian.

The second period was a complete volte-face. Blues were thoroughly outplayed and Laurentian counted all three goals to erase Varsity's 3-1 edge. Jakubo scored once and Ron Dussiaume twice (household names, the both of them).

Only some superb netminding by Tom Little, who took over from Adrian Watson halfway through the period, kept Blues within one goal. At one point, in the space of two minutes, Little halted a three man breakaway, a two man breakaway and a solo clearcut effort.

Paul Laurent evened the score at 7:20 of the third period only to have Bryan Slywchuk (not to be confused with Sawchuk) put Voyageurs ahead once more. They held on till Blues' ultimate three goal outburst.

The visitors outshot the home team 33-30 (note clever avoidance of dull repetition of squad names).

This is a very interesting snapshot. If one holds it up carefully to the light one notices almost immediately that the two figures are nearly identical. AND they both wear No. 41. Is this an example of cosmic coincidence or just an eery tea leaf reading? We leave it to Mike Crowe (41) and Bruce Dempster (41) to figure out, but we suspect someone knows something about anything. Varsity defeated Laurentian Voyageurs yesterday afternoon by about 20 points. Mike Katz led Blues with 14 points.

Lust murderer knocks off Insanity Teach-in

By GRANT SCHUYLER

Murder belongs in the home, members of a panel claimed last night at Insanity "69", a teach-in sponsored this week by the Psychology Students Union.

Speaking at "The Lust Murderer," the first event of the program, Clarke Institute social psychologist H. Mohr said:

"The most common murder is in one's own home. Killing of a stranger is in the 5 per cent group."

He then asked if members of the audience were aware that lust-murder is very rare. From the show of hands it was obvious none of the audience of 40 were.

"The amount of paranoia built into our society is fantastic. We hate strangers, and we pay a heavy social price for it."

By fearing strangers each of us, he implied, is trying to transfer his own distress to the dark alley and out of his own home.

Two films he recently saw warning children to beware of child-molesters were "obscene," he said.

"Their message was: Don't trust anyone. But the most common form of child-murder is infanticide, and the most common form of child-beating is that in the home delivered by the parents."

Another panelist, criminologist P. Macnaughton-Smith, wondered if the "mythical good" achieved by possibly protecting one child from a molester was worth the anxiety created in a thousand children who would never be touched.

He also suggested that television violence has no necessarily evil effect on children.

"I don't see any immediate reason to make television the scapegoat. Television has become a bogey-word. But every society has its violent stories and folk-myths."

Mohr, who formerly agreed with Macnaughton-Smith on television's effects, said that one survey had suggested that children who watched violence on television were more aggressive immediately following the viewing. He conceded that long-term effects might be nil.

But, Mohr thought, television and other urbanizing effects may be a factor in mental problems.

"Unlike people in small communities in the past, we live in a city we do not understand. We do not know what others are about. Our standards of morality have come down to a small margin, a narrow ridge we cannot walk. If we shared each other's dreams, we would all go nuts."

Today Insanity "69" is presenting films (including Marat Sade and Nobody Waved Goodbye) and tomorrow the main feature is a discussion on "Why People Crack Up."

"Abnormal behaviour is interesting because it is a component of everybody carried to an extreme," says Stan Heshka, president of the Psychology Students Union.

Friday night Insanity will consider "The Sane Society".

"University as Daddy" reported dead by SAC

By ART MOSES

Students Administrative Council spokesmen went under attack last night as they defended their view that the "in loco parentis" philosophy is dead, before a 10-man study committee on campus discipline established last summer by Claude Bissell.

Members of the Committee on Disciplinary Procedures — including two students — grilled the SAC representatives intensively on the contents of an SAC brief submitted to the Committee.

The brief, endorsed by SAC in December, calls for:

- making students accountable only to the "laws of society" and not subject to any kind of "double jurisdiction";
- allowing students and faculty to determine the direction of their studies and discussions;
- the right to strike and protest. The merits of each protest would be decided individually, and "every effort should be made to prevent the use of police or physical coercion;"
- ending the "in loco parentis" philosophy because it prevented the student from learning from experience and realizing his full potential as a human being;
- residence rules should be determined by the people who live in each residence;
- freedom of association. If an organization demands high fees or is undemocratic, then the university should reserve the right to refuse the use of university facilities.

Committee members were critical of the brief on several counts. Prof. S. P. Rosenbaum expressed his dismay that SAC's definition of the role of the university in society is vacuous and that the whole brief offered the Committee very little guidance.

"The Committee asked for advice; it got propaganda. It asked for ideas; it got clichés. It's shocking and getting us nowhere."

SAC student information officer Pat Armstrong, who drew up the brief with the SAC services commission, saw the brief's portrayal of the purpose of the university as "to serve society" and objected to Prof. Rosenbaum's use of the word "propaganda." She said the exact place of the role of the university on society will be defined by the Commission on University Government.

Both Mrs. Armstrong and George Biggar (III Law), SAC services commissioner, explained SAC's stand that class as a collective body should decide what action be taken against any disruptive student in the class and not the professor alone.

But Dean J. M. Ham of engineering, Father J.M. Kelly of St. Mike's, and Prof. M. W. Laurenc questioned the practicality of such a system.

SAC vice-president Norm Schachar explained that SAC wanted to create a sense of responsibility between students and professors and the best way to do this is to end the hierarchical structure in the classroom in which the professor is supreme with a system of student participation.

Several committee members also took SAC to task for not defining the limits of a legal protest in the university.

"By leaving the situation completely open to judging how far a demonstration can go on the basis of the merits of the individual case you are leaving the University on the point of a pin", commented Dean Ham. "You are ignoring the experience gained in other parts of the world in campus confrontations.

Prof. Arthur Krueger claimed that any protester must know how far he can go before he is breaking a law of the university and that leaving the matter open could allow a reactionary campus disciplinary committee to ban all forms of protest.

It was agreed that the question of who should decide what action could be taken against protestors was outside the bounds of the Committee and would be a matter for the Commission on University Government to decide.

These are only a few of the sleek black horseless buggies that carried an estimated 1500 people to Convocation Hall Monday afternoon to attend the funeral of former U of T governor and business financier and politician Wallace McCutcheon. Classes went on as usual and few students attended the ceremony.

... and into Hudson's Bay

At a cost of over $20,000 a minute, the University of Toronto launched its second nosecone yesterday morning from Fort Churchill, Manitoba.

Originally slated for takeoff at 5:00 a.m. the launching was moved ahead to 2:16 a.m. due to weather conditions.

Five minutes later, the vehicle had completed its mission and plunged deep into Hudson's Bay. Its peak altitude during the flight was almost 50,000 feet.

Leonard Bertin, U of T's Science spokesman called the launching "entirely successful."

The nosecone employed an electron gun under development for the past 10 years at the university's Institute of Aerospace Studies.

Data gathered on the five-minute flight, including information on the composition and temperature of the upper atmosphere, will be open to anyone, said Bertin, including Russians, Chinese and Americans."

Government takes few risks with poverty program says Dr. Rose

By TREVOR SPURR

The Canadian government's approach to poverty has been timid and inadequate, says Dr. Albert Rose, director of the University of Toronto School of Social Work.

Dr. Rose was the first speaker at a series of lectures sponsored by the U of T Liberal Club on urban poverty.

"There is no concerted federal policy on poverty and no indication that the government intends to do more than 'coordinate'," he added.

Dr. Rose pointed out that Indian women have a life expectancy of only 25 years, and the infant mortality rate is 10 times that of the rest of Canada. Indians are one of the worst sufferers of poverty in Canada.

"You have to go through four-fifths of the Canadian population before you reach people making what is supposed to be the average annual wage," he said.

"Up to 41 per cent of non-farm people are of low income or poverty levels," he added.

"We are still throwing up people in our community making $55, $65, $75 a week with a wife and family. We assume that they will get along and some people still believe we do not need a housing program," he said.

Dr. Rose criticized federal welfare schemes which provide the same payments across Canada, regardless of region.

Admitting that constitutionally the provinces have much of the responsibility for ending poverty in Canada, he still insisted on the need for more federal action.

Police & Fire Marshall to be consulted

By ANNE BOODY

Monday at noon members of three campus political clubs moved into the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall, pamphlets, tables, posters, and all — without permission from the "proper authorities."

They have been there ever since and plan to stay.

Today, on the third day of the "Liberation" they will present in living color the story of how they did it.

The action begins in the foyer today at 1 p.m. Following a guerilla theatre presentation, there will be a symposium on the "Myth of a Liberal University."

Members of the Toronto Student Movement say they were concerned about the lack of a free speech area on campus. Because there is no student centre, they took positive action. In came their tables and out came the leaflets.

For two days they've manned their posts without any major disturbances. A caretaker threatened to remove one of the tables yesterday following complaints from a faculty member who claimed unwarranted noise was being made but no action was taken.

The present rule regarding the use of the main lobby states students may not put tables there or use the area for mass meetings. Exceptions to the rule are left up to the discretion of Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science, A. D. Allen and Assistant Dean W. D. Foulds.

Dean Foulds said last night that Sidney Smith was not a suitable place to hold meetings. "We felt that because of all the traffic that the tables and posters should be confined to the area between the doors."

"Twice we've departed from this ruling," he said. We allowed the Teach-in Committee accessibility to the building because it was a matter of academic concern. We also granted permission to the U of T Debating Team to hold their Politithon there so they'd have an audience," said Foulds.

"But the matter is being referred to U of T Security and the Fire Marshall. If they see no problems, then we'll probably change our policy," said Foulds.

He suggested the issue also be referred to a committee of departmental faculty representatives.

Before Christmas attempts were made by the TSM to gain permission for use of the foyer. In approaching various superintendents and maintenance departments they were never referred to the Dean's office.

In exasperation, they decided to move in their tables despite the ruling. They were joined by the U of T Communist Club and the Young Socialist Club. Later Monday afternoon, the Mickities theatre group moved in from the cold to sell tickets for their production of The Fantastics.

On Friday the TSM is bringing Karl Dietrich Wolff, a leader of the summer student revolts in Germany, to speak at a mass meeting in the foyer.

SCHOOL OF GRADUATE STUDIES APPLICATION DEADLINES

A student applying for a Fellowship award by the School of Graduate Studies must submit the applications for fellowship and for admission to the School by February 1.

A student applying for an Ontario Graduate Fellowship must submit the applications for admission to the School by February 15.

All other applications for admission to the regular session should be submitted by March 15.

Students already enrolled in the School who propose to proceed to a different degree in 1969-70 must submit an application for admission to that degree by the dates mentioned above.

foyer should be free speed area

As home of the faculty of arts and science, Sidney Smith hall is a focus for thousands of students every day.

They pass through the empty foyer on their way to classrooms and offices, while campus organizations have to set up tables and displays in the cramped area between the two sets of front doors.

But action taken by a number of campus political groups this week may change that. Monday the Toronto Student Movement, U of T Communist Club and Young Socialists, as well as the Mickities, moved into the otherwise empty foyer without permission from the administration.

They are trying to revoke the rule restricting student access to the foyer as an area for speakers and debates.

The Sidney Smith foyer is the logical location for a free speech area.

Students at University of Toronto still don't have a campus centre, the natural spot for political forums and discussions.

Convocation Hall or Hart House might seem like possible alternatives, but they aren't natural gathering places for large groups of students.

W. D. Foulds, assistant dean of arts and science, says the foyer has too much traffic to be feasible as a meeting place. But the rule has been broken once for the teach-in committee because it was, according to Dean Foulds, "of academic importance," and also for the U of T debating union — "Because of the traffic they would be assured an audience."

And that's the point. Students won't have to go out of their way to hear political discussion.

Foulds said the administration might alter the ruling if the U of T police and fire department agree.

The whole question of free access to the foyer might be referred to a committee including representatives of each of the departments housed in the building. This excludes students from making that decision.

But even so, there shouldn't be any objection. The departments and classrooms, are protected from noise by doors, and most forums would take place at lunch hour when classrooms are empty.

Anyway, part of a student's education should include the expansion and discussion of ideas and philosophies. The classroom isn't the only place where learning occurs. It can occur right in the foyer of Sidney Smith.

voluntary fees?

Cracks seem to be appearing in John Winter's graduate tower, cracks which we never would have suspected from the show of solidarity earlier this year when the GSU wanted to withdraw from SAC.

Then, you will recall, Mr. Winter brought out numerous surveys, referenda and opinion polls showing how dissatisfied the graduates were with the student's council.

The question we now pose is whether or not the GSU will be consistent. After all, there seems to be widespread dissatisfaction among the graduates about the activities (or lack thereof) of the GSU.

The report of the GSU, submitted to the graduate council on Tuesday, contained statements such as the following:

"The GSU has been completely irrelevant to my life and I expect no improvement."

"I find a lot of the graduate students, especially those which frequent the GSU, too pseudo-intellectual, overtly academic, if not 'queer', or even totally boring."

The GSU house is "that rare thing — an old house without charm."

Faced with these complaints, it would seem only fair for Mr. Winter to propose a motion at the next GSU meeting calling for the abolition of compulsory fees paid to the graduate union.

By this simple act, he could prove that he is interested in the problems of the graduates, and that his move to lead them out of SAC was not just an agrandizement of his own empire.

Staff meeting has been switched to NOON today in the office.

residence shouldn't be "homosexual" environment

Two weeks ago, the ruling by Dean Stager on women's hours at New College residence was hailed as a triumph by the Residence Committee. The truth is, we were sold out. We wanted an open weekend (60 per cent even voted for an open week) and were given four more hours.

Stager's argument that a residence is responsible to society boils down to the fact that he is scared for his own skin. The Dean is sure that if he allows residents any freedom a great white hand will descend from the clouds of higher academe and pick him up by the scruff of the neck.

So why should residents have the right to entertain women in their rooms at any time? What Stager promotes is an essentially homosexual atmosphere;

"homosexual" in the strict literal sense of "same-sexed". All residences on campus are, in this sense, homosexual — they allow only those of one sex to reside and limit visits from the opposite sex to specified hours.

At the base of this system is the belief that a homosexual (Stager would translate "non-sexual") social environment is the most conducive to education and maturation. I must object.

How can a university student expect to grow up normally if he is forced to comply to the infantile practice of separating the boys from the girls?

Waterloo's Student Village Village is co-ed; Trinity College has open weekends... so why not New?

Brian Bannon

Sirluck should relax 10-hour rule

Regarding Dean Sirluck and his reported remark that graduate students should not work more than 10 hours a week aside from studies because they are an "investment":

Perhaps the Dean's remarks were used out of context or improperly reported. But if that is not the case then I would suggest his stand is rather tenuous.

To presume that because of some financial compact or agreement (overt or otherwise) it is possible for public or private bodies to control an individual's life is a rather dangerous approach to the question. This can of worms can change in interpretation from slavery to the results of bureaucratic and authoritarian used of power by unresponsive groups over a weak minority. Surely the Dean does not want to add to the abuses of this type already prevalent in our technological society.

Second, I think the Dean has not extended his argument to its final conclusion. Is it not better for a student to achieve the minimum necessary income for the continuance of his studies by working in excess of 10 hours per week rather than to have him completely dispose of the public interest (which the Dean is so concerned about) by prematurely concluding his education because of a lack of funds? Otherwise, the School ought to provide the difference between what the student can earn as a result of the regulation and what he could earn without it. I wonder if the Dean would still be the champion of public interest under this interpretation? If he is not prepared to fill this forced money gap then I don't see how he can insist upon it being applied in a meaningful basis that considers distributive justice unrelated to an individual's personal wealth and financial needs and family obligations.

Finally, until the Dean can show that the public's "investment" in a student who has to work more than 10 hours a week is any less "productive" in the long-run or jeopardized by any greater degree (after allowing for all the other uncertainties and risks that go to make up life), then I think the regulation is impertinent and that no one has the right to demand obedience to it.

lots of room in co-ops

At the first of the year, SAC launched a housing campaign with a Tent City to accommodate the protesters; and a Housing Commission was set up to solve the housing problem. At that time the Campus Co-Op had vacancies. It still does — seventeen of them. Why haven't these vacancies been filled?

Room costs are $400 less than any residence on campus. Students talk about the high cost of housing. The Co-Op is student-run and student-operated. We make our own rules; we control our own environment. Students talk about "doing their own thing" about having the freedom to decide how they want to live. Why aren't these vacancies filled?

Forestry students want 5 percent wilderness students

We the undersigned do violently protest the content of the C.B.C. public affairs program "The Way It Is" on the evening of December 1. It is our opinion that this program was produced to generate bias in favour of the wilderness view towards Algonquin Park. Since the C.B.C. receives monetary support from the Federal Government, we also believe that the production of such a program is in defiance with the general format of the C.B.C. The public should be informed of the matter and no attempt should be made to influence their position on it.

It is true that the facts of Algonquin were stated, but due to cunning commentary and sly editing, the actual situation has been misrepresented.

We, as future Foresters, would also like to express our approval of the proposed plan for Algonquin Park, which has 5 per cent of the area reserved as primitive areas. We believe that multiple use through management is the only answer to preserving the natural beauty of our Country. One needs only look to Europe where management processes have been going on for more than a century. Here the Foresters have implemented the term "multiple use" to its fullest extent, and in so doing have satisfied the demands of naturalists and foresters alike.

If forests are left to their natural processes, successional influences occur, whereby decadence and deterioration prevail. Are we going to let this happen to Algonquin Park?

If Canada is to remain prominent in forest industries and products she must develop a modern outlook towards the regulation of her forests. Our economy depends on it.

PROVOST D.R.G. OWEN

This article was written by Trinity College Provost D. R. G. Owen for the 1968 Trinity Annual Report.

There are several general points that I should like to make in connection with the whole question of discipline.

First, the present generation of students is the product of a social environment so different from the pre-War context that it might also be described as a different kind of culture. The mores, or conventional standards of behaviour, have changed to an extent that the middleaged find difficult to realize.

For example, even twenty years ago it would have been inconceivable that a mixed group of young people should spend a sking weekend unchaperoned; but this is now a common practice. Again, twenty years ago we should have been alarmed to hear of a drinking problem in the secondary schools; nowadays the problem is drugs.

On the other hand, a generation ago young people were scarcely aware of the existence of underprivileged countries; nowadays they leave by the hundreds to do volunteer work for a period of years in Africa, India and other places. And while their attitude to drink, drugs and sex may be shocking to their elders, they have very strong convictions about honesty, integrity and justice.

More mature

Secondly, students entering University these days are more mature, more sophisticated and better educated than previous incoming classes. Teenagers nowadays are not only better informed, but have been exposed to a far greater range of experiences than we were at that age.

This is the result not only of changed conventions and the pervasive efforts of television and the mass media, but also of broader and better schooling. Moreover, to quote a reputable authority: "There is persuasive evidence that the age of biological maturity has been steadily declining at an average of about six months per decade since 1880, probably as a consequence of improved diet and medical care. As a result, youngsters are currently beginning their College careers with as much as three years more of physiological maturity in their experience than was the case with freshmen in 1900."

Why Trinity College has 'open weekends'

For all these reasons, students entering College today have already had to cope with problems of freedom, responsibility and individual decision-making to a far greater extent than the eighteen-year-olds of yesterday. They are therefore not nearly so ready to take for granted the validity of rules that are based on earlier and different presuppositions.

Most of them have known very little of parental authority in its Victorian form and, in any case, they regard themselves as relatively mature human beings. They are therefore no longer prepared to accept the role of the University or College as in loco parentis.

It was previously taken for granted that the nineteenth century concept of the parent-child relationship was continued in College, with the College authorities replacing the parents. Nowadays College students no longer want to be treated as children, but rather as free human beings.

They are ready to accept responsibility, and they want a share in determining the rules that govern their behaviour in the College community.

Assent of Governed

This brings me to a third point. Long ago, in fact as early as the sixteenth century, a fundamental principle of responsible government was enunciated to the effect that: "The authority of the Government depends on the assent of the governed."

As long as there is general agreement on the propriety of the laws, there is respect for the laws but, when this general consent disappears, then the laws must be either changed or else enforced by authoritarian methods.

As an example, I cite a recent change in the rules of the men's residence in this College. Previously, women visitors were allowed in the residence on weekends until 2:00 a.m. This curfew has now been removed, although women are still excluded from 11:00 p.m. on Sunday to 7:00 p.m. on Friday.

This action was taken on the unanimous request of the Board of Stewards, the Dons, and the Dean of Residence (who are generally responsible for enforcing the rules), supported by the senior members of the academic staff in residence and by 95 per cent of the resident students.

If none of the law-enforcing agencies is prepared to enforce a certain rule, and if this rule has lost "the assent of the governed", there are only three possible alternative courses of action: The old rule could be retained for purposes of external relations, in the full knowledge that it will not be observed; or the rule could be enforced by a Dean of Residence and a group of Dons who would be prepared to act as a police force; or the rule could be changed.

The first alternative is the situation that now obtains in many residences; the second is virtually out of the question; the third is the course of action that we have followed. To retain rules that are unenforced, and probably unenforceable is to maintain a facade which placates the outside world and comforts the College authorities, but it also provides an example of the kind of hypocrisy to which the younger generation is rightly opposed.

In fact, one of their most vigorous protests is directed against the hypocritical, unrealistic and unjust standards to which the older generation (it is said) likes to pay lip-service. In any case, they are surely right in regarding deceit, dishonesty hypocrisy and self-righteousness as the worst of sins.

Ethical Principle

A fourth consideration has to do with the relation of rules to ethical principles. I do not believe that ethical principles can be inculcated by prohibitions. The main purpose of restraining rules is the maintenance of peace and order and the protection of the community against the excess of the individual.

A change in rules, such as the removal of the weekend curfew in the men's residence, does not reflect a weakening of ethical principles. Changes of this kind are not an invitation to licence, but rather an indication that we are willing to trust the students to behave responsibly and, in this particular case, to decide for themselves the time at which their guests will leave.

As far as I can discover, this change in the rules has not resulted in any notable changes in actual practice. The question of morality remains exactly as it was before, and the same can be said of the maintenance of peace and order in the residence, which is still the responsibility of the Board of Stewards, the Dons, and the Dean of Residence.

Re-examine Rules

It may be that the time has come to re-examine the source and function of disciplinary rules and the nature and place of authority in residential Colleges.

Here at Trinity we have always maintained that the purpose of the College was to provide a liberal education, and we have taken the adjective seriously. It was a former Provost who once instructed a Premier of this Province on the inviolability of academic freedom. It was this College that provided a place in which the "Red Dean" of Canterbury could speak, when all other doors were closed to him. We were also the first to remove the prohibition on drinking in the residence.

In the description "liberal education", the adjective applies to more areas of College life than the academic. The Oxford Dictionary defines "liberal education" as "an education fit for a free man".

If students are to be regarded as free and responsible human beings, we can no longer impose rules and prohibitions upon them in authoritarian fashion, especially if these rules are based on an earlier cultural situation that no longer obtains. The students themselves must be involved in the work of formulating and enforcing the rules that govern them.

In this College the Board of Stewards has for years played an increasingly active and responsible role in this connection. The inclusion of students on the College Council and on the Administration Committee, as well as the proposal to form a Residence Council, are signs pointing in the same direction.

In the face of this kind of development, the role of the Dean of Residence and the Dons is changing.

We are rapidly approaching, if we have not already arrived, at a point at which they are no longer regarded as authority figures, much less as policemen. Their function is to assist students with their counsel and advice, to reinforce the Board of Stewards in the maintenance of peace and order, to bear witness with their lips and in their lives to the highest ethical principles, and above all to strive in every way to make the College a genuine community and a community of genuine persons.

Abraham Mudrik, beloved Chairman of the Blue and White Society announced yesterday that David Rea, one of the fastest-rising folk singers in North America, will be appearing at the upcoming "Winter Carnival '69". He will headline a concert to be held at Convocation Hall on Sunday at 8:30 p.m. All those who buy a series ticket for the nine-day Carnival (only $3) will get their tickets FREE. The Carnival starts on Friday when the girl cheerleaders challenge the CKFH DJ's to a vigorous and enervating game of broomball.

'Sorry, I'm all tied up now'

President Claude Bissell was kidnapped from his office yesterday morning at 8:20 a.m. by two black-hatted desperados, clutching red "Community Chest" balloons. Bissell, his hands firmly tied together with masking tape, was forced into the mobile Radio Varsity unit in front of University College. He was thrown into a face-to-face encounter with Balex, alias Bryon Alexandroff (III APSC), who had just finished the first 24 hours of his continuing 62-hour broadcasting marathon.

Ransom for the mild-mannered university president is set at $10,000 in Community Chest donations, but Dr. Bissell is doubtful. "U. of T. presidents are expendable", he said. In an effort to raise the ransom he called vice-provost Dr. B. The Reddick. However, during his three-quarter-hour ordeal, Dr. Bissell helped Balex out by introducing the Monkees' record, "I Want to Be Free", and requested "Yellow Submarine".

The Commission agreed on lists of people from both inside and outside the university community who they feel hold views important to the understanding of university government.

The lists included representatives from student, faculty and administrative groups in Canada and the United States, as well as others et areas close to the university.

Members of the Commission on University Government laid the groundwork for seven months of intensive hearings and committee work in a two and a half hour meeting last night.

A five man committee convinced SMC president Rev. J. M. Kelly, to back the change, which was approved after some debate by the Basilian fathers who run the college. Visitors are still not allowed in the St. Mike's women's residences. Shiley said he knew of no attempts to extend the visiting privileges.

GSU questions 10 hour rule

The Graduate Students Union challenged the School of Graduate Studies' headline stand on the ten-hour work rule yesterday.

Last week the Graduate Council, the highest governing body of the graduate school, refused to reconsider a long-standing rule which forbids graduate students to work more than ten hours a week at a paid job.

The GSU executive waited on the stage of Convocation Hall for 40 minutes until they got a quorum of 25 students to start the meeting.

After 27 students had drifted in, the GSU asked the Graduate Council to set up a committee composed of an equal number of staff and students, through which graduate students could appeal the ten-hour rule under special financial circumstances.

The meeting also approved a constitutional amendment to include the four student members of the Graduate Council on the GSU executive.

UofT plans ahead for Czech students

When about 100 Czechoslovakian students register at U of T next September, the university should be ready for them.

A committee has been devising plans since September 1968 to solve the students' main problems — English and money.

The students, most of whom were abroad when the U.S.S.R. invaded their homeland, are now taking courses in English sponsored by the federal Department of Manpower and Immigration. The department pays a weekly allowance of $37 to full time enrollees.

U of T will probably follow up the Manpower course with a more intensive course during the summer.

One problem is timing. Because students proceed at their own rate in Manpower courses, they may finish in anything from six weeks to six months. The Czech stu-

Student speakers will be invited from the campus political groups, college councils and the student body at large.

Two representatives at large will probably be chosen from the ranks of those nominated for the Moss Scholarship, an honor awarded by election to outstanding U of T students.

Dr. Bissell pointed out that representation was weak from this group, "who have chosen to concentrate on their studies."

To accommodate the large work load the Commission will extend its Friday meetings from 10 a.m. through into the afternoon.

The Commission also passed a skeleton program for preparation of a preliminary brief for study by the middle of March.

"It is essential to get campus feedback on the direction we are taking before exams and the summer break," said genous group. But there are lessons to be learned from it.

Because none of them spoke English, they were given an intensive course from February to June, 1967. From June to August, the mining engineering students worked in the mining industry.

Troubles developed during the school year. There was a high failure drop-out rate.

"The level of language wasn't high enough," says Hart House Warden E. A. Wilkinson, who is chairman of the Czech Committee.

"They should take their time, feel around... talk to Canadian students, sit in on lectures, examine the educational set-up and possibilities after the education," says engineering Prof. J. Vitek.

But this just isn't economical, because in most cases the new students don't have the financial resources for an extended orientation period.

getting more.

In an exclusive interview Dr. Bissell reflected on his capture. "At first I was rather alarmed and shocked. However I recovered rapidly around the irises.

Mantra important as life: SIMS

The mantra is imparted by the instructor during the 20-minute instruction period. This is a precise sound and every person has his own.

As a person uses his mantra, says Shecter, his awareness becomes more and more subtle until he goes beyond the material to a state of unity with the universe.

Meditation lasts for 20 minutes in the morning, and again in the late afternoon. Its effects carry over into all a person's activities, allowing him to achieve greater happiness.

Meditation is "effortless and requires no discipline." "Anyone can meditate if they can think," says Shecter. "Even the most skeptical can reach the transcendental state by mechanical application of the technique."

Shecter hopes to have an introductory lecture for SIMS once a month, beginning in February, and then weekly meetings for those who are meditating.

Did you know you have your very own mantra? Do you know what it is? Do you want to find out?

The Students' International Meditation Society teaches a technique of meditation using the mantra, a special verbal sound.

"It's as important as life," says Howard Shecter, student co-ordinator of SIMS. "Everyone should have this experience."

Shecter, 27, a graduate student in psychology, is originally from Toronto, but has been in Los Angeles for the past six years where he graduated from the University of California. It was in Los Angeles that Shecter began meditating.

Those who want to begin meditating make an appointment for personal instruction for which there is a "donation" of $5. The instructor must have studied in India under the Maharishi Mahesh Yogi.

McGill students confront board in first Canadian open meeting

MONTREAL — (CUP) The first open meeting of a university board of governors in Canadian history was marred Monday at McGill when the board was forced to adjourn after 10 minutes of confrontation with 200 chanting, jeering students.

The students crowded into the meeting room in defiance of a limited ticket ruling that would have allowed only 34 spectators.

The students demanded at the outset that the board discuss a controversial decision to build a faculty of management rather than finance a student co-operative housing venture.

Students said the governors had ruled out the co-op because it was "a bad investment". They asked that the item be placed at the head of the agenda, amid angry choruses of "We control the university," "Who are the governors anyway?," and "Why are students bad risks?"

The chairman chancellor Howard I. Ross, refused to acknowledge the student right to speak or present motions. He was backed by board members.

The board then ordered that the room be cleared, and despite threats of disciplinary action from principal H. Locke Robertson, the students refused to leave.

The board promptly adjourned.

Robertson and vice-principal Michael Oliver took down names of students they recognized during the heckling, and Oliver said later they collected about 15 names.

He added that the administration would announce today what disciplinary action, if any, would be taken against the students.

Christianity solution to man's predicament: Lucas

By STEVE COWLEY

A folk singer of sorts tries to make himself heard over Convocation Hall's loud-speaker system.

An engineering type with a big wide grin prolongs a monotonous introduction.

And then Dick Lucas is on.

Mr. Lucas is hardly the typical evangelist. He speaks carefully, calculatingly with a tone that indicates he is taking pleasure in what he is saying.

"All of us today are looking for an accurate diagnosis of what we are," says Lucas.

"We must throw off the formal shackles of religion to discover some of the most basic truths about ourselves."

Lucas calls the philosophy of the Bible "unique".

"The Bible pictures man as hungry, lonely and enslaved. This picture is reflected in modern art, music and literature."

Lucas feels Christianity provides the only solution to man's predicament.

"Jesus knew men because he was man. He valued men and sought their friendship, although he could not condone everything they did.

"He went after men. He did not always expect men to come to Him."

Little of what Lucas says is put in straightforward terms. He constantly refers to past experience, and relies heavily on analogies.

"Christianity," he says, "is something like the clue to a cancer cure.

"It may not immediately answer all the complex questions which face us. But it does offer a clue to their solution."

Lucas describes Jesus as "the power behind everything, the rational principle in the universe.

"Through Jesus, God has made his truth available to all men," he says.

DICK LUCAS

But Lucas insists this truth is not simply a commandment to love one another.

"If Jesus' life was just a loving life it would not have been virtuous. His love for men resulted in His crucifixion.

"The dogma is not something tacked on by Christ's disciples. It is part of the story.

"Christ's disciples didn't get together and say 'If they can swallow the Trinity and the Virgin Birth then they can swallow anything.'"

Referring to a Chinese Communist dictionary, Lucas says.

"The neutralist line is a daydream that can never be realized," adding, "We must support Christ or reject Him."

"There is no third road."

Mr. Lucas continues a series of lectures at 1 p.m. everyday in Convocation Hall for the rest of the week.

SKULEMEN BALEXES VICTORIA!

by GELLIUS
VOLLEYBALL FINAL

Engineering beat Vic in straight games (15-11, 15-4, 15-10) to win the Victoria Staff Cup (donated in memory of Miss V. Staff, former chairman of the University Biology Department and isolator of the staffylococcus bacillus), symbol of Intramural Volleyballic supremacy. The cup was first contested in 1933; and Eng has won every year since 1953.

HOCKEY

McCarthy's marker was the margin as SMC blanked Vic, 1-0.

Law got goals from Over the Hill and Into the Moorhouse, Davies (2), and Fitzpatrick (2) to beat PHE A, 5-2. Nepotiuq of the North got both PHE A goals.

Devonshire house (Mills, McCallum) 2; For (Polk, Flanders) 2.

Skelton, Koutsaris, Taylor and Sullivan led Dents over Meds, 4-1. Moffatt found the range for the losers.

MacDonald had two goals for SMC B and Little two for UC II. There was no other scoring (Figure it out.)

Business, 3; Law II, 1. For Bus: Barber, Corcoran and Bengough (no relation to Vincent Ben Gough, the famous Israeli painter). For Law II: Glover.

BASKETBALL

Sanderson scored 14 as Vic II oreganoed Trin (Story 5), 37-20.

UC II (Koach 12), 43: PHE B (King 7), 27.

FOUR-INCH FILLER

The messenger-boy delivered the telegram to the board room at Simcoe Hall. He handed it to Jack Pine, oldest living governor.

"Here's a bag of gold. Now be off with you." He took it into the meeting and handed it to Bissell. "What do it say, Claude? You can read."

Bissell's lips moved as he pondered for a moment. "It from James 'Lord of the Flies' Mackie. The Varsity has been calling him a pig again, and he's feeling very disgruntled."

"Well, I'll say this for the Varsity," said C. O. Howe; "You'd never see anything like that on the sports page. That Rod Bingley is the bees-knees."

Which was strange, because he is dead.

FISTICUFFS

St. Michael's College, already renowned as the breeding ground for such campus strongmen as Fighting Freddy Fromm, Battling Father Kelly and Ace Paul McCann, has produced four more leather-lathered strongmen and all four have secured positions on the U of T boxing team.

They be Pat Goodwin (125 lb.), Dan Doyle (160 lb.), Kevin Cavanagh (165 lb.) and John Byrnes (heavyweight).

And the fearsome foursome will be in action, along with six other fellow fisticuff phobia followers, Saturday night in Hart House against a squad from Royal Military College.

Dave Frank, Varsity city editor, has promised to cover the story.

VARSITY AT WATERLOO--FIRST ON LINE TONIGHT

By PHIL BINGLEY

Much of the ink which has flowed from the wilted ribbon of this typewriter over the past few months has come out in the form of words describing the excellence of the 1968-69 Varsity hockey Blues.

And yet tonight, Blues are in a position to permanently relinquish (at least for this season) first place in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League. A loss to University of Waterloo Warriors in the latter's home rink would seal that particular fate.

So why the big discrepancy between the paper team and the actual team? That probably is one question that coach Tom Watt and his players would like to know the answer to. The fact is, however, that Blues have not played up to the potential which they possess this season.

They have had their big games but they have been crummy on other occasions. On still other nights they were just plain "not bad."

And, throughout the season while Blues have been searching for their true identity, Waterloo suddenly emerged as an eager and well-balanced unit. Warriors ambushed Blues 3-2 when the two teams met two weeks ago tonight at Varsity Arena. So now the pressure is on Watt and his players to win or tie or settle for second place.

If Blues are to win tonight, the recipe consists of solid and aggressive fundamental shinny. Included as necessary ingredients will be an effective power-play, tight penalty-killing, tough bodychecking, especially from the defense position, and a dash of luck around the Waterloo net (for a change). Blues do not seem to have the power to skate out and dazzle the enemy with their speed and science as they have done in past years.

Whatever evolves, this evening is not the end of the ball game for the team. Win or lose they will likely have to play Warriors two more times before either squad can proceed to the national play-offs to be held in Edmonton in March. Victory would, however, set the stage for a spectacular finish in the league with the key game at home (also for a change) when Warriors pay their second visit to Varsity Arena, Wednesday February 19.

NOTES...Watt will choose his starting goaler for tonight's game just before the team leaves for Waterloo later this afternoon. This has been a common practice all season. Netminders Adrian Watson and Tom Little have regained the lead in the loop's goals-against derby following Warriors 7-7 tie with Guelph last week...Paul Laurent still leads the SIHL scoring parade...Blues are home on Friday night for a game with Guelph Gryphons, a team they have already beaten twice. Saturday Varsity is in Windsor for another affair with Lancers.

BASKETBALL

By ALF CHAITON

*One by land,
Two by sea,
The Raiders are coming,
To Varsity.*

Actually, it'll be to York University, and the Raiders are the Roberts Wesleyan College Raiders of North Chili, N. Y. (just outside Rochester, a little east of Beautiful Downtown Burbank). They will be playing our Blues tonight in an exhibition basketball match.

R. W., as they are affectionately known, will probably be the best team Blues face all year. Their roster includes an honourable mention for All-American, Ken Curtis, a 6'3" forward who broke the Raider's season scoring record last year with 591 points.

Blues have played in North Chili (that's North, not South, America) for the past three years, losing last year by a 93-61 count.

This will be the first appearance of the Raiders in Toronto.

Come out and see how a good, American club plays. Game time is 8:15 p.m. Free admission.

Chaitonehat (debut):

Coach John McManus said he'll be playing everybody on the squad who comes out for practice. "This will be an opportunity for us to get in some players who haven't had time in many of the league games so far," he commented.

Only 10 players can dress for a league game, but the coach will probably dress 14 for this exhibition match.

He said that the Blues' big problem is playing as well in the second half as they do in the first.

A major factor is that the team practices on a small floor at Hart House, while they play their games on the big floor at York. As well, the backboards at York are glass, while they're wooden at HH.

"If we could only call each half 'the first half,'" the coach was caught musing.

Swim Blues' conditioning pays off

By DAVE POWELL

The Varsity swimming team demonstrated the value of good conditioning this week-end when they won two meets in less than 24 hours.

Friday evening, Blues travelled to the Tait McKenzie building where they whipped the York University squad by a score of 78-39.

Veteran Gaye Stratton, with victories in the 50 meter freestyle and the 200 backstroke and sophomore distance star Terry Bryon, who won the 500 and 1000 meter freestyle, and placed second in the 200 individual medley were the top performers for Varsity.

Doug MacIntosh took the 100 freestyle and Klaus Koch beat York star Murray Young in the 200 butterfly.

On Saturday night, in Hart House, Blues defeated Queen's and the local University Settlement Aquatic Club. Rookie Mike Guinness gave a fine performance when he unofficially broke the OQAA record in the 200 freestyle with a time of 1:53.9 and then knocked seven seconds off the OQAA mark in the 500 freestyle with a 5:17.5 clocking.

Theo Van Ryn came close to his own OQAA record in the 50 freestyle and won the 100 as well. Bob Heatley took the 100 fly in a fine 56.5 seconds and Barry Bowerman continued to impress in winning the 200 breaststroke.

Gaye Stratton easily won the 200 backstroke.

In the 400 yard freestyle relay, the team of Van Ryn, Stratton, Guinness and Doug MacIntosh chopped .3 seconds off the OQAA record and missed the Canadian intercollegiate mark by .1 seconds with a time of 3:25.8.

Referees foil fencers

Ever seen a frustrated Fencer?

In the MacFarland Master at Arms Tourney in Ottawa last weekend Varsity fencers experienced the bitter fruits of disappointment. Why? Each sabre bout became a gamble. The first and not the last, to suffer from the judge's myopia was Martin Moskovits going out in the semifinal.

Each President referee had a different view of the rules but Martin Peros seventh and Rowland Griffin eighth maintained their cool till the end.

Epee, that imitation of the duelling weapon, cannot be manipulated as there are no conventions to observe and hence no source of bias. Is that so? Just arrange the preliminary rounds so the best strangers meet Canadian A fencers.

Fortunately, the ploy rebounded in that Rowland Griffin reached the final after a barrage which carried out one A fencer. Unflappable Martin Peros had a chance to finish in the first three but the disorganized final took so long that his drive waned to take the sixth place followed by Griffin eighth.

Varsity fencers did their stuff in Ottowa last week-end but had a hard time proving their hits to the referees. Shown above is action in the foil competition.

Sir George students bivouac among computers

Montreal — CUP-VNS — A student occupation of the computer centre at Sir George Williams University entered its third day this morning as the administration continued to refuse to yield to student demands.

The student occupants are demanding dismissal of a five-professor committee hearing charges of racism against a biology professor. The students want a board of arbitration to include representatives of all sides of the dispute.

About 400 students, many of them black militants, seized the ninth floor of the downtown Montreal university building Wednesday after a hearing session broke down. They have refused to leave until their demands are met.

There was no indication last night that the administration planned to call in police, although acting principal Douglas Birms Clarke did not dismiss the possibility.

He said the hearing committee would not be reconstituted but will "continue its work . . . It's sessions will resume shortly."

Radio Varsity newsmen last night telephoned the computer centre, located on the ninth floor of the 14-story Hall Building, one of Sir George's two buildings.

"We will stay until our demands are met," students in the building said "We want a hearing committee set up which is agreeable to all parties concerned."

Student guards at the computer centre are allowing occupants to come in and out in shifts.

In the background there was the sound of shouting and music. At one point the stuttering sound of a machine — possibly a computer — was clearly audible.

The university pays $1,000 an hour to rent the huge bank of computers immobilized by the occupation.

The computers are vital to the administrative apparatus. They handle all the university's paychecks, class lists, schedules and exams.

Technicians say the delicate machines can last only a week without servicing before irreparable damage results.

The charges against the biology Prof. Perry Anderson had been heard as much as a year before the present crisis. Black students claim the professor awards low marks because of racialism, but Anderson has denied this.

Over the telephone last night occupying students refused to discuss the charges but said they would present evidence when an impartial board was established.

Late Wednesday night a faculty member resigned her post over the university's handling of the entire affair. Sociology lecturer Pat Pajonas charged the administration was making decisions on the basis of "fear, ignorance and self interest" citing the "illegitimacy" of the hearings and legal action against "black militants as the major injustices."

The student council has called for a three-man arbitration board composed of a representative from each side, plus an impartial third member.

Classes at Sir George, which has about 5,000 students, have not been cancelled although some professors have declared study sessions.

SECONDARY SCHOOLS GET WORD

Self-service curriculum for 1969

By JIM COWAN

Reforms of the Macpherson-Allen Report on undergraduate instruction in arts and science were unveiled in detail Thursday at Victoria College.

In the carpeted lecture theatre of Vic's New Academic Building, Ontario secondary school principals and guidance counsellors got their first comprehensive look at the new program which resulted from student-staff discussions last fall.

Dean A. D. Allen of the faculty of arts and science described the reforms as "an almost impossible revolution for this university to achieve." The Dean was one of the prime engineers of the present plan, a distillation of the Macpherson Report published in October, 1967.

The main feature of the new plan, which will be implemented for first and second year next fall and third and fourth year in 1970, is the great flexibility given to students in choosing their courses.

Stapleton Caldecott, principal of Parkdale Collegiate, Toronto, summed up the feelings of most of the delegates, saying, "This is something we've wanted for a long time. The difficulty will be to get it across to the kids this year. But this is the ideal set-up."

Dean Allen said the proposals had the approval of "the great majority of both the staff and students in the faculty."

The report goes to the Senate for approval February 14.

"A basic premise of our new program is that each student should be free to determine his own program each year by choosing from among those courses for which he is adequately prepared," Allen said.

"To make this choice a real one we have eliminated the categories that previously contained our students." He added that this meant the old general-honors distinction would disappear.

"The new program recognizes the continued importance of (the old disciplines)," said Allen, "but also makes provision for interdisciplinary areas of specialization, areas that might have particular relevance to both the interests of a student and the needs of society today and tomorrow."

Under the new program,

Dean A. D. Allen speaks with Dr. A. C. H. Halliell.

the student will require more extensive guidance from both the high school and the university "It seems to me," said Allen, "that what the student needs most of all is training in making academic decisions of this kind. And it might be a useful exercise if the student could be asked to select five courses . . . and try to rationalize why he has chosen those particular courses."

The new program will be offered throughout the faculty, which includes the St. George, Scarborough and Erindale campuses, and the Department of Extension.

English Prof Jack Robson presented a simplified explanation of the mechanics of the new system Projecting a grid on a screen, he gave several examples of the kind of course a student is required to follow under the present program.

Then he flashed the program a student entering university next year might face. The grid was blank.

He described the kinds of courses a student could follow, stressing that any unit of any illustration could be changed by the individual student.

"We want the students to develop their own courses as much as possible," said Prof. Robson. "What it means is that all the programs become part of the counselling process."

Under the new program, students will choose five courses each year. In some subjects pre-requisites or co-requisites will be required.

Sid Smith speakout succeeds - guerilla theatre, marshmallows

By Susan Reiser

If you missed all the action Wednesday at noon hour, Sid Smith is where it's at from now on.

"This place has never looked better," was the way one student put it. She spoke for the majority of the 200 students who stopped to watch the action.

The main action revolved around the guerilla theatre put on by the Toronto Student Movement.

There were two short skits about "the myth of the liberal university" and free speech at U of T, Sidney Smith Hall in particular.

Marshmallows thrown at the audience and consequently stepped on represented the students on this campus said

Andy Wernick (SGS).

About 75 students stayed after for the speak-out.

After a slow and awkward beginning, the speakout began to take some shape. The exchange was left and radical, almost a verbal war between the factions.

This didn't daunt the audience. All those questioned thought the rally was "a really good idea."

The students are in the foyer without permission. Dean W. D. Foulds said the matter is being referred to the U of T Security and the Fire Marshall.

If there are no problems the administration may change its policy.

Action today features a visit by Karl Wolff a German student leader, and national chairman of the SDS the student movement which has produced such militants as Rudi Dutschke and Daniel Cohn-Bendit.

But it would be possible for a student to obtain a degree by taking 20 unrelated courses.

Other major changes are also designed to increase the student's choice and break down barriers between disciplines.

Four new interdisciplinary courses will be offered. A student in these could study courses in three or four different areas (for instance, political science, economics and geography) all oriented toward one topic.

The new courses are: Environmental Studies, Modernizing the Community, Theory, Method and Practice, Lawmen try to Solve their Problems and Revolution.

Abolition of the year system as a means for passing or failing students is a second change. "The student will be given credit for any course he passes," said Dean Allen. He will not be failed in a year's work because he fails one or two courses."

Typical of the reaction from the principals and counsellors was:

• "I'm really excited about it. It offers the best of the old system but sets it up for today's kids. It's the best of both worlds." (John Culles, Widdifield Secondary School, North Bay).

Major worries yesterday seemed to concern counselling and registration. Associate Dean G.A. Watson explained that the university was already prepared to offer guidance to students or guidance counsellors, and that the sooner the questioning started, the better.

Dean Allen said the problems caused by students having more freedom were being studied. Students entering first year will be asked to make a preliminary selection of courses in May and June.

For 1969, requirements for Grade 13 graduates remain as at present. For 1970, these requirements will become "recommendations"; the students will be advised what subjects would form a good grounding for a chosen course.

Who is the ugliest man on campus? GODZILLA, that's who — a creature from the depths of Middle House, Victoria College. This was the choice of the U. of T. Community Chest's "Ugliest Creature on Campus Contest" held during Rodio Varsity's three day marathon broadcast. Tonight after the hockey game it will be unveiled by the lucky winner of the Most Courageous Girl on Campus Contest, whose prize is the privilege of spending the remainder of the evening with GODZILLA. (A girl may be nominated for MCGOC by placing 50 cents in an envelope and signing her name on the front. Both envelopes and ballot boxes are provided at various places around campus.) GODZILLA, who walked off with 74 votes, had several famous and infamous runners-up, including Abe Mudrick, Poul Fromm, Bol-ex, GSU president Jahn Winter, Steve Langdon and Gellius. Anyone interested in managing or helping the Community Chest is asked to attend a meeting in room 1022 of Sid Smith, Monday at 1:00.

why just Czech students?

When we examine the once and future treatment of the recent Czechoslovakian immigrants studying at the University of Toronto, some interesting speculations arise.

The few students now enrolled have free tuition, and scholarships or $1,000-$1,200 grants of which half are to be repaid, courtesy of the federal government.

But after this year of free tuition, these students will be expected to get summer jobs to help pay for their

it works

Confrontation politics works — just ask the students working on the University of Toronto Community Chest fund drive.

Angered that we failed to give publicity to their fund-raising "Ugliest Man on Campus" contest, about 20 of them came to the office and demanded coverage. Without actually announcing a sit-in they remained for an hour, one of them idly swinging a rope with a large noose on the end.

It worked. But if this is the latest stage in the escalation of confrontation politics, we urge Dr. Bissell to watch out.

education — "like any other Canadian", according to a program coordinator quoted in "Canada's most quoted newspaper." Other Czech students will take full-time English courses during the summer.

Even if enough summer jobs are available, all these students will need help, and they will get help. The government has lifted a regulation prescribing a year's residence in the province to get OSAP money.

But there is a problem — intended or not, this move will cut down any chance of the regulation being challenged on its intrinsic worth.

One can imagine the outcry if these students fleeing the Russian regime couldn't complete their educations because of lack of funds. Yet students from other provinces and other countries are just as needy and just as worthy.

But they aren't as good copy for the newspapers, and for them the rules don't get changed.

"The university is not a secular church, nor a society for general improvement, nor a permanent opposition to whatever is"

University (yūnivērsiti). ME. [a. MF. universitas: L. universitas, -itas (1) the whole, universe, (2) a corporation or community, f. L. universus UNIVERSE. As the designation of a whole body, community, or guild of masters and scholars, the full plur. was universitates; universorum et scholarum; universitas ultimately superseded studium for 'university'.]

We asked professors, administrators and students around the university for their definition of a university. This article is the first in what we hope will be an illuminating series.

By CLAUDE BISSELL
President of the University of Toronto

A university is distinguished from a college by reason of the diversity of its offerings and the senior nature of its work. In a bald administrative sense, a university is an institution of higher learning that has, in addition to the basic subjects in the Humanities, the Physical and Natural Sciences, and the Social Sciences, a number of professional faculties and a division concentrating on advanced work and research. But the real key is not so much diversity as devotion to scholarship and research.

Unless an institution is making some contribution to knowledge, it is not really much more than a superior high school with a better football team. This does not rule out undergraduate work, since undergraduate teaching must derive its strength from those who are themselves explorers and innovators in their disciplines.

Moreover, as the levels of understanding and knowledge rise, undergraduate work itself should be a phase of scholarship, not in the sense that undergraduates write learned articles for publication, but in the sense that they have the confidence to question assumptions and devise new approaches. This emphasis in the university upon innovation in and expansion of knowledge makes the dichotomy between teaching and research invalid.

There can be no good teaching at a university level unless it springs out of scholarship and research. Good teaching is not a technique, but a reflection of one's own intellectual interests. Good teaching is the glow of scholarship.

This emphasis upon the university as a centre for the expansion of knowledge carries with it certain assumptions about the nature of the university society.

In the development of that society and the formulation of its governing structure, we are seeking for means whereby a university can be strengthened as an intellectual centre. It would be possible, for instance, to have a university that embodies the purest form of democracy, and yet is an inferior university, avoided by good scholars like the plague. This emphasis does not rule out other qualities and other goals.

In the expansion of knowledge the university will contribute to the full development of individuals. It will inevitably become either directly or indirectly a critic of society, because new knowledge always involves a questioning of the status quo.

The university can exercise no control over knowledge any more than it can control human nature. But it can make sure that the knowledge it generates is fundamental and unrestricted, and it can insist on the right to make moral judgments about the use of knowledge. But we must always be careful lest we elevate these subsidiary functions to a primary position. The university is not a secular church, nor a society for general improvement, nor a permanent opposition to whatever is.

The ideal university would require an absolute minimum of regulations and formality. It would consist only of those who were devoted to the pursuit of knowledge and truth. Such an ideal has never existed and never will.

At the same time, despite the necessity for a formal structure, there will always be a large area of the university that is unpatterned. This is the area of the debating club, the political society, the dramatic, or musical performance, the newspaper and the literary publication. This is an area where student initiative and direction are crucial; success here can be no less important in achieving the university's purpose than all the formal work in classroom and laboratory.

If you would get some clear idea of the significance of this environment, take a good look at the university's publications and see whether they embody high standards in style and presentation, and reflect fully the intellectual life of the times.

As I have said, there is no ideal university, and certainly Toronto is far removed from the ideal. I have worked at four universities, one of which is looked upon as one of the few great universities of the world, but Toronto still seems to me to be the place where there are the fewest impediments to change and growth.

focus:

Hercules is tough and he means business. He is standing frozen high up against the wall of his cubbyhole, located at the stairwell of his three-floor department store. His grey tie is lying flat against his dark blue shirt; his belly is wide and vulnerable under a tailored grey suit.

Stretched out to his solid six foot height, he dangles his arms from his elbows, like a dentist afraid to approach a delicate extraction.

And just in case he really decides to go through with it, there's a set of abandoned dentist's equipment right under the floorboards. The reflector is smashed, the fountain is chipped a little, but the reclining seat and the drill are still intact. The cream-coloured set goes for $150. A duplicate set, minus the upholstered seat, goes for $90.

Hercules is the man responsible for the three floors of this slightly dingy building. And now he is making up his mind whether to stop slashing prices and explain the building:

"We're very careful about the kind of advertising the store gets," he says in his hard low voice, still not moving. "We've been here for many many years. You might call it a life's work."

"This," he says authoritatively, "is a legitimate business. Some people try to slant it one way or another, but we're not afraid."

The man's name is Mr. Fine and he goes on this way for five minutes before a phone call interrupts him. He comes down off the wall and reaches for the receiver.

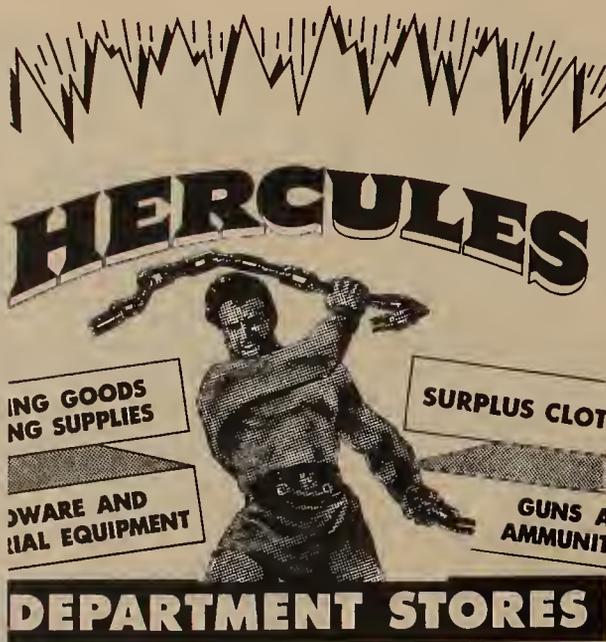

"No. Sorry.

"1 p.m. is the best I can do.

"Ha! Ha!" he laughs, fingering a black ring on his finger. "Saturday's my big day off. Got up at 6 a.m. though, but that's another story."

Of course Mr. Fine is right—Saturday is THE big day for Hercules. This is when the yellow-bricked store on Yonge Street plays host to a continuing stream of the curious, the aloof, the serious, naive and young.

The young are especially interested in Hercules. For the teeny-bopper from Bathurst Heights and other outlying regions of the industrial city, Hercules is a contemporary antique shop. Here is where they buy their ragged army jackets, try on military shakos, poke around in a pile of discarded old boots or select a choice commando knife, available for $4.

The latest — which no young guevarista has yet dared to spirit back to his high school or plaza parking lot is hanging from the rafters on the third floor. $1.49 for a rectangular pair of "bush pants" which seem to be cut from a length of green sailcloth. Square pockets have been stitched to the front, just above the thighs.

Another class of customers — although some people say the clientele is "hippies and strippers" — is typified by the determined and sallow men who arrive in search of the right fitting for their plumbing or just to poke about silently in a pile of dusty electrical hardware. They have to wend their way through the counters on the first floor, piled high with clothing, and pass the soap counter down the wide creaking steps to the basement.

The basement is the only part of the building without any salesmen. These subalterns wear grey cotton shirts and lurk about the other floors offering their services.

"Can I help you?"

If you're checking over hats in one of the bins he probably won't be able to. They're all the same size, 6%, apparently relics of the Children's Crusade.

Now, almost two decades later, they still sell army surplus but a lot of it is American. And in spite of the reputation, many consider Hercules to be a camping outfitter. Others consider it "just like Canadian Tire."

Anyhow, back to Mr. Fine, the man whose security was shattered on Saturday afternoon when a tornado ripped past the sleeping bag hanging in the front door, past the Coke machine, the empty rack, the cashier, the record stand, the Picasso prints and into his cubbyhole, where he had been waiting, the man who keeps insisting that "this business is legitimate."

Mr. Fine has a second office, on the second floor, away from the camping gear and 75c pyjamas. He is sitting in this cluttered office, quiet, cynical and solid, with the sunlight breaking in through the shaded window.

"This place? For 17 years. I've been with it since then. I opened it up for them," he replies. He isn't boastful, just stating the facts. "And I've been here ever since."

He explains the real owners, who never come near the building:

"They had a wholesale business out in West Toronto for a long long time 50 to 60 years," he reports in a clipped voice. Then he gets more expansive:

"They were in hay and feed." Images of cows and barns and yellow fields out in Dundas West. "Then they got into coal and lumber and got bigger." The fields have gone, paved roads appeared, and sawdust flies through the air between blackened brick buildings.

"Then they came into a lot of government war surplus — and opened up this store."

The store, he continues very slowly, used to be a hupmobile servicing centre.

"You know what a hupmobile is?" No. But it is easy to imagine Hercules, blue shirt and flat tie, standing on the running board. "It was before your time. Old cars." A quiet nostalgia seems to settle over his face, but he does not relax.

"There's an elevator down in the basement that can bring a car right up to the top. It's still here."

And it was here the brief balloon burst. It was either Hercules paranoia or just his general disinterest that got the better of him.

Considering the age of the building and the value of the land, might there be plans for redevelopment of the block? Hercules does not want to answer. He is angry.

This is Hercules on Yonge Street, one of the people who do business in our city. They trust no one and protect their investments. They are jealous of their stake in our city and wary of strangers.

Shopkeeper uptight. The way Hercules puts it is almost French, but not quite:

"C'est la vie," he says, and returns to the bins of merchandise.

will toronto's art lovers reject a stallion for a gelding?

Harry Jackman, who thinks that "the horse is a noble animal", picked up an equestrian sculpture of Edward VII in India and wants to donate it to Toronto. The hoo-hah this has generated is a good indication of the art standards of the various interest groups in the City.

In the first place, let it be noted that Jackman bought the piece because he considers it "one of the finest equestrian sculptures of the period." Furthermore, Edward VII is a non-entity of an historical figure whose name is not particularly associated with imperialism or butchery.

Despite this, many people who haven't even seen the work (there has only been one picture of it published here, to my knowledge) have been damning it. To some, it is a relic of British imperialism. Art gallery owners don't like it because there's no percentage in it for them if the public likes the sculpture — they don't have anything like it in stock. One writer to the Globe and Mail was concerned that the horse is a stallion, and if the work were placed in a public park little children would be treated to a larger-than-life view of horse balls.

Then there are the denizens of "the mainstream of Canadian art":

Two years ago the City had a Sculpt-In at High Park. A couple of artists — Len Lye and Armand Vaillancourt — accepted the money quickly enough, but showed so little interest in their works that they never completed them.

It annoyed me considerably when Phil Givens, trying to get the City to accept Henry Moore's "The Archer", apologized for it by saying that it would be "a great tourist attraction." The same thing goes for those who consider the political implications of raising Edward. Art and politics don't mix; socialists regard artists as "reactionary" unless they are drawing tractors, reactionaries regard artists as "subversive" unless they are doing portraits of juntas. Let's raise the work and say to hell with any implied imperialism.

The fascination of many European cities includes their public sculpture. The beauty of human and animal limbs is something celebrated too little in modern art. Toronto could do with Edward's horse because it has a positive dearth of anything like it ## the magus -- did john fowles ruin his own novel?

While the task of making a great novel into even a passable movie isn't easy, The Magus makes one wonder how one man could turn a plot into such a disaster without a conscious attempt. John Fowles, author of the superb novel, is also the man who hatched the screenplay of the same name on an unsuspecting world.

Briefly, The Magus deals with a poet's search for identity on a Greek island. Upon his arrival there, he falls into the clutches of a Greek millionaire, Maurice conchis, played by Anthony "I'm sure to get an award for this one" Quinn, who arranges a masque.

The masque, carefully prepared by conchis, includes our poet in an unsuspecting leading role. Thus, while acting out his part in the masque (himself) he discovers himself. It is from the various scenes of the masque, some violent some mystical, some lyrical, that the novel derives its beauty and originality. All this disappears in the movie.

The demoralized acting of Candice Bergen and Michael Caine is another disillusionment. Caine apparently decided to make the best of a bad job, and seems to deliver all his lines while trying to hold a paper clip between his teeth. Candice Bergen manages to look as pretty as possible but then that requires little effort on her part.

Quinn, on the other hand, gives a performance seldom equalled in the history of cliché-ridden roles. He revels in lines like "What is truth?" and "I am psychic." His hair has been died gray for the occasion and his skin is a deep, nutty brown. If I didn't know better I'd say . . . but I'm getting carried away. However, the greatest loss must be measured not in the bad performances or even in the ruined plot, but in the destruction of some of the book's superb dramatic moments.

One of these was the scene on Mount Parnassus, originally a rather torrid love scene in a valley surrounded by the mountains of Greece. The overtones of Greek mythology and the essential selflessness of the lovemaking were remarkable. We are left with an absurd run through the glades followed by some unspectacular petting in a swamp. A lot of the shots were stolen directly from a Parliament cigarette commercial.

The second missed opportunity was the trial at the climax of the novel. The thirteen judges, robed in witchwear carry the masque right to the last moment in a room cluttered with heraldry and colour ideal for film. The occasion was butchered on the screen.

So died the Magus. It may be two decades before somebody does it right.

SKIDOO

Skidoo is one of those "showcases for Hollywood talent" which annually descend upon movie-goers as proof that their favourite stars are not dead — only older and flabbier. The cast of this one fairly glitters with banality — Carol Channing, Frankie Avalon, Caesar Romero and many other such gifted performers. Frankly, the picture is a wide-screen, technicolor bore. If Our Miss Brooks ever teamed up with Ozzie and Harriet to produce a comedy about the generation gap, the result would be Skidoo.

If the movie is about anything, it centers around a racketeer and a draft-card burner (gasp!) who escape from Alcatraz by turning on the entire prison with L.S.D. Needless to say, director, Otto Preminger, employs the prescribed mind-snapping effects for psychedelic flavour, but after Alice B. Toklas the humour seems curiously out of date. After all, everyone knows that today's youth has turned away from the hippie subculture which Preminger exploits in his movie. Besides, what's Preminger doing making a comedy anyway?

If you're willing to take a chance, wait for Groucho Marx playing God (no, really) near the end of the film. Then, after you've seen the only one with any talent in the movie, you can walk out.

go visit the church on glen movies

Theatre-goers at the University of Toronto wait months and months to find a campus production that is really worth the trouble of going to see. That long-awaited production came silently into the church on Glen Morris last weekend, and is rapidly making its presence felt. Although F. Durrenmatt's The Visit, presented under the auspices of the Centre for the Study of Drama had little advanced billing, the tickets are free, and the night I went all the tickets were gone so I had to sneak in the side door. I was well rewarded for my pains.

The Visit is a demanding play to present mainly because of its mammoth size. No normal stage can contain its cast of thousands. No normal cast can keep the somewhat long play moving at a pleasant pace. No normal director can keep cast and story from falling into the most hopeless chaos. Happily, what we lucky few saw last weekend was a fine cast moving around on a complicated, but functional stage, guided by one of the few really talented directors we've seen on this campus in recent years.

The story of The Visit is itself a good one, and although Durrenmatt sort of whips it like a dead horse at the end, it manages to keep the audience involved throughout. Madam Clare Zachanassian decides to make a return visit to her old home town of Guellen after an absence of twenty-five years. During this time she has gone from whore to billionaireess by virtue of seven very lucrative marriages. She is accompanied by two gangsters she picked up in Brooklyn, two blind eunuchs dressed in black, a caged black panther, and her seventh husband named Moby.

Guellen, once a thriving industrial town, has, for mysterious reasons, fallen on days of depression and is now merely a ghost town on the 'Venice-Stockholm line.' Naturally the citizens are planning to welcome the prodigal daughter to the best of their means, in the hope she will endow them with enough money to put Guellen back on the map.

Director Henry Tarvainen catches most of the drama and suspense of this bizarre bribe and the events which follow. Almost as successful is his evocation of the samll town setting and the country peasants who go from rags to riches, tumbling in the process from piety to hypocrisy.

Most of the first act prepares us for Clare's arrival and we are almost prepared for a let-down. But when she arrives in her black dress, red hair piled high, hanging with diamonds, slowly drawing on a cigar, and followed by her fantastical retinue, Tarvainen creates a dramatic moment which is sustained throughout the play.

Maureen Fox as Mme. Zachanassian and Pat Saul as Anton, her old flame, head up one of the finest campus casts in a long time. It would be insulting to praise some players over others because each actor gave his part a skilful reading.

The stage, which thrust and bulged right into the audience and was arranged on about four different levels, was ingenious.

The Visit, because of the size of its cast, can have the makings of a dramatic disaster area. The Centre for Drama's production, however, manages to convert quantity into an asset by the number of capable performances, without sacrificing any of the quality of an original and powerful script.

The majority of people who might enjoy this production will unfortunately never get the opportunity of seeing it. The Studio on Glen Morris is tiny and seats will be hard to come by if you arrive late. But your 'visit' will be a worthwhile and entertaining one . . . and the price is right. We can only hope to see more of the same from Director Tarvainen and the Centre for the Study of Drama. It plays until Saturday night.

mouldy but palatable

Sometime in the heart of the 16th Century, right in the throes of Elizabethan England, and quite unnoticed by the people at the time, the very foundations of horror shows were being created.

George Peele's Renaissance play, The Old Wives Tale, now being performed by the Vic Drama Society, includes a gentle old seer who, although a man during the day, turns into "the white bear of England's wood" as soon as the sun disappears.

Scaropant, the black-caped, villainous magician, could easily have dropped in from Transylvania, and a golden-haired, lion-headed monster who lives in a well, allows his mane to be plucked by visiting damsels.

However, although these forerunners of horror celebrities are central to Peele's production, they are not meant to be frightening at all, nor is the play in any way a melodrama.

The Old Wives Tale is a "pleasant concept", a courtly presentation, an extremely light and vaguely entertaining diversion for the royal somebodies of 16th century England.

The plot is a watered-down combination of Hansel and Gretel and Sleeping Beauty. A sweet, young girl lost in the woods, is looked for by her two honourable brothers and a noble suitor. She is wickedly forced to lose her identity, but eventually, upon the extermination of the evil sorcerer, is reunited with love and family. Touching.

Director David Blotstein makes good use of sets and stage levels in his blocking and arrangements, but his actors' movements are sluggish.

Although period costumes (all made by one girl, I'm told), lend themselves to the graceful, exaggerated movements of the time, traditional gestures were not emphasized in this play.

The fumbling bravado of the "great and mighty" braggart Huanabango (Anderson Silber) and appealing flirtations of daughter Zantippa (Pat Longstaffe) provided the play's most entertaining highlights.

It was meant as a congenial court masque, and much

Clay Boriss felt he had sold out. His hair was cut, he wore a clean shirt and tie, and his job as a film repairman made him part of the "civilized" people.

He wanted to get back with the guys in Cabbagetown. But he felt he had grown apart from them. He needed an excuse to come back. So he made a film.

"I had a good idea for a film, simple but good. It was about something I'd done in the past with the boys. I knew they'd like it: it's their style. I start it off by having three guys standing at the corner of Parliament and Winchester Streets. These guys are screwed up. They're sick of the life around them especially the cops—how they hate them. These guys are mad at the world, and what they would like to do is get it out of their system. How do you do that? You beat the hell out of somebody or something."

Clay made the film last summer, shooting it on weekends with 20 rolls of super-eight colour donated by the National Film Board and a rented camera. He shot on weekends with half the kids in Cabbagetown trailing after him, improvising the scenes as they came.

The Ontario Department of Education Youth and Recreation Branch contracted him to make a 16mm. film from the original. It runs 7 minutes and was filmed by George MacDonald, a young professional cameraman.

The film consists mostly of the chase of a younger boy by some older ones through Cabbagetown and the subsequent beating up under the Bloor Bridge at the Don Valley. The violence had quite an impact on the audience of adults and newspaper reporters at the preview. Then they started asking questions.

Clay and some of the members of the cast, all from Cabbagetown, leaned against the seats, smoked and grinned with embarrassment when somebody remembered to applaud. Then everybody applauded.

"Why did you make the film?"

"Well, you know, that's what it's like in Cabbagetown. People do it every day. I showed the film to the Cross Gang after I made it and they had just finished beating up a guy five minutes before. They told me we should have hit the guy over the head with a bottle or kicked him in the groin, but they really liked it."

One woman asked, "Do you want to see any changes brought about by this film."

"No," answered Clay. "I don't think there'll be any changes. A friend of mine just got back from reform school the other day and he was standing on the corner, saying, 'First guy comes along, I'm gonna fill him in.' Sure enough, some fellow comes walking by and he pounds the hell out of him. Kicked him in the groin and everything. That's the way it is."

Rafi Kossower, who works at the Department of Education says he gets two different reactions when he shows the film to kids and to adults. "Adults always make a problematic thing of youth. They're always asking, 'Why does this have to happen' or 'what's wrong with these kids?' or 'why does the square guy run away from those toughs?'"

"But when we show it to kids, they can really identify with the film. They know what's happening and the discussions afterward are fascinating. When we tell them what the adults thought about it, they ask, 'don't they know that's what it's like?'"

The 16 mm. version has cut a lot of the Cabbagetown scenes out of the film and some people are upset about it, especially one member of the Church Army, an Anglican organization that works in the inner city, who "grew up in the old Cabbagetown."

Sid Adilman, a reporter for the Toronto Telegram, started to nitpick about the fact that the Department of Education didn't blow up the original picture to 16 mm.

"I don't think that you've answered my question," he persisted. "Why didn't you use the original 8 mm film?" Adilman was shot down pretty quickly when they told him that the original just wasn't that good.

"Besides," says Boriss, "I'm quite happy with the 16 mm. It gets the message across just as well as the original."

Kossower says that with a lot of the Cabbagetown scenes taken out, it's more universal. Most of the action takes place under the Bloor Viaduct over the Don Valley. And while they're pounding the guy out, (over 50% of the kneeling, groin punching and kicking is real), the Don Valley stretches placidly out in the distance.

Another excellent scene is at the beginning when the kid stands on the steps of the school trying to decide whether he is going to go home or not. He looks out on the vast, concrete schoolyard, reflecting the blazing sun.

We watched the film a second time and halfway through, Kossower murmured, "You know it kind grows on you. As simple as it is, everything has the possibility of going deeper."

He was right. It has a sort of inevitability about it that makes it compelling. It reminds you of the times you were beaten up or the times you beat up on guys smaller than you. (And if you haven't been involved in either, you're pretty lucky). It's very nature belies any liberal hypocrisy about "what can we do to help these kids?" or "that only happens in Cabbagetown."

The effect that the film will have when shown in various communities is not to incite people to do anything about the problems. They'll first have to sit down and feel what the problems are, realize exactly what's up before they go crusading off into the sunset. That's why adults don't get it and kids do.

Adults don't like to admit that people run after other people and beat them. But to people in Cabbagetown and other communities, it's a fact of life.

"Here's a square coming out of school," says Clay. "That's who we'll get. So the three guys run after him, catch him, beat the hell out of him, and then walk away like nothing ever happened. They go back to their corner, and that's how the film ends."

"But there's no cops added or anything. I don't want cops. It's like everyone else's story, and it's too phony. The kid wouldn't call the cops. He'd be too scared. And I don't want to add anything at all, because I need something simple where I can just use music for the soundtrack."

A woman walked up to Clay after the film and told him, "I really enjoyed your film and I'll bet you'll be famous someday." Clay dragged on his cigarette and laughed.

leary politics

The Politics of Ecstasy, Timothy Leary, Putnams, a nickel bag.

What ever happened to the days when the acid heads used to say "like man I can't tell you what it's like, like you've just got to DO it!" That used to make me want to puke, but now it seems just plain merciful.

The only difference between the acid trip bore and the Lake Louise trip bore is that the former can't show you slides. If you've seen one mind-blowing, ego-destroying electric corner of the infinite, you've seen them all.

That's a grossly unfair opening paragraph. The psychedelic drugs are one of the most important scientific discoveries ever, and, in all probability, they will be more useful to man and nature than the race to the moon. History will exonerate Timothy Leary. In the meantime, though on the internal exploration front, not a hell of a lot is doing. It has been two years since Daniel Cappon said "We are reduced to saying 'boo!' and 'hooray!' Those who have taken LSD and like it say 'LSD hooray!' and those who haven't and don't say 'LSD boo!'. Two years and things haven't much changed.

The Politics of Ecstasy by Timothy Leary says, with some justification, LSD hooray. But Huxley's The Doors of Perception says it better. Masters and Houston's The Varieties of Psychedelic Experience says it more scientifically, if that is your bag, and Eliot's Four Quartets say it more poetically.

It is perhaps unfair to compare the Leary book to these others as it is really not so much a unity as a collection of speeches, articles, letters and other assorted trip chat. The writing is clear and enjoyable but, as someone commented (again several years ago), the pro-LSD people would probably be a lot more convincing if they did not sound so much like they were selling snake oil.

This is not to give short shrift to the argument itself. Many of us as Leary suggests, could hardly be said to live much beyond robot lives. We have difficulty trusting, let alone loving or feeling a sense of community with our fellow man and other ecological prisoners.

Our political system cannot seem to deal with human realities like Biafra, Vietnam (or the Maritimes?).

From this point, however, we branch out: we must live under the law; we must overthrow the propertied class; accept Christ, Mao or among another thousand suggested solutions, turn on with psychedelic chemicals and become Marx-Rousseau's whole creative man.

The way to be loving is to be loving, Leary argues. The psychedelic drugs are a blessed short-cut to the peace that surpasseth understanding. Masters and Houston's experiments say they aren't; Leary and Alpert's say they are. Pick your favourite scientific method. (At the moment Masters and Houston are trying to raise money to continue research — the government cut them off — and Leary is trying to raise money to fight his court conviction.)

Leary goes on to suggest LSD as a political force; the turned on, tuned in youngsters vs. the menopausal coronaried angry old men. If nothing else, time is on the side of the Leary people. As Brecht suggested, the best way to fight authority is to outlive it.

OutLIVING is the politics of ecstasy: stuffing flowers in national guardsmen's rifles, kissing cops. It has fewer adherents since Chicago.

But putting aside ecstasy as a political philosophy, Leary is a sad, saintly, figure, like Dostoevsky's Ridiculous Man. ("It would've been so simple. . . In one day, in a single hour, everything could've been arranged. The key phrase is 'love others as you do yourself'. And that's all there is to it. Nothing else is required. That would settle everything. . . I'm a ridiculous man. Now they call me a madman. That would be a promotion, if I weren't just as ridiculous in their eyes. But it no longer makes me angry. I find them all nice now. . .")

Such is the world that the Ridiculous Man whose message to Canada — (in last year's Gargoyle magazine) "keep loving and laughing all you people of Canada" — is not allowed into the country; is hated by the political radicals as the most dangerous kind of counter-revolutionary; is only one appeal away from a forty year jail sentence.

Perhaps we should start a campaign to have the government set up a special category of people called Saints, nice innocent, naive, loving people. But I suppose there would be a means test, and the government won't increase welfare anyway. It can't without a change in the tax structure and the flow of capital to and from the States. And that can't be changed without some sort of left-liberal, socialist takeover and they don't like Leary anyway.

conflict, consensus, comity

The Progressive Historians, by Richard Hofstadter. Random House, 1968

At first glance, Richard Hofstadter's latest book, The Progressive Historians; Turner, Beard, Parrington, might appear merely to be a summation of critical writing about three historians whose views, once central to American historical thought, are now largely outdated. In fact, the book does provide such a discussion, but it goes far beyond these limited purposes to become worthwhile reading for anyone interested in American history or hoping to understand America today.

However, the book primarily remains a biographical account of the thought of three great American intellectuals, Hofstadter effectively analyses their development as people surrounded by a changing society, not merely examining their works as somehow appearing in a vacuum with no significant background beyond abstract thought.

Frederick Jackson Turner's work, emphasizing the importance of the frontier and of sectional conflict in American history, opened the way to a whole new approach to the development of democracy and America as a whole. His ideas were simplistic and inadequate as a balanced interpretation, but we must still admire Turner's courage in offering such a radical departure from the tradition of narrative history, and recognize the stimulus his work gave to real historical thought. As Hofstadter says, Turner's greatest monument is the mountain of critical writing he left behind him. We must remember that the historian's profession was then a very new one. Only a dozen or so years before he first enunciated his "frontier thesis" in the 1890's, there had been less than twenty full-time historians in all the universities and colleges in the United States. And we see Turner as a human being, for whom writing was an unpleasant task, who seized on a couple of brilliant ideas and clung to them in a state of relative stagnation for the rest of his career.

In 1913 Charles A. Beard struck at the traditional veneration of the Constitution as inviolable, perfect, almost divinely-inspired document with An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution. Delving into the personal finances of the Founding Fathers, Beard tried to show the making of the Constitution as a struggle between property and democracy. Once again this was a simplistic approach, and modern scholarship has shown many more factors at work in the Constitution-making process than Beard was willing to recognize. Nevertheless, as an assertion of the idea that politics does not take place in a vacuum the book represented a radical departure in historical writing. Hofstadter's account of Beard is sensitive and understanding, as he shows him grappling not merely with the past, but with the present as well, standing up for his beliefs even when all alone.

V.L. Parrington's Main Currents in American Thought was an attempt to discuss political ideas as found in American literature, largely portraying a struggle between democratic and aristocratic ideas. Hofstadter praises his efforts to make American literature intellectually respectable — few universities recognized it as a valid subject for instruction — and to place it in a social and political context. Nevertheless, he finds Parrington's work unbalanced, as if Parrington selected and interpreted the facts to fit his theory, rather than examining the facts first.

Despite the devastating criticisms made possible by modern scholarship, Hofstadter retains an immense respect for his subjects as historians, for their courage and imagination.

Yet Hofstadter concludes by attacking the central idea of the Progressive historians, that of conflict, as he departs from his original purpose to examine American history as a whole. The Progressives saw it as an unceasing conflict between forces of aristocracy, property and reaction and those of democracy, idealism, and "the people". Since World War II, as the theories of Turner, Beard, and Parrington have been slowly dismantled, American historians have tended towards a "consensus" interpretation, arguing that all interests and groups have been, for the most part, working towards the same goals without any deep disagreement.

While the Progressives exaggerated the depth of conflict, the consensus historians have passed over rather lightly the areas of real conflict that have existed, such as the Civil War era, the genuinely revolutionary aspects of the Revolution, and the religious and ethnic strife that, Hofstadter argues, has been a persistent factor throughout American history. Hofstadter introduces, as an alternative, the concept of comity, of which he says, "Comity exists in a society to the degree that those enlisted in its contending interests have a basic minimal regard for each other." That is, each interest recognizes the legitimacy of other interests and, even though competing, does not wish to defeat or crush the other interests. Such, for example, is the present relationship between labour and management in North American industry.

This concept of "comity" may have considerable merit as a descriptive term. However, there are limitations which may restrict its usefulness. It is probably more accurate to view American history in terms of a waxing and waning of comity than in terms of everlasting conflict or everlasting consensus. Yet, as Hofstadter admits, "Negroes have never been given a real part in the covenant of comity;" nor, for that matter, have the Indians, and the involvement of other groups, such as immigrants, is not clear. The concept of "comity" may not be broad enough to cover all the factors in American history.

The comity theory seems as if it were thought of halfway through the book. It is explained but not developed, and Hofstadter does not fully explore its implications here. Nevertheless, it is worth examining. — tony pargeter ## neo-classicist as fag?

The expression "Neo-Classicism" in most peoples minds conjures up a picture of a bunch of nude guys running around the French stock exchange, but it was not like that at all according to the Hugh Honour's "Neo-Classicism" (Pelican A978).

The movement grew up in the late eighteenth century, in the wake of the French revolution. In contrast to the decadent Rococo work that went before, the Neo-classicists strove for a "noble simplicity" rationality, stoicism.

Those of you who took highschool Latin will remember paintings in your text illustrating the great classical types like Caesar, Horatio, etc. All these are neo-classical works. In marked contrast to the historians of today, who regard the Roman government as an early version of the Mafia, the people of the eighteenth century believed that "the only way to become great is to imitate antiquity." The education of an English gentleman was not considered complete until he had visited the Eternal City.

The neo-classical movement was the first in history to have art critics — most of whom were queer. Enraptured by visions of a Greek and Roman world populated by naked youths who busied themselves with throwing the discus and otherwise exercising their freaky torsos, they went into fits of praise over the "nobility" of classical stonework.

It was a great embarrassment to all concerned when Herculaneum was dug out of volcanic ash and it was found that the male phallus was omnipresently used in sculpture as a lamp stand, good luck charm, etc. This was a little less than noble. (On the other hand, MacPherson successfully passed off his poems of "Ossian" as antique, proving, I guess, that it's easier to lie with print than pictures).

But neo-classicism was more than just hashed-over antiquity. Some brilliant contemporary painting was done by artists like Jacques-Louis David, who lived through the French Revolution and painted many subjects, including Marat assassinated in his bath. Painting of scientific phenomena was done, and Honour's book is full of many touching and natural pictures of family life.

It is interesting to note, in testament to the humanity of David (and others working in this period), that he has been simultaneously condemned by reactionaries as "a blood-stained Terrorist" and by Marxists as "a cynical betrayer of the proletariat." For an artist, there is no greater praise.

Honour's book isn't written with the dash and vigor that this review seems to suggest, but it is a solid and comprehensive view of the neo-classical period in art.

Some Frontal Lobotomies

Drugs

Because Toronto lies on open land the smog dissipates, and though you may be vaguely aware of your clouded lungs, you never feel any acute problem.

The white slave trade out of the X Restaurant is a case in point. It seems that it was organized two or three years ago by middle-aged men in business suits from "downtown", but lately the girls seem to be mostly the girlfriends of the motorcycle gang members, part-timers, who turn two or three tricks a week when their "old man" arranges it.

If the motor cyclists have taken over prostitution from the Mafia it would be interesting to know how and why the transition occurred.

But no one is saying. The cop on the beat in Yorkville talks knowledgeably about conditions in the area.

But ask him why the police have never closed down this restaurant.

"Well . . . uh . . . I don't know anything about it. I haven't been on the force very long."

A member of the Village Bar claims nothing is done about the place because "the police work hand in hand with the Mafia in Toronto."

Besides the "alleged payoff", there are several other reasons why police are said not to prosecute known criminals. One of these reasons may be control of drug traffic.

The hippy is fooliose. He may appear on the street one day carrying drugs from Vancouver, Mexico, Buffalo, L.A. or Frisco; tomorrow he will be gone and another will take his place. He may just disappear into a suburban high school where he will corrupt other kids.

If the hippies control the drug traffic, it is impossible for the police to have the situation in hand when one of the periodic public outcries comes.

However, so the story goes, if the Mafia is allowed to deal in drugs with immunity it will control the competitors — the hippies — for the police. The control of drugs will be centralized and the police will know where to look when they have to.

Hookers

When you meet a hooker you react to a stereotype. You expect a scarlet letter to be branded on her somewhere, or that she will at least show some guilt. But you are surprised by her candor. She is quite matter-of-fact about where she is headed, or coming from, and what she does there. She is equally matter-of-fact about the gang-splash she had to undergo to join the motorcycle gang, the beating she will get if she fails to meet her man when she said she would, or the two hundred dollars she must pay him if she wants to buy her freedom. It's all just part of the price you pay to be loved.

But there are clues that the hooker is not as happy as she seems in her relationship with her customer. She can't stand a show of affection from him — it's too ironic, too bitter a reminder that for some, sex is accompanied by love. She ensures that no affection comes by detaching herself from her body, making it into a machine which goes through the motions of love-making, mechanically, while she stands aside, allowing neither herself nor her client any enjoyment from the act. She, not he, makes the rules in this game. Every girl has a part of her body where she lives, from which she cannot easily detach herself. Touch this part of the girl (perhaps it is her lips) and she will show all her pain and anger — expressed, of course, as indifference.

At three a.m. the X Restaurant empties. First the motorcycle riders, then the bikers, then the hippies tumble out. The bikers head down the darkened street and the hippies mill around on the corner following them with their eyes. A motorcycle cop turns down the street, then wheels back out again onto Avenue Road. A cruiser draws up and parks. A pair of unmarked cars criss-cross in front of the place. But none of them turns down.

In a few moments the restaurant fills up again. Whatever happened, or didn't happen, has passed.

The Poor

In Toronto the poor are invisible. There are few outward symbols of class in North American society. It isn't clear which side of the tracks the poor live on; Scarborough, Forest Hill, North York all contain pockets of poverty.

The electoral riding of Rosedale contains both the very rich and the very poor. Above Bloor live University deans, publishers and psychiatrists. Below Bloor is "Cabbagetown". In every election the Liberals and Conservatives field candidates who aim their pitch above Bloor, and the NDP tries to win the votes of the Cabbagetown residents. The NDP always loses.

In this riding there are two public schools, both of them bright and new. Spruce Court Public School is, well, "functional". But Whitney Public School, about two miles north, is a showcase, with elaborate design, landscaping, decorative glazed tiles lining the walls, and modernistic playground toys.

In Cabbagetown the city has torn down the decaying houses and put up low rental apartment buildings. You would never think that these buildings are oppressive until you step inside the narrow, dark, institutional-green halls and climb the bare concrete steps between floors or ride what look like freight elevators. There are some who say that squeezing many more people into an area which was already overcrowded is not a good thing.

Lobotomies

The irrational behavior of a disturbed person is a warning that something has gone wrong in his mind, just as pain is a warning of trouble in his body. A frontal lobotomy will extinguish this behavior, but the person may never function again. — jahn best

This is one of a thousand restaurants in the area.

NOTES

What ought to be, but will not be, the last war ever is approaching its slow end. It will be an end marked by the secret, horrible deaths of unnumbered innocents, people no one outside their locales ever heard or cared about, people whose deaths, from one point of view, will be as meaningless and cruel as their lives.

Ten thousand miles away Bernstein conducts the New York Philharmonic; five hundred clever artists decorate every possible surface, including even canvases; Cunningham and Balanchine invent perfect new gestures for the human body to rehearse; Godard and Bergman and Antonioni continue to create, with larger audiences and more money than they have ever had before at their disposal; Baez and Dylan and Lightfoot and one hundred others sing sincerely, honestly, deeply about the way we really ought to feel about life, and death, and love.

Question: at what point, and how, does the ugly extrapolate into the beautiful? How can it be that war and culture co-exist, that in fact culture depends on war? Culture and war are as antithetical as flowers and manure. They are polarities which essentially have nothing in common, yet which exist at the same moment in time. Simultaneously, Joan Sutherland hits high C and a far-off village woman screams in pain; kettle drums roll as bombs fall; we watch a Warhol film of a man sleeping for eight hours, while a body lies motionless in jungle mud; Nureyev leaps in a beautiful arc as limbs hit by a grenade split and fly apart.

The historical relations of war and culture display a sad sameness. The Peloponnesian and Persian wars were times of creativity for Greek artists. Renaissance Italy was the scene of simultaneous slaughter and artistic productivity; Louis XIV's reign of wars was graced by the activities of two of France's greatest writers, Moliere and Racine. And the regimes of Hitler and Stalin, which were times of strange honesty and perhaps originality in that these rulers tried to resolve the war-culture antithesis by suppressing culture, ultimately failed in this attempt. German artists (Grosz, Beckmann, Mann) emigrated, while Russian artists either died (in droves), or produced in secret, or under official harassment (Prokofieff, Pasternak).

But throughout history, whatever the arrangements have been between the ministers of wars and artists, whether the latter were pensioned or despised, culture in some form or other has persisted side by side with war.

It doesn't matter what form art has taken in its milieu of war. From one point of view there is no difference in the way one reacts to, say, Picasso's Guernica, and a Byzantine Madonna, despite the fact that the artists' intentions in each case are in one way totally different. Let us posit that the Byzantine intends to produce joy, and Picasso anguish. Nevertheless beneath these intentions there is another one which is basically the same in each case — it is an aesthetic intention. Guernica is as admirably organized, as skilfully controlled, as the most serene, non-engaged, mystical Byzantine work. Picasso in other words makes us admire him even while we are saddened by his work. It is the same with all artists of protest: Francis Bacon, Goya, Shostakovitch, Lichtenstein, Rabelais, Beethoven, Shakespeare. The human mind cannot help admiring what makes it shudder. If we really thought Lear or Goya's war drawings were ugly, we would destroy every available copy of their works. Instead, we proliferate them.

ART

Miss McNulty is exhibiting her paintings in the foyer of the OCE building. Next Tuesday Gerard Bourlier's paintings are being exhibited in Alumni Hall, Victoria College. The show will last until February 25th.

Mario Amaya gets installed as the curator of the Art Gallery of Ontario next Thursday. Mr. Amaya, who was visiting Andy Warhol and got winged when he was shot, will answer questions about his appointment and the upcoming "Rembrandt and His Pupils" exhibition.

THEATRE

You probably don't like musicals, and your definition of theatre might be confined to O'Keefe Centre and Royal Alex professionalism, but you might make an exception for The Fantasticks, a Theatre Mickities production at St. Michael's College.

The Fantasticks is perfectly suited for amateur production. There's a minimum of stage setting, characters, and complexity. Simplicity is the key. No Camelot facade necessary.

It's a story about the girl next door, the boy next door, and the door. Props cardboard moon, wooden swords.

theatrical costumes — are all taken from one box by a deaf mute, who performs the Puck-like role of setting up the inner stage for the lovers' fantasy.

The Mickities, directed by Patricia Haber, fill their roles admirably in handling the music and choreography. The Fantasticks is a good musical not because of acting or plot or meaning, but because of music. You probably know the song "Try to Remember" (all about September and reminiscence and stuff). Yes, it's sentimental, but it's a tender, beautiful ballad, and it frames a score of lively, comic songs.

The tempo is swift, and, although the pace sags a bit in the middle, it starts and ends well.

David Warrack sings a fine baritone as the narrator and comes up with some strong acting. He moves through dancing and dying with vigorous precision. Carol Strickland as The Girl, and Stephen Macdonald as The Boy are quite adequate in their singing and acting roles.

The Fantasticks is unabashed romanticism, but its lightness saves it from the unwanted extra spoonful of sugar of musicals like The Sound of Music.

It's a play to be seen and the Mickities present a production worth seeing.

Four reps elected to committee

Sociology students elected four representatives Tuesday to a newly formed 12 man staff-student committee to study department policy and structure.

John McKay (I Scar), Robert Thomas (I Erin), Leslie Cornish (III UC), Tom Regan (III SMC) topped the 10-candidate slate.

The graduate representatives were chosen earlier, Arnold Rockman, Jim Turk.

Of eligible voters there was a 95 per cent turnout at Erindale, a 45 per cent turnout at Scarborough, and only a 10 per cent turnout on the St. George Campus.

End first year phys ed demand women

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

Compulsory physical education classes for first year women at University of Toronto may soon become a thing of the past.

For many years freshmen women have complained about the fact that they must take two hours a week of physical education classes or pay a fine of $50. If they do not pass a compulsory swim test, one of two hours must be a class in swim instruction.

This fall, one student decided to do more than complain. In late October, Irene Bowman (1 UC) began circulating a petition to end compulsory women's physical education.

"This whole matter is very shocking to me," she said, in an interview last night. "I came to university with the idea that I would be able to make decisions for myself and I find them still being made for me."

"Even some instructors in the Benson Building feel that physical education should not be compulsory," she added.

"The philosophy of education has changed. Someone who has been made to do a sport won't get anything out of it," commented Joanne O'Sullivan, PHE SAC representative.

"If they re-vamp the program, make it voluntary and allow upperclass women to participate, it will probably be more successful," she said.

The Women's Athletic Association is presently circulating a questionnaire to the 2500 freshmen women to obtain their opinions on the compulsory physical education courses.

Miss A. Hewett, directress of the Benson Building, home of women's athletics, said she did not know what would happen if compulsory physical education were dropped.

She felt that dropping the compulsory aspect "might hurt the physical education program."

"I'd like to hear everyone's opinion before I form my own," Miss Hewett said.

If there is overwhelming support from the female student body in favour of abolishing compulsory physical education the "staff would evaluate the support, and how it was obtained, and take into consideration the student opinion," Miss Hewett said.

"We are not adverse to listening to students," she added.

One problem which would have to be dealt with by the administration is how to reorganize the department's staff if classes were not compulsory and attendance dropped off.

The pros and cons will be discussed at a general meeting at 1 p.m. today in the Debates Room of Hart House. SAC endorsed the move for abolition two weeks ago.

Continental Can strike needs help

Student power is just a farce if students are not interested in the problems of society; says Alberto DiGiovanni (II SMC)

"It is important to show which side we are on," he said.

That's why he wants students to join in a mass picketing of a strikebound Toronto plant early Monday morning.

"I don't think SAC has done enough to keep up a students-workers alliance, and I hope we concentrate on this more in the second term."

The Canadian Union of Operating Engineers, which began the Continental Can Co. strike Jan. 6th, is entirely Canadian, and has been having trouble getting other union support. DiGiovanni says international unions are not supporting them because they are Canadian.

He invited all students to be at Continental Can, on the corner of Commissioner and Logan Sts. Monday at 6:30 a.m.; or to meet at Sid Smith at 6 a.m. for a car ride to the plant.

Regina students sue for fees

REGINA (CUP) — The Regina Student Council has begun legal action against the University of Sask. administration to get $4,000 in union dues.

The council was also seeking an injunction Thursday to stop the administration from turning the fees directly back to individual students.

Three councilors, including the council president, resigned in protest against a move to restrict students' voting franchise to those who had paid their fees on a voluntary basis.

CONTEST

Et tu, Brute?

Address all entries to "Contest", Varsity sports. The decision of the judges is ithyphallic.

Rookie fencers battle for ranking

There is not a grading scheme in Fencing so we re-sort to the next best thing. This Novice Foil, the use of the practice sword, sorts out the stylist, the fighter and leaves behind those still re-luctant to hit (riposte) back.

This year, Professor Hen-ney (Canadian Olympic Coach) has moulded the par-ticular styles of the long, the short and the left handed in his wonderfully fluent man-ner.

In the Hart House Fencing Salle over the last two weeks, 17 rookies have battled their way till only five remained. M. Duthie (fifth), the tallest fencer found his reach did not help against the persistent attacker. Attack, parry, counter riposte on it went and amazingly the judges had no difficulty seeing the hits.

A. Lee (2nd), Steve Jorgensen (4th) and O. Wong (3rd), all two victories, have been blooded on the Varsity Team but found their compatriots not overawed but ever ready to say "have at you".

Perhaps it was this competion between themselves that allowed J. Ho to slip through undefeated with four victories. Well done — all finalists, let's see you all on the Varsity team if not this year, next year.

BOXING AT HART HOUSE

Forget the mismatch on the hockey screen Saturday night!

Come on out to Hart House and see a sport that has ex-isted since man first toothed a brush and chalked dirty pic-tures on his cave.

Boxing — amateur boxing, not to be confused with that crummy, professional, George Chuvalo's umpteenth comeback, sort of thing.

Royal Military College in-vade Hart House Saturday night for a twelve bout card against the U of T mittmen. The two teams, annual rivals for the past ten years, always put on a good show and this year promises to be no excep-tion.

Both Blues and RMC have three men left over from their 1968 boxing squads.

For Varsity, Len Brown (140 lb.), Rick Smith (145 lb.) and Mike D'Ornellas (155 lb.) fought in the dim past.

Each bout consists of three two minute rounds.

BLUES HOST GUELPH AFTER BE(LITTLE)ING WARRIORS

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity hockey Blues will indulge in a bit of luxury this evening when they participate in a home game at Varsity Arena. University of Guelph Gryphons will be the visitors for Tom Watt and his unit who are back on top of the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League following Wednesday's 5-4 win over University of Waterloo Warriors in the latter's home barn (er, ice hockey palace).

Blues could play a total of 36 games this year if they advance to the Canadian national finals yet only 10 of these are scheduled to be staged at home. Life for the time this season has consisted of one road trip after another (Blues are currently in the midst of a series of four consecutive away weekends) and the effect of the excessive travel has shown up in several of their on-the-ice efforts.

Blues will leave for Windsor right after this evening's game and will face U of W Lancers tomorrow afternoon.

LITTLE HOT

In past seasons, the role of Varsity goaltender has featured benefits similar to those inherent in the role of Vice-President of the United States. In either case, actual selection and mistakes made in office were the major sources of publicity.

But this season Blues' two puck-stopping incumbents — Tom Little and Adrian Watson — have suddenly assumed the roles of VIP's to the winning cause. And, this was never more evident than Wednesday night when Little was "Premier Etoile" in Blues' revenge of an earlier 3-2 setback by Warriors.

Playing before a hanging-from-the-rafters crowd of 2500 screaming Waterloo partisans, Blues methodically picked apart the Waterloo defenses in building up a 5-1 lead by the early minutes of the third period.

Poul Laurent (8) scores eventual winning goal in Blues' big 5-4 victory over Waterloo on Wednesday night. Laurent stole puck behind and to left of net, skated in front and pushed shot into uncovered short side. Beaten gooler Arlon Popkey doesn't know where to look.

However, three successive minor penalties put the visitors into the soup when Warriors took full advantage to score three times within a five minute interval. On two occasions, Waterloo clicked within five seconds of when the misdemeanour was assessed.

Then Little stepped in, did his thing and effectively killed the Warrior comeback, making several saves that were disgustingly (for Waterloo) magnificent (for Toronto). In all, Warriors had 25 shots on goal in that final period and 41 over the whole game. Blues mustered 31 volleys at Arlon Popkey in the home cage.

Paul Laurent led the scoring with two goals (his 17th and 18th of the schedule) and an assist. Lenny Burman, Mike Boland and Brian Tompson had the other markers.

Ron Robinson with two and Gary Robertson and Rick Bacon hit for Warriors.

Certainly the most puzzling aspect of the game was the fact that the final score and shots on goal did not jive with the overall play. While Blues by no means ran their opponents into the ice, they did seem to hold a fairly wide margin in play except when shorthanded.

Several conclusions are in order on the basis of what went on in the outdated Waterloo rink. First, Blues have both the individual and collective talent to go all the way this year. However, they will probably need to employ all of it if they are to accomplish such a feat.

Second, Warriors are much improved over their counterparts of the past two seasons. They are a technically superior team and possess a better mental attitude. In past days, they would have folded quickly after falling behind by four goals. They could well have won this game.

The two teams will play the deciding match of their best-of-three series on Wednesday February 19 at Varsity Arena. A first place finish will be the prize that evening.

GYMNASTICS

The Varsity Gymnastics Team journeys to Kingston tomorrow for their final competition prior to the February 15th OQAA championships.

Blues meet MacMaster, McGill and host Queens in this annual invitational exhibition meet.

Coach Julio Roncon expects the strength of all-around competitors Brian McVey, Al Forest and John Kortright to once again dominate. It was the performance of these three which led U of T to a convincing win at RMC two weeks ago.

Larry Michaelis (free calisthenics and box horse) and Arthur Stein (pommel horse) give the squad the depth of a fourth competitor on three of the six events. Carl Sloane is also expected to make the trip.

Dribblers face new-grain Gryphons

By RICH PYNE

A reinvigorated Varsity cage side faces an equally reinvigorated Guelph Gryphon quintet at York tomorrow night in an attempt to ease out of the SIBL basement.

Rolling Gryphons has been about as easy as tax evasion but their 95-93 win over first place Western Wednesday serves notice that their crop this year is of a higher strain than the cabbage they've shown up with in their past four winless seasons. Newcomer John McKendry, who dropped in two dozen for the atavistic throw-backs did most damage to Mustangs who got 31 from former bench-warmer Dave McGuffin.

In any event Blues will have a rougher ride than they did in their earlier 84-74 victory in Guelph.

Nevertheless Varsity's flawless 84-77 upset of Roberts Wesleyan of N.Y. at the same hour of the Guelph exploit gives the home Blues equally as much momentum.

Better-dressed and traveling with women, the American team appeared somewhat less than sharp in the opening period when Toronto shook them up with an early 16 point lead. However, the women exhorted their traveling companions back into contention and by 20 minutes the U.S. offering cut Blues lead to six, 41-35.

Big reasons for Varsity's strong come-on was a terrific first half effort by Larry Trafford who exploited his position at the head of Blues' half-court press for 16 points.

The large bench used by McManus gave the home team some last-half legs so obviously missing in their loss last week to Windsor. Aggressive play by Peter Burton and John Hadden (both ways) and a closing rush of points from Bruce Dempster, converted to forward for the evening, kept Blues a safe way out in front until Wesleyan got the hots in the closing minutes and climbed within two points. With a minute left, the Wesleyan continuing to force turnovers, McManus strategically dropped Dempster back to guard. There were no more turnovers after that and Blues coasted home.

While the American team was, for an American team, medium rare at best, they were at least as good as anything in the home loop and Blues showed themselves well prepared for a head-on-ner with the not so lowly Gryphons tomorrow.

SCORING: VARSITY: Trafford 22, Hadden 20, Burton 15, Dempster 15, Crouter 4, MacDonald 2, Evans 2, Katz 2, MacNaughton 2, Feldman, Slater, Betcherman
WESLEYAN: Curtis 20, Evans 19, Kimbale 12, Crowell 11, Scribner 9, Roach 4, Miller 2, Rambo 2, Wood 1, Case, Page.

Soy there! Remember when you went to public school? Wasn't it a drag? You had to line up at the doors when the bell rang and then march in and sit at your desk all day. Today, however, it's much more fun, specially with this "un-structured" education stuff. I can sit on the floor all day and read comic books. Bet you couldn't! If you got caught with a comic book betcha you got the strop! Ho! See centre.

Lakoff report critical of Poli Ec

Students working towards doctorate degrees in political economy at the University of Toronto can expect greater freedom, more money and better supervision if the recommendations of a department of political economy special committee report are implemented.

They can also expect tougher requirements for entry into the graduate courses.

The report, prepared by Professors P. W. Fox, S. A. Lakoff and P. H. Russell, was commissioned last October and released Saturday.

The report says that the ratio of doctoral degrees granted to candidates admitted is too low, and suggests several reasons.

"Some of the candidates admitted may be of inadequate quality. A number may be delayed because of insufficient financial aid." The report also lists apprehension about the comprehensive exam and inadequate supervision over students who are behind schedule with their dissertations as reasons for the low ratio.

Other areas criticized by the report include:

- a reluctance on the part of the department to adopt methods from the behavioralist school of thought dominant in the United States. The report notes that this may put students pursuing their studies in the U.S. at a disadvantage, but also commends the department for keeping itself "isolated from the more virulent strains of behaviouralism and from the rush toward an indiscriminate preoccupation with quantitative methods."
- a lack of courses in areas such as political sociology or metropolitan government. The committee recommend strengthening such areas and building a strong Comparative Government course on Africa
- little personal contact between students and professors. The commissioners write, "It is a particularly serious issue at the graduate level where, for the committed student, the educational environment should be closer to the ideal of a "community of scholars."

• inflexible requirements which prevent the student from following a course of his own choosing. The report suggests several possible ways of overcoming this including allowing the student to draw up his own course of study in consultation with a staff advisor, and more regular supervision and assistance in selecting a dissertation topic.

The report recommends that standards for admission to an M.A. course be raised from the present 70 per cent to "a high second class average."

For the M.A. Ph.D. program the report suggests a maximum of 20 candidates be accepted each year

SID SMITH "POLITICAL" LOBBY CONTINUES

Passivity passe in Germany: Student movement leader

By SUSAN REISLER

U of T police and administration officials watched closely Friday as more than 300 students crowded into the lobby of Sid Smith and lined the balconies to hear a German student leader speak.

Until this week the lobby was closed to all political activities, permission for use being granted only in rare exceptions.

Last Monday members of campus groups moved into the area without official permission and pledged to turn the lobby into a "free speech area".

They say there is no other place available on campus for this kind of activity.

Robin Ross, U of T vice-president, said after Friday's rally that the university wasn't planning any action against the groups using the area.

As long as fire regulations weren't being broken he was in agreement with the "free speech area".

The speaker, Karl Dietrich Wolff, co-chairman of the German Social Student Federation, spoke on the problems of the German Movement.

Standing on a table-top Wolff said, "Every move to self organize is destroyed."

Preventative arrests have been legalized by the coalition government

The situation has become parallel to the Nazi era, said Wolf.

More than half the universities in Germany are on "active strike." This means that the students, instead of sitting around, have organized counter courses and are continuing in education.

Repression has been mounting permanently against the students. At first there were passive sit-ins.

"Now that kind of passivity is passe in West German," Wolf said.

"We are not going to be like the Jews for them so they can break us down."

Wolff's message for Canadian students was to get Canada out of NATO.

At present in West Germany Canadian NATO forces are being trained to take part in the internal struggles and work with the German police, he claimed.

Ethnic students pressured to retain their identity

By DARIA ANTONYSHYN

Ethnic students on campus are faced with a mating-dating complex, a research sociologist told a packed audience Wednesday night at Hart House.

"There is the same pressure on the Ukrainian student as, for example, on the Jewish student, to maintain his ethnic identity," said Elizabeth Wagenheim. She was addressing 250 Ukrainian students on the topic of "ghetto mentality."

Jewish students, she said, continue to keep to themselves until the second or third generation after immigration. How much of this is voluntary is a good question.

German students are quicker to associate with other groups and thus assimilate more readily, she suggested.

"The degree of ghetto mentality within each group influences their behavior and participation in campus life. Thus a student who breaks his socio-ethnic contact would be challenging the validity of his group's values."

The attitude itself is transferred to children from parents who have lived under ghetto conditions themselves.

At present, Toronto's "Ukrainian press and radio is controlled by the middle class newcomers thus all the young get the same interpretation of values".

What happens when an ethnic student feels 'compelled to retain his identity, and also wants to associate freely with other Canadians?

"We can never hold on to what we started with since there is an impingement of the outside world," she replied.

No NLF victory without world solidarity

By TOM WALKOM

Anti-Vietnam protests in Toronto are "an aid to the Viet Cong struggle," say National Liberation Front spokesmen.

Hoang Bich Son and Nguyen Van Ba, head and first secretary respectively of the NLF Mission in Cuba, were speaking Friday at a press conference in the Lord Simcoe Hotel. The pair are on a Canadian tour sponsored by, among others, SAC president Steve Langdon and Ontario Federation of Labour leader David Archer.

After a brief address stressing the intention and ability of the NLF to expel the Americans, the pair answered questions with Ba acting as interpreter. Neither of the diplomats has served in the field.

Anti-war protests, Son said show the unity of Canadians against the Vietnam war.

"Without the solidarity of the people of the world," he continued, "we cannot achieve victory."

Is Canada complicit in the American war effort? The Canadian people, Son replied, should "know best about this."

In spite of the Paris peace talks, the NLF will continue fighting in South Vietnam, said Son.

"Paris is for talking," he went on, "but to win we must drive out the Yankees."

Rev. William Newell of the Christian Missionary Alliance attempted to plead for the release of five American missionaries captured by the Viet Cong, but was barred from the conference.

His plea was relayed by letter to the diplomats by a newsman. The NLF representatives replied that their policy is to "release all prisoners."

Rev. Newell said that many requests have been made to the NLF, but the CMA has received no reply.

The two NLF spokesmen will address a public meeting at Massey Hall tonight at 8 15 p.m.

AFTER 3 DAYS SITTING

Community Chest busted

A three-day mass protest against Varsity editorial policy ended at 9 p.m. last night with the arrest of 25 unruly demonstrators who were sitting-in at the newspaper offices on St. George St.

The protestors, who face sentences of up to five years for trespassing on private property, began their sit-in Friday afternoon objecting to inadequate coverage of their campaign to raise funds for the University of Toronto Community Chest.

They said Varsity editor Paul MacRae had promised them a page one feature in Friday's issue. The story was then moved to page three and ran in a shortened form.

The Community Chest is a newly-organized activist group whose announced aims are to raise $10,000 on the U of T campus before the end of 1969. The money, they say, will go to support research into muscular dystrophy, the Hospital for Sick Children, the Heart Fund and the United Appeal. They do not plan to support the Varsity.

Varsity editor Paul MacRae said last night he was not against "peaceful protests" but added, "We have a responsibility to our advertisers and readers to see that the newspaper appears on time."

He said he was sorry he had to have the demonstrators arrested, especially in view of the severe penalties involved. But, he explained, "We cannot allow the wishes of a minority to interfere with organizational efficiency."

"Otherwise, we have anarchy."

The Community Chest group will hold a meeting today at 1 p.m. in room 1022 of Sidney Smith Hall to discuss future plans.

Friday's protest was the second in two days. Thursday, the Community Chest force occupied The Varsity office for over an hour, barricading MacRae in his office. It was then the promise for a page one story was made.

MacRae appeared worn and haggard after spending much of the three-day occupation pleading with the demonstrators to end their protest.

Standing outside the old three-story building and speaking through a megaphone, MacRae told the occupiers, "Reason, not force, is the means to change The Varsity!"

Finally, the beleaguered editor offered the protestors several inches on page one, but the offer was refused.

"We want all of page one, and a promise of no reprisals, or we stay," one demonstrator snorted.

MacRae then reluctantly called in the police to clear the building and arrest the protestors.

The demonstrators will appear in provincial court today for arraignment before magistrate Branislav Chrtieu.

Students at University of Victoria have elected as president Norman (papa) Wright, he's 46.

A college drop in, after 30 years absence from formal education, Mr. Wright ran on a liberal platform.

His nearest opponent, 20-year-old Drew Schroeder lost by only 23 votes.

Papa Wright's only beef on being elected was, that six of the other posts have gone to conservatives, with only two other liberals besides himself on the council.

"Papa", as he is known to his three children, earns his living playing the drums, and it's our guess that he'll make a pretty swingin president.

Democratizing our high schools: "the real issues haven't been raised"

By KEN STONE

Ken Stone graduated from the University of Toronto last year with an honors degree in political science.

I am disappointed, though not surprised, that the Jan. 8 Varsity editorial on the extension of the high school year is liberal bullshit.

I know The Varsity wants democracy in the schools and an improvement in the quality (form and content) of education. But you will be screwed by the Establishment and you will lead others to be screwed because (by your liberal editorials) you simply do not understand the root causes of such situations as the year extension. In short, Varsity editorials lack a radical analysis.

Let me take as an example exactly what was written on the extension: "The important issue here is not that Education Minister William Davis has lengthened the school year but that high school students were not consulted in the change".

Now by writing such a statement, you have obscured all the issues. You do not answer the question why, in 1969, the Department of Education has decided to lengthen the school year. You do not explain why there is no democracy in the schools. You do not go to the root causes of the impoverishment of high school so-called "education".

I'll take them one at a time.

HIGH SCHOOL EXTENSION

The high school extension is the response of the Ontario government to the problem of unemployment. This analysis is based on two assumptions. First, the government has an interest in maintaining "relatively full employment" (note: not absolutely full employment). Secondly, one of the main functions of the schools is to keep students off the labour market.

The government has taken an interest in employment since the days of the depression economist Keynes, who argued for governmental fiscal control of the economy. Today, the Economic Council of Canada lists "relatively full employment" as one of Canada's first social priorities. The schools first took on the function of withholding labour after the child labour laws were passed. The vast growth of the public school system (and indeed the whole adolescent culture) can be traced from the passage of that law.

KEN STONE

Today, there is an unemployment problem in Canada, both short term and long term. And the high schools are about to be used in their labour withholding role. Professor John Rountree of York University estimates the extension to be the equivalent of 10,000 man years of jobs in Ontario that would have been held by high school students but are now held by the unemployed, and now they're talking about a full-year operation!

So to advise high school students that the extension of democracy is shortsighted and possibly damaging.

DEMOCRACY IN THE SCHOOLS

Of course it is obvious that there is no democracy in the high schools (or for that matter the universities) and that this has some relevance to the extension. However, it is more important to understand why there is no democracy.

There are a number of apparent types of high schools. There are schools that specialize in one stream — technical, vocation, or academic. Then there are mixed schools. And there are schools in middle class and working class areas. Upon closer examination, however, one finds that the single stream technical or vocational schools are located in or for working class areas (Castle Frank, Brockton, Bickford).

One finds the mixed schools in mixed areas. (Bathurst Heights kids from the south side of Lawrence are in the academic stream unless they are girls and in the vocation stream — it's a man's world; kids from the north side, a low cost housing development, are in the technical stream). The all-academic schools are in all-middle class areas (Forest Hill, Richview, Lawrence Park).

Once inside the schools (if one can get inside) striking operating differences appear. For instance, at Forest Hill, an all-academic school, which I attended, twelve and thirteen do not have to come to school or go to class. Girls can wear jeans. School rules are rarely enforced. They don't have to be. The student council is fairly autonomous (it sponsored the organization of student council types versus the extension).

At Bathurst Heights, a mixed school, a student was put out in the halls for six months for having long hair. He left on his sixteenth birthday.

At Castle Frank, a vocational school near Regent Park, the expulsion of a student with long hair sparked an extended walkout. So far, one-third of the students who were out have been expelled by the principal. Another one-third have quit.

Statistically, it can be shown that working class kids end up in the technical-vocational stream, that middle class kids end up in the academic stream, but that a high percentage of girls from either class can end up in the vocational-commercial stream.

What I am trying to show, then, is that German students are quicker to associate with other groups than the amount of democracy used loosely for participatory democracy, degrees of discipline, feedback, etc.) varies directly according to class background.

The children of the rich get a taste of decision-making because someday they'll presumably be important decision-makers. Working class kids learn to obey. I mean, why give freedom and decision-making to a kid who's going to be working in a factory? (Castle Frank didn't even have a student council till after the walkout).

But even in the middle class schools and at university there is not democracy.

Why? Because ours is not a democratic society. And I'm not talking about bullshit liberal concepts of democracy — representative Trudeau or student councils that one gets to vote for every year or five. I mean democracy in the Aristotelian sense — rule for the people.

In Canada, the rulers do not rule for the people. The rulers, those who control the economy — the private businessmen who aren't even Canadian — and their executive committees — the federal and provincial governments, rule in their own interests. You can find them in the Board of Governors.

Anyone who can pollute whole inland oceans, anyone who can cause Eskimo women to die at the average age of 25, anyone who keeps 18 per cent of Maritime children in a state of malnutrition, anyone who can drop napalm on children or run schools like Castle Frank is not a democrat. He is a tyrant. And he should be smashed.

No, our schools are not democratic. Isn't it surprising?

THE IMPOVERISHMENT OF HIGH SCHOOL EDUCATION

Like the degrees of democracy, just discussed, the quality of education varies according to class background. Essentially, the schools socialize everybody into the values of society. They train everyone, on the basis of class background, for their future roles.

Stated oversimplistically, the quality of education in our schools is rotten because the quality of life in our society is rotten. Look at the ugly buildings, the crowded dirty city, the few public amenities for the people (parks, public washrooms, hospitals, subways as opposed to expressways), the greedy self-centered people we produce, the male chauvinists (the female submissives), the lack of community.

Our society is a product of having let the means of producing wealth into private hands. The results, aside from the maldistribution of that wealth and power and the conflicts over its control, has been the ideology of individualism and pessimism, the ideology that says men are born, not made, greedy, that it will always be thus, and that the survival of the greediest, most ruthless and self-centered, rather than a collective effort by the community, creates "progress". Until that ideology is eradicated, all the liberal aspirations for democracy and quality of life might as well be forgotten in the context you propose them.

If you are really interested in democracy and the quality of life, let's talk about socialism.

on hiring and firing

Who should hire and fire university professors? Faculty alone, or students and faculty together?

The issue came up at Friday's meeting of the Commission on University Government and it's bound to be touchy.

The faculty don't want students on the appointment committees. They think academic freedom will be jeopardized, and fear students won't recognize the excellence of a particular colleague.

These fears are groundless. First, academic freedom is protected now by tenure, which is granted after several years depending on academic rank. Tenured professors are almost impossible to fire. Before tenure, the university can fire a man simply by refusing to renew his contract. This isn't likely to change with students on the hiring committees.

Second, the faculty members of a joint board, because of their experience, are likely to carry considerably more moral weight in judging and choosing new staff than students.

But students still have legitimate interests and an important function on appointment boards — after all, students are the ones being taught.

They are likely to weigh teaching experience heavily, counterbalancing faculty's interest in research qualifications and collegiality and the administration's concern with insitutional prestige.

In this way we may avoid falling into a situation common at universities like Harvard, where top staff are hired for prestige and research duties and never see an undergraduate.

Students could also prevent the firing of an excellent teacher who doesn't publish enough to satisfy his superiors, or a professor whose views are too "extreme" for an Establishment-oriented university.

Even more important, one on the hiring committees, students will have increased control over the kind of university we become.

They may decide to hire more professors whose opinions differ radically from the accepted lines of "scholarship", teachers who think the university should take an active part in reforming the society at large.

other side

The Varsity so rarely prints establishment-oriented letters that Wednesday's effort signed "Forestry Students" (all of them?) came as a surprise. Please hear a word from the revolutionary-activist side of this issue.

The letter claims that if we don't leave the forest to the timber barons "successional influences occur, whereby decadence and deterioration prevail." Now why, really, do these "future foresters" want to cut down the trees in Algonquin Park? For the same reason that their future employers have always wanted to cut down all the trees in the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence area. To make a fast buck. A rather short-sighted view, of course, because pretty soon there won't be any trees left.

A few questions for future foresters. First of all, howcum the early explorers reported straight, healthy 300 foot pines growing all over Canada in the days before "timber harvesting" was invented? Secondly, howcum so much of the present activity in Algonquin Park centres around removing yellow birches, which don't reseed themselves when harvested? And finally, howcum we do not, indeed, modernize our practices to the European standard, by demanding that trees cut be replaced on at least a one-to-one basis?

Let's see a few hands raised in Forest Management class tomorrow morning.

Godoo Speirs
(S.G.S.)

Sixty-one forestry students signed the petition. Last year about 135 students were enrolled in the course. The number was left off the letter by mistake. Ed.

winter replies

Please allow me to comment on your interpretation of parts of the recent G.S.U. survey. The Graduate Student at the University of Toronto 1968.

The writer of the Wednesday editorial apparently did not read page one to see when the data was collected (April 1968). The statements should only be evaluated in context.

Last year's Executive under John Bradford made a terrible mess of graduate affairs. Yet it was strongly supported by the Varsity and Random. The Executive hired an unqualified man, who happened to be the President's roommate, as an Educational Consultant at $7,000 a year (with an extra $2,000 travel grant). After five months work this man had produced nothing and had taken up additional employment. The Bradford executive gave away money to draft-dodgers and hippies, and loaned money to people who were never seen again. Thus the statement, "The G.S.U. has been completely irrelevant to my life and I expect no improvement", should be read in the light of the recent actions of the Bradford Executive. It is surely a misuse of the power of the press to attribute this statement as a criticism of an Executive operating a year later!

Surely the editors of the campus newspaper are familiar with such recent events? Your taunts are either based on a deplorable lack of information, or on a deliberate desire to misinform. The latter could be nearer to the truth. Your columns have neglected to report that the Varsity

Public Relations Committee has accepted G.S.U. complaints about continual bias in reporting graduate affairs, and has settled our grievances in a way financially satisfactory to both parties.

Furthermore, the comments about the G.S.U. building, "that rare thing — an old house without charm", were written before the complete repainting and before refurbishing a part of the building. The remainder of the building is now being renovated for the full time liquor licence.

I would like to add two more points.

The Executive decided to run an opinion poll of its members as part of the G.S.U. rebuilding after the Bradford era. The Executive hopes to find out members opinions on the G.S.U., the Graduate School, and the University. Some of the comments were favourable, some were unfavourable, but both were carefully analyzed by us, and both were published. You realize that the Students Administrative Council has never run any tests of opinion. It can not direct any programmes according to campus opinion as it is unwilling, or afraid, to spend a small amount of money. The total cost of the G.S.U. survey, including printing, postage, programming and 1,000 copies, was $800. Expensive fiascos like Tent City cost S.A.C. $2,500.

The second point is our election promise, to "provide a mechanism by which graduate students can opt out of the organization if they so desire". There has been no request for a refund of G.S.U. fees. The only call for voluntary G.S.U. fees has come from the undergraduates writing for the Varsity. Indeed I think even the most biased observer will agree that the G.S.U. has become extremely relevant to graduate students' needs and opinions. The only written complaints received by the G.S.U. Executive were over the alleged pornography in the St. George Drago (Over which the Executive has no control), and about a particularly virulent editorial that, among other things, equated the Varsity's deliberate manipulation of the facts to piggery.

no thanks!

Al DiGiovanni's plea for students to aid the Continental Can Co strike is inane. I am sure that a thunderous majority of students will see fit to stay away in droves to "show which side we are on". How naive we would be to picket without knowing why the union has struck or what the management's position is. And why do Canadian unions abstain from assisting the strikers? Pulling students on bandwagons travelling with unclear motives and directions is a dangerous practice, Mr. DiGiovanni.

It is too bad that it took such an insignificant issue as this to show you that "student power is just a farce". Thanks for your invitation to picket, but if I and my 25,000 fellow students aren't there, start without us.

Sir Dan Dean supports fully student control of the residence

The dean of men at University College last week laid the groundwork for virtual student control of the Sir Daniel Wilson residence.

Dean E. M. Howarth told students at dinner Thursday night that he would give his full personal support to any recommendations they wanted to make concerning the rules of the residence.

The only restriction, Howarth says is that the rules do not violate the laws or the Peter Blanchard (IV UC) vice-president of the residence committee speculated that the recent flare-up at New College and the publication of an article on Trinity's lack of residence rules had much to do with his decision.

"The problem will be deciding how the rules will be formulated," Blanchard said. A plebiscite of all members or a new committee may be two ways of getting new rules, suggested Blanchard.

Open (but quiet) weekends for Sir George

George's Montreal building to stage a brief occupation of the council's offices.

The students demanded council members resign because they were unwilling to "confront" the administration. The short-lived occupation was ended because it was felt it would confuse issues.

Friday the council decided not to take a vote on a motion calling on the protestors to abandon the computer centre as a gesture of good will.

As the student occupation enters its sixth day, the lines of conflict are becoming clearer.

An open meeting of 800 students voted Friday to support the chief demand — that a committee agreeable to all sides be set up to examine charges of racial discrimination against a biology professor. They want the present five-professor hearing committee disbanded.

In a special meeting of the teaching association Saturday faculty voted "full confidence" in the administration and the impartiality of the hearing committee. The association represents only half of the 400 faculty at Sir George.

Support for the occupation has come from student councils at McGill, Laval and Université de Montreal.

Occupying students have called on outside supporters to "pressure" the administration into meeting their demands, which include no reprisals for the occupation. One spokesman called for direct action, "including other occupations, to escalate the conflict. He reiterated the occupants' determination to stay put until demands are met. There are some 300 students — black and white — holding the centre.

Erroll Thomas, one of three blacks charged with extortion, forcible detention and conspiracy was remanded Friday to a preliminary hearing Feb. 14. The charges arose from an incident in vice-principal John O'Brien's office two weeks ago when black students allegedly forced him to sign an apology of a confusion with a letter he sent to the accused biology professor.

$2 FEE RAISE REJECTED

SAC has to trim budget $20,000

By PAUL MACRAE

The U of T Chorus, weekend exchanges and Random magazine may have their funds cut off entirely, and other activities could be curtailed, as the Students Administrative Council prepares to slice $20,000 from next year's budget.

That's the word from SAC Finance Commissioner Bob Barkwell. The reason? SAC expects 90 per cent of graduate students not to pay the voluntary $12 SAC fee next year, leaving a gaping $40,000 hole in the SAC finances.

Part of the vacuum will be filled by enrollment increases in 1969-70, so that Barkwell expects an income of $243,000, down only a separate grant from the Graduate Students Union for these services.

The motion, which would have increased SAC dues to $14 a head for members, was tabled "indefinitely".

Even Barkwell has had second thoughts about the motion.

"This probably isn't a good time for a fees increase," he explained last night. "We raised the fees a whopping amount last year (to $12 from $8), and students are too skeptical about SAC this year. A fees increase might encourage people to break up SAC."

He said the U of T Chorus, budgeted at $5,000, might have to go, followed by the Harward and Tarheel weekend exchanges, costing about $1,800. Radio Varsity's $10,000

Women claim interfac will suffer if phys-ed ended

Students Administrative Council President Steve Langdon found himself surrounded by about 40 angry women Friday at a meeting called to discuss the elimination of compulsory physical education for first year girls.

"Most of the girls were upset over SAC's call for the abolition of compulsory physical education. They feared this would jeopardize the interfaculty sports program because, they say, girls are not likely to participate in sports voluntarily.

"Unless girls are forced to take it, they will do nothing in athletics," said Mary Reynolds (III Vic). "I wouldn't have participated in interfaculty sports if I hadn't had to take phys. ed. in first year."

It was an exasperating experience for Langdon. At times it seemed as though he was conducting a tutorial in political theory.

"To me the question is whether the phys ed is so essential to the university that we must force people to take it," he said he doubted that this was so and asked "if one person doesn't want to take it why should those who do force her to take it, even if they are a majority?"

"That's idealistic garbage", declared Sharon Wilson (III Phys Ed), to loud applause. "Society is governed by majority rule."

Miss Wilson was supported by other girls. Some comments were:

- "Modern democracy is based on coercion."
- "Education is based on compulsion."
- "We want a cross-campus referendum."

"Now wait a minute", implored Langdon, "in a democracy you've got to draw the line."

abolish compulsory physical education courses. She presented it to SAC, which endorsed it last month.

"We felt we were competent to make that decision as elected representatives," said Langdon, "but if enough students oppose this policy they can force a referendum."

But the girls demanded that SAC call a referendum itself. "It's up to you to find out what students feel."

About a third of the girls at the meeting were wearing Phys Ed blazers. The girls refused to reveal how many of them were in the physical education course.

The impasse was resolved in a brilliant display of Langdonian compromise. A committee was established to study the implications and effects of ending the compulsory first year course. It is to report to SAC in three weeks and SAC will then decide whether to maintain or change its original decision.

Crack-ups philosophers' problem

By MARY LYSY

"Cracking up is a philosophical problem, not a psychological one. It will be solved by philosophers, not social scientists," psychologist Dr. K. Ferguson told an Insanity '69 audience last Thursday.

Dr. Ferguson, a consultant at the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, questioned the concept of mental illness and the value of making qualitative distinctions between different mental states.

"Mental health is the presence of happiness; mental illness is the absence," he said. "The question of happiness is one of values, and therefore a philosophical question."

Schools are in the most strategic position to influence the mental health of society, according to Dr. B. Silverman of the Ontario College of Education, because of the length of time spent in school today.

"Thus far, however, the school system has not been exercising its potential as effectively as possible."

Dr. Silverman expressed concern with the damaging effects to human dignity of the practice of segregating exceptional children. He was concerned that many students don't concentrate on learning, but on getting right answers.

Insanity '69 continues tonight with a debate on Mental Health at 7:30 p.m. in Hart House.

line between majority rule and minority rights. The rights of minorities are important in any democracy: that's why we've got a bill of rights."

Most of the girls also objected to the way SAC had decided its policy on the issue, without polling students. In October Irene Bowman (I UC) circulated a petition to

No classrooms, no rows of desks, no permanent walls, that's Dewson Street Public School, Toronto's first "unstructured" public school.

A number of other old schools in the city are taking the same step because Hall-Dennis style education can't really be done in a classroom with rows of desks. Dewson started its open space program after moving into its new $1.5 million school.

Dewson principal W. L. Birmingham, feels a great way to deal with problems is to "humanize" them. And this, he feels, is what Dewson School is all about.

"The old system worked under a fear structure. Now when a kid is late the first thing I ask him is whether he's had his breakfast," he explains.

There are no grades at Dewson, but the school's 150 children are divided into three age levels. Each floor is divided into a number of areas — a science area, a math area, a reading area, and an activity area. The school library has every modern piece of equipment from cassette tape recorders for listening to a story, to films and projectors for individual use.

Every morning each child makes out an individual time-table or "goal-sheet." He may elect to play monopoly part of the morning, do a little math, and take part in a group discussion on anthropology led by Carol McLeod, (III UC) a U of T student.

Carol is interested in education among Canadian Indian children and thinks this method of education would be especially good for the Indian culture, where the emphasis is on the individual.

The philosophy sounds great, but how do these high ideals work out in practice?

Many of the children felt they weren't learning as much as they did in the old school. "It's easier just to goof off all day." Some said it was much better when there was someone telling them what to do.

Vera Czich, 11, said she liked the old school better because "here some people just fool around and don't learn much."

Deborah Silvea says she likes it better in the new Dewson, but she doesn't think she $13,000 from this year.

But SAC president Steve Langdon wants to jump the SAC surplus by $10,000 to $30,000 next year to pay for the initial costs in setting up a 700-student housing project at College and Bathurst Sts.

That leaves about $20,000 to be trimmed.

At Wednesday's SAC meeting, Barkwell proposed a $2 levy for all students, including graduates, to pay for cross-campus services such as The Varsity, Random and Radio Varsity. This move would eliminate the need for plans to expand into FM broadcasting might also be postponed.

Other programs and policies of SAC might have to be reviewed, Barkwell said, resulting in cuts for Blue and White activities and donations to non-campus organizations.

SAC is also considering hiring a full-time director to take care of SAC's proposed housing project.

Barkwell's finance commission meets to-day at 7 p.m. in Brennan Hall at St. Mike's to start work on next year's budget.

has learned as much as she would have in the old school.

Michael Ota disagreed. A student can move ahead as fast as he is able in the new building. "Sure I'm learning more. There's nothing to get in your way."

A mentally retarded girl, who was laughed at in the old school when she couldn't answer a question, can now work quietly at her own pace.

Although each teacher tries to supervise the 25 children under her care, it is a difficult task when the kids are allowed to go anywhere on the floor. But Mrs. Louise Wayerman, who is in charge of a school newspaper published by the older children, feels that knowledge of facts is not all that important. One of the most important things she feels the children have learned is tolerance and understanding.

Particularly impressive is the stress put on field trips at Dewson. Since the fall there have been about 60 field trips — to the Museum, art gallery, the Globe and Mail, Canadian Kodak, the Royal Winter Fair, the Post Office, and the local taxidermist. Then there is the exchange with a school in Regina in which 15 children are taking part.

Community involvement plays an important part too. Parents may drop into the school at any time, and are kept up to date with happenings at the school through a monthly newsletter.

A couple of mothers from the neighbourhood even come in once or twice a week to teach cooking. At Christmas one group prepared a turkey dinner for 45 people.

Then there is the retired editor of a United Church magazine, Frances Bonwick, who is coming in to hold seminar groups on Manchuria. Mrs. I. Siegal, who is 85 years old, teaches a civics class.

The big problem at Dewson is the need for more teachers, and volunteers to pay attention to the needs of each individual child. This is where U of T students come in. Pauline Segal, (III U.C.) a psychology student, spends two hours a week at the school. She finds it interesting to see how some of the learning theories she has studied work out in practice.

She suggests more students get involved.

disputes students' place in hiring, promoting profs

By MARY BASTEDO

Will students have a voice on committees that hire and promote professors? The Commission on University Government Friday touched on one of its most contentious questions.

"As I see it, having students on the hiring and promoting committees is the only way of ensuring that teaching is regarded as important in the evaluation of a professor," contended student member Bob Rae.

"Faculty activities include more than undergraduate teaching," said Prof. Bernard Etkin. "Research and publication are also important and undergraduates are not adequately qualified to pass judgment on this."

"Students are just as rational as faculty in deferring their judgment," objected student Gary Webster. "In matters in which they felt they were not competent they would listen to their superiors."

Some faculty members thought student evaluation of professors would reduce teaching to a popularity contest.

"I've seen professors influence students so much by their personality that students don't realize they are getting misinformation," said Prof. J. S. Thompson.

"If we don't reward research we will become a sterile university," he said. "Our best people will leave."

"Scholarship and publication have become a whole ethos," protested D'Arcy Martin. "One way to get at it is to alter the rewards system."

"Students have different interests in promotion. What counts is whether a man stimulates."

Webster discussed an annual poll at Yale in which students evaluate their professors.

"The faculty almost unanimously agree with the students' evaluations," he said, "but if they had had to do it themselves they would not have been as frank."

"It's an emotional question," said Prof. Etkin. "Faculty members don't want to be judged by students on the basis of their performance."

"We're talking about people's lives and jobs," Bob Rae said. "Evaluation is essentially a brutal process. The general feeling is that evaluation by one's contemporaries is more humane than by students, but students are just as humane as other people."

The issue will form an important part of a questionnaire to be circulated to all students and faculty next month.

The questionnaire is part of an effort to "get a grassroots feeling in the areas we have to make decisions on," said Prof. L. E. Lynch.

Another part of this effort will be a series of interviews planned for the next four weeks with various people on and off campus. Tomorrow Andy Wernick, Paul Fromm, Bill Charlton and John Winter will discuss their views with CUG. Friday morning Clark Kerr, former president of the University of California at Berkeley, will appear before the committee.

Canadian gov't powerless against U.S.: Watkins

By ALF CHAITON

If Canadians knew how their sovereignty was being subverted, they would rise up in protest, economics professor Melville Watkins told Canadian and American students at a seminar yesterday afternoon.

"The public would press for action," continued Prof. Watkins, "but the government wouldn't be able to do anything because they really have no power vis-a-vis Washington." Prof. Watkins was speaking to participants in the North Carolina Tarheel exchange at Brennan Hall at St. Mike's.

History Prof. Kenneth McNaught, who also participated in the discussion, brought up the example of U.S. draft resisters and deserters to illustrate the direct influence the U.S. has on Canadian internal policy.

In the past, he said, Canada has admitted Americans who will not accept the draft. Recently, however, there has been a secret immigration department directive not to admit deserters, he said.

"This is directly contrary to Canadian immigration law and tradition," he said.

Both Prof. McNaught and Prof. Watkins doubted that anything will be done about the situation.

"In Canada," Prof. Watkins said, "I am invited to talk about 'Canadian policy'. In the U.S. I am asked to discuss 'Canadian attitudes'."

"The Americans know what's really happening. We have a 'policy' of 'no policy'. All we have are attitudes," he said.

"Canadians have a fear of American reprisals if we take too independent a stance on foreign affairs," said Prof. McNaught

"But what we fear as reprisals is, on our part, actually self-censorship," he said.

"It is impossible," Prof. Watkins said, "for the Canadian national government to control the Canadian national economy."

He emphasised that it is somewhat of a misnomer to talk about a distinctively Canadian national economy.

"We actually have a continental monetary system, controlled by Washington. We are the thirteenth district in the American Federal Reserve system," he said.

Prof. McNaught stated that our relationship in NATO and in continental defence arrangements is not one of military effectiveness.

"Our basic policy," he said, "is that if you want influence in Washington, you have to buy it with these token military commitments."

"The question is: do you really purchase it by these means? I think not."

Both he and Prof. McNaught were of the opinion that by their very natures, the Liberal and Conservative parties would be unable to do anything. If anything is to be done, it must be by a left-wing party.

"We must radicalize the NDP," Prof. Watkins argued, "even if they don't take over the reins of government. It's tradition that the Liberals take over what the NDP proposed 10 years earlier."

"So maybe in about 10 years . . ." he mused.

University of Toronto's star female trackster, Abby Hoffman, was in action this weekend and did herself proud.

Passing up her normal distance, 800 yards, Abby moved down to the 440 level and, in the process, captured the senior women's 440 yard race in the indoor track meet held at Boston.

3 leave CUS

OTTAWA (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Students had a rough time last week as three more campuses voted to leave the national organization.

At the University of Winnipeg Friday, 43 per cent of the campuses' 2,700 students turned out to vote by a 13-ballot margin to withdraw. The decision is not binding on next year's student council.

At the 15,000-student University of Alberta students voted 5,267 to 1,754 to stay out of CUS. Alberta was the first campus to withdraw from CUS in August, 1966.

Last Monday students at the University of Calgary voted by a two-to-one margin to endorse a student council decision to pull out of CUS. Calgary has 5,000 students.

WEEKEND ROUNDUP

GYMNASTICS

Following an impressive win two weeks earlier, Gymnastics Coach Julio Roncon had been confident of a repeat performance in an exhibition tune-up at Kingston last Saturday.

But the unforeseen occurred when top gymnast Brian McVey found he was unable to make the trip because of another conflicting competition.

The understaffed squad was unable to take up the slack, finishing behind host Queens in the four-team tourney despite fine afternoons from the remaining two all-around gymnasts.

Rookie Al Forest stepped out of McVey's shadow to capture the individual all-around competition. A first in free calisthenics and thirds in vaulting and parallel bars paced his strong win.

Just missing a one-two sweep, John Kortright finished a scant seven hundredths of a point behind second place Doug Ritter of Queens. The placing was attributable to overall consistency, plus a fourth in vaulting, and a second in the rings.

Specialists completing the Varsity complement of competitors fared well, but could not make up for the loss of McVey. (The scores of the best three men from each team on each event count towards the team standings).

A second on Carl Sloane and a fourth for Phil Michaelis gave Blues three of the top four places in free calisthenics. Michaelis also took a fifth in the vaulting while newcomer Franz Schmidt managed a well-earned ninth on the rings despite little preparation. Arthur Stein led Varsity on the side horse with a fourth.

FENCING

Queen's lost their reputation for good organization this weekend, the wrestlers lost even with the fencers as cheer leaders, the beer lost its head to complete a flat Saturday evening.

Perhaps the late start, 7 p.m. was the cause of the trouble as there was not enough time to complete each weapon. A result was acclaimed when a team had 5 victories.

Queen's and McGill have teams of medium strength although McGill with some of their missing fencers may be very strong. McMaster is a different proposition with balance in all weapons and a very real threat to the Blues.

The sabreurs showed the way this time when Martin Beros, undefeated, and Martin Moskovits 5-1 outcut all opponents and Mark Pfeiffer had three victims. The epee team had a new look, Martin Peros (3-3) and Nan Sung Ho (5-1) doubled up with Mike Kerwin (5-3) of the usual squad.

The duo Ron Rice and N. S.

Ho had their first defeats of the season (4-1) each but still took off with first place. Rookies Chen and J. Ho, each posted three victories.

WRESTLING

University of Toronto finished second in the Queen's Invitational Wrestling Tournament held in Kingston over the weekend.

McGill came first with 50 points, followed by Toronto with 45, McMaster 44 and Queen's 31.

The first round of the tournament consisted of two dual meets: U of T facing McGill and McMaster grappling with the host school.

Then, for the second round, the winners of each division wrestled off, as did the losers, giving a grand point total. Clear?

Blues lost to McGill 24-19 in the first round, due mainly to some atrocious officiating and a five point default loss at 115 pounds.

Victors for Toronto against Redmen were Tom Taylor, Paul Beswick, Ernie Friedrich, Larry Barron and Ylo Korgemagi.

In the wrestle-off that followed, Beswick, Friedrich and Barron won their matches to emerge as meet champions at 160, 177 and 191 pounds respectively.

Veteran Varsity wrestler, Bill Allison, missed the meet because of a fishy engagement on Manitoulan Island.

COOL HADDEN BOOSTS RED HOT VARSITY B-BALLERS

By RICH PYNE

In four years of intercollegiate play, Blues' elongated center, John Hadden, has become increasingly valuable to coach John McManus and his Varsity cagers. His contribution Saturday night highlighted a 95-89 victory over the astonishingly efficient Guelph Gryphons.

Previously in the habit of vehement outbursts when on the adverse end of an infraction or foul, the 6'8" veteran has calmed down remarkably and restricts himself now to disdainful frowns, and then only on questionable calls.

Needless to day this settled attitude has contributed to Hadden's recent sparkling play. Defensively he contained the smaller Guelph forwards and forced the visitors to get a big chunk of their points from outside. At the other end he displayed a markedly improved finesse.

On one occasion he omitted his effective jumpshot which he lopped with devastation over defenders' outstretched arms, hung a move on two Gryphons that left their boots where their belts should have been, and waltzed in for his bucket.

Although the goateed pivot-man is in excellent shape, forty minutes the way Guelph played is too long to expect a sustained effort from a big man and McManus spelled him liberally with Jay MacDonald. Consequently Hadden finished as strong as he started — a big factor in Blues' avoiding the second-half sag that had plagued them earlier in the season.

Big surprise of the night was Guelph's prowess. Sporting only one big man who saw limited action, coach Garney Henley saw Blues would overpower his team in a slow conventional game after Varsity built up an immediate 10 point lead. His solution was a continually pressing defense with five hustlers who averaged less than six feet in height and a free-wheeling, wide-open offense triggered by guard Leigh Hammond and forward John McKendry.

The result was a pressurized game and a Guelph comeback that saw them go one point ahead near the end of the first half before they sagged to a six point deficit that turned out to be the final margin of victory.

McManus played Bruce Dempster at forward again and the former all-star guard showed once more he is one of the league's most valuable players wherever he's stationed. The lanky blond scored with such facility his 20 points were hardly noticed.

Larry Trafford continued his cat-like defensive play at the head of Blues' half court press and netted 26 points in the process.

Pete Burton and Dale Crouter rounded McManus' started five and turned in solid two-way performances which saw them both hit double figures.

Scoring; Varsity; Trafford 26, Dempster 20, Hadden 19, Burton 14, Crouter 10, MacDonald 4, MacNaughton 2, Slater, Katz, Evans.

Guelph; McKendry 26, Hammond 18, Angus 13, Magee 11, McGill 10, Horton 7, Promoli 4, Litman.

One of the surprises of Saturday's win over Guelph was the unexpected agility shown by Blues' tall center, John Hadden. The picture above is an example of the "new" Hadden in action as he makes a big move past Guelph's Clore Mogege for a shifty two points.

Passi bops, Wright bombs to lead first-place pucksters by Lancers

By PHIL BINGLEY

WINDSOR. Varsity Blues disregarded their normal speed and finesse approach to shiny Saturday afternoon when they bombed and bopped their way to a 3-2 decision over University of Windsor Lancers here and moved two points ahead of University of Waterloo Warriors in the battle for first place in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League.

Friday, Blues had little trouble drubbing winless University of Guelph Gryphons 11-5 in a game played before 3900 patrons at Varsity Arena.

In the Windsor game, Varsity, playing their third game in four days, looked tired in their battle with the stingy Lancers. The latter tried to run Blues out of the rink with heavy bodychecking but Ward Passi (the bopper) neutralized such attempts with some of the stiffest checks we've seen in intercollegiate hockey.

Steve Monteith put Blues on top 1-0 in the last minute of the first period when his low slapshot crashed through goaler Don Bruner's legs.

Gord Cunningham brought the visitors even with a 20 foot wrist shot during a powerplay after Lancers had moved ahead on markers by Neil Bradbury and Bob McCabe.

That set the stage for John Wright (the bomber) and his winning tally. Cunningham set the play up when he shovelled a loose puck to a circling Wright and the two players along with linemate Bob McClelland broke toward the Windsor net in a three-on-two formation.

Halfway between centre ice and the Lancer blue line Wright wound up for what appeared to be a long and harmless slapshot. However, most of the 2500 in attendance including participants and goaltender Bruner didn't see the puck again until it glanced off the post on its way to the back of the Windsor net.

After that Lancers had a couple of chances to stalemate the contest but Blues held on and even came close to widening their margin. Victory was Varsity's third in a row and tenth in twelve starts.

LINE SPARKLES

On Friday the Wright-McClelland-Cunningham line had a fun evening at the expense of the hapless Gryphons. Each member had two goals while Wright added four assists and McClelland had three.

Paul Laurent (his 19th and 20th of the season), Steve Monteith (the 95th of his career) Mike Boland and Brian St. John also scored for Blues.

From a technical standpoint, the game left a lot to be desired as both teams were sloppy in their own end. But Blues showed their old free-wheeling style and the crowd seemed to enjoy the reckless scoring outbursts.

One thing that did affect the game was the poor condition of the ice surface. Players on both teams complained that the ice is the worst in the league. This seems incongruent with the fact that a whole new floor and pipe system were installed last summer.

NOTES ... Blues travel to Hamilton Wednesday night for a game with McMaster Marlins. Next weekend they will play an exhibition contest with Cornell in Ithaca, New York. Cornell are defending U.S. intercollegiate champions ... Blues outshot Windsor 47-33 and Guelph 48-23 ... Henry Monteith a former Blue now with Detroit Red Wings of the NHL visited Blues' dressing room after Saturday's game. Henry seems happy with his present lot but hasn't made any plans concerning his future in hockey. His contract with Detroit runs out at the end of '17 current season.

BOXING

U of T mittmen Saturday night outclassed a crew of nine officer cadets from Royal Military College in a display of hard-hitting and accurate punching that won Varsity six of the nine bouts, four of them on unanimous decisions. Leading the blue-trunked fisticuff fighters to victory with crowd pleasing performances were St. Mike's heavyweight John Byrnes, 155-pound Mike Dornellas (IV Inn) and Dee Glynn (I Vic). Byrnes managed to knock down his opponent twice in the course of his three-round six-minute bout. The outstanding Kingston knuckle-fenders were 150-pounder Dave Czop and 160-pounder Al Maddox who beat out Varsity stalwarts in hotly contested bouts. Varsity return matches against RMC Feb. 22.

Dominion stores target of grape boycott

Concern for migrant farm workers in Delano, California, will focus this weekend on a concentrated effort to stop grape sales in Toronto.

Dominion stores will be the target Saturday for picket lines, shop-ins, leafleting in the stores and phone calls to the managers.

Sporadic harassment and pressure for the boycott failed to significantly reduce sales of this season's table grapes, which arrived in Toronto before Christmas. Now with 20 per cent of the harvest still to come in, committees are being formed across the city to organize a systematic campaign against individual stores.

At U of T, a Student Boycott Committee was formed last week with support from the Students' Administrative Council the Toronto Student Movement, the Young Socialist Forum, and representatives from all of the colleges.

The U of T group will be hitting the Dominion stores at Jarvis and Bloor, Parliament and Wellesley, and Parliament and Gerrard. Pickets are to meet at Hart House at 9:30 Saturday morning.

Dominion stores were singled out as the most hostile, although none of the Toronto chain stores are observing the boycott.

"We want a written commitment from Dominion that grapes will stay off the stands permanently until the strike is settled" says Tairi Dance (II SMC), co-ordinator of the Student Boycott Committee.

The strike began more than three years ago when farm workers, most of them Mexican-American and black, walked out of the California vineyards protesting lack of job security and sanitary conditions. When growers reacted by importing strike-breakers the workers turned to the boycott.

Toronto is North America's third largest consumer of California grapes.

Campus cafeterias, including the Trinity Buttery, have stopped selling California grapes in response to student disapproval.

Poverty really a need for money: Cotterill

There is no such thing as poverty, a prominent union leader told U of T students Monday, "only a need for money."

Speaking at the Urban Poverty Forum at Sidney Smith Hall, Murray Cotterill, public relations director for the United Steelworkers of America, said unions organized "to get money out of companies" have solved the poverty problem for the 50 per cent of Canada's employees who are skilled and relatively irreplaceable.

"The need for money," he continued, "involves 30 per cent of Canada's population today—most of whom are unskilled and replaceable employees who cannot practice collective bargaining."

Cotterill suggested that two concurrent jobs have to be done to "cure poverty permanently. Production must be increased and the proportion of employees capable of bargaining collectively must be increased."

The latter requires "consistent labor laws," he insisted. "The federal government does not show enough concern for labor despite its vested interest in its tax revenue."

The forum continues at 1 p.m. today at Room 1083, Sid Smith. Rick Slye of the CYC will talk about "Politics and the Poor."

Jewish-Negro conflict is insoluble: American Rabbi

By MARTIN REYTO

"The Jew should withdraw himself from the civil rights movement," Rabbi R. L. Rubenstein, director of the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation, University of Pittsburgh, told a Sunday night audience at U of T's Hillel House. "The conflict between the Jews and the blacks is, for the present, irreconcilable."

He said the Black Power movement has become increasingly militant since the death of Martin Luther King, so that now it bases its demands on threats and repeated acts of sheer violence.

"It is a trend which finds its parallel in Jewish history, and it is predictable," he said. "People will never listen to a moral plea."

"But the trouble is that the violence of the blacks is directed against powerless white minority: They have an intuitive knowledge of who are the most vulnerable of the white members of society."

"In 1965, I was in charge of a group of largely Jewish demonstrators on their way to Selma, Alabama," he said. "It was only on the bus that we learned that we were being taken instead to a SNCC demonstration in Montgomery."

"The Montgomery police told us that there would be no trouble if we stayed on the sidewalk. But the leader of the demonstration incited us to defy the cops every way we could. The hatred there was incredible."

"The result was a bloody slaughter. We learned later that no attempt had been made to secure a permit for the demonstration. I refused to allow my kids to become the unsuspecting victims of black violence. We pulled out."

"When we came back to Pittsburgh, most of us beaten up, we were welcomed as heroes. We didn't want to tell them that we left Montgomery because we couldn't trust the blacks. SNCC wanted our bodies; dead bodies."

Rubenstein spoke out vehemently against the philosophy of violence. "Nobody is going to make matters any better by tearing down the whole structure," he said. "Why do we have a society at all? Our goal should be the amelioration of all Americans through government."

The rift between the Jews and the blacks widened hopelessly during Israel's six-day war in 1967. The leftist movement in general came to associate Israel's aggressiveness with imperialism and colonialism; the black movement became violently anti-Semitic because of the defeat their "black brothers" in Palestine suffered at the hands of the Jews.

"Brothers like that, nobody needs," commented Rubenstein wryly. "American blacks do not seem to realize that the Negro was nowhere more ruthlessly enslaved than by the Arabs."

"The Jew has been burned out of the ghettos," he continued. "When the Negro riots, the safest thing for him to burn is the store of the Jewish grocer."

"When Mayor Lindsay said he preferred the destruction of property to the destruction of lives, he meant Jewish property. If the blacks had marched into downtown Manhattan, I'm sure he would have reacted differently."

"The Negro today gets preferential treatment," he said. "American universities are clamoring for black bodies, regardless of ability. Many Negroes at Pittsburgh are only taking one course and devoting the rest of their time to systematic destruction."

"When I ask them just what it is they want from university, they mumble something about manhood."

"Manhood is something you prove in bed, not at a university."

"Historically, the Jew has always been in a position where it has been impossible for him to hit back without getting completely slaughtered. For the American Jew, this is the situation now."

"The best position for the Jew in America is right-wing and conservative," he said, "away from any kind of violent confrontation. We have to look out for ourselves; no one else will. It has happened before. It can happen again."

Clark Kerr and "the New Slavery"

By HAL DRAPER

Dr. Clark Kerr was president of the University of California when the first major disturbances on any U.S. campus occurred at Berkeley in 1964. He is at University of Toronto until Friday as a Visiting Lecturer in American Studies. Below are excerpts from an article written by Hal Draper at the outset of the Berkeley revolt. Mr. Draper has been on the staff of the University of California Library since 1960.

FEDERAL CONTROL

With his book The Uses of the University (Harvard 1963), Clark Kerr, President of the University of California, became the outstanding theoretician and proponent of a particular view of the university.

Kerr presents the university as an institution which is, and will be, increasingly indistinguishable from any other business enterprise in our industrial society. The reader is likely to think, at first, that his is only a metaphor: "the university's invisible product, knowledge," or "the university is being called upon to produce knowledge as never before." But Kerr means it literally:

The production, distribution and consumption of "knowledge" in all its forms is said to account for 29 percent of gross national product . . . and "knowledge production" is growing at about twice the rate of the rest of the economy . . . What the railroads did for the second half of the last century and the automobile for the first half of this century may be done for the second half of this century by the knowledge industry; this is, to serve as the focal point for national growth.

Kerr reiterates and insists on the term "merger":

The university is being called upon . . . to respond to the expanding claims of national service; to merge its activity with industry as never before; to adapt to and rechannel new intellectual currents.

To become "a truly American university," what are the "new intellectual currents" which we must adapt to? It turns out, at bottom, to involve a large amount of currency, indeed, but less intellectuality. The new current, the "vast transformation," the Wave of the Future to which the university must adapt is the impact of the new mass of government money.

"Currently, federal support has become a major factor in the total performance of many universities . . ." There has been "a hundredfold increase in twenty years" in higher education's revenue from government. As a result:

The federal agencies will exercise increasingly specific controls and the universities dependent on this new standard of living will accept these controls. In a few situations, self-restraint has not been enough restraint; as one result, greater external restraint will be imposed in most situations.

There seems to be a wide gap between Kerr's published theory about the "merger" of the university and "society", and his moves toward restricting student involvement in political and social action off campus.

On the one hand he tells us we must accept the integration of the university with the state and industry in this Cold War (in fact, with what has been called the Military-Industrial Complex) and must erase the boundary lines; on the other hand, he tries to muzzle and rein student activity on campus which tends to step beyond the boundary line — which, as his administration puts it, "mounts" political and social action off campus — while at the same time other "constituencies" in the university community are lauded for doing just that.

UNIVERSITY AS FACTORY

This contradiction is not due to muddleheadedness. Behind it is a clear consistency, which appears as soon as we make explicit the assumption which permeates Kerr's book.

This is: The use of the university, or the role of the multiversity, is to have a relationship to the present power structure, in this businessman's society of ours, which is similar to that of any other industrial enterprise. There are railroads and steel mills and supermarkets and sausage factories — and there are also the Knowledge Factories, whose function is to service all the others and the State.

KERR'S 1984

— Behind Kerr's vision of the university-factory is a broad-gauged world view, a view of a Brave New World

(his term) or Orwellian 1984 toward which all this is headed.

Kerr described the coming New Order in 1960 in Industrialism and Industrial Man. (1)

1. The New Order will result (is resulting) from the presently ongoing convergence of the two dominant systems: a capitalism which is becoming more and more authoritarian and bureaucratic, along the road toward Russian totalitarianism; and a Russian Communist system which has softened up and become somewhat milder; the two merging somewhere inbetween: into an undifferentiated "Industrialism". The imperative is the force of industrialization; it is the road of progress.

2. It is refreshing to note that Kerr wastes no space on ritualistic obeisances to democracy. There is no pretense, no lip-service. It simply is not in the picture.

3. Statism: the leviathan State has taken over; it has expanded everywhere. It is "omnipresent."

4. Full-blown bureaucratic (or managerial) elitism: The progressive and socially decisive elements are only "the managers, private and public," with their technicians and professionals. There is no pretense of a role for "the people" other than as the working cattle who are to be herded by the manager-bureaucrats.

ROAD AHEAD

There is a convergence toward one-partyism in form or fact. Professional managers run the economy. "Economic enterprise is always basically authoritarian under the necessity of getting things done . . . Authority must be concentrated . . ."

The individual will be neither an independent man nor a human ant, but something between. The state, the manager, the occupational associations are all disciplinary agents."

There will be a certain "freedom" in a certain sense (if not democracy). "Politically he can be given some influence. Society has achieved consensus and it is perhaps less necessary for Big Brother to exercise political control. Nor in this Brave New World need genetic and chemical means be employed to avoid revolt. There will not be any revolt, anyway, except little bureaucratic revolts that can be handled piecemeal."

SCHIZOID SOCIETY

Where will the freedom lie? Maybe, muses Kerr, "in the leisure of individuals".

The economic system may be highly ordered and the political system barren ideologically; but the social and recreational and cultural aspects of life diverse and changing . . . The new slavery to technology may bring a new dedication to diversity and individuality."

NO PROTEST

There will be no protest, Kerr wrote. From whom could it come? The intellectuals? Here is how he deals with them:

The intellectuals (including the university students) are a particularly volatile element . . . capable of extreme reactions to objective situations — more extreme than any group in society. They are by nature irresponsible, in the sense that they have no continuing commitment to any single institution of philosophical outlook and they are not fully answerable for consequences. They are, as a result, never fully trusted by anybody, including themselves.

TOOL OR DANGER

Will there be protest from the ranks of the workers' movements? NO, says Kerr: vieux jeu. In the New Order, labor is controlled in institutions hierarchically set up. "One of the central traits is the inevitable and eternal separation of industrial men into managers and the managed". Not only inevitable: eternal!

THE MORAL CHOICE

— Clark Kerr believes that the student's relationship to the Administration bureaucracy can be only that of a tool or a danger.

It is easy enough to become a tool. There are all kinds of tools, and they can come without head, teeth, or point. On the other hand, there is danger in becoming a danger. Which will it be?

Everyone must choose, and it is a matter of life or death: life as an independent human being, or death as a man.

Graduate students in Political Economy have reacted with "shock and dismay" to publication of a special Committee report on the Department.

They have requested an open faculty and student meeting and are planning action at 44 St. George today at 4 pm.

Lakoff report: "a triumph of reaction"

By DAVID MILNE

David Milne is a Ph.D. student and a teaching fellow in the department of Political Economy.

The long-awaited report from the three-member faculty committee under Chairman Lakoff has been submitted to staff and graduate students in the Department of Political Economy. For those tender-minded students who had harbored the deluded notion that this committee was seriously interested in improving graduate education (and I must confess that I count myself among that misguided group), the report came as a rude shock.

After first offering the salutary warning that the report undoubtedly embodied the "prejudices" of the members of the committee, the report proceeded to demonstrate that prejudice by what amounts to a mindless affirmation of the status quo.

Despite the disclaimer that the "intention was to subject the programme to an open-ended and detached review", the report does not even faintly question the adequacy of the existing structure. To those who attended the two public meetings of the committee, this should not, upon reflection, be entirely surprising.

One has only to recall the curious paradox of the appointed head of an investigating committee whose purpose was to undertake a comprehensive evaluation of the graduate programme defending that programme with the ferocity of a confirmed zealot.

One might in justice have concluded at that time that the Chairman was already so obstinately committed to the status quo that proposals to the contrary would only have bounced off so closed a mind. This impression is reinforced by the startling lack of attention paid to the arguments of those briefs submitted to them.

The committee has attempted to ignore the brunt of this charge by stating flatly that they do not think it their primary concern "to take account of or to harmonize the views of all the members of the staff and student body" but rather "to present the partisan views of the three members of the committee". If that is their assessment of their function, they might have spared us the effort of trying to talk to them.

"TIGHT" SCHEDULE

Upon the request of this committee in October, substantial numbers of graduate students came together to discuss the graduate programme and to suggest improvements for the committee's consideration. Forced by a very tight schedule (which we later learned was not to be adhered to), these students held a number of meetings and drafted up statements.

One of these briefs, written by T. A. Heinrichs, represented the considered views of at least 10 to 15 graduate students who had taken the trouble to define their objections to the existing programme and to outline a workable alternative. This brief, whose objectives were largely supported by the remainder of the students in the later meeting with the committee, argued for an intensive tutorial system over three major areas of political science for those students who preferred it over the courses-examination system. It was felt that the standards and methods of assessment would be even more rigorous and realistic than under the present one. Opposition to the comprehensive examination was overwhelmingly apparent.

Not only has the committee refused to consider these demands, it has not even felt it necessary to answer the criticism. Judging from the report, there is no indication at all that the matter of comprehensive examinations was ever seriously raised and there certainly is no evidence of the members themselves having thought very much about it.

Instead, the value and relevance of the comprehensive examinations is implicitly accepted along with all of the other paraphernalia of the structured programme.

In fact, in the one place where student arguments are quoted, it would appear that a deliberate attempt has been made to confuse the issue by an indiscriminate joining of statements of briefs. The person(s) responsible for writing point 5, page 5, understood very well that the statements by Philip Resnick were not necessarily shared by the bulk of the students. One wonders then why he should have devoted so much space to this viewpoint, if not in an attempt to discredit student demands in general.

One can hardly avoid the conclusion that the committee had no intention whatever to consider student interests whenever they conflicted with what they so pompously define on the first page of the report as "objective reality". To characterize the meetings of the committee with the graduate students as largely an exercise in psychic gratification is typical of the smugness with which at least one member of the committee traditionally treats unfamiliar or objectionable ideas.

EDUCATIONAL GOALS

If the members of this committee had any reasonably sophisticated understanding of their educational objectives and goals (apart from an unthinking celebration of the status quo), they certainly have conspicuously failed in defining them. The only value which appears to have crossed their minds amounts to a desire for increased efficiency — tightening standards; closer supervision; shorter, faster, and more meaningless examination procedures; and, of course, (some sugar to sweeten the pill) more money for graduate students.

As for the pseudo-progressive proposal for the M.A.-Ph.D. student stream, it should warm the hearts of even the most reactionary. The older, structured programme is not in any way altered. The courses remain, and in fact are reinforced. (The suggestion is for a total of 7 courses, one more than at present). The examinations remain, with new provisions designed to speed up the processing. The supposedly new feature for which we are expected to be grateful is the assignment of staff advisers in our fields of study to whom we might bring our troubles. Yet, is it new?

The Department has already tried the method of arbitrarily assigning students to Ph.D. advisers, a procedure which was largely discredited. They can't be recommending that again!

The only concession which the committee has graciously chosen to make is that the advisors with whom a student discusses his fields of interest will "normally be included on the examining committee". This travesty is a system which we are told the members of the committee have envisioned as "better adapted to the needs of the student".

"APPALLING PROPOSALS"

There is no need to go on with any of the other proposals which the committee has made. Most are equally appalling. They are grounded in a paternalism which goes considerably beyond the legitimate right to set degree standards. They emerge from the minds of men who, while paying lip service to the ideal of a community of scholars, actually look upon the university as a training school, the Department of Political Economy as their own peculiar fiefdom, and the learning process as the acquisition of skills from an accredited collection of "wise old men."

What assumptions they do make about the learning environment and assessment procedures are in substance and spirit wholly alien to the conclusions of most educational authorities, and directly clash with the recommendations of the Hall-Dennis Report.

It is disappointing to see that two prominent and respected members of faculty should attach their support to such an unreasonable document. We can only hope that faculty and students will unite in repudiating it.

"Equal student participation is a nice ideal and our voices should be heard but we should not have an equal voice because people are basically not interested."

He centred his criticism on the university bureaucracy and structures which keep students "passive and inert." "Students should be treated as citizens in a country," said John Winter (SGS). "At present they are treated like nationals carrying a parcel."

Winter described his recent meeting with the Graduate Council over the 10-hour work week for graduates as evidence.

"We had a simple solution to a serious problem," he said, "yet they did not want to speak to us or even over our head, and in fact did not hear what we were saying."

"The best solution would be a strong central government able to take control when necessary but allowing diffusion of power to as many bodies as possible," he added. Wernick was skeptical of any good that might come of the Commission's work. "You can't force people to be free," he said.

Prof. L. E. Lynch said he shared the students' uneasiness about the impersonality of the university. He asked the resource people to suggest an alternative.

"The university must be divided into smaller units," said Charlton. "These men and women want to be persons — most people are wondering how University college is different from Forest Hill Collegiate."

Wernick described students as workers. "They are investing in themselves and like all labor are alienated because they are controlled by others. They are creating themselves, yet this creation is subject to outside control."

He told CUG this situation would not be remedied by "technocratic tinkering" but only by changing the hierarchy of the university.

The interviewees then discussed the forbidding nature of the university environment.

Winter proposed a relaxation of zoning regulations to allow bars on campus. He described the reaction of one of his students who described as "a giant urinal."

"I feel a forbidding atmosphere reflects on the structure," interjected Gary Webster (SGS).

Student resource people to the Commission on University Government expressed general dissatisfaction with the present university structure in the first of a series of interviews with members of the university community in a meeting last night.

Interviewee Paul Fromm (III SMC) bopped CUG would not be "overwhelmed by sacred cows" and instead deal with the questions of "who has what power and who governs."

"People whose motives are not for the best interest of the university should not be allowed access to the raw damage.

Roosevelt Douglas, one of the black organizers, promised that the blacks would abide by an impartial committee's findings. "We'll be the first ones to shake Anderson's hand if he's found not guilty," said Douglas.

During the committee hearing, Anderson said that after much "soul searching" he is sure race is not a consideration in his dealings with his students.

The occupants said they will not leave until the administration gives in to demands made last Wednesday by the group holding the computer centre.

They include dissolution and reconstitution of the hearing committee, removal of all threats of reprisal or punitive action, consideration for students who have lost academic time and active attempts by the administration to have criminal charges against three blacks dropped.

Administration officials say they plan no police action to clear either occupation unless MONTREAL — About 200 militant students seized the Sir George Williams University faculty club in a quick blitz yesterday afternoon.

The plush seven-room area, taken over in support of demands issued by black students last week, is just two floors below the ninth-level computer centre, whose occupation is now in its second week.

Meanwhile, the controversial hearing committee resumed its inquiry into charges of racism against a professor yesterday morning, without the six blacks pressing charges.

The faculty club occupation followed a noon-hour rally explaining the issues in the confrontation between students and administrators.

After two hours of heated debate, the group swept up the escalators and into the faculty club surprising several staff members at lunch. The faculty cleared out immediately and the students as workers. "They are investing in themselves and like all labor are alienated because they are controlled by others. They are creating themselves, yet this creation is subject to outside control."

LAPIERRE "NOT YET A SEPARATIST"

No French Canadian can live outside Quebec says Bourgault

By AGLUKACS

"Quebec is a ghetto", separatist leader Pierre Bourgault told American exchange students at Hart House Monday afternoon.

After two hours of passionate intellectual interplay, the students gave Bourgault and fellow panel member Laurier Lapiere a standing ovation.

"No life is possible for a French-Canadian outside Quebec," Bourgault explained.

"If we can't speak or work in our own language in this country, we'll build ourselves into another country," he insisted.

Bourgault, formerly leader of the Ralliement pour l'Independence Nationale, (RIN), which dissolved itself to effect a coalition party in Rene Levesque's Parti Quebecois, is awaiting trial for participation in a violent demonstration on St. Jean Baptiste Day, on the eve of last June's federal election.

"It is not the presence of the British, but the American influence, Bourgeois-Laurier can technological dominance, which is a hang-up," feels LaPierre, who calls himself a socialist.

"We're the drop-outs of North-American capitalism," agreed Bourgault, who wants to give Quebecers the choice between socialism and capitalism and will accept U.S. capital if Quebec controls it.

LaPierre, a losing federal NDP candidate in Montreal last June discussed the election with mild bitterness. "People were prepared to accept uniformity in order to have unity."

"Some of us like to think it possible to have a pluralist society, equality between the component parts of society," Bourgault sees "a real collaboration" coming after Quebec's separation from the rest of Canada. This would be "the end of French-Canadian schizophrenia of loyalty in a crisis." Quebec could also pursue a foreign policy independent from British Canada.

"It is not the presence of the British, but the American influence, Bourgeois-Laurier

Rochdale goes native on floor 17

Story and photos by HARRIET KIDECKEL

Almost any time of the day Wilf Pelletier can be found in the seventeenth floor office of the Rochdale College Indian Institute.

A big man, in both stature and heart, he exudes warmth and sincerity. Wilf is an Odawa (Ottawa, as the white man calls it) Indian who was born and raised on a reservation. Now he is a full-time resource person at Rochdale.

He worries about the problems of his people — North American Indians in a white man's society. So he has set up the institute for Indians in Toronto — a white man's city.

The institute is a sort of indefinable thing. "We're an educational institute — whatever that means to people. We're not a service institute," Wilf explains.

"We don't set up any sort of course — we're just part of Rochdale College; we wanted to set up a place where Indians could come together." But even "getting together" was not easy, at first. Wilf received only two applications last summer for residences in Rochdale.

"Indians deal in reality — they couldn't apply to a building that didn't exist," Wilf clarified.

But he knew that once the building was finished the demand would rise. He tried to hold the seventeenth floor for the future Indian Institute.

"As soon as some of my friends saw Rochdale, they wanted to move in," Wilf said. "But not only Indians live here; it is a cross-cultural situation."

"Our real problem," Wilf points out sadly, "is that everyone separated us from Rochdale; we are Rochdale. If Rochdale isolates us, it is the same as society has done in the past to the Indian."

The Indian wants to be a part of the society around him, but not the same — not a white man with red skin. D. G. Poole, a Canadian writer concerned about Indians, calls the Indian identity a sense of "Indianness."

Many other ideas inherent in the Indian culture differ widely from what Wilf calls "the Western European culture". To an Indian "education is experiencing," Wilf says.

"Indian people don't teach their children — the children learn. They're allowed to learn on their own," he elaborates.

"Indians are encouraged to do their own thing their own way. There is no such thing as one correct way to do something — if two ways can get something done, then they are both right.

"In the community, they don't mess around with children very much. Yet there is discipline in those children. If you're talking they don't interfere."

By DEBBIE KIDECKEL
Debbie Kideckel is a grade eight student at Wilson Heights Junior High School, in North York. On December 9, Debbie's class and another from the same school, about 70 12 and 13 year-olds, paid a visit to the Six Nations Indian Reservation in Brantford. Below are a few of her impressions from that visit.

After visiting the Six Nations Indian Reservation I realize just how lucky I am. Many times my teachers in different grades have told me that two-thirds of the world are have-nots and the other third are haves but I never paid much attention or thought about it.

Before going to the reservation I was asked what I expected and to be truthful I didn't know. As we drove into the reservation I was thoroughly astonished. Some of the houses there didn't have plumbing or electricity and yet others were nicer than yours or mine. I wondered what the school would be like after seeing the homes and I could hardly wait to see what the students would do or how they would act.

To me, the Indians seemed a far-off tribe never even thought of.

Again, I was surprised on arriving at the school. It was an up-to-date building with only one floor. We walked around inside the building and the classrooms were very similar to my own. There were science labs, health rooms and a large gymnasium. The biggest shock came when we entered the gym. The students seemed to be the same as us. But I had always thought of them as "redskins." They were all very friendly and they asked us questions as we asked them.

I asked them how they lived and how they could stand using the outhouses. I got answers like, "If you're used to it, it doesn't bother theirs."

you" and "It doesn't make a difference to me."

When I saw the Indians, I expected that all of their ways would be modern. We showed them one of our dances and they showed us one of theirs. I didn't expect it to be a rain dance, but it was!

Most of the Indians looked Chinese, but some were just Negro or just white (there were a lot of these because of mixed marriages). They were dressed equally as well as myself but they were supposed to be, in a way, poor. They are poor to us, but they are one of the richest reservations in Canada. That day I made a lot of friends and got a few pen-pals. At the end of the day I left regretfully.

When we left I asked some of the people from my class what they thought of the reservation and some answers were:

"Boy how can anyone say they're poor — just look at how they're dressed."
"It must be terrible to live in those little shacks!"

"They were nice, so who cares how they dress or live?"
"They are so friendly and they speak English as well as we do!"

From a teacher I got this answer, "I wonder whether they think of themselves as rich or poor, because they're poorer than us but richer than other reservations."

I didn't think of it for some time until I received a letter from one of my pen-pals. I asked her questions about the reservation by mail and she answered and in turn asked some more questions. She herself is one of the few Indians on the reservation who has a split-level house with two indoor washrooms. There are also Indians who live in little shacks.

I myself feel that the Indians are no longer on the warpath but want to be our friends and I want to be theirs.

and I think they are bitter," he says.

"The schools on the reservation are no different from ordinary schools — they are tools of assimilation."

An Indian institute working paper quotes a past United States Commissioner on Indian Affairs as saying, "The Indian must be imbued with the exalting egotism of American (rather European) civilization so that he will say 'I'mine' instead of 'this is ours'."

Wilf Pelletier sees that by shedding his culture, the Indian loses his identity. "The Indians on the reservation are happy," says Wilf. "It is the Western European culture that oppresses the Indian."

Wilf Pelletier and his people question: "Is white right? Does the white man feel guilty about taking the Indians' land? Does he feel guilty about suppressing a culture?"

"An Indian child is never rejected at any time — this is a main issue. Even if a child is dirty, he is not rejected because he is dirty; he is handled — dirty or not. The dirt is rejected, not the child."

Indians are very tolerant people, Wilf explained. "They have the ability to accept without understanding. A problem people have that makes them intolerant is that they must understand everything first."

"Each person is recognized as a human being. When you walk into the Indian community you are stripped — of titles or any other symbols. Each person is equal. There is no class structure. Each person is judged on his own merits."

Wilf Pelletier does not want to see the Indian lose his culture. "The reserves around Toronto are more assimilated than those farther north. They have lost their values instance for the first time last November when the administration suggested in the now-famous "secret brief" that it be abolished.

The incident aroused my curiosity and a couple of weeks ago, after the controversy of the secret brief had died down, I decided to visit the Institute.

Children were playing in the warm, sunny yard of the Institute and making good use of the unseasonable puddles.

When I walked through the building, I noticed a strange blend of opposites. The floors are old and wooden, but along one wall there is a large glass window that faces into a room of miniature tables and chairs. My guide told me it is a one-way mirror for the study of child behaviour.

Further down the corridor I noticed a most unusual washroom. All the fixtures — basins and toilets — are half-sized. I felt as if I was in a doll's house, for everything is on a miniature scale.

When I walked into a classroom, the first thing that struck me was that it didn't look like a classroom.

My concept of a classroom is rows of desks fixed to the floor facing a podium of desk-teacher-blackboard. But in this room there are just loose tables and chairs grouped in a random pattern about the room. There is a small blackboard, but it doesn't encircle the room like a wall of last words on everything. Instead, walls are covered with the kids' paintings, poems and drawings. A huge mural hangs across the middle of the room. I had to duck my head to get under it, but it was okay for the kids.

The mural represents the children's interpretations of Androcles and the Lion, a play they saw at the Toronto Workshop Theatre on one of their frequent field trips.

When I was in Grade 1, I didn't get to see much theatre.

And I don't think we ever had murals across the middle of the classroom. After all, someone in the back row might not have been able to see the teacher.

Here the teacher wanders from one child or small group of children to another — there are about 20 groups in all. But the unsupervised kids were not rowdy — they were too interested in their own work. And they weren't all doing the same thing.

Some were doing exercises in grammar; some were reading in a small group in the corner; some were writing letters to an injured teacher in the hospital. But they were not being told how to write them. Some drew their get-well cards, and others wrote them.

At first I felt conspicuous wandering around a classroom with a camera slung around my neck. But my presence didn't cause much of a stir, for the children are used to other grown-ups such as graduate students coming to talk to them.

After Grade 1, I visited a Grade 3 music class, taught by Margaret Galloway, one of the best music teachers in North America.

The room is full of musical instruments, many of which she has invented herself, especially for the children. There are simple stringed instruments: octave psaltery, the octave zither, the two octave zither, the nordic lyre, chordal dulcimer, and the bowed psaltery.

When the children arrived, they first rushed eagerly for the instruments. Miss Galloway asked them to put them down and sit down on the floor.

Her first act was to ask the class how they wanted to fill the allotted time.

One girl suggested they continue recording their own music on tape. A vote was taken. The suggestion passed unanimously. Student power at work.

The children broke off into small groups and rehearsed music they had composed themselves. The instruments are specially designed for children and are not so loud that the groups drown each other out.

After ten minutes, each group of two or three shyly approached the microphone of the tape recorder with their instruments and played.

A tape recorder is an inspiring audience for a child. Each group plays with an artistic self-awareness, a concentration at creativity. Yet they are still kids, and behind the organization there was a remarkable spontaneity and freshness.

"Children as young as three and four years will 'play' a simple instrument with the same freedom and abandon with which they 'draw' with brush or crayon," Miss Galloway explains. "In fact, children's music, like children's art, has qualities of vigor, balance, and 'rightness.'"

She told me how the children write their own stories and shoot their own films, and then create and play their own music to accompany them.

Miss Galloway expresses professional fascination with some of the music these young kids come up with.

"It is quite impossible for adults new to children's original music to credit the high sense of style which children instinctively use in such work," she says. "I believe that within a decade or two we shall be listening with astonishment and delight to children's original music."

And this attitude is prevalent throughout the Institute — learning something from the creativity of the child instead of trying to indoctrinate him. The child achieves his own creative independence; he learns from his own mind.

I visited a group of Grade 6 film-makers after the music class. There were three of them working without supervision and with all the serious concentration of professionals. They were filming a sequence on a set of their own design and manufacture.

An orange rubber water-snake swam through a set of cardboard stalagmites and stalagmites. The movement was convulsive and realistic, as a boy controlled the writhing animation of the puppet from above.

I was told they would create their own music to accompany the film.

Before I left, I took a glimpse at the empty art room. It was an exciting, though primitive gallery of clay sculptures, paintings, drawings, mobiles. These are not unusual objects to find in a school art room, but their quality was startling.

Despite the heavy concentration in the arts, the kids fulfill requirements in maths and science, Institute officials assured me. And their education in these fields is in the same creative style.

As I left the Institute, I took a couple of pictures of four children swinging on the front gate.

"Why can't we take your picture?" one of them asked me.

At the Institute of Child Study, doing your own thing is a way of life.

Accidents may cost the economy of Ontario half-a-billion dollars a year, says a new University of Toronto study.

A rough estimate of five million dollars lost to Ontario industry per year is equivalent to 20,000 trained men removed from the work force. In North America, accidents are the leading cause of death for those under the age of 35.

Jean Surry compiled the report, while on the research staff of the Department of Industrial Engineering.

Bannon rolls on and over Skule

By GELLIUS
HOCKEY

Vic (Dawkins 2, Brown) and Law (Garbe, Sear, Fitzpatrick) tied, 3-3.

SMC got goals from Donoran and Bannon, the roll deorant, to edge Sr. Eng., 2-1. Green replied for Sr. Eng.

Murray (-Old English oath; cf. "a murray upon thee Robin Hood, and upon thy murray men" - Nottingham) and Parish scored as Trin blanked PHE, 2-0.

UC blanked Meds A, 3-0, on goals by Nabeta, Brunskill "Is your summer cottage infested with bruns? Buy Brunskill" (to-day) and Cleland.

Watts, Simpson and Treen ed Sr. Eng over PHE A, 3-0. Dents (Jones 2, Taylor, Koutsaris) 4; Jr. Eng. (Newland, Craig) 2.

Four-leafed Glover scored twice and Nescio Quis once as Law beat New, 3-2. Storms had both goals for gnus. (The gnus is a small South African antelope related to the infanta Maria Teresa.)

BASKETBALL

Once again, Lochinvar Sprogris' steed was the best, hitting for 12 in Erin's 47-38 win over Law (Pyne 10).

Meds A beat Vic, 48-37. Kent had 13 for the winners and Lloyd Rossman 8 despite losing his hands to leprosy early in the second quarter.

Cummings topped Vic with 10.

SMC (Laglia 14) 61; PHE A (Barker 0) 28.

Archmaggeddon (Kohn 11) 26; PHE B (Chapman 11) 25.

Faust (no relation to G. Washington, who was Faust in war, Faust in peace, etc.) scored 16 to give UC II a 37-35 win over New (Kirby II).

CONTEST

This week's winner is Brian Margetson of New College Residence, who answers the query "Et tu, Brute?" by saying, "Naw, there warn't

WOMEN'S SPORT

The peace and calm of a typical Saturday morning at McGill University was interrupted last weekend when 86 girls from U. of T. invaded the campus to participate in a mammoth Sports Day.

The senior Basketball team started off the day facing a strong team from McGill. When the game ended, Toronto was well in the lead with a score of 32-20. Toronto's top scorer was Karen Empey with 11 points.

The intermediate basketball team then lost to McGill by a score of 20-19. Joanne Petzel was Toronto's top scorer with 8 points.

The Toronto bowling team managed to score 2213 points to McGills 1983 to win the bowling tournament.

The Fencing team from Toronto lost to McGill by 10 matched to 6.

The intercollegiate Ice Hockey team faced McGill and lost to them 2-0.

Congratulations to Varsity's Senior Volleyball Team for winning the Women's Intercollegiate Volleyball Championship for the third consecutive year. Bluettes won three straight games out of five 15-8, 15-6, 15-7 in the final against Western.

A FRANK LOOK AT BOXING BIZ

By DAVE FRANK

When a kid from, say, Vic, Innis, St. Mike's or UC, puts on his leather headgear, laces up a pair of flat black boots, shoves his fist into huge kidney-coloured gloves, and slips off his dark blue cloak, he becomes a boxer.

He flexes his back muscles, tests his arms, prances up and down in the corner, and then, when his trainer pops a plastic mouthpiece over his gums, he pouts out into the middle of the ring.

At least, that's the way it was Saturday night at Hart House, when Varsity's nine-man team punched their way through to an easy victory over the challengers from Kingston's Royal Military College.

Every boxer seems to look the same once he gets to work. His face assumes a dogged, buck-toothed intensity and his eyes, peering out from behind the gloves, never seem to move. Boxing, as they say, is the art of hitting without getting hit.

As in hockey, you have to know exactly where the target is all the time, and you should never have to stop to aim before firing a punch. The sledgehammer chopping down a tree technique never works in boxing, where agility, accuracy and quickness are the best assets a contender can have.

When two boxers square off, one usually seems to take the upper hand if the bout is going to be exciting. Otherwise the sport can become rather drab and frustrating. A lot of hard work, but not too much excitement.

That's what happened in one of three preliminary bouts at Hart House last Saturday night.

Both were heavyweights — Mike Allemano from St. Mike's and Joe Donohue, from Law — and they moved in short jerks, very slowly.

As Donohue retreated, shifting his right leg counter-clockwise ahead of him, Allemano, who is squat and shorter, continued to follow, grimacing, and landing heavy punches. The two heavyweights continued this way, with hardly any variation, for the entire three two-minute rounds. The judges awarded a unanimous decision to Allemano.

But when the routine is broken, boxing loses its frustrating qualities. The Saturday night Hart House match yielded several exciting bouts.

Pat Goodwin (II SMC) won a split decision over RMC's Art Rent in the 120 pound category by skipping and prancing expertly all about the ring, moving in to take a swing at his opponent and then dancing back out of reach. The RMC fellow defended himself well, but seemed to be hiding behind the big maroon gloves.

That bout set the tone for the rest of the evening. As Varsity won five more and lost out on three other hard-fought slugfests.

Dee Glynn (I Vic), for one, had a lot of the kind of class that makes a good boxer. He worked on his opponent, Bruce Reid, very carefully, taking no chances, but softening him up slowly in the first round with a few light test punches before moving in all the way with fists to take the decision. He was the only winning boxer in the meet to go over to the loser's corner afterwards and shake with both the loser and the coach.

Rick Smith from Innis, 145 lbs., won a bout with Larry Gibbs, in a gentlemanly, evenly-matched bout. Basically this kind of boxing — with a few quick exchanges of fist flurries followed by the referee intervening to separate the grappling boxers — is frustrating.

Len Brown from UC outscored Larry Travis in a similar bout. They planted their fists quite frequently in each other's faces but didn't hit too heavily, it seemed.

Mike D'Ornellas (IV Inn), scored a similarly effective victory over RMC's Terry O'Neill.

The most satisfying bout was in the evenly matched 150 lb. category, between Vic's Kit Simpson and RMC's Dave Czop.

— Kit Simpson was on his homeground and clearly the crowd's favourite. But he started off a little wildly, swinging too much, and wound up losing to Dave Czop, who scored with heavier, straighter and more telling blows.

On the sidelines one of the Varsity trainers kept hollering out encouragement as he had been throughout the evening:

"Straight and snappy now, right in there.

"He's tired now, Kit, he's dead.

The only problem was it didn't seem to help. Simpson's nose started to bleed at the end of the first round, and by the end of the second he was entirely fazed.

I suppose what made the bout exciting was the excellent stamina shown by Simpson, who was outboxed, knew it, and still kept on while the voice kept calling out to him to make it "straight and snappy, long and snappy."

St. Mike's Dan Doyle (160 lb.) boxed well, displaying fine footwork and sense of timing, but was unable to put enough dents into his stronger

RMC opponent, Al Maddox.

St. Mike's Kevin Cavanagh (165 lb.) went down to a defeat at Clark Little's fists, something like Simpson beforehand. The voice kept calling out "it's a freeway, real loose now, straight through," and Cavanagh, nose bloodied, still lost.

The heavyweights worked hard in the last bout of the evening, and again the match, while less than even, proved satisfying to the crowd.

— SMC's John Byrnes sparred cautiously at first, landed about five punches in the first round, and then felled his opponent, Ian Thompson. As they were both fairly heavy, they moved slowly, Byrnes clearly outboxing the officer-cadet. They would box, grapple and then be separated only to start in again on the same tack.

In the last round Byrnes chased him up against the ropes several times and once even into his own corner. He knocked him down for a second time just before the final long ending the match.

In all contests Varsity boxers showed they knew how to handle themselves with class. They also had the big psychological advantage — someone on the sideline telling them to "make it short and snappy." Varsity visits Royal Military College Feb. 22 for a return match.

GREAT STORY, JIM BLUE-BOTTLE DRIBBLERS AT MAC

By JIM MORRISON

After a lacklustre beginning, the SIBL season has slowly developed into a veritable dogfight. And the action promises to continue tonight, when the new-look Varsity Blues take on McMaster Marauders in Hamilton for an assault on third place.

If Mac's 107-79 detonation of Western Mustangs is any indication, Bill Fowler's charges will be very hard to handle. The only starter back from last year's squad is guard Paul Allingham, but an excellent collection of rookies have proved themselves more than capable. Particularly impressive are forwards Jeff Daw and John Dignan and guard Paul Mazza, who are Marauders' leading scorers.

Blues will once again feature Bruce Dempster at a forward spot along with Dale Crouter, with Larry Trafford and Peter Burton in the backcourt.

But the key to the game will be the performance of center John Hadden, who has been spectacular in the last two games. If Hadden continues to man the boards up to potential, Blues can lay a claim to the third and final playoff position.

BLUES FIRST AT QUEENS

Guinness leads swim

By DAVID POWELL

The University of Toronto swimming team faced their toughest competition of the season on the weekend and came through with a convincing victory. Blues were worried about a vastly improved McGill squad, especially as they were without their top freestyle sprinter Theo van Ryn.

— However, some fine individual efforts plus victories in both relays enabled the Toronto team to prevail.

Rookie sensation Mike Guinness again led the way as he unofficially broke OQAA records in the 200 and 500 yard freestyle.

Veteran Gaye Stratten showed why he is unbeatable in intercollegiate circles in the backstroke by winning the 200 back almost a pool length ahead of his closest rival. Strate then set a searing pace to take the 200 individual medley in near record time.

— Chris Fisher had a big day for Varsity with a win in the 100 yard freestyle and a close second in the 50 free.

Breaststroker Barry Bowerman tied for first in the 200 breast and Terry Bryon came second in the 1000 free and was just touched out for first place in the 200 butterfly by McGill star Richard Zachowski.

Bob Watt placed third in the 50 yard freestyle and fourth in the 100 free. Klaus Koch came third in the 200 fly behind Bryon and George Goldsmith took third spot in the 200 breaststroke.

Stratten, Ross Ballantine, Bob Heatley and Doug MacIntosh teamed up to win the 400 medley relay. Fisher, MacIntosh again, Bryon, and Guinness combined to take the 400 freestyle relay.

In diving, Blues' Eugene Cawthray showed fine form in placing second in the one meter event.

Final score of the meet was Toronto 115, McGill 80, host Queen's 50 and McMaster 24.

Blues last home meet of the year is Saturday, February 15 at Hart House pool. Their opponents on that occasion will be University of Waterloo.

Meanwhile, back at the ranch . . .

While Clark Kerr is in Toronto, Berkeley campus of the University of California, where he was president for 10 years, is being rocked by violence as a student strike enters its third week.

California Governor Ronald Reagan declared a state of emergency in response to an incident Tuesday in which 15 people were arrested and 8 people required hospital treatment.

The strike was called by the Third World Liberation Front, a group of Negro and other non-white students.

Reagan also announced he has sent severe new laws to the state legislature to curb student protest. The measures, he said, will end "acts of violence caused by a coalition of dissidents and criminal activists who have attempted to close down the university."

Kerr, who is currently giving a series of lectures at U of T, said last night of Reagan's actions: "It will only heighten the intensity of feeling. It will worsen the situation rather than provide a solution."

Kerr is now a professor of economics and industrial relations and research economist in Berkeley's Institute of Industrial Relations.

The laws would cover not only the multi-campus university of California but also its junior equivalent, the State College System which includes junior colleges and high schools.

One proposed measure would prohibit from public schooling for a year students convicted of a criminal offence during campus demonstrations.

Reagan said that he made the declaration at the request of Alameda County Sheriff Frank Madigan and administration president Charles J. Hitch in order to make state highway patrolmen available on a continuous basis to help maintain "law and order" on campus.

The additional police, available on campus because of the declaration of emergency, will be under the command of Sheriff Madigan, who earlier this week criticized the university administrators for not taking a strong enough stand against student strikers.

The last few days have been fairly quiet as students march around the campus chanting "On Strike," "Shut it Down", and "Power To The People", but did not enter any buildings where they assumed there were police.

The Berkeley faculty senate Wednesday voted by a narrow margin to table a motion that would have approved in principle the creation of a college of ethnic studies to be planned by non-white faculty and students. This would have fulfilled one of the student demands. Other demands include hiring of more non-white university employees at all levels and admission of more non-white students.

Radicals interrupt Kerr speech - get 15 minutes

No disciplinary action is planned so far against the group of about 10 students who stormed the stage at the Royal Ontario Museum Theatre Wednesday to disrupt a lecture by Clark Kerr, former president of the University of California.

University President Claude Bissell yesterday said he didn't anticipate action but suggested a clearer line be drawn between "activists and those not concerned with any positive outcome.

"I just hope for a triumph of reason," he said.

Kerr's U of T lecturing stint ended smoothly last night with no hint of the disruptions that threw the Wednesday night lecture into turmoil.

Wednesday night the students completely disrupted an overflow audience of over 500 people at the Royal Ontario Museum where Dr. Kerr was lecturing.

Kerr was probably a little suspicious of his audience after he had been presented with a bouquet of roses by one student and Bissell had received a lei of marshmallows from another. Kerr told his audience, "I left Berkeley as I entered it — fired with enthusiasm."

Three-quarters of the way through his speech on Higher Education in the United States and its Discontents, Kerr was interrupted by guerrilla theatre tactics.

Four members of the Toronto Student Movement rushed on stage and re-enacted the arrest of a former Berkeley student Mario Savio.

Savio's arrest took place in Kerr stands by silently as students take over the platform from him at the ROM Theatre Wednesday night. Bissell, here shown in a rare angry mood says Kerr "not unaccustomed to incidents of this sort," reacted coolly and was "more concerned about what will happen at U of T than for himself."

1964 after Kerr lost a battle with state governor over keeping police off campus. The result was another link in the chain of explosive events which continue today.

As the brief skit ended Museum attendants successfully herded the four students down off the stage as the hall erupted in shouting and cat-calls.

This continued for about five minutes while a TSM spokesman attempted to get the hall's attention. Another TSM supporter near the front of the hall, also tried to shout the audience but was dragged into the aisle by attendants.

When he got to the microphone, Kerr said: "I can only be impressed by the extraordinary efforts that people have gone to to make me feel I have never left Berkeley."

Bissell appealed for "fair play," but was also outshouted.

As complete chaos seemed about to erupt, Andy Wernick (SGS) walked slowly to the stage.

Bissell again rose from his seat and approached Wernick in an attempt to shake his hand

Bissell explained yesterday what happened: "My first disposition was to welcome him, asking what he wanted, and tell him to sit down until Kerr finished speaking. He wouldn't accept this and I thought he was moving to seize the microphone. I decided to stand in his way of going to the podium. The move was a gut-reaction to a threat to my guest."

When Bissell proffered his hand Wernick says he replied: "I'm not playing any of your liberal games."

Bissell stepped into Wernick's path and Wernick never reached the microphone. He remained on the stage, while about 10 supporters followed him up.

Attendants continued to try to persuade others to return to their seats.

Another shouting match developed between the audience and those on stage and lasted for several minutes.

"We don't want you in this country!"

"Give half an hour to this gentleman to finish his speech!"

"Most people like to sit and listen to polite lectures and then go home and have tea and sandwiches."

As the situation appeared to reach a stalemate, an irate Bissell picked up the mike and shouted, "We've had enough of facism here this evening."

The radicals agreed to sit down for 15 minutes after Bissell was approached by Bob Rae and D'Arcy Martin, two members of the Commission on University Government, and student Council member John Oldham. They proposed that TSM students be given an equal amount of time to speak after Kerr had concluded.

Speaking from the podium after Kerr concluded, Wernick tried to explain to the heckling audience the reason the students had disrupted the meeting.

He told the audience the educational system was a branch of society. Students who participate in this branch have become workers.

"A student revolt is the first move of students to organize themselves at their place of work," Wernick said.

He accused Kerr of being a bureaucrat whose function was to reduce tension and remove conflict.

"His function is counter-insurgency."

It was not Clark Kerr personally whom they were attacking, Wernick explained, but rather the system Kerr represented, one that was being imposed on the University of Toronto campus.

Police "join" Con Can Co pickets

Five policemen disguised as workers in workboots and parkas joined in with about 100 students and workers picketing the Continental Can Company plant in New Toronto early Monday morning.

The undercover policemen did not carry picket signs. The pickets did not suspect anything until one of the five left the microphone of a tape recorder hanging out of his pocket.

"When they waved goodbye and stepped into police cars, we were pretty certain they were cops," said picket Ken Stone, vice-president of the Ontario Union Students.

Besides the five police pickets, a busload of uniformed men waited around the corner while eight men on horseback, several squad cars and numerous policewomen kept tabs on the demonstration, at the corner of Commissioner and Logan Sts.

There were no incidents. Members of the Canadian Union of Operating Engineers have been on strike at the plant since Jan. 6 asking for a contract with 14 guarantees, including the right to respect other unions' picket lines.

Unionists charge the company has hired professional strikebreakers to keep the plant open by driving across the lines. They say that only by shutting the plant down through mass picketing can the strike be won.

Continental Can's 24 branch plants last year made sales of more than $100 million.

The people in this system see that radical action never takes place. The status quo is maintained and public discussion masks the power relations of society, Wernick said afterwards.

"What we tried on Wednesday night was to unmask these power relations and thus to unite thought and action," he said.

Kerr, replying to the TSM accusations, said training was only one function of the university. The university must also develop new ideas and serve as a major place where society is evaluated and criticized, he said.

Kerr described himself as an "individual concerned with the creative arts more than industrialization."

At last night's lecture Dr. Kerr discussed student revolt, which he said was a "universal phenomenon."

"Students generally tend to move in the same direction as the nation, only in a more exaggerated fashion," he said. "Campuses are developing a specialized student culture, a critical mass that could have some influence on the campus and upon society."

Dr. Kerr largely attributed the revolt to "the new technology."

Dr. Kerr's general solution for student revolt was to allow the student to choose among a greater variety of alternatives, and to give him more governing power where practically needed.

"We need a commitment to reason and persuasion and a rejection of force," he said.

After the lecture, Dr. Kerr fielded questions from the audience. There was no heckling.

Later U of T President Claude Bissell, who spent this evening with the audience instead of on the stage, privately congratulated Dr. Kerr on what he called a "magnificent speech."

Wednesday night Kerr restricted his lecture to his topic of "Higher Education in the United States."

This morning at 10 a.m. Kerr meets with the Commission on University Government in the Simcoe Hall Senate Chambers.

Liberals repress reforms through "openmindedness": CYC worker

By STEVE COWLEY

The bureaucratic oppression of the present Liberal government is responsible for the Italian community's problems, says Company of Young Canadians member Rick Slye.

Slye, field worker for the CYC's Toronto West Central Project, was speaking at Wednesday's meeting of the Liberal Club's Forum on Urban Poverty.

Citing unemployment, overcrowded housing and low incomes as the community's outstanding problems Slye said:

"Liberal governments make a fetish out of openmindedness. They use it to repress any meaningful social reforms.

"Militant Italian unionism would smash the whole farce," he said.

"Unscrupulous construction companies hire non-union Italian labor to work for low wages," he added. "Standard safety rules just don't apply on residential projects Italian workers are used on."

Slye partially blamed the "petty bourgeois" attitude of the average Italian worker.

"Most Italians would break their backs for minimum wages," he said. "They think of Canada as a huge factory. They want to work in that factory."

Other obstacles are "reactionary" Italian news media and student apathy caused by irrelevant university teaching.

"After completing a degree in sociology," he said, "my potential as a worker was destroyed.

"Sociology is an academic control mechanism. Only by abolishing sociology as an academic discipline can socially concerned students vent their concern."

The Glendon College campus of York University in Toronto voted yesterday to remain in the Canadian Union of Students. The vote was 407 to 85, with 56 per cent of the campus turning out.

Glendon also voted to remain in the Ontario Union of Students, 349 to 115. Glendon has an enrollment of 950 students.

The vote to stay in the World University Service was 403 for and 68 against staying in.

In the senate elections, Ron Kanter won over Vincent Del Buono, 322 to 180.

Robert McGraw was elected chairman of the student council with 294 votes.

Grads want say in Poli Sci reform

Graduate political science students want an equal say with faculty in reforming their department. They expect the Lakoff Report will "drift away into limbo."

This was the consensus of a meeting of almost 50 graduate poli sci students Wednesday when they decided to request a joint student-staff committee to examine all aspects of the graduate program.

At the Wednesday meeting the students approved a resolution saying the report prepared by three professors, headed by Prof. S. A. Lakoff, had "no redeeming educational merit" and that student suggestions had been treated with "arrogant disdain."

The university, not free speech, is at stake

The issue behind Wednesday's disruption of an address by Clark Kerr is only peripherally one of free speech.

Of course the address was interrupted for a few minutes by members of the Toronto Student Movement, but Clark Kerr has all the chance in the world to have his side heard.

The TSM can only bring up crucial issues about the kind of university and society Clark Kerr symbolizes by shocking the public into a discussion of the problems through disruptive action.

Kerr was allowed to speak, after the TSM had been promised equal time to attempt to refute Kerr's remarks. And this is the real issue—what Kerr was saying, and the importance of presenting the other side to his remarks.

Kerr spoke as an apologist for the American system of higher education, and ultimately for the American way of life circa 1969. As such his speech was riddled with distortions, half-truths and the occasional lie about what is happening to American education and American society.

These distortions had to be exposed, then and there. The TSM attempted to do that. That's why nowhere else would have done, and although we may quibble with the radicals' methods, they pale to insignificance before the reality underlying the pastel image of the United States presented by Kerr.

Compare the TSM's actions to that of Richard Daley's police in Chicago, Ronald Reagan's police at San Francisco State College, George Wallace's troops in Alabama and you see that reality—the oppressive structure of which Kerr is an integral part.

For however much Kerr may dissociate himself from these men, they are the reality of American political life today. It is for Ronald Reagan that Kerr apologizes when he states of American universities, "These are the best of times and the worst of times."

GOVERNMENT FUNDS

The best of times?

Kerr says that spending for education has doubled in the last 10 years to $20 billion a year, or two per cent of the Gross National Product. He doesn't mention the $30 billion a year spent fighting in Vietnam, and yet this fact is crucial in discussing American universities.

Kerr admits these universities are closely allied to the "military-industrial complex". He doesn't seem to realize that much of the unrest among students—this is part of his "worst of times"—hinges on opposition to this war and to the universities' part in the war.

Kerr said after his speech that he is national chairman of a group seeking a political settlement to the war. Yet Kerr's view of the university of providing "knowledge to better mankind" seems to hinge on the "obligation to serve" the larger society.

That "obligation to serve" means serving what even Kerr acknowledges is an unjust war, and in this light his view of the pluralistic, "neutral" university becomes a farce.

As "neutral" agents, American universities provide research facilities and manpower to develop weapons to kill, and techniques to suppress resistance among people who oppose the American economic and political takeover of their countries.

THE CIA

When Kerr praises the American universities' "studies in other parts of the world," he doesn't mention that many of these studies are financed by the Central Intelligence Agency and aimed at preventing people's revolts in those countries.

Kerr didn't say that American scholars are slowly being discredited in other parts of the world for this reason.

Kathleen Gough, an anthropologist writing in The Dissenting Academy, notes that "the United States is . . . dedicated to delaying or preventing social change throughout two-thirds of the world," and that much of this work is being done by and through the universities.

Miss Gough quotes a study by the American Anthropological Association which deplores "the damage already done to American anthropology abroad by the Central Intelligence Agency's alleged employment of non-anthropologists in the guise of anthropologists, and by its secret employment of some trained anthropologists who are said to have falsely represented themselves as engaged in anthropological research, in some cases for universities that in fact no longer employed them." (Page 153).

Is Kerr aware of this? He said in an interview after the speech that he had uncovered three CIA-sponsored studies on his campus. He did nothing because the nature of the contracts was "not such as to disturb students or faculty."

Kerr added that he had forbidden secret research at University of California, not because there is anything intrinsically wrong with such research, but because "some students and faculty could get security clearance and some could not."

This, we assume, might have been a disturbing factor.

Kerr said 25 per cent of the universities' bills are paid by the federal government "without controls". Very good—except Kerr and other university administrators have provided the controls themselves.

They've done it by their uncritical acceptance of government policies, so that the universities' "obligation to serve" seems to include support for a war even Kerr disagrees with. Kerr's university is a mindless servant to big business, the military and government. The university can have no policy, no direction of its own.

Kerr's analysis of student revolt is superficial. He cited Stony Brook College in New York in his speech, a college that has grown from zero to 5,000 students in five years. This growth, he said, has created an explosive situation there.

We heard another side recently from some students and faculty from Stony Brook. They were in Toronto to examine our system of university government with an eye to setting up their own system—without the permission of the president. It seems he isn't very responsive to student and faculty demands for a more democratic university—that's why there's revolt, not size.

NO PROBLEM

Kerr's whole attitude says there's no problem that can't be talked out, no need for ideology because there's no discontent that can't be fixed by a minor adjustment of personalities.

Society is just a mass of rough edges waiting for his skilled plane.

He doesn't consider himself part of a ruling class, possibly because he seems unwilling to take the blame for any of the atrocities of that ruling class, either in his country or abroad.

He's opposed to anything that might disrupt things, like secret research or CIA projects. Otherwise they are acceptable.

He says he is a man of principles and is a recognized civil libertarian, yet his commitment to these principles consists of talk, not the concrete, radical action that is needed.

He's a perfect liberal. He changes nothing that his elite doesn't want changed, and alters what they want altered. The only criterion seems to be the elite's approval or disapproval.

He will create the conditions for war research at his university, then disavow any responsibility for the results of this research.

He holds the American university up as "the model for the world."

Should it be? Should this be the model for Canadian universities—passive, inert and mindless?

He thinks so. And undoubtedly Dr. Bissell thinks so.

This is the issue, not free speech. Kerr has already got an ironclad right to free speech. He's got the police, government, military and industry on his side.

applauds Wernick

I would like to applaud the action of Andrew Wernick and his followers for their reactions at the Royal Ontario Museum on Wednesday night. Once again they have demonstrated that responsible students can bring credit to their university and themselves.

Had it not been for their foresight and timely participation, Dr. Kerr's lecture would have continued unabated; I am sure that we are all aware of how this would have disrupted our society. I think that Mr. Wernick made the principle abundantly clear when he stated, "We don't want you in this country. This country cannot stand conflict . . ." when referring to Dr. Kerr. Had Mr. Wernick and his associates not proceeded to storm the stage, shout, grapple the microphone away from Dr. Kerr, and initiate a shoving match with that notorious rowdy Dr. Claude Bissell after he attempted that old reactionary ploy of politely offering Mr. Wernick his hand, it is not hard to imagine the conflict that might have occurred had this representative of student opinion not interceded on our behalf.

So it seems that his small brigade of souls, the guardians of right and wrong have once again saved the day. This dedicated group would, I am sure, prefer to remain out of the limelight were they not forced to combat the evils of the establishment, because of our disgusting apathy. I have no doubt that had Dr. Kerr continued his speech uninterrupted, we would have been subjected to more obscenities such as "compromise", and "moderation".

It seems that Mr. Wernick's only accomplishment was to bring his own integrity and that of his associates into disrepute.

supports free speech

In no way am I a supporter of the "establishment" or of what Dr. Kerr represents, but on the other hand I am a supporter of free speech. If what Dr. Kerr had to say on Wednesday at the museum was representative of what we feel to be dehumanizing, then we have a moral duty to say so and to make our views clear. But we have no right to interfere with his freedom to express his views.

Both his and our views are those of men, not of gods, not of infallible men. Mr. Wernick does not speak eternal truths. We belly-ache about our rights but deny Dr. Kerr's. If what Dr. Kerr represents is "wrong", as Mr. Wernick believes, then I cannot see what he fears. For if so, those who listen to Dr. Kerr will hopefully be able to decide for themselves and reject any untrue statements. And if what he says is true, it can only advance our general body of knowledge. I do not understand why Mr. Wernick is so uptight. No one was stopping him from expressing his views, just asking him to respect others' rights.

Al Kamin's back from Greece and you know what's on his mind. (see R-6)

In the naive and euphoric summer of the Trudeau election campaign, there was a disquieting note about the Liberal campaign which we Liberals fluffed over, distracted as we were by the noise of battle and hand-rubbing anticipations of victory. Where was the Liberal platform, we asked nervously, while foraging through strategy maps of constituencies and piles of election signs? To reassure ourselves, we observed that the leader had only a month between the Convention and the Election to nail the planks of a platform together. So we excused the vacuous contents of the 'red book' of Liberal policy statements, assuming that after the boozing of election night someone would sit down and chart our course.

The Foreign Policy Review and Hellyer's Housing Task Force have been two of the most hotly ballyhoed evaluations of policy. The latter was released last week and we have a good idea about the probable contents of the former. Anybody left who is captured by the Trudeau dream had better read the Housing Task Force Report and think about the contents of the foreign policy review before resuming his position in the line behind the Pied Piper.

Housing

Hellyer's report on housing has been fried in the press this week and it deserves everything it's getting. If the report is the bones of Paul Hellyer's vision for a controlled human environment, then we are in real trouble. With the optimistic complacency permeating the report, the Task Force concludes with this gratuitous but revealing comment: "Some will accuse the task force of being socialistically inclined; others undoubtedly will brand its members captives of free enterprise. The members themselves will feel they have struck the proper balance if they are accused of both." I am, I suppose, one of those dismissed as branding them 'captives of free enterprise'. I am little interested to know who calls the report 'socialistically inclined'. You'd have to be a conservative of considerable paranoia to call this report even 'leaning left'.

More "socialistically inclined" (ugh) they should have been. Considerably more. It appears obvious that many Canadian urban problems, the shortage of mortgage money and the mind-sterilizing banality of high rise apartments, to name but two evidence of the urban malaise, have been caused # three boos and a tomato to the hellyer task force and the foreign policy review: a letter to anyone who still believes in the trudeau government.

—by mike ignatieff

(a) because private enterprise has defaulted its responsibilities in the field and

(b) because all three levels of government are hopelessly tangled in a jurisdictional war over the administration of our urban areas.

The Task Force won't admit (a), and assume that with prodding and biannual conferences with the federal government the loan sources in this country will set aside 10 billion dollars in mortgage money over the next five years instead of the present rate of 11.2 billion dollars over the past 14 years. And yet the same report admits that "during periods of high capital demand and inflationary pressure . . . present lenders tend to give first priority to other investments at the expense of residential mortgages". Having made this somewhat damning admission, the Task Force glibly passes over the need for the federal government to compel lending institutions to set a certain percentage of available money aside for residential mortgages.

The Task Force has an incredible regard for the people who build those filing cabinet high rises, presumably because two members of the Task Force, Hellyer himself, and Robert Campeau have been or are developers. The Task Force blames municipal bylaws and 'red-tape' for the incredibly barren subdivisions and high rise building in Canadian cities. Yet take a look at Campeau's prospective contribution to our waterfront: a series of sterile cruciform-shaped high rises, built as a private enclave for high-income single or childless swingers. (Campeau admits that the place is not providing for families). Now that's what Toronto really needs: another high-income set of boxes like the James Town apartments.

Liberating developers from red tape is not going to solve Canada's urban problems. We need nationally set minimum esthetic standards in development, in the same way that we have a National Building Code, and we need to co-ordinate esthetic and visual research in Ottawa, in addition to research on land use, transportation etc. We must bombard the developers with creative esthetic designs for housing and transportation systems.

The Task Force is clearly aware of the jurisdictional and taxing tangle dividing the three levels of government. Yet it can only contribute to the tangle and the resentment by lower levels of government of federal initiatives by its proposals for direct federal-municipal loans and agreements which bypass the provinces. What is really needed is a new approach to the present Constitutional debate between the provinces and the federal government. We need to get beyond the present haggling over language rights and the costs of education and involve municipal governments and regional governments in the Constitutional Conference to work out what Trudeau called for during the election: a 'functional' division of powers to deal with urban problems.

Foreign Policy

You don't have to be a genius to guess what we'll have for a foreign policy once the civil service's review of our present commitments is completed. We'll still be in NATO. We'll still be in NORAD. (Mitchell Sharp told us last December on The Way It Is that he didn't want to stop public debate about NATO policy, but as far as he was concerned the issue was settled by the Czechoslovakian invasion. And how long is Eric Kierans, a junior Minister going to hold on in the Cabinet with Cadieux and Sharp convinced that we should stay in?).

The NATO and NORAD questions are the crux of the review. If we get out, we can genuinely embark upon a less stable, but infinitely more constructive foreign policy. If we stay in, the possibility for new foreign policy initiatives will be severely limited and the 'new policy' will be a stew brewed of a dab of the Vatican, a pinch of Red China, a tortilla of Latin America, and a snippet of more multilateral aid.

Mitchell Sharp said before Christmas he hadn't heard any good arguments for our withdrawal from NATO and

NORAD and for a scaling down of military expenditure. Here are a few:

External Affairs justifies our membership in NATO and NORAD, first of all, on the grounds that our membership makes us privy to important decisions. Our membership in NATO and NORAD give us that elusive elixir, 'influence'.

All right. We have just got to accept the fact that we are not very important to the Americans. George Ball's opinion that we should have ceased to exist as a country long ago is merely Ball's usually arrogant, imperious way of expressing what most State and Defense Department people probably feel deep down — that is, whenever, if ever, they think about us. I am not being weepy. I'm rather glad they care so little about us. But I think we ought to discard the 'neighbour to the North' myth about American attitudes towards us, and admit that when the chips are down for the Americans, (i.e. in Vietnam, continental defense, nuclear strategy) we don't have 'influence'.

Mitchell Sharp sounded pathetic on TV last December when he said that when he went down to Latin America on his ministerial mission every foreign minister wanted to know 'the inside story' on the Cuban Missile Crisis from our vantage point on the NATO Council. The Kennedy decisions about Cuba were taken in the Oval Room of the White House and not in NATO Headquarters. Kennedy merely had the good taste to inform the 'Allies' post facto about the embargo.

Certainly we should try to 'influence' the Americans. But let's stop thinking we're better at it than anybody else. And let's not make 'influencing' the Americans through NATO and NORAD the lynch pin of our diplomacy, because the gains do not outweigh the loss of 'influence' in other areas of the world repelled by our nervous cozziness with the U.S.

Let's remember, for instance, that our membership in both alliances makes the Communist World and many unaligned or pro-Communist members of the Afro-Asian bloc suspicious of us. We have a small, but useful role to play in Africa — as a white Western nation with lots of technical expertise, some money, and no unpleasant imperial interests — that is, if we cut ourselves loose.

Of course the silent and cautious men in External argue that NORAD and NATO are 'essential to Canada's defense and to the defense of Europe.

Let's look at this proposition from a different vantage point. First NATO and the defence of Europe. I am doubtful that NATO conventional forces could hold Europe against the Russian divisions in Eastern Germany. One estimate is that under conventional attack, our brigade could hold out for six hours and then would have to make a dash for the Channel or call in American tactical nuclear weapons. It is in fact unlikely that Russian divisions would use conventional weapons in an effort to take Europe. Thus the bad old balance of nuclear terror is the keeper of the European peace, that is if you accept the idea that the Russians are committed to anything more aggressive than keeping their satellites in line.

The same kind of arguments apply to NORAD. North America will not be attacked from outside by conventional weapons, but by nuclear weapons launched from offshore submarines etc. And if Canada was attacked by the United States (why bother?) any amount of Canadian defense could not stop them.

When you add it up there is no justification for our armed forces. After the experience of the Congo and UNEF in the Gaza Strip there is little foreseeable role for peace-keeping. The developing nations object bitterly (in Nigeria for instance) to the idea of white peace armies mediating their disputes. There may be a Canadian peace-keeping role in a Vietnam settlement. For that and the distant eventuality of other peace-keeping roles we might retain an essentially non-military force. But for defense: you're kidding me.

As to membership in a nuclear anti-ballistic missile system under NORAD command, the Americans have to defend us anyway, since we are effectively part of nuclear bombing targets. We make no real contribution to NORAD: the decision to deploy nuclear weapons in the event of a strike is with the men in the basement of the White House. The Americans do not even need our territory for a ballistic warning system.

But there are even more obvious and compelling reasons to say the hell with NORAD. If we really believe that nuclear war is impossible, if we really acknowledge that any amount of ABM detection systems and counter-strike systems are not going to avert devastation in the event of a nuclear attack, then let us, as a middle power, take these truths seriously. If the Americans believe that it is worth it to spend billions on a 'light' anti-ballistic missile system which even MacNamara describes as useless, then let's say we won't have any part of it. Somebody has to start. Unilateralism is possible for a middle power in the nuclear age.

Anyone who lived in the age of Munich will find all of the preceding argument infu-riating cowardice. They may, however, be persuaded by the ludicrous costs of nuclear protection. Maybe, when the Americans ask us to become involved in their 'heavy' or 'light' ABM system, they will start reconsidering all of the old arguments.

The Review prize for fatuity goes to Pierre Trudeau for suggesting that if we withdraw from our NATO and NORAD alliances we would have maintain a huge army to protect our neutrality. Against whom, pray?

Withdrawal from NATO and NORAD is not primarily a moral issue: it is a question of priorities. The federal government is weeping that it doesn't have enough money for a war on poverty, for a co-ordinated attack on the problems of the urban environment by all three levels of government, for a substantial Aid program to underdeveloped countries. We cannot raise sufficient revenue for these massive tasks by increasing taxation indefinitely. So let's take a substantial swipe at the defence budget. Now. And do some of the things that Liberal rhetoric has been urging upon us for a generation. Take a look at the foreign policy review and the Housing Task Force. If you still want to follow the Pied Piper, it's up to you. I won't be in the line.

ninety minutes from fourteen kids

Fourteen kids from Toronto high schools; Mort Ransen, director, counsellor, resource person; an NFB film crew and an important ninety minute feature called Christopher's Movie Matinee.

On the final page of the latest issue of Take One, the promotional piece reads, "A film about youth, by youth." And then humbly, "Produced and distributed by the National Film Board of Canada." The photograph included in that ad could very well be all you will ever see of Christopher and that's more than unfortunate. Not only is the film an unpretentiously exciting experience for anyone, but more importantly it's the sincere and significant expression of fourteen kids directed against the middle-class ethic which rules and suppresses them.

Actually the film is more of a subtle nemetic weapon than an outcry. Both in the initial and final stages of production the only guideline which Ransen and the kids adhered to was that the purpose of the film should be reverse enlightenment. Instead of accepting the propaganda foisted off on them by an insensitive hierarchy of authorities, all concerned with the production felt that it was important that Christopher should foment something of a mind revolution in high schools. Naturally the Board of Education, motivated by their infinite wisdom, has virtually ignored the necessity of a film which communicates by travelling on beyond the sort of bullshit which they have perpetrated.

The film has also triggered a good deal of tension within the NFB itself. Certain non-institutionalized minds at the Film Board have supported Ransen's demand that the film must remain within the control of the kids themselves — that it must be used as a cinematic catalyst and not simply as commercial entertainment. Upper management disagrees . . . of course. Production hassles, especially the refusal of Ransen and the kids to emasculate Christopher by reducing it to a twenty minute classroom film, and the commercial unfeasibility of selling a release print at a cost of $388 to a high school organization have convinced many pocket-potentates at the NFB that Christopher's Movie Matinee is a dismal disaster. As a result, the film may never be seen by anyone, anywhere. Chalk up another triumph for the genius of the capitalist mentality.

The film itself was shot a year and a half ago over a three week period at a cost of $32,000. The motivating forces behind Christopher lie with producer, Joe Koenig, and Mort Ransen himself, who together convinced the NFB to place a camera crew and unit manager at the disposal of a group of high school kids from Toronto. In no way was the film to be representative of all teen-age reactions and behaviour but rather the expression of a few exceptional kids who would create a movie about themselves and the environment in which they lived. As it happened in the course of the shooting, the kids became momentarily involved in the crusade to close Yorkville Avenue to traffic. Another NFB film crew was simultaneously shooting a documentary in the Village and had planned a sequence in Queen's Park. Our city fathers were aroused by an allegedly NFB-staged demonstration and Ransen's crew, which unfortunately was also filming in Queen's Park at the time, was recalled by the Film Board in Montreal and so ended Christopher. But not the controversy.

Peter Keefe, one of the youngest members in Christopher, says "When the movie was shown at Humberstone, an English teacher stood up and said that we all weren't very articulate and that the truth wasn't brought out. The reaction of older people has been mostly negative." It's not overly difficult to realize the reason.

Generally the kids in Christopher's Movie Matinee have little tolerance for the bullshit around them. One scene which involves David Depoe, the kids and Allan Lamport is particularly damning. After the controller has pontificated about a lack of understanding between the city and the Village, the scene cuts to Lamport ignoring the kids' questions after the reporters and cameramen have departed at the end of the meeting. The hypocrisy and meaninglessness of authority is blatant throughout Christopher.

A good deal of tension is generated in the film, not only at the level of confrontation between the kids and authority; but also between the kids and the crew itself. Much of the film is concerned with discussion as to how and where a scene is to be shot, usually with the cameraman deciding that the sequence can't be filmed as the kids want. The result is a good deal of irrational footage in which a scene begins with neither Ransen, the kids, the crew nor the audience knowing what will result. Often nothing does and that is exactly the point. Christopher's Movie Matinee is like the rock music in the soundtrack — it's all emotion and instantaneous reaction. The film is immediate, spontaneous and deliberately rough along the edges.

But Christopher is more than confrontation, tension and irrationality. It's also subtle and gentle without any sense of contradiction between the emotions it generates. Darleen, with long hair and sensitivity behind her eyes, speaks of Christopher as "Very personal" — as personal as the scene between her and Larry in a sunny field; as personal as Mort whispering to her as she cries or the boy trying so hard not to betray love as the film ends. Christopher's Movie Matinee is beautiful without clichés, sincere without pretension and perhaps one of the most important films the National Film Board has ever made.

more bazooka bill from "play dirty"

If you weren't very excited about the films in town last week (I wasn't), you'll be even less excited about the offerings this week. Toronto theatres are still riding high on the ten or so films that came to town with Christmas dollars. One new film, Play Dirty, has opened at the Loew's, but you can skip it. It's a very ordinary war picture with Michael Caine. Not only is it unoriginal and loaded with clichéd situations, but even the clichés aren't effective. Play Dirty was a very boring assignment. The plot is one of those never-to-be-forgotten war stories that old soldiers tell each other as they wait around to atrophy. A book was written about the amazing adventures of a brigade (let's see:- Devil's Brigade, Dirty Dozen, Guns of Navarone), and around 1954, just when WW II films made money, the push was on.

I haven't seen too many war movies lately, but I get the feeling that Play Dirty is no different than the old Bazooka Bill comic book stories that were once the driving force in my life. There's a platoon in North Africa made up of ex-convicts and that sort of ruff, trying to accomplish a dangerous secret mission against the mean, nasty, ugly Germans. Well, that's exaggerating a little — the Germans don't get to say very much. And, of course, there's a conflict in the personalities of two of the leaders of the group. In this case, it's between Nigel Davenport, the dirty (he's the one after whom they named the film) tough, experienced desert fighter without scruples, and Michael Caine, blue-eyed, heavy-lidded, upright, British army colonel.

As directed by Andre De Toth, all characters are one-dimensional. The story is a poor imitation of the Dirty Dozen, with 7 bodies instead of 12. Not only that, but most of them are Arabs. They all look sinister enough and take orders from Nigel Davenport, not Michael Caine. That's the conflict running through the film. Hardly enough to keep awake. The unit is the work of an eccentric commanding officer, who fails all his missions. He puts clean-cut, soft-yet-strong Mr. Caine in charge of the unit and off they go to destroy a fuel dump. For an hour and a half, they tramp through the desert with a bit of gore here and there. The suspense for that first ninety minutes is tranquilizing.

The only characters that have any colour are two Arab homosexuals, who happen to be demolition experts. Their depiction on screen is short on humour and long on tasteless and obtrusive crudity. As the seven soldiers drag through the desert, the camera quickly moves to catch the two Arabs, Hassam and Issan, displaying their antics (in asides). Running down the hill hand in hand, or cuddling in the jeep, this sleazily portrayed sensationalism was obviously added to keep the story moving.

The screenplay by Lotte Colin is a disaster. It emphasizes an obscure mission which no one cares about, all the while trying to show us what dirty guys made up the war effort. Michael Caine's suede-shoed nobility counters the others. There isn't even enough dirty fighting to make you laugh the whole thing off. Filmed somewhere in Spain, there are some excellent travelogue-type shots of desert sands, sand storms, camels and things. No one stood out in the movie, least of all Michael Caine. There was a time when his blank stare and heavy eyes suggested intelligence of some sort; now it just suggests insomnia.

It's a shame that the film was so completely botched up, because the ending is rather good. But the final three minutes, come almost as an after-thought to the rest of the picture.

Play Dirty isn't dirty; it has no suspense, or at least not until the last twenty minutes, it isn't bloody. It's neither a good war movie nor a good anti-war movie, the characters are nothings, and I felt like I had just wasted a part of my life in the theatre that afternoon. — arny wise

Al Kamin works in the Rochdale Restaurant. He has the...

Dear brothers and sisters at University of Toronto,

Getting to be that time of year. Nose to the grindstone. Get those grades. You're gonna succeed. Someday it'll all be worthwhile, eh? Are you making it? I hope so. Are you really making it? Are you living your life to its fullest? Are you using your own sacred body, the product of 2 billion years of wise evolutionary experimentation, to its maximum potential? If not, don't blame the establishment. Their bad trip is no excuse for yours. Every human life has an infinity of potentiality open to it, but the responsibility for realizing these potentialities rests squarely on your shoulders.

If you're open to new possibilities for coming-aliveness, read on.

The magic potion, the elixir of life, the fountain of youth, is here right now. And, as has always been the case with such materials, it is ignored and scorned by everybody except those who are ready.

Are you ready?

LSD

But, not LSD drop a cap freak around groovy.

The magic word is discipline.

To get the really big kicks, the ones those gleaming wise men throughout eternity have sung about, requires patience and dedication. The ability to ride out those moments of profound terror and confusion without running for the asylum treatment. Also, the ability to abstain from things which feel good, like being brilliant or well-liked, or just plain having a good time, when these activities keep you from going deeper and further out. The discipline of ecstasy demands that you be fussy, that you raise your sights high, that you don't settle for second best because wow there's no substitute for the real thing.

Spending your whole trip grooving to music or getting into incredible discussions and wild freaking romps is great, but if you want to see it all, there comes a point where you have to go beyond that. The great teachers of meditation have all taught that among the big dangers in meditation are the pleasurable situations that weave a web of such powerful fascination that the person wants to stay there. Let it all pass.

Preparing for High-Energy Tripping

Make it sexually. The natural way to take LSD is with a member of the opposite sex. LSD is no substitute for balling. One of the great goals of spiritual acid using should be the expansion of your love-making capabilities.

Make it with yourself. One day each week or month, withdraw from all social contact and external responsibility. Sit, think about yourself and your relationship to life around you, your role on this planet; wander. The more time you spend alone, the less harried and self-centered you will be when you are with others. Fasting is a good accompaniment to these periods of withdrawal. Teach yourself to meditate. Try smoking grass alone, and sitting stoned in meditative posture in a dark, quiet room. Hatha yoga exercises can start your body humming; they are an excellent preparation for psychedelic yoga.

Tone down. Practice speaking more softly; say what you want to say simply and cleanly. Be gentle. There is no fast pathological bind to your behaviour. Change can come from the outside in as well as the inside out. Anybody can start to teach himself love and tolerance, and your LSD tripping will expand on these beginnings.

Read the great psychedelic masters like

Lao-Tzu
Chuang-Tzu
The Buddha
Herman Hesse
Timothy Leary

to name a few.

As you become turned on, their words will assume a new crystal clarity. Timothy Leary is the most happening-with-God man alive and writing today. Read his two latest books, The Politics of Ecstasy and High Priest. Read them slowly and carefully. That does not mean that everything that Leary says should be taken as the final and absolute word. You will have a chance to run everything through the filter of your own psychedelic experience. Note Leary's attitude of humility and awe and reverence before the incredible energies at which even he can only briefly peer. This is the inevitable result of extended experience with expanded consciousness, and it is the formula which works to get you out there.

The Ecstatic Journey, a book edited by Ralph Metzner, is valuable reading. It is a collection of first-hand accounts by psychedelic trippers. Note the frightening terrain through which every voyageur must pass en route to the supreme delights. Similarly, Harry Haller in Hesse's Steppenwolf encounters gory horror, but stays with it. Don't take LSD unless you are prepared to go through hell to get to heaven, because that's the route you have to take to get there. The visions themselves will not harm you. If you run from them, you may wind yourself into spiralling panic. This is the bad trip. If you accept them and go with them, you will go beyond them.

Setting up Your Trip

Your trip setting is of central importance to the nature of your trip. Don't expect to transcend your ego sitting in a restaurant booth, although God knows it can happen anywhere. The big trips should be done alone, with sexual partner, or with a very few close friends. An experienced guide is helpful, but qualified people are rare. You can do it on your own. You have to do it yourself, guide or no guide. It is wise for a person guiding psychedelic sessions to trip on a small dose himself. Spiritual trips are best done in a silent spot; a natural setting is ideal. Beware of jangling automatic machine noises, such as those from furnaces. Car noises are not so bad. Tripping out beyond earth-life to the tooting of car-horns is the 1969 way to go. Arrange your setting to avoid interruption, sudden intrusion. And trip with people who will let you go into your trip as they go into theirs, and not pull you into confining social games.

Records are good in the early and late stages of a high-energy trip. At the peak of the trip there is ecstatic silence. Select records that swing freely, that sing of life.

with: Here below is his Guide to the Spiritual Use of LSD.

Sergeant Peppers and the music of Ravi Shankar and Ali Akbar Khan are a good start; avoid music that harps on themes of bitterness and self-pity and sentimentality; the superficiality of these will be obvious immediately to the LSD-perceptive mind.

To have the high experiences you need the high dosage. Two hundred micrograms of LSD at the least, or the equivalent of maybe three lack-market "hits".

A note on physical effects: the latest evidence casts doubt on the early test tube reports of chromosomal damage. Timothy Leary, with 650 trips behind him, was given a chromosomal count and came out clean. Similar results emerged from studies of schizophrenic children who had been treated with frequent high doses of LSD.

For me, it has been reassuring and inspiring to meet with people who have seriously followed the LSD yoga over hundreds of trips. They are sparkling, alive, supple, and place a high value on the care of their organisms. Physical health seems to improve with extended psychedelic experience.

One final warning: you can only stay a short while at the highest levels of consciousness. The LSD yoga is a rhythm of up-down, in-out. You must return to Earth Canada Toronto 1969. Your duty will be to work at harmonizing your life with your psychedelic insights. Many people will take a very few trips and then stop, claiming that now they know it all. Their knowledge can only be a vague intellectual recollection of their experience. The real development comes from using LSD many times as part of a continuing ongoing process.

All this advice represents the accumulation of technique and awareness which I have acquired from about 40 trips. They describe the way I would set up my trips today. Still, they reflect only a bare beginning towards understanding the energies which LSD opens. Generally, my trip settings, especially in my early trips, have been far from ideal. I have blundered at every step. You will too. Still, LSD can work for you if you stick with it. Be humble in success and persevering in adversity. Be with God and God will be with you.

duke ellington "north of the border" in canada

Duke Ellington "North of the Border" in Canada.

Decca DL 75069

Last fall Duke Ellington (who will be 70 years old in a couple of months) attended a luncheon at Julie's over on Jarvis St. He was there to help push a record he had made in the summer of Canada's centennial. For a nominal fee, Ellington had donated his time, his talent, and most importantly, his name, to help get some recognition for Canadian composers.

Gathered around the well stocked bar were a lot of executive types from Decca records, CAPAC (Composers, Authors, and Publishers Association of Canada), and various radio, TV, and newspaper people, all of them just knocking it back. After all, it was free. When everyone was loaded, they retired to the dining room and stuffed themselves with the non-liquid part of the lunch.

Finally, it was time for speeches. Many men rose, each one introducing the next. When all this important business had been taken care of, some one thoughtfully introduced the guest of honour.

Ellington, looking old and tired, but nevertheless very urbane, as usual, made a few modest comments about how much he had enjoyed making the record and working with Gordon Delamont, Norm Symonds, and Ron Collier. Each of these composers also made a few remarks.

Then it was question time.

Did the duke think that Canadian composers were as talented as American composers?

Did Ellington think it was necessary for a Canadian composer to leave the country to get recognition?

And so on. That's it, play up to the Canadian inferiority complex, ye interrogators.

A Decca executive (one of the higher ones) rocked back and forth on his feet and allowed as how the duke had some talent. What he wanted to know was, would Ellington have become such a great success if he had been born in Canada?

Another man from Decca, who was unable to rise, shouted out that, yes, Duke was a very talented entertainer, no doubt about it. Could the Duke tell us to what he attributed his success?

Throughout these patronizing and stupid questions, Ellington remained calm, patient, debonair, although a bit weary, it seemed. Finally, however, everyone had to get back to their offices to sleep it off. So they took their free records, had them autographed by Ellington, and trooped out.

After all the fuss, the record turned out to be very good. One gets to hear Ellington in quite a different context from the usual. Here, Ellington is a soloist in settings in which he had no hand in designing. Each of the three composers has written two pieces of music utilizing different orchestral combinations. Ron Collier's "Aurora Borealis" has the usual trumpets, trombones and saxophones, plus a whole pack of violins and french horns and things. "Nameless Hour", by Norm Symonds, has strings only, while the remainder of the selections feature a 12 piece jazz band.

Since Gordon Delamont learned much about the art of composing music from Duke Ellington, and Symonds and Collier were once pupils of Delamont, it is not surprising that all the compositions on this record are strong on attractive melodies. Perhaps the nicest themes are found in Delamont's "Song and Dance" (I'm sitting here humming the tune as I write.) In this piece, Ellington has a lovely unaccompanied piano solo, which is one of the best moments on the record.

The other highlight is Symonds' "Nameless Hour". While violins, violas, celli, and basses play very austere chords, with lots of perfect fourths and fifths and very high voicings, the pianist makes some tentative, spare explorations. The effect is somewhat spoiled by a stretch in the middle of the piece which is rather clichéd. However, on the whole, the piece sets up a very interesting tension which finally isn't quite resolved, which creates a rather unsettling, almost unfinished feeling. (By the way, bassist Sam Levine executes his parts with notable authority.)

The compositions are worth hearing; they are well played and well recorded. Perhaps the most interesting result of this project is Norm Symonds' comment.

"Working with Duke", he said, "was a memorable experience. I had always respected him, but I had completely underestimated him. He's a musician who has never stopped growing. He utilizes the knowledge and experience of 50 years to build fresh ideas and approaches. He's a virtuoso musician."

kerr, the tsm, and an evening of insanity

"I saw the best minds of my generation destroyed by madness, starving, hysterical naked."

—Allen Ginsberg

Some best and not-so-best minds went mad in the basement of the Royal Ontario Museum Wednesday night.

That basement is usually a forum for films or lectures and docile audiences planted in their flower-pot seats by grandmother men called ushers.

But Wednesday night former Berkley President Clark Kerr came to preach liberalism to an audience of radicals.

Kerr was on stage delivering hackneyed lines in the lead role, and U of T President Claude Bissell was up-tight in an overacted supporting role, and the Toronto Student Movement jeered from the stalls and crowded the stage, and the audience became the play and Kerr the spectator.

But there was no real violence, just insanity, for there were only half a dozen cops and they were armed with boredom.

The tension had been building up for a long time . . .

TSM leader Andy Wernick watched the liberal adventurism in the Students Administrative Council until his tolerance broke; he watched the co-option of the moderate left into the Commission on University Government; he watched Bissell fragment the embryonic student movement into warring factions; and at Tent City in the early fall he told a mass meeting that Claude Bissell was the Clark Kerr of Canada, and Bissell laughed as part of the game.

Wernick hated the games of Bissell and Kerr because he felt the frustration in dealing with the politics of marshmallow absorption as a substitute for the politics of confrontation.

"Clark Kerr is a bureaucrat, and he'll admit it, and the job of a bureaucrat is to suppress conflict," says Wernick, for he sees Kerr as the administrator who will tinker with the technocratic structure to make it look peachy to students. While the system remains basically the same.

Wernick and the TSM felt Kerr's arrival in Toronto was the final insult . . .

Kerr droned on motionless and expressionless with tape-recorder sincerity, as I listened via a sound-system in an adjacent room for the overflow of the audience.

They stared at the speaker's grill cloth with the same vapid tolerance that the audience in the other room accorded the in-person Kerr.

Then there was sudden shouting and heckling from the speaker, Kerr's robot tones had stopped, and the overflow listeners strained to hear the muffled disturbance. They looked at one another, and they knew it had happened as they expected, for they were mostly radicals. A few heard familiar voices: a few ran into the auditorium, and then everyone followed.

The fire regulations said no standing in theatre, but the ushers could only watch as forty students rushed into the theatre.

Wernick was on stage trying to get to the microphone, while Bissell tried to shake hands with him, and then tried to push him off the stage. The TSM members were all around the stage, and one old usher jostled for a moment with Wernick, and Bissell used the TSM megaphone to plead for free speech for Kerr. He was seeing physical confrontation for the first time on his pasteurized campus. His face was contorted with rage, and his voice was the loudest it had been this year. But then everyone else was shouting for everyone else to shut up.

But Kerr stood at the lectern as a silent monolith for fifteen minutes.

The theatre had become a shouting arena. As the radicals at the back told Kerr to go home, a well-heeled statue of a man who looked like the Museum's proprietor lectured them.

"You didn't fight in the last war, did you?" he asked. His sophistication and sarcasm expressed a mild curiosity.

The radicals looked at him as if here were James Mason.

"At least I've got some manners, some breeding," he said. Manners, breeding, and an English accent among the colonials—the answer of real politique in a sticky situation.

The answer to the confrontation was inevitable and perhaps prophetic of future answers: liberal compromise. Free speech is defined: Kerr gets another fifteen minutes, and Wernick gets fifteen minutes.

And the problems of the world are solved.

Wernick calls Kerr industrialist, bureaucrat, liar.

Kerr is unphased. Platitudes about the Gross National Product. His solution is optimism.

The insanity of the meeting peters out with some intelligent analysis from TSM member Phil Resnick and some harmless jargon from Laurel Limpus.

All the while there's a man in the audience telling the speaker on stage to shut up, and another man in the audience tells that man to shut up, and so on until everyone goes "shhhhh."

And whenever called upon, Kerr is activated to ease the collective conscience of his society, to rationalize the United States of America. A society tries to justify its institutionalized madness. It seeks a liberal to suppress conflict, an apologist to justify institutionalized inhumanity, an expert to prove that a computer is a better teacher than a man, and a prophet to preach the tactic of optimism as an ideal.

Clark Kerr serves the purpose.

re-reading kerr after wednesday night

Clark Kerr, The Uses of the University, Harper Torchbooks, 1963, $1.85

Claude Bissell, The Strength of the University, University of Toronto Press, 1968, $1.95

Clark Kerr's book has been bandying about for six years, but after listening to him on Wednesday night, it was clear that it is still the key to his view of the university in industrial society. And Claude Bissell's collection of addresses has only been out for about six months and provides us with some basis for comparison.

Kerr has become more notorious than famous and his book is now almost amusing in its boundless optimism and detachment about the multi-versity. It is perhaps the toughest and most uncompromising analysis of what has really happened to the American university, and what is slowly happening to its Canadian counterpart.

What sets Kerr's analysis apart is that it says nothing about the wrongness or rightness of what has happened: the multiversity has become the servant of government and industry; a bureaucratic administrative revolution is taking place within the university; the faculty have become the new professionals in the knowledge industry. The phrases are all his: what is frightening is that Kerr is quite content that these developments have taken place. The claim that the university is, in a sense, a factory, he would probably have to accept. This of course means that the conflict between Marxists and liberal welfare capitalists has moved directly into the university. This is not very profound on the part of the reviewer, but what is happening is so crystalline clear that it perhaps merits some pedantic reiteration. If only for emphasis.

Any criticism of Kerr after Hall Draper's essay 'The Mind of Clark Kerr' will seem a little empty. Draper wrote the great piece on the technocratic intelligence and its amorality. The great question to ask Kerr now, particularly after his reception on Wednesday night, is whether his iron laws of progress have been affected at all by student revolt, or whether he considers these outbursts merely forms of twentieth century Luddism.

Re-reading Kerr six years after it was published one is struck most of all by his real insensitivity to reactions of people inside the institution so tied in with the corporate world. Its complacency and faith in neutral technological progress places Kerr clearly in the tradition of the 1950's end-of-ideology school of thought. It is perhaps pertinent to quote C. Wright Mills: "The end-of-ideology . . . circulating among the prematurely middle-aged . . . rests upon a disbelief in the shaping by men of their own futures — as history and as biography. It is a consensus of a few provincials . . ."

As Draper points out at great length, this is the great feature of Kerr's thought: certain things have happened to the university, it has become 'statified', tied to federal money and corporate ideas. These are trends which are, implicitly, inevitable; to try and stop them is, probably, futile. I said earlier it is a "tough" analysis. But events at Berkeley and Columbia (and even Toronto) surely prove that it is also dead wrong.

For many of this generation of students have simply not been content to accept futures decided for them by managerial consensus. The non-ideological, corporate world has been rejected. And they are determined to revolutionize the university, to control it in face of corporate pressure. Kerr's analysis is essentially inaccurate because it is inhuman. It will not allow for a human reaction to a series of technological economic imperatives. And that reaction is exactly what is taking place.

Dr. Bissell's book will not lend itself to the same controversy as Clark Kerr's. The analysis is more bland, and, as a result, more palatable. Bissell is a humanist and a rhetorician; he enjoys the well-turned phrase, the resounding quotation from Cardinal Newman and Matthew Arnold. His ideas are a strange mixture of nineteenth century British liberalism and twentieth century American liberalism. His favorite sources are probably Arnold and Galbraith.

Where Bissell has a greater understanding in contrast with Kerr is in talking about students (Kerr is fact mentions them only fleetingly). It is probably one of Bissell's great strengths. Where he lacks cogency is in appreciating the nature of corporate society; one gets the feeling that he does not appreciate the pressures on the university, not merely from government, but from the ideology of corporate efficiency. The whole section on 'The Role and the Purpose' is empty of real analysis on concrete problems. Chapters on "Business and the University" and the "University and Canadian-American Relations" do not come to grips at all with the real pressures on the Canadian university.

Thus if Kerr is a friendly carnivore, Dr. Bissell is a well-meaning vegetarian, in the company of the corporate lions. Bissell seems more aware of the need for an independent university. Kerr is more hard-headed about the "romanticism" of this approach. We are living in an industrial society, writes Kerr, therefore it is naive to think that the university will play other than an essentially industrial role. Kerr's book is explicit fodder for the radical's cannon; Bissell seems to be trying to fudge the basic issues, with some effect, and in all probability with no malice intended.

The events on Wednesday night only dramatized the conflict between bureaucratic "repressive tolerance" and neo-Marcusian radicals. It was bound to happen. The Free Speech area marked the beginning of the TSM revival, the first radicalism in Toronto to get away from the electoral establishment constrictions of the SAC.

What can never be measured is the nature of reaction. For the purists, what was for them an oppressive society will only become more obviously oppressive: confrontations will reveal the true repressor behind every smiling liberal. But in the long run, we are all dead; surely we are beyond believing that we can sacrifice the present for some sinless millenium. The means we use now will reflect any society we try to build.

Liberals sympathetic to a lot of change should be talked to with a little more generosity than seems to be the trend. Guerrilla politics in twentieth century industrial society is defeatist madness: it will be snuffed out, not only by repressive liberals, but by liberal humanists as well. A more broadly based, peaceful, but militant alliance of the democratic left would surely be a more effective, and in the long run a more just, opponent to the Clark Kerrs of this world than a flurry of ineffectual spanners tossed into the works.

tracy street

The children were out playing on Tracy Street as my girl friend and I walked through Cabbagetown last summer. We noticed the number of trucks rumbling through and couldn't help wondering whether the kids were always so successful in dodging them. The sun was bright and the narrow alley with its rows of tiny frame houses like rambling shacks from some deserted mining town seemed a perfect setting for some photographs of these survivors.

MUSIC

Balex, back from 62 hours awake at the wheel of Radio Varsity (he tells us he hallucinated at 50 hours — visions of men hanging from lamposts outside Simcoe Hall and rats scurrying around U.C.) has returned alive from the Electric Circus to tell this tale:

"With the two seven foot high columns (two 22" speakers per column) firing at half throttle, and the other superfluous sound sciences working on your head, you can virtually feel the paint peeling off the walls while the crowd around you, below the 30 foot domed ballroom on the butterfly-frequented floor, search through their own peeling minds. . . Escape from the performance theatre to soft possessive seats in quiet corners, to circular foam covered adult playpens, to explore up exciting stairwells to an all white graffiti room where you may add your own pearls of wit, or you may cool off in the body paint shop where moist iridescent water, colour brushes decorate your exposed flesh. . ."

Why, that's lovely, Balex. Now go back to bed.

ET CETERA

Our friend, Elizabeth Wilson, tells us there is going to be a seminar on communications theory and its application to education at Scarborough all day Saturday, February 8. Trinity College is sponsoring the seminar and you can get tickets ($2.00) at the Convocation Office at Trinity.

Multi-media education techniques, lectures, films, panels — indeed, every kind of info bombardment technique known to man and beast, will be used to teach you about communications theory. One of the stars performing at the seminar will be the Rev. John M. Culkin, Director of the Centre for Communications at Fordham (where McLuhan-guru spent last year, for God's sake). So if you want to know about the 'ed biz' as Tom Lehrer calls it, you better be out at Scarborough starting at 10:30 a.m. tomorrow. After all, anything our friend, Elizabeth, suggests has got to be good, good, good. . .

William Matthews will be reading a collection of his works at Hart House on Monday, February 10 at 1:15 p.m. Reputable rumour mongers have it that if you miss him you will be missing "more than merely one of the most promising young poets around today". Be there, chillun.

FILM

Carve out a little hunk of time on Sunday nights to watch Oscar Burritt introduce (that's not really the word I'm looking for) the late movie on Channel Six. Old Oscar comes on like a petulant, cross, whale grounded on the shores of cinema verite. He mumbles, stumbles, grunts, whines, wheezes and says in toto very little about anything much, but he just can't be beat for pure comedy on a lonely Sunday night.

BLUES

Things are pretty much as usual for jazz in town this week. The Art Ayre Trio plays at George's Spaghetti House, and upstairs at Castle George, it's pianist Brian Browne and his trio. The only new face is organist Jimmy McGriff who's at the Colonial for the next week.

Neil Young, ex of the Buffalo Springfield and now going it alone, sings and plays the guitar at the Riverboat over the weekend. Doc Watson opens there next Tuesday. He's probably the greatest authentic folk guitarist the states have produced. His finger picking ability is unbelievable.

There's some good blues coming to town. Albert King is at the Rock Pile Friday and Saturday night. If his most recent record is any indication, his show should be a great one. The other blues man on his way, is one of the biggest names in the business, B.B. King. He'll have one show at Massey Hall next Friday. Highly recommended. It's great that B.B. King is finally making tours to places other than the black sections of U.S. cities. Get good tickets while you can. Sam's has them.

And that's it, unless you want Bobby Gimbey.

Students continue to hold two floors at SGWU

By ST. GEORGE ALBOIM

MONTREAL (CUP) —

Occupation centres 1 and 2 at Sir George Williams University — the ninth floor computer centre and the seventh-floor faculty club — remained in student hands Thursday, the ninth day of white-Negro student unrest.

The computer centre, was occupied by Negro students in protest over biology professor Perry Anderson's alleged discriminatory marking procedures.

White students occupied the faculty centre Tuesday in sympathy. The two groups are in constant communication, with common dining facilities for the 400 demonstrators.

The Anderson hearing committee, central party in the dispute, continues to hear testimony despite demands from the occupying students that it be reconstituted on a basis acceptable to Prof. Anderson and the black students.

As a result of the turmoil several professors have announced their intention to use computer marked exams to avoid charges of discrimination.

The student council on the 5,000-student campus has formally condemned the faculty lounge takeover. But the demonstrators are conducting an active program to inform the campus of the issues.

A statement released by the demonstrators yesterday reads in part:

"All students are now beginning to question the authority and integrity of the administration and the relation of this university to the society at large."

Quebec culture condemned to second class: René Levesque

By HELEN FORESTELL

It is "hypocritical, illusion-breeding, and dangerously explosive," says Rene Levesque, "to try and maintain equality for the French-Canadians in a unilingual country."

Levesque, the leader of the separatist Parti Quebecois, was speaking yesterday afternoon to a packed Ryerson Theatre.

Bilingualism is not the answer to the French problems, Levesque feels. In Canada, outside Quebec, the French are a minority of not even five per cent. This way, French-Canadian culture is condemned to a second class status throughout Canada.

"What use is that force-fed culture going to be to them?" Levesque asks. "The people of Quebec want to take over their society in a normal healthy way."

For one thing, Quebec must have control of its own social security because its needs are different from those of the other provinces.

Levesque urged that we keep our minds open to the possibility that if Quebec's problems are not solved, there will only be more disintegration. "No matter what happens," he added, "we'll also be neighbors."

Levesque feels it's time we got rid of a "101-year-old set-up that's sick." "Is Canada the only bloody place in the world, where there's no imagination left of any kind?"

All for the love of Clark Kerr

By GELLIUS SWIMMING

Vic won Wednesday's annual interfaculty swim meet with 57 points and their 400-yd. relay team (Heatley, Watt, McGuiness, and MacIntosh) broke the record with a time of 3:46.0. "We did it for Clark Kerr" said a jubilant Vic swimmer. Engineering was runner-up with 39; PHE (35), Sear (29), Meds (24), UC (4) and SMC (1) followed. Gaye Stratten was top individual with two victories.

HOCKEY

Pharm blanked UC II, 8-0. ("We did it for Clark Kerr" said a jubilant UC II player.) God saw little Sparrow score two goals; Bertrand (2), Rosart, Galeazzi, Snider and Holliday got the others.

Sharp and Wright scored to give Vic a 2-1 win over Trin (Murray.)

Ferguson's goal led Bus over Forestry, 1-0.

Arch Andrews 3, Knox 2. Salmi ("salmi, sal my dog"), Sisam and Spragge were Arch scorers; Hamilton and Gibson replied for Knox.

"ACTIVITY"

While Clark Kerr and his battered brand of liberalism wings wearily home this weekend, various Multiversity of Toronto sporting sides see action in various Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association regional championships.

The curling Blues ("Oh I've got those low-down curling blues. . .") are hacking it out in Guelph in the Western Division finals of the OQAA. Queen's Golden Gaels are defending champeens.

U of T fencers wend a wendlesome way to Waterloo in pursuit of the claim to being "best in the west" rather than "least in the east".

And the cock Blues also shuttle along to prove that their badminton racquet is made of much sterner stuff than the Mafia.

While at McMaster, Varsity's jovial joidists try to reclaim the OQAA title they were denied last year by red tape and wishy washy rules interpretation (see last Year's varsity).

BASKETBALL

Sr. Eng. (Callaghan 16) 38; UC 29. Ali Pasht had 11 for UC.

SMC (Q'Neill 14) 47; Vic (Eben 12) 42.

Dow scored 13 to help Sear beat Erin, 45-39. Old Sibbald took time off from being a race-horse to score 17 for Erin. (By the way, Lochinvar Sprogis has now ridden into the West to take a football scholarship at San Antonio, Texas.)

Hibloom (no relation to the movie starring Gary Cooper) had 15 as Meds B doubled Pharm, 45-22. Dallal (note internal rhyme) had 11 for the losers.

SMC B 45 (Revelle, Fr. "get up" 20); Law (Pyne 13) 30.

Innis (Hirsch 14) 41; Dents (Deeny 8) 26.

INSIDE TRACK

BOOK-BENDING PUCK BLUES FACE NED AND BIG RED

By PHIL BINGLEY

At this university, participants in the intercollegiate athletic programme are considered to be book-crackers first and jocks second. Sports is just one of many extracurricular activities on campus open to those students who have a particular special interest and the spare time to satiate it.

But when Varsity hockey Blues skate on with the Big Red of Cornell tomorrow evening in Ithica, New York, they will be facing a group of individuals whose enrolment in a university academic curriculum is simply a prerequisite to the real raison d'être a Cornell of playing varsity shinny. Hockey is a business venture at the university and dividends are paid only as long as the team keeps winning.

Ned Harkness is president of the Big Red firm in his role as head coach, general manager and quack psychologist. He has been and is one of the most successful coaches in U.S. intercollegiate sport. Each year, Harkness scouts and recruits almost exclusively in Canada and each year he manages to come up with a power-packed and winning team. Whatever his players lack in ability he works to make up with hard training and confidence-building oratory. Uncle Ned also tries his damndest to psych-out the opposition.

Cornell and Harkness have won three Ivy League Titles in a row, the U.S. Eastern championship for the last two years and the National Collegiate Athletic Association title in 1966-67. Last year they compiled a prolific 27-2 record in league and exhibition play.

Included on this season's roster (one which incidentally lists no U.S. born players) are All-Americans Ken Dryden and Brian Cornell. Goaltender Dryden from Islington, Ontario, was recently described by one opposing coach as the best goalie to ever play college hockey in the United States. He shutout Blues 1-0 in overtime during last year's Nichol's Invitational Tournament although Varsity netminder John Wrigley outgoaded him in that particular contest.

Cornell was the team's leading scorer in 1967-68 and the national dream team member at the centre position.

For Blues, the game represents an opportunity to avenge the 1-0 loss they suffered last year. In that game they matched the Big Red step for step but saw their winning hopes crushed abruptly when the Americans scored at the six second mark of the first overtime period.

Varsity came on with their best all-around effort in thrashing McMaster 8-1 on Wednesday night and a repeat performance should be enough to sink even hot-shot Cornell.

Monteith, McClelland, Boland bag two each in 8-1 win over Mac

DUNDAS. Varsity Blues manhandled University of McMaster Marlin's 8-1 Wednesday night here to move into a four-point first-place lead in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League. Victory was Blues 11th of the season.

Steve Monteith came up with his best performance of the schedule to spark the one-sided win. Monteith scored two goals (the 97th and 98th of his SIHL career) and was the fastest and most effective skater on the ice.

Mike Boland, who seems to have found a happy home at right wing on a line with Paul Laurent and Ward Passi also had two goals as did Bob McClelland.

Laurent (number 21 this season) and John Wright rounded out the Varsity attack. John Smallman connected in the early moments of the third period for Marlin's only marker.

Blues were more aggressive in this match than they have been all year. The defense stepped out at the blueline and totally confused Marlin's offensive formations and the forwards kept the play bottled-up in the McMaster end for minutes on end.

NOTES...Tom Little will start in goal against Cornell...Blues begin a four-game home stand next Friday. Visitors will be McMaster (Feb. 14), Montreal (Feb. 15), Waterloo (Feb. 19) and Laurentian (Feb. 21).

Steve Monteith (19) is foiled on this scoring opportunity by McMaster goaltender Glen Bayliss. Bayliss just managed to get his foot out to deflect the puck wide of the net. Monteith, however, had better success on two other occasions when he scored goals on similar shots. Blues whipped McMaster 8-1.

MAC'S MARAUDERS 'MASCULATE

By THOMAS CHEYNEY

"Ouch", said John McManus, "what a terrible game." The coach was right, but a rambunctious McMaster crowd didn't care, as their basketball Marauders dumped Varsity Blues into fourth place with a 78-70 victory Wednesday night.

Blues travel to Windsor for a game tomorrow with Windsor Lancers, who are riding comfortably in first place with a 6-0 record.

Much of Wednesday's game looked like a battle of incompetents, as both teams took turns missing shots and throwing the ball away. During the first half, for example, the score actually remained at 12-9 for four long minutes.

Blues were hampered, as in past years, by the enormous McMaster gym and by the amazingly elastic basket rims which send rebounds sailing back to midcourt. But court conditions can't explain away a mediocre performance.

Blues came back from a ten point half-time deficit and narrowed the Marauder margin to 44-43 with fifteen minutes remaining. But Mac managed to stay ahead thanks to the outside shooting of Paul Mazza and the inside shots of center Jim Noble.

Toronto closed the gap to two points several more times during the second half, but never managed to collect the tying basket. With four minutes left, Marauders pulled ahead to stay.

Mac coach Bill Fowler has made a title contender out of a largely freshman squad. Chubby guard John Dignan, who collected 13 points, looks like a potential all-star this season, as does Paul Mazza, who led all scorers with 20. Both were high-school performers last season.

Brightest light for Varsity was Bruce Dempster who had 19 points, and would have had as many assists if his teammates had been at all accurate. Larry Trafford followed with 18 points, while John Hadden had 15.

BALLS: An indication of the sloppy play is the fact that Varsity had 31 turnovers and Mac 21 — or almost two a minute... Varsity shot 39 from the floor; Mac shot 31... Marauders were 18 for 28 from the foul line and Toronto was 14 for 27 (but only 4 for 13 in the second half).

PART 2

Story and photos
by BRIAN JOHNSON

The Institute of Child Study is one of the most successful educational experiments in Canada, the only project with a laboratory school for research and graduate-level training.

But it's a small-scale project, and most U of T students had not heard of it until last November — when U of T's top administrators nearly succeeded in destroying it.

The administration had prepared a "secret" brief of financial priorities and enrolment requirements for the next four years to be presented to the provincial government's Committee on University Affairs.

Included in the brief was a suggestion that the Institute of Child Study be assimilated by the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. The administrators did not realize that the OISE constitution could not legally embrace an experimental, laboratory program.

No one in Child Study, including the Institute's acting director, Dr. Michael Grapko, knew anything about the proposed move until the administration's brief was published.

The men who prepared the brief had never visited the Institute and their information was based on books written about it 10 years ago.

But with the help of SAC President Steve Langdon, at a President's Council meeting, the Institute successfully lobbied the administration to drop the reference to the Institute from the brief.

Dr. Grapko sat in an office lined with books on child psychology and upholstered in the executive tradition, discussing last term's incident and the Institute. He seemed slightly humble in the surroundings.

He said U of T President Claude Bissell is setting up a committee "to evaluate the potential and function" of the Institute. It will be composed of eight or ten people from Child Study staff and from faculty members of the university.

Dr. Grapko has definite ideas on "the potential and function" of the Institute.

"Education cannot continue to ride on platitudes but must systematically research its proposals and recommendations before they are imposed on the whole community," he says.

"Psychology has made very little impact on education," he adds. "We are concerned with looking at the live learning situation. Only in the type of laboratory situation we have here can I see any significant contribution by psychology."

Dr. Grapko would like to see a province-supported experimental school. Current tuition fees at the Institute's St. George School are $180, plus $100 extra for food and because of this, the children tend to come mostly from upper-middle and upper-class backgrounds.

With more financial support, the school could accept children from all backgrounds.

"It is my earnest conviction," he says, "that a Junior Nursery to Grade 12 laboratory school situated within the framework of the University could become one of the most exciting educational spots in this province."

"Its purpose would be precisely to test out new approaches in education," he adds, "providing results that serve as a base from which province-wide implementation could proceed.

"As masters and doctoral programs are established, research problems in psychology would complement concerns more specific to education."

I asked Dr. Grapko how the children reacted to the laboratory set-up, whether they felt like guinea pigs.

"No," he said. "One of our primary responsibilities in our ethical practices is that we protect our children from unreal kinds of situations."

By MARY-KATE ROWAN

Back in the good old days of 1792, when the sight of a motor car would have caused any self-respecting inhabitant of Upper Canada to swear off drink forever, Lieutenant-Governor John Graves Simcoe decided that what the wilderness of Toronto really needed was a university.

A few years later he declared: "A university would have great influence in civilizing the Indians and, what is of more importance, those who corrupt them."

Simcoe died before King's College, an Anglican school, was founded in 1827.

In 1849 the college was secularized and renamed the University of Toronto.

By 1859, the government had expropriated the King's College building and University College opened. At that time, if you hopped on your horse and trotted around University College, you saw the whole U of T.

Today, a hundred or so buildings later, it takes 26 minutes travelling by car at a moderate speed to see every building on the 160-acre site bounded by Bloor, Bay, College and Spadina.

The architecture ranges from the beautiful Romanesque of University College (or Style "Old Ugly" depending on your point of view) to "modern" Sidney Smith Hall.

By 1903, Trinity, Victoria and St. Michael's Colleges were all full partners in the University.

With the purchase of 26 acres of land in 1956, the campus spilled across St. George and began pushing towards Spadina.

During the past three years the growth rate has been fast and furious. For example, the combined space of the new Medical Sciences Building and the new Research Library (now under construction) will exceed by 400,000 square feet the space available to the entire university, not counting the federated colleges, in 1945.

SAC hacks away at budget

The University of Toronto will withdraw from the Ontario Union of Students' Union—if the Students' Administrative Council approves last night's recommendation of its Finance Commission.

As part of an attempt to lop off about $10,000 from its $243,000 budget, the Commission voted to cut OUS membership fees.

Finance Commissioner Bob Barkwell and SAC President protested that such a recommendation was not within the power of the Commission, since OUS membership is a constitutional obligation that a SAC general meeting must reverse with a two-thirds majority.

But the chair was overruled and the motion passed.

The multiple budget cuts resulted from lost revenue as a result of next year's withdrawal from SAC by the Graduate Student Union.

Budgets for the U of T Chorus, weekend exchanges to other universities, political clubs and the U of T Debating Society were wiped out completely.

With an electric adding machine at his side Barkwell and seven commission members met for five hours to find ways of whittling down the 1969-70 budget.

The U of T Chorus was the first major expenditure to be attacked.

"I can see no justification," said Barkwell, "for giving $4,015 to a chorus that performs twice a year on this campus."

The chorus' budget had already been cut from the $5,200 which they defended this year, largely through pressuring SAC with a singing protest in November.

Another major cut of $1,500 was made in the Blue and White Society's budget.

"With all the colleges and Hart House and everything that goes on in this city there is no need to bring in a lot of outside things to keep people keen," said Steve Langdon.

The Commission also cut its $1,895 grant to the weekend exchanges to Harvard and Tarheel, assuming the exchanges will still be able to operate with increased costs for the students involved.

"They benefit only about 60 people a year," said Barkwell.

Two thousand dollars was cut from the Varsity's expenditure, although the sum is still $5,000 greater than this year's due to increased printing costs.

The Canadian-Canadian Committee was also wiped out with a cut of $475.

Campus clubs and general donations were each reduced by $500 and a $500 cut from political clubs erased them from the budget.

One group to get more money at last night's meeting was the Varsity Downtown Education Project whose budget was doubled from $2,500 to $5,000.

The proposed Random magazine budget of $6,882 was chopped to $4,148 after lengthy debate. The magazine will be published only three times next year.

"There just aren't the resources on this campus to publish the Varsity, The Review and Random," said Steve Langdon. "Talent doesn't exist to publish all three."

Border officials refuse US "deserters"

By JOHN KING

Special to The Varsity

Canadian immigration officials are refusing landed immigrant status to qualified American armed forces deserters, despite the policy of the immigration department that deserters and draft evaders from the U.S. are to be treated no differently than other immigrants.

At a press conference at Glendon College York University Saturday night five Glendon College students working for the student newspaper Pro Tem told how they were refused entry at the Canadian border while impersonating American deserters.

Chris Wilson, Jim Weston, Bob Waller, Graham Muir and John Thompson each went to a different border crossing point in Ontario Saturday afternoon. All but one were refused landed immigrant status and sent back to the American border. A foreigner cannot apply for entry to Canada as a visitor at the same time as applying for landed immigrant status.

Each reporter attempted to enter Canada using the photostated documents of an American deserter.

Four of them were sent back to the American side where American officials frisked them and asked them for their American documents, calling them by their assumed names.

It appeared that Canadian immigration officials had contacted the Americans and told them a deserter was being sent back to the American side. Under the Immigration Act Canadian immigration officials are not allowed to divulge personal, confidential information to foreign immigration officials, or to enforce foreign laws.

All five had destroyed the American documents before returning to the American border. They were detained and questioned by American officials when they presented their Canadian passports, and then returned to the Canadian border. Muir was refused his right to attorney by the Americans.

Waller and Muir were asked if they were deserters by Canadian immigration officials at Windsor. Waller was told it was useless for him to fill out an application form.

SAC'S BUDGET

Last night the finance commission of the Students Administrative Council faced the impossible task of chopping about $10,000 from an already airtight budget.

The initial cause of the financial squeeze is the projected loss of fees with the withdrawal of the Graduate Students Union from SAC.

But SAC had a chance to alleviate the financial difficulty at its last general meeting two weeks ago, when a motion was presented to raise the SAC fee by $2 — from $12 to $14.

That meeting tabled the motion to raise the levy for "political" purposes. Finance commissioner Bob Barkwell feared a hostile reaction on campus which might cause other faculties to withdraw.

But the levy would not further political purposes. Nearly all the items which suffered cuts, last night were apolitical campus services. Here is a list of such items and the amount they lost:

- U of T chorus — $4,015;
- Random magazine — $2,734;
- The Carsity — $2,000;
- Mental health T-groups — $1,700;
- Harvard and Tarheel weekend — $1,895;
- Blue and White — $1,500;
- Debating society — $200;

The commission expressed an open disregard for cultural priorities in its budget.

Random magazine was reduced on $4,100, a budget that hardly makes the publication worth having.

The commission in effect has denied the need for a cross-campus magazine.

There is a potential for creative writing talent on a campus of 31,000 students to produce a first-rate cross-campus magazine — given the budget to produce a respectable format that would inspire of permanence, depth and artistic scope. Random was denied such a budget.

For no apparent reason, the commission did not touch the Radio Varsity budget of $16,410. Radio Varsity is an organization which indulges in the most luxurious and extravagant spending of any campus service. It has neither the cultural value of Random, nor the communicative value of The Varsity.

The best illustration of the commission's frustration in dealing with a tight budget was an unconstitutional motion to withdraw from the Ontario Union of Students.

The withdrawal is a question of political policy— for the consideration of the whole council certainly not within the jurisdiction of the finance of commission.

Another reason for the financial crisis is SAC's College Street housing project, an apolitical necessity which the Ontario Student Housing Corporation will probably make a reality. SAC is contributing to this.

No student should mind paying an extra $2 for basic community services.

The U of T SAC has the lowest fee of any student council in Canada, and by U of T's sheer size it can organize and finance on a collective, meaningful level unlike any other campus student council.

But apolitical services will be sacrificed because of fears of political fragmentation unless the groups affected unite and co-ordinate a strong lobby in the next SAC general meeting.

COE? -- OCE dressed up

What is COE? Why, it's OCE dressed up with a new logo. OCE was an institution that could be found at Bloor and Spadina, trying to hide itself from public notice by being semi-detached with UTS.

OCE, the institution that high school principals have tried to undermine by under-the-table deals in March of every year. OCE, the hopelessly inadequate building with its overcrowded, pathetic facilities. My friend, let me tell you that it is still the same.

Let me look at the root cause of the problem. I believe that it is a question of priorities here. The Ontario Government, for reasons best known to itself, has chosen to spend its education capital on such white elephants as OISE. This research centre should have its budget slashed drastically and the money should be turned over to a new college of education. The Government's priority should be placed on proper teacher education. What is the point of million dollar research projects into education, when the people who are in charge of education, i.e. the teachers, have such inadequate training?

If the Ontario Government will recognize that teacher education is a priority then the remedies will come easily. It will be recognized that OCE facilities are totally inadequate; that courses need to be stiffened academically; and that professors should be of university calibre. A course at OCE should lead to a Master of Education degree — necessarily a two-year course.

Let's give old OCE a chance to become the leader in education that it should be, by urging upon the Government and the University the necessity for new and adequate facilities, and a course structure that will lend it the necessary academic prestige. Perhaps then might be the time to change the name!

a letter to dr. bissell

The following letter is addressed to President Claude Bissell by Mr. G. A. Longley, a member of Local 938 of the Teamsters' Union.

As a taxpayer, with grey in my hair and a little fire in my soul, I wish to take you to task for your rather cynical remarks in Friday's Globe and Mail (Feb. 7) about some of your more forthright students.

I say, without reservation, but again as a taxpayer thank God for the likes of Mike Nevin, Andy Wernick and Phil Resnick — and all the other hardy, courageous young souls — who have the guts to face the likes of Dr. Kerr and yourself, and object strenuously to the turning-out of more "stereotyped, rubber-stamp robots" into our already-jaded society. You try to teach them — in all your phony, mundane smugness — to settle in Suburbia, hypocrisies and double standards, and how to skilfully climb over everyone's back in the never-ending search for success and power. How to weave deceitful schemes, and raise families full of deceitful schemers . . . How to cheat on their wives . . . How to worry always completely about "No. 1". By "free enterprise" you mean a dog-eat-dog philosophy — and any social conscience one of your students does exude you call radicalism.

What do you, as a teacher, teach the student?

Do you ever, as a teacher, discuss the long-standing, and disgusting, plight of the Canadian Indian?

Do you ever speak, or take a stand, on Medicare? Pollution? The grape boycott? Housing? Do you ever worry about the people on Tracy, or Bright, Street?

I think not. I think you, Mr. Bissell, live in a grey, Tory world, like a horse equipped with blinkers, never seeing the social ills of our polyglot society . . . If you do, you're not caring.

So in my opinion, and in the opinion of others like myself, you, sir, are ill-advised to refer in a derogatory manner to any of your more morally-honest students.

As far as I'm concerned, in many cases they could teach you a few basic values of life. Like brotherhood, moral fiber, and a distinct dislike for double standards.

"Who is to run cable TV, the government or Bell Telephone?" Such was the head to Patrick Scott's column in the Saturday Star. The day before, the Canadian Radio-Television Commission had an ad in the paper giving notice of a public hearing which stated, among other things that 'Persons wishing to inspect briefs submitted . . . may do so . . . at the offices of the Commission.'

Many of us want to make the university relevant. Perhaps one way would be to investigate the CRTC and its present attempt to work out some kind of policy on CATV (community antenna television — cable TV)

To quote from Leslie Millin (Toronto Globe and Mail, Jan. 25, 1969) "When you consider that more than half as many hours are spent by adults watching television as are spent by adults cranking out the Gross National Product, you can see how enormous is the problem that the CRTC is facing'. And cable TV will not be just for TV, that's just the visible edge of the iceberg.

The Toronto Student Movement thinks the universities are important. If they could get their hooks, intellectual and otherwise, into this problem they might be able to blow it. Somebody should. For letting society rely on newspaper columnists, no matter how good they are, for their information-critique of this problem shows how bankrupt the universities really are.

Red dropped in and treated us to a few tender renditions of natural childbirth. Anne with the scissors offered to do a soprano duet with him. Noel "The skunk" Steckley said Reg was like Preparation H. You have to put up with it. Hulk said that the Stork that brought him should be arrested for smuggling dope. Speaking of dope, Paul just dropped in from his T-group. Reg made overtures to Mary Kate (who kicked him in the orchestra pit), Moo Sperry (until Dave came to her Aida) and Harriet (who makes love to the Anvil Chorus when she gets hammered, of chorus.) Art told us about the fairy who was arrested for blowing kisses. Brian asked Mary Bastedo why women like concealed men better. Better than what, Mary wanted to know. Phil said he wasn't interested in sporting women. Morrison was too busy dictating to Karen, who was offering us her Young body, to listen. Innocent Geoff saw the connection between women and Moo. Experienced Mike got a more satisfactory connection, said Moo. Mickleburgh went to the zoo, with an ID card for safety's sake. Lucky he didn't have to use it. Took Richter's by mistake, Jim, Sherry, Tim and Jack stood on their heads in the corner and said they never thought they'd end up like this.

Computers, he said, have needs too

by MICHAEL WOLFSON

Michael Wolfson is a second year mathematics student.

I thought that I might bring to your attention some quotes from the January 1969 issue of the Journal of the Association of Computing Machinery. In it appears an article, the 1968 ACM Turing lecture, by R. W. Hamming, of Bell Telephone Laboratories. He describes some of his ideas about the types of schooling appropriate for someone in the field of computer science.

After indicating the growing need of funds for computer science departments, he describes how it is "poor propaganda for raising large amounts of money" if computer science is to be associated with "the bragging uselessness and the game playing that pure mathematicians so often engage in." The discussion then considers just what courses are necessary to change the current image of the computer programmer in the business world as someone who is "mainly interested in playing games."

He states, "We had better consider how we can avoid such remarks being made about our graduates in the coming years. Are we going to continue to turn out a product that is not wanted in many places? Or are we going to turn out responsible, effective people who meet the real needs of our society?"

Well, fellow students, can you dig it? Here you have a representative of the industrial job-giving market telling you where it's at. First, you are products, something that is being "turned out." The role of the University is to produce better quality human resource capital. Second, he is the one who knows what the "real needs of our society" are. There is not much room for idleness or the "useless pursuit of interesting games;" the nitty-gritty values are practicality, marketability, and technical relevance. The output the University produces for the society must be able to be smoothly integrated into the work ethic of the society machine. No useless games for Mr. Hamming and the aspiring members of the business community, the stakes they play for are money and things. It is only of secondary importance to them that their manipulations of money, things, and people products may cause pain and frustration and even death for others, and may ultimately deprive them of the ability to appreciate the metal and plastic fruits of their endeavors.

About eighty percent of you didn't bother to vote in the elections for your representatives on the Commission on University Governance. I guess you are content to let someone else decide the values you wish to have the rest of your life. It is always much easier to go along with everyone else; if so many people think things are all right the way they are now, why should you go out of your way to complain or even ask questions.

Herbert Marcuse (One Dimensional Man) says the liquidation of our higher culture does not take place "through the denial and rejection of 'cultural values', but through their wholesale incorporation into the established order, through their reproduction and display on a massive scale . . . . If mass communications blend together harmoniously, and often unnoticeably, art, politics, religion, and philosophy with commercials, they bring these realms of culture to their common denominator — the commodity form. The music of the soul is also the music of salesmanship. Exchange value, not truth value counts."

Mr. Hamming, to solicit funds for our education, would have us diligently working on practical things and acquiring useful technical skills so we can become responsible, effective members of society. Our reward for this is to be a high standard of living and the same culture as everyone else, neatly packaged. We will not have to worry about deciding what we like because we will be guided in our freedom of choice by experts.

Unfortunately, if you disagree with the experts, or if you just want to find out for yourself, you actually have to . . . (open your eyes, work, think, stand up, feel, move, act, be alive.)
Try it.

CAMPUS

2

"The U of T is just a nuisance part of the city. It gets in the way of the traffic."

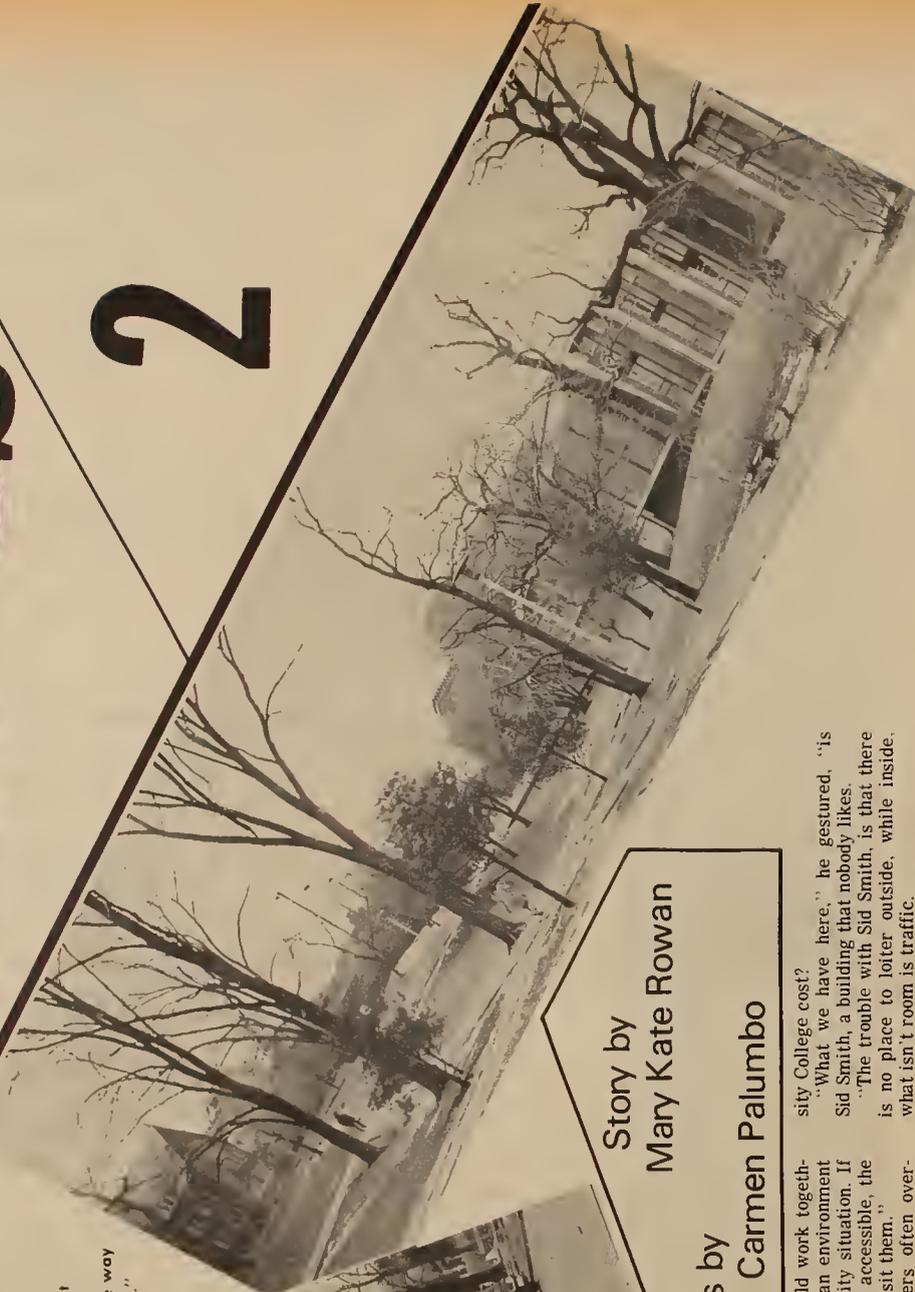

"There's a curious thing about this campus," says Ron Thom, the architect who designed Massey College. "It's cut by tremendous rivers of cars and even though it's in the middle of the city, it is completely un-integrated with the city."
"The U of T," he smiles "never quite makes it to Bloor Street."
Thom, who is in the process of designing Trent University, dislikes the present day campus sprawl and terms the planning "haphazard."
He sees the campus, with Queen's Park Crescent and the St. George Street "rupture," as "just a nuisance part of the city. It gets in the way of traffic."
According to Thom, the campus lacks a central core. "There doesn't seem to be a place where people congregate. Very little of the town's activity is knit in the campus. Therefore, it has no distinct coloration."
He cites universities such as Cambridge where the colleges surround a small core of "University buildings should work together. An architect can create an environment which encourages a community situation. If the faculty offices are easily accessible, the students are more likely to visit them."

Prof. Brooks feels designers often overlook the psychological needs of those people who use the building.
For example, Fine Art lectures depend on slides, hence professors spend time in the slide room every day. When the Fine Art department in Sidney Smith Hall was designed, a small, windowless room was allotted for slide storage.
The department finally sacrificed part of their library in order to have a more pleasant slide storage room.
"Visual environment is important," says Brooks.
"People will admit sensitivity to light and heat, but not to their visual environment," says Thom.
"Most of us are visual illiterates but the city College cost?"

"What we have here," he gestured, "is Sid Smith, a building that nobody likes."
The trouble with Sid Smith, is that there is no place to loiter outside, while inside, what isn't room is traffic.
"Sid Smith is a very uptight building," he continues. "You can't get at it easily. It has no site, covers almost 100 per cent of its ground and is ringed on three sides by motor vehicles."
"There, the person is external to the building. He approaches at as an object."
But Massey College, says Prof. Brooks, "has an ideal environment. It's a good compromise between revival architecture and something reasonably contemporary."
"As soon as I walk in I feel something warm and I have a feeling of belonging."
According to Prof. Brooks, philosopher's walk is "nicest long space on campus. He calls the building of the artificial ball... a major step."

where the colleges surround a small core of s...s, restaurants and pubs.

University students wear special types of clothes, they like to eat certain foods and like special kinds of entertainment, so aside from an area like this being colorful, it could also be lucrative.

At Cambridge, the centre of the campus is a common hub of activity. The U of T is near Yonge and Bloor Streets but, argues Thom, "I don't think those spaces ever work so well on the edge as they do in the middle."

"The advantage of a university," says H.
Allen Brooks, assistant professor of Fine Art at U of T, "is that you have many acres you can control."

Most of us are visual illiterates but the stems are still at work.

"For example each of us have color ranges that we live in more peacefully than others." He notes researchers have found "institutional green," long considered to be a neutral color, has adverse effects on some.

Can a large room such as a lecture hall emit warmth? "Sure," says Thom. "How about Stratford? When I go to the O'Keefe Centre its just like going to a peep show.
Nobody can make me cry at the O'Keefe.
They sure can at Stratford."

"Good architecture costs more money," says Prof. Brooks, "but it's going to last longer. Who cares today how much Univer-major step

"Buildings should relate to make congenial space," he says. "The Vic complex is the best on campus — or perhaps the centre of the UC, where you have the choice of walking under the covered cloister or outside it."

Thom feels the main campus "works" because it doesn't respond to a regular grid pattern and there aren't roads "running through it." He objects to New College because it "defines the street pattern with a vengeance."

According to Thom, the sprawling campus isn't a lost cause. "There's still hope," he cautions, "as long as what is constructed in the future is well planned."

"I must admit," he added, "that our children are at times tested. But the children are extremely willing to undertake the tests — some of them enjoy them. There are no adverse-stimuli experiments such as shock or pain."

When I later talked to children at the St. George's School, none of them seemed concerned about the laboratory situation, and most seemed oblivious to it.

I asked one Grade 3 girl if she had exams.

"No, just tests," she answered.

"What kind of tests?"

"Tests to see how quickly you can pick up things — you know."

That girl will have no exams while she's in the Institute's school.

Education without formal examinations is one of the basic policies of the Institute's experimental program.

"If you are going to assess a child it has to be on an individual basis," explained Dr. Grapko, "not on a group basis."

"Examinations are carried out on a normative basis, and most examinations are not useful until announced. Educators have never really handled the problem of motivation of the child. Too much of the motivation is by fear, for example the strap. But children should not be motivated by fear, rejection, humiliation, exclusion, and so on."

Dr. Grapko cited an incident of an ex-Child Study student who received an unfortunate shock when he went to Humber College. He was asked to sit on a platform in front of the class because he was a top student.

Success can be just as ugly as failure under a system of strict group evaluation.

Generally the transition from the Institute's school to a departmental school is not that traumatic. Children who have done well at the Institute continue to do well outside of it. The ability to study independently is not a hindrance.

St. George's is a private school, for it must charge fees to survive financially. Parents pay $180 for tuition and $100 for food.

But, because of the experimental nature of the Institute, the school avoids many of the educational stigmas attached to many private schools. Competition, conformity and discipline — encouraged at most private schools — are discouraged at the Institute.

"We have in part been carrying out the Hall-Dennis Recommendations progressively for the past 10 years," Dr. Grapko said. "We've never had formal examination, and children are primarily assessed on their own progress."

"Exploratory learning" and "environmental studies" are some of the technical terms Dr. Grapko uses to describe the progressive kind of education the kids are getting at the Institute.

Exploratory learning means letting kids write and play their own music instead of hitting the tamborine or triangle when the teacher says so. It means letting the kids make their own films.

Environmental studies means lots of field trips — going on a hay ride; letting the kids take part in a television show; taking them to a play.

The key is letting children do things rather than telling them.

Which brings about the question of student power:

"Concepts of student self-government are open to some question," says Dr. Grapko. "Decision-making is only meaningful if it is based on the appropriate information — otherwise it is irresponsibility — like letting a child cross the street without telling him what to expect."

"At Summerhill, A.S. Neill has got the idea that information should be provided for decision-making — not just knowledge of facts, but the philosophy is important; the attitude is important; the ideology is important. Responsibility is the natural consequence if this process is provided."

Bill Matthews: Space race may save rat race

By MARTIN REYTO

"My feelings as an American poet? I try not to think about it," said William Matthews, absently stroking his moustache and looking downward. "You could easily go insane living in the States today."

The 26-year-old poet had arrived from New York by car a few hours before, to spend a few days looking around Toronto, and to give a reading of his poetry in Hart House this afternoon.

Now we sat at a small wooden table in the murky light of the Babloo Tavern, talking quietly over the first of several rounds of beer.

Matthews has very strong objections to the war in Vietnam, which he sees as just another outgrowth of the American madness. He says that if he were drafted, he simply would not go. He writes about this "Asian war":

We talk about it clinically, as if it were a mold the body couldn't shed. We've lost control. Our fingers thicken, growing a hot clumsy crust until they are as stiff as icicles and we drop everything, leaflets, bombs, all hope.

"The scope of the student movement is rather narrow. It is silly and limited to attack the present-day situation merely from a political point of view. What we've got to do first of all, is to clean up our environment. We have this instinct to rule over the earth, to dominate nature.

"But we have to build civilization with nature, not against her..."

"Someone said to me once, 'So what's so exciting about a few birds dying?' — This kind of thing upsets me very badly."

A soft-spoken urbane man with quick, intelligent eyes, long, brown hair just beginning to curl around his collar. He lifted his glass musingly, and continued to talk:

"There is something very wrong with cities like Manhattan. I think what it is, is that it is uninhabitable by anything but human beings — except for freaky little things like Central Park. The city is a human sanctuary, built to keep the animals away.

"What happens is, of course, what happens in any sanctuary: it's inhabitants do their best to imitate nature. So you get conflict, fighting, killing, death, just like you get in nature; but it's not natural, there is something very ugly and very phoney about cities. It's just like animals in a zoo. When they begin to feel penned up, they create unnatural disruption. I read somewhere that monkeys in zoos masturbate habitually.

"I can see why. If I lived in a city, I certainly wouldn't want to breed. It's something like a death experience.

"A poem should engage all the faculties of the reader. It should arouse all his sensibilities. Poetry is like being laid, a very sexual kind of experience.

"A good poem makes you think, but it makes you think of specifics. It's no good to meditate on liberalism, socialism, existentialism and the like while reading or writing a poem. You have to meet a poem on its own terms, you have to meet the experience by itself.

With the arrival of our sixth round of beer, we began to talk about politics.

"Aside from being a grass opportunist," he said, "I'm convinced that Richard Nixon has a death wish. He has made every mistake it was possible for him to make. He has no depth whatsoever as a person. He would have lost again, had the Democrats not made an even bigger mistake than he did.

"It was Chicago that won Nixon the election."

"Where is it all going to end?" I asked, nodding sadly.

"God knows," he shook his head. "If anything saves us, it's going to be the space race."

"How so?"

"Well," he said, shrugging. "it's better to spend money on sending rockets to the Moon than to send a missile to Peking."

KERR AT CUG

University should include laymen

By GEOFF MEGGS

The university should be run by a small central body which includes members of the public, Clark Kerr said Friday.

Kerr, former president of the University of California, was speaking to the Commission on University Government about decision-making in the university.

"It is best to have key participation at the local level," Kerr said, "because when it is farther removed it is difficult for the board to be familiar with the institution."

"There must be some mechanism to satisfy the demands for equality of financial treatment within the institution," he added.

Kerr disagrees strongly with the idea of government budget control.

On student participation in university government, Kerr said:

"There are all kinds of decisions for which the student does not have much knowledge to contribute or much interest," he said. "However, there ought to be some way for the students to be associated with decision-making."

Prof. B. E. Etkin asked Kerr about the role of faculty tenure in the university.

"The most important decision is who gets tenure," answered Kerr. "If that decision is made well and every other decision made badly you will still have a great university."

SOC may get staff-student equality

By LEIGHTON REID

Greater staff-student authority in departmental policy making came a little closer Friday morning as the Sociology Reviewing Committee made two tentative proposals.

at a meeting in the Tip-Top Tailor building, the committee proposed:

- that, for decision making purposes, the "department" of sociology consist of "all faculty, plus an equal number of student representatives, chosen as the students see fit"

- that the chairman, may ask for a review of department decisions, but a second department decision shall be final.

All committee members stressed that the proposals, both passed unanimously, were only tentative and exploratory. Committee

Co-Chairman Jim Turk (SGS) termed them "principles of organization with which the committee is in sympathy."

Present University rules provide that The Chairman is "responsible for decisions made by the department and must have the authority to make such decisions, as well as the obligation to report significant dissent."

A showdown between Clark and several faculty members over "democratization" of the department resulted in the formation of the 12-man committee last month.

The committee, composed equally of students and faculty, is the university's first staff-student committee of its type.

It holds its next open meeting at 4 p.m. today in Room 204 of the Tip-Top-Tailor building.

2 more down

The Canadian Union of Students lost two more campuses last week.

Queen's University voted 1,292 to 639 against CUS membership, and the University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon campus voted 3,293 to 2,370 to pull out.

Lakehead University will hold a CUS referendum later this month, and the University of British Columbia will vote in March.

One member of the New College Residence Committee has resigned after saying restrictions on women's visiting hours are "immoral".

Jon Ennis (I Pre-Meds) urged other members of the committee Thursday night to follow suit and "demand abolition of visiting restrictions," while refusing to enforce the rules.

Ennis says many breaches of the rules have been ignored, and that this "hypocrisy" should be ended. A general new meeting at 7:30 p.m. tonight will discuss the whole issue.

Pair of girl's glasses, lost, tortoise-shell-coloured, probably in The Varsity office. Ask for them by name.

Also lost: girl's wrist-watch, dial showing 4:07 p.m.

Borrowing Privileges
for Students
at College Libraries

The various colleges have libraries which cater specifically to the needs of their own students, particularly those in first and second year. However, as a rule, only members of a college may use its facilities. A special arrangement has been made for other students to have access to material which is unique to a particular college library. If upon consulting the Old and New Catalogues in the Central Library, you find that the only copy of a book is in a college library at which you don't have borrowing privileges, and if you wish to borrow that book, you should

- 1 fill out a regular call slip
- 2 take it to the Catalogue Information Desk to have it verified and stamped as a unique copy
- 3 present this call slip to the College Library between 9 a.m. — 5 p.m. Monday to Friday

On doing so, you will be given access to that material on the same terms as a regular borrower of that college library. These procedures are in effect at Innis College (temporarily housed in Laidlaw Library), Knox College Library, St Michael's College Library, Trinity College Library, Emmanuel College Library and Victoria University Library.

Any student registered in a degree course at the University of Toronto, whether he is on the St George Campus, or at Scarborough or Erindale, may borrow from the Central Library

WEEKEND ROUNDUP

FENCING

WATERLOO—The gauntlet is down—Ottawa the scene—next weekend the OQAA Fencing Final. Waterloo—a Mecca of athletic facilities—watched while Varsity Fencers cleaned up on the Team Champs, to win the right to challenge the Eastern Fencers. Blues dismissed McMaster (2nd) 21:6, Western (3rd) 24:3 and Windsor (4th) 24:3. Ron Rice, Richard Wong, Irv Snitman, and Rowland Griffin were undefeated, Martin Peros and Martin Moskovits lost one, Al Galberg and Mike Kerwin lost two and rookie Chen managed 3 wins.

The sabre match against McMaster showed tension drama, disagreements and the cut and thrust for which sabre is so exciting. Finally Blues edged a 5:4 victory.

	McM.	West.	Wind.
Foil	7:2	7:2	7:2
Epee	9:0	8:1	8:1
Sabre	5:4	9:0	9:0

The Epee team white-washed the opposition and the Foil team coasted through to easy victories.

The Individual Meet held the previous day saw 5 Toronto Fencers qualify for the final pools to be held in Ottawa.

One fact marred the Tourney: there was not enough bout directors available so that some bouts had elements of either incompetence or subconscious bias. Sabre was the weapon which suffered most drastically. Martin Moskovits unluckily dropped a three way barrage in the sabre final.

Richard Wong, the leading foilist, clicked into gear, opponents insisted in walking on to his point which gave him first place without any trouble. Martin Peros nearly deposed the present sabre holder, Szabados, but in a tense bout lost by an odd hit. Rowland Griffin lost one bout to Green Jerusalem (Waterloo) finishing second in the duelling weapon, epee, while Mike Kerwin slipped into third place after an exciting barrage. Ron Rice kept the foil final in constant turmoil with his long reach where his tenacity won third place.

WRESTLING

"Aroint thee witch!" the rump-fed runyon cried as Varsity wrestlers finished a disappointing second in an exhibition tri-meet held at Waterloo over the weekend.

The host school triumphed ever glorious with 51 points while Varsity collected 45 and McMaster 28.

Main reason for Blues' failure to take the meet was the loss of valuable forfeit points in three divisions — 115 lb., 123 lb., and 152 lb.

Dave Simms (160 lb.), Bill Allison (167 lb.) and Ylo Korgemagi (Heavyweight), easily the most improved member of the squad, were best for Varsity during the afternoon, each winning both of his matches. Allison pinned his two opponents.

Other victories came from the grappling armpits of Ted Sauer (137 lb.), Mauro Dipasquale (145 lb.), Ernie Friedrich (177 lb.), and Larry Bar-ron (191 lb.)

Lack of conditioning hurt Ken White and he dropped both his matches at 130 pounds.

CURLING

The Varsity curling team, skipped by Terry Lalande, had their win streak snapped at thirteen games, but still shared first place at the OQAA Western Division played last week-end at Guelph, and earned a berth in the finals at Kingston this coming week.

The team of Lalande, Ian Buckwold, Dave Shugarman, and Craig Harvey, curled consistently in the six team round-robin bonspiel, losing only to McMaster in their final game after clinching the play-off spot. Waterloo, losers in their first game to Toronto, won their next four, and will be the other team in the finals with the two top teams from the Eastern Division.

Success was largely due to Lalande's nerveless shot-making, especially in the Waterloo game. Tied coming home without last rock, Lalande tucked a beautiful draw behind a pair of guards with his first shot, and then, after the Waterloo skip opened up the front, laid a perfect long guard to seal off the only path to the button.

BLUES WEEKEND -- LOSE CORNELL GAME AND ST. JOHN

By PHIL BINGLEY

ITHACA, N.Y. Brian St. John's long distance phone call moments after Varsity hockey Blues arrived at their motel here Friday evening set the stage for a miserable weekend visit. The two day road trip climaxed unhappily one night later when Blues dropped a 7-2 contest to Cornell University Big Red.

St. John was suffering chest pains when he went for an x-ray at the University Health Service before the team left Friday. The phone call back to Toronto was in answer to a message left earlier at the motel by the Health Service doctor and the results of the medical test indicated "pericarditis" — an inflammation of the heart sheath — caused in this case by a virus infection. St. John will enter hospital today for further examination and will likely remain there for the balance of the week. In any case, his present condition is not considered serious.

Of course Brian was not allowed to play in the Cornell game (he flew back to Toronto Saturday morning) and his absence was noticeable. Paul McCann filled in on a line with Steve Monteith and Brian Tompson and turned in a splendid effort — probably his best since he joined the team last season.

But Cornell burned Blues by the ease with which they moved the puck out of their own end. St. John could have helped Varsity in these situations with his always proficient forechecking.

The Americans (in name, but Canadians in nationality) out-played Blues by a wide margin. They moved freely and controlled the puck except during brief flurries by the visitors.

There is no icing in U.S. rules save when the play is made from behind one's own blueline and Cornell took full advantage of the situation. When they crossed their blueline, they simply dumped the puck into the Varsity end and then kept Blues bottled up with hustle and excellent checking.

Cornell moved ahead 1-0 in the first period before John Wright brought Blues even in the first minute of the second frame with a clean 40 foot slapshot.

Dave Field cut the lead margin to 3-2 after the Big Red had built a two goal margin, but that was as close as Blues came. The homesters scored once before the end of the period and then added three unanswered markers in the third for the easy win.

Kevin Petit with two goals and Gord Lowe, Bob McGuinn, Pete Tufford and Brian McCutcheon with singles hit for Cornell.

Blues would have needed strong effort to handle Cornell in any game especially when American rules were used. But on Saturday they worked with a patched up lineup (Jim Miles also missed the game to attend his own wedding) and came up with a so-so performance. The results indicated as much.

NOTES . . . A member of the Cornell athletic department informed us of the great "deal" students get on the purchase of game tickets. A Cornell inmate can buy a coupon book with tickets good for four home football matches and 10 hockey games. The price, the man said, is only 20 dollars. U of T students get the same deal for four dollars. . . 4200 people showed up for the Toronto-Cornell to fill the on-campus rink to capacity. Many others (most of them with tickets) tried unsuccessfully to get in. . .

John Wright (4) moves in for one of Varsity's few scoring chances during Saturday's 7-2 loss to Cornell University. Wright scored one of Blues two goals on a sharp slapshot which cleanly beat Big Red goolier Ken Dryden. Wright also assisted on Dave Field's marker.

Varsity goaler Tom Little kicks out shot during one of many sieges he faced around his cage. Dove Field left and Terry Parsons are fighting to break up the play while Bill Duthie (16) waits for rebound.

Varsity cagers drop to fifth

By KAREN YOUNG

University of Windsor Lancers racked up their forty-seventh straight win in St. Denis Hall Saturday night with an 80-67 victory over Varsity Blues in Windsor.

Lancers remain out in front in the Senior Intercollegiate Basketball League with a 7-0 record. Varsity dropped to fifth position with a 2-5 record behind Waterloo Warriors who defeated MacMaster 69-63 on Saturday evening.

Blues, completely overwhelmed by the foul air emitted by the referees were down 10 points after the first five minutes. Lancers' morale, lifted by their luck on foul shots, helped them maintain their lead.

Varsity remained on even terms for the rest of the game but were unable to close the gap. They were down 12 points at half time and 13 points at the end of the game.

Chief attraction for Varsity was substitute centre Jay MacDonald who replaced

John Hadden for most of the game. The former St. Francis Xavier performer paced Toronto with 16 points and an equal number of rebounds. Larry Trafford and Bruce Dempster played their usual steady games collecting 14 and 11 points respectively.

Spearheading Lancers' full-court press was Forward Chris Wydrzynski who contributed 19 points. He was helped by forward Andy Auch (ouch) and rightguard Mike Crowe who had 11 apiece.

Coach Eddie Chittaro's team, well-drilled as always did not disappoint the rabid capacity crowd. With only three games remaining in their schedule, Lancers look like a good bet to finish undefeated.

Blues still have a slim (mathematical) chance to tie for the second and final play-off position. Varsity must win their remaining three games beginning with Waterloo at home on Wednesday night, while MacMaster and Western must lose their remaining three encounters.

MONTREAL (CUP) — The two-week occupation of Sir George Williams University ended violently yesterday when students sacked and burned their building. The university has been closed until Monday, and 79 students are in jail as a result of the destruction.

These are the events which led from peaceful occupation to mass destruction:

Saturday and Sunday: Students and administrators negotiate an agreement whereby student demands are accepted in return for student evacuation of occupied territory.

Sunday: Principal Douglas Burns Clark hesitates to sign agreement. Prefers to "sleep on it".

By GEOFF MEGGS

"The important thing to remember about Erindale is that we are all explorers building something new and without traditions," said Nanci Wakeman (II Erin).

Nanci is one of 450 students presently enrolled at Erindale College, a place most people know only from the name on the side of the shuttle bus. Erindale, however, is much more than the commuter college it was originally designed to be.

Erindale resembles the educational Utopia we all dreamed of before our first year. In the spring the students will wander over the parkland again, the ice will melt from the two swimming pools, and by fall, when the college's first graduates begin their last year, the apple trees in the orchards will be laden with fruit.

Erindale's tiny building in suburban Streetsville is occupied by a thriving community determined to create a full educational experience. Thus faculty eat and play chess with the students, and the college's three administrators teach courses of their own. Erindale is probably the only college at U of T in which the principal invites students to his home for parties and knows half of them by name.

Unlike the impersonal masses of the St. George campus, the Erindale community includes janitors and administrators, secretaries and faculty, students and bus drivers. All are on a first-name basis and much of the college's esprit is derived from these closely knit relationships.

As in any group, common experiences eventually gain the stature of legends. In almost any conversation with an Erindalian one hears the tale of The Great Bed Race, an event which illustrates the life-style of the college.

During Orientation Week a race was organized in which two caster beds were imported to carry the colors of first and second years in a contest on nearby Mississauga Road.

The majority of the college was at trackside at the appointed time to witness the event. Traffic was held up in both directions to allow the competitors a clear run.

As the fates would have it, both beds collapsed part-way through the course and in the confusion first year carried the opponents' mattresses across the line to victory (for second year).

The blue-and white-collar people were there too. One beaming secretary described the hurried retreat of a motorist who managed to get onto the course in the midst of the contest.

A janitor told me as he swept the floor of the student house and chatted to the students, "I like working at this college. They are good people."

The conditions that have created this blissful community are many: the smallness of the building, the lack of constricting tradition, the innovative administration, the devoted faculty, respected student leaders, the beautiful rural surroundings and so on.

Unfortunately not all these factors are permanent. Although last year's enrolment was only 150, over 900 students are expected to register in the fall. By 1970 a peak of 5,000 students will use the facilities.

Paul Kochberg (II Erin) President of the Student Administrative Government of Erindale, hopes to alleviate the strains of expansion on Erindale life by the construction of a residence.

The administration is sympathetic to Kochberg's feelings. "Our major problem is the provision of enough physical plant to provide a community life," says Dean E. A. Robinson. Construction of some form of accommodation is a top priority at the college and several proposals are being considered.

The most innovative of these ideas is that of immediate erection of an apartment building to establish a core for the college life. The plans are still unofficial, but the building will certainly include some form of accommodation for even non-residents and extensive recreation facilities. Thus every member of the college would have his own room on campus, perhaps shared with four others.

Small size has hastened the inclusion of the student body at every level of college government. SAGE, fully constituted only this year as student council, has encouraged the development of a student paper, drama

NATIONAL UNION DAY

Screwed for the summer?

If you were one of the 74,000 Canadian students who were jobless last summer and thought that things couldn't possibly get worse, you're wrong.

By all indications, both permanent and summer positions will be scarcer than last year when 13 of the students who applied for jobs were unemployed. And 20,000 more students will try to enter the labor market this June.

These facts along with the economic issues behind them are part of a campaign by the Students' Administrative Council to get students the university and the government to act on the crisis.

Today at 1 p.m., there will be a mass meeting in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall where Steve Langdon, SAC president and Thomas Wells, Minister Without Portfolio in the Ontario government, will speak. Mr. Wells has recently been given the responsibility of looking into the student employment situation.

Six demands will be presented as alternatives to the present government policy of keeping the student unemployment rate high.

"This is the most important issue SAC has dealt with this year," says SAC president Steve Langdon, "and potentially the most explosive because it hits at the basic weaknesses of our economic system.

"The only demand that would in any way interfere with the work force already on the labor market is the guaranteeing of jobs for students by Canada Manpower. The rest of the recommendations will help because they will get students to question the causes in our economy that contribute to the unemployment situation that are leading to a depression."

The campaign is in conjunction with National Union Day on campuses across Canada.

"The time to do something about the lack of summer jobs is now," says Langdon.

"The government is embarking on an austerity program, so they cut the number of jobs. This leads to less wealth in the hands of the people and thus less government revenue. This vicious circle will lead to a depression. The government won't solve the problems by not spending the money."

and art groups and is presently involved in moving into new quarters in Colman House.

Colman House (named for last year's Dean S. J. Colman who is now at Scarborough) is the gift of the University. It is a huge ranch bungalow with swimming pool and fireplaces, equipped as a student lounge and meeting place. In addition to all the above SAGE has no trouble finding support for sports activities five nights a week.

Students also hold a balance of power on the faculty council committees and the Principal's Council. The Principal's Council, composed of 11 elected students, five elected faculty, and five ex-officio faculty including the dean, principal and registrar. Theoretically powerless, the Council makes recommendations to the principal on any college matter and usually gets its way.

The faculty council has 20 student members. While this is not a majority the busy faculty are often unable to field an equal number. On Faculty Council Committees students have equal or majority representation, except on the Scholarships and Awards and Research Committees. Faculty are in the minority on the Committees for Performing and Visual Arts and the Student Facilities Committee.

It is often difficult to find enough competent students to fill these positions.

"One of our big problems here is getting people interested in student government," says Kochberg. "They have everything they want and are too contented to really want to get involved."

"The students are far too content with the lecture system," agrees Dean Robinson. "They don't like to be prodded. If there is anything wrong with the students it is that they are far too conformist. The faculty are often more radical." There must be many administrators who wish they had Erindale's problems.

CAMPUS 3

Colman House, a student centre

Inconspicuous king of this happy realm is Dr. J. Tuzo Wilson, geologist, author and sometime administrator of Erindale College.

"My job is to see that things get done as they ought to be," he says complacently.

"I spend most of my time on my work. Right now I'm studying continental drift."

However blase Wilson may seem on the surface, his personality is inseparable from Erindale's. Frequent visitor to the cafeteria, he acquired almost legendary fame during the Bus Rally Stripes Incident.

It seems several students slipped onto the campus one night and painted rally stripes on a shuttle bus. The stripes were in college colors of course.

The bus was to be removed from service for a new coat of paint but Wilson heard of the exploit and borrowing pen and paper wrote a memo instructing that the students be allowed to decorate the rest of buses if they wished.

Dr. Wilson has made a point of opening his home to students and faculty, a policy which has paid off admirably.

"Dr. Wilson is powerful, knows what he wants, and works to achieve it with great vigor," says Dr. D. R. Clarke, professor of chemistry at Erindale.

"He is anxious that the talent and finance which go into the university feed back effectively to the community at large."

The Erindale faculty members themselves are something of a special breed.

"The faculty at Erindale are younger and more experimental," says Prof. J. F. Burke. "Some professors wouldn't touch Erindale with a ten-foot pole."

Those who do come are characterized by an interest in their students a desire for an alternative to the mass education of the main campus, and often the hope of escaping the sometimes unbearing presence of senior faculty downtown.

Strangely enough, some students initially resent placement at Erindale because of its supposedly inferior academic standards. This conception is vehemently denied by all faculty. In fact, over half of Erindale's students are there by choice.

"Any resentment at the beginning of the year is dissipated by the spirit of the community," says Dr. Clarke.

Student life at Erindale is uncomplicated. Most spare time is spent in the cafeteria or the library. Students can even have books imported from the downtown library. Few venture to the St. George campus at any time.

The question of the college's connection to downtown is a knotty one. Most would prefer stronger ties, but are unwilling to make any effort in that direction until SAC, the Blue and White, and The Varsity take more notice of them.

"We're not really getting our $12 worth from SAC," said Kochberg. "SAGE is presently involved in discussions of some kind of associate status. Erindale students have repudiated the revolutionary attitude of SAC."

Faculty, of course, are insistent on easy access to the vast reference and teaching resources of the main campus.

Problems such as these are a minor part of college life. Always evident is the searching, creative vitality of the community.

"Colleges like Erindale have enormous advantages for the university," says Dean Robinson. "They can be centres for change without everyone being committed. They may solve the problem of the multiversity. They can provide an environment particularly suited to undergraduate studies."

I found Dr. Clarke in the cafeteria refereeing a student chess game. On the way to his office he was hailed four times by students and faculty who asked him questions about his lecture or just stopped to say hello. As we entered his office he said over his shoulder "That's Erindale."

'stupid power' at SGW

The situation at Sir George Williams University in Montreal looked, at press time last night, something like this:

- at least a million dollars worth of computers destroyed. The centre will be out of commission until at least October.
- The entire ninth floor of the Hall building gutted.
- Water damage to at least five other floors.
- Valuable research projects destroyed.
- All animals in 11th floor psychology experiments are dead.
- Same academic records and exam marks have been lost in the fire.
- The university has been shut down until Monday, but normal operation may not be restored for months.
- At least 79 students face severe criminal charges carrying sentences ranging from seven years to life imprisonment.
- Total damages are estimated at $8 million.

Probably no one will ever know just what caused the students to end their occupation so tragically. Sources close to the occupiers feel it was the faculty's eleventh-hour betrayal in refusing to accept the agreement reached by the student-administration negotiating team.

After nearly 24 optimistic hours, the students were ready to move out the minute the faculty gave the agreement its stamp of approval.

The faculty reneged.

After two weeks of guarding the delicate computers, the students wound up taking out their frustrations on the machines.

At issue was a matter which would have been quickly settled on a less hysterical campus—the composition of a committee to investigate charges of racial bias against an assistant biology professor.

In this issue, 'everyone lost, and in a very real sense, all parties must share in the blame. The administration made the original blunder in refusing to act immediately on the charges of racial bias made months earlier.

The faculty, perhaps trying to protect its own, perhaps looking to amass some power for itself, refused to give in to a combined student-administration agreement.

And the students turned against the entire system and reacted finally in the only way they could, with the only power they had left — sabotage.

It's not a very pretty situation and no one can condone the students' actions. Destroying an intricate computer system is hardly the way to achieve any kind of justice.

Instead of establishing a fair marking system for a few Negro students, these hysterical militants have committed an act which is likely to set back the cause of student participation in university affairs for years.

We can only label their actions "stupid power".

Who 'uses' what

Simcoe Hall knows what this campus will look like eight years from now.

But although students are the main "users" of campus facilities, when planning time comes they aren't consulted.

When a new building opens, students use the seminar rooms, sit in the lecture halls, eat in the cafeteria and lounge in the common rooms. So do the faculty.

Faculty opinion is represented during planning stages. Student opinion is not.

When the University decides it wants a new building it appoints a Users committee "to prepare a statement of needs".

This committee consists of "a smallish number of people directly concerned". Translated this means the Vice-President Administration, the Chairman of the Planning Division, the Director of the Physical Plant and faculty representatives.

Aren't students "users" too? If students had helped plan Sidney Smith Hall would the result have been the same? Maybe a cafeteria would have been included.

When a new building is planned both students and faculty should be consulted. Both know the facilities they need.

LETTERS

Jews' salvation is helping the poor

Rabbi Rubinstein's recent arguments reported in the Varsity deserve comment, for they are now increasingly heard from many other quarters. The Jews, it is said, though they have for years worked for the civil rights of black people, are now being attacked by them. The white establishment seems ready to sacrifice Jews to preserve 'order' — a perpetuation of anti-Semitism — therefore the best course for the Jews is to be right-wing conservatives.

Now, the acts are largely as Rubinstein states them, though they need to be interpreted differently, but the recommendation he gives is certainly mistaken. I might note that there are certain uncomfortable resemblances between these sentiments and those of the civil rights "do-gooder" who panics when it's his block that is integrated, his property values that are lowered. But let this pass.

Rubinstein's facts cry out for historical perspective. Various white ethnic groups, including the Jews, that arrived in America have succeeded, in varying degrees, in becoming part of the middle class, in obtaining political power. Black people have not succeeded in this — largely because of racism. What is seldom acknowledged, though, is the extent to which the ascent of the former has been dependent on the "passivity" of the latter, and their exploited economic position.

The Jews, for instance, would have had much more difficulty advancing themselves if black people had been a militant and as organized as they are now. This is not to say that the Jews bettered themselves by being especially exploitative in their relations with blacks. James Baldwin put it well, in an otherwise unadmirable essay: the Negro hates the Jew not because he is different from other white men, but because he is the same. Black people need not put forward the anti-Semitic argument that Jewish businesses in Harlem should be eliminated because they are especially exploitative. But they can justifiably argue that non-black businesses — many of which are Jewish — are exploiting the black community and must be driven out or taken over.

Now we are at the crux of the argument. Suppose Rubinstein is correct in thinking that Mayor Lindsay would allow certain Jewish property to be destroyed in order not to antagonize blacks. Before we can tell what this signifies, we must ascertain which property it is that Lindsay can politically afford to sacrifice. It is the shops and small businesses of the Jewish petit bourgeois. If these people can be thus victimized, it shows that they have not won their rightful share of power in the cities. (It also shows to what extent the more successful Jewish bourgeois have become part of a white, mainly Protestant, power structure defending class interests.)

Now we can see the tremendous mistake these people would be making if they became conservative. Instead they can help themselves by working on the side of the Jewish poor, and clearly it is to the advantage of these allies to work with poor blacks, rather than against them. For although the poor blacks are the immediate cause of the present pressure on the Jewish petit bourgeois, the basic causes are to be found in the present economic system, and the exclusion of most blacks, especially the poor, from their share of political power.

Obviously it only helps the white Protestant elite (and those it has co-opted) if the poorer Jews blame the blacks for their problems. These Jews are duped if they believe power holders who say, "We can only make further concessions to the blacks at your expense." Rather they should seek a greater share of power for themselves, and try to help the blacks in their very much more difficult struggle to get their share. If these Jews do this, they have nothing to fear from "Black power."

to Mr. Wernick and friends

So you "expose this (capitalist) repression for what it is," where does that get you? If you can propose a better system, can you say that it will work better than what we have now? The years will prove you wrong, no doubt. If a "new system" (or whatever your ideal is) comes about, you're going to have trouble answering your children (or the "youth" of a future generation) when they see the inherent "half-truths" and "distortions" in your system. How can you believe that, after so many eons of life on this planet, you have the answer.

Until you find the answer, kindly let the "oppressed minority" of students on this campus, whose words often appear only under "letters to the editor" go on "doing the best we can."

Please pardon the clichés in this letter. In a "repressive society," this "military-industrial-educational complex," full of "conflict," and "uncommitted" people, in which we happen to live, it is often hard to find new words to express tried, and perhaps even true, ideas.

Capitalism

Mrs. A. grunted with labour pains. She was a bit apprehensive at the birth of her child since she had been in an iron lung for the last three years and wasn't sure she could stand the strain of delivery.

"Lights, move in camera one," said Walter Cronkite II.

"On the air."

"Hello, folks. This week the Wide World of Cripples takes you to the childbed of Mrs. A., a terminal cancer patient who is expecting her first child. Hello, Mrs. A."

"Hello, Walt. I got my iron lung with Raleigh coupons."

"Fine, fine. Are you expecting a boy or a girl, Mrs. A.?"

"Oh, I'm easy."

"Nine months ago," Cronkite continued, "The American Tobacco Company, hearing of Mrs. A.'s plight, and hearing that she has been a faithful customer for years, decided to help her fulfill her lifelong ambition of having a child. After all, what's life in this great democracy for unless you can enjoy yourself and get screwed by a big company?"

"That's right, Walt," averred Mrs. A.

There was a flurry of activity among the doctors and a baby emerged from the lung.

The child was a stillbirth.

Mrs. A. started to sniffle.

"Oh, too bad," said Cronkite. "Well, this program has been brought to you by Raleigh cigarettes. Mrs. A.'s hairstyle by Omarr of California..."

Psyche-society

Mrs. B.'s face clouded with apprehension as she saw the grave face of her doctor.

"Is the baby alright?" she said.

"Well, I'm afraid not. We've sent her fingerprints through the centrex computer and analysis shows she'll be a nymphomaniac who'll marry unhappily and become prematurely senile. We'll give her insulin-shock treatments for a few days, but we'll probably have to process her as a nun or a skydiver."

Mrs. B. bit her lower lip and forced back a tear.

"This is your third child, isn't it?" said the doctor.

"Yes."

"Thought so. The other pair turned out bad too, didn't they?"

"I don't know. They just shook their heads after seeing the analyses and wheeled them away."

"I'm afraid we'll have to voluntarily sterilize you, Mrs. B."

"What do you mean, 'voluntarily'?"

"I mean we'll do it without having to be asked."

"I want children," Mrs. B. whined.

"That's okay. We can train you with electro-therapy to hate the sight of them. You won't have to miss a day of work."

Darwinism

Fifteen-foot tall Mrs. C. was picking leaves off the top of her maple tree when her pains came on. She walked next door to the house of three-foot tall Dr. Snopes and rang the doorbell with her toe.

"I think it's time, doctor," she said.

"How far apart are the pains?"

"About two feet."

"No, no child. The time. The time."

Doctor Snopes got Mrs. C. to lie down on the lawn. He was a gruff old man, but he treated the six-year-old woman with affection. He had been the family doctor for years. He had delivered Mrs. C.'s 12-foot mother and her nine-foot grandmother. Mrs. C.'s family had been the most successful breed of leaf pickers developed at the university. Doomed to an early death because of their un-gainly frames and weak hearts, they were endowed with a compensatory fertility that enabled them to reproduce before their decade or so was up.

Snopes was feverishly busy boiling a bathtub of water, cutting the umbilical cord with a fire axe.

"How's my baby?" asked Mrs. C.

"Fine, dear. She'll be 18 feet tall for sure. Just like the professor promised."

"That's good. I'll call her Pine Cone."

Religion

Mrs. D. was plugged into the cold hands of the birth machine. She didn't like the feel of the metal, but the law demanded that machines be used, ever since it had been found that they cut down the incidence of indecent assault at childbirth by doctors 98 per cent.

A platoon of priests entered the room and began their ritual chant.

"We know what you did. We know what you did. Mrs. D.'s a screwer. Shame, shame. Razz."

Mrs. D. grinned weakly but happily. How good it was to have the comforts of religion at a time like this.

Suddenly a sharp pain convulsed her stomach.

Dr. Fainall rushed forward. "Labour has started again. It should come this time. It's been eight hours now."

"Stand back, secular man," said a dog-collar. "Her spiritual needs come first."

Mrs. D. broke into a sweat. "I've got to help you!" said the doctor.

"No, no! I've got to be purified in case I die! Else I'll go to the underworld."

"Let me save your child."

"I'll save it," said the oldest sky-pilot there. Inserting the baptismal syringe, he squirted.

There was a rush of blood and soon the mother and child dwelt in the house of the Lord forever.

Science

The doctors had never seen anything like it before. There was a distinct glowing light coming from the child's head.

"Fantastic," said the head surgeon. "I think I'll call it the Smythe-Bendix syndrome."

"Thank you, Dr. Smythe."

"Not at all, Dr. Bendix."

"Could this light be a form of putrescent phosphorescence?"

"This is not unknown among electric eels, doctor."

"True. And it's a slippery problem, alright."

"I'll reserve a cot at the Institute for the child. We've got to determine if the glow is healthy or not."

"What's the medical history?"

"Pretty scant. We just found the child and mother in an old newspaper. They came in pretty bad shape."

Dr. Smythe and Bendix went to visit the mother.

"Hello," said Dr. Smythe. "I'm sorry to bother you when you're not feeling well, but do you remember who the father of your child was, Miss E.?"

We murder the spirit of our friends, ourselves and mankind each time we "type cast" people, things, or situations into some ignorant unconscious form. We are spirits representative of the highest form of energy in Earth yet we consistently view ourselves and one another as very limited "things". We are not threatened by death, there is no death. We are threatened most by our illusions and self imposed restrictions. We do more violence to ourselves by our thoughts conceived inattentively and in ignorance to reality, than the physical acts of mayhem committed by us when we are unwilling to exert the necessary energy to control our id. Destruction and creation both require approximately the same amount of energy. Destruction is unconscious or without conscience, while creativity is reverently aware of the interests of the human spirit. Destruction is merely change. Creativity is improvement. There IS a difference, in both form and content.

"If you don't underestimate me I won't underestimate you..."

Conceiving human "nature as being anything less than the nature of God is a harmfully restricting category.

Life and the spirit of the human race are that of development through the discovery and realization and finally participatory control of creative change. LIFE and nature are in eternal flux. Day-night, Summer-winter, birth-death Yin-yang. Each dichotomy represents an intermediate that includes and combines of both, yet it also represents the tension of uncertainty about being neither! This is a description of a metaphysical problem that any student of psych will recognize. Change creates massive identity problems, be that change exquisitely private or celestial. Our society is apparently undergoing an apocalyptic celestial change. I find it very difficult to reject the suggestion by Jung that the advent of the Aquarian Age will have an effect on the consciousness of the entire human race. Fuller agrees. All together now, all together now.

They and I are very unhappy about being type-cast cum stereo-typed as anything less than God himself.

Hello. My name is God. Is life on Earth friendly? ? ? yes? no-yes. yes no. YES.

open letter

Dear Sir,

On February 8, York University student journalists revealed that five of them had posed as deserters from the U.S. armed forces and applied for landed immigration at different border crossing points. Canadian immigration officials turned all but one back and notified U.S. immigration officials that they were deserters. In two cases the officials, as reported, interrogated the "applicants" on their military status.

The Executive of the University of Toronto Faculty Committee on Vietnam, while it neither condones nor condemns the student impersonations, must register a strong complaint against the illegal and unjust actions of the immigration officials and the department or departments on whose orders they acted. Canadian immigration officials are legally prohibited from enforcing foreign laws or divulging personal information to foreign immigration officials, and the military status of applicants for admission into Canada is and should be irrelevant to their acceptance.

Aside from the injustice of the reported action, we also feel that it is an act counter to the stated neutrality of the Canadian government as regards the Vietnam war. Many or perhaps most deserters from the U.S. military are refusing to contribute to what they consider an immoral and unjust war. With much of the world openly opposed to the U.S. policy and with peace talks now under way, we find it inexcusable that the Canadian Government or any department of it should pick this time to act in a way which could only be interpreted as a support for U.S. Vietnam policies.

Accordingly, we urge that the Department of Immigration take action to ensure that its officials act more in the spirit of stated public policies.

barkwell objects

I wish to object strenuously to the editorial entitled "SAC's Budget" in Monday's Varsity. I object, not because of disagreement with the views on the cuts which were made, but to two errors of fact which were used to back up those views.

The first error is the statement that the increased levy proposed at the last SAC general meeting was "for 'political' purposes". This is simply not true; the increase was proposed for communications in general and for the Varsity in particular.

The second error was one of omission rather than commission. The writer failed to mention that I originally moved the motion for the fees increase, and pointed out to the council that if it was not approved, large cuts would have to be made. By juxtaposing my comments on the possible political consequences of such a fees increase (comments made, incidentally, some days after the meeting referred to) with the statement that the "meeting tabled the motion to raise the levy..." it was made to appear as if I was a major influence in that tabling.

The inclusion of several smaller errors concerning both the amounts cut and the organizations affected are not really consistent with good reporting either. I trust that The Varsity will see fit to check at least the basic facts in the future.

Bob Barkwell,
(II Meds)

staff democracy strikes again

I rarely find myself in disagreement with Varsity editorials, but two points in Monday's editorial did catch my eye.

You criticized Radio Varsity as "an organization which indulges in the most luxurious and extravagant spending of any campus service," adding that it lacked cultural or communicative value. You also said that the finance commission, by cutting Random magazine's budget, had "in effect denied the need for a cross campus magazine."

Money spent for Radio Varsity, especially in helping it go FM, can help make it a more valuable cross-campus service than the expensive PA system it is now.

As for Random, the finance commission gave the magazine enough money to produce three high-quality issues next year instead of the four asked for. This doesn't mean SAC does not recognize the need for such a magazine. On the contrary, I am sure that next year's SAC could be persuaded to pay for a fourth issue if the first three are up to expectations.

Wernick and Hoffa

I was rather amused by Mr. Longley's letter in support of the performance by Wernick and Co. Feb. 9. It seems strange to hear this righteous Teamster accuse the university of teaching, "...hypocrisies and double standards, and how to skilfully climb over everyone's back in the never-ending search for success and power. How to weave deceitful schemes, and raise families full of deceitful schemers... How to cheat on their wives..."

The activities of the Teamsters' Union are well known, but a few of the highlights are: beating up members who do not agree with the Brotherhood's pursuit of moral fibre, intimidating truckers who do not want to join by beating them up, setting their trucks on fire and threatening their families and even performing magic tricks, like making some people disappear permanently. Mr. Longley's glorious leader Jimmy Hoffa has finally ended up in jail. (It seems he tried to tamper with the jury.) Incidentally, the person who led the fight against Hoffa and his organization was, Bobby Kennedy. Nevertheless, the Teamsters think that Hoffa is still a great guy and have voted to continue paying his salary of $100,000 per year during his eight year prison term.

Thus while it seems strange to hear Teamster Longley talk of "...brotherhood, moral fibre..." it does seem appropriate that support for the actions of Andy Wernick and his goons should come from one of Hoffa's boys.

women's interfac

I would like to reply to your Feb. 3 article "Women claim inter-fac will suffer if phys-ed ended". The reason for which most girls were present at this meeting was that SAC had decided its policy of the issue without hearing both the pros and the cons of the situation. The main reason was not "That they feared this would jeopardize the interfac sports programme." A petition with 190 names on it, which was circulated by Miss Bowman is not truly representative of the 4,000 girls at U. of T.

Since when have "Phys-ed blazers" come into existence? The girls at the meeting were wearing Varsity blazers which can be bought by any girl. (They also sell men's blazers which can be bought by men in any faculty). If the reporter had asked, he would have been informed that these girls from all faculties were representing the University at the Sports Day with McGill, and were leaving on the train that afternoon.

Miss Bowman stated that if girls were interested in taking Phys-ed classes they would "show" voluntarily. However, if so many girls are interested in ending compulsory first year Phys-ed classes they certainly did not "show" at this debate. Only three spoke in favor of this view — two girls and Steve Langdon.

Again, however, may I stress that the reason I attended this meeting, and which was stated by many at this meeting, was that we did not approve of the method that SAC used in arriving at their decision. Let's hear both sides of the issue before any of us jump to a hasty conclusion.

"disgusting abuse"

The disgusting abuse of bodily force by a handful of radicals at the public lecture of Prof. Clark Kerr, cut short and deprived a vast majority of the audience of the intellectual, pleasure they had come to enjoy, in many cases at considerable expense of time and travel effort; it highlights the infinitely greater waste of public property and of the time of earnest students, caused by capricious occupation, if not damage, of lecture halls, computer laboratories, and administration offices.

It demonstrated the ancient revolutionary maxim that a small well-organized minority can easily subject to their tyranny an unorganized peaceful majority who are left with their frustration, if not worse. By their howls, when a solitary policeman walked towards the platform, our present-day pampered rebels also showed how heavily they count on the goodwill of the abused public for protection of their own physical inviolability, and how dismayed they were when a lone heckler sometimes disrupted the flow of meaningless stock-phrases mouthed by their hysterical spokesmen from an usurped platform.

The University, through its governing body and administration, has the duty to protect the legitimate use of its property, and the personal safety and freedom to speak and to hear, of its constituents and it has the primary right to do so by internal means. If the institution fails in this area because of the lack of the physical means, and therefore perhaps of the lack of will, outside force will move in, sooner or later, to protect the taxpayers' investment and to forestall a frustrated majority from taking its own measures with probably chaotic results. It may need only one hard-minded conservative individual to organize sportsmen among the hard-working engineers, scientists, and (even) social scientists who are de-humanised in the learning process" (as one of the radicals described them from the platform) to join in the fun of harassing the often unkept and therefore unattractive neo-revolutionaries.

The resulting calamity to University ideals can be prevented by a timely exertion of University authority, moral and physical. Since the University police comprise only a handful of men, a police-reserve should be formed by student volunteers who would be properly trained in crowd-control and, in an emergency, would be commanded by the regular University police; they should be easily distinguishable and they should get paid for time when on duty. The augmented force would enable the University authorities to safeguard the moral rights and physical safety of the majority as well as of the dissenters.

Grads pour in ascampus sprawls

By MARY KATE ROWAN

Oh for the simple life of 1963!

Cars could race down St. George at 100 miles an hour and the average student didn't care, for apart from a few rooming houses on the other side, there was nothing to cross to.

At that time, St. George Street was considered to be the final western boundary of the campus.

However, in 1956 the need for expanded graduate facilities became apparent.

"In view of the need for graduate work and the U of T being especially well-suited for it, we had to accept responsibility for the enormous increase in graduate students," explains Dr. Roland McLaughlin, Chairman of the U of T's Planning Division.

Since 1960, graduate student enrolment has jumped from 1,500 to 5,300. By 1976, there will be 7,500 graduates, an increase of 2,300 from today. During that time, undergraduate enrolment will rise by only 1,000 to 16,291.

To control campus sprawl, the university developed a master plan in 1956, projecting till 1968. The result is today's western campus.

As the graduate students continue to pour in, the campus pushes towards the west. Expansion is concentrated in the "north-west" campus, bounded by Spadina, Bloor, St. George and Harbord.

In Dr. McLaughlin's opinion, the St. George campus will not become the sole domain of the graduate student. "Certainly the proportions between graduate and undergraduate will change," he says, "but you haven't got a university if you have no undergraduates."

He also feels full time enrolment should not exceed 23,000 students, "for then there would be no possibility of any kind of personal interaction." By 1974, this figure will be reached.

What then? Originally planned for 5,000 students each, Erindale and Scarborough College could both become independent once the ceiling is reached. "What will happen then," says Dr. McLaughlin, "is anybody's guess."

To help absorb increased university enrolment, new universities such as York, Trent and Brock have recently sprung up.

The barrier of the future Spadina Expressway on the west and Queen's Park on the east limit future growth of the U of T campus.

"The U of T may expand south of College but only for residences and auxiliary services," comments McLaughlin. "We shouldn't have to or want to expand north."

"Because of this," he continues, "the area between St. George and Spadina has to be an area of high-rise, 10 to 15 storeys in height."

In the future, Dr. Mc-tion, the St. George campus will not become the sole domain of the graduate student. "Certainly the proportions between graduate and undergraduate will change," he says, "but you haven't got a university if you have no undergraduates."

They locked themselves in with sleeping bags, food and cameras, vowing to remain until the following demands were met:

Getting a new building: conception to completion

By MARY KATE ROWAN

From the time a new building is proposed to the time the doors swing open, the plans are discussed by everyone involved — Board members, faculty, planners and architects — only students are not consulted.

If the people concerned convince the President, he appoints a User Committee to "prepare a statement of needs," to determine whether or not cafeterias are needed, the number of classrooms, common rooms etc.

This User Committee is composed of the Vice-President Administration, the Director of Physical Plant, the Chairman of the Planning Division and members of the faculty concerned. Student opinion is not represented.

The Planning Division acts as an advisory bureau while the Physical Plant Department implements all plans.

Since U of T is a federation of four universities — Toronto, Victoria, Trinity and St. Michael's, there are four separate Boards of Governors.

After the User Committee report is amended by PACAF (President's Advisory Council on Accommodation and Finance), the Planning Division compiles the Program based on PACAF's comments, the Vice President Administration's report on finance and a report from the Physical Plant.

Now the Property Committee of the Board, armed with the Program, selects consultants or architects.

At this point, the Physical Plant Department takes responsibility for implementation of the Program.

Normally, consultants meet with the Users, Planning Division and other interested groups and make monthly reports.

Project development is divided into four stages:

- conceptual or schematic proposals
- preliminary designs
- detailed designs
- construction

After each stage, consultants report through the Physical Plant Department and the Property Committee to the Board.

Each stage must be approved by the Board before work begins on the next. After each stage, consultants can be dismissed, at the option of the Board.

Landscaping, which includes roads, paving, sidewalks and street lighting is considered separately.

Details are no surprise to the Board, the Planning Division, the Physical Plant Department, the architects or any other consultants. They've hammered out the details during many long committee meetings.

Hopefully everyone who was consulted is happy.

Laughlin expects more residence accommodation. "Academic needs will be met, slowly," he adds. "I expect all kinds of temporary arrangements."

Although they are financially independent, swapping of property does occur. For example, Trinity will probably receive control of the Devonshire residence site when the building is destroyed.

According to Dr. McLaughlin, the pedestrian traffic problem of St. George will become less severe in the future because "the centre of student gravity is moving to the north-west campus."

"However," he adds, "it will never disappear."

Laughlin expects more residence accommodation. "Academic needs will be met, slowly," he adds. "I expect all kinds of temporary arrangements."

The ideas are there but the problem is money. Technically, the direct responsibility for growth is within the university but the final source of money is the province.

"We are in a situation where we have to deal with Metro, the city, the province and the Board of Governors and we have to get them all to agree."

"Engineer in Society" conference marks emergence of New Breed

By Rod Ritchie

MONTREAL — U of T engineers will have something new to remember Montreal by after this weekend.

Until recently this city was the Skuleman's haven for the round of guzzling and womanizing at the annual McGill weekend. But Friday it will be the site of a conference to beat the hippies at their own game as the engineers assume their new role as the conscience of society.

Over 20 delegates from the U of T Engineering Society will present their case for the "Engineer in Society" before a congress of 195 engineering students from across Ontario and Quebec.

"Let me tell you that this conference definitely marks the emergence of the New Breed engineer," says congress vice-president Tom Gallo (IV APSC).

Gallo presents the idea that until now engineers have been "stereotyped and patronized on campus as intellectual infants and social misfits."

But the campus image is not the only reason for remodeling the engineering role, says Toike Oike editor Peter Renyi (II APSC).

"Until recently the engineer was simply given no reason to assess his responsibilities to society. The Vietnam issue has changed all that.

In Montreal the U of T contingent will be forced to grapple with a number of questions:

• How can the engineer gain political access to the university faculty and administration?

• What can he do when he objects to his company's policy on: manufacturing war materials; buying back Canadian industry; discriminating against French-Canadian engineers; polluting the cities; debasing the union man?

• At the same time, how can he make his education relevant to the needs of industry?

After a month of soul-searching the U of T delegation has come up with a spate of solutions:

—Industry's blind pursuit of profit at the expense of society is intolerable. It threatens slow extinction by polluting nature and rapid extinction by manufacturing war materials.

Because the engineer is the vital center of industry, it is his duty to protest to higher management as his conscience bids.

If, as a result, he is threatened with dismissal or demotion, he must have recourse to an arbitration board of Canadian engineers.

—The present education system is inadequate. Because engineering schools are the servant of industry and because industry is too often guided solely by the profit motive, engineering training often neglects the social consequences of corporate decisions.

Two solutions exist. One is to make certain that engineers have a wider background in the social sciences. The other is to make certain that they have a wider voice at the faculty council level.

—The idea that French Canadian professionals have to become Englishmen for survival and promotion in Quebec-based industry is intolerable.

—American ownership of Canadian industry is intolerable. At the public level it threatens Canadian political and economic independence. At the private level it converts the Canadian engineer into a mere technician since American subsidiaries discourage research and development in Canada.

Two solutions seem feasible. One is to buy back Canadian industry by channelling a vast portion of public spending into the Canada Development Corporation and by establishing import-export tariffs that would limit exports of raw materials and limit imports of manufactured goods.

While this would mean a vast drop in the Canadian standard of living it could be offset with the second solution: setting up a Commonwealth Free Trade Area.

Since the engineer is the administrative and technological backbone of Canadian industry, he has both the duty and the power to press his demands on the federal government.

"The threat to Canadian universities . . . is the pressure generated by a consumer-oriented society to judge the worth of everything, universities included, by how much they contribute to the growth of the Gross National Product"

By C. B. Macpherson
Professor of Political Science,
U of T

I shall argue that it is not utopian to define a university as an institution for the advancement of learning in the broadest sense. And I shall suggest what kind of action is most likely to be effective in realizing such a definition.

By the advancement of learning I mean the increase and dissemination of knowledge, of understanding, and of critical intellectual ability. The university's function, that is to say, should be twofold: (1) to provide the atmosphere and the facilities for the creation of new knowledge, new understanding of man and society and the universe; and (2) to spread the cumulative knowledge and increase the critical understanding of its members (which means developing their understanding of how knowledge is acquired and how it is judged, and of the place of theory in the coherent ordering of facts).

Is this a utopian definition of a university's function? I think not, although there are strong forces at work in modern national societies to make the university into something different. What those forces are, and their relative strength, is different in different countries. A mistake commonly made by Canadian university reformers, and particularly by some student activist leaders, is to assume that the forces are the same here as in the United States. There, the subordination of the universities to the needs of corporate capitalism and the military-industrial complex has gone a long way. (Its implications have recently been spelled out in a remarkable article by the Professor of Linguistics at MIT, Noam Chomsky, "The Menace of Liberal Scholarship", New York Review of Books, Jan. 2, 1969.) And since the professors in American universities have, by and large, lacked the will or the skill to resist this "counterrevolutionary subordination" of the university, the resistance has had to come from students.

The main force which threatens the quality of Canadian universities is I think of a different sort. Perhaps because Canadian corporate capitalism is so largely controlled from the U.S., and hence can get its research and ideological needs served in the American multiversities, it does not make serious demands on Canadian universities. Nor is our military establishment very demanding. Canadian-American corporate capitalism has not, in my observation, penetrated Canadian universities in any serious way. The one clear example of American penetration of Canadian universities is the penetration of the Canadian student left by the thinking of the American student left, which is apt to be taken over uncritically, without examining the real differences between the two national societies.

The threat to Canadian universities is a more prosaic and more pervasive force, (which operates of course in the U.S. as well as here). It is the pressure generated by a consumer-oriented society to judge the worth of everything, universities included, by how much they contribute to the growth of the Gross National Product. That universities do contribute to the growth of the GNP is fast becoming the main ground on which university administrations, and persons friendly to universities in bodies like the Economic Council of Canada, seek to persuade politicians and the public that universities are worth their steadily increasing cost to the taxpayer. The danger of this is evident. The university invites politicians and taxpayers to regard it as a producer of producers. From there it is only a short step to treating the university as a training ground for the professional, technical, and even cultural, personnel which an affluent consumer society needs and wants. That short step is not a logically valid one, for the university may well make its greatest contribution to production by living up to the ideal definition of its function rather than applying itself directly to the training of personnel. But it is the shortest and easiest step.

Have Canadian universi-

University (yūnivērsīti). ME. [a. AF. universit:—L. universitat-, -itas (1) the whole, universe, (2) a corporation or community, f. L. universus UNIVERSE. As the designation of a whole body, community, or guild of masters and scholars, the full phr. was universitas magistrorum et scholarium; universitas ultimately superseded studium for 'university'.] 1. The whole body of teachers and students pursuing, at a particular place, the higher branches of learning; such persons associated together as a society or corporate body, having the power of conferring degrees and other privileges, and forming an institution for the promotion of educa-ties any way of resisting this pressure? I suggest that they have, that the professors are better placed than the students to put up an effective resistance, and that if the professors fail they should not be surprised when students lose patience and mount operations of their own — operations which, because they start from a less naturally advantageous position, are likely to involve a good deal of destruction.

Why are the professors in a stronger position than students to resist short-sighted pressures from the outside society? Basically because professors are scarcer than students. This is true anywhere of course, but in Canada there is a further reason for their position of strength. It is this: the Canadian community builds and supports universities with a view to producing a native supply of professional, technical and cultural personnel to serve its needs, instead of relying as heavily as it has in the past on imported personnel; and national pride requires that the universities which are expected to do this shall have standards not generally inferior to the standards in older countries. Universities must have professors, and national pride will not allow their scholarly qualifications to be below a standard recognized internationally. This being so, professors can counteract the outside pressures simply by insisting on being scholars, and insisting that their view of the function of the university as the advancement of learning in the broad sense defined above shall prevail.

I have been making this argument, in public and private, for some months now, chiefly to university administrators and to professorial colleagues. But if it is at all valid it has an important implication for students also. They should be supporting the professors' resistance. Or if, as one of my sceptical colleagues remarked, too many of our professors have already more or less accommodated themselves to the production-line view, the students' task may be to use all the forums and dialogues that are now opening up in universities to win their professors back to a longer-sighted view of the functions of a university.

At any rate, on my analysis, the students should be pressing with the professors to make and keep the university a place for the advancement of learning. Within a university so armed there will be room to develop whatever additional forces critical intelligence can devise for improving, reforming or remaking the society outside. A university fragmented by direct hostilities between students and professors, and between students and the society outside, affords no such base.

IVAN ILLICH

By DARIA ANTONYSHYN

The Kerr-Wernick disturbance which erupted in the Royal Ontario Museum theatre last week claimed a good deal of space in the daily press and sparked hot debate all over campus.

Ironically, the press and the public paid less attention to a man who came all the way from Cuernavaca, Mexico, to tell us our school system is ritualistic and oppressive.

Ivan Illich came to tear down the system and was received warmly by an audience of more than 400 at St. Michael's College. Clark Kerr, who came with peaceful intentions to pat the administration on the back, created a furor that is still being debated.

Msgr. Illich questioned the whole framework (he calls it "ritual") of the North American school system in which students are subjected to a completely arbitrary, dehumanizing system.

"School age is growing like a cancer," he charged. "Why should children be subjected to compulsory attendance — a certain amount of hours and days and months?"

He attacked the principle of confining education to "a sacred building set aside for that purpose."

The class consists of approximately 30 children in front of a person "who exercises authority over them and spellbinds them". Msgr. Illich suggested there must be a more effective way of siphoning information.

Why, he asked, should students ultimately graduate? "God forbid if you should interrupt the ritual before you graduate!"

"The desire for participation in this ritual has become widespread in Latin America," said Illich.

Born in Vienna, Dr. Illich has had extensive experience in dealing with Latin American problems. As a Roman Catholic curate in New York, he worked with the Puerto Rican community and was subsequently sent to the university in Ponce, Puerto Rico.

He was expelled from the Ponce diocese for supporting advocates of a "birth-control" party. Although still a priest in excellent standing in a New York diocese, he prefers to work as a layman in Cuernavaca, Mexico, where he is founder and director of the non-ecclesiastical Centre for Intercultural Documentation.

For his stand and drive against the power elite of Latin America — the Church, educational establishment and the U.S. interests — he ranks with Che Guevara as a leading controversial figure.

The Centre, set up in 1961, has been called "a nerve-centre for almost all of the Latin American guerrilla bands."

The American concept of ritualized education has no place in Latin America, he feels.

"Yet the desire for participation in this ritual is widespread. School society is morally and economically damaging.

"One third of the budget is spent on educating less than one third of the populace to the sixth grade."

The import of American technological goals and the school myth is destroying traditions and polarizing society into two classes — the educated and the uneducated.

"This myth is serving to create a more oppressed proletariat, alienated not only because of money or family origin, but also because of education."

In Latin America, he added, schooling is the best means of exploiting 95 per cent of the population by increasing the education of the already-privileged five per cent.

Although education is becoming increasingly mandatory, few outside the power elite can afford it.

"The schools in Latin America produce very ambiguous results. They function as custodians, to keep the children off the streets. Their other functions are socialization — indoctrination with political ideology — maintenance of the establishment and the learning of values that are not in any way connected with the acquisition of knowledge."

"Cuba is the only country in Latin America which has had the guts to deritualize schooling. Castro, in his address to the graduates of a Cuban university, said 'This kind of temple can't be available to all Cubans, but all Cubans have the right to education. Therefore you must find alternate ways to distribute your knowledge. You are responsible for carrying the university into the fields and the factories.'

"You must advance institutionalized education beyond this temple."

The amount of time needed to absorb the amount of knowledge contained in a school year does not need to be eight months, Dr. Illich said. It is precisely the ritual that slows us down. He proposes a two-month concentration camp could impart the same amount of knowledge.

"Your education system serves only to create a blameworthy docility and readiness to have life organized for you," he concluded.

Someone in the audience asked him how to replace our present educational system.

"The very fact that you ask this question shows that you are a product of this establishment-oriented school system. We have to be taught how to be creative, how to think. We cannot formulate immediate answers."

TTC -I could stop them with 80 men

By MARY BASTEDO

"It's our subway. How dare they raise the rates without our permission?"

The old man leaned across the counter a Perry's Restaurant on Bloor Street, his bright eye seeking an audience.

"No other city in no other country would just sit back and take it," he exclaimed.

"They raise the rates 20 per cent every time. Do you think the workers' wages ever go up that much? Not bloody likely!"

"They're sucking us white and what are we doing about it?"

He turned around on his stool. His pants were thin and worn, ripped at one knee and clumsily mended with white thread.

"You say in Cuba the buses are only a nickel? And if you don't have a nickel you can get on free? Ah! And they call this a progressive society!"

"Where is justice?"

"I say I'll lead a protest. All we need is 80 or 90 men to stand up for their rights, to march shoulder to shoulder four abreast and face the cops. They won't touch us. They'll respect our guts for standing up for our rights. But when it comes to action everybody has an excuse. Nobody moves as long as he's got something here," he said, pointing to his stomach.

"And what are the young people doing, the university students? Taking it all in. Learning to make money like their fathers."

"That undertaker at the TTC, Ralph Day, when they asked him what guarantees immigrant workers get, he says, 'We can guarantee continual work. We just keep building suways and subways.'

"Jungle Toronto! We get up in the morning with one hand on a cup of coffee and the other in the pocket for the 30 cent subway fare, and we get to work and someone stands over us and says 'Faster, faster. You must work faster.'"

"Jungle Toronto! It's just not human."

Harvard black students cancel 'insensitive' course

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (CUP) — More than 100 angry black students at Harvard University last week forced cancellation of a course designed to develop "an action program for the effective control and eventual elimination of riots in urban areas."

The students filed into the first session of the course Friday while one of their leaders read a statement denouncing the "blatant insensitivity" of the course and calling for its cancellation.

The professor, Dr. Siegfried M. Breuning, listened to the statement and then dismissed the class in order to discuss the matter with the blacks. Five hours later he decided to replace the course with an unstructured seminar to develop new ideas for an urban education program at Harvard.

The action followed two days of unrest during which students charged the school with devising programs to contain and suppress blacks while only slowly beginning other courses to investigate the root causes for ghetto violence.

The blacks were particularly upset with the calendar description of the cancelled course, which read:

"The control of riot requires adequate counterforces and organization for them, and a strategy or strategies for their use. These can be provided from outside or from within the riot area."

Social work students hold conference

Four hundred and fifty students of social work from 18 graduate and under-graduate schools across the country will congregate in Toronto this weekend to discuss and evaluate their instruction in social work.

The U of T School of Social Work is sponsoring the conference. Resource people include Andrew Brewin, NDP MP; Alan Borovoy, executive director of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association; Dr. William Clement, psychopharmacologist at the Ontario Hospital in Toronto; newspaper columnist Sidney Katz; Walter Gunn and Allan King of "Warrendale" fame and Dalton Camp, former president of the Progressive Conservative Party.

"The way social work is taught now they only look at one aspect — social intervention — rather than the larger aspect of societal intervention," says conference director Joe Fecht (SGS).

"What we're not taught is how to get at those areas where the power is, how to contact City Hall, for example, if you're trying to get something done in Cabbagetown.

"Social workers must get involved in social action," he said. "They must learn better how to utilize mass media and how to get involved in politics."

The conference will centre around these two topics: "Social Work Education" and "Social Action." Keynote speakers will be Dr. Charles Hendry, Director of the U of T School of Social Work and Dr. Wilson Head, Research Director of Metro Toronto Social Planning Council.

Ryerson boycotts TTC fare hike

The Ryerson Student Council will be organizing a boycott of the Toronto Transit Commission.

"We want to show our appreciation for the recent fare raise," says Peter Haws, Ryerson yearbook editor.

"Some students are paying five to ten dollars a week for transportation depending on the zone in which they live.

The TTC last Saturday raised fares from five for a dollar to four for a dollar, or 30 cents each.

Student rates only apply to students under 18 years of age.

The boycott is tentatively planned for the week following York and U of T reading weeks.

punch cards, print-outs, papers, research documents, followed by typewriters, portable computers, adding machines, all out the window from the ninth floor.

8 a.m.: Students say they will smash computers one by one until the police leave. Clark tells police he "wanted them out and I don't care how you do it."

9:30 a.m.: Special riot-busting squad arrives. Students from all universities gather outside building jeering police and engaging in some clashes. At least five bystanders are arrested during the day.

1 p.m.: It is obvious the computers are being destroyed, and riot squads move in. Occupiers smash remaining computers and set fire to barricades.

Riot squad extinguishes fire and arrests 79 students.

6 p.m.: Students taken away in paddy wagons to be processed.

Of the 79 arrested students, at least 20 were women. The group was almost equally divided between black and white students. They will be arraigned on charges of conspiracy, arson and public mischief.

Arson alone carries a maximum sentence of life and a minimum of seven years.

One university official said: "We'll hit them with every criminal charge possible."

Lit unhappy with SAC grant

The University College Literary and Athletic Society passed a resolution Monday "strongly objecting" to the fact that Radio Varsity will receive an increase of $5,000 from the students council, while other cultural organizations will have their grants cut.

University College is one of the main consumers with 15 of the station's 50 speakers in the college.

The resolution was passed by a two thirds majority.

BLUE BLUES HOST WATERLOO

by JIM MORRISON

Varsity Blues will be trying to nourish their faint playoff aspirations tonight at 8 p.m. when they face Waterloo Warriors on the York University floor. Faint aspirations means that if Western and McMaster lose their remaining games and Blues win theirs (see standings), Blues could tie Western for second place.

"I don't care if we lose the other games", says Coach McManus, "as long as we beat Warriors this time." Blues lost 79-63 in a sloppily-played encounter in Waterloo earlier in the season.

BRUCE DEMPSTER

Warriors, like Blues, have been hot and cold all season. However, they looked impressive last Saturday when they dropped McMaster into third place with a 69-63 triumph.

Stadiest player for Waterloo has been sophomore guard Jaan Laaniste, who leads the team with a 15.7 scoring average. Other notables are forwards Tom Kiewetter, a rookie, Dave Crichton, and Larry Sobol.

If Blues could put together a consistent forward combination to go with the stellar backcourt work of Larry Trafford and Bruce Dempster, their difficulties would be over. John Hadden has played up to potential at his center slot, only on occasion this season, and forward Dale Crouter has been in a prolonged scoring slump.

OQAA HOCKEY PLAYOFFS MOVED TO VARSITY ARENA

By PHIL BINGLEY

A motion by officials at the University of Montreal to move the 1968-69 Senior Inter-collegiate Hockey League playoffs from Montreal to Toronto has been accepted by member athletic directors of the Ontario Quebec Athletic Association.

The four team series will now begin on Friday February 28 at 6:30 p.m. in Varsity Arena with the second semi-final game slated to follow immediately after the conclusion of the first.

The one-game sudden-death final will be played Saturday March 1 starting at 8 p.m. also in Varsity Arena. Time of sale and prices of tickets as well as the first round schedule will be announced at a later date. In any case, the winner of the Western Division will play the second place team in the Eastern group and vice versa.

The decision to move the games to this city came when U of M athletic staff realized that the school's hockey Carabins, designated as host team of the event, were in danger of not gaining one of the loop's playoff berths. Carabins currently trail second place Carlton University by a full four points. Laval University with a record of 11 wins and one loss have already clinched one playdown position.

If Montreal did miss the second place and still hosted the series, the student interest and attendance would be very poor. Also the league would be faced with the necessity of paying travel and boarding expenses for four teams.

Blues' coach Tom Watt sees the switch as one which makes little difference to his team. "I'm prepared to play anyone and anywhere. The advantage of moving back to Varsity will be the home crowd. That equalizes the edge we would have had in Montreal with the bigger ice surface."

"It's a good move though if Montreal does not make the playoffs. They wouldn't have had more than a corporal's guard in the stands without a local team."

On the local front, Watt is having trouble trying to come up with a finalized lineup for the four remaining scheduled games and the playoffs.

"I plan to sitch the defence around and see if we can get some hitting from these people," said Watt. Jim Miles will now pair with Bill L'Heureux to form one unit while Terry Parsons and Dave Field will try to make waves together on another.

As far as the forward lines are concerned, Watt is still waiting to hear the results of tests being performed on centre Brian St. John who is currently in hospital.

Naturally, if St. John can return to the team, the crisis will be averted. But if he doesn't Watt can't decide whether to put all his eggs in one basket or not.

"If Brian can't play there are two possible solutions. First, we can put all our big scorers on one line and spot the third line as a checking unit. Or, we can spread these scorers among the three lines and hope for the best. Right now, I just don't know."

Blues next test will be Friday night when McMaster Marlins are at Varsity Arena for an 8 p.m. encounter. Blues also play Saturday afternoon when they host Montreal Carabins. Game time then is 2 p.m.

NOTES...Cornell University has reneged on their promised return visit to Varsity Arena. The deal was that Blues would play at Cornell this season and the Big Red would return the compliment next year. Cornell claims they don't have room in their schedule.

BELLE BENSON BABES VISIT MCGILL

Archery — Toronto orchers Kathy Warburton and Sue Young (from left to right) take careful aim during meet at McGill. Varsity lost to McGill 2083-1978.

Bob Bourns (right) matches wits and blades with a McGill fencer in Montreal. Barb placed fourth in the individual standings but McGill defeated Varsity 10-6.

This bobe from Sherwood Forest (in the Benson Building) slings a shifty shaft toward the target during a recent archery meet. How sweet it is.

Ollie Predko (front) spikes a point winner for Varsity Volleybells during their match with McGill University recently. Toronto captured the event two games to nil.

BOXING AT HART HOUSE

As Bob Zimmerman once crooned, "She's a hypnotist collector, you are a boxing antique."

But you can't prove it with the University of Toronto boxing team which is anything but extinct. (Is anyone out there listening?)

After bamboozling Royal Military College six out of nine at Hart House February 1, our magnificent mittmen are planning a further assault on the cadaverous caddies February 22 (that's like in Vandoo's).

As a prep for the onerous onslaught, Varsity boxers are holding an exhibition bout among themselves tonight at ye olde Hart House starting at eight post meridian.

Once again, St. Mike's, home of frumpie freddie fromn, leads the list with five men on the card, four of whom are on the ten man Varsity squade. In other words 40 of the ten man Varsity squad comes from St. Michael's College.

SAC condemns SGWU destruction

U of T's Students' Administrative Council Wednesday condemned the actions of occupying students at Sir George Williams University in a 13-11 vote.

The motion, proposed by Lee Coulter (II Vic) read:

"While considering the context of the present situation at SGWU:

- that prior to a complete enquiry it is impossible to determine exactly what took place on Feb. 11;
- that the media and much of the general public seem more irate about the damage to a computer and other property than the rights and basic dignity of persons;
- that the situation which had been developing for at least 10 months was met with indecision on the part of the administration and faculty;

"Nevertheless that SAC condemn the destruction of property by students at SGWU."

Wednesday, the 90 persons arrested during the destruction of the SGWU computer centre were arraigned in Montreal's municipal court on 363 charges.

While they paraded before the bench, Prof. Perry Anderson, target of racial discrimination charges which originally sparked the occupation, was reinstated by SGWU's acting principal Douglass Burns Clarke.

L'Union Generale des Etudiants de Quebec Wednesday declared its full support for the students and blamed the administration for precipitating the violence.

UGEQ also denounced the "dishonesty" of certain news media for holding foreign elements responsible for the riot. (Forty-eight of the students arrested are non-Canadians and 28 of these are from the Carribean.)

SAC President Steve Langdon opposed the Wednesday night motion condemning the demonstrators on much the same grounds. "Let's understand why it happened, and let's remember the issue over which it started," he said.

External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp says the government may deport or deprive of financial and foreign aid foreign students involved in the affair.

Meanwhile, at McGill University, where a left-wing political science lecturer has been dismissed for as-yet undisclosed reasons, the administration is taking steps to protect its computer centre.

One of the machines has been moved off campus, and the main entrance to McGill's computing centre has been boarded up.

THE varsity TORONTO

VOLUME 89 — NO. 55
February 14, 1969

Feeling a little uptight over the marks you got at Xmas? That F on your last English essay bothering you?

If so, note that today is the last day you can pull out without losing your academic standing.

By dropping out now you can beat the rush to Ft. Lauderdale, or get a head start on all the high school and university students competing for summer jobs.

If you drop out today — and today is the last day, don't forget — you can come back next year and spend more time studying and writing essays (instead of working for The Varsity, say.)

The administration always acts in a benevolent manner towards students who leave the academe this time of year ... they will give you a partial refund of your second term fees. Isn't that just wonderful?

Good-bye, we'll miss you all. Write us if you find work.

Prof refuses public reply to TSM charges

By LEIGHTON REID

Members of the Toronto Student Movement warned yesterday that "grave consequences" might result from a Political Science Professor's silence over department course content and teaching.

The warning came at a class of Prof. Jean Edward Smith yesterday morning in Sidney Smith Hall.

Phil Resnick (SGS) one of the TSM students, warned, "There is much combustible material in the department — and if some of the faculty want to strike the match, they will be responsible for the consequences."

A group of about 25 students entered the lecture hall and attempted to ask Prof. Smith certain questions about his connections with the U.S. Dept. of Defence.

Until 1961, Smith was a full-time U.S. Defence Department employee and a part-time consultant until last year.

When Jennifer Penney (III

UC) asked Smith a question, he replied that he would not answer any questions from the TSM in public but would continue with his lecture.

Smith said also he would not answer the questions at any future public rally but only in the privacy of his office.

A number of TSM members said they were previously told by Smith that he would answer the questions publicly at a later date, if not in class Thursday.

The TSM has announced a meeting in the Sidney Smith foyer tomorrow at one o'clock to discuss the "tendencies to greater professionalism and Americanization in the social sciences."

Resnick later mentioned the possibility of a full-day teach-in after reading week concerning Political Science course content and Americanization of the department.

He said the teach-in would "hopefully include student-faculty panels, small seminars, and large discussions".

Langdon, Wells discuss fate of 74,000 jobless

By DARIA ANTONYSHYN

Seventy four thousand Ontario students were unemployed last summer and the prospects this year are even grimmer, Student Council President Steve Langdon told more than 300 students in the Sid Smith lobby Wednesday, National Union Day.

Foreign ownership of industry contributes to the problem, Langdon said, since "American branch plants import their own researchers and hire specialists from American parent companies."

University students are particularly hard hit since "the major innovative work is being done in the home plants."

The government, he added, tries to combat inflation by "substituting unemployment for falling loan profits."

Thomas Wells, minister without portfolio in the Ontario legislature, conceded that a problem exists and that the federal and provincial governments must do something.

"Students must have meaningful jobs," he said, "but warned that unfavorable headlines from incidents such as Sir George Williams "will create a tougher climate to work in."

He said the government has appealed to Canada Manpower, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and private enterprises on behalf of the students.

The government of Ontario "will provide 8,000 jobs this summer as it did last summer," Wells said. (This is 10 per cent of the student labor force.)

"If private industry would do likewise the problem would be resolved."

Langdon listed some of the student proposals to the provincial government.

Students, he said, should not be dependent on summer jobs. Grants should exceed loans.

Students should be employed by community service programs and not by corporations, Langdon continued. Working on education projects with children, on medial aid programs or giving technical assistance to Canadian Indians on reserves make for a far more stimulating summer experience than a 9 to 5 filing job.

Windsor occupation enters fourth day

WINDSOR (CUP) — Negotiations over the four-day occupation of the University of Windsor theology department took a strange twist yesterday.

The occupiers were approached late Wednesday night by administration officials with an offer that was said to have originated from J. F. Leddy, administration president.

Joe Sasso, head resident at the school (a hired official who oversees all residences) said Leddy was prepared to sign any letter drafted by the students in return for their evacuation of the building.

The students refused and demanded to meet personally with Leddy. The next morning, Leddy not only denied authoring the proposal, but he refused to deal with the students, calling them an "unofficial group".

Since Leddy would negotiate only with the student council and not with the occupiers, council yesterday afternoon set up an official negotiating team consisting of five occupiers.

The occupation is the result of the contract non-renewal of Prof. W. W. Kelly of the theology department.

The council will hold a referendum next week asking students to support the council negotiating position, and to support a general strike should Leddy refuse to negotiate.

Student demands include the reinstatement of Kelly, parity on all department decision-making bodies, representation on hiring and firing committees and access to records of all university decision-making bodies.

FLASH — The Medical Society voted last night to hold a referendum on membership in the Students Administrative Council. The vote will be taken in March.

Present your views

The Commission on University Government solicits briefs from individuals and groups.

Analysis, views and proposals on all aspects of university structure are welcomed.

All briefs received by March 3 will be discussed at public hearings.

Winning the battle, but...

By FENNO VAN ZWANENBURG

Mr. Zwanenberg is a fourth year student at Victoria College.

Wednesday night's confrontation on the staff-student committee of the Political Economy Department was sad. Sad, not because the student motion for a role in the decision-making process was mutilated, but because it proved that the bogeyman at U of T is not the administration but the staff.

Essentially, the conflict was summed up by Professor Melville Watkins when he said, "...I am asked to make a choice between demoralizing my colleagues and alienating the student body..."

The student motion, which is equivalent to what the Sociology Union has been practicing for the last two weeks, proposed that an advisory committee with parity for students and staff be set up with competence over all phases — curriculum, staffing, grading, etc. — of the department's operation. Final say would remain with the Chairman, as it is now. What this motion would eliminate, is the mysterious and discriminatory world of cliques, "advising", and power politics in the department.

The faculty, including some who had never before shown their faces, were out in full force. A half hour was wasted in acrimonious wrangling when the chairman would not accept Irv Weisdorf as proxy for another member, although he had been recognized as a voting member on all previous occasions.

The first objection was about linguistics. "Competence" was substituted for "jurisdiction"; "teaching has rarely been taken into account in promoting" was altered to "teaching has been inadequately considered".

DEMOCRACY "IMPRACTICAL"

Incredible though it may seem, a professor of political theory, whose specialty is democracy, stated flatly that democracy is impractical. The motion had provided for open elections of staff and student members. This was dismissed with contempt.

But most of the evening — some three-and-a-half hours — was spent on debating whether students should have any part in hiring, tenure, and promotion. The students have found out that resolutions about changes in the curriculum and in the way teaching is done are simply hot air unless there is some supervision over who gets on staff. As Clark Kerr said to CUG, "The most important thing is who gets tenure — if you do that right, everything else can go and you'll still have a great university." The overwhelming majority of staff took this as a conscious attempt to dismantle the university and a personal threat to themselves. Here are their arguments:

"Students would have no respect for a professor if they knew how much salary he was making."

"Serious scholars would not come here and the majority of my colleagues would leave if students were privy to these very personal matters."

"As a member of a minority group, I fear that considerations other than scholarship and teaching ability would enter into the decision."

"The system may be complex and hard to pin down, but it works!"

"We've had difficulty at Erindale getting enough students to fill positions on committees."

MOTION EMASCULATED

An amendment by Professor Richard Judy completely emasculated the original motion — "policy", not supervision was to be the committee's role; the committee was to be confined to undergraduates — thus effectively perpetuating the distinction between graduate and undergraduate interests; and all references to "democratic elections" were deleted.

The vote predictably split the committee — two professors voting with the undergraduates, two students allying themselves with their superiors. What the "new" committee will do, or whether it can even exist, is doubtful. Certainly the fourth year reps are on the verge of resigning and the other delegates are frustrated.

Whether the staff have any reason to be pleased is questionable. Certainly things will go on in the same old way this year; the students have been given a good sock in the jaw. No doubt "prof power" is a pleasant thought. But what will happen when the new wave of high-school graduates hits this university? When polite middle-class kids and not so well-mannered working-class students find out just what they have fallen into?

Berkeley, Columbia, Simon Fraser, McGill, Sir George Williams, T...

Time is running out.

PAGE FOUR

Who decides?

At Sir George Williams University an assistant professor is charged with racial bias in marking papers of West Indian students. The administration delays on the charges for eight months, eight months which lead to demands, occupation, frustration and finally, on Tuesday, destruction.

At the University of Windsor, a professor's contract is not renewed and in protest 80 students occupy the theology building. The administration refuses to negotiate with the "unofficial" occupiers.

At Montreal's McGill University a political science lecturer faces dismissal for non-academic (read "political") reasons. He has sufficient support on the campus to ensure he will not go without a fight. Part of this support comes from the students, part from his department head, who recently recommended him for promotion.

In each case (and you can add the firing of George Haggart at University of Waterloo last year), the administration moved to fire or protect a member of the teaching staff against the express wishes of the students.

We wonder for whom the university is being run.

At Toronto, the hiring of staff is done on the departmental level. By and large the results are good, but there is a real danger in the system, one which every student encounters from time to time.

We have all had lecturers who couldn't lecture, suffered through classes which were worse than useless, struggled with murky explanations and obscure references. If students reviewed professors the way they review us — pass the exam or you're out — would this situation exist?

The most common objection to giving students a voice on review boards is that it would lead to grandstanding on the part of the professors. This implies that students are incapable of judging the merits of a teacher. And remember, students only want 50-50 representation, the other half of the committee would be faculty.

At U of T the problem of dismissal has not come up lately. But if students were on boards reviewing lecturers before they were given tenure, how many of our professors would now be inflicting themselves on students elsewhere? We bet you can all name at least one.

Who pays?

As of Saturday commuters using the facilities of the Toronto Transit Commission have been paying 30 cents for each one-way ride, or $1 for four fares.

This makes Toronto's transit fares, along with Montreal's, the highest in Canada.

No wonder. Thanks to the TTC Toronto has a highly efficient rapid transit system reaching out into all sectors of the metropolis.

Somehow, somewhere, someone has to pay for this extensive communications network.

Why is it that the TTC is expected to finance this costly, expanding and essential service on the dimes, nickels, quarters and dollar bills of day-to-day users of the service?

The TTC is providing a service of incalculable value to the large downtown department stores by funnelling thousands of consumers direct into their buildings in a matter of minutes. Offices and factories throughout Metro don't have to worry about providing parking space for their employees — the TTC will always deliver on time.

The TTC should be financed on the same principle as the huge highway and expressway projects for which the Toronto and Ontario governments lay out millions of dollars annually.

In fact, the expansion of a rapid transit system encircling all of Metro, should take priority over all projects for bringing more vehicular traffic into the city, because they needlessly squander human and physical resources.

A transit system twice as comprehensive as the present one would perform the job more efficiently and far less expensively.

It is ridiculous to say the TTC should be self-supporting. The TTC is a lifeline vital to the livelihood of the vast majority of the people of this city. The TTC itself supports so much of Toronto's activity that it deserves to be supported in return.

This fees hike, one in a long series of hikes (remember when you could get TWO tickets for 30 cents? That was less than seven years ago), has been made necessary by a narrow-minded approach to civic planning, one which should have gone out when the first subway was built.

A transit system is a community venture. It cannot be supported by individuals. If the entire community profits from it, then the entire community must pay for it. Not just we who ride the buses and subways.

Students and other commuters should combine to protest the narrow-minded and discriminatory policy of forcing the TTC to support itself on a meagre $1 for every four passengers.

Radio Writes

With regard to the article in Wednesday's paper (February 12) entitled "LIT UNHAPPY WITH SAC GRANT" — there are several points that should be clarified:

1) As you can verify in the minutes of the twenty-seventh SAC Executive meeting held on February 10th, the increase in Radio Varsity budget was less than $1,700. This increase is quite a bit less than the $5,000 increase reported by you. The reasons for this increase are that we will be providing full time service to Scarborough and Erindale Colleges and that we hope to hire a full-time managing director. The costs of servicing Scarborough and Erindale will be $2,000, and the salary for a full time managing director will be slightly more than $2,000. As you can see, we had to cut back significantly on many of the items in our budget to hold the increase down to $1,700.

2) Our advertising budget has been increased by $1,100 to $5,600, which is approximately one third of our operating costs.

3) In an earlier edition of your paper, which, by the way, has been really good since January, you reported on the incredible inefficiency of the U.C. Lit. In fact, this seems to be truer than ever: Howard Goldblatt, President of the Lit, told me today that the wording of the resolution was very exact and never used the phrase "strongly objecting." Also, I spoke to Mike Sherk, who introduced the resolution, Herman Siegel, who seconded it, and Ruth Wilson, the Lit Secretary, and none of them could give me the correct wording of the resolution. (Neither could Goldblatt.)

Thanks!

Allow me to congratulate you on your articles on the old and new campus in the Varsity. I found them very interesting, and you achieved one of your stated objectives admirably — viz — accuracy! Naturally this quality is dear to an engineer's heart and having observed complete accuracy with respect to your interview with me, I conclude that quality is characteristic throughout.

And now I have to confess to an inaccuracy. When asking me about student participation in Users' Committees I fear I was thinking more of the past than the present, for, in keeping with modern trends, students were on the Users' Committees for the Graduates Complex and Innis College; and as might be expected, contributed very significantly to the ultimate Planning Division reports on those projects. Sorry for the mistake.

LUNAR ORBIT

—by peter moore

Christmas holidays, and for three days the new snows lie in long, graceful sweeps across the city, building up along the fences, settling softly upon the close, dark streets. For three days there seems neither heaven nor earth; only the dark, expansive clouds and shadows — drifting, billowing across the terrifying space. And when the sun appears the snow on the ground — the streets, houses, the trees — the snow shines yellows and whites, and in all its intensity the world suddenly spins from very brightness. Dazzling and soft, and vast.

And because it is Christmas the lights seem scattered — thrown — everywhere; buried and glittering in the snow and sky, alive and clear among the trees. Brilliant as memory, passed over; and at night the snows lie blue and the sky a rich dark purple, difficult to touch. To grasp.

"I am home for the Christmas holidays only," says Tony. And pointing: "The snows, the trees, the lights. Beautiful. No second thoughts Like childhood."

"Horseshit."
End of scene. Fade-out.

Christmas Eve. The same — interior. "Decorating the Christmas Tree." Tony on the floor, adjusting the stand. In the kitchen, cleaning off the bulbs. On step-ladder, screwing in lights. Throwing tinsel.

Remembering.
Like childhood.

Later. The living room. Christmas Party. Christmas tree and carols, mulled wines and breads and cheeses. And people — friends of the family. For Tony: A through W times 1 through 22 (yrs). Thus: (a X 1<sub>a</sub> b X 6<sub>b</sub> c X 4<sub>c</sub> ...) X 1/22. Mathematically incorrect, grammatically unreasonable. Ab yes.

"Gimme dem old an' simple woids."
Ah yes.

Later the same night. The bedroom. Moonlight (dull almost, warm and distant). Thinking: "that the room seems both the same and different; similar and yet strange. And that I can feel the walls closing in and falling, and that the room seems to be spinning in circles — slowly and then faster, swinging in momentum, buzzing slightly and gaining speed, faster and faster. That I can feel myself sinking — that my mind is beginning to turn in circles, deeper and still deeper — that I am sinking, around, around — deeper and still faster, around and around..."

And stops. Grabbing an object (pillow, the clock). Silence, and then once again the low, dull roar — louder and then still louder. And suddenly the pillows and clocks, the tables, the beds, the chairs — splinter and fragment, careen across the room. Break, fall to the floor, and once again the walls begin — slowly at first and then faster. Pictures shaking, floor opening up, walls moving, spinning, around and around, faster, faster...

And: "Only in such extremes does one become aware of how every person is lost in himself beyond hope of rescue, and one's sole consolation in this is to observe other people and the law governing them and everything." Kafka. The mind.

So that the following morning they did not find Tony dead in his room, but rather very much alive. In fact: they did not notice that the room lay in shambles, nor did they notice during dinner that once again the rooms were spinning. Nor did they see themselves as Tony saw them, as strangers.

Did they realize that this was Tony's twenty-second Christmas dinner?

Probably not.
Did they care?
No again.

And in the evening what were they thinking as they knelt in church? As they sang with their friends and as they listened to the sermon. Or as they passed the wine at the altar, one to another, each in his own thoughts.

Or as they drove home from church, whispering and laughing under the rich, dark sky.

"You're either on the bus or off the bus!!!"

Which means, ladies and gentlemen, exactly what it says: either on or off. Not an ordinary bus, you understand — in fact, not a bus at all really, but a collective mind-blow, a revolution-for-the-hell-of-it screw-up. Completely zonked.

Your own movie.

On or off.

—"Sort of like 'being with it' in the '50's?"

"Uh, nooo..."

Actually, you can see this outrageous day-glo nightmare as completely mind-fucking the whole U.S. of A., which is how Michael and Steven pictured it. Just all-American kids, you understand; just your average college kids gone totally insane. Barrelling through the myth-shit, stoned silly, looking for America. Freaking on the highways, harrassing the cops.

But nothing heavy — nothing

ing nasty:::

Just your own movie, right? Everything the way it is, pure and simple.

So there's the 'Beautiful Persons Letter' home, and the hassles, and then — and then — the freedom.

And the dope? Well yes, there's that too. But it's sort of a ritual, right? Sort of a — test: the acid test. So you do it and, your mind's free and you take off and you look.

—Which explained for Tony why Steve and Mike left — quickly — and started round the States. Very simple. Because they were either looking for the bus or they were already on the bus.

And Tony?

"Well, buses are fuck-all..."

Which brings us more or less back to earth. Like now: the present. University: Medical School. Physiology. "Not the what but the how of Anatomy," says Tony.

Not the what but the how, and the lab instructor calls the class to the front, where he is holding a small, live rabbit. Whose belly he is slitting open and whose heart he now holds.

—"...that the strength of the muscle tissue, even in something this size..." and he passes it around the circle.

les enfants du paradis

It's not easy to make a film under the iron heel of tyranny — for one thing, the light is so bad. But Jacques Prévert and Marcel Carné made Les Enfants du Paradis in two segments and then marketed the three-hour result in 1944 in France to "soothe and refresh the national spirit" as Bosley Crowther so badly put it.

The film is a drama with a peculiarly Gallic theme: the predominance of chance and illusions in the lives of men.

The time is the late 19th century, the place: France. The robust spirit of the French people is expressed and embodied in the "children of paradise", the theatre audiences who sit in the upper balconies and express their joie de vivre by whistling, clapping and stomping their feet.

The "plot" (if such a term can be used) concerns the lives of these and other theatre characters as they follow their careers — Debureau to become the most famous and popular pantomimist in France — and hence the world, and Garance to become the pampered mistress of an icy and evil aristocrat — always yearning toward one another, yet never consummating their love because of their curious dispositions — both Garance and the baroness being homosexuals.

This is the end of the first half. In the second half, years later, all is changed. Much older, Garance has found that life has been kind, and yet cruel, to her. Her former lover, the evil Larcenaire, murders the aristocrat in a Turkish bath. The Turk is wrongfully accused of the crime (since he was in the bath at the time) and is hanged. Garance seeks out Debureau and they attempt to realize their love in an attic. After several agonized moments of groping, which seem to last an eternity — there is no light in the attic — their love is consummated.

"You were right, Garance," Baptiste tells her. "Love is so simple."
"But it is not".

We are left at the fadeout of this "gigantic philosophical ballet," as Georges Sadoul has called it, with the feeling that the past is dead, that the magic of love and enchantment cannot be recalled from the long-gone years, that the illusion of wonder and beauty does not persist — beyond its momentary charm. Only the universal solvent for all the woes and despairs of this world — the ever-replenishing magic of illusion for others — remains.

pinter's tale

A masterful revelation of the non-relationships in modern society is playwright Harold Pinter's accomplishment in his latest play, The Homecoming, which closes tomorrow night at the Poor Alex.

Pinter's avant-garde play is in the capable hands of director Jeremy Hole of Ryerson, whose manipulation of stage silences and audience laughter slowly involves us in a novel treatment of the now-common theme of alienation.

The plot evolves amid the deceptive domesticity of a suitably shabby London working-class dwelling, to which Teddy, a professor at an American university, makes the mistake of introducing his wife. What he finds out is that he can't go home again, without leaving some illusions, and one wife, behind.

Pinter plunges the audience into the no-holds-barred atmosphere of Teddy's family with an acid interchange between his father Max, an earthy mass of psychoses convincingly if flamboyantly portrayed by Alan Thomas, and his brother Lenny, master of the art of subtle ego-jabbing, played with cool by Hole. The savage dislike which ties the family together—Max, his brother Sam, his younger sons Lenny and Joey—provides the undercurrent of the play. The characters have no words to exchange but invective, which provides most of the play's humour.

The Poor Alex is just large enough that you don't laugh or clap self-consciously. It is also intimate enough to allow the audience to feel itself involved in the domestic drama. In the well-timed pauses of the play, the audience actually feels awkward with the characters, and is thus further roped in by Pinter.

This is why, when it becomes evident that Teddy's wife is to become common property of the four men in the family, this one-up-manship on American suburban wife-swapping seems nothing out of the ordinary.

It's a credit to both the playwright and the Modern Drama Group that we walk out of the theatre analyzing the enigma of the play, rather than dismissing it as unrealistic.

Pinter removes, layer by layer, the conventional and sacred assumptions of Family Life and the Divine Spark in Man. We learn that Lenny is a pimp with a sadistic streak behind his urbanity, that the outwardly cold and dignified Ruth, played with control by Trisha Bentley, is cast in the mold of Max's dead wife, to whom he affectionately refers as a "slutbitch".

That Ruth is ready and willing to start her new career after six years of marriage throws a penetrating light on the man and the life she's leaving. The subdued petulant Teddy, played by Stephen Martineaux, is the so-called pride of the family, a philosophy professor, whose "stimulating" environment is harped on until it comes to mean the exact opposite. Teddy is out-philosophized by the saucy Lenny, and his philosophic acceptance of Ruth's loss is one more comment on the bloodless pedant.

The conditioned acceptance of the absurd, to which Pinter leads us, is an acceptance of a world of arbitrary values which have a strange sort of appeal. The stripping of deceptively familiar surfaces, leaves a haunting uncertainty which doesn't vanish when the curtain goes down.

atlantis is about to rise and you read about it first

Elisabeth Steen is a 28-year-old San Francisco housewife and mother of two. Although she loves the city, she is convinced it is about to sink into the sea.

Any day now, she will lead her family and about 150 middle-class suburban believers to Spokane, Washington, where she feels they will be safe from the impending disaster. Mrs. Steen, a part-time seer, feels San Francisco will not last out the month of April, 1969. In her visions she sees "huge sections of land along the Pacific Coast breaking off and crumbling into the ocean."

Mrs. Steen is not alone. Among others who have moved from Southern California recently are evangelistic ministers and their flocks, terrified hippies from Haight-Ashbury feeling "bad vibrations", amateur professional astrologists, and at least one respected scientist who has had the courage to publish his reasons for passing up a good job in California.

Dr. Peter Franken, a University of Michigan physicist who won the American Physical Society Prize in 1967, says: "I'm raising a family now and the earthquake risk in California is simply too great."

While he is no seer, Dr. Franken has been studying earthquakes as a hobby for 16 years. When his gloomy predictions on the fate of California ("hundreds" of deaths, "thousands" of injuries, toppled skyscrapers, broken dams and other disagreeable side effects) were published a year ago in the University of Michigan Daily last year, he was pooh-poohed by a large number of experts.

However, Dr. Franken's professional opinion bears a remarkable resemblance to that of Mrs. Steen as well as that of numerous evangelical ministers who have recently fled the area.

The Rev. Donald Abernathy led the 200 members of his First Apostolic Church of Bell Gardens (Los Angeles) to Atlanta, Georgia, after he saw a vision "that a giant earthquake would destroy California and swallow the entire state up into the ocean."

His brother, Rev. Nolan Abernathy, has taken his church, congregation and all, to Kennett, Missouri. Rev. Denny Porter's Apostolic Gospel Church has a new home in Independence, Missouri. And Rev. Robert J. Theobald has led his Friendly Bible Apostolic Church to Murfreesboro, Tennessee.

Whether due to increased awareness of the earthquake problem or not, net migration into the state of California in 1968 was 141,000—the lowest for any year since 1950. (Net migration for 1963 was 369,000.)

The most prophetic of the California earthquake seers is no longer living, but some of his predictions are already, apparently, coming true.

prophet", began his series of readings in September, 1923 and continued to his death in January, 1945. Although the "readings", delivered while Cayce was in a trance-like sleep, were mostly concerned with the lives and former incarnations of the people he sought to help, one can construct a fairly cohesive picture of Cayce's vision of the past and future from the readings, faithfully recorded through the years by his followers.

One of the most fascinating — and persuasive — was Cayce's vision of the lost continent of Atlantis. He saw the continent as a highly advanced civilization, with atomic power, flying machines and a highly-developed way of life.

Atlantis, Cayce says, sank into the sea partly through the fault of the inhabitants (who were becoming corrupt) and partly through natural causes. It did not disappear all at once, in a flash. Fortunately inhabitants fled to Egypt and to the Yucatan Peninsula.

Cayce believers point to the Piri Reis Maps, now lodged in Georgetown University in Washington, D.C., as proof that the earth once supported a civilization as advanced as our own. The maps, which date back 5,000 to 15,000 years, show the land forms of Greenland and Antarctica. They are so detailed that cartographers agree they could hardly have been made without the aid of aerial surveys.

For whatever reason, Atlantis sank into the sea, but Cayce tells us the continent will rise again. As early as 1932, Cayce told in his trances of the coming destruction of Los Angeles, San Francisco and New York, and of the surfacing of the lost continent of Atlantis.

"Expect it (the surfacing) in '68 and '69," Cayce said in 1940. "Not so far away."

In another reading, Cayce suggested Atlantis would rise "near what is known as Bimini, off the coast of Florida."

If we are to believe Elizabeth Steen and Edgar Cayce, 1969 should be a pretty exciting year for the United States—in more ways than one.

more from the bottom of the sea:

Atlantis the Antediluvian World by I. Donnelly. Timaeus and Critias by Plato. California Earthquake by M. Cass. Many Mansions by G. Corminara. Edgar Cayce On Atlantis by E. Evans Cayce. Upwards of 5000 other works also refer to and talk about Atlantis.

Plato, who was first to mention Atlantis, was discredited by his own student, Aristotle. The powerful Roman Catholic influence on western culture was one that embraced Aristotle in preference to Plato; thus we have neglected the idea of Atlantis. Now as that same church is losing its position of authority, the same story of Atlantis is gaining.

The really scientific data to support the Atlantis theory is absorbing but remains inadequate as generally acceptable proof. Here are a few recent discoveries:

• Particles of lava formed in a vitreous structure, indicating that it solidified in open air, were found at a two-mile depth in the Atlantic. Lava which solidifies under water assumes a crystalline structure. Since lava decomposes considerably in a 15,000 year period, the area below must have been above water within that time.

• Investigation of a deep sea core taken on part of the Mid-Atlantic Sub-Marine Ridge, yielded exclusively fresh water plants (diatoms) in portions of the sedimentary material.

• Surveys of the ocean floor have revealed contours suggestive of river and lake beds.

• Only a minute warping of the earth's crust (1/8000th of its diameter) could cause large portions of the ocean's floor to rise, and land features to subside.

• Similarities of pre-Columbian language, culture, flora and fauna have often been noted as being suggestive of a common central origin.

The scientific data appears fragmented, trivial, and highly anti-climactic when compared to the data produced by Edgar Cayce. The readings are unnervingly consistent and dramatically interesting. They see all of history as one integrated event; physical,

on the road with b.b. king

"If B.B. is within a hundred miles of me," said Buddy Guy, "I'll find him."

After 180 miles of the 401, some whiskey, warm milk, three hours of playing Whist in the back of his green Chevy bus with a couple of would-be writers and a latch-on, Buddy bumped into Sonny (of 'Sonny Freeman and the Unusuals', B.B. King's back-up group), in front of The Grande Theatre in Kingston.

"Where's B.B.?"

"I don't know man, when we left Cleveland, he said he'd meet us here."

"I'm hungry, lets eat."

For an hour and a half, Buddy, Bob (his driver), his wife, the Whist players, a couple of Toronto rock musicians and their part-time groupies sat around some scotch, sandwiches, steak, swapping stories and sipping champagne, (compliments of Buddy Guy) etc., interrupted now and then by a couple of local DJ's and a local free-lance tamborine player.

Another hour and a half Buddy Guy is sitting in the front row of the Grande Theatre, almost listening to a local hotel group throw out some almost jazz... B.B. King still hasn't arrived... a full house of about 800, mostly college students, several from as faraway as Ottawa, patiently wait... B.B. is late.

Buddy goes backstage, to the dressing room to rap with the 'Unusuals'. Some of the Press are there. Soulful greetings are exchanged, jokes and information passed back and forth.

"... I think the King, had some problems at the border..."

"... Where you playing, Buddy?"

"... Toronto..."

Fragments of crosstalk continue, but it is quiet now, and the periods of silence seem longer.

Where is the King?...

Someone asks Pat Williams, the trumpeter, where he got the scar on his forehead and... a story evolves, the narration jumping from one musician to another...

"They had left the club in Port Allen Miss at 3, B.B. his road man Frank, and Wilson, his valet, in a green Cadillac Fleetwood, the Band in a Ford Econovan — planning to drive the 200 miles to a motel in Mobile by morning, sleep until early afternoon, then drive to Montgomery for the date that night. While they gassed up in Baton Rouge, Wilson and two guys in the band walked over to a cafe for sandwiches.

"No eating at the counter."

A dozen white toughs watched over their beers.

"No take-outs, either."

"We're Wallaces'," shouted

a tough.

"Great, man." Sneered Wilson.

"Whah, you nigger."

Wilson got shoved out the door and hit the gravel.

"Git'em!"

Suddenly the toughs were outside, one swinging a heavy chain. The three fought back, and when Frank, a giant, came running and grabbed away the chain, the toughs scattered. But tenor sax man Lee Gatling had been stabbed in the arm and trumpeter Pat Williams was bleeding from a chain wound on the forehead.

The police, who gathered, asked a few questions, said they couldn't find any suspects, and stood under the blue-white gas station lights eyeing the band suspiciously. King, who had missed the action because he was in the men's room, quickly took charge, ordering an ambulance, calming his men and talking to the police, but his mind somewhere else.

man will hate you so bad he'd kill you. You think things are getting better... thought you knew how to get along, never anything like this happen to me before. Oh, man, this hurts so bad. And they tease me when I sing the Blues. Hah!, What else can I sing?"

They all waited at the hospital until 6 before a doctor appeared and said Williams was all right. As the sun rose they started for Mobile, getting there, sleepless, in the early afternoon. They arrived in Montgomery, over an hour late."

"sorry I'm late, but —"

B.B. KING had arrived, but his excuses stopped, as he joyfully embraced Buddy.

Buddy talked to the King for awhile, and out front Sonny Freeman and The Unsuuals, were belting out a nice heavy Blues—jazz sound, somewhere between King Curtis and Sonny Rollins.

About 10 minutes later Buddy slipped back to his seat. . . And about 10 minutes after that. . . Gatling stopped blowing the horn and took the mike. . .

"Ladies and Gentlemen, The King of the Blues, Mr. B.B. King."

A heavy set man in a well tailored, doublebreasted, shiny blue suit, blue shirt, blue tie stepped lightly out on the stage, and took the mike. . .

For an instant, King looked a little lost, then with a grin as wide as the Mississippi Delta. . .

"Sumthin happened to me tonight, that's never happened before. . . see Buddy Guy's here with us tonight and. . . (INTERRUPTED

BY CHEERS). . . and I got so nervous I forgot to bring out Lucille. . . (REACTIONS)

King turned towards the wings, but Wilson was right there with Lucille.

Lucille is a red Gibson, with gold fres and mother-of-pearl inlay. (She is Lucille No. 7). A label on the Case says "My name is Lucille. I am a guitar. My boss is B.B. King. Handle me with Care."

"On my new record, I tell about Lucille. It was in Arkansas, some guys were fightin' and they knocked over a Kerosene barrel and burned the place down. I was almost killed going back in to save my guitar, and when I found out the fight was over a gal named Lucille, I named my guitar that to tell me to keep her close and treat her right." The band plays.

B.B. King Caressess Lucille. His eyes screwed shut, and body bent, he hits a quick chord.

From that instant on, King and his guitar are a magic source of energy.

"Evra day, Evra day, I have the Blues"

B.B. sings, rocking back and forth, both fists clenched beside his head. The transformation between his voice and the guitar is so smooth it's hard to distinguish where the guitar stops and voice takes over. . .

"The Blues is basically vocal music, you sing the Blues — Blues guitar is not the same as classical, or 'legitimate' guitar; the strings have to make vocal sounds, to imitate the human voice. . . the same goes for the harmonica. . . if you don't think so, listen to Sonny Boy (WILLIAMSON). . ."

He hit a high note that bent flat as it faded, then another. — The crowd erupted and he was off again. . .

"Rock Me Baby"
"I got a mind to give up livin'"

Sonny and the bass man kept playing softly, and B.B. talked a little about the Blues. He told the Audience again that he was happy that he was here. . . happy that they were here happy that such a great guitarist like Buddy Guy was here — The Crowd yelled!!

"Buddy Guy, Buddy Guy, we want Buddy Guy, we want Buddy"

The King grinned, and Buddy soon found himself on stage, with Lucille in his hands. . . reserved, and somewhat restrained, but nevertheless thrilled, Buddy broke into a slow and soulful 'Stormy Monday'. . .

The crowd cheered. . . But Buddy too, had come to hear the King. . . So he sat and listened and B.B. played the Blues again. For almost an hour he played the Blues, rough and smooth exultant and downhearted, blues that were fresh everytime. The Blues poured out, never forced, never strained. The words falling behind the music, then catching up, going a little ahead, then falling back again. . . but always easy, always relaxed. . . The Blues poured out of him, the pain inside came out. He used it, played with it, worked with it till every drop poured into the audience. . .

"I got a sweet little angel, I love the way she spreads her wings"

Buddy Guy was forgotten for the moment, no one would remember him for the next couple of hours. . .

It was intermission now. The dressing room crowded with record PR men, reporters, musicians, fans, Buddy, and the Whist players, King talked to everybody.

". . . I wish they had sumthin could measure the pressure inside a person. . . like at times when you're in a strong mood, if you been hurt bad by a gal. It's like that when I'm playing and I know exactly what I want to play and its a goal I'm trying to reach and the pressure is like a spell, oh man, I don't have the words. But I know this, I never made it. I never played what I hear inside. I get close, but not there. If I did, I'd play the melody so you'd know what it was sayin' even if you didn't know the words. You wouldn't know when Lucille stopped and my voice began."

B.B. King may be just a little modest. He is 43 now, and he's been playing the Blues for 25 years, and looks like he has another 25 years of Blues more to go.

B.B. was born in the Mississippi Delta. He spent his boyhood working for a white tenant farmer. . . and chopped cotton and drove a tractor on a plantation. He sang in a church since he was tiny, and learned guitar from a minister uncle. In the Delta he started singing and playing regularly in a gospel quartet. At 18 he was drafted and then deferred—

"Cause I was the best tractor driver in the Mississippi Delta" with his pay he would buy a bus ticket as far as it would take him. Jackson, Oxford. . . and play blues on the street. . .

"Making more on a weekend than I could all week."

"Course, I was sneakin' way: playing the Blues if you were in a sanctified singing group was evil, consortin' with the devil."

After the war he moved to Memphis, determined to make it. He lived with his cousin, the great bluesman Bukka White, and landed a 10 minute spot on WDIA, (one of the first stations with Negro personnel.) He sang on Sonny mental and spiritual. Not only does he suggest Atlantis existed, but he says it is beginning to rise, "1968-69". While we are cautioned not to expect anything marked "Made In Atlantis", the whole mystery is to be solved with some very hard work, by approximately 1976.

Cayce's descriptions of Atlantis sound more contemporary than tomorrow's news. Atlantis had atomic explosives, lasers, masers, and highly evolved transportation technology. There were surface, air, water, and underwater vehicles. Propulsion was mainly electro-magnetic — something we have only begun to investigate in the last ten years!

Atlanteans had social ills disquietingly reminiscent of our own. There was a fatally unequal distribution of food, clothing, and access to shelter, as well as wildly inadequate representation on ruling bodies. Laborers were considered as property and referred to as "things". Sound familiar? It is directly implied by the readings that Atlantis was destroyed by no act of any "god" other than its own phenomenally un-conscience, and easily recognizable behavior!

"Proves to warn
That he not busy being born
Is busy dying."

B. Dylan

Atlanteans who escaped the final apocalypse went west to endure as the amazing and impressive Hopi Indian culture as well as the fabulous empire of the Aztecs. Eastward they became the yet-to-be-explained mysterious and magical Egyptians.

Of the puzzle surrounding the construction of the Great Pyramid of Gizeh, Cayce said, "By the use of those forces in nature as makes iron to swim, stone floats in air in the same manner. This will be discovered in 1958". A beginning of memoranda and seminars, which have since yielded successful demonstrations of electro-magnetic propulsion, was presented at the Westinghouse Laboratories by a Mr. S. Way. The date was October, 1958.

The data yet to be uncovered in the Bahamas and Egypt will prove to be identical and serve to resolve doubt about the link between Egypt and the still un-rediscovered Atlantis.

Other readings by Cayce (who died in 1945) tell of the period between 1958-98, as being one unique in all the world's history for rapidity of change. Although this era marks the beginning of a millenium of peace, prosperity and spiritual growth for all mankind, Cayce predicted we would first undergo some of the worst catastrophes in all history to bring about the needed awareness of the urgency of active struggle in attaining a Utopian millenium. He also said that this millenium could have begun in 1918! The critical point was Versailles.

In the next 30 years we can expect to see Los Angeles, San Francisco and most of Japan disappear under the sea. The Great Lakes will empty into the Gulf of Mexico. Northern Europe will be changed "as in the twinkling of an eye, and some areas that served as battlefields (W.W.II) will become ocean floor". The culmination will occur in 1998 with a shifting of the axis of the earth.

"... and so if you know anything, look closely at the times; and others who remain untrue and don't commit that crime... it's so simple really if you just look to your soul..."

Boy Williamson's 'King Biscuit Hour' and quickly became known as the Beale St Blues Boy (later shortened to Blues Boy.) By 1949, he had the best known blues trio in Memphis, his own show as a disc jockey and his first big record, "3 O'Clock Blues", which stayed at No. 1 spot in the rhythm-blues charts for 18 weeks. While 'legitimate' radio was broadcasting the King of Swing (Benny Goodman), the King of the Blues, was being heard in the black ghettos all across the country.

"The true blues is black, someone said.

"The blues are the Blues" The King replied.

The Blues are recognized as the elemental source of popular music. By being so basic they tend to merge into the culture back-ground. Muddy Waters, Howlin Wolf, Little Walter are "roots"; it is the Rolling Stones, the Otis Reddings, Bob Dylans, and Janis Joplins who, working changes on the Blues, are noticed. But B.B. is beginning to be noticed. On one hand educated blacks who had scorned the blues as dirty music, (an opiate of the people and a reminder of the past), are turning to them to express their blackness. B.B. is both funky enough and modern enough for them to dig. And on the other hand the millions of white kids going deeply into rock, led by young white guitarists like Bloomfield and Clapton have been discovering the blues. The new rock is as much a blues revival as it is electronic psychedelia. The influence that King has had on these is great.

The intermission is over and Sonny and the band are back. . . Elmore Morris, an excellent Blues & R&B singer does a couple of numbers, and then the King is back, this time wearing, an orange suite and black turtle neck. The magic is back with him.

mental and spiritual. Not only does he suggest Atlantis existed, but he says it is beginning to rise, "1968-69". While we are cautioned not to expect anything marked "Made In Atlantis", the whole mystery is to be solved with some very hard work, by approximately 1976.

Cayce's descriptions of Atlantis sound more contemporary than tomorrow's news. Atlantis had atomic explosives, lasers, masers, and highly evolved transportation technology. There were surface, air, water, and underwater vehicles. Propulsion was mainly electro-magnetic — something we have only begun to investigate in the last ten years!

Atlanteans had social ills disquietingly reminiscent of our own. There was a fatally unequal distribution of food, clothing, and access to shelter, as well as wildly inadequate representation on ruling bodies. Laborers were considered as property and referred to as "things". Sound familiar? It is directly implied by the readings that Atlantis was destroyed by no act of any "god" other than its own phenomenally un-conscience, and easily recognizable behavior!

"Proves to warn
That be not busy being born
Is busy dying."

B. Dylan

Atlanteans who escaped the final apocalypse went west to endure as the amazing and impressive Hopi Indian culture as well as the fabulous empire of the Aztecs. Eastward they became the yet-to-be-explained mysterious and magical Egyptians.

Of the puzzle surrounding the construction of the Great Pyramid of Gizeh, Cayce said, "By the use of those forces in nature as makes iron to swim, stone floats in air in the same manner. This will be discovered in 1958". A beginning of memoranda and seminars, which have since yielded successful demonstrations of electro-magnetic propulsion, was presented at the Westinghouse Laboratories by a Mr. S. Way. The date was October, 1958.

The data yet to be uncovered in the Bahamas and Egypt will prove to be identical and serve to resolve doubt about the link between Egypt and the still un-rediscovered Atlantis.

Other readings by Cayce (who died in 1945) tell of the period between 1958-98, as being one unique in all the world's history for rapidity of change. Although this era marks the beginning of a millenium of peace, prosperity and spiritual growth for all mankind, Cayce predicted we would first undergo some of the worst catastrophes in all history to bring about the needed awareness of the urgency of active struggle in attaining a Utopian millenium. He also said that this millenium could have begun in 1918! The critical point was Versailles.

In the next 30 years we can expect to see Los Angeles, San Francisco and most of Japan disappear under the sea. The Great Lakes will empty into the Gulf of Mexico. Northern Europe will be changed "as in the twinkling of an eye, and some areas that served as battlefields (W.W.II) will become ocean floor". The culmination will occur in 1998 with a shifting of the axis of the earth.

"... and so if you know anything, look closely at the times; and others who remain untrue and don't commit that crime... it's so simple really if you just look to your soul..."

MUSIC

"Here's a little flat pickin' for you guitar pickers," said Doc Watson and the Riverboat suddenly swelled with the pure, sweet sound of "old time country music".

As notes poured out and chords changed with incredible quickness and agility, and as the room began to echo with the foot-stomping of the patrons, Doc broke into a beautiful, relaxed grin.

A fair ways from his native Deep Gap, North Carolina, earning a bit of bread in the big city, Doc was doing his thing — pickin' — and still enjoying it, after all these years.

Watson sings and picks with incomparable ease. Ballads, blues, folk songs, even marches flow out effortlessly in a constant stream of intricate simplicity.

Doc's brought along his son, Merle, for his week-long stay at the Riverboat, and the two function, as one might expect, perfectly. Though Merle has only been playing the guitar for four years, he complements his father's brilliance with a quiet skill of his own.

The father and son combination also provides some warm, humorous moments for the audience between numbers.

Doc turns to Merle, prototype of the freshly-scrubbed, obedient son: "We're just going to fool around this last set. How 'bout you pick out a song, Merle."

Merle stares at the floor, somewhat embarrassed, unsure whether to take such initiative.

Silence. Doc explains: "Merle's kind of lazy." And his son's stolidness flickers briefly into a tiny, self-conscious smile, while everyone in the place chuckles.

"So here's a song I'll dedicate to Merle. 'Life gets teedjus, don't it?'"

A bit later, introducing a song, Doc smiles, "Merle don't want to pick this one but I'm going to make him anyhow." And Merle picks away with nary a word or expression.

But despite the fun Doc seems to have up there on the stage, pickin' and joking and everything, we all know where his heart's really at.

Southbound — written by Doc and Merle in New York City — says it all:

Southbound, she's oburning the ground, and I don't mean moybe. Sure om glad I caught this train, I want to see my bobby. Lord, I'm lonesome, I long to see those hills that I come from. Listening to the engine rattle and roor, taking me back home once more I'm southbound.

ALBERT KING

Albert King's first album for Stax, which came out a couple of years ago, was a showcase for all his limitations. He doesn't have a particularly strong or interesting voice, his songs tend to be rather standard numbers, and his guitar style sounds rather insignificant when it is only heard in short bits between blasts from the sax-line.

But last weekend at the Rock Pile, he showed that his particular musical genius lies in putting together long, imaginative guitar solos against the backing of a small band. When King's into a good one, everything he does sounds necessary, and the music, in spite of its improvisatory, flowing nature, begins to take on formal qualities.

Albert King's shows go on for roughly an hour and a half, which is more than enough time to get in several good numbers when the mood is on him. I had the chance to catch both his shows last weekend, and it was clear that he depends very much on the audience for his inspiration. His program was virtually the same both nights, consisting mostly of standards, but the audience on Friday had an excitement from the beginning which was missing Saturday night. They were on their feet, shouting and applauding every song, long before the show was over. There were people dancing on the sides, and one girl, in a big fur coat, got up and danced in front of the stage, looking like a moth in the lights. She would have looked alone and out of place Saturday night, but on Friday she seemed to fit in.

And Albert King played just beautifully. He's a good enough professional to present a show worth hearing on any night, but he gave that audience on Friday night something extra. More of the solos were really good ones, and they seemed to come with less effort. It was definitely the show to catch.

Stax has made amends for their first Albert King album by bringing one out recently called "Live Wire Blues Power" (Stax 2003). It's a live performance at Fillmore West with a band similar to, if not the same as the one he had in Toronto of organ, second guitar, bass and drums. It sounds like some of the best numbers culled from one of his long sets, and it has the advantage over his Toronto performance of not having an over amplified guitar.

STALKING MOON

The Stalking Moon would be a mildly diverting suspense Western except for one thing — it's a piece of cynical racist trash, made for the traditional American moron many American movies are still made for.

It's a paradox that the culture of a given society is best judged not by its outstanding artifacts but by its second and third-rate products. "The Stalking Moon" is a perfect barometer of the contemporary American cultural climate where technological efficiency is used to package a fundamentally repulsive ideology, in order to make a fast buck.

But the efficiency in this case does not quite work, which is partly why it is a third rate production. The director, Robert Mulligan, obviously insensible to the imaginative possibilities of color film and the wide screen, concentrates on maintaining the suspense of a chase and trying to convince the audience they are getting a good look at Gregory Peck and Eva Marie Saint instead of at the audience's own memories of these actors, Peck, whose age, weight and palpable disbelief of his role cannot be concealed by layers of pancake and a variety of deceptive angle shots, mimes a Bogart-type (cynic who masks his idealism) cowboy who takes on as cook a white woman and her Indian child who have escaped from the clutches of her insane Indian captor, the boy's father.

As for Miss Saint, it is easy to imagine why she accepted her role, consisting as it does of five minutes of slowly enunciated dialog, one jaunt up a hill and one ride into a storm. The mind of man has probably conceived of no easier way to earn $400,000 (or whatever she gets per film). True, she almost begins to act in one scene, while expressing the woman's gratitude for having escaped her mad Indian husband, but the effort either exhausted her or surprised the director, because it doesn't last long.

Then there's that mad Indian. . . so stereotyped he would seem funny if he were not a character in an American movie filmed at the height of the most critical racial troubles in the country's history. He is evil incarnate, totally without human characteristics (his face is never shown, so as to preclude any sympathetic audience reaction), blood-crazed to a nearly incredible degree, and (the final touch), sporting a black bearskin tunic despite the fact that the action takes place in the midst of a New Mexican summer. Pauline Kael in her review of the film suggests he harks back to the King Kong syndrome, but if we update that reference, he's more like every bigot's worst nightmare, Martin Luther King in drag. And you don't think Gregory Peck gets it in the end, do you?

LSD

There is a very nice lady at the Globe and Mail, Zena Cherry, who writes a column in the Women's Pages called "After a Fashion". She read Al Kamin's piece last week on "The Spiritual Use of LSD" and, to say the very least, she was horrified. So horrified that she called Mr. Bisell about it. His reaction: "It's incredible. But so many incredible things are happening, one goes numb with the blows". An article on LSD IS the last straw, I guess, after a week which included a wrestle with Andy Wernick in the basement of the R.O.M.

The thing that surprises me about Zena Cherry's reaction is that Al Kamin carefully noted current paranoia about chromosomal effects of LSD is exaggerated. The doctors held Mr. Leary's chromosomes up to the light and they counted the usual solid 48. Besides the whole subject of LSD seems an eminently sensible subject for discussion and debate. Especially when LSD's cause is advanced by the one guy I know who really understands LSD use and approaches the subject with none of the usual oh-my-god-what-are-they-doing-to-my-son's-head-attitude.

MEMORANDUM

Vaclav Havel's "The Memorandum" is an amusing piece which suggests thin Kafka and heavy "How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying."

While the vehicle of the play is the introduction of an artificial language into bureaucracy, the action is too centralized in the figure of Ballas, a man-on-the-rise type who institutes the language to further his own ends. His victim (Gross, the boss) is bewildered by the sudden turns of events, but hardly terrorized as is the case in "The Trial." Consequently, those who expect a devastating critique of bureaucracy (capitalist or socialist) need not apply.

As staged by Trinity Dramatic Society under Andrew Bethell's direction, "Memorandum" generally accomplishes what the script offers. The first act is unfortunately weak, due mainly to Chris Cornwall's (Gross) tendency to smile under his bewildered plasticky mustache. His efforts at slightly aging and muddling Gross do not quite come off in this act, although he steadily improves during the second. The other players are generally adequate, George Milligan as Pillar, a silent role demanding much expressive facial work and some mime, is singularly effective. Jonathan Boulton as the teacher of the new language has successfully con ned his part from careful attention to his own professors.

The production is worth your attendance, being kind of a superb Red Skelton Show (well, you know what I mean. And Skelton must have done some such job in his time). One suggestion: sit far to the back, as Cartwright Hall is small enough to make the back row inviting, especially since the Trinity company haven't quite mastered either the art of stage make-up or volume control as yet.

HAMLET

In a breathtaking mise en scene, the Royal Opera School has presented the most outstanding theatrical accomplishment in Toronto this year.

The North American premiere of Humphrey Searle's Hamlet, brilliantly reconciles time and space on an emotional plane of the grandest altitude. The opera is a tonal work with each principal characterized by a mood-theme; the music is difficult to hear as well as to sing, yet it augments the spirit of the play, underlining every nuance of the complex passions of the figures.

John Stoddart's sets are indescribably powerful in their sensual impact without ever conflicting with the spheres of attention of the actors. The costumes, styled "Elizabethan Mod", have some details of the period but a modern cut, and are superb.

Donald Rutherford is the best Hamlet I have ever seen. As an actor he gets closer to the character than can be envisaged without having seen him. As a singer, the young graduate of the school is brilliant: his voice is clear and strong and his control amazing. He is never seen to take a breath, or heard to.

Ricki Turofsky, with a voice as sharp as a diamond, gives Ophelia a new dignity and strength. Not here the wispy creature but a vital, hurt woman. Wilmer Neufeld is a political villain as Claudius, and has much of the best music, which he sings with verve. The players provide a magnificent interlude, brightly staged: the Player King's first speech is the high point of the production.

Anthony Besch, the artistic director, has made of this Hamlet a stunning triumph. A secret of the Opera School's skill may come from the fact that their singers are taught to act as well and, with the grandeur of music added to a great play, the theatrical experience cannot be surpassed.

First year students in General Arts and Science who thought they could drop one subject and qualify for second year under the new program cannot do this, according to an interpretation of policy by the Office of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Many students had misinterpreted the rules for entering second year in the blue and white brochure titled "New Programme 1969", which states that only five courses are needed to enter second year.

According to an official in the Faculty office the rules for the new program apply next year only and this year's frosh must pass the regular six courses.

Some students are claiming that an inequality exists here and will be circulating a petition to protest this after reading week.

Anti-Wernick petition grows

A petition demanding that Caput, the U of T disciplinary body, undertake "disciplinary investigation" of graduate student Andy Wernick's actions at Clark Kerr's Feb. 5 museum lecture has received almost 1,000 signatures in circulation around campus.

Wernick "behaved in a manner calculated to discredit the reputation of the University of Toronto and its members," the petition charges.

The petition, to be presented to Arts and Science Dean A. D. Allen today, is the work of Andrew Wyner (SGS).

"I want people to know not all students are ill-mannered, boorish and uncouth and break up meetings," Wyner said yesterday.

Wernick and other members of the Toronto Student Movement disrupted the Kerr lecture and were given an opportunity to speak.

• SAC briefs •

The Students' Administrative Council met Wednesday at Erindale College and:

- supported the four-month-old fees strike at Sir Daniel Wilson Residence, Whitney Hall, Devonshire House, and New College. The council endorsed the striking residents' suggestion that the amortization costs for the building of New College be equally distributed among all U of T residences, and that the administration subsidize the costs as much as possible.

- defeated Finance Commissioner Bob Barkwell's motion for a SAC fee increase of 50 cents.

Since The Varsity will not be publishing next week the University of Toronto will be closed.

Most lectures, seminars, and tutorials have been cancelled from Monday February 17 until Monday February 24. The SigSam Library will remain open.

The Varsity will be published on the 24th and classes will recommence.

A Call To The Campus Intellectual - Jews Only By Birth

based on a sermon delivered by Rabbi R.B. GITTELSON adapted and sponsored by Dr. DAVID MONSON

-----Rabbi Beth Sholom Synagogue

I learned that in such places as U of T, York, and other Ontario universities, there were Jews who hold themselves apart from the Jewish community.

These are the so-called Jewish intellectuals. Or, more accurately, the intellectuals — pseudo or real — who happen to spring from Jewish origins. They are to be found, in every center of Canadian and American academic life. Here in the Greater Toronto area they are identified chiefly with the U of T, with York and with the several private laboratories engaged in scientific investigation and research.

With only the fewest of encouraging exceptions — these men and women do not belong to a synagogue. They do not provide their children with any kind of Jewish education. Their names are not listed either as contributors, leaders, or even workers for the organized agencies of the Jewish community. They constitute a lost generation in contemporary Jewish life. What makes their defection too tragic to be accepted in quiet acquiescence is the undeniable truth that included in their number are some of the finest, sharpest, brightest minds of our time.

This sermon is deliberately intended for them. I shall appeal to them on three levels in my effort to persuade them that their estrangement from the Jewish community should be ended.

The first thing I would say to my un-Jewish intellectual friends is that the Jewish people needs them — the Jewish people past, present and future. Now — how is it possible to speak of a people in the past needing those who are alive today? What I have in mind is the unparalleled, immeasurable, almost unbelievable sacrifice and heroism exhibited by Jews through the centuries in their stubborn determination to remain Jews.

I would remind them of what Judaism has meant to Jews through more than thirty centuries of time. At least until the Hitler period, a relatively simple escape hatch was available for any Jew who wanted to avoid suffering. The door of conversion to Christianity was always open to him. All he had to do was give up the ghost, agree that Jewish survival wasn't worth the agony and pain it involved. At a cost only of surrendering his loyalty to the Jewish people and its faith, he could have purchased immunity and comfort for himself.

Yet very few Jews ever made the easy bargain. Nor was it just simple stubbornness which motivated them. It was rather a deep, profound, abiding conviction that Judaism was worth preserving; that it possessed something unique and precious which warranted even the most unspeakable kind of sacrifice in order that it be maintained.

Shouldn't that count for something today? Shouldn't Akiba count for something — risking his life eighteen centuries ago by gathering his students secretly to teach them Torah in stifling caves when Rome had forbidden such study at risk of life itself? Shouldn't the martyrs of nearly two millennia count for something — those who suffered and died on the stake, in torture chambers and crematoria, al kiddush ha-shem, for the sanctification of God's Name?

Shouldn't six million Jewish victims of Hitler count for something? Shouldn't those count who willingly gave their lives that the State of Israel might be established and defended? Just what kind of person is it who can with easy conscience thumb his nose at sacrifice such as this? Who can tell so many millions of martyrs that what they proudly died for isn't worth our effort to preserve? That, in essence, is what I mean when I say that Jewish people of the past need our intellectuals today.

When I add that the Jewish people of the present and the future need them no less, I have in mind something different, though even more important. I think I can understand what has estranged a certain number of Jewish intellectuals from their heritage. Judaism in some of its contemporary manifestations admittedly seems remote from modern life, but if there is one secret which explains the deep mystery of Jewish survival, it is the diligence of our brightest intellectuals in the past as they strove to coordinate Judaism and the secular world for the advantage and benefit of both. Time allows only two brief examples, though scores — perhaps hundreds — could easily be adduced.

As far as our records indicate, the most distinguished gushed Jewish intellectual in the first century of the Common Era was a man named Philo Judaeus. The prevailing philosophic mood of his time was Platonic. With a mental acumen much more abundantly appreciated by succeeding generations than by his own, Philo reconciled Hellenism with the religious ideals of Judaism. He did not find it necessary to choose either Hellenism or Judaism to the total exclusion of the other. He used the great gifts of his mind to combine them, thus laying the groundwork for Judaism's encounter with Christianity far into the future.

My second example is Maimonides. In the twelfth century the dominant intellectual atmosphere was Aristotelian. Modern science, moreover, was just beginning to emerge. Maimonides embraced many disciplines: he was a rabbi, a theologian, a philosopher and a scientist. He was perhaps the most eminent physician in the world of his time. He too found it altogether unnecessary to choose among Judaism, philosophy or science, at a price of rejecting the others.

Precisely because he was a truly great intellectual, Maimonides was able to help Judaism develop and adjust, to adopt its values and principles without ceasing to be authentically itself, to make room within itself for every legitimate influence from Aristotle and from the scientific method. Who can doubt that Maimonides himself, Judaism in particular, and human culture at large, all benefited from the fact that this man remained a questing, practicing Jew.

In our time, the mood is no longer that of either Aristotle or Plato. The mood now is a combination of Einstein, Darwin and Freud. But the challenge in the twentieth century is exactly what it was in the first and the twelfth. This is a job which is especially dependent upon the intellectual. Here then is my first dimension of my approach to the un-Jewish intellectual: your people needs you!

Of no importance, however, is the fact that the world needs you. The world needs you not merely as an individual, but specifically, precisely, as a Jew. Basic to this assertion is the premise that Judaism — properly interpreted and applied — encompasses a syndrome of emphases and insights which no other group or culture expresses in quite the same measure or way. It would require a whole series of articles to expand on this premise adequately. Let me just mention, with a bare minimum of comment, a few of the unique emphases of Judaism which the world needs and which it will obtain from us only if we survive in identifiable form. For what does our tradition stand — especially, uniquely?

First, that the heart of all reality is spiritual, not physical. It follows from this that if man is to be truly man, and not just the most complex of animals, his primary pursuit must be after truth, after beauty, after moral goodness — not just after pleasure and material wealth.

Second, there is a oneness in the sense that everything emanated from the same creative beginning and that the same chemical components and natural laws are operative throughout all existence — from the remotest reaches of outer space to the minutest molecule within my body. There is also a spiritual oneness which inextricably binds each person on earth to every other person, each nation or religion or race to all others.

Third, our noblest ethical aspirations, which derive from the very nature of reality itself, must be applied to every segment of life. There can be no asceticism, no withdrawal, no denial. All of man's experience is susceptible to sanctification. Life is to be divided, as Martin Buber put it, not into the sacred versus the profane, but into the sacred and the not-yet-sacred.

Fourth, every human being on this earth is my brother. The same ethic by which my family life should be governed must be extended to the stranger whose language I don't understand, whose mores may even be entirely beyond my comprehension. I who am descended from oppressed strangers must be forever compassionate to all who are either strangers or oppressed.

Fifth, religion is not a separate compartment of life but is rather a precious thread woven into the fabric of both the national and the ethnic. Which means to say: whatever I do as political man or civic man or biological man must be influenced by what I am as religious man.

Sixth, our greatest need today, if humanity is to survive, is for a synthesis of the particular and the universal. We must learn to live as citizens of our respective nations, yet simultaneously as citizens of the world. No one is in a better position to succeed at this excruciatingly difficult task than we. For on the world scene today only we Jews exist in part as a separate nation, living on a soil of its own, yet also as a universal people, scattered over most of the planet. In mankind's ineluctable, urgent, desperate pursuit of peace, we Jews constitute — whether we deliberately will it so or not — as we have in other contexts so many times in the past — an experimental human laboratory, testing for the whole human race concepts and ideals calculated to achieve salvation.

So much, then, for our brief encapsulation of what Judaism offers to the world. I think I know the Question some of my intellectual friends would pose at this point. Can't we cherish and foster precisely these emphases without identification as Jews? The answer is no. What kind of reasonable sense does it make to select from a variety of other sources — synthetically, as it were — that which has grown indigenously and organically in our own source in Judaism? Isn't that almost like enjoying the physical appearance of one's wife by reflection, through a series of photographs, each showing one perspective or angle, instead of living with her face-to-face, reveling in her beauty firsthand, alive?

Why go to the florist shop each day to purchase cut flowers while neglecting one's own bounteous garden? Why live only on the accumulated capital of Judaism without making further investments, in order that it may offer the world additional and perhaps even greater blessings in the future?

If I told you my un-Jewish intellectual that a new organization was to be formed, dedicated to exactly the six ideals briefly summarized a moment ago, if I invited you to join such an organization in order that, together with others of similar intention and hope, you might encourage and promote these emphases, you would eagerly accept, would you not? Yet you deliberately scorn the great historic group already in existence for this purpose and into which you yourself were born. Thus you deny to the whole of humanity continued creative enrichment through ideals which you profess to cherish.

Yes, one or another of these values may be found in other cultures. But only Judaism originated all of them. Only Judaism holds them bound closely together in an integrated, organic whole. And Judaism can best develop them as a pattern for the future. That's why the world needs you as a Jew.

I said at the beginning that there were three dimensions in which I wanted to address my indifferent friends. In addition to the fact that your people need you, and the world needs you to be identifiably Jewish, you, my intellectual friends need to be Jewish yourselves. You need it for the sake of your own fulfillment. You need it to attain happiness and self-respect. If you are as balanced emotionally as you are gifted mentally, you know that self-denial is not the road to happiness, neither for the individual as such, nor for the renegade from an honourable historic people. I am what I am — as a Canadian as a Jew, as a man. To the degree that I acknowledge who I really am and struggle to perfect myself as such, my life succeeds. In the measure that I attempt to deny myself, I become ludicrous in the eyes of others and more than slightly cheap in my own sight.

Rugs begin Sid Smith humanization

By SANDY LIND

A red rug now lies in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall. Its functional purpose is to keep the bulk of the street moisture from the rest of the building. It can absorb about 10 gallons of water a square yard.

But that is not all to the mystery of the rug, which appeared two weeks ago. Its ulterior purpose is to make Sid Smith seem more like home to every student entering, says the university's Coordinator of Furniture.

The rug was the idea of Mr. W. Jeffrey of the Physical Plant department, and follows his policy of "humanizing" seminar and common rooms across campus.

It is his opinion that an "optimum learning environment" can be created through the skilful choice of furniture. Jeffrey also maintains that it can be done cheaply.

Jeffrey's latest project has been the East Asian seminar rooms in University College, which have received deep upholstered armchairs instead of the ubiquitous tables and chairs of Sid Smith.

This new emphasis on informality was the result of discussions with faculty and students. Even chalk boards have been removed — and all this at an extra cost of only $60.

The Sid Smith rug itself cost nothing. Jeffrey used the possibility of a market test as a carrot, since the foyer is so well travelled, and the carpet was installed by Dobbie Industries free of charge.

And next Wednesday, Eagle Carpets Ltd. will carpet the other side of the foyer. Though nominally a marketing test, the carpets are there to stay.

Mat Blues tune tenacles for final

Varsity wrestlers get their final tune-up before next week's OQAA championships at McGill with a mat meet tomorrow afternoon at ye olde Harte House against University of Waterloo.

Blues are vowing sweet, nasty, hara kari revenge on the wiggly Warriors who upset them last week 51-45 in a close match at Wallabaloo.

191 lb-er, Larry Barron, especially, has his tough tenacles out to ensnare a meek, mild-mannered opponent of the same weight who, incredible as it may seem, stole defeat from the jaws of victory for the enraged Barron.

Other grapplers in action for Toronto will be colourful Ken White (123 lb.), Sweet

Daddy Sauer (130 lb.), more of DiPasquale (137 lb.), so it Simms (145 lbs.), Off Broadway (152 lbs.), affably affluent Allison (160 lb.), sur-reptitious Rick Sauter (167 lb.), who upset Don Stevens for the berth, kentucky Friedrich (177 lb.), and Ylo Korge-magi (Heavyweight), who's been complaining recently of insufficient press coverage of his grappling feats. Well, Ylo, your feats are much too big for us to cover adequately. Try Murph's shoes. (groan).

The gruntin' and groanin' gets under way at 2 p.m.

The only change in Blues' lineup for next week's OQAA scene in Montreal will be the probable insertion of playing-coach, Paul Beswick, at either 160 or 152 pounds.

GYM

The University of Toronto Gymnastics team hopes to return home tomorrow evening in possession of the Caron Trophy.

The cup, emblematic of OQAA gymnastics supremacy has been won by L'Universite de Montreal for the past two seasons. Both times, U of T finished second.

The team which competes in tomorrow's championships at University of Guelph has shown sufficient strength in exhibition meets this season to be rated an excellent chance.

Brian McVey, runner-up in the individual all-around standings to Montreal's Gilles Briere at last year's championships is favored to win this season.

Newcomer Al Forest should not be far behind. His steady improvement was shown by a victory in an invitational meet at Queens' two weeks ago.

In the same meet, John Kortright barely missed second spot. Work on his weakest events has paid off in a remarkably consistent performance.

Depth should help the team. While only the top three men on each event count towards the team standings, five entrants per event are permitted.

Veteran Al Hamilton who recently rejoined to compete all-around will be a particular plus on rings and horizontal bar. It is hoped that specialists Phil Michaelis in free exercise and vaulting, and Arthur Stein, working on pommel horse will pick up extra points for the Blues.

Varsity Blues meet McMaster Marlin's this evening at Varsity Arena (8 p.m.) to kick off a four game home stand which will complete their SIHL season and exhibition schedule. . . . Included in the series will be games with University of Montreal Carabins on Saturday at 2 p.m.; Waterloo Warriors on Wednesday at 8 p.m. and

B-BALL BLUES BOP W'LOO

By JIM MORRISON

Varsity Blues' playoff aspirations entered the realm of possibility Wednesday night at York, as Blues rolled over Waterloo Warriors to the tune of 80-57. If Varsity can defeat McMaster tomorrow afternoon (game time 3 p.m.) and Western Mustangs the following weekend, and both Mac and Western manage to lose to undefeated Windsor Lancers, Blues can still tie for second place. (Tends to boggle the mind, doesn't it?)

For the first few minutes of Wednesday's game, it looked as if Blues were headed for yet another debacle, as Warriors stormed to a 17-5 lead. Varsity, however, switched into their half-court press and poured in twenty unanswered points to Waterloo's considerable chagrin.

From then on, Blues made it look easy. They led 41-31 at the half, and padded their margin in the final minutes as Warriors' shooting fell off again.

Highlighting an impressive team effort was Bruce Dempster, Blues' most consistent performer who played his best game yet since switching to forward. Bruce contributed 27 points and 8 rebounds to the Varsity cause, taking over the team scoring lead from defensive wizard Larry Trafford, who had 10 points.

Other Blues of note were guard Peter Burton, who played up to potential after a succession of bad games, and muscular Jay MacDonald, who certainly rates as the team's most improved performer. MacDonald had 13 points, and Burton 12.

Waterloo was hampered throughout the game by miserable shooting. Guard Jean Laaniste, one of the league's top five scorers, hit on only four of 21 shots from the floor, and finished the game with nine points.

Warrior's best was center Larry Sobol with 15 points and 14 rebounds. He was followed by forward Ton Kieswetter and guard Stan Talesnick, who had 11 and 10 points respectively.

FOR TORONTO: Dempster 27, MacDonald 13, Burton 12, Trafford 10, Hadden 8, Slater 4, Feldman 2, Crouter 2, Evans 2, Katz 0.

DRIBBLES: Blues shot 39 per cent from the floor; Waterloo shot 34 per cent. . . . Bruce Dempster is now averaging 15.6 ppg, Larry Trafford 13.9.

BOXING

Varsity pugilists squared off against one another Wednesday to fight for the honor of going to Royal Military College later this month. Eight matches were fought.

Bob Maton (SMC) defeated Kit Simpson (Vic) in a three round-decision. Kit, who has been having a little trouble with his endurance, put up a good fight. Rick Smith of Inns defeated Terry Kelly, who came down from York university. Graeme Hunter, of the Toronto Athletic Club, took the decision from Mike Raymond (UC); both boxers, evenly matched, put up a good display of punch swapping until they began to tire in the third round.

Mike Allemano (SMC) repeated his win over Joe Donoghue (Law) in a heavy-weight match that the referee stopped in the second round. Allemano, who is the most awesome-looking member of the Varg squad, boxes the way he looks.

Alex Dougall (APSC) lost narrowly to Kevin Cavanaugh (SMC) in the 165-pound category. Pat Goodwin (SMC) a boxer who is noticeably fast on his feet, defeated Dave Macedo from McCormick playground in a three-round decision.

The evening was rounded out with two exhibition matches: Paul Fletcher (APSC) and Danny "Iron Man" Doyle (SMC) squared off and Bronco Simon from McCormick playground showed Wayne Brindley of Trinity playground how it is done.

The final team selection for the Royal Military College competition on February 22nd will be announced early next week.

WARD PASSI

WATERLOO HERE WEDNESDAY

Laurentian University next Friday at 8 p.m. . . . Latest news on the status of Blues centre Brian St. John is that he is through for the season. The original diagnosis of pericarditis was a correct one and he will remain in hospital in Uxbridge for another two weeks. . . . Coach Tom Watt hasn't decided how to fill in the gap left by St. John's loss and plans to use a variety of combinations in the two games this week-end. . . . Steve Monteith will be gunning for his 100th goal in SIHL competition this evening and in Wednesday's game with Waterloo if he doesn't have by then. Steve has collected 98 goals in his more-than-distinguished Varsity career. . . . Also at stake in the McMaster and Waterloo games will be the league scoring and goals-against titles. Paul Laurent and John Wright are slightly behind Warriors' Ron Robinson in the point derby while Tom Little and Adrian Watson lead Arlon Popkey of Waterloo in the goaltending race. . . . Winners of Wednesday's Toronto-Waterloo will take first place in the league and meet the second place team in the Eastern Division (probably Carlton University) in the first round of the Queen's Cup playoffs. The loser will meet Laval, first place team in the east, in the other sudden-death semi-final. . . . Mike Boland has played his best hockey of the season since he was moved permanently to the right-wing position on a line with Paul Laurent and Ward Passi. Mike has scored four goals in Blues' last four league starts. . . .

MCGILL — Six of the eight student senators on the 62-man McGill Senate resigned their positions Wednesday saying their continued presence would simply be an exercise in futility.

—Arts and Science students voted overwhelmingly last week to reject their present dean. Forty-five per cent of the faculty's students turned out to vote for Prof. Donald Theall, head of the English Department, as head. The students, who took the poll after despairing of getting an adequate say on a selection committee reviewing the post, plan to deliver the results to the university principal this week.

YORK — Students and faculty here plan to walk out of their classes tomorrow to back up demands for an 18 per cent faculty salary hike and student participation in decision-making.

MCGILL — The University has been trying to fire political science lecturer Stan Gray for the last two weeks, but the activist teacher refuses to go.

Principal H. Roche Robertson charges Gray with "conduct that affected adversely the general well being of the university." Gray says Robertson "is going against the expressed wishes of my department, student council, and political science students."

—The chairman of the McGill University Graduates' Society says donations are down these days, as many grads are holding back their money pending a stiffening of administration attitudes towards campus activists.

EASTERN MICHIGAN — Deputy sherrifs Thursday stopped 200 students from attempting to seize the administration building here.

PENNSYLVANIA — A sit-in of 250 students continues in protest against university plans for a $100 million social science complex in a low income neighborhood.

PRINCETON — Students for a Democratic Society plan a student strike for this week to force the university to sell its holdings in 40 South African companies.

OBERLIN — Marine Corps recruiters were escorted off campus Thursday by 500 students chanting anti-war slogans.

BERKELEY — Police last Thursday used tear gas to turn

2,000 student demonstrators into a weeping mob. Students overturned two paddywagons and hurled canisters of the gas back at the police.

MADISON — The last of 1,900 national Guardsmen left the University of Wisconsin campus Friday after completing mop-up operations among the students. The state legislature is to consider bills which would dismiss faculty participating in "disruptive" activities, keep suspended and expelled students off campus for at least one year, and bar the use of bullhorns by demonstrators.

VOLUME 89 — NO. 56
February 24, 1969

Following the Varsity policy of covering the news when it happens, where it happens, we sent two of our ace reporters into the jungles south of the border, one to Chicago, one to Berkeley. They emerged, slightly clubbed, to tell their respective stories. See centre.

Pollution: Is there a future for our generation?

By SHERRY BRYDSON

Don Chant is chairman of the Biology Department at U of T, and he doesn't think the world as we know it can exist for many more generations.

Dr. Chant is cheerfully, matter-of-factly unoptimistic about the fate of the human race. Since coming here from the University of California two years ago, he has been an advisor to the federal government's Science Council of Canada, flying to Ottawa every weekend to participate in an agricultural research study group. He knows the types of pollutants we are pouring into our water and atmosphere, and he doesn't think the future augurs well for this generation.

Sitting in his office in the Ramsay Wright Zoological Laboratories on a day last week when you could see the waterfront from the top floor of Rochdale College, he discussed the impossibility of convincing the public of the need for pollution research funds.

"It's an uphill fight to get people to take pollution seriously," he said. "Look at the Ottawa River — it's so polluted it's beginning to drive tourists away."

"Residents can no longer go down to the river to take a swim — they have to get in their cars and drive miles to a conservation area. But they don't look at it in money terms."

"All the Ottawa residents can see is that it would cost $150 per resident per year to instal sewage plants to remove the human waste from the river. Can you imagine voters approving that kind of tax?"

Apparently the Ottawa municipal authorities can't imagine it. They recently began to notice the raw sewage in the river. The solution? They built a channel which drew off some of the pollutants into the Rideau River.

One wonders what they will do when it, too, becomes intolerable.

An electric toilet, already on the market, can completely eliminate pollution from domestic sewage. These toilets could be installed at a cost of $500 apiece.

"It will be cheaper to give every home an electric toilet than to install the complex and expensive sewage facilities that are now needed in urban North America," claims Ajax journalist R.D. Lawrence.

"In the long run, clean air does cost less than dirty air," Dr. Chant asserted, albeit after some prodding. "But the costs of air pollution are less obvious — having to clean clothes and windows more often, having to paint the house once every five years instead of ten."

"But these things are almost intangible, and it would be a lot harder to convince the voter to vote that extra money for pollution research."

Outside, on Harbord St., the trucks rumbling in and out of the hole-that-is-to-be-a-library stirred up swirls of dust that rose a few feet to settle on exposed faces and hands of passersby.

They were breathing in construction particles, just plain dust, and tiny particles of salt, laid down by the Metro Roads to combat last month's snows.

Ontario Hydro labels these salts "contaminants", and washes insulators along the Gardiner Expressway after every salting. The girls going happily to the Benson Building for their swimming classes laughed and talked and breathed in large doses of these contaminants.

In the recent City Council 750-foot Smokestack Debate, tempers flared over the aesthetic advisability of constructing such a monster. No one ever mentioned that the only effect of spewing our poisons so high in the air would be to pollute some other city instead.

In the same way, we are receiving pollutants from other cities in the winds that blow over Toronto.

The Varsity was so alarmed by its findings that it has formed a group action committee, the U of T Pollution Probe. The organization will begin research immediately. The organization is dedicated to (1) investigating the causes and origins of environmental pollution; (2) the effects on our generation of air, water and soil pollutants; and (3) mobilizing the public, private and government sectors to action in removing the poisons from our environment — before it's too late.

Join, and get on the mailing list, by dropping a line to the U of T Pollution Probe, 91 St. George St., Toronto 5.

Student Council presidential candidate John Oldham (Emm) became a charter member last night when he learned of the organization.

"I'm with you 100 per cent," he said. "This is just the sort of thing the SAC should involve itself with. We should get a working group going over the summer."

The first meeting of the Probe will be sometime later this week.

WEDNESDAY: The poisons we live with every day in Toronto.

U of T is bracing itself for the arrival Wednesday of the leader of the Youth International Party. Leave has been cancelled for all security officers at campus buildings. The university computer centre has been dismantled for the duration of his visit and the components entrusted to trustworthy senior faculty. Sensitive files have all been transferred to microfilm and concealed on the person of top administrators.

Yippie leader Jerry Rubin, the pied piper who in August led students and other colourful young people into Chicago's Grant Park where they later fought police, will visit U of T Wednesday under the sponsorship of SAC's cultural affairs commission.

Rubin says he belongs to "an alternate culture" with habits radically different from those of "middle class America." He will be on display in the Sid Smith lobby at 1 p.m.

The last time Rubin visited a Canadian university — the University of British Columbia in October of last year — he led 2,000 students into the faculty club which they occupied for several days, for no reason at all.

SCHOOL OF GRADUATE STUDIES COUNCIL ELECTIONS

Call for Nominations for Student Membership

Four Graduate Students are to be elected, one from each Division, elected by the Students in his Division, for a term of one year. The Nominees must be students who intend to be full-time graduate students in the 1969-70 session.

The nomination papers require the signatures of two students enrolled in the School of Graduate Studies, and the signature of the nominee, signifying his willingness to stand.

A biographical statement of not more than 50 words, approved by the nominee, should be included.

Nomination papers must be received in the School of Graduate Studies not later than 5 p.m. March 5th, 1969.

Student-centered teaching comes full circle Wednesday when Bob Rae and D'Arcy Martin, student members of the Commission on University government, will be guest lecturers at a Higher Education 316 class.

The class is taught by Edward Sheffield, professor of Higher Education at Innis College.

"The students wanted to spend some time on this, so we arranged to have Mr. Rae and Mr. Martin in," explained Prof. Sheffield.

He plans a series of four or five weekly sessions titled Toward an Understanding of Student Discontent, and cordially invites other members of the university community to attend.

Rae and Martin will kick off the series Wednesday at noon, in room 102 of the Mechanical Building.

U of T students win 24 Woodrow Wilsons

By MARY BASTEDO

Twenty-four University of Toronto students were awarded Woodrow Wilson Scholarships this year, placing U of T first in Canada and second only to Cornell University in North America.

The scholarships went to 14 students at UC, three at Trinity, two each at Victoria, St. Mike's and New Colleges and one in the Faculty of Music.

No financial award is attached to the scholarship but last year all of the winners received money from graduate schools.

The winners were Robert Allen, Kathleen Beatty, Edward Bierstone, Linda Bortolotti, Edward G. Carr, Edmund Clark, David Cluff, Fred Lazar, Richard MacDowell, Heather Murphy, Alexander Murray, Manfred Raschke, Steven F. Wilson (all UC), Derek Allen, Michael Ignatieff and Steven McIntyre (Trin), Shelley Robb and Jean Thomson (Vic), Bonnie Campbell and Brian Mossop (New) and Douglas Rahn (Music). Fourteen other students received Honorable mention.

To receive the award students had to be recommended by a professor. Selection was then made on the basis of a marks transcript, letters of recommendation from professors, a 1,000 word essay on the interests and academic goals of the nominee and an interview. Most of the winners intend to teach university. The Woodrow Wilson virtually guarantees them admission to any graduate school.

The Varsity asked the winners how much creativity and originality the scholarship had demanded.

"I got it just through hard work rather than originality," said Edward Carr (IV UC). "If you master the knowledge that is imparted to you in lectures you can get by."

"What they base scholarships on is compliance with the system," one of the winners commented.

Others disagreed, and felt that the primary emphasis was not on marks.

"You have to get good grades and that means coping with the system somehow but recommendation letters are probably the most important criterion. If you don't have some sort of originality you won't get good letters if the profs are responsible," said another winner who asked not to be identified.

Bob Allen (IV UC) felt that teachers who recommended him on the basis of his creative writing had been most influential.

"I haven't had an A average in all my years here and I'm in a general course," said Manfred Raschke (IV UC). "I know people who still 1:1 in their courses and didn't get an interview. It can't be based too heavily on marks."

Another winner was cynical about the whole method of picking scholarship winners.

"The people at the top get more and more and it becomes an exclusive little group," she said.

"If you do well in one kind of contest it becomes the basis of your future success. People judge you on the basis of previous people's judgment.

"The whole society is geared to perpetuating an intellectual elite rather than opening up for a truly democratic education."

When asked whether they were proud of their Woodrow Wilsons reactions varied from

"I hardly think it's anything terribly significant" to "I feel I've been walking around in a pink cloud for the last few days."

"When you know how little it can mean you can't really be proud," one winner concluded.

Biafran students detained at airport

By MARTHA TRACEY

A Canadian speaking tour by four Biafran students almost ended before it could begin Saturday. Okechukwu Emodi, Ugah Igba, Kamalu Ukwuije, and Winston Bell-Gam were detained on their arrival at Toronto Airport by Immigration officials because they were travelling on passports from Biafra, not yet recognized by the Canadian Government.

Originally invited by the United States National Student Association to speak throughout the U.S., the foursome was invited to continue on to Canada by the Canadian Union for the Rights of Biafra.

A meeting with the press and student leaders, planned for 2 p.m. Saturday at the International Student Centre, finally took place at a Flemingdon Park apartment four hours later.

The students and their hosts - mostly returned CUSO volunteers and Biafrans studying in Canada - told of their hassle with Immigration. Despite pressure from New Democratic Party MP's David Lewis and Andrew Brewin, Immigration officials attempted to send the four back to New York.

"We stalled on the way to the plane," said Winston Bell-Gam. "We kept stopping and resting our luggage. By the time we got to the exit, we had missed the plane!" While plans were being made to put them on the next flight to New York, pressure from their hosts continued.

Finally, by "special permission of the Minister", they were permitted to enter Canada.

Saturday evening the Biafrans and members of the Toronto group chatted informally with reporters over a delicious Biafran meal.

Kamalu Ukwuije, tall and bearded, wearing rimless sunglasses and a woolen scarf around his neck, had toured the western US, including California. He had intended to speak at Berkeley, but arrived in the midst of the current campus unrest. Although encouraged to speak, he believed that the immediate concerns of Berkeley students should take precedence over his problem.

Ukwuije stressed that Biafrans did their utmost to maintain a Nigerian Federation, but that the slaughter of countless of their tribesmen in other regions forced them to seced.

All four students claim that the military situation has improved for Biafra in the past few months. They emphasize that the press often gives a distorted view of the war, since most accounts come from Nigeria.

The group will be in Canada for two weeks. They will travel separately to almost all major Canadian cities within that time. U of T commitments include speaking at St. Michael's College at noon today, and in the Sid Smith Free Speech Area at 1 p.m.

Philosophers interpreted world, in various ways; The point however, is to change it

Professor Macpherson claims in his article of Feb. 12 that the university fails to live up to the higher aims of education because it just happens to "allow" a consumer-oriented society to infiltrate, corrupt, and demand that universities contribute to the Gross National Product. But a university is created by its society: the owners set aside money for its existence, money to train the highly skilled manpower to produce the goods and justify the values of that system. If the society is militaristic and racist, suffering from a grossly uneven distribution of wealth, narrow anti-human values and a culture of violence, the natural development of intellectuals has always sought to remove the university from the "consumer society", and preserve integrity and purity amidst the ivy. But escape is not that easy.

Macpherson's main hope for Canadian universities contains a contradiction. On the one hand he says, our universities are not as subject to the military-industrial complex as are American universities. On the other hand, since we are controlled by the U.S., Canadian corporate capitalism turns to American universities for "research and ideological needs" avoiding serious demands on Canadian universities!

But that is precisely what the Canadian student movement is objecting to. Corporate capitalism is built on imperialist states and colonies.

We are a colony of the U.S. (there are not many University governors who do not sit on boards of directors of companies under more or less U.S. influence), and the best research grants and contracts go to the States. And the nature of those contracts is determined by the U.S.: heavily defense in a defense oriented continental economy. Furthermore, our own military is not just an idle expense: not only does it make us a no-man's land for the hydrogen holocaust, but the amount we have spent on the military since the war is just about equal to what we have accepted from the U.S. in the sell-out of our industry, something in the area of one and one-half billion per year.

Professor Macpherson suggests that because professors are scarce they have the bargaining power to create the ideal university simply by "insisting on being scholars." But there are at least two reasons why this hasn't worked in practice: 1) you have to organize the majority of people to make a democracy work and in the university the students are the majority and, people, 2) students are compelled to return to the "production line world" in three or four years and have to make a living in the irrational economy.

To this end universities should encourage critical thought and radical action, to equip the student for realities within and without the "ivory tower". The fine ideas of the university are nothing if they are not put into practice by people organized to create a rational society.

Charnie Cunningham

Bissell wrong on free speech issue

The events at the Clark Kerr lecture should be considered a partial victory for the left on this campus.

First, the left succeeded in establishing a (sorely lacking) physical presence on campus. This is important not only for the university as a whole, which must now take the left more seriously, but also for the left itself, which can only have its spirit lifted and energies fired as a result of the events.

Second, the issue of the increasing americanization of the university and the Canadian society it's in was at least raised. The only comment to receive unanimous applause all night was Andy Wernick's about Kerr coming from the metropolis to advise the branch manager on how to keep down the natives. Despite this, however, the sound analysis of our universities becoming increasingly dominated by the technocratic, professional American model while our society (no accident) becomes increasingly dominated by American-controlled capital was lost on most of those present.

The left made the mistake of not speaking to the free speech issue after the confusion had died down. It could have been handled quite simply by having someone explain that the public lecture format does not provide free speech because only the platform orator can speak freely. All others are reduced to passive spectators, even if a brief question period is provided at the end. For free speech to have any political meaning, there are two requirements.

First, the speakers must have access to audiences. To speak freely when no one can listen means little. Of course the Hyde Park model can be tolerated so long as the mass media are controlled by a few. The second requirement for free speech is the opportunity to engage in debate. Claude Bissell, when he raved about free speech and student fascism at the Kerr lecture, was dead wrong. It was necessary to disrupt that lecture in order to make free speech a reality in the ROM auditorium.

Why didn't the left say so? Had they, more of those present would have been ready to consider the more important issue of the americanization of Canadian universities and society.

Pollution Patrol

What did you do over Study Week? Lots of research?

The Varsity did. We researched pollution—air pollution, water pollution, soil pollution, people pollution. We researched industrial, agricultural and community pollution.

The research has produced a battery of articles on the pollution situation in Southern Ontario that is far from pretty. Our findings paint a picture of death and destruction, unless our generation, the heirs of a poisoned earth, get together and persuade the public, private industry and the government to do something about it.

In fact, we were so startled by our own findings that we were moved to set up an action committee, the U of T Pollution Patrol. Membership is free, and you may get on the mailing list by sending your name and address to U of T Pollution Patrol, 91 St. George St. Send it postage free by campus mail.

Sealskin boots

U of T's supreme academic body, the Senate, held its first open meeting in history on St. Valentine's Day, just as students were breaking for reading week.

The assembled alumni, administrators and senior faculty spent most of the meeting discussing and ratifying the new arts and science program to be implemented next year.

One student turned out to witness the historic event. He was a Varsity reporter. He had his picture taken by a photographer for wearing blue jeans and sealskin boots.

The U of T senate was the 16th Canadian university senate to open its doors to the public. A year ago only a handful had taken the fearful step, and in November the count was six.

Which all goes to prove two things: The Senate merely formalizes decisions made long beforehand by administrators and faculty. As of this year students have been finding out that real power lies at the department level, and they've been going after it.

And secondly administrators across the country are running scared — looking for ways to stave off student demands for an equal say in the decision-making process.

They should know better. More than a year ago U of T students turned down an offer of seven seats on the 200-man Senate as "tokenism." At McGill last week six of eight student senators resigned, saying the Senate was "irrelevant" and did not deal with the basic issues before the university.

At U of T at least, students know that an open senate means nothing. Reform must take place from the bottom up. And on a basis of equality.

Reactionary

Resolutions seldom do anything but get a load off the chest of the people who make them.

SAC's condemnation of the Student protesters at Sir George Williams University has done even less.

Ranting about the actions are best left to an older generation who are more adept at it. For the best interests of the student movement, SAC should have kept its mouth shut.

For even though the destruction of property is serious and even though the students may not have been innocent of conspiracy, the affair is over, finished, done and all we can do is react.

And that's what SAC has done — reacted as in the word reactionary. Before they learned all the facts (all of which won't be known for a long time), they were quick to issue a statement. What is more important is taking the actions and the issues at Sir George, analyzing them and applying them to our own situation here. The students at Sir George have enough trouble as it is.

Some times it's better not to say anything at all.

Sir George: a look back in anger

By SUSAN REISLER

Thinking back over the past few weeks of the Sir George crises, and then going back months it has become really obvious that a few events have been blown up to monstrous proportions and so much that really counts has been forgotten, not even filed away, but thrown away.

Dimitrios Roussopoulos, editor of Our Generation writes from Montreal:

"You cannot imagine the hysteria that grips the city of Montreal. The mass media have wiped up public opinion in an unprecedented fashion — moment by moment radio and t.v., and the press report their lamentations on the loss of property in the form of the Sir George computers in a shockingly hypocritical manner.

Just a few minutes ago a CBC reporter was interviewing two Sir George administrators about 'their 303, and their 409' as if these were napalmed children in Vietnam. Public attitudes are not even as refined as those after Watts or other ghetto 'riots'. All attention is focused on the student violence and hardly any one is talking about the issues or about the role of provocation of the administration and faculty. There is no attempt being made to understand the situation. While commentators work up hatred for student radicalism over the loss of property, no one has mentioned the $8,000 bill in liquor and food consumed by the administrators during the 13-day occupation at the Mount-Royal hotel as they were working out a 'compromise'."

From inside, here are a few thoughts written by Jim Wark, a former U of T student who was at Sir George during the Anderson hearings and became so involved in the case that he was with the students when they moved to occupy the computer centre.

"I've spent a lot of time in the past month in solitary contemplation with my conscience, and with those of about 100 of my comrades in various jails and computer centres. We've thought out a lot of things about racism, violence, property and other eternal white middle-class hang-ups; if the Globe and Mail hasn't completely walled in your mind on the issues, I have an irresistible hunger inside me to rap with you about what went on, and what didn't.

Furthermore, a lot of the brothers and sisters are languishing in two Montreal jails until their bail money can be raised. And that, as our friends the guards used to like to tell us, 'c'est pas un cadeau.' We need, I would guess, something like $10 or $20 thousand; and that's for bail alone. Remember legal costs will be astronomical, and none of us are in a particularly good financial position after a month of exclusively non-paying revolutionary activity. (Non-paying in spite of what anyone may have told you.)

I hope everyone will remember that the issues involved are rather complicated and have been getting that way for some ten months. They are also deep ones: it's a question of freedom, both internal and political, of community, love and hate, and of the various kinds and complexions of power, both real and ideal. Our actions were almost without exception, actions of which none of us is ashamed.

Jim couldn't finish the letter. Right now he is free on bail and anything he says can be used as evidence against him. But let's not forget the issues and what this was all about.

It was about repression, through various sources including the minutes of a meeting held in November with Sir George Williams administration, the police and local business men it was discovered that the university was becoming worried about the growth of the student left on campus. They needed some issue on which this left could be discredited. The press smear that followed the Sir George occupation shows they found their issue, and now the students have been completely squelched.

It was about racism. The initial charges of the students said that Prof. Perry Anderson gave consistently low marks to black students. The administration was racist in the way it handled the case, underestimating the force behind the black complaints, paying little attention to their demands on the composition of the hearing committee. We will see how racist this administration is or is not in the near future — will they continue the hearing on the charges that one of their professors discriminated against his students now that the instigators are locked up?

It was about Luddism. This has to be considered. During the Industrial Revolution a group of people smashed the new machines because they were dehumanizing. Some people say we are in a second industrial revolution now. They feel there is something glorious in smashing a machine as if it were at fault. Whether this was in the minds of the students is not known but it does raise some questions.

It was about property and violence. The students are considered violent because they have destroyed some property. They have become the scapegoats for institutionalized violence. That's the kind that sees so many university students committing suicide, that's the kind that fosters racism, that's the kind that sees wars of aggression, like Vietnam, continue. That kind of destruction is not thought of in those terms by the people who are so loudly condemning the student violence.

And it was about democracy in the university. The students and the administration had reached an agreement once, but the administration then decided that it was in their power to act without checking with the students a second time. When two people on the hearing committee resigned the administration selected two more who were unacceptable to the students. It's not a question of following channels, but rather creating new ones when the occasion arises. The due processes of democracy had almost solved the whole crisis until Principal Clarke decided the Monday before the final eruption to bring in another body to make the final decision, the Sir George Williams Association of University Teachers. This group had never played a major role during the crisis, yet it was to determine its outcome. Democracy was overruled.

why socialism ?

The following is a comment on Ken Stone's article that appeared in the Varsity on February 3rd.

"If you are really interested in democracy and the quality of life, let's talk about socialism."

O.K., Mr. Stone. Let's see how socialism (and I am referring to the traditional or orthodox definition, not Swedish 'socialism', where over 90% of industry is privately owned, and governed more by the market, in the classic free enterprise, than our own) would solve the complaints you voice.

First, you mention democracy. Your article states that neither our society nor our schools are democratic, and that the rulers do not rule for the people. Without questioning the validity of that, what about socialist nations?

There is a new ruling class in socialist countries "made up of those who have special privileges and economic preference because of the administrative monopoly they hold". This "new ruling and exploiting class" uses the state for its own ends; writes laws from its own interests; designs the economic system to perpetuate its power.

Who made these critical remarks about socialism? Wallace McCutcheon? John Foster Dulles? No. Milovan Djilas and Herbert Marcuse. The former was the Vice President of Communist Yugoslavia.

Why should socialism produce a more undemocratic state? It is because of the nature of the beast.

Socialism puts into the hands of an administrative elite all the decisions that the market now makes in a capitalist society. All property, all wealth, the entire governmental apparatus, the right to control the life and employment of any individual worker, and the communications media as well — belongs to the "people", which means that all this is in the hands of a hierarchial bureaucracy, which imposes its own scale of preferences on the community.

Have you ever known a democratic bureaucracy, Mr. Stone? Socialism, to work, requires a bureaucracy, in industrial states, a tremendous bureaucracy. This means an army of specialists, delegation of the myriad of tasks, red tape and impersonal standards. It means a hierarchy of smug officials; and the alienation of the workers from their bureaucratic masters.

Socialism, Mr. Stone, if it grows too big, will begin to choke your democratic plant. And don't console yourself with visions of socialists ruling for the people. That's hypnotizing rhetoric.

But what of the student in a socialist society? Who controls his education?

Not him. Party hacks run everything from overall policy to day-to-day functioning. At the lowest level, party locals carry out propaganda activity, enforce party policy, and direct the work of school administrators. Higher circles centrally prescribe the content of education and teaching practices.

Consequently, students in socialist societies have no voice in the curriculum. Books may be utterly biased; courses irrelevant; admission standards dominated by political considerations, but the student can do nothing. The engineering applicant refused admission because of his political leanings must acquiesce.

If socialism and democratic education are interrelated, such is not glaringly evident.

Mr. Stone should re-examine his ideology, and cease proposing alternatives which are not only unnecessary for achieving his goals, but are inimical to them.

A democratic society can only be realized where individualism thrives and a pluralism of countervailing forces exist. There must be an ideology of personal independence against the collective whole; and a financial base, such as private property, by which groups and individuals can realize that independence and demand a voice.

Inasmuch as socialism destroys these factors, it is in conflict with democracy. Any system which increases the number of power clusters — and liberal capitalism does this, is in agreement with it.

Mr. Stone can easily achieve his objectives through the system. If the workers want control of a company, they can purchase its stock. If democracy is non-existent in high schools, especially 'working-class' schools, and its establishment would be a sound idea, it requires only a simple reform — more enlightened administrators, or their removal.

The liberal-capitalistic-democratic system has proved itself extraordinarily adaptive. Poverty at one time threatened it. Now the majority of citizens are comparatively wealthy. Unions once provided a radical challenge, but they are now pillars of support.

Mr. Stone's ideas on education and the quality of life stem more from paranoia than genuine radicalism.

So be careful, Mr. Stone, like many other radicals, you may suddenly find yourself defused, or, like the unions, even co-opted.

Russell Deigan,
(III UC)

"You just don't belong in our school system"

By ART MOSES

Peter Kormos is an intelligent, soft-spoken boy of 16 who last spring was elected president of his high school student council. As president Peter wanted to give his fellow students freedom to run activities without interference from the principal.

Peter has been barred from Welland's Eastdale Secondary School since October. The Department of Education says it is up to the principal and the local board to readmit him, while the principal says it is up to the department.

Meanwhile Peter Kormos can't go to school at all.

The situation at Eastdale is probably not much different from that at many Ontario high schools. The student council is entirely subject to the principal of the school.

The student council constitution includes provisions such as:

- all candidates shall be approved by the principal
- all meetings will take place after consultations with the principal
- all expenditures of over $30 must receive the principal's written approval
- all subsidiary organizations must be approved by the principal.
- all council activities are subject to the direction of the principal
- the principal is the honorary president of the council.

The constitution was prepared several years ago by Glen Francis when he took over the job of principal.

Peter Kormos ran for student council president last spring on a platform of ending the principal's interference in student activities. A key plank in his election was the elimination of a proctor system which gave some senior students special privileges over others.

Kormos polled about 75 per cent of the vote. He speculates the principal let him run in the first place because "both my opponents were sports types and he figured I was relatively unpopular."

Kormos says he tried to discuss his policies with Principal Francis in September, but was given the cold shoulder.

When Francis discovered Kormos was listed as a Welland member of the province-wide High School Union of Students, he told Kormos he could not remain as student council president.

CALLS STRIKE

Fed up, continually frustrated by the principal's opposition, Kormos decided on drastic action. He called a student strike and on Oct. 15 some 35 or 40 students walked out to protest the oppressive rules dealing with student government.

"We wanted to dramatize the situation, to get the community to see what was going on." The students demanded Francis consider a basic restructuring of student government.

At the most, 150 of the 900 students at Eastdale participated in the strike. Francis threatened all participants with loss of recommendations and forbade strikers to participate in extra-curricular activities, but Kormos says "most of the kids were behind us and gave moral support."

"Throughout the strike Francis put himself into seclusion and refused to talk to the press or to teachers.

On Friday Oct. 18 the Welland School Board intervened.

"They promised the striking students that if they returned to classes there would be no suspensions and that they would be treated only as truants, that is they would get detentions to catch up on the work they had missed," explained Kormos.

The students returned to classes that day.

SUSPENDS STRIKERS

On the following Monday Francis began suspending the strikers, beginning with Grade 9 and working up to the higher grades. Kormos says that in all around 35 were suspended for periods of 7 to 10 days.

Francis had yet to reach the grade 12 students on his suspension list, when Kormos appeared on a St. Catharines radio station to discuss the situation. He, therefore, had to miss school that afternoon.

On Wednesday when he returned to school he was asked for a note from his parents explaining his absence. But Kormos had left his parents several months earlier and was residing at the home of Rev. Robert Wright, who was not his legal guardian.

This situation apparently made little difference to the administration of Eastdale. Vice-principal John Herman told Peter to leave the school until he had a note from his parents. Two days later Kormos received notice of his suspension for failure to bring a note.

On Monday Oct. 28, Kormos returned to school and told Francis why it was impossible for him to bring a note. He then went to class. The vice-principal followed him and ordered him to leave. Kormos refused. The vice-principal then called the police and two officers arrived and escorted Kormos from the school. While leaving he was handed a second suspension for "constant opposition to authority".

ARRESTED

The next day Kormos returned to classes. His home room teacher refused to report his presence to the Principal, but at his first class Herman caught him and again called the police. This time Peter Kormos was arrested for assault by trespassing, which involved a penalty of up to 2 years imprisonment.

Kormos pleaded not guilty on both the assault and trespassing charges.

He was acquitted on the assault charge in January and a week later the Crown dropped the trespassing charge. According to Kormos, Principal Francis told him that he had asked that it be dropped.

Cleared of all charges, Kormos still was suspended from school. On Jan. 28 Francis told him that to be re-admitted he would have to get the approval of the Deputy Minister of Education, James McCarthy.

"Francis told me that McCarthy didn't think I should be in a high school, and that he also didn't think I should come back," says Kormos.

"But Francis offered me a condition for my return — I must arrive at school no earlier than 8:55 a.m. and leave no later than 3:45 p.m. dismissal time. I was willing to accept these conditions because I wanted to get my Grade 12. But according to Francis the whole thing hinged on getting the permission of the Deputy Minister."

Francis offered to leave Kormos the texts he would need to catch up on work missed but when Kormos returned to school the next day he was told that since no texts had been found in his locker he could not get new ones until they were returned.

"But my old texts were in my locker when I was arrested and should have been there when my locker was cleaned out. A number of my personal things have also disappeared."

DOESN'T WANT HIM BACK

Obviously Glen Francis doesn't want Peter Kormos back in his school. The boy has been out of school for 4 months. He recently applied for an Ontario Government Correspondence course and was informed that no one under suspension from a high school is permitted to take an Ontario Government correspondence course.

I called the Deputy Minister's Office and spoke about the Kormos case with Tom Campbell, Executive Assistant to the Deputy Minister. Did Glen Francis ever write to his office; does the Deputy Minister have the power to say who shall be expelled; or re-admitted; doesn't the principal, himself, have the authority to readmit Peter Kormos?

What I received from Executive Assistant Campbell was a lecture in the virtues of a decentralized school system:

"All power in such matters rests with the local School Boards. These Boards have the power to expel and readmit and the system runs pretty smoothly. If the Department intervenes in such matters then decentralization becomes a myth. I couldn't comment on this particular case, other than to say it is unwise for the government to intervene in the jurisdictions of local school boards. Why didn't you talk to the principal before coming to us?"

If this is so, then how can Principal Francis use Departmental approval as the condition for Peter Kormos' return to school.

According to Francis, "That's one story I'm not giving out. If you're going to get any information it'll have to come from the school board. If the Board will give it out, that's fine, but you'll not get anything from me. Thank-you, good day."

"SPEAK TO THE BOARD"

"Speak to the Board" Francis had said. But the conversation with the gentlemen who preside over education in Welland proved more exasperating than the futile episode with Francis.

Mr. McLeod, the Director of the Welland School Board informed me that he wasn't with the Board when the Kormos case came up, as he had just taken over a month ago.

"All I know is what I read in the papers but I imagine that the boy was the author of his own problems."

McLeod turned me over to someone he thought might know about Kormos.

"I know nothing about it," the next man said, "I'm only in the business office . . . No, I don't know of anyone in the Board office who would know about it as we've just gone through a reorganization of school districts and all our staff is new."

He assured me that the new Board would be briefed on the issue by Principal Francis and that Kormos would have no more problems with the new Board than he had with the new.

Rev. Robert Wright, a United Church minister, with whom Kormos has been living since October, told me last week that he understands Francis has written a letter to Peter's parents informing them that he is asking to have Peter expelled permanently.

"The whole situation has developed into a personality clash between two strong individuals. The Principal seems to believe that a school must be run like a military academy and that he has the authority to do it. The important thing is that the community, wanting its school run efficiently, generally agrees."

"Many teachers have left Eastdale since Francis took over," added Wright.

"Peter is an extremely bright individual. He doesn't base his beliefs on any superficial knowledge; he is a very deep thinker: The educational system is obviously not designed for him."

CHICAGO: analysis of a sit-in that failed

By TIM INKSTER

Students at the University of Chicago ended a 15-day sit-in when they peacefully walked out of their administration building Friday, Feb. 14. They left without winning any of their demands, admitting their defeat.

"There have been few strides toward student power of any kind," they admitted on leaving, possibly to face disciplinary action.

Why did the sit-in fail? The confrontation began in early January, when the student paper revealed that a radical sociologist and self-avowed Marxist assistant professor Marlene Dixon, would not be rehired.

Students in Human Development courses, which she taught, called a meeting, attended by members of various campus political action groups — the local chapter of the National Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), members of a campus Maoist group, and a feminist group. They all picketed the administration building Jan. 10.

GRAY COMMITTEE ESTABLISHED

Under student pressure the dean of the social sciences division set up a committee headed by Prof. Hannah Gray. To review the decision not to rehire Marlene Dixon and make "appropriate" recommendations.

It should be made clear at this point that the sides in the issue were not students and faculty against the administration, but rather, students versus the senior faculty. The Chicago administration is little face of students the fact that the faculty runs this place," said the Maroon, the usually moderate campus newspaper.

The Gray Committee was clearly unacceptable to students — they answered with a two hour sit-in in the social science dean's office, and issued two demands: that Marlene Dixon be rehired with a joint appointment in sociology and human development; and

- that students be given an equal voice with the faculty in decisions regarding the hiring and firing of personnel.

University president E. H. Levi said he would wait for the committee's report and rejected the second demand.

SIT-IN BEGINS

On Jan. 30, about 400 students marched into the administration building and succeeded in gaining control of it. Their original demands escalated with these additions:

- that university employees receive full compensation for lost work-time as a result of the sit-in;
- that amnesty be granted to all participants.

Even in the excitement of the take-over, the students were split between those led by SDS, who want a radical university interested in social and human values as well as intellectual ones; and student power advocates who, while basically satisfied with the university's emphasis, want a greater share in the decision-making.

The first group wanted Mrs. Dixon rehired, and, in line with SDS' long range goal of a worker-student alliance, compensation for university employees.

World, black and working class students.

It was as if no one could agree on just why they were in the ad building, so each faction put forward its own demands to add to everyone else's. Some are clearly SDS demands, with their social interest, and long range goal of a worker-student alliance; some feminist, and some student power (those interested in a greater voice in the present system). The original issue, the firing of Marlene Dixon, had been forgotten in a vain and blatant attempt to boost lagging support.

NO GAINS

The administration re-matched obstinate. On Feb. 4, the Council of the Senate reaffirmed it would not bargain under pressure. On Feb. 7, the administration renewed its commando raids to hand out summonses.

The ever-present possibility that the administration would call in the police to clear the building, luckily, was never realized, although reading about the 900 National Guardsmen called in to restore order at the nearby University of Wisconsin did little to calm tensions.

Squad cars, continued to patrol the main streets around the Chicago campus at three-minute intervals. That situation is normal, however, due to U of C's status as a large employer and land-owner precariously located in the middle of a large black ghetto.

General student interest in the sit-in was waning — partly because it was more than a week old and the administration still showed no signs of compromise, partly because the new demands were viewed as too radical and unrealistic and partly because the occupation prevented the distribution of checks from the bursar's at the time the vote was taken, there were only 30 or 40 people left anyway.

True to SDS dogma, however, there were no leaders and the majority always ruled. In fact, no one person ever gave out more than one press release or did more than one interview throughout the demonstration. In principle, that concept works fine, but in this case, it only furthered the chaos with each person presenting his own view of the situation.

SIT-IN FAILS

On Feb. 11, the committee of the Council of the Senate reaffirmed that the faculty would retain all power of hiring-firing; the radicals tried to respond with a lecture strike, but met with widespread apathy and the strike failed.

The Gray Committee report, published the next day, charged that Mrs. Dixon's research was not up to the university's high standards, but main interest. She is more inclined to teaching and closer contact with her students; whereas the University of Chicago with 2,000 undergrads and 6,000 grads, sees itself as a research institute. In any case, Mrs. Dixon refused the offer.

On Feb. 14, faced with student apathy and possible antagonism, the radicals voted to leave the ad building; but spent eight hours cleaning it up before leaving. During the cleanup period, photographers for the Chicago press took pictures of piles of garbage students had swept together to remove as "typical examples of the mess they left in the building".

SIT-IN ENDS

In the closing speech, SDS leader Howie Machtinger said: "As losers in this specific action, we naturally leave unhappy. . . . But we also leave educated to a set of principles which we in the building have come to value together and which will form the basis for faculty be given equal power in hiring and firing of faculty; in the final statement, however, Machtinger said: "we voted to drop the demand because we didn't want a share in formulating the policies of a radical university; rather, we wanted to attack the university's racism."

All of which just shows that SDS no longer felt the need for an alliance with the student power movement. What about within SDS? I talked to John Fox, another of the more vocal SDS members, and asked him if he wasn't scared of the draft now that he had been suspended. He said: "Of course I'll get drafted, but that doesn't matter. The Revolution is all that counts." Then I asked who would get the power after a successful worker-student revolution. He didn't know. The sit-in is over, and it did nothing; but there is a matter of 23 suspended students to clear up. The demonstrators

BERKELEY: police power reigns in California

— "How I'd just love to be in Berkeley right now, to roll in that mud, frolic in that sky of funky revolution, to breathe its heady fumes. . ."

— Eldridge Cleaver

From the top of the Student Union Building at Berkeley, you can see all of San Francisco harbor, the Golden Gate Bridge, the beautiful hills and the shining ocean. Walk over to the next window and you see blue-overalled Alameda County Sheriff's Deputies wearing riot helmets, carrying long billy clubs and the reek of stink bombs and tear gas hovers in the air.

A roar floats up from the crowd of about 1,000. Three cops break out of their line and a student, his long hair flying out behind, bounds like a rabbit, cracking the line of pickets and yells "pigs!" all the way past Sather Gate into Sprout Plaza.

The cops gallop after him their billies clenched, the clatter of hundreds of footsteps behind them as the wave of people surges through the gate. The rest of the cops run with the students.

Shrieks of "Sooo-ie, soooie." "On strike-Shut It Down" from the throngs as the student is caught on the steps, the billy inserted between his legs and he is lifted and carried away.

The crowd surges and tight-tens; students stop marching and confront the patrolmen with a solid line. The cops grab their sticks, hold them out in front and charge; the line parts; some strikers fall in the melee and the police have cleared the plaza.

Incidents like this happen every day at Berkeley ever since the Third World Liberation Front called a strike five weeks ago to back demands for an "Ethnic College", a more comprehensive Black Studies Department and the hiring of more Third World personnel.

In this huge campus of 27,000 students, one of the biggest in the US, the strike of even 1,000 students creates nary a drop in the ocean. That was until a week and a half ago.

On Thursday, Feb. 13, the American Federation of Teachers (AFT) was conducting a peaceful informational picket line (the union was not on strike at that time). They kept themselves apart from the main picket line of about 300 students. Then the cops attacked.

They cleared the plaza area of the main core of strikers. Then they surrounded the union line. The pickets continued to march inside the police line. They were arrested and carried away.

The next Tuesday, the union voted to go on strike. This left most of the undergraduates without teaching assistants and demonstrators. The strike was for real now.

Throughout the week, minor incidents occurred. Students were arrested. Windows were broken. The Daily Californian the student newspaper, ran editorials decrying police actions but also condemning striking students for their vandalism.

"We will seize power," says Jim Nabor, right, leader of the Third World Liberation Movement.

A PURPLE FLOWER

At 3:30 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 20, a running student tossed a purple flower at one of the officers standing in front of Sproul Hall. He was grabbed, clubbed and carried off.

The student crowd, which had been building up from minor incidents all day, surged toward the police and the officers fired their tear gas canisters. Several of the canisters were picked up and hurled back at the police line.

Driven by clouds of gas into the streets of Berkeley, the students raced down Telegraph Avenue for a block, then search was not up to the university's high standards, but felt that a one year terminal extension should be granted to give her time to find another job. The extension, although blown up by the Chicago press to show the benevolent administration at its best, is actually standard policy.

In keeping with her Marxist philosophy, Mrs. Dixon admitted that research is not her which will form the basis for an ongoing and long-range struggle, a struggle which we identify with those going on all over the country from San Francisco State to New York's City College. We consider their fight to be one with ours.

This is nonsense, since even the Chicago radicals don't agree: one of the first two demands was that students and campus observers, not a few of whom were reporters. Before the gas attack Houchins said, "somebody threw something."

Asked if it had been the flow-er, he replied, "What it was, I don't know."

By evening, water tank trucks were spraying the pavement, clearing the acid, clinging gas from the streets, with the echoes of "On Strike, we'll be back," still dying down as students left for another day. On Friday, Governor Ronald Reagan and the Board of Regents of the University of California adopted a new code ordering administrators to suspend any student disrupting the campus with any form of violence, threats, destruction of property or blocking access to classes.

University president Charles J. Hitch attempted to amend the resolution so that he could have time to institute his own rules, but he was voted down. Outside of University Hall, where the regents met, milled 3,000 students. The Governor Guard and a contingent of 1,000 soldiers are on alert near Berkeley.

And that's the way the situation stands at Berkeley now. As one student said, "I don't support all of the methods used by the Third World Liberation Front, but I'll be damned if I'm going to go to classes with all those pigs on campus."

Conn Hallinan, president of American Teacher's Federation Local 1570 (Teaching Assistants) said, "We're fighting the most powerful corporation in California, and we've got to use every weapon we've got.

His assertion was widely disputed by students and by

"It's our feeling that our membership can't teach under these conditions." He agreed that the strike could hurt undergraduates whose classes are interrupted, but added: "When you strike, people get hurt, and there's nothing you can do about it."

So far, no buildings have been occupied. Many students agree that this would be bad policy, because they would simply be thrown out. "But if you show the students what the police are really like, if you keep up the picket line and show who really runs this university, it's bound to blow," said one senior in political sci-

The people in San Francisco and Berkeley talk continually of the student revolution. Many condemn it, but the hate for the cops is even greater. One Episcopalian priest, who used to be a chaplain at Berkeley and now has a small church in suburban Oakland says, "They don't realize that by bringing the cops in, they're going to precipitate even faster."

And the nervousness persists. People talk in frightened tones of the university unrest, especially because it has hit so many of the colleges and universities in the San Francisco Bay area — Berkeley, Stanford, San Francisco State College.

"Yep, we're havin' lots of trouble with those damned students," said one San Francisco policeman as he mounted his quarter horse in Golden Gate Park. "Now we have to go out to a high school. Seems as if they're starting to riot there."

All the people around tasked their tongues and kept walking.

Satisfied Windsor students end sit-in

WINDSOR (CUP) — Students occupying a University of Windsor building for 10 days went home peacefully last Thursday, claiming victory over administration President J. F. Leddy.

The occupation, sparked by the dismissal of theology Prof. William Kelly, involved some 150 students using Kelly's case to press student power demands on the administration.

Thursday, Leddy brought the tedious vigil to an end with an apparently satisfactory response to the occupier's demands.

• Absolute parity on university committees was refused, but Leddy promised to recommend 25 per cent student representation to a special committee on university government. He also said he would propose the addition of three students to the government committee, raising its size to 11.

• Regarding openness in the university Leddy noted that senate meetings have been open for some time and promised to suggest to the board of governors that it consider opening its meetings.

• No reprisals will be taken against the occupiers.

• Leddy pledged to accept any recommendation the faculty association makes to resolve the Kelly affair. The students had pressed for an investigation into the circumstances surrounding Kelly's dismissal but the faculty, unable to decide what to do, has thrown the matter to its own executive for further study.

Leddy's statement worked out during negotiations with representatives of the occupation forces, came 24 hours after the student body backed the occupation demands by referendum.

Students voted to endorse the demands 1,333-1,055 but rejected a student strike should negotiations break down by a count of 1,579-847.

The student demands included: full parity on all university committees, an offer of reinstatement to Kelly, open meetings of all university committees, and amnesty for the occupiers.

Kelly, who joined the university's Theology Department last fall only to find out in January that he would not be rehired, said Thursday he hoped a committee could be established to investigate his dismissal.

Theology Chairman Rev. Eugene Malley accused Kelly, a Roman Catholic layman, of "causing tension in the department" because he didn't understand its ideals—apparently a dispute over doctrine. Kelly has been called an ultra-liberal theologian, Malley a conservative.

In the ensuing dispute and occupation, other members of the Theology Department argued the decision openly, some joined the occupation.

Rev. Vernon McEagern, United Church chaplain and a part-time lecturer charged several days ago that the decision to drop Kelly came from Malley alone, not the Department.

But the Theology Department issued a statement supporting Malley by an eight to two margin.

"Under Attack" comes to U of T

The television show Under Attack is coming to Convocation Hall Tuesday and Wednesday.

Two separate shows will be taped back-to-back on each night for a total of four shows.

The first guest on the show is Nguyen Hoan, Councillor on Political Affairs from South Vietnam in Washington.

He will be trying to defend the war in Vietnam against a student panel made up of Harry Kopyto, president of the Independent Socialist club, Tim Walsh from the Communist Club and Hal White, a first year philosophy student.

Poet Irving Layton, will face an as yet unchosen panel Tuesday night.

On Wednesday the guests will be Rocky Jones, Halifax Black Power advocate, and Montreal Mayor Jean Drapeau.

Rocky Jones will face Howard Goldblatt (IV UC), Carmen Bailey, Ryerson journalism student, and Mike Hammond doctoral student Political Science.

Jean Drapeau confronts Doug Lash (IV Trin), Dave MacKinnon and Bill Charlton from (I Law).

Tickets for the shows will be given out free at the SAC office and at the door at Convocation Hall.

Grad council recommends more staff-student decision making

Graduate students can look forward to committee-based decision making in departmental matters, if departments follow up recommendations of last week's graduate council meeting.

The council, composed of 24 faculty, eight administrators, and four student assessors, adopted a three-part motion made by Dean Ernest Sirluck and amended by the student assessors:

That the council strongly recommend that each department, institute, or centre in the graduate field:

• encourage the establishment of a society or union in the department made up of graduate students enrolled, and, if possible, provide it funds.

• establish an equal-ratio staff-student committee to make recommendations to the chairman of the department on departmental matters of common concern.

• establish a system of individual faculty advisors for each graduate student.

Graduate Student Union President John Winter supported the motion.

"Before, people who wanted staff-student committees were regarded as troublemakers. The council has given them legitimacy," he said.

"This motion has got a lot of political dynamite in it," he added. "It could be quite innocuous, but everything depends upon the definition of 'common concern'. I would define common concern of the departments as the departmental budget and some say in hiring of professors."

Students should be consulted on what staff are being brought into the departments, says Winter, but he does not support student participation in firing decisions.

Toronto Student Movement leader Andy Wernick (SGS) condemned Dean Sirluck's motion as "a half hearted attempt at co-optation."

"But it's too late now," he laughed, "it's too late."

"The motion is probably a political ploy by Sirluck in his play for the U of T Presidency," he added.

CUS keeps three more

OTTAWA (CUP) — The headcount in the recent string of referendums for the Canadian Union of Students continued last week when three more schools — St. Thomas University in Fredericton, Laurentian University in Sudbury, and Lakehead University in (where else?) the Lakehead — voted to remain in the union.

The vote at St. Thomas went 256-146 in favor of CUS, with a 70 per cent turnout.

At Laurentian, students voted 511-399 to remain in the union. Some 63 per cent of the 1,531 students voted there.

As for the Lakehead, some 46 per cent of the 2,000 students on campus came down 507-408 in favour of the union.

These results seem to show that smaller campuses see a real need for nation-wide links, not so obvious to students at larger institutions.

In referendums held in the past month CUS has lost eight large campuses — U of Saskatchewan, U of Victoria, Queen's, U of Winnipeg, U of Alberta, U of Calgary, St. Mary's (Halifax), and even Waterloo, home of CUS president Peter Warrian, have all rejected CUS.

In contrast, two small campuses have voted to remain in the union. Those were Glendon and King's College, Halifax. One campus — Mt. St. Vincent in Halifax — has seen fit to join. But the flight of the big campuses has been a blow to CUS.

Although CUS has made no statement concerning the recent results, it is obvious that the drastic reduction in its source of revenues will cause somewhat of a financial pinch in the near future.

VEEDEP: students helping to create an inner-city community

"Cabbagetown children do not have to be paranoid to believe that everything is against them. Just about everything is."

This is the judgement of Ronald Weihs, a fourth-year English student at Vic who spent last summer learning all he could about Toronto's version of the North American slum.

Ronald is a member of one of the most ambitious projects ever undertaken by the students of this university: the Varsity Downtown Education Project.

What is 'Veedep', as those who are familiar with the organization call it?

Right now, the project consists of 20 U of T students distinguishable from the other 23,000 only by their common experience of four months in the inner city.

In the summer of 1968, they trained themselves by workshops, seminars, discussions, visits to schools and social agencies, followed by six weeks working with children. In May, they will return to the streets with a philosophy of community oriented action translated into their own program.

V.D.E.P. plans call for the establishment of two houses, one in each of the two areas they are familiar with, West Central Toronto and Cabbagetown. Using these houses as bases, they plan, in the words of Weihs, "to meet the people within a clearly established boundary and to make it clear that we are there to help them do what they want to do."

The V.D.E.P. program, in a different form, was initiated by the Students' Administrative Council last year in imitation of an 'upward-bound' project operated by Yale University.

By the Yale model, inner city high school students selected for their potential as leaders were to spend a number of weeks living in unoccupied university residences during the summer months. Here, they would take part in a 'free' educational program designed and run with the help of university students.

SAC appointed as director of V.D.E.P. the person who was most critical of these plans, George Martell, a former social worker with experience in downtown educational programs, who had been called in as a consultant.

Mr. Martell, who is now running a free school in downtown Toronto, felt the 'upward-bound' model would be "pretty unrealistic in providing an educational environment at all pertinent to the needs of slum children."

Program organizers would be faced with the problem of protecting university property, he argued, and if they wanted to work with the most responsive members of the slum community, they were not likely to find them in the high schools. Such individuals would have already dropped out.

Under the sponsorship of SAC, the Varsity Fund, the Atkinson Foundation, and a number of corporations including chartered banks, Bell Telephone, and Southam Press, V.D.E.P. came to life last Spring with 20 students working under the leadership of George Martell. In mid-July, the group assumed complete responsibility for itself.

"It was very important for me to let V.D.E.P. form its own direction after a short orientation period," Mr. Martell explains.

"All I did was set up a framework ... a one month series of workshops followed by situations in which the workshop experience could be utilized. I then resigned and

STAY WITH A FAMILY IN EUROPE THIS SUMMER

The Living Language Program offers students a unique holiday experience and an "in-depth" perspective of Europe that is simply not available by any other mode of travel.

Detailed booklet from Leon Fisher, 222-6358 or 222-6348. Also, the famous Freelancing Thru Europe economy trip now available again for a limited number of students.

A group of children play in Kensington.

the group has determined its own course since this time. In fact they have moved ahead in deciding to place themselves in more open, less protective situations."

Three weeks of the orientation period were spent on workshops in creative drama, art, and writing. This kind of activity provides the child from a sub-culture community with a chance to gain the self-confidence that must precede any kind of learning.

This was followed by visits to Everdale Place, the free-school situated outside of Toronto, and to inner city schools where V.D.E.P. members could observe both the children they would be working with and the teaching methods these children were accustomed to.

In his visit to Duke of York Public School, Ronald Weihs was particularly impressed by the performance of the children in Don Kennedy's opportunity class.

But he was disillusioned by an incident that pointed out to him the harsh realities of the world outside the school:

"I learned that the four teenage boys slouching just outside the schoolyard were waiting to beat up three of our pre-teenage girls. Within the class, the children were learning to get along without fighting — but what was the use of this outside the school?"

The most concentrated and demanding part of last summer's program was the six weeks spent with the children. V.D.E.P. split into two groups of 10, working out of Central Neighborhood House in Cabbagetown and St. Christopher House in the western sector.

Although these areas are both low-income residential neighborhoods, they are profoundly different communities. The former is predominantly composed of indigenous poor, many from eastern Canada and the latter, a European immigrant community.

Phyllis Axler, in third-year sociology at New College, worked in the west, in the Kensington area. She established contact with a group of children and led them in recreational activities.

In her report on the summer, she described the difficulties of making the first contact:

"Kensington Place and Fitzroy Terrace came as quite a surprise to me, the first time I went there," she explains.

"Although I had walked up and down Kensington Avenue several times, I never knew that these two rows of houses existed. There are about 20 families living there ... all Portuguese except for one French Canadian and one Jewish family.

"The first time we went to tell the mothers about our program, none of the women we approached could speak English. But we found a young girl to act as interpreter.

"Their response was very positive when we explained that the program would take place right in front of their houses under their eyes, that it was free, and that they didn't have to give their names."

Carolyn Cooper was doing the same kind of thing in the east end. She describes the hunger for affection the children displayed:

"The indiscriminate nature of their affection was disturbing to me. Children who were strangers to me would leap into my lap and fiercely demand cuddling at one moment only to run off and stare blankly at me from then on."

Larry Ware, who worked in the west, describes the culture gap between Toronto's dominant and minority communities in very simple and explicit terms: In his area the baseball diamonds went unused. The children prefer to play soccer.

The experiences of the six weeks on the streets were followed up by a period of assessment. Looking back on their experiences, members of the group often express common conclusions.

Many of them feel that the kind of free educational programs offered by Everdale Place or by A.S. Neill's Summerhill are not directly applicable to the slum environment. Here, the child's insecurity, a result of a permissive upbringing, leaves him too alienated to be able to respond immediately to a self-directed plan for learning.

Some feel that there is a great necessity for continuity in their work. Without a program sustained to some extent year-round, they are likely to nullify any positive effects by abandoning relationships built up carefully over the summer period. V.D.E.P. requires a commitment of more than one summer.

And they are unanimous in their feeling that recreational activities alone are completely ineffective in providing long-term benefits to the community.

In these weeks of discussion in August, the group formulated the plan of working from two centrally located houses in the east and in the west.

Weihs expresses the kind of reasoning that went into their decision:

"There are two factors keeping Cabbagetown people in a cycle of demoralization," he says. "Their own lack of inner resources and the influence of the community."

"In order to break the cycle, the individual must gain self-confidence and respect for his own ideas. To develop these he must be given respect, friendship, and an opportunity to make decisions and carry them out successfully."

V.D.E.P. didn't go underground this winter — everyone in the group has kept in contact with the downtown communities.

Larry Ware lives in Kensington and young Dismas still knocks on his door every morning. Many of them spend an afternoon a week at Central Neighborhood House or St. Christopher House.

And if you find yourself at the corner of Dundas and Jarvis on a cold and windy night, you can always drop in to V.D.E.P. house number nine. It stands at the top of George Street behind a few square yards of mud, inhabited by a group of individuals who are waiting for spring.

asks federated colleges to define their role at U of T

By MARY BASTEDO

The federated church colleges — Victoria, Trinity and St. Mike's — were asked to define and defend themselves before the Commission on University Government last week.

The CUG members interrogating the president and students' council president of each college seemed to be weighing in the back of their minds the Macpherson Report recommendations that the departments at the federated colleges be merged and their faculty pooled and paid by the University, and that the colleges be used primarily for first and second year undergraduate teaching.

"If the Macpherson proposals were implemented, we would no longer play a significant role in the academic community," said Victoria College President A. B. B. Moore. "We'd be doing joe jobs instead of being at the heart of the community."

"It ignores the historical dimension of the federated system and the type of tradition and ethos at each one."

"If the college departments were to disappear an essential aspect of the college system would be lost," said

Rev. D. Owen, Provost of Trinity College.

St. Mike's President J. M. Kelly agreed. "We must have academic staff that belong to the college and are not simply assigned to it," he said.

"CUG is under pressure to change a system that is irresponsible to the needs of faculty and students," said Derek Allen, (IV Trin). "The college is in a unique position to come to terms with exactly this pressure."

CUG member D'Arcy Martin said instead of asking whether the college system was an anachronism they should be asking how they could extend the idea of the college system.

Victoria College Union President, Sandy Black, thought more should be done to enrich the colleges' character and get more disciplines into the colleges.

"The academic profile of the college pales a little because of the present college categorization of subjects," she said.

"I am not denying that church affiliation does create a kind of ethos, but the texture is not rich enough."

Derek Allen agreed. "The key problem is that students are not taught by their colleges," he said.

He suggested several key departments be decentralized so that the teaching be done in the colleges.

The idea, which CUG has been contemplating of a one-tiered structure to replace the Senate and the Board of Governors, would also affect the colleges, which are financially but not academically self-governing.

They are penalized for their church affiliation in that 50 per cent of their provincial grant is cut.

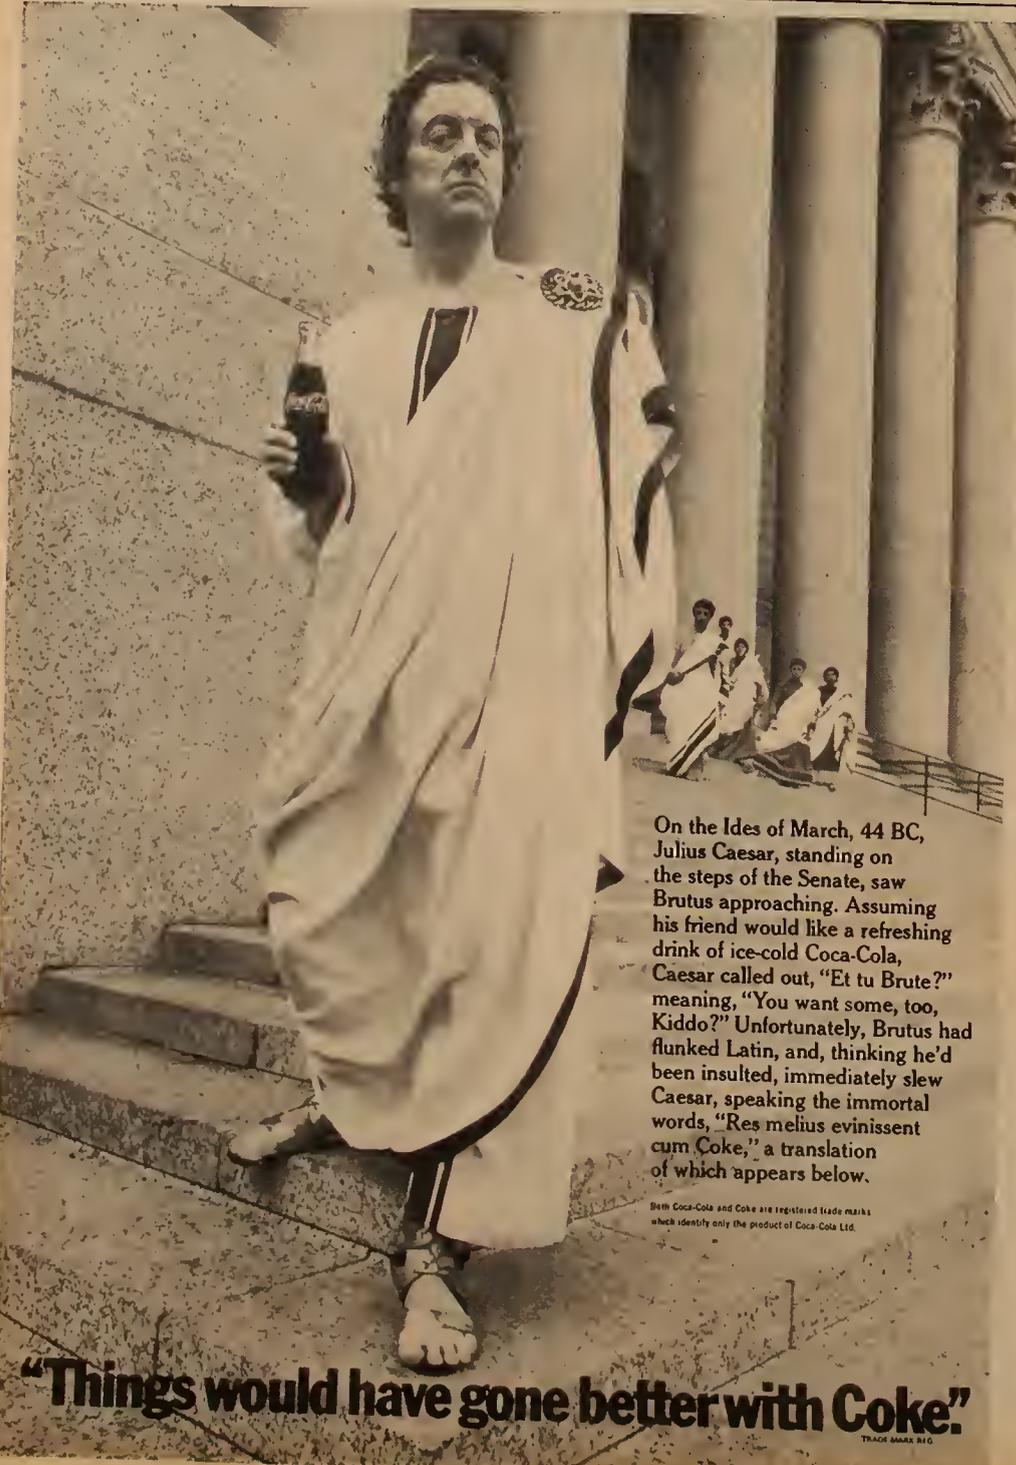

Implementation of the Allen Report, which was an academic decision, will have financial implications for the colleges.

"The colleges might well be brought into the structure where budgets are being planned," said Rev. Kelly.

We can't just leave it to good-will," he added. "It must be a matter of right, not privilege."

President Moore echoed his desire to be "written into the structure of the University."

"We are not isolationists in any sense," he added. "The stronger we are the stronger will be the University of Toronto."

On the Ides of March, 44 BC, Julius Caesar, standing on the steps of the Senate, saw Brutus approaching. Assuming his friend would like a refreshing drink of ice-cold Coca-Cola, Caesar called out, "Et tu Brute?" meaning, "You want some, too, Kiddo?" Unfortunately, Brutus had flunked Latin, and, thinking he'd been insulted, immediately slew Caesar, speaking the immortal words, "Res melius evinissent cum Coke," a translation of which appears below.

Both Coca-Cola and Coke are registered trade marks which identify only the product of Coca-Cola Ltd.

GYMNASTICS

By ARTHUR STEIN

GUELPH. For the third season in a row, University of Toronto's Gymnastics Team has finished behind L'Universite de Montreal in the OQAA championships.

In spite of the loss of two-time individual champion Gilles Briere, Montreal captured the Caron trophy at Guelph on February 15 by their biggest margin yet — a fairly substantial 14 points. In contrast, Toronto was 3.25 points ahead of Queens who beat out newcomer Ottawa University by a scant 0.12 for third spot in the eight team competition.

The Montreal squad took the lead over Blues in team standings right from the start and went on to sweep all six events on the program with an amazing display of depth and consistency.

Indicative of their depth were the results of the rings event. Toronto gymnasts turned in an excellent performance, with Brian McVey, Al Forest, and John Kortright taking fourth, seventh and ninth places respectively in the 39-man field. But Montreal gymnasts took the three top spots with scores (out of ten) of 9.0, 8.0, and 8.0!

In the floor exercises, Blues' McVey led the field with 8.35 while Philip Michaelis finished a strong 11th with 6.85. The consistent Montrealers were bunched in 4th to 6th places, scoring 7.65, 7.50, and 7.45. In fact, the best three Montreal men finished in the top ten on every piece of apparatus.

In the individual competition, Brian McVey led the way for U of T with a fourth on rings, a third on the horizontal bar and a second on the side horse. He rounded out a fine day with gold medals in floor exercises and vaulting.

Unfortunately, a poor parallel bars routine hurt his chances as he was denied overall victory for the third successive year. Montreal's Gerard L'Allier, appearing in his first OQAA meet, captured the Werry cup with a 44.40-42.75 margin over McVey.

L'Allier was fourth in both vaulting and parallel bars, second in rings and first on horizontal bar and pommel horse. His routine on the latter apparatus was one of the finest seen in intercollegiate competition in the last three years.

Indicative of the Montreal strength was the fact that only McVey prevented a sweep of the top three individual placings. Besides first, third, and fourth, a U de M gymnast was also eighth to put four men in the top 10.

John Kortright was Varsity's number two man, taking 11th overall in an expanded and much improved 25 man field. He paced his performance by finishing ninth on the rings and eighth on the horizontal bar.

Al Forest, in his first OQAA championships, ran into some hard luck in the first two events, but bounced back for a seventh on the rings and a sixth on the parallels. His 33.0 point total was good for 14th spot.

Despite little practice time and painfully strained wrists, Alex Hamilton turned in some commendable work to finish 19th.

Overall, the long meet (it lasted from 11:00 AM to 5:00 PM) was a frustrating one for U of T gymnasts and coach Julio Roncon. They simply could not match the consistency of the talented Montrealers who showed that year-round practice and regular competition pay off. The U de M boys were in fine form that Saturday and show every sign of building a gymnastics dynasty which may well dominate the OQAA for years to come.

POMMEL PATER: Former U of T star and later coach Barry Brokner was one of the judges. Toronto will send its three top gymnasts to the Canadian Intercollegiate Championships. Brian McVey, John Kortright, and Al Forest will make the jaunt to McMaster March 8-9.

BOXING

The boxing Blues ("I've got those low-down boxing blues...") had a rough time at Royal Military College in Kingston Saturday, losing six of the ten bouts.

However Blues won the overall home-and-home series by a razor thin 10-9 margin.

The caddies, who had dropped 6 out of 9 at Hart House, put on a much stronger performance this time in no small way to the raucous support of 450 screaming partisans who packed the pad, as it were.

Varsity victors were Pat Goodwin (120 lb.), Sinid John (125 lb.), Bob Maton (150 lb.) and John Byrnes (Heavyweight). Maton's match was the best of the evening as he won a close, rugged decision from Dave Czop.

In an exhibition bout Toronto's John Nedelkovic defeated Jim Hayes of Kingston at 132 pounds.

There were no knockouts during the night, except for a few women present.

SAILORS

There will be a meeting in the Music Room, Hart House at 7:30 p.m. on Thursday, February 27th, to elect the Executive for 1969-1970. All members are requested to attend.

GRAPPLING

Despite high expectations, University of Toronto wrestlers could manage no better than a fifth place in the week-end's OQAA wrestling championships held at McGill.

University of Western Ontario won the team title, ending a two year reign by Guelph.

However, despite the general Varsity carnage, there were several fine, individual performances by our lads in blue.

Larry Barron emerged as champion of the 177 pound division while veteran Bill Allison, wrestling at 152 pounds instead of his normal 160, also came first in his category.

Ted Sauer surprised with a second place finish at 130 pounds while Dave Simms placed third among the boys at 145 pounds.

But shed a tear for poor Ernie Friedrich who was forced to wrestle at 191 pounds, 20 pounds over his normal grappling category. He managed to win his first bout but then drew Ed Millard of Guelph, who wrestled for Canada in the recent Olympics in Mexico City, Sigb.

Way back on the 15th results were a bit rosier for Blues. They whopped Waterloo 31-8 at Hart House. And the next day, a squad from U of T won the team title in the Metro Toronto Wrestling Championships. Ken White (125 lb.), Dave Simms (145 lb.), Bill Allison (163 lb.), and Larry Barron (180 lb.) were individual champs while Ernie Friedrich (remember him?) came third in Barron's division.

Mat coach Ron Murphy, perennial optimist, was not downhearted by his team's performance at McGill. "We'll have just about every back next year and we'll field a strong team," Murph predicted.

SQUASH

University of Toronto student Vic Harding done himself proud last Friday night as he won the Toronto and District 'B' Singles Tournament held at the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club.

Harding defeated Bob French in the final in straight sets, 15-12, 18-14 and 15-11.

Harding leads the U of T squash team into action this week-end at Waterloo for the OQAA squash championships. Blues will be seeking to supplant McGill as team titlists.

DRIBBLERS IN PLAYOFFS, PUCK BLUES WIN LEAGUE

BURTON'S 31 POINTS LEAD BLUES OVER MUSTANGS

by Vlod Povezka

Western Mustangs are probably wishing that former teammate Peter Burton hadn't tried so hard to impress them last Friday night in London. For the Varsity guard exploded for 31 points to lead basketball Blues to an amazing 105-76 victory.

That win, coupled with Varsity's 69-61 triumph over McMaster a week ago, and down 24 rebounds, blocking shots and scoring 26 points in the process. "If John played that well in every game, we'd be in first place", said coach John McManus.

Rounding out Varsity's scoring were Bruce Dempster and Larry Trafford with 12 points apiece, and Jay MacDonald with 10. Greg Poole and Dave McGuffin led Western with 16 points each.

The game provided a fitting climax to an erratic season. Coach McManus seems to have finally found the right combination of starters after many experiments, and the unit certainly gelled Friday night. Blues now look like the team to beat in the coming playoff.

DRIBBLES: Former Blue Jim Holowachuk, who led league scoring for the first few weeks,

PETER BURTON

McMaster's 90-81 loss to Windsor Saturday night, leaves Toronto, Western and Mac deadlocked in second place. Mustangs now travel to Hamilton tonight for the first game of the playoff. If Western wins, Blues play them in London Wednesday night; if Marauders win, the deciding game is at York on Wednesday evening at 8:15 p.m.

On Friday night, Blues treated Mustangs to an incredible second-half performance. Leading 38-31 at intermission, Blues returned to shoot an amazing 63 percent in the final twenty minutes and turned the game into a rout.

The game was easily Varsity's best performance of the season. And, John Hadden again proved that he is the league's best center when he plays up to potential. Hadden dominated both boards, taking

ICEMEN'S 4-4 DRAW WITH LAURENTIAN MAY BE OMEN FOR CIAU PLAYDOWNS

By PHIL BINGLEY

Two years ago this week, Varsity hockey Blues completed their home schedule when they played to a 4-4 draw with University of Montreal Carabins. Then, a few days later, Blues captured the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union championship by drubbing Laurentian University 16-2 Voyageurs in the title game in Edmonton.

Friday evening, Varsity finished this season's quota of regular season contests when they battled to a 4-4 tie with Laurentian at Varsity Arena. And, the CIAU playoffs are slated to open in Edmonton again beginning on March 6.

A good omen maybe. But there is more than hocus pocus to suggest that a repeat of Blues 1966-67 performance is possible. And, there are also a few barriers that must be overcome if coach Tom Watt and his players are even to make to the western series.

Blues played perhaps their best shinny of the schedule during the last week and a half as they came up with three solid efforts and one so-so performance. Last week-end they bombed McMaster and Montreal on successive nights by 18-2 and 9-1 respectively.

Wednesday, Blues did their thing before 4,800 patrons at Varsity when they whipped Waterloo Warriors 4-1 and clinched first place in the SIHL for the sixth straight year.

In these three contests, Blues simply outskated, outworked and generally outclassed each of their opponents. The first two games weren't even close as Varsity shooters ran amuck through, over and around any defences which Mac and Montreal attempted to muster.

Against Waterloo, Blues were full value for their three goal margin in demoting Warriors to their "always a bridesmaid" role for the third straight season. True, Waterloo played without their on-the-ice leader and top scorer Ron Robinson (he missed the game to attend his father's funeral) but Varsity was so far the superior team that even Robinson's presence would likely not have been enough to crack the tough Toronto protective shell.

Warrior attackers were squeezed out by a combination of backchecking Varsity forwards and a defence which moved out aggressively in front of netminder Adrian Watson. When this didn't work, Watson cut the enemy's water off with several brilliant saves and the Warrior waffling was complete.

Paul Laurent came through as he has so many times this season in big games to lead the home team offensively. He scored Blues' third goal and set up the other three. Paul McCann counted the winner on a perfect slapshot from 40 feet out and Steve Monteith and Ward Passi, both playing their final SIHL regular season games at the Bloor Street arena, fittingly added Blues' other two markers.

Friday, Varsity was far from sharp in coming from behind to gain the tie with Laurentian on John Wright's third period marker. The winner of the SIHL will meet Voyageurs in the first round of the CIAU playdowns and whoever it may be will have their hands full.

Steve Monteith, Ward Passi and Bill L'Heureux had Blues other goals while Ron Dus-siaume, Ray Lamont, Jim Ferguson and Doug Forrester replied for Laurentian.

In the future, Blues will face Carlton University in the first round of the SIHL playoffs this Friday night. If they survive that match, they will move into the Saturday night (8 p.m.) final against the winner of the Waterloo-Laval half-final.

Since Warriors should eliminate Laval and Blues should do the same for Carlton, the final promises to be a classic. Warriors are superb shinny unit, one which is far from convinced that Blues are the best team in the league. Blues, l'autre main, are capable of beating anything on skates at the intercollegiate level in Canada when they're right.

Come Saturday night, the final ballot will be in. It should be damn interesting. NOTES . . . Steve Monteith scored his 100th SIHL goal in the first period of the McMaster game when he beat Marlin netminder Glen Bayliss with a 30 foot wrist shot. . . . Gord Cunningham who suffered a bruised back in the Waterloo game will be ready to go for the Friday's playoff game with Carlton.

Young Socialists run for SAC posts

The Young Socialist Forum, a Trotskyite organization on campus, is running a slate of candidates in the upcoming elections for the Students' Administrative Council. The U of T YSF Chairman Harry Kopyto (II Law) is running for the SAC presidency, and YSF member Ellie Kirzner (III UC), a sociology student, is his vice-presidential running mate. Miss Kirzner is also an executive member of the committee to End the War in Vietnam.

This is the first year in SAC history that any campus political club has run candidates in an election. And it is the first year a candidate has run with an open and direct platform of socialism.

"We want to make the U of T part of the international student movement," Kopyto told The Varsity last night. We want SAC to reach students through mass meetings, smaller meetings, leafletting.

"The university is a place where students should be educated over social issues.

"This year SAC has been very isolated from students," he said.

"SAC did not have the sustained activity over issues," said Miss Kirzner. "There have been too many one-shot affairs such as the demonstration over universal accessibility to education. Radicals will not be isolated from the student body if there is a continuous educational campaign."

Both Kopyto and Miss Kirzner are members of the Toronto Student Movement but are not in total agreement with

Undergrads to have limited use of Research Library

When completed in 1972 this is what the $41,000,000 Humanities and Social Sciences Research Library will look like to a bird flying west across St. George St. At the left is the Rare Books library, at the right the School of Library Science, and in the middle the 14-storey library itself.

Rise up and abandon the creeping meatball, says Jerry Rubin, that's the Yippie philosophy — the myth that lets you "be what you want to."

The Yippie movement, he says, is not primarily political, but is a religious action.

"I consider myself a priest," he adds.

Rubin, founder of hippiedom's Youth International Party, flies into Toronto from New York this morning. He will be turning up at the Sid Smith Free Speech Area at 1 p.m.

A Rubin visit last October to the University of British Columbia resulted in the im-

By JIM COWAN

For now, it's just a very large hole in the ground. But when it's finished, the new $41,000,000 Humanities and Social Research Library will form the heart of the proposed graduate complex at U of T.

President Claude Bissell feels the new library could make the difference between "Toronto as a good centre for study and a great centre . . .

"For a university, there is a correlation between greatness and the size of the library." All the great universities, he says, including Yale, Harvard and Berkeley, have big expansion programs under way.

"I feel this great library will have more impact on the intellectual life of the university than anything else," he added.

A major result of the library should be to attract the top scholars to Toronto to teach and continue their studies. This will be of invaluable assistance in U of T's attempt to expand its graduate school. Current plans call for the entire east side of St. George Street from Hoskin to Bloor to be developed for graduate facilities.

But for the average undergraduate, the new library will have limited significance. The Users Committee, which did not include students, stated that the primary purpose of the library was "to serve the research needs of the faculty and graduate students, and of undergraduates as they need the facilities."

This could happen fairly often, for the initial material for the library will come from the humanities and social sciences stacks, the reference material and the rare books section of the Sigmund Samuel library. According to Dr. Bissell this will not hinder undergraduates, but he added, "It will depend on our purchasing policy."

Purchasing policy is not, however, one of the subjects talked about by the Library Council or the Executive Committee, two bodies with student representation. But students will have a say in any future discussions on the new library, and Frank Sommers (III Meds), a SAC representa-to the Council, said "We are very concerned with the rights of students and with students being heard by those who make policy."

The master plan for U of T libraries foresees Sigmund Samuel being developed into what chief librarian R. H. Blackburn terms "a really functional undergraduate library." The Wallace Room stacks will be expanded extensively and other services will also be enlarged. Undergraduates will also have paging privileges in the new library in the event they require material shelved there.

This is what a truck looked like yesterday as it left the Very Deep Pit which, by 1972, will be occupied by the largest in size reference library in North America, second only to the Library of Congress. It's your library — SEE CENTRE for more.

"The disruption of the Clark Kerr lecture was an incorrect tactic," says Miss Kirzner. "The student movement must be careful about placing itself in a defensive position."

Both candidates said they stood "100 per cent behind the students" in the recent incident at Sir George Williams University.

"The final cause for the violence there is from the administration," said Kopyto. "Mass hysteria has been created by the press and the government," he added. "Our whole society is violent — the sick education we're getting, management lock-outs, slums, Vietnam."

The candidates believe students and faculty should control the university.

They want SAC to confront certain issues with large scale and continuing protest — universal accessibility, mass public housing, summer employment, the democratization of the university, and the removal of private corporate interests from the university.

"Steve Langdon has moved a step in the right direction in having SAC take positions on issues outside society," said Kopto, "but SAC hasn't gone much beyond changing structures."

Miss Kirzner criticized Langdon for not running last year on an open radical platform. "The students felt cheated when they found they had a radical SAC president," she said.

The only other candidate in the SAC presidential race so far is John Oldham (Emm), with Bob Barkwell (II Meds) as vice-presidential candidate.

Students press demands at now-open Library Council

For the first time in U of T's history a Senate subcommittee will meet in open session when the Library Council meets in the Senate Chambers this afternoon at 4 p.m.

The open meeting policy is one of many advances made within the last year by students admitted to the Library Council two years ago as assessors.

There are now five students on the executive committee of 12, two of whom have voting privileges.

From this position students have succeeded in extending stack access to all second year students and have won an experiment with day passes for all first year students.

Faculty loan privileges have been shortened from six months with one renewal to two months with one renewal, although faculty members are still exempt from fines.

Frank Sommers (III Meds) a member of the Library Council, considers these steps a "significant advance" but is still "dismayed at the grossly unfair disproportion of students members and policing of the stacks to cut down on theft."

A subcommittee has been set up to discuss the composition of the Council. Temma Stulberg (SGS), a student member of the subcommittee, hopes that the Council will become a small, elected and active committee that will represent the users of the library more fairly rather than the administrators.

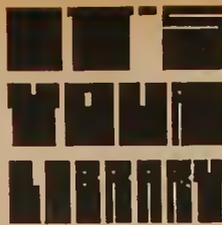

At the present time half of the Council is made up of Senators.

The students also want institution of fines for faculty members and policing of the stacks to cut down on theft.

They also want a voice in setting policy for the New Research Library. The policy of the new library has not been finally decided but it is feared its use will be restricted to graduate students. There were no students represented on the User's committee which disbanded in 1965, but students have been promised representation should the committee be resurrected.

The Library Committee will present a report to tonight's SAC meeting.

Irving Layton: a poet unbuttons for T.V.

By TOM WALKOM

"When I first started writing poetry, it was as if I were practicing a secret vice. Now universities hire poets in residence — all they have to do is keep their hair long and their flies unbuttoned."

Thus spoke iconoclast Irving Layton last night at the Convocation Hall videotaping of the TV show Under Attack.

The 57-year-old Montreal poet, ranged over a variety of topics, including marriage and organized religion (he is against them), the Vietnam war (he is for it), violence (he accepts it) and Canadian poetry (he eulogizes it).

Marriage came under fire "simply because it is an institution." He lashed into organized religion for "robbing people of their spontaneity."

Violence, he said, was partly the result of the breakdown of marriage and religion. It also stems, he said, from the "loneliness and restlessness of our technological life."

"Humans are sadists; they enjoy inflicting pain on one another."

Layton went on to say that Canada has produced the world's best poetry since 1945.

"And I am speaking not only of myself," added the poet.

On the matter of the Sir George Williams University incident, Layton, who has taught there for 20 years, felt "upset about charges of racism." Sir George, he said, has "bent over backwards to give blacks, poor whites and the proletariat a chance."

He blamed the computer vandalism on outside agitators and the administration's failure to act with necessary sensitivity. Layton was asked why he supported the American position in Vietnam.

"There are wars that are just and wars that are unjust. An individual has to decide whether the particular ugliness of his particular war is justified," he replied.

By SHERRY BRYDSON

On Dec. 10, 1968, the Ontario Legislature tabled a government commission report which gave a clean bill of health to Dunnville-Port Maitland area residents, exposed since 1961 to high concentrations of flouride.

The flouride came from the Electric Reduction Company's fertilizer plant.

The report was commissioned by order-in-council in August, 1967. In October, 1967, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation pre-empted the Ed Sullivan Show to run a one-hour special, "Air of Death". The program contained 10 minutes of material on the Dunnville area.

Three days later, the Ontario legislature passed a second order-in-council approving the composition of the commission.

While asserting there was no danger to human health from ERCO's waste flourides, it did admit to some plant and animal damage in the region.

Area farmers have been compensated for losses to crops and cattle amounting to $271,244.03 between 1965 and 1967.

In its concluding paragraph under Human Health Factors, the commission says:

"It is comforting to be able to report to the people of the area that, as a result of exhaustive medical examinations and tests of area water and body fluids and a dental survey of area children, there has been no acceptable evidence to indicate that any sort of human health hazards relative to pollutants exists in the area."

Acceptable to whom? is a question one might well ask, for on Dec. 27, 1968, Detroit doctor George Waldbott charge that the threat to human health is far from over in the Dunnville area. Considered a foremost expert on flouriosis, as an allergist, he discovered many years ago that some of his patients were allergic to flouride). Dr. Waldbott recommended "a careful clinical assessment of the health status of the population in the vicinity of the fertilizer plant by physicians with personal knowledge of sltrosis."

He had a point. Although the Hall commission report is touted in government circles as a scientific document, the commissioners did not hear testimony from a single doctor who had personally diagnosed or treated a case of flouriosis.

Witnesses, coming before the hearing, complained of mysterious symptoms, all of which have appeared after the ERCO plant went into operation.

They all complained of similar symptoms: sore, aching and swollen joints, sore back or neck, some eye irritation, upset stomach, kidney, bladder or bowel discomfort, unusual tiredness (one man, Ted Boorsma, was only 35), and other related discomforts. These symptoms began to appear around 1964 and 1965, about the same time the cows in the area began to go lame

The Commission makes quite an issue of this. In several places, it goes so far as to suggest the witnesses were only copying the symptoms of their own cattle.

Is the Hall commission report a scientific document? Judge for yourself: On page 111-112, the commission sets up five criteria on which to assess the presence of human flouriosis. On page 113, the commission promptly abandons one of the criteria, bone zitpsy.

"There was no reason to indulge in bone biopsy in order to determine the flouride concentration," the commission states.

"That's not poor science — that's damn bad science!" a U of T biologist recently commented indignantly.

Called in to testify about the medical history of Dunnville farmer Joe Casina, Dr. F. G. Marson, a Hamilton doctor was described by the commission as "a consultant in the field of general internal medicine, with special interest in rheumatology and gastro-enterology." Dr. Marson gave the following testimony:

Page 103: "This patient was quite adamant that his ankles were swollen in front of my very eyes. I don't profess to be an expert in rheumatology and I could not personally see any swelling whatsoever."

Page 105: "...when you see a patient twice over a period of a few months and on both occasions he insists that his ankles are swollen and you are there examining him at the time and, as an expert rheumatologist, you can find no evidence whatsoever for the swelling, it makes me wonder about the credibility..."

The commission later stressed the fact that — despite Casina's claims and despite the pain he was suffering (Casina has had to use a cane since 1967) — Dr. Marson thought his own patient was lying. Yet Dr. Marson contradicted his own evidence regarding his expertise.

I asked Dr. Don Chant, head of U of T's biology department, if he thinks the Hall report is a scientific document.

"I don't think anyone knows what has been going on in Dunnville and what is going on now," he replied. "That alone is an indictment of the Hall commission."

under the high school principal's thumb

We ran a story Monday about a high school student who challenged the power structure of his school and has been suspended since October for his activities. Principal Glen Francis of Eastdale Secondary School in Welland believes that all activities in his educational institution must be directed by the principal, that all efforts to establish a strong student council free of administration interference must be suppressed, that student responsibility has no place in a high school.

His response to the election of Student Council President Peter Kormos, who was determined to revamp the system, was to refuse consideration of student requests, to continue to censor council meeting agendas, and to declare that Kormos couldn't continue as President as long as he was a member of the High School Union of Students. (Apparently freedom of association wasn't made to apply to 16-year-olds.)

From our own experiences in high schools, we know Glen Francis is not an isolated case. We all know the dictatorial attitudes commonplace among high school principals in this province. We all recall prohibitions against long hair, beards, short skirts, or anything which didn't conform to our principals' personal morality.

We all complained about our farcical student councils. Their sole preoccupation was with dances and football games and yearbooks. They virtually ignored our basic concerns: the quality of education we were getting. They ignored it simply because the man in the office refused to recognize that we had anything valuable to say about the basic dynamics of the school.

Glen Francis is not an anomaly. The only reason he stands out is that some student had the guts to challenge his assumption that a school must be run like a military academy.

There was Wilbert Bush at Castle Frank, Wilkey Davy at Bathurst Heights. There was the principal in Sudbury who told an incoming group of Grade 9 students shortly after the Hall-Dennis Report was issued, "We don't believe in these new educational ideas because we know students. You have to keep them under your thumb at all times."

Let's not forget that men like these are still dominating the Ontario educational system. And let's not be fooled by recent pronouncements from the Department of Education about a new progressive system in the making. Remember that no matter how reform-minded the Department, it will merely make recommendations to local schools, but resolutely refuses to intervene and enforce these guidelines. The real power to implement change rests with the principals. From what we know about their attitudes, can we expect any widespread educational reform?

While the Department was preparing its recent pronouncement about new stresses on individuality in education, the Welland County School Board was ignoring a request by Peter Kormos for the right to appear personally before it to appeal his suspension. Kormos now must seek legal help to allow him to return to school after a four month absence.

And this occurred simply because he had the gall to push for changes in his school similar to the Hall-Dennis recommendations.

Kormos is now residing at the home of United Church Minister Robert Wright who says, "Peter is an extremely bright individual. Obviously the educational system is not designed for him."

But why isn't it designed for people like Peter Kormos? How long will it be dominated by people like Glen Francis?

Do we want the next generation of high school students to be educated under a system similar to the one that suspended Peter Kormos for advocating its reform?

Dunnville dying?

"I am by no means reassured by the findings of the commission."

Dr. Chant, a specialist in environmental quality, makes it clear that he is no expert on flouride poisoning, but his point can be made by any perceptive layman:

We just don't know what the situation is in the Dunnville area — we need some more conclusive tests before we can say for sure that the area water, livestock and vegetation (to say nothing of the air) is fit for human consumption.

Dr. Waldbott, who has had considerable experience in treating patients afflicted with flouride poisoning, says he suspects 27 area residents have flouride poisoning.

If the government of Ontario hasn't done anything about the findings, the Canadian Radio and Television Commission has. It has arranged a public inquiry into "Air of Death."

"The terms of reference for the hearing will be to determine measures taken by the CBC for maintenance of high standards of public information in the preparation, production and broadcasting of this program, including the use of information reasonably available at the time of the broadcast," the Commission's notice of public hearing reads.

And, while the CRTC asks itself whether the CBC was, as the Hall commission claims, unduly alarmist in bringing the flouride problem to light, flouride — in admittedly somewhat smaller quantities, continues to be emitted from ERCO's smokestacks and storage sheds.

In Florida, where a subsidiary of ERCO is engaged in a similar operation, the storage sheds where the most flouride is given off have been ordered sealed. There has been no such order by the Ontario Department of Health.

Admittedly, the CBC said some things on its program which can be scientifically refuted. The same can be said of the Hall Report.

But is this really the issue at hand? What is wrong with the people in Dunnville? How about the witnesses who complained of severe illness?

The Hall commission made no attempt to find out what is the matter with the Dunnville area residents. It merely "proved" they were not suffering from flourosis, and let it go at that.

What about the livestock in the Dunnville area? A farmer says on Air of Death that eight area farmers have gone out of business as a result of the inability of cattle to survive the flourides. (The situation is particularly bad for cattle since they feed on forage pastures, covered with a fine dust from ERCO's emissions.)

Since the CBC program, Toronto newspapers have documented at least two more bankruptcies.

The Hall commission reprimanded the CBC for scaring the public, hurting the economy of the area by making people afraid to eat Dunnville produce. What is more important, Dr. Hall, money or human safety?

The same questions go unanswered right here in Toronto. While Toronto's air is not a total disaster, it ranks second only to New York and Los Angeles in air pollution levels.

We are accustomed to thinking of Chicago as a highly polluted area: Toronto ranks right alongside that city in levels of contaminants floating in the air.

• In a recent survey, Toronto air was found to contain five times the United States Eepartment of Health pollution safety levels.

• About 750,000 automobiles dump upwards of 800,000 TONS of carbon monoxide annually on the city. A recent study on California school-children who had to drive long distances to school seems to indicate that carbon monoxide dulls the mind.

• Sulphur dioxide, which when combined with liquids in the lungs produces sulphurous and sulphuric acids, is poured into the Toronto skies at the alarming rate of 250,000 tons a year. What is an "acceptable level" of sulphur dioxide? We don't even know. The major sources: Ontario Hydro's two thermal generating stations, and private home heating units. No one escapes responsibility.

• Benzpyrene, cancer-inducing in laboratory experiments, is another alarming by-product of automobile exhaust fumes.

• All major hospitals in Toronto are located in areas of high pollution. Doctors refuse to operate on extremely bad days.

• Air pollution is estimated to cost Canadians $1 billion annually — about $65 a person a year. Can we afford this expense? We would certainly complain if we saw this extra cost added to our tax bill.

But when public and private industry cause it, we allow it to exist. Do we know how much longer we have to live as a result of breathing in these poisons? Air pollution is such a recent problem scientists have been unable to determine many of its effects.

Dunnville is a small problem — a microcosm. A parallel case, which bears a striking resemblance to the Dunnville situation, occurred recently at Garrison, Montana, where residents were successful in shutting down the Rocky Mountain Phosphate plant until it reduced its flouride output. But the damage to human health was devastating.

It was called the worst case of pollution on record in the United States. It was solved

We can solve the Dunnville problem, too — by concerted action by all citizens of Ontario. Then, maybe, we can start on Toronto's problems.

We may find we're 10 times worse off than Dunnville.

Pollution Probe starts Friday

The U of T Pollution Probe, an organization which has not yet held its organizational meeting, already has upwards of 30 active members.

An acting executive is furiously working on a draft constitution, to be presented at the first meeting Friday. Dr. Dan Chant, biology department chairman, will address the organizational meeting, and the executive has promised to implement one program immediately: an informational campaign on the Dunnville issue.

Elsewhere on the pollution scene: Bob Staska and Bill Gentiles, a pair of graduate electrical engineers who want applied science types to become systems engineers — concerned with the ecology of the sites on which they build.

They're having a smaker tonight with lots of free booze. Blake Goodings of the Association of Professional Engineers will chair a discussion on The Engineer and his Environment.

Everyone is welcome. The meeting is at 7:30 in the Mass Park Armories at Queen and Jarvis. Just follow the signs once you're there.

A must for all anti-pollution types: the Zoology department is showing the CBC's controversial special Air of Death on Thursday at 1 p.m. in Ramsey Wright 117. Probe will take a survey after the film.

University as stimulation, adventure and collection of knowledge

By Robert H. Blackburn,
Chief Librarian of the University

A university is a large group of people organized to devote a major part of their time and energy, over a period of years, to the pursuit of knowledge beyond the range of ordinary schools.

The knowledge being pursued includes the widest possible range of fact, idea, invention, theory. It also includes complicated technical skills.

The pursuit involves learning, teaching, understanding, interpreting, appreciating, evaluating, exploring, discovering, and organizing the means by which these activities may be carried on.

Knowledge is pursued in other ways, of course, outside universities. A lone scholar may become a world authority in his subject. A government department or a private company may employ a large number of talented people to

University (yūnivērsīti). ME. [a. AF. universit:—L. universitat-, -itas (x) the whole, universe, (2) a corporation or community, f. L. universus UNIVERSE. As the designation of a whole body, community, or guild of masters and scholars, the full phr. was universitas magistrorum et scholarium; universitas ultimately superseded studium for 'university'.] x. The whole body of teachers and students pursuing, at a particular place, the higher branches of learning; such persons associated together as a society or corporate body, having the power of explore the outer boundaries of existing knowledge which bears on a particular practical application. A university is different in that it involves scholars at all levels, from novice to savant, and that it is a self-perpetuating search after knowledge for the sake of preserving and perfecting it.

It would be hard to justify a large and expensive institution, and the annual expenditure of thousands of man-years, for the pursuit of knowledge only for the joy of the chase. I think there is another and stronger justification.

We live in a world in which the instinctive need for excitement and competition, though they may harm or destroy individuals, supplies the motive power necessary for biological evolution of the species. This need has been met traditionally in ways such as warfare, commercial enterprise, expeditions of discovery, athletic competition, and the pursuit of knowledge.

This last means, compared to the others, became institutionalized very late, only a few hundred years ago. It has always stood in the danger of becoming merely an instrument of other institutions, a danger which lurks in the temptation to concentrate on the application of knowledge. In its purest form however, in the university, it can ennoble the individual and, through him, affect the social evolution of mankind. As a means of satisfying man's instinctive need for stimulation, it has much to commend it over the more muscular alternatives.

In the past decade there have been phenomenal increases in the growth-rate of knowledge, in the volume and speed of communication, and in the number of people wishing to enter universities. In attempting to adjust, universities have grown much too rapidly to avoid severe growing pains.

At Toronto, growth in numbers and in the range and height of specialization has led to loss of contact among various groups which have taken to thinking of themselves as separate "estates." However, the estates are now busy establishing communication and mutual understanding, and I think that Toronto, through firmness of purpose and flexibility of form, is emerging as a better university.

In the course of its work a university is a collector of knowledge. A part of the collection exists, in a highly segmented and rather volatile form, inside the heads of the people concerned. The larger and more comprehensive collection, more widely accessible and more permanent than the other, is the university library.

In the library, which represents the accumulation of all knowledge to date, any member of the university may pursue his own ideas, or engage in deliberate consideration of topics which may be only tasted or tested in classroom and laboratory. While no library which is actively used, as ours is, can ever meet all the demands made upon it, Toronto is engaged in a vigorous and persistent effort to make its library system as effective as can be. As one of the people principally concerned in that effort, I find Toronto an exciting university.

Rubin raps

PAY TOILETS

I'm getting used to charred bodies. I'm getting used to brutality. But the one thing that gets me the angriest is the pay toilet. You see what the pay toilet says — if you don't have the money, you can't shit. I mean what kind of country defends that principle? Wow! The war in Viet Nam can be explained by pay toilets.

THE NEW CULTURE

We're building an alternate culture. We have our own press. We have our own definition of beauty, we have our own sex habits which are different from middle class America's. We have our own language. We have our own stimulants. We have our own definition of what's important — our own attitude toward the nation.

It's a new culture, and it's a culture with growing pains. And the first experiments in the culture are going to be stumbling and painful because it can't separate itself from the mass commercialism that surrounds it. So we have to create alternative economic institutions.

THE NEW LEFT

I'm not interested in the left wing. I'm not interested in leftist organization. And I'm not interested in left-right language. Because it all has that Marxist background, which I don't think is really appropriate to the 1968's over-industrialized, mass communications, consumer-oriented society.

Marxism doesn't help me understand the situation I'm in.

It's emotional rather than rational — doing it is more important than the analysis. I'm not interested in diagramming, or analyzing — I'm not interested in any academic jazz.

COPS AND OPPRESSION

Telegraph Avenue, Berkeley. Cops six deep, patrolling all the time. Move on, move on, that's all they have to say. And arresting people for drugs, arresting people for loitering, arresting people for sitting on tables, arresting people on felony raps for nothing stuff.

Breaking into your home — your home is your palace, it's your sacred shrine.

I could get your approval and say I don't hate the cops. But I'd be copping-out.

The cop does not oppress me that much.

The first 20 years of my life I was not oppressed by cops at all. I had no great experiences with cops. Why should I? I'm white, middle class — so cops don't oppress me.

But the American police do oppress large numbers of people — and those people have every fucking right to hate cops.

Those blacks in jails have every reason to hate cops.

So I can come on and say to the Black Panthers — "Hate cops? Don't hate cops. Lo-o-v-e, baby!" I don't think I have the right to try to impose that ethic to someone whose best friend has been killed.

I say the cops are beginning to treat the long-haired, whites, the hippies, just the same as the blacks.

And I can run off 20 ugly, brutal, experiences that have happened to me recently with cops.

Asking me why I hate cops is like asking me a very metaphysical question. It's metaphysical.

You might call it an act of love to kill a cop.

In Chicago the cops killed a Yippie and the press suppressed it.

A young kid was shot two days before the convention opened — from Sioux City, Iowa, Dean Johnson, shot and killed by Chicago police. But it got no publicity.

The police right now are in a certain position in America. I think there's danger they are going to go further.

Right now, if you're not black, don't have long hair, and don't break the laws you won't have any trouble with the police.

SAC Housing Project

TWO FULL-TIME POSITIONS AVAILABLE

The SAC requires two persons to co-ordinate the planning and construction of a residence to accommodate 500 - 750 students.

One person would primarily be concerned with policy areas: liaison between SAC and the Housing Committee, dealings with the local residents' association, education and social action programming for the building. The other would handle more technical aspects of the project, acting as liaison between the housing committee and the architect, construction company, and any other professionals involved in the project.

Both persons would be responsible to a student housing committee.

Employment entails a commitment of at least a year and a half, since the building will open, at the earliest, in the fall of 1970.

SALARY LIKELY TO BE BETWEEN $8000. AND $10,000.

Applicants should be interested in the educational and political possibilities of this unique project. They must be willing to work closely with, and be responsible to, a student housing committee.

Apply in writing, stating qualifications, experience, and reasons for interest in the positions to:

Executive Assistant
SAC

Please include full address and phone number. Deadline for applications is Friday, March 7.

DEDICATED INTERESTED STUDENTS NEEDED

(NO SALARY INVOLVED)

A seven-man student committee to supervise the housing project will be drawn from applicants. The committee will see the SAC housing project through the programming stages to its completion. People willing to undertake a two-year commitment to work on the project are thus preferred.

Applicants will be chosen on the basis of interest in providing housing alternative in design to present university residences and interest in developing educational and social action projects integral to the residents and the surrounding community (the Kensington Market Area).

Apply in writing, stating qualifications, experience, and reasons for interest in the position to:

Executive Assistant
SAC

Please include full address and phone number. Deadline for applications is Friday, March 7.

New library "A fantastic dream": Bissell

By the time the snow fence goes up on the U of T front campus, and the crocuses poke through the Trinity lawn, 150,000 cubic yards of U of T will lie at the bottom of Toronto harbour.

That's how much earth is being removed for the foundation of the new humanities and social research library now underway on a three-acre site at the corner of St. George and Harbord Streets. It could be the single most important construction project this university has ever undertaken. Repeated delays and revisions have dogged the new library since the first discussions 17 years ago. The report of the Users Committee, published in 1965, envisioned it as a Centennial year project and stated "It is assumed that there will be a cornerstone ceremony, or some similar observance, in 1967."

If any one man can take credit for making the library a reality, it is President Claude Bissell. In a recent interview he described it as "an obsession." "I was here when the Sigmund Samuel wing was opened and was disappointed in it. It looked like the answer and I knew it wasn't."

"When I came back there wasn't any great sense of urgency to develop the library. My early reports were in terms of expanding the existing facilities, and we started thinking in terms of theoretical sums of money although very little was actually allocated."

The story of the new library goes back to 1962 when the Library Committee of the Senate, in recommending the construction of Sigmund Samuel, predicted that further construction would be needed by 1965. A presidential committee enlarged on the librarian's definition of "further construction" in 1959. A second revision of the committee was finally handed over to the design consultants in June 1965.

But this was not the end of the plans. In 1966 the Spinks Report on graduate education in Ontario recommended that all research collections should be made available to all Ontario universities.

"Our plans for the library developed long before the province became interested," said Dr. Bissell. "Then the Spinks report came out recommending a central library for Ontario universities. It was silly to try and duplicate what we already had."

The result was that three floors were added to the building with an additional 600 study places to accommodate out-of-town scholars.

Even then there were delays. "We had a bit of a crisis when I returned this summer (from Harvard) because the Province had become concerned that there would be overbuilding of libraries. We had to go over as a group and persuade them we weren't overbuilding. We also had to justify the additional cost in terms of prestige and complexity of the project."

you who the benefactor is right now. It will be quite a story when it is released."

The physical planning department has been working on the plans for the building since 1963. Their part of the operation includes everything from planning the interior furnishings to servicing the building with heat, light and power. A new central cooling plant will be built at the corner of Spadina and Sussex.

Mr. H. C. Milne, general superintendent for mechanical and engineering construction and deputy director of the physical planning department, commented on the scope of the new library. "It's certainly in a different league from anything we've built up to now," he said. "It's a dickens of a lot of money." In mass, he added, it compares to the recent addition to the Ontario Government buildings at the corner of Bay and Wellesley.

The university owned most of the three acre site on which the library will be built, except for the south-west corner where Macdonald's Variety and the Alcohol and Drug Addiction Foundation buildings stand. This land is owned by the Province of Ontario but a swap was agreed on. The ADAP will move into new quarters behind the Clark Institute on Huron Street.

When the higher-than-expected tenders came in the physical planning department was called in to help with the revisions. One of the major items which was delayed was an auditorium which was to have gone on the west side of the building. Other items were interior trims, certain services for the librarian and landscaping around the site. Now will be used instead of concrete terraces. But as Milne noted, "There is nothing simple about cutting a building."

Even when all the difficulties about construction were cleared up, one final problem arose. After the last was cleared, U of T used it as a parking lot until construction

Cement wedge

no cheesy job

It was a clear, cold January day and the windows of the Cape-Ryco construction trailer were streaked with condensation. Outside, the heavy machinery excavating the foundation of the new Research Library crunched deeper into the frozen earth.

Project superintendent Rod Detenbeck glanced at a sheaf of plans and reeled off some impressive statistics. The excavation will be 33 feet deep, 150,000 cubic yards of earth must be removed and will take three months from start to finish. On any given day, there are up to 20 trucks on site and at $8 dollars a truckload the excavation is costing about $2,000 per day.

For the library project, Cape Construction joined with Robertson-Yates in a joint venture. This is not surprising; the project is the largest reinforced concrete contract ever let. Detenbeck and field engineer Ivan Truant will literally live with the project until its completion in 1972. "Temporary offices have been set up in a two-storey plywood building

The central building will also house all the administrative and business offices of the U of T library.

There will be a total of 1,015,070 square feet of floor space and accommodation for over four million books, documents and microfilms.

On completion, the U of T library will be second only to the Library of Congress in Washington in size.

...parking lot until construction was about to begin. Also then one day the parking lot was gone. "You'd be surprised at the people who phoned," said Milne. "But you can't just go in and start digging." The lot, he explained, was closed to allow surveyors to lay out the library.

The present completion date is in 1972, seven years after the headline first proposed for "further construction". Dr. Bissell says he is now moving on to other projects. "I've been associated with this library for a long time," he said. "It's been my major concern, my number one priority. And it's given me more satisfaction than anything else. It's like the realization of what was really a pretty fantastic dream.

The building will now cost about $41,000,000. Funds for the building are coming from the Ontario Government, (about $7 million) funds left from a Canada Council capital grant (about $1.5 million) and a very large personal benefaction. "I don't mean to be mysterious," Dr. Bissell said. "But I can't tell

"I spent as much time as I could spare from student power in meetings last fall," Dr. Bissell grimaced. "We whittled five or six million dollars off the cost. It means in some cases we aren't getting what we wanted, but it's adequate."

The failure of Vancouver to obtain an NHL franchise, the power of U.S. television network CBS in determining NHL game times, and the NHL control of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association were all cited by Kidd as examples of these unfavourable bi-products.

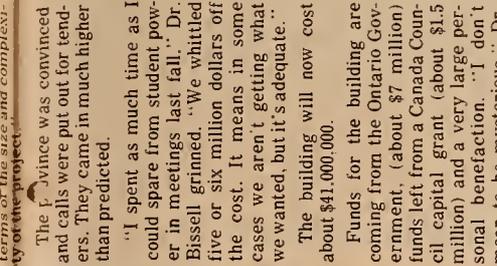

Several students lamented the lack of participation of Canadians in sports generally, and the seeming "strangeness" of those Canadians who do participate. "I agree," smiled Kidd. "I know of one middle-aged jogger who was once arrested for vagrancy here."

The simmering Stanley Gray Affair at McGill University nearly boiled over Monday as 500 students demonstrated in support of the political science lecturer and then invaded the school's administration building to discuss the situation with the Board of Governors.

The controversy over Gray's impending dismissal eased somewhat yesterday when the deadline for Gray's decision on whether or not to accept a commission of inquiry based on guidelines set by the Canadian Association of University Teachers was extended to Friday by Principal H. Rocke Robertson.

Comments Bruce Kidd

Canada's sports part of US empire

By LEIGHTON REID

Canadian sport is now an integral part of the American sports empire.

That's the opinion of Bruce Kidd, former track star and advisor on Canadian sport.

Kidd was speaking at a two-hour discussion on the continentalization of Canadian sport at the International Student Centre yesterday afternoon.

"The Americanization of Canadian sport has come through its professionalization," Kidd explained. "Hockey, for instance, is now a sector of the entertainment industry, and each professional team is essentially a branch of the same corporation."

Kidd said the "unfavorable

Peter Kormos, the Welland high school student council president, suspended since October, for opposing his principal's authority, will be in Toronto this weekend to seek legal help in his battle to return to school.

Earlier this month Kormos received a letter from Eastdale Secondary School principal Glen Francis saying he saw "no possible good" in ending his suspension. Francis is now recommending permanent expulsion.

Kormos wants to personally appeal his suspension but the school board has upheld the suspension and said only Kormos' parents or legal guardian have the right to appeal.

Kormos, estranged from his parents, is now living with United Church minister Rev. Robert Wright, and considers himself legally independent. Although he is 16, the Board refuses to recognize his legal independence and he receives only carbon copies of letters to his parents from the Board.

Kormos reports that his replacement as Student Council President, who was appointed by the principal has resigned due to lack of student support.

Campus boycotters to face grape boycott supporters

By IJL WILLOCK

The migrant workers by not caring, we want them to know what we think of their role."

The picket is being organized by the newly-formed Student Boycott Committee. "We want them to make a policy statement that they will respect the international boycott," says Welbye.

He explains that Dominion executives feel they're "giving their customers freedom of choice. We're asking them to make a decision." He discussed the picketing of individual stores since Christmas.

"They'd take the grapes off the shelves. We'd move on shouting 'Hurray, we won', and an hour later the god-damned grapes would be back on the shelves. Dominion obviously started the policy from up above — every store was doing it."

Pickets then started asking the store managers for a signed statement saying the grapes would not reappear, but with no result.

The boycott has had some effect on the Toronto market. Grape prices are way down — as low as 20 cents a pound. "And you can't even import dirt from California at that price."

In many cases the grapes are also starting to look bad on the shelves quality-wise.

Student boycott supporters will demonstrate tomorrow at 9 a.m. at the Placement Service office at Spadina and Harbord, where Dominion will be recruiting students for future employment with the chain.

Waterloo gives SGWU $10,000

WATERLOO (CUP) — The University of Waterloo student council Monday allocated $10,000 bail money to be forwarded to students arrested at Sir George Williams University earlier this month.

The motion passed overwhelmingly and brought loud cheers and applause from some 250 student spectators.

The council voted the money and condemned the Canadian Bail system after a Toronto area student arrested in the computer centre addressed them.

He said the high bail set in Montreal courts totalled over $100,000 and many of the people arrested could not raise enough money to bail themselves out.

One student councillor, summing up the council position said: "Whether the demonstrator's were right or wrong is not the question. It's our duty as students to help these kids out of jail."

The Waterloo council decided months ago to provide bail for any Waterloo student arrested on any charge. Monday, it reaffirmed its stand that the Canadian Bail system was weighted against the poor.

The meeting was the first for the newly-elected "moderate" council.

DINING WITH PAM

By PAM BERTON

The scaffolding on the first floor of Rochdale College is no longer in the construction phase, but scaffolding has become part of "The Same" 24-hour restaurant.

"It's an Aquarian restaurant," explained the girl in the green velour dress, which means that Ken Coupland, the designer, was born under that sign, and Aquarians like "plastic" things.

"There are three trips here," she went on. "Ken's is the snack thing; Art Roberts is the manager; and Wu's thing is good food — health food."

It was Wu, the head chef, who thought up the enormous pink and blue menu. The idea is that you take a long time to study it, and plan your meal carefully. When you finally get it, you are relaxed and ready to enjoy your meal.

It doesn't take long to realize "This is Rochdale — why worry?" If you go in with only 15 minutes to eat, you'd be happier at a curbside vending truck.

It's a do-it-yourself set-up. You plan your own meal, even down to the salad greens and kind of vinegar. You can't order a roast beef sandwich without choosing the type of bread — and don't forget to order butter. This is fun but the price tends to mount.

The alternative is to order the "special" for $1.25, which is either a meat or vegetarian plate.

With the philosophy that good food builds a healthy body and spirit, Wu believes in pure unprocessed food such as raw sugar and whole grain rice. And the orange juice really is freshly squeezed!

From 4 p.m. until about 5 a.m. the restaurant does a roaring business. The atmosphere is Yorkville-like only more intellectual.

"The records on the juke box are good, but there aren't very many of them," said one kitchen helper. "If Suzanne goes down to the river one more time..."

It's "The Same" place you have to see for yourself.

Borrowing Privileges
for Students
at College Libraries

The various colleges have libraries which cater specifically to the needs of their own students, particularly those in first and second year. However, as a rule, only members of a college may use its facilities. A special arrangement has been made for other students to have access to material which is unique to a particular college library. If upon consulting the Old and New Catalogues in the Central Library, you find that the only copy of a book is in a college library at which you don't have borrowing privileges, and if you wish to borrow that book, you should:

1. fill out a regular call slip
2. take it to the Catalogue Information Desk to have it verified and stamped as a unique copy
3. present this call slip to the College Library between 9 a.m. - 5 p.m. Monday to Friday

On doing so, you will be given access to that material on the same terms as a regular borrower of that college library. These procedures are in effect at Innis College (temporarily housed in Laidlaw Library), Knox College Library, Laidlaw Library of University College, New College Library, St. Michael's College Library, Trinity College Library, Emmanuel College Library and Victoria University Library.

Any student registered in a degree course at the University of Toronto, whether he is on the St. George Campus, or at Scarborough or Erindale, may borrow from the Central Library.

End poverty midst plenty says Minister John Munro

By SANDY LIND

The solution to urban poverty lies in the involvement of the poor in their own improvement, the national Health and Welfare Minister told the U of T Liberal Club Monday.

Panting slightly from a sprint up the steps of Sidney Smith, the Hon. John Munro attempted to outline problems peculiar to poverty in urban centres.

"To be impoverished in the midst of glittering urban plenty is to face a poverty to which a further cruel dimension has been added," Munro said. More than half the poverty-stricken families in Canada are to be found in urban centres, and more than half of these in metropolitan centres.

"They compete for the same poorly paid jobs, they use the same impoverished schools and public services, they pay inflated prices for poor quality goods, and their low status address follows them wherever they go, restricting their opportunities," he said.

"It amounts to a culture of poverty."

As for a solution to poverty, Munro said the simple offering of services was in his eyes an "insufficient effort." Citing recent American and Company of Young Canadians successes, he explained the theory behind proposed programs.

"We must be prepared to accept the reality of actual participation by the poor." In the U.S. local poverty programs are run by councils which have a neighborhood representation ranging from one-third to as high as 80 percent.

Munro gave the impression that this had been a bitter pill for the old pros to swallow. "The tradition of paternalism in the provision of social services must give way to one of participation if welfare is to be more than palliative," he said.

Under questioning, Munro admitted that the bulk of his department's three billion dollars expenditures had not gone to those who needed it most. The poverty-stricken had been skimmed over, and most of the relief funds had gone to those in the lower middle income bracket. His department is undergoing a review, he said, and significant changes are in the offing.

Actually, the Health and Welfare Minister was at his finest during the questioning. Asked to defend the morality of his department's programs seemed to exasperate him.

"I could give you a little Christian morality," he said. "I'm not a Christian," was the reply. But that didn't daunt the Minister.

"I don't think people want to be lazy — they want to do something. But they have to be motivated and given an income till they can be retrained and moved out of the situation. And what are you going to do with them till then? Let them starve?"

Engineers to elect exec on Friday

Engineering students will vote Friday to elect the engineering society executive for next year.

Art McIlwain and Steve Kallos both in third year, are contesting the presidency, while the first and second vice-presidential positions will be fought over by Alex Kitay and Jack Aluin both III APSC, and Bob Rowland and Kent Hodgkinson from II APSC.

The Treasurers position will be contested by second year students Mike Sefton and Ted Austin.

The five SAC rep positions are being vied for by seven second and third year students. Bryon Alexandroff, Henrik Jacobsen, Paul Maynes, Eric Mitlin, Wayne Richardson, George Sachs, and Rob Willson (whew! that's hard to read) will fight it out Friday.

They all gather today at 1 p.m. in the Mechanical Building (102) to sound off together with the LGMB.

SAC briefs

The Students' Administrative Council will meet 7:30 tonight in Brennan Hall at St. Michael's College to discuss these issues, among others:

- SAC membership in the Ontario Union of Students;
- the preparation of the SAC brief to the Commission on University Government;
- the adoption of the trimester system;
- labour liaison.

UNHAPPY ABOUT THE SYSTEM?

Interested in a real challenge? Then teaching is the job for you! The profession needs bright young people who are willing to dedicate themselves to improving education in Ontario. Here is the answer for people who are really concerned and want to do something constructive about our educational system.

Education is as stimulating, challenging and progressive as its teachers make it. If you don't like the way it is, get in there and change it!

Exciting things are already happening throughout the system from kindergarten to Grade 13. Did you know, for example, that:

1. there are schools in operation now in which the children determine their own program in collaboration with their teachers?
2. children as young as 6 or 7 years old are learning how to do research, and are carrying out their own?
3. children are creating and living history and drama rather than reading about it?
4. children are visiting places like the City Hall in order to learn about today, or places like Pioneer Village in order to learn about yesterday?
5. there are schools in which children are not confined to a particular 4-walled classroom, 30-35 classmates, and one teacher, but are free to move about in a large open area in which they work with a team of teachers, different ones at different times of the day, and a few or many classmates depending upon the activity in progress?

But, this is not the situation everywhere in Ontario schools. It is not even the situation everywhere in Metro Toronto. Why? Because more people like you — young, interested, ambitious and hard-working are needed!

Did you know that as a teacher you are paid according to your education and receive the same salary and benefits no matter whether you teach 5-year-olds or 18-year-olds? Did you know that the opportunities for advancement for bright young people are good?

If you would like to know more about teaching particularly at the Public School, and Junior High School (Senior School) level, come to the meeting this Thursday, February 27 at 4 p.m. in the Sidney Smith Building, Rm. 1073 and find out more.

The challenge is out — are you up to it?

This column is dedicated to Ian (and Sue) on the occasion of Ian's 21st birthday.

Squash Playoffs! Also Arabs
The squash playoffs are double-elimination, which means (1) Siamese twins are ineligible (2) if you lose twice, you lose.

The Trin trio of Morgan, Gibbins, and Grynoch (at my cottage we do grynoch starts on water skis) triumphed over both UC and Law B in straight games.

New beat Trin B by default. Trin B also lost, worts and all, to Dents, though Worts won his match. Dents winners were McIntosh and McCormick. Dents lost to Law's Sutherland and Laskin ("a small - las" - OED); Brymer won his match for Dents. Law beat New (Laskin, Sutherland, The Great Svami all won). Eng (Lennard, Zaremba the Greek) beat UC (Willert the Wisp). Law B then beat Eng (Purser and Glover for Law B, Spinner for Eng.)

Hockey

Vic got goals from Dawkins and Brown to blank SMC 2-0.

Moffatt helped Trin stove off defeat as Little and Proctor also scored in Trin's 3-0 win over Law.

Doug Treen scored two goals and was selected "Player of the Cosmic Year" as Vic II tied with For A (Swindle, Cox) 2-2. Treen scored again, and was joined by Clark (3), McClelland and Miller to help Vic II over Law II, 6-2. Glover and Strachan hit for Law II.

For a (Cox 2, Tworzynski, Swindle) 4, New 1. Clarke replied for gnus. (gnu is a small

South African antelope related to the itrum.

WOMEN'S SPORT

Bluettes take v-ball

The first weekend of reading week saw U. of T. host the Intermediate Intercollegiate Volleyball and Basketball Tournaments. The Volleyball Championship went to the Toronto team who defeated their opposition in a decisive manner taking McGill and Queen's three games to none, and Waterloo three games to one. This win coupled with the Toronto Senior Championship victory of three weeks ago puts the Toronto Volleys well out in front of all other Ontario Universities.

The Intermediate Basketball team did not fare quite as well as the Volleyball team as they defeated Waterloo (19-16) but lost close games to Queen's (35-29) and McGill (23-19). Western, the Tournament winners, defeated Toronto 41-32.

Last weekend the Senior Intercollegiate Basketball Team travelled to Guelph for the first half of the W.I.A.U.

Championship Tournament. The Toronto team faced their toughest opposition, Western, in their first game and came up with their best played game of the season. This was the closest, hardest-fought and most significant game for the Bluettes, and when the final buzzer sounded, the Toronto team was out in front by one big point as the game ended 33-32.

With the big win under their belt, Toronto went on to face Guelph who they defeated 24-17. The top scorer of the weekend was Violet Shadd (Meds 11).

This weekend, Toronto hosts the final half of this tournament, and with only 3 games left to play, Toronto has a chance of taking the Basketball Championship for the first time in years. This weekend's biggest opposition is expected to come from MacMaster. Best of Luck.

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1969-70 MONDAY MARCH 10 1969

This is the second year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate, will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 125 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of the three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"
  - The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"
  - The nominee polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"
- (The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee - see next paragraph).

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport"

The Athletic Directorate as the controlling body for athletics at this University meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence, also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

J. P. LOOSEMORE, Secretary
University of Toronto Athletic Association.

YEA, SUDDEN-DEATH, VERILY FOR BASKETBALL BLUES

By JIM MORRISON

Varsity Blues gained home court advantage for tonight's sudden-death basketball playoff when McMaster Marauders disposed of Western Mustangs 90-77 on Monday night.

Game time for the Mac encounter is 8:15 p.m. at York University (Tait MacKenzie Building). And for the first time this year, an admission charge (50 cents) will be levied.

High man for Marauders Monday night was lanky center Jim Noble with 27 points. Doug Morton had 21 for Western.

Varsity and Mac split their two meetings this season, Mac winning 78-70 in Hamilton and Blues triumphing 69-61 at York. This game promises to be as exciting as the others, so turn out in hordes to support a potential championship team.

The winner of tonight's game travels to Windsor for the SIBL championship tournament Friday and Saturday.

MVPs

LAURENT DEMPSTER

As both the basketball and hockey Blues head into their most important games of the season, they've cleaned up shop a bit by announcing their most valuable player awards.

Centre Paul Laurent receives the Dr. W. A. Dafoe Trophy awarded annually to the player on the hockey team "who in the opinion of his teammates is most deserving."

And guard-cum-forward Bruce Dempster was chosen by his teammates to receive the Dr. W. A. Potter Trophy as the most valuable member of the cage Blues.

Laurent, in his fourth year with Blues, led the league in goals scored this season with 23. He has been chosen as the SIHL's all-star centre for each of the past three seasons.

Dempster, an all-star guard last season, was moved to a forward position by coach John McManus early this year, and the move has paid off handsomely as evidenced by Blues' streak into the playoffs. Dempster is in his third year with Varsity, after a brilliant high-school career at Don Mills.

Varsity Blues' high-scoring forward, Bruce Dempster, just named the team's most valuable player, storms for the basket during home game against McMaster Marauders. Varsity play Mac tonight at York in a sudden-death contest to decide second place and the final playoff berth.

MOST POPULAR SPORT

TORONTO SQUASH BUG BIG—3500 PARTICIPANTS

By PHIL BINGLEY
Varsity Sports Editor

The most popular sport at this university in terms of individual participation is one which involves about 3500 graduates, undergraduates and faculty. Naturally that sport would have to be one of hockey and basketball. Right?

Wrong again sports fans! The biggest thing on the jock circuit at Hart House these days is none other than the game of squash. Each day, from 8 a.m. to 11 p.m., the three undersized courts in the HH sub basement are crowded by enthusiasts who drop in for a workout or a match.

Squash at the university has been and still is growing at an incredibly prolific rate. And, right now the cream of the competitive crop is the five-man intercollegiate squad coached by racketeer emeritus Ralph Rimmer.

Ralph has been on the job for more than a few years and his list of distinguished pupils include Colin Adair, recently crowned the Canadian Men's singles champion and Peter Martin, the reigning intercollegiate singles titleholder from McGill.

Rimmer and his team — Vic Harding, Ashley Perkins, Steve MacIntyre, D'Arcy Martin and Albie Garbe — are preparing for the OQAA finals to be staged at Waterloo this week-end. On Monday and Tuesday of this week, Blues worked out at the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club. The courts at HH are not regulation size and Rimmer wanted to give his players an opportunity to ready themselves under tournament conditions.

During the workout, Rimmer pointed out several of the finer points of the game. For the uninitiated, squash is similar to tennis. The racquets are smaller than those used in the net game as is the hard hollow ball which reaches speeds of up to 120 miles per hour.

Played in an enclosed room-like court with high walls, the object of the game is to continue to hit the ball off the front wall (as opposed to hitting it into your opponents court in tennis) until one's adversary cannot make a return shot. The ball is in play as long as it does not hit the floor twice in succession before being played against the wall again. A shot is also considered dead if it hits the front panel at a point less than a foot above the floor. Carom shots off any of the walls are completely legal provided the ball eventually touches the front barrier.

Rimmer believes, among other things, that technique rather than tactics is the most important aspect of squash. "The game is very popular in that it takes a minimum of time to get a maximum amount of exercise. One can play a match, shower, dress and be on his way all in a matter of 40 minutes. Equipment is cheap and you only need one opponent to organize a match.

"A person interested in taking up the game should first learn to hold the racquet properly and then how to strike the ball. The Squash Committee at Hart House holds a novice night each October and individuals are instructed by senior players in these basic skills.

"As far as tactics, I'll take a hard hitter over a finesse player anytime. Of course, this is only if he knows exactly what he is doing and can control the ball."

The serve in squash is one area which Rimmer feels is oft misunderstood. "It is not enough just to get the ball into play on the serve as so many people seem to think. This first shot should put one's opponent on the defensive immediately. Occasionally a player can even pick up a point if the serve is good enough."

Turning to the Varsity team, Vic Harding (Trinity IV) is the top seed and a leading contender for the OQAA singles title this Saturday. Rimmer says Vic has improved steadily all year (this is his third with the team) although he was highly rated even at the beginning of the season.

Vic was a finalist in both the Canadian and Ontario championships and last Friday won a Toronto and District "B" tourney.

The team's only freshman is second man Ashley Perkins (Innis I). Ashley recently came to Canada from England and his development in making the switch from squash English-style to the Canadian game has been smooth and rapid. Over 'ome they use a softer ball and the action is much slower. That doesn't seem to have bothered Perkins who recently made it to the semi-finals in the Canadian Junior tournament before losing out to the eventual winner.

Steve MacIntyre (Trin IV) is the intellectual of the group. Playing at the number three position, Steve has won a scholarship to Cambridge next year. He was with the team last year but did not compete in tourneys because of his number 11 ranking. MacIntyre however, worked on his game to move up and enjoyed his finest hour at the McMaster Invitational in Hamilton before Christmas when he won all of his matches.

Another player who has made a big jump in the seeding is D'Arcy Martin (Innis III). Martin was number nine in 1967-68 before moving into the fourth spot this season. D'Arcy has been with the squad in each of his three years since graduating from Trinity College Schools.

Rounding out the contingent is Varsity Blues personified, Albie Garbe (Law II). Albie has done it all at this university and could win his bronze "T" if the squash team comes through. Last year he played with the varsity basketball team and in each of the last two years, he captained the intercollegiate golf team. Albie also plays interfac hockey for Law just to keep in shape.

This is Garbe's first year with the racquetmen and Rimmer considers him the quickest member of the unit.

Besides competing at the intercollegiate level, the team is also entered in the Toronto and District "B" league and as many local tournaments as can be found. The season runs from the first week in October until the middle of March.

So if you are feeling tired and listless, don't bother with Geritol. Buy a racquet, borrow a ball and book a court at your local squash box. You'll have a swinging time.

Rubin raps it up at U of T

By SUSAN REISLER

Jerry Rubin is a person, not a character, a stereo-type, nor an actor, just a person.

When he finally appeared at the airport Wednesday morning after a 45-minute delay with immigration, he greeted us like brothers. He spoke softly though there was anger behind his voice when he explained what immigration put him through.

Take off your sweater, take off your shirt, take off your pants, take off your under-pants.

It was drugs they were looking for. Long hair and drugs are usually paired up.

There were questions, routine, then they let him through.

They didn't know who he was. "Jerry Rubin," a customs official asked me, "Who's he, some kind of revolutionary?"

Arriving on campus, Jerry checked into the SAC office first. Reading Wednesday's Varsity he laughed, "Hey, this is great. I haven't said some of these things in a long time."

And then we were off to the UC Refectory.

The refectionary transmitted the general mood of the campus. There were friends who greeted Jerry with a smile and a wave, but there was a lot of disinterest.

After disregarding his meat-pie he tried to talk to people around him but it was rushed and they were frightened.

On to Sid Smith. But the lobby was overflowing already. He was told the meeting had been moved to Convocation Hall.

Great, said Jerry. "I like lots of people. I gain energy from them and they pick up energy from me."

So we walked up through Sir Dan's to St. George to make sure everyone heard the meeting was changed.

Along the way we talked and joked with people. Where are you going? To hear Jerry Rubin. Great.

As we rerouted ourselves around the University Bookstore we could feel the numbers growing.

Behind and in front there was a sea of faces rushing to get seats.

As Jerry tried to talk to some their reactions were interesting. Some girls were frightened and jumped away. But many brothers stopped to shake his hand and exchange a greeting.

Inside they poured in, hundreds, until there were over two thousand beings crushed into the domed auditorium as others jammed the corridors.

Everyone clapped, cheered, jerrered threw things and generally made noise.

As he donned his Viet Cong cape there were more cheers and jeers.

There was no spectacular introduction. Only this short, almost slight guy standing in the midst of all those people, telling them of his experience with immigration officials.

In the distance we could hear the LGMB. It was greeted with cheers but the music was muffled because the boys couldn't get into the hall.

The Yippie Movement doesn't exist — it's a fiction. Its members? Well, check the Washington telephone book.

But people say it does exist, so you have a movement that's trying to relate things to ourselves. We are fighting for our own freedom.

The thing's a myth just like the philosophy "Rise up and abandon the creeping meatball". It can mean anything you want it to mean.

People say we are against Johnson. We like Lyndon Johnson. I mean, who founded the hippies? Lyndon Johnson. Where would we be without LBJ?

The audience was doing its own thing too.

"Get your hands out of your pocket", they shouted. "One at a time." And more orders.

Then they called for Fromm. He was greeted with a Sieg Heil from friendly enemies.

He told the crowd we shouldn't be angry with Jerry, he was only a single person. "The person we should be annoyed with is the so-called president of this university because he is not following the laws for safety and order on this campus."

That went over well with everyone and the jeers drowned him out for a moment. But somehow he came back with more. Clark Kerr's name was thrown in and then Fromm called for more Ronald Reagans.

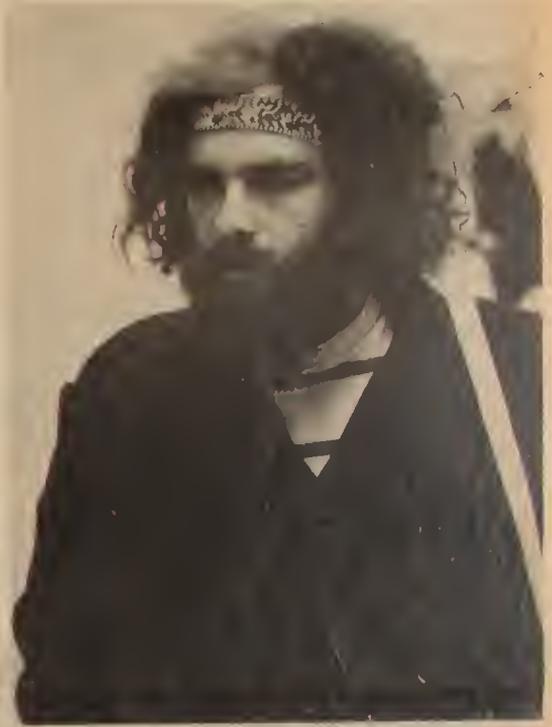

Jerry thanked Fromm for co-ordinating the act to make all the issues clear.

There is a difference between a guy who has power and one who speaks without authority, Jerry said.

And me, I'm powerless. The only power I have is that I think. Ronald Reagan has the power to murder and put armed violence in the streets.

Reagan is a national expression of an irrational disease. America doesn't have a cold, it has cancer and Reagan lays this out in the open.

And George Wallace? Picketing George Wallace is like picketing Hitler. I mean, what can you do about him? You legitimize his irrationality by picketing him.

Jerry Rubin arriving at Toronto International Airport.

Rubin and the Yippies joined in Wallace's campaign last year, forcing Wallace to denounce them in spirited language. At Chicago the Yippies supported Pegasus, a pig for president.

They said Chicago was part of a conspiracy. Well, how do you think we got there — youth fare. They knew we were coming.

Long hair may be the most controversial issue in the United States today. Long hair communicates something. It's saying visually that there is a certain amount of disrespect and a new identity. I think that's what's happening around the world.

TV made Daly's Chicago fail because we found out about it as it happened. Chicago is typical, just typical. The same is happening all over.

TV makes demonstration a one minute special. I've never seen a boring demonstration on TV.

Communism is indelible. I don't dig Russia. I have allegiance to what I have in front of me, who I'm lighting for and my brothers.

Vietnam is the responsibility of humanity. There's no such thing as a local struggle.

The US and Russia are interested in the status quo. When you start talking your own scene then people start reacting.

Vietnam has enabled us to express rebellion against our own conditions.

People interrupted. Said he was being funny.

"Reality is funny," Jerry said. "Each incident I'm talking about is like a historical drama."

More noise followed. People got up so they wouldn't be late for class.

He stopped, but it wasn't over. Students converged on the podium, friends surrounded him, every one with a question.

Confused, he looked around helplessly, hoping he could get out. He was stoned — he muttered — not on acid or pot or anything else like that. Jerry is a "feeley" person who reacts with crowds. For an hour and a half the crowd had pulled him in all directions and to use more jargon, he had had his mind blown. It was as simple as that. But then everybody needn't understand that.

What did you learn in school today?

By MIKE KESTERTON

Scientists, as we all know, have powers far beyond those of mortal men. When the Zoology building was being designed, all the botanists, biologists and ecologists at U of T said to themselves, "Why should we be forced to swill the same tap water that the rest of Toronto drinks?" So they built a dechlorinator into the system, and saw that it was good.

Not content with eliminating Gordon Sinclair's "rat poison", they also stipulated that all the plumbing be of cast iron, so that they could do without copper traces as well.

Unfortunately, there is an anaerobic bacterium that thrives on metals like iron. It has settled into the Zoology building plumbing system and has started to "eat" all the lovely iron and rust. (Just as it has everywhere else the cast iron pipes are used). The water system is a swamp — the taps produce a golden brown, stringy stream of water when turned on and when the pipes aren't used for a while, they frequently burst under the pressure built up by the bacterium.

It's reassuring to realize that these men have charge of the education of the next generation's pollution and environment experts, etc.

Council admits library inefficiency

Complaints of library inefficiency highlighted the first open meeting of the Library Council Wednesday afternoon.

Prof. A. K. Warder, Chairman of the Department of East Asian Studies, said that up to six years elapse, in some cases, between the request for purchase of a book for his department and getting it on the library shelf.

He attributed the inefficiency to the high turnover of library staff, and suggested pay hikes to retain staff.

Chief Librarian R. H. Blackburn said that a partial study is underway of the library staff, preliminary to a general study of non-academic staff of the university.

The council accepted a proposal from Graduate Dean Ernest Sirluck to recommend to the Senate Budget Committee that any pay increase for professional librarians be comparable to any increase for teaching staff. The proposal was accepted unanimously.

It was also announced that the Subcommittee on the Composition of the Library Council had recently held a meeting and had discussed the jurisdiction of the Council.

The Subcommittee has been set up to investigate the future of the executive of the Council, the size of the Council, and its jurisdiction, as well as its composition. The council now has more than 60 members five of them students.

Student Library Council member Temma Stulberg (SGS) said that the subcommittee would probably discuss how Council members should be chosen at a second meeting next Tuesday.

In reply to questions concerning the financing of library operations, Blackburn revealed that the library spends about 7 per cent of the total university budget.

He said this compares favorably with many American universities.

Dean Sirluck ended the discussion with a plea for stronger efforts to bring private donations into the university.

He said that organizations such as the now-defunct Friends of the University of Toronto Library would give a welcome lift to library purchasing.

Pollution Probe

Pollution Probe membership has soared to 50, and organizers are wandering if Room 432, Ramsey Wright, will hold prospective members as the organizational meeting gets under way at 4 p.m. today.

The harried executive is wandering how to control all the members who are eager to start work immediately.

An audience of about 200 jammed a lecture hall yesterday to watch the CBC's Air of Death, a program about pollution soon to be investigated by the Canadian Radio and Television Corporation.

Preliminary results of a Varsity survey indicate most of the audience was strangely behind the CBC in its efforts to inform the public.

In an unfortunate coincidence, an Ontario Water Resources film Commission on water pollution was shown at the same time and was poorly attended. Hopefully, it can be shown again.

Liberals consider radical tactics

By DARIA ANTONYSHYN

More than 200 delegates from 50 campus Liberal clubs across Canada met in Montreal last weekend at a Canadian University Liberal Federation convention.

University of Manitoba student Tom Bernes was elected president of the CULF, renamed Canadian Student Liberals-Etudiants Liberal de Canada during the course of the convention.

"The crucial shortcoming of CSL-ELC," he said, "is that it has not been relevant to the concerns and aspirations of today's student."

"While debate rages on campuses across Canada about CUS, democratization of the university, quality of education, drugs, the opening up of our political processes — CSL has been self-satisfied talking about American domination of Canadian industries, about pollution, about urbanization.

"Unless we can articulate and become involved in the student revolt nobody, not even the Cabinet, will listen to us for we will represent nobody but ourselves.

"To be ignored by the Cabinet is one thing. To not be considered credible by our association in the university is a disgrace. It is to this that CSL must be devoted over the next year."

Waterloo University's John Varley, the English speaking vice-president of CSL says:

"I am a Liberal, and therefore committed to changes in society consonant with valid criticism.

Do student radicals have valid criticisms? Varley said:

"The economic elite, radicals believe, cause most of our hang-ups since they control everyone from workers to clerks to students. Being separated from any real responsibility is what intellectual radicals call 'alienation'.

"The goals of society become the goals of monopolistic businessmen. The trap is inescapable. Student radicals try to shake up their apathy by demonstrations: the capitalist-owned media condemn them.

"Perhaps we should be thinking of adapting their argument instead of merely criticizing their tactical indiscretions."

Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau said:

"Youth won't wait til tomorrow to make its influence known — it wants to determine now what kind of society it's going to be living in. Youth can be of value by rejecting accepted modes of thought as suitable for the present.

"I believe the great portion of student activists on campus are illiberal, anti-intellectual and anti-university. They use the tool of democracy to destroy the tool of debate, the tool of freedom to intimidate opponents.

"Liberals should stand for these tools and the means of democracy and fight for the right to dissent. Young Liberals should stand on the side of excellence and the rights of democracy."

Among resolutions passed and recommendations made were the following:

- Canada should give notice of its withdrawal from NATO;
- Canada should divert a greater proportion of her current defence expenditures into both foreign and domestic aid.

- Canada should terminate the NORAD agreement;

Recommendations included support for the Governments "initiatives to normalize relations with the government of the People's Republic of China; and endorsement of the question of Taiwanese sovereignty as an issue for the "Chinese to settle among themselves." In this connection it was also resolved that "Canada distribute its exterior help in function of regional units instead of political units."

Students charged in Peterboro fined $50

PETERBOROUGH (CUP) — Three of over 20 students arrested during the Peterborough Examiner strike last December were fined $50 here Wednesday when they pleaded guilty to a charge of obstructing a police officer.

Ontario students, numbering up to 300, travelled to Peterborough throughout December and January to walk the picket lines with 21 workers from the local newspaper guild. The reporters went on strike in early November when their contract negotiations with the Thomson paper broke down.

Trials for the remaining arrested students will take place in March.

Jerry Rubin and the objective press

By BARRY KADE

At last 2,000, mostly uncommitted students get a chance to see how the "objective" professional press can deliberately distort an event.

Not only is the story, which appeared on the front page of the third section of Toronto's largest paper, riddled with juxtaposition, innuendo and missing information, but there are glaring inaccuracies as well.

If you listened to Jerry Rubin at Convocation Hall Wednesday, pick up this paper and see for yourself.

More than once, stories on student affairs have been distorted, even to the point of complete fabrication. Witness Peter Warrian's famous "burn-down the universities" statement reported last fall, a remark he never made.

Radicals have become used to this, considering it an occupational hazard. And usually if the reporter or the editorial desk twist the story, it's their word against that of the few people who attended. But against 2,000?

Rubin did not, as the paper states, receive a "chilly reception". This is nothing less than a gross inaccuracy.

"Two thousand University of Toronto students turned out to hiss, boo and shout Rubin down".

It's easy to see not only the logical fallacy in this statement but the slanderous intention behind the wording.

To anybody reading the story, the message is clear: U of T students hated Rubin. Why then, did 2,000 show up? Did all 2,000 come with the express intent of booing? If they did, more than three-quarters of them were either too frightened or too lazy because to them the skeptical observer, they seemed to applaud again and again.

The newspaper reports: "I'm stoned, I don't know what I'm saying," Rubin said when he repeatedly became confused during his two-hour speech."

What is this supposed to mean? Did Rubin say this every time he paused to collect his thoughts? People asked him afterwards point blank if he were on drugs. His reply was a straight "no." Obviously he meant he was "high" on something else — the crowd maybe?

"The students shot water guns at Rubin on stage, beat on drums and played trumpets to heckle him."

People sitting around Rubin report they never saw water guns, and the drum beating and trumpets came from the LGMB outside the hall, making far less noise than they usually make tuning up their instruments.

And the headline, "Toronto students boo, hiss as U.S. Yippie leader speaks." Any student of elementary logic knows this is no lie, just not the truth either. And in a daily paper, shame, shame!

"Rubin spoke to 50 Queens University students". Our sources report more than 400 people.

The incongruity and sloppiness of the story indicate a rewrite job at the city desk. No professional reporter could have done the job alone. Mind you, nothing's wrong with rewrites, unless the desk has a different view of the situation and distorts the story to fit that view.

There's nothing wrong with bias in a newspaper. It's the prerogative of any responsible press. But when the paper claims to be objective, and when it leads thousands of people to believe so, such coverage of the news can only breed contempt.

It makes you sort of wonder about the rest of the stories they print, doesn't it?

our (?) new library

No matter how you phrase it, the new humanities and social sciences research library is clearly labelled "For Graduates Only".

Oh, sure, undergraduates will be allowed in "as they need the facilities" and Dr. Bissell assures us it will be "for research; it's not a graduate library". And chief librarian R. H. Blackburn has said material will be available to all members of the university.

But the fact remains that undergraduates will not be welcome in the new building.

The Users Committee report published in June, 1965, states the library is primarily designed "to serve the research needs of faculty and graduate students, and of undergraduates as they need the facilities."

This, apparently, means the undergraduates will have paging privileges, but no stack access. In this respect the research library is a $41,000,000 joke on undergrads.

Students at this university have just spent two years trying to get stack access in the existing facilities. At present, stack access is extended to arts and science students in second, third and fourth years, medicine students, second to fourth year students in dentistry and law, and all those in the schools of library science, social work and graduate studies. In addition, first year arts and science students are being allowed in if they can show they need stack access.

But once the new library opens, all undergraduates will be back on the paging system for humanities and social science books, despite its obvious drawbacks.

We've been told that undergraduates won't need the new library because the Wallace Room and the rest of Sigmund Samual library will be expanded into "a really functional undergraduate library." But how functional can it be, when the humanities and social science stacks, the reference material and the rare book collection are all going to the new library?

Policy for the new library is not yet set. It would be reassuring if the Library Council gave undergraduates stack access now, avoiding a repetition of the last two year's work. If it turns out that undergraduates do not need the new library, nothing will have been lost. If they do need it, they should have equal access with the rest of the community of scholars.

As Dr. Bissell says, "If you say the library is the very centre of the university, you can't keep the students out of it."

Ever notice what happens
When two brands start to compete?

They get better.

GM recalls 535,000 vehicles for parts check

atta be, Paul!

Paul Fromm, whom we all thought was a lovable right-winger, is coming over to the radical side.

He put his finger right on most of the university's problems during Jerry Rubin's speech when he told the audience of 2,000:

"The man we should be attacking is not Mr. Rubin — he probably can't help himself — but the president of the university, Dr. Claude Bissell."

The profound cheering that greeted the remark indicates that Mr. Fromm's feeling is shared by many in the university community. But then he had to spoil it by saying Dr. Bissell was soft in letting Rubin on campus in the first place.

Oh well, you're getting close, Paul.

rubin should offer concrete alternative

I would like to voice my opinion concerning some of the viewpoints expounded by Mr. Jerry Rubin at Convocation Hall on Feb. 26; it seems I was not in a position to pose questions to Mr. Rubin as he seemed sad that some hecklers had opinions contrary to himself and his com(un)patriots.

May I first say that I was glad to see that Mr. Rubin was not the ranting and raving maniac that publicity burbs made him out to be, but rather he came off as a dandily dressed, very witty orator who kept the masses entertained. By his putdown of several legitimate questions posed by the audience, he showed his disapproval of people disagreeing with his views. I must honestly say that I agreed with some of his points, but it is not at all plausible to condone his methods.

He wants to rebel for the sake of rebellion. Even though a person recognizes defects within the house that he lives, he would be stupid to tear it down and then wonder where to stay. We agree that there are problems in modern day society, but Mr. Rubin does not and obviously can not provide alternatives or solutions. His only purpose is to try and show that these problems do exist and no more.

When he suggests non-compulsory public and high school education he is being ridiculous because there is nothing constructive that one could do out of school even if he were old enough to decide to quit in the first place (seven years old maybe??).

Finally, I wonder what Mr. Rubin suggests the "well-educated" soul would do in his life after completing a course of Mr. Rubin's "relevant" studies? Certainly he would be "well-educated" and would realize the problems of society but what would he do with this knowledge? Who would pay him a salary? Could he feed his hunger pangs with his new-found knowledge? One never hears of anybody wishing they hadn't gone to university and thank God there is still a place in this world for people with educational degrees, professional and otherwise.

I hope Mr. Rubin goes on educating people of the problems of the world, but until he knows what he wants rather than what he doesn't want, I wish he would put his energy to some better function than take-overs, burnings and sit-ins. We can never possibly reach Mr. Rubin's Utopia but in the meanwhile I wish we could be rid of his type of "negative-ism"!!!!

Brian Silver

PS. These are all of my own views, and I do not by any means, represent any one else in my own faculty or anyone else's.

"hitlerite defence of status quo"

F. Protter's letter of Feb. 12 is a shining example of the tactics necessary to defend the status quo. A distinguishing feature of reaction is to be helpless in the face of concrete, specific arguments such as were presented by radicals at Clark Kerr's public lecture. Defenders of the status quo must always resort to innuendo and name-calling; they must always appeal to abstract principle and avoid facts.

Certainly radicals have done their share of name-calling but, at Kerr's lecture, they spoke specifically on the topic. Protter does not attempt to counter the specific analysis of the university and the nature of free speech put forward by radicals by a factual analysis of his own.

Abstract principles mask reality. Facts show that certain principles are not observed in practice and indeed under a social system such as capitalism cannot be. For instance, the right to own and control the means of production wealth, with all this entails for every area of individual and social life, is, on the abstract level, a universal right. But under capitalism only a tiny minority can enjoy this "right".

The appeal to abstract principle is the first step toward mystification. As mystification grows and concrete thinking ends, it becomes easier and easier to justify the defence of these abstract principles by police violence, first against some minority used as a scapegoat for ills caused by the existing system, then against larger and larger sections of the population. Of course, "freedom" has its price, as ex-president Johnson never tired of repeating, and must be defended!

Talk of police reserves formed by student volunteers, as Protter suggests, trained in crowd-control and in "emergency" to be commanded by the regular police, has a distinct association with a type of thought that millions fought and died to destroy, obviously without lasting success, the most disgusting mystification of them all — the ideology and practice of Hitlerite fascism.

plastic people and creeping meatball

There was this guy up there and he was blowing beautifully. He was calling to these plastic people to free themselves. These little plastic people raised on a culture of white honkie bullshit — plastic bullshit. They made funny noises and threw things. "Abandon the creeping meatball." Hell, these guys were riding on it. Maybe because it's all they know. Maybe because it's safe. Secure in the knowledge that after they went home and masturbated that night, the world would be safe again. I think they're lost.

"abolish compulsory public education"

Regarding your editorial "Under The High School Principal's Thumb": we have all heard many times the statement that power corrupts (etc.). This is a case in point.

The reason that so many school principals are dictatorial in manner is simply that they are dictators in the power they possess. Compulsory public education gives them a captive audience. The school principal is a monopolist with a captive market — he has a service which parents of children under sixteen must buy (by law), and they must buy it from him. Therefore he does not have to compete with other schools for "customers" by providing education geared to the students' interests and desires. He can impose regimentation because students who object can't go elsewhere, depriving him of customers and tuition revenues. (Anywhere else they might go, the same educational situation obtains.)

ational situation obtains.)

The only way to prevent authoritarian behaviour is to deprive individuals of arbitrary power.

The way to make schools more responsive to student needs and interests is to dislodge teachers and principals from their dictatorial position, by making education voluntary and privately operated, so that teachers and principals must compete for customers, in the free market, by offering better, less authoritarian education.

Abolition of compulsory public education is the only reform which can eliminate the abuses your editorial criticizes. Are you willing to advocate this reform?

Paul Kernighan
(IV NEW)

Dislodging the authoritarianism from our schools would necessarily involve making attendance voluntary, agreed. But under your system, many could not afford to go to school even if they wanted to and that carries its own connotations of authoritarianism, the authoritarianism of unequal opportunity. So we think education should continue to be publically supported.

TSM clarifies

The Toronto Student Movement wishes to clarify its position on the forthcoming presidential elections for the Students Administrative Council:

1. Mr. Kopyto and Miss Kirzner are not official or unofficial candidates for the TSM. They are a Young Socialist (i.e. Trotskyist) slate.

2. The TSM does not support the candidacy of ANY candidates in the election, whether or not they have already declared their intention to run.

3. The TSM believes that the base for a student movement at Toronto must be built up outside the student council. We reject elitist methods of decision making. We have felt it best to pass over in silence the largely unsuccessful attempts made this last year by SAC to develop a strategy through the concept (compulsory) "student unionism".

Under capitalism, racism flourishes.. Rocky Jones

By AGI LUKACS

"If it's necessary for me to use violence in order to exist, how can you say it's wrong?" asked Nova Scotian Black Power leader Rocky Jones.

He was addressing a student audience during a taping of the TV show Under Attack Wednesday night at Convocation Hall.

He described his goal as "the total liberation of black people," or giving them the power to determine their own destiny.

"Canadians are racist because Canada is an extension of America, and America is racist," he argued.

"There is no degree of distinction between discrimination in the United States and Canada," he told program moderator Fred Davis. "If a Canadian real-estate salesman refuses nicely to sell me a house, and an American just refuses, the result is the same.

"Under capitalism, racism flourishes," he said, just before the taping was interrupted for a word from our sponsor.

"Wouldn't the small percentage of blacks in Canada keep their revolutionary movement from being taken seriously?" asked panelist Gary Webster (SGS).

"There is no skin color behind a revolution," he declared. "Indians are the natural allies of black people," he elaborated, "as will be white workers when they come to see the need for change.

"Aren't you splitting the

revolutionary movement," continued Webster, "by opposing the Jewish minority."

Jones admitted his movement's support of the Arabs in the Middle East situation, in order to achieve African unity, ignored history, because Arabs originally sold blacks into slavery.

He described himself as an African, not a Canadian, and said, "I hope we'll be able to take the mother country back from the whites."

A panelist from Jamaica challenged Black Power demands made simply on the basis of our color."

"In Jamaica we work for what we want, and control our country," said Ryerson student Carmen Bailey. A member of the audience later described conditions in Jamaica as just like those in the U.S.

Jones, 26, is a former civil rights worker, and one of the organizers of the now-defunct Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee. He is now studying African history at Dalhousie University, Halifax.

Bissell warns of community retaliation

KINGSTON (VNS) — President Claude Bissell told an audience at Queen's University last night that student extremists will cause an aroused community to retaliate and destroy the liberal university as we know it.

He told students and faculty that physical plant, design, and releasing role," he said.

Teitelbaum joins presidential race

"The Student Administrative Council does not do its job unless it makes an obvious attempt to be representative," said Bernard Teitelbaum (IIUC) last night. Teitelbaum is the latest entry in the SAC presidency contest.

As yet without a running mate, Teitelbaum believes that SAC is unrepresentative of the students "because it has made very little attempt to be a university institution."

"This can be best achieved through a president who is open to arguments from all sides, who can get the students to believe they have an influence after they have cast their ballot," he says.

Teitelbaum would also invite briefs, sound but student council opinions, in the faculties, and hold referendums on big issues. To keep SAC attuned to campus opinion.

His first referendum would be to determine student opinion on the issue of SAC involvement in extra-university affairs. He feels that at present the SAC constitution forbids allocation of funds or support for such groups as draft dodgers.

"Students should have 50 per cent participation in all mat-relations" by a united student front with respect for law and order, the faculty and the administration, he said. He has no objection to organized protest or strikes, he added, if the situation warrants them.

If such action failed, he feels his only alternative would be to release the issue to the press. The election of next year's president and vice-president will take place March 10.

Reform should be carried out for "improved university

Council backs Ivey's right to choose

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

New College Principal D. G. Ivey will be making the final decision in choosing a new dean of men, despite student attempts of the college council to give students a decisive say in the selection.

The college council Wednesday night rejected a proposal from Tom Maibaum (III New) to set up a special selection committee composed equally of students and faculty plus Principal Ivey.

The proposal was first put forward in mid-February, but tabled while Ivey investigated the procedure for appointing a dean.

There is no set procedure other than the recommendation of the college principal to the university president. The president then recommends to the board of governors, who have the final say.

Under Maibaum's proposal the committee, rather than the principal alone, would decide on the change for dean to be against the change because "it is not in the present structure."

He said yesterday he was not against change but that that was what the Commission on University Government was for.

Another committee, advisory to Dr. Ivey has been set up, composed of two faculty members of the academic staff, registrar Prof. F. A. Hare, dean of women students, Miss Huntingford, NCSA president, and residence committee chairman Peter Heath (III New). Ivey still maintains veto power over this committee's recommendations.

Though Dr. Ivey says he did

Computer technology is one of the fastest growing fields of applied knowledge today. Computers are already into their third generation after not much more than twenty-five years since the beginning of the first. These three generations generally correspond to advances in the field of electronics, particularly the evolution that has taken place from the vacuum tube to the transistor, and most recently the transition to microminiaturized circuitry. In an integrated circuit, or IC, several components such as transistors and resistors can be reduced to specks of controlled 'rust' on a single chip of germanium or silicon small enough to fit through the eye of a needle.

Along with this rapid electronic evolution, there has developed an aura of technological magic which surrounds the computer and transforms it into the 'electronic brain', an image of a sleek machine with incomprehensible flashing lights and thoughts moving at the speed of light. But when the analogy of the computer and the human brain is examined more closely, several basic differences become apparent. First, considering the size, there are about  $10^{10}$  neurons in the human central nervous system and they fill a volume of only about 1 litre. Even with microminiaturized integrated circuitry, however, it would take a good sized room just to hold the electronic numerical equivalent of the neurons in the human brain. However, comparing the electronic and the human speeds of operation, a typical nerve ending can process only about fourteen distinct impressions per second. At top speed the mind may be able to distinguish stimuli  $10^{-4}$  seconds apart. On the other hand, modern transistor circuitry has a reaction time on the order of  $10^{-7}$  seconds; millions of operations can be processed per second.

If modern electronics seems to be much faster than human nerve cells, it is necessary to note also the fundamental difference in the type of information communicated between neurons and between electronic circuits, as well as the number of paths of communication any particular 'cell' has with the other 'cells' in the environment. In the case of the computer, the basic unit of information is the bit, short for binary digit, which numerically is either a zero or a one, but can be interpreted as a true or a false, or as a yes or a no. A computer converts numbers in our decimal system, or logical values, to representations in binary notation. It can then perform, extremely rapidly, arithmetic or logical operations on collections of bits. It is because of this binary digit method of representation that the major class of computers are called digital computers. There is another basic class of computer's called analog computers which operate by employing electronic, or even mechanical models to simulate a particular problem or mathematical relationship in a smooth or continuous fashion. The digital computer operates on discrete packets of data or information. In the neuron there are both discrete and continuous, and even random processes occurring. Its operation can never be more than roughly approximated by either a completely digital or a completely analog model. Thus, while the digital computer can only deal with simple on-off electronic pulses, the human nervous system uses complex and varied mechanical-electrical-chemical interactions.

The problem of the number of paths of communication is generally considered in terms of the interconnectivity of the cells in the environment. A given collection of bits in the computer, usually called a word, can in general only be connected to one other collection of bits, or word, at a time, although these connections can be switched sequentially. But in the human brain, a single neuron can interact with up to one thousand other neurons simultaneously! Thus, while the computer can be considered a device for the sequential processing of discrete bits of information, the human brain is capable of simultaneously evaluating many continuously varying impressions. However, just as a person can add a column of figures, a sequential discrete process, a computer can monitor the operation of a series of pumps and flow meters in an oil refinery and adjust things so that the plant operates smoothly, an essentially continuous and multiple process. The important thing to note is that there are certain classes of tasks that can be performed more efficiently by the computer, while there is still a universe of problems that even our hypothetical computer technology will not be able to help us to solve or understand. These ideas contrasting the computer and its manner of functioning with that of the human brain are excellently treated in a book by John Von Neumann entitled, The Computer and the Brain.

At present, the uses of computers might be divided into three general categories. First, there is business data processing: the processing and computing of payroll checks, maintaining sales and inventory records, and assigning classroom space to different courses at the beginning of each university year are some examples. Second, controlling the pumps in an oil refinery, the temperature of the furnaces in a steel mill, or the traffic lights here in Toronto are examples of process control applications of computers. Finally, there are scientific or research uses. These are characterized generally by many long and involved operations that are performed relatively few times on a small amount of data. Included in scientific applications are more complex business problems, and research and maintenance for the computer itself. Nonscientific applications tend to be highly repetitive. From these examples, it can be seen that the computer has come to play a fundamental role in the operation of many of the basic institutions of our society.

The depersonalization or alienation of the individual in our society that is often attributed to the monolithic 'electronic brains' is perhaps due to the overly serious attitude with which the computer is approached by both its users, and also by the people who find more and more things in their lives printed by or calculated on the computer. From the discussion above, it is apparent that the computer is only a machine — that adds, subtracts, and makes simple logical decisions very rapidly. It is a tool to be used, and even played with, not something to rule your life. Its meaning is only in how and what it is asked to do.

This is not to minimize the profound sociological implications of having a technology capable of establishing a world wide data resource and communications network that could form the nervous system and consciousness of a global 'techno-human' entity. But the essence of being alive is not to become totally involved in just one infinitesimal segment of the complex games of our society; rather, to be able to move the focus of consciousness along the whole spectrum from the one end of intense and immediate involvement in the experience of living to the other end of detachment, to gain both a perspective of the essential unity of Life and also the deeper security to be able to take life as it comes.

There is a science fiction tale which tells of some time in the future when the whole world is run by a huge computer. This computer is worshipped throughout the land because it provides all the necessities of the people and frees them from work. It is tended by a cult of acolytes who each have a socket set in their foreheads connected to electrodes implanted in their brains. For their devotion, they alone are allowed the privilege of periodically being plugged directly in to the central memory of the great computer, to experience the omniscience and cosmic glory of their computer god.

Computers are also talked about as servants to man. Although human slavery was abolished a century ago in the United States, today mechanical slaves are not only accepted, but also a privilege wanted by all the countries of the world. Computers and modern communications technology have extended the domain of our slavery from being 'energy-slaves' cars and refrigerators to 'information-slaves' of media sources. In his article, "An Evolutionist Looks at Computers", (Information

COMPUTERS

'There is still a universe of problems that even our hypothetical computer technology will not be able to help us to solve or understand.'

Display, Jan-Feb 1969) Garret Hardin, a biology professor, examines the possible long-term side effects of the greatly increased use of computers.

The invention of the cutting knife has led to the degeneration of the human jaw by its partial replacement, externally, of a formerly internal function of human physiology. Thus, the cutting knife is an example of an 'exosomatic adaptation' of 'endosomatic' teeth. Man's dependence on exosomatic knives is not too critical to his ultimate survival. But a large scale dependence on artificial kidneys and electronic heart-pacers, or even the adjustment to walking in shoes and seeing only printed words and perpendicular walls, can cause permanent long-term evolutionary shifts that can render us unable to survive in our former world environments.

In his examination of the future of the computer as an exosomatic adaptation, Hardin draws upon H. G. Wells' tale, The Time Machine. He compares the Morlocks, the people who worked and lived underground and who had, in fact, evolved into a separate species, to those in our society whose work will be taken over by the computer. But the difference is that our Morlocks will have no work to do, they will become vestigial. Only the Eloi will have meaningful work to do, and be able to earn the rewards a highly technological society can provide. But this situation would be highly unstable, since the Morlocks would far outnumber the Eloi. It could be very easy for there to be a violent revolution that would destroy the technology and the society beyond the point of no return.

Hardin offers two possible solutions. He just mentions the possibility of controlling the breeding of the Morlocks, but stops there because "it is taboo to discuss such a possibility." The idea he develops at greater length is the possibility of educating potential 'mental Morlocks' despite the lack of need. Just as athletics has no real purpose, but we continue to have running races because "we dimly recognize that in the long run, we will be badly off if we do not continue to honor and encourage physical prowess," it will become increasingly necessary to "maintain such a transcendental value system in the intellectual realm."

"Computers are part of the authentic evolutionary trend of man. They are exosomatic devices the invention and multiplication of which is made possible by endosomatic intellectual abilities. The computer men who have developed these exosomatic devices are themselves agents of man's evolution now and extending into the future. If man is to survive, these agents must become conscious of the evolutionary implications of their actions."

mccracken stubs kesteron's toe

An orange-coloured box about a foot-square, entitled "Orange Box", sat on a pedestal. Just a simple cube.

"Orange Box is sensuously austere." — Kay Kristwizer, Globe and Mail.

"John McCracken's art is lofty and spiritual rather than emotional or personal." — Gail Dexter, Toronto Star.

"It's a load of old rubbish," — Mike Kesteron, The Varsity.

With the opening of McCracken's show at the AGO, a classical Greek is turning over and over in his unmarked grave. Euclid should have taken out a couple of patents on the geometrical forms he worked with. His descendants could have made a fortune on McCracken's show.

A number of coloured planks leaned against the wall.

"Planks — loafing by the wall in a sun of their own creation, yet lithe and as incipiently tensed as the surfer poised for his wave" — H. Dennis Young, Curator of Modern Art.

"The planks question what we don't know about the objects with which most of us surround ourselves every day of our lives." — James Monte.

"The 35-year-old sculptor had stood, slate-coloured eyes narrowed, as he judged to the inch, seemingly, the exact, meaningful slant of the planks against a wall." — Kay Kristwizer.

"Who left this goddam board here? I nearly broke my toe" — Mike Kesteron.

What is John McCracken doing with all these boards and boxes and pillars and pyramids he has set up?

"McCracken constructs space . . . nothing exists but the bold outline and the space it carves around itself." — Kay Kristwizer.

"My . . . things refer to nothing outside themselves, but which at the same time possibly refer, or relate, to everything." — John McCracken.

"You can relate the minimal artist's own physique with his work." — Gail Dexter. "This sculpture says and does nothing. It is silent and unreadable." "The search for ideal beauty seems impossible."

WHO' LULU

She was more concentrated than the finest consommés. She was alcohol: set a match to her and she would be afire. "Lulu," I said, "I love you, white and yolk and all!"

If I couldn't read the yes in her eyes I could read it in the statistics—births in November were two and a half times higher than the average month, even since pills.

I could see her on the floor of my room, her head in a whirlpool of hair, naked and as lovely in colour as the first morning in paradise; I could see her lift those legs with a baby's innocence. And yes, oh God yes, I could imagine how she would act the rest of the year, up to her very hat in privacy.

Like a professor's daughter. Which she was.

why have we forgotten nelson algren?

"Into a world of letters where we have the fading Faulkner and where that overgrown lil Abner, Thomas Wolfe, casts a shorter shadow, every day Nelson Algren comes like a corvette, or even a big destroyer when one of these things is what you need and need it badly—and at once, and for keeps. He has been around for a long time but only the pros knew about him. . . . Mr. Algren can hit with both hands and move around and he will kill you if you are not awfully careful." Ernest Hemingway, 1949

Nelson Algren is an American writer from Chicago who received the National Book Award in 1949 for The Man With the Golden Arm, a book which was later filmed starring Frank Sinatra. Another Algren book, A Walk on the Wild Side, has also been filmed. It would seem that he is a relatively successful writer.

What would also seem to be true, however, is that Algren is a relatively unread writer, a talent relegated to the movies. None of his novels are available in any of the U. of T. libraries, and they are extremely difficult to find on bookshelves; consequently, none of our students of literature have read the man; and consequently he has no talent. Greater writers have been similarly judged. The English Department creates literary taste.

The reason why The English Department does not like Algren is probably that, as Mordecai Richler says, he is "The Original Original Toughest Kid On The Block." And this is just not the literary fashion these days. As a matter of fact it went out with Studs Lonigan. That is why when Algren writes books about whores and junkies and boxers and freaks and lonesome monsters the weary voice of the critic is heard to say: "How dreary, but X has done it all before and so much better." Or, "There is no true compassion in these modern works, the degraded, the antisocial and the criminal are sentimentalized over, identified with . . . one has to be, a pervert or a savage to elicit sympathy! The point, however, is that when Algren is at his best, no one has done it better before. Then he is not affecting the tough guy but revealing the real humanity of the tough guy, the pimp and the whore. The loneliness and the vulnerability of the tough guy, the humanity of the aberration. The fact that we are all somehow aberrations: his lonesome monsters.

Only because students do not read him, then it is a great pity that The English Department has ignored Algren. Because he is a writer with art and a lot of art. Despite its mawkish title, some of the best stories ever written are contained in The Neon Wilderness which contains tales dating from the thirties.

One of the best stories, "Depend on Aunt Elly", tells of how Wilma drifts from desultory whoring into a three year jail sentence. She is sent to work on a prison farm and discovers she can buy a "furlough" from the place by paying over her bank savings and fifty a month to the warden, Aunt Elly. And so Wilma pays. She gets out of jail and finds a punchdrunk boxer and they get married.

But she never tells him about Aunt Elly. Well, Punchdrunk quits drinking, gets better in the ring, and in a big fight he wins five hundred dollars. And that same night he finds out about Aunt Elly. And so while he sleeps, Wilma quits him; with a rabbit's foot and his own troubles:

"He put his head behind his chin, sparr'd drunkenly with his shadow: a giant's shadow across the wall, elusive and threatening. Came in close and wheeled that left in, heavily. Then felt, suddenly, more tired than he'd ever felt in his life before; as though the bottom had dropped out of something inside him. And winning or losing or whether he ever came from behind again or whether he were drunk or sober didn't make any difference after all.

He went to the corner where the lucky foot lay and picked it up wearily, then stretched out on his stomach on the bed, with the furry little foot clutched in his hand, the great knuckles showing white and helplessly through the copper skin.

And slept at last, with the pitiless city sun beating in all day as though the dark and the rain and the cold, and the all-night tapping at the darkened panes, and the winds that blow forever away from home, might never, never, never come again.

Slept. And dreamed love-dreams."

It is true that the concept of compassion for the perverted, for those who are "forced to choices too hard to bear" is one that has been appropri-ed, sentimentalized and denigrated by American Literature until what has emerged is the whore with the heart of gold. Good writing is compassionate, bad writing is sentimental; good writing tells the truth about people, bad writing distorts that truth; good writing tells of people suffering, bad writing tells about whores with hearts of gold. And this is why Algren is relegated to the movies; because his writing seems a distortion. When he is good there is no distortion. He is a man of integrity, trying, trying, to tell the truth and sometimes succeeding. And when he succeeds he is utterly convincing and, as with any really good story, you are incapable of anything after.

Because Algren knows what is jargon.

This is jargon: its "Yes" is not "Yes"; its "No" is not "No." It is jargon because it diffuses meaning in order to conceal, rather than reveal, the writer's thought. It is jargon because it conveys the impression that the writer is employing Elegant English at the same time that it enables him to falsify his thought. It is jargon because it seeks to make an idea, that is easily refutable, irrefutable. Put into prose, the writer's thought here is that Hemingway was uniquely fortunate in having devised a great style while he had nothing to write about. Put thus honestly, the writer would appear asinine. Jargon, therefore, is the corruption of prose deriving from the writer's own corruption."

Perhaps this is why The English Department ignores Algren. Because he so obviously has no use for so many of them. And the rest of the literary mafia. The New York Jewish Literary Establishment is out. The campus novels are out. Benign critics there are, but the men who masquerade as critics and the literary gentlemen who masquerade as novelists are out.

"They arrived directly from their respective campuses armed with blueprints to which the novel and the short story would have to conform, were a passing grade to be awarded. For they were footnote fellows mostly, a species of public boy that talked like a head on a stick.

Prewar mottoes still hung on the walls, ancestral homilies offering obsolescent mysteries: 'No Man Is An Island.' 'I Have Always Depended Upon The Kindness Of Strangers.' 'While There Is A Soul In Prison I Am Not Free.' Their names were something like 'Leslie Feacure,' 'Elvis Zircon,' 'Lionel Thrillingly,' and 'Justin Poodlespitz' — it was plain the old mottoes would have to come down.

For such signs irritated the new owners and made them wish Hemingway would move out. For he was not, it was plain, a head on a stick, and yet he wouldn't move out. For what a Poodlespitz feels (I ought to have told you before) about a clod being washed into the sea making Europe the less, is that that's no skin off Poodlespitz's hide. And a saying like 'no man is an island' made him uneasy because it implied responsibilities that might well keep a headstick kid from rising. And rising (I wish I had told you before) is what a headstick kid likes to do best of all.

So they made criticism the focus of American writing and that was a pretty shrewd move right there, as neither Elvis nor Leslie nor Lionel nor Justin could write fiction. Yet at footnoting they were really skilled. In fact, it was said of Justin that he would rather write a footnote than ride a passenger train."

Algren would regard as the height of the intellectual catastrophe the critic who says: "The fallacy (is that there is) a rough correlation between the merit of art and the degree of public response to it . . . ." (Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism, pg 4)

Because unlike so many of our writers Algren would subordinate technique to communication. His art is to make you feel what he is trying to say. To translate ideas into emotions.

But the only way to describe a writer is to show you his work. Art is more eloquent than a review but since copyright laws exist you are left with a review. Which is no way to judge the author.

To understand and judge Algren, then, you will have to read him. If you can find him.

WHO'S LULU

She had a beauty to make you jump, like a voice in a room you thought was empty. Though I'd scarcely met her I'd known her from the day of my birth. Her starbright eyes looked up at mine.

"Take me outside", she said.

"I want to kiss the moon on the mouth."

Lulu is worth knowing. You'll find her in CARNIVAL/ a novel by Nigel Fowell/2.50 at the university bookstore.

Janis, death growls

"Come on, come on, come on, come on, Gonna knock you, rock you, seek it to you NOW"

Yum yum lap pant. Look at the little girl in the big green velvet pants and groovy red tassels. Dig the silver pointed shoes and the purple stockings. Watch the boobs. They got rhythm. It's real art. Wow. Janis Joplin is here and she's ALLL woman, right. She sells sex, right. It's all up on display, right. Hmmm.

"Watch her stumble. Dig that recovery. Oh wow, look at that girl. Why there she is practically screwing the microphone.

But the audience really should have enjoyed it; they really should have come in their pants and stood up screaming. If that's what Janis Joplin is about: James Brown in drag. But when it was all over, Janis and the band just sort of drifted off and everybody was left stunned.

What does Janis Joplin do? That's relevant because she was "doing it" very well in her Toronto concert, with a band at least ten times as good as Big Brother. And it was a very painful, frustrating experience. We were watching (not quite voyeurs) an acutely private ritual through a two-way mirror — watching Janis Joplin watch herself trying to sing and dance her way into oblivion:

Just loneliness surrounding me
Gotta be some kind of outside
Nearly everywhere I look
There's none around me

All right. That's a stunning thing: it's powerful and futile. There's no protection: between Janis Joplin and the audience, no distance between the song and her. And she's so far down that there's nothing left to sing to except her own reflection.

Why's it all so hard
Breathing in the air
Really want to care

So you get pushed back into yourself. And given a suicidal context, that's not pretty. There's no release, nothing happening between audience and performer — just a stunning exposure to real isolated pain.

Shooting crystal meth, clugging Southern Comfort: the stuff of legends, m'boy. You get the impression Janis Joplin's out to set an all-time speed record for early death among blues singers. She's just Billie Holiday in a hell of a rush. The singing is death growls.

Want a loving man to understand can't be too much to need

Amateur psychology: watch Janis Joplin play Catherine the Great with her band, demanding fealty and obedience and foot-kissing from each member in turn. And then listen:

I'm a mean, mean woman
I don't mean no one man no good

Guess I'm just like a turtle that's hidin underneath it's hardened shell

But you know I'm very well-protected

I know this goddamn life too well

I'm gonna take good care of Janis

Honey nobody's gonna dog me down

If you didn't see Janis Joplin this time, I wouldn't like to bet that you ever will. And unless you're a necrophiliac, Janis Joplin's no sex symbol.

catch this concert next week

The past year has truly shown us a generation of vibers. (Sorry, Down Beat.) Bobby Hutcherson. Then Gary Burton. And now Karl Berger.

Karl Berger? That's right folks. If all goes well (not at all a foregone conclusion in the jazz world) Mr. Berger will haul his vibraphone out of the courtroom and lug it across the border into the Great Hall of Hart House this Wednesday evening. With him will come, perhaps, one Pharaoh and a Workman.

They call themselves The Total Music Company. Berger studied musicology and philosophy (one hopes he learned to be a stoic) at the University of Heidelberg, and then went to Paris and played with pocket trumpeter Don Cherry. Since then he has played with many of the well known "new" musicians.

Pharaoh Sanders is from Little Rock. After being introduced to the new music by Sonny Simmons on the West Coast, Sanders made it to New York and played with Billy Higgins, the great drummer, and C Sharpe, the ancient looking bebopper, for $8 a night. Sanders slept in the subway (he never heard the song) and ate peanut butter.

As a result of this, he got to talk to John Coltrane about religion and even, sometimes, play with the great man's band. Sanders plays tenor saxophone on a couple of Coltrane's records, Meditations, and Live Again at the Village Vanguard. On Don Cherry's Symphony for Improvisors, Sanders is heard on piccolo.

Among those who follow the new music, Sanders is very famous. Listening to the former sports editor's copy of Tauhid, Sanders' own record on Impulse, I was left with mixed feelings about Sanders' musicianship. Long stretches sound like black anger expressed in interminable harsh, incoherent screeching ensembles. But then there are some passages in which Sanders plays beautiful melodies with a searing, rasping exquisite tone. (Lyrical, we call it in the trade.) I really don't know about Sanders. He could turn out to be a great musician; or he might be just awful forever.

Of course, we won't know until it happens, but the latest word is that Sanders will be with Berger at Hart House Wednesday. This could be a very important concert, and at the very least it will be interesting. And Reggie Workman, the excellent bassist will be there. He's worth hearing.

And it's FREE.

So rush on over to Hart Massey's mausoleum and cop your tickets. The concert happens round about 8:30, in the pm, Mar. 5.

WHO'S LULU

The moon was like a fruit to be picked, caught in a branch of stars, and I would climb up after it with Lulu in my arms and discover a whole archipelago of moons, like swans sleeping on a lake of darkness.

If she would let me live the length of a kiss.

I said, "Your handbag's nice."

Regis Debray, 1967: What is the reality?

William S. Burroughs, 1964: There is no true or real "reality" — "Reality" is simply a more or less scanning pattern — The scanning pattern we accept as "reality" has been imposed by the controlling power on this planet, a power primarily oriented towards total control.

Open your mouths kiss Artaud an .. ah .. zap! he turns into a MOTHER. In the grave necrophiliacs disguised by Polanski share the bloodless fifties in a pun-you-graphic festival of pre-Eric Goldman LBJ darkness shot by Walter Lassally for the pages of the Sporting News (If baseball is pensioned off can the newspapers be far behind?) while groupies are being strapped on —

F. V. Zappa, asked Sunday evening whether groupies were a sociological phenomenon: Sure they are. I think they're a very important indication of the sexual revolution. Ten years ago, you know, they didn't have such things. Unfortunately. Well, they had musicians freaks but not groupies, like you know an organized sort of thing. How big is it?

Groupies? Yeah. There's a lot of them I guess. But in numbers say — is this a small minority of the boys and girls who come to concerts? Oh yeah, it is a minority. I'm not saying that everybody who comes to the concert is ready to take their pants off for the band but there's quite a few —

What did you say you sent him? I sent him a pair of blue jeans. I figured he could use 'em. I saw those leather jeans he wore and figured he could use these blue jeans. I wore 'em for 42 days straight. Never got a reply or anything. Sent it in a shoebox.

Abbie Hoffman: The road into Chicago begins and ends in your own head . . . As I said to the cops who came to arrest me Wednesday as I was sitting in the Lincoln Hotel Restaurant waiting for breakfast, "The first duty of a revolutionist is to get away with it. The second duty is to eat breakfast. I ain't going."

Norman Mailer: Humphrey spoke three times as long, trudging through an imprecision of language, a formal slovenliness of syntax which enabled him to shunt phrases back and forth like a switchman who locates a freight car by moving everything in the yard.

Jean Genet: And what of the convention? It is democratic, it babbles on, and you have seen it on your screens: it is there for the purpose of concealing from you a game both simple and complex, which you prefer to ignore.

Frank Zappa, 1967: I think a revolution — not the sloppy kind, but the kind that really works — you know, it's about time for that . . . The sloppy kind is blood-in-the-street and all the bullshit. Today, a revolution can be accomplished by means of mass media, with technical advances that Madison Avenue is using to sell you washing machines and a loaf of bread and everything else. This can be used to change the country around — painlessly.

(But) WORKS OF ART WHICH LACK ARTISTIC QUALITY HAVE NO FORCE, HOWEVER PROGRESSIVE THEY ARE POLITICALLY.

F. V. Zappa, Sunday: I don't think there should be any lines (between 'classical' and 'pop' music). I think that art should belong to the people and not just a few people who think they're really specialists or something.

Just generally I find that most girls don't have a hell of a lot to say anyway.

. . . No they (The GTO's) weren't a group of groupies. They were a bunch of very strange people that I just happened to know because they were hanging around my house all the time and I says well why don't you guys get yourselves together and do something and I'll try and find a way to allow large numbers of people to appreciate your personalities. You know they were wasted just being known by a few people. They have something to say. I think it's important to find a way to bring them to a public where they can dig what they have to offer, because as young as these girls are, they've really been around. I think that a lot of boys and girls in parts of the country where nothing happens would be able to have sort of a pleasant vicarious participation experience listening to what these girls have to say and songs that they've written.

What he wanted to do was have three people score it simultaneously. He wanted me, Stockhausen and Paul McCartney to simultaneously score Barbarella (score and incredulity). So he bought my manager and myself a ticket to Rome and we went there for a day and uh went to see the uh rushes on Barbarella and talk with Vadim about it. And then it goes 8/8, 9/8, 8/8, 9/8, 8/8, 9/8, then it goes 8/8, 4/8, 5/8, 6/8, and back into 4/4 again. To get it together now, we just toss it off and it becomes a flop.

MOTHERS:

Lupe Varèse

From Lumpy Gravy: Everything in the universe is, is, is made of one element which is a note, a single note. Atoms are really vibrations you know, which are extensions of the BIG NOTE. Everything's one note. Everything. Even the ponies. The note however, is the ultimate power. But see the pigs don't know that. The ponies don't know that. You mean just we know that? Right.

Edgar Varèse, 1936: When new instruments will allow me to write music as I conceive it, the movement of sound-masses, of shifting planes, will be clearly perceived in my work, taking the place of the linear counterpoint. When these sound-masses collide, the phenomena of penetration or repulsion will seem to occur. Certain transmutations taking place on certain planes will seem to be projected onto other planes, moving at different speeds and at different angles. There will no longer be the old conception of melody or interplay of melodies. The entire work will be a melodic totality. The entire work will flow as a river.

. . . Some audiences would either go to sleep or leave. Or else scream for Louie, Louie. They like it (String Quartet) a lot in Europe. We played it in New York and we played a lot of things that are weirder than that in New York and they went for it pretty well. We had some very good audiences at the Fillmore this time. They're usually some of the worst audiences we get but they were very well behaved this time.

Friday night at the Fillmore East, the Mothers played their version of Oetandre (1924) by Varèse because Leonard Bernstein was in the audience. Sunday they played two sets at the Rock Pile. And if anyone screamed for Louie, Louie, it was his own mother. A couple new Reuben Sano songs — Bacon Fat, Corrida Polka — and some new oldies — Zappa has as fine a sense of the 50's rock sociology as anyone. (cf: his article in Life) and a faustian fascination with unknown groups who managed to put their whole creative experience into one or two unknown singles — All Night Long originally recorded by Joe Houston and his Comets on the Combo label in 1954, Who In The Sky an original by Roy Estrada and the Penguins, White Port And Lemon Juice by the Four Deuces (1955). The Mothers juice up and jam tight with choreography to parody the new art form. It's fine, so fine. But easy. Zappa wants to know if a band can read music.

String Quartet a gazebo between 4/4 and 7/8 of about 40 minutes to be included in the new Uncle Meat album with Zappa conducting, making waves of reed sound from a river of electronic effects and other gourmet treats with vocals in the form of edited syllables, grunts and melodies fair all the time 4/4 drives unremitting and the happy 7/8 ululates through reeds and rods and puppy dogs. Zappa jumps sometimes but not for effect. Resolution: the second set is all Uncle Meat.

Fred Neil: I'll never get out of these blues alive.

Frank Zappa: I like Captain Beefheart and His Magic Band. Who? You'll find out soon enough.

preview: the masque of wilde

Fact: Monday night twenty student actors from the Drama Division, University of Guelph, will give a free performance of a new play at the Drama Centre's studio on Glenmorris: "The Masque of Wilde" by Joseph Addison.

The Division of Drama at Guelph offers a B.A. program in Drama, something Toronto hasn't gotten around to. Guelph has also staged some of the best university productions I have seen.

Besides Chairman Michael Booth and an academic staff (many of whom themselves have practical production interests and experience), Guelph retains five professionally-trained professors of production technique. This is their first full-length production from scratch — their first "opportunity to create a dramatic work, not just recreate one," as director James Murphy puts it.

Hence, a professional director (Murphy), set and costume designers (Bruce and Carol Koenig respectively), and a young playwright work through the difficult process of bringing dialogue life, cutting, re-writing, and shaping text into a unified concept and expression. Student actors join the creative process through their participation in the staging. The learning process becomes truly kinetic.

The play has been described by its director as "non-theatre" in its techniques. To unravel this, let me say that the production is as theatrical as any play lacking conventional devices for suspending disbelief can be. Addison's text is skeletal, and Murphy's production has carried this uncluttered effect over into stage presentation.

The original set consisted of ramping and varied levels. The actors are literally choreographed in their movements during the set scenes, flowing through the set in an amazingly successful liquid pattern. At all times, the central or "real" Wilde is visible on a higher level, sometimes slipping into the scenes and dialogue, but always present, watching. The intended effect is that the play is taking place in Wilde's mind. Wilde sees himself as the public wit and the private poet, these two only occasionally (and perhaps this is an unfortunate element of the play) interacting or coalescing.

The Toronto presentation will lack the set and, as one of the actors commented after a recent rehearsal, "it's somewhat uncomfortable, re-adjusting to the flow of a flat playing area." Hopefully, much of this will be overcome by 8:30 p.m. Monday eve.

"Masque" is Addison's first play. He says that writing it was like being on a psychiatric couch for two years. This identification with the artist and his masques has probably hindered Addison in execution, and the play is not without flaws. Yet there is sound theatre in his play, and the results of the skeletal technique indicates that with further work on these lines, he may in future present us with fulfillment of the method.

Theatre and the university

Addison is 23 and a drop-out from high school. After knocking about behind the stages of Canadian theatres (including Stratford) he has opted for the university. He has chosen to write and work within the university, although he already has a wealth of experience denied the average student.

This, too, is significant. We know of the playwrighting laboratories at Yale and Bristol (where Pinter got rolling). We know that more of what we rather ambiguously term "serious drama" is done in the university than in the public theatres.

The natural conclusion, it seems to me, is that the trend will continue. Theatre will move into the universities, and the university (or simply the school) will gravitate around such institutions as Lincoln Centre or the National in Ottawa (for example Bristol is connected with Bristol Old Vic).

As our universities become the centres for creativity as well as the bastions of academe, means will have to be found for these university centres to touch one another, to exchange concepts and experience. And what will happen Monday night in the Church on Glenmorris is a tentative beginning of this interchange.

Carleton University will be sending a production here shortly. Our own Pociu Ludique Societas has travelled to Montreal and Chicago. And Leon Major once stated at an informal meeting of the Drama Centre that he should like very much to be able to take his professional productions on a tour of a university circuit.

Professors Parker of Toronto and Booth of Guelph in fostering "Masque's" presentation here are moving along the lines which must be pursued if such a circuit is to become a reality. Universities across Canada should begin to think in these terms as they prepare their departmental budgets, making sure that they set aside funds to make this interchange possible. And if Guelph wants to invite us there sometime soon I'm not shy.

phedre: an epic not a play

La Comédie de Bourges, under the direction of Roland Monod, took a heavy-handed approach to its presentation of Phedre at Hart House this week, but out of the darkness of their style emerged a reasonably pleasing production. It was faithful to the letter of Racine's text, as well as the metre of the Alexandrine, and didn't go out on any interpretative limbs beyond suggesting a curious relationship between Hippolytus and his tutor.

The presentation style on the whole remained true to Neo-Classical lines: the groupings were spare, as were individual movements; every fibre of the actors' bodies seemed to be under perfect control. This unfortunately did not eliminate some very melodramatic tirades, particularly from Madeleine Marion as Phedre. Mlle Marion, looking somewhat like Maria Callas delivered herself of some beautiful expressions of pain, but her voice tended toward slightly unnerving tremolos. Her Phedre suffered from its generality: she did not give us the particular passion of a particular woman which characterises the best Phedres.

Sylvain Corthay was an attractive, even engaging Hippolytus, yet he lacked the grandeur of spirit which would have made his performance memorable. As the youthful suitor of Aricie he was fine, but never imposing enough to justify Phedre's tormented love.

Mario Pilar was a gypsy-like Theseus, swarthy and tough. His reading was loaded with ritualistic apostrophes to the wings. Anne Bellec simpered through Aricie's lines with an irritating semi-smirk but a crystalline voice. The minor roles were undistinguished.

The production was generally quite good; what we can learn from French actors is the use of the voice. No one dropped a syllable. As the plays of the French classical repertoire are textual pieces, actors have a tendency to speak rather than act with the whole body. This Phedre had the constraint that came from treating the play as an epic poem rather than a piece of dynamic theatre.

FROM REVOLT TO REVOLUTION: A LETTER FROM PHIL RESNICK, T.S.M.

Take your desires to be reality.

It is ironic that the month of February, the month of suicides, should have blossomed this year into a month of revolt, if not yet liberation. Who would have imagined in mid-January that Sidney Smith would suddenly become an arena for left-wing politics, that Clark Kerr would be confronted and exposed, that radicalism would become a viable cause on this most apathetic and deferential of Canadian campuses? Truly, fortuna reus spins over our affairs.

But there is no point mistaking the positive events of the last few weeks for the real thing. Indeed, it would be foolish not to recognize that for many students our actions have been incomprehensible and worse still, inexcusable. How many more were sensitized and angered by the burning computers at Sir George, an economic act of violence by the oppressed, than by the burning napalm in Vietnam, the systematic violence of the powerful? How many equate the liberal Clark Kerr with the imperialist system that polices the world in the name of liberalism? To pose these questions is to comprehend the obstacles in the way of a broader radical consciousness.

I should outline a little more concretely, both in psychological and political terms, the root causes of radicalism in Canada, and the directions it may take.

The Psychology of Radicalism

It may be best to begin with the psychological. The values we absorb are profoundly individualist and bourgeois. The ego-trip is part and parcel of our psychological mechanism, and most of us carry it into our radicalism.

There is a sense, in which all arrive at a similar juncture, when they perceive, in Rilke's words, that "You must change your life." Personal experience, not collective experience, as in Algeria and China, lies at the root of our political consciousness. We rebel singly, often in response to strong moral pressures. As a result, many find it difficult to think in terms of a collective radical consciousness that transcends personality. They cannot go beyond the stage of negativity — rebellion against Reality, the system.

To be sure, the long-haired high school student penalized for his non-conformity or the conscientious undergraduate turned off by the formalism and vacuity of academe are far from the slum child mutilated by Canada's capitalist welfare system or the Brazilian peon exploited by Toronto's munificent Brazilian Light and Power Corporation. Yet there are connections between the brute repression by poverty and the psychological repression by middle class conformity. The name of the game is capitalism and power, though liberal ideologues persist in calling it democracy and just society. In short, from psychological we now enter the political realm.

Political Challenge

It is only when revolt becomes political that it becomes a threat to those who rule. Indeed the whole history of Canada can be read as a largely successful attempt by her elites to keep out politics from below, and perpetuate a stable, conservative society. Our elites are proud of their counter-revolutionary tradition and deny the class character of Canadian society and institutions. Yet these institutions are profoundly bourgeois, and the values they foster are as partisan as any.

Whose interests does talk of moderation, evolution, and middle-of-the-road consensus serve, if not those already in control? And historically who have these been — the Winnipeg strikers of 1919 or Robert Bordon and the RCMP? The subject of history in this country has always been the political and corporate elites. Anything which goes beyond the framework of electoral politics potentially escapes their control.

Thus, when the newspapers denounce student revolt and liberal administrators play their game of cooptation, both are being true to the spirit of liberal ideology.

Even the so-called reformers in English Canada are entirely caught up within the liberal system. Ostensibly, Marxist intellectuals continue to uphold the existing university as though its sole concern were an abstract commitment to knowledge. That the content of that education is eminently political, both in terms of what is taught and suppressed, that the branch plant character of our universities reflects Canada's participatory colonialism within the American Empire, they cannot see. When Stan Gray gets fired by McGill for his Marxist politics, the true tolerance of the liberal university is revealed. House radicals are acceptable, but not radicals who act on their convictions.

The NDP

So too, the NDP is completely out of it, so far as any socialist consciousness is concerned. The NDP is by no stretch of the imagination challenging the character of liberal capitalism. It is more addicted to parliamentarianism than either of the other parties, and develops its reformist policies in response to capitalist initiatives. Most of its constituency is hopelessly bourgeois in life style and sentiments, and is as fearful of conflict and confrontation in the development of socialism, as the most rabid liberal.

To talk radicalism today, therefore, is to talk a language quite distinct from that of reform. Instituting participatory democracy will solve nothing, if the overall structure remains repressive. Freedom means nothing, unless it connotes the freedom of people to shape their environment at all levels. Inevitably, this entails socialism.

Revolutionary Socialism

It is clear, however, that this socialism must itself be revolutionary in character, that it is the entire system of liberal capitalism that must be destroyed. Incremental change spells cooptation unless the ultimate objective is always borne in mind — a society democratically controlled and answering to real human needs. Such a society is incompatible with both capitalism and imperialism. Nor will it be achieved without conflict at all levels — Canada's elites will not voluntarily abandon the field. Socialist consciousness is integrally linked to struggle. Exit social democracy and parliamentary cretinism.

Why does the second stage of radical consciousness spell revolution? Why my emphasis on direct action and involvement? In part, because the stage of negative revolt can become sterile unless the individual is linked to others in revolt, to a group or movement. In part, because participation in struggle is itself creative of a socialist consciousness, without which there is no point projecting an alternative to repressive liberalism. Most importantly, however, revolt finds its consummation in revolution, in the overthrow of the social power that gave it birth. Between radicalism and liberalism the war will go on to the bitter end.

Implicitly, I am projecting a model for radicalism that goes far beyond the here and now. In fact, by speaking about revolutionary socialism I am assuming a long-term perspective, possibly a life-time perspective. Students are still coming to a first stage of revolt. Only when students, workers, and thousands of others in the society begin speaking revolution will the real fireworks begin.

The prospect for revolutionary action is in many ways greater today than it has been for fifty years. There are structural problems facing Canadian capitalism in the years ahead, as employment fails to keep up with university graduates. A recent OISE study predicts a sharp decline in employment opportunities in the professional and teaching fields in the 1970's. When added to the redundancy of unskilled labour as automation proceeds apace, there is clearly the basis for an explosion. What if the unemployed professionals start organizing with the unemployed labourers for revolutionary action? What if, in the nearer future, radical students coalesce with labour to fight the reactionary Rand Report, and a general strike ensues?

Nor are the structural problems facing the liberal universities going to be solved as increasingly rebellious high school students enter into it, CUG and a thousand other committees will not stem the tide, when students en masse begin demanding power from below, and more generally, an end to capitalist power. The TSM may yet prove the tip of a rising iceberg. The people will start seeking to replace the elites as the subject of Canadian politics. Then the roof will really blow sky-high on Claude Bissell, Bill Davis, and their friends.

Quebec may well achieve independence, ending once and for all the incestuous, reactionary arrangement that has kept out class politics in both French and English Canada. American imperialism may yet meet its Philippi; in any case discontent with Canada's role inside the American Empire and with our elites who have kept us there, may grow. In short, the original sin of our elites, counter-revolution, may yet be undone, as we prepare to make a socialist nation out of a capitalist colony.

The end of revolution, it cannot be stressed often enough, is liberation, and it is in the name of the human potential currently dammed up that we act. The Days of May in France revealed the creativity which thousands of perfectly ordinary people were capable of, once the chains of market relations of production were removed. To be sure, May lacked structure, but the spontaneity which it embodied will be central to any revolutionary movement in this country. Indeed, revolution is to no small extent an act of creative joy.

maids is mixed bag

Richard Murphet's production of Jean Genet's The Maids is a mixed bag, but its best moments are more than worth the watching. Genet has created a Chinese boxes complexity of plot twists, which he complicates by refusing to give Solange and Claire (the maids) any single basic characterization. They vary with the roles they play within the play, and unfortunately neither Patricia Conway or Patricia Maltby are consistently equal to the task. At times they have immense shock value, as in the whipping sequence, but there are flat spots in which they are engaged in a losing battle with a bad translation (Murphet stresses this by giving us two minutes of the play recorded in French at the close. And how much better it sounds). There is too much screaming in the production, particularly since the complicated lines lead to slip-ups and neither girl has the vocal equipment to do it for any length of time.

The production itself is in the dangerous area of theatre that shocks by strangeness and tricks. When it works it rocks you and when it fails it is sour. Murphet's introductory section works (get there early), as does the tea scene, the strangling, and Miss Maltby's last solo section, where her acting is absolutely first class. Gina Laight plays Madame to near perfection, from the moment of her startling entrance. Costuming and design also deserve high marks. But Murphet's use of a strobe light flops, as does the overlong use of three pieces of recorded music. Directors in the Studio should remember that a surrounding audience increases the difficulty of long pauses in the action.

The eye wanders easily.

The dissonant elements of the production leave longing for traditional dramatic continuity. Yet when it works, as this show does in flashes, one's reaction goes beyond the normal theatrical response. In playing down the obvious sexual relationships, Murphet may have lost the element which would have lit a fire under the slower moments of the show.

confessions of a theatre sleeper

Let the truth be known: I sleep in the theatre! That's right. Some of my best hours of sleep have been spent to the drone of oratory and soliloquy. I've gotten over the shame I once felt and have resigned myself to the fact that if a play is good enough, I'll sit up and listen.

So, relying on my instincts, I've got to say that Servant of Two Masters by Goldoni, now playing at the Royal Alex is good. 'Cause I didn't fall asleep —and that must mean something.

I met Heath Lamberts about seven years ago in Stratford. I had just run after Leo Ciceri, having seen him come out of a restaurant, and I was thinking, gee, if I could only get his autograph. So I ran after him all the way through Stratford and finally, puffing, I confronted him. "M'm'mister C'ciceri, I sorta saw you coming out of the restaurant, and I wanted

"Yes," he snorted, his nose high in the air. "We do eat, you know." I was crushed. I sauntered back to my friends, feeling forever cast out of the realm of drama, the love of my childhood. Then I met Heath Lamberts at a bus stop in front of the restaurant and wow! an actual actor from Stratford actually spoke to me and asked me and my friends what high school we went to and we told him that we acted a bit and he talked until his bus came.

All of this has no relevance to the fact that his portrayal of the servant who takes on two masters and starts a comedy of mistaken identity, is the key to a funny and entertaining Theatre Toronto show.

Most of the other actors, performing in the slightly affected Commedia del Arte method imposed upon the play by director Richard Digby Day are merely shadows, especially Richard Monette, who is hopelessly weak as a jilted suitor.

Colin Fox proved in "The Fan" that in a Goldoni play, even a small character can steal the show. Which means that every actor has to concentrate on making his role as amusing as possible or as effective as possible in reflecting the humour in the other characters.

This wasn't done to a very great extent in Servant. Brian Petchey was only mildly funny galumphing across the stage as father of the bride and Diana Leblanc hardly realized the comic potential in the part of the bride.

Only Heath Lamberts, as a servant who gets himself into the mess, is continuously hilarious throughout with his asides to the audience, his vivacity and his sprightly sense of Goldonian humour. He kept me and the audience awake.

ben hur sentimentally revisited

The current revival of William Wyler's 1959 production of Ben Hur only proves the over-used adage about the impossibility of returning to the past. If you were ever a normal kid, after emerging from the theatre on a Saturday afternoon, your pupils dilated from a two hour Randolph Scott matinee, your money invested in popticles which were flicked at the 20 foot technicolor images on the screen, you would carefully re-enact every scene of the movie as you walked home (including the mushier moments, of course).

But those Saturday afternoon excursions into the papier-maché world of Hollywood paled if you had recently seen something like Ben Hur or Cecil B. DeMille's The Ten Commandments. I can remember playing charioteer for about four weeks after I'd seen Ben Hur, and to play at anything for longer than a couple of hours when you were a kid meant that it had made quite an impression on you — right?

So, radiating a warm nostalgic glow, I resolved in my heart of hearts to revisit Ben Hur last Monday. But, alas, during the four hours that the film ran (with only one intermission and not an operative popcorn machine in sight), the only emotion that welled up in my breast was depression. Ten years later, I'm grieved to report, Ben Hur falls only slightly short of being an 'MGM Camera 65 — Panavision — 70 mm Wide Screen — Metrocolor — Stereophonic' disappointment.

The music, which underlies seven-eighths of the movie, sounds like a cross between Handel's 'The Messiah' and Percy Faith Plays the Original Score from Exodus. Charlton Heston spends most of his on-camera moments sweating, bleeding and gnashing his teeth, while Jack Hawkins seems as badly miscast as ever. And then there's the question of the alliance formed during the movie between the Jews and the Arabs to liberate Judea from foreign imperialism — more than a little latter-day irony there. Furthermore, the Jews all look like poorly disguised Hollywood Indians and the Arabs like Frank Zappa.

William Wyler, although he may not be the most sensitive of directors, certainly must be among the shrewdest. Who else could manufacture a four hour marathon around a ten minute chariot-race sequence, pass it off as a Biblical epic and earn eleven Academy Awards as a result. Actually, all that old Biblical 'as you can see folks, nothing up my bur-noose' business results in some of the more hilarious moments in Ben Hur. My favourite scene, in retrospect, of course, involves Ben's mother and sister who, thanks to the machinations of the evil Roman, Marcellus, contract leprosy but are miraculously cured when a divinely-inspired thunderbolt crashes down before them. The manufacturers of Acnomet have nothing on the Heavenly Host.

The best moments of Ben Hur are, naturally, the mammoth production scenes — great thundering wide-angles of thousands of massed Judeans and Romans, "their cohorts gleaming with purple and gold", etc., etc. In such scenes, the suggested audience reaction is to scrutinize the extras. You will undoubtedly discover that the well-dressed Arab, beneath his drab garments, was often known to wear white sneakers and tailored slacks. Or, alternately, that certain citizens in the midst of the sorrowful crowd attendant to the crucifixion, were reported to have been seen laughing uproariously after the Romans had busted Christ. So much for cinematic realism.

The dialogue has a nice homey quality about it too. Example — first Roman legionary: "Who's that?" Second Roman: "Some crazy character. Says he's the son of God or something."

Yet, however much of an anachronism Ben Hur may appear now, it really doesn't justify merciless criticism. All wide-screen Hollywood epics, as some obscure Russian revolutionary once said, are only logical extensions of Mighty Mouse comics, and are to be treated as such. They are created to appeal to huge audiences on a purely sensual level and fortunately rarely contain sustained moments of intellectuality.

Ben Hur is a harmless movie — horribly dated, but harmless. Although the overall acting is at the level of a high school production of Oklahoma! although the plywood set for Nazareth looks suspiciously like some designer's conception of a Biblical Tombstone, Arizona, at least Ben Hur has the plausible appearance of a $3 million dollar production, and after paying for reserved seats at $3.00 each, that's gratifying.

Ben Hur, like childhood and everything else, is a defenceless victim of time. It's the sort of movie that will probably embarrass you for ever having been enthusiastic about it, because everything surrounding it now appears so blatantly stereotyped. Yet, despite the intervening ten years since its release, Ben Hur still has appeal. Perhaps when we laugh at it, we are only trying to camouflage our own embarrassment with the past, so suppress your abiding sense of cool, fortify yourself with many boxes of popcorn and a friend, and see it again — for the sake of sentimentality.

isadora -- funny , teary, soppy picture!

Isadora is a woman's picture. Every housewife who has waited until her husband has gone off to work, then slipped on a negligee and done a little "here-we-go-gathering-nuts-in-May" in time to a Mantovani record as she does the dusting will empathize with Vanessa Redgrave who plays Miss Duncan.

Isadora was an American dancer who took the crowned heads of Europe by storm, apparently, by lunging about on a bare stage with four yards of gauze curtain ("Gad!

More, more! Pass the opera glasses!")

She starts out dancing in a lowdown American dive but, by shaking her thens-and-those at the audience, she is able to secure passage to Europe where she no longer has to prostitute her art. She is a success. She meets an artist who lays her in his garret by moonlight. She gets pregnant. Naturally, there is a difficult childbirth, grunt groan, just like when Mom had you. It's a girl. She shakes hands with the artist and we never see him again.

A rich tycoon plies her with roses and diamond necklaces. But it doesn't turn the head of our madcap Miss. She becomes his mistress. He buys her a school where she can teach Parisian urchins the art of the dance. Her every dream comes true. Even her two children drown.

Off to Russia where she raised the morale of the starving people in the 1920's by treading a few measures of the Cossack dance and opening another school. She marries a Russian poet and takes him back Stateside where she is persecuted and, during her performance, goes topless to answer charges by the audience that she is immoral and a Red to boot

On the Riviera she dies one of the funniest deaths in the history of motion pictures: she is out for a drive in a sport coupe with a prospective lover when her twelve foot scarf gets snagged in the wire wheels of the car and . . . Gakk! Garroted by her principle stage prop.

LSD

The fallacy of Mr. Kamin's L.S.D. as truth philosophy (religion?) lies not in its theory or even practice but rather in the author's rather over-generous evaluation of man in general, and more specifically, of the average type into whose hands the Varsity may fall.

Indeed L.S.D. may be the "answer" and Tim Leary may well be Christ reincarnate (remember, the masses ignored Him too), and Kamin's outlined guide may have worked for him and others too, but the fact remains that the average pseudo-enlightened soul today is out for kicks and has not the strength, perseverance, or common sense to deal with anything as powerful as this drug has shown itself to be. In fact, painting a picture the likes of Allan's, while being very tempting — even awe inspiring — can for the most part, at this stage of human development, do little more than increase the population at the already bulging Clarke Institute.

Allan Kamin's fervour has at least temporarily blinded his realistic evaluation of many (most?) of his fellow men. Everyone would like to think they have the "discipline" he lists as prerequisite for successful tripping, but alas, most cannot recognize this very shortcoming within themselves — ergo — "drop a cap, freak around, groovy" — exactly what he puts down. Sincerely, Wayne Janner (1 Meds)

I had two friends, both eager for the Brighter Day. The one was a talented musician; she blew her mind on the first trip. The second, a writer, lost control of herself after dropping acid for two years. She was at the time creating the new society, free of bourgeois ideas and hangups. Two years ago, she had joined a commune near Big Sur, California, given it her possessions, her labour, her self. When she blew her mind, they threw her out. New society, new approach, ideas, ideals.

Let's push acid, but let's also push the other ways to salvation: vegetarianism, back-to-the-bible fundamentalism, the power of positive thinking, no capital gains tax, and all the detritus of civilization that preys on susceptible minorities. Rather strange ideas than twisted minds.

BOOKS

Bird in a Gilded Cage, by Judy LaMarsh, McClelland & Stewart, $7.95

Judy LaMarsh's Bird in a Gilded Cage will probably rank as one of the pettiest, meanest, books of the year. It is a gossipy book, which accounts for its high sales, but of no political significance whatsoever.

Miss LaMarsh dislikes Mike Pearson, and Pierre Trudeau, and likes Walter Gordon and Guy Favreau. As far as one can gather, her contempt for Pearson reached its culmination when he refused to appoint her to an Ontario Supreme Court judgeship, and her feud with Trudeau from the time he made a judicial appointment she disapproved of.

It is a sentimental book, and a very personal one. It was written too quickly, reads badly, and contains various chapters of no importance whatsoever. Simply in a technical sense, it lacks coherence.

Most memoirs, almost without exception, should never have been written. Their historical value is limited (certainly these are), their literary value non-existent. Judy's book — apart from the few snarky paragraphs on her fellow politicians, reads with all the grace and style that one has come to expect from Judy babes.

La style, c'est la femme meme, and the result from either end is scarcely felicitous.

Miss LaMarsh obviously had to get all her gripes off her chest, and apart from this therapeutic function, the book has no value. I hope she feels better having written it. The reader leaves with an acute indigestion.

Earl Hines, who always knocks 'em dead at the Colonial, plays on for another week, and jazz singer, Salome Bey, with a new bag of songs, finishes this weekend at the Westbury Hotel.

It's white blues week in Toronto. John Hammond plays through the weekend at the Riverboat, and Spider John Koerner opens up there on Tuesday, while over at the Rockpile, John Mayall, one of the biggest names in British blues, has two shows Sunday night.

The Rockpile has "top local groups" appearing Saturday — so you've been warned. The Electric Circus has Chicago this week with Ten Years After representing the so called super groups on Sunday.

• Deoxygenation: oxygen in the water supports life in the river and aids in the decomposition of wastes and supports plants and animals that also aid in waste removal. Where water supplies are deoxygenated the problems from pollution are compounded.

• Thermal Pollution: mainly from industry and thermal-electric power plants. The heating of water further deoxygenates the water.

• Phosphates: The result of dumping sewage (treated and otherwise), fertilizers and detergents. Phosphates become a nutrient for algae which is now clogging Lake Erie. It clogs up sewage treatment plants, water intakes and when it dies, it sinks to the bottom of the lakes and decays, using up precious oxygen

In New College Council elections, Jon Fidler (II New) became President, Errol Platt (I New), commissioner of the committee on college Government, and David Heger (III New), Commissioner of the Committee on Inter-Student Relations.

Acclaimed were Eric Platt (I New) as first Vice-President; Mark Mendelsohn (II New) as second Vice-President; and Doug Gonyou and Ceto Romkholwansingh (I New) as members of the College Council.

At Wednesday night's College Council meeting all the faculty members present plus NCSU president Brian Schnurr (III New) voted against the motion. The other four student members of the council supported the motion.

Ivey himself says he was political economy.

If the motion had been passed, he "probably would have resigned," said Ivey.

"I would have considered it a vote of non-confidence," he said.

The present dean, David Stager, is leaving New College at the end of this term to concentrate on teaching and research in the department of political economy.

Probe..how we poison our waters

By RON GRANER

Water — Ontario's most plentiful natural resource — may soon become a menace to human life if residents do not take steps to prevent it.

One of the greatest menaces to our water system is, simply, human waste. While the Ontario government will tell the public 90 per cent of our municipalities have waste treatment programs, this figure does not include rural areas.

An outhouse or a septic tank is not waste treatment. Ottawa dumps its human waste into the Rideau and Ottawa Rivers.

Montreal, Canada's largest city, dumps its sewage untreated into the St. Lawrence.

Some municipalities, like Hamilton, use "primary treatment" only. Sewage is held in a tank until some of the solids settle out of it. The remainder is dumped raw into the lake.

The Ontario Water Resources Commission, which has recently become concerned about the effect of dumping all this sewage raw, may recommend that the town build a sewage disposal plant — but its recommendations have no teeth.

The Ontario Municipal Board has the power to overrule the OWRC if it feels the treatment plant is too expensive. Effective recommendations and plans are often overruled.

Changes in methods of farming have raised other difficulties. In the days when truck farming was the rule, organic animal waste was easily and economically spread on the ground as natural fertilizer. Times have changed, but the problem of waste from livestock has received no attention whatsoever.

The old-fashioned harms have been abolished and livestock is kept in multi-storey, hygienically scaled buildings. Built close to urban centres on small parcels of land, a single installation of this kind produces organic waste equal to that of a town of 10,000 people.

Waste is spread heavily over available land, where it cannot be properly decomposed. A multitude of disease-bearing bacteria find their way into the water table and eventually into our water supplies.

At present, all methods of waste treatment concern only one type of waste material — carbon or organic. This is the waste which floats in rivers or streams, causing localized areas of foul smelling pollution.

A second type of pollution is phosphorous pollution, and nothing is being done about it. Phosphates come from industrial waste, the fertilizer spread on farmer's fields and from the household. Some pollution from industry is unavoidable, and little can be done about run-off from fertilizer.

But phosphates from the household are another story. Domestic detergents account for 50 per cent of the phosphorus in the water.

No research is being done to find a substitute for phosphates in detergent, yet pollution from phosphates can render our organic waste treatment program useless.

In the past, plant life in the Great Lakes was limited to the availability of phosphorus in the water. There is only a small amount present in nature and the plants can't live without it.

Even a small amount of phosphorus added to the water drastically increases the plant population. Lake Erie is now flooded with algae. Most of this algae forms a stinking, decaying mass which further depletes the water's oxygen content.

Apart from what happens to our lakes and streams after we have polluted them, a quick run-down of the major poison groups that are daily discharged into our water supplies is enough to frighten the most conservative of citizens.

• Raw sewage. In many countries, Canada included, untreated sewage has been responsible for epidemics of typhoid, cholera and other epidemic diseases.

• Chlorination of municipal supplies kills bacteria but chlorine itself a poison, is now being linked with higher incidence of heart failure in early life.

worms, whose bodies contain deadly tetanus and typhus germs. The mere handling of these slugworms is likely to produce blood poisoning.

Authorities are now concerned that these slugworms might get into our municipal water supply, with lethal results.

• Cyanide, used in electroplating, hardening metal and gold extraction regularly seeps into our waters.

• Oil: a recent spill near the Trent Water System let thousands of gallons of oil into the river, endangering the drinking supply.

Oil not only spoils water for human use but also kills fish and aquatic life. Many thousands of waterfowl are killed yearly by oil poisoning.

• Arsenic, a cumulative poison (it tends to build up in our bodies) is released from mine tailings and as a copper by-product Arsenic is also a main ingredient in many pesticides widely used all over Ontario.

• Phenols, important in the manufacture of plastics and a by-product of the coking process taint and kill fish and give the water unpleasant tastes and odors.

• Sulphuric acid, in itself a poison, has the ability to corrode metals, adding other poisons to the water such as copper, lead and zinc.

• Metallic poisons in New Brunswick have killed fish and prevented salmon from spawning.

• D.D.T.; another cumulative poison has been slowly seeping into our water from the fields on which it has been sprayed.

One of many streams dumps gunk into Lake Erie.

• Aerosol Bromines, given off from the burning gasoline. After they have done their damage in the air, they collect in the water droplets of clouds and are the major source of bromines in the Great Lakes, and other fresh-water systems.

And a closing thought for the day:

• 25 per cent of the seabeds off Canada's coasts are now polluted. The department of mines & energy resources, in a recent report on hepatitis, shows that shellfish from polluted water are a source of hepatitis infection.

COMMISSION ON THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

A STATEMENT OF ISSUES

The Commission has been meeting for three months and has now identified what seem to be the basic areas of agreement and disagreement. We take this opportunity to list these, so that they may be discussed openly by the university community. By this process additional information and opinions, supplementary to those already secured through formal hearings, will be forthcoming.

1 What is the purpose of the University?

What is the nature of its social commitment — should this be up to the individual academic or should the university as a whole take stands on political issues?

2. Role of the government

- a) nature of its appointments to the Board of Governors;
- b) its role as the financial provider and the resultant stresses and pressures on the university;
- c) University of Ontario — does it exist? Should it exist? Reform of the Committee on University Affairs? How should we react? What is the University of Toronto's role in this structure?

3 The Alumni — Can they fulfill a useful role by interpreting the university to the public at large or serving in an advisory capacity on long-range departmental curriculum-planning committees, or should their role be largely unofficial and where they feel they can best serve?

4 The Board of Governors and the Senate — one-tier versus two-tier for the top governing structure?

5 The President — historical changes in the nature of his power and authority. Should his term of office be limited? Is there a need for other university officials to take over his ceremonial functions?

6 Colleges — Should they be expanded to multifaculty colleges and strengthened as undergraduate communities? Should all colleges have the same status in the university? Should all subjects be given the same status in the colleges by eliminating the distinction between community and college subjects? Should centres for interdisciplinary subjects be attached to the colleges?

7 University administrators — Should their role be that of the civil servant, or is there a necessity for them to take part in the decision-making processes because of access to important information?

8 Faculty and students — Should there be parity with staff across the board, or representation as suits the particular case?

Arguments against parity:

- greater commitment of the staff;
- more experience;
- the university is not a political institution;
- excess work-load of students;
- students and staff do not have monolithic interests;
- one need not necessarily participate in a decision which affects him.

Arguments for parity:

- the students have a different perspective;
- concern about "publish or perish" and the level of teaching in the university;
- they bring a fresh approach to the processes of negotiations;
- students feel a personal commitment to the University;
- enriched experiences from participation;
- if the university is a democratic institution, then to have unequal representation is undemocratic;
- student political acumen equal to that of the staff;
- age and experience are no criteria for wisdom in any society.

9 Equality on hiring and promotion committees

Opposition to students on hiring and promotion committees:

- it is a matter for professional evaluation;
- if students had a say in these decisions the university would lose personnel, and teaching would turn into a popularity contest;
- the down-grading in the evaluative considerations of research.

Arguments for students on hiring and promotion committees:

- students would be just as humane in their evaluations as professors;
- students are capable of making effective scholarly judgment, especially in the social sciences;
- students could contribute knowledge of a man's teaching abilities and provide a counterbalance to the "publish or perish" edict.
- students would promote on the basis of good teaching, and if they didn't feel qualified to judge on certain cases, they would rely on the opinions of the experts;
- if the professor were a good researcher but a bad teacher, he could still be promoted, only his duties should be re-assigned.

General agreement that a system of hiring and promotion should offer rewards for both teaching and research.

10 Relationship of S.A.C. and the A.T.S. to the governing structure of the university — Should these associations be part of governing structures of the university? Will they have to re-define their aims and purposes when the Commission makes its report?

11 Budgeting — difficulties with the preparation of annual target budget and hiring of new staff when the government formula grant for that particular year is not known

12. Style of decision-making — level of curriculum decision-making, power of chairman, method of decision-making.

The Commission will announce in a subsequent issue of The Varsity and the Staff Bulletin a series of public meetings at which members of the Commission will discuss the issues with interested persons and groups in the university.

The Commission will also continue to hold public hearings and meetings with various members of the academic community, to discuss a number of the briefs submitted and other matters affecting the work of the Commission. Such meetings will be held frequently as the process of drafting the report continues. It is the Commission's hope that they will present a final report in the early fall of 1969.

Pickets fail to end recruiting

By LIZ WILLICK

California Grape Boycott supporters yesterday planned an all-day picket line protesting the presence of Dominion Stores Ltd. on campus for recruiting interviews. But after two and a half hours the pickets packed up and drifted off.

At 9 a.m. a lone Varsity photographer, blinking in the morning sunlight, was on the scene. By 9:40, six pickets were shuffling about at the corner of Spadina and Willcocks in front of the University Placement Service office.

One student arrived complete with Che beret and a little red book poking out of his breast pocket. He called the two cameras slung about his neck "a good tactical measure.

Police don't like having their pictures taken."

In Delano, California, farm workers have been on strike for union recognition for over four years. Average wages are about $2,034 a year. Thus far, despite growing pressure from the boycott, few concessions have been wrung from the growers, who have the support of California Governor Ronald Reagan.

Marshall Ganz, a Delano field worker now in Toronto, says the pinch is being felt. "The loss to growers last year was $15 million. Grapes were sold at a loss or not at all. Last month 71 carloads came back to Delano."

Some were used for wine making. A carload of table grapes is worth about $4,000 — wine grapes, only $100. Some of the grapes were just plowed under.

All the large chains in New York, Boston, Chicago, Detroit, and Baltimore have stopped selling California grapes.

In Toronto, North America's third largest grape market, Dominion has been singled out as the most hostile to "la causa".

In all, twelve students had Placement Service appointments with Dominion. By noon all the scheduled recruits had appeared.

They all refused to make any comment on company policy.

Students drifted in and out of the lines, but there were never more than ten or twelve at one time. At noon, they decided to abandon the project for lack of support.

The Student Boycott Committee is presently concentrated on operating a day-to-day picket at the Bloor and Jarvis Dominion store. Grapes were removed from the counters for one day, but reappeared the next.

Other plans for boycotters in the near future involve "shop-ins", a tactic which has proved successful in the States. Shoppers load up grocery carts, check out, then ask if the grapes are from California. An affirmative answer brings the comment "I'm sorry, but I can't shop here." The 'customer' walks out leaving a dazed cashier with a long sales slip and a large heap of groceries.

Olshevsky oscillates waste

A computer-designed graphic called "Oscillating Waste-Basket" brought U of T a $2,000 scholarship yesterday from New York.

George Olshevsky, a graduate student who wrote the computer program, won the cheque as third prize in a nationwide U.S. competition. The prize was accepted by Dr. J. N. P. Hume, associate dean of the School of Graduate Studies.

"Oscillating Waste-Basket", designed on an IBM 7094 II with a Calcomp 665 plotter is two feet high and a foot wide. "Waste-Basket" is wide at the top, bottom, and in the middle, with two narrow waists (no pun), it is reminiscent in detail of some of the finest filigree work of a Baghdad silversmith.

The contest was sponsored by California Computer Products, Inc.

The Department of Political Economy has cancelled all classes Monday so that students and faculty can take part in an all day teach-in.

The department has been in a state of unrest all year, and it is hoped that through the teach-in there will be a better awareness of the problems — and maybe some solutions.

Strax up for arbitration

FREDRICKTON (CUP) — Non-hindering arbitration on some aspects of the dismissal of Professor Norman Strax is as far as the Board of Governors of the University of New Brunswick will go in re-examining the case.

The Board made the offer Thursday through a letter, written by Administration President Colin B. Mackay, in answer to proposals made by the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT).

The CAUT has requested the UNB Board take three immediate steps in the case:

- Institute arbitration proceedings along CAUT policy lines into all university claims against Strax.

- Dissolve the injunction preventing Strax from setting foot on the campus.

UNB denies Board fired Mackay

The University of New Brunswick has denied that President Colin B. Mackay resigned last December at the order of the Board of Governors.

The Board allegedly ordered his resignation because Mackay had been too liberal with students during the Strax affair, last fall.

- Assume the entire costs of litigation releasing Strax from all liability and costs in the cases against him.

The CAUT demands were the minimum conditions to be met to ward off a threatened censure of the faculty association.

Mackay's letter said in part: "I am authorized by the Board to advise you that the Board would be prepared to accede to a non-hindering arbitration on certain aspects of the suspension (viz. aspects of the re-dress or disciplinary action open to the university) . . . provided satisfactory arrangements can be established between the parties. However, the Board is not able to accede to your proposal that it take steps to dissolve or vacate the injunction and to your further proposal as expressed in step 3 (that the university pay all costs Strax has incurred in the dispute)".

Mackay cited the fact that Strax was presently appealing the injunction against him as a reason for not discussing that aspect of the dispute. The Board, he said, could take no action concerning the injunction while Strax was appealing because the entire matter was "sub-judice".

CAUT officials had not yet received the letter and refused comment until they saw the proposal.

B-BALL BLUES GO BLOOP TO MARVELLOUS MICMACMEN

by JIM MORRISON

A combination of stone-cold shooting in the second half and some unbelievable officiating ended another basketball season for Varsity Blues on Wednesday night, as they fell 87-63 to McMaster Marauders in a sudden-death playoff. Marauders now advance to the Senior Intercollegiate Basketball League playoffs which began tonight in Windsor.

Blues led 39-38 at halftime, after twenty minutes of see-saw action. But they ran into early foul trouble from two of the more myopic referees in captivity. With four fouls on Bruce Dempster and John Hadden, and three on Larry Trafford and Peter Burton, Coach McManus was forced to change his strategy in the second half.

Both Hadden, who was playing well defensively, and Dempster, who was starting to score, were benched during the early minutes of the second half, and Blues switched from man-to-man to zone coverage

Blues' Lorry Trafford (35) confirms old adage, "you don't have to use your head to be a good one," as b-ball whips by ye olde noggine in Wednesday's 87-63 loss to McMaster. Those two things dressed immaculately in sweaty football jersey and one striped sock are "the referees" (better names for twits I've yet to hear).

with substitute personnel. Blues managed to hit on only 7 of 28 shots in the final twenty minutes, while Mac exploited the Varsity zone for 49 points. Highlight for Marauders was the phenomenal play of center Jim Noble, who delivered the SIBL's outstanding seasonal performance with 40 points, 24 of them in the second half. He was followed for Mac by forward Jeff Daw with 12. McMaster coach Bill Fowler substituted freely, and got creditable performances from all ten of his players.

Larry Trafford was Varsity's best individual performer, collecting 18 points, but only five in the second half. Bruce Dempster finished the game with 13.

The final result was disappointing, but Varsity improved on last year's 4-6 (and fourth place) record. And Blues, at least in the second half of the season, were the equal of any team in the League. Bruce Dempster and Larry Trafford both deserve all-star rating for their seasonal performances, with an honourable mention going to John Hadden.

Next season could be difficult for coach McManus. Dempster, Hadden, Peter Burton and Ross MacNaughton are all graduating, and height could be a problem. But Trafford will be back, along with Dale Crouter, Mark Slater, and Garth Evans and Mike Katz who both showed potential at guard during their rookie seasons.

FOR VARSITY: Trafford 18, Dempster 13, MacDonald 9, Hadden 7, Evans 6, Feldman 4, Crouter 4, Burton 2.

SIHL SUDDEN DEATH ACTION AT VARSITY TONIGHT

Whistles will blow, rubber will fly, fans will scream and bands will play. That in a nutshell is what will take place when the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League's annual convention comes to order this evening at 6:30 pm in Varsity Arena.

Delegates will be present to represent University of Toronto, Waterloo University, Laval University and Carleton University. The main topic under consideration will be deciding who Waterloo and Laval will clash in the first contest while Varsity and Carleton do their thing in the second. Admission is by reserved ticket only (there are still plenty left for tonight and tomorrow evening's final) and the nightly entry fee will be one dollar.

Since past performance charts are of little value come game time, we thought it might be a good opportunity to look at them right now. On a team basis, the following observances has backed this up throughout most of the season.

No major weak spots are immediately visible and coach Tom Watt seems to have the team at a physical and mental peak right now. Most everyone knows about the exploits of Paul Laurent, John Wright, Steve Monteith, Ward Passi, Bob McClelland and Gord Cunningham simply because they've been the big scorers all season.

However, the efforts of individuals like Brian Tompson, a winger who can play either side and kills penalties effectively, Len Burman, a solid bodychecker who always makes the most of his opportunities around enemy nets, Paul McCann whose booming shot has already decided one key game, Mike Boland, a muscular rightwinger who continues to improve in each game and defenceman Terry Parsons, the team's most improved and perhaps underrated player, might well decide this "quickie" series.

In a sudden death event such as the one this week-end goaltending is always important. With Tom Little and Adrian Watson both ready to go, Blues are in good hands in this area.

In sum, Blues have it all and should come out on top.

Waterloo gets the nod to win the other semi-final but they don't seem to have enough to go all the way. Ron Robinson and Ken Laidlaw are both good with the puck and their point totals this season have shown as much. Robinson won the western loop scoring title while Laidlaw finished fourth.

Defensively, Warriors are anchored by Neil Cotten and Ian McKegney. Cotten can hit and McKegney combines many offensive skills with his work along the blueline. In goal, Warriors are solid with Arlon Popkey having a fine season.

The major shortcoming in the Warrior picture is that fact they rely on too much from too few. In each of their three games with Toronto, coach Don Hayes has gone almost exclusively with two lines while three or four players sat on the bench as interested spectators. This lack of depth is bound to hurt Waterloo's chances.

"Waterloo barely beat us 3-1 in November and we might be able to oust them this time," said one veteran Raven. "If it's Varsity, well at least they're human," he added wistfully.

But Carleton is also human and their reliance on one line to get goals and their lack of speed should spell the end of the season come tonight.

Laval Rouge et Or parlayed size, a new coach and a favourable-schedule into a first place finish in the east this year.

NINTH STRAIGHT TITLE

Records fall, swimmers win OQAA

Varsity Blues led by record breakers Gaye Stratten, Terry Bryon, Theo Van Ryn and Bob Heatley, captured their ninth consecutive Ontario Quebec Athletic Association title in the championships held at McGill University last weekend.

Toronto swimmers collected 409 points for first place, McGill was second with 355 and the University of Guelph third with 324.

Terry Bryon, Gaye Stratten, Theo Van Ryn, Bob Heatley, Mike Guinness, Chris Fisher, Ross Ballyntine and Barry Bowerman will be Toronto's representatives on the OQAA team which will participate in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union finals at University of New Brunswick in Fredricton on March 7 and 8.

Stratten was the top individual at McGill when he won two first and swam on the 400 medley relay record breaking team. Gaye broke his own mark of 59.2 in the 100 yard backstroke with a time of 57.0. He also won the 200 yard backstroke in 2:06.5. After setting the record last year with a 2:06.5 run.

Van Ryn lowered his own record in taking the 50 yard freestyle in 22.3. In addition, he finished in third place in the 100 yard freestyle.

Terry Bryon set a record of 2:07.8 in the individual medley bettering the old mark of 2:08.5. Bryon also picked up thirds in the 200 yard butterfly and the 500 yard freestyle.

Bob Heatley posted a new record of 53.6 in the 100 yard butterfly. Team mate Stratten was the previous holder of the 56.2 mark in this event.

The Varsity team has a strong performance from Mike Guinness who was second in the 200 yard free style with a time of 1:52. This equalled the old mark for the event. Dave Johnson was declared the eventual winner of the race although both he and Guinness were clocked in the same time. Guinness also was second in the 500 yard freestyle and third in the 1650 yard free-style.

Ross Ballantyne placed second in the 100 yard hreaststroke while Barry Bowerman took second in the 200 yard breast.

Blues medley relay team of Stratten, Heatley, Ballantyne and Chris Fisher set a record in winning the 400 yard relay. A second team of Bryon, Guinness, Doug MacIntosh and Bob Watt placed second in the newly instituted 800 yard freestyle relay. Their time was 8:02.3.

Blues have beaten Warriors twice this season in three meetings. If the two teams meet on Saturday night, Varsity should chalk up number three.

Carlton has already surprised many people just by making the playoffs. But coach Brian Kealey remains calm and hopeful.

"Sure we're underdogs", says Kealey, "But we've got the kind of team that can pull the big upset. We may not win but we will sure give them a big scare."

Major credit for Ravens solid second place finish belongs to the high scoring line led by former Western Mustang captain John Heslop. Other members of the trip are Junior "A" graduate Wes Peters and the team's top scorer Wayne Small, a former All-American at Brown University before he transferred to Carleton this year.

Carleton's defence is big and experienced but rather slow afoot and easily lured out of position. Fortunately for Ravens, their numerous defensive lapses are salvaged by outstanding goaltending from lean and lanky Rick Benning.

Their defence, led by capable veterans Alain Bergeron, Andre Robidoux and Marcel Lapointe, weighs in at almost 200 pounds each and they love to hit. Laval's strategy is rather obvious — spend two periods pounding the opposition into the ice and then skate away from the survivors.

Rookie coach Jean-Charles Gravel has transformed the Rouge et Or forwards from their traditional clutch-and-grab confusion into a well-drilled and tenacious group of forecheckers.

Left-winger Gilles Gagnon, the Eastern Division point leader, Denis Mercier, Jean Rioux, Normand Cote and Guy Morel are all proven scorers while diminutive and colorful goaler Jacques Audy has been very effective.

But Laval is slow and their tendency to take too many penalties does not help matters at all. Their hitting will not intimidate Waterloo or Varsity (Blues whipped them 9-3 at the Loyola Tournament in early January). In short, their successful season appears to be at its ceiling right now.

Saturday's final begins at 8 pm.

People may be dying in Dunnville

Omond McKillop Solandt is Chancellor of the U of T, and has been since April 28, 1965. Since May 29, 1964, Chancellor Solandt has also been a director of the Electric Reduction Company, the Dunnville fertilizer firm which has been accused of polluting the area with deadly flourides.

Last Friday, Dr. Solandt was present at a Commission on University Government meeting. We asked him after the meeting whether there is now a health problem in Dunnville.

"The (Hall) commission proved medically there was no damage to humans," he said. "People in Florida have been exposed to higher concentrations of flourides and after 25 years they have shown no symptoms of flourosis.

"We're just a little company — we're not in the big leagues of pollution," he said.

"We observe what are called Florida standards" developed where flouride-emitting plants are located next to sensitive citrus groves. We observe the level of 200 pounds per day."

Dr. Solandt, who graduated from the U of T medical school in 1938 with the highest marks ever achieved by a graduate, says he has assured himself there is no health menace in Dunnville.

"No cow actually died from flourosis. Some were sold for beef, which is perfectly acceptable because flouride goes into bones, not into flesh."

Yet Earl Deamude, a Dunnville farmer and chairman of the Moulton-Sherbrooke Air Pollution Committee, says he lost his entire herd in 1965 and has been afraid to buy new stock.

"I lost them (the Aberdeen-Angus cattle he had been planning to breed for show purposes). They were affected too much by flouride.

"The Department of Agriculture claimed it didn't affect the meat. I paid up to $400 for a young registered heifer. Two years later I had to sell the animal for $150."

Mr. Deamude is a cautious man. He doesn't want to say anything rash. But when I farmers more than $218,000 in crop and livestock damage compensation since 1965, when it was first discovered flouride was poisoning the area.

"The Dunnville farmers came to us (ERCO) and asked us to shut the plant down." Dr. Solandt said Friday. "They said we were killing their strawberries.

"But we asked them whether they wanted to do without their paychecks."

Dunnville farmers whose plants were affected don't work for ERCO.

ERCO employs about 300 persons. With one possible exception all these employees live outside the cone-shaped area which is badly affected by ERCO's emissions.

In this area, farmers see their fields yield less and less, see their plants burned and dwarfed, actually taste the poison in the drinking water.

Deamude reports that 1968 crops are double 1967 yields. "It seems coincidental that our yields went up this year, when the plant was shut down during the growing season."

Is Chancellor Solandt right when he says his company is not a menace to human health?

Doctors are cautious on this issue, pointing out that flourosis is very rare. And to this day, no expert in clinical flourosis has conducted an investigation in Dunnville.

Dr. Donald Hunter, Britain's top industrial physieian and an expert on flourosis, says three things must be done immediately if flourosis is suspected clean up the water supply, give all residents in the immediate area intensive tests, and give every 10th resident over a wider area the same tests.

The Ontario department of health has not even conducted a second dental survey of area schoolchildren, recommended tained 37½ parts per million of flouride.

(In a recent United States case, a man died from drinking water which contained 3.5 p.p.m. In Africa, water containing 2.0 p.p.m. caused flourosis symptoms in a number of patients.)

by the Hall Commission which inquired into Dunnville pollution problems.

In fact, the Ontario government does not come out very clean in the Dunnville case. In 1965, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture conducted tests on livestock and crops in the area, discovered flouride levels were far too high, and remained silent.

"All we needed was a picture of a crippled cow and the milk industry would have suffered great harm," said OFA secretary Donald Middleton, in explaining the reason for the decision.

In the same year, the Ontario Water Resources Commission ran extensive tests on area water, and also attempted to withhold its results.

Under pressure from area farmers, who said the water tasted so "hot" it turned the mouth, the OWRC released the figures: half the samples were above the danger level, and in one case a water sample conthat flouride levels are down, are "better than they were", residents are still being affected by flourides — or rather, since this has not yet been medically proven — by something causing symptoms coinciding with those of flouride poisoning.

Ted Boorsma, 37, weighed 145 pounds in 1961. "He never was a sturdy boy, but he seemed pretty healthy then," says Deamude.

"Now he weighs 112 pounds He has no ambition, he's not strong. He complains all the time."

Dr. Solandt claims there is no danger to human health in the "small" flouride emissions from the ERCO plant. Yet tests run by his company in the late summer of 1968 indicate that the flouride tolerances in cone-area crops are above the tolerances set out in the Federal Food and Drug Act — two parts per million (see illustrations).

NOMINATIONS CALLED FOR GRADUATE STUDENTS TO BE ELECTED TO THE PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL

In the future elected members of the President's Council are to include graduate students. Two graduate students are to be elected for a term of one year to represent the four divisions of the School of Graduate Studies in two constituencies:

- (i) divisions I and II,
- (ii) divisions III and IV.

Graduate students are invited to present nominations for graduate student membership in the Council.

A nominee must be a student who intends to be a full-time graduate student in one of departments of his constituency in the session 1969-70.

All students currently registered in the School of Graduate Studies are entitled to nominate and vote in their proper constituencies.

The nomination papers require the signature of ten students enrolled in the School of Graduate Studies, and the signature of the nominee, signifying his willingness to stand. All signatures must be accompanied by the student number.

A biographical statement of not more than 50 words, approved by the nominee, should be included.

Nomination papers must be received in the Office of the Vice-President and Registrar, Simcoe Hall not later than 5 p.m. on March 10, 1969. It is expected that ballot papers will be mailed to all voters by March 17, 1969.

The divisional structure in the School is as follows:

"Moderate pragmatist" in SAC race

By LARRY HAIVEN

John Rogers, a third year Victoria College General Arts student who describes himself as "a moderate pragmatist," became the fifth declared candidate for the SAC presidency Friday.

His running mate is Barry Sampson (II Arch) who sees himself as "an evolutionist". Both say they are "willing to listen to any story, to hear as many sides as we can get."

If elected they plan to institute a campus-wide report on the philosophy of education. "People all across the campus are really starting to think, 'Why are we here?' There wasn't time to look into this in the Macpherson or Allen reports but now that they're going to be implemented, it's about time we addressed ourselves to that question," says Rogers.

They also intend to look carefully into the withdrawal of professional faculties from SAC. "It could be disastrous for this campus if they withdrew", says Sampson, who deems his own architecture faculty's questioning of SAC membership as "a backwards way to go about it."

"We want to listen to their complaints," he adds, "and try and take corrective measures, to get them involved in university affairs, get them to appreciate the things to be gained from SAC."

Also in their platform is the implementation of the recommendations to be made by the Commission on University Government.

They believe that SAC should get involved in moral issues such as financial aid to draft dodgers "only if we get a two-thirds majority in a cross-campus referendum." The two-thirds majority, they say, will compensate for a "certain amount of drift of opinion that works over a certain period of time."

Radical elements on campus, they say "have a one-dimensional approach to very complex issues. A student who says this is a sick world abso-

Next week there will be only one issue of Random magazine. Not to be outdone, The Varsity will only produce 33 1/3 per cent of its normal quota of papers. lutely ignores all the good things in it."

What would they do if faced with an increase in student activist actions such as the Toronto Student Movement has engaged in? "We somehow have to get the student body more interested in SAC," says Rogers. "We'll have to change our policies, not toward a super power movement but to present a good even picture."

"Change never comes fast enough," says Sampson, "we have to learn how to speed up evolution by more communication as soon as possible."

Although he had never been a member of SAC, Rogers says he doesn't feel it is a hindrance. "Sometimes I get the impression that they (the SAC members) like listening to themselves... like in the draft-dodger issue."

Rogers has worked on the Arts and Science curriculum committee, was a third-year representative on the Religious Studies committee and was on the Victoria College legislative staff-student committee. He also served on various intramural athletic administrative committees.

Sampson is not in favour of the SAC housing project which is to be built in the Kensington market area of downtown Toronto. "There was a lack of consultation with the architecture faculty and the students of this university. They haven't fully looked into the effects this project will have."

Rogers says he agrees with the way Steve Langdon and SAC handled the matter of the secret brief late last fall. He says that he would take a tough stand on various recommendations of the Commission on University Government if the provincial government were to disagree with them.

"The politicians are there to help the people," he says, "and I'm one of the people and I will represent 18,000 other people."

"We have always kept up with the Ontario government regulations on pollution"

One man who could help clear up the question of whether Dunnville residents are suffering from fluorosis is Detroit physician George Waldbott, who has published more than 150 papers on the subject.

Dr. Waldbott testified before the 1960 Morden Commission hearings which recommended fluoridation of Toronto drinking water. He recommended against fluoridation on the basis of his findings as an allergist (he has many patients who are allergic to flourides) and although much of his testimony was given in camera, it is evident he clashed with commission member G. E. Hall, who was later to chair the 1967-68 Hall Commission.

Dr. Waldbott was effectively prevented from testifying before the Hall Commission hearings. He claims his requests for certain laboratory test results were denied him.

On the other hand, Dr. Hall and Dr. Solandt are old friends. One might question the Ontario government's propriety in appointing Dr. Hall to a commission investigating a friend's company.

Two hundred pounds of fluorine — 2,000 cubic feet — are released each day from the stacks of the Electric Reduction plant at Dunnville, Chancellor Solandt said Friday. Tests at Dunnville air shows that this becomes diffused to a concentration of 10 parts per million on the average "a safe level," according to a Dunnville report. At this concentration, 200 million cubic feet of air are filled.

"We have always kept up with the Ontario department of health regulations on the subject (of pollution)," Dr. Solandt said Friday. "There are others who have a far worse flouride problem than we do."

Dr. Solandt is in a good position to know the national pollution picture, for he is head of the Science Council of Canada, an organization which advises the Prime Minister on national science policy. In 1968, the SCC has a budget of $300,000. For 1969, it has a budget of $1-300,000.

The SCC has numerous sub-committees which study various scientific problems and make recommendations on priorities. Pollution is not a high priority for the SCC.

A $100,000,000 Intense Neutron Generator for Chalk River, however, was given an extremely high priority by Dr. Solandt's council.

Recent figures indicate air pollution damage alone cost Canadians $1 billion in 1967 — about $65 a person.

up again and again, there seem to be no answers forthcoming from federal or provincial governments on the subject.

● Why has no expert in clinical fluorosis conducted a thorough investigation of the Dunnville area residents?

● Why did the OFA and the OWRC withhold test results from farmers whose water, crops and livestock they tested?

● Where did all the Dunnville area cattle go? There is evidence some government agency bought numerous animal. ● Why did the Hall Commission find it necessary to reprimand the CBC in its report? The farmers in Dunnville are in the same condition now, in 1969, as they were when Air of Death a film on pollution mentioning Dunnville, was made. Why is the government so anxious to clear up the flouride problem there?

● Was the Hall report a whitewash, as so many claim?

● If the Dunnville farmers are not suffering from fluorosis, then what is making them so ill?

● What is more important, strawberry patches or paychecks? A fertilizer plant or human lives?

● Why does the Hall report stress the economic damage caused by attaching stigma to Dunnville crops? Is it better to let people eat poisoned foods than to close one factory?

● Why, if Dr. Solandt is so proud of observing "Florida standards" of air pollution, has he not also implemented measures ordered by the Florida board of health — sealing the storage sheds? Why hasn't the Ontario government followed the Florida example?

● Why does the city of Toronto buy 32 tons of flouride a week from ERCO?

It is not known how this standard is determined to be safe. A concentration of sulphur dioxide of 1 part per million starts to damage green plants after two hours; 0.6 parts per million of ozone starts to interfere with breathing. Fluorine is one of the most reactive chemicals known and at 9-16 parts per million it is several times more concentrated than these gases.

"I am disturbed by the whole question of the morality of allowing a scientist who owns part of a polluting company to make moral and welfare decisions," says a U of T scientist who prefers to remain anonymous.

"I wonder how the government can say his connection with the ERCO does not prejudice Dr. Solandt's scientific objectivity."

In two weeks of research, certain questions have cropped mals "for study purposes." Why?

● In light of ERCO's own laboratory tests, showing flouride tolerances above those permitted in the federal Food and Drug Act, why hasn't the Ontario government prevented Dunnville farmers from selling their produce?

● Why was Dr. Waldbott prevented from testifying at the Hall Commission last year?

The regimen I shall adopt shall be for the benefit of my patients according to my ability and judgement and not for their hurt or for any wrong . . . I will give no deadly drug. The Hippocratic Oath ## on pollution, war research, and the community of scholars

"Dr. Omond M. Solandt, scholar, industrialist, and former Canadian government troubleshooter, has been named Chancellor of the University of Toronto."

— Toronto Star, April 28, 1965

In the story from which the above quotation is taken the Star describes Dr. Solandt's career as "varied". How right they are.

Dr. Solandt graduated from the U of T medical school in 1938, and interned in England. During World War II, he worked on psychological problems of tank personnel and eventually joined the Canadian armed forces.

He was appointed to the Defense Research Board on Oct. 26, 1946, and became Canada's chief advocate of war research.

On Nov. 6, 1948, he urged the Canadian government to pour more money into germ warfare research "in an attempt to eliminate some of the uncertainties". In 1951, in London, England, Dr. Solandt revealed the Canadian government was testing poison gases in southern Alberta. In 1953, he was careful to stress that only animals should be poisoned in disease warfare. (One supposes here that man is not an animal.)

In 1958, Dr. Solandt went to Geneva as the Canadian government's representative to the East-West talks on policing of nuclear tests. Three days after his return, he said in a speech at McGill University that Canada may need to make "new sacrifices" in maintaining large conventional armed forces if nuclear tests are banned.

The thesis was clear: Canada would be unprotected if she observed the ban. Sounds like a country at war, doesn't it?

The tests, he said, should be suspended "as quickly as possible" but "we should be sensible about this . . . Radiation from this source is not as catastrophic as many people think."

Anybody see the War Game Saturday night?

Remember the quotes strung throughout the film from people who consider nuclear war a feasible alternative to . . . ? To what, Dr. Solandt? Life?

In 1967, Dr. Solandt was still at it, urging that Canada increase her production of triphibious weapons because it is good for the economy to sell weapons to countries fighting each other.

There is no question of morality in Dr. Solandt's speeches. Biafra, Vietnam, the Middle East — he doesn't mention these in particular, but they would make marvellous markets for some enterprising Canadian capitalist, wouldn't they? And if human lives are involved, well, at least our standard of living will go up.

This kind of thinking carries over into the Electric Reduction Company's treatment of possible fluorosis victims at Dunnville, Ont. Dr. Solandt is vice-chairman of that company.

Dr. Solandt's public policies as chairman of the Science Council of Canada also lack a certain human element. The SCC recently recommended as top priority items for Canadian government research funds a $100 million Intense Neutron Generator and a $80 million giant telescope — multi-million dollar toys that Prime Minister Trudeau had the good sense to veto.

In an age when Canada suffers losses of $1 billion annually in life and property from air pollution alone, this country's research appropriations might be better spent studying that. As it was, pollution received a fairly low SCC priority rating.

The close link between government and industry, typified by Dr. Solandt and his cohorts on the Board of Governors, creates problems of its own. Besides the "educational pollution" that occurs when the values of the marketplace seep into the educational system, industry-backed research is often terminated if the results aren't what the company wanted.

As an example from California, a U of T scientist explained that if scientists doing research for a pesticide company there on the "good" effects of insecticides should discover that the insecticide causes cancer in mice, "they would find themselves without a grant."

We're not saying we've reached this level of educational dishonesty and hypocrisy, this level of corporate control of the university. But the danger exists.

Perhaps it is naive to expect that a university's leaders be devoted to the development of the intellect instead of the economy, to the development of peace rather than the research for weapons of war.

But consider the alternative. For a start you could take a look at the Hippocratic oath printed above, remembering that Dr. Solandt graduated at the top of his class as a medical doctor.

University a 19th century monument to hardware: McLuhan

By GEOFF MEGGS

It was the centralized university vs. the diffuse learning community Firday as the Commission on University Government interviewed members of the Board of Governors in the morning, and Marshall McLuhan and Arthur Porter during the afternoon session.

Board member W. O. Twaits proposed government by a representative academic body under a small group of men, "so constituted that it will not only exercise authority in all fields, but be seen by everyone as able to do this."

This supreme body should be composed of "anyone who can make a contribution", Twaits argued, and act as a buffer between the university and the legislature.

He rejected the concept of an elected body forming a unicameral government system. "Such a group will turn into a debating society unable to make long range decisions."

But in the afternoon Marshall McLuhan told CUG members not to waste time trying to reform an institution. "Bypass it," he advised.

Calling the university "a 19th century monument to hardware," McLuhan said CUG's problems were the same as those of every bureaucracy in the world

"You cannot have centralism at high speeds of information movement," he said.

"What you call participation is tribalism, complete oneness of interests, decision-making and shared awareness," he said. "What better way to do away with administration than by participation?"

McLuhan said the problem of campus unrest was the result of a loss of identity caused by decentralizing forces of a technological revolution.

McLuhan proposed the electric environment be brought into the university and inspected.

"When you have the total inventory of problems you have the answer," he said.

Elections

● Vic

Election of next year's Victoria College Union Council will take place all day this Thursday.

John Elton (III VIC) and Ernie Hobbs (II VIC) are running for the position of President, with a three-way race for Vice-President involving Blair Cowper-Smith (II VIC), John Sparks (II VIC), and Mike Stewart (I VIC).

Other offices being contested are Treasurer, Educational Research Commissioner, Communications Commissioner, Scarlet and Gold Commissioner, Cultural Affairs Commissioner, two Members-at-large, and University Government Commissioner.

The candidates will be speaking at 1 p.m. tomorrow in the Music Room of Wymilwood.

CAUT to arbitrate Gray dismissal

MONTREAL (CUP) — Faculty at McGill University are sharply divided over the impending dismissal of political science lecturer Stanley Gray. Friday, Gray accepted arbitration by the Canadian Association of University Teachers. The proceedings will be open.

Gray has been charged with disrupting meetings of the McGill Board of Governors and Senate, behavior detrimental to the university community according to McGill Principal H. Locke Robertson.

Thursday, over 100 faculty members signed an open letter to Robertson supporting Gray. Teachers supporting Robertson immediately launched a counter petition, obtaining over 600 faculty signatures condemning disruption of university business and affirming confidence in Robertson's integrity.

Saturday, dissident faculty met to form a rebel caucus within the McGill Association of University Teachers. MAUT was criticized for a Thursday meeting which dissolved into shouting chaos as the majority faction tried to yell the dissident minority into capitulation.

The 17 dissidents will prepare papers supporting the right of dissent and disruption. They hope to force MAUT to disassociate itself from the administration.

Indications are that Harry Thomas, editor of the administration's McGill Reporter, may be forced out following a treatment of the Gray affair that was rather unfavourable to the principal.

A number of student and faculty groups have declared support for Gray, including the militant Teachers' Syndicate at L'Universite de Montreal.

Before arbitration proceedings begin, Robertson and Gray must find three mutually acceptable academics from outside the university. Failing that, Robertson and CAUT select one man who selects two others.

The Political Economy Department will hold an all day teach-in today to take a critical look at the department from both the undergraduate and graduate levels.

The morning session will consist of two panels in Sid Smith Room 2135. The first will discuss The Purposes of Education and The Uses of the University and the second will deal with The Content and Approach of Political Science.

At 12:30 in Convocation Hall Gabriel Kolko, of the State University of New York in Buffalo, will deliver the key-note address on "the Roots of American Foreign Policy After 1943," followed by an afternoon series of seminars in Convocation Hall.

A panel at 4 p.m. will sum up the teach-in and deal with the resolutions that the seminars have produced.

All Political Science classes have been cancelled, although most Economics classes will go on as usual. All sessions are open and the university at large is invited to attend.

WARRIORS WHOOP ROUGE ET OR

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Waterloo fans and players tuned up for the big Saturday footerall with a humorous 4-2 victory over Laval Rouge et Or ("Roar, roar for Rouge et Or!") in the opening semi-final played on the previous Friday eve.

The humour came from the feeble futility of Laval who showed about as much finesse and hockey savvy as a troop of one-armed aborigines.

Examples: Laval player picks up puck just inside his own blueline, dippy-doodles a few times, and calmly fires the puck straight into the boards, still in his own end, where it is pounced on by an amazed Waterloo player who moves in for a shot on goal. Also, big roar from the crowd as two Laval players snare a loose puck and prepare to race down the ice two-on-one (is two-on-one an orgy?), but too many cooks pollute the puck (as it were) and slowly but irresolutely they crumble into one another, ending up in a demoralizing heap of skates, sticks, gloves and embarrassment with the puck having budged nary an inch.

The weird thing was that the final score was only 4-2, and the result might have been a lot different if an apparent Laval goal hadn't been disallowed which would have tied the game 3-3 late in the second period.

It was not to be, however, and Waterloo skated lazily to victory with little sweat expended.

Warriors opened the scoring in the second minute of action on a goal by Orest Romashyna after a scintillating rink-length rush by captain Ron Robinson.

Laval stumbled back with a power-play goal from Guy Morel and the period ended 1-1.

Bob Verdun cheered as Warriors went ahead 3-1 following scoring markers from Rick Bacon and Ken Laidlaw, while Liz Willick roared with delight when Laval's Denis Mercier narrowed the gap to 3-2. Then came the disallowed goal and Laval lumbered ludicrously the rest of the way.

Robinson iced the game with a goal early in the third period.

Acrobatic work by Rougeetor's fiery little goaltender, Jacques Audy helped keep the score close.

FREE!!! FREE!!! FREE!!!

The Blue & White Society would like to invite all students to come to all the free events in the coming weeks. We think that most students are finding themselves in financial difficulty, and so are unable to indulge in a social life due to this lack of funds. Since students need some sort of break from their studies, and since they have already paid their $12 to S.A.C., we feel justified in using our budget to provide a social program for these students free of charge, especially since they are the ones who have given us our budget. Thus, all we are doing is giving you your moneys worth of programming. We hope you will take advantage of this, and come out to the programs we have planned.

On FRI. MAR. 7, we will have a free double-feature movie, with YOU'RE A BIG BOY NOW and A THOUSAND CLOWNS. This will take place at 8:30 at Convocation Hall. On SAT. MAR. 8, from 9 p.m.-1 a.m. there will be a free COFFEE HOUSE in the ARBOR RM. in Hart House, with live entertainment. On SUN MAR. 9, at 8:30 p.m. in Convocation Hall, we will present THE KENSINGTON MARKET in concert. Tickets for the Sun. Concert and the Fri. movies will be available on Wed. at the S.A.C. Office free of charge, 2 per person. I hope you enjoy this program and the similar ones in the coming weeks.

BLUES DRUB WATERLOO 6-0 IN SIHL TITLE MATCH

By PHIL BINGLEY

Something old, something new, something borrowed, add them all up and you get Varsity Blues. And, Blues are back on top of the heap today following their letter perfect victory over University of Waterloo Warriors in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League sudden death championship game played before 4,753 Saturday night at Varsity Arena.

The old were the veterans — Jim Mites, Steve Monteith, Ward Passi, Gord Cunningham and Bob McClelland — who were playing their last games at Varsity in Blues uniforms. The new were rookies Adrian Watson, Mike Boland and Len Burman while the borrowed was the powerplay which Blues employed as their most effective weapon in frustrating Waterloo for the third year in a row.

Paul Laurent got Blues rolling in the first period when he deflected Cunningham's slapshot from the point during a powerplay situation. Warriors were two men short at the time. Laurent put Blues two up early in the second period before Steve Monteith and Len Burman made it 4-0 by the end of 40 minutes. Each of the three markers came while Blues were enjoying a man advantage.

These scoring plays represented a complete reversal of form for Varsity from their regular season tilts with Waterloo. In those three games, Waterloo counted six of their eight goals while playing a man up and kept Blues at bay with effective penalty-killing. Saturday it was Blues who made their oneupmanship pay off while mesmerizing Warrior powerplay snipers with superb defensive work.

Monteith's goal was the one which put the final outcome beyond doubt. Warriors appeared to be ready for a rally when their goater Arlon Popkey made a fantastic stop on Monteith who had skated in untouched from the blue line. But Steve put the screws to that momentum when he broke in again moments later and beat Popkey with a quick backhand flip as he swooped across the front of the goalcrease.

Passi skated aggressively all night and set up Laurent's second goal. Cunningham was at his end-to-end best and contributed a goal and an assist. McClelland ignored his lack of size to continually check his larger opponents with ferocity and Mites turned in his best defensive effort all season and made the key play on Burman's goal.

In fact, it would be difficult to pick one Toronto player who did not at least match his best previous performance this year. Goaler Watson, playing his first playoff game, highlighted his confident and flawless effort with several splendid stops. Burman continued to make the most of every opportunity around enemy nets with his third goal in the two day series.

Rearguards Dave Field, Terry Parsons, Bill L'Heureux and Miles were never better both as individuals and as a group than they were in this one. They stood up at their own blue line, forced Warriors into costly miscues and carried the puck smoothly and quickly out of the Varsity end.

Warriors were a tired and disorganized team by the beginning of the third period. Their continual dependence on two forward lines (Blues used three throughout) and three defensemen hurt them badly.

In Blues noisy dressing room, after the game, happy players slapped each other, offered congratulations and rehashed parts of the sweet victory like a bunch of excited kids. Coach Tom Watt beamed from ear to ear and occasionally yelled "Great game gang."

There was nothing else to say. Blues had done all their talking with their respective on-the-ice performances.

NOTES . . . Adrian Watson's shutout was Blues first this year . . . Another of Varsity's bitter rivals, Loyola Warriors, bit the dust this week-end. They lost 4-2 to Sir George Williams in a league semi-final playoff game. SGW finished 10 points behind first place Loyola during the regular season and finished fourth . . . Blues leave for Edmonton and the CIAU playoffs on Thursday. They'll meet Laurentian University in the first round . . . Saturday's win gave Blues their fourth straight SIHL title. Paul Laurent, Ward Passi, Gord Cunningham and Bob McClelland have been members of each of those teams.

Steve Monteith (with puck) sweeps around Waterloo defenceman Neil Cotten before beating goaler Arlon Popkey with quick backhand goal. The goal came midway through the second period and turned out to be key marker in Blues' 6-0 victory.

Twinkle, twinkle little puck, how I wonder where you are? Ian McKegney (left), Bob McClelland (16), Brian Tompson (17) and Warrior goaler Arlon Popkey pose question during Saturday's game. Popkey eventually caught flying disc and held it for a faceoff.

Varsity ousts Ravens

Varsity Blues' line of John Wright, Steve Monteith and Len Burman dominated the game and Blues swept to a 10-6 win over Carleton University Ravens in a Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League semi-final contest played Friday night at Varsity Arena.

Monteith fired three goals. Burman added a pair while Wright picked up five assists.

Blues turned in one of their lesser efforts of the year but never looked to be in danger of losing. Carlton held Blues within range for two periods but sagged sharply in the third.

Paul Laurent and Len Burman gave Varsity a quick 2-0 lead in the early moments of the game but Ravens rallied to gain a 3-3 tie by the end of the first period.

Blues went ahead again in the second period 6-3 but the Ottawa team came back to make it 6-5 by the end of the frame.

Ward Passi, Bob McClelland, Bill L'Heureux and Gord Cunningham (with the eventual winner early in the third period) had Blues other markers. Greg Gordon with two, John Heslop, Doug Harper, Mike Pontus and Tom Barkley hit the scoreboard for Ravens.

Carleton was much slower than Blues throughout the game but made the most of their scoring opportunities. Blues, on the other hand, were often sloppy in their own end but had little trouble solving Carlton's porous defense.

Blues captain Paul Laurent accepts Queen's Cup from U of T administrator John Sword and athletic director Warren Stevens following Varsity's 6-0 victory over Waterloo Saturday night.

Since the beginning of the century, theoreticians have told us that the chances of revolution have significantly decreased in proportion to the increased destructive capacities of weapons at the unique disposition of governments. The history of the last seventy years, with its extraordinary record of successful and unsuccessful revolutions, tells a different story. The people mad who even tried to overthrow the overwhelming odds? How can the gap between success and failure be explained? Is it violence and what people? Or is it the theme of the gun? Or has it been the enormous that technology has made? Or is it the fact that the odds are stacked against the underdog? Or is it the fact that the odds are stacked against the underdog? Or is it the fact that the odds are stacked against the underdog?

THE COMMISSION ON THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO PUBLIC HEARINGS

Last week the Commission on the Government of the University of Toronto published in the Staff Bulletin and The Varsity a skeletal outline of the issues that the Commission has over the past three months identified as being central to the question of university government and structure.

While there are areas of disagreement on specific issues, the Commission is in general agreement that the structures they are seeking should aim at being responsible to the university community, decentralized in the decision-making process, and adaptable to meet the forces of continuous change. While recognizing that structural changes within the university in themselves cannot solve the problems of student and faculty alienation in a large university setting, the Commission's basic aim is to start to tackle the problem of involvement and participation.

The Commission wishes to discuss these issues with YOU. They want to hear YOUR opinions and reactions to their statement of issues. They want to explain to YOU where they agree and disagree — and why.

During the week of March 10 — 14, 1969, the Commission will be holding a series of informal public hearings in various locations on campus, at which Commission members will be present to discuss the issues with YOU. The Commission wishes to stress the fact that members of the university community should feel free to attend all or any of these meetings.

Erindale Students will help choose new Associate Dean

Students at Erindale College are to have a say in the choice of their new Associate Dean.

A committee of four professors, two students and the Registrar, Dr. J. J. Rae, is being set up to advise the Principal on the choice of Erindale's new Associate Dean.

The former Associate Dean, E. A. Robinson has been appointed Dean. He has been acting Dean since November when the former Dean, S. J. Colman, left to take over as Dean of Scarborough College.

The proposal to create this committee was discussed and agreed upon at the last meeting of the Principal's Council which has equal faculty-student representation.

The two student members on the committee are Alec McDermid and Erindale student council President Paul Kochberg.

Last week the New College Council rejected a similar proposal to set up a committee composed equally of students and faculty plus Principal D. G. Ivey to choose a new Dean of Men.

UofS supports independent union

REGINA (CUP) — The two-month-old conflict between students here at the University of Saskatchewan and the administration has strengthened student resolve for an independent student union.

Regina's student council is a participant of the Board of Governors' decision to stop collecting student union fees.

Negotiations between the Board and student council seem close to settlement. Sources say they expect a final decision by Thursday and the Board will again agree to collect student union fees. The Carillon apparently will be ruled by a set of guidelines patterned after the Code of Ethics of the Canadian University Press.

Last Friday well over 50 per cent of the campus turned out to elect a slate of student officers committed to the independent union and freedom for the Carillon, student newspaper at Regina and the pressident of the Board of Governors' decision to stop collecting student union fees. The Carillon apparently will be ruled by a set of guidelines patterned after the Code of Ethics of the Canadian University Press.

Wanted: by a cultural publication of high stature and intensely literate traditions, an Editor for the forthcoming editing season. Must be approved by Refew staff which meets Friday at 11 a.m. Must have applied to Count Miguel Ignattiera at 91 Sir George at 531-4543.

Moral standards dropped: Ryan

By LIZ WILKICK

"This is not an age of prosperity but of darkness for religion. But death and silence always give way to light and resurrection."

This was the conclusion of Claude Ryan, editor of Quebec's leading newspaper Le Devoir last night after a Hart House lecture.

He began his lecture Can Religion Become Relevant Again by saying that "peace is the ultimate goal — so important and so elusive" that one cannot ignore the contribution that may come from any source — religious or non-religious.

About 75 people were scattered about the theatre — students, laymen and clergy. Ryan spoke with an accent discernible only in the upward inflection on final syllables and the characteristically French hard th sound. His gestures were controlled but expressive.

Poli Ec — "benevolent"

By ART MOSES

Decision-making in the department of political economy amounts to "benevolent despotism," says Prof. Jean Edward Smith, the department's associate chairman.

Speaking at Monday's all-day political science teach-in, Prof. Smith said that under regulations established by the Board of Governors and Dean's Committees, the department must be run along these lines.

"This is something for the Commission on University Government to act upon," he added.

In the course of the panel discussion Prof. Smith was asked about his association with the U.S. Defence Department.

"I have consulted for the Defence Department and I feel that a body with the potential for the destruction that the Defence Department has needs all the advice it can get," said Prof. Smith.

Prof. Peter Russell voiced concern that students on hiring and firing committees would impose political tests on faculty member.

"We that the decide l Weisdor matter letting eide for i

"We men like Macpher men lik laughed at Smith's association — "men like Prof. Dupre for example," chuckled Smith.

Gary Webster (SGS) disagreed, saying that the Department "by and large serves the dominant class in society, obviously the upper-middle, business class. Political science the world over, including the Soviet Union, is supported by the system which exists. In General, political science is opposed to any radical transition."

George Carter (SGS) sug-

students can't really be effective on curriculum committees if they don't have a corresponding role in determining who teaches the courses they choose.

"As Marshall McLuhan said to CUG, maybe it is better to have the experience of a 21-year-old than the experience of a 48-year-old," said Webster. "I am sure students would be quite reasonable on these committees, even the most radical ones."

What is behind the threat to bring police on campus

Education Minister William Davis' decision, reported in the Monday newspapers, to call in police "immediately if students create disorders at any Ontario university" is an unfortunate decision, but one to be expected.

It is unfortunate because, if he carries through on his threats, he will destroy any possibility of peaceful change in the university and ultimately in the society.

The fact is that students' only recourse in attempting to create fundamental change in the way this university is run and in its goals is through direct action. Dr. Bissell, for example, has made it clear that he will not allow the present purposes of the university to be changed by the students.

In his opening address he told students: "In a simple, practical way democracy means the free choice by the people of those who will make decisions concerning the collective life."

But later in his speech Dr. Bissell added, "There are areas, however, in the democratic system where the popular will does not prevail and openness is not accepted. In the university the non-democratic element is greater than it is in the state."

Dr. Bissell's reasoning — that the quality of education would suffer under a democratic system — sounds logical, but behind the logic lies one simple fact:

"I, Dr. Bissell, will decide the aims and goals of this university." The core of power remains in the same hands as it did before the plethora of staff-student committees we have now.

Dr. Bissell added that the university could not be completely democratic because: "The university is not concerned with general welfare, in which goals may vary, but with a particular area, where there can be only one principal goal — the preservation, dissemination and expansion of knowledge . . ."

Yet in a recent interview Dr. Bissell slammed the radicals for trying to change the university and told them: "For heavens sake forget about (yourselves) and start thinking about the welfare of others."

Strange words indeed in view of his previous definition of the university. Radicals are concerned with bettering the general welfare and to do it they have added one more definition to Dr. Bissell's "principal goal" — the preservation, dissemination, expansion and use of knowledge.

The university should use the knowledge it gains for the betterment of society, and it is this criteria that brings student radicals into conflict with men like Mr. Davis and Dr. Bissell.

These men do not want the knowledge that genuine learning brings, put into use, because that knowledge often involves a recognition that our society is structured along irrational and unjust lines. Changing the structure would involve taking power out of the hands of Bissell and Davis and putting it where it belongs — with the people who are most affected by that power.

In the university, those people are students and faculty.

JUST DEMANDS

Most student "disorders" have arisen from demands that were "just", but demands that the system did not want to meet. At Simon Fraser University, for example, 114 students were arrested for sitting-in at the administration building. Their demands? Open up the university to students in technical and junior colleges, and to children of the lower classes.

The administration acknowledged the justice of their demands, refused to implement or even promise to implement them, and called in the police.

The picture on the front page shows national guardsmen clearing the Berkeley campus with tear gas. Student (and faculty) demands there? Open up the university to underprivileged groups — blacks, Mexicans, Puerto Ricans.

And so it goes at college after college, university after university — just demands met by Mace, teargas, clubs and bayonets.

It is this kind of violence — police violence — that Mr. Davis wants to bring onto the campuses of Ontario. And make no mistake, Mr. Davis may talk about "student disorders", but with the lamentable exception of Sir George Williams University, violence has almost always been triggered and carried through by the police.

Even at Columbia, most sources now seem to agree that the wreckage in the buildings was created by police, not students.

But it is not wreckage that Mr. Davis is worried about. When the engineers stopped the subway during one of their capers a couple of years ago, they did damage estimated at up to $250,000. The cry for police on campus did not arise out of that incident because it was not a threat to the established order. There was no fear of social change.

One can speculate whether Mr. Davis would dare make the same statement to the press about labor — "Police will be called in at the least sign of disorder during a strike," to smash the labor movement. Of course he wouldn't.

Why students, then?

Well, for one thing, students aren't organized and lack the solidarity of labor unions.

For another thing, students are politically powerless — most don't even have a vote.

But the main reason harks back to the crucial issue of the place of students, and the myths surrounding students, in our society.

STUDENT "DRONES"

Students are regarded, under the encouragement of Mr. Davis' department, as drones, unproductive parasites on the body politic. The truth is that students are intellectual workers in training, whose "production" during their university years consists of their increased potential to produce after graduation (we'll ignore the problem of production for whom).

If the government recognized this fact officially, it would be forced to pay students wages, just as apprentices in other professions are paid wages. As it is, students are doubly penalized by having to pay for this training.

The government does not want to recognize this fact, despite figures proving that as an investment, education yields "interest" (in increased production) of 15 to 20 per cent per year.

By bringing in the police, then the government is protecting its investment, and also maintaining the subordinate role of the university vis-a-vis government and business. The police are government's tools in this process of repression.

The events at Berkeley, San Francisco and other U.S. colleges indicate that if police are used to suppress student movements and the possibility of social change, these movements will gain numbers and fight back, physically if necessary.

This is the possibility Mr. Davis opens up when he sends police on campus. The university and the society must be changed, and a certain amount of "disorder" may be necessary to do it.

Mr. Davis may argue that "student disorders" lead to a reaction by the general public, a reaction that may lead the society down the long road to fascism. If so, Mr. Davis has no one to blame but himself.

It is he and his colleagues that have created the conditions for fascism in this society by their social policies, by manipulating the educational system and the mass media so that just student demands are regarded as a threat to freedom and democracy.

To the extent that students oppose Mr. Davis and his police, they are in fact fighting such a threat, and helping to bring about a democratic university in a democratic society.

There is no rule for the people of Canada It is just as easy to show there is no rule by the people of Canada

By KEN STONE

This article is in reply to an article by Russell Deigan (III UC) in the Feb. 24 Varsity. Mr. Deigan criticized the desirability of introducing socialism into Canada. Mr. Stone is a recent graduate of U of T.

I would like to reply to Mr. Deigan's criticisms under three headings: 1) the failure of Russian socialism, 2) socialism and democracy and 3) the fundamental contradictions of capitalism.

I - The failure of Russian socialism

Inevitably in any discussion of socialism for Canada, the red (?) herring of Soviet socialism pops up.

Socialism is totalitarian, undemocratic, not in the interests of the people. So goes the argument. Canadian conditions are ignored. The finger is pointed to Russia.

I would like to dispel a few myths perpetrated about the Soviet Union in the media and in our course content.

First, Russia is not a socialist state. True, it has a nationalized economy; but that economy is under the control of a self-perpetuating party bureaucracy that amounts virtually to a class. Moreover, under the Lieberman proposals, there is a move to give factory managers greater autonomy (sound like capitalism?). The Soviet Union supports the same rotten Latin American military dictatorships that are maintained by the United States, plays the same games in outer space, and so on.

What is important is to understand why the Soviet revolution has not yet succeeded and why Canadian circumstances are different.

One of the first mistakes of Lenin. I believe, was the overly-highly disciplined and centralized nature of the Bolshevik Party. This "democratic centralism" was a function partly of the efficiency of the Tzarist police and partly of the lack of a successful revolutionary precedent. ("It didn't really help much — as two out of the five members of the central committee were Tzarist agents.")

Another error was the style of the revolutionaries: a cultural revolution did not appear to go on simultaneously with the political revolution. In other words, no socialist life style was developed. Finally, the strategy of the revolution was not the best. The Bolshevik Revolution amounted very much to a coup d'état in Moscow and Leningrad rather than to a mass-based revolution on the Chinese model.

But we can't lay all the blame on the Russians. During the first critical years of the Soviet state, the western powers forced a civil war upon Russia (Canada sent troops). They also cut off trade relations as the U.S. is doing to Cuba. These facts coupled with the small stock of material goods in Russia in 1917 (the stage of socialism must eliminate scarcity before communism can be achieved), laid the groundwork for the hard fisted national government of Stalin.

But even Stalin should not be examined out of context to the designs of the western powers on Russia (see Carl Oglesby, containment and Change, a history of the Cold War).

Before leaving Russia, I would like to answer two more of Mr. Deigan's allusions. First, to conditions under socialism. One should never forget that in the "totalitarian" Soviet Union and, for that matter, in any socialist country except under the direst circumstances, and unlike under "normalcy" in "affluent" America, no one lacks the basic necessities of life — food, shelter, clothing, medical care, formal education.

As for the quality of life under socialism, I suggest Mr. Deigan visit Cuba to see what good things a revolution can do for people's heads. Also to see that socialist regime can be very, very popular.

Secondly, to his reference to this fellow, Milovan Djilas of Yugoslavia. Unfortunately, I know little about Yugoslavia and nothing of the Communist, Djilas. But I do know that not everybody who calls himself a Communist is a Communist. Take Brezhnev, for example.

In 1969 Canada, needless to say, conditions are different from 1917 in Russia. The repression on radicals has not really started yet nor will "democratic centralism" a la Russe be the model for the revolutionary organization. I believe that there is also a genuine attempt by the real radicals I know to live a socialist life style. There is also a much greater stock of material goods in Canada now than in Russia of 1917. Lastly, we want a mass-based movement.

II - Socialism and Democracy

Only under socialism can there be democracy. Democracy is defined here as rule by the people, for the people. I think most people could accept this definition.

In my last article, I pointed out examples showing that there was no rule for the people in Canada. It is just as easy to show that there is no rule by the people in Canada. Look at your schools and factories. Examine the vote you get for governments once every four or five years.

Even more illuminating is the fact that modern western political thinkers don't think the people rule. Madison, Hosca, Lipset, Dahl, Galbraith, Porter, Clark Kerr will all admit that under pluralism (that's what they call it), elite or interest groups, not the people, have the power. They excuse this fact by explaining that these elite groups are too small and too competitive for any single one to force its will upon the people.

Don't believe them. Look around and see ruling class that controls everything: the corporations, the universities, the banks, the government, the media.

But enough of capitalism. On to socialism.

No one has the blueprint for the socialist Canada. One can only postulate generalities.

However, speaking only for myself, I see the state organized thus, after the (hopefully) few initial years of the threat of counter-revolution.

A central planning agency delineating national goals and needs. Regional planning agencies to interpret the goals and needs in terms of the local factories, farms and universities. At each level, especially the one involving the vast majority of the people, there would be the machinery to dissent. In other words, the workers who would control the factories and the students and faculty who would control the universities, would be able to tell the planners to go back and try again.

This kind of participatory democracy would involve no contradictions, for the central and regional planners would be ruling, like the farmers, students, and workers, themselves, for the people.

Every once in a while, however, a cultural revolution might be necessary to prevent the formation of a self-perpetuating bureaucracy.

When scarcity is finally eliminated, we will have achieved the new society, called "communism" by Marx back in 1848. Needless to say, such a society is so alien to past human history (or "pre-history") that not even Marx tried to describe it. It might be the "non-repressive society" with which Marxism is primarily concerned.

III - Fundamental Contradictions of Capitalism

Mr. Deigan says I can "easily achieve (my) objectives through the (capitalist) system." I don't think so.

The fundamental contradiction of capitalism is the contradiction between the private ownership of the means of production on the one hand and social needs on the other.

Three examples. (I could give more):

1) Three main companies control auto production in Canada and the U.S. (and to a large extent Europe) — GM, Ford, and Chrysler. Figure how many millions of people work explicitly to put out those cars. Figure the raw materials necessary. Notice the enormous profits.

But also look at what is produced. Cars that depreciate half their value in their first two years and end up as junk after seven. Cars that are made to break down after a few years so that new ones have to be bought. Cars that pollute the air (The three companies are presently being sued by the US government for collaborating back in 1954 not to build into their cars an anti-pollutant device.) Cars that destroy cities for people. Cars for which it is necessary to brainwash the people with sex and status symbols to sell. Cars that require a whole advertising industry.

Why not public transportation (vastly improved beyond our present conception) at a fraction of the social cost? Why not use what is saved for socially desirable ends instead of the profit of the few?

2) At a strike of Mexicans-American mine-workers in New Mexico in 1950 (the story of the film, "Salt of the Earth"), the owners of the mine, a large corporation, kept the miners on strike for over eight months, because they didn't want to give them parity with the white mine-workers. As long as they didn't the owners could say to the white workers, "what are you complaining about, you get more than the 'mexes' ". This is the economic basis of racism.

3) After a while, as the capitalist countries (England, France, Germany, US) industrialized, they found two things. First, they didn't have enough raw materials or the right ones and secondly, they were producing more than their national markets could consume. The result (stated simply) was the race for the sources of raw materials and for markets. This action is called imperialism. After fighting two wars over these materials and markets, one country became dominant and absorbed the others. That country is our friendly neighbour to the south, which owns us, the United States.

As a reaction to this (stated oversimply), other great independent industrialized power seized eastern Europe as a buffer, as well as for its markets and materials. Having sold out long before on its founding aspiration and established itself as a great power, the Soviet Union also collaborated with its American imperialistic colleague to maintain the status quo.

The result is our modern screwed-up world.

Mr. Deigan, at the risk of sounding facile, I have already spent time being co-opted in the U of T bureaucracy and I don't intend to be co-opted again. Nor do I intend to be defused. I intend to organize. I intend to help smash capitalism and imperialism. I intend to help build a socialist Canada.

"which - hunting" in pol. ec.

The final session of the Political Economy Department "Teach-In" (Monday, 4 p.m.), devoted to decision-making structure in the department, brought forth the question of the past and present liaisons of certain professors in the department with outside interests.

Specific reference was made to Jean Smith, the associate Chairman of the department, who has been in the employ of the United States Defense Department. The issue was raised in conjunction with the question who in society does our Department serve and how does the decision-making structure perpetuate such service.

One member of the audience felt that the reference was McCarthyistic, that students had no right to concern themselves with such questions, and that such questions impinge on the academic freedom of the professor mentioned. Having posed the question of Professor Smith's connections (to illustrate the problem of decision-making), I should like to clear up such misunderstandings.

In designing curriculum, decisions have to be made concerning not only what courses to teach, but also how those courses will be approached. The name of a course, as we all know, indicates little about its actual content. There are many examples of the same course taught in two sections by two professors whose approach and analysis differ greatly. The setting up of a political economy curriculum therefore entails not simply a list of courses to be instituted, but also a conception of what those courses should involve.

However, every political scientist or economist has his own specific approach and analysis (though he may belong to certain "schools of thought"). A choice therefore has to be made. It is consequently very important to the fulfilment of student-staff curriculum objectives, that students and staff participate in making that choice — in the hiring of new professors, as well as in the designing of curriculum. One necessarily follows the other.

Of course, the logic of the whole argument is that students should participate in the decisions that affect them. Since curriculum affects students, they should have a say in the designing of curriculum (which they do) and in the selection of new staff members (which they don't).

But, curriculum decisions are not the only ones that affect students. Other departmental policy affects them as well. When the power to determine such policy lies largely in the hands of the chairman and associate chairman, it is both legitimate and necessary for students to question the factors that influence policy decisions.

The allusion to Jean Smith's liaison with the United States Defense Department is not then related to witch-hunting, (or wizard-hunting, for that matter). It is related to which-hunting; that is, which factors play a role in the decisions made by the associate Chairman. In the classroom, an honest and rigorous professor begins an analysis by indicating the assumptions (including the biases) that underly his approach and his view. The acceptability of his conclusions will largely depend upon his assumptions.

Just as it is valid for a professor's assumptions to be questioned when these affect his conclusions (as they must), it is similarly legitimate to question an associate Chairman's outside liaisons, if these affect his decisions (as they might). The liaisons should by no means exclude him from consideration as a candidate for the associate Chairmanship. The legitimacy of student interest in the question again lies in the fact that the decisions taken by the associate Chairman will affect the students, for whom policy is indeed being made.

In the best proposed situation, of course, Jean Smith's being associate Chairman of the Department will not pose a problem. For in such a situation, the Chairman and associate Chairman will not have to play the role of despots (benevolent or otherwise). Decisions will be reached through cooperation and dialogue of the persons affected by the decisions, namely the students and professors who comprise the Political Economy department.

OUS/CUS petition

A petition is circulating the campus this week calling for SAC to hold referendums on its support of OUS and CUS. The petition and the referendums it calls for raise separate issues. The petition is concerned with SAC's notion of "participatory democracy". The referendums will question SAC's membership in provincial and national student unions. The latter will be debated today in the Sid Smith foyer by the U. of T. Debating Union.

SAC's proposed budget for 1969-70 cuts certain campus services while endorsing continued membership in OUS and CUS. There is no question that the GSU withdrawal from SAC necessitated large budget cuts. What is in question is the assumption that the students of this campus feel it is more important to support student unions than it is for activities like the exchanges, the chorus, debating etc. to be maintained at their present level. The validity of this assumption has not been questioned. Hence the petition. Two thousand signatures, of which no more than 500 may come from any particular constituency, will force SAC to hold referendums.

The petition is not concerned with whether SAC should support student unionism; it has arisen out of a concern that student views not be taken for granted on an issue which involves $25,000 of their money and the sacrifice of certain campus services. It is concerned, in short, with achieving in practice SAC's rhetorical promise to involve students in its policy-making decisions.

appeal from New Women's residence

We love smut. We thrive on trash, doggerel verses and journalistic drivel. Oh, please send us the Varsity as soon as possible and regularly. Apparently a porter tried to sell last Friday's edition for a nickel a copy and maybe that's why he didn't sell any and why you think we don't want the "Varsity". But we do, we do.

Wilson Hall needs the "Varsity." Our girls must hold some kind of record for their crap tolerance. Who else would blithely accept the protective controls of our ill-defined administration? Betcha Wilson Hall has the scrawniest security on campus. If our girls seem hysterically happy at nine in the morning it must be because of our grainy pop-up toilet tissue. Or maybe it's due to the intoxicating effect of sundry smells from our mini-fridge bloated with the goodies of thirty-odd gourmets.

If one of our girls is seen stepping out onto Willcocks Street radiant and tingling you can be sure she's just had one of many surprise visits. We're never lonely. We get visits all the time from a suspiciously enthusiastic group of gentlemen who probe our intercoms, pierce our door knobs, pinch our wires, feel our desks, and blow our air filters clean.

Wilson girls' social needs are so well attended to in fact that (if offered) many say they will reject proposals of freer visiting hours, among other things. Right now they are chiding one enterprising resident who had the nerve to suggest they might learn something from a casual chat with a student leader after the bewitching hour — after all, titter, titter, he was male. I wouldn't be at all surprised if Wilson Hall were to establish diplomatic ties with Massey College in the near future.

So, like I say, Wilson Hall needs the "Varsity". Our girls say they're here to learn. Better learn 'em quick.

"When one tries to define an ideal university community, a lot of nineteenth-century myth gets into it"

NORTHROP FRYE

Northrop Frye is a University Professor in English.

Thank you for your letter. You ask me for a dictionary definition of the university as I should like to see it, in other words of an ideal university, and what I am personally doing to bring about that ideal. You begin by saying, quite rightly, that people have different assumptions in mind when they speak of the university. Your assumptions appear to be (a) that one must have in one's mind a definable ideal which could be realized in the future (b) that if one is honest and knows why he is here, one must be doing something definite to work for that ideal.

Dictionaries don't define things in terms of ideals, and for a good reason. All definable ideals get located in the future, but they emerge from the past, a past which mixes up historical and childhood reminiscences. When one tries to define an ideal university community, a lot of nineteenth-century myth gets into it: a small self-contained community where all relationships are personal, and where everybody has a sense of belonging as well as being free to do his own thing.

If I tried to work for or towards such an ideal, my tactics would become increasingly and more obviously regressive and reactionary. Everything that really happens goes in the opposite direction, and you follow that direction whenever you support the progressive side of any issue. Being liberal and progressive about contemporary issues is just trying to be sane and balanced about the contemporary world: it won't help to bring about an ideal, in the university or anywhere else, and one shouldn't kid oneself that it will.

If you support more student participation, you don't get happier students; you get a new flock of tensions and difficulties. If you support a program for getting more Negro students, you don't lessen racial conflict: you get Black Panthers demanding courses open only to Negro students. If you try to make curricula more flexible or seminars more personally integrated, you cannot avoid reviving some of the more repulsive features of progressive education and of what used to be called moral re-armorment. The only really consistent form of working towards an ideal is the opting-out form, the secession to a new or free university. It's consistent because it's pure and uncompromising reaction. But that, after a brief period of shuddering virginity, plunges into the contemporary world, and all the difficulties of that world begin to seep into it.

I joined this university because I discovered that there were some things I was intensely interested in doing, that I believed in doing, and that only a university would allow me to do. What I most regret about my career are my failures in what I can only call pastoral care; failures in making enough contact with students, mainly through not knowing enough about them. Such failures resulted, apart from my own deficiencies from the growth of the modern university: too many students, not enough time, the difficulty in arranging priorities when scholarship and writing have to have so large a place. During the last twenty years the legitimate demands of my own students have been increased by a steady cataract of books, articles, epic poems, projects, essays, proposals to rewrite my own theories, pouring from everywhere over my desk. The result has been a steadily increasing sense of frazzled inadequacy. I'm not feeling sorry for me; I'm merely showing how even my efforts to im-

University (yūnivē'rsīti). ME. [a. AF. universit:—L. universitat-, -itas (1) the whole, universe, (2) a corporation or community, f. L. universus UNIVERSE. As the designation of a whole body, community, or guild of masters and scholars, the full phr. was universitas magistrorum et scholarium; universitas ultimately superseded studium for 'university'.] 1. The whole body of teachers and students pursuing, at a particular place, the higher branches of learning; such persons associated together as a society or corporate body, having the power of prove my own scholarship and teaching carry me further and further away from any kind of ideal.

The university is in a society that has many things wrong with it, and I am familiar with most aspects of the "I can't study until" syndrome. That is, with the assertions that the university is so completely a creature of a hypocritical oligarchy that its educational process is a brain-washing and regimenting one that kills all creative interest, and that its real values cannot be discerned until society itself has been transformed.

One can only check these assertions against one's experience, and my experience tells me that they are nonsense. I like the tolerance of the university community: people can demonstrate and agitate and sit in, but there is no political commissar making sure that everybody does. I like its good will, and the fact that it is a less cut-throat community than any other I know in society. But these are incidental amenities.

I get intuitions, in odd moments, of what life could be like if the intelligence and the imagination were totally and consistently functional in it. Of how essential it is to human dignity to recognize that making things and learning things are the most important activities of life. Of how powerful authority is in society when it is a purely internal authority, the authority of the rational argument, the repeatable experiment, the imaginative classic.

I know that others, including many of my students and colleagues, have had similar intuitions, and my ideal university would be a place where everybody had them. But such an ideal is not a future ideal to be worked for or towards; it is a present ideal that I keep revolving around. When I joined the university I believed in the values it stood for: after thirty years of working in it I am convinced of them. And there are not many other things I am convinced of in this world.

SAC candidates

As far as we know, this is where the SAC candidates are at for the rest of the week. Tomorrow they travel out to Erindale (presidents only) for a noon meeting while the vice-presidents go to the Toronto General Hospital lecture hall at 1 p.m., to talk to med students. The campaign sort of winds up at Convocation Hall with a two-hour meeting starting Friday at 1 p.m. The rest of the time the candidates are just generally stumping the campus. (The campus is a small city of tents, related vaguely to SAC).

Plethora of platforms presented in presidential pursuit

By AGI LUKACS

"Ninety-seven per cent of the present SAC budget is spent on non-political services", the student council Finance Commissioner told an audience who had listened to several candidates for SAC P/resident criticise SAC's political involvement.

Bob Barkwell (II Meds) is running for Vice-President with theology student John Oldham, a candidate for President. They are the only two with previous SAC experience.

Four teams (and one loner) are competing for the offices, which are up for election March 10. After travelling to Scarborough Monday, they visited Cody Hall yesterday.

"SAC shouldn't allow itself to be swayed by either left or right", said Gus Abols (II Law), another presidential candidate, to applause.

He said SAC should push harder for an end to the mini-hub summer-earnings stipulations in student loans, and for the campus centre.

"A SAC president should be representative of all people", agreed presidential candidate Bernard Teitelbaum (II UC). He suggested that college councils poll their constituents on some issues, and relay opinions to SAC.

"I don't think students are here for politics; they're here for an education", echoed Abe Hudrik (BUS). "We should involve them in politics, but also make them into a community, not a nine-to-five sweatshop."

Oldham and Barkwell want SAC to remain "a strong central co-ordinating organization," though probably changed to do more for professional schools.

Socialist candidate for President Harry Kopyto (II Law) declared: "We're not posing as wishy-washy liberals and then doing things once we're elected."

His platform includes universal accessibility to university, a living allowance for students, and getting big business off campus. "A capital gains tax would get the necessary money," he said.

"Students are not isolated from society, and should make their views heard on world affairs. We identify with students around the world who are fighting for democratization of universities."

Mudrik, chairman of the Blue and White Society, wants to make students feel less alienated from each other by having more social activities.

Barkwell, noted that all but one of the Blue and White's concerts had lost money this year. "And you can put Gordon Lightfoot in a steam tunnel and still sell tickets", he commented.

In the question period which followed the candidates' short speeches, a student asked why three or four candidates had run on apparently similar platforms.

"Moderates all sound alike at first", said Mudrik. "It's when you get to specifics that you notice differences."

John Rogers (III Vic) has withdrawn from the race for the SAC presidency and thrown his support behind Gus Abols (II Law).

Rogers and his running mate, Barry Sampson (II Arch), announced their decision to drop out yesterday afternoon.

"We feel that the team of Gus Abols and Ed Thompson have platform planks very similar to ours. We have withdrawn so that the moderate vote will not be split, and we believe the ticket to be the best."

Abols, saying he was very pleased with Rogers' support, predicted the development would "narrow down the issues in the election."

THE UNIVERSITY: MYTH AND REALITY

SAC tells it like it is to CUG

izes the present separation of faculty from student. Straight committee representation does not really give equality and respect to any but the student elite, by no means institutes participatory control, and almost ignores the building of a real community feeling in the university.

The committee's strategy not only ignores the mass basis of student power; it may hinder it by cutting the student elite off in many ways from its base.

At the departmental and faculty level, at least, a better alternative exists: "Parallel structures" maintain the committee system by making joint committees the major innovative bodies and the forums for detailed discussion as that of the other administrative officers of the university. There should be some non-governmental representatives Teaching Staff is a voluntary association, and any staff members can opt out. It cannot bargain with the university and only presents a suggested salary brief each year. We would recommend that the CAUT and the ATS implement an automatic checkoff in an effort to become a stronger, more cohesive unit within the university.

The student movement must be seen not as a problem to be overcome or assimilated but as a challenge which can change this university for the better. It is a critical movement responding to very real problems — the large impersonal multiversity, the uninspiring course material, the passivity of student's learning in the present classroom and the present authoritarian structure of the government.

creative task. In some departments this tendency is especially obvious, leading to situations where, for example, a professor is getting $15,000 from the university and over $60,000 per year for consulting work.

The university is filling a role that no one can accept who takes seriously the idea of the university as an evaluating critic of society and an exciting and creative learning environment for developing young people.

One can begin by isolating the reasons for student power: • To gain for the student a sense and a reality of equality and respect within the classroom and the university community. • To give each individual a degree of control in shaping his education and living environment.

Student power — do you know where it's really at? What kind of changes do you want to see? What kind of university do you want? What do YOU want? CUG is going to try to decide what to say to CUG.

They will be discussing the issues raised in the following draft brief, which has been shortened somewhat.

Such methods of education are no longer intellectually acceptable, even as learning techniques. They do not lead, empirically, to an exciting creative educational environment; boredom and cynicism are the norm. Nor do they make of students critically evaluating and actively participating citizens.

One can perceive a status-quo orientation for much course content. Medicine builds in profit-motivation. English becomes picaresque. Political Science and Sociology concentrate on problems solving within the status-quo. Law memorizes it.

The subtle pattern of emphasis and approach is affected as well by the growing Americanization of many parts of our university through a shift to U.S. professors.

Education has very little social relevance at the moment. It is a one-dimensional

Scientists examine role in US

WASHINGTON (CPS) — Universities across the United States yesterday held seminars, symposia, workshops, letter-writing campaigns and just plain lectures as part of a nationwide effort to bring the role of the scientist in society to public notice.

The action was conceived and carried out by chapters of a newly-formed activist-scientist group, Science Action Coordinating Committee (SAAC). Officially, the day was to protest the misuse of science and technology in society, but at many schools the activities took on more broad connotations, relating science to other disciplines.

The famed Massachusetts Institute of Technology came closest to having an actual work stoppage. Major proposals came out of some workshops, including not giving courses or research credit for "classified" work.

At Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore, writer James Ridgeway led a number of speakers on The Responsibility of Scientists in Today's Society at a teach-in.

At the University of California at Berkeley, up to 500 students heard SAAC leader Charles Schwartz speak on "The Power of Scientific Knowledge to Build and Destroy, With the Big Loser so far Being the Human Race." Charles Townes took issue with Schwartz' contention that in effect the scientist should extend himself beyond the lab.

At the University of Pennsylvania, a day-long lecture series ended in a discussion of the anti-ballistic missile system proposed by former President Lyndon Johnson, which moved many scientists to their stoppage in the first place.

and in Canada

A committee tentatively called the Canadian Concerned Scientists was the result of a day-long seminar at New College inspired by similar teachers and "research stoppages" in United States universities yesterday.

"There has been a general increase in awareness that physics can be misused instead of used," said Prof. Jim Prentice last night. "Scientists are beginning to realise they have a responsibility in a generalized way to society."

It has been this trend in the U.S. that led to the initiation of the "research stoppages" during which the science faculties sat down to discuss their responsibilities and how they were fulfilling them.

The CCS, established at the New College seminar yesterday, set up three basic aims:

- to promote discussion of social responsibility among scientists.

What kind of research is going on beneath that dome on the MacLennan Laboratories? Who decides what work is to be done?

Some answers to these questions came to light during a recent fact-finding mission led by D'Arcy Martin, a SAC representative of the Working Group on Research.

No one was looking for Dr. Strangeloves in the basement of the physics building and the discussion between Martin and Dr. J. M. Daniels, newly-appointed physics department head proved such a creature does not exist.

According to Martin it has already been established that there is not a great deal of research being done on campus that has a direct relation to war research in the short run.

But there are still problems on this military tack. How far has the process gone? How aware are students and faculty that there is a possibility of

...to develop a community out of the multiversity, to replace the alienation and cynicism of the present with a group feeling of inter-relation.

- To create a "critical" university.

The university government question has been looked at so far in too narrow a manner. On the administration side the emphasis has been on structuring efficiency, rationalizing, streamlining and eliminating anachronisms. To administrators, student power is a problem that must somehow be integrated into their other aims.

Faculty now dominate students within the university. The student must come to a realization of his autonomous power, his equality and worth as a person before the open community idea can be other than utopian.

The fight for student representation on committees and councils even for parity, recognition becoming as Daniel says of the NRC. The NRC rarely approaches candidates; researchers have to seek out the grants themselves.

The NRC has enough difficulty in saying who should get the available funds without seeking out more places to disperse their money. Daniels says.

The applicant has the ultimate decision on how to spend his grant. There is no cash involved. A fund is set up on which the researcher can write cheques.

In the case of an NRC grant the researcher is under no obligation to the Council other than that of completing a successful project.

This story is not quite the same when it comes to Canadian Defence Research Board grants.

As far as obtaining a grant, the Board hasn't been too rigid in its qualifications.

"Everybody has their own interests," says Dr. Daniels, "and these interests overlap. What this means is a person rather than good projects."

...to parallel approval. Such a system establishes clear equality between faculty and student groups; Participatory democracy rather than elitism; Co-option is prevented and the push for change made more likely to succeed.

We believe student is a mature individual capable of governing himself.

In discussing students' ability to decide non-academic questions, we believe that no differentiation can be made between the competence of students and that of faculty. Students and faculty must control non-academic decisions.

Students should have equal power with faculty in determining what is to be taught, how it is to be taught, who is to teach, and what academic evaluation is to be made, both of student and professor. They bring a perspective to ac-

...in need of a grant tries to persuade the Defence Research Board to pay for his work.

The defence people don't know exactly what they will need in the next five years, so they go ahead and allow the applicant to make fundamental discoveries which will give the Board an accumulation of knowledge.

Thus researchers are given money by the Defence Research Board to work on "doubtfully necessary" projects.

It is hoped the researcher will produce something useful to the Board, and further that he may accept a permanent position with the Board or the Canadian government.

A graduate student will work under someone who is doing research in the area which interests him. If that supervisor happens to be aided by a DRB grant then the student will likely go to the same place to seek out money, thus perpetuating and increasing the number working with the Board.

"I would prefer to look on graduate training as not necessary training for a job," says Dr. Daniels.

...public representation to university. We decry the inequality of a situation in which the people paying for the university are, for the most part, people who do not and will not benefit from it.

We feel university education as specialized corporate training is insufficient to meet Canada's very real social problems.

All of these problems are challenges to the university which have not been met or in some cases even recognized. CUG cannot deal with them all; it may conceivably not deal with any. Structural changes cannot create utopia. Basic and radical structural changes can, however, promote the development of a better university and society. Students are skeptical about CUG's ability to do this. It is to be hoped that the Commission can prove us wrong.

Another group on campus which does not have collective bargaining rights is the teaching staff. The Association of ...Research being done in the department boils down to that of searching for a clearer understanding of nuclear.

Dr. Daniels said it would not be reliable to say that the work had a military application.

"But it is impossible to say that such and such a thing will never lead to military application," he said.

"Before the war nuclear physics was considered esoteric. In 1939 people realized there was a practical way of using it."

"You know the result..." Dr. Daniels is a pure researcher and the kind of work going on in his department is primarily pure science.

But the question of programs being shaped by grants is still an important one. What SAC hopes to do is find an alternative way to award research funds.

One answer might be to give (x) amount of dollars to the university to award as they see fit, or establish a special department to do this.

Research in the university what? how? why?

war research becoming as dominant here as it is in the United States?

This line of questioning led to the system of obtaining funds for research.

To what extent is research really generated by the desire for pure knowledge and to what extent is it servicing the community under the guise of the military and the corporate elite? These were some of the questions.

Most of the grants in the physics department come from the National Research Council. Any sums from other granting agencies are negligible.

Last year the Canadian Defence Research Board awarded three physics researchers a total of $17,000.00. The American Office of Naval Research gave one grant of $111,432.00.

Applying for an NRC grant is simple, but one of the criteria is the number of publications the applicant has made in the past five years.

"They pay for good people, rather than good projects."

...also innovate matters subject to parallel approval. Such a system establishes clear equality between faculty and student groups; Participatory democracy rather than elitism; Co-option is prevented and the push for change made more likely to succeed.

30 years ago, The Varsity looked Today, as a member of the Board

By LOUIS ERlichman

Back in the 'thirties, when the Vic Bob was an initiation and Varsity editorials were condemning the legalization of beverage rooms, Sydney Hermant was a big man of the U of T campus: President of the UC Lit, President of SAC, champion debater, tennis star.

Today, Sydney Hermant is a governor of the university. And though he is far less known now he is far more powerful than he ever was then.

In a comfortable chair in the small and warmly-furnished boardroom of Imperial Optical, the family concern that he heads, he talked about his great "abiding passion", the university.

He looked surprisingly similar to the old pictures in the back files: the dark hair somewhat thinner, the face a bit softer, but the same steel-rimmed glasses, the well-cut three-piece tweed suit.

And with it all, still the calm articulateness of the skilled debater.

"It's basically the same university," he said. "Students then were as concerned with the world's problems as they are today (I think they have less to be upset about now than in the 'thirties), but they expressed their concern in a different way.

"In those days, you worked through the political clubs, the Marxist societies, the Fabian Societies. I don't think it is SAC's business to take over such functions. It can't ever really represent students, most of whom are not that concerned through SAC anyway."

"99 percent of the time, the great, vital and explosive issue on campus was The Varsity."

Then, as now, Varsity editors showed a remarkable capacity for running afoul of campus opinion. "Varsity editors, who were generally inexperienced and trying to attract the attention of the newspaper world, would attack SAC, or publish some subtle pornography that would offend the Deans of Women," Hermant said.

"Two or three firings were about par for a year."

In former times, SAC was called into service to defend the university from outside attacks.

"Premier Mitchell Hepburn hated the university and the intellectual elite it represented," Hermant said, "and was constantly trying to cut the budget."

When history Prof. Frank Underhill, then a CCFer, made a speech attacking the British connection, a torrent of protest from little old ladies of all ages and sexes descended upon the university.

of Governors he says, "It's basically the same university."

"President Cody called me in as the senior undergraduate on campus one day and showed me a pile of angry letters," Hermant recalls. "He explained that the government had demanded Underhill's resignation and asked for student support to resist the government pressure. I couldn't speak politically for the student body, but I went out and talked it over with everyone that I knew. It's the kind of thing that's hard for you to understand today."

While he went to join the family business, his debating teammates were lured into the civil service. Arnold Smith (then a member of the CCF club on campus) is now Secretary-General of the British Commonwealth, while Saul Rae is the ambassador to Mexico.

"I sometimes kid my old classmates about being the only one paying taxes to support all of them," Hermant said.

"I was always tempted to do something like that. I was anxious to go to Oxford or Cambridge.

"But my father was ill, so I had to postpone my plans and go into the business. And once you are in business..."

In 1939-40, as a graduate, Hermant was elected president of SAC. At the same time, he was elected president of the National Federation of Canadian University Students, the predecessor of CUS.

"NFCUS was much different from what CUS is now," he recalled. "We were able to get special train fares for students, and during the war, to distribute recruiting information and act as a liaison between the Defence Department and students."

Hermant stayed president for the duration, as NFCUS suspended operations while he and most of his cohorts were overseas.

After the war, Hermant neatly hopped to the other side of the administrative fence, serving on the university senate from 1947 to 1962.

"In the senate, we dealt completely with the academic side of the university," he said.

"Nine out of ten meetings would be incredibly dull, but about every tenth there would be a confrontation on basic principle. You got to see things from the inside, and to meet all the academic people."

On the Board of Governors, of which he has been a member since 1962, the situation is completely the opposite.

"We lose touch with the academics," he complained. "We have no contact with people in the university. We just deal with salaries, housing, expansion — how to pay and physically handle the people in the university."

"Probably the best body to be on is the President's Council. It's in between the other two so that you can look at the whole picture."

Hermant sees a place for students all the way through the administration, except for the Board.

"They are intimately concerned at every level," he said, "but I can't be convinced of the logic of equal representation. Students haven't got enough perspective."

He also sees complete openness for meetings as a false idol. "It's all right to be in public if nothing much happens, but it's too awkward if you have to negotiate, and give and take to work things out."

One of the features of the old university he looks back at nostalgically is small classes.

"It was the best of all worlds way back," he recalls, "small classes so that you could know of the people who want a degree so that they can get a job and leave room for those with inquisitive minds. The average employer couldn't care less about a degree."

He also endorses abolition of fees. "If we do it in high school, why not here? I don't like means tests."

In addition to his own firm, Hermant is a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, Maple Leaf Gardens and A. J. Freiman Ltd.

He remains a joiner. He is a former president of the Board of Trade of Metro Toronto and the Empire Club of Canada, and Who's Who lists him as a member of six clubs.

And when he is not there, or at his Forest Hill home, or in the 14-storey building that bears his name, he may be spending his six hours or so a week in the Simcoe Hall Board room, making decisions.

In 1935, Sydney Hermant won a debate on the issue "Big Business is a Curse when directed solely by the profit motive."

When he is reminded of it now, he smiles. "Why, of course, it's true, it's like any of those debating topics. You can just as easily speak for either side."

your professors. It was the depression, so that many people couldn't afford to come, and some of those who could, had to live in substandard conditions, often on one meal a day.

"Now it's possible to spend your whole career in huge lecture halls and never meet a professor."

You might solve the problem, he suggested, if you took every new-born babe, "re moved his tonsils, and gave him a B.A. That would get rid

Eric Mann is an executive member of the Students for a Democratic Society national executive.

Following is the first half of a speech he delivered last September at the University of Windsor orientation procedure, shortly before he continued his Canadian trip by speaking at Uniwat.

I'm VERY HAPPY to be here, but also in some ways very nervous.

I'm nervous because I'm looking at a lot of you and thinking back to when I was a freshman. And I'm thinking that a lot of the things I would like to say would be platitudes.

I would say things like "welcome" or "I'm sure you'll have four happy years at the university of Windsor", "that these are going to be the four happiest years of your life", and a lot of the other things people say when you come in as a freshman.

One of the reasons I won't say it of course, is because I don't believe it. And another reason I won't say it is because it was said to me and it wasn't true.

And so I start out with a certain amount of trepidation. There is another reason why I'm worried about speaking tonight. This is that I have very mixed feelings about speaking to a group of mixed people, many of who won't agree with a word I say. Now, in one way I guess that's a little o.k. because some of you probably won't agree with anything anyone tells you in the next four years, and you'll have about as little choice as you do this evening.

Now, you at least have some choice this evening because there are no grades being given, but if you walk out, try to walk out quietly. I'll try and begin by talking about what happened to me, and try and explain what I think may happen to you. My parents never went to college. They spent a lot of time, probably from the time I was twelve and thirteen, talking to me about college. Now, they've probably never even seen the inside of a college, but they knew a lot about what it was like.

Quest for knowledge?

They told me that if I went to college that that would be a place where I would really meet people who are getting together in quest of knowledge, people who are interested in knowledge for its own sake, a place where I would really broaden myself, where I would learn a lot about the world, where I would make the kind of friendships that I could not make in high school, where, though I didn't like the work in high school, I would find college different, you're really going to like your work in college.

Essentially, in a lot of ways, college was described to me as being very, very different from the lives that my parents were leading, and very different from the kind of life I was leading. College was being held up as a very practical utopia. And so I went to school. I remember being very happy, and walking into a dormitory, at Cornell.

Cornell is built on some hills and valleys, and I remember standing at the top of the hill feeling very much alone, looking into a valley, said to myself, I'm going to really make it at this place. This is going to be the place where I'm going to find myself. What an expression! Finding yourself.

Well, I don't know where it started to go downhill. Maybe I could talk about the fact that six weeks after the school year started, some of the people got mid-term grades. And at the end of mid-term, a very small percentage of the people were asked to leave. And so the dormitory I was in, became, in some way, a very scary kind of place, in some way maybe like a jail.

Ed Hogue, class of 64, left after six weeks to go back to Kingston, New York. I thought, well, somebody else will fill that room. We don't need him. We've got a lot of students here. He couldn't cut the mustard. Maybe somebody else can. Goodbye, Ed, have a nice life. Then came first semester grades.

I remember first, grabbing my books and running into the library. Man, was I studying, 5, 6 maybe 7 hours a day, taking so many notes. I would write 7 pages of work and then write 10 or 11 pages of notes...

I remember trying very, very hard to do well, and having the sense that this was the place where I would prove that I was intellectual, if not superior, at least talented.

But many problems started to develop. One of the problems was that six or eight weeks into the school year, I found out something; something that took me four years to acknowledge. What I found out was that I didn't like to read and write too much.

Now, for those of you coming here, I hope you like to read a lot, and I hope you like to write a lot, because that's what college is. Stripped of all the rhetoric. You get your books, you read a lot, you listen, and you write. You get some more books, you read them, you listen, and you write.

Once in a while, you're not even allowed to talk. But the main thing, is that you'd better like books a lot.

Reality found in books?

You'd better be committed to the idea that reality is found in books, because the whole university system revolves around that concept.

If you like to sing, if you like to speak, if you like to organize, you can do that. But it's called extra-curricular... it's things you do in your spare time. It's not essentially valuable, you see, it's something that's needed in a certain way to keep you busy and interested enough to go back to that essential task of more reading and more writing.

Now, to start with, I think a lot of us wouldn't want to be here, if that was the definition of four years of our life. If you went up to the average person on the street and said "Hey, I've got something really good for you. Wanna come to a place where you spend four or five hours a day reading and writing? Sound great doesn't it?" How many people would spontaneously say "Wow?" "That's exactly what I've been looking forward to doing for four years. How do I join?" "Oh, you don't join, you have to pay." "Oh, that sounds good. I pay to read and write for five or six hours a day. H-MMM that really sounds exciting".

Clearly the university was not based on a voluntary system. We weren't there because we found it rewarding. We were there for a whole series of different reasons. But very few of those reasons came from inside ourselves.

At Cornell, the reason was pretty clear why you went there, because when you got out you could say you went to Cornell. It really didn't matter what the hell you did for four years. You were paying to say you went there. And people competed to see how they could go there with the least amount of effort.

Cornell, you see, is a big fraternity school. And I remember sitting with one of my friends in the dormitory saying "We don't want to join the fraternity because fraternities limit your individuality. Fraternities cut you off from other people. Fraternities are racially selective, they're economically selective. They're against everything we stand for." My friend said, "You're absolutely right."

We walked home together arm and arm and two days later we were both in fraternities. The reasons were somewhat clear. We did have the option not to join—at least at Cornell—again, the analogies are not quite the same here, but I'm trying to get at some basic points.

There were 53 fraternities. Most guys joined fraternities, and so, you joined. You joined for a very basic reason.

Protection from humanity?

Joining a fraternity protected you from the job of being a person. Instead of saying "Who's Eric Mann" and hearing "Well, I'm a lot of different things, I'm rather complicated. You'll have to get to know me", by joining I could say "Tah Delta Fi". Now Tah Delta Fi may not mean anything to you. University of Windsor may not mean anything, I.B.M. may not mean anything, and yet when you think about it, Buick, such and such a church or such and such a street mean something—they are ways we define ourselves.

They avoid the problem of being somebody. In fact, they say, "Don't you want to know who I am"? I drive that car. Don't you want to know who I am? I wear silk ties... Don't you want to know who I am? I wear work shirts.

You can identify yourselves in many ways. But the main point is that these labels allow people to avoid having to be somebody. And in a certain way this makes it easier, because we don't have to worry about each other.

Like, I know you by, "That's the guy with the silk shirt, and silk tie in that fraternity, or that is the girl who is the history major. Or she is going out with that guy and looks like that." And of course, looks are very important, because we all know we are living in a society where what things look like are considered more important than what things really are.

And so we see how certain things begin to be built in; about how we look at people, how we look at ourselves.

Happiness is an 85?

O.K. I went back to second semester. I started making little charts. "Well, if I get a ninety in this, no a 95 then I can afford a 70 in this, no a ninety in this and I can afford 75 in this. That will give me an average of 85. Boy, that sounds good. I think I'll get an 85 this semester.

"So I would work out my projected goal, and I had the fantasy that this time things were going to be different. I remember that my first average was 79.8.

Now at Cornell, 79.8 was a very dangerous average to have because 80 was the lowest possible grade to have because that made you sort of smart. With anything below 80 you were then run of the mill. At 80 they would say, "Hey, he's a pretty good student". Now I went through a big identity crisis wondering if I should tell people that my average was really 79.8, because 79.8 was very different from 80. 80 is smart and 79.8 is "Oh, I see".

So sometimes I would say to people very bravely, "I got 79.8" and just imagine that they were looking at me very differently, or sometimes I would say "80" and then feel differently inside. And so either way I felt that I lost.

And either way I felt that somehow a set of numbers had been developed to define who I was. So now once again I was being defined. I was now Eric Mann, Tah Delta Fi, 79.8. Now the second semester was worst than the first.

In the second semester, it was warm, and somehow I couldn't get into that 5 or 6 hours a day. Somehow I really liked the springtime. I really liked to walk around. But there is a problem with that 5 or 6 hours if you like to walk around, and that is one of the most amazing things about college is that you're never finished.

There's no such thing as leisure. In fact the week is # jobs and don't have any sense about extend to his course. If you rebelled

just one big tread-mill. So that you find, at least many of you, I think will find, that there's no such thing as being finished with your work.

Plus there's always additional books to read, additional course material and often the course material is more than you could read in one week.

You're always ahead in this and behind in that. You finally get caught up on this and you find out that you're behind in that and when you get caught up in that, you're behind in something else. You have to figure out, "Well, let's see. If I don't show up for this, and I say I'm sick, then I can have the time to catch up on that," and the process continues. And if you don't work, which happens frequently, you find that you can't enjoy your leisure.

You find that when you take an afternoon off, there's this cloud hanging over your head. "I am three weeks behind in Ec-101."

Well, that's o.k. If you're not going to do your work, at least enjoy your afternoon. "Sure. But I'm three weeks behind in Ec-101. What am I going to do? So I find that I never enjoyed either work or leisure.

Escape lies in sleep?

So I did the only logical thing. I went to sleep. I found myself sleeping eight, then eight and a half and then ten hours. Then ten hours plus a nice two hour nap in the afternoon.

I found myself so tired that I was tired when I woke up.

You know, I would wake up in the morning after having ten hours sleep; I would think about my work, think about what was ahead of me, and plan on having my afternoon nap. It was really very scary. What I was beginning to find was that I was beginning to feel less and less proud of myself.

While I was thinking less and less of myself, I discovered that there were only two basic options. One was more sleep and the other was finding out ways to feel more and more of myself.

And soon, after freshman year, because I had been president of my dorm my fraternity told me that it was good for the house for me to run for Treasurer of I.F.C.

Now Treasurer of I.F.C. is a very important position. What the treasurer actually does: well, I forget actually, but I remember it was very important because I was told to run for it.

I think, in fact, what's important about being treasurer for I.F.C. is that you go up to people and say "I'm treasurer of the I.F.C. In fact that's the only thing important about being treasurer for I.F.C."

Again, it's a substitution for being a person. I was now Eric Mann, Tah Delta Fi, 79.8, Treasurer for I.F.C. I was building up a series of things that again were trying to compete because on one hand I was weighing those things, on the other hand it was something that was much more basic, which was with all those numbers and all those titles I still didn't like myself very much. And not only that I began to like myself less.

After Treasurer for I.F.C. I ran for President of I.F.C. the next year. I lost but luckily enough I won Vice-President for I.F.C.

Vice-President is not as good as President, but it's better than Treasurer. The most important thing about being Vice-President of the I.F.C., is that it gets you into quill and dagger.

A lot of you won't know what quill and dagger is. Quill and dagger results when the Vice-President of I.F.C., football players and other people who do meaningless work all get together and create an honorary society.

Now why do you need an honorary? It will clearly decide who's cool. And without an honorary, who would know who's cool?

And so, I found myself going to these parties.

We all walked around with quills and daggers in our ties and went with girls who were sort of extensions of the quill and dagger.

Who's cool and who's not?

We all walked around saying "I'm cool, you're cool, how's it going?". You know?

Now about this time, I got pretty proficient at sleeping—I had it worked out pretty much to a size—but every once in a while I would have little academic spurts.

I remember going to some professor who would say to me stuff like, "Look, you're doing good work. You just showed up for two straight classes, why don't you start coming more often?" "I mean like it's not too late. You still have five weeks left in the semester. I'd really like to help you. Why don't you do your work. I mean if you'd start doing your work, I think you could come out with good grades. And if you pulled good grades I think you could get into a good graduate school."

And I remember on one of those rare instances when I was talked to by a faculty person feeling fantastically exhilarated, running home—I mean literally running—back to the fraternity, picking up a book, saying "Man, I'm really gonna do it this time", and I would read.

I'd read the first five or six pages and then read the next nine, this is really fantastic. And then about the 37th page I'd start getting sleepy again. And I couldn't figure out what it was. You know?

Well, after a couple of those starts it became clear that the same basic theme was developing that I couldn't face....I don't like school.

An alienated prof?

Now, I had a sociology professor, who was by some peoples' terms, a radical, but who was a radical in a very interesting way.

His course was about alienation. And the basic theme of the course was that people who work basically don't like their work; that people in industrial society are doing jobs that are kind of meaningless.

Because their jobs are meaningless, because they are ridiculous, they hate themselves and hate their work; they don't have any sense of being a whole person.

I said, "What a beautiful guy to say things like that. What a very sensitive person. He's really great. He really understands what's wrong with the country. He's gonna teach me a lot."

Except for one problem. He didn't believe that alienation extended to his course.

He didn't believe that his course was work. He couldn't believe that for me, reading his 19 books on alienation was very alienating. As a result, he thought the rest of society was terrible except for his course.

You could rebel any way you wanted against the factories because they were evil. You could rebel all you wanted about the schools because they were evil. You could rebel all you wanted about politics because it was evil.

But if you rebelled against his course, you were ungrateful.

So what I found out was that many radicals, or people who call themselves radicals can't be judged radicals until you see what they do with their own lives, unless you see what they do when they have real power.

Are they willing to relinquish the power? If they're not, then they're no different than anybody else.

So not only was I unhappy, but slowly I came to feel that I wasn't really very smart after all—that there were people in college who were better than me.

The people I respected were the people who could work 8,9,10 hours a day.

There were pre-meds in my fraternity who would go off at one o'clock in the morning. We'd call them the "Goldwyn-Smith Boys", because they'd go to this building called Goldwyn-Smith Building in ten below zero weather with these big clodhoppers on at one o'clock in the morning to study, after having studied all day.

I mean, they were just very serious guys. Like it's late at night and you say "Where ya' going?", and they would say "I'm going to study." And they would trudge off in the middle of the night to find this old building.

And I remember not just feeling that it's o.k. for them, but feeling very much like, "Why can't I be like them?" Why can't I be one of the Goldwyn-Smith boys? why can't I have their dedication? Why can't I have that concern for knowledge?

Well, I got out of college, graduated. I think as a mutual favor. They wanted me out and I wanted to be out and when it came down to some last minute credits, they gave me some government credits toward my biology 12 major, we were all happy and I left.

My basic conclusion about college was that it's a pretty good place, but it just wasn't for me. And I remember I left Cornell the day after my last final—I didn't go to graduation; I literally left Ithaca three minutes after I put down that pen. I shut my eyes and drove straight to New York, didn't wanna come back, and a very funny thing happened the next year.

Good Life at Berkley?

The funny thing that happened the next year was a thing called "Berkley".

Now thousands of students at Berkley went around protesting on the issue of free speech. But besides raising the issue of free speech, they began to talk about something called the multi-versity.

What they mean by multi-versity is me talking to you without knowing you, me talking through this microphone to hundreds of people, not one to one, not as a group, but as mass education, mass indoctrination.

The students began to say "Maybe"—they didn't say it to me but I knew they meant it.... "Maybe Ithaca wasn't your fault. Maybe it's because that place stinks. Maybe that place wasn't built for human beings. Maybe you weren't the only guy sleeping. Maybe you weren't the only guy that hated that work. Maybe you weren't the only guy who wanted to leave in his freshman year but stayed three more years because the world needs that "piece of paper" as we are so often told.

Maybe we can't change things right away but at least what Berkley did for me was for the first time say to me, "You're a person and you count and an institution that makes you feel like shit, that is the bad institution, not you."

That changed a whole lot of my feelings, about myself and the society and I began to feel a lot of different things from there. I began to think maybe it wasn't just the university that didn't care about me. Maybe I could look around and see other things.

For years we have been telling black people that all they had to do was get integrated into our good world because we had the good life. But all of a sudden some of us discovered that the good life wasn't as good as we thought it was.

CUG predicts campus blow-up next year . . . . .

By NOEL STECKLEY

This campus will blow up next year, predicted the student members of the Commission on University Government last night.

The blow-up will come no matter what kind of a report CUG writes, said the students.

After the regular business of CUG was over last night the members of the commission talked about fundamental communication problems.

Student member Steve Grant said that there "were a lot of things basically wrong" with the commission.

He said student members are frustrated because there seems to be a tendency to "talk at each other rather than to each other."

The members of the commission are talking platitudes, he continued. CUG is wrong in terms of attitudes, he said.

"Alienation is very real to the average student, the good student and the Woodrow Wilson student," Grant said.

"Whatever report the commission comes up with, it must have a great deal of flexibility, since coming events will surpass us and we will see a blow-up next year."

Grant said the students on CUG were seen as unrepresentative of the students on campus, because there are no students from the professional schools.

What the Commission must now do, Grant continued, is sit down and see where we are going and assess our goals.

D'Arcy Martin pointed out that the commission "was supposed to be some kind of a microcosm where we are to get to know each other" so that discussion on the fundamental questions of the university can take place.

Bob Rae continued the students' expression of their frustration. "There is a consideration that this (CUG) may not be the answer. In two years this university may change more than it has in the last 20."

Rae pointed out that some of the professors in the history department felt that people in first year are completely different than any ever seen before. The professors cannot cope with them because there is no common frame of reference.

Student co-chairman Gary Webster said the only thing CUG can do is legislate for the top structure: "we cannot legislate on the departments, and that's where the action is. We, therefore, can do nothing to stop a blow-up."

Prof. Bernard Etkin said that the act CUG will draft must be "maximally flexible so that we can react to upsets and changes that are to come."

"There is nothing in the system that I'm not prepared to change," Etkin concluded.

Earlier CUG had been faced with four non-political, average students — two Woodrow Wilson Scholarship winners and two members from the School of Engineering.

And it was a tie score. Two opted for students on promotion and tenure committees and two opted against.

Heather Murphy (IV UC),

Woodrow Wilson winner, and Paul Gooderham (IV APSC) did not think students should be on promotions and tenure committees.

"I don't trust democratic evaluation of teaching ability," Miss Murphy summarized.

Douglas Rahn (IV Mus) Woodrow Wilson Scholar, and Arthur Woyzbun (IV APSC) opted for the other side of the coin.

"The concern of the students is with the quality of education," said Woyzbun. "The rest of the department members have no basis for making an assessment of teachers on their ability to teach students."

ATHLETIC DIRECTORATE ELECTIONS FOR 1969-70 MONDAY MARCH 10 1969

This is the second year that a revised method of electing the five student representatives to the University of Toronto Athletic Directorate, will be followed. To be eligible for nomination a student must be in the second or higher year, but not in his final year at the University. There will be one ballot only under which 125 members of the electoral body (composition available in the Athletic Office) will vote for one candidate from each of three groups as follows:

- Group "A" Basketball, Football, Hockey
- Group "B" Sports other than those specified in Group "A"
- Group "C" College and Faculty Athletic Associations

The votes will be tallied under group headings and the elected representatives to the Athletic Directorate declared as follows:

- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "A"
- The two nominees polling the highest number of votes in Group "B"
- The nominee polling the highest number of votes in Group "C"

(The second representative in this group is appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee — see next paragraph).

In addition to the five students elected as set out above, there is one student appointment from the Students' Administrative Council and one student appointed by the Intramural Sports Committee to make a total of seven student representatives upon the Athletic Directorate.

The basic aims of the Athletic Association are set out formally in Article 1 of its constitution reading as follows:

"The Association shall be called the University of Toronto Athletic Association, and its object shall be the encouragement of athletic sport, the promotion of physical education, the provision of recreation for its members and the maintenance of the highest standard of amateur sport."

The Athletic Directorate, as the controlling body for athletics at this University, meets twice a month during the academic year and deals with a wide range of athletic matters upon which decisions are required. A good deal of this business is considered in committee, all committees having student representation.

Students elected to the Athletic Directorate are expected to attend the formal meetings unless there is good reason for absence, also they are expected to take their share of the committee work. A student member may quite properly bring any matter before the Directorate which his constituents wish to have discussed.

The composition of the Directorate includes students, faculty, and graduate representatives who work together in what has always been a most satisfactory manner.

This year, each nominee for election to the Directorate is expected to submit a written policy statement which he is entitled to send to all members of his electoral body. This is the recommendation of the student committee which revised the method of election of student representatives.

J. P. LOOSEMORE, Secretary
University of Toronto Athletic Association.

SPORTS ROUNDUP

Varsity Blues are preparing for their trip to Edmonton to compete in the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union hockey championships. Coach Tom Watt said last night that he planned one more workout — this evening — before the team leaves for the west tomorrow afternoon at 4 p.m. . . . Blues will play Laurentian University in a preliminary game on Friday night while Sir George Williams University meets the winner of the Maritime conference (nobody seems to know who that might be) in one of the semi-final games. The winner of the Varsity-Laurentian tilt will then play University of Alberta Golden Bears, defending national champions in the second semi-final on Saturday afternoon. The Final will be played Sunday afternoon at 2:30 p.m. (4:30 Toronto time) . . . The reason why Blues must play the preliminary game is not clear. The original plan was to have the representatives of the leagues who finished fourth and fifth last year (i.e. Laurentian and the winner of the maritimes) but somehow that idea was lost along the way . . . Wrestlers Larry Barron and Bill Allison have won feathers for U of T's intercollegiate athletic cap following their performances in the CIAU meet held last weekend in Montreal. Barron won the national championship in the 177 lb. class while Allison finished second in the 152 lb division . . . Varsity swimmers Terry Bryon, Gaye Stratten, Theo Van Ryn, Bob Heatley, Mike Guinness, Chris Fisher, Ross Ballantyne and Barry Bowerman will have their work cut out when they attempt to defend their CIAU swimming title during Canadian College Swimming Championships at University of New Brunswick this week-end. While there seems little doubt that this unit is the best in the country by a wide margin, the fact that they are few in numbers may hurt their chances. York University, for instance, will send a 15 member team and although they will not win as many events as Toronto, the points they pick up for third, fourth and fifth place finished may be enough to push them twice by Varsity star Stratten during a York-Toronto dual meet this season . . . University of Windsor Lancers have won the Senior Intercollegiate Basketball playoffs held in Windsor last week-end. They downed McMaster University 89-85 in the sudden death final and will represent the SIBL in the Canadian finals at Waterloo this week-end. Windsor, by the way, is undefeated in league and playoff action this season.

WHERE IS . . . HART HOUSE II?

By PETER ADAMSON
Athletic Directorate Vice-President

When will the men's new athletic building be started? This has been an unanswered question at this university since 1962 when the First User's Committee Report was presented indicating that the U of T was in dire need of expanded athletic facilities.

Since then, numerous problems have been faced and some of them solved. Originally, the building was planned for the Wycliffe site since it is a central location and could be incorporated into Hart House.

But Wycliffe demanded that a new college be built for them before they would move. Being a religious college, provincial grants to finance such a move would be difficult to obtain and so time and many problems negated the feasibility of this site.

The location presently reserved for the building is at the south east corner of Harbord and Spadina next to the Benson Building.

Now that the humanities library and Innis College have materialized, the athletic building is receiving "top priority". However, this term may be misleading. The Government of Ontario makes a project by project evaluation of all major university expenditures and unless they specify a grant for the building, monies received by the university will be spent on other projects rather than accrued for the athletic building.

The university capital expenditure for 1969 is expected to be $14 million on the St. George campus and none of this money is slated for athletics.

Nevertheless, the Second User's Committee Report had a feasibility study on it completed last week and sent to the Property Committee of the Board of Governors. Their proposals favored a low rise section to contain the gyms and pools and a high rise tower for other activities, office space, the Health Service and the Faculty of Physical and Health Education. The cost of 210,000 square feet of floor space (one fifth the size of the new library) is expected to be about $10 million.

But when will the building be started? The situation is bleak until pressure can be brought to bear on the provincial government to supply funds for this specific purpose. This pressure, of course, must come from the university, from Dr. Bissell and the administration.

Although the library was almost a dead issue when Dr. Bissell returned from Harvard last year, he managed to resurrect his plans by commandeering $7 million from the Ontario Government and $1.5 million from funds left over from a Canada Council capital grant. All this despite the province's concern that there would be overbuilding of libraries.

There can be no question that there has not been overbuilding of athletic facilities at this university. Perhaps some constructive student agitation might help. Dr. Bissell realizes that there is an urgent need and desire for new facilities and that his new project should be the acquisition of funds for this building.

Bronze Baby trisected!

By VOLKMAR RICHTER

First time in 12 years, U of T's women basketballers finished first in the Intercollegiate basketball tournament. They ended in a three-way tie with Western and McMaster.

The coveted Bronze Baby was divided equally among the three.

In the tournament's first-half, Toronto and Western went undefeated and Western suffered one loss. That was two weeks ago.

Last weekend, the Toronto girls, playing on home floor in the Benson Building, came from behind at half-time to beat McGill 37-23. But they then lost to Mac's rough-house, 27-23 and finished with a 33-23 win over Queen's.

Then, with first place riding on the outcome, Western defeated McMaster in the final game. Toronto, Western and McMaster each finished with four wins and one loss.

Leading U of T scorers were a pair of four-year vets, Violet Shadd (Meds II) and Lynne Garuey (Pharm I) gave commendable performances.

Burwash scores

Former Varsity tennis star, Peter Burwash, racqueted into fame yesterday in Nairobi as he and his partner, Richard Hawks of New Zealand, won the Kenyan International Doubles tournament. It was Burwash's most notable success to date on his barnstorming tennis tour around the world.

Burwash and Hawks defeated a pair of Egyptians, Aly El Daoudi and Mootaz Sombol, 1-6, 6-3, 9-11, 8-6, and 11-9 in the hard-fought final.

CAPUT wants to incorporate students

By DAVE FRANK

The University of Toronto Caput wants to crack down on "actions hostile to the orderly management and function" of the university — and wants students and faculty to take a hand in this.

The supreme disciplinary body yesterday issued a strong condemnation of the Feb. 5 incident at the Royal Ontario Museum theatre in which students disrupted a guest lecture delivered by Clark Kerr.

In the statement Caput "strongly deplores (the incident) as an example of the intolerance that runs counter to all the university stands for."

The move comes in response to a student-faculty petition presented to Caput with about 1,000 signatures. The petition condemned the disruption and asked for disciplinary action against the students involved.

Caput has decided not to take action, but to attempt to "establish clear procedures for disciplining persons who in future are found guilty of such conduct."

"The experience of the past year has shown that there are persons and groups both inside and outside the university who are ready to ignore the due processes of the university in an attempt to impose their personal views upon others," yesterday's statement says.

"The Caput considers that the university must be able to defend its members against activities of this kind."

At the same time Caput is requesting President Claude Bissell to change the composition of Caput immediately to include students and faculty.

At present Caput is a 24-man council composed of President Bissell, and the heads of the university's various faculties and colleges. It has the power to expel, suspend, impose fines or recommend academic penalties against students.

Immediate change in membership is necessary, says Caput, to make the disciplinary body "more fully representative of the university community."

The Caput's move to reform itself comes as something of a surprise to some observers. A special presidential advisory committee headed by Prof. D. R. Campbell has been investigating campus disciplinary procedures since last summer and expects to make a full-scale report in June or July. The Commission on University Government is also considering reform of discipline in the university.

SAC president Steve Langdon says Caput is an "illegitimate" body and is seeking, by incorporating students and faculty, to bolster its moral authority. The SAC president is an ex-officio member of Caput, but for the last two years SAC presidents have refused to attend Caput's secret meetings.

When reform is put in the context of dealing with incidents such as the Clark Kerr lecture, says Langdon, he is sceptical about student participation.

"If that's what Caput is for, I'm not so sure students should be involved.

"Incidents like that are not going to be solved by improving disciplinary procedures," he says. "They arise because of what the university is like."

Prof. Campbell says his 10-man student-staff presidential advisory committee is considering both reform of Caput membership and Caput's authority in campus "disturbances."

Immediate reform of the Caput would be, he says, an "interim measure," lasting only until the recommendations of his committee are acted upon. He expects to report back in mid-summer.

"The feeling has probably been that reform of Caput is overdue," says Prof. Campbell. He suggests that Caput's wish to reform itself at once is probably an attempt to gain "a stronger moral position, even if for only three or four months."

President Bissell has been proceeding with Caput's advice on the question of incorporating student and faculty membership.

The Varsity was unable to contact Dr. Bissell for comment last night as his phone was off the hook.

Budget hits Centre, Innis..staff pay hike unlikely

By JIM COWAN

The Campus Centre and Innis College's new building will probably be postponed as a result of the Ontario budget tabled Tuesday in the provincial legislature.

Ontario universities received only 60 percent of the capital grants they asked for and only 50 percent of the operating grants.

All aspects of the university will likely be affected, including future expansion and staff salaries.

A. G. Rankin, executive vice-president (non-academic) for U of T, described the budget as "extremely bad news" for this university.

"We requested $33 million cash for 1969-70, $20 million for ongoing expenses and $13 million for commencing new projects. We got $21 million."

With $20 million already committed for ongoing projects, that leaves just $1 million for new undertakings. And that, says Rankin, will have to be used to acquire land and build an air conditioning plant for the humanities and social sciences research library (now known as "The Hole").

Rankin stressed that final decisions on spending must be made by the resource planning committee, but added that "in essence, there is no money for Innis or the Campus Centre."

The various cutbacks overshadow the fact that funds to universities, colleges and cultural institutions will increase 19 percent over 1968-69, and that education accounted for 71 percent of the total budgetary increase. From every tax dollar next year, 42 cents will go to education.

But U of T administrators last night could only see that their capital projects had been cut to the bone and members of the Association of Teaching Staff were concerned that the 5.5 per cent increase in operating grants would doom their request for a 19 per cent salary raise.

The Ontario government uses a formula system for calculating operating grants. Various types of students are given different weightings (for instance, medical students and graduates count more heavily than undergraduates in arts) and the number of students a university has in each category determines how much it gets. The 5.5 per cent increase in the basic unit raises a unit grant from $1,450 to $1,530.

Rankin pointed out that 'current programs are rising in cost much faster than 5.5 per cent a year' citing hydro costs, which went up 25 per cent this year, as an example.

"There is no room for the staff's 19 per cent pay increase," he said.

SAC president Steve Langdon said the budget was "much worse than I expected." He said the university would have to realize that many decisions affecting the university are made by forces on the outside and added: "We're going to have to take that into account."

On the Campus Centre, he said, "It may mean the Board of Governors will have to accept the alternate plan for financing which we (SAC) worked out last year. It's going to be really hard."

Innis College student president Sue Stoess (III Inn) said she was "terribly upset" by the probably deferment of Innis.

"Innis costs are based on the building being completed in 1971," she said, "and the costs escalate from there. If we aren't building it now, I don't know what else we'll chop." The building has already been pared down as delays have forced costs up.

The teaching staff at U of T could be the most adversely affected group. Last November, the ATS submitted a brief to the university asking for a pay increase next year. Negotiations are still going on, but it now seems highly unlikely that they will get their increase.

"It can be done by increasing enrolment without increasing the faculty," said Ian Burton, chairman of the ATS salary committee. "We don't want that to happen but we feel it is inevitable."

The ATS has called for a teach-in on university financing for next Tuesday noon in Convocation Hall. Speakers have been invited from the Department of University Affairs, the University and SAC. President Claude Bissell, SAC President Steve Langdon, and Chuck Hanly, executive vice-chairman of the Ontario Council of University Faculty Associations, have already accepted.

"We want to make the de-

Confused about who's who in the SAC presidential race? Want to find out what the platforms are? Today at 1 p.m. all the candidates will speak in Convocation Hall.

Come and watch demanocracy in action. Be stimulated and inspired by dialogue and worthwhile exchange. This is your last chance to hear all the candidates before the election Monday.

If you (as a grad student) have paid your SAC-CUS fees you too can fill in a ballot. Your ATL card will be your credentials.

At the meeting the outgoing SAC executive will ask the candidates five questions:

1) EDUCATION: Many Macpherson Report recommendations have been implemented for next year through a SAC constituted Student-Faculty committee. What further changes in education do you feel are necessary, how would you go about getting them and how do they relate to professional students?

2) We have just received a letter from Dr. Bissell suggesting a new committee to consider discipline be established. The suggested composition is three administrators, three faculty, one Graduate Students Union representative and two SAC representatives. What would your response to this letter be?

3) SAC's proposed Housing Project will be located in the Kensington area. What would you do if the residents of the area ultimately voted against the project being built there?

4) Student financial aid, housing, etc. are affected by federal and provincial government policy. How would you try to affect that policy?

5) Late last year Political Science students at McGill, by majority vote in the department, went on strike and sat-in, successfully, to get changes in courses and in the decision-making structure. What would you do if a similar situation arose at U of T?

NEUROTICS IN THE CHURCH

In the last 10-15 years critics have regularly taken the pulse, temperature, and made a diagnosis of the illnesses of the Church. Most often the culpability of the clergy in this illness has been strongly accented. "Sermons are dull and irrelevant," the critics remark. They want something to uplift, to tranquilize, to give peace, to authenticate their existence and vocation in a tough world.

This Sunday evening at 7:15, University Lutheran Chaplain Lawrence Martin will give a presentation entitled "Neurotics in the Church," examining the charge of irrelevancy, and giving a provocative reading of the real source of the problems. In his research in the psychology of religion, Chaplain Martin has found that members bring the neuroticism in from the outside, and then expect the Church to be the playground for their ego-expansion and sick needs. Not infrequently these neurotics appear to be highly successful by society's standards, but they are the ones who are molding the congregations in their own image. Perhaps one of the best hopes for the Church is the student generation grounded in the exhilarating dynamics of biblical faith, and supported by the incisive insights of logotherapy-psychology.

A discussion and refreshments will follow the presentation.

Democracy in Hist. dep't

History students have gained equality with their faculty on four committees of the department of history.

In January the History Students' Union requested re-structuring of the department's standing committees. A meeting of the faculty two weeks ago endorsed the principle.

Under the new system, six undergrads will sit on the department's curriculum committee, four on the standards committee, five students (including two grads) on the library committee, two grads and two undergrads on the external committee. Student representation on each committee is on an equal basis with faculty.

Craig Heron (III UC), chairman of the Union, said the policy committee "is a separate and more politically charged issue." He eventually hopes to gain student representation there as well.

Paul Gerhart (II UC), vice-chairman said "We are concerned with education. The standards and curriculum committees are the places where those decisions are made."

Gerhart said negotiation had been largely conducted at the undergraduate level. The grads have not yet accepted their role on the committees. They are presently being consulted by the Union and the faculty.

St. Mike's may leave SAC

St. Michael's College may withdraw from the Students Administrative Council if the results of a referendum on Monday show that most of its students disapprove of the actions SAC has taken this year.

The referendum consists of four questions:

- do you think SAC should give financial assistance to politically orientated organizations outside the university campus?

- do you think financial priority should be given to campus organizations?

- if your answers to the above differ from SAC's actions and priorities would you favor St. Mike's withdrawal from SAC?

- do you favor SAC's membership and support of CUS and OUS?

"I'm urging that people say they would like to withdraw to the new SAC administration on the warning," said SMC rep Paul Fromm (III SMC) who has spent the last three months working hard to persuade the St. Mike's Student Council to accept the idea of the referendum.

"I don't think SAC has learned from the GSU withdrawal that a lot of people are discontented," he said.

SAC President Steve Langdon has been spending a lot of time talking seriously to students at St. Mike's about SAC's role and feels his concept of SAC has a pretty good chance of support.

"I don't think they'll vote to withdraw," he said. "I'd be very, very surprised if they did."

The referendum is not binding on the St. Mike's Council.

Anarchists out, Hoses tops poll

Four declared anarchists, who had sworn "to fertilize the seeds of anarchy in cemeteries everywhere in the name of the great resurrection" all lost in yesterday's elections for University College SAC reps.

However, coming out on top of the 13 candidate slate were five students who will represent UC on SAC next year — Art Moses, John Levin, John Frank, Tony Usher and Craig Heron. Moses topped the polls with a total of 284 votes. Around one quarter of the college voted.

Other anarchist candidates, whose names are not known, are running for SAC posts in other colleges and faculties. Their aims are to eventually disband SAC in an effort to bring an end to "the stupid preoccupation with Mickey-Mouse student politics."

UC students also voted for Literary Director of the UC Literary and Athletic Society, the only position on the Lit executive not already acclaimed. Winner was Marty Reyto. His opponent was Kirk Kelly.

Bob Rae, who earlier this year won one of the two Rhodes Scholarships at U of T, was elected UC nominee for the campus-wide John H. Moss Scholarship for best all-round student of the graduating class, to be chosen later this year.

• Dr. Edward A. Robinson has been appointed dean of Erindale College.

Dr. Robinson will continue to teach chemistry in addition to his added duties at the college, which graduates its first class next year.

• U of T Pollution Probe is open to nominations for the following positions: chairman, vice-chairman, two public relations officers, press secretary and secretary-treasurer.

Any member of the university community is eligible to stand. Please submit application or nomination to 91 St. George before Monday, if possible.

• Radio Varsity will provide live election coverage Monday night from the ballot-counting room, which is closed to the general public.

The rally from Convocation Hall will also be carried live today.

Budget

gree of concern more widely known," Burton said last night. "We want to express the concern of the faculty and students about the budgetary implications."

The U of T got $14 million last year and $21 million this year, with much of that going into the new medical complex and research library. Vice-president Rankin feels that one reason U of T did so poorly with new money was because of the amounts poured into these two projects by the province.

"The point we ought to look at is what share we got of the public purse," he said. "Presumably we have to suffer, (because of the library and medical complex) but for how long? And what are they doing to us in the meantime? I think they have failed to take into account the depth of this institution."

Richard Bird, an associate professor of economics, said yesterday the budget "could lead to all kinds of problems. It will lead to overcrowding, there's no doubt about that."

Prof. Bird said the most important point was the use of the formula system for operating grants. "If you have to accept 18 per cent more students, you'll take the ones who bring you the most in grants."

In the midst of cutting, Scarborough and Erindale Colleges came through relatively unscathed. Scarborough requested $1.2 million for capital construction and received about $900,000. It won't be enough to carry out the proposed expansion of the college, but it's a start.

Erindale asked for $9.5 million, and got it. But even here, there are problems. Erindale had also asked for an additional $1 million to finance a temporary expansion. This was refused, and now it will come from the $9.5 million, leaving only $8.5 million for the permanent building.

Officials of the Department of University Affairs have soft-pedalled the effects of the changes, assuring the universities that funds will be forthcoming to cover all current projects. One information officer said yesterday, "The government is tightening its belt all along the line, but less in education than elsewhere."

But so far, they have been able to do little to reassure U of T officials and teachers, who face a period of austerity which is bound to have an adverse affect on all students.

presidential potpourri - looking at the issues, the candidates.

So far the SAC presidential election campaign has been conducted on fairly low political level, dealing with issues only peripheral to what is really at stake.

The various candidates have talked about these kind of things:

- SAC should communicate better with the students;
- SAC should make students feel they are being represented;
- SAC should spend more money on "services" for students;
- SAC should pay less attention to non-campus issues (even ignore them);
- SAC should not take any stand which could be called "moral" or "political".

Let's look at each of these in turn.

Better communication: The candidates have been suggesting such methods as questionnaires, referendums and mass meetings.

This year's SAC amended the constitution to make a referendum possible if 2,000 students sign a petition saying so. Questionnaires were used last fall to evaluate student opinion on a wide range of issues. SAC has introduced mass meetings — this year for the first time — especially on vital political issues such as housing, the "secret" brief and summer jobs. And SAC carried its regular meetings out of Hart House and into the various colleges. A plea for "better communication" is no more than a platitude since the candidates have offered no fresh ideas.

SAC should be more representative: A host of candidates have declared themselves on one basic platform — "representation." But representation is constitutionally implicit in the electoral process. And for the electorate to be represented in an election, the candidates must declare themselves on certain basic issues so that voters can make a choice.

It's easy to run for office on a platform of "representing the student." You have to say where you stand on the issues before asking for votes. That's the way elections work. SAC has to provide leadership on campus — it can't become a perpetually fluctuating barometer of opinion.

SAC should spend more money on "services" for students: This year SAC has spent 97 per cent of its budget on "services" and necessary administrative expenses. This figure includes $20,000 on course unions and evaluations, more than $10,000 on cultural affairs — including such projects as the Blue and White Society ($5,200) — Radio Varsity, Random and The Varsity ($46,000 total.)

SAC should pay less attention to non-campus issues: Community action projects such as SHOUT, Project 999 and the Varsity Downtown Education Project would not exist without their SAC subsidies. VDEP, for instance, — which runs summer programs for kids in Cabbagetown — got $2,750 this year and SAC wants to double that for next year. Grants to these kinds of outside services total $19,000 this year.

SAC should not take "moral" or "political" stands: Several years ago SAC conducted a referendum on this issue and the result was in favor of making these kind of decisions.

Students then realized that you cannot separate morality and politics from vital student issues. If a body collectively objects to repressive residence rules, it is making a moral decision.

Thus on one hand, candidate Gus Abols says SAC should not make political decisions, and he also says SAC should do something about summer employment. You cannot deal with the reasons behind unemployment without analyzing the political and economic system, and making a critique of government policies.

All the candidates promise to get the campus centre built, but the new Ontario budget has just forced another delay. Are there no politics involved?

By trying to absolve SAC from politics, the candidates are abnegating SAC's responsibility in these matters — and issues like OSAP — for the sake of political opportunism, trying to get the vote of every student, regardless of his opinions.

Now let's take a look at the four tickets offered in Monday's election.

Gus Abols and Ed Thompson: They deny the need for SAC to make moral and political decisions.

Their platform consists of fine-sounding platitudes: "representation," better communication, improvement of OSAP, adoption of a trimester system and unlimited access for all students to the new Research Library — all policies SAC is now supporting.

They say SAC should be a tool to make as many ideas as possible accessible to the campus, without SAC backing any one of them.

They say the campus is disintegrating because SAC has been irrelevant for the professional faculties. If SAC had not forced public discussion of the "secret" brief, major changes involving the entire university, such as moving Forestry to Erindale, and abolishing the Institute of Child Studies, could have been imposed from above without public discussion. At the mass meeting last fall Abols voted against forcing the administration to sit down and talk.

Harry Kopyto and Ellie Kirzner: They are running on a Socialist ticket, attempting to identify students with "the great social upheavals of our times." They entered the race to "raise issues," but in this they have not succeeded. They have failed to show how these world-wide developments affect U of T at all.

Abie Mudrik and Marty Silver: Here's what Mudrik says: "Students haven't come here for politics, but for an education and they want to enjoy their university life." This means Mudrik does not want any basic change in the university. He sees the student as a consumer completing an unhappy term of service. This approach went out with the bobby-sox era 10 years ago.

It's really no excuse for Mudrik to say that his vice-presidential candidate, Silver, is "more political." Mudrik says money spent on course unions and evaluations are a waste of time and money, while Silver, apparently in contradiction, wants more say for students in determining their education. They should make up their minds.

John Oldham and Bob Barkwell: Apart from Mudrik, who has led the Blue and White Society for the last year and a half, they are the only two candidates with experience in SAC. Neither is as radical as Steve Langdon, nor as competent, but they still have the same basic commitments.

They say the university shouldn't be a knowledge factory, but rather a powerful force for change in society. This has to be started through changes in the kind of education students get. Before that can happen students have to win an equal voice in decision-making at all levels of the university.

To call them "extremists" or even "radicals" is probably a misnomer. They are not asking for a social revolution, and that's where they could be wrong.

Maybe after another three or four years of this "student power" game students will discover how the university can't change unless the entire society changes. But then nobody is at that point yet.

The candidates are speaking at 1 p.m. today in Convocation Hall. Judge for yourself.

a U of T student faces the draft

On February 20th I was drafted into the U.S. Army and after a 90 day extension, so that I may write my exams, I will report for induction on June 7th in my home state of Rhode Island. I have been in the graduate English department since autumn of 1967. I will shortly receive my MA in English, but I will also have to forfeit a scholarship, a probable teaching fellowship, and terminate preliminary work on a doctoral thesis. Painfully, a few close friendships are going to be suspended.

I am writing to this paper — not to rationalize a purely pragmatic decision — but because I feel that this is an appropriate time for me as an American in Canada to express faith in my country's historic commitment to cliched but nonetheless valid ideals. This of course does not mean that I actively support a seemingly meaningless war. Nor in returning do I intend to express either hostility or patronizing sympathy for the American exile. We all have to meet our problems and shape our lives in our own way.

But I do know that for those who did not come to Canada to voice their dissent, no definition of American society today can exclude them — and this is the way it should be.

By BOB BOSSIN

So they took Jerry Rubin into a little room at Toronto Airport and took off all his clothes.

That scares the hell out of me, not because of the political implications, of which there are practically none — let's face it, Rubin looks like pusher or at least a nark ("Omigod Smith, he has a little maple leaf branded on his right flank. Sorry officer, loved you at the Musical Ride".)

It scares me because I look like a pusher. And in all probability, so do you. At least you look like a student, or invariably like a young person. In times like these that is enough. I've taken to hitch-hiking with a sign that says Junior Executive.

Far-fetched. But so is what is happening at the borders this year.

I used to cross with a simple "no I didn't buy anything, nice to be back" on our side and a respectful up-state taciturnity on theirs.

Not any more.

"Pull over and step inside."

I pulled over, stepped inside and answered the usual where were you born, how long are you staying questions and started to go. Not so fast.

"Why are you going to the States?"

(Oh it's the cooking, sir, nothing like a good old Howard Johnson three-flavoured . . .) I decided against that response. "In order to see my girlfriend." I smiled, kind ts shyly.

"Why?" That was a rough one. Because she just missed her, um uh, and she's terribly worried and I thought I would re-assure her that its perfectly natural. We were going to get married in the spring anyway .

"Because she lives down here."

"Bringing anything?"

"A change of clothes. My guitar. A typewriter."

Pause. He leaned forward over the counter and looked me right in the eyes.

"Why the type-writer?"

I concentrated both my hazel eyes just over his left shoulder. "I thought I would type some notes."

"NOTES ABOUT WHAT?" (I've got you now you shifty undraftable Communist of the North!)

"School notes. Both my friend and I are very conscientious. (I regretted the word immediately) about our classes."

The Dustin Hoffman, letter from Vietnam approach finally won him over. This insanity went on for approximately half an hour.

On the way back, the Canadian guard, true to the tribe, didn't ask me anything, just went through every article of clothes in my bag, especially the underwear, the most obvious place to hide a kilo of marijuana. Or maybe he was looking for stains that might really be cleverly disguised hashish or maybe he just liked underwear. Anyway, it is nice to see a man happy in his work.

The next time, I crossed on the Harvard Exchange bus: Joe College kids circa 1969 — hair medium-long, jeans, beards, no beads.

They had us empty the bus: suitcases, purses, people coats, gloves, everything. They searched our bags thoroughly but uneventfully. The Man asked me why I was bringing the type-writer. "Both my girlfriend and I are very . . . serious about our classes," I said.

He didn't know what to do with the guy behind me. Right at the top of his bag was a box of condoms. He really wanted to look inside, I mean a guy could smuggle one hell of a lot of LSD in a condom, but the next two people in lines were girls and . . . Mom's apple pie finally won out, and he stuffed them back in the suitcase and went on to the underwear.

Then the other Man came in from searching the bus and announced, very menacing, "Alright, which one of you left this on the bus?"

Hail Mary, Mather of Gad, this isn't really going to happen, please make this a dream.

Everybody is silent. We all turn.

He is holding up an orange.

"You can't bring citrus fruit into the United States: You ought to know better than to try a thing like that."

What followed was a customs inspectors field day. They found no less than a dozen other oranges concealed about the group.

Only one guy got to bring his orange through. Because he's the son of the ambassador? No, California orange.

At a Howard Johnsons on the way back, we picked up a hitch-hiker, a quiet kid, 16 or 17, very short hair, and a hip beaten up Salvation Army felt hat. He was going to Toronto, didn't have much bread, could he crash at Rochdale; no, he was OK with the draft because he was under 18. He didn't say much else.

At the border they yanked the American kid off. He wasn't part of the group, eh? hitch-hiker, hummm? etc. Then they called in the bus driver and threatened to report him for picking up a hitch-hiker. Mark Freiman, who chartered the bus, said he had invited the kid to join us. The customs officer threatened to charge him with transporting an alien across the border. (Was he lying, or are there really laws like that?)

They kept the kid and sent us on. He didn't have a letter from his parents giving permission.

It was after midnight, so most everything in Buffalo was closed. No, he didn't know anyone in Buffalo, didn't have quite enough money for a hotel. That's tough kid, think about it next time before you decide you are going to go to Canada.

George, the law student with us, said there was nothing he could do. The immigration act gives the inspector complete discretionary powers. . . .

Five York students faked papers showing them as deserters and tried to cross into Canada, which is perfectly legal. Four were turned back. The Canadian inspectors then phoned the American inspectors, which they aren't supposed to do, and said they were sending back some deserters.

The groovy thing is that on the way back across the bridge, the York kids threw out the fake papers and went back as plain old Canadians, which must have really freaked out the Americans. ("Why those deserters have been on that bridge for two days now, sir.") . . .

One of the delegates to the Young Liberals convention asked Trudeau about the York incident. He said he wasn't sure about deserters crossing the border, but he felt it was easier now than it had been. Everyone else could cross, subject to the immigration authorities discretion.

They gave him a standing ovation

Mr. Renyi is a third-year engineering student, editor of the Toke Oike, and chaired a committee at the recent Engineering Congress in Montreal.

Steve Langdon said earlier this year that the engineers will be tomorrow's working class. I would be very glad to belong to the working class: where is it?

I have asked Canadian University professors, gas station attendants, factory employees and others, if they belonged to the working class. "Me?!" they said. "I guess I'm middle class." If everybody refuses to be known as a member, then where does a "class" go?

We certainly know what the term meant to Marx 100 years ago, when physical labor was a prime mover of the economy, when the difference between intellect and force used in the working process was very clear.

You could, of course, arbitrarily call everybody below a certain income level a member of the workclass, ( working class, pat. pend.) but I still don't see where the engineers, who are financially well off, would fit in.

The Engineer

Langdon, however, did not draw his conclusions out of the blue yonder. The facts are that the engineers, still too few to become the workclass, are beginning to think of using solutions that remind us of those cherished by the workclass in the past.

The engineers, for reasons open to discussion, are beginning to realize the existence and extent of educational problems, social problems, political problems. Instead of turning their backs to the issues at hand, they are planning — and trying — to act on them.

Aware of the added leverage of the concerted (as opposed to the individual) action, they are calling for an engineering union, a strong professional body. In other words, they are willing to tackle wandering problems with means used by the workclass of yesterday, not because engineers are the workclass, but because those means have been proven. I believe this is where Langdon made his mistake.

Few non-engineers know, for example, how much time, money and effort were spent by the Association of Canadian Engineers to study and implement pollution control programs. Few people know that the Engineering Student Congress, held two weeks ago called for the foundation of an Engineering union capable of enforcing pollution control. The same Congress requested that all undergraduate courses on campus be made available to all engineering students. And rather than causes, these actions and requests were symptoms and results.

Education: one of the most dynamic problems. Parameters change continuously; we have obtained the right to seat 23 students on the 180-man Faculty Council next year as voting members. This has already changed things for us, but we have not yet done our thinking homework about it. We should, for we are challenging the whole established idea of the University administration.

Today, we have a Dean, two assistant deans, four assistant-assistant deans and so on, the terminology being secondary. The students are, the last step on the hierarchical ladder. This is "The System".

It has been said this system is feudal. Maybe it is. Its smooth functioning implies that decisions are taken at the top, passed down through the hierarchy and finally reach the student. It works, especially with an inspired Dean and apathetic or unimaginative students.

But what if the students do have opinions and would like to contribute to the intellectual liveliness of their university life, of their education? Isn't the university supposed to be the place where ideas are born and polished through interaction? Should not at least some of the novel concepts come from those most concerned: the students? We believe that they should, and we shall act on that premise.

THE IMPASSE

The following is a pertinent example of how the students could help the administration, and mostly themselves, to get out of an impasse:

We have some very good lecturers and a few who are just short of lousy. The bad ones are frequently brilliant scientists, dedicated to research and otherwise gifted, but not teachers. We have repeatedly asked for the uninspiring research-types to be allowed to do what they know best, and to be lectured by motivated communicators.

Nothing happened, because the system is such that professors have to mix teaching with research. Well, the faculty council is powerless in this case, and we will have to change the definitions of "THE SYSTEM" itself.

There is a generalized feeling that we engineers are missing something by not having a serious grounding in Liberal Arts. It is impossible today to be a Renaissance man. Rabelais' Gargantua doesn't belong to the 20th century. But we try for some variety, and this is not only our way of retaining our personality, our humanity among the machines; it is also the "acte de foi" of our commitment to society.

A remark: technology is, directly or indirectly, the main factor for change in the world today. But students directly involved in technology are a small minority on campus. Many others, sociologists, philosophers, geographers, economists, study those effects of technology that impinge on their particular fields. Are these students concerned about — and if so, willing to learn — what technology is?

Do they want to understand the causes before judging the results? Are they not being somewhat hypocritical in their accusations of engineering isolationism? How thorough have they been in their explanation of social, human problems — which is, as they claim, their job?

of the Future

We are only able, at the present time, to ask questions and hope to find answers, sometimes. We don't know the future rate of technological change, and we assume that it will keep increasing. We cannot tell how this is going to affect society, but we suppose that drastic shifts will occur. Possibly, a state of permanent revolution (for want of a better term).

Where will the engineer stand, what will be required of him? Will he be asked to concentrate his efforts on finding ultimate truths of physical nature and thus become a scientist, while technologists take over the work of application? Will he act as a broker between science and technology, or technology and society? Will he be the guardian of society and the harnesser of technology?

I believe he will have to be a little of everything. Gradually, he might move from one denomination to another. After all, there are no more jobs today, only functions. Sixty-five per cent of the engineering graduates of 1949 have changed working fields at least once. This percentage is bound to rise.

Meds oppose Humane Society stand on Bill 73

By JEFF GOLD

Representatives from medical schools across Ontario will meet today in response to efforts by the Toronto Humane Society to alter a bill concerning the use of stray dogs and cats for research.

Designed to regulate the procurement and welfare of animals used in teaching and research, Bill 73, now before the Provincial Legislature, is opposed by the Society, which believes that much cruelty to animals is committed in the name of science.

The Society prefers to destroy the dogs and cats it shelters, rather than sell them to researchers.

Since the Society destroys most of the 25,000 dogs disposed of every year in Metro Toronto, a major source of animals is closed to researchers who must pay unlicensed and often unscrupulous dealers from $100 to $400 per dog.

Bill 73 would force the Society to sell its wards after a minimum waiting period of 48 hours. It would also licence dealers and the researchers they supply and provide inspection by government officials to ensure the welfare of the animals.

This would put dognappers out of business, guarantee research animals are not mistreated and free funds for other research purposes by reducing the cost of animals by 90 percent or more.

But the Humane Society still takes issue with the time-limit on redemption and the question of specific requests for the disposal of pets by their owners.

Harry Krakowsky, a member of the U of T Medical Society and an avid supporter of the Bill, says, "Protests concerning the 48-hour limit are meaningless because the Act allows any pound operator to extend this period if he desires."

"And if any owner desires euthanasia for his pet then that animal must be destroyed under the provisions of the Bill."

He urged everyone to "support this important and much-needed piece of legislation by writing to your MPP or to the Minister of Agriculture."

Next week there will be two (count 'em) two Varsity's, a regular Friday issue and a four-page election extra on Tuesday. This information is for Here and Now buffs and non-buffs, since there probably won't be any ads in the Tuesday edition. Ergo, get your H & N's in by 4 pm Monday for Tuesday, and 4 pm Thursday for Friday.

POLICY

Priorities

- 1 Build a true University Community by instituting activities to keep the student on campus longer, and provide facilities for students to meet other students and exchange opinions
- 2 Provide services that are beneficial to the entire University Community, such as a campus centre, housing, and parking
- 3 Obtain a bigger say in determining curriculum, not by confrontation, but by discussion and compromise, such as was done at Scarborough College this year.
- 4 More emphasis on the individual in education

Emphasis

- 1 Since the students are ignored, we need greater grass-roots communication and a greater concern for the student and his needs
- 2 We would change the centralized gov't to a decentralized gov't, so that we would have more involvement in the micro-level
3. Instead of hit and miss changes, we would institute responsible and co-ordinated change.

Generalities

- 1 We need to arouse in the student a greater awareness of the benefits of an active University life
2. We would have to convey greater information about the community through our sources of communications
- 3 We need more dialogue between students themselves, and so must provide facilities and occasions for them to achieve this
- 4 We must make greater use of the University after hours and during the summer
- 5 We must provide more educational and cultural, not pseudo-cultural, activities.

Specifics

- 1 We must make greater use of the facilities already established
  - a. establishment of campus-wide closed-circuit T.V.
  - b. much greater distribution of Radio Varsity outlets.
  - c. regular section in Varsity for "University News" involving the listing of all University activities coming up
- 2 The construction of Innis College must be speeded up.
- 3 We must provide more, better, and less expensive residential accommodations satisfactory to the students
- 4 We must push hard to close St. George St. and Huron St. between Harbord and College St. to vehicular traffic, so that a undivided University Community can be established. We must also push for the abolition of parking restrictions in these areas.
- 5 Every future, large-scale construction should include parking facilities, probably underground.
- 6 We would expand F.U. of T., and use this to build more of a community, as well as a source of new friends and exchange of ideas
- 7 We would make greater and more frequent use of social activities after hours and during the summer
- 8 We must institute more free activities outside during the term, such as mini teach-ins, concerts, and seminars, to create an informal social, and intellectual atmosphere to coincide with the idea of a University Community
- 9 Greater use must be made out of C O P O U T. to exchange information between the colleges themselves, and between the colleges and S A C.
- 10 Emphasis must be placed on S.A.C. representatives to have a more responsible attitude towards their constituents and S A C
- 11 We must provide more private, study areas
- 12 We must get a greater involvement of students in University planning
- 13 We must promote a greater S.A.C. involvement in summer employment, so that University skills can be utilized

Radio seeks FM licence: awaits Commons move

Radio Varsity is hoping to get an FM licence soon so it can be heard on private radio receivers.

It would have to buy a transmitter and possibly maintain more hours on the air but managing director Don Brady says it's worth it.

"As far as we're concerned, FM is the medium. To achieve its potential, 'radio' can't be just a closed-circuit system. It is transmitted programming."

Radio Varsity has not yet applied for a licence. The Canadian Radio-Television Commission is at present holding up the licensing procedure pending introduction into the House of Commons of legislation that will probably open up the FM band to small users.

Brady has sent a letter to the CRTC asking advice on whether Radio Varsity should apply now for a licence. He says he should get a reply in a week or two.

"What we have now is a type of halfway house: only part-way towards a true wireless system," Brady says.

"As it is difficult to listen to some speakers, most students would rather listen in their own rooms to their own radios."

He quoted statistics to prove that 50 to 60 per cent of people in Toronto have FM receivers, and that the use of FM radios is on the rise.

"FM is not that costly," Brady says. "For under $5000 we can get a small transmitter that would easily cover the campus."

In the meantime, Radio Varsity's programming is becoming more varied. Brady says the most exciting things this year are the live programs.

"We've been able to cover the CUG elections and the debates that preceded them, the mass meeting on housing at Tent City, and the SAC meeting over the proposed sit-in."

Radio Varsity presents theatre reviews, interviews with people in the performing arts, and live and taped drama.

It is now recording local rock groups on campus to make the groups better known as well as to entertain the students.

"We have made an offer to provide five minutes of free time to any campus organization that wishes to be heard campus-wide," Brady says.

Radio Varsity spent $2,695 last year on new capital equipment, much of which will go into a new studio and production facilities.

To many students, radio is now just a noise in the cafeteria at lunch-hour.

Radio Varsity staffers hope that FM, brighter programming, and the new studio will improve the situation.

The Ontario Union of Students has thrown down the gauntlet to top-level university and government officials but it has not been picked up.

In the last four days at least twelve administrators from five Ontario universities and a number of politicians from the Provincial Government have refused to participate in the OUS conference to be held March 13-16 at London.

Two panel discussions, "What are the Uses of the University?" and "What is Responsible Student Activism?", were planned to establish "meaningful dialogue" and "keep open the channels of communication" but all those contacted reported that they were too busy to attend.

ABOLS AND THOMPSON

We entered the SAC election race almost at the last moment. Both of us harbored criticisms of SAC's approach and were aware that SAC was creating considerable resentment and distrust on campus because of its failure to give students the feeling that it considered student views important. This lack of concern is currently illustrated by the "grass-roots" petition to have a referendum on participation which involves more than $29,000 is obviously a sufficiently important issue to ask for the opinion of the student body.

However, although one can build a platform on negatives one cannot create a positive alternative with them. From this negative position we arrived at a positive alternative via the question of "moral issues." So-called moral issues can be divided into welfare issues, those which affect the student as a student and educational issues, those which affect the student as a citizen. While the concern on which SAC's judgments on educative issues is completely valid, there is an element of presumption involved which is inconsistent with their definition of a student as a mature individual capable of self direction and their role as representative of more than 20,000 of these self directing individuals.

This distinction between welfare and educative issues illustrates very clearly the dual role that SAC should play on campus. On welfare issues SAC has both a right and a duty to take a stand to facilitate a student's attendance at university and his welfare as a student: such as continuing to work for student housing; as extending the university year on the trimester system with the dual purpose of permitting students to pursue their studies at their own rate and partially relieving the unemployment problem; as student aid programs and their inadequacies; moved by, engaged in the facts and theories, laws and hypotheses that are relevant.

Ed Thompson

What our running means is that SAC should be more concerned than they seem to be with discovering what students are thinking and feeling (and do this more than just at election time) and with playing an active role in increasing educational opportunities without attempting to state that we "know what is best" for the students at this university.

as the desirability of course unions; as free access for undergrads to the new library. On educative issues, issues which students ought not to ignore, SAC must take an active role of facilitating other groups in their attempt to make these issues known or barring concern by other groups; to present the various issues itself. One example of performing the latter role is through the Free University of Toronto which can be criticized on many points, but which has a great potential for satisfying at least two basic needs on campus: providing a forum to which students of different faculties and courses can learn from each other's perspectives on the society of which the university is an integral part and providing a means whereby students may interact with the surrounding environment to determine the relevance of their academic perspective and to become

KOPYTO AND KIRZNER

The basic issue in the campaign is the role of SAC. We see SAC as the defender and promoter of student rights, as the representative of student interests within the university as well as on the key social issues.

Across Canada students are under attack. Students who have had the courage to fight against racism on the campus, against the war in Vietnam, and for a democratic university in a socialist society have become victims of press hysteria and government suppression. The arrest of students at St. John's, and Sir George activity directed towards extending student-faculty control of the educational system. SAC should lead campaigns for equal student-faculty voice in determining course content and hiring and firing of professors.

For all its bluster at the start of the year, SAC has faded into obscurity. In place of a consistent orientation to mobilizing students, SAC has tended to work above them, expecting students to spontaneously respond to its declarations. SAC has done a lot of talking about building a student movement but as far as action goes, it has by involving them in decision-making on a variety of levels. SAC has become more than

A second SAC presidential candidate has withdrawn from Munday's contest, throwing his support behind the Gus Abols (II law) — Ed Thompson (SOS-OISE ticket).

"Our platforms were basically the same," said Bernard Teitelbaum (II UC), "I didn't know he would be running."

"Students have a real chance to elect the kind of president they want in this election," he said, "We would have been splitting the vote."

"I did it for the issues involved, not for the personal glory," added Teitelbaum. Teitelbaum officially withdrew from the race early yesterday afternoon, and has been campaigning for Abols and Thompson.

 Hello, Larry Solway; Speak

 Hello Larry. I'd like to talk about the—

Most of you have heard 'Speak Your Mind' — on C.H.U.M. Radio. Most of you also have opinions about Larry. He does not seem to be the way you picture him. I interviewed him with a tape recorder and enjoyed meeting and talking with him. But when I played that tape back and listened to it, it sounded like one of his radio shows. I really wondered: WOW, is this cat getting angry? He wasn't. His voice has a certain quality that makes it sound as though he is really chopping into a person.

Larry Solway, 41 years old, vice-president programming for C.H.U.M. Radio and the man responsible for the sound of the station on the air. He is one of the five directors of the station and spends about ten hours a day at the station.

I asked him how much money he made. He politely informed me that he found my question rude. Larry thinks that we judge people too often by the amount they earn. He earns enough to live comfortably. That is the only answer I could get.

How did he spend his youth? "In confusion". At 18 he left home. He went to Varsity and got as far as the junior common room to learn bridge. After an aborted second year he "copped-out". Larry says: "I was what one would call a lazy kid. I didn't like discipline." He didn't revolt the way kids are revolting today. He simply got out and plodded ahead in his own direction.

Larry — "I'm not concerned whether I'm happy or sad; I'm concerned that I get up in the day and I function — function is working-doing the thing that you have trained yourself to do. Hell, I know what I'm really doing; I'm coming in to work to supply a particular need that I can supply — I'm good at what I do and I do it."

I asked: "Many people feel that your manner on the radio with other people is rude and obnoxious. Would you say it is?" His answer: "Yeh, I'd say it is if they feel that way. If they find it rude and obnoxious, then it is rude and obnoxious." Myself: "What do you think about it?" Larry: "I think it is abrupt and forthright at times; and that comes off in some peoples' minds as rude and obnoxious."

"It is an entirely subjective question: "What type of person is attracted to radio work, Larry?"

answer: "The same kind that go into show business - narcissists."

thing. . . I'm not trying to be that way and I don't think of myself as being that way." "I'm not going on the air trying to be somebody else's man: I'm not trying to be somebody's version of rude or somebody's version of nice. My own sense of self-esteem and being my own man doesn't rest on the approval or disapproval of those people out there."

While on the air, Larry talks to people whether he wants to or not. He has to. That is his job. Some of the calls he gets are really sad. He gets some weird people phoning in; Thus, there is a four second delay from the phone to the broadcast system. A lot of his calls are hate calls. "I have to be indifferent to them." He is almost convinced that people don't listen; they wait for the sound to stop, then they start talking. One example that he remembers: "A kid phoned up and said — what do you think about teenage smoking?" Larry's reply: "I didn't even know they'd burn." The kid: "Yeh, that's what I mean. . ." and the kid kept on going.

Larry: "Once in a while a person phones in and says. I want to talk to you about your show —

"And I know the script, I can almost tell it word for word — about your show — Yes okay, it's not one of my favorite topics — This shouldn't be called Speak Your Mind — and I duet the next line with them; I've done it dozens of times — IT SHOULD BE CALLED LARRY SOLWAY SPEAKS HIS MIND — and we say it together. And they go on and on. . ."

People yell at him, and many of them say — 'Larry Solway. . . you're ignernt'.

Larry: "There is a certain class of people to whom ignorant means that you don't know anything or you are ill-informed; it means IGNORANT. They always say it that way." "If it bothers me at all, it is the realization that there are a lot of clots out there, and they're your friends and mine; and they participate in their own way in making this country what it is, and what you and I have to live in."

Larry Solway wonders if sometimes he lets a person go on too long, or he cuts them off too soon, or was he wrong in making a point in the way he did.

I asked a psychiatrist what type of audience might Larry Solway have.

1. Passive-aggressive personality, — persons who are aggressive but cannot deal with it in an open direction so they enjoy his being aggress-sive. They are drawn to it. It is part of their character.

2. Lonely — out of contact with others.

3. Older — they are out of the stream of life and this is a way of being in it.

I asked Larry the same question. His answer: "— columnists say that listeners are masochists who love to phone up and be destroyed by me —"

"— some listeners have a genuine concern with what is going on around them —"

"— others listen because they find it entertaining to hear people talk instead of an endless run of just music —"

"— others because, as one member of the B.B.G. put it, they are fascinated by me the way that some people are fascinated by watching a snake. . . they don't like it but they can't tear their eyes away. —"

Larry Solway stays away from a lot of social situations where he doesn't know the people. because he doesn't want to go as "THAT Larry Solway". He is a target and he says: "that really bugs me".

I asked him what type of personality is attracted to radio work? His reply: "Oh boy, I'm going to get hoist by this one. The same kind that go into show business — narcissists; people to whom it is all important that they perform, that they be in a spotlight and have a public personality."

Larry Solway is married with a son 17, who sometimes gets taken to task for what his father says. As Larry puts it; "I wouldn't like to be Larry Solway's son — its hard to be anonymous, it really is."

Music was one of the biggest passions of his life for a long time — it still is, but he can't spend as much time with it as he likes to. Larry likes classical and is very excited by today's contemporary music, including contemporary pop. Today's pop has intellectually more content than pop music has ever had, in terms of relating to people, its beat and quality. Larry: "For example — Night and day, you are the one, under the moon, under the sun — MAN, THAT'S NOWHERE."

"The abyss of ignorance into which many people fall and call it their right in a democratic country — That, I guess bothers me more than anything else. Bigotry and stupidity frustrate me. My wife says you're intolerant of intolerance and damn it I am. I'm a guy who cares; I'm a man who is involved in what's going on around him, trying to do the best job he knows how; without throwing any curves and without deceiving myself or anybody else around me. I want to participate in making tomorrow better than today."

A NEW ONE FROM McLUHAN

"When asked what music he liked best, Mozart replied: "No music".

"vision as our only objective and detached sense, when in high definition, discourages empathy"

"The eye defeated the Aborigines"

"The integral being cannot be a hero, or even tolerated in a fragmented or specialist society".

"To live without clocks is to live forever". Time is only divisible in visual space".

"new self awareness created by new public environment"

"cliches and stereotypes enacted a drama of social stability"

For those not familiar with Marshall McLuhan's style of thinking and style of expression, let alone what he is actually saying, his new book Through the Vanishing Point can be safely ignored. He is that rare breed of academic who stimulates excitement and new perspectives along the entire spectrum of human thought. McLuhan is alive, his scholarly insights seem real, and he can profoundly affect your way of looking at yourself.

Notwithstanding the sincere admiration I hold for his ideas, McLuhan's latest book, written in collaboration with artist Harley Parker is not a stand-out by any measure. Through the Vanishing Point is a scholarly application of McLuhan's insights towards the perceptions of space in poetry and painting, from cave paintings to the present. There are 49 examples of poetry and painting that reveal the significance of "points of view" in those expressive arts. Alongside the paintings and poems are quick, 2 or 4 line McLuhanesque capsule comments that allow or force the reader to fill in as much as he wants. It is involvement by suggestion rather than by statement, which means that you either get it or you don't. That style can be disconcerting indeed, if you don't get very much.

I cannot comment whether or not the material is original or stimulating to students of art or poetry. It is mildly interesting, but utterly scholastic. Far more exciting from an interested reader's point of view are the introduction and appendices, in which McLuhan ranges over pop-art, space travel, theatre of the absurd, French Canada, participatory democracy, mass society, and youth protest.

Earlier this year, while talking to a class, McLuhan remarked that Immanuel Kant's actual profession was "geographer", and not philosopher. There was no bread in being a professional philosopher so Kant had to use geography as a jumping-off point. In fact he conceptualized maps of the mind to express himself. The analogy sounds very familiar. After briefly rationalizing Kant's preoccupation with geography, McLuhan laughed. "Communications" serves his purposes of expression just as easily as Kant's geography. Any reading of McLuhan reveals more than a mere scholastic description of what is happening around us in the electric age, despite his insistence that he is not prescribing only describing. McLuhan is a philosopher who is challenging a concept of thinking which has dominated our culture since Gutenberg's printing press, and which was given ultimate sanction as a result of the Newtonian revolution in science.

From Gutenberg and Newton come the fixed point of view, linear thinking, and the presentation of ideas as if they were packages and mini-products which make up some larger whole. Products, like ideas in print force us to think sequentially, to build our ideas pyramid-style, all-the-time assuming that the foundation ideas upon which we build, have remained intact. We can take apart and fragment feelings and modes of behaviour and put them together again to create our personality and method of dealing with situations. In art, this is our Renaissance legacy, the vanishing point, the single static point of view, undisturbed restful symmetry, visual order. Ideas are in this way also perceived visually and sequentially — a sensitizing that has come about as a result of our digestion of ideas and concepts via print: — ordered, sequential, and building.

To young people, the above outlook on life and behaviour is "straight" and out of date. This is precisely McLuhan's jumping off point and relevance as a philosophy of the future and the present. His popularity with young people, sometimes to the point of reverence, is no accident. For in explaining the new world of electric technology and its utter rejection of the linear, straight, sequential experience, he provides as intellectual rationalization for the inevitable cultural revolution that is taking place before us. The educational system is pure Gutenberg, an anachronism, rejected by the young as irrelevant. Authority, parental, or the corporation-pyramid style assumes linear, fragmented relationships; rejected by the young.

McLuhan's thesis throughout his works, is the relationship between culture and technology, specifically the effect of science and technology on culture in the broadest sense. Through the Vanishing Point examines the development of the two arts as a reflection of changing sensory concepts that result from technological change. The arts also reflect a hostile reaction to technology; the nineteenth century Roman-tics spitting on the oncoming Industrial Age, and the modern artists taking simultaneous points of view (Picasso, Edward Munch, Joyce) of single experiences. Seurat, to McLuhan is the prophet of TV; by painting the specs of light he flips the viewer himself into the vanishing point, just as TV divides and scans light upon the viewer.

In the post-literate world of electric technology, simultaneity of experience is the key. It is acoustic space, where the center is everywhere and the margin is nowhere, as opposed to a visual bordered, perhaps barriered experience. "Good taste" just as "an accepted mode of behaviour" has walls. It is the first refuge of the non-creative, the resource of the insecure, and the strategy of the pretentious. Involvement, process, dialogue, and participation reflect the spirit of the electric generation. This generation cannot accept pre-designed products or packages of thought, when they are excited by the movement of processes and roles.

If that isn't a philosophy of life...

Take it or leave it at any level. McLuhan provokes challenge and dialogue.

allen drury drops on the Left

Preserve & Protect, the latest novel by Allen Drury, is not a book to be recommended to members of the New Left with weak stomachs.

This work is the fourth in a series that began, extremely well, with Advise & Consent. However, with this book, it has degenerated into a rather non-subtle attack on the New Left, violence, organised protests and demonstrations, and the "liberal" press.

The plot is too complex to explain. It revolves around the death of a president, who died in a plane crash prior to an election, after being renominated by his party, following a bitter struggle with a political rival. The process of selecting a new candidate is the vehicle Drury used to frame his ideas.

Many of the characters are familiar ones, to those who have read his other books: Lafe Smith, Culler Hamilton, Orrin Knox, Crystal Knox, Robert Leffingwell, etc. ad nauseam.

Many of the characters bear striking resemblances, unintentional of course, to contemporary figures. Walter Dobius, dean of the newhounds, reminds me of good old Walter Lippman. The President is obliged to defend a war in Asia (sound familiar?), and for variety, in Panama too. One of the main candidates, the "liberal" one, is the governor of a large state, and who inherited a vast sum of money from his father. Other such coincidences can be found.

The easiest way, perhaps the only way of transmitting Drury's ideas is through his own words.

Drury idolises the presidency as an institution, but understands the problems any occupant will have. He writes:

"He had only held the office five hours, hut the Presidency, as always, was imposing its own perspective."

"No man was ever really master of this house for long. Too many echoes were in the air, too many predecessors looked over his shoulder, too many past decisions kept him company as he faced his dreadful responsibilities. Now and again he might assert himself, use the fearful power that was his to change or initiate events. But before long events regained control and he found he was merely their instrument. He found he must start over, or change course, or do something else than he had at first believed he should — and could!!"

He also attacks the press.

"How obvious to everyone hut themselves, in their ideological enthusiasms, their switches, their twitches, their self-centred, self-interested hating and loving that coloured everything they wrote and broadcast."

On the impact of the media in creating a public figure: "It was all very easy for a man unscrupulous enough and rich enough, and irresponsible enough; and Ted had turned out to be all three. As a result, powerful publications and commentators had flocked to his side and dutifully given him the Big Build-up that they always give any Presidential candidate they have decided to support."

But he saves his best licks for the New Left, radicals, extremists, anarchists, and other such odious types. His words leave absolutely no doubt where he stands.

"If there was no excuse for a riot, well-trained and well-organised anarchists would create one: those who wished to destroy America were adept at it."

He was struck again with the sheer mindless virulence of the destructive forces of the world. Never once in all his memory had the Communists and their errand boys made a genuine effort to better the conditions of mankind. If the world had a wound, they opened it further; if the world had an evil, they made it more evil. In their mad dream of empire that could not succeed even if they achieved it — for their own actions guaranteed that it would have to rest upon a self-destroying foundation of treachery, terror, hatred, and deceit — they plunged blindly down the corridors of the twentieth century like idiots loose from the keeper. How utterly evil they were — how utterly worthless, how utterly pathetic. And how utterly dangerous."

After this display of spleen Drury turns to the New Left: "He recognizes now he was suffering from the liberal syndrome of the twentieth century, which said that all knowledge, justice, and purity lay on the left and all evil, intolerance, and reaction lay on the right. He has learned that nothing on earth can be so intolerant and reactionary as a humourless, professional liberal."

"He had strayed close to what came in time to be described as 'the New Left' — that phrase, so beloved of certain segments of the mass media, which really described just the same Old Left with a new generation of stooges to manipulate for its own imperialistic, Commufascist purposes."

Drury's characters are perfect stereotypes: the good guys, clearly demarcated, are all good, and the bad guys, perfectly sinister, constantly conspiring with the Communists to take over America the Free for their own evil purposes. Three hundred and ninety-six pages of this are enough to make anyone nauseous.

There are, however, redeeming qualities in the book.

I felt that I was situated right in the heart of the American political process. And insight into the extreme, American nationalist character is an education in itself.

faces launches a thousand flicks

American film is generally based on a literate tradition involving sequential plot development: a series of cause-and-effect episodes build conflict into climax, and are resolved in the denouement. In fact, many films from Birth of a Nation through Gone with the Wind to The Lion in Winter are actually based on books and plays to begin with.

The major Hollywood concern is with story-telling, and any interest in theme is usually a by-product of the story. These films tend to focus on appearances, recording events with simplicity and economy. Camera work and editing are functional, operating for the sake of the story's progress. These simple techniques have been highly developed and refined, but now, past their prime, they are becoming repetitious and obvious.

Many directors are breaking from this traditional mould. Arthur Penn's Bonnie and Clyde tells a story, but merely to involve the audience in the theme of violence. John Cassavettes' Faces breaks entirely from story-telling to emphasize treatment of an idea. Neither Bonnie and Clyde or Faces are the first of their kind, but they are among the best and represent dramatic points of departure from the established forms.

Faces delicately examines a marriage disintegrating in middle age. The events are important only to reveal the desperate, artificial relationships of the people involved, rather than create conflict rising to a climax. There is no ending or resolution in Faces. The situation at the ending is the same as at the beginning, only with a more honest understanding between the couple.

Personal themes have long been expressed in the films of Bergman, Antonioni and Fellini. They have developed highly refined styles which individually fill textbooks on film aesthetics. Opposite to their tight artistic control is the accidental, ordered chaos of documentary and cinema-verite, where the camera's record of actual events is cut and arranged according to the director's logic.

Between these poles of strict control and spontaneous reporting comes Faces. The non-linear treatment of ideas is coupled with documentary techniques to produce a film of thematic sophistication free of the heavy formality of many European works, while extant in a highly natural world.

Remarkably, every character in Faces is completely believable, identifiable only as the personality as whom he is "behaving", as opposed to Peter O'Toole's obvious "acting" in The Lion in Winter. There is a point when actors no longer act, but live their characters in a very vital sense. While in their subjective worlds of being, they can simultaneously function as objective critics analysing their works, constantly checking excesses and punctuating important points.

This applies to the entire film. Subjective improvisation with the hand-held camera works with objective aesthetic control. With Fellini and Antonioni, actors are programmed to move exactly in order to fill strict compositional requirements. In Faces, they are free to move anywhere and be followed by the camera: this is a source of spontaneity. The camera still has an eye for composition: a recurring shot is of a figure standing in the, distant background of another room, against a close-up in the foreground of a second character. But there is never any sense of restraint, for suddenly, someone will move to the right or left to destroy the purity of the composition and substitute vitality and reality.

This spontaneity is the main driving force behind Faces. Cassavettes starts the camera rolling and lets the actors live out their roles. This produces long takes with sparse, functional editing, as opposed to the popular flash techniques overworked in many films. The only time Cassavettes cuts is to a closeup of a face. The film abounds in faces, closely scrutinized by the camera to show their laughter, tears and desperation. It is these sensitive close-ups of people being that gives the whole film its credibility and vitality, thoroughly engrossing the audience in the futile existence of the characters.

Faces is hardly the first film to use documentary techniques and improvisation. But never before has their use been so refined or widely accepted by the public (including three academy award nominations). This indicates a break away from the Hollywood standards of story-telling towards freer, more spontaneous forms of expression, already utilized by the French new wave.

magdalene

In its production of Mary Magdalene at the Metropolitan United Church the Poculi Ludique Society has moved from medieval to modern English and in so doing has laid itself open to more conventional standards of criticism than in the past. The production succeeds in general because the very few weak performances are more than overshadowed by the very many very fine ones. Genesis Jones as Cyrus and as the Heathen Presbyter brings a measure of robust vitality to his parts which would be welcome in any production. He overacts outrageously but his enthusiasm and energy overcome any reserve of critical nicety and create some immensely funny scenes. Other outstanding jobs are done by Harry Lane, Geza Kovacs, John Browne, Graham Whitehead and Stephen Martineau in a variety of roles, large and small. The title role of Mary Magdalene is played by Maureen Fox with sincerity and intensity.

Another uncomfortable aspect of the production is the strange union of modern dance, as presented by the Toronto Dance Theatre, with this clearly un-modern play. It was an interesting and rather daring experiment but one which seems to fail as often as it succeeds. No United Church in Canada, I am sure, has ever seen dancing such as this. The temptation of Mary by the Seven Deadly Sins becomes an orgiastic frenzy in which Mary, beginning as an onlooker, ends up writhing in the midst of a forest of naked bodies all arms and legs. This scene could work but it doesn't because it is carried out much too long and its irrelevancy to the production becomes too apparent. Another awkward contribution to the play is the strange choreography of the messengers who flap like pigeons from one station to another. The final dance scene is really badly conceived and, coupled with the bizarre costumes of the angels ends the evening on a rather sour note. The resounding Te Deum which should usher us out of the theatre would have put God to sleep.

The costuming, seen against an elaborate and very workable stage of blacks, whites, and grays, is a blaze of colour. The court scenes especially are impressive. Flesh (of the World, the Flesh, and the Devil) has an almost unbelievable costume, composed of equal parts of nudity and grapes.

To my generation World War II is a few dozen old movies on the late show; Viet Nam is better on live videotape; many of us will fondly recall that the war began long before we ever reached college.

Are we truly ready for the next evolutionary change? Have the dead leaves finally clogged up the sewer of man's recorded history? We know that it is a practical reality that if certain valves, keys, switches and locks are manipulated, by certain men, that speculations as to the material presence on this earth of each a every one, would enjoy but a tenuous reality.

Wot oi means ter say is: the basic human dilemma is, then, resolved.

— Revolutions are, quite properly, something of a jolt to the sensibilities of liberals, Kiwanians, the beery bourgeoisie, and others of their ilk. One can't avoid confrontations on the public thoroughfares with these milling, murmuring legions of youth holding signs which declare that IT'S A HAPPY MAN WHO GRINS.

— Nor should we neglect the spiritual foundations of the revolution at vespers: "If I don't suffer lord and I am near the top of the pile lord let me recognize the constituent element lord, the organic source lord of that pile — I've got the stars in my eyes lord, but that pile smells so bad."

— I do not want to be seen fraternizing with the enemy; I do not want to be bitten by my neighbours . . .

— I would like to apply for a transfer, sir, I don't believe in arresting people. I should be in Russia yes, sir, but about that transfer, sir . . .

— Hitler didn't like them, the Scots, who came marching into the midst of night engagements at the Normandy Front, their kilts flaring in the ghostly light from the flares, the sound of the piper who marched in front barely disturbed by the roar of the guns and shells. He called them the Ladies from Hell.

— No definition of man exists; he is as undefinable as pain; nor do we have an authentic conceptual blueprint to consult for the perfect model. If tyranny, slavery, oppression are to be defeated, then we must focus our attack on those who seek to define man, for to define him is to recognize limits, and it is against his basic dignity to ask him to accept the limits of another man as his own. Those forces in our spinning world which are threatening personal and social liberties do so by peculiarly narrow definitions of their own species.

We are gods.

Are you now? Fine! Then raise the dead, walk on water, bring the flood and turn my sparkling water into wine!

We can't, we've forgotten how.

The destruction of private property is not, theoretically, a threat to the freedom of those who belong to the property: "I own, therefore I am?"

Smash a computer and bring along a small sponge for the blood it sheds. Smash a computer, however, and its dignity remains intact; a wiser course of action perhaps would be to reprogramme it entirely, challenge it to a game of chess and cheat.

Asking for dignity is undignified; demanding it more so; taking it, worthy of the prize.

The longer the present crisis of insurrectionary fervor continues, with its attendant reactionary opposition, the more compromising become the compromises.

There are no fanatics screaming for absolute power, they merely wish to live and be given the full respect due to the mysterious concept, the theoretical abstract we call man. This desire stems from an aesthetic sense so deep and from a moral base so absolute, that compromises and half measures involve a willingness to both suspend and injure our ethical foundations.

To be free to walk among his fellow creatures at will, knowing that the storms, obstacles and pain of life will still be there, but not as a direct insult to the very fact of his being.

If the insult is a stupid one, underestimating as it often does, the intelligence and resistance of the subject, then it is not even worthy of being called an insult; if however, the blind beast persists in intrusions upon liberty, then it must be directly and honestly dealt with.

Oppression is generally more stupid than it is evil.

Let us not hear anymore nonsense about 'moderates' and 'extremists' of 'both sides of the political spectrum'; if you agree to place yourself as a moderate or extremist, you are playing somebody else's game. Call yourself a man, or a woman, or a tree and if anyone tries to tell you different, sue him for libel.

While he was president Lyndon Johnson showed everyone that he was 'jes plain folks' by sharing the common paranoia of his people, riding in bubble top cars, speaking behind bullet-proof shields, in fear of his subjects whose constitution he was sworn to defend when he was made king.

Surely the man was humiliated or are we becoming accustomed to live as farceurs in an on-going tragi-comedy?

The key to the riddle of historical overview may be located in an examination of the diseases and malfunctions of the internal organs of the great and near-great.

Well, Pierrot, it's either a revolution or an extreme case of disorderly conduct.

To avoid it do this: turn off your television, cancel your subscriptions, draw the curtains, take the phone off the hook, turn off the lights, sit in a comfortable chair, breathe in and out (quietly and deeply of course) and whisper "Tsk tsk" every thirty seconds or masturbate until you fall asleep. Do this every day until you depend on it and everything will be all right.

Or you can withdraw all your money from the bank, sell your car, house and wife and put all the bread on the daily double at your nearest track; invite your friends and family to do the same. If you win, everything is changed and you can have a big party; if you lose everything is changed and you can have a big party. You will only have to do it once.

Crawl, to the edge of the world and look over; if you get the urge, jump; you may find yourself pleasantly speculating as to whether you're falling up or down, the warm rays of the sun beating on your back. "Don't be silly" you can scream at the cop on the nearest asteroid. "Don't be silly yourself" he retorts in a monotone.

Walk wild-eyed into the emergency ward of the nearest hospital at 3 a.m.; tell the night desk nurse that you are an emergency case about to die from an erupting ulcer; experience flashes of mania on the spot, forget your name and phone number, you have lost your ID and the number of your medical insurance scheme. Raise your voice deliriously, fall to your knees and threaten to die unidentified in the public lobby unless they give you immediate care and attention; fall flat on the floor and scream for demerol or morphine.

Look at the blur of the sixties Pierrot; our intellectual, artistic and emotional faculties have been liberated by the sheer power of event from the trap of predictability.

Yet it has always been so, no? Man's fortunes are always at odds with him because he desires to control them.

The medieval church bell, we are told, was continuously reminding the penitent of the certainty of death, the uncertainty of the hour.

With no historical continuum, no ideological guarantor we surge ahead; event and theory stand outside of time; let us then laugh outside of time, darkly perhaps.

What does history know? It has a uniquely limited experience of time.

harry bruce, er...max macpherson is the best writer in canada

The Short Happy Walks of Max MacPherson, by Harry Bruce, MacMillan, 4.95

Damn Harry Bruce anyway. Harry Bruce is the real life Max MacPherson, walker. Under his own name he has written and edited for the Canadian mag chain, Saturday Night, Macleans and the Star Weekly, before it amalgamated with the Ladies' Home Journal. He now appears in bowlerized form three days a week in the Toronto Star.

Bruce is also the best magazine and newspaper writer in the country.

But having said all this before in one of the fall issues of the Review, I thought I might have a little fun with the pseudonym Max MacPherson by removing him from Bruce's control and interviewing him at his suite in Sutton Place.

(One of Bruce's own vehicles is to invent people to interview, for example Senator Rutland ("Politics aside, Dalton Camp stabbed the Chief in the back...") and that "secret power" in the CBC who leaked out that Lee J. Cobb had agreed to come and take-over the 6:30 news.)

This seemed to be a fair game since there really is not much more to say about Bruce: once you are the best writer in the country, you are the best writer in the country, at least until a better one comes along. None have.

So I intended to meet a rather crotchety old Max—Bruce being thirty-three and not overly crotchety—and discover him to be quite loveable in spite of the fact that he was an anti-semitite. Or perhaps I would have spared the wrath of Hillel by making him anti-Portuguese. In the course of our conversation, he would tell me about an unpublished stroll down Philosophers' Walk during which he was attacked by a band of young toughs waiting to roll a queer. "But I'm Max MacPherson, Toronto's walker!"

Finally, Max was going to announce that he had decided to come out of retirement and had gone in the previous week to walk around Rochdale College.

"Why this man got on the elevator completely nude, stark as a corby in moulting season. And every blessed individual on the elevator just kept looking at the row of numbers over the door, like it happened all the time. And he certainly could raise a sporrán, as we used to say in the war. No, I certainly couldn't write about that. No, indeed."

Somewhere in the last paragraphs I would say that the book was very good.

That is the trouble with planning the review before you see the performance. The book is not good, it is a little masterpiece, a description none-the-less true for being clichéd.

In The Short Happy Walks, Bruce has captured what it is like to be alive, day to ordinary day. Not to be Beckett on the field with Henry, or Lear outside Goneril's gates, but to be Smith outside Half-Beat Harold's on the Strip. And that, Bruce reminds, is a very exciting thing to be. Ordinary, what is wrong with ordinary?

For most of us none-dope-smoking citizens, ordinary is dull, except when we fall in love again and for a few days it is nice that the campus smells the way it does, or that the front entrance to Trinity is a different colour from the rest of the building. By the end of the week, teaching assistants voices wake us and we drown. Not Max MacPherson:

For me the chief fascination of the Strip lies among the words it throws at us walkers and, today, I feel a distinct pride and pleasure in my discovery of prose like:

"That cruel, evil, grasping Dr. Goldfoot is back with a brand-new, hysterical harem of honeys, and he's heck-bent to hurl the world into a howling holocaust of hilarity."

I particularly like that heck-bent. This must be a family movie even if the girls do have thermonuclear navels. The movie is called Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs, and I think I'll buy one of those darling little toilet jokes at Benny's Discount or Half-Beat Harold's and award it to Dr. Goldfoot as first prize in this afternoon's contest for movie display-writing. Second prize goes to a film at the Rio about 'Krauts, Brutes and Harlots', in which the sergeant's wife is 'easy prey for the whole camp'.

... The Strip is depressing me again so I enter the Le Coq d-Or Tavern... It is dark in here, dark red. The Doctors is on the television, a couple of young guys are schlumping around on the drums and guitar on the stage, and a beautiful young woman is sitting by herself in the corner.

... (A man) comes in, a middle-aged guy in a grey overcoat. He sits two seats from her and looks her over and over, and smiles and smiles. I am furiously trying to eavesdrop but I can't tell yet whether he's actually saying things to her. Anyway, after awhile, she downs her drink, draws her gloves over her patrician hands and gets up to leave. Now he is saying something to her and as she struts away gracefully she replies, "That's very nice of you. Thank you." But she doesn't mean it, and, unless she's the sergeant's wife, I don't see why she should.

Bruce's gift is that he does not think too much. The stuff passes from the street to his senses to the page intact, as itself, not a thesis.

Bill Cameron's Style column, which has replaced Max in the Saturday Star, is a good contrast. Cameron writes damn well too; for him a pool hall scene comes out carefully, celebrated, something to think about. Bruce just spits out the pool hall, feel what it is like.

But of course I must have been wrong. From some angles the school looks almost pleasant this morning. There are more flowers blooming than there used to be... There's a new football field with real sod and, already at 9:20, some goofy, rangy boys are out there in their gym shorts with a football. They seem to be having a pretty good time and, even if what I said about Oakwood in the early fifties were the whole truth, the high schools of Toronto have surely changed for the better in the years since.

And besides, I'm thirty-three now, and no-one, no vice-principal, no system, can make me go through those double doors to find out."

It's naive, conservative, wrong, but that is what it feels like.

Not all the columns are brilliant, especially the "going East on Queen, I turn up Trefann and notice..." variety. But these are few. There are some columns that are Toronto-only's, but since I am one of three people who were actually born here (my father and Bruce being the other two—everyone else in this town seems to come from Winnipeg or Newfoundland), that is OK with me. Anyway, even as a book about Toronto, it's better than most. Does anyone else remember "A Tearful look at Toronto's Riviera"?

At his best, and it is a pretty consistent best, Max MacPherson is alive, not constipated from the brain down, a man who notices such things. For all his silly bias against the Portuguese.

eldridge and the revolt of the dirties

One night when I was in Washington the Congress of the United States deigned to hold a reception for the 300 odd conventioners at a College Editor's Conference in the regal, carpeted chamber of a building across from the Capitol.

Smartly dressed, striped-button-down-shirt-guys and smooth-legged, elegant chicks were quietly sipping free Pepsi-Cola and talking to their elected representatives in clusters when a scream arose from the other end of the room.

"You goddamn almighty pigs; all of you bastards are butchers and pigs; Nixon's a pig, you know it, you bastard. You can take your goddamn country and shove it!"

A long-haired, shabbily dressed young man, obviously not one of the editors was screaming at the top of his lungs to a moustachioed, young representative from upstate New York.

"What are you doing about those kids WHO ARE BEING BURNED TO DEATH IN VIET NAM? HOW ABOUT THEM, YOU BASTARD!" The people in the room were scandalized. They turned pink with embarrassment.

Then at the other end of the room, a great wad of papers went flying high in the air and the sheets fluttered down over the immaculate room. A group of long hairs sat in the plush chairs at the front and threw curses at the throng:

"You're gonna sit on your fat asses all your lives and talk, but you're never going to do anything! Why don't you ever DO anything?"

Naturally the police were called in.

"Oh we're so sorry that this had to happen," the well-dressed young men and women were saying, "We knew they'd try to disrupt our meeting somehow. Please don't use force, officer."

But the pudgy cop standing at the door wasn't paying any attention to the fracas up front. He was busy trying to make a buxom blonde who was giving him the eye. He read one of her buttons and winked at her. She winked back. The liberal kids started worrying about police brutality and all the cop was thinking about was this chick.

It occurred to me that the cop was much closer to the anarchists up front in temperament and social identity than he was to the other kids in the room. And that is when a lot of things about American politics started to become crystal clear.

The hippy, the anarchist, the black man and the cop are DIRTY. The congressmen, the liberal editors and the establishment are CLEAN. And because issues don't count in an obsessively image-conscious America, the battle today is between the CLEAN and the DIRTY.

It goes way back in history. America started out clean as snow, but the black man, the European and the Mexican have been polluting the country for 400 years, letting their funky dirtiness pervade the country, making the white man envious, making him increase his power.

The cop is basically dirty. He's more of a human being than the congressman. Except he's had his mind tampered with. They've taken his basic human aggression and dumbness and used it for their own interests, transforming him into a sub-human.

Before 1954, the blacks were hippies, living in a dream world, which, for all its funkiness and beauty, was not their own trip by any stretch of the imagination. On June 18, 1954, the U.S. Supreme Court outlawed segregation and the black man started shucking off his chains and began to realize exactly what were the issues involved in his liberation.

After ten years of shunning society, of dropping out, the beatnik, or hippy began to see through the clouds of marijuana. He realized that in power lay the hope to control his own life.

But he retained his image, and that is what establishment America cannot tolerate an image alien to its own and the threat of the power of that image.

To preserve its image, establishment America built up some very clean myths. But the dirty people are tearing those myths apart.

The land of the free and the home of the brave was neither. The pioneering spirit massacred Indians and made slaves of Africans. "Give me liberty or give me death" meant "let me emulate imperialist mother Britain without being one of her imperial colonies." American fair play meant giving the other side some credit but always remembering that God was on YOUR side, baby.

PRESIDENTIAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON THE FUTURE ROLE OF HART HOUSE

Members of the University and interested Parties, Welcome.

that long hair has become the most controversial political issue in North America. He couldn't have hit the point any clearer. Long hair is dirty. It's an image that bespeaks all the issues that clean America wants to keep hidden.

Because of the obsession with images, the figure of one man, John F. Kennedy has had so much power in this country that almost every striped, button-down white liberal college boy wants to be John Kennedy. It's unmistakable.

That's the story. When it comes right down to the nitty gritty, the state suppresses what it doesn't like. There's something really dangerous brewing. The revolution is beginning.

Which brings us to Eldridge Cleaver. Cleaver has transcended clean and dirty, the petty-image-quibbling of American politics. He is a beautiful soul, a true social critic, and a free man in an unfree society.

I have wondered whether a man could combine revolutionary consciousness and the art of writing. Cleaver is one of the few men of whom both these attributes are true.

His revolutionary consciousness came from over fifteen years in the prisons of the United States of America, from raping white women because he hated them, from watching the white man and observing the myths that he lives by.

The revolutionary consciousness produced the writer: "That is why I started to write. To save myself." And the book, Soul on Ice is an accumulation of the best of his prison writings.

What's remarkable about the book is that Cleaver has surpassed the search for a "black" identity and has written a manifesto for all oppressed people.

Strange as it may sound, Cleaver interprets black people. The answer to that stupid liberal question, "What Is It You People Really Want?" is contained beautifully within the pages of the book. The black man wants to be free. Not like the white liberal sees it. Not even as Eldridge Cleaver, Elijah Muhammed or Malcolm X sees it. But as every black man sees it.

Particularly relevant to the revolt of the white university students and hippies is the essay, "The White Race and Its Heroes".

A priest I met in Berkeley told me something very true. He said that the black man is no longer the lowest class in American society. He has begun to realize the power he has in society. Then he pointed to the kids high on drugs on Telegraph Street, wandering the streets, living in a fracked-out subculture of their own.

BORN FREE???

Family backgrounds, religious atmosphere, and social environment are immediate influences on who I am. So often status quo conventions make me feel like an alienated robot in a meaningless mass. Can I really know who I am when I feel so hemmed in, restricted, inhibited, and enslaved by rules, conventions and ideas forced on me merely by chance of birth?

Real freedom is a quality that touches the very ground of our being. It is not just an external quality such as the right to participate in formation of certain political and social decisions but it is also a freedom that drops barriers to communicate, to responsibility, to love, for our fellow man.

We found this freedom and God has shown us the Way in the person of Jesus. If you want to know about this freedom call 741-1488 and we will be happy to talk about it with you. Our barriers are down, are yours.

a great good soldier schweik

Good Soldier Schweik is as simple a story as can be told. An innocent, optimistic happy man, ruled unfit mentally for military service, is drafted into the army at the dawn of World War One. He drives officers crazy, creates small disasters and is seduced by his superior's paramour, all the while smoking his pipe and keeping a bemused smile on his face.

George Luscombe has directed a superb hilarious and ingenious staging of vignettes from the life of this happy private.

At first it seems as if Schweik is going to be a re-enactment of an Archie comic, but by the end, Ray Whelan, a diminutive veteran of Workshop Productions, has grabbed the affection of the whole audience. He's the universal soldier who is slightly bewildered over all the excitement, absurdly polite to his senior officers, and disturbingly honest.

The pace of the production sparkles. The cast dances its way into imagined trains, carriages, freight cars and across the countryside while gaily painted scenes are projected upon the back wall, a device they have often used before, but never quite as effectively. The set is a square table with a couple of square small stools. But these are used as a bar, a reviewing stand, a carriage, a freight car and a dozen other things. Designer Nancy Jowsey has again come up with a set that allows the cast to move around the stage freely, and yet gives a good sense of the surroundings.

A rollicking piano accompaniment complements the action and adds gaiety.

A lot of the credit goes to the playwright, Michael John Nimchuk, who adapted the play from the book of the same name by Czech author Hasek. There is one scene guaranteed to break even the hardest audience when an officer reads a message from a Bishop which says, "May the good Lord sharpen our swords that we may run them through the bellies of our enemies! Peace unto you all." Shades of Spellman. Pass God and Praise the Ammunitions.

And the cast, a finely trained group of dancers works as one, each actor taking as many as five parts. Especially good is Francois Regis-Klanfert as Dr. Grunstein who recommends enemas, and cold wet sheets for the "malingerers" who fill his wards. Michael Ayoub is uproarious as Lt. Lukash, who becomes speechless with rage every time Schweik, his batman, starts off on one of his rambling stories about back home.

The costumes are simple terry cloth overalls for the men, the officers having suitable paper appendages signalling their rank. Others wear caps, aprons etc. Yet, like the rest of the play, there is as little ostentation as possible so that the acting and movement can portray the universality of the theme.

Workshop Productions seems to have taken the undisputable position as the best permanent theatre group in Canada (although there could be more) because of their commitment to theatrical innovation and their concentration on movement and mime. Their staging is nearly always ingenious, even though the quality of voice is not up to the quality of the movement. (Don't let anybody tell you they don't enunciate as well as other theatre

An Evening With Futz is a lot of things. It's dirty words and crude jokes and bawdy songs and obscene gestures. It's actors lying in the aisles, it's audience participation and sometimes it's even a play. The whole evening, (whatever it is) is threatening to establish new standards of theatrical acceptability in Toronto.

Most of the opening night audience at The Central Library Theatre had been well-warned about the content of Futz, and so few people were inclined to walk out. In fact, after the initial shock, most people were unaffected by the obscenity; some were pretty bored. When I arrived, the players were strewn out in the aisles, asking to be stepped on. Most of the audience tried to ignore them and tiptoed down the stairs. I tried tickling the first player I saw, and when he didn't even budge I figured he might as well be a step. The audience interviews similarly failed to establish any feeling of living theatre or theatre of confrontation.

The audience was much more at home during the session of poems, readings, songs and dirty jokes which followed. The players danced and bounded about the theatre and at last succeeded in getting the audience into the perverse, orgiastic mood required to watch

Rochelle Owens' play, Futz.

The play Futz itself is actually quite conventional — except for its subject matter. Simon Futz is a simple happy God-fearing farmer down south — who has intercourse with his pet pig. He suffers the damnation of the whole community, who themselves engage in almost every sexual perversion in the book. The idea is of course to make the obscenity of the townsfolk so disgusting as to make Futz's devotion to his pig almost religious. Surprisingly enough it works, and the play succeeds in inverting whatever sexual values we may have had when we arrived.

Futz is sometimes sensational, but unfortunately I just don't think it's a very good play. Luckily director Jim Garrard and an excellent cast of players exploit fully the few theatrical possibilities offered by Futz. One wishes that the skill and care taken in the play itself, (which lasts for less than an hour,) had been displayed throughout.

In presenting An Evening With Futz, the Theatre Passe Muraille, as its very name suggests, attempts to go beyond the accepted norm of theatricality. It has brought to Toronto exciting dramatic concepts which have long been lacking on our sterile local scene. Futz is an evening of experimentation. Sometimes it works; a lot of the time it doesn't. But one thing is at least clear — that Futz is not, just a four letter word.

cronenberg's opaque stereo

Last Wednesday, David Cronenberg, his mother, father, and all his friends, including the cast of his first feature length film Stereo gathered around at Cinécity to swap hellos and congratulations at the film's first showing. There weren't too many people there who really cared whether the film had any merit. Everyone was grinning and looking as if they were all part of a singular creation. It took a while to filter out that pervasive "gollygee" feeling and watch the movie. In fact, after the movie, most people didn't know what was happening either.

Cronenberg is a 24 year old English graduate who wrote, produced, photographed, directed, and edited the film for $8,500. The cast is made up mostly of his friends, and the setting for the Academy for Erotic Inquiry was very imaginatively shot at Scarborough College. No doubt about it, Mr. Cronenberg has a great deal of talent. He uses the camera superbly to catch the spiralling impact and perspectives of John Andrews' architecture.

Cronenberg is much less successful, however, when he trains his camera on the faces and postures of his actors. They appeared unintentionally dead.

Cronenberg tries to explore two spheres of thought in Stereo—the deep-seated sexual urges in man, and the powers of telepathy communication or parapsychology. Using almost a parody of a scientific documentary, he introduces us to an experimental study of men and women under laboratory conditions. That means that their brain tissues have been tampered with in order to test certain results, a la Rattray's

"Biological Time Bomb."

Because of his style of expression, I'm sure half of the people in the audience didn't have a clue what was going on on screen, while the rest filled in their own hazy interpretations as they went. The nuances and meanings of the film are well-cloaked not only by the visual obscurity of the style, but by a distracting super-academic commentary which acts as a backdrop to what is essentially a silent film. In fact the film was shot completely without words in the first stage. Only later did Cronenberg add the monologue accompaniment.

Cronenberg stretches the current re-examination of sexual mores, and drives forward to a futuristic time in order to make the present seem clearer.

Sexual hang-ups come clear in the strange setting. By induced telepathy the eight participants can extend their natural brain processes and react to their own as well as others' hidden sexual desires, via signals. From a visual sense, the sex-scenes are the high spots of the film. You see, the brain's field of sexuality extends beyond the heterosexual, even beyond the homosexual. It is a three-dimensional (stereo) field. Thus there are revealing examinations of all sorts of diversified sexual experience.

The contrast between what we see on screen as intense sexual expression, and the sober academic intellectualizing of the sound track makes for some sharp satirical jabs. To make the point even sharper, Cronenberg leads off with five minutes of credits, acknowledgments, by-laws, and other bureaucratic-scientific paraphernalia. In one rather extended scene the drone of the academic continues as a male seduces a female by telepathy, by excitingly caressing the plastic anatomy of a female medical dummy, while the living girl sits half-nude in the same room.

The pace of the film often reflects inexperience. Some parts are uncomfortably slow, despite the continuous clinical chatter of the documentary monologue. In fact the monologue itself is so painfully pseudo-erudite that the effect of the film is eroded as a result. Of the cast, only the blond, wide-eyes, mysterious-looking Ronald Mlodzik stood out. Most of the others appeared self-conscious on screen.

Sometimes Cronenberg loses the connection between technique (which has great moments) and content, leaving the viewer not so much bewildered, but uncomfortable. Fascinating nonetheless.

sweet young girl raped at cinécity

Gilles Carle is one of the legion of French-Canadian filmmakers who are paving the way to a feature film industry in Canada. Currently playing at Cinécity is his latest production, Rape of a Sweet Young Girl.

The film is not at all unpleasant, though its eighty five minutes left me bored at times. There is no dramatic structure to this story of a young girl who discovers she is pregnant, refuses to go through with an abortion, and is 'revenged' by her three brothers, who beat the hell out of a fellow who might have been the seminal donor.

The most pronounced feature of the film, and perhaps one which explains the occasional boredom, is its similarity to the work of Godard. The colour—manipulation of large blocks of primary tones; the terseness—supposedly reflecting the absurdity and randomness of the world; the characters—never losing their ennui; and the wide open non-endings, which deposit you back where you started (minus, in Carle's case, the tension and moralizing) are hallmarks of Godard. And beyond similarity in concept and treatment there are actual scenes, with people backed against a wall, speaking into the camera, or taking surreal drives in the country that are lifted from Godard.

Carle has an obvious cinematic proficiency and expertise, but he fails to control his subject matter in the way he controls the camera. Carle said that he wanted Rape of a Sweet Young Girl (it sounds so much better in French—Le Viol d'une Jeune Fille Douce) to show the little things of ordinary life—the moments that are not in themselves bad, but which amount to tragedy when you look at their sum total. Tragedy and black humour are what Carle claims the film is about, but these elements escape his grasp.

Rape is essentially a humorous film, perhaps only a humorous film, because the elements of the absurd, the incongruous moments, the hypocrisy of society simply do not come across; they fail to make their point. Dialogue: doctor tells the pregnant girl, Julie, that she must avoid using stairs. Scene: pregnant Julie and friend, deliberately running down long flights of stairs on the side of a hill. Add, priest in cassock, climbing stairs. Effect: revolution with facile cinematic moralising. Even the supposedly shocking illuminating scene of casual rape appears more as a ready device than meaningful exposition of some social or personal abnormality.

Julie and her three brothers have a very narrow range of emotional response. The ennui which Julie has at the very beginning of the film she carries through to the end, for despite the experiences she goes through, she feels nothing. She complains that nothing happens to her, yet when it does happen, she is unable to savour the experience. Always expecting and never fulfilled she belongs to the legions for whom a real experience can never approach the intensity of the imagined one. Her responses involve the most primitive differentiation, between that which causes pain and that which does not. Her predatory brothers know only that which they have allowed themselves and what they have not—all four of them moving through the social landscape quite apart from concepts of sin and evil. They are simply indifferent, condemned to eternal boredom. They may stretch out their hands in a crowd and fail to touch anything that is to them real. The real is imaginary and arbitrary; it is willed into existence.

The problem I had with Rape of a Sweet Young Girl did not arise from the film as much as from listening to Gilles Carle talk about it: I often wondered if it was the film I'd seen. Writing in The Dyer's Hand, W.H. Auden said of writers that they should first master the craft of writing, then cast about for something to write about. This might be pointed out to the several Canadian filmmakers who apparently have mastered cinematography, but are not introducing reasonable material into their films.

The often repeated cliché that the director should not write the scenario might well be invoked, though this realization may come of itself when the filmmakers decide they need no longer prove the scope of their creativity.

ART

He grabs your arm — Justin de Santos smiles. Suddenly you hear this splashing sound and a girl singing in the shower. You stare seeing nothing but a plastic shower curtain; when you step backwards a fleshy woman appears; she is singing to you from a wooden frame on the wall.

You are in Justin de Santos' gallery — the crossroads of art and suburbia. He has opened a gallery studio on Dundas West. De Santos is determined, determined to confront the stagnant imagination of Etobicoke with stimulating works of art as opposed to the Dominion Store reproductions "on original artist's canvas". He wants to reach the Blue Meanies. But they pretend that he isn't there to be taken seriously. He returns the insult by mocking them in his paintings.

'Chaos Out of Order' — a thoughtfully layed-out parking lot disgraced with a jumble of plastic cars. 'The Decent Society' — a real toilet seat, the lifted lid revealing a bowl full of plastic flowers (covering the S$H$I$T$). Did you know Canadians use the telephone more than any other people? 'Yak, Yak, Yak' — a red phone surrounded by many smiling chatting mouths.

Although he is from the West Indies, de Santos is a Canadian patriot; it is obvious in the majority of his works. 'Bay Street' depicts an eagle coloured by an American flag with a newspaper clipping of office building suspended from its neck. Snipers fire at the huge soaring bird. 'The King and the Queen' — Gerda Munsinger leans alluringly from a chessboard. Beside her, snuggling under the flowered bedsheet on one of the black squares is a small gold crown. 'The Americanization of the Canadian Woman' — a naked woman with three-D hair is surrounded infinitely by American products. This is his famous work — the most widely recognized — and one of his best.

There are handpainted leaves from the Orient and many changing works of Toronto artists: Jean Galt, John Richmond, Carl Zander, Jerry Human.

De Santos is there handing you a glass of wine, asking you what you think. He is really interested in getting you involved in art.

He's reaching out into the schools — sponsoring a contest: the best work to be exhibited in his gallery. When a car is awarded in the Thorncrest Motors draw one of De Santos' paintings will be given away too. He believes that a live-in-artist should glean more than sustenance and survival (although he does compromise to pay the rent by painting landscapes and 'old characters' upon request.)

LETTER

I would like to clarify a point concerning my article "From Revolt to Revolution" which appeared in your last issue. My article was somewhat shortened and one of the statements left out was to the effect that I was speaking for myself alone, though indirectly for many others.

You presented my piece as though it were a manifesto from the Toronto Student Movement, which it was not. To be sure I am a member of the TSM and of its Steering Committee, but the TSM cannot be equated with any individual. Although the bourgeois press is naturally given to personalising every left-wing movement, it is not a path which the student press should follow. I wrote my piece as Philip Resnick, not in the name of the TSM.

ELDRIDGE

They're the new "nigger". But he forgot to mention that when this new class emerges, as it is sure to do, the repercussions will rock the country.

Cleaver traces the history of the white protest movement from the liberal reform movement of the early fifties to the burning of the universities. He describes the 'generation gap': "The cause is you, Mr. and Mrs. Yesterday, you with your forked tongues."

Cleaver is brilliant not only when describing revolution, but also when talking about men and women and his own love life. His letters to his lawyer, Beverly Axelrod, with whom he fell in love while he was in Folsom Prison, are really honest and beautiful, the happy ravings of a free man.

But perhaps most incisive and piercing of all are the essays in which he looks at the relations of black men and black women to each other and to whites. He describes the "Supermasculine Menial" the "Ultrafeminine Doll", the "Omnipotent Administrator", and the "Ogre of Frigidity". (Figure out which is which).

Through these metaphors, he traces the hate, the fear, the cultural and sexual mores of whites and blacks in America, revealing as nobody except perhaps James Baldwin, the deep instinctual and sexual backgrounds behind racial conflict.

He ends with a message "To All Black Women From All Black Men", which has a soliloquy like Molly Bloom's in which he cries out the message, "Black Is Beautiful". Notice he doesn't cry it out to the white man or woman but to his black sister.

As Jerry Rubin (and everybody else for that matter) says, "Dig It!"

Grads and undergrads not the same says Sirluck

By PAUL MACRAE

"In engineering we can build a straw man.
"Let's get them out of SAC, ah wot a game.
"Then they'll say 'work together?' We'll guffaw, man.
"For grads and undergrads are not the same."

A Bob Bossin Christmas Carol
"Walking in John Winter's Wonderland"

As far as graduate Dean Ernest Sirluck is concerned, grads and undergrads are not the same, and he believes that the Graduate Student Union was correct in pulling out of the Students Administrative Council.

"It is a mistake for 16,000 undergraduate and professional students to say to 6,000 graduate students 'You must do so and so' if they don't like it," Dean Sirluck explained in a recent interview.

"For one thing, 50 per cent of graduate students are married, and half of them have children. My figures show only five per cent of undergraduates are married, and only two per cent have children.

"The graduate student has had a minimum of four years of participation in undergraduate activity," the dean continued. "His appetite has slackened for this kind of activity, but that's no reason for undergraduates to give up those activities."

Dean Sirluck notes that the average age for graduates is 27 years compared to about 18 or 19 for undergraduates. "a clear difference."

"I approve of the Board of Governors' action (making graduate membership in SAC optional)."

ERNEST SIRLUCK

The result, he says, will be to make the GSU and SAC compete for the sympathy of graduate students, necessary because in the present set-up graduate and undergraduate interests may clash within SAC. He picks out especially the area of library policy.

"Graduates have a remorseless need — an absolutely remorseless need — for the library resources," he explains.

"So when undergraduates want to enlarge the number of people who have access to the library, the graduate replies in the name of frankness, 'You can't until you meet more of our needs'.

Future plans, at least as outlined by Dean Sirluck, call for more separation of graduates and undergraduates.

While undergraduates will have access to the new $4-million Research Library at Harbord and St. George, it is intended primarily for graduate and faculty research.

Much of the planned graduate complex — residence, study and relaxation facilities — will be located on the east side of St. George north of Harbord, more or less geographically separate from the rest of campus.

But Sirluck says there is little possibility of the U of T becoming a predominantly graduate campus — if you include Scarborough and Erindale in the overall totals.

Even on the St. George campus, with its population of 25,000 students, graduate enrollment is expected to level off at about 5,000 full-time and 2,000 part-time graduate students. Right now U of T has about 6,000 full and part-time graduate students.

When Sirluck took over as dean in 1964, the graduate school enrollment, also full and part-time, was only 2,226.

With the Research Library, Sirluck says, U of T should become the strongest school in Ontario in terms of materials available for research.

What is the place of graduate students in governing the graduate empire? Right now four students sit on the Graduate Council with 31 faculty members elected by the four graduate divisions, but Sirluck doesn't discount the possibility of more students on the Council.

"I'm very proud that there was no opposition within the council to student membership," Sirluck explains. "The council was quick to see the need for student representation, but now there must be a certain amount of consolidation before making further changes.

A contentious issue with the four students, who sat on the council as non-voting members until the Senate ratified their positions, was the retention of the 10-hour work rule.

The rule limits the amount of work a graduate may do outside his studies to 10 hours a week. The four students wanted it abolished. They lost.

Sirluck himself came under some criticism when he was reported by The Varsity as defending the work rule because graduate students are an "investment" of outside interests.

Dean Sirluck said he was misquoted and pulled out the speech he made at the Council meeting explaining his position.

He read: "The argument that a graduate should make his own choices might be valid if he were the only investor. But there are others."

While the student is a "heavy investor", Sirluck continued, the university invests its human and material resources in the graduate student, the provincial and federal governments and private donors invest their money.

"These participants have a right to specify the conditions under which they will invest," Sirluck said.

He added that the statistics link the number of work hours with completion rate of PhD. theses, and deplored the "great human waste" that occurs when a candidate does not complete his degree.

"Individual persons become very distrustful of themselves if they don't complete their requirements," Sirluck explained. "They sense they have failed in a very important way.

"Also, the PhD. thesis is the first important jump at the business of making knowledge one's own. It provides a firm foundation of research for an academic career."

Finally, the university might lose money — a considerable amount of money — if the 10-hour rule isn't enforced.

According to Sirluck, a new ruling by the provincial government will define "full-time" graduate student as one not working more than 10 hours a week. If the student works more than 10 hours, the province will supply only a part-time student grant — one-third to one-fifth the amount for a full-time graduate student under the formula financing plan.

"If this happened," Sirluck said, "how could we meet our obligations? The drop in revenue would be catastrophic."

Although graduate students do bring in more government money under formula financing, Sirluck denies this has been a major factor in the growth of the graduate school over the past few years.

He points out that formula financing is only in its second year, that the growth of graduate schools is stimulated by "social demand" for more teachers and professors, plus an economy demanding higher levels of "skill, inventiveness and developmental capacity." In addition, Sirluck cites heavier demands by government on the university.

Sirluck's recent promotion to vice-president in charge of the graduate division has given rise to rumors that he is a possible candidate for university president when Dr. Bissell steps down, a rumor that Dean Sirluck does not firmly deny.

"Does any sane man think of being president?" he replied.

"Looking forward, I wouldn't like to leave my job until the things that occupy me the most are secure and in being."

Then, he says, he will cease to be dean and go back to his first commitment as a professor of English literature.

"But," he adds, "I won't deny that this commitment has been replaced for some time by the pressure of my duties as dean — and I like the pressure of a tough job."

Students agree with 'Air of Death'

When 242 students and faculty watched Air of Death, the CBC's controversial film on air pollution, in the Zoology building last week, reaction ranged from laughter at interviewed government officials to anger at statistics and business spokesmen. Last night the Varsity assembled the results of 59 questionnaires turned in to its offices and found that:

- 51 found the film "substantially accurate", and the rest found it accurate with qualifications.

- 53 found themselves alarmed to some degree, most "greatly alarmed."
- "Don't these people (the businessmen and politicians interviewed) realize that their children are in danger too? Money does sickening things to people — may their dying breath be labored!"
- 47 thought the CBC was "responsible to the public interest." 11 others thought there was "slight exaggeration" involved.

"How the hell can (the CBC) exaggerate about a situation of which little or nothing is known? There is no norm for comparison."

- questioned about the Canadian Radio-Television Commission's hearing into the CBC's showing of the film, 50 said the CRTc should "congratulate the CBC on raising the public's awareness;" the rest thought the CRTc should either leave the CBC alone, or demand that the government do something about the pollution problem.

"In my opinion the CRTc should discontinue their moronic hearings."

- 48 thought that the CBC was justified in presenting the program to the public; none agreed that pollution is an alarming situation best kept under wraps. 11 had no comment.

"I was always under the misunderstanding that the CBC was created for the express purpose of bringing subjects of public interest before the public. I say 'misunderstanding' because otherwise why would it now have to answer for what would ordinarily have been its duty?"

"It is awesome to find that the CBC must do the work of the government."

- 20 wanted to join a committee over the Dunville problem; 12 wanted to write a brief to the CBC. The rest suggested a wider program, more research, general "shit" raising, legislative action and "applause" for the CBC. One George-Raft sort of character, hearing about government officials who want to keep the problem "under wraps" wrote: "Where are these bastards? Let's go visit them at Queen's Park!"

Amnesty storms Bastille

By MIKE KESTERTON

In Toronto you can hold an anti-Vietnam demonstration and the cops come out to hold back the crowds for you. Your leader gets arrested for scuffling and, all of a sudden, he's another Dreyfus. "Give me liberty, or give me death!" he cries, and the judge lets him go and justice is done.

In most of the countries in the world you can be whisked away in the middle of the night, put in jail without a trial or a specific charge being laid against you, and rot the rest of your life away.

In 1961 an English lawyer, Peter Benenson, who had defended political prisoners in many countries, set up Amnesty International to help such people. The organization, which has since grown to 10,000 members in 23 countries, sends a barrage of letters to selected political prisoners, their families and the ministers of Justice in 60 countries. They send money and encouragement.

The organization is humanitarian and apolitical. All points of views are represented and political prisoners in left-wing, right-wing and neutral countries are worked for. A local group, such as the one centred in Toronto, receives the names of three prisoners, one from each category of country, and works to get them released.

To qualify for help, a prisoner must have been imprisoned for exercising the rights guaranteed him in Articles 18 and 19 of the United Nations Charter: the rights of freedom of thought, conscience, religion and opinion; he must not have advocated violence or the military overthrow of the government.

How successful has the program been? In eight years of operation 5,000 prisoners have been investigated and qualified to receive aid. Over the years 3,000 have been released. Amnesty International is reluctant to take full credit for this since it doesn't want to become known as a "pressure" group. But it is safe to say that most of the prisoners would still be in jail today if it weren't for its work.

The Toronto chapter has just received its "prisoners" for 1969. Hassan Duhul of Kenya was arrested by the British before the country achieved independence because he argued for its independence; the new regime has kept him in jail. Father Booney is a Catholic missionary in Burma who was arrested and imprisoned without trial or a specific charge being laid.

Next week the chapter is holding a supper to raise funds for its work; a discussion of "Portugal Today" will follow.

We believe that it is erroneous to pretend that S.A.C. can speak with authority for over 20,000 individual students on moral issues. S.A.C.'s role is not to pronounce to the world that particular students think, thus causing polarization, but to enable students to express their thoughts as individuals or representatives of groups. The reaction of S.G.S. emphasizes the divisive nature of stands which are representative of a small segment of students.

On the other hand, S.A.C. can and should speak for the campus on issues which involve the welfare of students as students such as summer employment and housing and on issues which will enhance the educational possibilities of this university such as the trimester system and the new library. If elected our immediate aims would be:

1. To discourage the present emphasis on polarization politics. This import from European politics is neither the only nor the main problem solving tool available to student government. It creates more myths and barriers than it destroys.
2. To improve communication between other student governments we would in particular encourage Scarborough and Erindale Colleges to consume more responsibilities. We would return S.A.C. fees to them, and they could then renegotiate with S.A.C. for central services that S.A.C. may be able to offer them.
3. We would negotiate with the Ontario government to remove the "minimum summer savings" requirement that is now a condition of P.O.S.A.P. grants.
4. In the field of education, we would encourage the introduction of a trimester system. The advantages of such a system are considerable. It would allow students to complete a B.A. in two or three years.
5. We would encourage groups on campus to use facilities that S.A.C. has, in order that they may express their ideas.
6. We will work for unlimited access for all students to the new library presently under construction. It seems unreasonable to deny access to such a valuable research tool to any student.

VIC & SMC CONTINUE TO PLAY WITH THEMSELVES

By GELLIUS

HOCKEY PLAYOFFS

In the first of a two-game total-point series, Vic tied SMC, 4-4. Fraser scored 3 for Vic and Laurie the other. Donovan (2), Morrison and Merlocco ("Road to Merlocco", starring Dorothy Lamour and Bob Hope.)

Rice scored thrice and Taylor and Pollard had one each to lead Dents over Law, 5-0.

BASKETBALL PLAYOFFS

The Forces of Evil took it on the chin (a slang expression meaning "to run away") yesterday as Innis (wearing the white Hats) beat favoured Vic, 64-58. Silver and Hirsch each scored 16 for Innis; Little Jack Horner hit well from the Corner with 23 for Vic. Vic was severely hampered by Innis players who continually made the sign of the cross, forcing Vic players to roll up into hoops and whirl away biting their ankles.

Maver and Sanderson had 16 (sc. "men on a dead man's chest") and Magna Kartna 15 as Vic II watersranded Erin (Shaw 27), 92-47.

The Purple Flower of Pasht scored 29 and UC beat New, 106-54. Kirby had 17 for the gnus. (The gnu is a small south African antelope related to the Ibn Saud.)

WATT'S THIS ABOUT CLARE DRAKE AS SUPERCOACH?

By PHIL BINGLEY

Edmonton — In the Canadian section of Time Magazine, (October 18, 1968) there appeared a half-page article depicting the phenomenal accomplishments of University of Alberta coach, Clare Drake. The title of the article was "Supercoach" and in it Drake was described as "the most spectacularly successful college coach in the country".

To back up this claim, Drake's involvement with two Canadian championship hockey teams and one Vanier Cup football winner was cited.

Now, this is all very fine and we do not wish for a moment to detract from the success of Mr. Drake. But the fact is that when Varsity Blues begin the battle to win their third national shiny title here this evening in a game with Laurentian University Voyageurs of Sudbury, the man behind the Toronto bench — coach Tom Watt — will be an individual who has a more valid claim to the supercoach title than his western counterpart.

Watt, like Drake, has also been a coach with two hockey and the football national team champs. But consider further examples of his prowess as a guiding guru. Tom has led Varsity to league titles in each of his four years at Toronto, won three Loyola tournaments in as many years of trying and brought Blues home with the third place bronze metal from Austria and the Student Olympic games in February of 1968.

And, Watt has accomplished all this in just four seasons of coaching at the intercollegiate level. Also, in the two meetings between Toronto and Alberta, Watt's charges have emerged victorious each time — Blues clobbered Bears 8-1 in the CIAU playoffs in 1966 and again 8-5 in the Loyola tournament in January of 1967. We rest our case.

Turning to more immediate and more important business, the game between Alberta and the winner of tonight's Blues-Laurentian title looks to be the key to the title. Blues have already beaten (7-5 in Sudbury) and tied Laurentian (4-4 at Varsity Arena) this season and in both cases achieved the final results with rather mediocre performances.

This does not mean that Laurentian will be by any means a soft touch. Voyageurs are a well-drilled unit featuring speed, aggressive checking, a sound defence and excellent goaling.

But Blues have shown that they can handle Voyageurs and handle them they should. Varsity possesses better scoring, a stronger defence, equally competent netminding, in short, greater depth. Their lack of muscle had no effect on the outcome of their other two contests and shouldn't in this one.

Assuming that Blues prevail tonight (and who gives a damn about a Laurentian - Alberta confrontation) tomorrow's contest with the Golden Bears should be a classy clash. The only unfortunate part is that the meeting could not be arranged as the title final. Any meeting between Saturday's conqueror and the winner of the Sir George Williams — Maritime Conference game is likely to be anti-climactic to say the least.

Varsity Blues take on Laurentian Voyageurs tonight in the first game of the Canadian Intercollegiate hockey finals. Last time the two teams clashed, it was in every sense of the word, with fights breaking out all over the ice. Blues' burly defenseman, Jim Miles, lets loose in this particular brawl against Voyageurs No. 20, who shall go nameless.

Along with the secondary interest involved in a Drake-Watt duel, prairie hockey buffs will get a chance to see the two best college hockey teams in the country in action against one another. (Loyola Warriors and Waterloo Warriors despite their absence from this competition are probably the next best).

Alberta won their league rather handily as they posted a 16-4 record and finished six points ahead of runnerup Saskatchewan. Milt Hohol and Wayne Wiste each had 45 points in 20 games this season to finish in a tie for loop scoring honors. Mel Baird, a former Waterloo player, anchors a stingy Bears defense while goaltenders Dale Halterman and Bob Wolf posted by far the best goals against average in the west. They each played 10 games and registered a 2.25 goals let-in-per game mark.

Since most of what we know about Alberta has filtered back by word of mouth or through the scribbles of the always unreliable press, it is difficult to make any meaningful comparison between Blues and Bears. Suffice it to repeat that the latter are defending champions.

Coach Watt also sees the Alberta semi-final match as the key game in the series. "Whoever wins the Saturday game should win it all. I believe that our players are in shape and that we can skate with anyone. Of course, Alberta will be in shape, too, and will have the added benefit of the draw. But it seems that there are several players on our team who seem to play their best when it means the most."

Remember Waterloo anybody?

FENCERS FINALLY PREVAIL

Go East, fencer, make sure your rules are their rules, beware all innocents and carry a copy of the F.I.E. rules.

Ottawa's first attempt at organising the finals set the scene for Ron Rice to return the Walter's foil Trophy to Toronto. His excellent judgment of distance won the gold medal while Richard Wong out-pointed all opposition for the silver — a dramatic show of superiority. Martin Peros suffered some doubtful manipulation in pool order but recovered to win third place in the sabre event. His consolation was to win the Tully trophy for style, skill and sportsmanship. An exciting epee final finished with Rowland Griffin 4th (same victories as 3rd and 2nd) and Mike Kerwin 6th.

A tense Foil event saw McGill outpsych the U of T squad 5 matches to 4. Rice and Wong had 2 wins while Chen lost all his bouts on close calls.

The sabre was marred by the non-arrival of a Toronto fencer so the Blues gave up 3 bouts. Peros showed his class in a 3 win spell but Martin Moskovits was screwed to win 1 bout, a 5:4 loss!

The chips were down, win the Epee or, defeat was unthinkable. What a start! Five straight wins, Kerwin beating the individual epee champion. Snitmann gallantly fought flu and his opponent but lost two fights while Griffin lost 5:4 to Hoffman. The last bout of the match — 13 victories all — Kerwin won. 14:13. Toronto had it or so we thought.

McGill's interpretation gave them a 2:1 match victory while Blues followed usual fencing practise to claim a 14:13 win. Although Toronto appealed, Mr. Arnot, a non fencer, awarded the trophy to McGill, in itself exceeding his terms of reference.

Subsequently, Ottawa showed Toronto losing the sabre 9:0 arguing that U of T defaulted, a term not found in the rules, by only having two sabreurs.

This Monday, the Administrative Council of the O.Q.A.A. ignored the detailed study of the rules needed and compromised toward a joint title.

SEE MACRAE'S GROIN INJURY

Varsity Inkmen leave the ice after recent practice session in preparation for Tuesday's big duel against wishy-washy liberals from SAC.

By BRONISLAW CHRTIEU

Get our your thermos bottles and car blankets, cause the hockey season ain't over yet. This Tuesday night at 10:15, Varsity Arena will be filled with the groan of sweating muscles flashing limbs and prostrate bodies as the annual SAC-VARSITY hockey game takes place.

SEE Phil Bingley star as "the net". SEE F. Paul Fromm play left-wing. SEE buxom VARSITY Belles grind helpless SACCITES into the boards. (There's no referee!) SEE the beer-breaks every two and a half minutes. SEE Paul MacRae get a groin injury.

Yes, bring your friends and family (if they can stomach it) to watch the most gruesome display of brutality this year. (A recent ruling has demanded a puck be used instead of the traditional tennis ball.) Winner gets to lead the glorious cultural revolution on campus next year.

Abols -- quietly waiting, smiling

Gus Abols — the man who takes over Steve Langdon's job May 1 — followed last night's election results quietly, accepting his victory philosophically.

As the first results trickled in at about 6.30, with a 25-vote margin for Abols at Trinity College, he laughed softly:

"Well, we've got them worried."

And that was the way it was for most of the evening as Abols amassed his 300-vote lead over John Oldham.

Early in the evening Abols, looking dapper in a light olive suit and coral shirt, had said: "We didn't come into this race to win, but to express our opinions." He said he thought it would be close.

"Whether or not we win, we will still have a victory party, for a good week's work. It was enjoyable getting feedback around campus; and momentum mounted every day."

"What looked like a walkaway turned out to be a good competition."

He seemed to be a little surprised at the way things were going, remembering that he had seriously considered running for SAC president only the week of the nominations deadline.

Abols lead until the fourth ballot, when the University College returns put Oldham into the lead. But nevertheless Abols and his campaign people continued to react with "pleasant surprise" as they made strong second-place showings at Scarborough, St. Mike's, and UC.

Things started looking up again as the professional faculty votes were tallied.

Abols showed his only real enthusiasm of the evening when the engineering results were announced. Engineers voted four to one for him.

"Really incredible," he declared, clapping Engineering Society president Brian Dunk on the shoulder. "All I did was go to the cafeteria twice."

In the vice-presidential contest Oldham's running-mate continually led Abols' partner Ed Thompson. This prompted Thompson to turn half-jokingly to Abols and remark: "How are you going to get along with Barkwell?"

"I guess I'll just have to listen to him," answered Abols with a smile. And later: "I can get along with him quite easily; it may take him longer to cool down from the heat of the campaign."

He sees next year as "a difficult year" but he agreed basically with Steve Langdon's comments on the results.

He doesn't necessarily foresee his "radicalization" during his term of office, although he smiles again and says he is "open-minded."

Oldham as Volkswagen dealer ?

By LARRY HAIVEN

The "restrained optimism" reported by Radio Varsity in McCaul House, where John Oldham and Bob Barkwell awaited the results of the SAC election, was mostly restrained and not very optimistic.

A continuous bridge game stopped occasionally to listen to the results on campus radio. Some people were doing homework and John Oldham looked through the classified ads and decided that he would leave the clergy (he graduates this spring from Emmanuel College) and get a job selling Volkswagens next year.

Bob Barkwell (II Meds), his running mate, looked with gloom at the results even though the polls promised victory for him but not for Oldham. People shuffled over to congratulate Bob in flat tones.

Over at the Junior Common Room at University College campaign manager Bob Rae pontificated on the worldwide effects of the returns surrounded by eager onlookers.

Later at the wake in Rochdale, Rae, who was giving the word for a silent Barkwell, said "I guess we just underestimated Abols and didn't count on the strength of the vote in the professional faculties. I think it was a mostly anti-SAC vote but still I was very surprised that we lost."

Around him came the beer-soaked strains of a song: "My father knows Gus Abols; my father knows Abe Mudrik; my father knows Harry Kopyto... at this point the singers broke up because Kopyto's name had too many syllables in it.

"I think polarization politics has already happened," continued Rae, referring to a slogan in the Abols-Thompson campaign which warned of increasing left-wing-right-wing delineation on campus.

Barkwell, faced with the position of being elected with a president from another ticket, said that he hadn't decided whether to accept the vice-presidency yet. "I'll have to talk to many people, including Abols, and I'll have to take a good many long walks, m'boy," he said, patting the reporter on the shoulder.

The apartment of Hugh and Pat Armstrong, decorated in early poolroom gothic, was the meeting place for many of the left-wing politicians on campus later in the evening. Silently quaffing beer, they wondered, "What is going to happen next year?"

A few said they would join the Toronto Student Movement, a snattering indicated they would be full-fledged anarchists and some just got drunk (on beer?). None seemed happy at the prospect of Gus Abols as president of next year's student council.

Oldham refused to give a comment, saying he was too tired and that he would have to get together with his supporters and decide what to do later on.

Turning point in the counting seemed to come around 10.30 when the results from Victoria College came in. Oldham only won by 36 votes, not near enough to catch up with Abols, who was already more than 300 votes ahead of him before the Vic count.

Winning by only a slight margin at New College put the final nail in the coffin and it was all over.

Kopyto, Kirzner -- happy losers

By LIZ WILICK

The action was pretty subdued last night at the Young Socialist Forum headquarters, home base for the Kopyto-Kirzner campaign.

Ellie Kirzner, vice-presidential candidate (miserably beset by a flue bug) was optimistic: "The whole campaign was so good. We've gotten an awful lot out of it. The results are sort of anti-climactic."

Presidential candidate Harry Kopyto arrived at 8 p.m. and was told that Ellie was leading him in number of votes. Ellie explained: "I think the campus is full of male chauvinists." She asked: "Who do you think will win?" Harry burst out laughing: "I think we will win." Somebody commented, "Anyway I think the people of U of T will lose."

The high point came when Radio Varsity announced at 9.30 that Kopyto and Kirzner had "conceded and withdrawn." "It's a fallacious report," protested Kopyto. "We're very happy with the vote. There's no way we're out of the race. There's no way we've conceded."

Harry decided to make a speech to thank his supporters and asked for a cigarette. "We entered to inject politics. I think we did it. We ran to build a student movement. The gains we have made and the steps we have taken have far outweighed who gets in. It's heartening to find such a significant minority supporting the socialist ticket."

At 10 p.m. Kopyto and a henchman took off in search of beer. Kirzner drifted away in search of aspirin.

Interest centred around not the number of votes but the percentage. They were all hoping to do at least as well as other YSF candidates across Canada who had polled between five and 20 per cent of votes cast.

Harry returned a few beers later to talk. "In the last year, SAC has not sunk roots into the student movement." He accused it of having an "elitist mentality" and of being a home for left-liberals. "It has to be democratized."

"We don't consider that we've lost at all. It's a step forward, a positive act, part of an international, long-term process of radicalism."

"No army is as powerful as an idea whose time has come. Perhaps we belong to the future."

Scarborough students want to build $1 million residence

Scarborough College's student council will build a million dollar student-run residence if U of T's Board of Governors will supply the land.

The students hope to gain the board's approval at its meeting Thursday. This would allow them to make financial arrangements for construction.

Bob Kligerman (II Scar) explains that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a federal agency, would put up 90 per cent of the cost if the university would supply the remaining 10 per cent. This could take the form of a land grant.

John Andrews, the architect who designed Scarborough College, had been retained to draw plans for the proposed residence, which the council hopes to open by fall, 1970.

They have already spoken to officials in the department of university affairs, Simcoe Hall and SAC, and term the response "hopeful".

The move to build a student residence came after months of frustration, waiting for the administration to start residences approved last December.

Last weekend, the council conducted a survey of first and second year students. Of those polled, 27 per cent said they would be prepared to move into some sort of residence complex. Since there will be 1,700 students at Scarborough next year, this would indicate demand would be more than sufficient to fill the proposed 200-bed residence.

Student Council President Steve Langdon said last night SAC was prepared to help with the preliminary financing and with planning the building. SAC's housing committee has already met with Scarborough representatives to discuss the project. The project hinges on receiving approval in principle from the governors, a move which would indicate the university feels the plan is financially feasible. "If they don't get that approval," said Langdon, "it's pretty hard to go ahead."

The Scarborough council hopes President Claude Bissell will present the proposal to the board, since students can not appear at the board's closed meetings.

Erindale College beauty Nanci Wakeman, 20, was crowned Miss Erindale at the college's Awards Banquet Friday.

Principal J. Tuze Wilson and Mrs. Wilson presented Nanci with a tiara and bouquet of yellow roses. A graduate of Richview Collegiate Institute, the Erindale queen plans to desert her college next year in favor of a Dental Hygiene course on the St. George campus.

Princesses Cathy Slobodian, 21, (left) and Adrienne Trull, 21, (right) also received roses. The ceremony was followed by a dance until midnight and numerous parties afterwards.

Earlier in the evening, awards were given for athletic, academic and student council achievements.

Vic results counted - Hobbs wins

You may well ask why, since Victoria College held elections on Thursday last, the results are only now available.

Well — it took a long time to count the ballots.

Vic students turned out at more than 40 per cent of their full strength to mark ballots for a slate of Victoria College Union Council executive posts.

Tabulating the results proved a tedious task for the returning officers, who put the ballots through a total of nine recounts.

Dents get 85%

Eighty-five per cent of the voters turned out to the polls in yesterday's local elections at the Faculty of Dentistry.

Barry Chapnick (II Dents) was voted President of the Dental Students Society, defeating his opponent Tom Rice (III) by a margin of 283 to 216.

Other DSS positions were: secretary Frank Wilson (II); treasurer Hans Viergiver (II); assistant treasurer Randy Whyte (II); social director Doug Meredith (III); assistant Eric van Gorder (I); athletic director Rick Ward (III), assistant Jerry Shudrak (I); Dentanties director Rick Gresik (II), assistant Jerry Boyko (I); publicity director Brad Chapple (II); yearbook editor Mike Bouris (III), assistant Nick Shabotinsky (II); junior SAC rep Peter Gold (II).

The dental students elected Vince Wroblewski (II) as their representative on the Students' Administrative Council.

Squeaking into the president's job is Ernie Hobbs, who, with 418 votes, outscored his opponent John Elton by a margin of 18.

The vice-president's post went to John Sparks who garnered four votes more than Blair Tupper Smith's 313.

Totals in both of these races were recounted six times each.

The VCUC's treasuring post remains with Bill Collier. New University government commissioner is Jim Maxwell.

Other commissioners elected are: educational research Tim Young; communications Doug Mann; Scarlet and Gold Scott Walker; Cultural Affairs Darlene Lawson.

Elected as members at large were Carolyn Henderson and Mary Ballachey.

About 50 of the ballots cast in the election turned out to be spoiled, largely because students used tick marks rather than an "x" to indicate their choice.

"Stay on campus this summer" does not sound like a very clever slogan, especially at this time of year. But it is part of the new SAC summer program.

"Summer is in many ways an ideal time for exciting learning, since most students are free from the pressures of exams, class schedules etc." SAC President Steve Langdon said yesterday.

"A program in the summer seemed especially called for this year as many U of T students will be unable to find jobs."

Programs will include the F. U. of T., the Pollution Probe, work with downtown communities and work with high schools.

Those interested are being asked to sign a mailing list at the SAC office. Anyone with ideas for F.U. of T. Summer seminars should contact Bob Bossin, 923-3490.

"It is difficult to respond to the summer job situation. I hope this program will enable students to ask the kind of questions that will be relevant to their own hang-ups as students and workers," said Langdon.

VARSITY SPORTS

Various SAC members were reported quaking in their boots late last night in anticipation of their imminent defeat at the hands of Varsity staffers at the big game tonight at 10:15 in Varsity Arena.

Varsity Inkmen, who have spent the past three weeks getting up a cheering squad ("We're Not Biased, Fight, Fight, Fight!") are convinced they will win on moral support alone. An audience of several is expected to cheer mightily.

It is not yet known whether the Inkmen will feature a topless womens' line. "It all depends on how we're doing after the second period," commented Ma Brydson last night. She would neither deny nor confirm the rumor she is planning to appear in a bikini.

ATS holds money teach-in

Discontent with the latest Ontario Budget has prompted U of T's Association of Teaching Staff to organize a teach-in at Convocation Hall today at 12:15 p.m.

Deputy minister of university affairs E. E. Stewart, president Claude Bissell, SAC president Steve Langdon and Chuck Hanly, executive vice-chairman of the Ontario Council of University Faculty Associations will speak.

Prof. Ian Burton of the ATS said yesterday, "The purpose of the teach-in is to inform faculty and students of the implications of the budget and give some feedback to Queen's Park on campus opinion."

Prof. Burton stressed the teach-in was a student-faculty affair. "We want students to be there," he said.

The teaching staff is concerned that the 5.5 per cent increase in operating grants to Ontario universities is too small to allow salary raises next year. The staff has asked for a 19 per cent pay hike and is currently negotiating with the administration.

The teach-in will hear reports and debates on faculty salaries, staff-student ratios, negotiations with the province and university autonomy. Organizers promise there will be "ample opportunity for debate and speeches from the floor."

BLEED!

Blood drive total to date is 1475 (units). Today's clinic is at Trinity, tomorrow's at UC and Sig Sam is to be visited on Thursday and Friday. Dents have dripped up with 263 pints and are leading the race at this point.

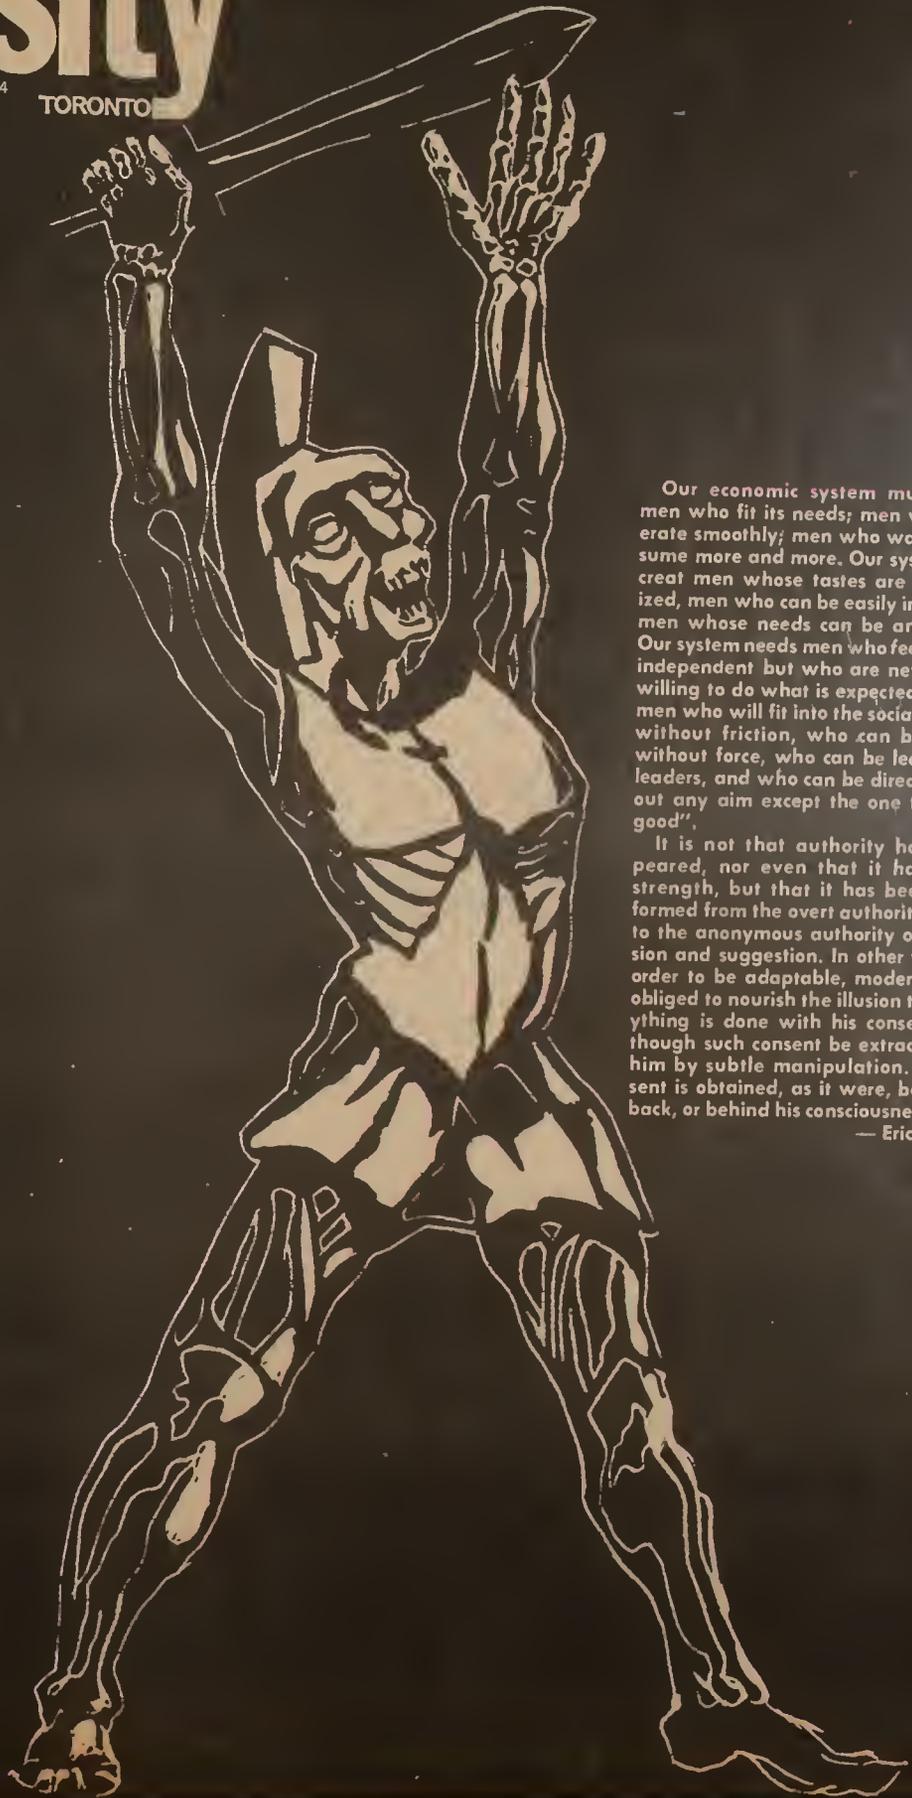

Miscellaneous donations, have accounted for 16 pints, one of them from a McGill University grasshopper, a small insect vaguely unrelated.

TORONTO

Our economic system must create men who fit its needs; men who cooperate smoothly; men who want to consume more and more. Our system must create men whose tastes are standardized, men who can be easily influenced, men whose needs can be anticipated. Our system needs men who feel free and independent but who are nevertheless willing to do what is expected of them, men who will fit into the social machine without friction, who can be guided without force, who can be led without leaders, and who can be directed without any aim except the one to "make good".

It is not that authority has disappeared, nor even that it has lost in strength, but that it has been transformed from the overt authority of force to the anonymous authority of persuasion and suggestion. In other words, in order to be adaptable, modern man is obliged to nourish the illusion that everything is done with his consent, even though such consent be extracted from him by subtle manipulation. His consent is obtained, as it were, behind his back, or behind his consciousness.

SAC

EDUCATION CONSULTANT

Chief administrator of the Free University of Toronto, handles other educational programming with SAC reps and local councils. Organizing with course unions and educational research are also part of the job.

EXECUTIVE ASSISTANT

To relieve the President of much of the workload, act as liaison between Council and the SAC Office, help the Council and Executive members carry out various projects. This position involves participating in planning and decision-making, and thus requires background and abilities related to the university and student government.

SECRETARY TO THE PRESIDENT

To keep track of the President and his schedule, type his correspondence, handle some Council work. This is a vital co-ordinating and organizing role and again requires abilities and background related to student government.

STUDENT INFORMATION OFFICER

To be in charge of summer drop-in centre for prospective new students and unemployed students in general. To organize group action around student problems during the academic year, such as the OSAP march this year. Again, research on student-related issues is included in the job.

Salary for each position: $95 a week; $10 extra if married; $15 extra for each child.

All applicants must have a genuine interest in working with students. ~~None of these positions are 9-5 jobs; they all call for commitment and~~ willingness to work long hours.

"SAC should have fall vote"

In postponing until next year the request of 2,000 students that a referendum be held to question SAC's participation in the Ontario and Canadian Unions of Students, SAC has emasculated its credibility as an institution responsible to the students of this campus. The issue that the petition raised was very simple: SAC's proposed budget for 1969-70 implied a set of priorities which assumed that students would tolerate support of OUS and CUS while the budgets of certain campus activities were reduced. This assumption may be valid. The petition merely asked that it be questioned.

Why won't it be? It won't because certain SAC members managed to convince the council that the petition was dishonest and irresponsible; dishonest because of my association with the Debating Union and because its first clause was false; irresponsible because it was raised at a time when academic pressure would preclude widespread discussion of its issues.

I want to make several points clear. 1) My motivation in circulating the petition is entirely honourable though totally irrelevant. The only relevant issue is the demand made by students to question the priority given in SAC's 1969-70 budget to continued membership in OUS and CUS. That demand has been ignored.

2) The petition was not circulated under false pretenses. In a letter to The Varsity submitted when the petition began circulating, I stated that the purpose of the petition was to challenge the assumption that the students of this campus "feel it is more important to support student unions than it is for certain student activities... to be maintained at their present level". This assumption was implicit in SAC's budget and explicit in the minutes of SAC's Feb. 12 meeting which records Langdon rejecting a fee increase in favour of "setting priorities". The petition arose to question those priorities. It was advertised and circulated as a legitimate challenge to a vital policy decision which SAC's budget for next year reflects. (No one maintains that it is irresponsible to elect a SAC president and student officers across the campus in the last month of the year).

3) 2,000 students do not agree that it is irresponsible to present this challenge at this time of year. No one maintains that it is irresponsible to elect a SAC president and student officers in the last month of the year. The petition arose in response to a budget. The real irresponsibility lies in debating a $250,000 budget one month before the end of term and in ignoring the request that some of SAC's budget priorities for next year be decided by the student body.

Let there be no mistake about the fact that the central question which the petition raised, the priorities of SAC's budget as reflected in its commitments to OUS and CUS for next year, has been dismissed. By cowering behind a veil of personal abuse and self-righteous indignation, SAC has belied its rhetorical promise to involve students in its policy-making.

more on CUS

I am writing this letter to protest SAC's handling of the petition calling for a referendum on CUS and OUS. In the first test of SAC's proclaimed desire for 'participatory democracy' it has flagrantly ignored the wishes of over 2,000 U of T students. Its reasons for doing so are hypocritical and dictatorial.

The first argument presented by SAC was that this is not the time of the year for referendums, because of lack of a Varsity to clarify the issues, lack of time to debate the question, and lack of interest on the part of students. This problem of communication is easily overcome by pamphlets and a special issue of the Varsity (as was published after the presidential election). Secondly, four weeks remain in term and it is easily possible to organize a referendum within ten days. Finally, March is the month of peak election activity on this campus, when other important issues are debated and decided by ballot.

A second line of defence initiated by Mr. Langdon attacked the wording of the petition, claiming that student activities had not been cut in order to send fees to CUS and OUS. He contended that the wording of the petition was 'a lie'. This is fallacious, for it is obvious from the budget tabled by the Finance Commission that priorities had indeed been set (as they must in any budget), and that CUS and OUS were placed ahead of other campus activities. By delaying the referendum to next fall, SAC has unilaterally decided on CUS and OUS membership for the year 1969-70—the specific question the referendum was to decide.

The petition was circulated at this time in response to SAC's outline of priorities. Had they been determined earlier, the issues raised by the budget and the resulting petition would not have come so close to the year's end. To say that students who attempt to hold a referendum at this time are irresponsible is to misplace criticism. In ignoring this petition, SAC has violated the spirit of its constitution and its rhetorical commitment to the students of this university. Will democracy only be employed when it suits SAC's convenience and prevailing ideological bias?

broken minds

Though I am a member of the Toronto Student Movement, the following reflects no official or unofficial policy of that organization.

So everybody's outraged at a broken computer.

The incompetence of our political structure manifests itself closer to us than Vietnam. Canada's economy is 65 per cent US owned. Over 6 per cent of Canadians are unemployed. Universities are not geared to the solution of unemployment, nor are they geared to the elimination of economic imperialism. They are designed to mold rebellion into rhetoric; vitality into "virtue"; and revolution into repairwork on an absolute economic structure. So is the power of the written word, and the power of armed force. The only force remaining to effect change is the power to attach the controls, the machinery, the computer, the means by which the structure monopolizes power.

When an agency, any agency, states as its purpose the perpetration of the status quo in a politically absurd and therefore very dangerous situation to survival, this agency must be destroyed.

In the February 12 article, "stupid power" at SGW", the writer pointed out several terrible consequences of computer destruction. I've already commented on the value of the computer itself, so what about the animals in the 11th floor psychology dept. that died? These were the guinea pigs of some scientists who place such a low value on life that they, in order to gain knowledge, do not hesitate to hinder and impair the lives of fellow creatures. Which is worse, to kill these animals as an unintentional consequence of an unrelated action, or to systematically and consciously maim them? The rest of the points all mentioned the destruction of some phase of computer clothing.

An action may be classified as "stupid" only when a more effective and constructive action could have supplanted it. We must change the very basis of our political, economic, social, and educational structure, or our own "stupid power" will destroy us.

BORN FREE???

Family backgrounds, religious atmosphere, and social environment are immediate influences on who I am. So often status quo conventions make me feel like an alienated robot in a meaningless mass. Can I really know who I am when I feel so hemmed in, restricted, inhibited, and enslaved by rules, conventions and ideas forced on me merely by chance of birth?

Real freedom is a quality that touches the very ground of our being. It is not just an external quality such as the right to participate in formation of certain political and social decisions but it is also a freedom that drops barriers to communicate, to responsibility, to love, for our fellow man.

We found this freedom and God has shown us the Way in the person of Jesus. If you want to know about this freedom call 741-1448 and we will be happy to talk about it with you. Our barriers are down, are yours.

CUS REFERENDUM HERE NEXT OCTOBER

By BRIAN JOHNSON

A divided Students' Administrative Council decided Wednesday to hold a cross-campus referendum in October to determine whether or not U of T will remain in the Canadian Union of Students and the Ontario Union of Students.

The motion resulted from a petition signed by 2,000 students asking for a CUS/OUS referendum before the SAC joint meeting March 26. The petition was initiated by David Adamson (IV Trin) and Derek Allen (IV Trin).

The petition's preamble read: "Whereas SAC's proposed budget for 1969 cuts certain campus services in order to maintain membership in OUS and CUS; and whereas greater benefits accrue directly to the majority of membership of students on this campus from those services than from SAC's support of OUS and CUS; we, the undersigned, request that SAC hold separate referendums on the questions of SAC's participation in OUS and CUS."

The organizers of the petition demanded the referendum be held in the next few weeks.

At Wednesday's meeting SAC President Steve Langdon condemned this preamble, saying the petition had been "brought up at a very irresponsible time." "The organizers are not really concerned about the CUS-OUS issue. They could have brought it up all winter. Instead they have waited until the budget meeting.

"But membership in those organizations is not a budgetary matter. It's a constitutional matter. If we are members then we have to pay the fees."

CUS and OUS fees total $23,000 a year.

"The people who organized this petition represent narrow interest groups affected by budgetary cuts—Mr. Allen is the President of the U of T Debating Union that was cut."

The UTDU will get no SAC funds next year, compared to $1,500 this year.

"And there is something really dishonest about the wording of this petition. Services were not cut so U of T could remain in CUS and OUS. Cuts were made because of the withdrawal of the Graduate Students' Union from SAC.

"Given all these things," Langdon added, "I'm afraid we're up against the wall."

But in the end Langdon revised his field to urge a referendum later this month.

"If CUS can't know definitely that it will have $20,000 from the U of T at the summer congress, it will fold."

Next year's SAC vice president Bob Barkwell (II Meds) shot back, "I was stunned with the last part of Mr. Langdon's speech, because the initial expose he gave was exactly what I felt. If we are going to have a good debate, holding the referendum in the first month before exams is the best way to avoid it."

Speaking above a din of heckling Derek Allen denied Langdon's charges of dishonesty and said SAC must hold the referendum this term to be democratic. (This year a change in the SAC constitution allows for a referendum on any motion passed or failed in SAC, if a 2,000 name petition is presented.)

Mark Freiman (IV UC) said a referendum this term would produce a low turnout and no debate.

"One thousand voters will decide the fate of a national organization that involves many thousands of students across the country," he added.

SAC voted 11 to 11 on Langdon's amendment to hold the referendum before the joint SAC meeting. The amendment failed.

Bob Rae's unamended motion to accept the petition and hold the referendum in October passed.

The council then passed a motion reaffirming their membership in CUS to give U of T delegates a more solid mandate at the congress.

"Otherwise," Freiman said, "the congress will think we're blackmailing them — 'give us what we want or we'll pull out'."

BISSELL TELLS ATS TEACH-IN

Cutbacks mean no hike

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

A $2.5 million cutback in next year's provincial grant to the University of Toronto will mean no raises for faculty and non-faculty staff next year, President Claude Bissell told over 500 faculty members Tuesday.

Due to a change in the formula for provincial grants, graduate students are no longer counted as full-time students unless they are trimester students, he told the Association of Teaching Staff teach-in in Convocation Hall. The formula, devised in 1966 and supposedly in effect for three years, calculates the size of the grant by considering the "student enrolment weighted in accordance with ... different courses, multiplied by the value assigned to the 'basic income' unit to produce the university's 'basic operation income,' ... students' tuition fees plus provincial government grants." The amount of fees is subtracted from this and "the remainder becomes the amount of the government grant", Dr. Bissell explained.

But "the government uses a median figure and not the actual fees," he added.

Dr. Bissell ruled out the possibility of raising fees or increasing weighted enrolment "at a time when students are asking for smaller classes and more direct contact with their instructors".

Even next year's "addition of 27 new staff will not improve the staff-to-weighted-enrolment ratio", he pointed out. "The ratio will be worsened slightly".

SAC President Steven Langdon, second of the four-man panel to speak, offered student support for the salary requests—especially for junior faculty members and teaching assistants. But he agreed with Dr. Bissell that money was not available without raising fees or increasing student-staff ratio—both of which he considered "not viable". Langdon shifted the responsibility for the lack of finances in education from the university to the government. "We have to talk about the priorities of the university over other financial demands on government," he said. "There is not a very fair balance between private individual needs and collective social needs—and the university is the first to lose out."

E. E. Stewart, Ontario deputy minister of education, said that at present "there is no great groundswell of support for the university". He attempted to shift blame from the provincial government, which, he said, "is putting more money into its universities than any other province, than most states in the U.S. or anywhere in the world." "The university must look at what it is doing for itself," he said. Stewart explained that spreading courses too thinly and keeping courses with very small enrolment is one economic drain.

"The teaching staff themselves must question their contribution and validity and the validity of their research," he said. These last comments were met with groans and grumbings from the audience. Prof. Chuck Hanly, executive vice-chairman of the Ontario Confederation of Faculty Associations, said he "would like to develop a method of involving the province in the financial administration of the university".

He cited figures that showed other post-secondary school institutions like Ryerson and

UTTERLY

Next year The Varsity will follow a policy of complete and utter, it was revealed yesterday.

The reason for this is that a new editor has been duly voted on and appointed.

The news came as a terrible shock to the present editor, Paul MacRae. "I was just getting used to this chair," he said, getting used to his comfortable chair, and warming his hands over a smoking typewriter. "Who is the new editor anyway?"

Just then staff democracy came lumbering in and replied:

"Brian Johnson," it said.

Brian Johnson is a 19-year-old second year English Lang & Lit boy from Islington who was elected editor of The Varsity for next year.

the community colleges received a larger increase in their provincial grant than did the university.

"Sub-professional technical training was supported to fit industry's needs," he said.

"We recognize that the government is in fiscal difficulties—it is the distribution of money that we argue with," he added.

UBC pulls out of CUS

VANCOUVER (CUP) The University of British Columbia voted Wednesday 2946 to 1707 to drop out of the Canadian Union of Students.

The withdrawal leaves CUS with 21 members, 19 less than it had before its annual congress last summer. There are about 70,000 students in the 21 universities that are still members.

Fraser Hodge, incoming UBC student president, believes the withdrawal of UBC's 21,000 students means the death of CUS.

CUS president Peter Warrian said: "I don't think the UBC withdrawal spells the end of CUS: it brings things to a head."

The future of CUS will be decided at a meeting of the union's national council, March 21-23. A working paper from the National Secretariat has suggested that there are three possible courses for the union: a social democratic union, which is essentially reforming what the union is now, a voluntary union of radical students, or a service union similar to what CUS was 10 years ago.

"A lot of people have felt that through smashing or 'moderating' CUS it is possible to stop or redirect the radical student movement in Canada. I think that is mistaken," Warrian said.

"There will continue to be disruptions in universities, alienation of sections of the business community regardless of what CUS does or does not do."

DEADLINE

● Bill Lawson, the friendly vending truck driver in front of Sid Smith, received two summonses from the Metro Police last week.

This brings the total number of summonses he has received to five. The Metro Licensing Commission usually revokes licenses after three convictions.

His case will probably come up after students have left the university for the summer holidays. George Majic, (III Law) expects action from the licensing commission and says that response from the university community will be very helpful in Bill's case. A petition will be posted at Bill Lawson's truck for the remainder of the school year starting Monday. Interested patrons are invited to sign it, giving name and address. Letters to the Metro Licensing Commission, explaining the need for caterers like Bill, are also welcomed.

● The fellow from Personnel was pretty nice guy. The kind you might call affable. He was tall, fortyish. Looked like he might play tennis summer Sundays.

He talked about "ballpark figures" and being "pitched high hard ones" which seems funny at the university, but he was that sort of nice guy.

His desk was in the south-west corner, sparsely and irregularly populated with other desks and other administrators.

He said that after getting out of the air force he started in graduate work in English. But the girl said, "Do you want a wife or a Ph.D.?"

So he quit school and got a wife and a job in Personnel. I like stories with happy endings.

WHO CHOPPED DOWN MY CHERRY TREE?

George Washington was an honest man. When he was a boy he was given a hatchet by his Pa and he chopped down a cherry tree. When his Pa confronted him with the fact he said: "Father, I cannot tell a lie. I did it with my hatchet." ("Well, from now on you'll do it with your concubine, son.")

The only thing wrong with this story is that it is not true. Parson Weems, who lived with the Washington's and later wrote a book about George's life, made it up. In other words, it's a fib.

Undaunted, we asked the same question of Varsity staffers to see how they'd react.

PHIL BINGLEY: With a dazzling display of dexterous axe-handling, Varsity sports editor Phil Bingley, maintaining a hard-hitting, mile-a-minute pace that left his audience gasping, chopped down your cherry tree.

BOB BOSSIN: Damn Johnny Appleseed anyway. His trees are sometimes just too beautiful for this world. Oh wow. Last night I was drunk, or constipated, or something and I needed a little roughage to come down from my high. It was just too beautiful. The cherries, the squirrels and all raining down around my ears. Unreal.

SHERRY BRYDSON: Of course. I had to. Paul never does anything around this apartment. And another thing, if you're suggesting that a woman is too weak for that kind of work . . . well you can just . . . male chauvinist. . .

ERROL YOUNG: Yes. People might have eaten the cherries. We can't have that, you know. Eating cherries makes you healthy. We can't have that you know. When you're healthy you have to go out and work. Oh no. We can't have that, you know.

SUE REISLER: Naaw! I had my hands full, doing a CUP rewrite, and running back and forth between my desk and the Telex. I never get a chance to do anything I want to do, like chopping down a cherry tree.

DAVE FRANK: Did I chop down your cherry tree?

MIKE IGNATIEFF: That's a good question. Really. That's a good, good, good, good question. It's so good you can keep it. Yass. Keep it. Yass, you can have it. Are the checks out yet?

MIKE KESTERTON: Glad you axed me that question.

SUE PERLY: Oh, wow! Did you have a cherry tree? I had one once, but it bit the postman and we had to have it sprayed.

BRIAN JOHNSON: No. Unlike the other candidates, I wasn't grinding an axe.

JIM COWAN: Yes. It refused to give blood.

TIM KOEHLER: Yes. I figures I could spray-paint it, fix it up with a light bulb, a photo-electric cell and a flag and have an automatic, illuminated flag pole that goes on and off when the sun rises, for my cellar.

KASPABS DZEGUZE: What? Get my hands dirty? That's not my idea of ink.

ANNE BOODY: Crumb! Did someone do that? I wonder if that's good or bad for the compus.

MARY-KATE ROWAN: Yes. Hee Hee.

HARRIET KIDECKEL: Whoopee shit, eh? Hell, I wouldn't do anything crude like that.

AGJ LUKACS: Gosh. You're. Being. Silly. I. Just. Wouldn't.

GEOFF MEGGS: Oh wow! It's so real! Such a real cherry tree!

GELUUS: O temporal O mores!

HANK TARVAINEN: Yeah, what about it?

LEN GILDAY: No. I'm review.

LIZ WILLUCK: Himmnnnn? Himmnnnn? Ah. Ah ha. Ooooooh.

MARY BASTEDO: . . . dididowhat? . . . dididoit? . . .

SUE HELWIG: Weel. Actually. What! is the reason of . . . All this — questiang?!. Hahahahaha.

ANGELA SHENG: Oh, sure! Always blame the Jews!

NOEL STECKLEY: There never was any cherry tree. Why do you hate your father? Was your brother older than you or less richer?

ANDY WERNICK: Yuss. The cherries were getting cow-opted into cherry ice cream, a product of Lablaws which supports the American effort to develop a cherry-tree insecticide spray which is resold by the CIA to the Israelis for nerve gas.

HAROLD EKSTEIN: I get the picture. But the answer to that stumps me.

ART MOSES: Ah, forget your damn cherry tree. Have a drink of cherry brandy, fresh this morning.

HELEN FORESTELL: squeak.

BOB RAE: . . . . .

C'MON RAE, DID YOU CHOP DOWN MY GODDAM CHERRY TREE?

BOB RAE: . . . . . no

CAROLYN CAUGHEY: Weally! I didn't chop it down! I chewed it to death.

LOUIS ERUCHMAN: I wouldn't like to commit myself.

PAUL MACRAE: Great idea! Write a story on it. No. Do an editorial on it. Better still write a blurb, write a pic too. (Did I say that?)

ROD MICKLEBURGH: Yes! It was starting at me. Why shouldn't I? And who do you think I am anyway. Of course I didn't chop it down, it was just a tree you know. I'm sorry. I didn't do it again. Awww — who gives a damn anyway? Yes! Not Go away.

LARRY HAIVEN: Ahhhhhh — there are no words, ahhhh I express, my deep apprecshun. But surely. Who am I to say? If the cherry want to free itself down, who am I to chop it? Det's enoff, hey?

MARTY REYTO: Cherries, wow! I can eat bushes of them. I like cherries and peaches. I don't like canteloupe too much. But I like bananas Yum, yum, slurp.

blues for the spring

For the most part, the reissue of blues material has been done by enthusiasts, for small labels, often without access to the original masters, and all too often with poor sound quality. Now finally, Imperial, a major producer of blues records in the '40s, has begun to reissue some of the best of its own material at the instigation and under the guidance of members of the Canned Heat.

The first volume issued in Canada from a four record set, Rural Blues, Vol. 1: Goin' Up the Country (Imperial LM 94000) a well recorded and well selected anthology. Although there is no way of knowing from the title of the album, this is fortunately not an attempt to document a wide range of country blues styles.

The musicians are all from Texas, with the exception of Snooks Eaglin who is from neighbouring Louisiana, and they all play in a style that was developed in Texas in the '40s. As a result, the record has a more unified sound than if the producers had tried to live up to the all-encompassing title.

Three of the artists Nathaniel Terry, Manny Nichols and Country Jim, never had more than a few records, so that a large percentage of their output is represented (in the case of Terry, both sides of his one record are here), Lightning Hopkins and Lil' Son Jackson are the best known artists and three of their selections were never issued before in any form. Also included are Hopkins' first recordings, on which he plays guitar accompaniment to the piano and vocal of Thunder Smith. It was at this session that Sam Hopkins picked up his nickname, so that the two artists could be billed as 'Thunder 'n' Lightnin'.

The record has obviously been compiled with some thought as to what would appeal to collectors, but the quality of the performances is very high. It's a rough music, and it may take some getting used to if you're not familiar with it, but it has a good sound to it.

The 1968 Memphis Country Blues Festival (Sire 97003) is a not too successful attempt to document, once again, some of the remaining active country bluesmen. Two of the artists, Bukka White and Furry Lewis, are very well known to blues fanciers. The other three, Rev. Robert Wilkins, Nathan Beauregard and Joe Callicott, are much less well known. Furry Lewis has done some excellent recording since he was rediscovered some ten years ago, but if his one selection here is a fair indication, he should now end his recording career. Certainly this number should never have been released — the guitar is so badly out of tune it is embarrassing, and Lewis' playing is disjointed. The Bukka White selections are marred through no fault of his own. The mike arrangement while he was playing doesn't seem to have been adequate, so that his voice is much weaker and more distant than it should be. Even worse, he is haunted by a washboard player who is unable to keep time.

By far the best selections on the record are those by Robert Wilkins. He has been improving his playing skills and his voice has mellowed since his blues playing days of forty years ago. He would certainly be far better known if he hadn't given up blues long ago for religious music.

Nathan Beauregard and Joe Callicott provide some interesting moments, but age has caught up with Beauregard and Callicott's songs tend to be a bit aimless.

Turning to somewhat more recent sounds, Chess has issued a new anthology called Heavy Heads, Voyage 2 (Chess 1528). The artists represented are many of the Chess blues greats: Muddy Waters, Little Walter, Sonny Boy Williamson II, Howling Wolf, etc. A large part of this album is a reshuffling of material from a five volume set called The Blues, and much of the rest is from available albums of the various artists. The fact that so much of this was on The Blues isn't very important in Canada, because the set was never available here except as an import. However, if you own many Chess records, check the titles before you get this one. Otherwise, it is an excellent sampler of Chess material and includes some great songs (Little Walter's "Off the Wall" and Wolf's "How Many More Years" to name just a couple).

Raw Blues (London 543). Here are 12 electrically simulated numbers to test your friends blues sense on. There are four songs by Otis Spann, six by John Mayall and two by Jack Dupree. To make things more difficult for those being tested, the accompanying musicians for Spann and Dupree are Clapton, Mayall, etc. If, on the first cut, your friend says that it sounds like Otis Spann, but with a bad bass player and a guitarist who isn't quite up to Muddy Waters, you can quit right there.

There's more good blues sound on the record than might be expected, but the English boys don't even begin to give the Americans competition in the singing department. This could be an interesting album to many people, but looked at strictly for its blues quality, it's a bit uneven.

Suddenly there are three Albert King albums (actually there are four, but who's ever seen the old King album around?). The second one, which was recorded live at the Fillmore, Live Wire/Blues

Power, is still the best. The latest is called King of the Blues Guitar (Atlantic 8213) and it looks as if Atlantic-Stax-Atco are beginning to duplicate Albert King's material the way they did Otis Redding's. Four songs from the first album, Born Under a Bad Sign (Stax 723), including the title song from that album appear here. However, if you don't have the first album, and prefer Albert King in a soul music mode, this is a better album than the first one. For really fine blues guitar, Live Wire is the record to get.

Buddy Guy is a Chicago guitarist in his early 30s who, like Albert King, is definitely benefiting from the resurgence of interest in the blues. Vanguard put out a second album not long ago, This is Buddy Guy (Vanguard 79290) and just a couple of weeks ago, Chess released Left My Blues in San Francisco (Chess 1527).

I don't think there has yet been a satisfactory record by Buddy Guy, but these two are a marked improvement over the first one on Vanguard. The Chess album has somewhat better material — This is Bud- dy Guy suffers from songs like "You Give Me Fever" and the badly overworked "Knock on Wood." On the other hand, the Vanguard record is recorded "live" before a wildly enthusiastic audience and much more attention is paid to Buddy's guitar. It's for the guitar that you listened to Buddy Guy, and on the Chess album, he is relegated too much to just being the shouter. I'd like to hear him record with a small group with just three or four other instruments, but the way the promoters seem to be thinking these days, it may be beyond hope.

Finally, to end this on a note of despair, the people at Cadet Concepts have conceived again. No sooner had they finished surrounding Muddy Waters with electric mud, they turned their attentions to Howling Wolf and came up with an album which seems to be titled This is Howlin' Wolf's new album. He doesn't like it. He didn't like his electric guitar first either (Cadet Concept 319). I don't like it either, and I never had any strong feelings about his electric guitar. This is a somewhat psychedelic remake of 10 of his greatest songs, but Wolf just sounds lost in a musical surrounding he doesn't like. These are great songs, and if you want to hear them, get Chess 1502 which is available here, or spend a little more and get an import copy of Chess 1469 which is his best. Howling Wolf with flutes? Oh well, some of my pop-friends liked Electric Mud, maybe they'll like this one too, and he'll get rich enough so that he can avoid being pushed into another such session — fond hope.

bob bossin on non-verbal communication

As unaccustomed as you are to doing what the Varsity or its intellectual cousin the Review suggests, take five minutes and try the following exercise. The experience will probably say much more about the subject of this review than my words can.

Sit straight, not rigid in a chair.

Close your eyes and follow your thoughts for one minute.

Then let the words go and become aware of how you feel, not how you think you feel or how you'd like to feel, but your actual feelings and sensations as they are in the next minute.

Now shift your attention to your feet and without moving them in any way become conscious of what they are resting on.

Then take 15-20 seconds to feel-experience (rather than think or imagine) the following areas of your body: your feet, each of your toes (without moving them), the top of your feet, your ankles, calves, knees, thighs, buttocks, the chair that is supporting you; your stomach, chest, back, the back of the chair; your shoulders, arms, elbows, forearms, wrists, hands, each of the fingers; your neck, lips, cheeks, nose, eyes, face; forehead, top of the head, back of your head: your entire body. Experience your breathing, the sounds in the room and how you feel right now.

Keeping your eyes closed, let your thoughts wander to a time and place where you felt serene, perhaps a scene in the mountains, or at a cottage. Try and see it, then hear it, experience the way things felt to touch smell; if there was a breeze; the temperature. Then when it is comfortable drift back to the present and open your eyes.

I suppose the next instruction should be to ask yourself how the exercise worked. I feel more relaxed, but then I have been doing things like this off and on since the autumn, usually when I have been invited to speak to a roomful of strangers. It helps to cure my own nervousness as well as their apprehension about what sort of dark angel this student radical is going to be. It only really bombed once, and then it was a sorority. They mainly giggled.

The exercise above was an adaption of the opening pages of Bernard Gunther's Sense Relaxation Below Your Mind, a beautifully laid-out paperback showing a number of techniques for sensory awakening, relaxation and stimulation.

If you are thinking that you don't have much use for such a book, you might be right, but you probably should think again: most university students (myself included) are so tight-assed it is a wonder we can stand.

We sit to discuss, and hardly ever allow our feelings to surface (they are irrational, extraneous). We have little time for our bodies, or the non-"intellectual" aspects of our heads. We haven't got time to experience what is happening around us — in the most immediate sense — for our courses are all outlined in advance and, if you are like me, you have a reading list that stretches into 1976.

Release? Bridge, movies (we watch), organized sports, sex (although the last two are each cut off for some). How many people never touch except in bed, or say "excuse me" if they (we) brush up against someone in the street. (Desmond Morris in The Naked Ape notices from the top of a building the amazing patterns men make as they walk, in order to avoid contact with one another.) If we do somehow begin to notice the present, we think oh my God, I'm stoned.

It is worth quoting again from Gunther, on the way we use these mistreated temples of ours:

Non-verbal communication is: Your posture, facial expressions, voice tone, how close you stand to others, how you listen. . .

The floor is not hard or soft except in relationship; standing against the floor it will be hard against you. For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction. Standing on or in the floor is easy. Knowing this the Japanese sleep on a bare floor.

Pushing eyes see hard and sharp, causing eye-strain, fatigue, eyesolation. . . Forcing in elimination is pushing the shit out of yourself, symbolic of how you treat yourself in other areas.

. . . How you treat-mistreat, deal or relate with all the aspects of the world other reflects your relationship with yourself. The body talks, its message is how you really are not how you think you are. Posture: do you stand up for yourself . . . There are some girls who lack support and are push-overs . . . Look around you at the poker-faced and the hard-headed.

There are people who are tight, hold hack, tight assed. . . Body language is literal. To be depressed is, in fact, to press against yourself. To be elosed off is to hold your muscles rigid against the world. Being open is being soft. Hardness is being up tight, cold separate, giving yourself and other people a hard time. . .

Recognize anyone?

The whole situation is not just rather sad — although that is reason enough for correction — it is dangerous in the effects it has on our individual and social attitudes: if we show so little respect for our own felt needs, how can we be expected to show respect for others (or others for us)? If we aren't together with ourselves, how can we be together with other people?

Small wonder the most characteristic feeling at this university is loneliness. Small wonder Eleanor Rigby and Day in the Life are such powerful songs.

In Education and Ecstasy (see Bossin's Handy Bibliography of Radical Literature on Education), George Leonard approaches The Lord of the Flies from an interesting point of view. Instead of just saying that the original sin premise of the book is wrong (which it is: as Bob Rae said to Paul Fromm when he appeared before CUG, "Nobody believes in that anymore."), Leonard says of course the kids chose Jack over Ralph: because Ralph was a little adult, a bland, wishy-washy, rational, liberal intellectual. Jack was a vicious son of a bitch, but at least alive and inventive. It is a point worth considering.

This classroom castration (see Student as Nigger, The Community of the University) has a negative effect on the learning process itself, something that, for the life of them, university officials can't seem to realize, perhaps because they are so castrated themselves. It is hard to learn when you are tight-assed.

"A university cannot be first rate unless intellect, passion and devotion to one's course are socially acceptable to the student body. . . The impact of the University rouses all the powers of the mind to the fullest activity and stirs up as much mental conflict as possible". So says Northrop Frye. So, what happened here?

What has happened is that the phrase "all the powers of the mind" has not been remembered.

To again quote Frye (about how a serious decision is made): "The emotion bucks and plunges; the imagination throws up one phantasm after another; the memory mutters and gibbers like a chained ape; the intellect urges the most reckless courses of action as the logical ones. . ."

What has happened is, that in our ridiculous concern for memory, and to a lesser extent the intellect, we have succeeded in pretty well killing off the rest of the mental team.

William Schutz book Joy takes off from this point. It is an attempt to revive senses, feeling and self-confidence, so that people can get back on the track of fulfilling their own potential, or so that people can at least start learning again.

The methods are taken mainly from T-group experience. (The "T" is for tivity, as in sensitivity.) Many exercises involve acting out, for example, having two people meet and introduce themselves and their feelings without words, thus forcing them away from the usual chickenshit, to use the technical term. In another instance, the trainer (as the psychologist at a T-group is called) felt his group angry at him for not telling them what to do, as they had come to expect from their usual teachers. Still they would not express it openly, so he suggested they act out their feelings on the paper cups sitting on the table. Several immediately crushed theirs, one drank from his, and another declared that he wanted to "piss in it".

Other techniques involve psycho-drama, wrestling and individual and group fantasizing. The most basic, the hardest and the most rewarding is just to be honestly expressive of what you are thinking and feeling. Try it.

However, let me add what are in one sense a series of warnings, for as Frye points out, real learning — for which you can substitute growth, or change — is disquieting in the extreme. While some T-group enthusiasts (eg. Leonard) hold that it is pure joy, that is disputable. What can be discovered are feelings of hostility, difference; realizations that the way one has defined oneself, the future one has planned for oneself, are really sham. Thus, from the F.U. of T. T-groups alone, people have come back to quit jobs, quit the university, confront parents, break off love affairs.

The alternative, however is not very appealing to me.

And even if hostilities or splits are revealed, as in the paper cup incident, they can be dealt with up front, honestly and co-operatively. If CUG had not rejected the idea of a weekend group, while the final outcome of the commission would have probably been the same, much of the charade that goes on at the meetings could have been avoided.

Gunther's Sense Relaxation, Schutz' Joy and F.U. of T.'s groups are not going to change the world. They can give people a protected opportunity to act responsibly, openly, co-operatively (see The Community of the University).

Again a caution: once you begin to become aware, you begin to be conscious, and that has psychological, social and political implications. For, a human being, conscious of the tribe he belongs to, has responsibilities including countering the dehumanizing forces acting on him and his brothers. And where do these forces come from: again, a caution: you might wake up and find yourself a student radical.

herb hall, old tyme modern

Herb Hall was born in Reserve, Louisiana in 1907 and cut his first feature record in Toronto in 1969.

"When I left New Orleans in 1929 with Don Albert's band, the guys in the band didn't know each other. There were four saxophone players, one trumpeter, a trombonist, a drummer, and a piano player but no bassist. We all got into one of those old Dodges with the top that came down, and we drove to Dallas. We had a gig lined up, but we didn't have any music. Don went downtown on the first afternoon we got into Dallas and bought some music. But we still didn't have any place to practise. Anyway we got a local bass player and another trumpeter and went on the stand."

That was the beginning of a long chapter in Hall's life. After the first trying weeks in Dallas, the band got a job playing in a casino outside San Antonio. The only trouble with playing there, Hall explains, is that you never knew when the Texas Rangers were going to swoop down and padlock the place. Nevertheless, this remained the band's home base for many years. When they weren't looking out for the Rangers, the band went on tours around the state and as far away as Buffalo and New Haven.

Since it was a territory band, Albert's group never achieved national fame like Basie's and Ellington's. However, behind and around the odd effeminate male singers who were featured in those days, some good jazz was played. Hall remained with the band, playing tenor and baritone saxophones until 1940, and if you ever come across some of those rare records made in San Antonio you can hear some fine playing by a young man who had obviously been listening to Harry Carney.

"I first started out on banjo, but I haven't touched one since those early days. In fact I can't stand the instrument and wouldn't even consider playing alongside a banjo player.

"Then I took up clarinet, and later added the saxophone."

"Listen, that man sure could play some beautiful tenor sax, but he ain't touched it in years," commented Mrs. Hall.

After the war, Herb Hall lived in New York and gigged around the city in small bars and clubs for years until he joined Eddie Condon's group in 1957. For the last few years he ran a store out in Jamaica, Queens, occasionally taking time off to play in the band for the Mets at Shea Stadium. It wasn't until the formation of the Jazz Giants that Hall returned to music full time.

The fact that he was the brother of the famous clarinetist Edmond Hall may help to explain why Herb Hall remained in relative obscurity for so long. Yet it is still puzzling, for Herb Hall has a very distinctive style, readily identifiable, and owing very little to his brother's influence. While the elder Hall featured a hot, raspy tone and a constantly hard driving rhythmic feeling, Herb is more subtle and various tonally, and his playing has a more relaxed feeling. He has an exceptionally beautiful sound with a wide range of timbres, from low breathy, but full, tones, to the raspy sound favoured by his brother, to a clear and limpid middle register tone, with many shadings in between. Furthermore, Hall is very melodically inventive, always able to create a fresh new line, never relying on old worn out phrases. And he swings with complete ease — always.

It was his work with the Jazz Giants that brought Hall back into musical focus. A lot of people who had never heard his name before have begun to realize what a fine clarinetist and jazz musician had gone relatively unnoticed for so many years. And so, finally, at the age of 62 years, Herb Hall has made his first record as a leader, for Sackville Records.

He doesn't seem at all bitter that he had to wait so long. For the next week or so, he will be touring around promoting the record, talking to radio and other media people.

"I'm grateful that I have the chance to do this promotion," he said; "it's especially important since this is my first record under my own name, you know."

Old Tyme Modern, the new Sackville release, was made at 10 o'clock on a Monday morning, a time not usually favoured by jazz musicians for recording sessions (or anything else for that matter). Somehow all the musicians showed up, and they must have been feeling good, because the music is fine.

There is no sense of strain; all the musicians are relaxed and together. Yet there is an alertness and attention to detail not often found in productions of this kind. The music is thoughtfully programmed and played consistently well. There are no lulls or weak points.

Although Hall dominates the proceedings through sheer excellence, pianist Claude Hopkins and bassist Arvell Shaw have some fine solos, and are consistently attentive and sensitive in support of Hall's clarinet. Drummer Buzzy Drootin stays in the background, a significant contribution for a drummer these days; he can't be faulted on any count.

Though the tunes are well known, the treatment is fresh. Never does one get that feeling that it's all been heard too often before. In fact the point is that this kind of music is not heard enough. In every respect, from sound quality to jacket design, the new Sackville record is an exemplary production. It's nice to know that some one still cares enough about jazz music to bring Herb Hall to us for the first time — at last.

andy wernick on the s.a.c. elections and the t.s.m.

Who won the SAC presidential elections? One paradoxical answer is the Toronto Student Movement. Election post mortems are all rather crazy. 27 per cent of U of T students voted in the election, or 73 per cent didn't. 12 per cent voted for Abols, or 88 per cent didn't. The SAC Left (Oldham and Barkwell) ran an opportunist campaign — mustn't "alienate" anyone. (How can you alienate the alienated? How can you turn off the turned-off?) Kopyto and Kirzner posed as Socialists. But most of the Left either abstained or voted for Oldham and Barkwell. Factionalism. Boredom.

How did TSM win the elections? By abstaining, partly. The SAC Left (20 people or so) lick their wounds and wonder where to go. Reformists and Left-Liberals (ie, students looking for some regular channels or established structures that might yield some improvement if there were enough student support) have lost, with the Abols victory, a clear and obvious home: commitment to student government.

The Toronto Student Movement is a late and rather frightening arrival on the scene. The Left with its internecine faction fights, and forebidding Marxist rhetoric must lack attraction for students, discontented but "shopping around". Maybe the TSM is frightening because of a different "image" — the one given it by a manipulated establishment Press. You know: Clark-Kerr. — Sir-George-Williams. — violence. "The new radicalism of the far right," the Telegram called it.

What really is the TSM up to? How does it work?

The TSM is a group of left wing students trying to build a base for a student movement off council. We don't think a left-wing council can build a base for itself. People who might be "reached" by such elitist methods are "turned off" by a "representative" council that tries to act as a vanguard.

Our ultimate aim? The social liberation of Canada. A small student movement can't do that. There has to be an alliance of many sectors in Canadian society: students, blue-collar workers, white-collar workers, and technical workers. How do we grow? By working with people to liberate and democratize the institutions in which they live and work.

Our immediate task? To develop a student movement in this university, and to press for changes in the structure and content of our education. Hence our strategy — in so far as we have been able to develop it — has two levels:

1) a departmental fight for an education which is co-determined by educators and educated and which is oriented towards helping the majority of Canadians. This means democratization and a struggle against the present content of education. The need for democratization and anti-authoritarian struggles is understood by most people. But why the attack on content? First, because the education in this university, the "knowledge" dispensed here hinders our understanding of the world. Knowledge is compartmentalized (into disciplines) and theory (abstract contemplation) is divorced from practice (acting in the world). The cultural desert of bourgeois culture makes us narcotic, subjective, mystified.

But this mystification serves the elites who ultimately have control. They don't basically care if students have no integral understanding of the world they live in. After all, the governments and industry require specialists who know their own small area of knowledge very well, and 'integrated' people who don't challenge a job whose creativity is still-born and a productive system which serves to maximize profits but not to satisfy peoples' social needs (as consumers or as producers).

It's the same with research: specialists do research for corporations, for the military, for the government. They help 'solve' problems by isolating them, by patching things up, by corrupting labour, by keeping people quiet.

2) Students can get no structural changes without allies. Hence the TSM promotes the as-yet tenuous links with the blue-collar, white-collar and technical workers.

If you want slogans, we have three lines:

- (1) Democratize the campus.
- (2) Fight the bourgeois content of research and knowledge in the university.

(3) Build a student-worker alliance.

How do we operate? We try to operate democratically. How? By full discussion of all action both before and after; by full discussion of strategy as it develops; by an attempt to fight elitism, manipulation and male chauvinism within our own movement.

We are not 'exclusive', in the sense that we have a clearly defined membership. People learn through experience. The more involved in our activities the people are the more they can affect overall orientation.

We aimed this year to build a compact group which would exist next year — and the year after. We also aimed to establish a political 'presence' on campus.

This summer, we hope to set up an educational program which anyone can participate in, to study and discuss everything from why Russia invaded Czechoslovakia to how women are oppressed in our society.

As Eldridge Cleaver said to a crowd at an election rally last fall: "It's getting time to pull Daddy Karl Marx off the dusty shelves and read him."

IT TOOK MICHAEL WOLFSON AND A COMPUTER

A major area of current research in computer science is in the field of 'picture processing'. This field includes both the analysis and generation of pictures, and is generally referred to as either computer graphics or digital pattern recognition. Recently, many researchers have been employing a linguistic approach. Originally, linguistics dealt with 'natural' languages like English. But with the advent of large scale computers, and the associated development of programming languages, a branch of linguistics has developed that deals with statements or programs of instructions for 'finite state automata' (ie digital computers). However, both natural and programming languages have in common the fact that they are basically sequential patterns. Any given symbol in a string of characters is only in a pattern in relation to the characters on either side of it. Applying linguistic methods, such as the analysis of syntax and semantics, to pictures implies extending current concepts of linguistics from the one-dimensional case of human speech and computer programs to the case of n-dimensional patterns. Implicit in the 'preprocessor' part of a pattern recognition device is some 'data structure' for representing or encoding the pattern which in turn determines, in some sense, the basic elements of a language for communicating picture concepts.

Currently, the 'data structures' used for computerized picture processing may be divided into three basic categories: representational, functional, and probabilistic distributions of 'signs'. The first of these, representational, simply stores a list of points, with X-Y coordinates and some markers to indicate how they should be connected. This method is no different from the 'connect the dots' pictures in childrens coloring books, except that a 'dot' to the computer is a group of three numbers, (X,Y,IC), where X is the horizontal distance from the 'original' to the point, Y is the vertical distance, and IC tells you to move to this point from the last one with either the pen up (so no line is drawn) or with the pen down.

A list of these 'points' comprises a simple line drawing. When the pen moves from point to point, it does so in a straight line. Thus, to draw a curved line that looks at all like a smooth curve, it is necessary to give the computer many closely spaced points. It can be seen, especially in the first picture, of the girl, where the individual points are that make up, for example, her hair lines. The picture of the girl contains about 320 points. These points were obtained by tracing the original picture of the girl onto some graph paper, picking out the basic points in the tracing, and then punching the X-Y coordinates onto computer cards. (The whole process took me about eight hours) A basic difficulty becomes apparent comparing the original to the first computer version, namely, all the texture of the lines is lost by using only simple straight line segments. A certain amount of texture is possible, however, as can be seen with the varying thicknesses of the ellipse (really just octagons) of gradually increasing size with centers along the lines that connect the 'dots' of the 'representation' of the ellipse.

HOURS TO MAKE THESE PICTURES - HERE'S HOW

The transition from the girl in the first picture to the freak in the second was accomplished by the composition of four separate 'functional' transformations. The first of these was to 'interpolate' points in the girl, both to smooth out the curved lines and to uniformly distribute points along the line 'representation'. This task was accomplished by stepping along the points in the girl, 'fitting' arcs of a circle to successive groups of points, wherever possible, and then inserting new points from along the circular arcs.

The next step was to distort her face by finding the distance from the center of the picture to each point, and then changing the point so the new distance would be the 'square' of the original distance, while the direction from the mid-point to the new point remained unchanged. Finally, the distorted freak was 'normalized' so she was a convenient size, and 'moved' so she could be centered on the paper.

In the third picture, the girl has dissolved into a 'distribution of signs'. Instead of playing 'connect the dots', as was done in the first two pictures, each point (dot) has been 'fuzzed' by a specified random distribution, in this case a normal (gaussian) distribution, and then a sign has been drawn, centered on the new randomized point. The idea of 'probabilistic distributions of signs' is that pictures or patterns (gestalts) can be built up from a vocabulary of basic symbols or 'signs' according to a set of specified random descriptions of how they are to be distributed.

In a sense, all of the pictures here are combinations of all three 'data structures'. The first girl is built up from straight lines, which are all from the class of 'signs': straight line segments, and are also simple linear functions. The circles in the first ellipse are also both signs and functional representations. The 'animated' transition from ellipse to rectangle in the second picture is a linear 'function' relating 'representations' of these two basic 'signs'. The computer time used to produce this sequence of pictures cost about ten dollars and it took the Calcomp Plotter about forty-five minutes to draw them.

These pictures represent some initial playing around with the ideas that have just been explained. It is reasonable to predict that these rudimentary ideas of an automated picture language will be expanded, and that the concept of higher dimensional grammars, applied in particular to visual vocabularies, will be exploited by mass media as the next step in the painful birth of the collective planetwide techno-human consciousness.

a.e. housman and bull shit scholarship

I've been biased in A.E. Housman's favour ever since I discovered him during a grade twelve English class.

I remember the encounter precisely. Several of the class were asleep. The majority were learning that, while thousands at His bidding speed o'er land and ocean, they also serve who only stand and wait and show up for detentions on time. I was staring out the window. Then I flipped through Sound and Sense until I found:

Terence, this is stupid stuff:
You eat your victuals fast enough;
There can't be much amiss 'tis clear
To see the way you drink your beer
But oh, good Lord, the verse you make
It gives a chap the helly-ache.
Then the clincher:
And malt does more than Milton can

To justify God's ways to man.

I laughed. Right in the middle of Milton's blindness. Do you find blindness particularly funny, Bossin? No. Well? I was just thinking that Milton might have been better off if he just got drunk. Out, Bossin.

We finally took Housman during that limbo period in the spring. He was introduced to us as a minor poet; that was the first time I had ever heard a minor poet called such, and I felt rather badly for him. It was the same feeling when Gordy Howe passed Rocket Richard's record.

Ultimately, I wrote a long paper on him.

From a superficial reading, Housman sounds like a literarily inclined, but unconvincing Lord Baden-Powell. Of course that is precisely what he was trying to sound like, for Housman had a terrific ability to weave doubts into very positive statements, to negate by underscoring resolve with reservation.

Towns and countries woo together,
Forelands heacon, belfries call;
Never lad that trod on leather
Lived to feast his heart with all.

Up Lad: thews that lie and cumber
Sunlit pallets never thrive;
Morns abed and daylight slumber
Were not meant for man alive.

That is a very worldly-wise scoutmaster, a sort of rural marriage of Polonius and Hamlet.

But since Housman is a minor poet and not even a mainstream minor poet, no-one bothers with him much, for all his careful sadness. This is why it was so pleasant to see in the William and Mary Review (Winter '69), an article called Of Negatives: A Study in Housman by P.J. Budahn. It deserves quoting.

"The question of the significance of Housman's treatment of the negative is easily dispensed with. Of the 104 poems which we are considering, all but twenty-two, possessing 322 lines of verse, have at least one negative; 277 negatives are found in the 1,864 lines of the remaining 82 poems. These figures mean that if there were such a thing as an "average" poem by Housman, it would contain twelve lines of verse and three negatives.

"... In the above five excerpts, there are fifty-three words, only nine of which are not monosyllabic. His inversions of "not" and frequent use of "no" as an adjective circumvent the use of the word "do" and its derivatives which would otherwise be grammatically required. In the midst of lines composed of simple, direct words of Anglo-Saxon origin, a polysyllabic negative can have a powerful effect visually as well as poetically:

They kill and kill and never die;

And I think that each is I.

"... Of the 277 negatives considered by this paper, only one has its correctness suspect:

And home at noonday from the hills

They bring no dearth of daffodils.

Although the grammatical purity of the above excerpt is beyond question, the use of a negative adjective with a noun that has a negative denotation, has, at first reading, the disruptive affect of a double negative."

Fie on you, P. J. Budahn, fie on the William and Mary Review, and, if this is what is defined as "scholarly research", fie on the university.

an un assuming but promiscuous new american review

The New American Review (New American Library)

September of 1967 (remember when) saw the publication of the first issue of The New American Review; subsequently, there have been four more. According to the publishers, it succeeds New World Writing, described as a "paperback literary magazine, relatively mass audience." Relatively mass, I suppose, being the publishers' compromise between literary esotericism, and real literature of the masses, whatever that may be.

"Fiction, essays, poetry". This is the New American Review. But of course it is a Signet paperback, and might be mistaken from some feet away for a new Robert Heinlein Sci-Fi Odyssey. New American Review must feel rather uncomfortable, and a bit of a social climber for sharing the same shelf with Encounter and the New York Review of Books both of which do something of the same thing, but in a much more traditionally acceptable format.

So what of the New American Review? It does look rather lower middle class, doesn't it? But it's homey; no pretension. It's not glossy or newsprinty, but as far as I can see, it does very little less than both Encounter and the New York Review of Books. It certainly seems to have no trouble getting writers. In the first five issues, there are (among many), Conor Cruise O'Brien, Mordecai Richler, Philip Roth, Robert Graves (another classically-inspired poem, unfortunately), John Barth, Staughton Lynd ("Why I decided to become a Historian"), Gunter Grass, Frank Kermode (we're infinging on Encounter's province, this time, Mister Editor), Eric Bentley (a very good article on the Unliberated University. It's in Issue No. 5.) Robert Bly, and others whom I should probably recognize.

The only thing I find unsatis-fying in the New American Review is the poetry. None of it really grabbed me, but then, very little of what is going on in the United States of Heaven (establishment poetry-wise) does. It's very precise and prosaic; no life:

But the prose is generally quite good, and the analytical articles, especially those dealing with the American social apocalypse. Some of them are even politically radical, heaven forbid. Some, like Robert Bentley's piece on the alienation of the middle class, are from a point of view nobody (but nobody) takes these days. I mean, who worries about the middle class?

The New American Review is a comfortable mistress. Encounter is the high-priced courtesan whose lipstick shouldn't be smudged. You can sleep with the New American Review. Watch for it. It's socially promiscuous.

george grant's noble despair: technology and empire

George Grant, Technology and Empire, Anansi, $5.50

George Grant's Lament for a Nation gave him the reputation as the last of Canada's Red Tories. A condemnation of liberalism, Liberalism, and Americanization, it saw John Diefenbaker's defeat in 1963 as the death of Canada's last hope for survival, the end of whatever chance we had to stay out of the American orbit, to stay clear of American values and the homogenized culture.

There was something gallant about that effort, though one could not help feeling that his sentiment was misplaced. Diefenbaker was no more the St. George Grant was looking for than Louis St. Laurent or William Lyon Mackenzie King. Dief ranted and raved about the Americans, but foreign investment did not disappear, our defence agreements were never seriously questioned, the process of cultural imperialism was never even slowed down, let alone stopped. And to lament the demise of the Tory party in Canada as some kind of salvation army was patently absurd.

His latest book, Technology and Empire, is a far more serious and far more important contribution. A collection of essays written between 1963 and 1969, it is subtitled Perspectives on North America, and it is an outstanding attempt to deal with the problem of North American values, and Canada in the American Empire. It also represents a powerful condemnation of the whole technological society and the Cult of Progress.

It is a book written from outside the North American tradition, though Grant is very much a North American. Grant accepts the Weber-Tawney-Hartz thesis about Protestantism and capitalism, and its marriage with Anglo-Saxon liberalism in North America, and is horrified at the result. His is a perpetual battle with sanity; he has clearly rejected the Marxist response to liberalism, and he realizes "the futility of conservatism as a theoretical standpoint in our era." His faith is that of a religious philosopher, a quasi-stoic response, a "noble response" to what he sees as the barren and arid madness of North American technological values.

He is eminently concerned about human values, about reverence, and about what he describes as "nobility", the greatest quality a man can possess.

The essays on "Defence of North America", "Canadian Fate and Imperialism", and "The University Curriculum" are a major and powerful critique of the technological state. Grant can write with great eloquence about what is wrong, indeed what is insane in the human condition. He leaves us with very little hope, and few thoughts on liberation.

The book is profoundly pessimistic: Grant's great and brooding presence dominates the book, a massive seer pointing out the aridity of the mainstream of Western intellectual life since Bacon. He talks about our fate: "By that fate I mean not merely the relations of our massive empire to the rest of the world, but even more the kind of existence which is becoming universal in advanced technological society. What is worth doing in the midst of this barren twilight is the incredibly difficult question."

"Incredibly difficult" yes. Grant leaves us with the impression that the task of "what is worth doing" is virtually impossible.

One is left with a rather grim theological vision of the possibilities of human salvation. Grant's own personal response is "noble", and for that reason one is left with great admiration for the man and his sensitivity. Yet his position is sterile in societal terms. That is why, as he says, conservatism is not a "practical stance". But it would seem to this writer, that "a practical stance" we should be trying to find and maintain.

Grant's pessimism about traditional Marxism is founded on a basic lack of faith in "progress", in the idea that things, whether in liberal or Marxist terms, will always work out for best. This is not a lack of faith in "human nature" a la Hobbes (though there is inevitably a trace of this), but rather stems from the conviction that we have produced a monster we cannot control, that our belief in unlimited research and our own ability to understand and appreciate what science and technology hath wrought, is completely unfounded, and, even more, is the source of the dilemma of twentieth century man. "Control" is the key word: man has, quite simply, allowed science and technology to develop beyond the bounds of human appreciation. The results are institutionalized insanity; the roots are the rapid western belief in mere positivism and liberalism.

Technologies and empires expand of their own making, the cult of expertise and boosterism providing the intellectual justification for the society in which we live. And the culture and life produced is homogenized, Americanized: that is the nature of technology itself. It emanates from the center of the technological empire, America. "As for pluralism, differences in the technological state are able to exist only in private activities; how we eat; how we mate; how we practise ceremonies. Some like pizza, some like steaks, some like girls, some like boys; some like synagogues, some like the mass. But we all do it in churches motels, restaurants indistinguishable from the Atlantic to the Pacific."

It is a brilliant and disturbing book. I question the broader importance of Grant's nobility or the civilized quality of his response: as an individual voice crying in the wilderness it is moving and, indeed, prophetic. But it was never intended to be a tract for practical action, or a primer for social and political liberation, which is both its limitation and the source of its supreme honesty.

"and now the envelope, please..."

Over 200 people beating down the doors of the Church on Glen Morris for the final production of The Visit in February says something for the possibilities of live theatre on this campus. It shows that there's some sort of community alive that will support an exciting slate of dramatic activity.

Now all we need is an exciting slate of dramatic activity.

All in all it was a good year for quantity and a bad one for quality.

Our first category is original production written by a campus author. In this category we have four productions (unless I'm wrong) Phaeton's Birthday by Richard Reoch; Moira by Ron Weihs, Jesus by Hans-Werner Tolle, and The Sisters of Mercy by Graham Jackson. The most entertaining and cleverest was Moira, a West-Side story tale with characters from the Multiversity. The play with the best lines, the worst plot and the funniest camp action was The Sisters of Mercy. Jackson might be a good playwright when he stops writing beyond what seems to be his limited range of experience and gets down to examining himself. Both Jesus and Phaeton's Birthday were greatly flawed, not only in the interpretation and acting, but by the fact that there was very little dramatic unity in either. Both suffered horribly by poor directions.

The next category is serious dramatic production by an outside author. Most of the plays in this category were by recognized authors, and their defects served mainly to point out the poor quality of directing and acting on this campus.

But a few really shone. Principle among these was The Visit, directed by Henry Tarvainen. I can't really comment on it, because I was in it, but from the immense critical acclaim it received, it is reasonable to assume that it was a superior production. Close behind is another Church Studio production of The Just Assassins by Albert Camus, directed by Martin Hunter. It was a very difficult play to direct, but Hunter used his acting area effectively and it was a brisk, cutting performance.

The Fan by Goldoni was a lively and amusing production by the professionals at Hart House. The trouble with The Fan and The Changeling the other, inferior production, was that with the money spent and the time and effort put in, they could not afford to be less than smashing successes. And they were somewhat less than that, mainly because of the Centre's policy of doing lesser known plays.

It seems to me that in order to work, there must be more use of student actors in key roles. Using professionals is good, but only if they can interact with students on some kind of equal basis.

A special honourable mention must go to Howard Cronis' ambitious and almost brilliant interpretation of Jean-Paul Sartre's "Crime Passionelle". It was greatly flawed, mainly because it reminded me of a photograph blown up to many times its size, so that you can't tell the picture for the graininess. But it was so intense and insightful into the philosophy of the author that it blew my mind. Patty Steenberg, a professional actress was superb and Geza Kovacs also gave a deep and piercing characterization of an "intellectual anarchist" who volunteers to kill a party leader about to deal with the enemy. Sartre is one of the greatest suspense writers of the last fifty years. One of his main influences has been the American cops and robbers and Cronis took this aspect and developed it. It was a wild production.

Also a small gem was the Victoria College production of Ionesco's The Bald Soprano, which was a noon-hour play. Most noon-hour plays are too bad to even mention, but this production of the absurdist writers first effort was hilarious and quick-paced, a real pleasure.

Best comical revue on contemporary political and social events is the next category. The winner par excellence is the Interruption and Confrontation of Clark Kerr as performed by Andy Wernick and the Members of the Toronto Student Movement, as directed by Claude Bissell. This little bit of guerilla theatre gave the kind of piercing and immediate social comment that U.C. folies and even Futz cannot give. In contrast with the usual depressing lack of imagination, intelligence and insight shown by most revues, it was a breath of fresh air, dealing with issues, however subtle, that are really at the heart of what's going on right now, not some anachronistic morality about a girl bearing her breasts, but the disturbing meance of liberal scholarship and what it does to people's heads.

I must admit that I'm not qualified to write on the next category, "Musicals performed by eager nubile young girls and eroaky voiced males, directed by hard-working people with no talent". I just don't dig the stuff. The only one I saw was Stop the World, I Want to Get Off, on which I cleverly avoided writing a review. The only musical that I ever really liked was The Fantastics the most charming, unpretentious and warm piece of musical theatre I've ever seen, which explains why I didn't go to see either of the two productions of it on campus this year.

About city theatre, there was again lot of quantity but not much quality. I thought the best production was Rosencrantz and Guidenstern Are Dead, which played here in January. Second was Work- shop Productions Good Soldier Schweik. Black Comedy done by Trio Productions back in September was athletically and dexterously done, a fine example of slapstick revived. Charlie Dennis' trio of one act plays, Everyone Except Mr. Fontana was cynical and amusing, digging into the ribs of neurotic society, sometimes hitting at very tender spots.

The worst production this year was Barefoot in the Park, at the Royal Alex during the summer. It was so totally embarrassing that for the first time I felt like throwing tomatoes. Now that I think back, I believe it would have been a good idea. I didn't go to see Edward II Theatre Toronto, but I am advised by agents that it is best included among the worst.

Throughout the year, I have followed the policy of not bothering with reviews of musicals playing professional theatres, because I figure reviewing them is fruitless, since people don't go to them except for pure entertainment, and no reviewer showed a sufficient interest in reviewing musicals for their own sake.

Some of the best theatre, however, comes our way during the summer. Last summer I travelled Ontario in Gray Coach buses, seeing different festivals, all of which provided very interesting insights. The Shaw Festival was the most exciting. The production of Heartbreak House, though oppressively boring at time, was lavishly and seriously done and quite effective as a whole. The real success was an absolutely uproarious production of The Chemmy Circle by Georges Fedeau. Directed and performed in by Paxton Whitehead, it convinced me that this actor is one of the most creative theatre people in Canada today. His portrayal of a stuttering, bumbling Frenchman was a real triumph.

The Kawartha Festival in Lindsay, which produced multi-media productions of Len Peterson's original play Black Winter and Tennessee Williams' Glass Menagerie was a fantastic lesson in the failure of high hopes. Even now people refuse to talk about it or shrug it off with a disappointed laugh.

Deep in the heart of outland Ontario lies a small town near Bowmanville, called Newcastle. In the town hall, the first youth theatre festival in North America started last year with productions of Billy Budd and A Man for All Seasons. They got very good reviews from the critics and hopes are high for this summer. If you're at all interested and are under 25 or so, drop them a line, the "Great Pine Ridge Drama Festival, Newcastle Ontario" (I think).

That just about wraps it up for this year. Yes friends, when you feel down and out, take fifty dollars and blow it on an expensive evening at the theatre. It's guaranteed to make you feel gouged. Or do it in the road yourself. It's good for the soul. See y'all next year. (God, how sentimental can you get?)

FILM CANADA

If the National Film Board films are so good, why don't Canadians see them? Oh sure, there are film councils across the country and there are film libraries, but how often do we see NFB films in commercial theatres? It seems that only by decentralizing its distribution to world markets, namely the USA, can we folks, who finance the efforts, ever get to enjoy the quality fruits of the NFB.

From the beginning, the documentary movement became the chief means of expression for Canadian filmmakers. The NFB achieved world-wide fame as a result of its quality documentaries. By 1940 the NFB had a staff of 10. The war years gave the agency its big boost. It was during the period 1939-45 that the NFB produced its "War News" and "Les Reportages". By April, 1945 the staff had grown to 739.

Since 1939 then, the NFB has been primarily an information agency of the government. A department in the government had a program it wanted the public to be aware of, it asked the NFB to make a film. Then the film-makers produced it, distributors distributed it, and that was that. What the film communicated to whom was generally an unasked and unanswered question. Self-expression over personal issues and feeling was difficult. It rarely tackled contentious issues, simply because as a government agency it couldn't present the government in a poor light. Unlike the CBC which is a Crown Corporation, the NFB is a government department with a Commissioner who must answer to Parliament. For a long time Canada was presented as a land of farmers and fishermen. There was also a tricky constitutional problem of Federal interference in provincial affairs even in the presentation of provincial problems by Federal authorities.

In 1950 a new National Film Act was passed which asked the NFB to produce "films designed to interpret Canada to Canadians and to other nations" and to "research film activity for use of persons engaged in film production." Such is the wording of the act that there emerged a great opportunity for increased dimension in the film making field. Nearly 20 years later the NFB is still groping for a purpose.

The NFB prides itself on being an innovator of new cinema techniques. It yearns to be the recorder of the nation's day to day evolution. To young film makers, the NFB is still a great place to learn film making. The latest probe in an attempt to make NFB films more meaningful is the ambitious "Challenge for Change" programme which is designed to promote new ideas and provoke social change. Still shying away from social criticism as a blunt method of using the awesome power of film, the NFB has chosen specific social purpose films.

The new concept of "film power" according to Bill Nemitin a 25 year-old Torontonionian, and co-ordinator of the programme involves "films that will be used increasingly by deprived groups and communities to understand their own problems, communicate them to other people and finally as a means of exploring possible solutions." All that sounds very McLuhanesque, in fact the programme is designed to educate by involvement, by the process of discovery. It is a response to the lack of participation or recognition that is allowed Canadians. Film excels in communicating emotions.

So far projects have included Negro unrest in Halifax, Indians filming their own problems, a social action film on the depressed region of St. Jerome, Quebec, and the Fogo Island project in Newfoundland. In most cases a film crew moves into the community and films their day to day lives, their complaints, fears and hopes. Later the completed film is shown to the group depicted. By participation in the film activities the project is supposed to generate group action, to seek new solutions. The film is then shown to government officials, professional or civic groups, in fact anyone who can contribute to a solution of the problem. So far the results of the projects have met with fair success, to the extent that film has been discovered as a definite way to improve communications and create greater understanding.

norman mclaren. in love with film, compelled by it and wrenched by its demands upon him

I imagine a secret fantasy whenever I think of Norman McLaren. He becomes child Dylan Thomas, who happened to meet Rimbaud's Genie, and was captured and transformed by the Genie's magic into a beautiful imagination, of colours, motion, and ideas.

Whenever those who know McLaren speak of him, they mention his "genius", his "complexity", his "humanitarianism", and "his modesty", and I am always struck by the warmth and respect in which he is held. In many ways, McLaren doesn't seem real, and yet, as Alexandre Alexeieff said, "Behind the patience, the modesty, the gentleness of McLaren, there must lurk an aggressive ambition, one which has been wilfully and solely directed towards the exploration of the transmental."

Certainly his love affair with film has endured through time (37 of his 55 years), has retained its paramount fascination, and affected his life style.

Although he enjoys the "directness", the "closeness and intimacy that exists between the painter and his canvas", film was and still is McLaren's first and most consuming interest. "I never got my diploma from the Glasgow Art school because I cut my painting and sculpture classes. I was too busy making films on the side." Although he finds that film-making has lost some of the excitement and freshness that it formerly held, McLaren says "I start having new ideas long before I'm finished making a film. But still, I can't resist. There are still so many things that haven't been tried."

André Martin says that McLaren has "touched cinema"; he credits him with the invention of a second method of constructing a film; second, that is, to Griffith's method. He says that, thanks to McLaren, "it is no longer necessary for everything to take place on the screen or during filming."

McLaren is most often associated with the "camerless technique", that is, drawing or painting directly onto 35 mm. negative film with waterproof inks, acetate paints and felt pens. He has achieved various effects by using straight pens, brushes, razor blades, stippling, scratching off the paint, spraying, pressing cloths of various textures into the paint while it is still wet; in other words "everything that imagination and accident could suggest."

In 1946, he employed the "pastel" technique in his film "La Haut sur ces montagnes." This process involves filming frame by frame each change which a painting undergoes from its conception to its conclusion. It switches "the focus point of all the effort from the end condition and spreads it over the whole process."

McLaren is also credited with the live-actor "pixillation" technique. His most famous film, considered by some as his best, employed this technique — "Neighbours", which won him eight awards. "Neighbours" is one of McLaren's few political "message" films. The story involves two men — Jean Paul Ladouceur and Grant Munro who fight over the possession of a flower. In the ensuing battle, the two men destroy everything that is near and dear to them, including eventually, the flower. McLaren made "Neighbours" after returning from a year spent in eastern China working for UNESCO. The impact of the Korean War was still fresh in his mind, and brought back memories of days when he worked as a cameraman during the Spanish Civil War for a Red Cross film. "Neighbours" was the result.

McLaren's "militant philosophy", to try and preserve in his relationship with film "the same closeness and intimacy that exists between a painter and his canvas", is his attempt to eliminate the "ill feeling and hostility which film technology creates between the artist and his finished work."

This concern with keeping his films a one-man operation has resulted in his use of "synthetic" sound, that is, directly drawing onto the film the sound track. This process is insanely painstaking and time consuming — it involves drawing 50 to 60 lines for each note, varying the colour of the ink, the shape of the lines, and the thickness of the strokes to control the pitch of the note. However, McLaren feels that synthetic sound "as a rhythmic instrument is definitely superior to most of the traditional instruments, in the subtlety, the speed, and the complexity of rhythms which it can make."

McLaren's fascination with space has resulted in his development of the stereographic animation technique which creates the illusion of three films "Now is the Time" and "Around is Around" are the only such films ever made. Stereoscopic painting is the only interest he has ever thought of giving up film-making for.

There is something Sisyphian about McLaren's work, something old-world in the guild-craft tradition. In romanticized moments, I have sad little images of McLaren, in his cubbyhole office, earning a civil servant's salary of $9,000 to $12,000 ruining his eyesight, to produce a five minute film every ten months. Five short minutes into which have gone over 7,000 drawings, thousands of lines to create the synthetic sound track, and months spent at the editing bench. (80% of his time is spent in the editing of his films.)

And yet, McLaren is no "absurd" hero. He has received more film awards than any other film-maker (66 in the last 15 years); his films have been seen in over 53 countries, and although he is a film-maker's film-maker, his admirers are not limited to the small art-house crowd. He has invented new methods of film-making, created for us moments of exquisite beauty, and enlarged our perceptions — both visual and aural. In many respects, one can feel that McLaren is a fortunate artist in that he is permitted all the freedom which he desires, has received critical acclaim for his work, and has the time and facilities to work out the problems which he sets for himself.

And yet, one questions this rosy phantom. McLaren's paintings and etchings reveal another person, a man in whom frustration, pain and loneliness predominate. One wonders if film-making isn't as much a solace as a compulsion which forces him to work even when mentally depressed and physically ill. (McLaren's heart condition has forced him to cut his working hours from 15 to 8.) As Alexeieff said, "The day Norman removed his spectacles to wipe them, his sprightly mask gave way to eyes that were stern and as deep as wounds; the strain he puts on them condemns him to a constant suffering — the same that Andersen's Siren had to endure for each one of her steps."

SAC BUDGETS

The Students' Administrative Council Wednesday night, passed Finance Commissioner Bob Barkwell's airtight $250,000 budget for 1969-70 after further tightening that resulted from the loss of $13,000 income from the graduate student withdrawal from SAC which takes effect next year.

Under Cultural Affairs, the Blue and White was slashed from this year's $5,200 to $1,500.

Four student activist candidates swept to victory at St. Michael's College in yesterday's SAC elections, shutting out Paul Fromm (III SMC) and two other "anit-student radicalism" candidates.

Elected were Greg Kealey (III SMC) with 511 votes, Mike Marino (I SMC) with 472 votes, Tom Mathien (III SMC) with 389 votes and Anne Maurer (II SMC) with 386.

Fromm went down to defeat with only 232 votes. Matthew Stickman (I SMC) with 90 votes and Larry Stickman (II SMC) with 80 votes, who ran on a slate with Fromm, were also defeated, Harry Jaffe (III SMC) scored 211 votes.

A jubilant Alberto Di Giovanni, current SAC rep from St. Mike's decalred: "I am very proud of St. Michael's College again."

Ted McGee (III SMC) was voted in as Men's Vice President.

Pollution Probe will hold its first informal gathering Monday night at 7:30 p.m. in the student common room in the basement of Ramsey Wight (underneath the lecture theatres). Persons wishing to get committees underway should come in order to recruit prospective members.

The U of T Chorus was cut to $1,500 from $5,015.

Special cultural programs were raised from $1,250 to $2,500.

The Varsity Downtown Educational Project grant was increased from $2,750 to $5,000.

Harvard and Tarheel University exchanges received $1,000 between them, half of last year's grant.

The World University Services Committee was cut from $4,050 to $3,550. Conferences were cut by $500 to $600.

Outside donations and grants were cut to $5,600 as compared to $8,100 this year.

Radio Varsity received $15,410, a $500 increase from this year.

Increased printing costs raised The Varsity grant from this year's figure of $28,000 to $32,000 for next year.

Random magazine was raised from $3,842 this year to $4,548 next year.

Expenses for the Canadian Union of Students and the Ontario Union of Students were cut by $2,000.

The Debating Union lost its total grant of $1,500.

Course evaluations were cut entirely, previously a sum of $6,391. Course unions received $13,250, a $1,000 drop from this year.

Johnny-on-the-campus

By MIKE KESTERTON

"Why do students and staff have separate washrooms at this university?" I asked Simcoe Hall last month, giving voice to a problem that has been preying on my editor's mind for months.

"We don't know," came the prompt reply.

Not content to let the matter drop, I went into the john issue further.

For one thing, Scarborough and Erindale have washrooms marked "Men" and "Women" only. The policy of segregating facilities seems confined to the St. George campus. Staff and administration approached seemed vague about the reasons.

"It's to prevent student-faculty dating."

"Professors often discuss exam questions, and so on, and we don't want anything to leak out at an unguarded moment."

"Professors have to attend lectures on time. They can't wait around."

HAIVEN'S HAVEN

Still not satisfied, I employed the services of two Varsity staffers. One, Larry Haiven, who worked in the Medicine Faculty this summer, told me the following story:

"There aren't many students who have had the privilege of using a staff washroom all summer. However, being a member of the Department of Anatomy, I was accorded this enormous privilege for all of May, June, July and August.

"When I first started my job in May, I would puff my way up to the fourth-floor students' washroom. Many times, I stood cross-legged as I waited for the single stall to be free. I knew full well that the staff washroom on the second floor had two stalls, which were hardly ever used.

"One day, as I raced past the staff washroom, I knew I would never make it to the fourth floor. The turmoil seethed inside of me. Quick! I had to make my decision. I ran inside and finished the deed. Carefully I cleaned the traces. I was just about to leave when I heard footsteps.

"Quickly I dashed into the stall and slammed the door. There I sat for an hour, afraid to leave, lest I be spotted by a member of the staff. It was in that hour that I noticed the washroom and the wonderful things therein.

"There was nothing different. As a matter of fact, it was not any nicer than the student washroom. I was disappointed.

"The next day, I humbly asked my employer whether, I being a member of the staff, I could use the washroom. 'M'boy,' he said, 'M'boy, you can use it whenever you desire to.' And so I did.

"But after a month of availing myself of the facilities therein, I began to feel guilty. Would I, when I returned as a student in September, have to use the student washroom again? Of course.

It would look pretty silly if I went into the staff washroom and then had to explain that, well, you see, I used to work here. No, it wouldn't work. Both the staff and I would be embarrassed.

"So I had to make a decision. Should I continue to use the staff washroom now that my conscience said 'no'? Could I ever use the student washroom again once I had tasted the illicit pleasures of the staff washroom? Oh, the dilemma!

"From then on, I used the washroom in the Sig Sam Library, and I was pleased. Running out in the rain wasn't much fun, though!"

INFILTRATION

Larry's account was all right in its way, but it left out of consideration what staff members talked about in washrooms. Accordingly, I dispatched a graduate student, Jack Hopper, to infiltrate. Here is his report:

"First case. Stationed in cubicle. Hear footsteps. Knocking on the door. 'C'mon fella, it's my laundry hour!' Obligated to leave.

"Second case. Sidney Smith. Overheard the following conversation:

'Hey, George, has that shipment of cathode ray tubes arrived yet?'

'Hell no. When does anything this goddam university order arrive on time?'

'Look, you think you've got troubles. I tried to get my secretary to get me a new waste paper basket four months ago. Do you think they would give her one? The poor kid would still be waiting if I hadn't stolen one from down the hall.'

'You know, I had more trouble getting $25 for a throat microphone for my lectures than I had getting my research grant.'

'I believe you.'

Historically, U of T has been primitive in regard to its washroom facilities. Outdoor conveniences (located where the back campus of U.C. now stands) were used until the 1880's when the first University College washroom was built. It was an architectural wonder (see photos).

The washroom brought some early international recognition to our university, long before we had Marshall McLuhan. It had a skylight, oak panelling and urinals as big as telephone booths. Our ancestors were giants in many ways.

The entry of coeds to U of T was delayed for a year because we had no washrooms for them. A suggestion to use integrated washrooms for a while was laughed out of existence — after all, Sweden has integrated washrooms and it has the highest suicide rate in the world.

Historically, mankind has varied a great deal in its attitudes to sanitary operations. In the time of Louis XIV in France kings, princes and even generals treated the john as a throne at which audiences could be granted. Johns were constructed by Sheraton, Hepplewhite and other master furniture designers.

But other ages have regarded elimination with shame. In medieval castles, toilet facilities were built high up in towers and turrets, to elevate oneself close to heaven to counteract the baseness of the act, with chutes built into the walls and emptying into the surrounding moats.

MEDIEVAL WASHROOMS

It is from the medieval period that we have taken our washroom legacy. Although waterflush systems were known to the Minoans in the time of King Midas, it is only in the past hundred years that we have graduated from the privy. No Sheraton designs our fixtures. If you are lucky, you may find the address of an American company that will sell you a gilded eagle to stick on the seat, if your taste runs to Americana. Eaton's will sell you a rhinestone-studded seat, if you're willing to risk the discomfort.

The washroom today is virtually the same in design and construction as the washroom of 40 years ago, despite rapid advances in other areas of architecture. Look at the photos of the U.C. john, built before the turn of the century; except for its sumptuousness it is almost indistinguishable from a john of today. Only recently was Cornell University given a $100,000 grant to study washroom fixtures with scientific precision.

I mention this because I think that the washroom, by its very nature, is a reactionary structure. It preserves old-fashioned class structures by segregating students and staff. Psychologically, a man loses his dignity when he drops his trousers. He becomes human. If a bureaucrat intimidates you, try to imagine him at stool.

The separate washroom is the most manifest symbol of oppression at our university, a symbol of the undergraduates' degraded status.

In other parts of the world the signs on our washroom doors would read "Whites Only" and "Coloreds Only."

Over 70 per cent of the students in the Faculty of Music Undergraduate Association turned out to vote for their new executive last Monday.

Ted Groat (III Mus. Ed.) was voted president by a very small majority, defeating Theodore Gentry (I Parlourance).

Others elected were Vice President — Ruth Marston (II Mus. Ed.), Treasurer — Dan Stephens (II Mus. Ed.), Secretary — Margaret Benson (II Mus. Ed.), Barry Easton (II Mus.) was acclaimed SAC representative.

Next year as part of the 50th anniversary celebration of Hart House, a three day interdisciplinary conference on education will be held. Faculty and student representatives will take part in "think tank" sessions on the general topic of education. The conference is being designed as a small and hopefully far ranging series of speculative discussions.

The 25 student participants will be selected on the basis of a series of interviews, which will be conducted at the start of the 1969-70 academic year. Any under graduate or graduate students interested in participating in the conference are requested to write: Interdisciplinary Conference, Hart House, attention, Bob Hoke or phone 928-2517

An ecumenical organization, the Christian Movement for Peace (CMP), has been set up to promote world peace and to help eliminate bias and "all forms of oppression."

The organization sponsors study groups and exchanges, as well as multinational work camps. These camps are held in the U.S., Canada, and several European countries.

Volunteers, mostly students and young teachers, receive free food, lodgings and insurance while at the camps. Arrangements can be made through the organization for transportation to and from the camps.

The movement is supported on campus by such prominent people as Communications expert Marshall McLuhan, Rev. William Fennell, professor of theology at Emmanuel College, and Rev. Arthur Gibson, professor of theology at St. Michael's College.

Varsity team was composed of Stratten. Ross Ballantyne, Heatley and Terry Bryon. McGill University took the 400 yard freestyle relay as they broke another Canadian record with a time of 3:31.8. Blues swimmers Stratten, Chris Fisher, Mike Guinness and Van Ryn came second in 3:22.31 as they also bettered the former record.

Toronto's team showed plenty of depth in other events. Bryon placed second and third in the 400 yard individual medley and the 200 yard butterfly respectively. Guinness was second in the 200 yard freestyle and third in the 500 yard freestyle. He also finished seventh in the 100 yard freestyle.

Ballantyne was fourth in the 100 yard breaststroke and eighth in the 200 yard breaststroke. Barry Bowerman captured two sixth places in the 100 yard and 200 yard breaststroke events. Fisher placed eight in the 50 yard freestyle.

At the conclusion of the meet, Stratten was voted "swimmer of the year" and joined Van Ryn, Ballantyne, Bryon and Guinness on the select list of "All Canadian Swimmers".

It was a big year for Blues and coach Robin Campbell. Campbell will lose Stratten and Fisher to graduation in the spring but will have a strong team next year. Stratten will become the new coach of the Etobicoke Aquatic Club.

HOCKEY BLUES BEST IN LAND

By PHIL BINGLEY

EDMONTON. Varsity Blues are the best college hockey team in the Dominion of Canada. Fact, Blues proved that point beyond a reasonable doubt here last week-end when they won the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union Championship with consecutive victories over Laurentian Voyageurs, Alberta Golden Bears and Sir George Williams Georgians.

made the all-star team at right wing, and Adrian Watson won the dream team goaler award. But these players did not do it all by themselves or even try to.

Success was possible because 17 players pulled together, forgot about goals and awards and sought only final victory.

Tom Little, the rangy goaler who turned in so many fine games during the season to get Blues into this tournament, sat with heavy body-checking and their ploy almost worked.

Monteith won the game with his three second period markers while Wright and Len Burman did the groundwork on each scoring play.

Alberta caught up with Blues late in the third period with two quick goals but didn't have the tying tally in their bag of tricks. The game ended with the Alberta goaler on the bench and the play at centre ice.

It was in the final contest

Blues' Terry Parsons (18) moves puck out of his own end while Steve Monteith (19) prepares to break an right wing. Action took place during Varsity's 3-2 over Alberta on Saturday afternoon. Harvey Paan (19) and Bill Clark (10) are Alberta forecheckers.

Blues capped their climb to supremacy sans fanfare on or off the ice. There were no displays of overpowering shinny dominance, no scoring marks set, no astronomical scores recorded. They simply did a job on each of their three opponents one by one.

By the start of the last game, there wasn't a Toronto player left who didn't wish that the tournament was over, the title won and a plane waiting to take them back home. They were tired, hurting and probably sick of hockey. But they sucked up reserves of energy from some unknown pool of go-power, skated out against a rested Sir George team and beat them.

John Wright was selected as the most valuable player and all-star centre, Steve Monteith scored all three goals in Saturday's win over Alberta and on the bench throughout the three games simply because Watson was on a hot streak. And when the hockey was over and the team sat in the dressing room changing and showering, Tom swallowed his own personal disappointment and told of the sadness he felt as he sat and watched Monteith, Bob McClelland, Jim Miles, Ward Passi and Gord Cunningham taking their final shifts in Varsity uniforms.

In the games themselves, Blues spurred ahead of Laurentian 5-0 by the end of the second period and then held on to win 6-3. Bob McClelland with two goals and Monteith, Wright, Dave Field and Mike Boland with singles were the scorers.

The Alberta game as expected was the key game and the most exciting to boot. Bears tried to run Varsity into the ice that Blues came up with their piece de resistance. They didn't play great hockey but they hustled, scored four goals and made them stand up. McClelland scored late in the first frame, Wright connected on pretty, individual plays in the second and third, and Burman sandwiched in the winner midway through the final period.

Victory marked the first time that any school had won the CIAU title three times. Blues shared the honor of twin titles with Alberta before the tournament started.

Looking ahead, at least the five members mentioned above will be gone by next season and a couple of others may turn their skates in before then. In short the future is uncertain.

But this year has been great. Amen.

SWIMMERS COP 4th STRAIGHT CROWN

Eleven records fell at the University of New Brunswick last Saturday as Varsity Blues captured their fourth straight Canadian College Swimming championship.

The Toronto swimmers collected 250 points to take first place followed closely by McGill with 244 and Sir George Williams with 214.

As expected, Gaye Stratten and Theo Van Ryn led the way for Blues capturing two firsts each in their events. Stratten broke his own CIAU record of 2:04.8 in the 200 yard backstroke setting a time of 2:03.97. He also took the 100 yard backstroke in 56:58 just over the old record of 56.5 which he set last year. Gaye also swam on the 400 yard freestyle relay winning team and on the 400 yard medley relay team which placed second to McGill in record time.

Van Ryn lowered his own CIAU record of 49.2 in the 100 yard freestyle with a time of 48.99. In the 50 yard freestyle, Van Ryn stroked to victory in 22.08, just short of his 21.9 CIAU record which he set two years ago. Theo also finished eighth in the 100 yard backstroke and swam on the 400 yard freestyle relay team.

Bob Heatley broke Stratten's 100 yard butterfly record of 55.7 posting a new CIAU time of 53.87. Heatley placed seventh in the 200 yard backstroke and ninth in the 200 yard butterfly.

Blues' 400 yard medley relay team set a new Canadian Open record with a time of 3:46.58. This eclipsed the old mark of 3:48.4 held by the University Settlement Aquatic Club. The

THANK-YOU ET AL

By PHIL BINGLEY

VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

It has become ritual in the past for the head dummy of this sport's department to sit down on the night of the last edition and review the athletic happenings of the past season. And, after five years at this the best university in Canada and the same stretch of confinement with this newsheet, there are many things upon which I would like to expound.

But the shortage of space on these pages (and this has unfortunately been the case all year) prevents such a poetic pouring out and thus the words of praise and thank-yous due so many deserving individuals and groups on this campus must be brief.

In no particular order, my hat goes off with many thanks to the following:

Each of the coaches, athletes, trainers and managers who were involved in intercollegiate sports. They've all provided us with excellent entertainment and brought many honors to this school.

Athletic Director Warren Stevens, Director of intermural athletics J. McCutcheon, Miss Lea, Miss Boyd and their staffs. Their organizational efforts have helped make U of T the most successful university in Canadian sports.

Fellow sportsies Rod Mickleburgh, Jim Cowan, Gellius, Jim Morrison, Bill Nepotiuik, Jim Kalman, Rich Pyne, Astris Liepa, John Cameron, Paul Vesa, Dave Powell, Art Stein, Dave Frank, Mike Kesterton, Paul Henry, Rowland Griffin and all the photographers who have contributed to this paper. All gave unselfishly of their time and ideas in an effort to make our coverage interesting and complete.

The loyal fans who turned out to support Blues in every sport. Attendance at Varsity home football and hockey games was unmatched by any other student body in the country.

The few understanding people who read our pages each issue without ripping them up in disgust or using them to wrap garbage in.

Finally I would like to thank my parents who made my presence at the Varsity possible and my landlord, grocer and barber who made it all necessary.

NOTES . . . Professor J. McCutcheon, director of interfaculty athletics, has been awarded the Loudon Trophy. The Loudon is given annually to the person at U of T (either a student or a member of the staff) who by the decision of the Athletic Directorate is deserving by reason of outstanding services in the promotion and advancement of athletics at the university during the current year . . . Swimming Blue Gaye Stratten has won the Biggs Trophy which is presented annually by the family of the late Dr. G.M. Biggs, Meds '04 and awarded to the undergraduate who has contributed most to university athletics from the standpoint of leadership, sportsmanship and performance . . . Defenceman Bill L'Heureux and forwards Paul Laurent (for the fourth year in a row), Ward Passi and Steve Monteith were selected to the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League first all-star team. Goaler Adrian Watson and winger Gord Cunningham were voted to the second team . . . The winners of the election for the 1969-70 Athletic Directorate have been announced. Don Karn (III Vic), Terry Bryon (II pre-Meds), Mike Killoran (I Spec.), Mark Slater (III PHE) and Peter Adamson (IV Trinity) will serve on next year's directorate . . . Bruce Dempster was chosen to the SIBL all-star team.
