The Vietnam Mobilization Committee decided at a meeting Thursday night by a unanimous vote to proceed with the Yonge St. march despite the fact that the police had denied us a permit. This decision was conveyed to the press at a press conference Friday morning and was carried by them the same day. At the rally itself hundreds of sheets were handed out explaining that the march had no permit but that we were going to go ahead anyway to test the determination of the police. This was also announced many times over our sound system before the march. So much for the conspiracy theory of this odd collection of falsifiers.

Did the leaders of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee consciously attempt to provoke the police. Who's side are you on gentlemen! Do you or do you not agree that we have the right to march on Yonge St. as many other groups can? Do you not believe that it is crucial for the anti-war movement to have the basic rights of free speech and free assembly before it can effectively reach the people of this country? Do you really believe that peaceful marchers trying to exercise their rights as explained to them by the Civil Liberties Association are provocateurs? Just who's side are you on?

It was the police who mobilized hundreds to attack a peaceful protest. It was the police who had scores of horses, tons of motor cycles, tear gas, hundreds of men on foot, clubs, plastic body shields and paddy wagons. It was the police who terrorized stores all down Yonge St. to close. The Vietnam Mobilization Committee march merely attempted to exercise its civil rights. When this proved impossible in the face of massive police violence the VMC leaders drew back and continued on to the City Hall.

HAGGART SUPPORT

Ron Haggart in the Telegram puts the case very well: "This entirely undemocratic commission (the Police Commission), answerable to no one but itself, has written a so-called law which dictates who may march on Yonge St. and who may not."

"Its effect is that silly old men in purple pants may peddle up Yonge St. on tricycles when the Shriners are in town, but peaceful citizens anxious to advertise their views on the greatest moral issue of our age may not."

The Varsity, the Communist Club and the CNLF should reconsider what they are saying. By attacking the Vietnam Mobilization Committee they are helping to attack the rights of all the people of Toronto. They are playing into the hands of the Toronto police, the city government and the reactionary press. An injury to one is an injury to all.

The vile slanders, falsifications and attacks will not harm the Vietnam Mobilization Committee. The VMC has begun a fight for the rights of the people of Toronto and against the dictatorial Police Commission. This struggle will gain the support of the majority of Torontonians who value the freedom to express their views. No, friends, you will only hurt and discredit yourselves by allying yourselves with the malicious attack of the status quo.

The anti-war movement in this country will continue to grow larger. It will grow because it fights for its right to express its views. It will grow to encompass the vast majority of students and workers. It will grow because it presents its views clearly and because it is not afraid to defend its rights against the status quo. Do you want to be part of this great process? With attacks such as those made on the Vietnam Mobilization Committee you only discredit and destroy yourselves.

"Police used provocative tactics"

I comment you for your stand on the demonstration at the U.S. Consulate. Your editorials were emotional, yes, but very responsible. It seems that the "level headed" people have been too easily outraged by the word "pig", yet have failed to respond to the violent and provocative acts of the police. Yes, cops are human too (and potentially on our side) but it was more than obvious to us that these cops are being trained to be something else. I am an American and I have been participating in confrontations with the infamous Chicago cops since 1963. Even they at one time did not deserve the title "pig".

Last Saturday at the consulate, several uniformed police were anxiously enjoying their new role. I also observed teams of plain clothes men staging arrests. In contrast many rookies were truly embarrassed and confused. One who arrested me later let me go when his superior was nowhere in view. As for provocative tactics, those used were very similar to the methods used by the Chicago Police at the civic centre last April 27. At that event the large demonstration was strung out in a thin line, making communication impossible. Upon arriving at the civic centre, the demonstrators were closed off from the road by a row of motorcycle cops and were kept off the public plaza by a thin rope.

At an appointed time police from the front, middle and rear began to "clear the sidewalk" pushing people one direction and then another, arresting them for being in the road, on the plaza, or in fountains where they were pushed.

The only differences with Toronto are the use of horses instead of motorcycles and planters instead of fountains. The Toronto police were just as effective in destroying our solidarity. As brothers were being arrested right and left for nothing, a few people yelled "pig", "fascist". If there had been real resistance, the cops were prepared to do much more. A show of great force at the civic centre was used to strike terror into the heart of the anti-war movement as a warning not to show up for the Democratic Convention. Why the show of such force here? What is so special to Canadians about the U.S. Consulate? What was so dangerous about this small half-inspired group of demonstrators? Do we merit the development of an anti-riot force?

It has been suggested to me that this escalation of stages on the part of the police is the aberration of Police Chief Mackey and Inspector Magahy who want to create some kind of private army. The established powers maintain control of their own police force. They must have decided that what applies in the U.S. today applies in Toronto. They came down hard on last spring's demonstration. They were harder Saturday and they will be much harder next time. They have decided that Toronto needs and wants pigs, which says a lot for Canadian independence and sovereignty.

By MARY KATE ROWAN

Oh to be lodged in Ottawa's beautiful Chateau Laurier!

Last June I campaigned for Steve Otto (Liberal, York East). He won easily.

To reward his young workers, Otto organized a trip to Ottawa. Transportation, a banquet, several tours and lodging at the Chateau all free.

The Chateau could be a fantastic castle from a never-never land-until you get inside. Then the term Fortress Laurier becomes more apt.

We had two keys to our hotel room but unfortunately neither would open the door.

Down to the front desk. "Turn the key to the left."

"We did."

"Try again."

"We did. The lock turned round and round but refused to open."

After another friendly visit to the front desk and two brand new keys, there we sat, leaning against our suitcases on the floor in the hall.

A wandering bellboy suddenly found himself corralled by four desperate females. After fiddling with the lock, he assured us of his immediate return and took off.

He never came back. Later we learned he was new and felt unable to cope with the magnitude of the problem.

Another visit to the now familiar front desk. "You must have slammed the door too hard when you last left."

"But we haven't been in the room yet."

Knowing smile. "Oh yeah, that's what they all say."

During the elevator trip back to the room we met a very friendly commercial sales-

SAC attacks library bureaucracy

The Students Administrative Council has trained its guns on the U of T library. At his urging, SAC last week adopted the following demands:

- meetings of the library council and its executive be held in open session;

• the stacks of the main library be opened to all students (First year students are presently barred from the stacks.)

• that a special committee with equal student and faculty membership — be set up to discuss the operation of the new research library to be built at the corner of St. George and Hoskin Sts. SAC wants the library to be open to all students, but fears it may be restricted to graduates only.

CIA checks water at HH for HHH

By NOEL STECKLEY

Vice-president Hubert Humphrey marched into the Hart House Debates Room last night flanked by a CIA man.

He was there for a public confrontation with Republican Richard Nixon and third party candidate George Wallace.

The CIA man unstrapped the briefcase attached to Humphrey's wrist, and checked the drinking water for poison.

After short introductory speeches by each of the three presidential candidates a reporter from Radio Free Russia asked Wallace what he thought about a bombing halt.

"I believe that we should reduce Chicago to ruins before we halt the bombing," Wallace answered.

"The reporter from Radio Free Hillel asked Humphrey how he justified the U.S. involvement in Vietnam.

The Vice-President hesitated, looked at the CIA man, and said, "I think we have to do something. If we pull out what would we have to talk seriously about?"

The CIA man nodded approval.

When Nixon was asked how he felt about being called a liberal by the press he replied, "Let them form their own country-clubs."

All this, of course, was just in fun. Fun sponsored by Hillel Foundation.

Jack Newman (SGS) took the part of Hubert Humphrey with Michael Silverman as his hovering CIA side-kick.

Alan Rubin (UC IV) played George Wallace. Richard Nixon (five o'clock shadow and all) was played by Jeffrey Stutz (IV UC). Radio Free Russia and Radio Free Hillel (accents no less) were portrayed by Norman Friedman (IV UC) and Abe Pesses (I LAW) respectively.

The library council consists of about 60 members — the faculty deans, professors, several library officials, and four students. It meets only a few times each year. Real power lies with the 18-member executive committee, two of whom are students.

Chief Librarian R. H. Blackburn says he sees no need to form a new committee to discuss policies for the new research library since the library council makes policy decisions.

He also feels it would not be practical to open the library stacks to all students.

"Special provisions have been made for the undergraduates in the Wallace Room and college libraries. The research collection, most of the material of which is irreplaceable, is too large and cumbersome to give undergraduates the quick service they want."

Temma Stulberg (SGS), a student member of the council, says the question of open meetings is at present being considered by the council.

On the recommendation of SAC and the GSU last spring, stack privileges were taken away from first year students and extended to all second year students.

SAC is also concerned with faculty privileges in the library.

Faculty members are permitted to borrow books for up to four months and are exempt from fines on overdue items on an overdraft.

we met a very friendly commercial salesman.

"If you don't have anything to do tonight, why not pay me a visit and I'll show you my merchandise?"

After much deliberation, we decided the Parliament Buildings would be more interesting. Besides, politicians are notoriously impotent.

Another bellboy suddenly found himself abducted. He called the hotel engineer. Defeat was conceded fifteen minutes later and we were escorted to the room next door.

When the maid left the room, she slammed the door rather vigorously and jammed the lock.

There we stood with two keys and no access.

As we slinked back to the front desk trying to avoid the knowing eyes of the hotel staff, the bellboy saw us. As we told our tale to the desk clerk, the bellboy stood behind us juggling his keys.

"Are you the ones...?" asked the clerk.

"We nodded."

"I knew it!" laughed the bellboy. Success. The door opened.

Apparently the cleaning staff did not know of our presence in the room.

Next morning the maid entered looked at the two half awake bodies, scratched her head and raced to the phone.

"They're two girls in room 684. What should I do with them?"

They let us sleep.

Too bad! Think of the commotion if we'd suddenly arrived at the front desk in our nightgowns.

ing case for Biafra in Convocation Hall last night at the so called debate on the Nigerian Crisis.

The Nigerians boycotted the debate protesting the composition of the panel. In leaflets passed out at the door, they branded the event a "mere lecture on Biafra".

The panel consisted of W. Oforogoro, a Biafran student from Columbia University; correspondent Lloyd Garrison of the New York Times; and Mr. Lewis. MPP, recently returned from Biafra. The audience of 150 heard each of them speak before the floor was opened to questions.

This writer heard only Mr. Lewis' presentation.

The speaker was in Biafra for seven days three weeks ago.

He charged that "Nigeria wants an artificial creation", with no regard for factors such as tribe and geography. He denounced the Nigerian Federation as an "arbitrary imposition of the British Colonial Office" in 1960. He argued it was created for "less than genuine colonial reasons" and was bound to lead to disorder.

Lewis stressed the great importance of religion in the conflict. He charged the Nigerian Muslims with attempting to exterminate the Christian Iboos.

ironic. When the Nigerian Federation was created the Iboos were, according to Mr. Lewis, "more than others rhapsodized by a united nation."

The northern Nigerians are protesting a war on a reluctant secessionist in the name of a united country, in the view of Mr. Lewis.

"This is not exclusively a Nigerian-Biafran war. It is as much a creation of the original imperial power (Britain), as it is of the people who are there now," Mr. Lewis saw the British arms shipments to Nigeria as tied to the protection of British oil interests (specifically B.P.) in Biafra.

He warned that if Canada wanted to help Biafra, she could not be diverted by relief alone. "To concentrate exclusively on relief condemns Biafra to death," Mr. Lewis estimated that present relief shipments would have to be increased 15 or 20 times to keep the death rate down to the present level.

"We must end the war", he said.

He saw the present death rate (estimated by Mr. Otonogoro at more than 10,000 per day) as escalating the conflict from a civil war to an area of human concern requiring international initiative.

CUG starts nominating members today

After a year of setbacks in a Board of Governors and politicking, President Claude Bissell's proposed Commission on University Government is finally ready to be formed.

Students Administrative Council President Steve Langdon announced last night nominations for the four student members began at noon today, when nomination forms will be available at the SAC office.

The Association of Teaching Staff will also elect four members to the commission on an open ballot divided into four constituencies.

The ninth voting member will be President Bissell. Representatives of SAC, the ATS and the administration are currently discussing the appointment of a chairman.

The student-faculty administration conflicts over the formation of the Board were resolved two weeks ago mission formed in the university since 1907.

"The elections will give the whole student body an unprecedented opportunity to discuss reform of the governing structures of the university," said Langdon last night.

"Although the elections occur late in the term, I hope the importance of the commission will lead all students to follow the campaign closely."

The arts and science faculty council meets today at 4 p.m. in Convocation Hall to continue discussion of Dean A.D. Allen's proposals for curriculum changes in first and second years next fall.

Last week the council voted to end its policy of meeting behind closed doors, and open the meetings to whoever wished to attend

"The Board probably took the student-faculty rejection of its proposals as a rejection of the idea that it will be a Board commission," speculated Bob Rae (IV UC) of the SAC executive.

Although the Board will have no voting representation on the new commission, it might send assessors.

The commission, which is designed to restructure the government of the U of T, may reform or abolish the Board of Governors.

President Bissell has called it the most important commission formed in the university since 1907.

"The elections will give the whole student body an unprecedented opportunity to discuss reform of the governing structures of the university," said Langdon last night.

Scenes from the Third Reich? No, it's just the engineers protesting an editorial in last Monday's Varsity which compared police to pigs. About 1,000 papers were put to the torch while 300 spectators warmed their hands. The setting of a fire on public property is prohibited by a City of Toronto by-law, but no action was taken to break up the demonstration. Verry Interesting!

What did you learn in school today?

By LIZ WILLICK

The fact of the matter is I didn't learn much. I didn't belong there.

But the engineers (all male as far as I could see) seemed quite absorbed.

I stumbled in 10 minutes late, greeted by cheers, whistles, and offers of seats. Having grabbed the first one in sight, I realized that this indeed was not Sociology 202. After such an enthusiastic entrance I felt I couldn't admit my error. I posed as an artsie Varsity spy for the rest of the period.

Prof. A. J. Abrams ("Who's your prof?" "I don't know"), resplendent in dark green shirt and red bow tie, tinkered with his assistant at a projection machine for some time.

Eventually the lights dimmed to further whistles and moans. Two beasts looking like overfed unicorns drawing a piece of driftwood appeared on the screen.

A student stumbled in 20 minutes late. Groped through the dark toward the steps. Stubbed his toe. "Shit." Sank into a front row seat.

Did you know that a mer-khet is a sort of ancient compass? (Apparently used by naked men seated cross-legged under the stars.)

In 1510 the relation of triangles to stresses and bridge-building was established.

And the ancient symbol for "regenerative" metals was a snake devouring its own tail.

At one point what sounded suspiciously like a bottle tumbled to the floor. Hmrrrrrr?

I may not have learned much but at least it was more interesting than Soc. 202.

NEW YORK (CUP) — The Students for a Democratic Society and the National Mobilization Committee have revealed their plans for protest action on Election Day, Nov. 5.

They include a strike Monday and Tuesday by high school and college students across the country, demonstrations in the streets of a dozen major university cities, an "Anti-election People's Festival" at Chicago's Lincoln Park.

CAREERS in Business Management

To College graduates eager to assume substantial management responsibility early in their business lives, we offer a unique climate for rapid personal growth, with unsurpassed advancement opportunities.

To understand the kind of opportunity that exists for you at Procter & Gamble, you must first know a little about us, and our philosophy of management.

It is our practice to develop and promote from within. Virtually everyone in higher management at P&G today joined the Company shortly after completing his formal education, and progressed upward from a beginning level equivalent to that at which you would start.

We need more good people with management ability because our business is steadily growing. During the last 22 years, our business volume has increased by more than 700%. This expanding business generates a continual need for more and more graduates with management potential. We welcome candidates who thrive on hard work, relish responsibility, and like to compete.

We want you to develop rapidly, and we give you every opportunity. You'll be given substantial responsibility as soon as you join us, and, in most cases, you'll learn by doing, rather than enter a formal training period. You'll be given additional responsibility as soon as you demonstrate you can handle it. Your managers will take a personal interest in your development, because your growth is an important part of their responsibilities!

This emphasis on early development means you can move ahead fast. We promote only on the basis of merit, and you progress as fast as you demonstrate that you are ready to move up. Because of this willingness by P&G to match ability with responsibility, regardless of age, it is not unusual to find graduates still in their 20's transacting substantial portions of the Company's business. In fact, we do not know of any other organization where there is greater awareness of ability, or greater opportunity for unlimited advancement on the basis of merit alone.

We have openings in many fields of interest for graduates at all degree levels, and with all kinds of educational backgrounds. Basically, we ask that all candidates have a good academic record, and be able to show evidence of leadership on or off the campus, with goals set and achieved.

In joining P&G, you would be joining a company widely recognized for management excellence. In a survey conducted by Dun's Review, a panel of nearly 300 top business executives named P&G as one of the ten best-managed companies in industry. The business practices that resulted in such recognition will be an important part of your career training.

Procter & Gamble is a growth company with remarkable freedom from cyclic trends. Although we are large in terms of sales, we are small in terms of people (approximately 1800 employees in Canada). The Company's continued growth is one reflection of its deep interest in research. About one P&G employee out of every ten is engaged in research of some kind, and more than one-third of our business volume is in new products developed in the last ten years.

Our work is creative and challenging. Management at P&G involves a genuinely creative approach to varied and often complex problems that will challenge your resourcefulness to the utmost. It requires a competitive interchange of ideas with other good people. It demands fresh, dynamic thinking and wholehearted participation. If you prefer this method of working instead of "cut and dried" routine, you will find a degree of personal satisfaction in your early assignments that will become even greater as your career responsibilities increase.

"One or more P&G products are used in 95 out of every 100 homes, a penetration unequalled by any other manufacturer of anything."

Procter & Gamble representatives will be on campus for interviews with interested students on: NOV. 27, 28, & 29.

Ask your Placement Office for a copy of the P&G Careers brochure and an interview appointment.

WEEK-END BLUENOTES

ROWING

Varsity's senior lightweight crew had a successful day on Saturday at the O.Q.A.A. championship regatta in St. Catharines. However, this was not enough to take the overall trophy from a more consistent Western crew.

Toronto with 67½ points finished eight points behind in second place.

The junior crew coxed by Charlie Anderson while rowing well, were unable to come up to previous standards and finished behind Western in both their races. The freshman and junior varsity races were taken by McMaster crews.

The senior 155 pound crew, however, capped a successful season with a definitive victory in the lightweight race and a second in the six boat senior heavy race.

RUGGER

A near gale force wind was the toughest opposition Varsity rugger Blues faced this week-end when they twice whipped Waterloo Warriors in their home park.

The firsts triumphed 17-0 and played good rugger only when forced to do so. Speedy Tony Pierre scored two tries from his centre position, one when he outraced the Waterloo team and an orbiting Andy Gibson kick, caught the ball, and touched it down.

Another try was made by wing Doug Phibbs while George Wraw booted one convert and two penalty goals.

Despite playing one man short because of an injury to Graeme Wynn, Varsity successfully thwarted several Warrior scoring threats. Wynn's injury may keep him out of action for the rest of the season and this is a serious blow to Blues' title hopes. Wynn is the leader of the pack forwards and his rugger savvy has been a paramount factor in Blues' success.

Continuing their excellent play, the rugger seconds thumped Waterloo's backup squad 37-0. Andy Cairns and his magic toe led the scoring with 16 points on five converts and two field goals.

Vic Harding, who ran at will through the Waterloo side, scored two tries while single 'touchdowns' went to Bob Noble, Chris Rous, Peter Zepp, Brian Hamill and Richard Van Banning.

Especially important was the excellent play of Van Banning who likely will be the replacement for Wynn in Tuesday's big match with Western. A win over Mustangs in that game would lock up the Western Division title for Blues and move them into the final against Queen's.

HARRIER

The University of Toronto harrier team failed to qualify for the CIAU meet, finishing second to Waterloo by two points in the OQAA meet on Saturday at Guelph.

Grant McLaren took first place in the field of 50, running the gruelling six-mile course to win for the home university. McLaren was followed by Dave Bailey, Brian Armstrong, and Brian Richards, all of Toronto. These three ran fine races, but no other Varsity runner was in the top twelve.

Waterloo, by contrast, showed no spectacular performances, but five of the six runners following Richards were theirs.

The other Toronto runners finished respectably, but well off their previous performances. Bruce Thompson was 13th, Dave Tong 17th, Bob Cairns 22nd, and Rich Pyne 25th.

RAMPAGING RAHAM RAVAGES RAGGEDY-ANN REDMEN

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Varsity Blues and Queen's Golden Gaels cleared away the cobwebs Saturday afternoon in preparation for the real housecleaning next week-end in Kingston.

Blues zonked McGill Redmen 36-13 here at Varsity Stadium while Queen's were multimgling McMaster Marauders in Hamilton 54-7.

These results leave Gaels one point ahead of Varsity after six games with the Yates Cup on the line when Blues journey to John A.'s old drinking home approximately November 9, to be exact.

If Blues hope to repeat as SIFL titlists, they'll no doubt have to come up with a better performance than their efficient but relatively uninspired victory over McGill.

Aside from a brilliant display by Mike Raham, who had an incredible Jimmy Brown-sort-of-day, and twin long touchdown passes to Eric Walter, the offense coughed and sputtered through much of the afternoon. It failed to mount one sustained drive against McGill, putting together as little as three successive first downs only once.

The defence was tough when it had to be, but Redmen still managed to pick up 20 first downs compared to 13 for Blues.

However it's all l'eau au dessous du pont by now and the win: c'est la chose. Past performances will count zip against Queen's.

Raham, playing his last regular season game for Blues before the local yokels, was simply superb. He scored three touchdowns on a 41 yard run, a 50 yard punt return and an eight yard pass, and rushed for 99 yards to regain the league rambling lead from McGill's Dave Fleischer.

Happiest man to see Raham go will undoubtedly be McGill's embattled coach Tom Mooney. Raham seems to make a nasty habit of picking on the Mooney men for individual heroics. In his last four games against Redmen, Varsity's answer to the Land Rover, has eight touchdowns and more than 430 yards rushing.

Walter's two touchdowns (64 and 70 yds.) give him a career total of 25 according to veteran statistician Rick Kollins, four short of Ronnie Stewart's record of 29.

Raham opened the scoring in the first quarter for Varsity with his 41 cubit run which saw him break through the middle, pick up a block from Rich Agro on the 20, and outharryjerome four defenders to the goalline. Paul McKay's sharp toe split the uprights for the convert.

Redmen responded two and a half minutes later with a 44 yard field goal by their fabulous flatfoot, George Sprin-gate, and it was 7-3 the score.

There was an bombing halt on the Reds from McGill as Alboini unleashed his first of two to Walter from the Varsity 44. Walter made a great catch (see picture) and raced over for the score. McKay converted at 1:34 of the second quarter.

Blues upped their lead to 21-3 in the next two minutes when the redoubtable Raham wafered (a Raham wafer?) 50 yards for a touchdown on a punt return. He bobbed and weaved his way to the end zone like a good politician at press conference.

Another field goal by Sprin-gate (26 yds.) narrowed the margin somewhat but the Varsity aerial attack struck again with a 70 yard barrage from Alboini to Walter. John Ritchie hit Mark Slater (ouch!) in the end zone for a nifty two point conversion play and the half ended 29-6 for Blues.

During the second quarter Varsity scrimmaged only seven times to McGill's 25 but outscored them 22-3.

The second half produced nothing but snores and a pair of touchdowns as Redmen kept control of the ball but went inexorably nowhere. Dave Doherty got McGill's major on a six yard pass from quarterback George Wall. Raham duplicated his effort for Blues from eight yards out following an interception by Bill Stankovic.

No pain for Glass

WATERLOO — Varsity Soccer Blues scored their most profound victory so far this season when they crushed Waterloo University 8-0 Saturday.

For Blues, who were due for a good game, the win was a hefty dividend on the time coach Ernie Glass has spent all season trying to get the players to improve their touch around their opponents' net.

Varsity easily rolled over an eager but greatly overmatched Warrior squad. Blues gave us a good display of accurate passing and excellent shooting.

John Gero, who started slow at the start of the season but has been picking up in recent games, scored five goals.

Ken Cancellera scored a pair in the second half, the first time this rookie has landed more than one in a game. Jim Lefkos, who is still leading the league in goals, completed the scoring in the last ten minutes. He has scored in every regular game this season.

Both teams pushed and grabbed too much throughout the game. As a result, four players, including Blues' Dwight Taylor and Frank Soppelsa, were sent out of the game.

Glass, the coach, was pleased with the tightness of his forward line. The line played so well that on five of eight goals, Blues had two-on-one breakaways.

The defence remained solid throughout, permitting few dangerous situations to develop around Blues' own net.

All this allows some confidence when Blues meet Western Mustangs at London Tuesday. Blues have been sloppy in recent outings, but a win over the Mustangs could clinch them the league title, and its emblem, the Blackwood Trophy. After that they would meet the winner of the eastern conference down east.

Parking on the wrong side of the law . . .

Fifteen years ago, when the university was half its present size, when the local soda-jerk wore a white cap and girls wore woolen skirts, bobby socks and saddle shoes, Bill Lawson would have been known affectionately as 'Pops'.

Now, although he greets every patron of his vending truck with a big smile and an enthusiastic, "How are you today?" chances are nobody knows his name.

Chances are too, that he will lose his vending licence and the job that earns him his living.

For three years, Lawson, 58 has been standing on the same block with his Andrews van consistently drawing more customers than all the rest of the trucks anywhere on campus. People bypass uncrowded trucks stocked full of sandwiches and cakes just to line up where Bill sells his wares.

"It's a pleasure working here," he says. "These are my kind of people; they're honest and outspoken." His eyes appear twice their size through thick glasses.

"There are lots of people who really need the trucks because the restaurants are so far away."

Since last January, the cops have been enforcing a slew of bylaws, and Bill and the other caterers have been ticketed and summonsed un-

"They're my kind of people" he do if he lost his job? He's not a young man, you know."

Trying to find out about the hylaw and its penalties took a morning of phonecalls. The metro licensing commission switched this reporter to "catering upstairs." Then "catering" phoned into the switchboard and asked the call to be switched to "enforcing." "Enforcing" said nobody was around so they asked the switchboard to ring Mr. Smith. "But I just transferred the call from Mr. Smith to you!" the switchboard girl complained. The line went dead. Then somebody picked it up. "This is Inspector Folley." He said to call back after 1 o'clock and ask for Inspector Wheatley.

At 1 o'clock, Wheatley said that it wasn't their concern, to call the police. Constable Evans at the traffic division, when called, exclaimed, "Oh my God, they make up the laws; call the Commission!"

I soon realized this trail would lead nowhere. Finally, Constable Dooley, from No. 52 Station, the man who hands out the fines and summonses, provided the most consistent interpretation.

Without divulging the source of the complaints against the trucks, Constable Dooley said there were two bylaws, city and metropolitan, forbidding the trucks from staying in one place for more than 10 minutes in any one place. It also forbids them from parking for more than a half hour on any block.

The police can issue up to a $300 fine but the licensing commission can revoke the individual driver's license for 10 days, 20 days and then for life. Bill's license is being renewed now but he hasn't received it yet.

"I'm behind Bill 100 per cent," says Elmer Nicholson of Lawrence Caterers. He operates his truck at Wilcocks and St. George Sts. and he's had almost as much trouble as Lawson. "The bylaw dates back to '31 and was put out for fruit and vegetable trucks that restricted the flow of traffic. But now we don't block the traffic. We park and we pay the meter."

How do the students react to the threat to take away the vendors? "Well the students don't care," says Nicholson. "They say, 'as long as you're here, we're happy.' But if they make us go away, the students won't react until we're gone. Then it'll be too late."

"There's one loophole though. If we could park on university property, then the bylaw wouldn't be in effect. My wife called Simcoe Hall last year and they refused, saying that if they allowed one company, they'd have to let us all on. I can't say I blame them."

Paul Beagle, Nicholson's lawyer, says the most likely method of dealing with the problem is to go to Metro Council and get the bylaw amended or revoked. This would involve hordes of money and would call for the organization of the various catering companies in the city, companies that gross more than $25 million a year in the Metro area alone. They pay, besides taxes for their plants, up to $125 for their trucks, while restaurants pay only $40-$45 for a licence besides building taxes. At one meeting of the licensing commission, at which Bill Lawson was charged, Alderman Joseph Picinninni is reported to have put the vendors down as "fly-by-nights".

Beagle was very wary of divulging his information on the fear that the enemy would get wind of his tactics. The enemy seems to be the restaurants on the outer fringe of the university and the various machine operators in the university buildings, (who, incidentally, deny ever lodging a complaint to the police).

"The students can help if they really care," says Beagle. "But they've got to watch out because when people hear the name 'students' they immediately think of riots and protests. The best way of showing you're behind the vendors, is to write letters to Metro council. Also you can form a delegation to go to the council."

Mrs. Nicholson has tried to organize the caterers but has had little success, mainly because most of the caterers don't have the problem. Some just weren't interested. The lawyer for Andrews, says Mrs. Hilton, didn't care much for the case and let it fizzle out.

Meanwhile, with the sword of Damocles hanging over his head, Bill Lawson continues to vend his food outside Sid Smith, with a cluckle and repartees like this one:

Bill: "How's married life treating you?"

Student: "Fine. Hey, how'd you know I was married?"

"Don't you remember, you told me last March. I remember."

"Jesus Christ. Well, I'll see you."

Even if Bill doesn't lose his licence and the bylaw (despite overwhelming odds), is amended, there's another bylaw that says that if a vending truck is in a certain place more than a certain length of time, it is classified as a restaurant. And restaurants, by law, must have bathrooms.

Story and
by Larry Haiven

til, this summer, Bill was told at a Metro licensing commission meeting that if he had one more conviction, his license would be revoked. Two weeks ago, he received two summonses.

"I would be willing to take all of my trucks off the block and let Bill stay," says Mrs. Hilton, the office manager for Andrews Food Commissary. "He serves the customers like a real gentleman and they all love him. What could

What did you learn in school today?

By MARY KATE ROWAN

Some profs just don't know where it's at. That's what.

Room 135, Old Physics Building, holds a class so large that a prof could literally walk in, start lecturing and not know that NONE of those smiling faces belonged to his class.

Yesterday it happened. Expecting a lecture on child psychology and Dr. Joan Grusec, the class exploded with laughter when a man entered with "Now, yesterday we were talking about the metronome."

The din refused to subside.

One student walked in and with a look of utter bewilderment, and stared at the deadpan-faced prof for a full minute.

The lecture continued amid the roar of chortles and hand-claps.

"He's putting us on," commented one student. "This has got to be a sneak psych experiment."

It wasn't. Dr. Grusec entered. After a brief consultation, our would-be prof took a last short look at the class that wasn't his and took off.

But he never wants to see any of those smiling faces again.

Sinclair: the students' friend

Gordon Sinclair has refused to appear on campus to debate his charge that The Varsity "lied" in its coverage of the anti-war demonstrations Oct. 26.

SAC education consultant Bob Bossin invited Sinclair to air his views on a panel which would include Varsity editor Paul MacRae before a student audience.

"What's in it for me?" Sinclair demanded, says Bossin.

"I've a much bigger audience right here," the broadcaster told Bossin.

"I asked him if he would debate with someone from The Varsity before his listeners in that case. He said no he wouldn't," said Bossin.

Sinclair added: "You think the taxpayers owe people like you an education. Well, they don't."

Sirluck named Vice-president

Professor Ernest Sirluck has been appointed to the newly created post of Vice-President and Graduate Dean, effective January 1. Prof. Sirluck will be one of seven vice-presidents. He is presently dean of Graduate Studies and will continue with his present duties upon assumption of the new post.

In his new capacity Dean Sirluck will act as an assistant to President Bissell in certain areas of university government, such as the library, for which the president previously had retained direct responsibility.

Law looks at society's problems

The Faculty of Law offering on Nov. 14-15 will examine Law and Freedom in a Changing Society.

Panels will consider The Electronic Challenge to Privacy, Drugs: Law and the Moral Dilemma, Labor: The Right to Strike, and Civil Disobedience.

Participants include metro police Chief James Mackey, several members of Parliament and a number of U of T professors. A complete list of participants is available in the law building.

Applications are available at the general office of the Faculty of Law. They must be completed and returned with the $5 fee by Nov. 10.

Don't miss it.

BLOOD

Third year Dentistry's Fairy Godmother believes in an eye for an eye, and a pint for a pint. Of the class of 130, 102 gave blood Friday and received a pint of beer in return. The Dents, who have topped their projected quota by a wide margin, seem to have the Carling Cup in their jaws for the second year in a row.

But the present U of T total of 2,288 units still falls short of the goal, 4224 units.

So rush — you have only 3 days to give. Give for the college or faculty of your choice — but give! New College continues to bleed in the Reading Room from 9 to 4 today. Tomorrow is the big day for Innis Knox, S.G.S., Pharmacy; and P.H.E. at the Sigmund Samuel Library from 9 to 4.

Relief for marrieds ?

On January 1, 1969, a bit of much-needed relief will be brought onto the tight housing scene at U of T.

The Ontario Student Housing Corporation is constructing two apartment buildings on the north and south sides of Charles St., west of Yonge. The apartments will be available for married students, undergraduates as well as graduates. Children will be accepted in both buildings.

The south building, to open Jan. 1, will contain 76 one-bedroom and 224 two-bedroom apartments. Prices range from $135 per month for a one-bedroom on the second floor to $153 for a one bedroom on the 20th. Two-bedroom apartments range from $158 on the second to $176 on the 20th.

The suites can be seen Saturday mornings until 1 p.m. at the site office of the south building.

WHY WE BURNED THE VARSITY

We, the third year class of Chemical Engineering, would like to indicate some of the motives behind last Friday's Varsity Burn-In:

1) Dubious integrity in your reporting, and, epitomized by Monday's now infamous editorial "Cops are Pigs", indefensible adventurism and total lack of social perspective on your editorial page.

2) The Varsity has taken every opportunity to bring disrepute on the Engineering student: while inborn prejudices motivate some of our fellow University students, we feel that people in positions of power and pres-age, in this institution, if nowhere else, should be above acting on such puerile promptings.

3) The Varsity has always given place and support — implicitly or otherwise — for such leftist and reactionary activities as are staged by the Ad Hoc Committee on Vietnam. As an example, we note that no condemnation of a serious nature was voiced by the Varsity of the cow-gut exhibition on Sid Smith's front steps two weeks ago.

4) We are not averse to change — as some journalists suffering from creative impulses would have the rest of the campus believe — provided it is constructive, meaningful, and within the spirit of the law: however, we are convinced that the labelling of the Toronto Police as pigs is not creating a healthy atmosphere for the amelioration of anybody's society, and therefore we want to dissociate ourselves from it.

In reply to your challenge of our Mr. Janikowski to debate with your editor: if the debate is carried out in the pages of the Varsity, we will gladly accept.

We sincerely hope you will not be disappointed in this, but it is felt that when superlative rhetoric is pitted against good logic and intelligent dissertation, the original problems, and true perspective are drowned in a deluge of words.

In conclusion, dear sir, we recommend you research your innuendos more thoroughly before printing them... The University of Toronto is not incorporated in the charter of the corporation of the city of Toronto, and thus is not subject to its by-laws... perhaps you are still trying too hard to evade respect for the law and its executor, the man on the beat.

S.E. Kallos

REPLY: PUT UP OR...

Dear Mr. Kallos:

In reply:

1) You accuse us of dubious integrity in our reporting, yet have offered no specific examples of such reporting. If you are referring to our news story on the Oct. 26 demonstration, we suggest you look again. If you are referring to other news stories, please name them so we can reply to stated charges.

Granted Monday's editorial was emotional and angry, but on Wednesday I tried to give my reasons behind Monday's piece. Monday's editorial was tactically stupid because it made people react to a word instead of an argument, but it wasn't illogical. I said the same thing Wednesday using facts.

As for lack of social perspective, the facts, as I see them, indicate that police should not have broken up the anti-war demonstration. Whether I should have called police pigs or not is a matter of individual opinion. I do question the "social perspective" of those who refuse to consider the possibility that police might have broken up a legal demonstration without cause.

2) You state that The Varsity has taken every opportunity to bring disrepute on Engineering students. Without trying to appear obtuse, I can't reply to vague generalizations like that. Could we have some specific incidents, please?

To say engineers and The Varsity see things differently is one thing, but to say we are prejudiced for that reason is another. If we were prejudiced, we'd say engineers shouldn't be part of the university community. I don't believe that.

Out of two points of view should come dialogue, confrontation, and increasing awareness. I have asked you for just such a public dialogue, and you have refused. You state that a face-to-face debate will "drown in a deluge of words" the "original problems and true perspective". I find this argument incredible.

Does this mean Langdon and Bissell should have written notes to each other instead of debating? Should the U of T Debating Union dissolve itself? Maybe SAC members could write memos. Perhaps Parliament could be carried on by mail.

I've always thought debate the best way to bring out the facts, (although not the best way to get action), and I'm sure most students feel the same way.

Are you afraid you will be defeated? Well, that's the nature of a debate. It's not enough to say that debate is invalid because "superlative rhetoric" will be pitted against "good logic and intelligent dissertation". I hope those listening to a debate would make their decision on the basis of "logic and intelligent dissertation", which may or may not be rhetorical in nature.

3) Which is worse, the cow's guts or the butchery they were meant to symbolize? The answer depends on your point of view and because we differ on that point of view is not grounds for condemnation.

4) Very few people admit to being "adverse to change". But societies are set up to resist change and usually change within the "structures of the law" isn't much change at all. Minor changes can be brought about through legal process, but rarely major change. That we consider the lifting of the prohibitions against abortion or drinking at 18 as "major change" bears witness to that.

You are right that calling cops "pigs" doesn't do anything for "creating a healthy atmosphere for social amelioration". But what kind of "healthy atmosphere" are you dealing with when police can break up a peaceful, legal demonstration at will. Maybe that's not true, but the facts apparently can support both views. I chose the view of one who was there.

There isn't any bylaw against burning newspapers on university property — I was wrong there. I did phone 52 Division of Metro police on Friday and was told such burning was illegal. I phoned yesterday and was told that notification must be given to city authorities before holding a bonfire to ensure proper supervision. But there's no bylaw, you're right.

But I wasn't using the "bylaw" to prove you were wrong to hold the demonstration—I tried to show that a minor bylaw should not be used to snuff out free speech as was done Oct. 26.

Mr. Kallos has indicated he does not want a public debate on these points. I reply that his charges student power movement back two years, for SAC is at least making effective changes in the students' role in education.

SAC might appear too radical for the average student, but extremism confronted with the tremendous inertia of the administration has so far turned into effective reform.

It seems SAC is worth $12 a year, even to graduate students.

SAC must appeal to graduate students as a whole, not just the GSU, a selfish political body. Only a minority of students voted in the referendum, on SAC.

SAC must persuade the mass of graduate students to rise from apathy to consider a very crucial issue.

against this newspaper are unfounded and untrue and that in view of the serious nature of these charges, he owes me a chance to reply in public. If he does not want a debate, then let us hold a discussion. If he does not want a discussion, I will be happy to answer questions at an open meeting. If he is unwilling to take one of these steps then I suggest he keep his criticisms to himself since he won't back them up in public.

SAC'S GSU Problem

By BRIAN JOHNSON
Varsity SAC Editor

"... one man on the chessboard gets up and tells you where to go ... when logic and proportion have fallen stony dead ... and the white knight is talking backwards, and the red queen's lost her head..."

White Rabbit—Surrealistic Pillow

The vision of a destroyed Students' Administrative Council ... ideals and ethics smashed, a student movement without a government or an electorate ... I have never seen a more frightening SAC meeting than last Wednesday's.

The scene was suitably austere in Seely Hall, Trinity College, where SAC was doing a little soul-searching over the Graduate Student Union request to withdraw.

By referendum, mass meeting, and just about every other conceivable form of decision-making, the GSU has chosen to leave SAC. But many members of SAC are not prepared to accept that decision.

SAC President Steve Langdon declared it would be impossible for GSU to withdraw. How could SAC deny them its services? How could it stop them from reading The Varsity? How could it stop them from looking at cheerleaders at football games?

So Langdon suggested a sweep-it-under-the-rug committee composed of a lot of reasonable people. And the idea of the committee was passed, but not without some ugly debate.

Langdon and Bob Rae (IV UC) are aligned as the dual protagonists of the cause for SAC unity:

... Langdon listing SAC services and searching in vain for reasons that aren't there ...

... Then GSU President John Winter flattening it all with the reminder that the majority of graduate students want to withdraw and will withdraw ...

... Rae, usually the rational tactful diplomat, giving a pompous, unreasoned argument. (It would not be right, proper, or possible for GSU to withdraw.)

... Laughter from Winter huddled with his machiavellian reactionaries.

BLACK COMEDY

The scene was amusing at first, but it was black comedy. I felt as if SAC were losing control. It was mad. Winter was sitting there with a smirk that warns of the inevitable. He always has the last card.

Where's the master of logic and analysis. Surely he can find a reason to prevent the withdrawal? Where is Andy Wernick?

"This is all metaphysical bullshit," he said, "—all this talk about community."

And he was dead serious.

DESTROY SAC

In a brilliant but frightening speech, he painted black the idea of community at this university. Only three decent eating places for a university of 30,000. No place for the engineers to eat. No campus centre. Students who hate other students. The unity is metaphysical; the reality ugly. The only community, he said, is created by SAC and by the Varsity, a SAC publication.

But the GSU withdrawal could destroy SAC. It would set a precedent that would allow Engineering, Medicine, Law, Trinity, Victoria to leave—as SAC weakens, fragmentation increases. SAC could snowball itself out of existence. And where would the student movement be? SAC was faced with a dilemma and waiting for the answer.

I thought Wernick might then say GSU couldn't withdraw, because it would destroy what little community there is, and, more important, damage the student movement.

But then he told us SAC had to accept the withdrawal — by the very ideal of democracy by which it was elected.

Langdon, usually cool and reserved, lashed out at Wernick. He tried to reply to Wernick's negativism with words like "cannot" and "impossible". Langdon was furious; he thought Wernick was trying to smash SAC.

Then it all began to fit into place. The Langdon-Wernick conflict was out in the open for the first time, and it was over the different approaches to the student movement, as I pointed out a few weeks ago.

No matter what kind of student movement Langdon would like, as SAC President, he is bound by an electorate, a factor that can limit the radicalization process by election, impeachment, or withdrawal. SAC is a student government, or, at best, a student union. Langdon's conception of a student movement is directed by political necessity: compromise and delay are his only tactics in dealing with the GSU.

STUDENT MOVEMENT

Andy Wernick a more fluid student movement. It's a spontaneous feeling among students that is fostered by the ideology and tactics of an organization like the Toronto Student Movement. For Wernick, the destruction of SAC would not be the end of the student movement.

The reality began to make sense, but as it did, the irony doubled: Paul Fromm (III SCM) sided with Wernick.

Even that made sense. Although the two men are on opposite ends of the political spectrum, they might agree on a common cause—the destruction of SAC. Fromm would want to crush it to hamper radicalism; Wernick might want to crush it to redirect the student movement into the TSM. (Wernick left the SAC executive three weeks ago to devote more time to the TSM.)

When I later asked Wernick why he favoured accepting the GSU withdrawal for democratic idealism, he said, "It's not idealism; it's politics."

He's right. If SAC forces the GSU to stay in, it will be committing political suicide.

Unfortunately Langdon and Rae haven't got a leg to stand on. GSU has the democratic right to be wrong.

SAC's only argument is the constitutional one. By charter, SAC includes GSU.

There is no provision for withdrawal. But one can be made: constitutions can be amended.

SAC's only tactic so far has been delay — thus the committee.

SAC's only hope is persuading GSU that it would be foolish to withdraw. And it would. Graduates would lose SAC services — the Varsity, Varsity Radio, low-priced tickets for SAC sponsored events, SAC chartered flights, inclusion in the student directory. Not bad for $12.

Allen Report next year: the new freedom?

By MARY BASTEDO

The road seems clear for implementation of some major Macpherson recommendations next year.

The arts and science faculty council Monday endorsed:

- the abolition of the present honor and general course system in favor of a generalist and specialist program,

- the common first year principle,
- the simultaneous implementation of the changes in first and second years.

By a vote of 188-45, council members, packed into the Museum Theatre, also agreed in principle on four of the five sections of the Allen Report. The sections describe the nature of the common first year and the specialist program which can begin in second year and provide for implementation next fall.

The only serious objection to the entire body of proposals came from New College Principal D.G. Ivey, who objected that streaming would break down under the new system.

"One of the advantages of a large university is the streaming of students and the resulting homogeneity of classes," he said.

"The broader the spectrum of students the more difficult it is to present courses for them."

A motion proposed by Prof. G.W. Field that the proposals be submitted by mail to a referendum among all faculty members was ruled out of order.

"The people who are entitled to be heard are those who are present," said Prof. Conacher.

"The busiest people are here," he said to loud applause.

In response to complaints that free choice of courses would result in a mad scramble to organize classes and teachers at the last minute, Dean Hallett replied that students would probably be required to choose their courses in April or May.

"One of the most exciting aspects of the proposed developments will be the imaginative course planning and the opportunity for inter-disciplinary

History Prof. J.B. Conacher expressed fears the seminar system would be destroyed.

"I cannot support this motion unless the dean can assure us the specialist program will be roughly the equivalent of the present honor course system," he said.

As the U.S. election results trickled in, Rochdale College held a wake and benefit night for the Toronto Anti-Draft Program. Body pointing was a feature of the evening.

Election results at press time, 3:55 a.m.: Richard Nixon leading, with 42 per cent of the popular vote and 167 electoral college votes.

Jerry Rubin's pig lost by a substantial margin.

DOW sparks Sask sit-in

SASKATOON (CUP) — A group of 75 students sat in at the Canada Manpower Centre at the University of Saskatchewan yesterday to protest Dow Chemical recruitment on campus.

The demonstration was peaceful until about 2:30 p.m. when some 50 commerce students invaded the already clogged office to remove the demonstrators. Several were dragged out before the commerce students were cooled down by demonstrators and convinced to leave.

Saskatoon campus principal W.R. Begg met with a delegation of the demonstrators and promised to establish a student-faculty-administration committee to study on-campus recruitment by companies making war materials.

The demonstrators plan to stay outside the hall until Dow recruiters leave Thursday after they interview approximately 25 graduating students.

Students to strike? Maybe

By LEAH ADAM

The role of the university should be to produce "critically evaluating" people who would be willing to change society, SAC president Steve Langdon said yesterday.

He told a meeting of the U of T Liberal Club that the university is "too closely bound with the centres of power." Changes must be streaming of students and the resulting homogeneity of classes," he said.

"The broader the spectrum of students the more difficult it is to present courses for them."

250 females stripped of curfew

By ANGELA SHENG

Curfews for the 250 students at University College's Whitney Hall residence were abolished this week.

UC's dean of women, Charity Grant, accepted a number of recommendations put forward by students at a meeting of the residence council Monday.

From now on the first year students — about two thirds of the residence population — will not be subject to curfews.

Students returning to the residence through the night entrance after 11 p.m. will no longer have to sign their room numbers and record the time, but only sign in their names.

Men's visiting hours in the common rooms are extended to midnight from 11 p.m. all week.

Students may now dress as they wish at meals except for suppers on weekdays.

Other minor rules still exist, for reasons of security only.

For example, all rooms are subject to inspection for safety hazards which could cause the appearance of insects of the start of a fire or other damage to the building. Since there is a girl on desk duty from 7 to 11 every night only, no one will be admitted after 11 p.m. unless the visit is arranged beforehand.

Science shrinks hours

By AGI LUCKAS

Second-year life science committee later unanimously endorsed the change in the curriculum.

"They proved quite prepared for change," commented Phil Atkinson (II Vic), a student spokesman.

Physics now becomes one of the optional courses. The class was informed of these optional courses.

U of M tokenism protested:

...Changes must be instituted at all educational levels in order to lessen the influence of society.

He outlined what SAC has been doing in order to "democratize" the university:

- outside activity, such as political stands on issues such as Biafra and Vietnam,
- a committee to study implementation of the Macpherson Report.

Engineers back staff on salaries

The Engineering Society passed a unanimous motion last night supporting the Association of Teaching Staff in their current salary demands.

The body of the motion pointed out the "apparent ## life, liberty, pursuit of sex

SAN FRANCISCO (CUP) — Eldridge Cleaver is probably the most harassed person in the United States.

The black militant has just been informed that he may no longer sleep with his wife.

His wife purchased a gun to protect herself. The law prohibits Cleaver, a parolee from the California State Prison, from living in a house where he has access to a gun.

"This has now become an issue of whether or not it's a man's constitutional right to sleep with his wife," Mrs. Cleaver said. She bought a handgun because her life has been threatened several times in recent months.

Cleaver was defeated in yesterday's presidential election.

students quit councils

making body.

There are two "student" representatives presently on the University Council. The representatives, however, are non-student administration appointees who are supposed to represent the student interest. But students are dissatisfied with their performance.

Student president Alderie Darveau, knocked the University Council for "serving the corporate elite instead of the human majority." Darveau hopes to force the administration into a re-evaluation of the student's role in the university and the role of the university in society.

A new radical group, Le Mouvement D'Action Politique, erupted onto the campus to stage a disruption of a university assembly meeting and to invade the vice-rector's office.

Vice-rector Paul Lacoste told the invading students they would have to follow "democratic channels" to bring about reform.

All university government bodies sit in closed session, another irritant to the dissident students.

three optional courses. Last week all of the more than 30 students enrolled in the course signed a petition saying their six-hour physics course was unnecessary to most of the life science students.

They complained that their 33-hour week workload was too heavy.

A delegation of two visited Prof. D.A. Chant, chairman of the Group D Honor Socioec Committee, responsible for the course's curriculum.

L.A. students seize their building

LOS ANGELES (CUP) — Students at San Fernando Valley State College took control of two floors of the administration building Monday.

The acting administration president and two of his aids are being held hostage.

Over 300 members of the Black Students Union and Students for a Democratic Society seized the building to protest racial discrimination in campus athletics and lack of student control over decision-making at the school.

Specifically the students are demanding the dismissal of a football coach accused of striking a black athlete.

The class was informed of the change Monday morning by Chant, who advised them to skip physics class from then on. There were cries of joy at the prospect of missing yesterday's physics test.

The only condition, said Dr. Chant, is that students must have discussed dropping physics with a faculty member before making final individual petitions for it, "though you don't have to follow his advice if he advises against it."

It's a first for this type of poetic drama has never been produced here, and Yeats is also a rarity in Toronto.

"His work demands a highly stylized form of acting," says Prof. Robert O'Driscoll of the Irish Theatre Society, "and an inspired production staff. It should be a challenge to students on campus."

The productions are being performed under the auspices of the Irish Theatre Society and The Centre for the Study of Drama.

Auditions for the two plays are being held Friday, Nov. 8 at 2 p.m., St. Michael's College, Brennan Hall, Room B. Leon Major will be doing the casting for Mr. MacAnna who is in New York directing a play.

Engineers protest curbed earth

By RON GRANER

I was peacefully driving along College St. in my 1939 Chevrolet when a motorcycle policeman pulled up alongside and gave me a long hard stare.

Suddenly his expression changed to one of worry and he stepped on the gas and whipped up University Avenue.

I followed right behind him and we pulled up to the Planetarium together.

A small group of police faced a cordon of jubilant engineers.

It was the official Lady Govinda Memorial Band opening of the McLaughlin planetarium.

The paddy wagon was ready, parked across the road.

CFTO newsmen were there looking pretty disgusted because almost all of the speeches were tape recordings and unprintable.

Nervous planetarium officials blocked the entrance to the building as the Flat Earth Society protested that the obscene, domed building was unnecessary since the earth was really flat.

foes from second floor windows.

The engineers attempted to seize a water hose but were fought off by Vic students.

The U of T police were called in to restore order.

Finally a major offensive was launched and the Engineers succeeded in storming one of the gates and captured a water bomber.

The Saga of the Soggy Shoe ended when the bedraggled engineers returned to the Engineering stores via Queen's Park.

Fromm impeachment fails

A move to impeach F. Paul Fromm, SAC member for St. Michael's College, has fallen flat.

According to Joe Blonde, (II SMC) leader of SFEAR, Students For Effective and Acceptable Representation, the move "engendered considerable bad feeling".

"People feel he is a constructive force on campus," said Blonde.

Fromm is also president of the campus Edmund Burke Society.

"We got about half the number of signatures we needed," commented Blonde, "but many people felt they didn't want to rock the boat."

What now? "We've given up," says Blonde. "If Fromm does something that excessively angers people, it will be up to them to act."

SAC PLANS ACTION

More OSAP hangups

As the academic year progresses and wallets get thinner, more students are feeling the pinch from the stiffer Ontario Student Awards Program rules.

A typical case is that of the co-ed whose parents refused to fill out their part of the OSAP form.

OSAP wasn't very sympathetic.

Dear Miss X,

October 7, 1968

I am returning your application for a student award.

As you know, we submitted your application to the Department of University Affairs for special consideration as an independent student but regrettably this was denied. In the words of the Department of University Affairs "...it is the parents' decision as to whether they wish their daughter to be educated or not. It is not the role of the Department of University Affairs as representatives of the Government of Ontario to step in where the parent does not wish us to. Therefore, this application must be rejected unless the parent is willing to fill out the appropriate sections."

I am sorry to have to convey disappointing news, and hope that it might be possible for you to find other means of financing your final year.

Yours sincerely,
(Miss) Lois Reimer
Director, U of T Office of Student Awards.

For students like Miss X—or anyone who couldn't get enough money to live on this year—and for students who don't need OSAP but who support universal accessibility, SAC will hold a mass meeting Remembrance Day, Nov. 11, to plan further action.

FOOTBALL

The Victoria College machine rolled to its 4th consecutive victory without a defeat last Friday as they crushed St. Mike's 31-7. St. Mike's, due for an upset after whipping Phys. Ed. and Engineering, couldn't get untracked while Vic could do nothing wrong. Touchdowns by Myers, Kartna, Fairgrieve, and Kristenson and a field goal and 4 converts by P. Marshall made up the Vic scoring. St. Mike's major was scored by Jim Doyle after a missed field goal was fumbled by a Vic player.

The Faculty of Dentistry clinched first spot in Group C as they rolled over Trinity 25-0. Meds lead Group B with a 4-0 record after trouncing UC 32-5. Should they meet St. Mike's in the semi-final, the Doctors will have their hands full. St. Mike's is capable of playing much better football than they showed against Vic. If Brian MacConnell keeps up his power running and quarterback Jim Poland can find his excellent receivers the Micks will give the Doctors some aches and pains of their own.

Filly Blues field shinny champs

Bully! Bully! - A familiar sight last Friday and Saturday as centre campus was converted to a Field Hockey pitch to host the final round of the Intercollegiate Field Hockey Tournament.

Going into this round, Toronto and MacMaster were tied for first place by virtue of their five previous victories. The big game between these two teams was on Friday morning.

A sluggish, scoreless first half seemed to indicate that the game could go to either team. However, early in the second half, Toronto broke through with 2 goals from Sue Long and Sue Allingham which remained unanswered by McMaster during the rest of the game.

With McMaster defeated, Toronto needed two more victories to win the tournament. On Friday afternoon, the Bluettes managed to defeat MacDonald College 1-0. On Saturday, Toronto was assured of a tournament-win by defeating Western 3-0.

Special mention goes to two of the team members. In a nine game season, Sharon Wilson, the goalie, allowed only two goals, and Joan Stevenson, the centre forward, managed to drive home 19 goals of the total 40 scored by Toronto this year.

Alboini and pride boost Blues

Varsity No. 16 . . .

By JIM COWAN

Chalked on the blackboard in Blues' dressing room this week is the stark legend, Queens 35, Blues 0. Below it is printed, Blues 36, Queens 0. Underneath both is written one word, in capital letters and underlined, PRIDE.

The first score refers, of course, to the October 5 drubbing Blues took from Golden Gaels, while the second is a prediction of Saturday's game in Kingston. And Pride, well, that's what it's all about.

"There's no way they're 35 points better than us," Blues diminutive quarterback Vic Alboini said yesterday. "They're not better than us at all!"

Alboini is probably the most improved player in the league this year. After getting off to a slow start, he settled down to work long and hard hours under the direction of the coaching staff, particularly assistant coach Dave Copp.

The results are obvious. After last Saturday's game against McGill, Alboini's passing record for the season stands at 51 completions in 101 attempts, pushing him over the 50 per cent mark for the first time this year. He has passed for 11 touchdowns.

"You can sum it up in confidence," said assistant coach Dave Copp last night. "We've spent a lot of time on the pass offence. We run a fairly complex offence and Vic has a tremendous command of it. He's a very intelligent ball-player."

Alboini himself feels the whole Blues offence has improved. His unfamiliarity with his receivers at the beginning of the season was a major cause of the team's dismal pass offence, a facet of the game where, as Alboini said yesterday, "one little mistake can make everyone look bad."

Rookie John Chapman, who will miss Saturday's contest because of a knee injury, said of Alboini, "He's like a receiver himself. He tells you what you should be doing . . . in no uncertain terms."

Split-end Eric Walter, one of Alboini's favourite targets this season, said of the quarterback, "There's no one who works harder. He's always out there throwing the ball. And now he's getting to know our personnel and the other teams' defenses."

Blues, like Queens, allow the quarterback to call most of the plays during a game. "He gets advice when he comes to the bench, but he calls most of the plays himself," said Copp. "We probably haven't sent in half a dozen plays all season."

The system suits Alboini to a "T." "I like calling my own plays," he said, "because I'm in the game situation and can tell what's happening. Sure the spotters help, but I can usually see who's blitzing, blocking, and so on."

Which brings up the point that Alboini, at 5'10" and 160 lbs., is pretty small as quarterbacks go. Usually this would be compensated for with roll-out patterns, but Alboini is basically a drop-back type of passer. "I don't find I have that much trouble seeing my receivers," he explains.

This is Alboini's third year with the Varsity Blues. His first season was spent as understudy to Bryce Taylor and last season he was sidelined early with a leg injury. Even so, in the two league games he did play, he completed 22 or 40 passes for five touchdowns.

Saturday could be the biggest test the little QB has faced. "We've got to be up for the game, and our defense has to be strong," said Alboini as he dressed for Tuesday's practice. "We have to run the ball, with enough passing to keep their defense honest."

All of which sounds like a pretty winning type of formula.

Varsity Hockey 1968

One cold winter day last year, I sat in the office of one of my professors and listened intently as he analyzed the shortcomings of this newspaper's coverage of intercollegiate hockey. "Every year," said he, "I read in The Varsity that although Blues have a stacked team, the coach thinks that they will have a tough time beating their next opponents. Then, I go to the hockey game on Friday night and watch as Toronto wins by ten goals."

I am inclined to agree with this man that pessimism on the part of coaches and cub reporters can be a lot of phoney bologna. However, can you imagine what a bunch of over-confident prima donnas a coach would be faced with if he started to pop off about how great his team was?

And, as far as crystal ball writers go, calling a team to win by large margins is just a lot of unnecessary crap. Therefore, reports on the progress of Blue and White puck-chasers this season will consist of conservative, middle-of-the-road stories printed on asbestos lined paper. (No one is going to burn up our sporty chef d'oeuvres).

THE TEAM

Back at the rink, coach Tom Watt has collected as fine a group of shabby talent as is likely to be found on any campus in Canada. Despite the fact that two first team SIHL all-stars — defenceman Peter Speyer and goaltender John Wrigley — Dr. Dafeo Trophy winner Murray Stroud, defencemen Doug Jones and Bob Hamilton, and rightwinger Brian Jones have moved on, Watt has more than enough potential in camp to regain the CIAU national title lost to Alberta Golden Bears last year.

Paul Laurent, a dream team member in each of his three seasons at U of T is back, as are wingers Gord Cunningham and Steve Monteith. Monteith, you'll remember, played for the 1967-68 Canadian Olympic Team.

Other returnees include winger Bob McClelland, who tied Laurent for team scoring honours last season, John Gordon, Brian Tompson and Paul McCann, centres Brian St. John (first choice of Boston Bruins in last summer's NHL amateur draft), and Fred Pollard, defencemen Jim Miles and Terry Parsons, and goaltenders Tom Little and Peter Adamson.

Promising newcomers are centre John Wright, who played with Toronto Junior Marlboros, winger Mike Boland (St. Michael's Buzzers), defenceman Brent Swannick (Markham Juniors), winger Len Burman, defencemen Dave Field and Bill L'Heureux, (both from Western) forwards John Ritchie and Mike Pederman (from Princeton) and goaltenders Adrian Watson and Brian Chapman. Marty Zuchotki, a forward turned defenceman, has also had a good training camp.

THE SEASON

Blues get their first taste of a long rugged schedule when they travel to Montreal this week-end for games with University of Montreal Carabins (Friday) and Loyola University Warriors (Saturday).

Montreal was the only SIHL team to blemish Varsity's record last season while Loyola edged Blues 1-0 in the first round of the CIAU national finals held last year in Montreal.

Expansion has hit the SIHL this season and as a result, Varsity will be facing considerably weaker competition than they have in the past. Windsor, Carlton and University of Ottawa are the new schools and the rebuilt league will operate in two six-team divisions.

Toronto will play a fifteen-game schedule (three matches with each opponent) in the Western section — Windsor, Western, Waterloo, McMaster, Guelph and Blues. The Eastern Division will include U. of Montreal, Laval, McGill, Queen's Ottawa and Carlton.

Toronto officials have arranged several exhibition contests in an attempt to insure player and fan interest throughout the many one-sided league matches that are likely to take place.

Blues will visit Cornell after Christmas for a one-night stand with the defending U.S. intercollegiate national champions. A Minnesota tournament in which the U.S. national team will be playing is another stop Varsity will make, this time before the two-week winter vacation.

NOTES . . . Ward Passi, a five-time all-star has just had the cast removed from his leg. Passi tore an achilles tendon in September but hopes to start skating next week. If all goes well, Ward may rejoin Blues before the end of the month . . . John Wrigley and Peter Speyer are both playing for Orillia of the Senior OHA league . . . Murray Stroud plays for Collingwood in the same loop.

What did you learn in school today?

POLI SCI 328

By TREVOR SPURR

Third year political science students have successfully petitioned the political economy department to have one of their courses made optional.

The course, Political Science 328, is entitled Quantitative Methods in Social Science. Until this week, it was one of two courses compulsory for the students.

"The people in the course felt it was irrelevant and the standard of statistics involved too low. It could be learned in two months," said a third year Trinity College student.

"For many students, they couldn't take enough to be useful yet it still had to be studied for," said another student.

Over 90 per cent of the 39 students in the course signed the petition. The department at first offered to make the course optional if the students would submit an essay instead. After Tuesday's class even this requirement was dropped.

The students did not feel the professor was at fault.

"The professor knew his stuff all right," said one student.

The department had planned to make the course optional next year in line with recommendations of the Macpherson Report.

ARCHITECTURE

By LIZ WILLICK

Architects don't think they're getting their money's worth. They want to find out why.

About 80 architecture students met yesterday to consolidate their grievances into a list to be presented to the Architectural Society today. With approval, it would go on to the president's advisory council on academic facilities.

Architecture students pay the same fees as engineers — the second highest on campus — but claim they have received nothing comparable to the elaborate equipment the engineers are blessed with.

Don McKay (II Arch) said he understood "that we are on the bottom of the priorities list on campus."

Dean T. Howarth, said last night "when we moved into the present building, we were taken off the priority list."

Lectures and laboratories will not be cancelled for Monday's Remembrance Day services. In previous years classes were suspended during the service at Soldiers' Tower, Hart House. This year the Alumni Association will lay a wreath at the Tower and observe two minutes silence at 11 a.m.

He can see why students "can't understand why they have to put up with the things they have."

With only three set courses this year and few formal lectures, students want to spend more time in their studios, which they find inadequate and overcrowded.

The new course structure puts an increased emphasis on individual work and audio-visual teaching methods. The students want equipped dark-rooms.

They want to make more use of empty classrooms and redecorate their building to suit themselves.

McKay emphasized that they do not want "makeshift things as an excuse for putting off real needs."

After today, the students will wait one week. If demands are not met, they are prepared to start talking about a walkout. Or, if Peter Boag (III Arch) has his way, an occupation of the building. They hope it won't be necessary.

HISTORY 120

Regis Trudel (I SMC) is one of the many students who have found that washing out his ears made no improvements in hearing History 120 lectures in Room 102 of the Mechanical Building.

"The University should install an adequate sound system in any hall holding over 250 people," says Prof. T.A. Sandquist, academic secretary of the history department. It has done so in Cody Hall and the Museum, but not in Room 102.

At present, a small port-

Using a 300 mm lens Varsity photo editor Tim Koehler yesterday afternoon solved the mystery of the five paper airplanes lodged in the ceiling of Room 135 in the Old Physics Building. Acute and perceptive readers may enter the Paper Plane Contest by examining the evidence and submitting their solution c/o Liz Willick, The Varsity, 91 St. George.

One clue: there are three reasons.

While Miss Willick was investigating the mystery beforehand, she was told by Mrs. Burnett, eight years on the cleaning staff at OP, "there are no pins or anything, I can't figure out how they stay there."

ble mike is installed for every lecture in the Mechanical Building. People sitting towards the back of the hall can often barely hear the lecturer.

Student complaints during the past two years have led to history department requests for improvements, says Prof. Sandquist, which were passed on to a Presidential Advisory Committee on Accommodations and Facilities. Further student letters were given to Dean A.C. Hallett this week, who told The Varsity that he believes a new amplifying system is on order.

Another request is for the mike to be mobile. Natalie Davis, who followed Prof. Zaour as lecturer, says she feels chained to the floor with a stationary mike, and will not use it.

Luckily for History 120 students, her voice carries well. She feels no voice strain yet.

Problems for Bissell's commission

by BRIAN JOHNSON

President Claude Bissell's Commission on University Government still has another roadblock in its way, although the board of governors has agreed to co-operate with the commission and send two non-voting representatives.

This time the interference is coming from the Graduate Students Union which demands "its own election for the graduate student representative on CUG, based upon universal graduate student franchise."

GSU President John Winter makes the demand in a letter yesterday to U of T President Claude Bissell.

He cited as reasons.

- SAC's failure to consult the GSU regarding election procedure.

- low graduate turnout in any SAC sponsored election,

- election irregularities of recent SAC elections.

- a confidential memo from SAC executive assistant Martha Tracey to SAC President Steve Langdon and Vice-president Norm Schachar which Winter described as "a detailed plan for concealed interference in graduate student affairs.

"I would be negligent in my duty as GSU President," said Winter, "if I allowed SAC to be involved in the election of the graduate student representative to CUG."

Langdon will meet with Dr. Bissell Tuesday to try to reach an agreement.

Meanwhile board of governors Acting President O.D. Vaughan assured President's Council Chairman John H. Sword in a letter that the Board would participate in CUG.

But he expressed dismay at the blocking of the Board's proposal for the commission.

"The original proposal of the President's council had been frustrated," he said. "The board accordingly rescinded any action that it had taken in connection with this committee."

"Now the board is calling CUG a committee instead of a commission," said Bob Rae (IV UC), SAC universities commissioner. "They are trying to make it sound less important because they do not have voting members on it."

Meds consider SAC withdrawal

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

Students in the faculty of medicine are considering withdrawal from the Students' Administrative Council.

The Medical Assembly, a body of 40 medical students, discussed the value of SAC to the medical faculty Tuesday. The assembly has decided to set up a committee to investigate the problem.

"We are sick and tired of SAC's pronouncements on contentious off-campus issues," said John Cowell (III Meds), a member of the assembly's executive.

The major issue in the withdrawal is the "matter of

Mr. Vaughan said, the board would send two members of the board and provide accommodation and secretarial assistance for the committee "if and when such a committee is constituted by the President's Council."

moral decisions SAC is making", said meds SAC representative, Bryan Tanney (III Meds), chairman of the committee to investigate SAC for the 800 medsmen.

Since the pre-medical course is being phased out in favor of a science degree, Tanney sees Medicine more as a graduate course.

"We are both geographically and culturally removed from the rest of the undergraduate campus," said Tanney.

He believes SAC does not provide an adequate link.

The eight-man investigating committee will report to the assembly in January.

Is peace a matter of beads, cessation of war, quietness? Are the draft resisters choosing an impossible dream? Is the peace-of-mind cult valid? The Christian concept of peace is far different than many of us imagine.

However active the leading group may be, its activity will amount to fruitless effort by a handful of people unless combined with the activity of the masses. On the other hand, if the masses alone are active without a strong leading group to organ-

We need an OSAP march

Three years ago, then-SAC president Tom Faulkner organized one of the biggest marches this campus has ever seen. Twenty-four hundred students gathered at Queen's Park to say they thought the Ontario student loan program was lousy.

The march got results — there was more money and it was easier to get. Maybe it's time for another one.

The Ontario Student Awards Program this year is totally inadequate. The Alumni Association, which gives out about $100,000 in loans, reports a much higher number of requests for funds.

The new, tighter regulations have produced situations where students classified independent last year, have to get money from their parents this year. Sometimes, as a result a loan application is refused because a parent won't fill out his part of the loan form.

In Wednesday's case, the government sent a letter claiming, "It is

Some 2,400 University of Toronto students and faculty members marched on the legislature building Wednesday to protest the Ontario government's student awards program.

They marched three to five abreast in a line about half a mile long. The protest was led by Tom Faulkner, president of the Students Administrative Council, who said the government's aid program was a "regressive step which is more of a deterrent than help to university students."

—The Varsity, Sept. 30, 1966

the parents' decision as to whether they wish their son/daughter to be educated or not."

We know of at least four students — and there must be more — who can't get OSAP because they are estranged from their parents. Now, the government claims that if they let these applications go through, students will cheat so their parents won't have to pay anything.

Yet we have it from E.E. Stewart, deputy minister of university affairs, that there is very little cheating on OSAP forms.

Information officer Pat Armstrong has organized a group concerned about OSAP, but they're not sure whether a march on Queen's Park is a viable form of protest. At a meeting this week they decided they'd go ahead with a March if 200 students show up at a meeting Monday, Nov. 11.

Nonsense. Many students who didn't come to the meeting would still be concerned enough to march — and a march seems the only viable way of showing our concern. Governments like nothing better than to form a committee and then sweep the results under the rug. But they can't sweep 5,000 students under a rug.

A march seems to be the only way great numbers of people can register an immediate protest against government policy. We'll also be protesting for people who are out working because they couldn't get OSAP financing. And we'll be protesting for students at universities all over Ontario working under the same financing system.

Pat Armstrong and her OSAP committee say they won't plan a March unless 200 people show up at the Monday meeting. We say march regardless.

A thousand stories

Wednesday's story about the troubles of Bill Lawson, the friendly guy who runs a vending truck outside Sidney Smith, could have been told a thousand times with a thousand different people. They all have one thing in common — they're powerless against an increasingly inhuman and uncaring bureaucracy.

In Lawson's case, it's a series of obsolete bylaws that shouldn't be on the statute books. The members of Metro Council get paid to make laws, but it would cost Lawson a fortune to get the laws revoked or changed.

Lawson can't afford it, so he gets it in the neck.

Many people say that's man's lot and forget it. That's easy to do when you aren't trying to make a living, when all you have to do today is get through a 500-page history of Luxembourg during the Reformation.

But students do have a stake in what happens to Bill Lawson because students are part of the community. Privilege involves responsibility and students have been woefully lacking in responding to this responsibility.

Bill Lawson loses his job if he gets another parking ticket, because of a stupid law that shouldn't be on the books at all. It doesn't do any good to look for villains. Ald. Joe Piccinni calls the vendors like Lawson "fly-by-nights", but he's trapped in the same system as everybody else.

This time mass protest won't work. The restaurant owners are more powerful than the truck vendors in city council, and the wishes of the people with money come before the wishes of the people to a politician. We forget that a favor deserves a favor, after all.

So we have to work within the system, at least until Lawson does lose his job. Maybe a petition would do something. Above all, we need organization, because only that way can the mass of people move against the silent and arrogant monoliths of power that our governments have become.

"McPeake has weak angle on Vietnam"

While I sympathize with the emotion that underlies Barry McPeake's statement on the war in Vietnam, (Varsity Oct. 23). I felt that he had tackled the problem from a weak angle. Stronger objections could have been made to the way in which American forces are waging the war, notably the tactic of bombard and occupy instead of open combat. The profligate use of firepower seems to be responsible for the worst aspect of that war, the high number of innocent civilians killed.

Mr. McPeake tries to attack U.S. policy on a multiplicity of levels: morality, constitutional law, economics, and more. What I question is the framework that he uses to combine all these levels of attack. This comes out in his emphatic statement that "almost since its birth, the United States has had an expansionist policy grounded in the needs of its economy" and, later, "while it is not generally recognized, a direct American commercial interest in Vietnam exists. For the most part it is potential but that makes it no less real."

His framework seems to be a simplified Marxist economic determinism. Having rejected the Cold War myth of "the Free World" which counted Spain among its bastions, I think that it is a pity that Mr. McPeake has embraced an equally rigid dogma. If the university has any purpose, it is to free us from dogma and total thought systems so that we can appreciate the subtleties and complexities of the world and then act to reform society with a liberated understanding of problems. Unless you share Mr. McPeake's dogma, his argument has no logic or rationality to it; it becomes a mechanical and subjective exercise.

The "imperialism" that seems to infect the foreign policies of the U.S., the

COMMENT

U.S.S.R., and possibly, China might be explained as the arrogance that great power gives to its possessor. It is evident in events in Czechoslovakia and in the Dominican Republic that these great powers do not give a fig for the national sovereignty of a neighbouring state if they think that their self-interest is endangered. In a way, De Gaulle's idea of a union of small powers to counterbalance the major powers makes sense. This "imperialism" is more than a simple case of economic self-interest.

The argument that "U.S. intervention in Vietnam (is) a criminal act" because the Saigon regime is illegal and the argument that the North Vietnamese are not invaders because the division of Vietnam is illegal are extremely weak. The Saigon regime is about as legitimate as most governments in this world and the latter argument ignores the precedents of Germany and Korea. I think that Mr. McPeake's dogma has led him out onto thin ice.

I strongly object to the division of wars, which he appears to accept, into "imperialist wars of aggression" and "popular wars of liberation." This division is so subjective as to be absolutely useless; it is tantamount to saying "my wars are good and their wars are bad." I prefer straight out and out pacifism to this sort of doublethink. There is much that is just in McPeake's case but he discredits it with his mechanical world-view; it offends the intelligence. I can only wish that Mr. McPeake were radical enough to break free of thought systems and give us a telling and compassionate argument that appealed to our common humanity.

The momentary saga of nickel and dime bag Pete

He leans on a cane of polished Irish Thorn, designed, he asserts, "to crack at a single blow the thickest of my colleagues' skulls".

He is not a violent man, mind you — a pacifist in the best of times, with a hearty enthusiasm for old ladies and children; he is especially fond of young girls between the ages of ten to thirteen who are quick to respond to his friendly chuckle and the twinkle in his eye as he quickens the stroke on his staff of Irish Thorn.

He is a peaceful man but "the street is a jungle and my colleagues would as soon cut my throat as deal with me".

He emphasizes the point flashing a wad of bills which includes a number of fifties and hundreds — some three thousand dollars.

"It's been a good week; my colleagues (some call me friend) are prone to theft, violence and other acts of a ridiculous and unreasonable nature when they behold my success. As I said before I'm not a violent man, but when you deal with the creeps on the Strip (Yorkville) — Jesus Jesus Jesus God!"

So saying he returned his eyes from heaven to his fingernails which he is assiduously cleaning with a Swedish Commando knife, his Irish Thorn momentarily at rest against the wall of a Yorkville alley.

And thus he waits for business in the shadows of the Strip, an erstwhile merchant, honest, hard-working and above all thrifty — so thrifty that his clients are given to occasional sharp remarks upon discovering that their bag of goods is somewhat short or overly flavoured with oregano and alfalfa.

While the city sleeps, he and his ubiquitous 'colleagues' are waiting on corners in Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Halifax, waiting to score, waiting to deal, waiting to serve the market, filling an ever-present need as they ply the ways and byways of the dope trade — spices from the East! Marco Polos of the Here and Now!

They are not alone; they fill but one niche in a vast political, social and monetary hierarchy which ranges from the nickel-and-dime-bag dealers to the ounce, quarter-pound, pound, kilo, truckload and shipload suppliers.

From the time the cannabis is harvested from the fields of African, Mexican, Brazilian and Panamanian farmers to the time when it finds its way to the week-end parties of lawyers, teachers, students, artists, preachers, suburban housewives and go-go politicians in Ottawa, the weed passes through an elaborate yet tenuous financial network involving the gain (often the loss) of many thousands of dollars.

It is a sensitive world, where fortunes rise and fall daily; often a dangerous one subject to the destructive forces of paranoia and suspicion. So you approach him with due caution — not from fear of the Irish Thorn nor of the Swedish commando knife but from respect of his situation. You hesitate to disturb the implacable front — his 'cool' if you will.

You respect the fact that his nerves are tuned acutely to his immediate surroundings, while his mind ponders the next thousand or evaluates the ever present possibility of a bust. He indicates with a slight nod and a grunt two men seated at the sidewalk tables of the Upper Crust Cafe at Hazelton and Yorkville; they are wearing the casual clothes of the suburban tourist on the town; undercover agents posing as undercover agents, easily spotted.

"The Man — sure he knows me, sure — that one over there followed me here from Regina and Winnipeg; he apparently thinks I'm into something big. I sometimes buy him a coffee and we talk about Trudeau and Black Power — he thinks we're sort of friendly enemies . . ."

He begins to laugh and strokes his Irish Thorn with verve, giving it a few quick strokes against a bush, the air whistling behind it.

He relaxes and his countenance becomes again immobile, his eyes following the action along the Strip, his static stance belied by their darting glances. Fat Simon, Mexican Louis, Greasy Jack, Hepatitis Huey — the world passes by; a few stop briefly and look at him questioningly; he shakes his head and they continue shuffling down Yorkville — his colleagues, comrades in arms, waiting to score with nothing to score.

"Nothing happening on the Strip, nothing happening, Van, Montreal and New York are dry — I hear even California is dry; too many busts at the border, not enough dope, not enough money. I have to catch the noon jet to Montreal and I don't relish the thought of returning without copping.

"No dope; no dope in Canada all summer — and prices are high when it's here; just hash — lots of hash from Africa and the Near East — most of that I cop from the diplomatic corps in Ottawa and it's not always easy."

His nails were done; he adjusted his cap and stepped into the milling crowd and mindless hungry faces of the Strip; he is resplendent in a dark blue serge suit, dark glasses, full beard, his Irish Thorn neatly clearing a path through the crowd.

"There used to be trust" he comments, "in fact the whole operating ethic of dope-dealing was based on trust — now it's a jungle. Everybody's out to burn somebody else; as I said before I'm not a violent man but when you see the lawlessness of the streets . . ." he shrugs and hails a cab poking along Yorkville, mentioning that he will someday run for mayor on the issue of law and order so that innocent men can again walk the streets in safety.

As he steps into the cab he nods towards a plainclothes detective with dandruff on his shoulders, a rear-end grown broad with sitting and a gut grown broad with beer, who is talking to an equally typical uniformed constable.

"They're the real criminals; I don't know how they got loose but whoever gave them guns is completely nuts. When I'm mayor I'll appoint myself police commissioner — until then you'll never catch me talking to a cop in uniform, never."

He slams the door and is gone — off to the suburbs.

middle-class buys dirty jokes at the isaacs

John MacGregor is exhibiting a bunch of dirty jokes at the Isaacs Gallery. They're pretty funny, but I wish he had learned to draw and paint before he put on the show.

A stairway with a piece of phallic broompole on each step is entitled "Dick Descending a Staircase", a pretty good take-off on Duchamp's famous nude. A little birdeage with windup spring motor pokes a phallus through a loop. "Watch the dickie bird jump through the hoop" says the legend. When you wind it up it does just that, with much chirping and twittering.

A rocking chair pokes a phallus through the back of another chair; this is a "homosexual union".

Another motif of the show is the old Dutch Cleanser lady, endlessly multiplied.

So far, so good. The stuff is funny. But the quality of workmanship is something else. The paintings are spotty, the "sculpture" is roughly machined, and the drawings look like preliminary sketches for preliminary sketches. I thought that one aspect of pop art was its imitation of the machined, mass-produced slickness of artifacts. MacGregor's a young fellow, and obviously he has fallen over his dick trying to put a collection of work on display and earn some cash. There's nothing wrong with his wanting to earn money (he could use some to pay for an art education), but I can't see people buying too much of him. It's one thing to have a vulgar joke sitting in your living room, it's another to have it so crudely made that no one knows it's supposed to be art.

The principle motivation of middle-class art collectors seems to be conspicuous consumption — spending your money on something as outrageous as possible. But at the same time the outrageous that you pay for must have a good pedigree. "Dick descending a staircase" is like a society flapper cursing like a trooper at a party; when you get her into one of the adjoining bedrooms to test her mettle she freezes up. Art collectors say "fuck" to twit bourgeois conventions; they never say "fuck" because they have stubbed their toes. That would be non-u.

At the Carmen Lamanna gallery virtually next door to the Isaacs, Barbeau was showing some minimal sculpture: ell-shaped pieces of canvas grouped in triads on the wall. The average price tag was three-hundred and fifty piastres, in other words seventy fins (or thirty-fives sawbucks).

I think that many of our artists today are in the wrong business. Have you ever noticed how many exhibitions of junk are prefaced with elaborately written introductions? Without these introductions they are nothing. Whatever happened to the old-fashioned painters who thought visually, created visually, dreamt visually? People like this Barbeau gink should have been philosophers or newspaper reporters. They dream an idea like "minimal sculpture" and then design the work to fit it. Creativity isn't a uniform quality — there are different kinds. There's verbal, pictorial, musical, etc. Possession of one creative ability doesn't imply possession of any of the others. Why aren't artists today creating visually? Why are they stuffing coke bottles up the returns of bald eagles (The War in Viet Nam), painting black canvases (Abstract Art) and erasing their drawings before selling them (An Erased De Kooning)?

To come back to Barbeau for a minute, I don't think he knows what the ell painting or sculpture is about.

square roots

Three of the best music albums released recently in the popsy-blues-rock-folksy field share at least two characteristics:

1) They have clear roots. Music From Big Pink (Levon and the Hawks, Capitol) is by a band which has been doing rock and roll together for several years. The group derives directly from Bob Dylan's latest work and makes the excellent use of "country and western" style. In My Own Dream (Paul Butterfield Blues Band, Elektra), the best effort to date by one of the first "white-urban-blues" bands, uses a big brass sound effectively, not just for flourishes and decoration, and without the slightest hint of put-on. The Time Has Come (Chambers Brothers, Columbia) includes a variety of styles of urban negro bands, all definable.

2) They are group efforts. Each band is very tight, and all the people involved are integrated into a group sound.

Nobody, including Butterfield, tries to be the star.

Originality and imagination are the springs of these albums. Music From Big Pink is so far out in front of the mainstream of popsy-blah that it will probably be the object of imitators for the next year or more. In My Own Dream is the music of a successful band who didn't necessarily have to try harder to make money; but unlike the majority of successful groups who, once they have accomplished some small coup, sit on their imaginative arses and sell records to teenybops while the dough rolls in, Butterfield and his people have done something new and good. The Chambers Brothers, probably unwittingly, put Motown and its repetitive, schematized drone in place — a few years behind anything that's happening.

Music From Big Pink involves the music with the motif of the lyrics better than Dylan did on John Wesley Harding, and this may be the biggest accomplishment of the group. People have been deriving from Dylan for years, but no-one has drawn from him with such discrimination or developed beyond his original conceptions so well. The use of keyboards — from baroque and churchy to hard-rock organ, from circus to honky-tonk piano — by the Big Pink band paces their music, and the music is woven tightly with the melancholy ballads and moral preaching of country and western tradition.

How much did Dylan have to do with Big Pink? He wrote two of the songs, drew the cover and, according to reports, advised on editing. Beyond this he has had a professional association with Levon and the Hawks which extends back before Blonde on Blonde. Together they have now opened up the most interesting new area for popular music.

The Paul Butterfield Blues Band which has also had a professional association with Dylan, looked originally like it had only one trick in its bag, and that sound — hard, loud, white blues — has always been wanting in control, variety and tightness. (This is not to say Butterfield hasn't made more good music in the past few years than most people in the business.)

Only two of the group's original members remain, Elvin Bishop and Mark Nafatalin (listed as Naffly Marham in the liner notes). But the departure of Mike Bloomfield and Sam Lay from the band may well have helped the Butterfield sound as much as some used to think it would hurt him. Bloomfield's playing, as good as it often is, and Lay's personality, as entertaining as it is, are both musically obtrusive. Would it have been possible for the group to achieve the soft, controlled, non-jamming style which characterizes In My Own Dream as long as Bloomfield was with them? There's good reason to doubt it. (One might observe at this juncture that Butterfield's band seems to capture on this record what Bloomfield tried hard to grasp on his group's Electric Flag — a coherent statement of good old traditional U.S.A. pop music styles.)

The Chambers Brothers recent success in person at the Rock Pile relieved the doubts of some of their critics that the title song of The Time Has Come is planned freak-out; The group was casual and professional and did not try to impose themselves or their musical power on the audience. The Afro-psychedelia of The Time Has Come written by Joe and Willie Chambers, contrasts enough with the rest of the album, none of which is by Joe or Willie, to suggest that there are at least two musical schools of thought in the group. Any tension created by the Brothers' diversity of tastes seems to be productive though, since everything they do is done well. (This writer has not heard their album just released and is talking only about The Time Has Come.)

requiem for an evening

Only the competitive spirit of festivals justifies the presentation of one-act plays in lumps, usually of three, as is going on presently at the Central Library. Supposedly the premise is that nobody would come out to see one or two. After Wednesday night I will not even come out to see three.

Comparative merits aside three is at least one play too many. Even for connoisseurs of 'the concise art form', there is little consolation, short of the Sandwich Show, a pretty poor one at that. Am I working for the demise of the short play? Not per se, but surely there must be a better way. The problem, is to put forth a good evening's entertainment in which there are as many as three equally-weighted spheres of action.

This problem acknowledged, we come to Three Acts for an Evening. To begin with they were, by admission, commissioned and first produced' for the CBC. My bias against TV drama is personal but the least one can expect, surely, is that it be restricted to presentation on television. To stage it, as George Jonas has attempted in "Happy Birthday, Death," 'cinematically', or in Pinteresque terms, laconically, is an assault on the theatre-goer's sensibilities. The play, an ill-chosen start for an ill-fated evening, consists of a series of memoranda, alternately from a General in charge of Bombing Hiroshima, and the Director of the Programme, to their respective secretaries. The General is an Anti-American Canadian's conception of an American General with a bomb.

The Director is an 'idealist' who cites the Bhagavad Gita and Donne's Holy Sonnets at will and feels that one moral-ly has to drop a bomb to justify the $2 billion spent on its research. All this, mounted on Les Lawrence's beige blocks, is a play? If even the actors were good . . . but I defy any actor to do anything worthwhile with Jack Winter's deadly, cliché-ridden script. They are adequate, to be sure. They are probably good in the right circumstances, or in any connected set of situations comprising a circumstance. They are a bit of a concentration strain in Happy Birthday, Death.

Onward, valiant critic. (The chiefest occupational hazard of reviewing one-act plays, en masse, is that there's no walking out half-way through). Act Two is a pseudo-profound 'comment' upon old age, done in the improbable guise of a murder-by-omission on the part of an old man's daughter and son-in-law. A modern fable? The set, the aforementioned blocks covered by white tarpaulins, supposedly evokes — that word again — universal country field in winter. The symbols are as in sledgehammer—winter, space, timelessness in an unbounded season. It is accentuated by a soliloquy — the old man making sure the point is made — by subtleties as original as 'let me die, then' and 'I'm no use any more.' Three small boys enter to save him — ah, youth! — and they function to liven up the tedium ad nauseam although not dramatically. George Jonas is the lesser villain this time by a substantial margin. Ian Malcolm's play would not get through screening at a college playwriting contest.

'Isn't it great?' said the man behind me after the last play. 'Best one yet'. Well, whoopee and hooray for Hazel, or Grace, rather Grace Richardson, that is, author of an in-depth, penetrating sociological piece of resistance, the watershed of a soggy night. It has the compelling title of You Are the Only Wasp I Know. This one — let none accuse the producers of an unvaried selection of themes — deals with loneliness, frustration, impotence, in the relationships of people slipping tragically into adulthood. There are funny moments, which without qualification exist as good reason for this play appearing here.

The scene is the bachelor-flat set-up, drink after drink serving as an excuse for prolonging the agony and a succession of painful confessions and revelations serving as the plot. The lights dim with the usual lack of resolution and premonitions that there will be eternally more of the same. The only reaction I mustered was that the lights had gone down . . .

grass's flood by twp a bit soggy

"Rain, Rain Go Away..."
 "And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth..."
 Genesis 6:7

Gunter Grass is an author of catastrophe. An unwilling witness to the atrocities committed by his native land Germany in the Second World War, he reflects in his works the disastrous effects of catastrophe on the human mind. His play Flood which opens up a new season for Toronto Workshop Productions presents man's reaction to yet another disaster.

What kind of disaster is this? This would appear to be a pretty foolish question judging from the title. The play begins with a reading of the Biblical account of the Flood. The principal character is called (almost too obviously), Noah, and all the players wear mouldy, soggy-looking apparel and cast longing glances up to the sky. Ostensibly man's foe is the rain: but surely there is more intended.

Noah does not build himself an ark. He is as much concerned with saving his prized collection of inkwells as he is with saving himself. Likewise, his sister Betty (Mrs. Noah is dead,) spends all her time worrying about the volumes and volumes of family photographs which may be ruined by the water.

God does not appear in the play: he is not even mentioned. The disaster here is human: it is not natural. It might have been a flood, it might have been an earthquake, it might have been a war. Grass's Flood actually presents the archetypal disaster — one more catastrophe which man must try to face in his struggle for survival.

The characters are representative of all mankind. Besides old Noah and his sister, there is Noah's daughter Yetta, shapely, angry and defiant, with her fiance Henry, an idealistic, effeminate youth who can see the sun even when it's still raining. Noah's wandering son Leo pops out of a crate of inkwells with his Negro buddy, Congo (why not?). That's just about it, except for two rats, Pearl and Point, who have the misfortune to be stuck on the "sinking ship," with these weird people. Keep your eye on the rats, because they are generally more human than the humans and act as a kind of traditional Greek chorus with Brooklyn accents.

In this play the barometer falls and then rises but not too much else happens. All the characters tell stories recalling the past: several talk about what they are going to do if it ever stops raining. For a while the daughter and Congo have something going together. But only the rats seem to know what is happening. At the end of the play, the rainbow comes. The humans are too lost in nostalgia and themselves to notice the sign, while the rats prepare to make a pilgrimage — to Hamelin of course. It is said that rats always desert a sinking ship first, and as they leave the soggy, muddy house we feel certain that rain or shine, life will be something of a disaster for these people.

The production which opened Tuesday night, while not a disaster itself, is at best uninspired. George Luscombe's direction, here as always, is often unusual but seldom really effective. He makes no effort to clarify the symbolism which runs rampant through the play, and devices such as the deliberate muffling and echoing of dialogue do very little to explain the play's message. In addition the players have some trouble moving around on a three level stage made of planks and crates.

What we are offered is an agitated bombardment of sight and sound but little clarity. In the absence of actual, wet rain we have music by Brian Yukich, played by a trio backstage. The music is undeniably novel and artistically lively — and I didn't like it one bit. It was loud, often drowning out (no pun intended) the actors. There was far too much of it for my taste.

The acting was, for the most part, dull. Lines were polished and precise, but at the same time, each actor appeared to be on his own rain-cloud carefully avoiding any emotional involvement with the others. Henry, the fiance played by P.M. Howard and Keith Dalton as the brother come closest of the humans to doing something meaningful.

But thank goodness for the rats! Played by Charlene Roycht and Ray Whelan, of all the pairs in this Noah's ark they come closest to a team. They were polished, humorous and they were able to conquer the various obstacles of the stage. Whelan in particular shows the suppleness of body and spirit which have become a trademark of the Toronto Workshop Productions.

While I was hardly inspired by TWP's production of Flood, as I left the theatre I was thankful for one thing at least — it wasn't raining.

Watching Richard Reoch's play, "Phaeton's Birthday", that immortal phrase from Macbeth came to mind, no matter how hard I tried to forget it: "'Tis a tale told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Now Reoch is not an idiot; he may even be brilliant. But the play is definitely full of sound and fury, and is so pitifully performed as to end up signifying nothing.

But the reviewer can't get away that easily. It is, granted, an amateur production, written by an author who is the first to admit that his play may not please everybody.

Nonetheless it was presented at the Poor Alex Theatre, open to the public and people are paying money to see it. Also, the actors and the playwright seemed darned serious about it, so they might as well know where they went wrong.

It is a modern free adaptation of the Apollo and Phaeton legend (Phaeton was Apollo's son and drove his father's sun chariot across the sky, losing control). Apollo is a jobless young idealist in a Depression era, nagged by his wife Daphne, who earns the bread. Their marriage breaks up. Ajax and Nemesis live in an apartment downstairs and Nemesis tried to find in Apollo a substitute for Ajax, who is devoted to Achilles.

The first question that arises is: Is the play basically good enough to merit production? I read it three nights ago, after talking to Reoch for a while about his ideas. The play looked good. I was caught up in the verse of the thing, the language wavering between modern day colloquialisms and Reoch's sometimes lyrical and beautiful, sometimes embarrassingly awful poetry.

I was also impressed with his grasp of the subtleties of human interactions and his soberness in dealing with their problems, especially in the scenes between Apollo and Daphne, where they discuss how their marriage has gone sour.

Somehow, I overlooked the great flaws in theatrical unity and utter lack of drama sense that would make the production the disaster it was.

Reoch has many good ideas, some fresh, others terrifying, most provoking. If only the production had not insisted in ramming these views down our throats, some semblance of order would have prevailed.

It is amazing that Reoch as director and actor (the chorus), did not see the worth in his own play. He came on throughout, giving an extremely hard sell on the themes of death, human frailty, misery and transience of life. He was only ludicrous.

Perhaps the lion's share of the credit for ruining the play goes to the cast, which, because of the perfection of their useless stylized mannerisms and morbidity, made the production one big nightmare. George Young as Apollo was so stiff and rigid in both his acting and characterization that some of the other actors actually looked good. His voice, and that of others, hardly ever wavered in tone except for occasional bouts of screaming. The tone of the play did not vary one iota from beginning to end. Nobody did anything right.

It is useless and wasteful to describe the poorness of the production, so the reviewer will try something new and revolutionary, (horror of horrors!) He will try and make some suggestions in the way of positive criticism (something seldom done by critics) if, indeed, the play can be salvaged.

The action and words must go a lot faster if anything is to go right. Also many, many words must be cut. The chorus, is too sinister and too wordy to be serious. Get rid of George Young as Apollo or teach him how to act. There is absolutely no communication between the actors and this wasn't done on purpose. If each actor acts in a void, then you see nothing but a series of poetry readings, which is just what happened.

In addition, if the actors weren't so damned intense, the subtleties that Reoch tries to project might be evident. As it is, the actors seem only to be mouthing words that they don't understand just for the sake of ranting.

Maybe if the actors understood what common end they are all working for, the play might have some direction. It is virtually impossible to do a play on the pretext, "Whatever you are looking for, you will find/Discover what you seek." This is a line from the opening chorus, and it may be alright for the audience but it wasn't meant for the actors. They and the director must know what they seek. Reoch is full of glimpses, hints, intimations and insights, some of them excellent; but nowhere is any one carried through to any conclusion.

Perhaps if someone besides Reoch were to direct the play, and somebody else were to take the part of the chorus, a fresh approach would make for a more effective production.

Maybe it would have been easier to dismiss the play outright. Despite the richness of ideas and the potential drama, it is not at all well-written. The characters are never deeply investigated. The action is static. Nothing really ever happens.

The real theme, if there is one, appears as Apollo realizes that he must face up to the breakdown with his wife, the spectre of death, the wretchedness of Nemesis that engulfs him, the moral defeat that Ajax suffers when Achilles dies, and the pre-conscious ties of the legend and heritage on all his actions.

Apollo then provides a mirror for all men to see their dilemmas. Reoch shows this much. But the mirror is cracked in many places and clouded over beyond recognition. It needs much work.

ORWELL

The Collected Essays, Journalism and Letters of George Orwell, edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus, Secker & Warburg Four volumes

In his book on George Orwell, The Crystal Spirit, George Woodcock tells the ironic story of how an irate Englishman thrust a copy of Nineteen Eighty-Four in to the hands, of the well-known Trotskyist scholar Isaac Deutscher, saying "Now you see why we should drop the bomb on the Bolsheviks".

I have listed his shortcomings and eccentricities first just to get them out of the way. For these books confirm Orwell in his position as the greatest journalist and critic of the century. No one else — Edmund Wilson, H.G. Mencken, Walter Lippmann — comes close. None had his depth of experience, his understanding of the human animal, his command of the language, nor his sense of humour and humanity. None produced with truth and hypocrisy, with the official lie and its officialese explanation. He became an expert on propaganda and the distortion of language: some of his best, and most trenchant writing deals with the decline of English as a means of communicating good sense. It was a lonely battle, and Orwell was a rebel against the prevailing orthodoxies of the Marxist left in England for some time. He was a bitter opponent of the Poputhy, went completely awry. This is not to say that he lost his perspective: he merely carried his first fears about Mass Society which these volumes allow us to trace — to their logical, if frightening, conclusion. Orwell's essays on language, on how to write, and political identification, are of particular value today. One of his most telling columns in "As I Please" was about Fascism, and Fascists, and how what was once a Public Hypocrisy. So was Orwell. His later preoccupations have been borne out in time. He wrote with admirable simplicity and strength, as well as with humour and decency. His was a sane voice in an age given to political hysteria, and yet it was not a compromising voice. He was humane, but never bland. The essays and letters contain some ruthless analyses of his contemporaries, but he was often prepared to

Essays and Letters

Orwell's last book has been adopted as a rather grim joke. The publication of Orwell's complete work gives us a chance to see just how grim the irony is.

The essays, letters and journalism of George Orwell have been edited in four fat volumes. The editors have done a very good job indeed. Their footnotes are useful and unobtrusive, the index is a model of its kind. The edition is not marked by the pseudo-scholarship that has marred the publications of so many Great Authors in America. In short, the work is never obscure.

The appearance of these volumes gives us a chance to look at Orwell afresh. And not just the Orwell of Animal Farm and 1984, both of which were written near the end of his life, but the author of The Road to Wigan Pier, Keep the Aspidochelone, Flying, and A Clergyman's Daughter. For Orwell's strength was not primarily as a novelist, but as a journalist and essayist. His novels — with the exception of Animal Farm — will never rank as great fiction.

Orwell's greatness is in his quality as a critic. He was not a great political thinker, and he tended to idealize the virtues of the English working class and England in general almost to the point of Chrestianian sentimentality. (See his essays "On England" and "English Cooking"). He also created the annoying caricature of the left-wing intellectual, the vegetarian, effeminate, sandal-wearing 'parlour Bolshevik', who contrasted sharply with the virile, commonsensical, working class hero of whom Orwell was so fond.

Orwell's early life as a writer in the late 1920's and 1930's was spent living as a tramp, picking hops in the south of England, serving as a waiter in Paris and London. Then it was on to Wigan Pier, the slum district in Manchester, and a tour of grimy industrial England.

Orwell has left us accounts of these journeys in three early books; the first volume of these collected essays provides us with some fascinating background notes from his diary, "Hop-Picking", and "In Wigan Pier."

This was the first phase of Orwell's work. It left him with an extraordinary personal knowledge of poverty and its effect on the human spirit. He lived as a self-imposed down-and-outer for years. It also gave Orwell his great sympathy for the English working man, for his decency, his common sense, for his humour. We can see too in this period signs of his interest in popular culture, as revealed in subsequent essays on Donald McGill's postcards and on the weekly magazines.

The Spanish Civil War was perhaps the most important single event in Orwell's life. He went off in 1937 and fought in Catalonia on the side of the Republicans (read his Homage to Catalonia). "I have seen wonderful things and at last really believe in Socialism, which I never did before", he wrote Cyril Connolly. It also marked Orwell's revulsion against the Communist Party, against Stalinism and totalitarianism.

All his writing after this period becomes more directly political in its tone and content. He is concerned, above all, Orwell's best journalism appeared during the war, in a column entitled "As I Please" in the Tribune, a left-wing publication run by Aneurin Bevan and George Strauss. It reflects all his interests, and the columns are contained in the third volume of the collection. Like virtually all of Orwell's work, they are as relevant today as they were when they were written which is surely something of a feat for a weekly column. The feature contained three or four 'thoughts' of a few paragraphs each: from popular culture to London pubs to Charles Dickens to Thackeray to political pamphlets from the left and right.

In one typical article he discusses Italian propaganda about living conditions in London, and moves on to a general examination of official names and political labels and their significance. Then comes a short analysis of the decline of the English short story. The final few paragraphs are devoted to the marriage customs of the Babylonians, as related by Herodotus.

Racked by tuberculosis, obsessed with his vision of a controlled, mindless, truthless political world, Orwell moved from the field of pure political satire in his most brilliant book Animal Farm, published in 1945, to the frightening picture of 1984. Orwell's world, never optimistic, never healing the past thirty years have been so consistently impervious to the fashionable bunk of the moment. In a time of universal panic and lying he is a good person to make contact with." So is Orwell.

Hanoi Diary, by Rabbi Feinberg. A Longmans Book.

The Secret Search for Peace in Vietnam, by David Kraslow and Stuart H. Loory. Vintage Books.

The Military Half, by Jobnathan Schell. Vintage Books.

It did not take the war in Vietnam very long to become an obnoxious bore to most of us watching it on the TV set at home, or glancing over front page accounts in the newspaper of various forgettable scuffles in the rice paddies. Of course, all wars are mostly boredom, at least for the participants, but they usually had their compensations for the stay-at-homes. There was, for one thing, the clear joy of tension released at the start of a war when the troops marched off: the hope for victories was like the hope that an impossibly good natured and polite Joe Louis would get into the ring and pound the shit out of Sonny Liston. And when the realization set in that in any big war both sides got their lumps, inevitably, there was still a scientific curiosity for the people back home in the visible campaigns and battles of the front, there was an available supply in the national psyche of not too disagreeable mental images defining these campaigns and battles for them.

In Vietnam, our side never marched off to fight the enemy; they were shipped off gradually according to calculations of our generals, according to their estimates of how many Americans in uniform were needed at any given moment to keep the action hot while our Air Force and Navy tried to win a victory over the enemy (assumed or real, they could never be sure) with bombs and artillery. And our collective images of this conflict were as stimulating as recreation time in a terminal ward for cancer patients. Our antagonists depended, in this conflict, on their knowledge of the land, on their endurance, their ability to sight the enemy and move in or out according to advantage; we depended on jets with napalm, helicopters with hot breakfasts, B-52's from Thailand and Guam.

In this atmosphere of conscious boredom and revulsion, books on Vietnam are not, and never have been, very appetizing. Some have been useful to buttress arguments pro and con for U.S. involvement — as far as anybody is still anxious to pursue such arguments, based on the threads of history, diplomacy, geopolitics, etc. Others had less to tell than a five minute report from Saigon on Huntley-Brinkley. The essential problem is that describing the war adequately is like trying to describe adequately a huge traffic jam on the freeways of Los Angeles. The effect of a composite description, of an "over-all look", no matter how perceptive, would be mere chaos and nausea: to bring order to the description, however, and understanding to the reader it would be necessary to sort out from the vast collage separate images, and to trace them to their separate roots millions of miles away, in small garages offering respite from universal schizophrenia.

This requirement is precisely why a book like Mailer's Why We Are in Vietnam, which ostensibly has nothing to do with the American war effort, will bring us the balm of understanding, healing order to our perceptions, far more than any on-the-spot reportage. Nonetheless, the requirements of literary heroism do not necessarily invalidate other, more journalistic, efforts at bringing understanding to the problem. In a world of official lies, we are lucky to get what morsels of understanding we can — even though the boredom by this time may have become much too pervasive for most of us to bother.

Rabbi Feinberg's Hanoi Diary is almost painfully conscious of its task of penetrating the official lie barrier on North Vietnam. Unfortunately, this hard-driving consciousness is not the only painful effect produced in this mass of rabbinical prose. For, even if one makes allowances (after all, I suppose, the book is called a "Diary") and does not expect the prose of a Mary McCarthy, still the style is puzzling enough, at least until it strikes the reader that he has actually seen it many times before: it is the style of messages jotted down on post cards. The book consists entirely of these messages, a tiresome series of wide-eyed observations, the significance and triviality of each one almost always blurred by a spray coat of over-worked irony, or of pious indignation, or wistfulness. Sometimes the coat becomes embarrassingly wet, as in the sentence where Rabbi Feinberg raps Washington for callousness towards its bombing of civilians: "It does not allocate much importance to the possibility that a school, and the soft torsos of a half-dozen lovely little dark-haired pupils can be gutted by bombs that fall from a plane whizzing through the sky over a church-centered hamlet on the fringe of Hanoi — much less acknowledge the "accident" with humility, or apologize for the "incident" with courtesy." After reading several pages of this stickiness you have to admit that the Rabbi's heart is in the right place, but that the book is not very useful either.

Messrs. Kraslow and Loory, on the other hand, make it clear from the start that they are proper journalists (no small favor after reading Mr. Feinberg). In living up to this role — that is, in avoiding both masses of irrelevant detail and flights of overstatement in their narrative — they have succeeded in making something readable which otherwise would have been insufferable: the story of the many and varied peace initiative failures in the Vietnamese War, up to the time of the Paris talks. The insufferable potential is unmistakable, it looms large; this is nothing more or less, after all, than an account of diplomatic molehills that could have been mountains. Even the pattern for keeping the molehills down to size is unvarying: for the U.S. it consists in making promising contacts with Hanoi, beginning to clear up points of negotiation with these contacts, and then sending the bombers North in new waves of intensity, stepping up military action in the South, and finally castigating Hanoi for its lack of response in following up the initiative.

Of course the pattern may not be a pattern at all, or at least not a deliberate one. One State Department adviser is quoted in the book as warning us: "Never underestimate stupidity, lack of judgement and lack of coordination as factors in foreign policy. What appears to be a pattern may not be a pattern at all. Things sometimes simply happen that are not supposed to happen."

Apart from this basic reassurance, two points in the book, which are not really explicitly drawn by the reporters, struck the reviewer as particularly interesting.

The first is the suggestion that if Lyndon Johnson and his decision-making coterie, with their sensitivity to "peace feelers", had been in power at the time of the Cuban missile crisis, none of us would be alive now. The second is a hint of the rouge on the face of Dean Rusk's eminent and public reasonableness, suggested to be a light but durable cosmetic of lies.

Jonathan Schell's book is distinguished by his willingness to look lunacy in the face without whimpering, to give us the chaos and nausea as if we were actually prepared to acknowledge it and possibly handle it in some way. The word "lunacy" is a generic term for what is probably the most schizophrenic war in history. Not only is the soul of the individual participant fragmented here, but the most elementary identity of the enemy himself is lost and virtually undiscoverable. The "pacification" of the land becomes an exercise in nihilistic caution; every native, every hut, every hamlet in the territory to be pacified has a highly ambiguous identity so that the only truly safe response for the pacifiers is one of pure destruction. And the reshaping of the land which has been destroyed will be on the gigantic scale of American wizardry: we will not stop until every peasant in South Vietnam abandons his charred village and moves to the city to work as a shoeshine boy in, front of the neighborhood brothel.

The process is recorded in Mr. Schell's book. What occurs in the minds of the soldiers and airmen who actually carry out the orders of the "military half" (working in conjunction with the pacifiers, the "civilian half") is also obliquely recorded. There is a song which an Air Force major sings, after insisting, "You can't let it get to you, or your couldn't go on. . . After you've done it for a while you forget that there are people down there.":

Strafe the town and kill the people
Drop napalm in the square
Get out early every Sunday
And catch them at their morning prayer

It is a hoarse song of ridicule, of course, one that could easily echo down the corridors of an asylum, past the rooms where we sit in the silence of our boredom. It is not such a very long distance, after all, from these rooms to the rear of the building where the patients are being murdered, slowly.

big J meets the impeccable lover

The curtains part and what? We see another set of curtains fill the screen — and there's an orchestra tuning up on film. O smashing! Just like the theatre! And now a five minute overture before the curtains part. But what's this? Newsreels of Saigon? Wartime whores and bustling streets? And what's that big bag of saccharine being pushed along the counter? And why is everyone laughing? Wait! That's no bag of saccharine — that's Julie Andrews! And that's not Saigon — that's a London pub circa 1900! Oh! it's the life of Gertrude Lawrence, glamour girl of the Middle Ages. Banana oil!

Yes, the Jul opened Wednesday night at the University Theatre in STAR! her greatest success since Thoroughly Modern Millie. This time Big J has forsaken the jecune and cultivates the sophisticated (Hello dahlings). Nor is she reluctant to taste of sex (pulling rifles through her girlfriend's crotch).

Yes, if you doubt that Jules is the Sarah B. of the Ramjet set you have yet to see her capers as she unleashes seventeen, count 'em, new hits and beguiles the audience with such trenchant epigrams as "cripes." And if you still doubt such talent, why you have three and a quarter, hours to change your mind.

To be fair, though STAR runs on into the most tedious crap you're likely to see.

It begins well enough with some skillfully meshed newsreel/filmreel scenes of the old days and a few good vaudeville numbers. Gertie meets Noel Coward (Daniel Massey) and off they go through the next thirty years with "ta" and a "bob" to become the toast of London and New York.

Enter Romance. Gertie knocks off the lovers like first-night audiences, and collects a daughter on the way from first hubbie, Jack Roper (John Coltin).

"Oh Jack, I shouldn't have done it," says Gertie as they exit from the church. Not to be outdone, the Rope divorces her.

Enter Sir Antony Spencer (Michael Craig), the Impeccable Lover from H.M.'s Royal Guard. But, alas! she must soon from Sir Ant the Impec away, for Gertie is bound for America and more success.

There she meets that Brash Young Charles ("I could return and seduce you in the morning") Fraser (Robert Reed). But will our Gert forget Sir Ton for this creep? Will success spoil the caw blimey girl? Not bloody likely!

Well, Gertie runs through the '20's and '30's and finally finds herself a stranger to her daughter Pamela (Jenny Agutter) and 24,000 pounds in debt. Her spirits sag and so does the show. Thenceforth we are treated to scene after scene of St. Julia with her bum to the wall, heroically fighting her way back to happiness. Which turns out to be Strong Lover Richard Aldrich (Richard Crenna) wherewith the picture ends.

If it had only been sooner, you may find yourself saying, hut a pity, because the previous portion was such a giggle like unto Mod Milly. However, even we most ardent admirers must face facts: Big Julie has now caw blimeyed us to tears. In fact, she must terminate such silliness. . . The Ramjet set won't find much wrong with this flic, but please Big J., next time keep the hits down to an even dozen or so.

daniel massey renounces throne and hollywood?

The Massey tribe is Canada's answer to the royal family, yet Daniel, son-of-Raymond (spiritual father to Doctor Kildare) has no aspirations to the throne. There he sat in Hart House before a blazing hearth and beneath illustrious Uncle Vincent's court portrait surrounded by the eager vassals of campus theatre, and held forth with amazing honesty, frankness and even perception on his latest film Star, his theatrical career and Daniel Massey.

Massey, 35, who dislikes Uncle Vincent and whose future "is sprinkled with stars" has no misconceptions about the enduring artistic merit of his role in the mammoth musical extravaganza, Star — "I did it because the money was good and I needed it because I had alimony to pay. But it's about as meaningful as . . . (pause) . . . well, you know. One talks artistically, but there is always money unfortunately."

Does he worry about compromising himself as an actor as a result of this film? "I'm in the business to act not to worry about compromising myself. When I left university I was full of ideals and I roared and screamed as they were dragged from me. But eventually you end up with a compromise that works. You see, I'm still being truthful to myself in the situation in which I'm forced to work."

What happens to an actor in the legitimate theatre who can, at best, hope for only three months of steady employment? Plummer and Burton launched themselves, or is it sunk, into their careers as Hollywood stars. Daniel Massey is following in the best tradition of the American theatre with his role in Star, yet unlike Plummer and Burton, Massey sees his movie career as one of expediency. Appear in yet another of Hollywood's colossally pointless efforts, have your every gesture captured in vibrant technicolor and Todd-AO, receive five million dollars worth of publicity, and then . . . then return with fame and a coincidental fortune to the humble stage still uncompromised. That's Massey's plan. But not to be unreasonably cynical, Daniel Massey might just be able to do it. If passion counts for anything he's already succeeded.

"I was trained in the theatre and I will always go back to the theatre no matter how much filming I do. There is nothing in the movies which can touch the theatre . . . because theatre is a flesh and blood experience."

The whole insidious plot that Twentieth Century-Fox has sprung on the unsuspecting public is to create a sequel to West Side Story and The Sound of Music which combined grossed $140,000,000. When Daniel Massey exclaimed, "People are attuned to advertising", he spoke with sage words.

Perhaps, the question of Massey's motives for appearing in this particular "smash-eron" are academic. Hollywood works in strange and wondrous ways, but if as he maintains "Hollywood is becoming much less of Hollywood than it used to be", it certainly isn't evident from his movie. Star is simply the Ziegfeld Follies revisited. Its best moments are its most mindless moments. Its worst, its dramatic scenes.

The image of Daniel Massey, the Hollywood movie-star, captured by the studio photographer, apart from being wildly presumptuous, is simply illusory. It's difficult to imagine Massey with his humble stage still uncompromised. That's Massey's plan. But not to be unreasonably cynical, Daniel Massey might just be able to do it. If passion counts for anything he's already succeeded. Sincerity isn't exactly a characteristic feature of Hollywood, yet Daniel Massey is sincere. The scion of a family which has built tractors and Hart House, and who admits a dislike for Uncle Vincent, must be honest.

jean-luc godard's politics of joy

After Weekend, what's left to say? Godard has set some of the limits for film expression and perhaps, as he claims, created "the end of cinema".

At any rate Weekend, now at Cinecity, will certainly increase the despair currently spreading through film circles—that all film-makers should retire to the sidelines and let Bergman and Godard have the floor.

For each in his own way, Bergman with his introspection and Godard with his superb showmanship, is the forerunner for a whole slew of imitators.

In this, his latest film, Godard covers the screen with gobs and gobs of blood, greed, and Marx, deluges us with colourful images, and pounds us on the head with propaganda, leaving us with no alternative but to follow blindly through whatever nightmares he's dreamed up.

At thirty-seven, with fifteen films in cans, no one can predict with any kind of certainty what Godard will do next. After "Blonde on Blonde", "John Wesley Harding" came as a surprise, and yet one could still trace the cyclical progression of Dylan's music returning him to his roots. But with Godard, who can say?

And yet Weekend isn't entirely new. It combines some of the sense of the absurd of Pierrot le Fou, and the idea of the young revolutionaries from La Chinoise — this time, he doesn't show us a news clip of a burning monk, but a sequence where Roland senselessly burns Emily Bronte. And of course there are the usual Godard trademarks, his "mis en suits", his sense of colour, and his penchant for shock imagery. But what is new is a better sense of timing—some of his gag scenes really do work—and his use of violence, blood, and gore—enough to make you gag the next time you eat breaded pork.

Weekend is a film that most perfectly fuses Godard's head with his camera. The one is now more easily palatable, the other more of a craft.

Godard has centred his film on two non heroes, Roland and Corrine, two of the most bitchy, selfish, money-hungry people you'd care not to meet, and though we follow them through a Mad Hatter's tea party on top of a funeral pyre, witness them killing her mother for her money and then watch them in turn captured by a band of young guerrilla fighters, we do not feel any more sympathy for Roland's oozing bloody head than we do for the stunned pig whose throat is slit.

For Godard is weaning us completely away from the Pollyanna days of our Hollywood youth. Away from our optimistic naivety that the good guys always win to a point where there are no likeable good guys and where there is no victory.

Godard portrays history as a cyclical one, in which man like Sisyphus is getting nowhere fast. Weekend is a pessimistic statement about man's condition, for it says that violence is our nature. According to Godard there is little difference between the shitty bourgeois and the shitty revolutionaries.

In this film, he doesn't allow us to get close to the guerrilla fighters as he did in La Chinoise. And so, the senselessness, the killings, and the callousness, roll absurdly on, dulling our own sensibilities to the point where we anticipate the blood and wait for it. Godard uncovers our own minds and we find that perhaps the whole movie isn't that absurd after all. He says that Weekend is a film "taken from a scrap heap" but what he's really done is a Bergman striptease and made a film about us.

FILM CANADA

It is easy to talk about the cinema as an art form, the cinema as a shaper of culture or the cinema as a reflection of our times. It is so easy, in fact, that we often forget that it is also a business.

It sells a product which requires an apparatus for distribution and advertising. And it employs people who in turn require unions.

Though often ignored in discussions of the cinema, these unions have enough power to affect the business of making films in Canada substantially, both beneficially and harmfully. In order to examine these effects it is necessary to look at the nature of these organizations.

The two unions most involved in film making in this country are the Director's Guild of Canada, and the International Alliance of Theatre and Stage Employees (IATSE), which takes in everyone from camera men to script girls.

The Canadian film industry is no more immune to the economic influence of the U.S. than any other business. It comes as no surprise, therefore, that the Director's Guild has a working agreement with its American counterpart, whereby a Canadian working in the states for an American company has to join the American Director's Guild and vice versa. However it is autonomous in all other respects.

The IATSE has its head offices in the States and is thus in a different position although it does have local autonomy. But one of its locals, 644 (cameramen), is a direct subsidiary of a New York local.

The Director's Guild and the IATSE also differ in their objectives. In its constitution the Director's Guild establishes much more than policies about working conditions, wages etc. It has adopted measures relating to the industry as a whole. One goal is listed as the following: "The Guild shall function as a clearing house for dissemination and advancement of new ideas and developments . . ." George Gorman, the Executive Secretary states another aim to "fire away at the Government, lobbying against what is wrong." He felt that the government would be better off supporting private business, instead of channeling money for feature films to agencies like the National Film Board which makes good movies without seeming able to capitalize on them. In particular he referred to the Ernie Game, probably the best Canadian feature ever made. They let it sit for a year, unable to sell or distribute it to get a return on their investment. They refused to spend money on promotion. He summed up his feelings on the NFB's ineptitude: "They are not certain whether or not they're in show business. Either they should go in whole hog or get out."

Periodically the press demands to know why we don't have a strong feature film industry in Canada. It proceeds to answer its own question with a mournful litany about, 'lack of money, lack of interest, lack of talent . . . etc'.

However, while these are all very real problems with which a film maker must deal, there can also be more technical problems behind them. A director must get many organizations functioning together smoothly to produce a successful film. Any one of them can upset the process.

An example of this is the strange case of David Secter and the IATSE. The problem arose from Secter's feature film The Offering, which he was making on a very tight budget. According to Paul Hoffert who worked with him on the film, Secter had to reach an understanding with the cameramen's union in order to finish the film.

Because this union (644 IATSE) is controlled from the US, its rates were the same as those charged by Hollywood cameramen. Secter couldn't afford to pay these rates. He also felt that the local cameramen would be unaccustomed to feature work, since the bulk of the film work done in Toronto goes toward the making of commercials. The union allowed him to proceed with non union cameramen.

Hoffert went on: "The union decided to throw the book at him, after Secter leaked some information to the press. When the film was run it was beset by accidents. For example, the union projectionist would forget to turn the house lights off when he ran the film."

In addition, Columbia, a distributor which handles many Canadian films, was pressured into discontinuing distribution of The Offering. In the vulnerable position of being a film maker as well as a distributor, Columbia gave in.

This was an important event in Canadian film. It demonstrated that an American based union is quite able to prevent the showing of a Canadian film in Canada.

Hoffert felt this was done as a test case by the union, and it scared away other people from working in 35mm.

The last charge has particular significance. The big theatre chains and distributors, like Columbia, will not accept films in less than 35mm. Yet most of the films made by independent movie makers have been shot in 16mm, using non union cameramen and so on. Because of this size limit these films are restricted to small independent theatres like Cinecity and the Electra.

Film unions have also been criticized for impeding progress by making it so difficult for a prospective member to join.

The Director's Guild seems the more open of the two. An applicant applies to the Executive Board of the Guild and the main criterion of membership is a required number of film screen minutes which he has directed. In motion pictures the required minimum ranges from 50 minutes of commercials to 180 minutes of features.

The IATSE has often been attacked for its restrictive membership practises. This seems to be more true of the union in the United States. Robert Wise, director of Star, gave an example of the situation in the U.S. at a recent symposium on film at Ryerson.

"Many graduates of accredited courses in film technique have been unable to work simply because they could not get into the unions."

The difficulty in getting into the IATSE stems from the fact that a candidate must be voted in by the entire membership.

But the position of the IATSE in a situation like the one with David Secter is understandable. The people I talked to in the union commonly replied, "We have to protect our membership", and they are quite right in feeling responsibility for their union.

However, because they are working in the film industry in Canada, they also have a responsibility to Canadian Cinema.

The unions by their very existence strengthen the film industry, but they can also hamper it if they choose to. The business of these unions is necessary. It should not take precedence over the art of making films.

BLUES

Big Joe Williams got an engagement in Paris and decided to stay in Europe rather than show up in Toronto. He can't be blamed too much for this; Europeans support blues musicians very well, and Big Joe often has a hard time finding work in the States, but it does make it very tough for the Kibitzeria, especially since Lightning Hopkins also didn't show not too long ago.

There is some blues in town, however. Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry are back again at the Riverboat where they'll be making their type of coffee-house blues until Nov. 24th.

P.H.

JAZZ

On the jazz side, Salome Bey will be singing at the Kibitzeria this weekend along with Gene Edward, for many years the guitarist with Richard "Groove" Holmes. The fine tenor sax player Booker Ervin will be at George's Spaghetti House Friday and Saturday playing with the house trio, and next week guitarist Lenny Breau comes in. Bobby Hackett and Vic Dickenson are teamed up at the Town for the next couple of weeks, and Flip Phillips is at the Colonial over the weekend. He'll be followed next week by a dixieland group, the Jersey Ramblers. If you want more dixieland, La Maison Dore has a different band almost every night. Friday it should be the Black Eagles and Saturday, Kid Chapman's Olympia Band.

ART

The McLaughlin Planetarium contest has attracted three entries. For five dollars, it's still worth your while to go and scrutinize the dome of the building and describe what you see.

Paul Carter's photography is getting a showing every morning from 9 to 11 in the Buttery, Trinity. Siamese art is being shown at the Albert White gallery. When I went to see it I was stoned, and it looked great, so before you go, be sure to Thai one on. Tony Smith's sculpture can still be seen at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

M.K.

BOOKS

Worth reading is Norman Mailer's little paperback on Miami and Chicago; so is Robert Fulford's Crisis at the Victory Burlesk. I. F. Stone and Elizabeth Hardwick have written biting articles on George Wallace and Robert McNamara in this week's 'New York Review'.

Stay away from the glitz of the U of T bookstore, because their prices are higher. Go to S.C.M., which is not as warm and friendly as it used to be but still the best in Toronto. There is a new little shop on Spadina called 'Volume One' that is worth browsing through.

FILM

WHY NOT: Star is the Hollywood version of the life of Gertrude Lawrence, with Julie ("If I had a bust I'd rule the world.")

Andrews as Gertie, and the droll Daniel Massey as Noel Coward. Star is better than most extravaganzas that are measured in dollars, tons and cubic feet; both singing and acting are often good. Director Robert Wise uses the format of a narrow-screen black and white Thirties newsreel to advance the story, filling in detail with full-screen colour explanations. This is one of the most useless ideas to come along in years.

WHY INDEED:

The Subject was Roses is a repeat of the scene we already made in Virginia Woolf. Death of a Salesman, etc., with actors cast in obvious, overused situations, screaming and crying in their hopeless alienation. The film lacks cinematic imagery and interpretation, being instead a celluloid shadow of the original theatre version. Therapy it is, but film?

JUST WHY:

Bliss of Mrs. Blossom is money thrown away. It's billed as comedy, but the scenes are stale, boring and gross. See it after a few beers, or if jokes about dogs' faces (dogs' faces?) and brassieres are your speed. Bliss is the creation of some over-thirty types trying desperately to be hip.

P.S. "Cripes, you was just great, Dan'l Massey — Heien.

Daniel Massey on theatre

By LIZ WILLICK

"Theatre is in a dangerous state. It's almost an anachronism. If the theatre is dead in a culture, then there's something emasculated in that culture. . . A really popular vital theatre fights the American Dream terribly."

Daniel Massey wound himself easily around a well-padded Hart House armchair. Comfortably settled, he launched an informal discussion with about twenty students Wednesday afternoon in the Music Room.

Mr. Massey is tall, and slender with an interesting face, expressive hands, and an English accent. He is also very easy to listen to.

Massey is the son of Canadian-born actor Raymond Massey and nephew of Vincent Massey. Dan Massey co-stars in the new Julie Andrews movie Star.

"The theatre is marvellous.

There is nothing the movies can do to touch the flesh and blood event."

On acting, he said, "I'm in this to act and to work and to explore it. I trained for ten years, and like an athlete I have to keep those reflexes going."

He spoke of young people who have "much more awareness and sensitivity — they created Bonnie and Clyde and The Graduate. If theatre doesn't talk to the 18 to 25 year old, we're nowhere."

On New York: "It affected me physically in the most terrifying way — I can't stand it. It's like Devil's Island."

On Harold Pinter: "He's done something to language in the way Renoir did something to the human complexion."

On Uncle Vincent: "I didn't like him very much."

As for Star, he grinned

and said, "I needed it because there's money in the part and I have alimony to pay." He sees success as the ability "to control rather than be controlled," and filming as essential to theatre.

What does he plan to do next? "I want to do the next good part."

Times change

The Hart House bell refuses to recognize the change to Eastern Standard Time — Oct. 27. If it continues to chime an hour fast for another two days, it will equal last year's record of two weeks resistance to reality.

Asked for comment, the hall porter commented that "this is nothing unusual".

Fromm and Wernick meet at New College

By MARY BASTEDO

Andy Wernick and Paul Fromm confronted each other last night before an audience of about 80 people in the New College dining room but failed to meet head on.

Fromm, bounded onto the stage and cracked a Barry Goldwater joke. Then he said: "Student power is elitist, anti-democratic and at least verbally complicit in violence."

Sauntering in half-an-hour late with a package of Du Maurier in his mouth, Wernick said, "I didn't hear Fromm's talk this time. But if it was typical it never got to the guts of anything.

"The most disappointing thing about U of T," said Wernick, "is the low level of argument I find. It's like when I used to make generalizations when arguing with my mother, and she would say, 'but the lady down the street. . .'"

He challenged Fromm to say three sentences on the general subject of "technology and unemployment." Fromm said he couldn't do it in three sentences.

"I believe we need a distribution mechanism that doesn't just distribute wages for work," said Wernick.

"I want to work and I want to earn my wages," Fromm replied. "I don't want anyone to give me hand-outs."

NDP support

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

The leader of the Ontario New Democratic Party, Donald MacDonald, has expressed support of the democratization of education at the university level.

MacDonald outlined his views to 30 students at Sidney Smith noon hour meeting yesterday.

"From the very beginning", he added, "I have always suggested guidelines for the abolition of the authoritarian nature of the system, but the Tories and Liberals have continually knocked them down."

MacDonald explained he hoped to bring new strength to the N.D.P. "Right now", he stated, "we all work under the assumption that by 1971 we can gain power in the province. Our job is to create a policy that is reasonable and acceptable."

MacDonald said the NDP "is not exclusively a labour party and can never be so."

CORRECTION

The Varsity Wednesday incorrectly reported that students returning to Whitney Hall after 11 p.m. are required to sign only their names. The girls must also record their room numbers.

Through a typographical error, the story said male visitors were permitted in the rooms Sunday from 9 to 5 p.m. It should have said 2 p.m. to 5 p.m.

Trinity men's gowns still on

By GEOFF MEGGS

The idea of making academic gowns optional at breakfast and lunch was defeated by a resounding 50 to 25 margin by Trinity College men Wednesday night.

Peter Kelk (IV Trin) described the motion as a compromise between two extremes in the college, one demanding total abolition — the other against any change in present regulations.

The rule which applies to all of the approximately 300 men enrolled at Trinity says "All students will provide themselves with an academic gown as prescribed to be worn as directed." This has usually been interpreted to mean the gown will be worn to meals, classes, chapel, and meetings with the faculty.

Kelk said he was opposed to the gowns because they were indicative of an elitist sentiment at Trinity. Gowns also emphasized the master-slave relationship between students and their professors by their different styles, he added.

Alec Dufresne in seconding the motion mentioned his experience in Oxford this summer, where he was "impressed that no one wore gowns to breakfast."

Opposition to the bill was strong. Most speakers were in favour of retaining the gown as a focus for college spirit.

"If we make gowns optional it's just like abolishing them," said Al Parish (II Trin) "because no one will wear them."

Another opponent of the motion defended the gown on practical grounds. "My gown has saved a lot of dry-cleaning bills" he said.

In an interview yesterday Head of College John Whittall, a graduate divinity student commented that "gowns are good until they are completely irrelevant to the people who are wearing them. Obviously this is not the case at Trinity."

The meeting was adjourned after a recalcitrant anti-gown man took off his gown and was ejected.

Queen's executive defeated

Kingston (CUP) — Two activist student leaders failed in their bid to gain a campus mandate Wednesday, Nov. 6.

Chuck Edwards and Jan Lichty resigned as president and vice-president respectively Oct. 22 in order to run again, specifically on an activist platform.

Conservative candidate Dave Parkrul and his vice-presidential candidate Andy Pipe beat the activist pair by a three to one margin.

The vote went 2150 - 746 — a turnout of over 50 per cent, far higher than any other election in the past few years.

Four members of the Queen's Journal resigned after the election to do some grass roots organizing. They felt they couldn't reach the students through the Journal.

Though the students voted for Parkrul instead of the activists, they rejected his position on decision-making and voted overwhelmingly in favour of student-faculty decision on academic policy.

Gary Perly remanded

The trial of Gary Perly, president of Canadians for the National Liberation Front, was remanded to Nov. 14 in magistrates court yesterday.

Perly is charged with obstructing police during a CNLF demonstration outside the U.S. Consulate April 26.

Acting as his own lawyer, Perly cross-examined arresting officer Charles Woodhead for an hour before Magistrate Tupper Bigelow remanded the case.

New College says no to TADP

New College students are 58 per cent against donating money to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program—or at least 58 per cent of 334 are.

Of the 1524 students registered in New College, fewer than 23 per cent voted in the referendum yesterday.

"It was an above average turnout," commented David Hoffman (III New), New College Students Council vice-president.

"The narrow margin against the referendum shows that there is some justification for voting in favour of the donation," he added.

The council decided last week that a referendum ought to be held to obtain an idea of the general sentiment of the student body before the council decided on a donation of $100.

The final decision will be made on Tuesday, at the next NCSC meeting.

The council is supposed to use the referendum as a guide to their voting but does not have to abide by it.

Ron Harris spent last summer fishing for water.

Mad? Not really. Ron is a marine biologist with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The water he fished for and the sediments in it contained vital information about depths, tides, navigational hazards and the nature of the seabed. After three months at sea, Ron produced a report that will make our coastal waters safer for navigation and help in the development of harbour facilities.

Ron Harris is one of the new breed of people in public service . . . young, college educated, ambitious and dedicated. In Government service he has found a rewarding and responsible future in the mainstream of Canadian development. Matsuba (a Jewish delicacy put in soup) had two goals, as did Bishop and Balman in Innis' 8-5 win over Pharm; other Innis scorers were Waller and McLauchlin. Casselman scored all five Pharm goals.

Meds A took Vic II, 9-5, on markers by Tuchisa (3), Howes (4), Baycrest (he's got to be named after a housing development) and Murnaghan. Birze (2), Simon Semple (2) and Southward scored for Vic II

UC exceeded Law's output by 100% 6-3. Blyth scored two goals (Hail to thee, Blyth, Wolfe (5), Hamilton, Mel-low Yellow (2), Munro (2), Scully (2) and Guy scored as Eng jerubbabelled Dents, 13-2. Drury and Southward were Dents marksmen.

Christie and Mackey scored for PHE B, Griffin for For as PHE B won, 2-1.

RUGGER

Bobbet had three points and Slean ("Jack Sprat could eat no fat, his wife could eat no Slean" - a taboo on oral intercourse is common in primitive societies) two as PHE whitewashed Eng, 5-0.

Steiswicz (UC) and Howarth (Vic) scored in a three-3 tie.

INTERFAC FOOTBALL

With only one game left in the regular schedule, Victoria College lead Group A with a perfect 5-0 record. Kartna scored Vic's only touchdown as they whitewashed PHE 6-0. In yesterday's action, St. Mike's blanked Engineering 8-0 on Jack Thomann's major, while New recorded its 1st victory of the season - a 7-6 triumph at the expense of UC. Fat Albert scored for New.

St. Mike's victory clinched a playoff spot for them and it looks as if they'll be playing Medicine. In the other semi-final, it should be Dentistry against Vic. Vic has Group A's leading scorer, Peter Fairgrieve, who has run over, around, or through any defence which the rest of the Group has had to offer.

SCORES TO SETTLE

A pile of timber and mud called George Richardson Memorial Stadium houses the last and most important game of the SIFL season on Saturday.

It's the home of Queen's Golden Gaels and Varsity Blues come calling tomorrow afternoon for a pleasant encounter which will decide this year's winner of the Yates Cup. Blues trail Queen's by a point in the league standings.

There doesn't seem to be much doubt on the outcome in Kingston. Queen's are already looking forward to next week's College Bowl semifinal in Edmonton. The victor in Saturday's game advances against the winner of the Western Intercollegiate League, and Gaels have taken special pains to send a man out there to shoot movies of that league's sudden death final between Alberta and Manitoba.

But Queen's confidence seems pretty justified. They've already beaten Varsity 35-0 right in Toronto, haven't they? And didn't Blues have to fight like mad for a 19-19 tie against lowly Waterloo (snicker)? Sure. Game should be a breeze for the big boys in gold. Sure.

Varsity coach Ron Murphy: "You want to know the key to beating Queen's? Score one more point than they do."

Centre Rick Agro: "I can't get any sleep. I keep thinking about all our different plays, and I keep seeing a big number 77 coming at me."

Defensive halfback Chris Hicks: "I'm not getting much sleep. This game just sticks in my mind. I keep seeing gold jerseys all over the place."

Trainer Eddie Armstrong: "I'd rather go to Edmonton next week than Halifax with the hockey team."

Balex: "There are still 45 tickets left, available at the SAC office or the engineering stores."

Coach Murphy: "This week has really dragged. I'm 'way over my crackers quota."

Offensive halfback Mike Raham: "If the weather stays like this, it'll help us a lot because of our strong running game."

Coach Murphy: "The weather? It's cold and wet."

Varsity reporter Rod Mickleburgh: "Eat 'em, Blues!"

Rugger broom sweeps Western clean

Varsity rugger teams travelled to London on Tuesday afternoon for two games against Western. The first Varsity needed a victory over Western to capture the western division and advance into the final against Queen's. A loss would have meant a sudden death playoff with Western.

However, it was learned shortly before the game that Western had forfeited several games because of an ineligible player. The pressure was off, and the team responded with unspired rugger.

Varsity clung to a 9-6 lead at half time on three penalty kicks by captain George Wraw. Western tied the score on their third penalty goal midway through the second half.

But in the last five minutes of the game Varsity scored two converted tries. Centre Tony Pierre picked up a loose ball in the Western end and rambled for the first try. Moments later centre Pete Sutherland gathered in an on-side downfield kick by Andy Gibson and burst into the end zone past a group of dejected Western players for a 19-9 victory.

Varsity seconds were having their problems with Western too as they had to come from behind twice for the win. The seconds led 9-8 at the half as fly half Roger Moore scored two unconverted tries and Andy Cairns booted a penalty goal.

Western went ahead in the second half on a converted try but Blues back Carl Trinier scampered for a try converted by Cairns to give Toronto the lead again. Wing forward Brian Hamill ran 25 yards for the final try. Cairns converted to make the final score 19-13 for Toronto. The pride of the second team was 69 year old Blues coach James Hamilton who played prop with great gusto despite chiding from his players that he was "too slow getting into the loose scrums."

WATERPOLO

Varsity Waterpoloists will try to stretch their string of victories to sixteen consecutive games Saturday as the Aqua-Blues host the Macmen of Hamilton.

Although McMaster has played water polo as a club sport for years, this is her first year in regular intercollegiate competition. In their only previous encounter last January, a very strong swimming Varsity team dominated the Mac pool and won by several goals. In the miniscule Hart House natatorium, however, ball handling is expected to be the critical factor. If Coach Otto Demjen's rearrangements at center pool have eliminated Blues' weakness there, it should be Varsity by four goals.

Game time tomorrow is 2.00 pm.

Soccerites suffocate stubborn 'Stangs

Varsity Soccer Blues retained the Toronto and District Soccer Association trophy, symbolic of the western division championship, Tuesday, when they defeated a stubborn University of Western Ontario side 3-2 at London. The victory pushed Blues three points ahead of the 'Stangs' with each team having one game remaining.

The score was surprisingly close, especially in the light of the first meeting between the two teams when Blues romped to a 5-2 win.

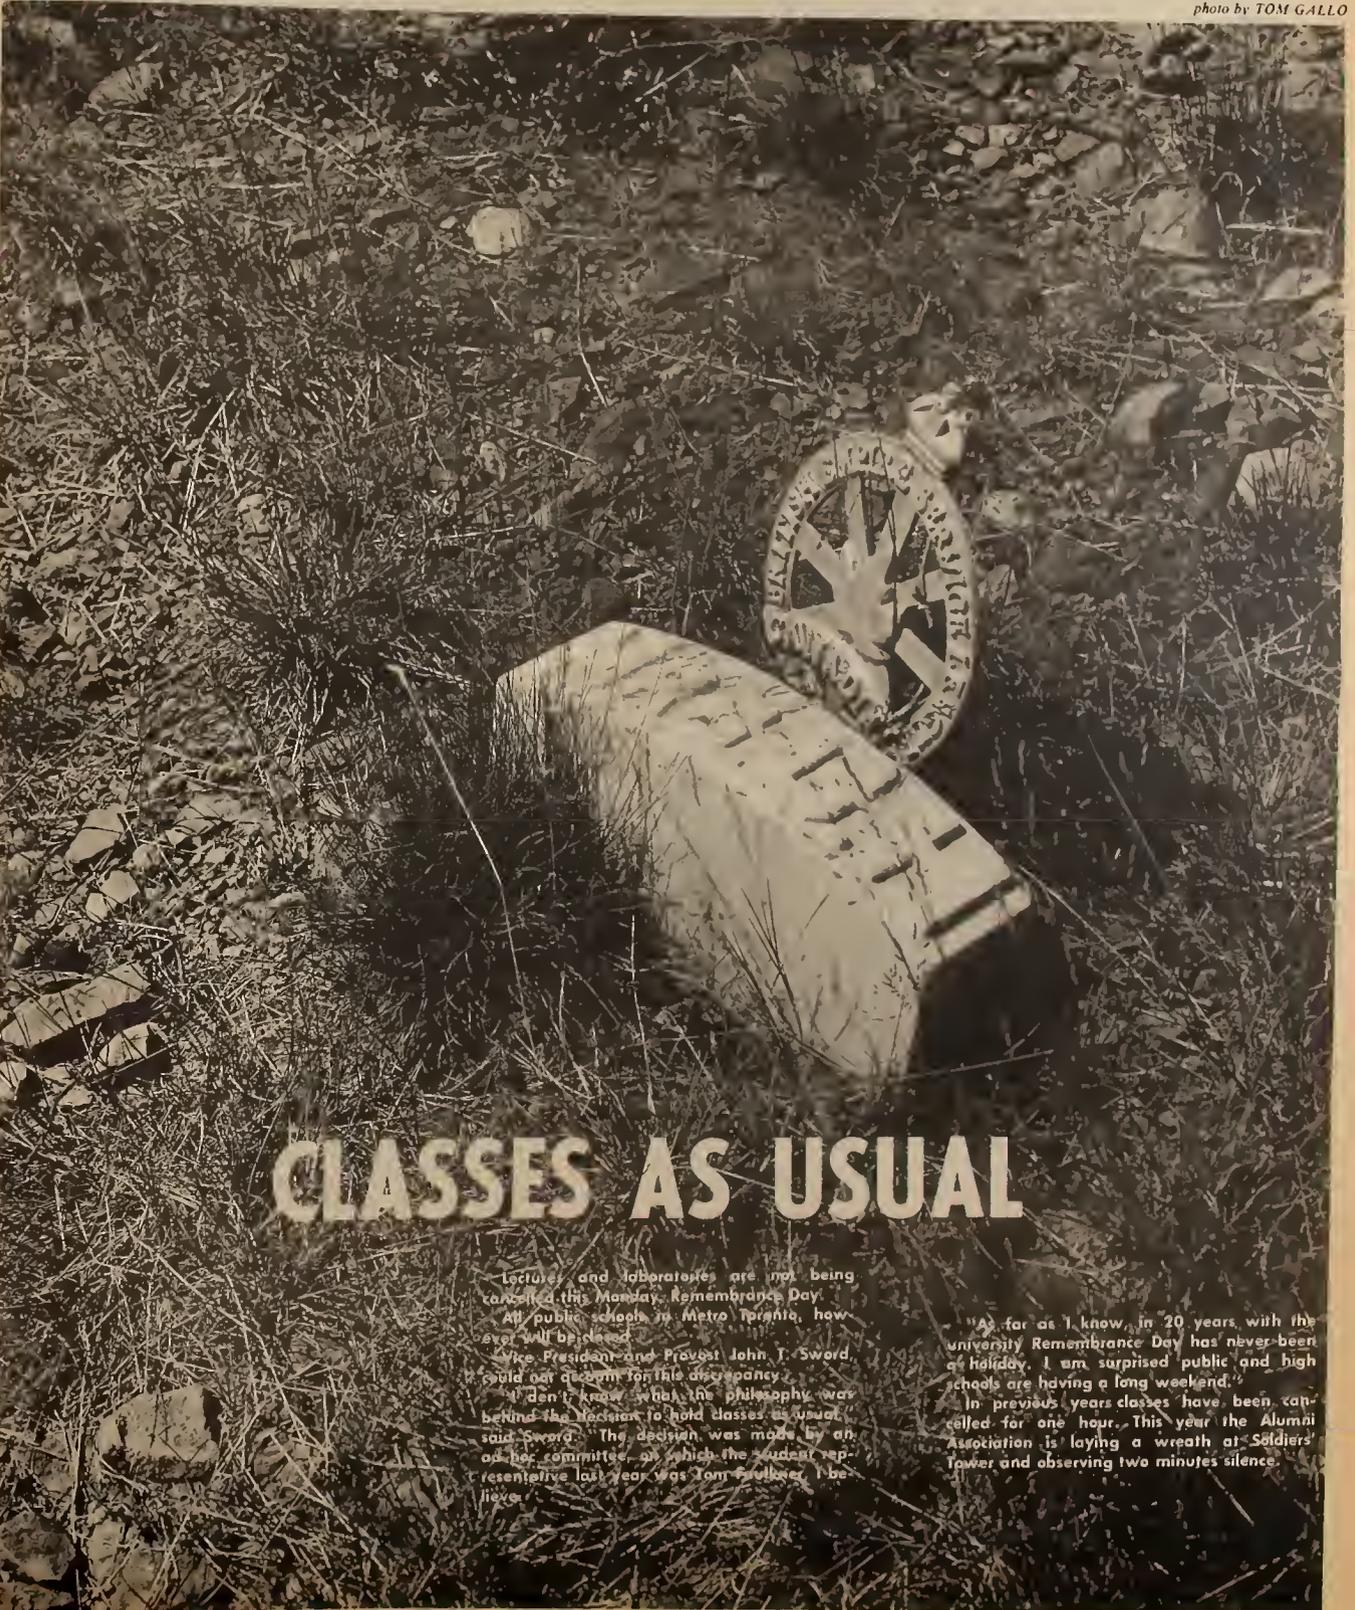

Charles Kiewiet, Western's left-inside forward, opened the scoring in a fifteen yard free kick at the seventeen minute mark of the first half. Then ten minutes later Blues aggressive defence gave away another free kick almost from the identical spot of the first goal. Kiewiet, again made no mistake as he sliced the ball over the defensive wall and into the top corner.

With a 2-0 lead bolstering their morale, the Western side came to life and started playing soccer on the same level as the Blues.

But with five minutes left in the opening half Miles Sosa lofted a high floater towards the net which incredibly slipped through the goalkeepers hands and landed in the net. That was the spark that Blues needed. From that point on the Varsity Eleven dominated the pitch.

Ken Cancellera finally evened the game up 2-2 at the sixty-nine minute mark when he took a pass from full-back Jim Kolman and drilled a short into the corner. Sixty seconds later Roman Zakaluzny threw the ball to Jim Lefkos who doesn't miss goals from five yards out.

CLASSES AS USUAL

Lectures and laboratories are not being cancelled this Monday, Remembrance Day.

All public schools in Metro Toronto, however, will be closed.

Vice-President and Provost John T. Sword, could not account for this discrepancy.

"I don't know which the philosophy was behind the decision to hold classes as usual," said Sword. "The decision was made by an ad hoc committee, of which the student representative last year was Tom Frutkiner. I believe

"As far as I know, in 20 years with the university Remembrance Day has never been a holiday. I am surprised public and high schools are having a long weekend."

In previous years classes have been cancelled for one hour. This year the Alumni Association is laying a wreath at Soldiers' Tower and observing two minutes' silence.

"Pornographical"?

CALGARY (CUP) — North Hill News, publisher of the Mount Royal Junior College student newspaper, recently charged The Reflector with using "pornographical" copy.

The article in question outlined types and uses of birth control methods. The data was adapted from a Ladies' Home Journal article and presents the birth control information in chart form.

The terms used in the chart are medical ones. Originally printed in The Brunswickan (University of New Brunswick) last December, the chart has appeared in at least 10 Canadian university newspapers since then, with no repercussions.

Roy Farran, owner of the News, maintained the article served no purpose and refused to print it.

The Reflector was forced to run a blank page where the chart should have been.

Winter claims SAC interference

Graduate Students Union president John Winter says there was a "detailed plan for concealed interference in graduate student affairs" by the SAC executive.

This involves a memo dated August 22, from SAC executive assistant Martha Tracey to SAC president Steve Langdon.

Winter says this was a "confidential memo" in which SAC leaders contemplated running "apparently 'neutral' candidates as graduate representatives in the SAC elections; infiltrating the St. George Dragon, a magazine published by the GSU;" and "finding an 'acceptable' candidate" to organize graduate students into course unions.

Miss Tracey points out the memo was not "confidential as Winter stated."

"The memo was in a public file for anyone to look at. It was a personal memo, but not confidential."

As for running "neutral" candidates, Miss Tracey said that "SAC should not be the main issue. The candidates should talk about what's happening in graduate schools throughout Canada. The high degree of professionalism for example."

Miss Tracey said she "felt that all of the applicants (for editor of the GSU paper) should not be anti-SAC. It should be noted that we were talking about applicants not appointees."

"'Weekend' is a great original work. 'Weekend' is Godard's vision of hell and it ranks with the visions of the greatest. The vision that rises in the course of the film is so surreally powerful that one accepts it as one accepts a lunar landscape. 'Weekend' has more depth than anything he's done before."

—Pauline Kael, New Yorker

"A fantastic film in which all of life becomes a weekend—a cataclysmic, seismic traffic jam. The film must be seen for its power, ambition, humor, and scenes of really astonishing beauty. One of the most important films Godard has ever made. There's nothing like it at all."

—Renata Adler, New York Times

"A stunning experience. A savage imaginative comment on our times, the film breathes virtuosity at every turn. Humor, too, abounds but it's a humor of tragedy and quickly turns to acid. I can't think of another modern filmmaker who has so tellingly and originally summarized greed, callousness and the seeds of adventurism as Godard does."

Mexico after 50 years of revolution

The glitter of the Olympic Games in Mexico City crowded the plight of the Mexican students out of the mass media. Yet thousands of these students are being harassed and jailed. Prior to the "Games" many were shot down in the streets by the Mexican Army.

Although there is little in the news the problems that precipitated the bloodshed still exist.

Richard de la Luz M, a leading member of the National Strike Committee, will speak today at 1 p.m. Room 2117, Sydney Smith.

By PHIL RUSSELL
College Press Service

I am a communist
Because I see humanity in pain,
Under the boot of imperialism,
Because I see the peasants suffering,
And because the braceros are leaving.
I am a communist
Because the people don't even have the right
To ask that they be treated justly,
And because the salaries are meagre,
And because there is no equality.

MEXICO CITY (CUP - CPS) — Although these words, taken from the wall of a strike-bound Mexican university, reflect the politics of only a few students, they do reflect the surroundings of every Mexican student. In a country which makes the American press with its annual report of a 7 percent gain in gross national product and its elections every six years, this may seem a contradiction.

This seeming contradiction is, however, a reflection of the great inequalities which have long existed in Mexico. Even as far back as the beginning of the 19th century, a visitor to Mexico called it "the land of inequality".

A century later the Mexican Revolution was fought to eliminate these inequalities. In this struggle most of the fighting was between rival factions, not between revolutionaries and the old guard. Early in the war the landed aristocracy which had been governed by Porfirio Diaz was defeated. What followed was a struggle between the militant agrarian reformers, Pancho Villa and Zapata, and the emerging entrepreneurial class led by Carranza and Obregon. The eventual triumph of the entrepreneurs set the stage for both the successes and failures of Mexico in the last 50 years.

MONOLITHIC PARTY

In 1927, ten years after the end of the revolution, the dominant faction founded a political party which has grown into a monolithic structure known as the PRI, Partido Revolucionario Institucional. The PRI, which has never lost an election for president, governor, or senator, is the dominant factor in the Mexican political scene.

The PRI's domination has had its rewards, but the price has been high. The PRI has given Mexico stability and economic growth which can be equalled by few other Latin American countries.

One obvious price of this domination has been the inability to effect change from outside the PRI. Since the results of the elections are a foregone conclusion, the PRI holds the power to choose officials through nominations which take place behind closed doors. Similarly the labor movement offers little opportunity for change, as it is made up of government-controlled unions.

In the few instances in which the labor movement has become a force of change, it has been brutally crushed by the government, as was the 1959 railroad strike. In the past the student movement has also been impotent, due to both government control and brutal repression.

The PRI has also been unable, or unwilling, to cope with rural poverty. (Ironically, this was the main issue of the Mexican revolution). The government's program of land reform has consisted of giving landless peasants small plots of land in agricultural communities called ejidos. In these communities the peasants has use of the land and its crops, but may not sell the land.

LITTLE LAND

But there is little land left to distribute to the increasing population, and what is distributed is often of poor quality. The recent growth of large farming operations has taken up much of the productive land. As a result there are still two million Mexican peasants without land.

This situation, has resulted in the country dwellers having an income only 1/3 as high as the city dweller. However, inequalities do not end here. The working class is divided between those who are members of the government-controlled unions and some ten million who have no union representation at all. Confronting the workers are the wealthy and the powerful who have the backing of the PRI. As a result, the benefits of a rapidly expanding economy have remained mainly in the hands of politicians, the professionals, and property owners.

bility and rapid industrial development is the increased control of the Mexican economy by American interests. The result of this is that more than half of the top 400 corporations have strong foreign interests — many cases controlling. Combined with this foreign control, mainly from the United States, is increasing American cultural influence in Mexico, ranging from the Reader's Digest to the ever-present Coca-Cola.

U.S. DOMINATION

Although American domination has long been a sore point in Mexico, during the term of the PRI's incumbent president Diaz ordaz, American investment has been flowing in at an increased rate. Criticism of American financial control and Diaz Ordaz's furthering of it are two of the topics drawing the loudest cheers at student rallies.

Despite these various shortcomings, the PRI still seems to be firmly entrenched in power. Political opposition is token and mainly serves to give the PRI a facade of democracy. The labor movement has sold out to the government and workers are either trying to make ends meet or to achieve middle-class status. The campesinos are unorganized and their takeovers of large land holdings have been repelled by the army. Jaramillo, the peasant leader, who managed to organize peasants around militant demands in recent years, was killed by the government.

The current student movement is the first nationwide organized opposition to the establishment. At present, the students' liberal demands do not threaten PRI control. However, many students have gained a radical political perspective and may come back to haunt the government, just as a young lawyer named Fidel Castro did in Batista's Cuba.

In the meantime, Diaz Ordaz will stay in power and his successor will almost certainly be the PRI candidate for the 1970 elections.

This jealousy of the fathers toward their male children, unconscious in part or wholly so, is one of the causes of war, seems not to have escaped the notice of the youth of this age — at least of some of the more sensitive among them, poets and novelists. War, with its special death toll among the young fulfills the desire of the old men for the removal of their lusty rivals; the war memorials, the cenotaphs are not only monuments raised in expiation of the old people's sins, but are survivals of days when it was feared that the ghosts of the killed, taking shape, would revenge themselves on the living; these monumental erections will prevent the dead arising. M.D. Eder "Psycho Analysis in Politics" (London, 1924)

Buggery is Remembrance

If the two men in the cartoon were killing each other, you would pay no attention. Killing is so natural and universal, and its prevention so futile, that the conglomerate Hebrew deity, God, included killing with nine other "human" actions that are most commonplace, that should not be committed.

Killing is natural; buggery is a "crime against nature". What is natural is forgotten, what is perverse, remembered. The problem with "Remembrance Day" is that it commemorates men being natural on a mass scale. So natural that we forget them.

"God" made a personal stricture against killing, because such restraint did not exist, does not yet exist, in many himself. He sought to make killing anathema. He sought to make killing an unforgettable, unforgivable crime, one linked in the minds of believers with His personal displeasure. He failed.

Buggery is not one of the 10 acts outlawed by the Commandments. But, in many societies, especially killer-carnivore societies, buggery brings its own automatic guilt and punishment — the guilt stemming from some long-forgotten past, the punishment continuing into a memorable future.

Buggery is remembrance. Buggery is one man with another, not through the surrogate sexuality of a rifle, but through his own body.

Let us do something that will make our soldiers truly memorable on "Remembrance Day"; let us change the rules of war. Let us turn our soldiers loose upon these other men, the enemy; let them fuck the enemy to death. Immortality is the reward of a ruptured ass.

Elyse-VARSITY

Piglets?

Last week a group of Americans — 33 students from St. Mikes — decided to celebrate the American election at the Consulate. Their party didn't last very long. Fourteen cops broke it up for impeding sidewalks or causing a disturbance or some such excuse.

The Toronto police are racking up quite a record for demonstration-busting, almost all of it in front of the Consulate. And that raises some questions that had better be answered.

What is so sacred about the property in front of the Consulate?

Tourist revenue? All that American investment money we might scare off?

A Mr. Patterson says in a letter on page 5 that it is "inconceivable" that the police are politically motivated. Maybe the cop on the beat isn't but his superiors are.

And until we do something about it, those superiors are going to continue to place the rights of American money over the rights of free assembly and free speech.

LETTERS

Martha denies duplicity

I understand from the Varsity and from some of my friends in the professional societies on campus that one of my personal memos to Steven Langdon is being circulated to student and administrative leaders by Graduate Students Union President John Winter, along with distorting interpretations of the memo by Philip Wulfs of the GSU.

I feel no need to apologize for having opinions on the situation with the GSU, nor do I believe that any of the ideas in my memory are unjustifiable. I find it necessary, however, to clarify some of my ideas which Messrs. Winter and Wulfs have chosen to grossly distort, since some may be misled by the accusations of these gentlemen.

I would first emphasize that the memo was a personal one from me to Langdon, outlining my ideas on SAC fall elections at the School of Graduate Studies. The tone is informal and at times (I think) humorous. The memo does not represent SAC policy, nor was it ever implemented, since the GSU has yet to have held elections for the five additional SAC reps could elect.

Mr. Winter describes the memo as "a detailed plan for concealed interference in graduate student affairs", thereby implying that SAC has no business thinking about how to respond to attempts of any groups of its members to withdraw from SAC. I find it incredible that Mr. Winter would expect SAC to sit idly by while a group of members attempt to destroy the effectiveness and unity of the student body. We're not ostriches.

Mr. Winter implies that SAC was attempting to manipulate graduate students by interfering where it did not belong. I would point out that my main argument was that the defence of continued graduate membership in SAC had to come from graduate students themselves. SAC's role as to act as a facilitator, bring various SAC supporters (and there are some) from all areas of the widespread Graduate School together to plan a unit program, rather than operate in isolation from each other.

Mr. Winter and his Executive make much of the fact that I speak of "good" candidates, a "reliable" Returning Officer, etc. Because Langdon and I work closely together, I knew he (at least) would realize that a "good" candidate in my view would be one who did not believe in splintering what student unity exists on this campus, but would work to make it more of a reality; one who would consider the unfortunate economic and working situation of Teaching Assistants and enlist SAC aid in working for solutions to this problem; one who believed that the content and quality of education, whether graduate or undergraduate, required drastic improvement; and one who did not advocate segregation of graduates and undergraduates.

I am accused of duplicity for suggesting that candidates should support SAC only implicitly. I advocated this approach not in an attempt to dupe the voters, but simply because I believe an election run merely on the issue of pro or anti-SAC becomes so involved in charges and counter-charges that the larger issues, such as involvement of graduate students in long-range planning for the School of Graduate Studies, the problems of teaching assistants, etc. etc. are almost completely overlooked.

I resent the actions of the GSU in publishing this personal correspondence. I resent their unfair distortions of my views, and the unjustifiable conclusions they have drawn from the memo. I also regret that my informal correspondence with the SAC President has become the focus of a general attack on more than myself, and can only wish that our files weren't quite so open to anyone regardless of their intent. I hope that the GSU will not continue to indulge in such ad hominem (feminine in this case) attacks. I will be happy to answer any questions from persons still confused by the content of, and unfair conclusions drawn from, my now public memorandum.

MACHIAVELLI on the GSU

By PETER HAWLEY

Peter Hawley is a graduate student in sociology.

Niccolo Machiavelli — a philosopher of great wisdom — resides in the cubicles of U of T's oldest libraries. Nobody listens to him any more. Younger men have taken his place — men like Edmund Burke, Karl Marx and Herbert Marcuse. Some say Machiavelli knew too much. Others say he was mean. Yet I believe he understands this university like no other man.

It was decided, therefore, to consult with Niccolo Machiavelli about the recent conflict between the Graduate Student's Union and the Students' Administrative Council.

"The Graduate Student's Union is an ecclesiastical principality," said Machiavelli. "It is sustained by ancient religious customs which are so powerful that they keep its popes and princes in power in whatever manner they proceed. Those religious customs provide graduate nobles with respectability and status and wine, which is deemed of importance above all else by all but an insignificant number of graduate nobles who, by opposing religious custom, have lost their respectability."

"Now, in every city, two opposite parties are to be found, arising from the desire of the populace to avoid the oppression of the great, and the desire of the great to command and oppress the people. The aim of the undergraduate populace is more honest than that of the graduate nobility, the latter desiring to oppress, and the former merely to avoid oppression.

"Lord Langdon of S.A.C. is honest, and to that I attribute his failures. For I say that it would be well for a Prince to be considered liberal. Lord Langdon has no such image I would say that to possess the quality of liberalism and always observe it is dangerous, but to appear to possess it is useful. . . . For the reformer has enemies in all those who profit by the old order, and only lukewarm defenders in all those who would profit by the new order. Thus it arises that on every opportunity for attacking the reformer, his opponents (the G.S.U. nobility) do so with the zeal of partisans. The others who see the need for reform defend him only half-heartedly.

"Lord Langdon has made a second mistake, for a wise Prince will seek means by which his subjects will always have need of his government. It is not enough for the feudal government of S.A.C. to subsidize virtually every activity in the feudal city of Toronto Varsity. The nobles of Graduate Student's Union will not see that. S.A.C. should also have paid for the new bar at the G.S.U. castle, and inscribed the name of Lord Langdon upon it so the graduate nobles could see that inscription every day. For the vulgar is always taken by appearances and the issues of the event; and the world of the G.S.U. nobles consists only of the vulgar

"The first two mistakes which Lord Langdon and his predecessor made are serious indeed. For men commit injuries either through fear or through hate. And so it is that Lord Winter and his nobles at the castle of G.S.U. have decided to withdraw from the city state of S.A.C. and escape to a hermitage in their own castle.

"Fortune is a woman, and if you wish to master her, you must strike and conquer her. But alas, the nobles of G.S.U. are trying to escape from fortune rather than conquer her.

"The feudal city of Toronto Varsity is threatened with being divided into its principalities. I fear that a city divided will only augment the power of Pope Bissell I and his professional cardinals. The influence of both the graduate nobles and the undergraduate populace can only decline in a divided city.

"Popes before Bissell used to say it was necessary to hold Toronto by means of factions. I do not believe that divisions ever do any good, on the contrary, the cities thus divided will be at once lost, for the weaker faction will always side with the enemy and the other will not be able to stand.

"I suggest a solution, Lord Langdon, other than to rectify the two serious mistakes which have already been made. Invite Lord Winter and the graduate nobles to a sherry party at S.A.C.; offer them some money; and invite them to send more graduate nobles to sit in the courts of S.A.C. But alas, it is too late. The good that you do does not profit as it is judged to be forced upon you, and you will derive no benefit whatever from it."

Campus complicity

By ELLIE KIRZNER

Ellie Kirzner is chairman of the Committee to End the War in Vietnam.

The problem of campus complicity which first sprang into prominence last year is again with us. Already this year there have been sit-ins at the University of Saskatchewan and at the University of Manitoba. Most students will recall the impact that campus complicity had at U of T last year — the demonstrations, the mass meetings and the election which was forced because of the war recruitment issue. Many questions were raised by last year's protest but few answered.

There is a general unease around this question on campus. Many people are unsure of what campus complicity is and what its implications are for the role of the university in society. Everyone agrees that it is an important question which cannot be ignored but there is no consensus on what is to be done.

DISCUSSION

This unease and doubt can only be resolved by an open campus discussion around the problem of war recruitment. SAC as the representative body of the students should initiate such a discussion. We don't need back room discussions and plotting sessions, we want open and free debate where all the students can express their views. SAC should organize several mass meetings around the question of recruitment. The pages of Varsity should be opened up to a free-wheeling discussion and every view should be circulated in the form of leaflets. SAC has an opportunity to involve all the students in a searching and critical discussion which can delve into the fundamental nature of the university in our society. SAC should accept this challenge.

This discussion would define the nature of complicity. It should be pointed out that in 1967 research grants from military organizations totalled $699,839.86. There are many questions surrounding this research. What is its nature? What influence do these funds have on moulding the whole university? On our Board of Governors are many men intimately tied up with the military establishment? Men such as Neil J. McKinnon of Honeywell Controls Ltd., O.M. Solandt, whom we all know so well and others.

What effect do these men have on our education through their positions and money? There is the recruitment which includes many companies which are complicit in the Vietnam war, companies such as Dow, CIL, Levy Industries etc.

EFFECT OF COMPLICITY

The discussion among us should go on to investigate the effect that this has on our university. We realize very well that our university exists in a society geared to war but does that mean it has to serve the war society. We may have to work for companies like those mentioned, but do we have to like it too?

We don't have to allow these companies to permeate and control our university in a 100 different ways. Why can we not begin to break the ties of the university with the elite which dominates our society? We can have a university that produces critical, creative individuals who are not tools of the existing order but who actively work for social change but not while these men control our campus. Our university must not be a market where skills in human form are bought and sold. Let's discuss the idea that it is necessary to get all the recruiters off campus and back into their downtown offices where they belong.

SAC must meet the challenge SAC has an obligation to the students to give them a forum where they can express their ideas freely. SAC should instruct the administration to keep the recruiters off campus until the discussion is complete. The culmination of the full discussion should be a vote by the students and faculty on a one man one vote basis to decide for or against campus recruitment. The problem is before us, let us now air our views openly and then, having made our views clear, let us ACT!!

"political motive inconceivable"

I believe that the charges levied by Paul MacRae in The Varsity October 30, 1968 can and should be refuted. It is inconceivable that the Toronto Police are politically motivated. They are forbidden to have any political affiliation; nor are they allowed to place campaign signs on their property or support any political candidate.

Several police reportedly said they wanted Wallace. Assuming that this wasn't sarcastic, what makes these individuals spokesmen for "the 125 men on foot, 23 on horseback, plus two busloads plus two dozen men on motorcycle, as well as many more from squad cars." Following Mr. MacRae's logic, one is forced to the conclusion that the police who protect John Beattie in Edwards Gardens are all Nazis. Mr. MacRae also says that the demonstration was broken up in order to try their new anti-riot techniques (as reported in the Toronto Telegram). The article in question said that the Metro Police were training with machine guns. The Varsity's sharp-eyed reporters have not mentioned the presence, let alone the use of these weapons. Secondly, the training referred to by the Telegram is restricted to the Ontario Provincial Police at Downsview.

So much for MacRae's second and third assumptions; now for the first. I will merely state that the people I have spoken to said there were attempts made by demonstrators to deliberately provoke the police to violence. I think that is sufficient reason for dispersing the demonstrators.

support for Lawson

I was delighted to read your front page cover story about Bill Lawson and his fight to be allowed to earn his living as a mobile caterer. I am all in favour of any action which will help Bill to continue to provide the service which he so ably and cheerfully does outside Sidney Smith Hall.

I wrote to Mr. F. R. Stone, Office of the Vice President, Administration here at U of T, about last May when Bill Lawson and several other mobile caterers were being constantly "moved on" from the Sidney Smith Hall area. I suggested that consideration be given to the University providing certain sites on campus where these trucks could ply their trade without causing nuisance and without constantly being hounded by the police. I did not even receive the courtesy of an acknowledgement, and several 'phone calls did not produce any kind of result.

I can understand the U of T administration not wanting to make an exception in the case of Bill Lawson, but I cannot see why they cannot consider finding university sites for only those trucks which presently serve around the university area. (Maybe qualification for this privilege could be even further narrowed to permit only those vendors who had served the area for say, more than one year.) Maybe if Bill and any other vendors interested in staying in this area were to have petitions which could be signed by people using their facilities, these petitions could be presented to the appropriate administrator at Simcoe Hall.

more support

I was disturbed to read in this morning's Varsity that Mr. Bill Lawson is being threatened with loss of license which permits him to operate his vending van.

He performs a very important service to the University community since alternative sources of food at the University are consistently terrible. The quality of lunch food, which Mr. Lawson sells, is very good.

I therefore strongly object to By-Laws which would not permit him to continue to operate on St. George Street.

Should Mr. Lawson not be permitted to continue offering his services, it would mean walking many long blocks to find decent food for lunch. Therefore, I urge you to act so as to allow Mr. Lawson to continue to operate.

the Granite Club as campus centre?

The Varsity reports that financial and zoning difficulties make it unlikely that the new student centre will be completed for three or four years at the least.

In spite of assurances given at the 1967 Athletic Banquet, no apparent progress has been made to increase the overburdened athletic facilities needed for recreational purposes by the male student body. The present Faculty Club is too small, and membership is thus restricted to Asst. Professors and higher ranks. No expansion of these facilities is planned for the immediate future.

What is needed is a temporary increase in the University's facilities until the previously mentioned buildings are ready.

Last week the Toronto newspapers reported the Board of Directors of the Toronto Granite Club in considering selling their St. Clair Ave. site and moving to a new location.

The Granite Club has a swimming pool, squash courts, steam baths, curling ice, skating ice, bowling alleys and locker-rooms for these activities. It has an indoor parking building attached. It has rooms suitable for meeting rooms and offices. It has dining rooms suitable for a faculty club. It has ballrooms suitable for social events. It has a limited number of rooms now used for residential space for members. It has bars. In short, it has almost everything that the University Community now lacks, only 15 minutes from the campus.

I suggest the university buy this building and operate it as a club for the whole U of T community until the needed facilities are available on campus. Faculty members could buy family memberships enabling them to use the various facilities. Undergraduate and graduate students would have equal access to the club, with a financial contribution coming from their student fee.

Overcrowding of the totally inadequate Faculty Club would be solved. Overcrowding of recreational facilities at Hart House would be solved. Lack of space for SAC activities would be solved.

And when the new buildings are finally built on campus, it seems probable the club could be sold at a profit (given the upward rise of property values in Toronto) which would cover the mortgage and carrying charges for the period the university owned the club.

A degree of patience pays-off

By ELIZABETH ADDISON

A B.A. is worth $400,000 over a man's 40-year career. An industrial psychologist said in a panel discussion at Hart House yesterday afternoon.

But Dr. J. Sawatsky conceded later that women have little opportunity in industry and therefore their degrees would not be worth so much. The lone woman panelist, Mrs. E. Kilborn, a former associate of Innis College, and now a housewife, said the education obtained is often left behind after four years at college.

"You can learn just as much by being pregnant five times as you can by going through college," she said. "It's just a different kind of learning."

"The majority of students are far more interested in what happens when they get out of university than what happens when they get into university," commented Prof. D. F. Forster, executive assistant to President Claude Bissell.

"How much good is $10,000 a year when you're not happy with what you're doing," wondered Bob Bossin. After completing his B.A. at Innis last year, Bossin became full time education consultant for SAC.

"It is knowledgeable workers that employers are looking for," Dr. Sawatsky said.

"They are usually very lazy about evaluating prospective employees and they would rather look at the letters after your name than five tests to discover your potential," he added.

After more than two hours the panel hadn't yet decided how "hot" a degree was. One student suggested employers feel if you have the patience to sit through four years of university, you will have the patience to stay with the company for 40 years.

Police close curtains on 48th day

FREDERICTON — (CUP) Seven protesters sitting in UNB's Liberation 130 were arrested early Sunday morning during a surprise raid by city police.

An inside look at Liberation 130

The night before I arrived there the engineers had succeeded in breaking in the door with a large cement ashtray. The defending students, managed to keep them out of the room and the door was repaired shortly afterwards.

October 30, the liberators were again attacked when an aluminum ladder was put against the second floor window and a geology student, armed with a pick and a five-foot fencepost, ascended the ladder.

He began to break the remaining windows with his pick and swung the post around the inside of the room, barely missing the head of a boy who was in the room at the time. One of the defenders then reached a metal pole, usually used to barricade the door, and tried to dislodge the boy from the ladder.

In the struggle which ensued the attacker was hit in the eye with the pole and fell to the ground. Latest reports were that he had 16 stitches in his eye and may eventually lose his sight.

Halloween, the next evening, a note was received under the door threatening the people in the room with stink bombs, tear-gas and fire bombs. The authorities were notified of their intentions, but no action was taken to prevent this attack.

It was carried out by about 200 drunken students who also used a strong spotlight to illuminate the window. The Strax supporters had decided against force or retaliation.

When two of the liberators later went out on the roof to survey the situation, the counter-demonstrators trained the spotlight on them.

Judi McCullough is a first year Erindale College student who spent the week from Oct. 28 to Nov. 6 sitting-in at Liberation 130, the office of University of New Brunswick physics professor Norman Strax, who was fired from his job in September for protesting library regulations.

Strax has since been fined $1 for ignoring an injunction barring him from university property.

Strax supporters have been constantly 'attacked' by conservative Engineers and Forestry students who were always very drunk when they appeared. These students, whether Colin B. McKay who wanted to 'protect' the university from the radical element, came night after night to throw rocks, bottles of acetic acid compound (quite effective stink bombs) and tear-gas at the liberated window of room L130.

If you were going to sock it to the administration, where would you begin?

By ROBIN RIGBY

In this year of universal student unrest, Canada's bastion of conservatism, the University of Toronto, is slowly beginning to shake itself from its lethargy and take a good look at itself.

The two main problems now facing the student are:

- knowing where to go to voice criticisms most effectively
- learning how to differentiate between dissatisfaction with individual courses and with the structure of the university as a whole.

In dealing with problems in specific courses of study, the individual departments reign supreme. These departments make recommendations to their particular faculty council, which in turn passes them on to the Senate, the President, and finally the Board of Governors.

In general, none of these bodies uses its potential power to reverse decisions made by the departments. Students, therefore, should make suggestions about a particular course to their professor or, with the collective presence of course unions, to their department, or make contact with representatives on staff-student committees.

Separate from this, however, is the claim of many students that the entire structure of the university should be revamped. President Bissell's Commission on University Government (nominations for the four student representatives are being accepted by SAC this week) has undertaken to do precisely this.

The above diagram attempts to simplify U of T's structure which confuses even the administrators. So much of the system is based on informal relations between students, faculty, administration, and Board of Governors, that the task of singling out a particular power centre is nearly impossible.

Furthermore, we can only assume that various bodies, such as the Board of Governors, will continue in their present policy of waiving potential powers and control over academic concerns. We can only hope that government intervention, in the form of financial coercion as experienced at Berkeley, will not occur here. But that remains to be seen.

At present, the two key centres for effective decision-making are the Faculty Councils and the President's advisory committees.

Of course, anyone who suffered through three hours of debate by the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science to agree to use Roberts Rules for debate will be justifiably skeptical about its efficiency. Nevertheless it is making some decisions — in spite of its mammoth-like obsolescence.

If students want to have a meaningful say in the restructuring of the university, then they must have equal representation on both the Councils and the advisory committees.

Students have a small wedge in these now — (The 1,000 member Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science has 16 student members). But they must apply pressure to open them up to parallel representation.

The responsibility that cannot be separated from such representation, however, demands that the students be genuinely interested in devoting their time to long often tedious meetings to discuss change.

The high degree of student apathy of U of T, unfortunately, makes me doubt very much that students have reached the stage where they are prepared to accept the responsibility implicit in democracy.

Established by President Bissell in the Spring of 1965 to be "a body distinct both from the Board and the Senate, but closely related to the former, in which these problems of capital, priority, salaries, staff benefits, and long-term policy are discussed by a joint group of lay governors and academics." (from a speech delivered by Bissell to the Association of Teaching Staff, April, 1965).

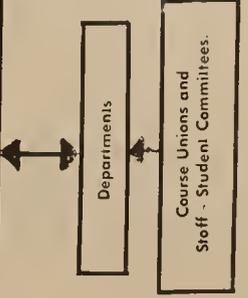

Membership in this group includes: three members of the Board of Governors, selected before each meeting; twelve ex-officio members including the President, Vice-Presidents, Deans and the Chairman of the Dept of Planning; seven directly elected faculty members.

Student representation of this council has been discussed with SAC, and seven SAC members have attended one special meeting of the council.

Strax claims he can live off NB potato harvest. The University administration took another shot at Norman Strax yesterday.

"Strax better than successor" say students asking his return

Strax . continued from centre

They threw rocks, hitting a girl on the head.

The couple on the roof made the peace symbol and begged them to stop the attack. All this succeeded in doing was to bring more rocks from the lynch mob below.

Several minor attacks took place, afterwards, but there were no more injuries on either side. The Strax supporters once again settled into their quiet, family-like existence. Food was still brought into the room by rope or delivered by sympathetic shopkeepers.

Students continued to enter the room at night by the rope ladder suspended from the window, and the students were still attending lectures at the University.

When the officers entered the room this morning they were received by seven tired but nevertheless spirited students. The students passively resisted the officers and were taken to the station, charged with "public mischief".

It is worthwhile noting that, as of now, no charges are reported to have been laid against any of the students who had been involved in the attacks on the room and caused serious damage to university property. Where was the law then?

Target 200 at OSAP meeting today

If 200 students show up for today's OSAP meeting (in Room 108, Mechanical Building at 1 p.m.), a grievance march on Queen's Park will occur within three weeks, says Pat Armstrong, organizer of the SAC committee on student awards.

A report listing grievances with the Ontario Student Awards Program has been presented to Deputy Minister of University Affairs E. E. Stewart.

The report, written by Jack Heath (II New) has three major demands:

- a long range plan by the government to institute free education and universal accessibility,

- revision of the "independent status" clause. At present students are not considered independent unless they have been working for a year, are married, or are in their fourth year.

- a more open appeal system where the student awards officer could no longer be the go-between the student and the government but would make concrete decisions himself in ascertaining an individual's needs.

Stewart has taken no action on the report, Heath said.

Gnu girls get New II news

On Jan. 5 the Spadina side of Wilson Hall, the New College Women's Residence, will be opened for occupancy.

The fee is $525 from Jan. 5 to May 3. There will be space for 150 girls. About 57 of these rooms will be singles, 11 regular doubles, and 41 rooms with bunk beds. When completed the building will hold 386 girls.

Preference will be given to out of town freshmen students, but New College Dean David Stager feels Toronto students will have a good chance of being accepted for the coming term.

Miss A. Huntingford is to be the Dean of Women. There will also be a system of "don-tutors" who would ideally be full-time faculty members. These "don-tutors" will be paid for by the college academic rather than residence budget.

Residence rules will initially be the same as those of Whitney Hall, University College. Dean Stager hopes to be able to get the new residents together before term opens to discuss residence government.

There will be tours before Christmas so that applicants will have a chance to see the rooms.

LONDON (CUP) — The Canadian Union of Students lost another cog in its wheel when the students at the University of Western Ontario voted 2,155 to 1,381 in favor of dropping their CUS membership.

Great paper plane mystery solved

The meaning of the aircraft lodged in the ceiling of Room 135, Old Physics Building has finally come to light. In a letter to The Varsity, the Red Baron of IV APSC identified himself as the designer and launcher of the aircraft which, he explained, are not paper airplanes but "anti-paper plane missiles."

"These craft have been hangered in the said ceiling since Nov. 1966 — it's about time someone noticed them," the Baron said.

"The APPM's can penetrate at least four Varsitys," he boasted, "or 1.039x10<sup>6</sup> inches of steel plate."

The Baron refused to disclose the design of the aircraft. "Revelation of military secrets will leave me no choice but to produce an AAAPPM (anti-APPM-missile) or at least a better APPM and can only lead to a gigantic new arms race and the further proliferation of conventional paper weapons," he said.

Investigations last week unearthed the three reasons. The planes were durable because they were made from IBM computer cards. The nicks in the nose indicate they were shot from elastic bands. Furthermore, the ceiling is made of soft acoustic tile.

ROM minerologist studies crown jewels

By SUSAN GOULD

Would a Topkapi-style scheme to steal the Crown Jewels of Iran succeed? Take a trip to the National Bank of Iran and try it out. But beware of a guard with a machine gun sitting behind a one way mirror.

Even if you did manage to steal the jewels, it would do you no good. Their value is incalculable and they couldn't be sold. But it is a romantic idea

So who cares about the Crown Jewels anyway? The citizens of Iran do, because the Jewels back their currency. And Dr. Victor Meen, Chief minerologist of the Royal Ontario Museum does. He wrote a book about them.

Twenty people showed up for a Hart House talk by Dr. Meen Wednesday night. They came to hear about the days when royalty used jewelled swords, enormous diamond tiaras and bushels of emeralds, to wage wars and pay ransoms.

Today, a handful of ruby rings is worth about $1,000,000. Dr. Meen's book is worth $20. For those who have everything, there is special leather-bound edition for $250. Published in honor of the coronation of the present Shah of Iran.

Rebuild the universities

Pelletier tells AUCC

Over 600 administrators of Canadian universities met for four days in Ottawa last week and discussed the nature of the contemporary university in the light of student unrest, public backlash, federal funds and accessibility.

It was the annual general meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, where most university presidents concluded there was no final answer to general problems of Canadian universities.

Secretary of State Gerard Pelletier had a few answers. He told the AUCC delegates they must "break down the barrier of the aristocratic university and rebuild it as a university of the people."

He said university administrators should pay more attention to student radicals rather than to the preservation of their buildings and the status quo.

Administrators must decide between a "university of reflection", to fulfill the country's manpower demands, and a "university of conscience", having an autonomous decision over education," he added.

It is rumored that a former member of the Canadian Union of Students wrote Mr. Pelletier's speech.

RESIST PRODUCTION-LINE

U of T Professor C.B. Macpherson, president of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, agreed universities should resist outside production-line pressures to provide a capitalist market with skilled manpower.

But he said universities must not take political stands on such issues as war recruiting on campus. Most college administrators agreed that universities must remain neutral and at the same time provide a free forum of dissent.

CUS President Peter Warrian insisted universities were not neutral but represented the establishment. Warrian was one of 25 student delegates and observers invited to the conference.

Dr. D. Carleton Williams, president of the University of Western Ontario, saw two major threats to the university: student extremists "whose diagnosis of the university's ills is dire and whose prescription is fatal", and government intervention which will end the university's autonomy.

Dr. Williams expressed anxiety over the public backlash against student unrest, a swing to the right which could "force the activists to progressively more extreme positions."

"The mass media have developed an unique capacity to 'tell it as it isn't' in their single minded absorption with violence," he added.

Administrators expressed considerable anxiety in the face of another public institution which could threaten their autonomy: federal and provincial government.

CUT-BACKS HURT

AUCC Executive Director Dr. Geoffrey Andrew said a cut-back in government grants would mean a reduction of the number of professors and thus a worse staff-student ratio.

The AUCC also demanded funds for loans to part-time students. In one of the few significant and concrete motions of the conference, they asked the federal government to amend the Canada Student Loan Act to enable part-time students to be eligible for loans.

The AUCC will make a study on accessibility to higher education to be published next June. Dr. Andrew said the study will be "an important social document" rivaling John Porter's Vertical Mosaic in public influence.

About 10 delegates from the U of T administration attended the conference. They included President Claude Bissell, Registrar Robin Ross, and Dean of Graduate Studies Ernest Sirluck.

Students' Administrative Council President Steve Langdon and Vice-President Norm Schachar went as observers.

"Meetings like that never do or say anything," said Langdon, "but it did point out how really basically different are the assumptions of the student left and the administration."

U of T pays $1.75 a student to belong to AUCC.

By ANGELA SHENG

The theme of alienation is all in the blows of the wind. Like the falling leaves, you find it on the door of the bus that takes you to school, on the shoulder of the girl walking in front of you, all over the lawn and the steps leading to your lecture hall.

Then, it descends into your eyelid, quite accidentally as if it were a falling leaf.

As you try to wipe it off, in defence, it has already touched you and is falling off now, maybe onto your jacket, maybe onto the ground, maybe back into space ready for its second eyelid-descent.

As you try to wipe it off, in vain, you realize that you have no power to get rid of it. Just like you have no power to get rid of the sense of alienation you feel.

But you are not alone: you are just one of all the falling leaves. And there is an overwhelming abundance of them.

You are no different from everybody else who thinks he is getting the injustice of it all.

And it is injustice of all kinds at home, on the bus, on the streets, in the lecture halls that he acknowledges and resents.

Occasionally, he thinks maybe there are a few others who are being treated unjustly as well.

Only a few others, mind you, but those few get together by human nature or by conditioned instinct or whatever else that is in the bag. Like small heaps of leaves that get swept together by the inherent whirling of the wind. Anyway, they get together and they become a new way of life.

By new, I mean, they all have their own thing. Be it Maoism or Anti-Imperialism or Realism or Democratic Capitalism or Materialism. Economics and politics and philosophy all mixed up.

They wear or not wear a particular button, they eat croissant or toast for breakfast, they live or not live in a particular district of a city, but they meet themselves, they talk to themselves, and they make love to themselves.

They remain within their respective cliques, consuming their transient comforts. For the moment, they are no longer lost, no longer wandering. For the moment, they may even be happy.

In their transience of "happiness", all forgiven and all forgotten.

And life continues on. So the leaves still fall.

Sometimes they are still aware of the injustices in our society. Sometimes they still care enough to want changes, particularly those changes that would benefit others directly and benefit themselves in the most altruistic sense.

More often, we hear ourselves hargaining for ourselves.

We bargain on the individual basis within our cliques. We all belong to some clique or another.

We bargain as a clique against other cliques.

We, the hot-house weeds and flowers being university students, bargain as a clique against the big and the outside clique, that of our society which contains even more numerous little, petty cliques. Oh, the numerous decadent heaps of brown and yellow.

Enough of all these cliques. Underneath it all, have we really ever given a thought to the well-being of all that surround us, people and nature and all?

The cinematic vision of leaves falling backward into the embraces of the trees.

We are alienated from our society.

Have we not alienated ourselves from the beginning?

Students meet to plan anti-CUS union

Four Carleton students met with representatives from five other universities in Toronto last Thursday to discuss the possibility of forming an alternative association to CUS.

"What we want to consider is an association not a union; an individual not a corporate membership," said George Hunter, 1st vice-president of Carleton University Students' Council who organized the meeting.

The other universities represented were St. Patrick's College, Waterloo, Waterloo Lutheran, Queen's and Windsor.

They hope to interest the University of New Brunswick and the University of Alberta, who have dropped out of CUS, in the alternative association and to attract some independent students from Quebec.

George Hunter claimed Carleton Students' Council President Jerry Lampert had nothing to do with the meeting but last week eight Carleton students angrily charged Lampert with secretly planning an "attempt to organize a counter-union to CUS."

"CUS is a joke" and "Their credibility gap is incredible" were some of the remarks made by those at the meeting, but nothing definite emerged from their discussions.

FOOTBALL ROUNDUP

University of Manitoba defeated the "unbeatable" University of Alberta Golden Bears 10-7 Saturday to win the Western Canada Intercollegiate Athletic Association football championship. U of M will meet Queens next Sunday at Edmonton in the Western College Bowl.

In the SIFL, McGill Redmen buried Waterloo Warriors 48-8 Saturday, led by Dave Fleiszer who carved out 298 yards in 30 carries. Fleiszer finished the season with a total of 925 yards to beat out Blues' Mike Raham who led the league going into the Queens game. Raham had 698 yards total.

University of Western Ontario scored 24 points and McMaster Marauders only 14 to give UWO third place in the SIFL standings.

University of Western Ontario Mustangs scored 17 points in the third quarter to lambast McMaster University Marauders 24-14.

Finally, Waterloo Lutheran University piledrove Loyola U. 40-0 to move on to the Maritime Bowl against St. Mary's University.

Hockey Blues face bullies and boors in Loyola loss

By PHIL BINGLEY

MONTREAL — An impressive win over Montreal Carabins, a disappointing loss to Loyola Warriors and subjection to a boorish, hostile crowd were the highlights of Varsity Blues' pre-season junket to Montreal this week-end.

Friday night, Paul Laurent whipped in three goals when Blues trounced Carabins 12-3 in a clean wide-open contest. Montreal, who are expected to be Toronto's toughest opponent in the battle for Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League honours, proved weak in moving the puck out of their own zone and inconsistent on offence.

In contrast, Blues exploded from behind their own blueline with defencemen Jim Miles, Bill L'Heureux, Brent Swannich and Terry Parsons alternately lugging the puck out cleanly and hitting quick-breaking forwards with sharp passes. Miles, incidentally had one of his best games in three years at Varsity.

Gord Cunningham and John Wright each with a pair and Bob McClelland, Brian St. John, Mike Peterman, Brian Tompson and L'Heureux had the other Varsity scores.

Tom Little, starting his first game in two seasons, played solidly and had no chance on the three shots that beat him.

On Saturday evening, Loyola tried to intimidate Blues with an all-out body-checking attack. Their game plan was successful in that they kept Varsity forwards off-balance and pulled off a 6-4 upset but the thumping often turned into high-sticking, slashing and general hacking.

Laurent received a nasty gash over his left eye when a Warrior defenceman connected on a two-hand slash as the slick centre was breaking into the clear. McClelland (eye laceration) St. John (mouth cut) were similarly given the battle-axe treatment.

Thirty-one penalties were assessed during the chippy match and when the players did try to concentrate on hockey, the fans halted action with continual barrages of garbage. And, despite the fact that arena attendants spent the better part of their evening removing debris from the ice surface, the public announcer never warned spectators to stop heaving paper, leftover food, etc.

Despite the loss and the honky tonk atmosphere, Blues' coach Tom Watt still managed to see the brighter side of the situation. "They (Loyola) beat us," quoth Tom, "But I don't think they outplayed us."

Warriors didn't outplay Blues, they just scored more often. Gord Cunningham turned in a fine effort with his two goals while Laurent and Peterman added singletons.

Blues Rookie rearguard Brent Swannich showed great poise in carrying the puck out of his own end and the overall defensive work was encouraging.

NOTES: ...Goalenders Tom Little and Brian Chapman each played in the two game set. Blues other two puckstoppers Adrian Watson and Peter Adamson will split duties in the two exhibition matches with Halifax Junior Canadians next week-end. ...Newcomers Mike Boland, John Wright and Terry Peterman all showed well in their first starts. ...Loyola officials spent a month before Saturday's game building up the contest as a showdown for first place in the national pre-season rankings. Naturally then when Warriors looked to have the game won, the fans started to chant "We're Number One". If they meant number one hamburgers, I'd have to agree.

Bill L'Heureux (3) moves up quickly from his defense position to take John Wright's goalmouth pass and score Varsity's seventh goal in 12-3 win over Montreal Carabins. The game was L'Heureux's first as a Blue.

Bracht bops ex-mates again

University men? They looked and played like school kids on Saturday.

I'm talking about the soccer Blues, defending western conference champions in Guelph against Gryphons.

Now Gryphons, see, are the lowest. They've lost five and tied one. And Saturday they managed to win their second of the season—both against Blues, defending western conference champions.

The score was 2-1.

Guelph opened the scoring at 18 minutes when ex-Blue Norm Bracht placed a well-taken free kick just inside the post. That seemed to give Gryphons a lift and they pressed Blues hard.

But at the 39-minute mark, Blues came back to make things equal at 1-1. Jim Lefkos slammed a pass from John Gero past a helpless goalkeeper.

Knowledgeable observers felt this would mean a Blues' comeback. It has in past games. But not this time. Sloppy before the score, Blues at that point fell apart.

Team play all but disappeared. In soccer, this is disastrous.

Then came the crushing blow — a fine floating header off Bracht's noggin into the corner to give the Gryphons a 2-1 lead with 22 minutes left in the match.

Some cool, careful play by Blues might at this point been sufficient to turn the tides aside. But, no. Blues completely lost their cool.

Within five minutes two of our men Ken Cancellera and Jim Lefkos, were ordered to leave the game by the referee with whom they had argued. Their childish displays of temper meant Blues had to oppose the 11 Gryphons with only nine men. In soccer, this too is disastrous.

Team manager, Brian Houston summed it up succinctly when he commented "...too many stars and not enough workhorses."

Blues now have one full week to prepare themselves for the OQAA championship game.

GAELS GILD BLUES 14-6 TO SNATCH YATES CUP

Queen's tough halfback, Heino Lilles (34), crashes over for Goels' second touch-down. Grobbing Lilles too late is Jim Bennett (41) while Gord Squires (42) makes a futile lunge. Blocking out huge Norm Troinor (60) is Bob Climie (57). Ron Clark (26) odds insurance.

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

KINGSTON. Ram, bam, slam, wham. Or perhaps serunch, punch, munch, crunch.

Either way it sounded victory for Queen's Golden Gaels on Saturday as they recaptured the Yates Cup from Toronto by rigorously pounding out a sound 14-6 win over Varsity Blues to conclude the SIFL season.

The victors now travel out west for a game against Manitoba Bisons to decide one of the two berths in the College Bowl. Waterloo Lutheran and St. Mary's collide religiously and otherwise in the other semi-final.

Saturday's contest in Kingston found itself churned back to hammer and tong fundamentals on a gridiron that would have made a good World War I battlefield, complete with craters, pockmarks and mud, oodles of mud. The truck of muck which littered the field totally ruled out spectacular dancy-fan offense by either team. Two bucks and a kick were the order of the day.

It proved a rugged recipe particularly amenable to Queen's as coached by veteran Frank Tindall a team always well-schooled in the basics of the game. Amid the great gobs of goo, simple chores like blocking and tackling became paramount. And the fundamentally better squad won.

Defensively especially, Queen's were magnificent. For the second straight game, the gilded goliaths held Blues without a touchdown, yielding only a pair of field goals by Paul McKay, and these resulted from offensive lapses.

The front wall of Jim Sheritt, Doug Walker, George McKenzie and John Stirling kept building muddy pyramids of Varsity linemen to blot out Blues' running attack, so essential an ingredient with the field as sloppy as it was.

Their task was made easier by the absence of hard-charging back, Glen Markle who suffered strained ligaments in last Saturday's game against McGill. Markle was sorely missed since Queen's were able to key consistently on fullback Mike Raham, who managed only 58 yards in 16 carries. Varsity's total rushing output was a meagre 96 yards.

Quarterback Vic Alboini had another rough afternoon against Queen's, completing five of 19 passes for 72 yards, with three interceptions, all by Gaels' Jim Turnbull. However, in fairness, aerial conditions were atrocious; Alboini's opposite number, experienced Don Bayne was hardly better—three out of 13 for only 19 yards.

Offensively, Queen's stuck to the ground, grinding out yard after yard after yard, with dull, methodical, straight-ahead power football. Behind the brilliant blocking of veteran guards Brian Parnega and Bob Climie, Gaels oozed 219 yards rushing, the majority by halfback Heino Lilles.

Lilles was a standout all day before the home folks, as he kept running through the left side of Blues' defense for short, staccato bursts of five and six yards a shot. He totalled 123 yards and one touchdown.

Although they came out on the short end of the score, Blues had little to be ashamed of. In fact, there were a number of 'if' factors during the game which might well have reversed the outcome.

The defensive unit was hellishly tough. Unsung regulars like Gord Squires and Chris Hicks had superb games, as did rookies Walt Sehr and Dave Richardson who filled in for halfback Stew MacSween and linebacker Bill Bennett, both injured during the game. (Sehr went both ways admirably.)

Defensively, Blues' effort could hardly have been improved upon. They were just given too much to do.

Varsity's six points were set up by the defense in the first quarter. Ian Kirkpatrick intercepted a Don Bayne pass on the 21 which resulted in a 24 yard field goal by McKay. Two minutes later Gord Squires recovered a fumble on the 29. However the offense faltered again and McKay connected for another placement from 21 yards out.

Queen's took the lead at the 7:14 mark of the second quarter on a drive kept alive by a foolish third down penalty to Varsity for holding. Fullback Ron Clark went over from the one yard line. Doug Cozac converted.

The second Gaels' touchdown in the third quarter was a complete farce thanks to 50 yards in four penalties called on Varsity by the officials, two of which described by Ivor Wynne recently on television as "two of Queen's most distinguished alumni." Gaels contributed the other 18 yards as Lilles got the touchdown from the two. Cozac converted.

RUGGER

In rugger action on Saturday, Varsity defeated a vastly improved Guelph team 19-3. The Guelph squad, though bigger in the forwards than Varsity, lacked the experience of Blues who capitalized on their opportunities. Once again scrum half George Wraw led the scoring with two tries and two converts, while Compton, Moris Apse, and Tony Pierre added majors.

For Blues, Saturday's game was a dress rehearsal for the championship on the fifteenth against undefeated Queen's University. If Blues are to retain their hold on the Turner Trophy, there will have to be considerable improvement in their tackling and ball control which allowed Guelph to cross the Varsity line for the first time this season.

Blues line-up for the championship will be strengthened by the return of Larry Barron and hopefully Graham Wym, both of whom on the injured list at present.

Blues B team got burned for the first time this season as Trent University swept to a 26-3 victory. Trent was led by Paul Wilson, an outstanding former Blue, who provided 12 of their points.

IN THE SCRUM: Moris Apse and Chris Compton playing his first game for the firsts, both had outstanding games on Saturday. Apse who had played for Ontario and Eastern Canada is responsible for much of Blues' success in the scrums and lineouts.

Mike Rohom (22) wears a look of amazement as he bobbles and eventually drops a short toss from Vic Alboini. George McKenzie (60) rushes in for Queen's.

U of T calm, Dow besieged elsewhere

Dow is coming back to campus Dec. 12 — recruiting again.

To forestall a recurrence of last year's conflicts the Students' Administrative Council wants to ask the Engineering Society to co-sponsor a teach-in on the question of recruitment on campus.

The various companies would be invited to discuss their production.

Several other proposals have been put forward to cope with the possibility of violence and confrontation.

One recommends an ad hoc group, rather than SAC, be established to organize a series of educational activities. This group might deal directly with the issue of campus recruiting, and could perhaps circulate a petition asking companies to debate their production if more than 500 signatures are obtained.

SAC Cultural Affairs Commissioner Mark Freiman (IV UC) said the idea of a forum on the topic of war production would be unlikely to serve as an adequate vehicle for protest.

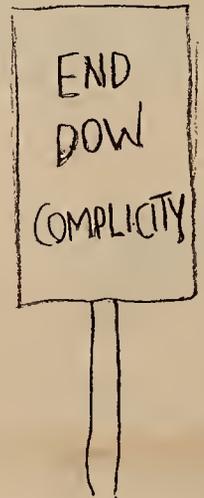

He suggested a demonstration be organized at the placement service to center against the companies rather than the students.

Members of the anti-war groups, Canadians for the National Liberation Front, and the Committee to End the War in Vietnam are meeting today to discuss their positions.

two of 13 scheduled interviews, fisticuffs broke out between demonstrators and engineering students. Clothes were torn, people knocked down, and one demonstrator had his face cut.

Dean of Arts Lloyd Dulmage had earlier notified the manpower office of possible violence and recommended the recruiter leave.

The Manitoba demonstration followed a similar but peaceful one at Saskatoon last Tuesday.

STORRS, CONN. — (CUP) — Over 100 students occupied the administration center of the University of Connecticut Monday to demand amnesty for four faculty members and eight students charged by the administration with obstructing Dow Chemical Company recruitment on the campus Oct. 30.

The 12 are threatened with disciplinary action and suspension for their role in a Dow protest which forced cancellation of the company's recruitment procedures.

Administrative work continued throughout the occupation and no attempts were made to evict the demonstrators.

Students say the 12 were singled out of the original protest group of 100 because of their history of anti-war action. Edward V. Gant, the school's provost, said the charge against them resulted from their refusal to leave a room where a recruitment interview was being conducted despite their "full knowledge" that the action violated university regulations.

Since the Dow protest, administration officials have cancelled scheduled placement interviews on campus by the Grumman Aircraft Company and the Central Intelligence Agency.

WINNIPEG (CUP) — Violence erupted at the University of Manitoba last Thursday in the wake of a protest against the presence of a Dow recruiter at the university placement office.

The protest began when 15 sign carrying students gathered outside the Canada Manpower Center. Within an hour 200 had gathered with 30 people actively protesting.

When the group padlocked a door to keep out the recruiter who had completed only

New College noes Anti-Draft

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

New College Students Council last night voted 15-5 not to give $100 to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

The motion was originally tabled at the last NCSC meeting two weeks ago while a referendum was held to gauge the sentiment of the student body of New College members toward the donation.

The referendum, held last Thursday, resulted in a 58 percent vote against the motion — but only 23 percent of the members voted.

Council members were asked to vote last night on the motion "using the referendum as a guideline."

Rick Lehan, (I New) felt the referendum was merely a "public opinion poll" which members should consider but should not have to abide by.

When Chris Szalwinski (II APSC) moved to have the council accept the referendum as binding, he was ruled out of order by speaker, Ron Thompson (SGS), whose position was supported by the council.

"I reserve the right to represent the minority point of view," Tom Marbaum (III New), NCSC treasurer, said. "And other members should, too."

Jake Zelinger (I New) protested that the money should be given to a "worthier cause".

But Szalwinski, a New SAC representative, pointed out that New members believed their "voting was making the decision."

"We cannot take it away from them," he said. "We have no other choice than to vote against this motion."

Whatever their reasons, 15 members voted successfully to defeat the motion. New College will not make the donation.

OCA Confrontation

Dr. Douglas Wright

Dr. Douglas Wright, chairman of the Committee of University Affairs buffeted questions and criticisms fired by students and faculty at the Ontario College of Art yesterday.

Dr. Wright is author of the controversial Wright Report, commissioned by the government to study and propose changes in the administrative structure of the college following the unrest at the college last spring.

The report proposes that a council of 9 laymen chosen by the provincial cabinet, 6 full time staff members, and 3 students embody the formal structure for academic and administrative decision making.

Students, criticized the invitation for student representation as being merely student tokenism.

Violence in Mexico City

By AGI LUKACS

The film showed a wide street filled with matchers, and then some tanks. A voice told of two students crushed by the tanks. There were shots of young people in jail, one holding a guitar above his head. And a traffic sign held above a crowd read "No Turn to the Right."

Students in a half-filled Sidney Smith lecture hall were listening Monday to a young Mexican student leader speak of the last four months' violence in his country.

Ricardo de la Luz, a member of the National Strike Committee which nearly plunged Mexico into a revolution this summer, was brought to the U of T by the Latin American Justice Committee.

"The climate of violence which now reigns in Mexico City was initiated by the military invasion of the U of Mexico campus," says a leaflet distributed Monday afternoon.

Discontent surfaced so quickly in Mexico, said Ricardo, that two marches 15 days apart had 250,000 and 600,000 turnouts respectively. In one march in Mexico City, 5 demonstrators were killed by police machine-gun fire. The town of Topillero was occupied by 25,000 peasants and government officials were driven out when buslines wouldn't compensate for 10 deaths.

The movement petered out somewhat following an Oct. 2-3 massacre in which, reported a New York Times correspondent, there were 49 dead and 500 wounded. "There was virtual martial law" explained the Mexican student, because the Olympics were only 10 days away.

"But the movement will continue until our demands are met," insisted de la Luz. University students, who were due back to classes Nov. 4, will not return until then, he said.

The demands of the National Strike Committee are:

- freedom for the 4,500 political prisoners now in jail, one third since August.
- repeal of an anti-sedition law that is used to imprison opponents of the virtual one-party state;
- dismissal of three police chiefs, and dissolution of the granaderos, the repressive military security police;
- compensation to the victims of the repression.

"These democratic demands must be discussed democratically," said de la Luz. "We have wanted to have a public dialogue with the government so the people would become a bit more politicized . . . we had already radicalized most of the student body, unmasking the government for what it is."

The 75 students and staff in Sid Smith agreed to send a telegram to Mexican President Diaz Ordaz, protesting the repression of the last few months.

NO SLUR INTENDED

There has been a storm of protest over the Monday editorial "Buggery is Remembrance". Some people have called it pointless, and others have objected that the editorial was unclear and poorly written.

The point of the piece was this — people become more incensed about morality and obscenity than they do about the killing of human beings.

Maybe that's true and maybe it's not. But one thing is sure — some people have become more incensed about an editorial than they ever have about civil rights, Vietnam or Biafra.

We apologize to those who thought the editorial was a slur against those who fought and died in World Wars I and II. Such a slur would be inexcusable. If just wars exist, those were just wars against naked aggression.

We are sure, for that reason, that most students would have fought voluntarily in those wars. We hope, for the same reason, that most students would object to the naked American aggression in Vietnam.

The war in Vietnam, to which the editorial cartoon and, indirectly, the editorial referred, is patently not a just war. The Americans are clearly the aggressors there, and Canadians are clearly complicit in this war.

CUG

Nominations for the Commission on University Government (CUG) close Friday with only one completed nomination for the four important student seats.

Dr. Bissell has said the commission will have "a profound effect on the academic structure of the entire university community in Canada."

One of those effects could be the establishment of a principle of equal staff-student representation on virtually all university bodies. With four student and four faculty seats on the CUG, it seems logical that they would specify the same proportions for the final structure they recommend.

(Of course, how Dr. Bissell, the ninth member, will vote is a matter of conjecture.)

The CUG has also established the principle of non-interference by outside bodies in university affairs. The Board of Governors has been excluded as voting members, hopefully the final structure will also avoid such a body.

The interests of the community can

This country sells war material to the United States, and the University of Toronto does research for the U.S. armed forces, harmless research perhaps, but enough to free American scientists for the perplexing problems of developing effective defoliants, nerve gases, etc. The University of Toronto also permits companies which contribute to the war to recruit on campus.

There will be (we hope) no Dow demonstrations this year — the cost in friction and ill-will is too great. But that does not stop us from recognizing that allowing these companies to recruit here is morally wrong.

The editorial was not intended to desecrate Remembrance Day. We hoped it might indirectly point out the hypocrisy of holding such a service on the one hand, and contributing to an unjust war on the other.

We've heard this argument before, many times. In this form it is trite and would have passed without comment. So we tried another way, attempting to get through people's detached attitude toward the war in Vietnam in particular, human suffering in general, by asking:

"What shocks you more, obscenity or death?"

We therefore apologize to all those offended by the editorial and will try to avoid offending them in the future.

probably be better expressed through the provincial government than big business. Perhaps a fourth body made up of the public could act as a countervailing power against outright provincial interference.

Above all the new structure recommended by CUG should include:

o greater decentralization of the various academic departments, especially in the areas of examinations, evaluations, course content, etc;

o an emphasis on a university that is critical of society, one that does more than provide trained manpower.

o recognition of the university as an academic community made up of students and faculty, with administrators the civil servants whose primary responsibilities are carrying out policy, not creating it.

With four seats out of nine students have as much power as they could hope for, and deserve the best possible representation.

Let's hope this isn't one of those elections with a handful of candidates and a turnout of only 25 per cent.

left something to be desired

I have some difficulty reacting to your editorial regarding Remembrance Day. I hold no great grief for the heroes of World War I, for whom November 11th was designated, but I do think the Monday editorial left more than a little to be desired.

The point made in the editorial was very vague and tended more to alienate than educate people concerning the real issues Remembrance Day raises.

An editorial page should be a place for cogent argument and concise analysis. The Monday editorial did not display these characteristics. I hope that future editorials will do so.

It's particularly unfortunate that such editorials should become alienating factors when the general standard of the paper in such areas as news coverage, special features and set-up has improved so much this year.

Steven Langdon
SAC President.

reaction — any reaction

The editorial policy of this paper as it has appeared this year can only be described as a blind attempt at provoking reaction from its readers. Reaction on any terms and by any means. Any kind of reaction so long as the reader is shocked out of his supposed lethargy.

With this in mind, the Remembrance Day editorials are undoubtedly the best pieces of writing the paper has offered the university audience in a long time.

Considering that The Varsity has had almost unqualified success in alienating its readers in only two and a half months, what could do more for the cause than two editorials entitled "Buggery is Remembrance" and "Piglets"?

Perhaps a reading of the first of these would add the finishing touch. This piece of writing was offered not as the cynical comment of one man on the basest elements of human nature, but as the representative opinion of a newspaper. This is its most reprehensible quality.

editorial

Last night, while I was attending a showing of Serge Eisenstein's film October at The Public Enemy Cinema, a representative of the Ontario Board of Censors, Mr. W. R. Watt, arrived and ruled that the film could not continue its run because it has never been approved by the Board of Censors.

This film, which documents the overthrow by the bolsheviks of Kerensky's provisional Russian government, is one of the greatest silent film classics in existence. Although no public objection was made against this showing, the Board has apparently decided to ignore the film's artistic and historical importance. There can be no possible objection to this film aside from its political content, and it can hardly be called propaganda.

I wish to urge all conscientious readers of the Varsity to rectify this outrage by complaining to the authorities involved, and to ensure that such a serious breach of freedom of thought is never repeated.

How to start a Course Union

By DON ROSS

Don Ross is SAC Education Commissioner and a fourth-year student at Trinity College.

Staff-student committees are becoming generally accepted as a means of increasing student participation in departmental decisions. Course unions are a logical means of extending this participation.

Course unions involve challenge and potential. They are an opportunity for students to become more directly involved in the educational process; to better conditions both for themselves and for others. But unions will only succeed if a number of students put forth some effort. They require general interest, not just the support of a few.

STRUCTURE

Membership in the course union of a particular department is composed of those students taking at least one course offered by that department.

The elected executive of a union should be responsible for implementing policy decisions made at general meetings and for realizing other objectives of the union as defined by the membership.

WHY A COURSE UNION

Course unions can form the constituencies from which students are elected to the staff-student committees of their departments. Student members, democratically chosen, become authorized representatives with an obligation to discover and speak for the wishes of all students. Meetings of the union can provide excellent forums for student representatives to report on committee proceedings and to receive suggestions and reactions from other students. A few course unions are already getting educational reform to the satisfaction of both students and faculty.

Course union programs may include informal meetings with members of the staff where discussions can be of a wider scope than those held in current, formal learning situations. Other programs might include seminars, dinners, films, seminars, etc.

The day of the centralized SAC course evaluation has passed. Too much work was required of too few people and some questions were too general to provide information of value. The cost was high and the results inadequate. But evaluations should not die for they offer a critique of courses valuable to staff and students alike. If course unions take up the task of evaluation the questions will be more relevant, the interest and response better, and the administrative load more manageable.

FORMATION

You can start a course union by getting a group together, drawing up a constitution, and submitting it to a general meeting for amendment and adoption. You then elect an executive and develop a program. Other bodies, such as course clubs, could alter their structure and become course unions.

There is much leeway both in the method of formation and the structure adopted. Only the general principles of unrestricted admittance and democratic elections are basic requirements. Different courses may call for quite different constitutions depending upon the size, the nature (college or university subjects), and the objectives set by the students involved. The union should be the servant of the students, meeting their specific needs.

SAC AND COURSE UNIONS

The Students' Administrative Council is anxious to see course unions develop. The Education Commission will gladly provide both information and financial support. Financial aid will be given to cover the costs of forming the union, such as advertising general meetings in the Varsity, and sponsoring specific programs including course evaluations.

Do students want to elect their representatives to staff-student committees? Do they wish to sponsor programs connected with their discipline? Do they feel the need to produce course evaluations? Do they want to discuss their education with the departments directly and let SAC devote itself to other more general matters? The answers will come from student response and, as always, actions speak louder than words.

editorial argument "completely irrational"

I wish to object to Monday's editorial "Buggery is Remembrance" on several counts:

1. The editorial was a completely irrational argument, if it can be considered an argument at all. There is no logical connection between buggery and war. Buggery is an individual immorality, while war is a social immorality. When individuals were killing each other they were responding to a social coercion of justice and patriotism.

Whether or not these social values were immoral is irrelevant to the comparison with buggery.

Although I can see some distorted connection between buggery and war, I fail to see any connection whatsoever between buggery and remembrance. I doubt whether the author of the editorial could explain his generalization either: he didn't in the editorial. Or perhaps this was his explanation:

"Killing is natural; buggery is a 'crime against nature'. What is natural is forgotten, what is perverse, remembered. The problem with 'Remembrance Day' is that it commemorates men being natural on a mass scale. So natural that we forget them."

I cannot criticize the logic of this series of generalizations: there is none.

2. Since the editorial appeared on Remembrance Day and since it compared fighting to the individual crime of buggery, the implication is that it is an indictment against the men who fought and died in the two world wars.

Tell a student whose father died in the war that his sacrifice was tantamount to buggery. Would you have the guts to tell him that face to face?

3. Despite the illogicity of the piece, it was generally badly written. The use of obscenities was not justified. They created an even greater confusion than the irrationality of argument allowed alone. Their effect was only shock or disgust — in the author rather than in war. Obscenity has been used much more cleverly by Paul Krassner.

4. Even if the editorial was not an indictment of individuals but of war in general, an anti-war argument is a cliché unless it offers something original and relevant. That editorial did neither.

My final objection is that the editorial was not signed. Nor would the writer let his name be known to anyone who might inquire at the Varsity.

Paul MacRae tells me he did not write it. At least MacRae has the guts to sign dubious editorials such as "Pigs".

If the author of Monday's editorial had the supposed 'guts' to write it, he could have had the guts to sign his name to it.

An unsigned editorial generally means it represents the policy of the Varsity.

If I were convinced that "Buggery is Remembrance" was the Varsity policy, I would resign from the staff.

Brian Johnson

Varsity SAC editor

"tasteless and idiotic"

The Varsity editorial page has been the source of more confused hysteria this year than most. But your editorial on Monday was without doubt the most perverse, tasteless, and idiotic pieces ever to grace your pages.

We first had to suffer through the nonsense of police pigs; in an attempt to relieve the passions and causes of our American friends the editor indulged in a self-righteous diatribe against the fascist tendencies of the Toronto police state.

There was an element — an iota, a minuscule iota — of truth in that editorial, so in the cause of student unionism and radical solidarity one suffered in silence.

But your Monday piece "Buggery is Remembrance" was so grotesque and so completely irresponsible that I feel obliged to comment.

I write as a radical, and as one committed to the basic premises of the student movement. And not only was the editorial an affront to the

I believe that Robin Rigby misses the point in Monday's article ("Who pulls the strings at U of T").

The days of revolution at the University of Toronto are not far off. For an increasing number of students, there appears to be no alternative to a disruption of the present system and to an open conflict with the rulers of the university.

While the red or the black ## who pulls the strings?

flag may not be flown over Convocation Hall, the occupation of university buildings or their abandonment is a real possibility

The administrators are aware of this and are looking in fear and anger for the nineteenth-century causes of unrest. They think that the causes lie in the pronouncements of the democratic socialists on the SAC or in the utopian liberalism of the ATS. What the administration fails to realize is that both the SAC and the ATS are but bureaucratic by-products of the liberalism so firmly entrenched in this university. As such, both the SAC and the ATS can pose no meaningful challenges.

Student unwillingness to participate in student government reflects their recognition that hierarchies are no longer meaningful and does not imply apathy or complacency. We, as students, are involved in our environment, if it is just that the SAC and the university structure are no longer central to that environment.

When revolution comes, it will not be the product of any causal sequence of events, but will be in response to the total inadequacy of liberalism's answer to our present dilemma. Such an upheaval cannot "fail" since its purpose is to disrupt the present order and to pose a more meaningful counter-environment to the existing one in the university and society.

Halfway House to Square John society

By JUDY LANE

HOW WAS THAT POT YOU SMOKED LAST NIGHT?

Remember the book you "borrowed" last week from the library AND FORGOT TO SIGN OUT?

Weren't you ashamed of yourself the other day in Eaton's, when you considered dropping that lipstick into your purse WITHOUT PAYING?

Be honest with yourself — Have you never in your lifetime committed or contemplated committing an indictable offense? Is it so far out for you to imagine yourself in prison, behind bars?

How would you feel when you got out?

How could you face people?

Who would employ you?

Where would you live, if you had no family or close friends?

In short, how would you cope financially, emotionally, and socially with the cold, cut-throat, Square John society beyond the security of the prison gates?

Harold Kind is one man who could help you out. The Harold King Farm in Keswick, Ontario, is not a farm. It is a halfway house, an intermediate facility bridging the enormous prison community gap, for the rehabilitation of the released prisoner.

The 44-acre project, opened in January of 1963, is operated almost exclusively by Harold King and his wife, Katie. The farm house, to which a large new wing was recently added, provides modern facilities and accommodations for a maximum of 12 men at one time.

Upon arriving at the Farm, you will most likely see a few boys working on the grounds, cutting grass, painting, or fixing, and others just having fun — swimming and fishing in the man-made lake, or tossing a football around.

As you enter the house, you are warmly greeted by Harold King, overloaded with work and responsibilities, yet always finding time to talk and "kibbitz". His welcome will be echoed by his lovely and charming wife, Katie, and by their boisterous and precocious son, Aubrey.

You will usually find one or two boys preparing dinner in the kitchen, some reading or playing cards in the hobby room, a couple downstairs in the rec room, around the piano or pool table, and oth-

COMMISSION ON UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT (CUG)

What's it for?

CUG will examine the role of University of Toronto in society, and the structure of government at U of T. It is expected to make recommendations to the Ontario legislature for amendment of the U of T Act.

Major questions to be dealt with include:

- Should there be a separate Board of Governors and Senate?
- Should the public have any voice in university decisions and planning? Who should speak for the public?

What is a meaningful degree of student participation?

How long will it work?

CUG will get down to business in late December or early January. Submissions will be received from interested groups throughout second term. An interim report will be released at some point in March. A final report will be written during the summer of 1969, for completion by September '69.

Who's eligible to run as a student member?

Any student, part- or full-time, at University of Toronto is eligible for election to CUG. Nomination forms are now available at the SAC Office. Thirty signatures of students with ATL numbers must be obtained.

How much of my time will it take?

The election campaign will be from November 15-26. To encourage a large turn-out in voting, many forums will be held across campus during the campaign period, so you can expect to be busy if you run.

Students elected to the Commission can expect to be rather tied up during second term. Simcoe Hall is considering making as many concessions as possible, though, to students elected. These may include extensions of deadlines on all papers and reports; and the possibility of writing exams during the summer. Details are to be worked out with individual deans or department chairmen.

What would the campaign cost?

A limit of $50. has been set on campaign expenditures by the election committee. SAC is considering payment of part of these expenses for all candidates, and will also approach Simcoe Hall for assistance in this matter. Other election rules will be available at the SAC Office on Friday, November 15.

ers in the living room engaged in conversation with each other or visitors.

But Harold King offers his "boys" more than food, accommodations and facilities. He gives them affection and attention — home and a family. He is one of those individuals who has the rare ability to communicate with anyone from criminals to university students to animals.

Every halfway house seems to have its own unique quality or philosophy. The Harold King Farm revolves primarily around the "family concept" with a warm, friendly, non-institutional atmosphere. King is referred to as "Dad," a name that maximizes authority, respect and affection, and Katie is "Mom". Their "boys" are taught to share and work together as one large family.

The boys range in age from 16 to 60, and are generally guilty of committing minor offenses. Applications are carefully considered. The men are screened and selected by a special Board, which chooses only those that seem hopeful and show a genuine desire to help themselves. No drug addicts, homosexuals, or psychiatric cases are accepted. Those selected stay for an average of six weeks.

The men participate in individual counselling with Harold King, frequent group meetings and the numerous house responsibilities. King attempts to find suitable employment, and often some type of educational training for each man he takes in.

In talking to these men, you realize that many are lonely individuals, in desperate need of friendship and attention. Others, especially the older men, have greater obstacles to overcome, and their prospects of changing seem less hopeful.

Though it is difficult to define and measure the success of a halfway house, the Farm may be said to have a relatively high success rate. Only about one third of the boys who "leave the Farm are known to return to prison. The national recidivist rate in comparison, is as high as 66-80 per cent. But success in the case of some offenders may merely mean keeping a man out of jail six months this time instead of six weeks.

King hates to calculate rates. "This isn't a ball game," he says. "We're dealing with human beings, not scores and statistical figures."

The Farm faces several perennial problems. To begin with there are constant financial burdens. Given only a small provincial grant, the Farm is almost entirely supported by private donations from companies and individuals. This means that only a limited number of men can be accommodated at once.

But perhaps the greatest concern is public ignorance not only of the existence and operation of the farm, but also of the halfway house movement in general. Individuals and governments are just beginning to realize the significance of and vital need for halfway houses, to support them, and incorporate this type of facility into their correctional systems.

In King's words, "The responsibility of society begins every time a prison door swings open to release a man."

This is the founding philosophy of the farm.

OSAP Queen's Park march for next week

About 200 U of T students decided to march on Queen's Park Wednesday to demand changes in the Ontario Student Awards Program.

At a general meeting called by the Students Administrative Council irritated students discussed the feasibility of a march to Queen's Park.

A SAC-sponsored committee has been meeting since mid-September registering complaints from students who have suffered from the tightening of OSAP regulations this year.

They have presented two briefs to deputy minister of university affairs E. E. Stewart, listing their grievances and asking for a more liberal program.

SAC president Steve Langdon says no action has been taken by the department of university affairs since the reports were submitted.

The students are asking for:
• a presentation by the department of university affairs of an overall plan as to how universal accessibility can be achieved.
• the revision of the "independent status" clause. At present a student is considered independent only if he is in fourth year, married or prior to entering university.

All others are expected to receive educational funds from their families regardless of the family's income.
• the revision of the loan-grants system in order that more grants be made available.
• a change in the policy of student contributions. Under the present program a student in second year is expected to contribute $450 of his summer earnings toward his education. However, said Langdon, many students found it impossible to find jobs last summer.

Langdon said all university registrars and aid officers across the province have filed requests for changes in the restrictive program to the Department of University Affairs.

"But they haven't had any response either," he said. Mr. Stewart was unavailable for comment.

Langdon blamed the department for manipulating public opinion against students.

"We constantly read in the public media of isolated cases of cheating by students in obtaining their loans. But we never read about the large number of students who can't go on further with their education because of the restrictive nature of the program.

"And we get continual news from the department about the great increase of money being spent on the program, but the department never relates this to the fact that there has been an 18 per cent increase in the number of university students this year."

Langdon told students they should not think of their own needs while participating in the march. They should be also concerned with families who will not be able to send their children to university in the future because of the restrictions applied this year.

He suggested that trade unions could be a source of support for the students. The students are planning to gain support from other post-secondary institutions in the province.

Religion helps says professor in theological Baumbast

Religion helps students get used to living with unsolved questions, said theology professor Gregory Baum in Carr Hall last night.

"The question of religion applies directly to the modern student", he pointed out. "Because through it students learn to preserve their identities in a changing world."

"Because it was there," answered Varsity photographer Sir Edmund Hilary when asked why he climbed the smokestack on southwest campus yesterday. From the top of the giant 290 foot erection — which is still under construction — Sir Hilary said he could see "an awful lot" of the campus. "It was windy," said the weather-beaten photog. "But I could see an awful lot." The interview, unfortunately, took place at his hospital bedside. After leaning out over the rim of the cement structure, Sir Hilary fell and . . . Well, his camera is OK.

Police action backfires at UNB

FREDERICTON (CUP) — An administration decision to use city police to quietly end a bothersome 48 day sit-in at the University of New Brunswick has backfired noisily.

The Strax affair, almost dead for three weeks now, was suddenly revived after the arrest of seven protesters in Liberation 130 early Sunday morning.

Within 48 hours of the police action:
• the student council at UNB strongly condemned the use of police;

• a group of protesters sat in at a city police station and demanded they too be arrested;

• a conference of students from universities and colleges in the province announced plans to switch the location of its sessions this weekend from the UNB campus to protest the presence of police at the university;

• two keynote speakers scheduled to address a maritime history symposium at UNB this weekend have refused to speak on campus and may force cancellation of the whole affair.

While all this was happening, the seven appeared in magistrate's court Tuesday morning and pleaded not guilty to a charge of public mischief. All were released on their own recognizance, and separate trials were set to begin Dec. 10.

The UNB student council, not at all vocal during the seven week protest, called the police action "unprecedented, violent and oppressive" in a letter sent to administration President Colin B. MacKay.

The students said they could not condone "totalitarian tactics as part of the regular administrative routine" and affirmed the "right of students to disagree with the policies and opinions of the Board of Governors." The council then demanded the university drop charges against those arrested.

On Tuesday afternoon, Dugald Blue, university registrar, said the decision had been made Nov. 1 on the advice of the board of deans. He said student possession of building keys had been one of the reasons for the eviction but admitted nothing had been broken into or taken.

He said the administration would have to "consider" whether any action would be taken against engineering and commerce students who participated in raids against Liberation 130 and caused extensive damage.

On Monday, 24 protesters, including Dr. Norman Strax, picketed memorial services at the Fredericton Cenotaph in support of the seven arrested.

They then marched to city protest the police action.

Two history professors, Michael Cross from U of T and George Rawlygh from Queens, have launched their own protest against recent events at the University of New Brunswick.

The two were invited by graduate students at UNB to present papers for the Atlantic Provinces History Conference this Friday and Saturday at UNB.

Both Cross and Rawlygh have been alarmed at the situation on the UNB campus.

"We will attend," said Prof. Cross, "but we laid down conditions. We would attend the conference if our papers could be delivered off campus."

This condition was made by both professors in protest against the suspension of Dr. Norman Strax and the recent arrest of students sitting-in at Strax' office.

"We are going because we didn't want to let the students down," said Prof. Cross, "but as a gesture of protest we want the papers given off campus."

The two professors plan to hold a press conference upon their arrival at the Fredericton airport making explicit their position with regards to the Strax affair.

They will refuse to share the podium with any UNB administrator.

Organizers at the symposium were debating late last night whether or not to call off the whole affair.

Panelist Brewster Kneen, a resource person and theologian at Rochdale College, said: "We don't want to define the Church in exact terms," he said, "because that would tend to pose a united front against anyone else."

The panel of four all agreed that the Church's role plays a definite part in modern life. Kneen said he preferred to think of today's chaplain as "a type of agitator."

Baum remarked that this idea is not unusual, for the Church is also in a state of transformation.

Baum was asked whether he considered the university to be a godless society. "I don't think so," he answered. "A godless situation exists when people assume that they know everything that can be learned."

"In the university, however, there is a continual quest for knowledge, and if the students want to learn, then it is a good sign."

New's news

By TOM WALKOM

New College students remain paperless following the resignation two weeks ago of maverick GnuSPaper editor Alf Chaiton (II New).

Chaiton resigned after coming under heavy fire from NCS vice-president David Hoffman (III New) and treasurer Tom Maibaum (III New).

This culminated in a cut of the paper's operating budget from $2,500 to $1,700.

"Council was trying to tell us how to run the paper and enforced their position by cutting the budget," says Chaiton.

Hoffman and social committee chairman Bruce Libin (II New) charge Chaiton with disobeying council edicts.

"He was given a large budget," Hoffman said, "on the condition that he cut costs by getting advertising. This he didn't do."

Chaiton asserted that it was "impossible to get advertisers or anyone to handle advertising."

Hoffman also said the paper possessed "nothing of importance or social value."

Hoffman insisted the disagreement was not over editorial policy.

Applications for the editorship were to have closed as Friday and are advertised as limited to non-freshmen. At council meeting yesterday however, president Brian Schnurr (III New) announced the deadline will be extended until next Wednesday.

As of now only one application has been received — from a first year engineer, Andre Foucault.

Lots of freedom for Vic men

By ANGELA SHENG

The Campbell Committee on disciplinary procedures went to Victoria College last night to find out what they could about residences rules on campus.

"We have always allowed a maximum amount of freedom in the houses," said Rev. E.G. Clarke, the senior tutor at Vic's men's residence.

Rev. Clarke, the dean of women, dons, and representatives of the resident students' council were invited specifically to this meeting.

"At men's residence, only more important issues such as alcohol, the hours women may be entertained in the residence, and general cooperative behavior in the dining room and so on would be discussed at the Caput," said Rev. Clarke. "Other minor details concerning phone duties and water fights and the like are resolved in respective house executive meetings."

Although alcohol is at present prohibited in the residences, there is evidence of its consumption. Peter Gray (III Vic) the Ryerson House president, testified to this.

dent representatives on the Committee.

"We know the rules are on the brochure before we apply for residence, even though I don't particularly agree with all of them," said Margaret Sedgwick (III Vic).

CAREERS in Business Management

To College graduates eager to assume substantial management responsibility early in their business lives, we offer a unique climate for rapid personal growth, with unsurpassed advancement opportunities.

To understand the kind of opportunity that exists for you at Procter & Gamble, you must first know a little about us, and our philosophy of management.

It is our practice to develop and promote from within. Virtually everyone in higher management at P&G today joined the Company shortly after completing his formal education, and progressed upward from a beginning level equivalent to that at which you would start.

We need more good people with management ability because our business is steadily growing. During the last 22 years, our business volume has increased by more than 700%. This expanding business generates a continual need for more and more graduates with management potential. We welcome candidates who thrive on hard work, relish responsibility, and like to compete.

We want you to develop rapidly, and we give you every opportunity. You'll be given substantial responsibility as soon as you join us, and, in most cases, you'll learn by doing, rather than enter a formal training period. You'll be given additional responsibility as soon as you demonstrate you can handle it. Your managers will take a personal interest in your development, because your growth is an important part of their responsibilities!

This emphasis on early development means you can move ahead fast. We promote only on the basis of merit, and you progress as fast as you demonstrate that you are ready to move up. Because of this willingness by P&G to match ability with responsibility, regardless of age, it is not unusual to find graduates still in their 20's transacting substantial portions of the Company's business. In fact, we do not know of any other organization where there is greater awareness of ability, or greater opportunity for unlimited advancement on the basis of merit alone.

We have openings in many fields of interest for graduates at all degree levels, and with all kinds of educational backgrounds. Basically, we ask that all candidates have a good academic record, and be able to show evidence of leadership on or off the campus, with goals set and achieved.

In joining P&G, you would be joining a company widely recognized for management excellence. In a survey conducted by Dun's Review, a panel of nearly 300 top business executives named P&G as one of the ten best-managed companies in industry. The business practices that resulted in such recognition will be an important part of your career training.

Procter & Gamble is a growth company with remarkable freedom from cyclical trends. Although we are large in terms of sales, we are small in terms of people (approximately 1800 employees in Canada). The Company's continued growth is one reflection of its deep interest in research. About one P&G employee out of every ten is engaged in research of some kind, and more than one-third of our business volume is in new products developed in the last ten years.

Our work is creative and challenging. Management at P&G involves a genuinely creative approach to varied and often complex problems that will challenge your resourcefulness to the utmost. It requires a competitive interchange of ideas with other good people. It demands fresh, dynamic thinking and wholehearted participation. If you prefer this method of working instead of "cut and dried" routine, you will find a degree of personal satisfaction in your early assignments that will become even greater as your career responsibilities increase.

"One or more P&G products are used in 95 out of every 100 homes, a penetration unequaled by any other manufacturer of anything."

Procter & Gamble representatives will be on campus for interviews with interested students on: NOV. 27, 28, & 29.

Ask your Placement Office for a copy of the P&G Careers brochure and an interview appointment.

The total number of donors, 3,089, is 14.6 per cent of the St. George campus. This includes 22 staff and 50 miscellaneous. This is a drop of 312 from last year's total of 3,399, but it is up from the year before.

Bill Cowan, co-chairman of the drive, commenting on this year's drive, said, "Personally I feel that as high as 60 per cent of the campus could give." He said, however, that this was idealistic and that the projected quota of about 20 per cent was perhaps more realistic.

Good grooming is the most important attribute for a job applicant, a job employment interviewer said yesterday.

EBS plans future policy

By DENIS SQUIRES

"We believe that the best government is that which governs least", said Paul Fromm (IV SMC) yesterday at a small open meeting in Sid Smith. The EBS executive met to discuss its future plans and outline its principles to prospective members.

EBS President Fromm defined conservatism to include:

- the historical and traditional approach in assessing the desirability of a given change.
- individual freedom as its principal goal,
- the existence of government primarily for the protection of individual rights.

Fromm revealed that membership in the EBS has expanded to 1,000, half in Toronto.

The ensuing discussion, saw only one challenge issued concerning government anti-poverty programs, which the executive condoned with the provision that such spending meet with good results. There was no discussion of SAC.

The activist organization is distributing pamphlets called What is the EBS? to introduce itself as an alternative to the liberal-leftist position.

The showing of films concerning the manipulation of mass media and revolution, as well as the appearance of guest speaker Dr. Norman Gunn of the Canadian Taxpayer's Union is being planned.

Ryerson architecture students threaten walkout

Architecture students at Ryerson Polytechnical Institute have been skipping classes since Thursday, using the time to carry out a thorough study of their course. They threaten a complete walk-out if demands for change are not met next Wednesday.

The student action was prompted by the news that the University of British Columbia and Waterloo University will in future treat applications from Ryerson architectural graduates on the basis of their Grade 13 marks. They were previously given advanced standing in either second or third year of university courses.

Dean Thomas Howarth, director of architecture at U of T, said: "We have a clear-cut policy. We have accepted Ryerson graduates who have graduated with first class honours and given them advanced standing in our second year course. We have recently liberalized the requirements and will now consider other applications on an individual basis."

Wayne Judges, president of the Association of Architectural Technology students said: "We are not trying to set up Ryerson as a pre-university course. But we want to find out what our courses should contain for those who wish to go on after graduation."

AAT has set up student committees to look into all aspects of the Ryerson course. The reports from these committees will be incorporated into a brief to be presented to Ryerson President S. C. Jorgenson and representatives of the Faculty Council. If the Council refuses to call an emergency meeting to discuss the complaints and recommendations, Judges says the students will walk out

Head of Rye's architecture department, J. P. Paivio has said the student actions are "very responsible", and adds that the problems came almost without warning. "Most of the students' demands are valid," he said. "I think we can do something constructive together."

As well as course changes, the students are protesting the high cost of equipment, which can run as high as $260 a year exclusive of tuition, and a heavy work load, which includes 12 hours a week in the studio and four hours a night homework.

Read it in 4 hrs. 30 mins.

The average reader takes about two weeks (35 hours reading) to read Tolstoy's 'War and Peace'. It's long, a 'heavy' classic. By learning to read much faster though, you can change any novel, any of the 'musts', into an evening's entertainment rather than a week's labour.

After taking the Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics course, you'll have time for reading pleasure. It teaches you to concentrate

Money problems spark unrest in saskTHATCHERan

By GEOFF MEGGS

The University of Saskatchewan may be more radical at this time than any other campus in the country. Of its two centres at Regina and Saskatoon, only Saskatoon has an avowed conservative force attempting to avoid direct confrontations.

A peculiar set of circumstances has set the situation in Saskatchewan in relief, accentuating problems that remain grey areas at other universities.

Money is at the root of Saskatchewan's university unrest. For in Saskatchewan, third richest of Canada's provinces, owner of endless wheat fields, cattle ranches, and at present exploiting one of the world's richest deposits of potash, there is not enough money to send more than five Indian and Metis students to university, to expand university facilities, or to give any student a loan exceeding $1,000 when most students agree that $1,650 is a minimum figure.

In fact it was Saskatchewan Premier Ross Thatcher's concern about fiscal integrity that started the province and its Liberal government into one of the hottest public issues Saskatchewan had seen for several bumper crops.

GOV'T MOVES IN

On October 27 of last year, Thatcher announced the government would take direct financial control of the university to end spending excesses.

This was in spite of the fact that although $40 million was spent last year on expansion and renovation, buildings were barely adequate for the enrolment.

Thatcher envisaged detailed budget submissions from the university to the Legislature. After four sub-votes the university department in each case would receive a sum of money to cover the year's expenses.

In addition, all further construction would require approval of the Public Works minister before building could start.

The faculties and the administration were understandably concerned about government control of the academic affairs of the campus. With each department's finances under the legislature's scrutiny, it was not inconceivable that money could be used as a lever to influence the university.

FACULTY JOINS IN

The same month 300 U of S faculty members approved a resolution calling for internal management of the university by the Board of Governors. By December the faculty association had mailed 10,000 letters to alumni pointing out the following facts:

- that the provincial cabinet was already in a position to authorize budget requirements.

- that there were government controls at three stages in the financing process.

- that Saskatchewan, the province with the third highest per capita income in Canada between 1962 and 1966, ranked seventh in university spending.

- that four parliamentary sub-votes opened possibilities for political pressure on the university.

On December 4, Thatcher announced the removal of the University of Saskatchewan from the jurisdiction of the department of Education. The press speculated on the establishment of a department of University Affairs.

The students of both campuses were silent throughout the fall of 1967. Indeed the first blow for educational freedom in Saskatchewan was struck by Mr. Charlie.

The students weren't long learning the lesson. On February 16, they marched in protest against the proposed legislation and in the spring elected a student council that spent the summer crossing swords with Thatcher and Peter Warrin, president of the Canadian Union of Students.

Leafing through The Sheaf, the Saskatoon student paper, one gets an impression of people unwilling to stand still any longer.

STUDENT LOANS

At first the big question is the student loan program. Angered by new clauses, especially new requirements for classification as an independent student, seemingly designed to cut down the number of people eligible for loans, the Student Representative Council prepared a brief for the education minister.

On September 24 the government and the administration received a joint slap in the face from Alwyn Berland, the Dean of Arts at Regina Campus. Berland's letter of resignation is a somewhat bitter testimony to the illness on the Saskatchewan campuses.

In his letter to U. of S. President J. R. Spinks he cites the following problems as reasons for his belief that the university has no future:

- too much administration is carried out by overworked academics;

- the administration refused to confirm the University's autonomy during the preceding year's crisis;

- the autonomy of the Regina campus had been denied. All administrative duties and curriculum decisions are carried out in Saskatoon;

- the Regina campus is plagued by "drastically insufficient" facilities.

This defection was a hard knock for the administration. The students bypassed President Spinks and on October 4 a joint Regina-Saskatoon group marched on the legislature to protest inadequate student loans. Chanting and shouting, the students did a thorough job of embarrassing the government before the Prime Minister and the country.

A list of 200 case histories of unfair treatment was presented to Education Minister Cliff McIsaac, who promised to investigate post haste.

"STUDENTS WILL NOT RUN UNIVERSITY"

Chagrined and humiliated, Thatcher denounced the demonstration the same night as sparked by agitators who were "professional students" taking only a few courses. He told a Liberal gathering in Moose Jaw he would not tolerate students running the university.

The students were now demanding a voice in the choice of Dean Berland's replacement and pressing for rapid and far-reaching reform of the structure of their university.

In Saskatchewan they have the tacit support of the faculty, which is finding its own situation intolerable.

Seemingly dedicated to the repression of these forces is Ross Thatcher, fresh from reelection of his majority government. He is the one who will ultimately decide when the change has gone too far

France gives ISS 100 volumes

Statues of Liberty have gone out of style, so now France gives away books instead.

Yesterday the university received 100 volumes in the field of economic and social policy. The books are a gift of the French Government (you loved him in Montreal), and will rest at the Institute of Social Studies.

Many of the volumes deal with Latin American development, because that's where a lot of the Institute's students come from. A wide range of thought is represented, including Marxist.

Professor Bregha of the Institute — who was instrumental in obtaining the gift — described the works as "fundamental". The books are on display today in the lobby of the Sigmund Samuel Library.

Blues' rookie defenseman, Brent Swanick (17) cuts in for rare rearguard scoring opportunity in last Friday's game against U de M.

Roccer & suggermen prep for finals

SOCCER

By STECKLEY SOCCER

The Varsity soccer team travels to Montreal Saturday to meet the eastern conference champions, University of Montreal, in a sudden death match that will decide the OQAA champion.

Blues go into the game sporting six wins and two losses while U. of M. enters the game as slight favorites on the strength of their seven wins and one loss during the regular season.

Montreal beat Queens 3-2 last Saturday for the right to represent the east white Blues, who had already clinched the western conference, played badly in a 2-1 loss to Guelph.

Perhaps the loss will prove to be a blessing in disguise.

Blues' last two practices have been quite a change from the previous week. All of a sudden the Blues are coming out of the doldrums and are starting to exhibit some of the hustle that enabled them to compile a record of 30 wins, two losses and one tie in the last four intercollegiate seasons. Coach Ernie Glass is quite pleased with this change of attitude and, despite the loss of Miles Sosa due to academic commitments, is very hopeful of the result in Montreal.

Frank Seppelsa, who had missed the last three games, returned to the fold last night and appeared to be in good shape. Graham Shiels is the only doubtful starter. He suffered a pulled muscle in the Waterloo game.

RUGGER

The Varsity rugger team has a chance to avenge the loss by its football confreres when Varsity meets Queens in the rugger final here this Saturday.

Rugger lacks the science of football in game preparation. There are no scouting reports or game films to analyze and exploit the other team's weaknesses.

Queen's has had only six points scored on them in six league games. They are small but extremely fit.

These are impressive credentials but hardly the stuff from which strategy is planned.

Varsity will miss two of their first team guns. Early in the season 6'8" Andy Bethel was lost with torn ankle ligaments. Also missing and missed will be Graeme Wynn who has played outstanding rugger at wing forward.

But Varsity will have no excuse this Saturday. If an additional inducement is necessary to spur Varsity on to a superb performance, it have been announced that Channel 11 will be telecasting this rugger final since there is no local college football game this weekend.

As it is with all Varsity—Queen's matches this game promises to be an exciting and hard hitting game. Those who saw the Varsity—Western final last year were treated to a game containing every aspect of a thrilling sports contest. Certainly this year's final promises equal excitement. Rugger patrons and interested spectators are urged to attend at 2 PM Saturday in Varsity Stadium.

Varsity Blues' hockey practices these days resemble rush hour at Yonge and Bloor as coach Tom Watt directs the traffic of 26 aspiring young players making a bid for what one wag termed a "berth on the Blues."

"Last night was the worst practice since I've been here," Watt said yesterday. "It was my fault, there were just too many guys."

Watt can dress only 16 players for any game, but will probably keep about 21 on the roster. The only position where there isn't an excess of bodies is defense.

Blues lost three starting defensemen from last year's squad; Doug Jones, Peter Speyer and Bob Hamilton. The only returning starter is Jim Miles. Terry Parsons who played irregularly last year, is also back.

Blues have been fortunate in obtaining replacements for the lost players. Dave Field and Bill L'Heureux played as a defensive pair at Western last year. This year both are taking graduate courses at U of T, and Watt has been using them together in practice.

Another promising defenseman is Brent Swanick, a 17 year old freshman at Trinity. Swanick played Junior B with Markham last year.

"Hockey's fun for a change," Swanick said last night, "but I'm not used to practicing every day. The guys here are faster and don't use the body as much as in Junior B."

The defensive duo from Western, Field and L'Heureux, should add experience to the blueline corps. They are also the biggest defensemen Blues have, at 204 and 180 pounds respectively.

"They (Blues) expect to win, it's just a matter of by how much," L'Heureux said before last night's practice. Added Field: "Everyone's on their own here. You can work as hard as you want to, and everyone works hard."

Veteran Blue Jim Miles has been paired with Swanick, and has nothing but praise for the rookie. Miles biggest worry is his own weight. "After all, 165 pounds is pretty light for a defenseman in the SIFL," he says.

"But we've got really good guys," he continues. "I'm not pessimistic."

Blues fly to Halifax this weekend for two games with the Halifax Junior Canadians. Watt expects to make his final cuts after these games.

"They're as good as any team up here," Watt said yesterday, "but they're rougher. After you pass the puck, they still ride you. That's why I want to go back there. In practice you get a little lackadaisical."

Varsity played two games against Canadians last year, winning the first one 5-4. "Then we came back and bombed them in the second game," recounts Watt. The score in that one was 10-4.

The weekend games will also give Watt a chance to look at his other two goalies, Pete Adamson and rookie Adrian Watson. Watson was the all-star goalie in the Toronto highschool league last year, and could easily steal a spot from one of the more experienced puck stoppers.

BLUENOTES: Ward Passi "refereed" last night's practice and looked like his old self during several rushes...Ward is recovering from a torn achilles tendon, suffered playing squash in the pre-practice warm-up...Dave Field is doing his M.Sc. in physiology, and his partner Bill L'Heureux is in Law...the safety glass which has replaced the screening around the ice has improved visibility, it's true, but the noise in the empty arena is almost deafening...

Aqua Blues waterdown Mac moistmen

Waterpolo Blues defeated McMaster Marauders Saturday in the Hart House pool 12 to 8.

Although a number of flaws marred the performance of Blues' young team, they showed continued improvement of play and the potential to successfully defend their OQAA title against McGill in two weeks.

It was anyone's game for most of the first quarter as both teams played aggressively. Only spectacular saves by the respective goalies stopped early scoring. Dave Breech opened the scoring late in the first quarter and set the tempo for Blues' eventual victory. McMaster exerted continuous pressure for most of the game, but after Alex LeRoy's tally early in the second quarter, they never really poised a serious threat to the Blues' lead. Breech added an other four goals and McNaught repeated as high scorer with six.

Netminder Brian Barras (picture) earned votes as "most improved player". He made 23 saves and showed markedly increased poise within his four yard line.

The deciding factor in the game was ball control in center pool. Don Carr and John Archibald played well as rovers, setting up plays and maintaining Blues' constant edge in ball control.

Marauders host the Blues in the sumptuous Mac pool Saturday. As both teams showed signs of tiring in the fourth period on Saturday, and yet Toronto maintained better ball control, the predicted outcome for this week should not differ radically from last week's. May the hosts be generous; the victors gracious.

SAC on line with OSAP march: Schachar

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday night threw its weight behind a move to try to repeat the successful march on Queens Park held two years ago to protest the Ontario Student Awards Program.

They hope more than 2,000 students will turn out next Wednesday, the opening day of the Legislature, to demand sweeping changes in OSAP, which this year placed important new restrictions on eligibility for student loans.

"It is not just specific changes in OSAP this year we want," said SAC president Steven Langdon, "If we are going to be socially responsible we must aim to ensure that every kid in the province is able to get an education."

But there was opposition to the march from two sides.

"Why march on Queens Park," said Jaanus Proos (II Vic) "Why don't you tell the laborers you deserve a greater share of their pay cheque?"

Ontario Union of Students president Brian Switzman agreed with Proos, saying "the working class will get uptight — they're the ones getting gouged.

"You'll either have to settle for a small elite school or attack the very basis of the economy in this country.

"Unless we present our whole demands in terms of the bigger picture, we'll look selfish to the workers."

Langdon, however, urged plans go ahead for the Wednesday march.

"Let's not get hung up on the sophistry that because we can't do everything we can't do anything," he said.

U of T chorus sings its way to $5,015

By BRIAN JOHNSON
VARSITY SAC EDITOR

The U of T Chorus turned up in the Hart House debates room 40 strong with maracas and bongos to raise the most vocal protest the Students' Administrative Council has ever heard.

Wednesday was budget night and SAC finance commissioner Bob Barkwell (I Meds) looked on with the proverbial bottom button of his vest undone, as SAC granted the chorus the $500 that had been cut from its budget.

There was still an hour of heated debate on whether the chorus should receive the $500 or try to raise the money from outside.

It was low-lighted by long sympathy speeches from Marion Mowat (III Nurs), who said, "We have to remember our promise of the spring."

SAC BUDGET MEETING

*We huy our music, plan our tour, based on April budget plan,
And promise many pee-e-ple that we come sing for them,
But now must we say "No can come, our budget has been chopped."
You'll be the ones to answer this, will our chorus he stopped?*

*Some people say, go knock on doors, get money from outside.
But we are students' chorus so, SAC funds should pay ride.
Long time ago last A-pi-ri-l, so de SAC man say,
De SAC grant full hudget, then up until this day,*

My, my, my, money come back, hudget back . . .

SAC promised the chorus $5,765 last spring, but cut this to $4,515 in the new budget. Without at least $500 more their planned tour would have been impossible.

"We have a long song and dance to present about the chorus," said Miss Mowat. "There are 170 students in the chorus. It's the one musical thing on campus with any value.

"I may get shot for not asking for $1,000, but I will ask for only $500," she added.

Miss Mowat was not shot.

SAC cultural affairs commissioner Mark Freiman (IV UC) objected strongly to any further money for the chorus.

"This isn't culture. It's a ladies' home and tea-garden society," he said. When the sum total of culture is a chorus, an orchestra, a debating society, and a drama committee that gives no plays — that isn't my idea of culture."

SAC President Steve Langdon was worried the sing-in might distort the issue.

"We were fairly effectively lobbied by the chorus," he said with his classic hand gesture which makes him look like he's clapping the waist of a very thin girl. "I'm disturbed by the kind of procedure used to influence the decision. I've never seen anything like this before."

Andy Wernick (SGS) agreed with Langdon and said a "hysterical atmosphere" was developing. "Steve and Mark had the guts to attack motherhood," he said.

Langdon was wearing the radical's version of the old school tie — a set of blue beads presented to him at the beginning of the budget debate by the Committee of Sartorial Concern. He blushed when he first put them on.

When the chorus finally got the $500, it was with the stipulation that it write and sing protest songs for the SAC-sponsored OSAP march next Wednesday.

The cultural commission still can receive funds for Freiman's planned "Cultural Revolution" festival, for the $1,200 from the cancelled education commission's festival was placed in the contingency fund which is now $10,970.

Another disputed item on the budget was The Varsity. John Karl (III SMC) introduced a motion to cut $5,000 from the $28,000 grant.

"The people at my college just do not read The Varsity," said Paul Fromm (III SMC). "Piles of The Varsity are left around every day."

The motion was defeated overwhelmingly.

Jim Plumpton (III Vic) introduced a motion to cut everything that remains of Random Magazine's entire $3,842 budget.

"The people at my college do not read Random," said Fromm. "Piles of it are left lying around."

This motion also failed. The budget debate, one of the shorest in living memory, lasted a mere three hours. Most items were passed in the form proposed by Barkwell.

Altogether, SAC disposed of $388,786.

It was clear sailing all (well, almost all) the way for SAC Finance Commissioner Bob Barkwell's $388,786 budget. Barkwell's the hoppy looking guy with the pipe.

G.S.U. FIGHTS PRESS CENSORSHIP

On Tuesday Nov. 5, the G.S.U. submitted to the Varsity editor, Paul McRae, a copy of a personal memo written by SAC executive assistant Martha Tracey to SAC president, Steven Langdon. The G.S.U. Executive recognized the importance of giving the memo as wide a distribution as possible. Mr. McRae said that it would appear on Mon. Nov. 11. Miss Tracey's reply to the unpublished memo occupied the lower 1/3 of the editorial page.

This memo should not have been suppressed by the Varsity. Since it seems that the only way to achieve freedom of the press at this university is to buy that freedom, the Martha memorandum appears below in its entirety:

MEMO

TO: Steve Langdon, c.c. Norm Schachar
FROM: Martha Tracey
SUBJECT: SGS Fall Election
DATE: August 22, 1968

The problem of winning the SGS SAC fall elections is primarily that of finding popular well-known candidates in faculties where a large turn-out is possible. The School of Graduate Studies is made up of four divisions: the Humanities, the Social Sciences, the Physical Sciences, and the Life Sciences. To win an election we need several contacts in each of these areas to help us choose good candidates, and to make sure that the vote gets out on election day.

A working group should thus be established in early September. It should decide on strategy for the election, choose candidates, and be our contacts in the various areas.

ELECTION PROCEDURES: The first problem we may have is the Returning Officer and his reliability. Intend to write our Elections Committee soon (are any of them hard workers — I'm not sure) to make sure they keep an eye on SGS this time. All we need is another invalidated election. Hankey is presently finding out who the Returning Officer is.

A subordinate problem is that of location of polls. SGS departments are so scattered that several must be set up. Eg. a good candidate lost at OISE last year because they had no ballot box. Not sure how to play this one.

TACTICS: The group must decide whether to run a slate of four candidates, or to run more than four good people in several populous courses. In either case, the candidates must support SAC only implicitly. A pro-SAC ticket would only serve to get out the anti-SAC vote.

If SAC is attacked and misrepresented by the GSU's candidates, Steve and Norm should reply through the Varsity, or should confront Winter (not his candidates) in a debate. We should not endorse candidates.

THE CANDIDATES: The ideal candidate would be a moderate left liberal with a long list of impressive titles and former affiliations after his or her name. Dream examples: Mary Lewis or Doug Hay. One problem might be that of dealing with "sincere" radicals who have a different set of tactics. We can't afford to screen working group people as to how far left they are, but it sure could cause trouble later!

We must not avoid the Physical Sciences as we did last time. This only increases the possibility of a large block vote, whereas a second candidate could help split things.

THE ISSUE: Maybe a few of the facts concerning how unconsulted Grad Students have been re buildings, etc. when there juniors have had the administration quaking! This could be played really well, and no advocacy of SAC tactics or radicalism would be necessary, eg. if those punk radicals get consulted — why not us mature responsible types?

Candidates (some at least) should identify themselves with what I have come to call Hankey's 'Get Tough with SAC' policy. This would also serve the advantage of pointing out that their reps elected last spring have done something.

TA's thing should also be raised again.

OTHER SINECURES: The position of Editor of the GSU paper is, as far as I know, still open, also we have not yet figured out how to find the W. Hankey Memorial Organizer. (ecch! - another post congress headache). In both cases, we must find acceptable applicants. Election working group can help with this.

TIMING: I'm told (but I'm not definitely sure) that Grad courses start late, so that the election may even be held in October. Which would be nice.

CONTACTS FOR RECRUITMENT: (we need lots more)

Alan Bowker (but how do we keep him out? — he's not reliable — I can elaborate)

Wayne Hankey

Frank Cunningham (will not run or work hard — desperate about his thesis — but will strategize)

Andy Warnick

Rose Marie Harris

David Hunter

Bruce Lewis) hard to get, I think you would be a good contact (Mary Lewis) to convince them

Doug Hay

Norm McLeod - has contacts in Social Work and OISE

Ted Rotenberg

Randy White recommended as 'liberals' by Ken Stone

Abby Hoffman

Kathy Horne

Rick Waern - may know people

Joe Merber - may know of some good grad Engineers

Bob Parkins - is thinking of ex-Varsity types to apply for news-paper job.

John Morris (I'd like to contact him to learn of good Engineers, but I'm afraid of blowing it since it's hard to know where he's at)

Other candidates on last year's Bowker slate:

Howard Adelman

Rick Waern

Hugh Barr

Check with Treleven and Faulkner for possibles. VDEP grads (only a few — but I'm afraid of alienating them since most are apolitical).

MISCELLANEOUS: The grapevine sez the Grad Sociology Club supported getting Dow off campus. Whoopee!

We're not free claims Burwash

In response to your article entitled, "Lots of Freedom for Vic Men" (Wednesday's Varsity), we, as residents of Burwash Hall would like to enquire into the nature of "the maximum amount of freedom" supposedly granted to us by Victoria College. Rev. Clarke fails to clarify this statement although he admits indirectly that alcohol, women's hour, dining hall behavior, etc., are under his direct jurisdiction.

We suggest, on the contrary, that the administration and rule system of Vic are aimed at the production of plastic model students rather than real people. In particular, the use of alcohol and the presence of women are regarded as privileges granted to us by a benevolent administration, rather than as basic rights we possess as human beings. Despite the fact that many of us are over 21 and none of us are under 18, the head tutor and his dons persist in considering themselves "in loco parentis."

We disagree with the basic concept of residence as a controlled extension of our pre-adult home life rather than simply a boarding-house. We feel that neither alcohol nor hours when women may be entertained are the concern of the administration.

We stipulate that annoyances to other house members due to the use of alcohol should be subject to discipline by the rest of the house. Similarly, that women's hours are the concern of all house members and should be determined on the premise not that it is sinful to have a woman in one's room, but that women should not be present in the halls during hours specified by a majority of the house members. We feel that the basis for this decision should be the convenience of the majority of the house members.

In conclusion, we point out that those who argue the possibility of leaving residence, rather than opposing a system of rules that they disagree with, are simply sidestepping responsibility and allowing the perpetuation of an anachronism.

police court

Magistrates court used to be known as "police court", but the name was changed to remove the impression that trial by magistrate means trial by police — not altogether successfully.

The Criminal Law Quarterly, a lawyer's journal, pointed out in June, 1962, that the magistrate "does, in effect, work with his local police officers very closely day after day."

Obstructing or assaulting police is one of the few indictable (serious) crimes for which the defendant is tried by magistrate alone and cannot get trial by jury.

The question is particularly relevant because nearly two dozen workers, students and professors were arrested on these charges during the April and October anti-United States protests at the U.S. Consulate.

In these special magistrate-only cases, the defendant is also denied his customary right to a preliminary hearing. At such a hearing, the prosecutor must present his evidence and submit it to cross-examination by the defense. It is difficult to prepare a defense when you don't know what the evidence against you will be, and preparation is made even more difficult by the fact that sometimes police evidence bears little resemblance to what you thought happened.

In most cases, the police prepare the evidence against the defendant and the crown attorney simply reads it at the trial. These special arrangements are very convenient for all concerned—except the defendant.

(This isn't the case in the United States where you have the right to be tried by a jury for police offenses.)

Trial by jury was first won in England more than 700 years ago to protect against abuses of the law by those who enforce the law. Surely Canada in the 20th century could better protect itself against such abuses by instituting the same system.

the piper pays

The U of T Chorus Wednesday night had a sing-in at SAC to defend their right to a $5,015 grant, a grant which puts the chorus among the top eight items on the SAC budget.

The issue reduces in the end to a question of whether the grant to the U of T Chorus is merely a subsidy for semi-professional musical training or not. If it is, then the faculty of music provides opportunities for that.

The faculty of music, we understand, restricts its vocal ensemble almost entirely to the faculty's own students. That of course is wrong, anyone who is good enough should be allowed in. But that's one thing students in the chorus and SAC should be getting together on.

Two things happened, as the chorus members waited in suspense for the outcome of their plea. The chorus discovered that "non-violent direct action," as Steve Langdon put it, can be effective.

The second thing to happen — the reinstatement of a $500 section of the grant — carried with it a half-humorous but also very serious stipulation. The chorus will be required to write and sing a protest song at Wednesday's OSAP march on Queens Park. That will be one of the perhaps three occasions this year when U of T students will be able to witness the work the Chorus is doing. It will be the first time the members of the Chorus have looked upon themselves as more than just semi-professional musicians, but also as members of a community in which individuals get together on common issues — such as OSAP — helping out with their own unique talents.

Perhaps they could even take on some of the functions of a "clean LGMB" as one student suggested, or at least make more frequent campus performances.

By the way, if their intensive lobbying had not succeeded in melting the cold hearts of a majority of SAC members, they would have learned an important lesson, one that SAC and students themselves keep learning as they try to get more power in running the university — "going through proper channels" doesn't guarantee that your demands will be met.

for adults only

Two recent surveys on the sex habits of University of Toronto students reveal some disturbing figures.

An Engineering survey shows that 20 per cent of U of T co-eds aren't virgins compared to 50 per cent of the guys, while a Globe and Mail report notes that 1 girl in 12 and 1 guy in 9 have sex "often".

Now, U of T had 7,300 co-eds and about 14,000 guys last year. Averaging out the results of the two surveys, we discover that about 850 co-eds are sleeping with approximately 3,500 guys.

Putting that another way, each girl is sleeping with at least four guys. Which means that although more guys sleep around, they are less promiscuous than girls in their selection of partners. Or else males are naturally polyandrous. Or somebody's lying. Or something.

But one thing is for sure — to bring down this horrendous rate of promiscuity and even the odds, more girls are going to have to lose their virginity.

Otherwise, civilization as we know it is doomed.

LETTERS

bad news for radicals

- 1) G.S.U. withdraws
- 2) Engineers burn The Varsity
- 3) Med. school threatens withdrawal; other professional schools to follow.
- 4) Student leftist administrations being defeated all over Canada (Simon Fraser, Ryerson, Waterloo, Queen's).

Right wing conspiracy? The Machinations of the Edmund Burke Society? Hardly. Rather, the understandable reaction of the vast majority of students against the monolithic intransigence of the leftist administrations that have abused their right of power to propagate in the name of the majority the most flagrant and abusive attacks on our society and traditions while at the same time hypocritically benefiting from it. Note, for example, the advertising revenues of The Varsity and the annual compulsory tithing of the S.A.C. bureaucracy that could not exist without it.

We are told by Mr. Langdon that S.A.C. has a messianic duty to consider the evils of society and forwith to point the way to a new, better, brighter Utopia of socialism and loving comradeship of the future professionals (the students) and the poor suffering proletariat. I exaggerate only to point out an essential premise: that the S.A.C. administration considers itself to have extra campus responsibilities over and above the fact that it has no constitutional powers to effect such reform in the society outside, and such unreasonable demands for reform both within the university and without often bring on the opposite effect of reaction.

The association of the leftists on campus with the problems and interests of the unions and negroes strikes the average student as little short of ludicrous. Who among you does not know that you are heading for an upper income job? Who among you does not know that you are supported here under unprecedented generosity of society? Or do you need to be reminded that 50 cents of every tax dollar in Ontario is being spent on education?

reply from . . .

Thank you for publishing my letter of November 6. I would like to point out, however, an omission on your part; namely that you did not indicate that the letter was addressed to Metro Council. The letter does not make sense as a "letter to the Editor".

I simply sent you a xeroxed copy of my letter to the Council. If there is any point in your publishing my letter it is to encourage public support for the cause of Mr. Bill Lawson. As I interpret your article, the best way of expressing support in hopes of obtaining concrete action is to write to Metro Council.

The xeroxed copy sent to you was simply to indicate that you have very effectively pointed out an injustice.

While the fringes consume themselves in petty bickering over partisan politics, the professional schools and faculties seriously question exactly what they are getting from S.A.C. that they could not get otherwise by themselves. The fact is that the S.A.C. administration under Langdon has been somewhat short of disastrous, that he has taken stands (threats of strikes etc.) that few who voted for him last spring would have supported then or now. It is becoming increasingly apparent that S.A.C. is hell-bent on its own destruction, a dangerous tendency that will end in the weakening of the student body as a whole and its common legitimate aims.

Perly gets 30 minutes a week for defense

The trial of Gary Perly (SGS) went into its second week yesterday, with the prospect of lasting all winter.

Perly, chairman of the Canadians for the National Liberation Front, is charged with obstructing police at an anti-war demonstration outside the United States Consulate April 27. The charge carries a maximum sentence of two years.

Magistrate Tupper Bigelow told Perly yesterday he could have a half-hour of the court's time every Thursday at 10 a.m. until the case is finished.

Perly protested that he had notified witnesses to testify and that the arrangement was not satisfactory.

"It is not satisfactory," Bigelow replied, "but otherwise we'll be here all day. We've got 35 other cases."

At last Thursday's session, arresting officer Raymond Woodhead testified that on April 27 Perly jumped on his back while he and other police were arresting a demonstrator. Woodhead spoke slowly and carefully, with the flat intonation of a HAL computer.

He testified without notes, saying the incident was "vivid" in his mind.

Perly, acting as his own defence, noted that Woodhead must have a remarkable memory.

"You could say that," Woodhead said. "I recall incidents."

Under questioning, Woodhead said he didn't remember what had happened to him May 19 or June 4, two days chosen at random.

"That's six weeks closer to now," Perly said. "All you can remember is me? You have an astonishing memory. You normally come into court and you don't have to even look up notes. You can testify but somehow you can't even tell us what happened to you on this date or that date or another date. How is this, Constable?"

"If you could give me a specific instant and what happened on those days, or the name of a person that I arrested, I could tell you the circumstances surrounding the incident."

Later Perly asked: "Isn't it true, Constable, that there might be something in your notes that you might not wish to be produced in Court?"

"No there is not."

"Why don't you have them with you?"

"I have my notes with me."

Perly asked if he could see the notes, and Woodhead said no.

Later Perly asked, "Did you know, Constable, that if you did not refer to your notes during your testimony that I would not be allowed to see your notes?"

"I do."

Woodhead denied the notes might show Perly did not obstruct police, and said the incident was quite vivid in his memory.

Perly said: "You mean to tell me that you walked into this court, and you sit down in the witness stand and you had notes referring to this incident sitting right in your pocket and you wouldn't even take them out and glance at them you are so confident in your memory?"

"I am," Woodhead replied.

Yesterday Woodhead said he had not gone over his notes to refresh his memory of the incident in the past week.

"When was the last time you consulted your notes?" Perly asked.

"I don't recall. I went over my notes before the last session. I can't say for sure."

Woodhead testified that he was on duty at Nathan Phillips Square outside City Hall on April 27, watching "several groups" of protesters. He said another group was picketing at the Consulate. He said the city hall group had tried to join the consulate group in violation of their parade permit and the demonstrators were "brought under control and dispersed."

He said he would describe the situation as a near-riot, started when "the city hall parade tried to attack demonstrators at the U.S. Consulate."

Perly said Woodhead had testified at a previous trial Aug. 28, also arising out of the demonstration, that there were not "several groups", but two.

"I don't recall my exact words," Woodhead replied.

Perly asked: "Didn't you say there were two groups in the larger group — one against the war (in Vietnam) and another favoring the American enemy?"

"I don't recall saying that at the trial."

"That was in August wasn't it?" Perly asked.

"I've no idea of the date. I believe it was the end of August."

"That's closer than April, Constable."

"But that is finished with."

Woodhead said he concluded that one of the anti-war groups was in favor of the Viet Cong because of signs and slogans, but couldn't finger any one slogan or word.

Perly said: "Your memory for detail seems to have failed you."

"I remember your incident," Woodhead replied. "That's part of my work, I've got a job to do. I'm not there to memorize slogans."

After a half-hour of examination the case was again remanded one week, to Nov. 21.

"But this could go on forever," Perly objected.

"That is up to you," Bigelow replied.

"But I have all my witnesses here. It's impossible to present a defence this way — this is completely unfair."

Bigelow leaned forward over the bench.

"To say that this court is unfair, Mr. Perly, is contempt of court."

Putting On

Beauty tattoos on your hand and knee. What a with-it way to have fun!

There's another with-it way, too. For those so-called "difficult" days of the month.

They won't be difficult any longer with Tampax tampons.

They're the modern sanitary protection. Worn internally they leave no tell-tale signs. You put on what you want to wear with no wrinkles or bulges.

Nothing can show, no one can know.

Tampax tampons are made of pure surgical cotton, lightly compressed. They give you all the comfort and protection you want and need. Without any give-away odor or irritation.

Your hands need never touch the tampon, and there are no disposal problems. The Tampax tampon and its silken-smooth container-applicator can both be flushed away.

There's another great thing about Tampax tampons. They're small enough to tuck away in your purse — along with your extra tattoo.

Six thousand dollars for a bottle of Coke!

The absence of Coca-Cola in Italy in the Second World War is marked by an interesting story: in 1944, a field-artillery sergeant managed somehow to procure a couple of bottles of Coke. He drank one and raffled the other off to the men in his battalion, the proceeds going to increase a fund for children of members of his unit who died in action. The astonishing sum of four thousand dollars was soon collected from the soldiers, and the man who won the bottle was too overcome with emotion to drink it.

When The Coca-Cola Company heard of this, they immediately sent two thousand dollars to be added to the fund—which means that a single bottle of Coca-Cola fetched six thousand dollars.

A refreshing thought!

Both Coca-Cola and Coke are registered trade marks which identify only the product of Coca-Cola Ltd

IN THE CHAPEL

BURNABY (CUP) — Five hundred dissatisfied students occupied the entire administration complex at Simon Fraser University yesterday.

Students from Simon Fraser, British Columbia and Victoria Universities, and Selkirk and Vancouver City Colleges sent four demands to the SFU administration and B.C. provincial government against an unclear admissions policy at SFU:

- Freedom of transfer and automatic acceptance of credits within the B.C. public educational system;

- An elected admissions board, half students, half faculty;

- The opening of all administration files;

- More money for education as a whole and equitable financing within post-secondary education — including an immediate end to the current school construction files.

SFU administration President Ken Strand thinks the students have a "good issue", though he rejects the four demands on account of their inadequacy.

The students will meet with the Senate admissions policy committee to press their demands.

MEXICO CITY (CUP) — The Mexican government attempted to appease its defiant students Wednesday when it released 35 students who were arrested in violent clashes with police during the four-month-old student strike.

The National Student Strike committee announced last week it will not call off the strike until all students jailed in the four month period are released.

Hundreds of their colleagues are still imprisoned.

The release order came just after a city-wide strike of primary and secondary school teachers was called in support of the university students. The four month strike has been extremely effective: no classes have been held at the national university since July.

focus:

Patrick T. Johnson is the principal of one of the oldest, most expensive, and most reputable independent schools in Canada.

He's an Oxford man, 39 years old, a big 'L' and small 'L' liberal (if both are possible), and is the principal of Upper Canada College, a school that has been Toronto's breeding ground of the Canadian aristocracy ever since John Colborne of the Family Compact founded it in 1829.

I had spent 10 years at U.C.C., and I thought it gave me the best education money could buy. It did and I enjoyed every minute of it.

But when I went back to talk to Mr. Johnson, I felt torn between nostalgia and contempt. Socialist arguments about elitism and universal access to education reacted against the returning vision of the 40 acre grounds of the school, the kids playing hockey on one of the two artificial rinks, the sight of the clock tower that meant unquestioned happiness. It was good to see all the old masters, the school blazers, the school spirit emblazoned on every notice board, but what did it have to do with modern ideals of education and equality?

I thought of protesting Castle Frank students rallying for student power with picket signs; I remembered seeing 200 anti-war protesters being chased off the sidewalk in front of the U.S. Consulate by cops on horseback; Dow; Bissell; Board of Governors.

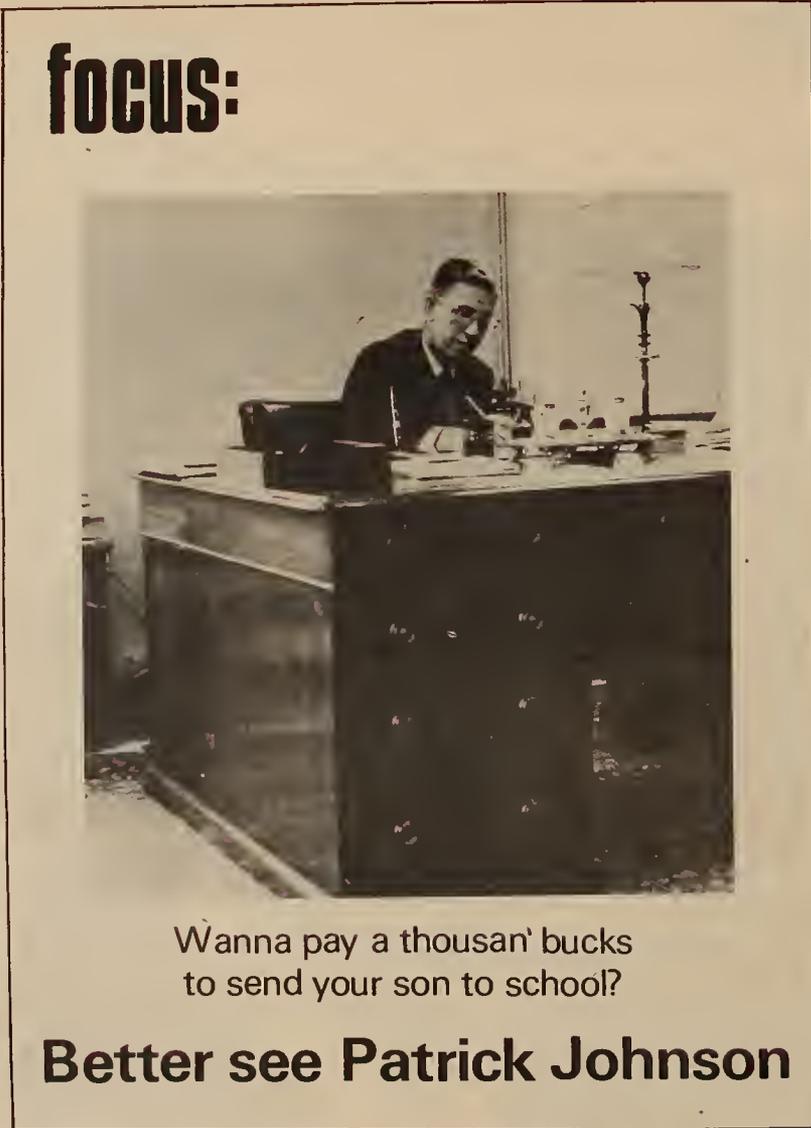

"Student power is a meaningless slogan," Mr. Johnson said. "But if you're talking about student responsibility and student leadership, Upper Canada gives a greater opportunity for that than most schools."

The administration is aided by a system of stewards and prefects and occasionally sub-prefects. Most are taken from Grade XIII and are appointed by the principal and masters in consultation with the students. Mr. Johnson has introduced an elected student council, although it is virtually powerless.

"I couldn't call it democracy, but most of the boys in the younger grades shouldn't have power."

Quite a few students who have been cultivated by the establishment become activists when they leave U.C.C. It seems ironic.

"I would expect them to be activists. Rebellion is healthy. It's particularly suitable

Wanna pay a thousand bucks to send your son to school?

to the university period.

"Students should be actively concerned about Vietnam."

I thought of a few students sitting on the steps of Simcoe Hall and getting kicked by engineers looking for jobs. And what would he think about war research and campus complicity.

"My view of campus complicity is on the whole pretty moderate. Research should be geared more to peace keeping than war making. But such research may be necessary to increase Canada's security."

I thought of Mr. Johnson talking to Dr. Bissell, two rational, moderate people.

"It would be most unfortunate if the U of T lost President Bissell. He's a moderate man sympathetic to constructive student protest. He's liberal, progressive, sympathetic."

I was beginning to understand Mr. Johnson's position more and more. He has been called everything from a nice guy to a technocrat, but I saw him as he saw Bissell — a pragmatic liberal who is progressive and sympathetic, but whose ideals are limited by the system. Both find the system such a necessary structure. Reform but never revolution.

U.C.C. is finally using its independence to its advantage through Mr. Johnson's progressive reform. He is introducing experimental courses.

"We used to have a responsibility in making sure our boys do well in Grade XIII, but now we have much less emphasis on exams. We are introducing a computer science course through Grades IX to XIII. In Grades XII and XIII we are planning courses in anthropology, economics, civics, and logic. We have a daily French course from Grade III."

So Mr. Johnson is a progressive who likes the Hall-Dennis Report, who believes in lowering the drinking age to 18, who has confidence in Richard Nixon but would have liked to have seen Robert Kennedy as President, who agrees with the Macpherson Report, who would like to see parents get tax deductions for sending children to U.C.C., who believes in a modern independent school and free enterprise.

But I remember we would march in the battalion parades every Thursday afternoon. Student officers would shout invective and give out Saturday morning detentions. Some enjoyed the power; some shirked it. I could never see the rational behind this student pseudo-army.

"I don't try to justify the battalion. To do a radical change now would be useless. I would like to make it into a service opportunity, more meaningful. I hope there will still be an occasion when the whole school does something together. It is a factor of unity."

Discipline is a fact of life at U.C.C. Boys must wear a jacket and school tie at school functions and classes. But Mr. Johnson says it's not meant to be a restriction on freedom.

"We get the boys to wear ties so they have some recognition that they belong to some community."

Community is very strong at U.C.C. — a school spirit that almost becomes snobbery at times.

The system at U.C.C. is competition. The incentives are such things as the desire to enter the steward-prefect elite, to become an officer in the battalion, to make first team in everything, to get an award at Prize Day presented by Mrs. L. B. Pearson. Success is the byword.

Stephen Leacock (author); Walter Gordon (former Liberal finance minister); Tom Daly (award-winning filmmaker); Dick Ballantine (producer of the film Mr. Pearson); Stanley Ryerson (radical); Kenneth McNaught (historian); Graham Fraser (journalist); Sydney Hermant (U of T governor); Michael Snow (sculptor); Arnold Smith (Commonwealth Secretary); Bill Crean (Ambassador to Italy); and hundreds of prominent businessmen.

They are a broad cross-section, but there is a common element of success. Two aspects at U.C.C. inspire success: competition in an active community and the making of useful contacts.

There is nothing wrong with success. We live in a capitalist system and the school is a microcosm of that system by intensifying competition.

It's unfortunate that one can pay to get a better education—it costs over $1,000—but it's an unfortunate necessity. It's difficult, however, to reconcile the right of universal accessibility to the basic right of education to the independent school.

That U.C.C. has been making the best use of its independence is debatable. There has not been enough experimentation, not enough freedom.

Only if Mr. Johnson lets his progressive tendencies overcome the school's adherence to tradition and system, will U.C.C. be relevant in the future.

best of the '68 - '69 sculpture season

Great slabs of crystal, Druid building blocks, ebony pillars — Tony Smith's sculpture is all this and more. Strung out in sequence through the courtyard rooms of the Art Gallery of Ontario, they progress from relatively simple structures to modular works so complex that their structure is not apparent at first glance.

The pieces fall into the "minimal" bag because their geometric surfaces have all been painted dead-black, so that the surface appearance doesn't matter and the overall shape and size of the works — the fundamental or minimal qualities of a sculpture — are of sole importance.

The works are gigantic. One can crawl around and through them. The tallest is over twenty feet tall. It gave me a distinct chill to watch it. I felt like an ant crawling across a table-top on which sugar cubes had been spilled, a syphilis virus darting around on a microscope slide of blood.

It may well be the most significant work of the 1968-69 sculpture season.

Psychologically, they deserve the adjective "minimal" because they are so self-possessed, so uncommunicative, like silent stones (although they are in fact wooden mock-ups of solid works).

To understand Smith's sculpture, one has to remember that he was for a long time a practising architect, and therefore constantly faced with one of the basic problems of architecture: the interrelationships between a building and its environment. His ideas are very specific on the way a building — or a structure — ought to be affected by, and in turn affect, the landscape around it. He sees his structures as anchored in the environment, at the same time creating the environment, by their presence.

The six-full-size mock-ups presented in this exhibition will allow the audience, which would otherwise have to rely on photographs, to experience their presence — and it is the intensity of their presence that accounts for the widespread public attention Smith has received since 1966, (although his underground reputation, and recognition by artists, antedate it by at least a decade).

John Masciuch's fluorescent lighting is also being displayed at the AGO, in a darkened room off the Smith rooms. There are two works — a "raft" consisting of about fifty parallel fluorescent tubes on the floor and a "bank" of about four times that number. They come in all colours.

The tubes are actually burned-out hulks being reactivated with ultra-high frequency current. They flicker and send waves of discharge down their lengths. When you fondle the vertical "bank" you change the glowing and colouring.

It may well be the most important fluorescent tubing sculpture of the 1968 - 69 season.

an amusing evening from everyone except mr. fontana

Charlie Dennis' gift as a playwright is seeing life through a series of one liners. One liners that mean something and show what people are like. "I had a job in Toronto but it fell through," says shy young Heather from Winnipeg, "But they threw a good-bye party for me, so I couldn't..."

In his trio of one-acters, "Everyone Except Mr. Fontana", now playing at the Colonnade, Dennis seems to have realized just how far he could go and no further. The plays are amusing and exciting; they hardly ever lag.

Only the middle play, about the trials of two homosexuals (one's a switchhitter) who part ways when an innocent young thing enters their life, carries on with little substance with only the one liners buoying it up.

The first playlet, entitled, "Aztecs and Orange Juice", has a "dumb broad" waking up in the morning in a strange apartment and finding the roommate of the fellow she spent the night with. The dialogue that ensues between Cathy Chilco and David Foster is charming and funny. The shy young man who writes poetry reads his verse to the overwhelmed girl, finds that holding her ears to make her stop breathing is a good way to get into a kiss. Enter the swinging roommate to find the two stretched out on the couch. "What are you doing with my broad?"

"Your broad?" And so on. The plays, when examined closely are quite shallow. If they had not been performed as nimbly as they were, it would have been very easy to leave unsatisfied. (Ed. note: really?) This is the case with most current comedy. A Neil Simon or Arthur Kopit play is hilarious when performed by a first class group. There's a lot to work with. Alone, they fall apart miserably.

Most of the credit, then, goes to Joel Kenyon, who directed this light look into apartment dwelling and its neuroses. He keeps the action moving and the actors in a constant high pitch of interaction. The various lines are delivered impeccably by Miss Chilco, David Foster and Dennis himself. Foster is the weakest of the three but only because Miss Chilco and Dennis delivered their lines with an amazing flair for the wry and the absurd.

The most interesting is the last episode, called, "Ever The Vanishing Virgin". Robert Copeland, a poet who does the first draft of his poems on bathroom walls, takes over the apartment of Stanley Bernstein, his lawyer friend "We were on the debating team together", says Stanley, "Now our values are different." There's a Bible broad out cold in the bedroom and Stanley and Robert have a great argument about Robert's lack of morals, "shtupping" girls every night since he became estranged from his wife Madeline Anne. Robert fires back with accusations that Stanley and his new wife (schoolteacher, from a small town) are prudes. Then Madeline Anne comes in (all the way from Philadelphia?).

The mood changes and Dennis gets serious. Robert and Madeline Anne talk about the way their marriage broke up. Robert, the poet, meets his perfect girl, the one he's been writing all the poems to. "She even speaks like me!"

She talks about how Robert built himself up to be a sexual superman and then failed on the wedding night. Somehow, these lines came just to the brink of sounding corny. One could not help get the impression that one had heard the same stuff before. But once again, the smooth direction whisked away the action before it got too corny.

Dennis hits upon some really serious stuff here—the poets fascination with self, the breakdown of a relationship between two people because there never really was any relationship. Because of lightness of the play, these things came in unobtrusively and left quickly, yet made their mark.

Nobody can say whether "a budding young playwright" will succeed or not. It's pretty stupid. In any play, you can always find the seeds for failure, if you look hard enough. That's not the point. Charlie Dennis' plays are smoothly performed and have enough humour in them to be constantly entertaining past two overlong intermissions. When you think back, they don't really say all that much, but they succeeded, which is all that matters.

respectable prostitute

It took me twenty minutes of the production to begin to accept "Prostitute" as a comic farce, and another fifteen to realize that Sartre, at least, probably hadn't planned it that way.

More's the pity. The play itself is a dated bad melodramatic lament on racial inequality in the United States. The characters lend themselves to easy caricature, and this is what director Marty Stellar has for the most part done. Only the whore herself, played unevenly but amusingly by Adrienne Haas, has more than one dimension, and that flawed an otherwise unified production of a flat play.

The production began as melodrama with comic elements and progressed into comic farce in a hilarious conversation between the Senator (Marty Paul) and the whore in which the senator appears to be a Billy Graham in a sport jacket. It then passed on to new depths of bathos with the return of the hunted Negro Lyn Pollard (university student in black-face), and finally resurrected in the third part as farce once again with the senator's son's (Michael Stewart) brayings about family fortitude and connections.

Stellar might have done better in sending up the whole play. It would not have been Sartre, but at least it would have been consistently farcical and thus more amusing. As it is, it's still worth seeing for some twenty out of forty-five minutes' production time.

yes virginia, iceland has a cinema

One of the features of being connected with the film industry, however loosely, is that all the 'personalities' that are passing through the city are foisted upon you, in the manner of the legendary visiting fireman.

You meet those who are in front of the camera and those who create the film, all purveyors, "To whom it may concern", of tragedy, violence, sex, melodrama or whatever.

It is often difficult to go through the ritual of interest, concern, and zeal, to which the 'personality' is expected to respond with colour, animation, and quotability (quotiveness?).

I was not too excited, then, to receive a call from a friend in a film distributor's office, who promised me a meeting with a director who has a considerable reputation in Europe, but whose films have yet to be distributed here. Name: Gideon Thorviksen; country: Iceland. With my extensive knowledge of Icelandic culture and film (is Iceland still where it used to be?), he said, I could no doubt make a great interview.

He need not have worried. There was no interview: it was a monologue by Thorviksen, a man at once cold and aloof in his manner, yet very intent on communicating ideas. (I had the impression throughout the interview that he was directing his comments at someone sitting directly behind me — he was speaking to me, but through me.)

I arrived with photographer Paul Campbell at one of those crummy apartment houses, about forty or fifty years old, which, with a few others, serves the heart of Toronto much in the manner of New York's Hotel Chelsea: as a breeding ground and working area for the exotic, artsy segment of the population.

Thorviksen was in a small study, revising a scenario; he works even as he travels around the continent. He stood up, stooping, so that despite his thin frame, he did not look the six feet he no doubt is.

When I remarked that his appearance did not fit my conception of an icelander, he replied that his mother was from England, the industrial midlands, and his dark hair and eyes came from her. His nervous, fidgety manner was inherited from his father, Thorviksen said, who used to be Minister of Finance in the Icelandic government.

This said, he sat down, without inviting Campbell or myself to do the same; indeed, he really did not appear to welcome our visit. My film friend claimed afterward, that Thorviksen rarely gives interviews, and that it was only through a twist of that strange humour of his that he gave an interview to student press in Toronto while he had turned down the Times in New York. So far as I could see, Thorviksen was not possessed of much humour at all, though he often made very ironic or cutting remarks.

As I was on the verge of asking Thorviksen the first question, that set off the monologue, he told Campbell not to take pictures while he spoke. They would be taken afterwards, he said, under his direction. And so they were: he specified lighting and camera angle for each shot.

"I am in Toronto on my way to visit some friends in the United States, people I have met in Europe, at film festivals and such. Who? Well, Dwight MacDonald — he used to be the film reviewer for Esquire, and Henry Miller, whom I knew in Paris. Then, a few that I know less well, like Nat Hentoff and Giselle Damar, and of course, my good friend in Hollywood, Gene Autrey.

"I became involved with film much later than you might expect. My father sent me to a private school on the north coast of Iceland which was very strict. No smoking, lights out at ten. And no movies. I was nineteen when I saw my first film, Lost Horizon, at the American Strategic Air Command base. Of course, I didn't want immediately to make films, but I had always wanted to reach people, talk to them, teach them.

"Religion was important for me then. I had gone a little overboard, I guess, going to church several times on Sundays, quoting scripture to my friends. At one point I wanted to be a minister, but I came to realize that you could reach many more people, much more directly, through film than through the church.

"I helped a friend of mine make a small film on the architecture of Reykjavik and discovered that I had more of an intuitive grasp of film, even with my isolation from the medium, than he did. My father bought me a 16 mm Arriflex 79, and I have been making films ever since.

"I made my first feature in 1956, and now I'm at work on the fourth film in my life's major work, a triple trilogy, nine films. The first trilogy is complete, and its title is 'Elements'. The one I have started now is called 'Passions', and the third will be 'Revelations'. In the first one, I used the legend of Óvald for its base: the two others are influenced mainly by my readings of the Bible.

"Elements' uses three principle characters throughout. Two men and a woman; they live in a stone cabin built on the bottom of an ancient lake. I use the closed environment to throw the people at each other and in upon themselves. There is no escape.

"The viewer too, must look at himself through these characters, and the extreme focus and attention on each of them will not let him look past. The screen is more than a mirror, because you don't just look at, but through yourself, your fears, your guilts. There is so much guilt.

"Black and white film only, of course. My films must have the purity of steel, of the icy whiteness of my homeland. Of course my cameraman, Gary Watters, was well trained by Hollywood. He is now developing a new technique for 'Passions', the second trilogy, where the whites have the quality of silver, and the blacks can be made absolute, flat black.

"Don't misunderstand; I am not carried away by new inventions. After all, it was the simplicity of "The Voiceless Flowers" that won me the Golden Bear award at the Berlin Festival in 1964. Now I am looking over North America. My distributor, Atvar-Film, wanted to release them in Canada and the United States a long time ago. I think you are now ready for my earlier works.

"I am not especially dependent on box-office money because I am subsidised by the government. I don't have to do things like everyone else, or appeal to the same public. For example, I am not in favour of the exploitation of natural sex, and there is none in my films.

"I resent the implication that I am building up a mystique in my works. The supernatural is manifest in many ways, and if I show it in the sexuality of a woman, that is my right. The press is simply too inquisitive, they want to know everything. When I gave my last review, the reporter wanted to know about my family and children. Absurd! It's through my works that I am known, and not through my wives."

Asked what he thought of Toronto, Mr. Thorviksen replied that he had so far only seen the City Hall, Chinatown, and a brewery. The latter is accounted for by the fact that Thorviksen first knew of Canada through a beer — O'Keefe's — that he sampled in Iceland. He was disappointed in his tour that the tall bottles had been replaced by short brown ones, so I assume his acquaintance with the brew was more spiritual than spirituous.

"The people are very nice in Toronto, not like in Reykjavik where you just aren't accepted for what you are. The honesty is very refreshing; I had heard so much that was bad about North America, I wanted to investigate the life rhythms for myself. I am quite pleased."

olive brown, a blueswoman at heart

Olive Brown, now at the Cav-a-bob, isn't a blues singer in a narrow sense. Her songs are jazz and popular standards as well as blues tunes, but she was brought up hearing the songs of such classic blues singers as Bessie Smith and Lizzie Miles and Ma Rainey, and the classic blues still form the basis for her work. When she talks about music, she is enthusiastic about almost everything, with the blues always at the beginning.

"I love those old low down muddy blues," she said. "Some singers just do one now and again, but I've got to do them every time I get up there." Just then, Henry Cuesta began to play As Time Goes By, and she said, "That's a beautiful song. Just listen to that. Sometimes you have to come upstairs." It doesn't matter to her what category a tune is in, as long as it's good.

The only music she won't have any part of is soul because soul has developed out of the sanctified singing of the churches, and it was too much a part of her early life. "I came up singing that music. I was singing that and playing a tamborine when I was five. You know I've seen those old ladies — it was their life — singing out their hearts. Sometimes they had fifteen kids and no money coming in, and I wouldn't feel right taking that music and messing around with it." She doesn't say anything against those who want to sing soul music; but for herself, she can't separate the sound from the sacredness of the music.

On the bandstand, she likes to sing at least one long blues number. It doesn't matter what it is called because the verses are traditional, and she can put them together for as long as she wants and in ways that suit her mood. For the rest of the set, she sings a couple of standards, and most likely a Bessie Smith song. (Her favorite material comes from Bessie Smith, and when she appears with the Toronto Symphony soon she will sing "Send Me to the 'Lectric Chair.") Usually the set also includes a Billie Holiday tune sung in imitation of Billie Holiday. The imitation is excellent, and the audience enjoys it. Olive Brown isn't interested in sounding like anyone except herself, but she does a song in imitation of Billie Holiday because it is fun, and one thing that is clear when she is on the stage is that she likes to have a good time.

She is a fine entertainer and Henry Cuesta's swinging clarinet backs her beautifully. On some of the blues numbers I would like to hear her with a good blues band, but on the whole the band, especially Cuesta's clarinet and Bruce Harvey's piano, do just what they are there for. They make her sound good.

COMMISSION ON UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT (CUG)

What's it for?

CUG will examine the role of University of Toronto in society, and the structure of government at U of T. It is expected to make recommendations to the Ontario legislature for amendment of the U of T Act.

Major questions to be dealt with include:

- Should there be a separate Board of Governors and Senate?
- Should the public have any voice in university decisions and planning? Who should speak for the public?

What is a meaningful degree of student participation?

How long will it work?

CUG will get down to business in late December or early January. Submissions will be received from interested groups throughout second term. An interim report will be released at some point in March. A final report will be written during the summer of 1969, for completion by September '69.

Who's eligible to run as a student member?

Any student, part- or full-time, at University of Toronto is eligible for election to CUG. Nomination forms are now available at the SAC Office. Thirty signatures of students with ATL numbers must be obtained.

How much of my time will it take?

The election campaign will be from November 15-26. To encourage a large turn-out in voting, many forums will be held across campus during the campaign period, so you can expect to be busy if you run.

Students elected to the Commission can expect to be rather tied up during second term. Simcoe Hall is considering making as many concessions as possible, though, to students elected. These may include extensions of deadlines on all papers and reports; and the possibility of writing exams during the summer. Details are to be worked out with individual deans or department chairmen.

What would the campaign cost?

A limit of $50 has been set on campaign expenditures by the election committee. SAC is considering payment of part of these expenses for all candidates, and will also approach Simcoe Hall for assistance in this matter. Other election rules will be available at the SAC Office on Friday, November 15.

lightnin' flashes for arhoolie

Lightnin' Hopkins:
Texas Bluesman. Arhoolie
F1034
Early Recordings. Arhoolie
R2007
Lightnin' Sam Hopkins. Arhoolie F1011

It was my plan to review the records of Lightnin' Hopkins and Big Joe Williams when those two country blues greats appeared in town. However, despite quite a lot of interest in Toronto, neither of them showed up for their engagements. This left me with quite a few records to review, and here are some of Lightnin's.

Lightnin' Hopkins has a restrained, smooth voice which tends to trail off at the ends of words. He is a Texas blues singer, claimed by many to be the best blues singer in the world. He is certainly the most famous.

Lightnin' improvises extensively, even when he begins with a standard blues theme, and this can be either good or bad. It is bad when he uses his standard improvisatory techniques for song after song with little variation, as he seems to do when he is tense or tired. But it is very good when his mind is working well, when he is playing his most exciting guitar, and when the songs are sufficiently varied.

I have heard few Lightnin' Hopkins records which were entirely bad except for some poorly made cheap discs. In general his least inspired work is found on his many Prestige albums.

The Arhoolie albums listed above are all extremely fine with a few reservations. As on almost all his records, there are two basic kinds of songs on Texas Bluesman, a rapid boogie which is essentially an instrumental, and a slower long blues ballad. On this record, "Watch My Fingers" is one of the finest boogie numbers I have heard him do. It is full of humor and virtuoso guitar work. Of the other numbers on this album, the only other outstanding one is "Slavery", a very personal, moving treatment of the subject. Lightnin's often moody voice is beautifully suited to the song. The only real reservation I have of this album is that the recording, which was made on portable equipment, makes the guitar sound hollow and distant. Also in attempting to get a stereo effect for this record, the engineers have done some peculiar dividing of guitar and voice. It sounds better as a mono record.

"Early Recordings" is a reissue of material Lightnin' recorded for a Texas label in the late '40s. It has some of his great songs on it, but they were all recorded within the confines of single sides. The sound is not up to 1960 standards, but it doesn't really matter. This is a record that everyone interested in Lightnin's music should have.

Of these three, I think that Arhoolie 1011, the first record that Lightning made for Arhoolie, is the most interesting. It is one of the best records he has ever made. It was recorded in two different places at three different times and catches him in different moods, but the most interesting thing about this record is that it has him playing an electric guitar as well as his usual amplified guitar. Many blues players will play an electric guitar in very much the same way that they play an acoustical guitar. Two very similar improvised numbers, "Ice Storm Blues" (about the weather in Houston) and "California Showers", show the difference in the way he plays an electric guitar, and there are some excellent electric guitar breaks in a beautiful song, "Once was a Gambler." Not all the cuts on this album are equally good, but this is one of the best albums for anyone who wants to hear what Lightnin' can do. —p.h.

sonny terry and brownie mcghee

At the Riverboat until the 24th, Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry play a different sort of blues. Brownie McGhee is a guitar player from the Carolinas and Sonny Terry is a Mississippi harmonica player, and together they have been playing the coffee-houses and folk music clubs for many years. They first became popular with the rise of folk music in the '50s, and they present a smoothed out and easy-going music which appeals to a folk audience.

To my mind Sonny Terry is the really great entertainer of the two. Brownie is too much of a ham and he works too hard for a response from the audience, but Sonny just does the right thing without effort. There are some musicians who won't accept Sonny Terry as a blues harmonica player, and it is certainly true that he doesn't sound much like the great city harp blowers. It may be, though, that one can distinguish two main schools of blues harmonica.

There is the Sonny Boy Williamson school, with all the many great players who followed his lead, and there is Sonny Terry. The former may have an earthier sound, but Sonny Terry is a remarkable musician, and if he owes something to country dance tunes and light songs, one can hardly say that the influence was a bad one.

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee sing a great many of the great tunes by the greatest of the country blues singers. They put on an extremely good show which can be enjoyed by anyone except perhaps the country blues purists. No, even they should listen to Sonny Terry at least once.

THE DISSENTING ACADEMY — edited by Theodore Roszak, Vintage, Random House, $2.25

There is something a little frightening about this book, the questions it opens up, and the intensity with which it is presented. Even in rereading it, it struck me as a desperate cry from an academic morass.

It's a necessary book. There's been no book I've read this year or last that's as important for every student at the University of Toronto to read.

There's been a lot of work, fairly successful so far, toward getting effective and democratic student power on the structures of this and other universities in Canada. That's been a significant fight, and it's not won yet; but we can see which way the trends are going, and it's time we started thinking very seriously about the uses of that power; we have to begin thinking about the role of the university as a social institution, and about the education we are getting here. This book is a crucial background to an answering of the question: "power for what?"

The role of the present university is critically analysed, and its shift to an integrated factor of the industrial-military complex is noted. Instead of existing as an institution of critical evaluation, the university has integrated itself into the status quo of our society. We see a refusal to take collective stands. The first piece in the book puts it bluntly: "The multiversity progressively comes to resemble nothing so much as the highly refined, all purpose brothel Jean Genet describes in his play The Balcony."

The greatest responsibility for this rests with the Faculty, especially those in senior positions. A uniting thread throughout the articles in the book is the intolerable institutionalization of academic disciplines these days. There's an attack in each case on the professional body governing the discipline, from the American Political Science Association to that for Modern Languages. Professors come to relate to these as the centre of attention rather than to their universities or their student. The institutionalization breeds conservatism, smugness, and a womb-like sense of security. The early fight for tenure within university politics breeds insecurity which has the same impact, usually a predilection for convention.

One of the best articles, by Kathleen Cough, points out the possible dangers of unconventional activity. She was personally forced to leave an Eastern arts university for having demanded an end to the American blockade of Cuba, and her ability since that time to get research grants, particularly for the projects that she has been most interested in, the growth of Communism in underdeveloped areas has been very limited. The picture given of upper-level academic life is about as bleak as T.S. Eliot's The Wasteland, and about as meaningful.

In a kind of vicious circle syndrome, Graduate Schools come to reflect this malaise. The fragmentation and overspecialization of graduate schools, the tremendous drive for job and status, and the rigid methodological discipline imposed produce graduate schools that are anything but centres of critical thought. One of the best articles puts this point frankly: "Good undergraduates, when not completely turned off, are generally intellectually open-minded and alive than all but the best of graduate students, a commentary not on graduate genes but on graduate systems."

The graduate student "must play the game by the profession's rules — or he must abandon the board. His graduate studies, his dissertation, his ability to find a position at 'name' school: all of these are tokens in the game on which his teachers have gambled a certain amount of their professional prestige. If he is to find a job (indeed, in many cases, if he is ever to be made aware that a prospective job exists), if he is to achieve tenure and promotions, if he is to survive and prosper, and especially if he is to acquire any amount of glory, then he must be obedient to the expectations of the professional powers that control these rewards." The Graduate School becomes no different that the rest of our professional facilities in its concentration on technique, such graduate schools keeps the vicious academic circle going.

The integration of the American university and military is shown by the position of research in those institutions. Throughout this book, professors again and again stress the involvement of their institutions in secret and semi-secret research work of direct value to the American Defence Department. They talk about projects financed by the CIA, and about counter-insurgency studies and about foreign affairs studies in the social science departments. We've not yet got this kind of a situation here, but the co-option of American universities should make us vigilant in Canada. The U.S. experience has proved that institutions giving research grants can shape the curricula of universities and can have a tremendous impact on the progress of particular scholars and particular points of view in the scholarship of any discipline.

But the heart of The Dissenting Academy is its critique of content on our courses. This is one thing that students have largely ignored. To actually suggest that there may be some alternative to the content that we study, that our courses may be biased, slanted, or less relevant that they should be, is something that just isn't done. We have to do it.

The perceptions and information transferred in the classroom are the guts of the university. It's there that real change will have to take place.

There have been glimmerings of discontent with content here; the History Course Union ran a counter-course in the philosophy of history last year; the Psychology Course Union is running a counter-course in clinical psychology; the Free University is offering counter-courses; but this has not been a major concern. Anyone reading this book is going to realize that it has to be, and that the student movement on this campus has to start very seriously and rigorously analysing the content that's being transferred here.

The best sections of the book are those on the social sciences. And its major critique is directed at the increasing emphasis on a quantitative approach to human interaction. This quantitative approach leads to a position that says what we have in any situation is simply a specific problem that must be dealt with in specific terms. We do not, in other words, have an example of a general problem, of a general situation in a society that must be analysed as a whole and changed. From this you get the kind of political view that says there's "an end to ideology", and that what we have from now on are simply adjustments in particular parts of the status quo to make those specific areas conform to the generally satisfactory condition of the whole.

Related to this is the moral detachment of both the social sciences and humanities. The problem with this moral detachment is that it doesn't recognize that there are already values inherent in the material taught in these courses and in the approach taken. An 'end of ideology' view is in itself a political position. A belief that quantitative analysis can understand any problem is itself a philosophic position. A belief in amoral consideration of problems is in fact a form of conformity to the current status quo. And anyone who accepts that the current status quo is value free has

Value-free versus the Weepy, Value-free Dinosaur.

C. H. M. C.

Perhaps economics is an even better example of this moral copout. In the United States and Canada there has been a great integration of economists into government activities and special projects. The result has been a general acceptance by the decision-making centres of our society of the conventional wisdom of economics. The economist has understandably been fairly smug about this success. And his smugness has prevented him from clearly seeing and communicating the basic value assumptions of his discipline. The whole science of economics as represented by Galbraith, is the epitome of liberal capitalist values.

The assumptions in the study of economics at the level of the firm and at the level of the national economy, are fairly clearly the belief in profit maximization on the part of any individual. Those assumptions rarely get discussed and an elaborate framework is built from them. Perhaps even worse, the alternatives to this liberal capitalist view of economics are seldom presented. We do not have rigorous courses in socialist economics; we do not study the development of workers' control in some Eastern European countries; in short we do not really deal with alternatives to the kind of economic system which exists in our own society. To suggest that this is not a value oriented approach to the problem of production is simply amusing, amusing and a little sad.

The point is not that we should teach socialist economics rather than the economics taught now, but that both alternatives should be presented, and that we should recognize and evaluate the value-laden assumptions of the economics taught us now.

The article on economics in The Dissenting Academy stresses a good deal of this, also noting that American economics has not dealt in any kind of intellectual way with the questions of wealth and income distribution, or arms and the economy. Relevant issues such as poverty have been raised by popular writers like Michael Harrington, rather than by professional economists. Labour relations has been considered in the context of eliminating conflict rather than of attempting to create a fair division of power and wealth. In short, the norms that motivate the way we live together have been forgotten and the techniques of the present status quo have become the centre of attention.

The article on Anthropology, the best in this book, offers another example of hidden value assumptions. Katherine Gough, suggests that anthropology has always been connected with colonialism in that it began with the advance of western societies into undeveloped parts of the world in the 18th and 19th century. At the moment the involvement of many anthropologists with the American army in places like Thailand, leads her to think that anthropology probably represents neocolonialism as well.

Anthropology does not deal with the growth of guerilla movements in underdeveloped parts of the world, except insofar as understanding them would help to discourage them, and it does not deal with the factor of neo-imperialism, the more subtle control that western economies often exert in newly developed areas. Instead anthropology concentrates on cut-off and stagnant communities, and does not deal with questions like Vietnam and the anthropological affects of American actions on the various tribes and peoples there. "It must be acknowledged that anthropology has not been and cannot be ethically neutral. Rather, what seems to have happened is that in circumstances of increasing specialization, bureaucratization, and management and research by governments, anthropologists have virtually ceased to ask explicitly what the human goals of their science are."

A professor at a Canadian university, Christian Bay, the head of the Political Science department at the University of Alberta, makes the same points about any claim that current political science is value-free. When political scientists talk, as they often do, about the state as an automobile, to which new parts can be added and old ones taken away, they're accepting a value orientation, that in fact commits them very closely to the status quo. Certainly it's a far less critical orientation than that with which political science began. The first department of political science was founded at Columbia in 1880 by John William Burgess, a Union soldier in the civil war. His intention "was to establish an institution of pacifist propaganda, genuine not sham, based on a correct knowledge of what nature and reason required." This kind of orientation has simply been lost. As Bay puts it, "a concern with human needs according to priorities dictated by justice is virtually ruled out, even as a problem for empirical inquiry."

Related to this question of underlying values is another overriding theme, the social irrelevancy of much that is communicated within the university today. Throughout The Dissenting Academy there's a general concern with the lack of connection between social issues and the courses that are being taught.

One of the best points Marx ever made stressed the necessity of unity of theory and practice. To make education simply a theoretical exercise is to miss the reality which could come from social action tied to learning. We could, for example, have our social science courses involve part time in community work around the university. We could have our political scientists organizing seminars on issues of particular concern to the public and the university.

Over the book, as a whole, hangs the grim reality of Vietnam. Some will think it is of excessive concern throughout, but perhaps the last section on the social responsibility of intellectuals will help us see why it is so pervasive an issue. The need to critically evaluate foreign policy in the States is crucial for the U.S. intellectual since his country is strong enough to do so much, whether good or bad, to affect the world.

Speaking about social relevance, I stress again the significance of this book for all students. If we are really going to qualitatively affect this university and the world around it, we have to begin the kind of critical evaluation presented in The Dissenting Academy. Course content may be the crucial issue; we have to be able to influence content towards a more humane, critical and socially responsible curriculum.

Only in this way will the power that we students are beginning to gain through course unions, college councils, and the S.A.C. be of importance in fundamentally shaping and changing our environment.

not been reading many newspapers recently.

To say that an economics based on assumptions drawn from Thomas Hobbes is value-free, simply makes a mockery of words. To say that international relations courses which do not consider the question of right or wrong in particular events, are value-free, is simply ridiculous. It has been the refusal to analyse things in terms of right or wrong, that has permitted, the Americans to stay in Vietnam, and the Russians to invade Czechoslovakia.

It's a belief, in vulgar terms, that 'might is right', or at least the only thing worth analysing. The total lack of critical evaluation by this discipline of the war in Vietnam has probably been the most depressing copout of any part of the academic community.

richler shot by fulford at victory!

Crisis at the Victory Bursk, by Robert Fulford, Oxford $5.95

Hunting Tigers Under Glass, by Mordecai Richler, McClelland & Stewart

The great American journalist reports: (draft one):

"It's a (cold, hot, so-so) day in Chicago. A butt of a (Winston, Camel, Lucky) is lying in the ditch and somehow it reminds me of the state our country is in. The (hippies, dippies, yippies, McCarthy supporters) are (grooving, smoking, balling) in Grant Park. (Come on kids, be earthy; sock it towards me I need a story.)"

"The cops are attacking now (tee hee). A big (gorilla, orang-utang, ixitlcoatal is lifting his (orange, red, polka-dot, spumoni, bodoni) truncheon and is beating the kids over the head with extreme (brutality, dzeguze, righteousness)."

"I have just been hit on the (head, shoulders, &?+?!?) by a cop. Hey, watch where you're . . . . Flowing forth from my temples is (blood, blood! blood!!!). I am unconscious. Argh."

Back in Hemingway's day, every Tom, Dick and Branslaw journalist was writing novels in order to become famous. Now its the other way around.

Perhaps, it's because with mass communications, like television, there's no lying to people about the way things are. Mayor Daley, through his insight, brought violence back into the home where it belongs. Truth now becomes more fascinating than fiction. For once, citizens and policemen were involved with each other. "Im doing this fer yer own good, kid," one can hear a cop saying, as the club comes down, "So's ya can learn first hand 'bout where the government is at, so's ya won't feel alienated."

That's why most of the best writing today is being done by the journalists: Breslin, Mailer, Fulford, Harry Bruce.

And because of their involvement, each writer can't possibly stick to the facts, ma'am. His journalism becomes his interpretation of history as it happens. His personality becomes one with the story, making for a melting of fictional warmth with journalistic immediacy, and making the reportage of world-shattering events like a fireside chat at home in the global village.

Robert Fulford is a gifted writer. The picture on the dust jacket, perhaps even better than his writing, shows up his character. He's hiding shyly behind a pillar, his face deadpan, a huge polka dot tie, and a copy of the Beatle's Rubber Soul up front of the pillar.

Fulford is the sort of person who can review Norman Mailer's Armies of the Night and make the review almost as good as the book. Anyone who can do this has got to be the best Canadian journalist around.

Crisis at the Victory Bursk is a book of his collected writings during the 60's, for the Toronto Star, Macleans, Canadian Forum and other journals. If anything at all, it brings back into print that hilarious anti-review of "They Gave Royal Assent: Governor Generals of British Columbia". In it, Fulford lambasts the publishers of such insignificant tomes (cf. Bob Rae: tomus (Lat.)) as "Vigor for Men Over 30", or "19th Century Pottery and Porcelain in Canada", for sending him advance copies of books that nobody will ever read.

Perhaps the only writer who matches up to Fulford's wit, eloquence and overall knowledge, is that vastly underrated movie reviewer for 'Saturday Night', Marshall Delaney.

In his book of essays, Mordecai Richler says of Norman Mailer: "It's still too early to write off Norman Mailer. One still hopes he will stop clowning and settle down to the book he has talked about for so many years. But if he does have a perception that will settle for nothing less than making a revolution in the consciousness of our time, then the sour truth is he is still imprisoned with it.

Funny that Richler should write this comment in a book of his own journalistic-type essays entitled Hunting Tigers Under Glass. It's obvious that Richler wrote this before reading Mailer's The Armies of the Night, in which Mailer did attempt to make a revolution in the consciousness of our time and probably succeeded. The novel won't be the same after that.

Now if the hypothesis that these journalistic forays into the atmosphere of our times must reflect the individual author's style, then Hunting Tigers Under Glass, falls short of success. After reading, Cocksure, the pieces in this book seem remarkably bland. With the opening of the book came the anticipation that, "Oboy, here we go; Richler's gonna make me roll on the floor." But he doesn't.

Hunting Tigers Under Glass, is extraordinarily, overwhelmingly adequate. Only some of the essays, like the one on "The Encyclopaedia of Jews in Sport", come up to Richler's usual caustic wit.

Perhaps Richler would have had fun reviewing the dust jacket of his book which describes itself as, "a long, cool look at our mod mod world from one of the most with-it writers of our generation". The only word they left out is "groovy". (You've got to hand it to the McLelland & Stewart admen; they're always one jump ahead of the people in Smooth Rock Falls)

Even though all of the essays are interesting, they tend to drag, one of Richler's problems from way back. He goes on past the point where interest lags in his essay on the resorts in the Catskills. It's admirable that he has no axe to grind, that he just describes everthing as it is, but it seems as if Richler's best when he's digging the knife into somebody. Maybe something happened to him before Cocksure. I'd sure like to know what it was.

politics of paranoia

The Mackenzie King Record, Vol II, J. W. Pickersgill and D. F. Forster (ed.); University of Toronto Press; 471 pages, $12.50.

"I should not forget that at this time much is owing in my thought to Robert Burns and his noble independence and humanitarian teachings, but more than all else are the beautiful teachings of Christ, and none more beautiful than the one which begins 'Suffer the little children to come unto Me.'"

William Lyon Mackenzie King wrote that in his diary after he gave Canada the Family Allowance Bill, or baby-bonus. It's one of the examples that come up time and time again in which he personally identifies with such grand characters; and therefore his opponents as covert agents of the devil plotting against him. In this second volume his fears of being "crucified" seem to build, his delusions become deeper, as the conscription crisis builds and threatens to split both his government and the country. As the crisis builds even his two defense ministers, Ralston and MacDonald seem to be plotting against him, not as agents of the devil, but as unwitting tools of those agents—the Tories.

Paranoia, I suppose, is inevitable for anyone who sees himself in such a messianic role. That paranoia made him the most cautious of politicians. But when he knew what had to be done, and there was no other way, he became ruthless. I can well imagine that in his cabinet meetings—described in these diaries according to the degree to which members did or did not agree with his ideas—he was a tyrant. The most obvious case of his use of personal power, is at the climax of the conscription crisis when he demanded his defence minister Ralston's resignation, by suddenly pulling out of his pocket a written resignation Ralston submitted two years previously. He was always terrified of the prospects of a "palace revolution."

It was absolutely imperative for King to keep his Cabinet squarely behind him. The Tories were demanding a Union government of all parties, as in World War I. Any crack in the solidarity of his men would have given the George Drews, the Henry Bordens, the George McCullaghs, and the rest of the Tory crowd fuel enough to demand representation in the government. How cautious would they have been?

These were the men using every opportunity to agitate for conscription. King called them the Tory Imperialists. They called for ample support for Britain and the Canadian boys dying over in Europe, but King had the French-Canadians, the C.C.F. and even Tim Buck's Communists on the other side, denouncing small imperialism.

This second volume, takes the story forward from King's return from the 1944 Commonwealth conference, to the founding of the United Nations and the election of 1945. The bulk of it is the conscription crisis. It underlies everything just as it was the main domestic issue of the war. The two volumes together are the best history of the war period yet published. King made politics his obsession and every thought is framed by political considerations. How such and such would look to the people and help in the next election. When the next bit of social welfare legislation should be passed to be of the most value in an election but not look like a bribe. This is case material for a political scientist studying the workings of Canada's government—the cabinet and parliament, the army, relations with uncooperative provincial premiers. (Early in this volume Duplessis gains power in Quebec and Tommy Douglas wins Saskatchewan. Ontario was led by George Drew, whom King and members of his cabinet considered the greatest threat to his country because of his agitation on the conscription question).

This volume is also like a novel, as King tries to keep order among the various factions and personalities and still slowly bring in a measure he was sure could split the nation. He was the shrewdest of politicians in his use of power, but constantly fighting a battle against his enemies, among which his own feelings of inadequacy are just as important as the Tories. That's why it's hard to condemn King. We often think of him as the typical politician mouthing fence-sitters like "Conscription if necessary but not necessarily conscription." But he was fighting a public mobilized by the Tories. (Granatstein's Politics of Survival shows the desperate situation the Conservatives found themselves in during the war, and why certain of its members used every political trick possible to fight King. George Drew's agitation over the Hong Kong Expeditionary Force (Vol I) was dirty politics, but did threaten the government for a while and was one of the many little incidents that helped to polarize the nation—the English to say more men are needed overseas; the French and the socialists saying don't send our men into action just because Churchill says the empire is at stake).

He noticed those who opposed his no-conscription policy were the same men who objected to his social welfare policies. Typically he connected the two, claiming the Tories were using the conscription issue to defeat him and in that way defeat his welfare legislation.

I believe he really did see himself as the saviour of the common man. His welfare legislation wasn't passed only because of the amazing electoral gains of the C.C.F. He was talking about some of them back in the 1920s. And much as it sounds sour grapes, I believe this statement from his diary: "I shrink so inwardly from anything that savours of a demagogic appeal that I find it difficult to say much about the poor and the masses of the people lest it be thought that this is being done for political reasons." King thought that way, and he put it all down in the most candid way in this diary. That's what makes it so fascinating to read.

King must have gained strength from this diary. It seems to have been the only communication he had with anyone. Chats with his mother through a medium also seem to have been measures for constantly reassuring himself. His diary, though, was himself, and at the same time a tool for self-analysis, self-justification, self-deception, and a chronicle of his

An Independent Foreign Policy for Canada? University League for Social Reform, Stephen Clarkson, editor. McLelland and Stewart: $4.95

Democratic political systems tend to be run less by the people for the people and more by pressure groups for their own self-interest. The frustration experienced by those interest groups which lack power to influence government decision-making is distressing. During the past few weeks, mass demonstrations, sit-ins and fasting have been tried in an attempt to influence government policy, specifically in the field of Canadian foreign policy.

The University League for Social Reform, an elite group of university professors mainly from Toronto, has idealistically challenged the government by a more intellectual medium. An Independent Foreign Policy for Canada? is the third book that has been produced by the ULSR. As a compilation of 19 articles by 25 authors, edited by Stephen Clarkson, Professor of Political Science at U. of T., the book claims to be a debate, but of course cannot avoid concealing the bias of its editor.

The book is represented as "an attempt to provoke discussion", to stimulate public involvement in the debate over Canadian foreign policy. Whether it has been any more successful in involving people than the October 25 anti-Vietnam War demonstration is questionable. Five thousand copies have been printed and presumably sold, but only 1000 people aspired to send in a questionnaire enclosed with the book as an attempt to measure public opinion and widen the base of decision-making.

However, the book does succeed as an attempt by academics to provide an evaluation of and an alternative to present Canadian foreign policy, to fill a role irresponsibly ignored by Parliament and by the bureaucracy behind our politicians.

The dominant theme throughout many of the 19 articles centres on attack on what has been referred to as the Canadian foreign policy of Quiet Diplomacy, which the book essentially regards as the antithesis of an independent foreign policy. The Federal Government has used Quiet Diplomacy as an excuse for failure to analyze causes and call for effective action. What "Middle Power" really means is "Defender of the Status Quo".

Indeed, the emphasis on negotiation for its own sake, rather than for settlement, is a manifestation of the Canadian political character moulded by a federal system. Federal-provincial relations have maintained a tenuous balance for the past 100 years, with problem-solving on an ad-hoc basis and no lasting solution ever having been achieved. The successive procedure of Royal Commission followed by inaction has been transplanted to the international scene in the form of Canada's role of peace-keeping. As one article points out, a peace-keeping force merely suppresses the conflict which necessitated intervention, but does nothing to solve that conflict by further action.

Frequent reference is made in several articles in the book to the restrictions involved in the implementation of an independent Canadian foreign policy. The present method of governmental decision-making is attacked, and various proposals are put forward to make decision-making more visible, more open to the Canadian people.

Quiet diplomacy, to Professor Frank Griffiths, is private diplomacy propagated by our own English-style civil service, an elite few who appear to be consistently conservative and pro-American. He proposes several changes in the existing political system — "intermediate groups" (more elites), more research staff for M.P.'s, a restructuring of the network of decision-making to permit more involvement and better communication with the public. Thus, typical of the small "c" liberals who have contributed to this book, he proposes changes to make the system work better, without considering that what is needed are fundamental changes in the system itself.

In their pristine liberalism, some of the contributors even advocate a foreign policy which reflects a utilitarian view — putting the greatest happiness for the greatest numbers ahead of the national interest. To judge by the fear of American economic retaliation expressed by some of the authors, Canada's national interest would soon replace universal welfare. As long as people's attitudes are products of our authoritarian educational system and victims of biased news media, they will tend to think solely in terms of the status quo, namely our present materialistic value system. The degree of objectivity in Canadian foreign policy is determined by our wallet. No author reflects upon the essential prerequisite of an independent foreign policy, a different value system that would transcend self-interest.

Reference is made to the influence that Quebec could have in determining an independent foreign policy for Canada as a whole. A different culture does help to keep the American dogs at bay, but how much willingness has the federal government shown in allowing Quebec a meaningful voice in the foreign affairs which are specifically in Quebec's own interest?

The familiar topics of current debate regarding Canada's role vis-a-vis the world are extensively covered in An Independent Foreign Policy for Canada? — Vietnam, NATO, Cuba, the O.A.S., American economic domination, Rhodesia, nuclear weapons, peace-keeping. An informed article by Professor Pratt reminds Canada of the role it should be playing regarding the question of Rhodesian independence. Two other articles analyze foreign aid and recommend that Canadian aid should concentrate on countries where aid would have maximum per capita impact. However, the authors fail to reveal that much of Canada's external aid is tied aid, forcing underdeveloped nations to buy Canadian manufactures at inflated prices, and therefore primarily enriching our American "branch-plant" economy.

Ian Lumsden offers an enlightened analysis of the political situation in South America, warns Canada to avoid American mistakes in perpetuating unjust social systems, and recommends that Canada maintain its liaison with Cuba.

The Distemper of Our Times. Peter C. Newman. McClelland and Stewart. 479 pages. $8.95.

I have never felt myself obsessively fascinated by the carrying out of the nation's business in Ottawa. Barring complete revolution, there has always seemed to me very little chance of a government decision having any sort of profound impact on my life. I may prefer one decision over another, but I don't really care.

The reason for this, I hope, isn't apathy or abnegation of responsibility, but rather the fact that our two governing parties work resolutely within a system with which I basically disagree — 'grasping' capitalism — and they strive to perpetuate that system. It matters only slightly whether the Liberals or Progressive Conservatives hold the reigns of power.

While people point strenuously to the amount of 'progressive' legislation passed by the Pearson government, the same government also paid incredible lip-service to 'big business', ignoring the Carter Report recommendations, bringing Robert Winters into the cabinet, yielding to American economic guideline, etc., culminating in the total victory won by Mitchell Sharp over Walter Gordon and his brand of economic nationalism.

The Diefenbaker Cabinet housed such Bay Street boys as George Hees, Wallace McCutcheon and Donald Fleming. And the ruin of Diefenbaker came about when he tried to buck the pro-American, economic establishment, so well represented in his cabinet.

But despite my unfortunate boredom with Canadian political policies, I remain intensely interested in its political personalities. The fact that Lester Pearson once represented Switzerland in international ice hockey is more interesting to me than the fact that he didn't make a very good Prime Minister. And the whimsical sense of humour that often came out of a nice little guy with a bow tie interests me more than his ability or inability to control an unruly cabinet.

The same with John Diefenbaker, surely one of the most absolutely fascinating persons ever to careen about on the Canadian political stage. We all know Diefenbaker's hang-ups as a politician — his abominable misunderstanding of French-Canada, his ridiculous devotion to everything British, his utter failure to cope with a changing Canada.

But still, what a personality. What a fighter. What an

REVELATIONS OF A FILM FOX

Sly reports from a friend in the field

I sauntered onto the set of "The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie" in Edinburgh just in time to dig Maggie Smith at work. She's something else! As a romantic, eccentric Scottish schoolteacher whose very presence inflames any man around, she declares, "Give me a girl who is at an impressionable age and she is mine for life!"—ready to pass on her know-how to nubile students. I loped into Maggie's dressing-room to offer her a few pointers but she recoiled in distress. "I can't bear personal publicity," she said, a plea in her beautiful green eyes. "It's against my nature. I'd much rather have my work speak for itself." Jean Brodie, Maggie explained, is determined to teach her favorite high-school lassies that they must be on the alert to recognize their 'prime' moments in life and love and then live them to the full. Showing me a candid snapshot of Pamela Franklin, cast as one of the student lovelies, Maggie asked me if I'd like to be her Dutch uncle. Oh, to have had a teacher like that when I was a cub! Sighing, I flew to Austria, where a fellow dropout, Assaf Dayan, was playing a medieval college man in "A Walk with Love and Death." Trying to avoid fighting on anyone's side except his own during the Hundred Year's War, he romances his costar Anjelica Huston, under the watchful eye of her director-father, John Huston. "Bit of a bind, what?" I asked. Assaf shrugged philosophically. "It would be a pleasure to pursue her under anyone's eye," he said. "Look at that ravishing brow! That elegant figure! That enigmatic smile!" I quivered. "Even though the story is set in olden times," he went on, "it's for the young of today. I play a student who quits the university because he doesn't feel related to what he is doing. The year is 1358 A.D. but you think times have changed all that much?" I was too busy eyeing Anjelica to answer. Then her old man kicked me off the set and I repaired to "The Guru" for wisdom in ways of controlling the physical appetites, trailing Michael York and Rita Tushingham to India. Michael appears as an English pop singer studying the sitar with a famed guru, played by Utpal Dutt, while Rita is an enchanting hippy searching for life's meaning. "What have you discovered?" I asked them in Benares. They were too busy gazing into each other's eyes to answer. "Guru" Dutt was meditating at the Ganges under a Do Not Disturb sign so I buttonholed the first swami I fell over. "What is the future?" I inquired. "I think there is hope for you," he replied. "In your next life you will most likely be a wolf." "till next month orator. "The Chief" was straight out of Shakespear — King Lear, Julius Caesar, Macbeth, rolled into one forboding presence that dominated Parliament Hill for ten years. Forget political shortcomings (anyway, has Canada ever had a 'great' prime minister?). Cloaked in tragedy and greatness, often at the same time, Diefenbaker was bloody good just to have around and to experience.

That's what I have against Peter C. Newman and his latest book, The Distemper of our Times, a highly critical survey of the Pearson administration. Newman has no interest in people, no concern with their roles as human beings. Wholly caught up in the phobia of Canada's potential as a great country, he cannot bring himself to excuse either Pearson or Diefenbaker for failing to live up to his high expectations. But Dief . . . but Mike . . . I thought you were going to make us great, he wails.

Newman seems to exist in a perpetual state of disillusion as one Kennedy after another becomes only Mike Pearson or John Diefenbaker or . . . Pierre Trudeau.

"The office of prime minister," he writes, "demands of its occupant some special quality, a dimension of unrealized potential, to maintain a distance between himself and the people. Pearson's personality was fatal to any sense of awe." Newman's complaint, therefore, is that Pearson was merely a good man, and not a great one.

thoughts to be preserved for history.

King was sort of a Charlie Brown character. His diary is the comic strip by which he speaks to us; the medium is Lucy at the psychiatric-help stand; and absolute assurance of greatness in the eyes of others, is the little red-haired girl. The most uncomfortable parts of this diary are his accounts of meetings with world leaders, deGaulle, Churchill and especially Roosevelt. He pretended greatness but never got in their way. He relished their compliments and kowtowed to their requests. At the Quebec conferences (the second is in this volume) he only supplied the whiskey but had his picture taken with the powerful men, to show the public he was right in there with the biggest.

alism during the war—and in many ways since then. He didn't want any other country to make his decisions for him, even though the end result was the same. He felt uncomfortable in the presence of a British governor general and planned a Canadian flag and anthem. He was pulling away from Britain, only to be forced into the U.S. sphere by the war and by his own subservience to Roosevelt.

To him subservience to Britain was the greater evil. His greatest failure then was probably in missing the point altogether: he saw that the lower classes needed better welfare provisions and that the financial interests and the industrialists didn't want to share their wealth; but he didn't see that this analysis of society applies best to the United States. And on the international level, his analysis of imperialism was horribly shallow. He cut ties with the

There's no room for decency in the Peter C. Newman world of power politics, no room for people to be people. Newman goes to say, "At the core of Lester Pearson's disappointing performance was the fact that during his time in power he behaved as if he would rather be himself than a memorable prime minister." For that same reason I admire Lester Pearson. This may sound hopelessly naive, but, given the pretexts of our society and our political system, I don't feel it matters a great deal who the prime minister is, the same basic injustices and exploitation go on irregardless. So if the prime minister is a refreshing individual or an interesting personality, I'm satisfied (blush).

Newman also has criticism for Gordon's style (an essential Pearson ingredient of greatness): "Even his books, with their revolutionary implication for Canadian society, read like dry texts on bee-keeping." It's not what you say, Walter, but how you say it. Pearson's style, too, comes in for heavy criticism. What this has to do with governing the country Newman never quite makes clear.

Picking up where he left off in Renegade in Power, Newman renews his attack on Diefenbaker with savage intensity. In fact, perhaps one of the reasons for his harshness towards Pearson was his persistent failure to out campaign "the Chief". The press could never quite forgive Pearson for not giving Diefenbaker the type of electoral thumping they felt he deserved.

Diefenbaker's one great asset, the asset which enabled him to hang on for such an interminable length of time, was his overwhelmingly superior contact with that mystical group, "the people". Pearson, cut off for so many years in the cocoon of the civil service, could never hope to come across as the champion of the "little man". He felt shy and uncomfortable among strangers, while Dief relished in the worm bask of swarming voters. "I never campaign. I just visit with the people," he once said. It was a quality of Diefenbaker which has never been admired adequately.

As a political analysis of the years when Lester Pearson was Prime Minister of Canada, Distemper of our Times is excellent.

But Newman's chief error lies in castigating people for falling short of greatness. Worthwhile contributions become minimal side-effects to the great show of failure. He almost passes over Pearson's crucial grasp of how to deal with Quebec when Confederation seemed on the ropes.)

Lester Pearson's greatest attribute as a very ordinary prime minister was his steadfastness in refusing to be changed by the job. He remained decent, likeable, witty, intelligent and refined throughout his years in office. I'm sorry but that's quite enough for me.

formal British Empire only to wrap himself in informal economic and military ties with the United States. Of course, then, King was always an under-achiever. At the University of Toronto, where he led the North American world's first student strike and then-finked on it, he worked terribly hard and never got top recognition.

An incomplete man personally, he purveyed an incomplete brand of nationalism. While in London he was told a Normandy invasion would take place, but not the exact date. This he found out: 'On June 6 . . . awakened about half past four in the morning by the constable on duty knocking on his bedroom door and "coming in saying: Mr. King, the invasion has begun.'" Pickersgill released a statement to the press calling Normandy "the climax of the war."

FILM CANADA

Expo '70 will be held in Osaka, Japan. The theme of the exposition will be "Progress and Harmony for Mankind." Since Canada was the first country to sign for a site at the world's fair and since there will be four pavilions representing Canada (which is more than any other country), it should be safe to assume that Canada has something very important to say on this theme.

Total Canadian participation for the Canada, Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia pavilions will cost twenty million dollars. The exposition committee estimates that a maximum number of sixteen thousand Canadians will attend the fair. Thus Canadians are paying $1,250 for each Canadian attending the fair. What is there to show for this?

Quebec has not announced the design of its pavilion and it has stated that it plans only to make conventional uses of film. (Total cost: three million dollars.)

British Columbia's pavilion will be a 160-foot tower carved from spruce trees. A movie on B.C.'s resources will be shown on a squat 45-by-9 foot screen. Ironically the whole pavilion will be surrounded by water.

Ontario will construct a relatively conservative pavilion for less than two million dollars and will feature a new Chris Chapman film which should cost $650,000, only $150,000 more than A Place to Stand. Whereas Chapman's Montreal film was shown on a flat 60-by-30 foot screen, the new film will be shown on a 90-by-35 foot screen which will curve at 120 degrees. Chapman, who was the director, designer, cameraman and editor of his award-winning A Place to Stand intends to concentrate more on people this time around. He is not interested in introducing any new techniques and he does not think a picture about industry will particularly impress the Japanese.

In his words: "We can't say, 'Look we build ships too,' when ours are canoes compared with theirs. Or, 'Look, we build cars as well,' when they build original cars."

This film will last about eighteen minutes, the same length as the Montreal film, and will again be shot on 70 mm.

Mr. Randall, our Minister of Trade and Development, thinks of the film as depicting "Progress and Harmony among Ontario's Mankind." We can assume from this that there will be lots of shots of The Six Nations Reserve in Brantford and other progressive parts of the province.

Canada has budgeted $11,200,000 for its pavilion. It will have a fairly interesting design. (After the flop in Montreal, how can they go wrong?) The theme of the pavilion will be Discovery, so at least they do not have any pretensions.

Movies will be shown on a triangular 47 - by - 25 foot screen and also on a 18 - by - 30 foot parabolic glass unit which will seem to offer the image from behind the screen. The further the viewer stands from the screen the larger the movie appears. All film productions will be in the charge of the National Film Board of Canada.

Aside from these pavilions, Canadians will be doing some very significant film-making for Expo '70. As the Osaka Exposition was already being planned in May, 1966, the Japanese were able to go over Expo '67 with a fine tooth comb. Some of the best talent at our World's Fair was hired by an organization known as the Fuji Group. This is a group of thirty-six companies headed by the Fu Bank.

The group is going to build a six million dollar pavilion made out of "air beams." These are air-filled tubes sixteen feet in diameter made from vinyl-coated canvas. These tubes will be arranged side by side to create a structure twenty stories in height.

Once inside the pavilion the visitor will be carried around first on an outer ring then on an inner ring of conveyer belts. This trip takes twenty minutes. During twelve of those minutes a film will be showing on a screen with 65 by-90 foot dimensions. (This is about seven stories in height.) By merely turning his head the visitor can see the film from anywhere in the pavilion. During the remaining eight minutes there will be a highly complex audio-visual treatment.

The film and the audio-visual display will complement each other and will both be closely related to the pavilion's theme. Roughly, the theme which the Fuji Bank has chosen is that the future of mankind will depend on man's compassion. Further that compassionate man not technological man will lead the way to the twenty-first century. The subject of the pavilion will be man throughout the world.

First the Fuji Group hired a new Canadian Company called Multiscreen Corporation. Among the company's members are: Roman Kroitor, who originated and produced Labyrinth for the National Film Board; and Graeme Ferguson and Robert Kerr, who produced another Expo '67 film called Polar Life. Multiscreen Corporation will produce the film.

Roman Kroitor will be co-producer with Kiichi Ichikawa, who is known to North Americans through his film Woman in the Dunes. It is hard to imagine two people with more divergent film styles working together. How is it possible to combine big-screen technical achievements with the moving, stark simplicity of a film like Woman in the Dunes?

Three other Canadians hold important positions in this production. Donald Brittain is the Director and Colin Low is the Art Director. Low will look after the audio-visual treatment. The chief cameraman is Georges Dufaux, who recently won an Etrog for his camerawork in Isabel.

The first thing that should be noted about this pavilion is that it will have no sequence. The visitor enters at any time. He may come in during the audio-visual display or he may come in during the middle of the film. In most cases the visitor will see the end of the film before he sees the beginning.

This will be the "biggest" film ever seen and so new equipment has been invented. Multivision, the name of their invention, will have a frame size three times that of 70 mm film. Not only that, but the film will run laterally through the projector. This new equipment is deemed necessary so that they can get a high quality image. The huge screen is being used to give people a higher degree of involvement.

Filming will start in Canada, but the final film version will probably have scenes from every continent.

The total budget for the twenty minute message is one million dollars. How will the results compare to The Ernie Game, which cost only $500,000 or to Nobody Waved Goodbye, which had a budget of fifty thousand dollars.

There are a number of depressing things about Expo '70. First despite its theme, there can be no doubt that this fair is Big Business. Secondly, although compassion and not technology should lead the way to the twenty-first century, it is obvious that in these films at least, technology has surpassed compassion. Involvement is placed much higher than emotion. Thirdly, the Fuji Group is being given an excellent chance to show its real deep-down humanity.

See you at the trade fair in Osaka.

bargain book basements

Hugh Anson - Cartwright's, in the Oddfellows' Hall on College St., is the best book shop in the city. There are no paper bags, no bills, and sometimes no small change; hut these are trifles.

Hugh runs the place in his spare time (12:30 to 5:30 Monday to Friday), but it's worth taking an afternoon off from the glue factory to have a look around.

This is the only book store in Toronto to consistently have copies of harder-to-find or less usual works (Carl Van Vechten's novels, Aleister Crowley, early Paul Bowles, Emma Goldman's book on Russia).

plus old books and first editions. Besides literature (almost entirely English-language authors) there is a good historical and military section, and generally a lot of intriguing stuff at very reasonable prices.

Of the good used bookstores, Jack's Books is the largest. Right in the heart of Skid Row, usually flanked by various be-whiskered and shuffling men of leisure one discovers Jack's Books. Inside, there are lurid paperbacks and pulp science-fiction magazines, but further back in the store, there are good fiction and lit. crit. sections and a useful rack of better paper backs at half price (including occasionally, out-of-print penguins and such). The only uninteresting section is the poetry. Jack's is a used book store and no-one, it seems, sells poetry. Not many people buy it, and those who do usually hang onto it.

Also available at Jack's are back issues of literary magazines, Life, New Yorker, Sports Illustrated, Nugget, The Big Babes, etc. The staff is sullen, except for the elderly man in the trilby who is delightful. I think he sleeps in that hat.

Batta Books is cramped, civilized and friendly, and the prices are reasonable. There are good selections of fiction (especially foreign authors) and travel. Sometimes obscure and out-of-the-way items turn up (I picked up Rudolf Steiner's 'Atlantis and Lemuria' for $1.00 and Merezkowski's 'Jesus the Unknown' and 'Jesus Manifest' for $2.50 each.) Batta is at 656 Yonge Street, and will buy your old paperbacks.

The Book Cellar, on Bay St. just south of Bloor, deals mostly in magazines and paperbacks, including stuff from some of the little presses in Canada and the States. The poetry section is particularly good, and there is a wide range of magazines, including 'Anarchy', 'Stamp Collecting', 'Psychedelic Quarterly' and various doggie journals. The staff are swell and the place is always horribly crowded.

The Village Bookstore at 29 Gerrard St. W. carries interesting things from small presses. Martin Avenhaus who runs it sometimes gives the impression of being rather sinister:

Lady Customer: Do you have anything new in . . . today . . . Martin?

Martin: Oh yes . . . yes . . . I have a lot of new things in . . . I don't think anything that would interest you though . . .

L.C.: NO? . . . No? . . . Oh, well . . . You know I haven't read the books I have yet you know.

M: No?

L.C.: No . . . I have a lot of books you know.

M: Yes . . . I imagine you have. (they both stare into space for a while, as if remembering lost visions).

M.: We're having a sale next week you know . . .

L.C.: Yes . . . Will it be a great sale?

N.: I think it will be a really . . . great . . . sale. (a slight frown develops on the brow; beads of sweat.)

Book World at 72 Gerrard W. and the Vanguard Bookstore opposite Britnells are run by different factions of the communist movement - Vanguard by the Trotskyists, Book World by the (generally pro-Moscow) Party. Both have an interesting array of leftist books and magazines. Book World offers Russian classics in inexpensive Soviet editions.

White Book World has an art gallery upstairs, Vanguard has a back room, supposedly for revolutionary political meetings, but it's long been my opinion that this is a front for illegal bingo.

The Old Favorites used book store is the place to go if you want a 1927 road map of Pennsylvania, a parts manual for your old Austin or back issues of Playboy. Otherwise, the books are Old all right, but there aren't many of your Favorites. (Poems of Elsie Windham Birch, 1827; English For Modern Schools; Christ's Message To YOU; etc.) A cavernous warehouse basement at King and University, this one is advised only for the most persistent, optimistic and hardened bookhunters. The prices are high, many of the books are in poor condition and the 'search service' is a joke. Not for anyone allergic to dust.

The Volume One at Spadina and Harbord has both new and used books and for a small shop, the selection and organization are excellent.

There are of course the Yonge St. paperback stores that have pornography in the back. Olympia Books at 587 Yonge is the biggest. 'High-Heeled Yvonne' is available here; also Maurice Girodias' Olympia Press books (Alex Trocchi's 'Helen and Desire' for example). There's a fair selection of science fiction and wall posters.

Finally, for American 'underground' newspapers such as The Oracle, the place to go is the Head Shop at 98 Scollard St. in Yorkville.

All these stores are within healthy walking distance of the St. George campus. They're a good way to spend a Saturday in the city, and who knows, maybe you'll stumble on that first edition of Lascelles Abercrombie you've been looking for for so long.

Mackey defends wiretapping

By LEIGHTON REID

The police chief is the man best able to control the misuse of wiretapping, says Metro Police Chief James Mackey.

He was speaking at a conference on electronic snooping Thursday afternoon in the Edward Johnson Building.

"Organized crime is now a major threat," he said. "We need all the help we can get."

Mackey said criminals are now using electronic "bugging" devices in house break-ins, frauds, and blackmail. He wants the law to prohibit the use of these devices by everyone but law-enforcement agencies.

Alan Westin, author of a book, Privacy and Freedom, wants a series of wiretapping regulations that evolve along the lines of search warrant legislation and custom.

He described surveillance equipment that makes it possible to hear conversations up to a mile away.

"Sound within a building makes the windows vibrate. The windows in turn emit "ultra-sound" which can be picked up by sensitive equipment," he explained.

The most important potential danger to the individual's privacy is the growth of immense computer networks, compiling large amounts of personal information, said Westin.

"Large statistical databanks will require that information be kept up to date. Identifiers will be hired to do just that job," he warned.

The conference is part of a two-day larger program, Law and Freedom in a Changing Society, sponsored by the faculty of law.

Virgin count up 9% --planner Pullam skeptical

"Lies! Lies! Lies!" exclaimed John Pullam (SGS), planner of the Engineering Computer Dating Program, when asked about the results of this year's computer dating.

The virgin count has gone up to 80 per cent of all girls who filled in computer dating forms. Last year 71 per cent and two years ago 60 per cent of all girls to submit computer dating applications were virgins.

"I don't believe the number has actually gone up," protested Pullam.

"My roommate and I plan to conduct a personal survey to verify these results," he added with a chuckle.

The virginity rate among males has remained fairly constant over the years with 48 per cent of the males virgins, this year. Of the 18 people who requested dates with their own sex, thirteen were male and most were named Peter.

The questionnaire seemed more serious than last year, dealing with questions on the war in Vietnam and nuclear disarmament.

Pullam explained that such questions define character traits not always obvious in the implications of the question.

When people are matched by computer, it is not simply on the basis of the same answers to the questions but according to a personality profile drawn from these answers, Pullam explained. Thus, someone who does not believe the United States should withdraw from Vietnam may be matched with someone who does, because their personalities are compatible.

Altogether, 715 males and 647 females applied to be matched through the computer. There were also 154 rejects who filled out their applications incorrectly.

"I tried every person against everyone of the opposite sex 43 times," Pullam explained, "So if they didn't get a date..."

Most people were matched with four others.

Pullam said the questionnaire is revised each year on the basis of the answers obtained the year before.

"If we get the same answer to a question from practically everybody, the question is changed or discarded," he said.

Key punching for the computer program was done free by IBM. The Engineers donated just under $1700 to the United Appeal from their profits.

Those who managed to salvage their dating questionnaire will be able to search out their perfect match (if the computer hasn't already done so) at the computer dating dance tonight at the Drill Hall. For those who were foolish enough not to be matched mechanically but prefer the old hand-picked method, you too may attend the dance for a nominal fee.

Bogus burning draws 2,500

WATERLOO (CUP) — Waterloo students followed the lead of American students protesting against Dow Chemical Co. and pulled off a gigantic hoax-teaching session Wednesday.

Some clever advertising brought 2,500 students, 30 police, SPCA officials and the commercial media to the campus to witness the napalming of a dog. Toronto area media picked up the story and played it strongly.

Humane society officials threatened criminal action.

Of course, there was no dog burning. There wasn't even a dog. The protestors in a brief speech told the assembled crowd the purpose of the stunt had been achieved. They said they had succeeded in proving people cared more about dogs than they do about Vietnamese civilians.

Engineers in the crowd were incensed. They burned the protest group's literature and one engineer scorched a hot dog. Another engineer was mistaken for a radical and could not prevent his colleagues from igniting his lab report. They thought it was a pile of leaflets.

A similar hoax was pulled off in Cincinnati last week with even more people in attendance.

Dow is recruiting on the Waterloo campus this week.

Fromm axed from Tarheel

Paul Fromm (III SMC) was told yesterday his name had been removed from the Tarheel Exchange. The exchange, an annual event, leaves Wednesday for the University of North Carolina.

David Adamson (IV Trin), who is in charge of the exchange, told Fromm yesterday afternoon he had "not shown the proper social spirit" and had been removed from the list.

"I gather Adamson was upset that I had to leave a Sunday meeting early to go to church," Fromm said last night.

"But if he'd been so uptight and upset about me, he might have informed me Monday, instead of waiting until now."

Fromm said Adamson's main beef seemed to be his leaving the Sunday meeting early.

Since being accepted as a member of the Tarheel Exchange, Fromm has been in charge of sending information on the U of T to North Carolina. He has mailed posters, pamphlets, government brochures and copies of campus publications to UNC.

Adamson was not available for comment. It is not known whether a replacement will fill Fromm's position.

Catch Sneezles — cure blues

Be sure to catch the school of nursing's production Sneezles.

Last night's show proved to be an evening of light fun featuring the Sneezlettes, pantomime go-go dancers in Harper Valley PTA, Bonnie and Clyde and many others.

While some of the jokes will mean little to a non-nurse, they are soon forgotten thanks to a few good ones.

The skirts were light. Anne Larson gave Sleeping Beauty a new twist as she played the bad fairy who gets it in the end.

And oh, those skirts! Too short to be believed.

U of T team develops enzymes

Two University of Toronto medical researchers have been awarded the Honors Achievement Award of the Angiology Research Foundation of New York for their work in developing a cheap and readily-reproducible enzyme to dissolve blood clots.

Walter H. E. Roschlau, M.D., and Albert M. Fisher, M.A. Ph.D., of Connaught Medical Research Laboratories received the award yesterday from Alfred Halpern, president of the ARF. Angiology is a branch of anatomy dealing with blood vessels.

The enzyme called CA-7 for Connaught Astra, is not yet commercially available, but a team of researchers at the Connaught Laboratories have been testing it.

First isolated 10 years ago, CA-7 has been extensively tested in Canada, the United States and Europe.

It can be stored like coffee in a freeze-dried brown powder for several years. When needed, the doctors just add water to the powder. The enzyme is cheaper than other agents for dissolving blood clots, more effective and less dangerous.

Ford accused of mistreatment

By TOM WALKOM

Ford Motor Company "encourages alcoholism" among its workers to keep them "captive," charged Communist Jim Bridgewood Wednesday.

Bridgewood, a laborer at Ford's Oakville plant and unsuccessful Communist candidate in the June 25 federal election, was speaking to an audience of 9 at Sidney Smith.

His remarks slashed out at Ford for using automation and time experts to increase the work load intensity.

Bridgewood claimed two men had committed suicide recently because the "pressures were so great."

"The auto worker said the university was "not important" in the reform of society.

As to whether workers would actually "go out on the picket lines for students," the speaker acknowledged he "couldn't promise" any significant support for a campus movement. In his final remarks, Bridgewood cut into Ford for hiring "scum from foreign countries." Among these the communist charged were at least 10 "SS" types and "one real Nazi, all of whom were employed by the management to bust unions."

Baron blasted

In a letter dated Nov. 11, Eleanor Parmenter (II New) refutes the Red Baron, winner of the Great Paper Plane Mystery Contest.

She said he did not reveal the whole truth about the origins of the five paper airplanes in the ceiling of room 135, Old Physics Building.

"According to Miss Parmenter, one at least was of ordinary paper and hand thrown.

"Calling the material on the ceiling 'soft acoustic tile' is a typical example of radical left-wing mealy-mouthed Varsity reporting. It would be far more accurate to call it a degenerate species of rotting sawdust," she said.

• to nominate Alberto de Giovanni to a committee to be set up at SMC to study the problem of traffic on University Ave., in light of the fact that a girl from St. Mike's was recently bit by a car while crossing Queen's Park Crescent;

• to use the preferential balloting method in the election of four student representatives to the Commission on University Government;

• to grant $75 to all student candidates for CUG for election expenses.

HOCKEY ROUNDUP

Blues fly to Halifax this afternoon at four o'clock for games with Halifax Junior Canadians Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. Varsity won both games 5-4 and 10-4 in the two meetings last season . . . John Ritchie, a back-up quarterback with the football varsity, has been working out all week with the pucksters. Ritchie, along with Len Burman and Dave Field, all of whom did not make the trip to Montreal last week-end will play against Halifax . . . Return travel arrangements from road trips are causing all kinds of trouble for the team this year. Last Saturday night, at Loyola, the time wasted cleaning litter off the ice forced CNR officials to hold the midnight train out of Montreal for 15 minutes so Blues could make it. This week-end, Canadians insist on playing the second match of the two-game exhibition series at 3 p.m. Sunday. This means the players will not arrive back in Toronto until 2:45 a.m. Monday morning. A 2 p.m. starting time would land the team at Toronto International Airport by 8:45 Sunday evening . . . Ward Passi has regained most of his all-star form if skating drills are any indication. Ward is optimistic about his return to the lineup after suffering a torn achilles tendon. "I want to play and the leg feels good. However, the doctor still has the final say." . . . Paul Laurent is sporting two shiny black eyes — the aftermath of a cut received in the Loyola fiasco . . . Peter Adamson and Adrian Watson will split the two games this week-end in the nets. Coach

Tom Watt intends to make his final outdown on Monday and only two goaltenders from the quartet of Watson, Adamson, Tom Little and Brian Chapman will make it . . . # BOTH UNDEFEATED, QUEEN'S AND RUGGER BLUES CLASH

By MIKE KESTERTON

It's sudden death for Queen's this Saturday if the rugger blues show as much energy at Varsity Stadium as they did on the back campus last night.

Thundering around in the darkness last night, there didn't seem to be a charley horse or broken leg in the bunch.

The pressure of playing a team with an unbroken string of wins this season when you are in the same position yourself showed on the faces of the lads as they pushed for that extra burst of speed in passing formations and extra bit of force in scrums.

"What are the strengths of the Queen's team, Doug?" I asked a player.

"Winning," he replied.

"And what do you think their weaknesses will be Saturday at Varsity?"

"Playing us," he said and laughed.

Blues' lineup on Saturday:

Prop—John Rook, came to Varsity after four years of rugger at Queen's.

Prop—Larry Barron, played prop for McGill last year, OQAA wrestling champion in 1967.

Hooker — Dave Ledson, played rugger for Varsity for the past six years.

Second row—Paul Henry, received his rugger training in B.C. and playing in Toronto for the Wanderers and Varsity.

Second row—Joe Donohue, playing his third year of Varsity rugger, OQAA heavy-weight boxing champion in 1967.

Lock—Maris Apse, playing his second year for Varsity, a member of the 1967 all-Ontario team.

Wing forward—Peter Hand, played four years for Varsity. Wing forward—Richard Van Banning, learned his rugger in Rhodesia, with Varsity for past two years, replacing the injured Graeme Wynn.

Scrum half—George Wraw, played for the Middlesex trial and Toronto Wanderers before joining Blues two years ago, team captain.

Fly half—Andy Gihson, second year with Varsity, played previously with Salisbury City and Toronto Irish.

Centre—Tony Pierre, first year at centre for Toronto, previous experience at the Royalian Rugger Club in Port O' Spain, Trinidad.

Centre—Peter Sutherland, retired after three successful years with the football Blues, in his second year on the rugger squad.

Wing—Vic Harding, in his first year of rugger, he has blended into Blues' running attack with great success.

Wing—Doug Pihhs, also an ex-gridiron guru, second year with the rugger Blues.

Fullback—John Holmes, played wing last year but his sure hands and running ability prompted the switch to fullback.

Reserves—Andy Cairns, Curt McQuire.

Coach—Jim Hamilton

Blues are defending champions of the Gilbert Turner Trophy, emblematic of OQAA rugger supremacy. They wrested the title from Western last year in a thrilling struggle.

Saturday afternoon at Varsity Stadium, Blues and Queen's clash for the Turner with both teams sporting a perfect 6-0 record over the season.

The game will be televised by Channel 11 at 6:30 p.m. on Saturday in place of the usual SIFL contest.

As shown by the picture rugger is one of the most punishing, gruelling sports there is. It can also be one of the most exciting. Saturday's game promises to be all of these. Game time is 2 p.m. at Varsity Stadium. Admission free.

INTERFAC FOOTBALL

Scarborough College topped off a fairly successful season on Wednesday as they blanked UC 20-0. Quarterback George Goldsmith directed the Scarborough team to its 4th win in 6 starts as he got majors out of Nilhill, Cloutier, and Hillyard.

In Group A, St. Mike's finished with a 4-2 record as they whitewashed PHE 27-0. Flanker Pat Kielty scored 2 touchdowns for the Irish with singles going to Tim Wolfe and Mike Sefton. Quarterback Jim Poland added a field goal to round out the scoring.

Semifinal games are scheduled for next Monday at Varsity Stadium. St. Mike's plays Meds (6-0) at 12 p.m. and Vic (6-0) is matched against Dents (6-0) immediately following the 1st game. The 2 winners play in a final game next Friday.

This office has been swamped with hate letters which accuse me of being pro-SMC and anti-Vic. For the record, the Vic defense allows an average of 3 points per game and on the basis of this and other valuable information placed at my disposal I shall predict a Vic triumph of not less than 29 points and not more than 31. In the other battle, this writer is not at liberty to make any prediction as it is not in keeping with his philosophy of school spiritmanship.

Soccer final on again

The on again, off again OQAA intercollegiate soccer championship is on again and will be played Saturday afternoon on the home pitch of University of Montreal Carabins.

Montreal officials called yesterday afternoon to inform officials here in Toronto that the site of the game in outer Drapauville was covered with three feet of snow. And, since soccer is a game best played on dry land, especially when there is a championship involved, both sides agreed that the game should be cancelled or at least moved to another site. Last night, U of M bureaucrats again called Toronto, this time to let our boys know that they had decided to host the game after all.

And so, as the situation stands now, Blues will board the 4:45 p.m. Rapido for Montreal this afternoon and meet U of M in the final for the Blackwood Trophy tomorrow afternoon.

Blues have either won or shared the Blackwood for the past four seasons. In a bid to become the first team to win five in a row since Toronto turned the trick in 1945-51, head coach Ernie Glass will be looking for big efforts from sharpshooters Jim Lefkos, John Gero, and Frank Soppelsa.

Defensively, Bill Nepotiuk, Jim Kalman and goaltender Bernie D'Abreau will carry a big load against Eastern champion Carabins.

By SUE HELWIG

Starting in September of 1969, the new breed of student will be a 'generalist', a 'specialist', or a hybrid 'generalist - specialist' in the eyes of the faculty of arts and science.

The distinction will be made on the basis of kinds of courses he takes. He will follow a 'program' of five 'courses' for the first two years and will elect either to have his degree granted after three years or to be admitted to a final fourth year on the basis of standing.

The author of this plan, which requires only a vote of acceptance from the faculty council before it swings into operation, is Prof. A. D. Allen, Dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science. For the last three months, the dean has been working full-time on a series of proposals designed to implement those Macpherson recommendations that have to do with the structure of degree programs.

In a faculty with a student enrolment of 10,000 this is no easy task.

In the more progressive of the 32 departments in the faculty, the reforms have met with enthusiasm. But in conservative areas the steam has escaped in such exasperated comments as: "My wife and I have had to attend so many meetings over the last few weeks that I couldn't even tell you what courses she's teaching this year."

Perhaps the most common phrase among faculty has been, "But The Dean Says! . . ." expressed in louder-than-usual tones with fingers run through the hair for emphasis. At the beginning of September the Dean said a list of prospective courses describing what each department would offer first and second year students under the new program was to be submitted to him by October 15. This was the source of the simmerings of discontent.

The man who has managed to cause all the excitement and who obviously inspires some feelings of awe in the timid is a very distinguished chemist with a very distinguished beard.

Three years ago, working with Dr. C. V. Senoff, he achieved one of the major breakthroughs in organic chemistry in the last twenty years. (Their discovery of a nitrogen compound produced in an experiment marked the beginning of a now world-wide search to find practical means of 'fixing nitrogen'.)

"ADA's been all over the shop with this business — Austria, Israel, Japan — " but the others make their decision with an insufficient basis of information. What seems to happen at the moment is that the student tends to get locked into one type of a course or another. And the tendency then is for the honor explains Dr. Frank Bottomley, one of his present collaborators, in a characteristically English way of expressing things. "But he hasn't had very much time to spend on chemistry lately. In fact he was caught up in this dean's business just when things really started to fly."

Dean Allen

At the beginning of October, the Allen sub-committee formally presented its "recommendations for urgent action" to the faculty council.

"The pressure comes first of all from the Macpherson Report and from all the reasons behind it," Dean Allen explains. "The fact that it was created here with a great number of contributions I take as an indication of widespread support. And this I think is sufficient cause for someone in my position to begin to plan for reform."

The Macpherson Report was most critical of the relation between honor and general courses. The honor courses are equated in practice with higher demands on the student and the exclusion of general students from these courses makes them into second-class citizens, it argued.

Dean Allen echoes the feelings of the report in criticizing what he calls "the artificial limitations of the present system."

"It seems to me that the vast majority of students who arrive on this campus have an inadequate idea of the nature of the disciplines. A few of them are strongly motivated in one direction, student to receive preferential treatment."

The crucial problem in the new system, which abandons the distinction between honors and general students, will be determining which students should be admitted to a particular course. This will be critical where the number of applicants exceeds the number of places.

As Dean Allen envisages it, "The single and only valid criterion for entrance to a course should be the preparedness of the student or that the particular course suits his particular program better than other students."

In practice, he feels, those admitted will not necessarily be specialists. "They may be students who are specializing in an area that is particularly relevant. Or it may be that the student is a generalist who selected his courses so that this one fits right in with what he wants to design for himself."

The student will be free to design his own program by choice of courses under the new system. But the departments will also offer programs. These, Dean Allen stresses, will be "for the advice of students," and he hopes that a number of "generalist - specialist programs" designed to cover inter-disciplinary areas will be worked out through inter-department co-operation. (At the graduate level there are a number of formal inter-disciplinary units.)

In addition, departments should be able to offer courses at different levels of interest for students.

"There's definitely going to be a place for the less intensive and more extensive course for the student who wants to gather the outlines of a subject. And this kind of course shouldn't be and needn't be any less arduous for the student," he explains.

As students move into the higher years, the pre-requisites and co-requisites attached to courses will become more clearly defined. This means that some departments will have more difficulty in designing courses than others, according to the nature of the discipline.

"It's difficult to know where the greatest difficulty will be in practice," Dean Allen says. "In terms of planning, it would appear that the people who have what are called 'sequential disciplines' have much tighter limits placed on the freedom they imagine for students."

"For those disciplines that are less sequential, it would appear then that the program would be wide open."

One Macpherson recommendation that has not been followed is the suggestion that there should be one lecture and one tutorial (or laboratory where appropriate) in each course. This has proved to be financially unfeasible and is not universally regarded as ideal. Instead, it is hoped that a wide variety in the type of instruction will develop.

The Macpherson report suggested that a more fundamental inquiry into the concepts of general and specialist education be instituted to support any reform. This did not mean, however, that certain recommendations which were "immediately feasible" could not be put through right away.

And the report also pointed out that at this university there has never been a fundamental inquiry into the concept of general education.

Dean Allen's own ideas do not follow the Macpherson report completely on these questions. He agrees with the report that the requirements of undergraduate education have changed over the years. But he is not certain that there has to be an inquiry into the matter.

"Not many years ago," he says, "it was quite rare for a graduate program to contain normal courses. This is now a common procedure and I presume that it is a recognition that no matter how high the degree of specialization, the graduate not ready to begin independent work immediately.

"Whether it follows that one should attempt total reappraisal of the undergraduate program, I'm not sure. Such an inquiry would seem totally antiquated a few years hence. It might clarify a few ideas and this would be good if it helped the evolution towards a better program. But I think that it is very unlikely that any commission that I can imagine could come up with a definition of undergraduate education that would have any permanent significance."

With major decisions still to be made and with a host of details still to be worked out, the evolution seems to be picking up speed.

Plans are already being made to send out a 'mini-calendar' to the highschools in Ontario early in the new year. A series of explanatory sessions for principals and guidance teachers is under consideration as is a questionnaire to be sent to the present first year students asking them what they would have chosen under the new system.

With a tentative choice of courses submitted by prospective students in May or June, Dean Allen feels things will be well under control.

Since half of the first year students at present are enrolled either in general arts and science or in soc. and phil. almost half of the faculty will not be very different under the new system.

He reports that reactions at a meeting last week of all the deans of arts and science from Ontario universities ranged from enthusiasm to coolness to the amount of change that is taking place.

"It's a matter of going from something that is well tried and respected to something that has yet to prove its worth. And in such a situation it is impossible to evaluate until you've been in it for a few years."

The East is graceful, rich and humble

By ANGELA SHENG

With The Awakening Lion, a Chinese instrumental ensemble, a cultural evening organized by the Chinese Overseas Students Association, began its subtle function of integrating the mind of the Western man and that of the Orient Saturday night.

The sumptuous music and the graceful dances at once brought the audience of 700 to the country-side, the Yang-tse River, the land and the heart of China.

The difference in the concept of entertainment between the East and the West was apparent. From the emperor to the commoner, the Chinese views entertainment as another form of art.

The songs, instrumental solos and ensembles reflected the simplicity and the humble nature of the Chinese who is content with the basic necessities of life, if given rich spiritual satisfaction.

The student choir sang the cheerful "Song of a Patriot" whose lyrics were the outcries of General Yo Fei (around 1100 A.D.) expressing courage, loyalty and strong determination to relieve the people from the yoke of foreign occupation.

CAUT condemns UNB administration

MONTREAL (CUP) — The Canadian Association of University teachers yesterday condemned the University of New Brunswick for its handling of the "Strax Affair".

The teachers' association slammed the UNB administration for suspending the Nuclear physics professor "without stated charges or provisions for an adjudicative hearing."

The move came at the semi-annual conference of the CAUT council held here this weekend. The meeting was closed.

The association asserted "matters of academic freedom and tenure are best handled by arbitration within the academic community." It then offered to "assist the UNB to establish proper procedures to deal with and settle this case."

The association did not censure the UNB administration, as it did Simon Fraser last year.

The Association lifted Simon Fraser's censure Saturday following the recommendation of an investigation commission.

CAUT officials disclosed after the conference that an agreement had been reached with the Canadian Union of Students to sponsor a joint commission on academic freedom for students.

The commission, to consist of two members each of CAUT and CUS, will report on disciplinary procedures and student civil rights.

CAUT President C. Brough Macpherson said the commission was called because "if there is a real problem the lack of satisfactory policy for dealing with it obviously reduces the effectiveness of the University as a place for teaching and learning."

Dr. Macpherson, of Macpherson Report fame, is a professor of political science at U of T.

Engineers invade Sick kids

Saturday, Nov. 16 will go down in U of T history as the day our engineers pulled off their most daring raid yet.

Under the cover of daylight, in an Econovan disguised as a Christmas present, a battalion of skulemen including the Brute Force Committee, and seven assorted members of the Lady Godiva Memorial Band, invaded the Toronto Hospital for Sick Children.

Camouflaged as people in suits, ties and hard hats this assault force found little opposition in scaling the elevators. But upon reaching the 11th floor they were ambushed by a strong defence action on the part of one artsman. After some heavy hand to hand combat all opposition was suppressed and the invaders marched victorious to the recreation room on that floor.

While the L.G.M.B. carolled, gifts were distributed as planned.

"We are proud of ourselves," said one of the organizers, who identified himself as The Ghost of Christmas Present. Last week we raised $269. Out of this $150 went to buy toys and the rest went to the hospital."

"We considered infiltrating the Santa Claus Parade but that would have involved the police and since we engineers are the non-violent faction on campus — we decided against that."

tures only one engineer, although others are involved in such areas as music and production, Goodman revealed.

"Except for one guy, the entire cast is female," he added.

Goodman sent personal telegrams to his guests last week. The two refusals were received almost immediately.

"We have arranged for hotel accomodation and transportation for the others," said Goodman.

Prime Minister Pierre Elliot Trudeau was not invited, Goodman revealed.

Varsity drama critic Larry Haiven announced last night he was planning to attend the production personally.

Skule discriminates against Trudeau

Premier Alexei Kosygin and President Lyndon Johnson are expected to attend the opening night of Stop the World I Want To Get Off, produced by the U of T engineering society.

Lt. General Moshe Dayan and General Abdul Nasser are also expected.

Letters of regret were received from both Prince Philip and UN Secretary General U Thant, who say they have previous commitments.

"I'm kind of disappointed that two of them couldn't make it," the show's producer Jordan Goodman (II APSC) told The Varsity last night. "But at least we'll have four dignitaries present."

The show, which opens at Hart House on Nov. 20, fea-

The average price of wage labor is the minimum wage, i.e., that quantum of the means of subsistence which is absolutely requisite to keep the laborer in bare existence as a laborer. What, therefore, the wage laborer

students aren't drones

This morning's Globe and Mail informs us that students shouldn't march for more OSAP on Wednesday. We're supposed to be satisfied with what we've got and leave the rest of the money to the hard-pressed "proletariat", as the Globe so cutely puts it.

Newspapers have a way of doing that to make a point — use your terms to cut the ground from under you. Of course it's completely hypocritical — it was the Globe that last year sneeringly told us how simple things looked from a Marxist-Leninist viewpoint.

The Globe's talk about "proletariat" is sheer cant, linguistically pleasing but logically worthless.

As students, we are just as much a part of that proletariat as any other lower-income group and have just as much right to get our due from the "bourgeoisie" as anyone.

The fact that we join the "bourgeoisie" on graduation is a fault of the system. There is no intrinsic reason why a greater degree of education should result in higher economic rewards. If education is worthwhile, it is its own reward.

The fact is, students are conventionally regarded as drones — this is the implicit or explicit justification for keeping us at a bare subsistence level. Yet if every student quit school, couldn't get a job and went on welfare, the government would probably have to pay twice as much as it does now.

Thus we contribute in two ways — by staying out of the labor force, and by learning.

The faults in demanding OSAP while other groups are also needy are faults in the overall social and economic system, and these faults will not be corrected by waiting for the "bourgeoisie" or the "bourgeois press" to do something about the other "proletariat" groups.

One of the ways of understanding the system is confronting it and hearing its excuses for ignoring you.

"Thank you for coming in, Professor. I wanted to discuss your method of handling student unrest."

SAC should hold a CUG run-off

After a large build-up and an equally large amount of bickering over how to set up the composition of the commission on university government, we've finally reached the stage of the ballot boxes. The voting takes place a week tomorrow, but it looks like the whole election has already been blown.

Seventeen people were nominated to run for the commission. One withdrew yesterday, saying that the large slate would make rational consideration of the election impossible. It is reported that several others decided not to run for the commission when they saw the number of people running.

Obviously SAC didn't count on 17 candidates. It allotted $75 for each candidate's campaign, and that certainly adds up. And what's going to happen at 1 p.m. today when they all show up at Hart House for the first campaign meeting? They'll each get either two or three minutes to outline their positions.

The election will turn into a popularity contest, in which a handful of well-known people get elected on the basis of their names or the place they come from. Who will know what their ideas and philosophies are?

And who will respect a commission which decides the fate of the university, but gets its mandate in such a superficial, hastily planned and executed election?

Our hope is that SAC will decide to hold a preliminary run-off next Tuesday and then begin a real campaign with a slate of perhaps eight candidates for the four positions. The run-off could be along faculty, college or course lines.

In theory at least, this commission will have a massive impact on the university and the student movement. We hope the commission will be able to come up with the kind of irrefutable logic that will make it uncomfortable for the Board of Governors or Ontario government to refuse to make the aims of the university those of its students and faculty.

why, Mr. Adamson?

When the Tarheel Exchange leaves Wednesday for Chapel Hill, North Carolina, Paul Fromm will not be on the bus.

Why? We don't know.

David Adamson, co-chairman of the exchange and one of the people responsible for choosing the members, says it's because Fromm did not have the time to devote to the exchange.

He is anxious not to make a fuss about the fact that (in his words) the North Carolinians were somewhat upset" by an EBS pamphlet which Fromm mailed to Chapel Hill along with pamphlets from the Vietnam Mobilization Committee, the Committee to End the War in Vietnam, some copies of The Varsity and a number of posters.

Tell us Mr. Adamson — was this because you felt Mr. Fromm did not have enough time? Or was it a political move?

The one would be acceptable, the other would not.

residences

We've heard a lot of rumbling from the residences lately. Sir Dan, Whitney Hall, Burwash and New College residents have all told us they're dissatisfied.

They don't like the rules, the food, the lack of privacy, the dons, the in loco parentis philosophy of the residence deans.

Current dissatisfaction with the quality of living in university residences seems to indicate some drastic change is necessary in the way we're allowing ourselves to be treated.

Living on campus is not a privilege, according to university administrators. It is a right—often touted by Dr. Bissell in various academic addresses.

"Living in residence is an essential part of the University Experience," is the administrator's common cry.

But apparently for many, residence living is somewhat less than comfortable.

We know there's something wrong with residence living. We know because we hear it, every day, off the cuff. But why is it that hardly anyone wants to say anything bad about residences for publication?

Is it fear of being expelled, of losing grants and bursaries, of the wrath of the deans? Whatever it is, there will be no changes in residence conditions until all the dissatisfied people come out of their shells and start telling us, the Campbell Committee, and anyone else who'll listen just what it is that's bugging them.

And it looks like that's starting to happen

Who gets served by student aid?

By BRIAN SWITZMAN

Switzman is president of the Ontario Union of Students.

The Ontario Committee on Student Awards (OCSA) was established in May 1967. It was formed in response to the general outcry against the government's unilateral introduction of the Province of Ontario Student Awards Program (POSAP).

The committee was composed of students (less than 1-3) faculty, student awards officers, representatives of University Presidents and Government officials. It was to advise the Minister of University Affairs on improvements in POSAP and to recommend a long range strategy for ensuring universal accessibility to higher education. The Committee has been a total failure from a student viewpoint.

At the outset, the student representatives (appointed by the Ontario Union of Students) put forward the arguments that the long term solutions must be tackled immediately to establish the criteria with which we could judge the effectiveness of the existing Student Aid programs in creating universal accessibility or even "equal opportunity to education". Accordingly we pushed debate on the validity of loans, compulsory parental support, dependence status and the use of a stipend system. The debate proved to be sterile and the other members directed the work of the Committee towards debating limited changes for POSAP.

The work of a special subcommittee on POSAP proved to be most frustrating. After nearly three months of work the subcommittee was presented with the new POSAP program whereupon the committee as a whole ignored the subcommittees' recommendations and adopted the program as the government officials had drawn it up. This was the most blatant example of the manipulation of the Committee by the government.

Yet even if the Committee's cooption by the government could partly be blamed on the inadequacies of the student representatives, the structural relationship of OCSA to the overall decision-making process regarding student aid in Ontario has reduced the Committee to the status of legitimizing governmental decisions.

The provincial student awards officers meet with federal representatives to work out a number of decisions such as parental contributions, the division of federal loan revenues among the provinces, independence status etc

The provincial committee of campus student awards officers determines 'administrative' decisions such as final dates for submissions, 'legitimate' expenses etc. Most important, the Provincial Treasury Department determines how much money it is willing to spend on student aid without questioning whether that money will relate to the needs of the present or potential student body.

With all these factors as 'givens' it has become pretty obvious that OCSA was not going to be the vehicle for creating change in our present student aid program. In fact, the committee is becoming a research body which is the way of all bodies established to pacify, (when in trouble, appoint a committee and when that bogs down let it do research) Therefore, after 16 months of futility the Ontario Union of Students withdrew its representatives.

Our alternate program of action is twofold.

• Students should be made aware of the nature of the student aid program and whose interests it serves. If students are going to be able to create meaningful change they've got to know how they're being screwed

• The public at large must be informed of the truth about student aid. We must show how the government's rhetoric of 'equal opportunity' is a lie. When we have reached enough people we must formalize just demands that will prove beneficial to creating an egalitarian educational system and take direct action to insure that they are implemented. At U of T this work is now being initiated

Column and a half

By MIKE KESTERTON

You're on the palazza balcony with this jet-set Italian countess. (Oscar Wilde said that the trouble with the aristocracy is that they are all a bunch of silly counts.) Her fluted nostrils breathe the night air. The moon hangs like a red lantern in the southern sky. A flurry of wings passes overhead.

"Hey," she says, "Lookout them dum pigeons, eh?"

"Those aren't pigeons," you reply, "those are erms, or sea eagles (variant: ermes), passeriform aquatic avians."

"Huh! How 'bout them sonsabitches!"

You've done it again. Your general education, acquired from crossword puzzles, has made you the master of another situation.

When the cocktail party conversation turns to lava you know that smooth lava is called "aa", the rough lava "perchoeh."

If you find a three-toed sloth in your tree, you call him an "ai", among other things.

The hairball in a reindeer's stomach, used for a wash rag, is called a dzegze.

Many hard-up students with a facility for languages don't realize that they can get ten dollars a shot from syndicates like Dell for making up these crossword brain teasers. Librarians, watch-makers, and other people with time on their hands are able to supplement their incomes this way.

Crosswords come in standard sizes: 13 by 13 is the smallest. Working up by odd numbers, 17 by 17, 19 by 19 and 23 by 23 are popular sizes.

There are double-crostics, and other super-hard versions, but the basic form is still the most popular.

Tricks to remember in designing them are that the crossword shape should be symmetrical as possible and that it is wise to alternate vowels and consonants like the red and black squares on a checkerboard.

English has very few words ending in "a", "i" or "o", and for this reason many foreign words, archaic dialects and latin prefixes are called into play. This is sometimes infuriating, as when you have to know the Chinese word for 'temple' (Mandarin dialect) crossed with a three-letter word for 'bitter vetch' in order to complete your puzzle. Purists insist that you shouldn't use a dictionary, but until you become familiar with the special words that occur frequently in puzzles, you may be excused.

Apart from playing chess in a restaurant, there is no clearer way to demonstrate your erudition in public than by filling in a crossword on a bus or streetcar. In New York state, many commuters get up early in the morning with their Times and research the harder words in a dictionary so that they can fill in their puzzles quickly and correctly on the train.

Actually, it doesn't take much intelligence to do crosswords. Once you have become familiar with the odd words used, you can fill in a puzzle within a matter of minutes. To paraphrase Wilde, people puzzling over crosswords is usually a case of the ineducable in pursuit of the unspeakable.

Some housewives claim that the release of tension associated with successfully completing a puzzle is equivalent to sexual orgasm. Although puzzles haven't yet been mentioned in a divorce suit, the cross and worried husbands you see on t'air way to work in the mornings probably have wives who know four-letter words for everything but sex.

CUG won't bring radical change

By JOHN DOYLE

John Doyle is a graduate student in English.

What the hell is wrong with the Toronto Student Movement? Ungrateful bastards. We fought for equal faculty-student representation on the Commission on University Government, and we got it. Now the TSM is making a mockery of the Commission by running a tape-recorder as their candidate. Don't they know what they want? As a matter of fact they do. They want a new university, a place where people can think and learn what they want, not what any power structure thinks they should. And the TSM knows that CUG is not the way to get that kind of radical change.

What will really happen to the Commission? Some nice liberal students, and maybe a couple of liberal profs, will be elected. They'll recommend the abolition of the Board of Governors. The Board will prepare its own report.

God, through the Ontario Government, will dictate a compromise, and a new University of Toronto Act will be passed. The new university will be more efficient. End game.

The Commission won't do anything important because it can't. CUG means playing by the establishment's rules. When you play the game their way you lose, because they can't afford to let you win. A free university doesn't serve their aims.

The worst of it is that people may be duped into expecting big things from CUG. That's what the TSM wants to prevent by mocking the election. The revolution — the new university — will only come when there is mass student awareness of the need for radical change. It will only come when students realize they are being screwed and decide to do something about it.

Students don't have to put up with courses they don't want. They shouldn't be forced into competing for a place in the B.A. line. They shouldn't be dehumanized by thought-controlling profs. Some day the mass of students will realize this. They will demand change, and they will get it. CUG is an attempt to delay this student awareness. It won't work if we don't take it seriously.

As Norman Mailer might have put it. Fug CUG

letter — SAC's "cultural revolution"

I read with some concern in last Friday's Varsity that the U of T chorus received a $500 boost in their budget only on the humiliating condition that they write and sing songs for the upcoming OSAP protest march.

Just where the hell is this at, sir, and why? We are not in Red China. Only a few days ago I was leafing through a book published by the Peking Opera Company, full of revolutionary arias, which occasioned me a most enjoyable paroxysm of laughter. Yes, yes, I can see it now:

Down with the filthy OSAP brigades and swine

Down with the stinking capitalist self-interest of the bourgeoisie

My old man lives in a bungalow in Weston

While I live downtown in abject poverty

In a furnished room without a kitchen.

Down with my oppressors!

Down with the tyranny of the rich!

Make them live in a furnished room too

And see how it feels.

I don't care what SAC is protesting against. The use of a cultural medium to transmit a political message of any kind is to debase it, humiliate it, and destroy its ultimate purpose. This low act of coercion on the part of SAC illustrates the total ignorance and subsequent contempt of that body for any genuinely cultural endeavour on campus.

wiretapping

In the law faculty's recent conference, "Law and Freedom in a Changing Society", Metro Police Chief James Mackey claimed that as police chief he was best able to control wiretapping.

Such a unilateral, arbitrary, and undelegated assumption of power smacks of Big Brother and "police state". It is wrong, and terrifying to contemplate.

Now, James Mackey is no "fascist ogre". He is seriously concerned about the rise of Mafia-like organized crime in Toronto; and he wants the power to combat it.

Mackey has merely seized the initiative when no-one else could, or would, take it.

10.8% more

In the November 13th edition of The Varsity, the Blood Drive figure for the Faculty of Music was reported as 1.2 per cent the second lowest on campus. This would mean that 3 people gave blood. However, over 40 people actually donated thus making our figure 12 per cent, ten times higher than that reported.

Could you possibly be more accurate in future??

Marilyn Anthony
Student Services Rep.
Faculty of Music

What Mackey and others like him don't see is that totalitarianism thrives when the authorities have abundant knowledge of all the citizens of the state.

Conversely, when the police have the power to listen to any telephone conversation by any persons, and to record information from it under the pretext of fighting crime, then we are one step closer to that totalitarianism.

Mackey himself admitted that the main purpose of his wiretapping was to gain information on "criminal elements", not to use the tape for a specific court case.

We have a fine police force in this city. We trust our cops, perhaps too much.

Can we let them retain this potential destroyer of our privacy (and ultimately of our freedom) by presuming that "Chief Mackey is a wise man, he will use it correctly"?

What if Mackey's successor happens to be a power-hungry eavesdropping maniac?

Let's not be naive. Is this a government of men or of laws?

Can you imagine a society where the police have the power to enter your house arbitrarily and at will, without your consent or even your knowledge? Where you may get a knock on the door at midnight to "inspect the premises for criminal elements"?

I always thought a man's home was his castle!

And so it is. We do have a long-evolved system of judicial authority in the handling of search warrants.

The theory behind it is that a judge has the broadness of purpose and the understanding of the individual's right to privacy to deal with any limitation on that right.

Surely this theory must be applied to wiretapping and other forms of privacy invasion.

"Knowledge is power—power is temptation" says Alan Westin of Columbia University.

For my part, I don't want to give any man that temptation.

biased report

The U of T Communist Club objects to the biased reporting in Friday's Varsity of the talk we sponsored given by Jim Bridgewood. Many students have voiced the opinion that industrial workers are indifferent to the struggle for democracy on the campuses, and others have expressed concern about student ignorance of the industrial working class. The Communist Club invited Mr. Bridgewood, an auto worker and Communist labor leader, to the campus to help remedy this situation and feel that the Varsity has done a disservice to the student body by its biased reporting.

First, The Varsity says "The auto worker said the university was not important in the reform of society." What was really said, at some length and with supporting arguments, was that the student struggles are important both in themselves and as part of the broader Canadian struggle against oppression and want, but that the industrial workers would have to be the dominant force in a transition to socialism, since they have potential control of the means of production.

Second, The Varsity says "As to whether workers would actually go out on the picket lines for students," the speaker acknowledged he 'couldn't promise' any significant support for a campus movement." What was said, emphatically and clearly, was that Mr. Bridgewood could not himself promise labor support for any student action that may occur, but that many such supporting actions have already taken place (and he listed them) and that labor leaders, especially in the local unions, would welcome requests from students in the future (and he outlined how to go about making contacts with them).

Third, the article includes several words and phrases, taken out of context, which make Mr. Bridgewood's talk appear an emotional harangue, when in fact it was carefully argued with much documented supporting material, none of which was included or even mentioned in The Varsity article.

Varsity "unjust"

The Varsity editorial of Nov. 13, 1968 states that "the war in Vietnam is patently not a just war." Please allow me to disagree as follows. Ho Chi Minh hails the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia as a "noble deed." Prince Sihanouk says that if the U.S. pulled out of South Vietnam his country would be taken over by Communist armies. Is there any reason to doubt that the U.S. is forestalling all sorts of such "noble deeds" all over Southeast Asia? Your writer was never in chains so he takes his freedom for granted and is quite willing to consign all of Southeast Asia to Communism. For all kinds of honorable and dishonorable reasons the U.S. government is unwilling to let the Communists put the people of Southeast Asia into their prison. Similarly, for all kinds of honorable and dishonorable reasons, the Nazi takeover of Europe was resisted. If your writer had been present he no doubt would have seen Churchill as the reactionary that he was, and therefore condemned his war against Hitler as "unjust".

I say it was Varsity that was unjust, in this editorial.

TV has a future: Templeton

By MARY POWELL

"What sort of a future does television have?", mused Charles Templeton, familiar to all CTV-viewers, in a talk on Broadcasting Media Wednesday night in the red-carpeted Hart House library.

He sat back comfortably as he spoke. A glowing fire crackled behind him. The warmth of his mellow voice drew in the informal gathering of 25 attentive listeners.

"The impression of T.V. on our society is profound beyond our knowledge. The educational factor of T.V. is a fantastic and yet unmeasured property," he said.

When someone claimed T.V. could have a harmful effect on children, Templeton replied he agreed the networks seriously neglected children's programmes.

"However, children seem to have a sieve in their heads that has an amazing capacity to sort the important from the junk. We have not yet begun to see what the T. V. generation is, for we have only had T.V. for the last ten years."

Templeton stressed he was not going to pose as the "blanket defender" of T.V. "Much on the network is very bad. The amount of crud on T.V. reflects the society that demands it in such large numbers."

Charles Templeton

News and public affairs are Templeton's forte. With some pride he stated "Canada leads the U.S. in the field of public affairs. They are just beginning some things we did seven or eight years ago."

"If I were told that I could not go ahead with something because it would be treading on the toes of someone higher up, I would quit my job tomorrow. I insist on the right to be wrong for myself.

"And you can quote me on that," he added.

Templeton revealed that he believed he would air the controversial film 'Warrendale' if given the choice.

Before concluding Templeton predicted that "within ten years there will be a worldwide T.V. network and we will also have playback T.V. at our finger-tips."

Canadian College Bowl

This Friday, Nov. 22, the Canadian College Bowl tries again to win friends and influence people.

Plagued since its inception in 1965 with high admission prices and choices of unpopular teams the College Bowl reversed this trend last year with low ticket prices and two well-matched teams.

This year the good trend continues and the game starts at 8:30 p.m.

With Queens and Waterloo playing, the turnout is expected to be just under fabulous.

Tickets are $1.50 at the SAC office.

The council of the faculty of arts and science meets today at 4:15 p.m. in Convocation Hall for further discussion on the Macpherson Report. The meeting is open to all students.

Mexican govt. meets demand

MEXICO CITY (UPI) — The Mexican Government moved still closer to a rapprochement with striking students when the Mayor of Mexico City, Alonzo Corona Del Rosa, promised students representation on a police review commission.

He said the commission would study proposals for restructuring the police force and limiting its authority. The commission would be composed of teachers, government officials, students and businessmen.

This was one of the demands made by students in their four-month old strike. On Wednesday, the government released 35 students jailed during the various clashes between police and strikers. The students have demanded the release of hundreds of their colleagues arrested since July.

“Where else can you achieve so much so quickly?”

Gord Clements of Vancouver, a 23-year-old student at the University of British Columbia, had been thinking of joining a stock brokerage firm on graduation — until he met a marketing executive from London Life. That was a couple of years ago. Today he's a successful London Life representative — and a man who is convinced that no other field can offer so much to the college graduate. Read why.

At first, Gord thought the life insurance business had more than its share of hang-ups. As he put it: “I thought a life insurance salesman was a plodder, a man who pounded on doors day and night. And I thought everyone had insurance anyway, so there was really no market for the product.”

But Gord had an open mind. He was curious. So he talked with a couple of his professors, who cleared away many of his misconceptions. “They helped me realize that selling insurance takes technical knowledge and skill in influencing people. Plus imagination and creativity, because you're working with an intangible product,” says Gord. “They also pointed out that insurance offers real opportunity, a great deal of responsibility, and even the chance to name your own income.”

Gord still had doubts. But life insurance now held some appeal for him.

VIGOROUS COURSE

After an aptitude test, and a series of interviews at Vancouver and the company's head office in London, Ontario, Gord was invited to join the London Life team. On graduating from university in 1967, he began a 21-month training and development program. During the first three months he was at London, where he was given a thorough training in professional salesmanship, and a background knowledge about such subjects as the uses of insurance, financial planning, business insurance, taxation and group insurance.

(From his first day with London Life, the college graduate receives an assured income plus the opportunity for additional earnings.)

UNLIMITED POTENTIAL

“By the time I completed the course, and returned to Vancouver to work with a regional manager, I realized that the life insurance market is unlimited, and therefore unique. That's because insurance is the only product everyone needs. And most people need more than they own.”

(Early in his career, the life insurance salesman is given a significant job with a great deal of responsibility. His work has a beneficial im- ... pact on the lives of his policyowners, and a direct effect on his own success and on the success of his company. In many other industries, a man might have to wait five or ten years for opportunities and responsibilities as meaningful.)

“I found out, too, that most people buy insurance many times during their lives, and for a variety of reasons. That's because insurance has so many uses. People who already own insurance, therefore, are willing to buy more as their needs increase. Because the market is so broad, you can build your own clientele, and you can do it by picking people with whom you want to do business.”

(More than any other people, Canadians appreciate the value of life insurance, because they buy more. And Canadians own more life insurance with London Life than with any other company.)

EARLY INDEPENDENCE

“Apart from what insurance can do for the public, I know what it has done for me. Like most students, I was in debt when I graduated. My only asset was a commerce degree. Today, most of my debts have been paid off and I am beginning to accumulate some fairly substantial assets. Frankly, I can't think of another field in which you can achieve so much so quickly. Insurance is the job for the young man who wants real opportunity, who wants to get into business for himself, and who even wants to name his own income and achieve financial independence at a relatively early age.”

(At London Life, you have the opportunity to grow. Plus the freedom and help to develop your own skills, knowledge and income at the pace you choose. Nobody holds you back. There is no limit to what you can accomplish. If you wish, you can build your entire career in sales — or, if you prefer, you can move up to management.)

To learn more about London Life, ask your placement officer for the booklet “A Career for You with London Life.” Or arrange an interview with a London Life representative.

Interviews will be held on campus November 21

Shinny squad stumps Halifax twice

Varsity hockey Blues' second exhibition road trip of the season ended as an unqualified success when they swept two games from Halifax Junior Canadians 6-3 and 3-2.

Blues also took both games when they played a similar pre-season series last year. Canadians will compete in the Montreal Metro Junior 'A' League this season.

John Wright was the pace-setter in the first game when he scored two third-period goals including the winner. Brian St. John, Len Burman, John Ritchie and Brian Tompson had the other markers in a penalty-riddled affair.

Tompson was removed to hospital for observation and ten stitches when he was slashed in the face moments after he scored a goal with Varsity short-handed in the third period.

In the Sunday matinee, Burman counted the winner at 16:19 of the third frame after taking passes from Bill L'Heureux and Wright. L'Heureux also set up rookie Brent Swanick for the tying goal when Blues had a man in the penalty box.

John Gordon combined with defenceman Dave Field to give Varsity a 1-0 lead early in the game.

Coach Tom Watt will make his final cuts following tonight's practice. If play on the week-end is any indication, Watt is in for a dandy floor-walking session.

The six or seven players fighting for the final three spots on the club have all showed well in the four exhibition matches to date. And, to make things tougher, Watt plans to keep only two of the four netminders in currently in camp. There hasn't been much to choose among their efforts so far either. Each goaler has played one full game.

NOTES... Wingers Steve Monteith and Gord Cunningham both missed the Halifax trip because of academic commitments... The attendance for the two week-end games was only 4000 all together. Last year more than 8000 turned out to see Blues play... Blues' next games are with Clarkson Institute of Technology and St. Laurence University in Clarkson and Potsdam.

WATER POLO

Mac 7, Blues 6

The Varsity waterpolo squad lost its first game in five years Saturday as it dropped a tight 7-6 decision to McMaster in Hamilton.

The ecstatic victors used "Angelo Mosca" tactics throughout the 40 minutes to give Blues a black and blue tattoo by the end of the game.

The vastness of the beautiful McMaster aquadome proved deceptive to Varsity's shooters. Dave Breach's parabolic loop-di-loops consistently fell short of the goal and Chris McNaught's linear whizz-bangs kept whizzing above the crossbar.

Mac proved effective in using the larger pool area by outswimming Varsity and containing Blues in their own end.

Ross Freeman, in particular, noted the difference in the Mac pool. One of his better tricks is to sink below his check and torpedo off the bottom of the pool. However, as the pool was equipped with two springboards and three diving towers, Freeman remarked after re-surfacing late in the third quarter that maybe the pool was a little deeper than Hart House.

Some players did manage to shine in defeat, notably defenceman Skip Bergman and goalie Brian Barnes. Each endured the entire game. Barnes, who improves with every outing, continued to use his head for many brilliant saves.

Don Carr, previously known only for his screaming, grunting and arm-waving, tallied two goals and along with John Archibald managed to tie up Marauders' attack for the two quarters they played together.

Chris McNaught with three goals and Freeman with one accounted for the other Varsity markers.

Gaels vs Lutheran in College Bowl

The Canadian College Bowl, at long last, seems to rest on firm footing.

The Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union has officially designated it to decide the college football championship of Canada, and every intercollegiate league in the country has seen fit to consider themselves eligible for the first time.

The game takes place Friday night, November 22, at Varsity Stadium, with Queen's Golden Gaels and Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks clashing for the Vanier Cup. These two teams advanced to the final with thumping victories Saturday in a pair of semi-final bowl games.

Gaels whipped University of Manitoba Bisons 29-6 in the Western College Bowl at Winnipeg while Lutheran thrashed St. Mary's University Huskies 37-7 in the Atlantic Bowl game at Halifax.

Before a good crowd of 10,000, Queen's had little trouble with Bisons who were never really in the game. Fullback Heino Lilles, scored two fourth quarter touchdowns for Gaels with halfback Keith Eaman and flanker Tom Chown getting the others. Doug Cozac kicked two converts and two singles to augment a single from punter Jim McKeen. Bisons lone touchdown came in the second quarter when Dennis Hrycaiko returned a punt 105 yards.

Waterloo rolled at will over St. Mary's, scoring six touchdowns, all by different players.

The presence of two universities in the College Bowl within driving distance of Toronto could produce its largest crowd yet.

Queen's has asked for 6,000 tickets alone, and Waterloo will probably sell at least two or three thousand.

University of Toronto students can purchase tickets for the game at the SAC office for a scant $1.50. It's a good buy.

RUGGER SIDE ROCKS GAELS TO RETAIN TURNER CUP

Captain George Wraw bulls his way over the goalline for a tough try in the rugger Blues' 11-8 victory over Queen's on Saturday. Wraw was Blues' big gun, accounting for eight of their 11 points. Wraw's try came after a scrum which you can just see breaking up on the extreme right.

Before a shivering but thoroughly loyal crowd of supporters at Varsity Stadium, Varsity rugger Blues retained the Gilbert Turner Trophy with a solid 11-8 victory over Queen's Golden Gaels. The Turner Trophy is awarded annually to the rugger champions of the Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association.

Each team was undefeated going into the game, Blues winning the western division of the OQAA while Queen's lost at least in the east.

Gaels put on a gritty display against their more polished opponents who excelled when passing the ball and in the scrums. While it is true to say that Blues controlled play most of the game, Queen's managed to hang tough and came extremely close to pulling out a victory with only a few minutes left. But a gallant goalline stand by Blues threw back Queen's last ditch attempt and play remained at midfield until time ran out.

The game was played on a greasy pitch which kept wide-open play to a minimum. A bitterly cold wind added to the discomfort of the players.

Varsity jumped into a 5-0 lead on a try by Doug Phibbs who burst into the end zone and kept right on running until he touched down right behind the posts. Captain George Wraw, a standout all day, sidewheeled the ball through the uprights for the two point conversion.

Queen's struck back when their captain, Ron Eastel, was successful on a penalty kick, making the score 5-3.

The final scoring play of the half was a dogged try by Wraw (see picture) who crashed over following a scrum close to the Queen's line. Tony Pierre attempted the convert but he was wide, leaving the score at the half, 8-3 for Varsity.

It appeared only a matter of time before Blues would start running up the score, especially when Wraw upped their lead to 11-3 with a penalty kick shortly after the second half began.

But an injury to Peter Hand after he smashed a Gaels' ball-carrier out of bounds served to invigorate Queen's and dishearten Blues. "In true cold-blooded rugger style, the referee came over for a quick look at the prostrate Hand, and quoth laconically, "All right, let's get on with it." Play went on immediately only a few yards from where he lay.

After threatening for a long time, Queen's Chip Drury finally beat Blues for a try and when Eastel converted the score was suddenly 11-8; no easy romp was in store. Queen's began to threaten once again.

Then, to the astonishment of all, Hand trotted from the dressing room out onto field while play was halted momentarily to carry a Gaels' player off. Blues took heart from there and the game ran its toll.

Blues take Blackwood

MONTREAL — University of Montreal Carabins gambled and lost. As a direct result, Varsity soccer Blues whipped Carabins 12-1 to take the OQAA championship and the Blackwood Trophy for the fifth straight season.

Carabins decided last Thursday that their home field, which had been covered with some three feet of snow, was in no condition for the East-West playoff. Had this decision stood, it is likely that the game would have been cancelled and Carabins and Blues declared joint champions.

However, U of M officials changed their minds at the last moment, cleared the playing surface of all but six inches of the icy white stuff, painted field markings on the snow (in Blue no less) and the show went on.

Carabins opened the scoring early on a goal by Jay Dausin but from then on it was all blue and white and blue and white etc. Varsity ran the count to 6-1 by half time and from that point it was just a question of avoiding injuries and getting the game over with. Jim Lefkos playing his last game with Varsity, put on quite a show for the 100 odd fans that braved the weather. Scheduled to graduate from Phys-Ed. this spring, big Jim booted in six goals in one of his finest efforts in four seasons as a Blue.

Lefkos is toying with the idea of becoming a professional soccer player next year. If there were any scouts in attendance Saturday afternoon, he won't have to go begging for a contract.

Another veteran of intercollegiate competition, Frank Soppelsa found the grubby climate to his liking. Soppelsa scored three times for his biggest output of the year.

Miles Sosa with two tallies and Graham Shiels with one rounded out the Varsity total to an even dozen.

Blues victory makes them the first team, since the Varsity sides of 1945-51 won six straight titles, to dominate intercollegiate soccer so completely.

AND IN THIS CORNER, FROM ST. MICHAEL'S COLLEGE...

By BRIAN JOHNSON

There's a little man who goes around in a black leather jacket who comes from Bogota Colombia, and there's a big man who comes from Italy and dresses normally and follows the little man around to set things straight.

SAC President Steve Langdon usually gets caught in the middle and tries to pacify the two with smooth hand gestures.

The little guy is F. Paul Fromm (the 'F' stands for Fred) of the Edmund Burke Society and the big guy is Alberto Di Giovanni of the anti-Edmund Burke Society.

The only things these two men have in common are that both are SAC members from St. Michael's College and both disagree with each other constantly.

I asked Fromm what the difference was between himself and George Wallace.

"I don't like ketchup on my food, and I'm not a lawyer, and I'm not a Democrat," he said. "I think George Wallace has been underestimated. He's a figure to keep watching. If Nixon doesn't solve the problems of the United States, I think 1972 will see a George Wallace victory."

Di Giovanni said he was a believer in democracy and socialism.

"All this talk about democracy and democratization is just so much hogwash," replied Fromm. He cited the SAC's refusal to accept the Graduate Students' Union withdrawal as an example.

"If one section of a university pulls out, others will pull out," said Alberto. "This is not an achievement of democracy. This is an achievement of irresponsibility."

When I mentioned violent confrontation to them, each accused the other of being guilty and himself innocent of it.

"Violence on campus is reprehensible any time, any place, anywhere," said Fromm.

"He talks about non-violence," said Alberto, "but his group caused violence at the consulate demonstrations. Look at what pulpit the speech is coming from."

"Well for a fellow who's called himself both a good Christian and a good revolutionary, I find this sort of calling the kettle black rather amusing," replied Fromm.

When Alberto asked him to name the leftists who are advocating violence, Fromm accused him of living in "a communications vacuum" and then named Andy Wernick (SGS) and Bob Rac (IV UC) as advocates of violence.

After about 20 minutes, I managed to get Fromm and Di Giovanni off the subject of violence and asked Fromm about the Commission on University Government. Fromm is a CUG nominee.

"I'm running on a campaign of approach rather than final ends," he said. "I've been one of the few people who's refused to go along with little Stevie Wonder (Langdon) on all his little plans and schemes for the good of utopia in the university."

"We're not in any position to change the Board of Governors or even eliminate it," he said. "It's a fact of life."

"I think Paul Fromm really knows what he's going to do there," said Alberto. "And that's why I see in Mr. Fromm the most dangerous man on this campus. He has a very definite kind of philosophy — represented by a very small minority on this campus like the EBS. But he's afraid and ashamed to present what his philosophy really is. You see him becoming all at once a liberal to win an election."

"I would say I'm an across-the-board conservative," Fromm replied when I asked him for his political philosophy. "Unlike the left, I don't have to drag international politics or conspiratorial theory of imperialism into everything I say."

Alberto always looks so exasperated when he's confronted with Fromm. He's a non-political idealist who says he's devoted to helping his fellow man, and when he listens to Fromm's 'straight talk', he just wants to call him a liar. And sometimes he does.

For instance, Fromm got $100 from SAC and $100 from the SMC student council to sponsor an EBS forum featuring William Buckley and David Lewis. William Buckley and David Lewis did not arrive. The EBS spent the $200 on the forum anyway.

That's the type of thing that gets Alberto mad at Paul.

It was difficult, but I tried to get the antagonists away from the issues and started asking some what - are - you - really - like questions.

"I'm a fanatical movie-goer," said Fromm. "I like just about all types of movies except musicals. I love westerns, who-dunnits, comedies, and comic spy movies like James Bond, Matt Helm, and Tony Rome."

Alberto joked that Paul must like violence. I met Alberto at Polanski's Repulsion once. It's one of the most sordid and horrifying films I have ever seen. And he laughed all the way through it. He has a wonderful sense of humour.

Despite Alberto's boisterous laughter and his slight problem with the English language, he's no fool. He's acted on stage for several years and is now producing a play in Italian. He's been active in the NDP and might run for alderman in the next election.

"Political opportunity to me is not an end," he said, "but an opportunity to serve people. I might teach or go into social work. I like to help people and get involved in community projects. There's a need for social work in the Italian community. One thing I don't want to do is go into business."

Fromm said he would like to write a book when he graduates — "Inside the Student Movement."

Bof G main election issue for CUG

By TREVOR SPURR

Candidates for the four student seats on the Commission on University Government kicked off their campaigns Monday with three-minute speeches in the Hart House Debates Room.

"The task that faces all of us is so awesome," said A. Gary Webster (SGS) in referring to the job of the commission, but many of the 50 students in the audience must have felt he was referring to the problem of selecting four members from the slate of 16 candidates.

The Board of Governors came in for constant criticism by the candidates during their brief speeches.

"In the Board of Governors there lies a potential veto over the future of the university. It doesn't serve the interests of the community or the university," said Webster.

"The Board of Governors must go," said Bob Rae (IV UC).

In contrast Ron Thompson (SGS) said too much attention was paid to the Board.

"Most of the money for this university comes from the legislature," he said.

"The main solution is to set up some sort of structure to deal with the Department of University Affairs," he added.

"The university is owned by the taxpayers and the Board of Governors should be responsible to the electorate," said Paul Ves (I UC).

"There is no purpose in student and staff councils and there is no purpose in course unions on this campus," he added.

Several candidates proposed greater staff-student cooperation.

"This committee represents student opinion as one of two factions — faculty and students. Both factions must share equally in the governing of the university," said William Rocket (SGS).

"The administration should be constituted more equally of faculty and students and between them they will control the governing of the university," proposed D'Arcy Martin (III New).

"There should be openness in terms of all decision-making and equality of staff and students," said Rae.

The last candidate to speak was Twitchy, the tape recorder, presented by his campaign manager Andy Wernick (SGS), who has no faith in CUG.

"I'm a bit mechanical but so are all the other tape recorders running in this election," she said.

The election takes place Nov. 26. There will be a preferential voting system whereby a voter will choose four candidates in order of preference. At least one of the successful candidates must come from the School of Graduate Studies.

Sig Sam delivers ultimatum will staff please return books

By ERROL YOUNG

The Sigmund Samuel Library has issued a quiet ultimatum to the faculty on campus, asking them to please speed up their rate of returning books.

Until last year faculty members were allowed to keep books as long as they wanted. Then a three-month limit on loans was introduced. After the faculty became accustomed to that — "We did have problems at first," says Chief Librarian R. H. Blackburn — the limit was reduced to two months.

Faculty members may still renew their books for an additional two months before recall notices are sent out.

Unlike students, faculty are not subject to fines on overdue books, nor will fines be imposed in the future.

"If we can't collect the books from them" says Blackburn, "How will we collect the fines?"

A statement issued this week to faculty notes that "a substantial number of faculty members give limited attention to recall notices."

From now on, the library council executive has recommended copies of second and third recall notices be sent to the relevant Deans or Department heads, asking them to help get books back to the library. This will apply for material borrowed since the beginning of last month.

Students will continue to pay fines by the hour on overdue books.

WRITE TO BISSELL TODAY!

There is a real danger that the Board of Governors may stall on the graduate student application for withdrawal from the Students' Administrative Council at its meeting on November 28.

Section 34(3) of the University of Toronto Act (1947) guarantees each student the right of direct access to the President, and via the President to the Board, on matters "he is or may deem himself to be entitled to complain".

Please do not let the Administrators foil a democratically taken student decision. Write to Bissell today! If necessary, ask for an interview!

President C. Bissell,
Simcoe Hall,
University of Toronto,
Toronto 5. November 20, 1968

Dear President Bissell,

I would like to express to you my support for graduate student withdrawal from the Students' Administrative Council.

For the cause of campus democracy, I recommend that the Board of Governors accept the overwhelming mandate for withdrawal granted by the graduate students.

Please inform me of your opinions and your immediate policy on this matter.

Yours truly,

Osmond Solandt:

By PHIL RESNICK

Phil Resnick is a graduate student majoring in political economy. His specialty is the history of Canadian defence commitments.

On Nov. 21st, at 8:15 P.M., Chancellor O. M. Solandt will be awarding diplomas at fall convocation. Who is O. M. Solandt, and on what basis did he become Chancellor of this University?

Dr. Solandt had his original training in medicine, but from an early date he was attracted to the corridors of power. During the Second World War, while in England, he rose through various posts in medical research to become special scientific adviser to Lord Mountbatten's South East Asia Command, and was a member of the Joint Military Mission sent to Japan to evaluate the effects of the atomic bomb.

It was natural that the Canadian Government turned to O. M. Solandt at the war's end, when it was looking for some one to head up Canada's defence research. Solandt set himself the task of empire-building, and in 1947 succeeded in gaining the establishment of an independent agency, the Defence Research Board, of which he became the first head. To be sure, defence research as Dr. Solandt and the Canadian military envisaged it could not be pursued independently, but would involve close cooperation with Britain and the United States.

Solandt was instrumental in bringing about tripartite arrangements in defence research, one of the first steps in Canada's subordination to American policy. Canadian facilities, such as the testing range at Suffield, were thrown open to the United States, while Canada adopted a continental strategy in defence.

DEFENSE RESEARCH BOARD

Solandt, moreover, adopted a policy of involving the universities in the work of the DRB. Generous scholarships were offered to graduate schools; conferences were organized under DRB auspices, at which scientists in every field gathered together; grants were used to direct research work in the universities. Every attempt was made to minimize the difference between military and civilian research.

In 1956, having finished his stint in the higher echelons of the Ottawa mandarin, Solandt retired to the more lucrative world of business.

PAGE FOUR

U of T has an enviable reputation for its honors program. So it's natural that a great deal of energy and money go into the honors courses, at the expense of general students. So far this has been taken for granted.

But now all that is supposed to change. Macpherson recommended ## a (disguised) step backwards

abolishing the honors-general distinction, and the Arts and Science Faculty Council agreed. Now some faculty people are apparently having second thoughts.

There were two signs of this at Monday's Faculty Council meeting. One was above-the-board, a request for more evidence that "academic excellence" won't suffer under the new order. The other was a motion by Professor J. B. Conacher which would let departments restrict enrollment in seminar courses to "specialist" students. Which sounds like a new honors program.

Professor Conacher is sincerely interested in the quality of education at U of T. He says he wants a better deal for general students too. So why give the "specialists" preference? Why give them the best courses?

You can't run seminars for everyone, they tell us; we haven't got the men and money. But that doesn't mean the criterion for admission to seminars should be based on the specialist-generalist distinction. Why not diversity of background, say, or degree of interest?

Perhaps professors are more worried about their own reputations than the quality of education. After all, if U of T honors courses are distinguished, and you teach one; then that makes you distinguished, doesn't it?

The point of abolishing the honors-general distinction was to encourage departments to upgrade the standards of all their courses. If they could build such a fine reputation for the honors program, surely they could do it for the whole school. But Professor Conacher's motion ensures that nothing will change.

Maybe it would be better if the generalists went to Erindale. They could take their courses on closed-circuit TV, or follow the CBC School Broadcasts. And they wouldn't have to worry their feeble brains about academic excellence.

not enough

The Ontario government says that it has increased its Ontario Student Awards Plan money more than the increase in university enrollment. The tighter borrowing regulations, they claim, make the distribution of money more "equitable".

Judge for yourself if the program is adequate. Ask a friend (about 40 per cent of U of T students are on OSAP) if he's getting enough to live on, and if he got more than last year. Chances are he got less under the new "equitable" system.

With summer jobs harder to get, more and more people are going to get bounced out of university under the new plan, and others won't be getting enough.

No matter how much the government is spending, it obviously isn't sufficient. And that's why the march has been called — to say the program isn't good enough.

invisible "chains"

The Vietnam war continues — indeed, it may go on forever — thanks to thinking like that of Prof. Malcolm Bersohn (see letters, Nov. 18).

Referring to a comment that the American war in Vietnam was an unjust war, Prof. Bersohn remarked that: "Your writer was never in chains so he takes his freedom for granted and is quite willing to consign all of Southeast Asia to Communism."

If Communism as practiced in Southeast Asia is chains, you'd have a lot of trouble convincing the Vietnamese. The North Vietnamese and Viet Cong don't fight like people in chains.

They don't need 500,000 and more Chinese troops to sustain their battle for "freedom". They don't have a government so corrupt that it was overthrown and now has to be supported by the Americans.

Comparing the Asian Communists with the Nazis just doesn't work. The situations are different, and Ho Chi Mihn and Mao Tse Tung are not Adolf Hitlers. For proof, read some of Mein Kampf and compare it with the works of Mao.

Asian politics and economics are different from those of Europe. These people have seen capitalism in its role of exploiter and have rejected it. The Asian peasant has never known freedom. Indeed, many have labored under a feudalistic landowner system similar to that of capitalism, without the pretense of democracy.

Finally, the U.S. is almost the last country to hold up as a model of democracy. The last election was a mockery, and the American refugees to Canada have a few things to say about the U.S.'s highly touted "freedoms".

Finally, a recent Associated Press article noted with veiled surprise that the National Liberation Front were holding democratic elections in the towns they hold. We'll probably be hearing more stories like that, along with stories about South Vietnamese, imprisoned for speaking out against the kind of "freedom" the United States is imposing.

The whole Vietnamese war boils down to another Crusade by the west against the east. Like the earlier Crusades, it is one part blind faith and ignorance, and three parts economic. This kind of war should have gone out with the middle ages.

"classic manipulator"

First as Vice-President in charge of research with the CNR, then as Vice-President of de Havilland, he put his manipulative skills to work in the market place. During his years at de Havilland, 1961-5, the firm was involved in placing 160 of its Caribous in the field with the American military in Vietnam. Solandt's experience with both the Canadian and American military bureaucracies no doubt served it in good stead.

FOR LOYAL SERVICE

In 1966, on the basis of his loyal service to both military and corporate elites, he received a new appointment, Chancellor of U of T. It was only logical now that the university had become big business, now that skills required to service both corporations and government were in greater demand, that this veteran of two elites was appointed to an ideological post of the first importance — brain washing the young.

Solandt also continues to wear his old caps. He continues to act as godfather to the DRB, suggesting Canadian leadership on research into trititious warfare. He is Vice-President of Electric Reduction Ltd., a large chemical firm, convicted of air pollution. He is associated with MITRE, a research group at MIT, involved in military work.

O. M. Solandt is a symbol of everything that is wrong with this country, everything the university should not be. He is the epitome of the continentalist who sold Canada down the river to the United States in the 1940's. He is the classic manipulator moving between military and corporate posts, between elite positions in government and industry. He views the university as a servicing agent for the powers that are, for the Canadian elites who have run Canadian society in their own interests for over a century.

O. M. Solandt has no right to be Chancellor of this University. His vision of the university, like his vision of Canada, leaves no room for radical democracy from below, the critical university, which is the signpost of this generation. He is a remnant of the Mackenzie King era, an old illiberal elitist masquerading as a liberal. To protest Solandt is to protest the liberal capitalist establishment that runs this university and this country.

contradictions in the superstructure: or why feelies are progressive and reactionary, at the same time — a poem (?)

Sometimes, when the morning glare still hangs like an incubus on a late afternoon, and I shamble down a grey street brushing past strange faces, I long for the old subjectivity. The tyranny of unbalance and jobs undone and books unread and dreams undreamt and feelings unfelt and an old longing returns: not for absorption into higher and higher unities, but for solitude and silence. But sensitivity is a privilege and besides, to make it possible, it must almost be denied. The ego's downward spiral into itself, where fantastic shapes burden the imagination, and intensity dims the vision, culminates in void not wonderland. And yet culture must precede politics, just as decadence precedes death: for otherwise, who will understand?

But even decadence seems to be impossible in the great desert of Ontario.

Honors program abolished, "best features" kept

By JOHN DOYLE

The honors program in arts and science is officially dead, but its passing is still being mourned by some faculty members.

At Monday's meeting of the arts and science faculty council, motions were passed to retain what were called "the best features" of the old honors system. Some council members charged that the motions were an attempt to retain the old program in disguise.

Following the Macpherson Report recommendation, the honors - general system will be abolished next year. The only distinction will be between general students and specialists.

But a number of speakers at Monday's meeting suggested that U of T's world reputation is based on the quality of its honors program. The Council voted 55-45 to set up a fact-finding committee to determine whether "the excellence of the best undergraduates" would be adversely affected by abolishing the honors program. The system could be re-introduced after the committee's findings are published.

History Prof. J. B. Conacher introduced a motion to allow departments to restrict enrollment in certain courses to those with the best qualifications.

He explained this would refer not only to pre-requisites but also to the specialist - generalist distinction. If a specialist and a generalist applied for a seminar course, and both were qualified, preference would be given to the specialist, Prof. Conacher said.

The motion was attacked by student Doug Webster (IV UC), who claimed it was an attempt to retain the honors - general distinction. Professor Conacher said there was nothing wrong with the honors program, and he wanted to safeguard its best features.

He was concerned there be a "meaningful" specialist program.

The motion passed by a large majority.

Ottawa students strike

OTTAWA (CUP) — Social science students at the University of Ottawa have voted overwhelmingly to occupy their faculty until they win parity in departmental decision-making.

The vote, representing 75 per cent of the students in the faculty, went 239-74 in favor of occupation. Within a half hour, an occupying force of 60 had moved in to spend the night.

The students say they will remain in the school until their demands are met. Students will be free to enter the classrooms, but teachers will first be required to sign a pledge honoring student demands.

The conflict stems from a month-long series of negotia-

Up and down from the left, are the six candidates for the commission on university government who turned up for a forum of Devonshire House last night — Bill Rockett (SGS), Ron Thompson (SGS), Steve Groat (II Vic), Gory Webster (SGS), Roger Smith (II Trin), Bob Rae (IV UC). Candidates failing to show up of the forum were — Paul Veso (I UC), Don Young (II UC), Douglas Lord (II Law), Dore Martin (II New), Paul Fromm (III SMC), and with The Varsity a Devonshire last night.

OSAP is inadequate: SAC brief

The march demanding improvements in the Ontario Student Awards Program will go on today at 1 p.m. despite efforts by the Ontario government to forestall it. (see Queen's Park).

The Students Administration Council brief on OSAP notes that "in a democratic society, it has been maintained that all citizens have the right to be educated to the full extent of their ability."

The brief adds: "Since employment in an advanced technological society is based on educational requirements, and since education serves to keep people out of the labor market, educated people necessarily serve the present economic system."

The brief criticizes the tighter OSAP regulations, including the provision that "all unmarried students who have not completed four years of post-secondary education or have not worked for 12 consecutive months prior to enrolment receive parental support."

Parents are thus doubly taxed, the brief says, and many cannot afford to pay their children's education costs.

"With a shrug, the Government fails to consider the very real problems faced by countless students who have no influence over their par-tents' decisions not to finance their education."

Education should not be a right bestowed only on those who are assisted by their parents, the brief says.

The brief also urges a reform of primary and secondary schools which perpetuate geographical and social barriers between various groups.

"But reform throughout the educational system is only part of what is required. Until the whole question of poverty is tackled by a comprehensive government policy, poverty will continue to perpetuate itself.

"Slum housing, low motivation and inadequate medical services for the poor all contribute to the inability of all but the exceptional child to benefit from what we hope will be an improved educational system.

"This is why the question of access to post-secondary education must be solved by more than improved student aid and education policies."

Queen's Park replies

The Department of University Affairs Tuesday released a detailed set of answers to student grievances concerning the Ontario Student Awards Program.

The statement reported total loans, grants and fellowships of $8,991,030 for 1967-68.

In a step - by - step response to the grievances the Department replied:

- That while free education is desirable more facts should be gathered through a series of objective studies before any action is taken. The department estimated free education would presently cost the province $50,000,000 annually.

- that although students who genuinely accept the burden of self-support, a form allowing students to sign away independence might result in abuse and unnecessary spending of public funds.

- that for the same reason the present system of estimating student summer savings is at present the most equitable.

- that the form should and has been revised.

- that commuting students be given greater consideration and will be.

- that a different system of dividing loans and grants be devised.

UNB administration tightens hold

Boycott the UNB administration.

"It was a thoroughly unpleasant experience," Prof. Cross said.

Both Prof. Cross and Prof. George Rawlygh of Queens University were the focal point of direct and indirect rebuffs from the UNB administration.

At an airport press conference which the professors had arranged, the Fredericton Press was notably moved to nearby St. Thomas.

By SUE REISLER

All hope has faded from the eyes of University of New Brunswick students who are fighting for a little democracy on their campus.

"There is a sense of despair among the people who have been involved," says U of T Prof. Michael Cross.

Prof. Cross has just returned from a Maritime history conference which was to be held at UNB but was moved to nearby St. Thomas.

After spending several hours with some of the arrested students, Prof. Cross said his general impression was that the administration had won.

"They have pretty thoroughly cowed the students. Nothing has happened on campus since the break-up of Liberation 130 by the police two weeks ago. A few students tried to attend a Board of Governors meeting but they were not allowed to."

Devonshire denizen uptight too

Residents of Devonshire House have joined students at Sir Daniel Wilson in demanding changes in university residence financing. They will withhold the next instalment of their fees — which are over $500, depending on the length of term, and cover board only — until they get a reduction.

At meetings yesterday students voted 136-2 in favor of the actions to back up their demands.

They also want the burden of mortgages on New College — which the students say has added about $90 to their fees this year — spread equally to all campus residences.

Devonshire House was built in 1907. Residence council president Peter Kidumae (III Arch) says the basements, where 90 per cent of the facilities are located, have been condemned by the fire marshal.

Bissell may "kill" pullout: GSU

Graduate students Union president John Winter wants to know where president Claude Bissell stands on GSU withdrawal from SAC.

He claims Bissell pledged himself to support the move if the GSU demonstrated "massive support" for it.

Winter is afraid Bissell will attempt to "divert or kill" the withdrawal bid at next week's closed meeting of the board of governors.

"We want him to come out in the open and say where he stands," says Winter.

Winter has initiated a write-in campaign for graduate students to demand Bissell make his position clear before the board meeting.

University in an effort to lack. Eng Soc calls SAC vote The campus' 2600 engineers will vote Dec. 5 on whether to remain in SAC. The decision to hold the referendum was taken at an engineering society executive meeting last night. "It's a good thing to get it out in the open," commented Art McIlwain (III APSC), who proposed the motion. He hopes the referendum will fail, and will campaign against it. "On balance SAC is a good thing for engineers," he said. "They don't realize what they get out of it. "It's also good for SAC. They will have to show they are relevant." In a statement passed last night, the engineering society says that if the majority of the faculty's students vote in favor of withdrawing, their wishes will be followed. McIlwain says he expects more than 2,000 engineers will turn out to vote. "It is the only way in which SAC can prove itself to the engineering faculty." When The Varsity asked SAC Universities Commissioner Bob Rae (IV UC) about the referendum, he said he was "not too worried." "Their motives are the right ones," he added. "They want to talk about SAC. "I'm very confident the engineering society will stay in SAC. But we'll have to get off our asses and talk to people."

"I'm very confident the engineering society will stay in SAC. But we'll have to get off our asses and talk to people."

The administration has issued a press release regarding the lack of charges against the engineers who also caused damages and were liable for public mischief. The release said the engineers were being provoked by the students on the inside of the occupied physics building and thus were free from any charges.

Meanwhile Strax, the suspended professor, has very little support on the campus. He is regarded as an outsider, an American, and is dismissed as a troublemaker.

The Frederickton community has too tight a grip on the university to allow any hope for the reinstatement of Prof. Strax. It is likely the administration will wait until the affair cools down and then fire Strax.

Will the luck of the Irish corrupt

By LARRY HAIVEN

Abe Mudrik was sitting on the desk in the SAC office, his legs dangling over the edge. "Well listen, if those two don't pan out, we can always get Joni Mitchell. While you're at it, see about Bob Dylan, eh?"

Whenever you see him, he's on the phone, calling an agent in the States, arranging for ticket sales or booking a group.

Between Abe and Gord Lightfoot the Blue and White Society, traditional headache for SAC, has come into its own, broken through, justified its existence. It's actually $2500 in the black!

This is, to say the least, an improvement over last year's disaster, where the Society lost money on a cancelled Otis Redding Concert and was dissolved by SAC in November. Abe took over just before Christmas, and helped the Society limp its way through the rest of the year.

"The students shouldn't have to pay anything. They go to Waterloo or Western and they see free concerts and they come back and say, 'Why can't we have that?'. Right now, just under twenty-five cents of a student's SAC fees go to the Blue and White Society. If one dollar of his fees were given we would be able to have all those free concerts and really do something meaningful."

"Twenty thousand dollars?" Finance Commissioner, flabbergasted. "That's how much one dollar per student brings. You see Abe's sense of priorities is not the council's. The council thinks that education is the highest priority, and Abe doesn't."

"SAC is doing a lot of good things," retorts Mudrik. "But these are long range projects that won't affect the students here now; education. F.U. of $2,400; interjects Tinker. "Well, anyway, we're pretty well off financially." Tinker had to agree.

organizations at Western," says Barkwell, "is that there's nothing else happening in London. Here in Toronto, Abe has to compete with the Rock Pile for the Ars Nova crowd. I'm really happy that he's so involved, but that doesn't put him in charge of the council's money priorities."

Meanwhile, Mudrik phones the agents and the Society rolls up an impressive score of successes: all-night horror movies, Hart House dances, Gord Lightfoot concert.

"We're doing more this year," he explains. "We're more versatile. I saw that we lost $1,100 on the Ars Nova concert."

"I think it was closer to $1,200," interjects Tinker. "Yeah, well you're pessimistic. But we made $2,500 on the Lightfoot Concert and I'm afraid it was closer to $2,400," interjects Tinker. "Well, anyway, we're pretty well off financially." Tinker had to agree.

Come prepared! Come prepared if you have to write a test.

Have you ever wished the clock would stop while you're belaboring over a test — just so you could have a few more minutes?

Tuesday at 11:10 a.m. in Room 2118, Sidney Smith, the Fine Art 200 class began to grit their teeth over a term test.

At 11:20 a.m. the clock stopped but at the same time the lights went out and stayed out.

Room 2118 is windowless so our only source of light trickled in from the open door.

"You'll have to keep on writing even though the conditions are rather unusual," shrugged the lecturer, P. W. Mellen. "Of course, I will take this into consideration."

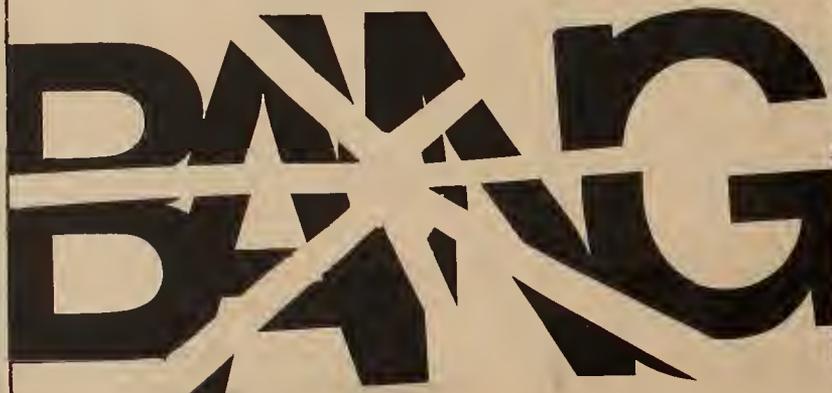

At 11:45 the lights returned just in time for the class to hand in their tests.

I've learned my lesson. Never show up for a test without wearing your miner's head lamp. Failing that — carry a bright flashlight.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE 'OSAP' MARCH

In order to "ease the cheese of getting fees" the Student's Administrative Council has planned and solicited your support for a march this afternoon on Queen's Parks supposedly to protest inadequacies in the student aid program. (OSAP)

Conspicuously missing from the pro-march diatribe are stipulations as to who is going to pay for the increased handouts demanded. Despite the fact that the OSAP gravy train has been enlarged from 13 to 26 million in the past year, the S.A.C. has not been placated. The S.A.C. doesn't seem concerned that money drained off by financially-pampered university students and OSAP parasites deprives other sectors of the community from the funds necessary for valuable services.

Today's march is the culmination of the planned spontaneity of a "working group" on OSAP set up by S.A.C. Despite the fact that a third of this university benefits from OSAP, despite hundreds of dollars worth of advertising in the Varsity, only thirty people showed up at the inaugural bitch-in of this working group. Of these only a handful had personal complaints. Subsequently support has increased to 100, mainly from those who will march for any cause claiming that society owes them a living; that the individual is not responsible for his own economic welfare. Taking into account the thousands of OSAP recipients and the complicated bureaucracy that must administer it, it is only inevitable that some red tape and technical complications should arise; that some deserving individuals should be overlooked. If appeals prove unproductive, one should get in touch with his member of parliament. Queen's Park Hansard reveals that a considerable amount of time in question periods is devoted to individual OSAP complaints. However, such procedure would only represent reform. It would not be a "confrontation"; it wouldn't allow society a glimpse at Mr. Langdon's "true egalitarian community confronting society." Above all it wouldn't bring into question claims that the whole system is rotten to the core and needs a major overhaul.

The leftist majority on the S.A.C. justifies many of its self-righteous stands as its duty to the community. Yet at a time when over half the provincial budget is spent on education; at a time when tax increases are demonstratively related to spiralling costs of university spending; and, at a time when marches are organized to ask the tax-paying public for more handouts, the S.A.C. has chosen to deny the taxpayers' representatives, the Board of Governors a vote on the University Government Commission. It is rather doubtful, that the S.A.C. will be hesitant in demanding that the taxpaying public pay for the manifestations of the structural reforms recommended.

Does the S.A.C. explain that the government is already spending more on the 15% of the university age-group that is in university than on the 85 that is not. Does the S.A.C. explain that the taxpayers are already subsidizing 5/6 of the cost of putting a student through university. (almost $3000 annually per student. Despite free tuition, Newfoundland only spends $1800.) While clamouring for more handouts, does the S.A.C. explain that increasing government debt and restrictive tax policies slow down and discourage production, development and employment (including student employment) Does the S.A.C. explain that inflation is not caused by too much money, but by an ever increasing tax burden and a depletion in the needed supply of money and capital, resulting in excessive interest rates and retarded economic growth. Does the S.A.C. explain that if the money were available, there exists enough labour and materials to solve the housing crisis, including student housing. Instead the S.A.C. spends $729 of your student funds on tent rental and $1200 on lighting for the farce called "Tent City." How long does the S.A.C. expect the tax-paying public to remain passive to the fact that in a time of unparalleled prosperity and inflation, the provincial debt already represent a stack of thousand dollar bills three times the height of the Dominion Bank Tower and increases with every OSAP cheque. How long will the taxpayers remain passive to the fact that the deflated dollar is robbing them of their savings; placing a cost-price squeeze on farmers and primary producers driving them out of business or forcing them to sell to Americans and pushing the economy inexorably towards depression.

Perhaps the march will pass the Medical Building construction site. Quite a spectacle for the construction worker to stomach: students marching to "ease the cheese of getting fees," — a majority of middle class students from suburbia demanding a greater share of their paycheck. (Perhaps Mr. Switzman of the OUS will explain his drug-store dialectics to the labourers, telling them how students are young workers.)

Why can't the marchers recognize that as Canadians we are the most fortunate people in the world; that as university students we are receiving the best this nation has to offer. Why can't they realize that a hundred years of free enterprise, INDIVIDUAL SELF-RELIANCE, and limited government has brought Canada advancement, individual freedom and economic prosperity unequalled in the world. Why must they serve as dupes in the contrived confrontations resulting from the pipe dreams, dreamed in the S.A.C. office of a socialistic approach in government. Why must they give sanction to the steady tramp of the socialist leviathan.

Why at a time when the S.A.C. is decrying dehumanized bureaucracy, does it sponsor a march for more money and concurrently more power for that bureaucratic maze administrating OSAP. How can one claim independence, when his dependence is merely shifted from his parents to the over-burdened taxpayer. Why should anyone who is not too proud to accept an OSAP handout, be too proud to submit to a proper means test. Why doesn't the S.A.C. list as its first priority the elimination of OSAP profiteers; whose handouts find their way into trips to Florida, cars, or the purchase of the government bonds issued to pay for the latest welfare handouts.

Above all, why are students so ready to surrender that very economic independence without which political independence has never been a reality.

(This ad sponsored and paid for in the interests of the tax-paying public by JAANUS PROOS, S. A. C. rep. Victoria College)

Vic and Law drew 1-1 as Fraser and James scored the goals.

Appleton scored once and Duncan twice as PHE A edged Trin, 3-2. Murray and Denison scored for Trin.

SMC 3, Sr. Eng. 2. For SMC, Weiner, Donovan, and Cavanagh. Who scored for Sr. Eng.? You guessed it—Lenard and Treen.

Vic II blanked New, 3-0. Berry had the hat trick; Umragi-Gray got the shut-out. Bullock (3), Waslow (2), Turner (2), Dawson and Wroldsen (2—is Sen-sen Swed-ish?) led PHE B past UC II, 11-1. Shianan replied for UC.

Yamasaki (1or) beat Devonshire House, 3-2. (The sober Engineers play for Eng, the other ones for Devonshire). Dev marksmen were McCallum and Moody.

UC (Clelland, Nabeta—"the thief was aided and abetted by...") took Jr. Eng (head engineers), 2-0.

Dents (Akiyama, Sullivan) beat Scar (Hambly). Our computer broke down so we are unable to give you the total score.

Erin won over SMC B, 3-1. Beamish, Michie, and Ryan counted for Erin, Sypik for SMC B.

Business beat Law II (Glover, Gardiner), 5-2. Corcoran, McVeighn, Longpre, Baker, and Bengough scored for Magic Bus.

Bertrand's goal ensured Pharm's 1-0 win over Knox.

SOCCER PLAYOFFS

Innis slaughtered Wyc 6-0 on goals by Glixom (2-Raquel Welch is a glixom wench), Darnelles Pikulyc (2), Fatisz.

UC defaulted to Scar.

Minichillo scored 3 goals to lead Erin over For, 5-1.

Artyczuk and Percukligievic! completed Erin scoring; Gregory replied for For.

WOMEN'S SPORT

Last weekend, University of Buffalo hosted a Tri Swim Meet between the Women's teams from Buffalo, Western and Toronto. The Toronto gals dazzled their opposition and won the meet with a score of 82.

Randy Croome, Food Science, swam an amazing time of 31.7 sec. in the 50 yard backstroke and 1.06 in the 100 yard free style event—placing first in both. Sue Fergusson, P&OTS, placed second in the 100 yard free style, clocking 1.08.

Liz Daniel, PHE, placed first in the 50 yard butterfly and in the 100 yard Individual Medley with terrific times of .32 sec. and 1.12 respectively. Mabel Ann Brown, PHE, captured first place in the 100 yard breast stroke, timing 1.30.

But the pride of the Toronto team at this meet was the 200 yard Free Style Relay Team who had a time of 2.00 5, and in the process, completely lapped the Buffalo team. Hats off to members of this relay team—Ruth Unger, Judy Kent, Liz Daniel, all from PHE, and Sue Fergusson, P&OTS. Gail Whyte, PHE, defeated her opposition to take the diving championship at this tri-meet.

LACK OF INTEREST IN WATERPOLO DISTURBS COACH

By JIM COWAN

Rumour has it that if and when the new mens athletic complex is built, special facilities will be provided for the Varsity Blues waterpolo teams' sea horses.

O.K. I'm sorry.

The waterpolo Blues are one of the most successful teams on the U of T campus, and one of the least known. In the past five years they have lost only one game, and have taken the Herschorn Cup, emblematic of OQAA waterpolo supremacy, every year for the past three years.

The lack of interest in this aquatic equivalent of basketball disturbs Blues' coach Otto Demjen. "I'm surprised it is only a seasonal sport here," he said last night. "The university should be the basis of all amateur sport."

This is Demjen's first year with Blues. He was a world class waterpolo player in Hungary around 1950, and has since taught physical education in India. A Ph.D in Law and political science, he now works as an estate evaluator with the Ontario government.

Blues play McGill in the first of a two-game total point series this Saturday at Hart House, to decide the Herschorn Cup for 1968. Game time is 2:30 p.m. and spectators are more than welcome to attend. The second game will be played two weeks from Saturday at McGill.

Skip Bergman, veteran defenseman, said, "On Saturday it's going to depend on how well our guys in their end hold on to the ball and how well the guys in the center set up plays and come back to cover breaks."

Coach Demjen is pleased with the progress the team has made in the past six weeks. "Before we had good individual players," he commented, "Now we have good teamwork. If one player makes a mistake, the others will encourage him."

Waterpolo as a spectator sport ranks with basketball or hockey for excitement and sustained action. There are no time-outs, except for injuries, and fouls are called on a team which unduly delays the game. Teamwork is essential, and a well-played game features fast breaks and accurate passing complemented by close defensive coverage. And unlike a sport such as football, there is no great body of complicated rules to confuse the novice fan.

Each team has seven players in the water at a time — a goalie, two defensemen, two rovers and two forwards. The rovers set up plays and drop back to cover the other teams' forwards when they are attacking.

According to Bergman, spectators should watch for the fast breaks by the forwards. "Watch where the ball is not," he says, "and you'll see the center forwards trying to get in position and the defense trying to push them away. There's a lot of underwater stuff the ref can't see."

It's this "underwater stuff" — pushing, kicking and jostling — that makes a theoretically non-contact sport rough. And it's what results in most of the fouls. There are two classes of fouls, major and minor. Minor fouls involve loss of the ball, while major fouls also carry a penalty point. When three penalty points are accumulated, the opposing team gets a free shot, much like the penalty shot in hockey.

About two-thirds of the time the shot results in a goal.

It's a game of endurance. There are four ten minute periods, with no substitution allowed except for injuries and at the end of periods.

And the players are swimming all the time.

The most common injuries are broken noses and damaged fingers. For instance on Tuesday night Hunter Milborne, a rookie with the team, had his nose broken in practice. As he put it, "My nose ran into Ross Freeman's fist."

Blues will be faced with tough opposition this Saturday, and it would be good to see them get the support they deserve.

Golden Gaels'll ingot Golden Hawks

Queen's Golden Gaels Gaels rate as heavy favorites over Waterloo Lutheran in this year's College Bowl, to be held Friday night at Varsity Stadium.

The final cross-Canada college rankings listed Gaels as the number one team in the nation, while the Golden Hawks from Waterloo merited only a sixth-place standing. It's hard to argue rationally with these assessments.

Queen's veteran coach, Frank Tindall, has amassed a typical Gaels' unit, tough, strong and durable, exceptionally well-schooled in the basics of the game.

Led by guards Bob Climie and Brian Barnega, and underrated centre Cam Innes, the blocking is razor-sharp, providing lots of holes for a strong fleet of running backs, Heino Lilles, Ron Clark, and Keith Eamon. Quarterback Don Bayne has an excellent arm and excellent receivers to go with it, ends Dic Van Buskirk and Don McIntyre, plus flanker Tom Chown.

Defensively, the story is told by Varsity Blues' inability to get even one touchdown in two games. Jim Sherritt, John Stirling, Jim Tait, and Jim Turnbull are the rugged leaders of Gaels' mangle-and-maim men.

It looks like a Waterloo for Waterloo. U of T's ticket allotment has almost been sold out. Only end zone seats are now available for a buck at the SAC office.

Waterpoloists claim most common injuries are broken noses and mangled fingers. The action above suitably denotes the reasons why. For similar roughhousing, see Blues take on McGill Saturday, 2:30 p.m. at the Hart House pool.

RAHAM WINS COPP

Mike Raham is the deserving winner of this year's Johnny Copp Trophy, voted on by the football players themselves and awarded to the player who, in their opinion, by his sportsmanship, character and playing ability, proved himself the most valuable member of the team.

Raham closed out a superb four year stint with Blues this season. Coming to Varsity from Guelph, he played in the defensive backfield for his first year, and then became the hard-charging fullback familiar to Toronto fans for the next three.

In those three years, Raham scored 20 touchdowns (won scoring crown once and tied for it once), rushed for 1,416 yards (won rushing honours twice), caught 24 passes for 328 yards, and returned 52 punts for 650 yards.

Hoods, cops, TSM confront Omond and his grads

By MARY BASTEDO

Three hundred and thirty four people received recognition for their academic achievements last night amidst the latin and organ music of ceremony in Convocation Hall, while twelve black hooded protestors stood nameless in the drizzle outside.

About 30 members of the Toronto Student Movement demonstrated against the first of the fall Convocations carrying signs reading: "Peace Research not War Research", "Solandt's business has no business in the university", "Education for war? No!"

They paraded quietly back and forth in front of Convocation Hall while half a dozen Metro Toronto policemen stood defensively in a huddle behind the massive pillars.

U of T police at one point asked the demonstrators to move to the other side of the road. After consultation among themselves they refused. The 12 hooded ones silently appeared across the street and as mysteriously disappeared after about 10 minutes. They wore bright red "Z's" on their black cloaks and refused to answer any questions.

Inside the Hall Governor General Roland Michener received an honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

Chancellor Omond Solandt also conferred 87 Ph.D. degrees, 10 Masters of Philosophy, 261 M.A.'s, 70 M.Sc.'s, 67 Master of Applied Science 14 Masters of Engineering, 1 Doctor of Social Work, 77 Masters of Social Work, 1 Master of Architecture, 9 Masters of Business Administration, 1 Master of Science of Dentistry, 4 Doctors of Education, 10 Masters of Library Science, 2 Masters of Music, 1 Master of Science in Pharmacy, 1 Master of Science in Urban and Regional Planning.

About 50 per cent of the recipients were present to receive their degrees in person.

Andy Wernick, president of the TSM, was to receive an M.A. but did not show up to claim it. He was present however at the protest outside.

Coffee gets Strax 30 days

SAINT JOHN, N.B. (CUP) — A 15-minute cup of coffee in the students' union at the University of New Brunswick cost UNB professor Norman Strax $500 and 30 days in jail.

And when UNB administration president Colin MacKay and members of the board of deans (who called in the police to remove the demonstrators last week) did not appear at a Wednesday meeting to explain their actions, the student body threatened a general strike.

Strax was jailed on the second of two charges involving the injunction which the administration served on him Sept. 30. He was warned at that time he would be jailed for the next violation.

He was, on Wednesday afternoon.

The administration's suit against Strax alleges he broke university regulations and "incited" students to do the same.

Shortly after Strax's sentencing, more than 300 students agreed that if the administration did not show up at a special meeting to be held before Nov. 28, they will go on strike.

In a letter to student president Geoff Green, secretary of the board Dugald Blue explained why the board did not attend the meeting: "The board finds the pre-emptory tone of the resolution and the proposal contained in it unacceptable. It cannot agree to such a meeting.

Several students called for an immediate strike, but the meeting decided to give the board of deans another chance.

Resolutions passed at the meeting called for removal of MacKay from his campus chairmanships, dismissal of criminal charges against Dr. Strax and the seven protestors arrested with him, and increased student and faculty involvement in the affairs of the university.

SFU occupies bldg for 2nd time

BURNABY (CUP) — Simon Fraser University students seized the school's administration building Wednesday for the second time in two weeks in a protest over university admission policy.

The seizure came after the SFU senate met Wednesday night in special session with 300 student observers to discuss student demands, later rejected.

They included:

- freedom of transfer and automatic acceptance of credits within the provincial educational system;
- an elected admissions board made up in equal part by students and faculty;
- the opening of all registrar's files;
- more money for education and equitable financing for all post-secondary institutions.

Have you heard the one about the French Ambassador's wife?

The story goes that the wife of a French Ambassador to Great Britain had a passion for Coca-Cola. And, having been invited to Queen Elizabeth's Coronation, she went to considerable inconvenience and expense to have special pockets fitted into the stole that she would wear. The pockets, believe it or not, were for Coca-Cola—one bottle in each to see her through the ceremony.

It seems that even at Coronations, things go better with the taste of Coke.

Both Coca-Cola and Coke are registered trademarks which identify only the product of Coca-Cola Ltd.

It seems ridiculous that:

- the socialist Toronto Student Movement is selling TSM buttons at 30 cents a button, 8 cents over their cost, for a profit of 27 per cent. (We know, we know. The 8 cents pays for the unsold buttons. Wasteful capitalist overproduction.)

- the engineer who helped burn The Varsity, Andrew Janikowski, is still harping on The Varsity's "irresponsible reporting" (Globe letters—Nov. 21) but doesn't want to debate his points in public. It seems the least a man who burns first and talks later could do—give his opponent the chance to defend himself in public.

- It's even more ridiculous when you consider that one of the examples of "irresponsible reporting" was an article which began "The first draft of these comments..."

- And even more ridiculous when you consider that he said The Varsity was once the best campus newspaper in the country, yet in private conversation obviously knows nothing about newspapers at all—not even the difference between a comment piece and a news story. How does he tell the good papers from the bad?

- that the Toike Oike should say The Varsity is "great reading".

Farm workers appeal to Toronto

The farm workers of California need your help.

For three years we have been on strike against the powerful agricultural corporations of California. These are corporations of 5, 10 and 400 thousand acres. For years, their power in rural California has been absolute. They have excluded us from the most basic legislative rights and gains made by industrial workers. They would not permit "Grapes of Wrath" in public schools and libraries and held public book burnings. They receive millions of dollars every year from the U.S. Government in subsidy. Their sons are exempt from the draft because agriculture is a "vital industry", while our sons are sent to fight and die in Viet Nam because we are not so "vital" and are a minority.

They force us to move from place to place in search of work, living in tin shacks, old army tents and even our cars. They deny our children an education by making it necessary that they work in the fields so our families will survive. They own the Governor of California — Ronald Reagan — and prevent the enforcement of the meagre legislation that does exist to protect us. They condemn us to $2,000 a year in the richest state in the richest nation in the world. They illegally import strike breakers from Mexico to break our strikes while the government looks the other way.

In our struggle against this 4 billion dollar a year industry, we are forced to seek help outside the farm worker community, outside California, outside the United States. Because of their determination to crush our organizing efforts through illegal strike breakers, violence, the police, the courts, the government — we find our final weapon and only source of hope is the boycott of California grapes.

The grapes which we have given our lives to producing, we must now ask everyone not to buy. You in Canada buy 20 percent of the grapes now being produced by strike breakers — $19½ million worth. If you do not buy California grapes, you say no to the system which is oppressing us and you give us hope and the means of helping ourselves.

Through your help and the help of many others, our boycott has been effective. California agribusiness is suffering great losses. Even though the U.S. government has steadily been increasing its purchase of grapes to ship to South Vietnam. We still meet with adamant refusal and resistance on the part of the ranchers to negotiate. Their determination is surpassed only by our determination to win and the belief that our friends will help us win.

During the coming Holiday Season, the ranchers will try to dispose of all the grapes they have not been able to sell. At Christmas time many people like to have some beautiful table grapes on their table to express the joy of this Season. It is during these coming weeks — up to Christmas — that we must increase our efforts. It is a small sacrifice to ask, that the citizens of Toronto not take joy from our suffering — to ask that they not buy this holiday fruit — California grapes — and open to us the hope for a better life. To ask that they not fill their tables with the fruit that keeps our tables empty.

To this end, there will be a demonstration on November 23rd in Toronto. There will be other demonstrations in other towns and cities throughout Ontario. It will be a SILENT and non-violent demonstration as the spirit and belief of our movement is non-violent. We invite you to join with us as our friends and show your concern and solidarity with 400,000 farm workers who — with your help — are determined to find a better life.

facts straight

A newspaper editorial writer is entitled to his opinions but he should get his facts straight. The anonymous writer of the lead editorial "a (disguised) step backwards" in the Wednesday edition of The Varsity, attacks my motion at the Monday Faculty Council meeting presumable without having heard what I said on that occasion. I made it clear that the motion was designed to provide that where the enrolment in a small class or seminar had to be restricted, the professor or his department must be the judge as to which students were best qualified to participate. I went on to say that I would expect that preference would be given to those with the best academic qualifications, i.e. a first-class "generalist" would have preference over the second-class "specialist", but that where their qualifications were equal preference might be given to a "specialist" if it were shown that the seminar was more important to his programme than it was to the programme of a "generalist" who was not choosing the course to fit any particular pattern. On the other hand, it is conceivable, although probably less likely, that a "generalist" might work out a highly structured programme, say on Victorian Studies, where a particular Victorian history seminar might be more significant to him than to a history "specialist" who could be accommodated in another history seminar. In this case I would give the preference to the "generalist" over the "specialist", other things being equal.

J. B. Conacher
Professor of History

Professor Conacher made it clear in introducing his motion that the intent was to preserve the traditions of the honors program. He made the same point in an interview with the Varsity reporter who covered the story and wrote the editorial. His motion leaves the wov open for departments and professors to preserve the honors-general distinction almost intact. Ed.

vietnam

Peter Moogk's comment on my Vietnam article is based on the precept that a "liberated understanding" of problems in society derives not from an understanding of the historical, economic, and political roots of the society but from a rejection of all value systems. His appeal "to our common humanity" escapes me for neither does he manifest its existence nor does he attempt to explain the meaning of such an animal. The elimination of "the profligate use of firepower" is apparently more important, if possible per se, than to explain and eliminate its root causes.

He more than missed the point when he refused to mention my consideration of the interaction between political ideology and economic necessity for it then becomes more than just "a simplified Marxist economic determinism". This refusal leads him to relegate the analysis to "dogma" without suggesting why it fits into this category.

The question for Mr. Moogk is not the humanity of a nation's self-interest but merely the containment of those symptoms which offend his sensibilities. He would have us believe that the use of power is an emotive reaction unattached to value preferences and that the use of countervailing forces rather than an understanding and conscious acceptance of values leads us to the liberation of humanity.

He again misconstrues my argument, for rather than suggesting that the U.S. intervention in Vietnam is illegal on constitutional grounds, I made it quite clear that the U.S.'s Contention that their involvement had legal substance was false. And of course it's the dogma again.

In an attack on Canada by, say, Russia I wonder if Mr. Moogk would be hard put to classify his retaliation as a "war of liberation" and the actions of the attacker as a "war of aggression"?

There is nothing that is useful in Mr. Moogk's comment for he refuses to engage in a discussion of substance while at the same time proclaiming that to have values one cannot think. There is no clearer definition of the pejorative term liberal.

"But, miss, can you type?"

On a very ordinary day last May, crowds of people were pouring into the white-domed building with large round columns. Recognition had come in the form of a delicate scroll and the graduates stepped up proudly to claim them one by one.

Mary-Lou Hurley was one of the eager people ready to step into the world outside the university. On the 14th of October she still didn't have a job. Sue Hewings, a straight-A student in Mathematics and Philosophy found work only at the beginning of that month.

A "B.A." is no longer the commodity it used to be 10 years ago. Nor is it the passport to the job you want.

With a surplus of graduates and a scarcity of jobs, many students, as well as their parents, panic at the prospect that after three or four years at university they are unable to find satisfactory work. It seems that any kind of a skilled worker, from a typist to a pretzel-bender is more readily employed than a graduate with a B.A.

"After graduation, I sent in applications to Imperial Oil, Esso, insurance companies, employment agencies of all kinds, and answered ads in the papers," Mary-Lou explained. "Most of the companies seemed genuinely interested but were unable to offer me jobs."

Everywhere she went the first question was "Do you type?"

"I finally took a five-week business course from Shaw's and although the prospects increased, I was still unable to find employment," she remarked. "My whole summer was spent going to interviews and keeping hopes on a tight-rope. I was absolutely shattered."

Some of the jobs offered were interesting, but someone with experience always got there first. Mary-Lou wryly observed, "It was not my B.A. but my two summers' experience with the Board of Education that finally got me the job."

Sue found most of the companies offered her a low starting salary. "I felt it had been a waste of time going to university," she explained. "One company told me not to expect a raise for at least a year, if I wanted as much as $85 a week starting salary."

In going from interview to interview, the applicants found many other graduates in the same predicament. The really interesting jobs with larger corporations like I.B.M. were usually swamped with applications. There were 2,000 applications on file with Air Canada for hostess positions. This meant that applications filed in Spring would be considered some time next year.

"Some companies would not hire me because I was too educated while others would offer me a dead-end job such as telephoning people. After a couple of months of this I was depressed to say the least," Sue said.

Counsellors at the U of T Placement Service are aware that this is too often a representative picture of what happens to the graduate.

"Most girls are shocked and horrified at the nasty little phrase: you must be able to type," said Rosemary Gaymer, a spontaneous and cheerful person. "But university is not a production line and was not established to teach you particular skills. You get a B.A. in order to be able to choose any field of work rather than to be able to fit your vocation into a certain pea-hole."

Students shouldn't set their hearts on one thing only, she suggested. Few students, it seems, ever look into the vast expanse of fields open to people with a degree.

A common mistake is to wait until after graduation to start thinking of a career. "If you want a career, it's important to choose your subjects with that in mind," said Sue. "I know that now, because I made the wrong choices."

"We have started to build a library with various divisions of information for the job-seeking student," said Miss Gaymer as she opened the door of her office and led me into a modest room with rows of shelves partially filled with brand new yellow red and blue binders. A couple of students with 6T8 and 6T9 sewn onto their jackets were browsing through the material.

Too many students go job-hunting with the wrong attitude, Miss Gaymer suggested. They see the B.A. as the end of the road, instead of adopting a more positive attitude.

"Too many students feel they are pawns in the world of business instead of taking matters into their own hands," she said. "This is not the case. A degree gives you the training to be the chess player, but you must assert yourself. You have to show the employer that you can take charge...that you have imagination and that you know how to use it."

From there I made my way to a totally different atmosphere in the airy Colonnade office of Mr. Steadman, recruitment officer for the civil service. Although he claimed to be very busy, he squeezed me in for 15 minutes between appointments.

"It is simply a matter of supply and demand," he said. There is a freeze in both government and industrial employment. Not only arts, but the other disciplines are having a hard time of it."

The employment agencies are all very sorry about this state of affairs, of course, but the employer is in the smug position of being able to choose the very best.

This means that an honors graduate has a better chance of getting a job than a general arts graduate. Women have a harder time looking for work simply because there are many jobs, particularly in industry, for which females are not suited, he said.

"As a result, we have an excess of applications from women on file," observed Mr. Steadman. "The ratio in our application files is two to one for women to men. Most girls seem to apply for personnel work. We have 200 of these applications alone, but there simply aren't that many openings."

As in other fields, out of the many girls who apply for personnel work, only a few have an inkling of what the term means.

"They just don't have a clue as to the depth and breadth of personnel work—interviewing is just a small portion of it," he explained.

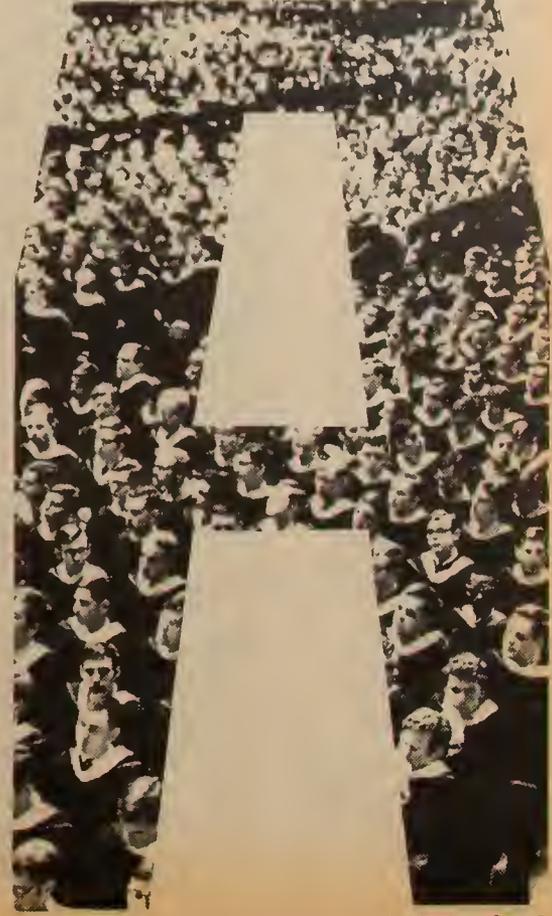

I remembered that Miss Gaymer told me the same thing almost word for word. "Too many people go into an interview blindly and it shows up in their responses to questions," she said. "If you are interested in a job, show it by reading a bit about it."

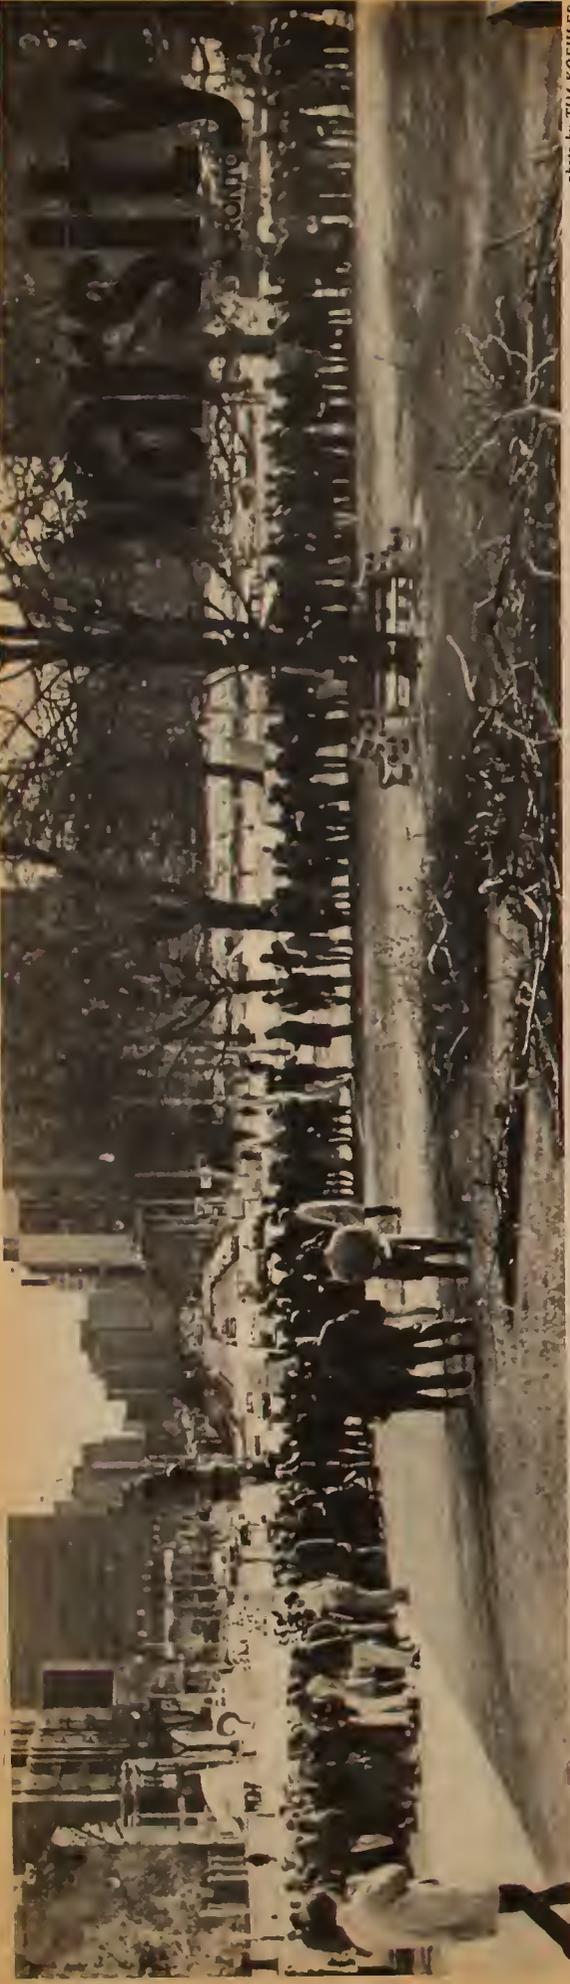

There's a real art in being able to pull it off at an interview. "I wish I had caught on to it sooner," commented Mary-Lou. "There is a blue booklet in the Placement Service which tells you all about it. I would advise everyone to read it before, not after, going out to apply for a job."

"I found that the employer was more interested in my hobbies and extra-curricular activities than in my degree," said Sue.

In Mary-Lou's experience, "employers will fire all kinds of crazy questions at you." At first this technique caught her off guard and she would be at a loss for words. "But I soon found that it is better to say something even if you think it's stupid, than to say nothing at all."

In the final analysis, the real problem is not in finding something to do. It isn't that no-one will employ young graduate co-eds. But after putting in three or four years of study, they feel justified in expecting a well-paying and interesting position.

1,200 tell Bill Davis to "pass the buck to us" at Wednesday's OSAP march

By ANNE BOODY

About 1,200 students from U of T, York and Ryerson marched to the front doors of Queen's Park yesterday with demands for changes in the Ontario Student Awards Program.

"There are two issues," SAC president Steve Langdon told the shivering group. "We've come to force consideration of specific changes in this year's OSAP program and we demand government action immediately on the totally unacceptable social barriers that now exist."

He told front-line dignitaries the marchers were there for those who can't get to university or who have to drop out because of changed regulations. "We want Davis. We want Roberts," the crowd yelled. "The damn building behind us is imposing on us, so it's about time we impose on it," said John Bolsky from York University.

A ruddy-faced Gerry Gallagher of the International Labourer's Union told students emerged from the crowd of civil servants. "Perhaps it would be better if opposition leaders spoke to you first and then I could reply to them," Davis told the crowd.

The LGMB struck up with a noisy chorus of Mickey Mouse.

"I gather you want me to speak now," Davis replied softly.

"The OSAP program certainly isn't perfection but nonetheless it's enabling some 30,000 students to get aid," Davis said.

He told students that $26,000,000 was spent this year on student aid.

"There's a building to be erected just at the corner of College and University for $28,000,000, Langdon retorted. They're spending more on one building than on all students in Ontario."

"I'm not here to pass the buck," Davis began. And the crowd picked it up: "Pass the Buck, Pass the Buck, Pass the Buck to us." "It seems to me you people would like several million dollars, but I just can't give it to you," Davis said in exasperation.

"What about kids in Cabbagetown? That's what we're here about. They're locked into the secondary school system and just can't get out of it," said Tim Reid, Liberal Part education spokesman.

Donald Macdonald, leader of the provincial NDP told students their brief reflected the fundamental tax problem. "It's a tragedy that a disportion of money for education comes from those who can't afford to pay it."

Back at Hart House following the march students decided that a committee of five or six should not go alone to speak to Roberts. They decided he would have to confront all interested students.

Jill Wright (I New) was not impressed with Davis's speech. "He didn't say anything. If the government wants more money, why can't they introduce a capital gains tax."

Joan Valerjote (III SMC) saw the whole student aid situation as hopeless. "Davis seems to be superficially overlooking SAC's OSAP brief. The way I see it, our only hope lies with the opposition."

The car broke down at midnight five miles from Black Lake.

We laughed and swore and the silence of the forest around us made our voices small.

We watched a stiff procession of headlights come over the hill behind us and as we got out of the car, the flat engine whine gathered and the transport rigs rushed past us, wind and oil slick lashing the car.

We flagged down a car and did an explanatory clown show to a drowsy lump of people in a stationwagon. They took Frank to the Black Lake station and Bruce and I waited for him, feeling the wait was long because we had lost one person.

A silent boy with one of those thick faces that made his eye sockets small and round returned with Frank in a work-horse Meteor and he towed us back to his home—a dark, plywood-panelled diner with Buckingham pipes for sale on the wall and books about sex and cars in the book rack.

The boy and I couldn't start the car so we walked to an absurdly fluorescent phone booth on the edge of the dark highway and phoned Bruce's brother in Ottawa to pick us up. He grumbled about goddam student agitators not being able to fix a goddam car and said he'd be there in an hour.

We walked back to the diner to wait for Bruce's brother and slowly the boy's father began to talk to us, in that tired, nasal voice of the Ottawa Valley poor.

"It's dangerous driving around here. Most of the people in these parts are too poor to buy glasses, but they drive anyway. The old man across the road who sold me this place went into Perth the other day because he wasn't hearing too good. Doctors says to him, 'While we're fixing your ears, why don't we do something about these cataracts in your eyes . . .'" The voice trailed off, humourless and distant.

The man's wife came into the room, and sat down to watch us. She was fat, and the fatigue and the suffering ## on the importance of total environment

I had a good lesson in the importance of art gallerie environments last Saturday as I visited two shows.

Leon Field was showing some of his op art sculptures at the Sobot. Op art makes use of optical illusions, contour perceptions and like that. It works inside your eyes. Field has done a very good job of producing well-finished pieces. He has utilized the full potential of plexiglass rods and sheets — making them into lenses, screens and invisible supports of patterns.

Although the work is quite clever (albeit somewhat overpriced) there was something lacking as I looked that I couldn't put my finger on.

It soon became apparent when I visited Hart House, where the "Archi-kinetic Exhibition '68" is being presented (until December 7th). The gallery has been partitioned off with black drapery, and the paintings and sculptures are dramatically lighted in the otherwise darkened room. A little man fiddling with a tape recorder supplies electronic music. The overall effect is quite impressive.

There was the difference. Although Field's work is just as interesting as this Archly Kinetic jazz, it is displayed in a classical gallery with lots of white space on the walls to hang pictures and plenty of lighting.

The best piece in the Hart House show is "Nova" by Gerald Tooke. It's a four-foot disk of plastic triangles lit with neon and fluoresecent lights. The mandala uses to which this work could be put are obvious to anyone who sees it glowing peacefully by itself in the dark. Anyone who can fork up the $2,400 necessary has a good bargain.

In the galleries: new A. J. Casson oils in the Roberts Gallery; last chance to see Tony Smith's minimal sculptures at the AGO this weekend.

can you pass the acid test?

The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test, Tom Wolfe, Doubleday, 413pp, $7.25.

Marvellous. A marvellous book, even worth $7.25 with no pictures.

The Electric Kool-Aid Acid Test is the book version of one of those bursting public fireworks that explodes in a shower of one colour — only then another rain of coloured fire bursts in its centre, and then another in the second.

"We are involved in many levels here" says the dusty-jacket sales pitch. Believe it.

First there is Kesey, the real-life novelist and leader of the Merry Pranksters. Kesey is a sort of acid-head Pan. He was a golden boy athlete, scholar and actor. Then he wrote One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, a brilliant first novel according to an arm-length list of critics. (I read it; it was. Graham Fraser said it is) to I Never Promised You a Rose Garden as Jules et Jim is to Le Bonheur.) Only then, after a second novel, Sometime a Great Notion, Kesey stopped writing. Instead he gathered together a wild bunch of hip cronies, enough acid to turn on Philadelphia, a 1939 Harvard Schoolbus, gallons of Day-Glo paint, and set out across America to spread joy.

One of his joy-producing methods was to sponsor free light-rock shows with free electric Kool-aid punch. That's Kool-aid liberally spiked with LSD. Over the bowl he hung a sign reading "CAN YOU PASS THE ACID TEST?"

To chronical this latter-day Til Eulenspiegel in a suitably rollicking style would be enough. And Wolfe certainly does it: AT night the goddam hus still houncing and the Southwest silvery blue coming in not exactly bouncing but slipping and sliding in shafts, stekly shit, and car heams and long crazy shadows from car heams sliding in weird bends over the inside, over the love bunk. The love bunk will get you if you don't wash out. One shelf on the bunk has a sleeping hag on it and into this sleeping hag crawl whoever wants to make it, do your thing, bub, and right out front, and wail with it, and Sandy looks over and he can see a human... bobbing up and down in the sleeping bag with the car heams sliding over it and the motor roaring, the fahulous love hunk, and everyone — synch — can see the sleeping bag veritably filling up with sperm, the little devils swimming like mad in there in the muck, oozing into the cheap hairy shit they quilt the hag with, millions, billions, trillions of them, darting around, crafty little flagellants, looking to score, which is natural, and if any certified virgin on the face of the earth crawled into that sleeping bag for a nap after lunch she would be a hulking knocked-up miracle inside of three minutes — but won't this goddam bouncing ever stop —

But there is more to even this, the first, star-burst — much more because Kesey is no fool. He is serious, serious about self-transcendence, inter-subjectivity, saving people from having their cerebral cortex constipated with the usual bullshit. And there is a religious thing happening too, for the bus demands faith, the sort of walking-on-the-water faith. We must understand. (as Wolfe puts it): "But suddenly it hits me that for the Pranksters this is permanent.

That's the first burst, but there is more for who crops up like a prize in a box of crackerjacks but Neal Cassady, the real-life Dean Moriarity of On The Road. There is little like a homecoming, and nothing like a reuniting with Moriarity-Cassady. He's right where Kerouac left him in 1950, careening down the road chasing life at 70mph (in a schoolbus now), talking at the speed of light, confusing the cops. He, crazy as ever, he alone is worth $2 bookmoney. The brightest explosion is Wolfe himself. In my first encounter with him some five years ago, he rather bored me with his acrobatics. So he could stand sentences on their head and thumb his nose at the same time: he was just as trapped in a convention as Emily Bronte. However he or I have matured, and Wolfe now seems not to have escaped normal literary form so much as to have gotten beyond it.

He spits his insights at the hippies ("I never got into an abstract discussion with a total stranger so fast in all my life") and at us "genteel little pudding kids". Genteel little pudding kids, that one hurts, it's so right.

Let me just say put the Acid Test on the shelf with On the Road, Catch-22 and One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, and let Wolfe finish his own review:

...They pull up to McMurtry's house, in the suburbs, and the door of the house opens and out comes McMurtry, a slight, slightly wan, kindly-looking shy-looking guy, ambling out with his little boy, his son, and Cassady opens the door of the bus so everybody can get off, and suddenly Stark Naked shrieks out: "Frankie! Frankie! Frankie! — this being the name of her own divorced-off little boy— and she whips off the blanket and leaps off the bus and out into the suburbs of Houston, Texas, stark naked, and rushes up to McMurtry's little boy and scoops him up and presses him to her skinny breast, crying and shrieking, "Frankie! oh Frankie! my little Frankie! oh! oh! oh!" — while McMurtry doesn't know what in the name of hell to do reaching tentatively toward her stark-naked shoulder and saying, "M'am! M'am! Just a minute, ma'am!" —

— while the Pranksters, spilling out of the bus — stop. No roar, no crazed bounce or vibrations, no car beans, no tapes, no microphones. Only Stark Naked, with somebody else's little boy in her arms, is bouncing and vibrating.

And there, amid the peaceful Houston elms on Quenby Road, it dawned on them all that this wantan—which one of us even knows her?—had completed her trip. She had gone with the flow. She had gone stark raving mad.

benign approval; they knew their wives were safely domesticated and a bit of rah-rah for the suffragette was easily tolerated.

The chairman seemed disappointed that the evening had come to an end so early: only twenty after ten. "Have you got any questions for the candidates," he pleaded to the crowd, desparate to maintain his authoritarian role. There was no reply; everyone wanted to go home, chew the fat and hit the sack.

Out they streamed, mightily pleased with themselves for showing such an interest in the ol' town. Their voices carried clearly through the crystal chill of the moon-lit night...well he's got experience you know...I wouldn't vote for him it's the...tom never was much of a speaker...

And over at Bell's Billiards across the street, the balls were racked up for another one.

This Rock Within the Sea: A Heritage Lost. Farley Mowat and John de Visser. McClelland and Stewart, 160 pages, $10.00

Prose is rarely so moving as when it pays tribute to the dead or the dying. It seeks to recapture in print what was once good and healthy, and at the same time to mourn its irretrievable disappearance from the face of the earth. The result can be a devastating emotional impact on the reader. For death is surely the most soulful of human experiences, the most absolute, the most futile to fight against, yielding the widest possible gamut for a good writer to impress his reader, already interested by the mere fact of death.

The death of Little Nell in The Old Curiosity Shop nearly caused an entire nation to drown itself in sobs. Perhaps Jimmy Breslin's best column ever was about a young man coming home in a box from Vietnam. And Peter C. Newman's journalism at its finest dealt with the political death of John Diefenbaker.

This Rock Within the Sea is also about death, but a different kind of death. It's about the death of a people, the passing of a way of life, something so much more tragic than the loss of a specific individual.

Since Newfoundland entered Confederation in 1949, the outport people on the Sou'west coast have been slowly dwindling away. With four centuries of tradition behind them, their simple but proud and rugged way of life lies doomed to extinction.

The outport people are fishermen. They live in square, squat, solid two-story houses collected together in scattered settlements along the incredibly bare and desolate coves of the Sou'west Coast. The only life they know is that scratched from the sea, and the only people they know are themselves.

But now Joey Smallwood and his government have decreed that "progress" shall come to the island, not progress aimed at improving the life of these people but progress aimed simply at ruining them.

Industrialization must take place and cheap labour must be produced to carry out the industrialization. Where else to look but to those poor, unfortunate wretches of the Sou'west Coast. Ergo, government support for Newfoundland's local fishing industries was severely cut back, and basic services were reduced to a level far below that of the factory towns. Money was offered to families who chose to move to these manufacturing centres.

The plan is working well and will probably continue to work well until the Sou'west Coast returns once more to the solitude and wasteland it was centuries ago.

Farley Mowat comments: "Progress dictated that the men of the sea forswear their ancient ways of life and move, as rootless migrants, to the alien milieu of industrial and mining towns."

Mowat, along with photographer John de Visser, whose superb camera work enhances the book brilliantly, had originally planned a celebration of the lives of these durable fishermen. Instead they found a people dying off and produced a requiem. "We who had come to chronicle human life in its most admirable guise remained to witness and record the passing of a people."

The book is beautiful, both in design and content. Indeed it is almost ironic that such a sad tale of poverty and despair and endurance is done so beautifully, recorded within the pages of a volume bearing a price tag of ten dollars. It seems incongruous somehow.

Mowat concludes the book with the words of a young girl, growing up on the Sou'west Coast to a future of nothing: "The worstest thing I know is that we got to go away. I watches the gulls following the boats out there and I wishes I was a gull sometimes, because nobody makes them go away from where they belongs. Those gulls are some lucky! They can stay and live in Burgeo until they dies. It won't be very long before they's nobody here except the gulls at all."

gossip column actors

Into the gossip columns we go, and it all comes out. "Secret Ceremony" with Mia and "Lady in Cement" with Frank. No wonder. Talk about the value gap, the mind gap, the action gap. They're in two eras separated by a war (with a big W). Tony Rome is back, cool, tough and who cares? Come on guys, Hollywood pulled the script out of a 1950 wastebasket; why revive it? We don't care about a story anymore . . . it's a worthless experience to follow through. No suspense even. At least sit back and enjoy the zoom shots of Raquel Welch's bazooms and bottom, or of dear Raquel trying to act. Right . . . groove on a boob. Geez, she looks like a real pig (sic), doesn't she? Hire the odd contemporary hack writer, and, says the bar girl, "I'll bet we can relate real good." And Dan Blocker (ex-Bonanza Hoss, guffaw, guffaw . . . "isn't he big and strong, and look how he really beats the brains out of those 200 pound lightweight.")

And Frank . . . well Arthur, he's so with-it he really knows everything, and he's so smart. I mean he really knows his stuff, and how to operate, you know? Makes you feel so inferior, doesn't he? So you want to feel like you're walking into the Town Tavern and conning the slick chicks. It's all here at your local theatre; step right up, popcorn at the right.

What about Mia, with Liz

Taylor, Robert Mitchum, and directed by Joseph Losey? It's an eerie, psychic, mind-playing experience; slow to the point of pain. The other world struggles to get in or get out.

Mia is Cenci, not self-confident like Frank, but inner, so inner she's crazy, all fantasies and illusions. What's real, and what isn't? That ugly long black wig, and that pickle-walk don't make it easy. She beady-eyes Liz on a bus, and Liz becomes her dear dead mother. Those eyes, with the Rosemary bags under them, big blue balls. Liz is fat, again; a gawdy, vulgar, whore who has her own bright hang-ups on top of being a whore; a dead daughter the same age as Mia. What a combination; both brilliant performances. Liz has a patent on bitchy women (Taming of the Shrew, Who's Afraid of VW?), and Rosemary (oops, Mia) has that iceberg look in her eyes. You know two thirds of her is way under.

Then scenarist George Tabori takes over in a Henry James style mansion with oblong shots of tapestries, high ceilings, and ten-foot circular porcelain bathtubs. The camera creeps around corners to dazzle your eyes with depth of perspective. The heavy oak door slams (bamm-echo) maybe five times.

The film delves into a whole crate of suppressed motivations; a veritable psychologist's notebook on screen. Robert Mitchum, oaf that he is, the lecherous professor who violates (horrors) his daughter, Mia. Sexual fantasies abound, "oh please, let me hear that sound you make", no, yes, oh . . . Mia torments her mind-mother, she plays with her guilts and hopes. Cruelty, gut emotions that you know exist.

What a book it must have been (by Marco Denevi). For Joseph Losey, the bundle was just too heavy to handle. Watching the film is like having a tub of slow, thick honey poured on you. Missing, very dramatically, is playwright Harold Pinter's snappy dialogue (Losey's collaborator in "The Servant" and "Accident"). The subject deserves a much better package. Losey loses the touch that marks the effectiveness of film as a media. He doesn't shake up the subject, he merely spreads it over, slowly and methodically. That won't do. He goes beyond the subject itself. The eerie, crackle-crackle music adds about two tons to the heavy honey.

Joseph, my boy, why blow your cool just when it's becoming fashionable?

there is a difference...

People are leaving the Franco Zeffirelli film of Romeo and Juliet with strange, puzzled expressions on their faces. Amazing quantities of them are wondering why they feel slightly disappointed, for it is not a very bad film. It can be argued without too much difficulty that it is, indeed, a good one. What, then? . . .

There is a feeling of anticlimax to the picture which can be explained easily by the fact that it was talked up for over two years prior to its release. Very little could live up to the sort of expectations seduced by the over-zealous publicity people who got on to the job of picture-peddling. In fact, the film would probably have come off much better standing on its own merit, but all the time and all the talk have given movie buffs tender meat for the imagination. Many are entering theatres to find that Zeffirelli's interpretation is not what they understood it to be (because of someone or other's on-location article last spring) and, therefore, not exactly what they wanted to see. There are probably more mental scenarios for Romeo and Juliet than for any other film of the decade.

Zeffirelli rocked London several years ago with his devastating staging of R&J, his introduction to the classical theatre in any language. For the first time it seemed that Shakespeare had been brought down to earth and his characters reduced to human stature; they wandered across the stage as if the events were actually unfolding rather than with the presciences of tragedy and airs of immortality. The word being tossed around liberally was reality; for the first time it was being used with a clear meaning, no longer a method but a dimension. A lot of directors were biting their nails as they examined what was suddenly obvious—Zeffirelli had taken minute details of everyday living and of human behaviour as the tools of his staging. People moved and talked like ordinary people on a stage which, by the use of some bourgeois accessories, looked truly representative of medieval Italy.

There was an atmosphere of excitement and dash to this then-fresh but still appealing approach. The use of a medium so intrinsically opposed to reality, in this way, accomplished with great effect a breakthrough in the handling of the classics and prompted the resurgence of interest in them which was by then overdue.

It would seem that Mr. Zeffirelli, the critics, the publicity agents and the cinema audiences all underestimated the differences between the media and miscalculated the impact of reality in film. This quality may be somewhat of an innovation in London, on the stage, in the early sixties, but it is old hat in the cinema.

What Zeffirelli has done in the film is merely to contemporize the tempo of Shakespeare's lines and have his characters treat the events in the way they presumably would in real life. The result is the loss of poetry which has been so widely defended in the name of 'using the medium.' There are two almost-equally valid reactions to this — the above, in defense of film, and the argument that if you're going to use Shakespeare then use him. There is the reconciliatory viewpoint: if the fusion is a good one, then a little 'give' on both sides will go a long way. The question is ultimately subjective. Of course. But despite the fact that the film is entertaining, Zeffirelli does not allow either the poetry of Shakespeare or the aspects of cinematic production any particular focus.

Visually, Romeo and Juliet

is about as stunning as El Cid, that is to say very stunning circa 1960. Colourful. Lots of people. Fights with real (looking) swords. The costume bit. Zeffirelli has not done anything new with film — his best ideas date back as far as John Schlesinger's Far From the Madding Crowd. The sound is nothing worth listening to: the music is the usual variety of historical-picture spectacular, with one valuable exception. Just prior to the Ball, Mercutio sings an interlude, carpe diem song which serves to change the mood at least as effectively as some clever technical device might have done.

And then we get to the much-touted Zeffirelli version, the yes-sir, never-before-on-stage-or-screen, avant-garde, etc. etc. This was the most grievous offence of all on the parts of the aforementioned zealots. Not that Zeffirelli's interpretation might not have been new, if we hadn't heard it all long since. As for its supposed originality, it doesn't take an awful lot of thinking at this time to reshuffle some scenes and parallel two fast, drug-taking, passionate anti-establishment kids with today's youth. I could cite a pre-Zeffirelli undergrad essay . . . The virtue of this tack rests with Zeffirelli's refusal to carry the thing too far, which is rather negative and all that but probably after all the racket about his novel ideas he was hard-pressed to think of anything that would come as a genuine surprise.

It would seem that film is potentially the final resting-place for the works of Shakespeare. All that is there on the printed page is the script. The fancied sets and scopes of the writer's imagination are more than could ever be feasibly put on a stage. For use in the theatre Shakespeare must be done with qualification; challenges and use of the medium exist here too.

Film can fill in the holes in any one of a number of ways. It can serve the concepts of a Zeffirelli who wants to make Shakespeare's span wider than the Globe courtyard; it has all the known advantages of its techniques. Focus can be a great advantage in Shakespeare where the train of thought can be lost in the crowd; the cumbersome scene changes—up to thirty in a play—are neatly integrated into the progression by dissolves, cuts and panning shots. The great outdoors is brought in and there can be a sense of tangibility to the often unintentionally alienated plays. And of course, special effects can add immeasurably to the impact of much of some texts; The Tempest comes instantly to mind.

Zeffirelli didn't need these advantages in order to do what he wanted with Romeo and Juliet. The consequence is not a waste, but it is an extravagant use of an art form. The man knows what he's doing with a text and is not a stranger to film or even to Shakespeare on film but in the case of the ill-starred lovers the medium is not the message.

WEA THOOK TOWN

We crossed the border at Buffalo on Sunday night, August 25, 1968. An officious face from the box of the border guards fixed us for a moment. Where were we born? Where? Oh, Toronto.

"And you?"
 "Toronto," Oscar said. And then softly: "Where were you born?"
 In the back seat Freddy and Doug chorused Toronto. Where were we going?

"Chicago."
 No, only a few days. Okay, and the incurious eyes passed us on. We pulled away into the fine rain and the darkness of New York State and already Freddy and Doug had closed their eyes.

 Five hours later Doug was at the wheel and I awoke as he pulled into a big Shell station for gas. He looked creased and deflated with the semiconsciousness of the drive and nothing but Murray the K for sounds. Rubbing his big eyes and squeezing the bridge of his nose he said: Do you want a coffee Jim? We woke the others and sat in the bright restaurant, watching the tired waitress smiling for tips. And we slurped the lukewarm stuff which was passing for coffee.
 "Well, we should be there in another five," said Doug.
 "How are you Doug? You falling asleep?" Freddy asked.
 "I'll drive for a while."

"Okay, I'll dream about how I'm going to assassinate Humphrey," Doug said, his eyes slightly mocking.
 He would look strange, I thought. The innocuous Doug with his bell bottom jeans and the beads which hung to the waist. His thick teeth set in a fine jaw which rose directly to the eyes. Slightly Sandburg—the broken teeth of the grey summer open.

Well, there weren't too many students present at his funeral, and with all this protesting going on, and no mention of him, it seems, as I say, that he couldn't have been well known.

Nor does it seem that anyone realizes a U. of T. student was killed in Chicago in August. But then, so many people getting killed. Well, he was killed, clubbed down in the park on the second day of that exhibition of law and order which served as a backdrop to the Democratic convention.

Trudeau thinks that the trouble will come from the south and not from overseas. And you may be inclined to agree with him; but this is academic, of course, because until it happens, no one really cares. You can read the newspaper and speculate but in the end it's just cocktail conversation. This may be right or wrong, probably neither, but, since the papers seem to have given only cursory attention to the fact that one of those dead in Chicago was from Toronto, I thought I would explain it so that you can at least speculate.

 We pulled into Chicago at 9.00 a.m. on Monday, August 26. Passed through miles of factories, grey and solid. And as we neared the centre of the town, the stream of people here for the convention began. A seething mass of shoppers, students, blacks, whites, placards for Humf, placards for Clean Gene! Streamers and sunshine filling the streets, and you had to think of all those fierce stories of Chicago. Big bad Chicago. Its very name ringing with the broken teeth of Sandburg—the grey summer tive which filled the air. The crowd was massive and impossibly diverse, nudging and squeezing out shouts of PIG, PIG, punctuated here and there with nervous laughter, a strange sea of sweat and elbows, collars and sportsjackets pushed together with nothing in common but their presence.

The hotdog vendors were doing a sellout business and we munched a couple as we left the scene. There was a point in hanging around. It was impossible to see.

"It's a high pressure place, all right," Oscar said, as we got into a taxi.
 "I'm still going to assassinate Humphrey," Doug said.

The taxidriver was silent. Maybe he thought Doug was for real. Who wants trouble? They mean it down there when they say violence is a way of life. Back in town we met a school teacher from Buffalo who told us he was on holiday; they had let the kids out to riot. He was glad for a bit of a rest.

 I cannot honestly remember what was said the next night. But on Wednesday night the debate on the Vietnam Peace Plank took place. A mass meeting was to be held in Grant Park, and we decided to meet back at the hotel if anyone got lost. And as if planned, when we got to the park, Doug and I were quickly separated from Freddy and Oscar. In the bandshell of the park, Rennie Davis, of the Mobilization for Vietnam Committee was speaking through a bullhorn to a crowd of about 3,000. When the cops arrived wearing gas masks. We were mildly amused and excited by these theatre heavies, but then, without warning, they move they were on us in the first wave of clubbings. Beating, smashing, grinding, clubbing, clubbing everyone that moved, everyone that didn't move, frothing and clubbing. A young negress stumbled by with an absurdly broken nose. She moaned and was hit from behind. Thwack! Crack! Heads were dropping cold in the gutter. The distant rumble had become a deafening scream and then on top of us was a hardosed panting red-faced bull, with hate in his eyes, snobbering and furious and big.

"You motherfuckers!" he almost laughed as he screamed.
 And he grabbed Doug by the hair. Doug kicked out and caught him in the shins and the cop's eyes burst as he brought the wood down. There! I heard a whip crack and looked around but then I realized that that crack had been Doug's head. It had cracked open, split apart on the pavement, and he was lying there still. You cunt, the cop muttered. And he tore off.

I dragged Doug to the sidewalk and was unmolested as the second wave of cops swept by. His head was literally pooled in blood. Thick red blood which seeped eerily from his temple. He mumbled a few words. And it seemed to me that he stopped breathing. All about us the cops were squashing faces, breaking teeth, and kicking the fallen. A horrified reporter was grabbed and beaten. His notes ripped and trampled underfoot, his glasses broken. The crowd surged from corner to corner like a trapped animal beaten back at all exits. Before our eyes huge, snorting sweating, megafisted

They'll chase the ones that are running," he said. We stood on the sidewalk jammed between a middeaged matron and two huge blacks, watching the melee across the park go our left, while to our right, the Poor People came on with an unreal passivity, floating up the street like a black cloud. As they reached us we saw of what this parade was comprised. Mostly negroes and hippies, a few ministers bunched together, some brave little housewives, and in their lead, the token mule train.

"Join us, join us," they were calling, and the sidewalkers began spilling forth adherents, everyone willing to join a peaceful protest, everyone in sympathy. We fell in as they went by and a lady in a football helmet touched Doug's arm and said: "You better walk in here, dear. The police don't like long hair."
 He thanked you, and we felt good. "Thank you, madam." We still weren't taking it too seriously.
 Well, we marched down to Balbo Avenue, perhaps 5,000 of us, and there the real trouble began. The police halted the mules and had a talk with Abernathy. We waited for a half hour, talking to the other marchers.

"Man, we ah gonna mahch raht into that pigsty and kick theah asses!" a black man said.
 "Yo keep yo boots to yosef sunken but with a mad and impish glee. His fragile bones linked heroically together, and there, gun in hand, absurdly poised for the kill of the invertebrate Humphrey.

"I don't think you could make a character assassination," laughed Oscar.
"Men have died, men have died," Doug intoned, "Restamus in paximus."
"It's not on the menu,"
Oscar said.

I sketch the above to give you something of the mood of that Sunday night, and to give you the gist of Doug Amber-croft who was here at U.C.
last year. Because he wasn't too well known. He did a couple of articles for the Review but this isn't exactly fame. The Making of Mollodrus was one, the other I've forgotten. They were both movie reviews and you probably wouldn't remember.
Anyway, for reference, he was twenty-one last year, in third year General English, and as I say, at U.C. He was a likeable guy with a deliciously ironic sense of humour, quite likely, as his form of private protest, to sail into a party with his fly smoke lobbing their tear gas, and the place exploded with screaming mothers. We fell back quickly but this was a mistake because from where the cannisters of gas had fallen in the crowd, they came lobbing back. People were returning them to the cops before they exploded.

Explode they did, but in the cops' faces, and this was like bandilleros to the bull. The cops ran forward past Doug and me, clubbing heads and shoulders, and making for Davis. Doug received a glancing blow but then the cops were past. They fell on Davis who was asking for calm through his bullhorn; they hit him and he went down heavily, and unconscious. The crowd went mad with wild jeers and screams and I felt an elbow in my gut as the crowd backed off. Figures were flying past. Let's get the hell out of here said Doug and we turned and made for Michigan Avenue. The crowd was bursting apart in all directions and sirens started up, howling through the din of clubs and moans. And then, down the avenue, we saw this weird procession which we later knew as the Poor People. That afternoon we went over to the Amphitheatre where the convention was being held, to have a look at the bayonets of the National Guardsmen. Doug had wise-cracked a bit but we were all surprised at the shrill invec-

Charlie bull, his face contorted in sweet rage, throttled a young nigger with one hand and beat him unconscious with a club in the other.
This went on for about an hour. When it had finally ended, the park and environment looked like a crazy circus. Some of the wounded limping off, the cops arresting most. And for some there were ambulances. Doug got to the hospital at ten-thirty.
And I waited in the cold vinyl hall, reading the Chicago Herald. There was a picture of Humphrey on the cover.
And at eleven-fifteen, a young doctor, bespectacled and serious, and somewhat at a loss, came and told me that my friend had died.
Well, Doug was not well known. But it must mean something that he actually died while the papers are filled with nothing but news of committee after committee. You can't help but feel somewhat hopeless when all this is going on. And no one caring. Because, as James Baldwin says, you get tired of talking when nobody's listening, when nobody wants to hear it.

A college girl, scared and excited said: Do you think they'll assassinate McCarthy?
A whitefaced kid came running past with blood on his face. Had we seen the Wizard? No, we hadn't seen him.
A long-fella, with spectacles.
No, we hadn't seen him.
And then, ahead of us a grumble began. A faint rumble which slowly built into a roar and which shook the cement, and we saw, about a hundred yards ahead, that people were falling back from the sidewalk as though from an invisible tidal wave. Several people could be seen running toward us and now a terrified white boy with big bleeding eyes and a Daley
T-shirt came flying past.
"They're coming."
I tried to look ahead to see just what was coming and Doug said I think we'd better split and then the whole crowd of 5,000 people suddenly fell apart like a cut watermelon, simply cracked open and kept going, and Doug and I saw in that widening wedge, a blur of blue helmets and flying clubs. The cops were beating everything in sight and before we could begin lobbing their tear gas, and the place exploded with screaming mothers. We fell back quickly but this was a mistake because from where the cannisters of gas had fallen in the crowd, they came lobbing back. People

stop the world it's herby, nate, jim'n' mac!

The great American drama critic emotes (draft one):
(As Herb Whittaker, Globe and Mail would write it):

One hundred and fifty devotees who attended "Stop The World, I Want To Get Off", Wednesday night at Hart House Theatre can't be wrong. Now may it be said that notwithstanding the slightly mistimed dancing and the slightly off key singing of various members of the cast, the buoyant humanity of Anthony Newley shone through to make the evening a bright and lively one for all.

Particularly charming, beautiful, gracious, and bewitching was Miss Ellen Cole, as the female heroine, Evie. Her acting was also good. To be congratulated on his meticulous, marvellous, incisive, beautiferous direction is Terry W. Starker, adding to the delight of the wonderful evening with his graceful manipulation of the warmly persuasive chorus line which added so much to the warmth and charm of the play.

• • •

As Jim McPherson, Telegram would write it: I tell you, they're mad, Virginia. They're tough too. Last night, after the performance of "Stop The World I Wanna Get Off", one hundred and fifty angry, sex-crazed engineers beat me up Wednesday night in the lobby of Hart House Theatre, (Ha Ha). They told me that if I didn't give it a good review, they'd shoot me with their cannon while I listened to the LGMB.

Well, wasn't Ellen Cole luscious as Evie, the done-wrong wife of Littlechap, the male hero? Littlechap, it must be said, was unfortunately not played up to par by Booth Harding Savage (but his name makes up for it). And the two blonds in the chorus line, well the dialectical pragmatism of the inherent selfishness of the character of Littlechap, the finale of "What Kind of Fool Am I?" could not but have succeeded were it not for the substandard voice of Mr. Savage.

I need hardly add a thing, so I won't.

(As Nathan Cohen, resident Star piranha would write it):

When will the engineers finally wake up and realize that they shouldn't have woken up at all? The unmitigated disaster at Hart House Theatre, foisted upon the unwitting audience sank to the lowest depths of unabashed theatrical rankness last night.

"Stop The World, I Want To Get Off", relies on two basic factors: the constant excellence of the hero Littlechap is a must and the dancing, (the whole show being very much a mime) must be perfect. Neither was so Wednesday night.

not up to the task of bringing this allegorically typical English success story to the heights it reached with Anthony Newley in London and Broadway. Anyways, the play isn't that good.

Booth Harding Savage, as Littlechap, the anti-hero didn't have the faintest, wee, itsy-bitsy teeny weeny, ippy-dippy, clunchy munchiest inkling of what was meant by the part which he was playing. Neither did Newley, who wrote the musical. This was very plain to see.

It is obvious that the engineers would be best to go looking again for their slide rules and drafting boards and forget forever the seductive lure of the footlights.

• • •

Well it's about time the university kids gave the taxpayer something for his hard-earned money, and did they ever Wednesday night at Hart House Theatre! Booth Harding Savage will have his name up in lights (if they can fit it all on the marquee) before I retire (which will be never, you hear, never!). And as for the female lead, Ellen Cole; well, her beauty graced the stage and was accentuated by a striking red mini-dress that really socked it to us (I've even co-opted your rhetoric, ha ha). Yes, sir, by cracky, if this is student power, then it certainly is nice.

THINK

Do you want to run this university? Do you want to see this university run by the students, by the faculty and the students, or even by the faculty alone? If you do, you might as well stop reading this ad. Paul Vesa is one candidate who, if elected to C.U.G., will make sure none of these things come about. Paul Vesa is one candidate who will make sure the rights of the owners of this university, the taxpayers of this province, are maintained. Make the rational choice.

tests at studio lab

When you walk into the Studio Lab Theatre at 41 Collier St. it may occur to you that you've mistakenly walked in on a private party. There are a few people at the rear, talking and drinking coffee, a few others on stage, someone fooling around with a carpet sweeper, several hippie-types, grown-ups and regulars walking around. You realize this is a theatre when you notice an elevated platform sometimes along a wall, sometimes in the centre, sometimes just not there (don't forget its an experimental theatre).

Studio Lab's first production this fall was Comings and Goings a series of skits, one-liners, communications, between five people . . . Each member of the audience had a number (well, they have to organize it somehow) and when yours appeared you had the privilege of choosing who was to be in the next segment, to exercise a preference for certain actors, for different bits.

The current production is called Tests, a selection of surrealist segments, canticles almost, written by Paul Abelman. It is a poetic, musical experience where words are employed for their lyrical effect, for emotive reactions, where sound and pattern rather than content are emphasized. Tests is a sensuous and emotional awareness before it is an intellectual one. Meaning and content are secondary to effect. The action is sometimes symmetric, often balletic, ebbing and flowing, reaching climaxes, denouement, relaxation.

I couldn't help but feel that the communication was in some new language. It was verbal, and highly dramatic, but the words took on a super-dimension, a greater cognitive value.

The audience was closer than in a normal theatre. The members interacted with each other as well as the people on stage. Action and reaction took on additional levels. It was impossible not to become excited about what was occurring before and around you.

All five actors are comfortable, talented, and they enjoy themselves with interest and enthusiasm for what they're doing. This feeling is communicated around and during the performances. During the intermission, the cast elicits small pieces of dialogue which it later collects, chooses from arbitrarily, memorizes and puts together to form short, humorous and highly-immediate improvisations. This section has been described on the program as a "work in progress" since it becomes possible to feel the actors accepting, concentrating and expressing their roles for the first time. Any one who wishes to join them is encouraged.

Every Sunday night, the group attempts a more obvious participation session. These are relaxed, yet intense experiences slowly moving towards inter-communication, expressionism between strangers, involvement on a personal level.

I want to tell it just like it is, but this leads only to a frustration because of the limitations of written communication.

Go see feel do experience it.

moira

I've avoided musicals for a long time now. It's always seemed that a musical is a group of catchy songs strung together by a scriptwriter apprenticed in situation comedies. This concoction is then administered by a handful of celebrated singer-dancers whose peculiar talent is to make you happy in spite of anything.

The musical is then farmed out across the continent, where ensembles ranging from big-name tour companies to little theatre groups try their best at imitating the "original Broadway show." It is a system which does nothing to promote creative music, writing or performance.

Which brings us to this year's Vic Bob Revue production of Moira, which continues at the Central Library Theatre until Saturday night. Moira proves conclusively that Victoria College for one isn't afraid of doing something original, provocative, funny and — I do not blush — charming.

The dialogue, staging, and acting provide some of the sharpest and most perceptive comment on campus sex and social hang-ups. Take for instance a scene in which three boys — in unison — go about seducing three girls. Or the grey-suited men who carry briefcases and benevolently oversee the fates of their young. Or the worker who has spent half his life grinding outlasses for Amalgamated Cutlasses, and the other locked by his wife behind a closed door.

Liberating him from the clutches of his vicious circle is only a symbol of how the rest of the young people themselves can cast off the values and taboos — instruments of repression — imposed from likewise to above.

Credit for an original and entertaining show should be shared equally by Mike Jones — who wrote the uptempo jazz score — and Ron Weills who wrote the dialogue and story. The entire cast, under the inventive direction of Gay Stinson, turn in polished performances as they set merily about proving a very simple but important point.

TOWNS I

of her bulk played in her eyes, as she looked at us, her silent son and her small, battered husband.

He began to speak again. "This is hunting time. You're lucky anyone's around. Most every man in these parts goes out with his sons and hunts bear for two weeks in the bush. Some of the men are too old to hunt. Their eyes go bad. But they still go out. Seven hunters were killed last week-end, drowned or got shot," he said with a flat, tired finality.

He talked then about the people "up back - off the road". "Law and order comes slow to these parts. Oftentimes health inspectors from Ottawa come up here to test the water in some of the wells and the people, they chase them off. Shooting at their trucks. Running them down on the road in their cars."

He kept talking because he seemed, in that dark diner, to be glad of new people to speak to. He spoke about the men who go poaching. Jack-lighting he called it. "Those inspectors are tough on the poor people. They catch you jacklighting out of season and they can take your car, your house, your gun, anything. There's nothing you can do."

Then the family decided to close the place so we waited outside in the car.

Frank and I walked up and down the highway watching the truck drivers putting their rigs through the turns at 60 miles an hour at 3:00 a.m. In the flat glare of their lights we couldn't see their faces but as they slammed the shift down on the turns we heard the dull engine roar become a gnashing whine.

Bruce and I returned to the diner the next day with a new fan belt. As the boy and I fitted the belt we talked too much, his silence forcing us to a false joviality. When we charged the battery the motor came back to life and we saw the silent boy's face flicker into a smile.

I drove the car and Bruce followed behind. On each side of the road I saw grey wood slat shacks and thin women standing in dusty yards. The rocky, worked-out soil of Lanark county. The scrub forest, useless for lumber or pulp. A people surviving on dirt farming and on the garages and motels along the roads between Kingston, Ottawa and Toronto.

The car died again at Harry Rhyder's garage, in Perth, but Bruce didn't see me stop. He went on to Ottawa looking for me.

Harry's wife said he was out hunting and wouldn't be back for some hours.

There was a huge neon sign over Harry's garage saying EAT so I went into the restaurant, ordered some coffee and watched the waitress. A tiny pale face, skin dull and oily from a life of making or eating French fries in the oil vats behind the counter, hair thin, short and teased. She brought me a coffee, poked a button on the Wurlitzer to start Buck Owens on "Your Cheatin' Heart" and then sat down to a Toronto Telegram. She ran her finger up and down the long columns of want ads, listing one or two bedrooms on streets she had never seen in a city two hundred miles away. "I must have read this paper thirty times . . ." she said to no one in particular.

I watched Harry's son run out in the hard cold night and put gas in people's cars. He checked oil, counted change, cleaned windshields and changed tires, hour after hour.

Young men in faded windbreakers brought their rusted Pontiacs up to the pumps but Harry's son didn't help them because they were from the area. They'd grown up driving cars and tractors. They leaned over the big V-8's and cursed their machines with affection while tightening fuel pumps, filling the rads with anti-freeze or dismantling the carburetor.

I looked out at Perth: a town raped by the demands of the highway, a barren way station between the big cities, a dirty strip of diners, gas stations, wrecked cars and city newspapers flung along the highway by the wind.

Harry returned from his hunting. He'd been gone a week and his face was thin, white-stubbed, aged with fatigue. As he leaned on the counter and I told him about my car, his wife fussed with the cuffs of his thick hunting jacket. "Harry, you hunters are crazy to go running round in the bush with your cuffs flapping around. Wonder you didn't catch yourself bad on a tree. How do you 'spect to catch anything when you're caught on a tree." She laughed and squeezed his arm. Harry's face lowered into a droll, foxy, grin. He drew on his cigarette and disappeared into the garage looking for a B79 generator and muttering, "That woman, Jesus . . ."

Harry and I talked in the garage. I was someone new to speak with and he liked me for that, even though I had interrupted his hunting. "I take two weeks a year to hunt. The rest of the time I'm working. You come right in the middle of the two weeks. I'm going back tomorrow."

Looking at my hair he asked what I did in Toronto.

"Student, Harry."

Pause.

"What do you study?"

"History."

Long Pause.

Then he talked about the history of his land. The old iron foundries. The worked-out mines. "I been up to some of them in the bush," he said. "There's jack pines that thick", he said measuring off a foot with his hands, "and jack pines don't grow any bigger. The mines must be old."

He told me about a gold mine with two huge steam boilers. "Biggest, goddam boilers you ever seen."

I asked what they were for.

He looked at me, city boy, right in the eyes and said: "To sell stocks, lad."

I asked him about the hunting.

"Got six deer and a bear. Could have had another bear. He was twenty yards from me and I had a clear shot but we was caught in a swamp, splashing and struggling and I didn't take him."

It took two hours to fit the new generator. Harry lay on the cold, oily floor under the engine and I held his wrench on the cold bolts. The engine became a whore to Harry. A bitch of a woman keeping him from his home. He cursed the little English engine. "Darn bolt, go on. I wanna go home," he muttered from underneath the car. He hated her but he had spent his life around engines and as he put his huge knotted hands to an incredibly delicate filing of steel bits for the generator he said, "She's a beauty machine. Those Englishmen know how to make a machine."

After the job was finished and Harry was washing his hands with Varsol, a fleshy, uniformed Pinkerton guard came into the garage and asked for directions to a high school dance at the Legion Hall in Cambelltown. Harry watched the uniform as he gave directions: forty miles down the highway, right on Langer's road, over the bridge, down a hill two miles, right at a stop sign, through Cambelltown to Mill Street, along Mill to Jack's Corner Store then left to the Hall." A fox's knowledge of the terrain. The guard went off to his fat car, confused.

Harry watched him get into his car and then whispered to me: "Ha, the secret service is gone. That uniform . . . Jesus."

I reached Ottawa at 1:30 a.m., twenty hours after leaving Toronto.

So I'm writing this for you two hundred miles and two weeks away from Harry's garage. But we're separated from him by more than time and distance and we never see these people unless our machines break down as we drive from one big city to another.

maxine brown's sophisticated rock

Maxine Brown is a lovely, sophisticated young singer with a strong, polished voice. She sings what some would call soul and others would call R & B or rock and roll, but it doesn't matter what it is called. She's good.

She came up what she calls

"the same old route," starting out in South Carolina with church music and then getting into gospel groups when her family moved north. She might have moved up in the business by winning singing competitions as many other young singers have done, but she got a break in 1961 when a small New York record company issued a demo tape after it had been turned down by the big companies (female singers were out in the early '60's). The song, "All in My Mind," was a hit, and her career began.

Shortly afterwards, she made her debut at the Apollo in New York. Since then she has been making more records and playing in nightclubs across the States.

All singers try to get close to the audience, but for many it doesn't quite work except on rare, happy occasions. Maxine Brown has a very sensitive feel for her audience, and she knows all the tricks of getting it with her. If something doesn't work, there's no fumbling. She goes on to something else until she's found the way to that audience. Between sets she makes the small changes she thinks are necessary for that audience, but basically she has had it worked out long ago. From the moment she steps on the stage she gives the feeling that she is there with her people — the people who have come to listen to her.

She does a variety of songs, but whatever their origin, they are done in a basically R & B mode. Many of the songs are currently popular soul songs like "Sweet Soul Music" which she uses to do imitations of the Temptations, the Miracles, and then to swing into her own song "Hold On. I'm Coming."

The group which travels with her has Bernie Worrell on piano, James Atkiss, drums, and Leon Pendarvis, bass. She is lucky to have this group. They are excellent, highly trained young musicians. They sound good together before she comes on, which is not too often the case with accompanying groups, and they give her the solid, strong beat she needs.

Maxine Brown's recent record is Out of Sight (Epic BN 26395). I listened to it before I went to hear her do a couple of sets at the Colonial, and it struck me as smooth and pleasant, but nothing to get very excited about. It has some tasteful strings and a nice vocal group, and she sings some good songs. If you like the Motown sound, you will like this record, but the great power of her voice doesn't come across, and that's where her excitement lies. I hope Epic can capture it better on her next record. A live session might do the trick.

***

James Brown made his annual or biannual trip to Toronto last Friday. I caught his show at Maple Leaf Gardens for the first time, and I was disappointed by what I saw and heard. He got some enthusiastic reviews and there was a certain amount of mass action by the audience, but he really isn't an exciting performer.

A great many of the big rock performers have things they do to generate excitement. James Brown does an incredibly loose-footed dance, he knocks the mike around, he falls on his knees, and he has a long series of fake conclusions which got the audience in the ice level seats surging around the bandstand.

But the real excitement in a rock show has to be in the singing, and James Brown's songs just aren't good enough. The result is that you tend to watch all the extras in the show rather than the main feature. At one point almost the entire audience around me was far more interested in figuring out if the go-go dancer's bottom was really as bare as it first appeared to be, than they were in listening to James Brown. In fact, except for three girls who did some occasional spasmodic clutching in response to James Brown, the audience where I was never seemed to get more than mildly interested in the show. As for the super finale, if you're not caught up in the show by that time, the whole thing looks so mechanical and put on as to be dull.

However, there's a chance to get to see a good soul show. Wilson Pickett is booked into O'Keefe Centre next Tuesday for two shows, and if he isn't overwhelmed by the big place, it ought to be good. Don't be put off Jeannie C. Riley. She has to be better than the local groups that took up two thirds of the program when he was at Massey Hall last year. This time they have also had the good sense to bring in additional, respectable talent

"...and his mother called him Bill."

"... and his mother called him Bill". Duke Ellington RCA Victor LSP 3906.

It is easy to feel disappointed about Duke Ellington these days. He almost never, it seems, lives up to one's expectations. When you go to an Ellington concert, chances are the band will play the same old tunes, with the occasional new composition thrown in — which only makes you burn with frustration when you realize that Ellington is still the greatest composer, orchestra leader, and maybe even the best piano player, in jazz, if only he would get down to it.

And his records are very much the same. Although, by current standards, most of them are pretty good, still one is always waiting for the one that will show that Duke is as great as he ever was.

But consider what it means to demand that Ellington always (or even occasionally) live up to the standards he has set. There is, on RCA Victor, a record called In A Mellotone, which contains 16 pieces that Ellington recorded in 1940-42. Of these, 15 are masterpieces unequalled in jazz, and the other one is unusual and interesting. Every piece is highly structured, orchestrated with matchless genius, and contains definite solos by some of the greatest jazzmen who ever lived. Never is there the sense of a series of solos supported by a band, for each piece is a total orchestral performance, with the solos an inherent part of the whole structure. A quarter of a century later this music is still alive, still fresh, unique, still full of more subtleties to discover. And after all this time, no one has yet managed to equal or surpass Ellington's achievement in the creation of orchestral jazz.

But, of course, this record consists of music culled from only the best of a large number of pieces recorded over a period of two years when Ellington and each and every man in the band was in his prime. However, anyone who is familiar with this collection cannot help regarding it as a single unified artistic work, since all the music is of uniform excellence. And therefore, we have hopelessly high expectations.

Consider too, that Ellington has been leading his men on a continual tour of one-night-stands at dances, concerts, and clubs for the last four decades. And these men are not new young, eager musicians. Harry Carney has been with Ellington without a break since 1926. Cootie Williams and Johnny Hodges joined the band in 1928 and are still there. Lawrence Brown has been with the Duke, off and on, since 1932. By now, they might be getting tired.

Nevertheless, people still hope for nonpareil greatness every time the Ellington orchestra makes an appearance. When the Duke joined Reprise records in 1961, and Cootie Williams rejoined the band after a 20-year absence, another golden age appeared at hand. With an unprecedented complete freedom to record whatever he wanted, Ellington gave promise of great things to come with his first release for Frank Sinatra's company. Afro-Bossa contained orchestral writing of the highest order and seemed to signal a return to the unique compositional concepts of Ellington's greatest period.

But when Ellington turned to Mary Poppins to find his music, it became obvious that Afro-Bossa was a freak occurrence. There followed a string of rather nondescript records (with some bright spots of course). When he returned to Victor, things did not improve. Lately, the Duke has concerned himself with attempts at light operatic works and diffuse, uninspiring religious tracts.

Yet, when something moves the Duke, he can still create wonderful music. The death of Billy Strayhorn in the summer of 1967 resulted in a tribute from Ellington that was worthy of the man who had joined the band at the onset of its greatest creativity and remained until his death 28 years later. Strayhorn had collaborated with Ellington in the composition and orchestration of music for the band, and the two men had a musical relationship which is probably unique.

All the compositions on "... and his mother called him Bill" were written by Strayhorn; most of them are unknown but excellent nevertheless. For once the band sloughs off its usual sloppiness, and does justice to the music. It is obvious that all the men really cared about this record; the result is the most satisfying Ellington oeuvre in a long time.

a small town meeting

The small auditorium of the old Town Hall was packed tight with citizens, interested and eager to hear their candidates to govern the town for the next two years.

It was mostly an elderly crowd, people in their late forties and fifties, many retired. They were "local" people; they knew each other and they knew the candidates. ("Tom never was much of a speaker.") A few young faces, but I was easily the junior of the lot at twenty-one.

Born and raised in the town mostly, they'd been coming to these meetings ever since they could remember. Right up at the front was Shorty Keats, five feet tall, over eighty, still in fine condition. He walks by himself for miles every day around the town, and just re-married to the consternation and merriment of us all. Nearer the back were Will Fish, the high school botany teacher, and Mr. and Mrs. Dean, veteran proprietors of the snack bar at the rink. Over in a corner were a bunch of the boys from the firehall in their shiny red jackets. So it went. All one needed to do was look up and there was another familiar face, another venerable figure of the town.

The place was packed because of an issue which had raised bitter controversy throughout the town over the past month and a half, an issue which comes to every fledgling municipality at some crucial point in its existence: Urban Renewal.

Urban Renewal meant change and once again the age-old battle of tradition versus progress was being waged. The proposed redevelopment, which had narrowly passed council the week before, constituted a complete revamping of the town's quaint, antiquated, narrow Main Street. A spectacular Mall was to result, a show-piece to flaunt before the city slickers.

Once the business and merchandising hub of the community, Main Street was dwindling drastically in importance as more and more people sought the convenience of the large Plaza and drove into the nearby city. But the drastic transformation which Urban Renewal promised frightened a lot of people, including many of the Main Street merchants, who feared having their shops torn down.

George Richardson, candidate for mayor, was the first speaker of the evening and his rambling, drawn-out speech blended perfectly with the drab yellow wallpaper, dusty venetian blinds and pink radiators which surrounded the room.

No one could understand what George was saying but he wanted it clearly understood that he stood firmly for Urban Renewal. Chairs creaked as George rambled on until finally the kindly, white-haired chairman broke in quietly and informed George his time was up. George stumbled to conclusion: "I will do my utmost to help form this town a better place to live at the lowest cost to the taxpayers."

The next speaker was candidate for councillor, Trevor Phippard. Suitably incoherent, he rocked and reeled nervously at the lectern but he did manage to get in a lick at poor George Richardson. "A few years ago I worked on a budget for George Richardson but it never got anywhere because he couldn't explain it to the council. If Richardson had eighteen hundred more years on council he still wouldn't be able to understand the budget." The crowd gasped as Phippard's bluntness sank in. Phippard concluded, "As an asterthought (sic), I promise to you, one, you will know how your money is spent, and two, you will know what is going on."

Phippard was followed by Mrs. Doris Blair, a pretty lady dressed tastefully and matronly in a blue dress and prim brown hat. A Main Street merchant affected drastically by Urban Renewal, she spoke in a sincere, dignified tone of voice which won the crowd's respect.

"Since January first, 1945," she said with obvious pride, "I have been a merchant in this town. Now I find that I will be one of the merchants eliminated by Urban Renewal. My friends, I am for renovation, but I am not for extermination." A great burst of "hear! hear!" echoed from the crowd. "We on the Main Street have served this town well. I may not have the fanciest place around, and many of you go to the Plaza and to the city, but, my friends, there was a day when you came to our shops...now I went to town council a few months ago and said I would like the answers to a few questions, but I found I couldn't get them...If I'm elected, I will do my very best, and, believe me, I'll ask questions!" The crowd believed her and clapped loud and long for the gutsy little lady.

At this point the chairman rose slowly from his well-warmed chair, a slight smile on his face. He addressed the candidates: "Ron Doner is in the second row over there. Now then, when Ron Doner stands up you'll know your time is up." The crowd roared with laughter. Ron Doner is the town's contribution to the professional wrestling ranks.

Henry Vandenburg spoke next and ended his talk with great impact; "I have the time and the desire and I would like to have the opportunity to serve my community in 1969 and '67." The crowd whispered and chuckled to each other, smug and superior that they had noticed poor Henry's mistake. Eyes twinkling the chairman looked at the flustered candidate. "I believe there is room for a little jibe there, Henry."

The town athlete, Bob Forhan, came smiling up to the rostrum, nervous, hurried, 'gee whiz' written all over his dimpled visage. Forhan, who had represented Canada twice in Olympic hockey, rushed through a brief paragraph he had written out, grinning self-consciously, knowing he was going over like a soggy bagel. But the crowd liked him, nothing pompous or pretentious. A small town reserves its ire for the stuffed shirts.

Bob Gapp, a big guy with the rumpled face of a boxer, haltingly made his way to the front as the next candidate, looking cramped and uncomfortable in his awkward-fitting suit. He drawled in a gruff voice, "When I com' t' town I's told was a dead town. But in past two years has really come to life. I hope and trust that you will vote fore me on December second." He sat down to a puzzled sprinkling of applause. Bob was a bit of a newcomer to the town.

The other candidate for mayor, Tom Surgeoner, followed and interest perked up. The crowd hoped that Tom, a well-known opponent of Urban Renewal, would set the wallpaper to peeling with vociferous verbal fireworks about the situation, but "Tom never was much of a speaker". Matter-of-fact homilies were all poor Tom could muster, and even the town-folk could tell he wasn't saying much.

"I operate a business on the Main Street. I've been here since 1947. This town is my home...We all get hurt a little but that's the way the democratic system works...politics is a stormy trip...where we may differ there is no animosity unlike three years ago...let's live together as good neighbours...you know where I stand on Urban Renewal...we need a community centre...I humbly ask your support."

Between George Richardson and Tom Surgeoner, the town had a meagre choice for mayor.

The parade of rhetoric continued with the most pitiable candidate of the night, Lou Stephens. Lou was a familiar town figure, tall, old, and gaunt. Of him it might be said, "Hold him up to the light, not a brain in sight." No one could understand what he was doing up there running for council, least of all, it seemed, Lou himself. The old gentleman looked a trifle confused but managed to stammer out: "I am opposed to Urban Renewal the way it is. Now you all hear what we should do and what we shouldn't do. Well I for one am for everything we should do. I thank you."

Then came young Tom Cleland, smirky businessman, John Insley ("I will ask your support as I have always done."), Tom Taylor, looking and growling like Jonathan Winters, Seneca Cook ("my record is there; I don't need to make a speech."), Aubrey Smith, but guy with a crew-cut, terribly honest and sincere but with an unfortunate Elmer Fudge speech impediment, Hugh Grant, resplendent in brown suit and bright red socks, and the last candidate, stately, dignified Mary Commissiong, silver-haired chairman of the local Professional Club of Women ("I believe there should be a woman on council and if you agree with me, then the women have to go out and work to get that woman in!")

The ladies in the crowd clapped appreciatively while their husbands looked on in

ART

People who recall the recent exhibition here in Toronto of Jackson Pollock's oil painting on glass will appreciate the work recently applied to the front window of the Varsity. Entitled "Febble Brains" (artist anon.), it will be auctioned off next Thursday night by Henry Tarvainen, well-known aficionado of the "splash your boots" school of urinal decoration. Proceeds will go to the Varsity kidney operations fund, a fund set up for people on the Varsity who need kidney operations.

ET CETERA

For the best free theatre on campus (besides SAC meetings) get out and see the CUG candidates when they come to your local supermarket. Tell Mom to get one these slow talking, serious, (ultra serious models for private display only) students for your very own. Watch in amazement as they tell you that this is the most momentous decision you will ever make in your life (electing them to talk with the biggies). Hear them say they can't decide whether to abolish the board of governors. See their teeth gnash as Twitchy comes up with dull lines, and Andy Wernick grins. See whether Mrs. McGillicuddy, the fishmongers wife will really get a set on the senate. All this and Steve Langdon too! It's a must to see.

MUSIC

Skip Bergman, U of T Blues water polo star, tells us that this Sunday night's Hart House concert will feature Spanish guitarists and ole ole ole flamenco dancers. The Great Hall will resound to clacking boots, castanets, tight good guitar and you should be there. Trust Skip, he's a water polo star.

Olive Brown will continue to sing her fine blues with Henry Cuesta's quartet at the Cav-A-Bob next week. On Saturday she and the group appear with the Toronto Symphony at Massey Hall. Moe Koffman will end his stay at George's Spaghetti House this weekend and next week's artist isn't yet set. Tenor sax man Lou Donaldson is now at the Town with Chris Carter following him next week. Salome Bey sings with Gene Edwards on guitar and the Don Thompson group at the Kibitzeria again this weekend. She's worth hearing. "Harvest of Stars" at O'Keefe Centre Tuesday night headlines Wilson Pickett and Jeannie C. Riley. The Colonial, for a change of pace, have brought in the exciting young R&B singer Maxine Brown. Recommended.

BARBARA REID

Miss U of T is no dumb blonde

By JIM COWAN

Barbara Reid, this year's Miss University of Toronto and a candidate for the Miss College Bowl title, does a lot to destroy the stereotyped image of a beauty contest winner.

A fourth year modern history student at Victoria College, Barbara was chosen at the Homecoming Dance to represent U of T. This week she's been kept busy with civic receptions, parades and press conferences. The celebrations climax tonight with the Canadian College Bowl parade and game.

As might be expected, Barb has a full schedule of extra-curricular activities, centered particularly around her fraternity and the Vic bridge club. But she also finds time to take a keen interest in campus and college politics.

"The college is not here primarily for an education purpose," said Barbara in an interview Wednesday, "because most classes are not taken at the college. It is supposed to provide a social atmosphere.

"The college role will have to change radically in the next 15 years. I don't know what the college will be like, but I can't see it becoming academically more important."

Mark Nakamura (IV Vic), a SAC rep and fellow bridge nut, wandered past to ask if Barb had time for a bridge game. "She's a very good player — for a girl," he commented.

"I don't think there's a particularly stereotyped character at Vic," said Barb. "Vic students aren't in cliques, it's just natural for friends to get together." But there are problems. "At Vic, the kids find it hard to orient because we're so far from the main part of the campus. Victoria College students will study in the main library and go to Hart House instead of coming all the way back here."

Barb got into a conversation with another friend from fourth year, Antoinette DeKir, on The Woman at University. "I've had more arguments with friends who say 'You mean you didn't come to university to find a husband?' Maybe that used to be the case, but it's not now," says Barb.

Miss U of T plans to enter the School of Business next year, and typically, she has good reasons. "I don't think I want to be a teacher—lots of people think teaching is the only thing a girl can go into.

"I worked in personnel at a bank last summer, and I'm interested in personnel work and marketing. Many girls who apply are turned down because the employer thinks they aren't really interested. A diploma in business should show your interest!"

Barb's term at Vic has seen some of the fastest change the university has ever undergone. "The results were a long time in coming, but they came so quickly you had to take note of them," she says. "I don't think it was the professors who were all that conservative. The students thought that fewer hours of lectures would mean easier courses. But it's much harder to prepare for a seminar."

She also finds the university much freer now. "A few years ago," she noted, "You had to have two particular courses to take a fourth year course. There's nothing like that now."

"Apathy" and "student power" are clichés Miss U of T objects to. "I don't like the don't mention on the forthcoming referendums, saying "Probably the referendum is a good idea. Objections to the idea of SAC and what it's all about should be talked about."

He feels engineering support is crucial to SAC — "even to the question of its continued existence. It's that important." But, "if there's anyplace on campus that understands the necessity for cross-campus unity, it's the engineers. I think we'll win it."

Langdon also thinks pharmacy "will go the way the engineering vote goes. Pharmacy is too small a faculty to survive on its own."

The U of T chorus added a cultural note with a slow, sombre rendition entitled "When We Work by the Sweat of Our Brain."

The first verse — "The summer was long and the work, it was scarce; come back to school with no bad. So we choose 'Room, r 'Food', since there's no time to earn, enough to keep up, for there's so much to learn. When we work by the sweat of our brain"

Boos and hisses greeted the Ontario Minister of Education, William Davis. His main argument "Changes must relate to the amount of money available," was challenged with cries of "Tax words 'student power' because of their association with violence. I really agree with the idea of student participation — and by that I mean over 50 per cent — but I don't think students are equipped to evaluate their own courses. Students in upper years should be doing critiques on lower year courses."

The conversation finally got around to the question. Says Barb: "I don't know what to expect from this weekend. The other interviews (screen applicants for Miss Victoria College and Miss U of T) were much more relaxing than I expected."

"I really want to get excited about winning and when I stop to think about it, I am. But it all happened so fast that I have to stop and organize to get excited!"

Miss College Bowl will be chosen by a panel of radio, television and newspaper personalities, and the winner will receive the use of a Jeep convertible for a year. Barb was faintly critical of the Blue and White for not letting her know what the plans were for the Bowl festivities. "I'm sure the girls from out of town, must have known what was happening. I had to go over to the SAC office on Wednesday to find out."

To say that Miss U of T is attractive, intelligent and articulate is obviously unnecessary. But for those of you who are interested in such things, she is 21 years old, gives her vital statistics (reluctantly) as 35-22-34, and says that, while she doesn't have a steady boyfriend, there is "someone special".

Too bad, guys!

The U of T committee will change the housing service so that it can reserve places as well as list them," said SAC President Steve Langdon last night. "I feel it will have authority over university residences also."

After what Langdon calls "a grudging acceptance in principle" a month and a half ago, the administration finalized its decision Tuesday when Langdon met with Executive Assistant Donald F. Forster and Registrar Robin Ross.

"We think much of the earlier opposition came from the deans of residence," said Langdon. "and the student members will probably be appointed in consultation with the residences."

Langdon. "They'd be more likely to push for reform than the faculty." Representatives from the Housing Service, the SAC housing chairman, and others concerned will be ex officio members.

Of the seven student members, four will be nominated by SAC, and one will be elected from university residences, one from affiliated colleges' residences, and one from the graduate and married students' residences.

"However, election is not possible this year," said Langdon. "and the student members will probably be appointed in consultation with the residences."

Candidates attack B of G at CUG forum

By CAROLYN CAUGHLEY

Most of the eleven candidates for the four student positions on the Commission for University Government came out last night in favor of giving vastly increased power to faculty and students.

All eight candidates present agreed:

- That decisions on all levels should be made openly
- That the board of governors and the Senate be abolished

Ten faculty members have been nominated to the Commission on University Government, of which four will be chosen from a ballot mailed to all full-time teaching staff at the U of T.

The following candidates will stand in the four constituencies:

From the Humanities: Prof. J. B. Conacher (History), Prof. R. A. Green (English), and Prof. L. E. M. Lynch. (Philosophy).

From the Social Sciences: Prof. J. E. Hodgetts (Political Economy), and Prof. Ian Burton (Geography).

From the Physical Sciences: Prof. Ken Fisher (Zoology Chairman), Dr. C. Scott Russell (Medicine), and Prof. J. S. Thompson (Anatomy).

• That committees composed equally of students and staff should make all decisions affecting them directly, subject only to the ruling of a higher body composed by at least a majority of staff and students.

Ron Thompson (SGS) pointed out that such rulings would necessarily make the system inefficient, but added inefficiency would help preserve individuality.

Gary Webster (SGS) proposed a "buffer body" appointed by the legislature to act as a clearing-house between the University and the Legislature, in place of Government appointees on the highest governing body of the University.

Roger Smith (II Trin) opposed the idea of complete control by faculty and students, favoring a fairly large representation of laymen on the governing body.

Bill Rockett (SGS) advocated the principle of the administration being "employees" of the faculty and student body.

He feels that government and private industry exercise enough control through their grants.

D'Arcy Martin (III Trin) felt the governing body of the university must contain some laymen simply to avoid public backlash.

Steve Grant (II Vic) agreed the administration should be seen as a civil service rather than a power.

Bob Rae (IV UC) said candidates would have the "almost impossible task" of convincing the legislature that change will not be destructive to the interests of the taxpayers of Ontario.

Donald Young (II UC) favored eventual student participation at the highest levels of university government, but said that the students would have to prove themselves in lesser committees first.

Graduate Students Union President John Winter plans to protest the eligibility of Twitchy the tape recorder in the Commission on University Government elections.

The SAC executive decided at a meeting last night to let Twitchy run. Her name on the ballot is listed under the ATL number of graduate student Laurel Limpus, who will carry Twitchy into meetings.

Winter said last night he plans to:

- call an emergency meeting of the GSU executive to discuss the possibility of protesting the whole election;

- consult GSU lawyers to see if a legal injunction can keep Twitchy out of the election.

"KEEP THOSE LETTERS COMING IN FOLKS!"

WRITE TO BISSELL TODAY!

There is a real danger that the Board of Governors may stall on the graduate student application for withdrawal from the Students' Administrative Council at its meeting on November 28.

Section 34(3) of the University of Toronto Act (1947) guarantees each student the right of direct access to the President, and via the President to the Board, on matters "he is or may deem himself to be entitled to complain".

Please do not let the Administrators foil a democratically taken student decision. Write to Bissell today! If necessary, ask for an interview!

cutting competent help bugs Watt

By PHIL BINGLEY

As the end of training camp and the exhibition schedule draws near, Varsity coach Tom Watt can only look back on the last few weeks with mixed emotions. No coach could be less than ecstatic with the skinny talent who will don Blue and White threads this season.

TOM LITTLE

Yet when one considers the fact that nearly a dozen intercollegiate calibre players were cut from the roster, he might understand Watt's frustration.

"I hated to cut any of these fellows," moaned Watt, "but there was no way we could keep them. In some cases it wasn't so bad since the boy was young enough to play in another competitive league (Junior B for example). To tell you the truth though, I believe the other players are simply being wasted. There is just no place for them to go."

One solution to this problem would be to create a "second" team to handle the overflow of manpower. (In fact, the sponsorship of junior squads in sports such as football, soccer, rugby and basketball would eliminate similar shortcomings). Unfortunately, however, the training and playing facilities for such an undertaking are not available.

Back at the rink, two lads who are most relieved to see the end of cutdowns are Tom Little and Adrian Watson. They survived the tightest battle in at least five years for the two goaltending berths on the team.

Little was with Blues two seasons ago but took last year off in favor of a trip to Europe. He re-enrolled in a political science makeup course this fall and hopes to complete a master's degree in that subject in 1970.

Despite the twelve month layoff, Tom has looked extremely sharp in practices and in the one exhibition game he played — a 12-3 win over Montreal Carabins.

"I have to admit I am surprised with the way things have worked out after the year off. Cutting down the angles correctly is still a problem but I actually feel better now than when I played two years ago."

Watson is a first year soc. and phil. student who played last with Monarch Park high school (he was an all-star there) and Agincourt juveniles. Adrian claims he is having a few problems combining schoolwork and hockey but feels he can work them out. He also has his own theory about the practice-pernig system here at Varsity.

"It's hard work and takes a lot of time yet I'm in good shape because of it. I used to hate to skate because my legs became so tired. Working out every night cured that and I actually enjoy skating now."

Some teams specialize in scoring a couple of quick goals and then playing way over their heads. Since this formula has spelled disaster for Blues several times in the past, good work by Watson and Little is of paramount importance.

NOTES . . . Blues travel to Clarkson and Potsdam, New York this week-end for games with Clarkson Institute of Technology and St. Lawrence University . . . The team's exhibition record currently stands at three wins, one loss. . . First league game of the year is Wednesday night at Guelph. This game was originally scheduled to be played here. . . Varsity fans will get their first look at Blues when Loyola comes to town next Friday night for an exhibition game. Game time is 8 p.m. at Varsity Arena.

INTERFAC ROUNDUP

By GELLIUS
SOCCER PLAYOFFS

Fatizis' two goals were of primal importance (that is, "important to a monkey") in Innis' 2-1 upset of Sr. Eng. Homatidis found the range once.

Bulletin: Erindale, who received a bye into the playoffs, beat first-place SGS 2-1 on goals by Damel and Artyszuk. Hughes replied for SGS.

Phe A scored as many goals again as SMC B, 6-3. Eizenas (2), Godin, Plastina ("Fantastic Plastina Lover" — Jefferson Airplane), Kishinoto and Vincze (cf. "In Hoc Signo Vincze") scored for PHE A.

RUGGER PLAYOFFS

Trin slaughtered Eng 11, 16-0. Scott (3), Whalley (4), Publisher Parish (3), Compton (4), and Liewellyn (3) made up the total.

UC defaulted to PHE. (They showed up, decided the field was a mess, went home, and were unfortunately contradicted by the referee.)

HOCKEY

Sr. Eng. (Zabolotney, Currie, Ty Cobb "Georgia Peach" Pitts) beat PHE A, 3-1. Emery replied for PHE A.

Fraser, Brown, and Dawkins scored as Vic defeated Trin A (Murray), 3-1.

Innis edged Knox, 2-1. Wilson and Akihiro (he's married to Akihiroine) lead Innis; No. 16 (who was that masked man?) hit for Knox.

Sparkman's hat trick was the margin in Vic II's 4-1 victory over Devonshire. McClelland had the other Vic II tally; Buddy Bolden scored for Dev.

Three goals by White and singles from Markle and Peluca ("Peluca books are not for sale in the US for copyright reasons) paced Bus' 5-2 win over For A. Cox and Mol Flinders scored For goals.

BASKETBALL

Despite 14 points by THE GREAT PUMP, SMC B edged Scar, 41-40. O'Connor's 17 (sc. "points") led SMC B.

Laglia picked up 16 as SMC took Sr. Eng., 40-30.

Erin slaughtered Dents A, 54-37. Shaw had 30 for Erin, Mon Kapitain 8 for Dents A.

CANADIAN COLLEGE BOWL SHOULD BE A REAL ICY BLAST

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

The wind whistled through the trees, the players whistled through their teeth, and Hayley Mills whistled down the wind. Whorling snow obscured instructions and it was zero at the bone.

Such were conditions as Queen's Golden Gaels and Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks got in their last practice before their confrontation in the Canadian College Bowl, Friday night at Varsity Stadium.

Whoever scheduled a night football match in Canada little more than a week before December should see a psychiatrist. Of course anyone who goes to a psychiatrist should have his head read.

Both teams worked out yesterday afternoon at Trinity College, much to the chagrin of the hard-working scholars inside who complained of excessive distraction while trying to mend their robes. (If robes owned a son named pierre would the son be robespierre? Am I Gellius?)

Queen's attired themselves out quickly in nifty grey sweat togs and zipped through their work-out in fine style. It's difficult to see them beating Waterloo by less than two touchdowns. Varsity Blues' coach, Ron Murphy, claims their only weakness is their defense against a short pass, which is a pretty miniscule weakness.

Lutheran is a bit of an unknown quantity. Their only game against an SIFL opponent this year resulted in a decisive loss to University of Waterloo. But that was in the early season and the Golden Hawks have come on like horse and buggy since then.

Hawks' forte is defense. Although the calibre of their opposition hasn't been of the highest standard, they've still managed to impress many observers with their hard-hitting brand of football. (Of course you realize I'm making this up.)

Their standout performer is lineman Mike McMahon, who goes both ways and won the most outstanding player award in the Central Ontario Intercollegiate this year.

GOLDEN GAELS

RAHAM WINS IT ALL

It's official. Varsity Blues' football star, Mike Raham, is the best collegiate player not only in his own league, but in all of Canada as well. Already a winner of Blues' own Johnny Copp Trophy, Raham has now been named recipient of the Omega Trophy as most valuable player in the SIFL, and the Hec Creighton Trophy as the outstanding college player in Canada. Congrats, Mike!

GOLDEN HAWKS

Now it's the Waterloo Golden Hawks working out with portly mentor, Dove Knight, barking instructions in his peculiar southern drowl. Hawks sure look ogile, don't they?

CUG

The complex proportional representation system to be used for the CUG elections tomorrow is meant to assure that a representative group of students is sent to act on our behalf. Based on the procedures for electing the five senators from each state in Australian elections, the system works as follows:

lots cast is counted. This total is divided by the number of persons to be elected plus one, i.e. in this case 4 plus 1, or 5. This number plus one is called a "quota". To put it in mathematical form, if the quota is "q", total voters is "x", and the number to be elected is "n",  $q = \frac{x}{n+1} + 1$ .

1) The total number of ballots cast is counted. This total is divided by the number of persons to be elected plus one, i.e. in this case 4 plus 1, or 5. This number plus one is called a "quota". To put it in mathematical form, if the quota is "q", total voters is "x", and the number to be elected is "n",  $q = \frac{x}{n+1} + 1$ .

2) After mixing all ballots to avoid any faculty bias, all first preferences are counted. Each candidate who is over the quota in first preferences is declared elected and the extra votes cast for him over the quota are redistributed to the second preferences indicated. This procedure continues until no candidate has more than the quota.

3) At this point the candidate with the fewest first preferences is dropped and his votes transferred to the next highest preference indicated. This dropping process continues, combined with the transferring of excess votes indicated above, until the candidates reach the quota.

4) If one of the three is not a graduate student, the graduate student closest to the quota at that point is declared the fourth candidate elected. If one of the three is in graduate school, the regular process continues until a fourth candidate reaches the quota.

Believe it or not, the system guarantees that only four candidates can be elected, and that those elected will be overall the most preferred of those running.

CUG ELECTIONS TOMORROW

WHY VOTE?

The four students we elect will serve on the most important Presidential Committee of this university in over sixty years. They, along with four elected faculty members and President Bissell, will draft reforms in the overall governing structure of this university, from the question of whether the Board of Governors should continue to exist, to the question of the extent to which students should have a voice in departmental decisions.

VOTE TO ENSURE THAT YOUR IDEAS ARE REPRESENTED ON THIS COMMISSION

WHY IS A LARGE TURNOUT AT THE POLLS NECESSARY?

Students serving on the Commission must be able to point to widespread student concern about the issues CUG is dealing with in order to have any effective influence on other Commission members.

WHERE DO I VOTE?

A list of polls and the hours they'll be open is elsewhere in today's Varsity. Polls can be found in almost any area of the campus. Be sure you get to one. (Preferably before it closes.)

HOW DO I CHOOSE FROM ALL THE CANDIDATES?

A final CUG forum will be held today at 1 pm at Convocation Hall. A few pointed questions should make clear to you what the ideas of each candidate are --- all have pretty clear ideas. BE THERE!

VOTE TOMORROW - - - EARLY AND OFTEN

Nigger—the student as product

Last week a man told a group of university presidents to help students get summer jobs by going "Madison Avenue".

The man was W. H. Rutledge, Director of Operations for the University Career Planning Association, and the occasion was the annual meeting of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

Well, I promptly forgot the whole traumatic vision of cello-wrap students until I popped into Woolworth's yesterday and ordered my lunch to the plaintive strains of free enterprise — Noel . . . no kidding.

Old Rutledge was right, I thought, it's a buyer's market. He's hustling summer jobs in November and the shop keeper is acting like "lest we forget" refers to last year's profits.

Universities are big business; students are our most important product.

It doesn't matter what material it's made of as long as it has a good zipper. Do you have a good zipper?

More important — is your university president telling the world about your zipper and what your zipper can do for the world?

Rutledge said what you have to do is make film clips for local T.V. and sound tracks for public service announcements on the radio. Sell students like you sell a new car or, better still, like you sell something personal.

How about: "Industrialists, decide for yourself. Would you rather sit back and count the days on the calendar waiting for those tense moments, or go swimming and dancing any day of the month?"

"Looking for something cheap to fill in those little gaps in your assembly line? A little something to allow you to operate in freedom and comfort? Our product will let you rest easy without the embarrassment of a bulky payroll or expensive retirement plan.

"When your busy season ends, would you rather worry 'What do I do now?' or simply dispose by flushing away?"

"You probably know what we're talking about now. The complicated versus the modern way — why get involved with messy unions, the agony and restrictions of arbitration, when a simple summer insert will do the job?"

"Our product, developed by doctors and now used by millions, will take up the uneven flow often experienced during peak periods.

"A small investment will give you more confidence, peace of mind and flexibility. Let you slip out for that game of golf without the feeling that you've forgotten something.

"We have the student to suit your own personal problem, coming in junior, medium and extra strong.

"But don't just take our word for it — decide for yourself."

What we need, however, is more than a spot on radio here and a blip on the telly there. And Rutledge is the first to admit it.

He suggests a national organization linking students, administrators and government in common cause with some kind of overall theme.

Christmas has "the spirit of giving": Hal-lowe'en, "trick or treat". For our project I think we can profit from the rather industrious group of students at McGill who say: "Management is where the action is". Dynamic, what?

Now that the theme and goals are out of the way, a name to convey our message.

The boys in the head office submitted the following: the National Institute for Gaining a Greater Entrepreneurial Resource (NIGGER).

Our letters of introduction are now on the presses and will be out within the week.

They read:

"Dear factory owner:

If your profits are falling off because of increased labor costs, NIGGER is the answer to your prayers.

The National Institute for Gaining a Greater Entrepreneurial Resource is a tripartite organization for the collection and distribution of that all-important product, labor, into the mainstream of our economy. We carefully screen our recruits with the understanding that the university is here to serve you, the man who is making our country great.

We won't recommend just anybody. Only qualified technical and professional people willing to work for low salary under demanding conditions.

Why not let our representative drop up to see you? A NIGGER man can estimate your individual requirements in just a few hours.

Give yourself a break this summer — Make profits bigger, go NIGGER.

Yours for free enterprise,
Tom Black, Head NIGGER.

Fellow students, the answer to summer unemployment is close at hand.

As a NIGGER student both you and your country will benefit.

Don't delay: send away today for more information and a free button depicting an open palm, the national NIGGER symbol.

Remember, think NIGGER — it's good for you.

the CUG candidates

There's no excuse for crying that your views weren't represented in this Tuesday's election for the four student representatives on the Commission on University Government. The spectrum ranges from obdurate status quo to fairly sweeping change in the way this university is governed.

On paper the candidates' platforms appear similar — the real differences came out in the open forums. For those who can't attend today's forum at 1 p.m. in Convocation Hall, we present a consensus of the views of John Doyle, Paul MacRae, Noel Stickley and Carolyn Caughy, who together attended most of the forums.

Paul Fromm (111 SMC): A good speaker who has taken the trouble to find out what the issues are. However, his solutions to problems arising from these issues have been vague and, to a certain extent, demagogical.

He perhaps presumes too much in asking students to rely on his "judgement" in dealing with CUG matters, instead of coming out with clear policy statements. On SAC, his judgement has been largely negative. He considers SAC unrepresentative of student interests and votes against most motions, even when the vast majority of other reps, elected just as democratically as Fromm, are in favor of the motion.

He doesn't see the possibility of much change, and doesn't think students want much change. For example, he says students would rather have lectures than tutorials because tutorials are "too much work". The Board of Governors is a "fact of life" that will last "longer than any of us". He concedes that the Board's composition might change a bit, but that's about all. He will probably favor very little change on CUG.

Steve Grant (11 VIC): As the campaign has progressed Grant's platform has shifted in the direction of the more experienced candidates. His understanding of the issues seems to have been increased by the campaign, adding to his own experience as a Vic council member for two years.

Generally open-minded, his biggest step will be to clearly define what he wants the commission to accomplish instead of wavering, but given progressive fellow student members he should be able to do this easily.

D'Arcy Martin (III New): Probably the candidate who takes the commission most seriously as an agent of change, he nonetheless recognizes that a too-extreme position could alienate the outside public. He has dealt with administrators before, in one case on the Presidents Advisory Council, and argues effectively. Perhaps more than any other candidate, except Bob Rae, he recognizes that one must deal on a basis of equality with the administration and faculty to get any worthwhile results.

Bob Rae (IV UC): He is probably the most intelligent candidate in the running. Although he has strong ideals, he is open-minded enough to co-operate with other CUG membes and maybe even teach them something.

Like Martin, he has known the frustration of dealing with the higher levels of the university, but has had several successes. An effective and persuasive speaker, he was one of those instrumental in getting equal staff-student representation on the commission, and in excluding the Board of Governors as voting members.

Bill Rockett (SGS): Has obviously put a lot of thought into his platform, and defends it ably and intelligently. He is unrealistic on one point — the exclusion of the public from the eventual governing structure of the university. He places great importance on the work of course unions in improving the quality of education offered by departments. He has worked as an education reporter for the Newark Times in New York, and his understanding of the university structure is impressive.

Roger Smith (II Trin): Running on a platform of moderate activism, Smith's policies are almost identical to those of candidates he defines as "extreme left". On the whole, he seems misinformed about the workings of both student movements and the university. For example, he advocates "more communication" as a solution to the university's problems. In fact, there has been a great deal of communication between students, faculty and administration, much of it fruitless from a student's point of view.

Smith has some good ideas, such as implementation of a petition board for grievances or a pass-fail system of grading, but these are largely peripheral to the bigger issue of designing a new university structure. In debate with Bissell and faculty, he has probably not thought out his position clearly enough to see where their "pragmatic realism" is simply vested interest.

Ron Thomson (SGS): He seems rather vague about what the place of students in the new structure should be. He says that "students should form a "good part" of the governing council, adding that "50-50 representation with faculty isn't out of the question." For most of the other candidates, anything else would be out of the question.

This vagueness of purpose will not stand him in good stead during the hard debate of a commission meeting, although he speaks well. He is perceptive in recognizing that "the lines of difference (between progress and reaction) cut across student-faculty lines", but we aren't quite sure on which side of the line Thomson falls. However he is probably one who, when he makes up his mind, follows through strongly if he understands the situation.

Ron Thomson is, incidentally, not the same Ron Thompson who tried to get Tom Faulkner unseated last year).

Paul Vesa (I UC), is unclear about what he wants from the Commission. For example, although he recognizes that many students (including himself) are unhappy with the present system, he believes students and faculty should not have any power in changing the university because it is "owned" by the taxpayers. He obviously hasn't read enough Ayn Rand to say how his position squares with her view of the importance of the individual. In any event, he says he's only running for the Commission because it is "advisory", without any power to change. This puts him at odds with almost every other candidate.

Gary Webster (SGS): As a teaching assistant and graduate student, he would bring a view from two sides into the commission. He favors an in-depth re-examination of the purposes of the university, but is realistic enough to recognize that the public cannot be ignored. He taught for two years as a university lecturer in Nigeria, giving him a background in other educational systems. Along with his broad experience, he makes his points effectively and has gotten a good understanding of how the university works in his two years here.

Pbil Wulfs (SGS): There is some doubt about whether Wulfs really wants to get onto CUG at all. He describes himself as a "chronic absentee", and attended not one of the CUG forums to make his views known. In fact, he says his own views are unimportant, that his position is non-ideological, that he will not commit himself to prior judgements, that he will make his decisions after reading the briefs to CUG. He does not say, then, on what intellectual basis he will make his decisions. He doesn't seem well informed about what the commission is all about, perhaps due to his heavy load of graduate work. He admits that he doesn't know what the function of the Board of Governors is, for example. He has been endorsed by the Graduate Students Union, but says he doesn't agree with all GSU policy. We're not sure what he thinks about anything.

Donald Young (II UC): For some reason, at the forums, he often sounded like he was parroting the other candidates. His platform is remarkably similar to the rest, and yet he doesn't seem to understand what that platform really means. He doesn't delineate the problems clearly, and sometimes seems contradictory. He comes out strongly in favor of the SAC Free University, and yet doubts that students are responsible enough to participate in the highest governing levels.

He toched on the problem of residence fees, without offering any even semi-viable solutions. Obviously sincere in his desire to reform the university, he doesn't seem to have enough experience to see beyond the glaring problems to the more subtle conflicts that create them.

An open letter from Steve Langdon

I have been gravely disappointed by the quality of reactions from SAC opponents on this campus to our activities this year. The intellectual poverty of their response has been shown by the continued ad hominem attacks, especially on myself, which have been used. Instead of intelligently discussing issues, they have consistently tied opinions to my name and moved on to accusations unrepresentativeness and so forth. John Ayre's letter in the Nov. 15 Varsity is only one example of this style of unsubstantive debate. (See Addendum) The realities of SAC decisions, priorities and actions are rarely mentioned and never considered in any depth.

This refusal to deal seriously with political differences has resulted in opponents of radicalism talking about the option of faculty withdrawal from the SAC rather than having the courage to try to rationally articulate their own position and move the student body as a whole to accept it. Instead, these opponents have played on sectional differences and tensions with little regard to the dangerous consequences for all of us of structural separatism. Unlike last year's reaction, the opposition this year has lacked both intellectual content and the guts to fight things out honestly.

Let the opposition seriously talk about the issues that SAC has dealt with this year. Let them take issue with the SAC's success in changing the structure of the Commission on University Government to give students 4 of the 9 voting positions. Let them give an intellectual critique of our policies in creating the Free University of Toronto and the courses it offers. Let them react to our success in gaining access for all students to meetings of the Council of Arts and Science. Let them rationally attack the use of mass meetings and the new initiative-referendum system that have made our Council one of the most open and democratic in Canada. Let them go ahead and analyse our detailed 6 page housing program passed in October. Let them intellectually react to the newly adopted Library policy which comes before the next Library Council meeting. Let them reject the Student Information Bureau established this fall to help students confused by the bureaucratic complications of this University. Let them refuse to accept the idea of a co-operative bookstore to give lower priced books to students. Let them rationally demolish our emphasis on building open, democratic course unions; let them criticize intelligently the series of debates and forums held on Vietnam, on Biafra, and so on. Let them intellectually argue about the SAC's POSAP policies. Let them analyse the budget and rationally debate the overall priorities of the SAC.

Our opponents have not done this. Instead of acting as though they were part of an intellectual community, they have resorted to ad hominem attacks and charges of "anti-democratic", all the while taking the easy option of withdrawal rather than fighting for what they believe, openly, on a principled issue - orientated basis.

Let them do that and I would have far more respect for them than I now can. Let them honour the democratic dialogue they are always accusing the radicals of trying to destroy. Democracy means you participate to influence action rather than pulling out because you think you aren't able enough to make your critique stick.

Steven Langdon
SAC President

The words of President Langdon

One of the favorite "ad hominem" attacks is to accuse me of standing for something far different from my platform last year. Let me set that one straight, at least, by referring to the 3 positions papers I wrote and circulated during the campaign last year.

ON EDUCATION

"Lectures are too large and impersonal, options are too limited, it's too difficult to change courses; the stress put upon one shot examinations is excessive and misleading; tutorials, where they exist, just supplement lectures, giving little chance for independent work; labs become anything but educational, with cooked results the rule . . . bureaucratic complications are everywhere.

"We are committed to seeking change in these methods of university education and, unlike many other candidates are also going to provide SAC alternatives to the present pending change. We will: Build course unions . . . establish SAC run alternative courses . . . Run a SAC anti-bureaucracy service . . . try to get fair treatment for Teaching Assistants . . . etc."

ON UNIVERSITY GOVERNMENT

"The present structure of (the upper) level of government is archaic, confusing and dominated to an undue extent by outside business interests and political interests only marginally concerned with the university. And over the whole hangs a dusty cloak of secrecy as unjustified as it is outdated.

"To accept representation in such a situation would be power - grabbing of the most unprincipled kind . . . Instead, we should immediately seek the ultimate goal of a university in which the primary components, faculty and students, would be most influential in decision-making."

ON SOCIAL ACTION

"No difference in this election? We think there is. The two other candidates for President have made no commitment to SAC social action. We believe that a student government has a responsibility to encourage and assist community action and educational projects.

"Full opportunity for all persons, regardless of sociological and economic barriers, to attend university must accompany student requests for more financial aid for themselves. The Canada Student Means Survey, sponsored by the Canadian Union of Students, showed, 'one quarter of Canadian university students come from 6 per cent of Canadian homes, with incomes of over $10,000, and that a matching 28 per cent represent the 52 per cent of Canadian families earning less than $5,000 a year.'

"Financial reasons alone do not explain this spread; . . . Very real social barriers, poor housing and poor schools, to mention just two, play a significant part in the under-representation of lower income students. A universal degree of accessibility must be sought by student government. We must try by means of community organizing projects and summer educational action to eliminate the social barriers which keep university dominated by the middle and upper classes.

"Other social action projects must also be supported; . . . and national action must be assisted through membership in CUS and OUS.

"Make no mistake; we consider student government more than a service station. We're past the sandbox stage; we're part of the real world now and must not be afraid to work to improve it."

I also refer interested student to an article I wrote in Random at the beginning of the campaign last winter (January issue) about the role of the university under the title "The Revolutionary University", in which I stressed the need for the kind of socially responsible university, I am now told, by John Ayre, I never talked about before I was elected.

I will admit to being more impatient now than then, given the frustrations of trying to implement change, but I deeply resent suggestions, such as those of Mr. Ayre, that the ideas that won campus support then are different from those I now stand for. And if our opposition feels that they can't abide by that spring election, then, they should have the courage to use direct democratic means to get change - by recall or by referendum - rather than hiding behind separatist sentiment to push for withdrawals from SAC which will hurt the student body as a whole rather than the radicals.

What do we have to do to convince Mr. Langdon that we don't care for his organization? Do we have to have a sit-in at the SAC offices to put pressure on them to let us go?

Four times we have stood up and were counted: we elected a "separatist" GSU executive, we told a summer opinion survey what we thought, we put our names to it at registration, and we voted for withdrawal at an open meeting. We even abstained from participating in a SAC election. And they still don't believe us.

The pro-SAC students claim

we will start the break-up of SAC, but if we are so important, why doesn't it pay attention to our needs? They claim this movement to withdraw is just a power play by Winters et al - of course it is, with Langdon and friends trying desperately to keep this power for themselves. Most grad students don't care too much about it but they dislike SAC and it's objectives enough to work towards getting out.

The SAC executive claims to represent a moderately active left wing group of students but they were unable to find even 100 such students in the GSU active enough to spend two hours to support them. Why should the rest of us be forced, by an undemocratic process (i.e. if we want to study, we must join), to support a group we don't like? Let those who want to help SAC do so as individuals, and the GSU can co-operate with any project we think reasonable.

For instance, why should we have to put our numbers behind SAC's uppity demands for complete control of the undergraduate courses while it rejects more reasonable improvements in the University?

SAC is primarily undergraduate oriented and actually seems to be trying to suppress our point of view. Most graduates think SAC is useless for them and many feel that it could be harmful. So we want out, NOW!

con

On Dec. 5, the engineers will decide whether or not to stay in the Students' Administrative Council.

It has become clear that the graduate students have indeed set an important and, in my opinion, irresponsible precedent.

The advocates of this kind of "campus separatism" insist that SAC is "no longer relevant" to them, or is "too left-wing" or "too radical", or simply "not worth my 12 dollars".

I'm not going to list the worthwhile services provided by SAC for that 12 dollars. Any SAC rep.

can tell you that. I do think, however, that, on general grounds, withdrawal from SAC is unwarranted and irresponsible.

As I remember it, when we elected Tom Faulkner for SAC President last year, one of the issues in that election was whether or not the student political situation within a university was analogous to that of a state. We appeared to say that it was. The election of Steve Langdon this year appeared to confirm that view.

In other words, some kind of "special democracy" does not exist here.

The graduate students insist that, because a majority of them voted for withdrawal, democracy must be fulfilled and they must leave SAC.

But does democracy as we know it imply that anybody or any group can leave its society (via leaving its government) because of differences of opinion? I always thought democracy implied voting in elections within a system, in order to change that system if necessary.

If you don't like the Canadian government's stand on Biafra, for instance, can you stop paying taxes?

I cite Miss Joan Baez, American folksinger, who every year attempts to withhold 60 per cent of her income taxes on the grounds that the 60 per cent goes towards armaments. Do the graduate students support this kind of thing? Do the engineers? The analogy is not as ridiculous as it appears.

What if the engineers do decide to withdraw? (I trust they will not). Let's imagine what may happen after that.

The chemical engineers, let's suppose, after two years decide to break away from the Engineering Society, claiming that the Society is "not relevant" to them. They set up the Chemical Engineering Society. The freshmen of this group then get restless and soon break away, forming the new Freshmen Chemical Engineering Society.

Soon dissension reigns again, and the only two girls of the latter group revolt to form the Female Freshmen Chemical Engineering Society. Finally the two girls have an argument, and each forms her own Single Female Freshmen Chemical Engineering Society.

We can take campus separation to its absurd conclusion.

Now I don't think that kind of thing will really ever happen. But that conclusion seems to me the folly of this kind of thinking.

Engineering students are by and large moderate and responsible.

In our democratic system, a certain amount of responsibility is expected and demanded for that process to survive.

That responsibility does not include copping out!

We was had

That which took place at the OSAP march last Wednesday only serves to point out to us, the students, that 'WE WAS HAD'. Mr. Langdon and his associates on that saddest of all SAD SACS were certainly not sincere in the manner in which they handled the whole question of OSAP.

If they were sincere would they not have informed the marchers that free education was their aim and not merely protesting the inadequacies of OSAP.

If they were sincere their brief to Mr. Davis would have stressed OSAP problems instead of free education theories.

If they were sincere the march would not have reeked with NDP influence. In fact they should not have permitted labour leaders and NDP politicians to join the march which was billed as a student protest march.

If they were sincere they would have prevented the presence of the LGMB which only added a sense of frolicking gaiety to the march.

If they were sincere they would have prevented their carrying of the Quebec flag (the symbolism of which escapes me) at a protest against the ONTARIO government.

If they were sincere they would not have allowed the childish heckling which took place at the protest which was against an injustice to us and should therefore have had a more solemn tone.

If they were sincere they would have suggested solutions to the problem of the OSAP inadequacies which they were protesting. Any fool can object to the status quo but it takes more to suggest a solution.

I find the actions of SAC on last Wednesday to be typical of the Mickey Mouse approach of the irrational members of SAC. It is too bad that the few rational members of SAC can't be heard over the heckling of those crusaders for the rights of mankind who are led by their emotions into doing foolish things that are a discredit to us all.

Let us hope that little Stevie Wonder and his Sad SAC can overcome their emotions and add a touch of sincerity to their capers.

Please let me express my disappointment in the reporting by the Varsity on the decisions by Sir Daniel Wilson Residence and Devonshire House residents to hold back their second instalment of residence fees.

Firstly, from the small, tucked-away articles covering these stories, I can only assume that the Varsity does not recognize the significance of these actions or has deliberately chosen to play them down.

My second objection is to the handling of the Devonshire House story in particular. Devonshire House members do not pay one red cent for board. The "over $500" mentioned refers to the cost per year for room only.

As the representative of the members of Devonshire House I have never said that we wanted "the burden of mortgages on New College spread equally to all campus residences." This arrangement would be no more fair than the present one.

Finally, your story failed completely to recognize the reason for Devonshire members requesting a reduction in their fees. Since January 1968 most of our basement areas have been declared unsafe and therefore out of bounds by the Fire Marshall. Since most of our extra facilities such as games rooms, party rooms, music listening and practice rooms, television rooms etc. are located in the condemned parts of the basement, we have been denied official use of them.

These facilities are still advertised in the brochure sent to residence applicants and are considered by us to be as much a part of the residence as are bedrooms and washrooms. Therefore, with these facilities being officially closed and declared unfit for use, we feel fully justified in asking that some recognition of this fact be made by the administration in the form of a reduction in fees.

No action has been taken by us so far because the administration has repeatedly promised to have the situation remedied in short order. However, we have waited long enough and no longer feel it fair to be paying the same price as is asked for at residences where such facilities are not only available and safe, but also of a much better quality.

Graybiel wins lousy poem prize

"A full stomach and an empty mind are very important in writing bad poetry," says Kim Graybiel, a U of T student whose bad verse has won him a free trip to Los Angeles.

Graybiel, (III New), stood first among more than 1000 entries in the CHUM-FM lousy poem contest, which included such eminent literati as Dennis Burton, the artist, and Charles Tuck, from the chronic illness unit of the Toronto Hospital, Weston.

"It was after a very big meal on a Sunday that me and Marilyn Haddad (IV Trin) sat down and wrote the worst poem we could think of. I didn't even write it while I was stoned or anything!"

Tim Thomas, a Deejay at CHUM-FM agrees with the ruling of the judge, Sean O'Huigin of the New Writer's Workshop. "It was really the worst poem we received. Dennis Burton submitted seven pieces of shirt cardboard in the shape of hearts, but it was too good to be the worst, so it didn't win."

Along with the printed copy, Graybiel and some friends submitted a tape in which they chanted the poem.

"That's 'cause the Bhudda scene is really good," explains Kim. "Some of my best friends are Gellius." Gellius (Gellius est tenius, quid ni?) played the organ on the tape.

"Bad poetry is the reversal of the overheated image," said Graybiel, trying to sound McLuhanistic. He agreed with the reporter that it was like the prince in the fairy tale who wanted a desert that was both hot and cold. "That's right," said Graybiel.

"We've made a new tape," he added, "with organs, three guitars and pots and pans. The guys at CHUM say they're going to play it and it'll be on the top 10 in Toronto."

Students to join Proctor-Silex strikers

Toronto students are being asked to join with Picton workers in a fight against American economic imperialism.

Strikers at the American-owned Proctor-Silex plant in Picton are calling for a boycott of the company's products, and they hope students will help enforce it in the Toronto area.

The Proctor-Silex workers are striking to improve what have been called starvation wages. The American-owned company has refused arbitration, although the union agreed to go back at existing wages during the discussions.

The present basic pay rate is 93 cents an hour for women, $1.27 for men. The company has offered about six or seven cents increase.

The Toronto Student-Labor Committee is trying to organize a boycott of Proctor-Silex irons and toasters, which sell under 17 different brand names. Two of the strikers are coming on campus Wednesday to explain the situation.

Steven Moore (SGS) of the Committee said they were attempting to broaden student power into people power. "For a change we are bringing workers on campus to educate students," he said.

A picket line will be set up Thursday around the Toronto distributor of Proctor-Silex products. Cars will be leaving from Sid Smith at 7:30 a.m.

Vice-president Cottrell of Carling Breweries hands over the Carling Cup to the bloodless victors, the faculty of dentistry. Accepting for dents (left), Dental Students' Union secretary Allan Barry Chopnick (III Dents). Dents' bleedability quotient was 50.2 percent (317 units) while the Anemio Award went to the Dents of 771 for getting 102 of 130 people to bleed.

Berkeley student leader, Bettina Aptheker, to speak today

Bettina Aptheker, student communist leader at Berkeley campus, speaks at noon today in East Hall, University College. Her topic is the student revolution in America and she qualifies as one of her nation's best known revolutionaries.

In 1964 she and Mario Savio led the Free Speech Movement. Her participation in the Sproul Hall sit-in won her six weeks at Santa Rita prison farm, which she was forced to serve while six months pregnant.

But prison didn't prevent her from leading the 1966 Berkeley strike. And her membership in the Communist Party didn't prevent 90 per cent of Berkeley students from voting her their representative on the campus rules committee set up after the Berkeley sit-in.

Already prominent as a national student leader, Bettina kicked off the April 1967 student strike against racism and the war in Vietnam. Over 2,000,000 students participated.

Part of her contribution to the U.S. student movement has been to struggle for militant black-white unity in action against the imperialist university. Recently Black Panther leader, Eldridge Cleaver, invited by students to teach about white racism at Berkeley this fall, so agitated Governor Reagan and corporate Board of Trustees members, that they tried to stop him from speaking and eliminated credit for his course. This sparked another major fight still in progress. As a political acquaintance and ally of Cleaver Bettina will speak about the program and action of the Black Panther Party.

At an informal meeting Sunday evening at Rochdale she told students that police in the U.S. are out to kill the movement. "On Thursday my husband phoned to say that for the first time cops fired on a massive crowd of white students. This barbarism at San Francisco State College indicates authority in my country has decided on a hard line. They seemed determined not to give an inch, to meet protest with violence."

After her noon meeting today in East Hall University College, she will address the Commission on University Government election forum to describe the Berkeley experience with student-faculty-administration negotiations.

She will speak at Glen College this afternoon before moving on to Waterloo and Montreal. She is sponsored here by the Student Administrative Council Education Commission.

You have two choices: confrontation or responsible reform through compromise. I stand four-square behind the latter.

As a policy, confrontation is bankrupt. Remember the Tent City farce. That "confrontation" — an admitted failure — wasted $2,500 of your money. The politics of confrontation has divided the campus. The GSU has withdrawn from SAC; Meds and Engineers may follow. Confrontation has failed.

This is not wholly our community. The Board of Governors will be here a lot longer than we will. The government has a responsibility to the taxpayers and somebody has to represent the government in the university.

We must recognize the practical reality that the taxpayer public must have some say in the university.

We must look at the briefs submitted to the Commission and exercise judgment.

Course unions represent compulsory unionism which is wrong.

should serve the university, rather than dominate it. The present structure vests control in this undemocratic group, putting power beyond the reach of staff and students.

The interest of the general public is, quite legitimately, in turning out trained, qualified technicians and managers for society's complex machinery. The interest of the academic community should be in turning out independent, critical minds. Where these interests conflict, staff and students must have the decisive voice or the university will become only an appendage of society.

At the departmental and faculty levels, authority should be vested in bodies composed equally of staff and students. At the top level, authority over all internal questions should be concentrated in a general council with equal staff and student representation, plus a number of delegates from the provincial

D'ARCY MARTIN

The stake of staff and students in the running of the university is equal and these two groups are the primary constituents of the academic community. Staff and students should jointly and equally hold control over decision-making up to and including the highest levels of administration.

The public should have a say in deliberations on university policy, but should not control it. In the end the public, through government budgetary decisions, will have its say in the direction of university development.

The eleven candidates for the Commission on University Government were each asked by The Varsity for answers to a set of five questions. The questions are:

- Do you believe students and faculty should run the university on a basis of equality?
- What controls should the general public have over the university?
- What is the place of the administration in the university?

- What is the function of university in society?
- What structure do you think would best accomplish your aims?

Several candidates could not be reached yesterday to answer the questions. Their self-descriptions consist of policy statements prepared for The Varsity.

F. PAUL FROMM

Yes, faculty and students together have a primary and fundamental role in the governing of this university. Their basis must be equality; once we have established the structure, interested, articulate and responsible representation must follow.

Through the provincial legislature. The university must reform from within; hopefully, society must follow suit.

The administration must assume a civil-service role, subject to the basic governing of faculty and students.

The university must be

STEVIE GRANT

An institution of free thought and criticism. It must educate people. Society needs universities which foster criticism of society's values and practices. University government can defend the university community against intrusions of a politically motivated ed utilitarian - oriented society. The ideal of faculty - student partnership must become a reality.

A structure where faculty and students are in primary governmental roles at the departmental level and the university level would provide the best structure.

If a restructured university government offers students a vital role, students will accept this challenge. Existing students' resignation from our present community will be replaced by concern and involvement. Student power will become a realistic goal and respected concept.

BOB RAE

Emphatically yes, are the students and faculty the only ones who have the authority to judge what the future of the university should be. This includes courses and departments right up to the level of government in the university.

The influence of the general public comes through the legislature. The administration is essentially a civil service. Its purpose should be to advise the governing body. In the final analysis it must accept the decisions of the governing body which is made up of equal staff and students.

The purpose of the university is to produce creative thinking individuals and as such the university will inevitably serve as a bastion both of academic freedom and of radical social reforms.

There are two essential principles which should be involved in any structure of the university. First there must be an openness at all levels of the university — indeed right through the province. Secondly there must be staff-student equality.

I believe in a single tiered, upper level of government in the university, but I generally favor greater control by individual departments, within reasonable limits, over their own courses.

BILL ROCKETT

Students and faculty are the two factions of the university community which make that community work. Consequently, it is only just that these two factions share equally in the power base of a democratized university. The university should be democratized both for the sake of the academic community, and for that of the society within which the community functions.

The legislature and the corporations control the purse strings of the university by means of grants and research financing. Control is on the side of the community itself. The administration of the democratized university should be hired on contract by the basic power unit of the academic community. Administrators should report publicly on all decisions, and stand for renewal of contracts after periods of, say, five years.

The university is pivotal in society. The upper levels draw on it for research and leadership, while other levels see it as the way of entry into upper economic and power levels. Consequently, the academic community is an ideal place to initiate social change.

I see a power base located in an elected assembly in which students and faculty are equally represented. Administrators hired by such an assembly carry on the day-to-day conduct of the university, subject to the approval of

• Yes, I am committed to the principle of staff - student equality, and believe that together, they should have no less than majority control of the Assembly replacing board and senate.

• I consider this question highly ambiguous since "control" and "general public" are loose connotations. Basically, however, I stand for the natural sovereignty of the academic community - this implies a minimum of governmental direction.

• The administration should be conducted through committees of the assembly governing the university, under a Secretary - General, who would replace the present comptroller. Thus, it would be subservient to the needs and wishes of the academic community.

• The university is a natural resource which should have the purpose of fostering creative, progressive, truly intelligent, citizens. It should not be overlooked that the function varies with the type of individual as well as the structure, however.

• A decentralized, "bottom heavy" structure, with permanent legalized academic review, substituted course review, course unions, staff - student committees, and, in the arts and science faculty, a co-ordinating faculty council. Thus, I think that the emphasis on the top level of government is somewhat misplaced; power must rise from below in the university.

PAUL VESA

The Faculty Council determines the courses and exams of the students and there is no purpose for students as voting members.

The Board of Governors is the single most important body in the university. It represents the taxpayers and consequently the board should be elected by the general public. There has been much argument during this campaign about retention or abolition of the Board of Governors, and about the advisability of equal faculty-student control of the university.

But these are policies: what is their underlying principle? This principle is, of course, the principle of property rights: the rights of an owner of property to control it and decide its use.

I stand unequivocally behind this principle. My opponents, with one or two exceptions, reject it. This means I stand unequivocally behind the rights of the owners of this university, the taxpayers of this province. And I thus stand behind their agents, the Board of Governors, to run this university.

Course unions, and staff-student committees have no purpose and should not be. Course unions represent compulsory unionism.

• Students and faculty should make the decisions on the running of this university on committees composed of 50 per cent students, 50 per cent staff.

• The general public now controls the university indirectly through the legislature

I believe that we need joint student and faculty responsibility in all decisions on campus, decisions which are open and which stem as far as possible from the lower levels - courses, departments, faculties; only when diversified is not feasible would decisions accrue at a higher level.

The administrators and the layman should not form a majority; there should be a few laymen on the Council. Students should form "a good part of the council." A 50-50 representation of staff and students is not out of the question.

A university should be the source of independent, creative and responsible thinking. The university should develop individualism and tolerate individualism.

There should be one council form of government. The decisions should come from joint student and faculty representation. I view the Commission on University Government as the most important body currently on this campus. No one can give final answers at this point.

• Yes, the students and faculty should have equal say in the running of the university. As a general principle students and faculty should have more power.

However, the chief issue of the campaign arises from the fact that at least some of the four students elected to CUG must be representative of the majority of students.

• The public should have no type of veto control. The Ontario government should have consultant control. It should not have absolute control. The government's power of the university should be reduced.

• The place of the administration is to administrate. "Let them eat cake."

• The purpose of the university is education. The university's function is not solely the granting of degrees. The university should disturb people and open their minds. It should be subservient to the General Council. They should be experts and fund raisers, responsible for implementing General Council decisions.

• The function should be to develop sensitive, free-thinking, responsible individuals, not to turn out products for the use of society. It should participate in a dialogue with and lead society in a critical evaluation of society's goals and methods of improving the quality of human life.

• Course unions in all departments that can generate the staff-student councils in each department. There should also be a general council of 50 per cent students and 50 per cent faculty. Students should be elected 60 per cent from the departments (represented proportionally to size) and 40 per cent from Faculties and Federated Colleges - each represented equally.

GARY WEBSTER

• Yes, 50-50 at the departmental level and 50-50 in a governing general council. There should be four elected students, four elected faculty, and three administrators on an Executive Council charged with negotiating with the legislature.

• The public should have control through the legislature - the Department of University Affairs. They must also rely on the good sense of the Executive Council.

• The administration

I would allow some representatives of the general public to sit on the highest governing body, but faculty and students would be in the majority.

should expose them to complex ways of thinking.

• "Let's wait and see what things are submitted to the commission." Whatever structure is arrived at by the commission will be the best structure.

If elected, I will attempt to base my conclusions on the data contained in the briefs submitted to CUG. I am a moderate reformer, and not committed to any one ideology.

Larry Tomlinson is a pretty normal-looking guy. Perhaps a bit straight: fairly short dark hair, black-rimmed glasses, plaid jacket, sneakers.

To look at him you wouldn't think he was anything special, just a regular freshman in General Arts.

But Larry Tomlinson is a special case, because he lives on Queen Street East, just west of the Don Valley, in the heart of that area affectionately known as Cabbagetown. And if you come from Cabbagetown and go to university, you're an anomaly.

Only two of Larry's neighborhood friends have made it to university. For Cabbagetown is a place where you go out and get a job at 14 or 16, with or without a bit of technical training, because it makes you a man, because your parents need the money, because you start off with a built-in handicap known in the trade as being "culturally-deprived", with no books and narrow horizons, and you never catch up, and because nobody you know has ever stayed in school.

Larry says he knows of "only three people from my area who have gone through university, and they are all from one family that has lived there for years and years. Among the older people, it's hard to find someone who has finished Grade 8." Larry's mother completed Grade 9 and went to a commercial school for a short time. His father, a factory worker, originally quit after Grade 6, but got his Grade 11 in adult re-training.

Even taking an academic course in high school is not all that common. According to the 1961 census, the proportion of school children in the last three years of high school ran from 2.3 percent to 8.2 per cent in Cabbagetown census tracts 97 to 102. (Average income $2,688 - $3,340) compared with 23.2 per cent in census tract 94 (Average Income $8,737) in Rosedale. The Board of Education does not release figures on streaming, but Larry Tomlinson estimates that about one-seventh (one class out of seven) of his Grade 8 class at Park School went to Jarvis Collegiate, the one collegiate for the 40,000 inhabitants of Cabbagetown and a sizeable chunk of Rosedale.

"The kids are just as bright as Rosedale kids," says Carl Head, principal of Sackville Public School. "They have lower I.Q.'s and meet with less success academically because they lack experience and stimulation.

"We have some eight and nine year-olds who live on King Street and have never even been on streetcars," he said. "You have to have something to talk about if you are developing language as a child. These kids just haven't had a stimulating environment in this community. Very few of the homes have many books. We try to fill in with field trips but we can only do so much.

"Here we have more problems to overcome before we start teaching," Mr. Head said. "We have to worry about whether the child is warm, has a full stomach, is well-rested, problems you never even think of in North Toronto."

cabbagetown, toronto

He also noted a different parental attitude toward schools. "Parents don't expect their kids to go to university. They have different expectations and ideas of prestige."

Larry Tomlinson agrees. "Down in our neighborhood, you're not a man, you're not respected unless you're working, no matter how old you are. My brothers Ernie and Ken are more ambitious than I am, so they quit school earlier and are out making money."

But Principal Head denies a lack of interest on the part of parents. "They are just as interested as North Toronto parents, and will always come when we ask them. Perhaps they fear the school. Teachers are the only 'professionals' in the district, so there seems to be more respect for our judgement."

In an attempt to compensate for some of the difficulties that inner-city children face, the Board of Education has instituted an "Inner-City Schools" program. It proves 26 schools with more money for equipment, lower student-teacher ratios, more parental contact and more psychological services. The downtown delinquency rate has dropped considerably since the program was instituted three years ago.

Teachers, most of whom come from middle-class backgrounds, have to adjust to the characteristics and problems of downtown schools. They have to learn to expect different things from children. "We don't worry about their being late as long as they are here," Mr. Head said. "You have to learn to support them and build up their self-image."

Larry Tomlinson is not quite so enthusiastic about the attitudes he found at school. "I was encouraged by teachers to go on, but the guidance information is totally unrealistic. They treat it as if the end of public school is the end.

"They tell you that the collegiates, the technical schools and the commercial schools are all equal, that they all have the same outlook and the same aims," he said. "I know a guy who wanted to be a Certified Accountant. The guidance people told him to go to commercial school. He wasted a year before he found out at Manpower that his course couldn't get him into accountancy.

"They treat it as if you have the same opportunity to make money no matter what course you go into," Larry said. "They mostly expect you to go to technical school."

So the majority go to Castle Frank, or East End Vocational, or Parkway Vocational, or Eastern Commerce to learn trades like clerking and cooking and typing and quickly make their way onto the labor force with or without a diploma. And you meet boys of 10 whose somewhat wistful ambition is take a course in bricklaying, though they are not very confident about finishing it. Not that they are really interested in bricklaying, but it's the only kind of future they have any notion of.

An exaggerated fear of failure pervades children's educational hopes. Since they know of almost no-one who has successfully moved through the system, they view each minor step as an almost insurmountable obstacle. Students moving from Grade 6 at Sackville School to Grade 7 at Park Senior School expect to fail and very often do. Carl Head attributes some of the trepidation to the move to a larger school (1,100 students compared with 165 at Sackville) and the feeling of "impersonality" it induces.

Larry Tomlinson, who went to Park for both Senior and Junior Public Schools, makes the same point. "I don't think the staff knew their students well enough. You didn't feel that they knew you unless you caused trouble."

But the most frightening jump for Cabbagetown children is Jarvis Collegiate, where they have to compete academically and socially with Rosedale types. They certainly are at an educational disadvantage compared with their classmates from Rosedale, but Larry feels that the social barriers are somewhat over-rated. "The crowd I hung around with had all kinds of kids in it. One of my friends got a sports car for his sixteenth birthday. The differences didn't really bother me."

So why did Larry Tomlinson get to university in spite of these obstacles?

"I'm just lazier than anyone else. It's a respectable way to be a bum," he said. "It's a heck of a lot easier than earning a living."

Larry's parents, who are executive members of the Trefann Court Residents Association, uncharacteristically encouraged him to stay in school. "My going to Jarvis was a real achievement for my parents," Larry said. "It was always pounded into my head that technical school was where bums went."

"I got a lot of encouragement from teachers," he said, "but a lot of them are young and inexperienced. Some of the public school teachers don't know very much about university."

But two of Larry's younger brothers are already out working, having left school after Grade 10. "They wanted to be something, to start making money. My other brother and my sister are probably staying in school, partly because of my example, but I don't know how far they are going."

So Larry Tomlinson is still an anomaly, and the situation shows few signs of changing.

All this is not to suggest that everyone should go to university. The problem is simply that a kid from Cabbagetown has a far smaller chance of getting anywhere in the educational system. And if he gets nowhere in the educational system he has very little chance of getting a decent job. (opportunities decrease with increases in automation). Which is the only way to break the Cabbagetown cycle so that his kids have the freedom that he lacks.

The chance to develop middle class hang-ups and drop out comes only after one has made it in the first place. The Board of Education is doing a little bit to compensate, but hardly enough to make a really significant difference.

And despite all those speeches by Steven Langdon and Tim Reid about making it possible for the kids of Cabbagetown to get to university, POSAP and even free university education will have little effect on the children of Cabbagetown who face rather large odds even reaching Grade 13. Larry Tomlinson is receiving nothing from OSAP this year (he made a mistake in filling out his form).

If people are really serious about universal accessibility, it means change in a whole system which makes family wealth the most important factor in educational attainment.

playing tag with the board of education

Once upon a time I wanted to write an article on the educational opportunities facing the children of Cabbagetown. Feeling that some of the best people to talk to would be educators working in that area, I decided to speak to people at Sackville Junior Public School, Park Senior Public School and Jarvis Collegiate Institute, for a survey view of the situation.

So, on Wednesday, Nov. 13, I went down to Sackville School to talk to Carl Head, the principal, whom I knew from having worked in his schoolyard last summer. I interviewed him for about an hour, and he suggested I speak to Frank Stewart, a vice-principal at Park School, since he himself had almost nothing to do with "streaming" procedures.

I called up Park School, and, while Mr. Stewart was not available, I made an appointment to meet a Mr. Robert McCulloch, apparently a guidance counsellor, the next morning.

I then phoned Jarvis Collegiate. It took four calls before a secretary finally informed me that the principal, a Mr. Jewel (spelling my own), was not speaking to anyone from the media, nor would he give permission for anyone on his staff to do so. The reason given was that he was retiring at the end of this year.

Later the same day, Mr. McCulloch called me back and informed me that I would have to get permission to interview him from a Mr. MacDonald at the Board of Education.

Friday morning, I called M. K. MacDonald, assistant superintendent of public schools, and asked for permission to interview Mr. McCulloch. Mr. MacDonald said that Mr. McCulloch could not speak with any authority for the school system as a whole, and directed me to a Mr. Kitney, head of Guidance for the Toronto system.

I called up Mr. Kitney. Despite my telephone manner, which tends toward the obsequious) I was greeted with a response so defensive, it would make the most taciturn university administrator sound like a PR man.

Mr. Kitney admitted that he too had worked for The Varsity when he went to university and so understood my situation. But the guidance system was so "complex" and so varied, that he could not really speak for the whole system, and indeed, it would be impossible for me to convey an accurate impression of the system in the short time I had available, seeing as how newspapers distort things.

Why, the fact that I talked of "streaming" (He doesn't like the word — I had used it because Carl Head had) and called Mr. McCulloch "Head of Guidance at Park School" rather than a "guidance counsellor" showed that I was already dealing in wild inaccuracies.

"Why," Mr. Kitney said, "I've been working in the system for 30 years, and I'm still not prepared to write about it."

I expressed my sympathies but asked how I could possibly find anything out if I couldn't talk to anyone in individual schools and he couldn't speak for the system in general. He promised to put in a good word for me with Mr. MacDonald.

Later the same day, Carl Head from Sackville School called me and asked me not to use his name unless Mr. MacDonald gave permission. He had felt he knew me well enough to give me an interview, without having things distorted as much as certain newspaper reports he was familiar with, but had realized afterwards that he should have gone through Mr. MacDonald. After I explained to him my present machinations with the Board, he expressed great faith in Mr. Kitney's goodwill.

I spent most of the next week trying to get in touch with Mr. MacDonald again, finally reaching him late Thursday afternoon. I asked once again for permission to speak to Mr. McCulloch. Mr. MacDonald informed me that the power over such matters lay with the principal of the school concerned, in the case of Park School, Mr. McGilloway.

The next day, Friday, Nov. 20, I called Mr. McGilloway. He told me that the authority over who says what in Toronto schools does reside with Mr. MacDonald, and that Mr. MacDonald had in fact spoken to him and denied me permission to talk to Mr. McCulloch. I was to deal only with Mr. Kitney.

"Say," asked Mr. McGilloway, "what's really behind all this?" I told him again that I was writing an article for The Varsity.

"What's your brother got to do with all this?" (My brother is working as a community organizer in the district served by Park School).

I thanked him for clarifying the situation. It struck me that a massive transference had taken place, that I had absorbed the combined persecution complexes of all these educational bureaucrats.

Now, we're all somewhat aware of how the employees of large industrial organizations become secretive. How they turn out reports that conceal more than they disclose, how they become unwilling to give out the most innocuous information, for fear that they might lose their place in the corporate pecking-order if someone found out what they were really doing.

I am not going to try and plead obstruction of "freedom of the press" (though I do resent being discriminated against for having a brother) and I can take a certain comfort in realizing that these frightened educational bureaucrats are at least one step away from educating our children.

What really distresses me is that the Public School system, the most public of public institutions, is run by people with an obscurantist attitude that is far more suitable to the proprietors of forced labor camps.

Twenty U of T engineers will have a unique chance to discuss themselves and their profession at a first-ever conference in February.

Tom Gallo (IV APSC) says applications are now being received for U of T's 20 delegates to the Congress of Engineers, to be held in Montreal Feb. 14-16, 1969.

There have been three similar Congresses in the past, but this is the first time Engineers from outside the province of Quebec have been invited.

Engineers from all engineering schools in Ontario will participate in the conference, which will center around four main topics: The Engineer and his Moral Conscience; The Role of the Engineer in the Corporate System; The Engineer and his Political Environment; Engineering Education.

Gallo, vice-president of the Congress, says six applications were filed within three hours after forms were made available. (Get your very own at the Engineering Stores.)

Engineers interested in participating in the Congress have until noon Wednesday, Nov. 27 to file an application. Applicants will be interviewed and screened by a four-man committee.

"It will involve a lot of work," says Gallo. "Delegates from each participating university must prepare a working paper on each of the four topics."

Wright Report - what will become of OCA?

By ANNE BOODY

Last February, students at the Ontario College of Art boycotted classes for more than a week and marched to Queen's Park to demand reinstatement of two of their best instructors, fired without notice, and a more democratic decision-making process in the affairs of the College.

Following the unrest, the Ontario government commissioned Dr. Douglas Wright, chairman of the Committee of University Affairs, to study the present legislation and structure governing the operation and administration of OCA. His findings and recommendations were released in October.

The Wright Report bombed with both students and faculty. They had hoped for an end of the obsolete and faulty pattern of government and administration. Instead they got recommendations or a compromise structure still favoring the interests of the administration rather than the creative interests of student and faculty.

The report's rhetoric was revolutionary, but the Act drawn up by Dr. Wright, (which comes before the legislature this week) is a compromise.

In the Report Wright introduces four principles:

- 1) continual self-examination and change within OCA;
- 2) full consultation and participation in decision-making by all parts of the college concerned;
- 3) that the different needs and aspirations of "fine arts" and "applied arts" be given administrative recognition;
- 4) that the instructor at OCA be accorded his full professional rights.

Wright maintained the new structure should be the simplest possible within the needs of the college with a large number of formal bodies for better participation and communication within the college.

The proposed College of Art Act drawn up by Dr. Wright would set up a college council with the power to:

- 1) control, regulate and determine the educational policy of the council;
  - 2) determine the courses of study and standards for admission to the College and for continual membership and the qualifications for diplomas;
  - 3) to conduct examinations and appoint examiners.
- In fact, the proposed council would have in its grasp the powers behind the running of the college.

The council will consist of 18 persons and the OCA principal as an ex-officio member.

But one doesn't have to look too closely to realize the proposed structure still caters to the interests of the administration and big business instead of the creativity of students and faculty.

Nine council members will be appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor of the province. It seems doubtful that there will be a fair representation of public interest among these nine that Wright assumes.

Dr. Douglas Wright and panel chairman at a discussion on Wright Report. photo by JOHN WATSON

Six members will be faculty, elected from the full-time academic staff of the college. But Wright doesn't report that most of the staff are part-time instructors who work outside the college as well.

Three students will be elected by the full-time students of the college.

The act stipulates that those elected students be of good standing but who determines whether a student is of good standing is unclear.

The report doesn't say.

As it turns out, the powerful council is hardly a fair representation of all factions of the college.

The students seem united in their belief that the tokenism offered them is not satisfactory.

But the faculty has turned to bickering among themselves about the feasibility of departmental divisions as recommended by the report.

In general there are two contradictions at OCA.

On one hand is a bureaucratic and authoritarian administration whose interests are orderly conduct in predetermined units. On the other hand there is the potential creative intercourse of students and faculty in their everyday classes.

The reason the creativity is not actualized can be directly related to the present nature of student-faculty experiences and the subservience of these experiences to the bureaucratic administration. This authoritarian nature has been the root of discontent at the College for years.

The second contradiction is more difficult to see. Faculty argue among themselves whether or not there should be a separate "fine arts" division.

Dr. Wright urges change to occur gradually. The very mention of "change" at OCA is devastating to the Fine Arts division. To them it means the extermination of their department. At a meeting with Dr. Wright and students earlier this month, Fine Art teachers were vocal in airing their discontent with the idea of "breaking down the walls between departments".

Other faculty members said art knows no divisions and some of the most creative art is done in the field of advertising where writers, artists, and analysts work as a team.

Here the contradiction rises. Indeed in the above situation, artists, writers and analysts would bend their creativity towards selling girdles and ear tires.

Who would they be serving? Those corporate ties they've tried so desperately to emancipate themselves from. Those corporate ties that the administration they've been battling, represents.

The horror is that this bickering among faculty and students leaves time and room for the enthusiastic administration to implement its full power. What will result is an administration turning OCA into another conglomerated College of Applied Arts and Technology.

PRINCIPLES

There has been much argument during this campaign about retention or abolition of the Board of Governors and about the advisability of equal faculty — student control of the university. But these are policies: what is their underlying principle? This principle is, of course, the principle of property rights; the rights of an owner of property to control it and decide its use. Paul Vesa stands unequivocally behind this principle: his opponents, with one or two exceptions, reject it. This means that Paul Vesa stands unequivocally behind the rights of the owners of this university, the taxpayers of this province, and their agents, the Board of Governors, to run this university

If you accept the principle of property rights you see that the faculty of this university are its employees and the students are its customers. It should be quite obvious that neither customers nor employees should control any enterprise, let alone one as important as a university. Employees are hired because they know how to do a certain job, such as teach. Customers pay to get a certain commodity, such as knowledge. Employees are given some leeway by the employer in how they do their job. Similarly, customers make recommendations if they are dissatisfied with the product. But it is not the right of the students and not the right of the faculty to govern this university any more than it is the right of any other group of customers and employees to run any other enterprise. Freedom involves rights and the most basic right of all is that of property. Choose freedom. Vote freedom.

WATERLOO (Special) — J. H. Hagey — founding president of the University of Waterloo — has resigned, and students are angry over the method of choosing his successor.

Hagey, who underwent throat surgery in 1967, said he was resigning because of his inability to use his voice. "With the unrest that has occurred at the University of Waterloo recently it is necessary that a university president be able to speak to the students," he said.

The Board of Governors will appoint a 14-man committee, including five faculty and two students, to choose Hagey's successor. In so doing, the Board rejects a report recommending a search committee dominated by faculty and students.

Student council ex-President Brian Iler was critical of the Board's method of choosing a new president. "What can students and faculty now think of the administration's rhetoric about mutual trust and co-operation?" he asked.

NASHVILLE — (Special) The Vanderbilt University Board of Trust has decided to allow four young people to take seats on the 36-member governing body of the university.

The only stipulation is that they must not be students.

BURNABY (CUP) — The three-day occupation of the Simon Fraser administration building met a sudden death early Saturday morning when Acting Administration President Ken Strand called in the cops and 114 students were arrested.

Over 150 local RCMP officers (acting as Provincial Police in British Columbia) hit the campus at 2.15 a.m. as Strand took a bullhorn to announce the building would be cleared in half an hour.

Strand read out his proclamation three times, as he stood before the locked building: "To all persons occupying any part of the academic services and administration area of the library building: you are hereby directed to leave the building within approximately one half hour, that is by three a.m.;

The Alumni Association of the university will now nominate a member of each graduate class in addition to selecting three other nominees.

"This move," said Chancellor Alexander Heard, "will bring the trustees close to the contemporary life of the campus."

Your final chance to hear the CUG candidates, live and in person, is at 1 p.m. today in Convocation Hall, where they will be haranguing the masses and also soliciting votes.

SFU: 114 arrested

repeat three a.m., Saturday, November 23, 1968

"This University will no longer tolerate any interference with the use of its property. I, and I alone, have requested the RCMP to come on campus.

"There are two options: each of you may leave the building or the RCMP will remove you. The decision is yours."

"At the stated time of three a.m.; the RCMP will enter the building. Any person remaining in any of those areas after three a.m. or interfering with the RCMP or myself entering the building, will be arrested by the RCMP and will be charged under the criminal code of Canada."

A copy of the warning was slid under the door but after a half hour discussion of alternatives, only 60 students left voluntarily. The rest decided to remain and peacefully await arrest.

The 60 people who left by the front door were led through a cordon of about 20 cops, photographed, then allowed to go their way.

Those who remained to be arrested were led out one by one, with a cop on either side, through a cordon of about 100 police.

All roads leading to the University were blocked, and everyone approaching or leaving the campus had his name, address and license number recorded by the cops. Several cars were turned back.

The students, carted off to the police station in paddy wagons, were charged with "obstructing lawful interest or use of private property." The charge carries a penalty of up to seven years in prison.

The Simon Fraser student council met at 5:40 a.m. Saturday and pledged council funds for legal aid and bail. The council condemned Strand for calling the RCMP in violation of academic freedom and the integral autonomy of Simon Fraser, and said the president was unwilling to resolve the conflict internally. Another resolution by the executive, to be ratified by a general meeting, calls for Strand's resignation. Students were asked not to attend any meeting called by the acting president

VANCOUVER (VNS) — Since last Thursday beer has been flowing in the University of British Columbia, student centre.

The students have obtained a 24-hour renewable liquor permit from the government, but hopefully, if they stay within the law they will have a permanent licence by spring.

To rigidly enforce the 21 or over law membership eligibility cards are being sold for $1.00 apiece. In order to purchase one, applicants must supply three pieces of identification, each stating the age, one of which must be their Alma Mater Society Card (ATL).

For the present guests will not be admitted.

The biggest problem the students expect will be space. They are opening their beer garden in a party room that holds only 200 people.

WRITE TO BISSELL TODAY!

There is a real danger that the Board of Governors may stall on the graduate student application for withdrawal from the Students' Administrative Council at its meeting on November 28.

Section 34(3) of the University of Toronto Act (1947) guarantees each student the right of direct access to the President, and via the President to the Board, on matters "he is or may deem himself to be entitled to complain".

Please do not let the Administrators foil a democratically taken student decision. Write to Bissell today! If necessary, ask for an interview!

President C. Bissell,

University of Toronto,
Toronto 5.

November 25, 1968.

Dear President Bissell,
I would like to express to you my support for graduate student withdrawal from the Students' Administrative Council.

For the cause of campus democracy, I recommend that the Board of Governors accept the overwhelming mandate for withdrawal granted by the graduate students.

Please inform me of your opinions and your immediate policy on this matter.

Yours truly,

What did you learn in school today?

By MARY BASTEDO

Prof. W. McLeod (McLeod," he explained, "means 'son of ugly'") evoked response from his Greek and Latin Literature 220 class Wednesday afternoon during a discussion of Homer's Iliad.

"Does anyone feel for Patroclus?" he said.

Paul McCann (II SMC) stuck his hand up.

"Have you anything else to say?"

"No, I just feel for him."

Crinkle, crinkle. Someone was cleaning his glasses with a $2 bill.

His glasses finally spotless, the boy said, "My idea of Achilles is that anyone who spent 15 books (of the Iliad) in his tent muttering 'Nuts to them' is no hero."

McLeod wrinkled his bald brow in perturbation and asked for a straw vote on whether or not Achilles was justified in going on strike. Achilles got a handful of votes.

"In favor of management?" he asked hopefully, waving the sleeve of his academic gown in the air.

McCann put up his hand.
"Hey, you're really participating today," McLeod remarked.

Patroclus killed 54 Trojans, which was the Trojan War record, the class learned.

"I like to do things in black and white to make them a bit more ridiculous," McLeod explained.

"If you make things grey you may begin to believe there's a bit of sense in them."

Complete a year's required reading in 10 weeks.

Whatever you're studying, from first year English to fifth year medicine, there are a lot of texts you should read, a large number of books you have to read. Now, by reading three times faster, you can cover all of your required reading in less than one third of the normal time. Or read three times as much as the average student.

The Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics course teaches you to read faster, with improved comprehension. To retain more of what you read, and to concentrate more easily. If you don't at least triple your reading speed, your tuition fee will be refunded.

Give yourself two-thirds more time to read more, learn more, be more. Call us now at 923-4681 and enroll in one of the dynamic reading courses starting next week. Or come to our open house on Saturday, November 23 from 12 noon to 3 P.M. at the Evelyn Wood Institute at 1104 Bay Street or at the Yorkdale Shopping Centre and learn what dynamic reading is all about.

Can. College Bowl draws more than 19M

Those huge Chesire Cat smiles which lit up the sky late Friday night were more than Unidentified Flying Objects with a sense of humor. They belonged to the smug, satisfied faces of the Canadian College Bowl executive, who, at long last, have established their promotion as a viable sporting attraction.

After three haunting years in the wilderness, the College Bowl has come in from the cold, and more than 19,000 fans were on hand at Varsity Stadium in tumultuous testimony to this fact. This was the largest crowd to view pigskin pummeling at the Bloor St. Bowl since the Argonauts left in 1959.

Of course, having nearby schools like Queen's and Waterloo Lutheran in the Bowl didn't exactly hamper ticket sales, but, now officially designated by the Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union as the national collegiate championship, the point is that the Bowl's success seems permanent. It will probably never flop again.

The huge crowd on hand was not disappointed either. They saw an exciting, wide-open, entertaining football game. To the surprise of no one, Queen's Golden Gaels had little trouble rolling over Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks 42-14, but there was lots of good action.

Gaels' veteran quarterback, Don Bayne, directed a superbly balanced attack of 246 yards rushing and 241 yards passing. He completed 13 of 18 tosses for three touchdowns including a spectacular hot potato effort that went Bayne to Heino Lilles to Keith Eaman to Bayne to end Don McIntyre (all by his lonesome) for a 71 yard scoring play. For his effusive efforts, Bayne won the Ted Morris Memorial Trophy as the game's outstanding performer.

After spotting Lutheran an early 6-0 lead when Wayne Mizzen recovered a fumbled punt in the end zone, Queen's roared to a 21-6 gap at the half and carried on splendidly from there.

McIntyre had two majors for the Kingston Tri-colour (the other on a 16 yd pass) as did halfback Keith Eaman (runs of 11 and 2 yds.). The others came from Dick Van Buskirk (1 yard pass) and Heino Lilles (9 yd. ramble). Doug Cozac had four converts while Jim McKeen kicked two singles to complete Gaels scoring.

Doug Strong, a real standout for Lutheran with 63 yards in 16 carries and eight receptions for 133 yards, had Waterloo's second touchdown while Adrian Kraayeveld (Adrian Kraayeveld?) snared a two point conversion pass from Mike Lynch.

Gaels had simply too much class for Lutheran whose task was somewhat akin to halting the Nazis with "a piece of paper" (cf. Neville Chamberlain, 1939, Munich).

Gaels' defense halts Lutheran end Bob Hamilton (75) after short pass. Jim Tait (29) grasps tightly while Theran Craig closes in dramatically.

F. PAUL FROMM for C.U.G.

"The Government of Ontario is giving us, as students, the opportunity of exercising a real voice in determining the future of this university. We can seize this chance and use it constructively or we can blow it by having student representatives who will be demanding the impossible. The Ontario Government is in an economy mood and is caught in an economic squeeze. My opponent, Mr. Rae, told a SAC meeting at Lorretto Residence that we (S.A.C.) have not recognized the legitimacy of the Board of Governors. While I would like to see the Board representing a greater cross-section of society, such talk as this is irresponsible posturing. It may impress the neo-Marxists on campus, but it is not the way to get things done. We cannot ignore the government appointed trustees of the people who pay 6/7 of the cost of our education - the taxpayers. My approach is one of honest, man-to-man discussion. Mr. Rae told the summer SAC meeting: 'There is no reason, if I am talking to Claude Bissell, why students cannot be occupying Simcoe Hall or doing what ever revolutionary thing they like.' Student leaders who resort to threats or disruption are not the types who will inspire compromise and confidence in the so-called 'powers that be.' Let's face it, the time has come for a moderate responsible voice. Our student image has been dirtied too long by raucous radicals who oppose anything that is established, and whose violent rhetoric evokes a Utopia of unstructured aimlessly permissive anarchy."

Where do I stand? Unlike many candidates for C.U.G. I have not dreamed up a blue-print for Utopia at U of T. In large measure, the men you elect will be called upon to study and evaluate the beliefs YOU and other interested parties submit to the Commission. I believe that responsible student participation should be the rule of every level of this university. Our voice should be heard but we cannot realistically demand an equal or controlling say. My bias is that of the vast majority of students who have not come out to C.U.G. forums. I am basically satisfied with the present structure of this university. That is not to say that U of T is perfect, or to deny that minor changes, perhaps in the library regulations and in course requirements, are needed.

I offer you my interest, my desire to co-operate and to listen, and my genuine desire for real and responsible form. Should my pragmatic approach to C.U.G. be to your liking, I would be pleased and flattered to be your rep."

CANADIAN TRANSPLANTS GIVE NEW LIFE TO BLUES

Mike Bollond (14) picks up loose puck outside his own blueline and heads toward the St. Lawrence goal. If you wonder where the centre red line is, don't be alarmed. There isn't one. This is one of the exciting (?) features of the U.S. game. There is no such thing as a two-line offside and icing is called only when the puck is shot the length of the rink from behind a team's own blueline.

By PHIL BINGLEY

CANTON, N.Y. — It took a spanking from a group of Canadians who play their shinny American style to wake up Varsity Blues this week-end and lead them back from the lackadaisical fog in which they have been operating of late.

Blues were beaten 4-3 in over-time on Friday evening by Clarkson Institute of Technology (in Potsdam, New York), a team whose roster lists only four U.S. born players. Clarkson outthrusted, outshot and generally outplayed Varsity to the delight of a packed house of loyal Tech supporters.

One night later, Blues moved into Canton for a game with St. Lawrence University and had no trouble prevailing 8-3. The difference on the two games was simple — the Toronto players entered the second match with a much better attitude and worked a lot harder.

While Clarkson certainly deserved their decision, they were still fortunate to come out on top. Blues were disorganized for most of the first and second periods but started to move in the third.

Clarkson led 3-1 with less than fifteen minutes remaining when Steve Monteith scored his second goal of the night and Dave Field batted in the equalizer.

Varsity held a slight edge in the overtime frame until a line change left the playing surface sans Blues (except of course for netminder Tom Little) and Tech scored the winner on a breakaway.

Little was the best of coach Tom Watt's charges with a solid display of goaling that kept the team in the game until the bitter end.

Steve Monteith also turned in a good effort with his two goals and constant skating.

In Canton, captain Paul Laurent and centre Brain St. John led the way with two goals apiece. Brian Tompson, Bob McClelland, Dave Field and Brent Swanick had the others.

The game was highlighted by two fights, both of which occurred in the second period. Since fighting means automatic disqualification under U.S. intercollegiate law, all four combatants were excused from further activity.

Terry Peterman had to settle for a draw when he tussled with a SLU played who outweighed him by 20 pounds.

But John Gordon gained a split decision (the SLU official scorer had his man ahead on points) in the other one shower affair.

Hockeywise, Blues simply had too much class for the younger American team. It was by far the best all-round effort in Varsity's six pre-season games.

Adrian Watson, who played the second game in goal came up with a fine performance including several spectacular stops during the team's few defensive lapses.

Defenceman Bill L'Heureux (6) leads the play into the St. Lawrence defence zone during the second period. L'Heureux shored playmaking honors in the game with winger Steve Monteith. Each had two assists.

FENCING

Four Varsity Fencers qualified for the final pool of the Open Foil Dell Tourney at the Woodsman Club in Toronto. In the history of the Varsity as well as so early in the intercollegiate season this performance is unrivalled. Fencers from all over Ontario as well as new members Varsity Club applauded the excellent fencing of:-

URBAN RENEWAL: resisting the cure in trefann court

By INGRID VABALIS

Trefann Court is part of Cabbagetown and Cabbagetown, they say, is a slum.

The houses are small and old and huddle together between Queen, Parliament, Shuter and River streets. And the people who live there are poor, by middle class standards.

Trefann Court is in Ward Two along with upper middle class Rosedale and two years ago City Hall branded the area a slum and earmarked it for urban renewal.

Since then, residents have been faced with City Hall's large impersonal bureaucracy which intends to make decisions for them — decisions that will affect their lives, decisions over which they have no control.

This sounds like the student power rhetoric. But the people in Trefann Court are no radicals. They don't trust City Hall and they knew then that the money they'd get wouldn't find them another house.

The residents wanted to fight expropriation and a few interested people went in to the area to help them organize.

Now, two years later, there is a staff of three community organizers at work in Trefann Court. Two of these are John Sewell and Wolf Erlichman, both alumni of the University of Toronto.

When they came to the area two years ago, Sewell was an almost lawyer in his last year at Osgoode Hall and Erlichman an MA social worker, minus thesis, from the U of T school of Social Work.

The rebellion in Trefann started when City Hall tried to expropriate. And the rebels came up with quite a revolutionary attitude — they wanted a new house to replace their old one at no extra charge.

The Residents' Association was organized.

"We see ourselves as staff for the residents' association. If you work all day how can you go to City Hall and fight?" Sewell asked, sliding deeper into his coat. It was cold in the Trefann Court Community House. The place looked very much like a hippie pad with the bare outlines of makeshift furniture, but somehow it felt comfortable. It looked a lot like Rochdale before it went highrise.

"Every organization will fail if they haven't got people to do the everyday things for them — like go to Board of Control sessions, circulate times and places of meetings — things like that," he added.

The earmarking for renewal has a peculiar effect on the people who live in an area.

They know their houses are going to be torn down soon so they don't bother to fix them up.

The place starts to really look decrepit. But the people don't care because they know they probably won't even be living in the same area any more.

Past experience in urban renewal here in Toronto shows that residents from the old community don't come back to live in the new row housing built for them.

Less than a quarter of the tenants of Alexandra Park and Don Mount got into the new public housing.

And knowing this, the people feel they might as well be out of the area. So the community dies waiting for urban renewal but the people go on existing there until everything is demolished.

You wonder what kind of thinking goes on behind the progress of urban renewal in Toronto.

Not so long ago when the city's second great clearance of urban blight began — the Alexandra Park project south of Kensington market — a bright, idealistic first year kid wanted to do something relevant for society, she wanted to help people. A college group was helping the city study slum clearance. She wanted to see a slum so she took the tour.

She saw old houses built one right next to the other. There were a lot of kids around. They looked dirty and ragged. They all played in the street and the older ones — only eight or nine — came out with some really 'dirty' language. And there were alleyways behind with garbage everywhere — tied up in big green bags. But still, there was so MUCH of it.

The windows were dirty and the houses needed paint, some of the porches were crumbling. There was the odd gaping hole where a basement window should have been.

She KNEW there would be rats in those smelly dark cellars. This was a slum, not like the suburban bungalow she was used to.

But no one really bothered to speak to people who lived in this 'slum'. To them it was a meaningful coherent lifestyle. Living in high-rise apartments in the city, or moving to the suburbs or living in the artificial creations called housing projects in the city are alien and unsuitable alternatives.

Maybe the City — and the idealistic kid — didn't realize this when they both agreed new houses were better than old.

But now the City has decided to do the same thing in Trefann Court after the people there have shown how the city's urban renewal plan would hurt rather than help them.

The Trefann Court rebels don't want the city's neat well-organized plan already drawn up for the area.

They want to take part in drawing up a new plan. Since their community is going to be changed, — and they don't object to having new houses — they thought it would be a good idea to take part in making the changes. Since the city said they would live there after the new houses were up, the residents and tenants felt they should make sure it would be the kind of place they wanted to live in.

Maybe have a recreation centre — and a park for the kids — a nursery too so mothers would have someone to look after their 10 children when they couldn't.

It's really amazing that these people should even consider demanding participation. Usually the City Hall machinery operates smoothly.

But stranger things have happened — apathetic university students are now demanding some say in the university community that they live in.

Both somehow feel they have the right to have some control of the conditions which affect them.

"Those bureaucrats in City Hall," chuckled Erlichman. "They're leery of people like us. They're scared of community organizers because they upset things."

"They call us outside agitators," broke in Sewell.

Both see themselves as catalysts. The people were there, the problems were there. You can't be a catalyst, you can't organize if there is nothing there.

"I'm much more confident about the local people now," said Sewell. "Usually the way they want to do things is better for them than the way I would like to see them done. They make the decisions."

While they were fighting expropriation, Trefann Court people found another villain. The Rubin corporation had built a huge factory-like building just east of Sackville St. right in the middle of the district.

Rubin wanted to buy some of the houses around this building (now used as a warehouse by the CBC) to landscape it. But they wouldn't pay the prices the residents asked.

In 1956, the corporation drew up a plan for redevelopment that was very similar to the plan the city wanted to force on Trefann Court ... with expropriated land allocated to the corporation.

"We've got sharp business people here," said Erlichman. "They realized if the city went ahead with that plan, this developer was going to make money off them."

So through fighting expropriation these people found a lot of other rotten things about the whole scheme of urban renewal.

Through grass roots organization it seemed as if they forced City Hall to listen. The daily papers here often say "the little people of Trefann Court have won." But what really stopped the expropriation process was a bureaucratic technicality.

Because of a slip in procedure, the ready-made plan for Trefann didn't go through the City's Municipal Board. They couldn't pass the necessary expropriation by-law. And now the whole thing may fall through because Ottawa may not supply money.

It's true that the delay gave the Trefann court people time to organize their fight.

And after a lot of pressure, City Hall now has withdrawn its original redevelopment plan.

As the situation now stands, a new plan may be drawn up. The question is will the Trefann residents have a say in this and will the City continue its expropriation policy? Will it go on tearing down houses wholesale or will the residents' demands be looked at?

It doesn't look as if City Hall has changed its ideas on urban renewal very much.

"As it stands now the old plan hasn't been dropped, it is only under reassessment, and this fact indicates that the city has every indication of finally pushing it through," John Sewell explains.

Things like this are all done through a mysterious game of give and take that politicians play. And the politicians have divided loyalties — Trefann and Rosedale.

The only way Trefann Court residents can win is if they have effective control in the decisions which affect their community.

They must have a voice in deciding if their area is a slum or not.

They have a right to choose their life style. They do not have to live in an artificial environment created for them by a government of the middle class, for the middle class and by the middle class.

a clear-cut decision

The choices in yesterday's election for the Commission on University Government were clear-cut — student could opt for the status quo, a modified, more efficient status quo, or a fresh approach to the organization and operation of the university. Students opted for the new approach.

The four candidates elected — Webster, Rae, Martin and Grant — are committed to a thorough reform of the university structure. The question now is, will they be allowed to carry through this reform?

It is possible, but not likely, that the four faculty members elected to CUG will want the same kind of sweeping reform. The ninth member, Dr. Bissell, and the two non-voting members from the Board of Governors, are not on record as wanting a "critical" as opposed to a production-line university, nor are they likely to favor joint faculty-student control of the university.

We think that Dr. Bissell had a more efficient university in mind when he called the commission, not a different university.

Because academic committees traditionally work by consensus instead of majority rule, the Board members will in effect have a vote. They are not likely to vote for change.

But even if Bissell and the Board are out-consensused, they can still file minority reports to the provincial legislature, which hacks out the final structure. Their opinions will carry more weight at Queen's Park than the faculty-student views.

The administration has a final resort, one they've never hesitated to use before. They'll just say only 16 per cent of the student population elected the four students, they are not representative. The apathy vote of 84 per cent wins — you cast the deciding vote by not voting.

All this means that if students — the interested students — want change, they can't sit back and let four students do it. We can't stop agitating for change while waiting for the commission's report. We'll have to back up the candidates we elected.

Above all, we can say that this time we used the "proper channels", we played the game their way. Now we'll find out for sure whether the proper channels really work.

"We can't wander through the forest much longer without some smart-alec teaching assistant or student asking us where we are going."

sherry parties?

Graduate students will soon have the privilege of two authorized drinking spots on campus. Massey College has had a license since 1962 and the Graduate Students' Union was granted one last week.

Why are there no bars for undergraduates on campus?

Many undergraduates are over 21.

Many undergraduates are not teetotallers.

Undergraduates are not legally bound by the Puritan ethic.

There is no logical reason why an undergraduate should not be able to buy a drink on campus—except that the administration considers the undergraduate inferior to the graduate.

Admittedly the undergraduate does not have the same academic prestige as his graduate counterpart, nor the same unquestioning servility to the academic ethos of this university.

But why shouldn't he have the same basic rights as the graduate student? Drinking rights are not the only matter in question — graduates have smaller classes, wider library privileges, and the walled-in, windowless, ivory tower paradise called Massey College.

To say that the undergraduate body is the proletariat; that the graduate school is the bourgeoisie; that GSU President John Winter is an elitist because he says graduates are better than undergraduates—that would all be meaningless jargon, wouldn't it?

It would imply that the university is unjust and that its values are based solely on academic status.

And we all know that's not true, don't we?

Instant Kindergarten

By MYRA PALMER

Blue dress, red dress, Standing tweed Suit and Sitting tweed Suit, four employees of the Government of Canada simulated an instant kindergarten environment Monday night in a room in Sid Smith. The kiddies assembled were a talented elite, U of T's contribution to 1200 successful applicants sifted from sea to sea to be plopped gently onto teeter-totters and jungle-gyms on Wellington Street in Ottawa next year.

Frankly, I thought the props were cute at first; blackboards decorated in green and white with proposed two-year schedule including "social activities", rewards for graduate-survivors of the training period; an embarrassed black and white poster propped on a ledge by the right corner reading quaintly "Government of Canada" with the Public Service emblem on the left; a huge pad of newsprint (like the ones cartoonists use) dead centre on a drawing board advertising tantalizing administrative positions for would-be megalomaniacs; and of course the delightful staff introduced by conspicuous differences in colour scheme.

We were mesmerized by their nebulous comments on available positions, all in starkly negative terms, when one smart-aleck chick demanding to know whether or not our government offered equal opportunities to women.

After stating that this was possible, the standing man conceded, "Many girls rank just as high as men in final year class lists." (ie. kids, that in spite of obvious intellectual inferiority, females do somehow make it, nearly, close to, well almost to the top.)

I looked around me and noticed, thank God, some groans and even a few pumping shoulders like my own. But I do not know how many others, if any, were trapped in that horrifying cry-laugh syndrome by this time. (Too many were sucking it all in. Well, you know, first day at school all over again, and first impressions, and careers' reports to Mommy and Daddy...)

A surprise character, another male staff-member incognito in the peanut gallery up to this point, resolved my perplex when he rose to summarize the primary objectives of this recruitment. He explained they were looking for a specific kind of talent. "We want to unlearn the intelligent thinking patterns that you have acquired at University," he concluded.

A little brains, a little talent... a benevolent proselyte-government... and whcc!... back we go to year one.

Three years, four years — for what?

employers

An Ohio businessman will hire no one but Ohio State University graduates to drive his trucks:

"If a kid shows me an OSU diploma, that tells me he's spent four years plugging away at something. I don't expect him to be a truck driver all his life . . . but chances are he'll stick with me for a while, and while he does, the chances are that he won't be a wise guy, or go off, or hand in fake gas bills, or join the union."

"The unimaginative, mediocre student is much more likely to remain in university to be graduated."

—U.S. Office of Education

"If I have a choice between an A student from Massachusetts Institute of Technology and a B student from any engineering school, I will take that B student every time."

"Why? Because the A student from M.I.T. is going to go off by himself in a corner somewhere. He'll want to fool around with theories. He'll want to do some God-damned research that isn't worth a cent to anybody, but the B student is going to be practical. You tell him what you want done, and he'll sit down and do it for you."

—personnel director of a large industrial concern.

"I suppose there is a place for brilliance. But not on this newspaper. We need placid people for the long pull."

—Washington newspaper editor

"I don't want to hire the 'A' student because he's not the employee type . . . He'll work for you just as long as it takes him to learn the business, and then he's gone to start in business for himself with some of your clients. The most valuable guy in our office is a real dumbbell. It takes him longer to learn something than it takes anybody else, but once he's got it, he never makes a mistake . . . the best part about him is that he's so dumb he's happy to do what he's told."

—head of an investment firm

The Certified General Accountants Association of Ontario has announced it is going to call persons taking its five-year university-based program "undergraduates" instead of "students."

"All too often," said Herbert Perry, the association's secretary, "the word student today describes a dirty, unwashed, bearded, rebellious person totally unlike the sensible young businessmen on the association's program."

What good is a degree? Does it have a bearing on the job you'll be able to land when you graduate?

The answer, according to a cross-section of large Toronto firms, seems to be that a degree is indeed a meal ticket. Response to a survey conducted in February, 1967, shows either a degree or some experience is the key to job-getting in Toronto.

And since it's a bit of a bind getting experience without a degree, you come back to the irrefutable conclusion that in a tightening job market, a degree of one sort or another is a pretty important thing.

But a degree for what? Responses to the survey show that while a degree is "crucial", "very important" or "preferred" by most companies, an overwhelming number of firms offer company-sponsored training (other than on-the-job) to their employees.

This would seem to indicate that while personnel officers think a degree is a nice thing for an employee to have, it does little for job training. Companies must take "raw" students and "process" them into good employees.

the personnel officers

"(The B.A.) is mind-stretching and develops self-discipline. It is important, however, to combine the degree with a clear picture of what one's career goals are."

—General Foods

"The general B.A. or B. Sc. does provide the individual with a higher level of education but requires that the graduate coming to a Company must be prepared to gain experience (3-5 years) with the Company before he can expect to advance.

"Whereas, the individual with an honors degree can make a more immediate contribution to the Company because of his specialization and will likely move ahead a little quicker."

—Canadian National Railways

"For most of the 15,000 employees a degree is not required, indeed, an educational level between Grade 11 and Grade 13 is more appropriate, but it is essential for people holding (some 1500 jobs). Special training outside of university is required by most people whether they have advanced to university level or not.

"We are testing out a bracket of jobs to determine the feasibility of people having an education not so strictly related to the job, for example, a degree in history."

—Ontario Hydro

"The degree adds three useful years education beyond high school graduation. A pass course can be a useful stepping off point for a man who is not sure what he is ready for in the business world."

"We make no distinction, however, between employees with degrees and those without. Promotion and hiring are strictly on the basis of merit. Every employee has equal opportunity with his neighbor, regardless of education."

—Canada Packers

"A single degree should enable a graduate to obtain a reasonably good job.

"We certainly are in an age of increasing speculation and we definitely agree that a B.A. or B.Sc. is not of much use in electronics, space research or the sciences generally.

"Education does not end with university graduation. We encourage our graduates to take courses, and if we feel such additional knowledge gained is beneficial to the company we will pay for half of the expense involved, and increase remuneration."

—Javex Company Limited

"Either (the B.A. or B.Sc.) offers the individual a good basic education. He (she) can proceed at a later date towards an M.A. or MBA if required for their chosen field. However, care should be taken to avoid becoming a permanent student. Neither a B.A. nor an MBA will ensure anyone of becoming a success."

—Olivetti Underwood Limited

"People having experience in Arts or Sciences develop a better facility for communications which is essential in our business."

—Cockfield, Brown & Co. (advertising firm)

"May be helpful when starting at the bottom."

—A.E. LePage Ltd. (realtors)

"From a business point of view: excellent, if the major is mathematics, physics, etc.; less attractive if the major is English, Geography, History, Anthropology, etc."

—The Imperial Life (insurance)

graduates

Mary, an honors psychology graduate, works in the personnel department of a chartered bank. "When I applied for the job of personnel officer, the first thing they asked me was, could I type? Even now (after two years with the bank) they only let me interview prospective bank tellers. Mostly I do secretarial-type work for Mr. X (the head of the department) and the other men in the office."

Julie, a mathematics graduate from an Ontario university, is now working in Toronto as a "financial analyst." She feels her degree had some influence on the employment officer, although "I'm not using any of the things I learned at university. Everything I'm using comes from what I learned at high school."

Bob, a bright young engineering graduate, was hired by a large food manufacturer even before his final exam papers were marked. He moved his wife and child halfway across the province, rented a home, and started to work for the firm in a junior executive position. When his marks came through, Bob failed to get his degree because he had failed his one-hour compulsory English course. The firm demoted him to plant foreman, and Bob eventually left the company. His wife took the requisite course the following year, wrote the exam for him, and the university mailed him a degree. He now has a good job with a rival firm.

John, an engineering graduate, was hired by an electronics firm. He quit after a year because the job he was doing was management, not engineering. He estimates that no more than 25 per cent of engineering graduates get jobs in which they can make use of the skills they learned in their four-year university course.

Jean, an honors English graduate, works in the billing department of a finance company. "I was hired because I had a degree, but I'm no smarter than the other four applicants. I'm sure. My supervisor has a Grade 11 education, and they tell me I could never rise higher in this firm than her. But I've had it with the working world— if this is the only job available (Jean job-hunted for 6 months) then I'm going to do something creative: get married and have a family. Maybe I can go to night school and work on my M.A."

430 sign Bill Lawson petition

A petition demanding the repeal or suspension of by-laws limiting the parking of catering trucks, and/or special provisions for the parking of the trucks on University property has been signed by 430 students.

The petition, placed on the main bulletin boards of Sid Smith, the Lash Miller Building, and the Ramsay Wright building was circulated by an ad hoc group of professors and secretaries from the Geography Department and elsewhere.

Copies were sent to President Claude Bissell, the Metro Licensing Commission and the Police Commission of Metro Toronto.

"The Licensing Commission acknowledged the petition but said action can only be taken by City Council," said Sally Goodwillie, Geography Research secretary.

But Council members take a different view. Mayor William Dennison said in an interview Tuesday that parking on campus was solely the University's responsibility.

"If the students feel strongly about the matter they can write me a letter and I will pass it on to the Traffic Director," he said.

Any by-law reform "should be initiated by the alderman of the ward concerned," he added.

Horace Brown, alderman

Meanwhile, Bill Lawson, truck driver for Andrew's Commissary reports less ticketing activity in the last month. He is due at court in mid-December to answer three summonses.

A new petition will be posted in The Varsity office, 91 St. George for anyone wishing to add his name to the list.

The parking lot that never was

More than 300 angry people have been turned away from the parking lot at Harbord and St. George since Monday, when U of T police suddenly ordered the lot closed for construction of the New Research Library.

"We just kept circling and circling," said one staff member who refused to give her name. She arrived at the lot at 9:30 and finally left her car at a corner at 10:30.

"I knew I'd get a ticket," she said, "but I just didn't know what else to do."

"There was a sign there on Friday," she added, "but an awful lot of people didn't see it."

The sign read: "Due to imminent construction work this lot will be closed." The most irate people were the 90 staff members with staff stickers, which they pay for by the year, the parking attendant said.

One teacher from France is reported to have sent a letter to President Bissell threatening to resign and go back to France if he doesn't get another parking place.

By BRIAN JOHNSON
Bob Rae (IV UC) swept the polls yesterday as he won a first ballot victory as one of the four student members elected to the Commission on University Governance.

Of the 4,788 students who voted, 1,463 first ballot choices went to Rae.

The complicated process of calculating the results of the preferential ballot took place last night in University College's East Hall, and early in the evening the quota was set at 958, one fifth of the electorate.

As votes were redistributed until eight ballots, the other three winners were declared: D'Arcy Martin (III, New) with 1101 votes after the first ballot; Gary Webster (SGS) with 874 votes on the seventh ballot; and Steve Grant (II Vic) with 839 on the eighth ballot.

After Rae and Martin were elected, about 40 people watched a close race between Fromm and Grant for the third undergraduate position.

The crucial moment came at the eighth ballot. Fromm had 791 votes to Grant's 759, and Bill Rockett's 406 votes were being redistributed.

The predominantly left wing crowd in the East Hall was getting worried. Fromm was a right-wing candidate, and the popular Bob Rae had threatened he might resign his position on CUG if Fromm was elected and proved uncooperative.

Everyone huddled tensely around the blackboard while election officer Karl Buchmann (II SMC) wrote down the figures.

The figures first indicated

PETERBORO — (Special) Peterboro City Council voted yesterday to ban distribution of a 32-page supplement prepared by The Ontario, Guelph University's student newspaper. The supplement, to be distributed in high schools throughout southern Ontario, reprints among other things, Jerry Farber's controversial Student as Nigger.

POLLS AS FROMM EDGED OUT

Fromm had won... a gasp from the crowd... someone moved to congratulate Fromm... Buchmann checked it... he changed the figures... Grant was shown to win by 14 votes.

A great cheer went up while everybody embraced each other, and for the biased and happy crowd it was like New Year's Eve.

Amidst the shouting, SAC President Steve Langdon gave a sigh of relief, and Rae said he was "just thrilled, absolutely delighted."

Scrutineers and hangers-on watch intently as returning officer Karl Buchmann (II SMC) chalks up the results of the final ballot count. He got the figures wrong, however, wiped them out, and when he got them straight on his second try the crowd erupted in a frenzy of backslapping and cheers.

Students, faculty win bookstore control

At least part way toward solving things.

The committee could decide to replace the present discount policy, which gives faculty members 10 per cent off, on all books, but only 5 per cent to students, and on hardcover books only.

One of the important aspects of the new committee is that it will meet in public and full financial reports will be released.

Although this breakthrough represents a victory for the SAC bookstore — established last spring in the face of university intransigence — changing bookstore policy —

GSU settles down to serious drinking

But a basic problem which neither store can solve is the high cost of textbooks set by publishers.

BURNABY (CUP) — Acting administration president Kenneth Strand lit the fuse to a seething keg of student unrest Saturday at Simon Fraser University when he called the police in to clear a three-day occupation of the administration building.

While 114 students were arrested in the process, thousands of others were pushed to action. By late last night, it was only a question of counting down the hours to explosion.

At 6:20 p.m. (PST) Strand released an answer to the four student demands forwarded to him after it was overwhelmingly approved by 2,500 students at a general meeting Monday.

The student ultimatum demanded:

- that British Columbia attorney general drop charges against students arrested Saturday;
- the opening of all university files to a committee of three students and three faculty;
- an emergency Senate meeting to discuss the original areas of dispute (Simon Fraser admission policy);
- that Strand keep off campus.

Late last night, the 125-member SFU teachers union endorsed the four student demands and indicated a teachers' strike was likely.

The SFU students vote today on what action to take; it seems likely they will strike. Correspondence from university files including: letters between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the university administration, personal pleas from a Canadian senator to allow the admission of his daughter and her subsequent late admission; and letters telling of an investigation conducted on a teaching applicant's political background.

fettered thinking is inherent in the idea of a university. Unfortunately, this is not acceptable to the corporate elite which runs America's colleges. This elite, she said, would like the universities to serve big business.

Bettina spoke of the possibility of a student-labor coalition to fight the corporate elite. She cited the situation at San Francisco State College, where some 35 unions will strike if the administration attempts to fire teaching assistants for their part in the student uprising.

Most of the 20 U of T forestry students in the audience of 300 did not agree with the conservationists.

A.W.L. President C. Abott Conway said the present government plan for the park leaves only 3 per cent as a primitive zone and over 85 per cent as a multi-use zone held at the same time as classes are normally represented on all committees and councils of the department. The proposal is a compromise set by the students after faculty rejection of an earlier call for student-teacher parity.

The key to the whole affair is the committee on hiring and firing staff and staff promotions. Faculty which contains final responsibility for the bookstore budget, will send a representative to the committee meetings.

Simcoe Hall, the bookstore and the U of T Press will also send non-voting members. The press committee is expected to approve establishment of the committee next week. SAC will discuss it tonight.

SAC president Steve Langdon sees the move as a breakthrough. "moving at

"I'll tell you what industry thinks of you," replied Mr. R. P. Loughlin, Manager of the Ontario Forest Industries Association. "The logging industry supports families in the area and the Canadian economy, and it should not be forced out of the park by restrictive measures."

He said the proposed plan prevents logging operations and that it would no longer be profitable for companies to work there.

The audience burst into applause.

Mr. Loughlin described his speech as a "factual, objective assessment of the park from the logging point of view."

The occupation followed a two-month-long negotiation process that finally stalled after faculty rejection of the student compromise

The strike vote was taken on Monday afternoon and after an hour-long meeting the students, some 150 of them, moved into the building.

In addition, there are about six separate committees to handle the logistics of the occupation including sanitation, food, equipment, communication, security and strike and picket.

But A.W.L. vice-president Dr. D.H. Pimlott attacked the forest industries as a pressure group at Queens Park pursuing their own economic interests.

He said the forest industry in the United States devoted much more money and research to the protection of their forests and were "capable of seeing more in a tree than six cubic feet of marketable lumber."

•The University College Literary and Athletic Society has voted to give $250 to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

Initially the idea was to sell peace stamps on campus to enable individual students to express their support but Lit president Howard Goldblatt (IV UC) says the idea fell through when the California company producing the stamps quadrupled its prices.

Goldblatt says the Lit was the first to give to TADP last year.

•The Students' Administrative Council meets at 7:30 tonight to discuss, among other things: whether Steve Langdon should accept an invitation to join the Commission on University Affairs (not CUC); the engineering and pharmacy referenda on withdrawal; war research; John Roberts and OSAP; discipline on campus; the bookstore; the campus centre; the library; and Soviet Jewry.

The meeting will be held at St. Joseph's, St. Michael's College.

What did you learn in school today?

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

Prof. H. E. Johns yesterday began his Physics 511 class discussing radiation. But barely had the lecture started, when he became side-tracked, much to the approval of the class.

Johns related, amidst a bloodthirsty, but fascinated, silence the physical effects of a cobalt radiation "insult" as it destroyed half the population of the world ("You feel lousy").

"I'm sure you find modern biology very exciting", exclaimed Johns, with 20 minutes remaining in his physics class.

When everyone had stopped cheering, Johns decided to pick at random a few students to put the homework problems on the board during the next lecture.

I was his first choice. "But I'm not in this course", I stammered helplessly. Up-roarious laughter and applause filled the room.

"All right", attempted Johns. "You in the back, you do it. What's your name?"

"I'm not in this course either", called out an apologetic voice. Another round of cheering.

"Why", Johns calculated, "the odds against that happening are at least!" (pause) "one to 104."

"Are you sure you're in the right room?" yelled a heckler at Johns. More laughter.

To avoid further confusion, Johns asked those students who were in the correct room to raise their hands. Choosing a student, he marched up the aisle and copied down the name from the victim's ATL Card.

Prof. Johns did manage to squeeze in some physics, and the class seemed to enjoy it as well.

"I think those classes are fantastic!" later remarked Arnold Kravetz (I New). "You need a period like that every week to make you feel good."

Galati and Taylor scar Innis

By GELIUS
SOCCER SEMI-FINALS
 Galati and Taylor led Scar to a 2-1 overtime victory over Innis.

Goals by Connery and Vincede (vincze—"a grimace"—OED.) gave PHE A a 2-0 shutout of Erin.

Final will be 12:30 Thurs on the Front Campus.

RUGGER SEMI-FINALS
 Trin took Eng II in the q-f, 16-0 and went on to keffulle Scar (6-3 conquerors of Vic) 17-0. Compton (9), McIntyre (6), and Parish (2) were Trin scorers.

McLean's five points were the whole story as PHE blanked Eng (fresh from trouncing Erin, 11-0) 5-0.

Final will be Monday at Varsity Stadium.

LACROSS PLAYOFFS
 Innis beat SMC, 6-2. Besley (3), Scott, Gray and someone else (sorry) scored for Innis, Pancake Bator and A. Travers (fr. "across") for SMC.

Connelly had four, Rudge and Trafford three each and Fawcett and Reid singles to lead PHE A past PHE B (internecine warfare), 12-2. Uki and Moore replied for the losers.

HOCKEY
 Donovan (SMC) and Cumberland (PHE A) scored as their teams drew, 1-1.

Garbe (Old English, "clothes") and Sear led Law over Trin, 2-1. Trin's goal came from Denison.

Dents (Aluyawa, 2; cf. "Aluyawa Chorus", Handel, "Messiah"; Jones, Taylor) zeroed Meds, 4-0.

SMC and Law drew, 2-2. For SMC: Hurley, Merlocco (a hot, dry wind blowing in North Africa). For Law: Fitzpatrick, Park.

Knox 4, Ides of Arch, 1; Law 11 2, Trin 1; SMC B 3.

UC 1; PHE B 2, Pharm O. Scar 5, Jr. Eng 0. Arch 9, UC 11 0.

BASKETBALL
 New beat Jr. Eng 23-15. Katz topped Gnu with 6. (The Gnu is a small South African antelope related to the Iberia.)

Innis (Hersch, 12) beat Law (Shivas, Garbe 6), 27-20.

JUDO

The U of T judo club wrestled to a third-place finish last Saturday in an open tournament held at Cornell. Despite the absence of some team members who were in Montreal for the Eastern Canadian championships, the five-man squad piled up enough points to finish behind St. John and Cornell, both American colleges.

Best individual performance, in the opinion of team captain Dave Mackidd, was that turned in by Gaetan Godin (I P & HE), who won the lightweight brown belt category.

Garry Model (IV New) took the middle-weight brown belt; Joe DeCarli (IV APSC) finished third in the heavy-weight brown belt category. Archie Erwin (I Scar) and George Abonyi (II UC) added points in the team match.

"With luck we could have finished second," said Mackidd. "We drew the first-place team in the team competition. Also, our black-belt was in Montreal."

Vic-Meds in Mulock

By JOHN CAMERON
 The Mulock Cup, Canada's longest-competed-for football trophy, 75 years, is up for grabs this Friday at 1 p.m. Victoria College, who have won the cup every year since 1958, will be battling against the Faculty of Medicine who won the first Mulock Cup in 1894.

Monday's semi-finals saw Meds trim St. Mike's 13-0 while Vic downed Dents 15-7. In the first game, touchdowns by Craig Retter, Bob Chisholm, and a single by Denys Symons gave Meds their 7th consecutive win of the season.

Meds' defence clinched the victory when they blocked a 4th quarter punt by Brian MacConnell and ran for their second major. In the second struggle, Vic got touchdowns from Aarne Kartna and Bob Potts while Peter Marshall kicked 3 singles. Bob Sullivan raced 75 yards for Dents' score with Gary Kushner converting.

With identical 7-0 records, Vic and Meds should provide an excellent contest. Meds haven't won the Mulock since 1938 but should they be healthy, they will definitely give the defending champs a run for their money. Meanwhile, Vic would like to make it 11 straight.

ST. JOHN ONE OF KEYS IN BLUES CLIMB TO TOP

By PHIL BINGLEY

Varsity Blues begin the long difficult march to what they hope will be the top when the team visits University of Guelph Gryphons in the Senior Intercollegiate Hockey League opener for both clubs. Blues, who were eliminated from the CIAU playoffs last March by Loyola Warriors have one common purpose in 1968-69 — to regain the Canadian national intercollegiate crown they last held in 1966-67.

One player who will certainly help to decide whether Blues' final record is a good one or a great one is sophomore centre Brian St. John. Although the league gives no recognition to the "outstanding rookie" at the end of the schedule, St. John would have been a landslide winner had loop officials decided to open the polls for such an award last year.

Rated a fine offensive player when he first came to training camp last year, Brian had to spend long hours on his defensive game before he shook the "no check" tag pinned on him by several critics.

Boston Bruins of the NHL were so impressed with his improvement through the season that they made him their first-round pick in the summer amateur draft, invited him to September training camp for a quick look-see and then brought out pen, ink and a one-year contract.

Although the contract was an attractive one, St. John took into consideration the fact that he had completed only one year in General Science at Vic and turned the offer down.

"They offered me a spot on the Oklahoma City club (Bruins' Central Pro League affiliate) and told me I needed a year of pro experience before they would give me a chance to make the big team.

"However, it would take at least six or seven years to complete my degree in night and summer school if I were to sign a pro contract. Besides, I'm not so sure I even want to play professional hockey. Without knocking the Bruins — they were pretty good to me — there is a lot that goes on behind the glamor and excitement of the NHL. A lot of the players seem to be just hockey machines, owned and operated by a bunch of executives.

"Of course I may still give the pros a try but that will be a decision for next summer. Hockey has always been a secondary to school and right now I'm learning more and more on the latter and looking forward to playing on the Blues for this year at least.

"The one thing that did surprise me though was the reaction of Boston's general manager Milt Schmidt. When he learned that I was returning to school, he came and told me that I had made a wise decision."

Brian's ultimate decision to play hockey or enrol in dentistry or medicine (his other ambition) is one that looms in the future. Whenever it comes you can bet your sweet bippy (look that up in your sporting dictionary) that the move will be a wise one.

AROUND THE NET . . . Tonight's game as student coupon book holders already know was originally slated as a home contest. That game will be made up at a later date . . .

Adrian Watson will start in goal for Blues tonight with Tom Little scheduled to play the exhibition home contest against Loyola on Friday night . . . Also dressing for Blues this evening will be centres Paul Laurent, Brian St. John and John Wright, forwards Steve Monteith, Gord Cunningham, Brian Thompson, Len Burman, Bob McClelland and John Gordon and defencemen Dave Field, Jim Miles, Bill L'Heureux and Terry Parsons . . . Game time Friday night is 8 p.m. vs Loyola.

No basketball blues for basketball Blues

By SLIM MORRISON

Yes, Hortense, there is a basketball team. After a month of clandestine workouts, John McManus's Blues emerged from the nether depths of Hart House and proved their de facto existence to Phil Bingley with two weekend exhibition wins. On Friday night, they demolished Mohawk College in Hamilton 93-77, and came back to level Osgoode 57-41 Monday evening. This weekend, they travel south to take on Gannon College in Erie, Pennsylvania and Buffalo State Teacher's College.

Coach McManus feels Blues are stronger this year than the team which finished fourth last season in the Western section of the Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association. Arvo Neidre, an all-star forward, has retired, and two other starters, guard Mark White and forward Ron Voake, have graduated — White to the U.S. Army, and Voake to PhD work at Stanford.

But new talent should make up the deficit. Two time all-star guard Bruce Dempster is back along with veteran center John Hadden and forward Mark Slater. Other returning lettermen are guards Larry

JOHN MCMANUS

Trafford and Joe Faust, and forwards Mike Kirby and Ross MacNaughton.

Prominent newcomers include Peter Burton, a guard two years ago with Western Mustangs Jay MacDonald, a center-forward from St. Francis Xavier, and Jack Pasht, an all-star guard from York Mills Collegiate. Blues also have guard Mike Katz, a rookie from Vaughan Road Collegiate, and three former Interfaculty League performers — forwards Butch Feldman and Dale Crouter, and guard Garth Evans. Balls: Windsor Lancer coach of seasons past, Bob Samaras, is now basketball coach at Wayne State University in Detroit.

STUDENTS PROTEST SECRECY

A secret brief prepared by the administration without responsible consultation with either students or faculty has sparked a campus-wide controversy which could lead to a sit-in Monday.

The furore arose at Wednesday's student council meeting, in which President Steve Langdon revealed that a brief outlining the future of the university for the next seven years would be presented to the provincial government's Committee on University Affairs meeting, scheduled to meet here Monday.

SAC voted Wednesday night to hold a non-obstructive sit-in if these demands were not met:

- that the brief be made public;
- that the brief not be presented to the CUA until discussed and accepted by the U of T community

In response to the SAC motion, the Committee on University Affairs decided yesterday to postpone their meeting to Dec. 16 or 17. The CUA has indicated it has no objections to publication of the brief.

trators not consult the students," said Rae, "but they did not even inform the Board about the brief; they did not inform the President's Council; and they did not inform the Association of Teaching Staff Executive Council."

Although details of the brief are secret, the administration has given some indication of the type of proposals it suggests (see box).

SAC members and students questioned by The Varsity were shocked by the implications the secret brief has for

Two unidentified board of governors members leave Simcoe Hall in the rain last night as Varsity reporter Brian Johnson waits at the door to ask the same question of each governor — "What happened at the meeting?" Here are some of the answers: "You know better than to ask me that." "I'm sorry, you'll have to ask a governor." "I can't tell you...but you can twist that any way you like." "There were no decisions made." "Was there a meeting today?" "I don't want no pictures taken."

The secret brief which the university administration plans to submit to the Ontario government's Committee on University Affairs outlines proposals for the development of U of T over the next seven years.

The brief discusses:

- changes in both medicine and engineering faculties,
- major changes involving the reduction, expansion or elimination of certain faculties,
- decisions affecting the structure of the university,
- the priorities for construction on campus for the next seven years, including Innis College and the Campus Centre.

Langdon and university commissioner Bob Rae (IV UC) met with President Bissell yesterday morning to try to reach an agreement.

Dr. Bissell said he personally would like to publish the brief, but referred the question to the Board of Governors for decision.

The Board yesterday referred the decision to the closed meetings of the Board's executive which meets Monday, and to the President's Council, which meets today.

"Not only did the adminis-the Commission on University Government. They feared the brief would encroach upon the jurisdiction of CUG.

"The President reacted in the most traditional way," Rae told The Varsity. "He reacted according to habit, and he did not choose to ask students or faculty. He has made a bad political error."

"The feudalistic structure of the university is generally regarded as not being a particularly fair way of looking at any university plan," he added. "Openness is the issue on this campus."

discussion of the fate of the university," said Bob Rae (IV UC).

"No one was seen in connection with this brief, it was discussed with no one, the committee was responsible to no one but themselves. The Administration must be made to understand that it cannot continue in this fashion.

"There has been no sincere attempt on the part of the president or the Administration to allow discussion," said Rae. "Our task is to see this whole issue is opened up."

Paul Fromm (III SMC) opposed the motion on the grounds that Rae was "over-reacting."

"The Commission may feel it necessary to hold its meeting in camera to put off land speculation," he said.

ATS dodges CUA decision

By GEOFF MEGGS

The annual meeting of the Association of Teaching Staff adjourned last night before voting on a motion to require opening up of the university brief to the Committee on University Affairs.

In a climax to an evening which saw acceptance of a brief proposing an average 19 per cent increase in staff salaries, the 102 (of 1,500) members present listened to pleas for support from Bob Rae (IV UC) and from President Claude Bissell to consider carefully the implications of controversy over the CUA brief.

"The report was not passed by the President's Council, the ATS executive, or the SAC executive," Rae said.

Rae described the administration's action as "a serious error of judgement."

President Bissell assured the ATS that their salary recommendations would be taken very seriously by the Administration.

Dr. Bissell told the ATS he felt early publication of the report would have been a "breach of propriety."

"There is nothing in the text of the report I would wish to keep secret," he said.

Later President Bissell conceded "there are some statistics and speculation which could not be revealed without acute embarrassment to fellow universities."

SAC President Steve Langdon declined to address the meeting after his right to speak was unsuccessfully challenged.

Prof. Loren Smith of the philosophy dept. said, "We believe the students and faculty ought to be consulted on the brief." She was speaking for an element of the Philosophy Dept. partly sympathetic with the SAC demands.

There is also a movement in the political economy dept. by a few professors to promote the SAC cause. The meeting was adjourned before the membership could vote on the CUA issue.

The Varsity asked Dr. Bissell to comment after the ATS meeting.

"No comment," he shouted several times. "It's been a long day."

• In an emergency meeting yesterday, the Victoria College Union Council condemned the U of T administration and agreed unanimously its action "seemingly contradicts the mandate for openness as demonstrated by the student elections for a Commission on University Government.

"We condemn them for the bad faith shown by this action, and ask them to make this brief public."

The VCUC also urged campus wide support for today's mass meeting at Convocation Hall and any subsequent action.

• The Medical Society Assembly, also called for mass support of the meeting and urged publication of the brief.

They endorsed "the general principle of participation by all sectors of the university community in decision-making," but made it clear they did not agree with the idea of a sit-in.

• All four CUG candidates — Bob Rae, D'Arcy Martin, Steve Grant and Gary Webster — have pledged to sit in unless the brief is published and the students and faculty are left to decide on the final form the brief will take.

SAC may sit-in

By GEOFF MEGGS

The Students Administrative Council voted Wednesday to hold a non-obstructive sit-in if President Claude Bissell refuses to release the contents of a secret brief to the Committee on University Affairs.

Dr. Bissell asked SAC President Steve Langdon to attend the presentation of the brief but warned he would be forbidden to divulge contents of either the brief or discussion at the meeting.

Langdon told the meeting that the brief had been prepared without consultation with any level of the university community.

"This represents a real setback. It demonstrates there is a misunderstanding of the basic premises of our argument which is open dis-

MONTREAL (CUP) — Political Science students on strike at McGill made a small but significant step forward late last night.
With the help of the mediator, Donald Theall, Head of the English Department at McGill, the students voted to hold open negotiation meetings every day until the strike is settled.
They will meet with anyone who shows up. The faculty have not approved this latest move but it is hoped that they will attend the meetings.
The English students said they would boycott their classes on Monday and have asked for study session today in support of the poli-sci students.

Ten faculty members have said they support the students and three political science professors have come out on the strikers behalf too.
Meanwhile in Hamilton, 32 graduate students from the University of MacMaster are still continuing their two day boycott which began on Tuesday. The graduates have refused to teach their first year classes claiming they have similar grievances.

Mortgage costs spark residence protest

Tomorrow is the deadline for payment of the second instalment of residence fees for Devonshire House, Whitney Hall and Sir Daniel Wilton Residence.

About 280 of this residents will be withholding their fees in protest of the portion of them which goes to cover mortgage payments on New College. Ninety-eight per cent of the residents are involved in the protest at Devonshire, 93 per cent at Sir Dan's, and more than 50 per cent at Whitney Hall.

Representatives of the three residences last night formed a committee of unified opposition to the inequitable distribution of mortgage payments on New College.

Due to a recent change in executive, New College residents were not organized in time to take any fees hold-back action. They are, however, endorsing the stand taken by the committee.

The presidents of the four houses of Whitney Hall have circulated a letter to President Claude Bissell, Registrar Robin Ross, Chief Accountant G. Ford, UC Principal Douglas LePan and UC Dean of Women Charity Grant, explaining their objections.

Peter Kiidumae (III Arch) estimated that $90 of the $520 fee for room goes to pay for the New College mortgage.

Penalty for late payment of fees is $3 a month to a maximum of $10. If the fees are not ultimately paid the university can refuse to give students their marks.

As the rain splashed down from yesterday's gray and gloomy skies, two attendants sat in a small hut near the corner of St. George and Harbord Sts., guarding a huge empty muddy lot. The parking lot was closed early this week so that construction on the New Research Library could begin. Construction hasn't yet started and a lot of people (more than 300) are wondering what happened to their parking space.

Architecture facilities to be improved

Architecture students have obtained approval in principle for proposed changes in the facilities of the architectural building.

A brief drawn up about two weeks ago by the student House Committee was presented to Dean T. Howarth and the president's advisory council on university facilities. Bill Kent, president of the Architectural Society, expects "facilities are going to be changed very soon."

Most of the student demands centred on better utilization of available space. The new course structure this year has given them more time to spend on individual work in their studios which they find inadequate and overcrowded.

The fee issue is still being investigated. Architecture students pay the same fees as engineers — the second highest on campus — but claim they have received nothing comparable to the elaborate equipment of the engineers.

brief affects us all

The administration's secret brief on plans for the university up to 1975 affects all of us as students. Although the actual recommendations for the brief are still unknown, the allocation of money in any way is a function of university policy.

We thought that the Commission on University Government elections made it perfectly clear that this kind of secrecy was unacceptable to students. The four students elected stood on platforms of openness in decision-making and equal staff-student participation in decision-making.

The administration knew this when they planned to present the secret brief to the provincial Committee on University Affairs on Monday.

At no point were students and faculty as a whole consulted on the final brief. In fact, neither the SAC nor the Association of Teaching Staff had heard anything about it until Dr. Bissell suggested SAC members should attend the presentation under confidential conditions.

At the mass meeting today, SAC may bring up the possibility of a sit-in at Simcoe Hall on Monday. This may seem like a rash step, but not if it impresses on the administration that:

- all decisions affecting the university community must be made openly;

- students and faculty are the appropriate bodies to make decisions on crucial university policy, with the administration in an advisory role.

Dr. Bissell indicated that he would publish the brief if the Board of Governors agreed. Yesterday, they threw the matter over to the Board's executive council, and the Presidents Advisory Council. They will meet in the next two or three days. Yet Dr. Bissell's handling of the affair does raise some puzzling questions.

How does he justify the secrecy of this important brief considering the stress on the importance of openness during the CUG negotiations?

Does the brief at all overlap with CUG's mandate? If so, the administration has acted in bad faith and there is considerable doubt about whether students ever can, or should, work with administration on university committees.

Why was the brief referred to the Board of Governors for ratification of publication? The brief had nothing to do with the Board at any time before from what we can gather.

Why is the Board referring the decision to its executive council? This procedure is unheard of — in fact, it is normally the reverse (from the executive to the general).

Dr. Bissell points out that a number of faculty and college committees contributed to the final brief, including a sub-committee of the President's Council. He points out that seven students have been asked to join the President's Council.

He does not mention that students have refused to join the Council until the meetings are open — the same principle violated by the secrecy surrounding the brief.

What the brief says — whether it is innocuous or highly important — is irrelevant. The issues of openness and staff-student approval are very relevant.

A sit-in to establish these principles should not carry the same bad connotations as the Dow sit-in last year. For one thing, it will be a non-obstructive sit-in. For another, it will only be called if a majority at the mass meeting today want it.

If we demand only publication of the brief, and that the presentation of the brief be stopped for a while, Dr. Bissell will outmaneuver us easily. He will show us the brief and give us a token say in a brief that is, to all purposes, fait accompli.

If we can establish once and for all the principles of openness and participation of all the university community instead of one part of it — and these are principles important to students from every college and faculty — we will have won a worthwhile victory indeed.

We must be able to openly decide on this brief.

"But if I share my toys with all the kids isn't that communist?"

biafra

What is wrong with our government that it sits idly by and makes excuses for our lack of involvement in Biafra. Excuse after excuse comes from Ottawa, while our aircraft sit on the tarmac of Lagos and Trenton, Ont. I am a pilot and a member of the Canadian Forces and I cannot stand the nonsense which Ottawa hands out.

Background: we had to be begged to consider the loan of some aircraft, then we had to negotiate with the Red Cross, then we waited for Nigeria and Biafra to agree on a mercy flight corridor. The last straw came when Nigeria said our C-130 Hercules aircrafts are too heavy for the runways.

We hear claims and denials concerning genocide by the Nigerian government every day. What is true I don't know and I am not qualified to comment upon. What I can say is this: Nigeria is using the century old battle tactic of siege warfare and will not have to mistreat the Biafran people if she can starve them out.

I will now proceed to destroy the reasons the Nigerian and Canadian governments give for not flying in.

The Swedish C-130 weighs the same as ours does and the runways aren't falling apart yet. If the Canadian government accepts this, why not send in De Havilland and Caribou aircraft which can be operated off grass (they are in Vietnam) we have lots in Mobile Command (the funny thing is our armed forces are primarily suited for defence and peace-keeping operations such as this). If Nigeria still says no. Tell them where to go. Our pilots have guts which is more than our prime minister, his cabinet and the rest of Canada

To maintain our neutrality we will allow a Nigerian representative to inspect the cargo as it is loaded. Then our planes will fly a continuous corridor announced by us.

They will be escorted by our CF-101 Voodoo Interceptors which could easily handle anything the Nigerian government could send up against us and our planes crew and cargo would not be sitting ducks. This practice if implemented immediately could save thousands of lives. And, to quote Churchill, never would so many owe so much to so few.

parking

On Monday, November 25, the parking lot at St. George and Harbord St. was closed without previous notice. On Wednesday morning of the same week, the lot behind the Connaught Laboratory was closed to students but not to staff; again this happened without notice. Apparently the attendant had been told to do so less than 24 hours previously.

The parking problem was acute even before this occurrence. However, the unjust aspect of the situation appears to be the ability of the administration to take arbitrary action without previous notice. It seems to us that unreserved parking should be open to everyone. We hope that the university administration will seriously consider providing parking space for students.

In the ill-judged execution of the well judged plan of things, the call seldom produces the comer, the man to love rarely co-incides with the hour for loving. Nature does not often say "See!" to a poor creature at a time when seeing can lead to a happy doing, or reply "Here!" to a body's cry of "Where?" till the hide and seek has become an outworn game.

Thomas Hardy - Tess of the D'urbervilles

In China, we are told, the whores are now extinct — mirabile dictu! we cry, for the still point of the rest of the turning, spinning world is still cash.

In Moscow they are still there, in Red Square, on the subways, lurking by the cab stands, skirts slightly hitched revealing black market American nylons.

Havana is no longer the city as Hemingway knew it; the posadas (brothels) of Batista's Cuba have also been revolutionized into small hotels where young lovers seeking privacy in a crowded city may go; for a few pesos the man in the government shirt ushers them to a room, a bed, a sheet and a shower — and knocks on the door when the few allotted hours are up.

The hookers have moved to the quiet bars and darker streets; a few of the more successful ones have managed to become a part of the decor of the tourist hotels such as the Havana Libre (née Hilton).

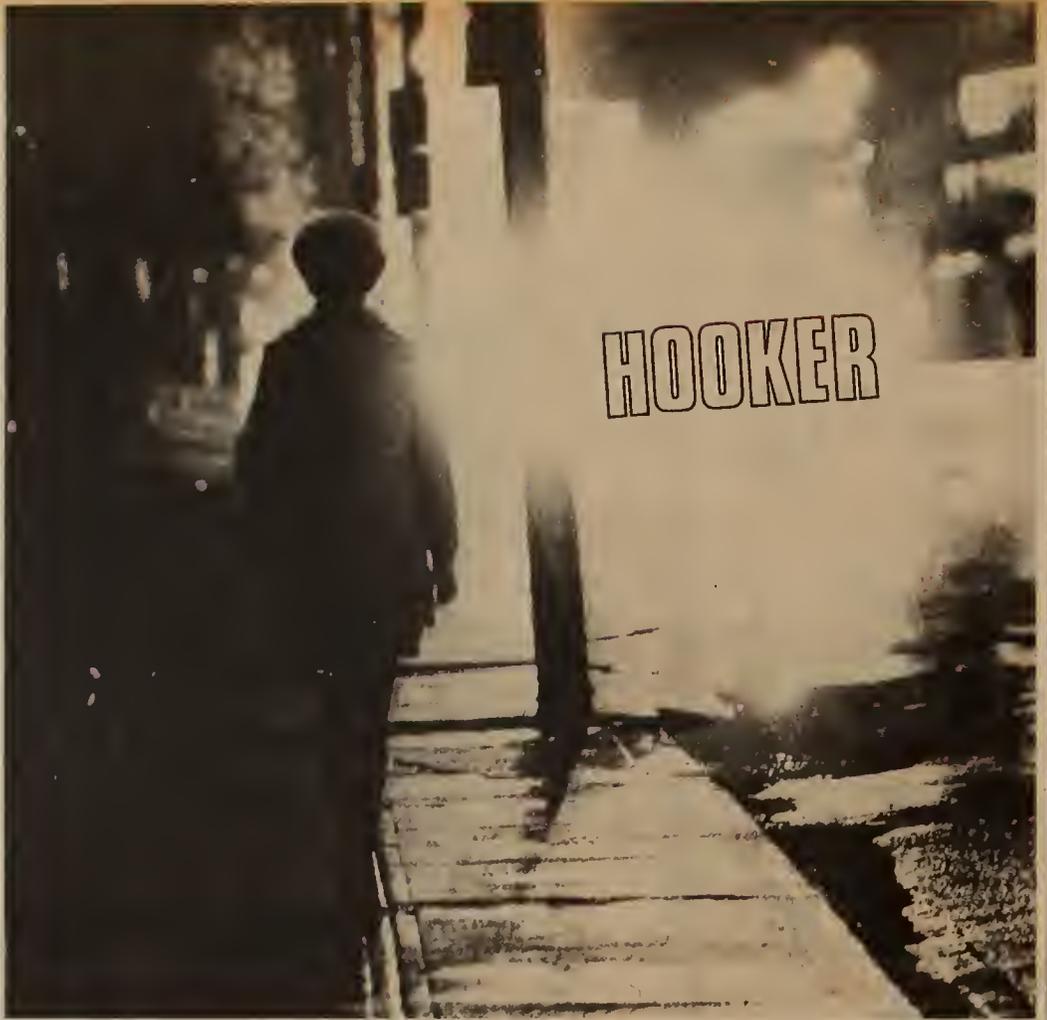

The Marseilles waterfront is, perhaps, more overt; one is not faced with the need to resolve official socialist piety with fact. Along the teeming carnival streets of the docks, sailors, tourists, thieves are greeted with shouts and coos from bare-breasted women leaning out of the hotel windows, "Hey lover-boy, good ficky-ficky".

In Mexico City a young lad runs alongside and offers his sister, "very young, sir, very pretty, to do anything you like sir, very cheap, please sir . . ."

The style, the approach, the pitch varies according to the locale, but — if you will forgive a melodramatic hiatus — when the door is locked, the name of the game is the same: someone gets paid, another laid.

ing true you have satisfied the sexual appetite of your menfolk, repressed it, or eliminated it. Or are you lying?

For if the whore is a universal presence, far more so is her customer, the straight John, the trick in the parlance of the North American hooker. The man, lonely, humble, arrogant, eash in pocket who knows reality is to be bought, mutters to himself, what is who is it that he could not buy if he had enough; and who is it that will not surrender herself to be sold if the price is right?

The whore concurs and takes his money and gives him nothing, unmindful of the spilling sperm.

If they have any distinguishing universal mark, it is their eyes; they are the same everywhere — pale, flat, glazed — reptilian, lifeless and distant. It is in the eyes of the hooker that you see her reality; it is in the eyes of a hooker that you discover the extent to which man can destroy; when you look into their eyes it is clear who the tyrant is and who the victim — and if you associate your ego with your manhood, more's the pity.

Poor straight honest John, the lonely trick, chuckles as he drives into town on a Friday night. Poor straight honest John, the unassuming killing.

"Every man's a trick," she asserts, putting on her mascara, "even him" nodding towards the television set where Trudeau has just placed a flower in his mouth awaiting victory at the nominating convention.

"For somebody, somewhere, at some time, every man is a trick and that's how I treat them . . .". Cindy waxes enthusiastic as a few others in the room shake their heads in disagreement.

"And so what anyway? I like my tricks and they like me; and something else — every chick's a hooker in the right time and place."

Cindy is an established hooker in William Dennison's Toronto. She dresses well, her wardrobe running into a few thousand dollars; she drives a new car, is vivacious and would be called attractive by some who might not notice her pale, glazed eyes. She averages between six and seven hundred dollars a week if she's not sick or in jail.

She works hard, keeps regular hours with her tricks and is more than a bit insulted if anyone were to suggest that she does not come by her money honestly. She has now reached a level of success which keeps her off the streets; nor does she rely on the services of a procurer, as do many if not most of Toronto's underground business girls. Cindy does all her business by telephone and sometimes by mail.

The conversation pauses momentarily as everyone turns to the set again to hear Trudeau's acceptance speech; they nod their approval of his style, his cool and Cindy resumes her lecture on What is What.

"Listen: Canada is on the up and up; I was just in New York last week and listen Toronto is just as swift, just as swift as New York; swifter even . . ." More disapproval from her audience.

"Yes, it's true Carol-Anne, yes it is . . . the people are here and the money is here and that's all it takes."

Carol-Anne is not yet a part of Cindy's 'swift' world. She has just arrived in Toronto from the same little Ontario town as Cindy; she works in a tiny Yonge Street boutique but is rapidly developing an eye for the swift life.

The two other girls in the room are also hookers, friends of Cindy's, also from small Ontario towns; they and their immediate friends are a tight group, surrounded in a haze of dope, soul music, and a meticulous calculated cool of jargon and attitude to the effect of convincing friends and enemies that they are right on top of Things.

Beside the two other girls are a pair of Detroit rounders, two large implacably fronted Negroes; they rule and guide the fortunes of Cindy's two friends who have not yet reached her level of success where they can go it on their own.

The two men speak very little apart from the odd grunt and a deferential murmur; their jeweled hands and straight, slicked down hair suggests that they are not yet disciples of Eldridge Cleaver. Their cool is so advanced as to be frozen, fitting inmates of any mausoleum.

They are eyeing Carol-Anne with some interest, for she is attractive, graceful and seemingly enchanted with Cindy's babble. She is very quiet, always smiling, listening, her great dark eyes flashing.

The conversation has again

Sometimes, in the morning the driver is in a good mood. From Finch down to Wilson Ave., he says good morning to all the ladies in Yiddish. They all understand him, but are very careful not to acknowledge him; they are very, very embarrassed. From Wilson Ave. to Dundas St., he says, "Bon giorno" and the fat Italian housewives gleefully fuss over him. He is very happy then. From Dundas St. down to the exhibition grounds, he says a curt, "hello", which usually stops just a few blocks below Queen. From then on he says nothing.

***

The people who live in the suburbs live in continual warmth; they are always in their cars or in their houses or in their climateless shopping centres. The dream of solitary single family unit has reached its ultimate conclusion: isolation.

But it's a great place for kids. Wade knee deep in the sewage ditch and climb the trees growing in the swamp just past the backyard or roll snow for a snowman. They learn to accept the blazing sun or the cold blasts that come because there are no trees. But they never experience the beauty of dark corners in city streets, in the shade of fifty-year-old houses that smell of old paper and dust. They learn the smell of the grass and the earth rolling down a hill on a hot summer's day, but never know of selling lemonade to tired workers on a tree-lined street. They learn of the great warmth of their individual homes after playing in the snow but will never know a warmth that exists on the streets. Because there is nothing in the streets.

But kids grow older, and it's then that the almost unbearable flatness of the environment really takes its toll, the unbearable sameness.

And even the huge apartment buildings, thrusting out like fists against the sky, are flat, each dwelling crushed by the weight above it. You stoop when you walk in, though there is a good 3 feet of room above you.

***

It's at school that the kids first come headlong against the one-dimensional world that dooms them for the rest of their lives. They will get a good education, because they know they can't get it anywhere else. You can't get an education in the pool halls because all the rest of the guys are the same as you anyway.

They'll get their enrichment classes, but they will never really know the meaning of what the teachers, also dulled, tell them about social studies. They will raise money for the Junior Red Cross club to send to needy children whom they will probably never see. They will write oral compositions on "Civil Rights", without having spoken to a Black Man. They will talk about the tragedy of nuclear holocaust in a land that looks like it has already been hit by the bomb.

In the wide flat expanses of the suburbs, where the family is all important, rupture, which should be a natural thing, is made unnatural and the victims crowd the streets were the action is.

Being sordid in a greasy fish and chips store in Etobicoke isn't half as exciting as being sordid in a greasy hamburger place in Yorkville. What's the action? People. All kinds. And there are no people in Don Mills, Scarborough or North York. Only dead souls barricaded in their warm fortresses.

***

The apartments and the shopping plazas don't help. They're built on the same principle. You can be private even when you shop. The miles of fields and highway around Yorkdale are testimony to this.

The suburbs are valuable, very valuable. You sense this when you walk the dog for three miles through the cold winter streets with not a soul to be seen; when you ride your bicycle on an early summer morning and see the mist rising from a small valley that the apartment builders have not yet touched; when you walk a mile in the biting wind to pick up your date on Saturday night because your dad won't let you have the car and no bus runs up that way and you decide to stay at her place instead of going to a movie all the way downtown.

It's when you get older that it becomes a menace. You come to rely on the car, as if it were part of your body. But you don't go out because it's so hard to park downtown. So you fall asleep by the television for the rest of your life.

Nobody ever made the law that privacy couldn't co-exist with community, only the unseeing opportunism of the land dealers with their nineteenth century ideas of private property. Any solution seems likely to be the most important of all in the future life of our cities, and yet, thus far it has been ignored. People seem happy the way they are, but are they? Yorkville can't hold all the orphans these places produce.

Beyond suburbia lies not the millenium, but Los Angeles.

money's worth at 3¢ opera

There is a well-known and consoling theatrical axiom that a bad dress rehearsal guarantees a good show. If this works in reverse, Theatre Mickities' production of Threepenny Opera must have been drastically devalued on opening night. While the cast and crew could have used some audience adrenalin to speed up their responses to cues, their Wednesday dress rehearsal provided a sometimes exciting and always entertaining evening.

What it was that author Brecht had in his disillusioned mind when he adapted John Gay's 1798 Beggar's Opera to the tensions of the twentieth century is debatable. The play is a large-scale farce of exploitation, with a minimal plot in the "marriage" of the underworld aristocrat, Captain MacHeath, to the daughter of J.J. Peachum, whose thriving business is to be the Beggars' Friend. While hordes of starving Londoners writhe around the stage, the central characters snicker and betray each other, thereby demonstrating that, as one song proclaims, a man survives by living on others.

The audience won't see this brick bat message until very late because it's swathed in Victorian trappings and whammed home in some very funny lines. The Mickities' production, battling in the Ryerson auditorium instead of Brecht's intimate experimental theatre, tried to sock it across by expanding the script and spilling the show out into the audience.

The most striking, and probably the most successful, instance of this attempt is the use of a permanent curtainless set, a wooden superstructure whose angle opens up the deep stage. And on this set the expansion principle goes into operation with the opening number, Mack the Knife, which is assigned to the entire company instead of to a lone street-singer. The effect is more like a banjo sing-along from the Grand Ole Opry than a description of a man who leaves trails of blood behind him.

This is however consistent with the tone established by the central characters, whose viciousness is literally beyond belief. MacHeath, for example, is tagged "the slipperiest criminal in London", but Mike McCabe's version of the character is greased but no lightning. The strongest performances are in the explicitly comic roles -- the best of an excellent lot being John McAndrew as the incompetent beggar Filch, Joe Crowley with a deliciously detailed portrayal of one of Mack's henchmen, and Susie Murray as the red-pantalooned Coax-er, the most convincing whore on stage. Another and more serious minor part, that of Mack's ex-love Jenny, was well-executed by Jody Alessandro.

With the comic effects dominating the acting, the job of establishing something beyond pure fun and games is left to Kurt Weil's music. While some songs never got across David Warrack's orchestra, those that did were mostly unnerveingly successful, notably Mrs. Peachum's (Georgia McFall) comment on the rottenness of males and Pirate Jenny's (Chris Betzen) threat against the world at large.

It adds up to a good bit of theatricality, and maybe my head is too hard to sense when it's been hit. But the show hit me like one of the red taffeta flounces which swirl through it, and I rather suspect that the production simply proves Mr. Peachum's claim that "the powerful of the earth can create poverty but they can't bear to look at it."

theatre goes the victim

Mario Fratti makes his living in New York by translating plays for Italian television. His little effort at stagecraft, presented by Belmont Theatre Productions at the Central Library, crams as much sexual dialogue as possible into a play which couldn't make it past network censors.

Unfortunately, to this reviewer Fratti's self-purgation was only annoying as opposed to intriguing. The performances of Ben and Sylvia Lennick and Peter McConnell didn't alleviate The Victim's problems either.

There's this mad rapist, see, who murders the gas man and takes Sylvia Lennick's quasi-virtue by threat. She digs this, though, and eventually finds out that her husband has put this rapist up to the whole thing as a plot to murder her. See? No.

As an example of modern alienation techniques the production is a masterpiece. Sylvia moves like chintz, while Ben is fond of holding stylized poses (one foot held in the air). McConnell makes the least of Leslie Yeo's staggeringly static blocking. McConnell, it must be admitted, did sound like a lunatic, and he had some very funny

dizzy dean of the statusleagues

All right, guys and chickies, put on your bell-bottom trousers and Indian scarves, tie those scarves in lush double-butterfly knots — not you bushy Jeremiahs of the philosophy department — but the rest of you, flick the tuner on to CHUM-FM and stretch out on the wall-to-wall with the latest word from Tom Wolfe. The Pump House Gang! Yah! Tom Wolfe laughing and scratching at you from apple-pie-and-motherhoodland! And here it is, live from La Jolla, Calif., from New York, from London, from Columbus, Ohio, a continuing play-by-play of the pursuit of the happiness game.

Since 1965 Tom's been zipping across the United States, across England even, taking in the new . . . life-styles. Everywhere he's noticing (and recording) the emergence of new forms, new groupings in society: surfers in southern California ("The Pump House Gang"); middle-class recluses (following the example of Hugh Hefner, "King of the Status Dropouts") who retreat into their own technological wonderlands; socialites who say "shit" and "fuck" at high-class dinner parties (c.f. "Tom Wolfe's New Book of Etiquette"). With unprecedented amounts of money and leisure time, all sorts of people are establishing their own standards of achievement, their own statusleagues.

Everybody by now has read Tom Wolfe's first collection of revelations about pop culture, The Kandy-Kolored etc. etc. That book . . . well, it really zapped a lot of people who thought of themselves as thinkers. They didn't want to believe Wolfe was serious, or they didn't think he was serious enough. Here they were accustomed to thinking about big, i.e. apocalyptic issues like the threat to personal freedom in modern America and poverty in the midst of plenty and along comes this joker yattering about — what? Custom cars! demolition derbies! tyrannical nannies!

Tom squares off with his opponents in the introduction to his second book. "What struck me throughout America and England was that so many people have found such novel ways of doing just that, enjoying, extending their egos way out on the best terms available, namely, their own. It is curious how many serious thinkers — and politicians — resist this rather obvious fact. Sheer ego extension — especially if attempted by all those rancid proles and suburban petty burghers — is a perplexing prospect. Even scary, one might say. Intellectuals and politicians currently exhibit a vast gummy nostalgia for the old restraints, the old limits, of the ancient ego-crusher: Calamity."

So the literati and soothsayers and moral rationalists — in other words, all the good 19th-century intellectuals disapprove. Tom Wolfe is not quite intellectually respectable. And the radical utopian-thinkers at the university keep putting him down, because the revolution he is talking about has left them without Exhibit A, the suppressed masses. What the university radicals can't accept is that money and technology — yes! — the tools of the industrial-military complex — are exactly the means by which the supposed victims have liberated themselves from the old hierarchical class structure. What's more, the cultural tastes of the diploma elite no longer count for very much; the liberated masses have imposed their style on the whole society — as witness fancifully-designed automobiles and mod clothes and pop music and the whole range of pop culture.

The people who call Tom Wolfe superficial and valueless generally apply the same criticisms to Marshall McLuhan. It's no coincidence that the longest chapter in The Pump House Gang is the one on McLuhan ("What If He Is Right?"), and that it comes smack in the middle of the book — smack-dab between Part 1 about the exciting-but-sometimes-dangerous new orders of society, and Part 2, about the sad confusion of established society in New York and London. McLuhan — the high priest himself! gets in his own attack on moral protesters in the literary-intellectual mold: "The mere moralistic expression of approval or disapproval, preference or detestation, is currently being used in our world as a substitute for observation and a substitute for study. People hope that if they scream loudly enough about 'values' then others will mistake them for serious sensitive souls who have higher and nobler perceptions than ordinary people."

But — but . . . But there's Vietnam dangling like a mangled arm off the whole Jesus emaciated body of Asia.

And there are those 20 or 30 per cent lighting a bomb under the fat contented prole ass of America. And when the yellow and black and purple hordes appear over the horizon . . . And then there's little Sue, a 16-year-old Dollie girl, driving around the Little Venice section of London with Crispian Fellock-Withers or whatever-his-name is, who has just picked her up at some deb's party, and the most immediate agony of Sue's existence is whether this terribly upper-class boy will ask her up to his flat or announce that he has a headache.

But exactly! We care about the status struggles of Sue, the Teenage London Society Girl, because we're all immediately concerned WITH MAKING IT ON SOME LEVEL OR OTHER IN SOME COMMUNITY OR OTHER. That moment — snap! — provides a microcosm of the whole class thing in London society. Sue's agony is frozen — snap! — while Tom Wolfe explores the relative position of Dollie girls (rich bourgeois) and Heathfield girls (aristocrat), including their clothes, their ambitions, families, sexual habits, confrontations. Tom seems to approach the situation with some sort of Kodak Instamatic Mixed-media camera, one that hasn't been invented yet with time-space-depth vision. He seizes on specific people at a specific time and place, freezes them — snap! — in their particular context, and broadens his angle of vision — snap! — to include historical-literary-ethological or whatever kind of analogies. From McLuhan to Freud. From the madness at Grand Central Station to the effects of overcrowding on Sika deer and Norway rats. From male attire at Harvey's Drive-in to the court fashions of seventeenth-century England. Snap! Frozen in history!

Tom Wolfe's style . . . his style resembles an incredible seemingly random patchwork, but the hysteria is carefully contrived. It involves a lot of liberal education (a Ph.D. in American studies at Yale), a newspaperman's skill in researching, a writer's perception of character, vocabulary from medical texts and comic books, quick cuts out of nouvelle vague movies, and detail — masses of exquisite detail, almost a baroque excess of decorative detail. Of course all this goes far beyond the who-what-where-when-how school of journalism, in fact it goes beyond journalism altogether. Perfect. All the biggies in today's culture and communications field are inventing new forms that don't fit into any of the existing categories.

One can envisage an English professor twenty years from now lecturing his English 150 class on the oeuvre of Tom Wolfe, that is if things like professors and lectures and English 150 are still around in twenty years. Anyway the professor, a green corduroy type with that milky-white academic complexion, is saying, "In Wolfe's vision of society, the primary drive of the individual is to achieve the most complete possible realization of life-style as defined by his social environment blather blather Archetypal characters are depicted in fact blather blather. . . ." Status-drive. Yes! Archetypal characters. Yes! New Jersey teeneybopper bouffant baby in stretch pants and furry sweater and Dick Tracy eyes. Bob and Ethel (Spike) Scull, the successful climbers who made it fast! in New York's Culture Establishment. Heroes and heroines of America in the 1960's! The Put-Together Girl: that's Carol Doda, the San Francisco topless dancer who took silicone injections "in order to show the new world a pair of — at last! — perfected twentieth-century American breasts." And Tom Reiser, one of the motorcycle greats: he attached a 300-horsepower Chevrolet V-8 engine to a Harley 74-XA and went sailing down a great smooth stretch of Ohio superhighway "at 140-160-180-200 miles an hour — 2000 miles an hour — sailing! At last, the winged American centaur, the American dream, at last."

civilized academic futility

Agenda 1970: Proposals for a Creative Politics, Lloyd and Mcleod (ed.) University of Toronto Press, 1968, $3.50

Large black and white buttons saying 'Ivory Power' have been doing the rounds at the university this past week. They are being given out in connection with Agenda 1970, a product of The University League for Social Reform, "an informal group of university professors, young rather than old, to the left rather than to the right, who produce a book about once a year on contemporary problems."

Agenda 1970 is a collection of essays by academics on "proposals for a creative politics". The book has certain weaknesses, as does the whole approach of the League: civilized men write about world problems, for which they think they have civilized answers. There is a sense of futility about the whole exercise.

For the premise on which the approach is based is that with an increase in knowledge, or information, problems can be solved. Some of the articles in the book complain about the plethora of royal commissions and task forces in government, but these articles themselves do nothing but make tinkering recommendations on how to make the whole structure more relevant. Only a few articles try to come to terms with the whole system.

Among the tinkering articles could be included Ronald Blair's on parliament, Ian Drummond's on broadcasting, and to a certain extent Peter Silcox's on boards and commissions.

'Ivory Power' is pretty meaningless if it means professors writing quiet suggestions on how to make government a little bit bigger and a little bit better. Not that this is completely unimportant: it's just that it's really not the guts of the issue. If this is the best of the hard hitting, sock-it-to-me, tell-it-as-it-is academic of the 1960's can come up with, one fails to see what all the fuss is about.

Fortunately, its not. For there are a few articles in the collection which really do come to grips with Canada's political economy. Two articles stand out, those by Mel Watkins and Gad Horowitz. They make one remember, however faintly, that universities also produced the Thorsten Veblen's and C. Wright Mills' of the past.

Watkins traces back over some familiar ground, foreign investment and Canadian independence. The essay features an analysis of the failure of Canadian entrepreneurship, the emasculation of the bourgeoisie, and the subsequent loss of Canadian control over the economy. He writes with toughness and good sense, as well as with great political sensitivity. There is nothing of the obscure spider spinning his academic web which seems to characterize so much university writing today.

Horowitz is writing about the need for a realignment in Canadian politics on an ideological, class basis, in other words politics as left and right, rather than in terms of 'my catch-all versus your catch-all'. As Horowitz writes: "There is no major party of the left in Canada, not because our people are too stupid to be conscious of the disadvantages of non-elite status, but because our business-orientated elites have been reluctant to translate the personal trouble of non-elite status into the public issue of inequality."

Other articles worth reading are John Rich's analysis of the New Youth, Gilles Paquet's condemnation of the Economic Council, and Jack Macleod's look at post-capitalist society.

The frustration with some of the articles which I aired earlier stems from the conviction that the solution to the 'problems' of 1970 are essentially political. It is not a lack of information about housing that has paralysed the government (which seems to be the basic argument behind the formulation of the task force), but rather that housing has never been recognized as a social or political responsibility of the public sector. What is required is not merely more information, or more task forces, but an entirely new political approach.

The book does contain some valuable insights into the Canadian policy, but it is not as revolutionary or dynamic as the blurbs would have us believe. The idea that all university professors perse somehow have a spectacularly vital insight into our problems is just not true.

'Ivory Power' is a great hoax if it simply means fudge-like recommendations from academics who want to go down in history as consultants to the wealthy and not so wise. It is not even very relevant if it naively allows itself to be used by whoever wants to use it. 'Ivory Power' only means something if it is accompanied by a determination on the part of academics to see that their talents, their understanding of Canadian political problems, have some real social purpose.

cabbagetown

Cabbagetown, by Hugh Garner, Ryerson Press, $7.50

This is very welcome new edition of Hugh Garner's Cabbagetown. The first version, published as a cheap paperback in 1950, was, as the saying goes, much expurgated and revised. Garner has now given us a totally unexpurgated and unrepented book "edited and completely rewritten by the author from the original manuscript."

There has been a recent flurry of interest in Toronto and its one great indigenous slum, and if nothing else Garner gives us a very acute description of the tawdry and dingy life of the urban poor in Canada. I am sure that what he writes about Cabbagetown in the 1930's could be written about today, though as he points out in his introduction the Regents Park public housing development has completely changed the landscape of Cabbagetown proper.

The novel concentrates on the lives of just a few people, all growing up in the early 1930's. Ken Tilling, the hero, leaves 'the Tech' at sixteen, takes odd jobs, works in sweatshop conditions in factories, and finally goes unemployed when the city is hit by the full weight of the Depression. Tilling's mother becomes an alcoholic, the girl of his dreams a prostitute, one of his friends a thief and murderer, another a member of a right wing youth organization. The end of the novel sees Tilling armed with newly won political conviction, determined to fight the good fight in Spain.

Cabbagetown is no Grapes of Wrath, and Garner will scarcely rank with Steinbeck or Upton Sinclair as a chronicler of the poor in North America. But Garner does succeed in recreating the tensions of the Depression 1930's, and the impression he gives us of the urban English poor is quite moving, and politically accurate.

Garner's knowledge and understanding of Toronto life in the 1930's, and his ability to relate with the few characters he does describe well redeems a rather thin and soapy plot.

So what we have is a 'useful' and 'interesting' second rate novel. Garner manages to recreate an atmosphere, a way of life, which is no mean achievement, but the novel does have distinct limitations. There is a tremendous tendency to sentimentalize, the occasional purple passage more reminiscent of a Victorian melodrama than the 'realistic school' of which the young Garner was obviously trying to become a member.

But in all fairness to Garner, the novel does convey, with considerable force and eloquence, a very basic message: for people in Cabbagetown, as for people in slums everywhere, poverty is a degrading and warping experience. And in an age in which the ultimate myth of Horatio Alger still persists, those who maintain the reality that poverty usually destroys the human spirit should be welcomed.

TO PLAN

We've come a long way from thatched huts, drafty stone castles and log cabins, yes. No more outhouses, coal furnaces, the horse and buggy days are gone. We've got a modern tech-no-lo-gee, and you just give us a problem, and we can solve it. We will hustle your dilemma into a committee of specialists, apply sophisticated logic and the power of IBM, work out a time cost ratio and efficiency percentages and do you up just fine and hunky. And, if you want, we will market your solution, sell it nationwide, worldwide, write it up and show it off, and the world will beat a path to your door.

We've come a long way from log cabins, today we live in massive multiple-unit buildings constructed with all the inventiveness and efficiency our technology has to offer. Ever read a high rise advertisement? Limited time only — convenient underground parking — fabric drapes — excellent transportation facilities — magnificent views from large private balconies — sauna baths. Sock it to me. Yes, limited time only.

Of course the lower level of your convenient underground parking garage may well be three feet deep in water. You'll need those fabric drapes to protect you and your loved ones from the drafts and winds which whistle through the cracks between the window frames. And subways and buses from all over Metro stop at your door — excellent transportation facilities; just allow ten to twenty minutes for the elevator trip from your floor to the ground depending on how long you have to wait for one. From your large private balcony, maybe five feet wide by twelve feet long, you will have a magnificent view of the neighbors' balconies on either side and across the street. Enjoy your sauna bath, but please be extra careful of fire since, if you start one, it's quite possible you'll find the emergency water hose at the end of your corridor without pressure. Limited time only. Hurry. Hurry. Hurry. Reasonable rents starting at $150 for a bachelor apartment (which is one large room, kitchenette and bath).

The Toronto high rise janitor. A couple of weeks ago the tenants of one building, in a rash moment, organized a rent strike. The building's managers responded with all the finesse and good judgement of a cornered bull; the leaders of the strike found themselves locked out of their homes. But, fear not for our heroes. Big Bill Denison, Toronto's legislative whip, inspected the scene and said, "Something's got to be done, here." That firm, take-charge-guy style lets us know you're on top of the situation. Planned any good smoke-stacks lately? Big Bill's riding off now into the snog-set. Meanwhile, back at the Planning Commission the big date approaches: December 4th when City Council will consider the Toronto City Plan. Before then a crucial issue has to be settled. Should the Commission recommend that size restrictions be placed on buildings to be constructed between Parliament and Spadina, Bloor and the waterfront?

The five City Council members on the Planning Board (and chief kibitzer Alderman Rotenberg), in opposition to the planners, want no controls. The citizen members of the Board unanimously support the planners. The division, then, is perfect: the politicians against the people and planners. Since the latter group could outvote the politicians on the Board, restrictions will probably be written into the Plan. But because the Board functions as an advisory body, City Council isn't bound to accept any parts of the Plan it doesn't like.

Haven't we been here before? Government hires "experts" and persuades "clear, unbiased thinkers" to advise, to participate in decision-making, to help protect the public interest. Then, when the people who have agreed to help render their opinion, they are ignored. Allen Lamport and Rotenberg are the voice of the people, and their will be done. Do you realize that, by the politicians' laws, if you have a piece of downtown Toronto property which you just let sit and grow weeds and collect junk, you aren't taxed very much; but, if you develop that property, you are taxed lots? Consider the logic of taxing progress and making stagnation profitable. Thus speaks the voice of the people.

Let's retrace two steps taken above to clear up a couple of possible misconceptions:

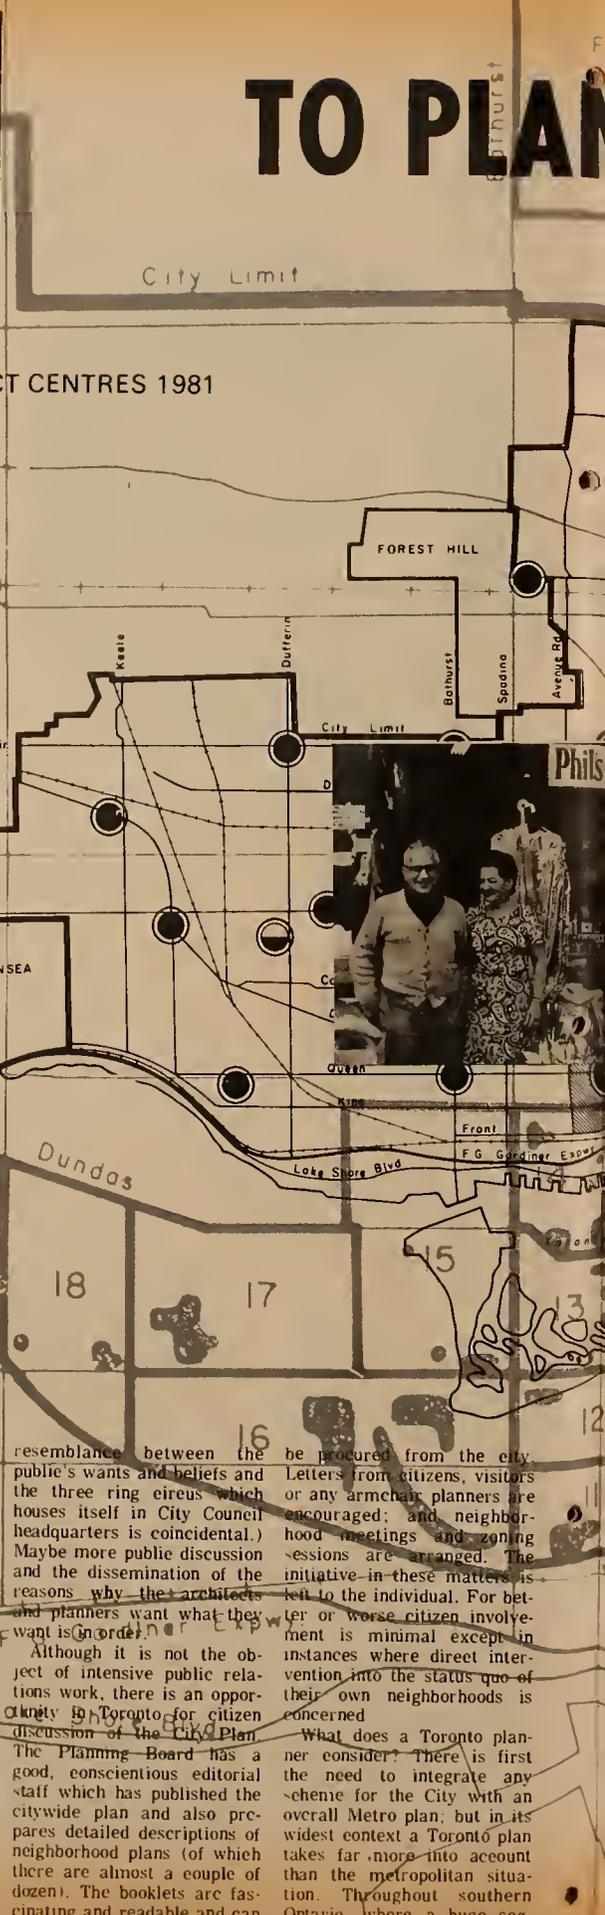

1) Specialists IBM time cost logic and the rest of our tools of development are all potentially for the best. Progress is not the main of the piece. Was it John Foster Dulles who said, "The future lies ahead?" In our movement into the future we can make our environment and the future itself work for us. Or we can let the future serve the interests of an obsolete entrepreneurial class who will cut all the corners they can in the construction and operation of an apartment house. (They will also build as many as they can as high as they can wherever they can. The more folks you can pile onto a small plot of land, the more money you stand to make in the long run.)

Thus we have a situation in which, because of a severe housing shortage, tenants have to take what they can get, pay outrageous rents for the honorable privilege and, if they don't like it, get out because every lease has a catch-all clause and landlords can rent an empty apartment within hours to the next patsy who walks through the door. For rent, limited time only. If we don't use our technology as well as we can, we might as well not have it.

2) The "experts" should be asked to advise and should be heard fully and thoughtfully. But they can't be allowed to ride roughshod over the public desires. In the words of University of Toronto urbanologist William Michelson, "Most people don't want what architects want." (In the case of Toronto, however, one must remember that any resemblance between the public's wants and beliefs and the three ring circus which houses itself in City Council headquarters is coincidental.) Maybe more public discussion and the dissemination of the reasons why the architects and planners want what they want is in order.

DISTRICT CENTRES 1981

be procured from the city. Letters from citizens, visitors or any armchair planners are encouraged; and neighborhood meetings and zoning sessions are arranged. The initiative in these matters is left to the individual. For better or worse citizen involvement is minimal except in instances where direct intervention into the status quo of their own neighborhoods is concerned.

What does a Toronto planner consider? There is first the need to integrate any scheme for the City with an overall Metro plan; but in its widest context a Toronto plan takes far more into account than the metropolitan situation. Throughout southern Ontario, where a huge segment of Canada's population resides, Toronto is the hub. Toronto shares common interests with every other city on the Great Lakes, and, at a point in time when the very continued existence of the Great Lakes is a moot point, (the draining of Lake Erie is being seriously considered) this is a significant consideration.

But if Toronto planners must at one limit consider such macrocosmic variables as the development of Lake Ontario's "golden horseshoe" (Kingston to Rochester) or what's going on in the Port of New York Authority planning sessions, at another extreme minute units of the city are examined. Monteith Street, for example, a tiny lane which runs east from Church above Wellesley Street is written up in the Yorkville District plan: "A row of family homes on Monteith has been completely renovated, extending its life span considerably. This street should be rezoned to protect the low density form of development..."

Not infrequently macro- and microcosmic interests will conflict as presently is happening in the neighborhood of Malton Airport. On the one hand a planner must consider the relationship between Toronto and the rest of the continent — rates and kinds of air traffic and how they will be channelled into Toronto. On the other hand a planner must be conscious of the conditions of neighborhoods in the immediate vicinity of ever-expanding air terminals.

The dimensions of planning are as wide as the sizes of areal units are varied. Not only are questions of residential, commercial and industrial location and control considered. Once you have people living somewhere, if you're a good planner, you look at their recreational environment and the proximity of amenities. Huge blocks of Toronto are too far from parks for them to be a convenient journey for small children or old folks. And the amount of parkland, which does exist in the city is less than minimal for the population's needs. (High Park on Summer Sundays is so crowded it can take half an hour to drive in or out). Are stores located reasonably for short shopping trips?

Once you have developed a neighborhood residential plan you project the sort of population you expect. Will there be children? Then there must be nearby schools of appropriate size. If your housing is high density apartments with one bedroom and bachelor units, children don't have to be planned for; there won't be any. If the housing is low density with two bedroom or larger apartments, you'll have children in droves. To borrow again from Professor Michelson, at what stage in their "life cycle" (young unmarried people? married people with children? middle-aged people? couples without children?) will the projected neighborhood population be? Plan accordingly.

And once you have a resident population you've got to make sure they're able to get around. High rise apartment development in Toronto is zoned to follow subway lines. People have to get to work and have to be able to get downtown for long shopping trips and entertainment. No city planner in his right mind wants them to use automobiles for these journeys; transit must be carefully planned.

The description above is planning oversimplified. The bureaucratic and administrative problems of executing a neighborhood scheme aren't even touched on. Writing of a plan is the easiest part of the planning strategy; having it executed thoughtfully is the difficult phase.

A description of some features of the Toronto City Plan may give you an idea of what could happen here in the decade ahead if the politicians don't jumble too much.

Not only are high rise apartments but entities called District Commercial Centres zoned to follow the major arteries of public transportation. Along Bloor these will be at Jane, Dundas, east of Dufferin, Bathurst, Yonge, Pape and Woodbine. This sort of district development follows the sociological contours of the city and exists already in haphazard form. The planners hope to accentuate the districts and simplify and standardize the zoning within them so that the distance from your home to the grocer or park isn't a function of random chance. Convenience isn't, however, the only consideration in the neighborhood planner's mind, most planners believe that, if you create a community situation with bricks and buildings and zoning ordinances, a social community of the people who live in the area will result.

Doubling up of facilities will be done where possible. Above the subway immediately east of Yonge from Wellesley to Bloor there now stretches a long, rather ugly parking lot. Here, as anywhere it is possible, inoperative vehicles will be stored underground, and, in this case, a park will be at ground level (Not a kiddie park with wings and slides, but a landscaped area with little walks and benches suited to the needs of the young and single people who make up most of the neighborhood population).

Industrial areas will be limited to the areas within the City where they presently exist. (This doesn't mean planners are hostile to industry. Most new plants built today are in the suburbs; and the planned industrial areas within the city have surplus space well beyond that created by the frequent relocations of industries for which it is not profitable to be in the central city any longer.) These areas follow the railroad tracks from the St. Clair-Keele boundary of the city, through the central business district and waterfront area and following the railroad again, across to the Danforth-Victoria Park boundary. Industrial developers will be encouraged (presumably by tax incentives and other effective economic tools) to make their sites attractive and to dispose of all wastes in the most efficient and tidy manner possible. The cooperation of industry will require more than a modicum of bargaining and hard-headed legislation.

Toronto's present reputation as an educational center will be enhanced. Not only are some of the most revolutionary reforms in the organization of primary education likely to occur in urban Ontario. The establishment and growth of community colleges and technical institutions throughout the downtown core are planned. The University of Toronto will simply be incapable of coping with the needs of the population for general higher education and remain a prestige university too (no snickers, please). In connection with these plans the Central Library will be relocated perhaps at the city's key intersection, Bloor-Yonge, and the whole library system will be expanded in conjunction with the District Center pattern mentioned above.

This is of course all quite visionary in many senses. But Toronto has the potential raw resources to manage the chore. We won't be the first but will be following in the footsteps of European governments—Sweden, the Netherlands, England. In the matter of urban development and effective city planning, Canada will not, as so often before, be treading the path of the great nation to the south. The complexities of the racial problem in the United States are retarding tragically almost every hope for the renovation of cities.

brel lives and breathes

Jaques Brel is Alive and Well And Living in Paris

Jaques Brel at the Playhouse Theatre has style and power.

Brel writes about the American Dream Girl (the girl who never came), and about war, death, and false love. He conquers time and age and the Middle Class, tucks Devils or Angels under his arm, disintegrates illusions with a crack of his magic whip, and pulls the mountains from under our heroes.

But he does it with class. As both writer and composer of the twenty five odd numbers presented with great finesse by the east of four,

Brel has found a perfectly adapted, satisfying and powerful vehicle for his commentary. He's just not the usual folk-rock-protester. Nor can his songs be classified in any of the traditional ways. There are many levels to his lyrics and they cannot be captured in criticisms; the songs of Jaques Brel must be heard.

The cast remains loyal to Brel throughout.

Stan Porter's absolutely chilling renditions of pieces like Amsterdam or Next could not have been more hard or tough. Another number, Arlene Meadow's "Sons of . . . the great or sons unknown, All were children like your own" expressed the passionate emotion not merely of a prophet dissatisfied with the world.

It's incredible that Blau and Sehuman were able to translate Brel's French into English without sacrificing either meaning or emotional impact.

Brel attacks us for putting important areas aside "until it's too late", or while we "talk of something else." His bitterness is close to Eliot's and Albee's and the combination is phenomenally powerful and original.

Generally ahead of the Europeans in the production of performers, Americans and English-speaking Canadians must now belatedly acclaim an artist too large for our own assembly lines.

lines (this play was billed as a "psychological thriller"). Everybody moved through Joan Hall's highly naturalistic putrid-pink set like ball bearings in a bottle of Listerine.

Somebody once suggested that the Lennick's stick to radio and do Toronto theatre a favour. I would suggest that Ben Lennick with his basso-profundo voice might get away with it, but Sylvia would be better off baking brownies for the boys in the band.

the horror of joe egg

If your stomach starts to heave at the thought of a funny play about a spastic ten year old girl, then you have come close to understanding the major difficulty presented by Joe Egg, Peter Nichols' play at the Royal Alex. Those people around me who indignantly viewed the play as one long sick joke missed the play's very important message.

The humour is admittedly black but Nichols presents us with a frighteningly realistic story of life and no-one dare underestimate his serious intentions. Bri, (Noel Harrison) is a young self-conscious English school teacher, ("eyes front . . . hands on head . . . all right, who farted back there?) who can no longer cope with the daily strain of caring for his ten year old spastic daughter Josephine.

There is very little question of love or pity here, for the child remains totally inert throughout the play. Bri's problem is a loss of courage and hope which places him in conflict with his wife Sheila (Mitzi Hoag.)

Bri hides behind a facade of cynical jokes and the first act becomes a sprightly vaudeville show featuring Harrison's jaunty comic routines and impersonations. Several members of the audience walked out in disgust, when after one of Joe's moans, Bri suggests singing and dancing lessons. I was afraid to laugh because of the stony silence all around me.

The entire message of the play, however, is that in times of great duress, man can do little else but hide his pain in laughter. The alternatives are presented in the second act by Bri's school chum Freddy who assumes a stiff-upper-pose of courage, and by his wife, a spoiled bitch who quietly tells the audience that Joe should be gassed. The selfish grandmother is the worst of all — "she would be so lovely if she were only running about."

Bri finally opts out, he tries to kill Joe Egg, and while we don't exactly admire him, it's hard to blame him.

The powerful production, directed by Milton Katselas is calculated to make the audience feel uncomfortable. The players speak directly to the audience, deeply involving those who came only to be entertained.

Noel Harrison was charming, immensely funny, and he was able to speed up the slightly falling pace in the second half. Carol Lawson, Steven Sutherland and Elizabeth Kerr as the outsiders served up a generous round of laughs and were suitably despicable.

Mitzi Hoag as Sheila was constantly overshadowed by Harrison, but at several moments she rose admirably to meet the challenge of a very difficult role. Young Robbie-Lea Jago was capable and disciplined when her part demanded it.

For a comedy, (the billing is obviously questionable,) Joe Egg is a frank and harrowing experience. The gags are there — for those who have the nerve to laugh

kiyooka's sensuous folds

As I entered the Laing Gallery to see Roy Kiyooka's show, a prospective buyer was pointing to one of the floor sculptures and saying "You could use these things for love seats, see? The host and hostess sit in these two holes and the guests sit in these two buckets."

The gallery attendant uttered, "Mr. Kiyooka didn't intend them for that, but I'm sure he would be amused to hear your suggestion."

Mr. Kiyooka would probably have been more amused to see the man's wife and friends. From the look of the holes, all his friends were double-jointed midgets who rode side-saddle.

I sympathize with the buyer's attitude, though. Kiyooka's work is very beautiful and meticulously crafted but upon examination it leaves one saying "What, isn't there anything more to it?" Reading things into it is very tempting.

Kiyooka's paintings are well thought-out and arranged. Barely-visible blue ellipses float on blue backgrounds like glass tea leaves on a clear sky. The canvases have had their spaces thoughtfully and lovingly partitioned. They're almost ready to be painted on.

To return to the sculptures, they look like huge cheese slices that have been pinched and rolled up. ("Sensuously folded" — Kay Kritzwiser, Globe and Mail). They seem very sensuously folded. They are like the whirlpools of liquid muscle that chase one another up and down a fat woman's back as she bends low to crouch into her step-ins.

"How much is that painting over there?" asked the prospective buyer, who rustled when he moved as if the shoulders of his coat were stuffed with the green stuff, the cabbage, the moolah

"Seventeen twenty-nine" said the gallery man "Stick 'em up," he added, as an afterthought. Noticing that we were eavesdropping, he steered him into the office

"Who was that masked man?" I asked my companion, a Fine Arts major

"Don't be reactionary, Mike," she said "Who can put a price on the priceless? This may be the most important fibre-glass work of the 1968-69 Sculpture season"

Oh? You're afraid someone will discover exactly what time of the month it is? Fine. Stay home. Give up your social life for a week. Or try Tampax tampons. They're worn internally so nothing can show. No one will know. You're comfortable. Free to swim, dance, wear any clothes you wish... almost forget about your period altogether.

Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor. They're made of highly compressed, pure surgical cotton. The silken-smooth container-applier assures easy, hygienic insertion and, like the tampon, it simply flushes away after use. Don't you think it's time you tried Tampax tampons? They've given freedom and comfort to millions of modern women all over the world. O.K., now go out and enjoy yourself.

If the vision doesn't become fact, a large part of the blame will be borne by the people who are building the buildings and executing the plans — the contractors who toss up slipshod high rises, the politicians who feel that controls, restrictions and plans somehow inhibit natural growth. In Toronto the latter talk seem entrenched quite sufficiently to hinder the planners' schemes and what the people might insist upon if anyone explained the issues to them.

The people in political office have, nonetheless, been elected by those Torontonians who bother to vote (voting rates in the city are ludicrous). In the final analysis we will get, as individuals, the kind of city we deserve.

— Jon Caulfield

addendum

It is remarked in the article that no sane city planner wants people to have to use automobiles in the city any more than necessary. A host of reasons—problems of moving cars, parking cars, car exhaust fumes, the aesthetic loveliness of heavy, slow lanes of traffic honking through centers of city life, the safety factor—account for the planners' antipathy for the automobile.

This isn't to say cars aren't important in cities. The shape and geographical spread of the modern cities and its economic and residential nuclei is in large part a function of the mobility allowed by cars and trucks—just as yesterday's city was formed by the railroad. Nor is this to say that the private automobile will be zoned out of the city in the foreseeable future; public transportation is grossly inadequate and, even when public transit is good, many people prefer their mechanical alter-ego—Marauder, Mustang, Barracuda or whatever it may be.

There is, though, a strong minority opinion which most planners share, that central cities should belong, insofar as possible, to those concerned with the execution of necessary economic functions and to people on foot. Legislation of this idea has been found worthwhile in a few places in Europe where it's been tried.

Perhaps the lessening of the air pollution problem to be wrought by the advent of electric cars will soften planners' hostility to private vehicles. Electric cars will be smaller, too, and this factor will allow greater speed and flexibility in the movement of cars into and from cities; and they won't be as much of a problem to park downtown.

We would have electric cars now, were it not for the fact that the most important industries on the continent are those which manufacture automobiles with internal combustion engines and the products required to maintain them. The dubious record of these industries with regard to the public good is compounded when one realizes their role in inhibiting development of electric cars. A technology which can drop capsules on the moon can make a good electric car—unless, of course, someone's vested interests will be served by delaying such a vehicle. And this brings us back to one major theme of the article: the irresponsibility of some industries concerned with developing for the future.

City IV SPADINA

Spadina is an anomaly, an alien land which is only physically dependent on the city which envelops it. Spadina is a village, a refugee camp, a street in the formative west where two and three storey shacks were erected along roads broad enough to show contempt for the Easterner's valuation of real estate.

Spadina is spontaneous. In spite of the street's width, you can't make any headway: north of Queen, there are no lanes painted on the road, Spadina has its own rules. If you know Spadina, you can do without the lanes: you have your own guides, on the road, and in the shops of many nationalities which line it, where business is transacted according to the rituals of diverse peoples.

South of Dundas, Spadina lives only in daytime, when the garment business creates its fashions. In the early morning, streams of TTC coaches invade the area to disgorge Italian scamstresses. At night, the same mustached ladies stand sweat-sanctified in orderly lines to await evacuation. This part of Spadina is an ungainly, sticky flower, sensitive only to light.

Dundas to College is where Spadina lives day or night. This Spadina, on the fringe of the skyscrapers and business dealings of fat, impersonal Toronto, is a tribute to the old ways of selling and huckstering. It ignores the new methods and techniques for the traditional way, just as it wastes the possibility of order on its broad roadway, preferring chaos instead. Nothing is neat, arranged by plan; erratic placement of stalls in Kensington, and the random association of nationalities, are reminiscent of German principalities, or of an extreme, Balkanized product of the Versailles treaty.

Spadina remains a street for people, where the individual has a chance to be run down, to triple park, to get a vendor's permit and open his free enterprise stall in Kensington market (which, due only to physical limitations is the soul of Spadina, not its heart), to open a shoddy shop which allows you to overcharge the avaricious bargain-hunter, to buy fresh produce, or poultry neither fresh-frozen or cello-pakd, but warm from the hands of the shoichet (the ritual Jewish butcher who kills poultry by strangling it), to haggle with shop-owners and afterwards have them bring out pictures of their proudest moments to show you, to misunderstand signs in a variety of languages but to accept the sentiment of a Portuguese shop which sells revolting plaster of Paris bleeding-heart Jesus Christs, to sample the atmosphere of being cursed in unknown tongues, to see people not in a hurry.

You see people who are not quite beautiful, people who wear their heart upon their sleeve in a manner disapproved of at university or in the rest of McLuhan's cool world. An old man sits shrivelling on the steps of the Scott Mission, while above him stands a youth of twenty, defiant, his arms crossed on his chest, scowling to indicate that only his stomach binds him to this place. A counter-man in a smelly restaurant asks his regular customer, "Whaddy-a-want?" — "To see your smiling face." A come around the corner. I'll unbutton my fly." An old-timer born on Spadina says "There used to be gambling in every shop on Spadina, but there's none now. They've cleaned us up." He smiles and refuses to have his picture taken. But why intrude further, talk is the currency of Spadina. What you lack in cash, you make up for in talk.

Kensington huckster practices the essentials of his craft. "Panties, panties, six panties for only a dollar." A poolhall loafer making with the cool asks a photographer "You allowed to take dirty pictures with that camera?"

"There's more business in softgoods done on Spadina, says a garment salesman, "more business between Front and College, than anywhere in Canada. The jobbers are all filthy with money." A nice lady in a printing shop Jewish mothers me "Nnt much money in writing, you know? My Manny, he's gonna be a doctor. He told me, 'Momma, I don't want to be a lawyer'." When I tell her about some other university courses that lead to high-paid jobs, and she takes out paper and pencil and says, "How do you spell that?" The panhandlers on Spadina look after each other; when nne has enough for a bottle from the Parkdale wine store, he shares it with his buddies around the corner. One of these old fellows explained a bit of Spadina history to me: "When I was going to university, in 1912, we kept our horses in this building here. Used to be a stable. Spadina's named for an Indian tribe, you know, the Spadinas. So was Ynngge street, and Bathurst. They named Casa Loma after the Lomas. . ."

Spadina — what does the real and believable matter over the incredible: the skyscrapers of the city can't compete with the castles of the people on Spadina

ART

When reviewing commercial galleries, I sometimes overlook the fact that U of T has conveniently located art shows on all three campuses.

Erindale is showing "Contemporary Canadian Art": Victoria College's alumni hall has a show by Kim Ondaatje: Scarborough is showing the works of John Anderson, the Hart House quad is filled with sculptures by Leonard Oesterle.

Every year the Faculty of Architecture has a sketching trek to the woods known as the Dorset weekend. The results, in art and photos can be seen in the Faculty building, 230 College street, today and tomorrow.

JAZZ

The Town Tavern being under new management, a change in the entertainment policy is expected. At the moment, it is unknown whether there is any reason to go there.

At the Colonial, look for Dizzy Gillespie and the excellent saxophonist James Moody, early in December. Earl Hines or Groove Holmes might follow; it is hard to say for sure.

Al Cohn (the other half of Zoot Sims) is expected at George's soon.

At Sam the Record Man, a new shipment of Saba records should be in before Christmas. Beautifully recorded in Germany, they include an opportunity to hear two of the greatest tenor saxophonists in jazz together — Don Byas and Ben Webster, as well as new releases by the rarely heard Lee Konitz and the ubiquitous Oscar Peterson.

The latest issue of Coda, the Canadian jazz magazine, should be out next week. Rush out and buy it.

J. McC.

BOOKS

We shall have to suffer through the annual North American disease of Canadian Fiction Week, (cf "National Brotherhood Week" of Tom Lehrer). Mordecai Richler, Brian Moore and Jack Ludwig will be roaming around the campus this week; Richler and Moore will give open readings of their "fiction in progress", in Cody Hall on December 6th at 8:30 p.m.

Another thing worth reading is the Harvard Lampoon of Life Magazine. It is on sale at most bookstores, and in my opinion surpasses even their spoof of Playboy. You can tell it from the regular edition of Life by its distinctive cover featuring a cracked egg. I especially recommend their piece on heart transplants.

FILM

"Shoes Of The Fisherman" is Hollywood's lead-footed attempt to walk on the waters of righteous moral issues and thorny theological crud. It is as successful as the performance of a yogi who had 'acquired' the secret of water-walking; at least his audience got its money back. Anthony Quinn is the fattest, best-dressed Siberian prisoner to ever become Pope. The cast includes a covey of Sirs, Olivier as the Rasshan premier, and Gielgud as a deceased-Pope-to-be. I had not been to a Loew's theatre since they began to run advertising across the screen; I don't know if the ads are still run with regular features, and discontinued only with road shows.

Then There Was:

At the corner of Spadina and Hoskin sits the little fruit-market-turned-Halewyn-Productions, which you have no doubt seen but know naught of. They have been promised $42,000 by the government's Canadian Film Development Corporation to make 'A Poem For Christine', the story of an emotionally disturbed teenager.

THEATRE

Ah, mes amis Canadiens. Ah, there are no words, ah that will express my appreciation to Le Theatre de Paris for bringing a lively and hilarious Tartuffe to Hart House Theatre on Monday evening. The people in Prince Albert will be glad to hear.

The U.C. Follies, playing at Hart House Theatre this weekend is too long, not funny enough and above all, not pointed. Why is it that most reviews lag five years behind the time? If anything is coming from the universities, it certainly isn't relevant humour. Where are all the sharp minds, capable of poking fun of things that really exist, not just things we set up to ridicule? We should set up a president's council into the state of humour on the campus, to submit a report in eight months. The follies is better than most campus reviews, it even has a few good laughs, but nothing you can get your teeth into, which is trite but true.

Tomas MacAnna, director of the Abbey Theatre in Dublin is here to direct two plays by Yeats, and that will begin on Saturday night. The Promise, by Alexei Arbuzov opened last night at the Coach House, performed by the University Alumnae. Review of that next week. The Fantastiks opens at the Colonnade on the 3rd; Dentanties runs next weekend; The Lesson and The Zoo Story at Noon Thursday at Brennan Hall, St. Mikes. Beginning Dec. 4 Theatre Passe-Muraille is putting on Tom Paine by Paul Foster at Rochdale.

The best from lux to Henry T., who wrote his Hooker thing in the plumbing ward of the TGH: congrats to Bob Rae and D'arcy. That's giving them the old dzeguze! and many thanks to Arlene Perly, with her great charm and beauty. Thanks to Marion for a 2:00 a.m. story.

A bottle a day per pilgrim

Some years ago, six hundred Moslems gathered together in Bangkok and set off on a four month pilgrimage that was to take them to Mecca, the birthplace of Mohammed. For such a long and arduous journey, one would have expected them to travel light—but no, included in their provisions were thirty-four hundred cases of Coca-Cola—well over a bottle a day per pilgrim. Understandably, the pilgrims did need readily available refreshment, but this story indicates a strong preference for Coca-Cola. It is not known if Mecca was able to provide thirty-four hundred cases of Coke to make things go better on the way back!

Both Coca-Cola and Coke are registered trade marks which identify only the product of Coca-Cola Ltd.

SAC acts...

WATERLOO (Special) — A slate of moderate candidates captured 16 of the 22 student council seats in an election here Wednesday, while former president Brian Iler went down to defeat.

Iler, who resigned a month ago to get a more radical mandate, was overturned by a vote of 2,741 to 1,835 by John Bergsma, a third year engineering student.

Six radical students were also elected to the council.

FREDERICTON (Special) — Public mischief charges have been dropped against the seven students who were turned out of Liberation 130, Nov. 10, after sitting in since September in protest over the dismissal of physics Prof. Norman Strax, who led a protest against library regulations.

OTTAWA (Special) — Students in social science at the University of Ottawa returned to classes yesterday, ending an eight-day sit-in.

The striking students accepted the administration's offer of one third representation on departmental councils and the faculty council. They had been demanding parity with the faculty.

Students were not given a voice on the committee which reviews promotion of professors.

The motion passed by a large margin.

Emmanuel College SAC rep John Oldham, moved "that SAC organize a sit-in at the meeting of the CUA Dec. 2."

Opinion on this motion was at first divided.

Wayne Hankey (SGS) supported the action because "we must draw the attention of the students to the fact that vital decisions are being moved up to provincial and federal levels."

Andy Wernick (SGS) called for a tactical rider saying the sit-in be "obstructive" if students are not allowed to enter the building.

Many members were concerned about the possible damage the failure of the sit-in could have on SAC prestige.

Wayne Richardson (III ASPC) told the meeting he did not "want mass meetings replacing SAC in decision making."

Bob Rae took the floor to end debate in the same dramatic fashion he had initiated it.

"If you don't believe in the principal of openness you don't believe in anything," he began.

"There is nothing violent about a sit-in. This is not a violent confrontation," Mr. Fromm, and you can write that down. This issue should unite this campus, not divide it."

The motion for the sit-in was carried.

what did you learn in school today?

By LIZ WILLICK

"If you want to change society you mustn't play on its own terms. That way you only get sucked back into them. You need the most direct kind of action and destruction possible."

Professor E. W. Domville was speaking to 14 members of his English 201 class Wednesday at U.C. He was discussing the difference between the anarchists and conventional society in Joseph Conrad's novel, The Secret Agent.

The senile impotence of anarchists Yundt and Michaelis, and the younger degenerate, Ossipon live by "an ethic of contemplation rather than action," like some of "the student power people."

"The police and the criminal are intimately connected. They abide by the same basic assumptions." In short, they are playing a game with well-defined rules for each side.

But Prof. Domville went on to point out that when policeman, Chief Inspector Heat, is confronted by the anarchistic mind, he is utterly stumped. "It's a different type of mentality." Just like (would you believe?) "police and hippies or student demonstrators clashing."

When the police mentality "is confronted by strange phenomenon — student power and so on — with no rules of the game to follow, strange things can happen."

Civil Eng. gets changes for '69

The Civil Engineering Curriculum Committee has proposed fundamental changes in the present curriculum, which would start next year for first year students, with an intermediate year for other students.

Gary Hajek, (III APSC) said that the Civil Engineering faculty came to the students and suggested this kind of committee be set up. "The profs were aware of changes in the university and essentially were trying to head off revolt. We didn't have to chase after them with strikes and so on."

The basic proposals are:

- a semester system with 144 semester credits for a bachelors degree,

- technical electives to total about 15 per cent.

- contact hours and the number of courses per semester to be reduced.

The emphasis will be shifted from straight science to the more practical aspects of civil engineering. The present compulsory course will be changed to a system of core and elective courses. The wider range of possible electives will also include humanities and social sciences.

The Committee, made up of five students from the Civil Club, and five professors, have been working on the revisions for several months. The proposals are now being considered by the rest of the Engineering Faculty, and contacts are being made with the Arts and Science Department.

B of G shelves GSU withdrawal

The Graduate Student Union's move to withdraw from SAC has been shelved once more — this time by the Board of Governors.

Yesterday the Board decided to withhold a decision on GSU withdrawal for one month.

GSU President John Winter said he wasn't surprised at the Board's move. "I knew it was coming," Winter said. "The Board could hardly turn down Dr. Bissell's recommendation that the matter be sent to a committee."

SAC President Steven Langdon, an opponent of GSU withdrawal, said he hoped the graduates would use the month to work out a satisfactory arrangement. A SAC committee has been set up to attempt a compromise.

UNIVERSITY HOUSING COMMITTEE

APPLICATION FOR FOUR STUDENT POSITIONS NOW BEING ACCEPTED

In September the SAC publication, Housing the Community, written as a statement of demands arising from Tent City, called on the administration to centralize authority for University housing development and administration by establishing a Student-Faculty Housing Committee to supersede all existing committees.

SAC demanded that students have a majority on the committee, since it is students who inhabit completed university buildings. These Demands have been met.

Seven students and five faculty members will serve on the committee, to be chaired by Professor D.F. Forster.

Four students, one to be a graduate student, will be appointed by SAC. The three others will be appointed in consultation with representatives of residence students.

Please apply in writing, stating your background, qualifications, and your reason for being interested in serving on this committee.

SOCCER FINAL

The Arts Faculty Cup, donated by Arthur P. Faculty, former President of the University in 1894 (and thus, after the Mulock Cup, its senior by one year, the oldest Athletic Award on campus for Interfaculty Sports; v. title, supra.) was won yesterday by PHE A- only their second such victory. PHE A just edged a surprising Scar Squad, 3-2 in overtime. PHE scorers were Bobbett, Slean, and Leonardo da Vinze. Our reporter, Kwertyuiopus, was assimilated by a famished pool of quicksand on the Lower Campus field; we are thus unable to release the name of Scar marksmen.

LACROSSE PLAYOFFS

Hall's five goals were alas! to no avail (a bid of "two no avail" requires 21-23 high card points-Goren), nor did Storey's single merit meeds as For beat Trin, 8-6. For scorers were Coffey (2), Cooper, Cormack, O'Reilly (2), Griffin (2).

Vic (Blyth 2, Valilee 4 - "valilee": a gentleman's personal Gentleman" - OED) beat Erin (Pelech 2, McKeown, Robinson, Lehman), 6-5.

In semi-final activity, Vic got goals from Murphy (2), Blyth (6), Valilee, Hiseler (2), Moebus Apollo (2), and James (4) to kideckl For, 17-4. Elliot (2) and Cooper (2) scored for For.

Finals (Vic vs. Innis or PHE) will be Mon., Wed., Fri. next week.

SMC took Vic, 2-1. Morrison and Hurlily ("Hurlily, Hurlily, Hurlo'!") scored for SMC, Dawkins for Vic.

Sharpe, Laurie, and Erin scored to give Vic a 3-0 shut-out of Sr. Eng.

Erin beat UC on goals by Ryan, Michie, and Mastromatteo, 3-1. (Does that mean Mastromatteo is 3-in 1 oil?). Perkins replied for UC.

Old Weller, Yamasaki, and Cox paced For A's 3-0 win over Law II.

Also: Devonshire 4, New 2; Pharm 2, UC II 0. Dents 3, Jr. Eng. 0.

BASKETBALL

The Messiah has returned. Rising like a phoenix from midcourt (and scorching several cheerleaders in the process). Lloyd Rossman scored two points, one with each hand, but was let down by his Medsmates as Meds bowed to UC, 34-32.

There is a story of a negro who was fishing for tarpon in Florida. The fish which he hooked was a big one, and in spite of all the negro could do, the tarpon pulled him overboard.
When he had been hauled into the boat again and the water had been shaken out of him, he remarked, chokingly, "What I want to know is, is dis nigger a-fishin' or was dat fish a-niggerin'?"

HOME OPENER FOR ICE BLUES A REAL GRUDGE MATCH

By PHIL BINGLEY

Among the many four-wheeled wagons in town this week-end for Grey Cup festivities will be a bandwagon sporting the colors of Loyola University's hockey Warriors. However, the latter's raison d'être in Toronto is not football. If the Warrior musical chariot can stampepe through the pigskin crowd and make its way to the hitching post outside Varsity Arena by 8 p.m. this evening, hogtown hockey fans will be treated to the thrills and excitement of a match between Loyola and Varsity Blues.

Blues opened their SIHL schedule Wednesday night with an impressive 6-2 win over Guelph Gryphons.

While no intercollegiate team, including Blues, is ever reluctant to toot their respective horn, Loyola drums have explicitly (and loudly) spelled out the superiority of this season's Warrior puck stars.

Following a game in Montreal three weeks ago in which Warriors dumped Blues 6-4, Loyola fans screamed the camp "We're Number One" chant. Considering the fact that neither team at that time had played a single league game, one would have to admit that such an ascendancy is rather amazing (any sarcasm discerned is fully intended).

On the other hand, and despite the early delusions of grandeur, Loyola coach Dave Draper has assembled a very skilled team which will certainly be a contender for the national championship come playoff time next March.

Goaltender Andre Molino has always played superbly against Blues and was the individual most responsible for Loyola's 1-0 overtime victory which eliminated Varsity from the CIAU semi-finals at the end of last season.

Offensively, Draper has an experienced and talented lamplighter corps. Art Thomas and Mike Lowe are the top sharpshooters in a well-balanced attack.

While it is unlikely that tonight's contest will ultimately prove anything (it is only an exhibition game) it should clear up a few misconceptions about the relative quality of the two teams. Blues are a much better unit than the one which lost the first tilt 6-4.

Tonight's game will also give Varsity fans an opportunity to show Loyola players, officials and fans how a mature crowd can enthusiastically encourage and support their team without littering the ice. The uninhibited display of garbage throwing in the Loyola rink November 9th looked like a step backward in the civilization process.

In Guelph Wednesday night, Blues found out that a puck in the net is worth ten in hand. Outshooting Gryphons 60-29 over three periods, Varsity snipers managed only six goals. Actually, Blues outplayed their opponents by such a wide margin that the final count was almost inconsequential.

Guelph led 2-1 at the end of the first frame on goals by Doug Weaver and Pete Turner. John Wright, playing his best game as a Blue tied the score just past the five-minute mark of the second period with the first of his two goals and it was no contest thereafter.

Wright, John Gordon, who turned in his best effort to date, Paul Laurent and Brian St. John salted away the win with third period markers.

Coach Tom Watt said after the game he almost stood up and cheered following St. John's goal. "We moved the puck out of our own end just the way I want it done, the pass in their end (from Gord Cunningham to St. John) was perfect and bang it was a goal."

Len Burman, who scored Blues' first goal, threw several solid checks and generally kept any Gryphons who wanted to try his left-wing alley looking up.

Laurent and Steve Monteith skated miles and picked up two points.

FENCING

ARE YOU READY FOR THE VARSITY TEAM?

Try out your skill and enthusiasm this Saturday at 1.00 pm in the Hart House Fencing Salle.

The ONE hit epee competition and bouts in other weapons will be the final trial before the selection of the Varsity Team for the match at Rochester December 7.

The prospect of a high Province standing is revealed by the return of Nan Sung Ho and Martin Moskovits to the scenes of their former glory. Freshmen Victorio de Vecchi, Mike Kerwin and Rowland Griffin (English Universities Champion 1964) will test members of last year's winning team.

Blues' John Wright caps a brilliant individual effort by paking the puck past net-minder Jim Horton for a goal in the second period of Varsity's 6-2 victory over Guelph.

Meds after upset of century over Vic

by GELLIUS

Bulletin: General Motors has telegraphed their good wishes to Vic in today's Mulock Cup game.

flash: The Vic coach squelched rumours that his players will wear black hats and ride black horses in today's contest. "My players ARE black horses" he explained.

from "The Strand": "On the Vic game calendar is written "kill Meds" and everywhere hangs this solemn personal word "RIDE".

special: Sources close to President Bisell have announced that the god Asklepios will in fact attend the Vic-Meds football game today. That's nice.

stop press: English professor Qwertuioius today announced that "a first draft of Paradise Lost has been found in Milton's papers from which it appears that the figures of God and Satan are later substitutions for the original Meds and Vic football teams."

The Faculty of Arts and Science today revealed that Dr. Branislaw Chrtieu would deliver a public lecture on the Manichaeon Heresy, which held that, while God may have created what is Good, the Devil created Vic.

Support Meds. Remember, more heart transplants are performed by graduates in Medicine than by any other comparable income-group.

Vic has won the Mulock Cup for the last 11 years. I say, anyone who drinks mulock would suck eggs.

Time and place: Varsity Stadium. 1 p.m.

views of the new medical complex

Introduction

There is a (fairly) new erection taking shape on south campus, several students informed The Varsity. In response to this development we sent forth a squad of reporters — Trevor Spurr, Art Moses, Henry Mietkiewicz, Paul Coleman and Agi Lukacs.

They tried to find out why it is being built, how it will be used and what students and faculty think of it. They came back with this report.

Furthermore, there is a new cafeteria in the building, with space to seat 350 people.

The new curriculum

A completely new medical curriculum was announced by the Faculty of Medicine Friday. At the same time the provincial government announced a drastic cutback in expansion plans for the medical school.

In line with modern educational thinking, the Faculty avers that "medical education is a lifelong program" and seeks to instill in future students a desire for self-education that will keep them continually abreast of new developments.

The training period will be shortened by a year. The fourth medical year (MED IV) will be replaced by a year of "clerkship" which will combine teaching with clinical experience in hospitals. After this will come a year of straight internship in an area of special interest to the student, although a rotating internship may be taken if the student wishes.

Some aspects of the new curriculum will be:

- emphasis on the interdependency of biological, behavioural and clinical sciences.
- teaching of body systems as an integrated unit.
- greater flexibility by increased emphasis on "elective" courses
- much greater emphasis on the relationship between Medicine and the community
- involvement of students in planning, conduct and evaluation of the curriculum

The curriculum will be structured into three interrelated periods of study. The first will deal with the normal biology of man. The second will discuss disease in terms of altered human biology. The third will involve patients in relations of altered biological processes.

The new course of studies is planned to come into effect next June 15th.

This curriculum, with its heavier emphasis on internship, will undoubtedly be affected by the provincial government's cutback on funds for medical expansion. Only 14 million dollars will be granted the U of T Medical Faculty, instead of the 50 millions asked for.

The four Metro hospitals which will be involved in the teaching, and which had planned to expand by 1000 beds, will only be allowed funds for 91 new beds. Sunnybrook, the former veterans' hospital which the U of T planned to turn into a major teaching hospital, will not be able to add any new beds.

Some medical staff members have said that this cutback will mean a future shortage of doctors, hospital beds and medical scientists.

The Dean

Dr. J. W. Steiner, associate dean of the Medical Faculty, expresses almost complete satisfaction with the new Medical Sciences Building.

"There have been some complaints about the color schemes and so forth, but generally, it has been quite satisfactory," he said in a recent interview.

Dean Steiner added that lecture facilities and laboratories have also been "perfectly alright".

He admitted however the building would have been better located connected to a hospital.

"Sure it would have been preferable but there wasn't any land available," he said.

Dr. Steiner did not believe the new structure would become outdated within the next ten or fifteen years.

The students

"The kids like it on the whole", says Paul Fralick (1 PreMeds). But in conversations with students using the building, praise was mixed with derogatory remarks.

"It's probably the ugliest building I've seen in long time . . . an architectural disaster", said Bob Barkwell, (11 Meds), a Meds SAC rep. "though there are some interesting conglomerations of shape in the north-west wing".

The very straight, white and well-lit halls of the building evoke various reactions.

"It's nice, modern, clean", comments Russ Tanzer (1 Meds). "It's incredibly sterile" agree Barkwell and Neil Colman (11 Meds). "It's a bit like a cell", feels Allan Dennis (SGS). Several students point out the contrast between the new building's halls and the dark, narrow ones of the old Anatomy Building. "The floors don't creak", comments David Rosen (1 Meds).

Students also agree the new building's teaching facilities are improved. The labs are smaller, with four tables per room for four students each, as compared to the more impersonal rows of 20 in the old labs of Lash Miller. The new labs are available to students any time of day or night.

"The faculty has been under fire for not doing enough research" notes Doug Graeb (11 Meds). The labs in this building reflect a new research drive, he feels.

Only one student levelled any criticism at the labs. Alan Dennis (SGS) says that as they are in the centre of floors, the labs lack the natural light that could have entered in the daytime. He notes that the chemistry department has six or seven students working where there is only room for five — it is already too big for the area allocated for it.

The professors

Members of the medical faculty reacted extremely favorably to the new building.

Dr. F. C. Monkhouse, director of teaching laboratories for the medical faculty considers the Labs in the new building as good as he had planned.

"They are the result of our studying American medical schools in an effort to come up with the best facilities possible here".

They reflect the fact that the medical faculty is responsible for teaching two types of students — those in the medical faculty itself and those in other faculties taking subjects taught by the med faculty. Therefore two levels of labs have been set up. On the second floor of the new building are the labs for medical students and on the third are those for all other students.

"This does not mean that we have second class citizens in one section of the building. It is just that the requirements of these students are different. Each medical student will have, in addition to his place for laboratory work, a sit-down space in the lab where he can study whenever he wants. The non-medical student will not need this kind of study place as he will have one at his own faculty or college."

The new labs were also designed to reflect a new philosophy of teaching medicine.

CONSOLIDATED - BATHURST LIMITED

BACKGROUND

In 1967 two solid and long-established companies and their subsidiaries joined forces in a dovetailed operation that represents wider geographical dispersion and greater product diversification. This integration brought with it a new name Consolidated-Bathurst Limited. Consolidated Paper Corporation Ltd. had been linked traditionally with newsprint. Bathurst Paper Ltd. largely with packaging paperboards and containers made from paperboards.

Consolidated-Bathurst is 93% Canadian owned, with its head office in Montreal. Sales in 1967 were $278 million. The Company harvests 22,000 sq. miles of woodlands and operates eight mills and some thirty converting plants in Canada. The Company has manufacturing subsidiaries in the United States and in West Germany. One of Canada's largest producers of newsprint, Consolidated-Bathurst has about half of its total dollar sales in packaging materials in paper, wood end plastic. It also sells bleached kraft pulp and has a wood products group of five sawmills.

OPPORTUNITIES

In the structure of the parent Company there are five business or operational groups: Woodlands, Mill Manufacturing, Newsprint and Pulp, Wood Products and Packaging. The Company's management philosophy and its organization into functional and business groups are intended to provide every opportunity for the advancement of promising employees, present and future.

Top quality graduates in the faculties or departments of chemical, mechanical and industrial engineering, chemistry (research-graduate and post-graduate levels), business administration and commerce, will be offered positions that will allow them to demonstrate their ability to perform with competence and progress to management responsibility at an early age.

While on-the-job training will be emphasized, graduates, along with other company employees, will participate in development programmes coordinated by the Manpower Planning & Management Development Department.

DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Performance is reviewed annually and salary increases and promotions are based on individual performance and potential. A complete range of coordinated employee benefits is comparable with the best available.

Consolidated - Bathurst representatives will interview Commerce and Business Administration graduates on Friday, December 6th and Engineering graduates and undergraduates on Friday, December 13th, 1968. Please see your Placement Service for further details.

pline program will be used in which all aspects of medicine will be taught in one continuous course, rather than physiology in the morning and anatomy in the afternoon."

Mr. C. Gibson, the director of technical facilities in the new Meds Building, considers it a substantial improvement over the old.

"It's a beautiful building," he says.

"It is bright, clean and cheerful, and seems very well designed, although some people are sorry that there are no windows in their rooms. This is something that will take some getting used to," says physiology Prof. Dr. M. A. Ashworth.

Dr. P. K. Basu, Associate Professor of Ophthalmology said he hadn't been in the building since the official opening but recalled that it was a magnificent building.

"I am sure that the facilities must be very good, although I doubt if my department will get to use them".

The architects

The Varsity interviewed separately Colin Milne and Robert Goering, representatives of the two main architectural firms involved with the New Medical Sciences Building. Their viewpoints at times differ but such differences are probably reflected in the potpourri that the building will finally be.

Goering: This was the first building of this size U of T had to deal with — it's half the size of the Toronto-Dominion Building — and as its staff is overworked, it commissioned an American-based consulting firm, Bechtel, to arrange the "best possible" building in time to accommodate students by 1969. Bechtel then hired a firm experienced

That means a possible expansion of 50 per cent.
 Varsity: Will teaching methods differ in the New Meds Building?
 Milne: Yes. The existing situation has been to have the professors remain in one laboratory, while the students rotate according to a schedule. But enrollment will increase and teaching methods are changing. Therefore, the system I have just described Milne: The building will be available the whole day for classwork, labs and research. After a day of classes, the students will be allowed to remain for extra research and study at their convenience.

 Goering: Two-thirds of the building is for research. This is one of the first few buildings like this, although there is one in Hamilton (which is also attached to a hospital, to allow the full spectrum of teaching). This allocation for research is new and valuable, because nobody knows where teaching stops and research starts.

Varsity: What about the building as a whole? Will it fit in with the others on campus?

Milne: Yes. Architecturally it is a valuable addition to the St. George Campus. It relates in feeling to the rest of the buildings, and does not dominate the area simply because it is new.

Goering: The building is on the wrong site. It's too crushed here. The presence of this building on the green campus contributes to the takeover of the informal character of the campus by an urban character.

Others

The visual relationship of the New Meds Building to the students it serves is entirely out of proportion — the building dominates the people, says Peter Boag (III Arch).

There have been attempts to offset this effect, he says. Artist Robert Downing, who was hired to do external panelling for the building, (as well as some sculpture), told Boag he worked without knowing what the building was going to look like — in other words, in a vacuum. Boag feels that, as a result, the panels are too small to play down the overpowering aspect of the building.

The other side of the building also exhibits such compensating factors, Boag continues. The staircases protrude from the building itself in an unsuccessful effort to decrease the visual impact of the building, he says. Further, as there is no natural growth outward from neighboring buildings, the Meds' staircases resemble wings, as if the building had just landed there.

Peter Boag called the new building "schizophrenic." This impression may be explained by the information, supplied by Mr. Downing, that 14 architects worked on the building. He described his facing as an effort to give the complex "some sort of continuity" via a "tapestry effect" of six panels.

in the building of medical centres, Ellerbe of St. Paul (Minnesota), to make the basic schematic plans for Toronto's building complex. These plans, along with suggestions from a Users' Committee under Mr. Dave Turnbull (hired by U of T) which talked to staff about their requirements, were passed on to the Toronto architectural firms which carried on from there.

Varsity: Has the project advanced more quickly than originally anticipated?

Milne: Yes. As the building stands now, it will be complete by September 1969 instead of September 1970. The advance came about because we opened the New Medical Building this year to provide facilities for the present enrollment of 250. In doing so, we were given permission to tear down the old building one year earlier.

Varsity: What was the overall budget?

Milne: It was $39 million at first, but we have managed to trim that figure down to $36 million.

Varsity: Is the building flexible enough for innovation?

Milne: Most definitely. The building was designed to accommodate four additional floors atop two of the research wings. There are presently 15 floors, and eight more can be constructed will be true only until the end of this academic year. Starting next year, the students will remain in the same lab, while the professor or instructor will come to them.

Varsity: Is there supposed to be a hospital or classroom situation?

Milne: A great majority of medical buildings are not labs and classrooms alone, but are joined directly to established hospitals. Unfortunately, this cannot be done at the University of Toronto whose students receive the theory at the university and the training in a hospital somewhere else in the city. Therefore, the New Medical Building will not resemble a hospital, but will function primarily as a "classroom" building.

Varsity: What will be the building's chief improvements?

Milne: At its completion, the New Medical Sciences Building will be the largest such complex in Canada.

Varsity: But will there be any truly outstanding features which will make a student feel proud of his facilities?

"American imperialism" is not irrelevant jargon

By STEVE LANGDON
SAC President

FEWER JOBS

"Imperialism" is a word that brings reactions because it sounds like irrelevant left-wing jargon. What it refers to is the economic and consequent political extension of United States' influence and control into territories beyond its boundaries. Some call it "neo-imperialism" to differentiate it from the older form of direct armed control of colonies which characterized the British Empire.

The fact is that it is not irrelevant, especially if you happen to be an engineer. Concern about it should be one of the things that most closely binds us together as students, in arts and science as well as engineering.

American parent companies now own over 65 per cent of Canada's manufacturing industry; in some basic resource fields the figure runs as high as 90 per cent. The old British influence and control has been replaced. One of this University's greatest scholars, Harold Innis, put it bluntly: "The change from British imperialism to American imperialism has been accompanied by friction and a vast realignment of the Canadian system... It (U.S. Imperialism) has been made plausible and attractive in part by the insistence that it is not imperialistic."

Let's relate it to those of us who are engineers, or other students of science and technology. Permanent engineering jobs are getting harder and harder to find in this country. That's why engineers get so annoyed with other students who try, as they see it, to make it difficult for them to get jobs by seeking to bar access for certain companies to our Placement Service.

The reason for this shortage of jobs is difficult to figure out and has many aspects, but several points of significance can be noted. The Canadian government did a study on the migration of professional workers from Canada to the United States for the years 1950-60. Of the university trained people who left, the largest group, 18.7 per cent of the total, were engineers. And the trend was up; in the last period studied, the percentage of engineers was up to 25.7 per cent.

It's true that incomes are higher in the United States, but the lack of opportunity here has as much or more to do with migration. This same study tells us at least partly why fewer opportunities exist. Talking about scientific and technological work in our industries here, it notes that "the fact that work may already be effectively done by parent firms in the United States or United Kingdom hinders or prevents such activities being undertaken in this country."

And the people who get hit are the engineers, and engineering students, who can't find exciting research and development roles in Canadian industry. The Watkins Report on foreign ownership talked about this and pointed out that U.S.-owned companies in Canada do far less R and D work, even allowing for size of establishment, than their parent companies in the U.S.A. Resources are concentrated in the U.S. rather than providing extensive possibilities in Canadian branch plants. And decision-making about any such expenditures here is "one of the functions of the central (U.S. based) management bodies of these enterprises."

MORAL OBJECTIONS

This kind of integration into the American economic and political sphere angers a lot of arts (and other) students because of "moral" objections to what the United States is doing in Vietnam, Latin America and elsewhere. They blindly attack the nearest target of this, U.S.-based companies on campus to recruit engineers. They miss the point; that they have a common interest with engineers not in attacking American companies like Dow, but in trying to oppose and reduce general U.S. influence.

The point I'm making as well is that engineers have got as big a stake in opposing American "imperialism" as anyone else. The engineer's stake is in gaining control for his country over research and development decisions so that he can have his abilities matched by opportunities to do exciting scientific work in Canada.

Opposition is not enough, however, for we have to pose alternatives to increasing American control. This is where all of us as students have to work together. We can talk about pushing for a strong Canadian Development Corporation to directly develop Canadian resources, and undertake research and development work to make us more than competitive with the USA in international markets. We may have to talk about even stronger measures to counteract US influence and control. But one thing is sure; if all of us, Engineers, Artsmen, Science students and others, are going to be able to make those opportunities for us to develop a free Canada, we're going to have to work together.

the Peterborough Examiner strike

You'll probably never man a picket line. As a university graduate you'll more likely be inside, looking out at the lines of stubborn strikers who won't accept your "reasonable" offer. You'll wonder how to keep things moving until the union gives up, and maybe you'll call in the cops to escort your scabs.

Maybe that's one reason the Newspaper Guild asked for student help in their strike against the Peterborough Examiner. Maybe they want to give future bosses a chance to be on the outside looking in. Maybe the students will even remember what it was like after they graduate and go inside.

The Peterborough reporter's strike is only partly about wages. Mostly it's about Lord Thompson of Fleet and what happens when one man controls an empire of newspapers and broadcast media.

For Lord Thompson, newspapers are a business. Businesses are for profit, and in the first six months of this year, the Thompson empire reported a 69 per cent increase in profits. But sometimes it seems profits are more important than good newspapers.

When Lord Thompson took over the Peterborough Examiner in April, things started to change. The amount of advertising increased. Newsmen were told to cancel their subscriptions to research materials. When Robert Kennedy was assassinated, the staff wanted to run an extra two pages, but management said no. After all, good coverage costs money, and it doesn't increase profits.

And when reporters began wage negotiations they were offered a decrease. Good reporters cost more, and they don't increase ad sales in a one-paper town.

The Peterborough strike will be hard to win. Lord Thompson owns the city's television station and one of its radio outlets. The local cops have lent their services as strikebreakers — two Waterloo students found that out the hard way.

But the strike must be won. It's important that the reporters get a decent wage. It's far more important that Canadians see what happens when one man owns too many newspapers and too many broadcast media.

The Examiner story is classic. A small community business goes under, so big money picks it up and makes it pay. The workers suffer and the community is poorly served.

Right now all the Peterborough workers want is a decent wage. Maybe, someday, economic justice will mean employee and community control of businesses, instead of control by the huge monopolists.

Why did Jaanus Proos have to buy a half-page ad in The Varsity to publicize his views against the OSAP march? Because he did not submit the article as a letter or comment piece and no other reason. In the interests of fairness, we would have run the Proos article or one expressing a similar view if available. As it turned out, we received no anti-OSAP march letters at all.

Page 5 is almost always reserved for opinion articles and letters submitted to The Varsity editor. We try to allocate this space fairly so most views are expressed, but we can't print every letter. So, to be sure of getting in, you'll have to buy an ad. Otherwise, your letter or article must compete with all the other letters and articles on the basis of timeliness, readability and reasoning.

Soggy coffee, frozen feet

The picket line outside the Peterborough Examiner started at six a.m. Friday, still dark, with a light drizzle that soaked your hair in the chill 40 degree weather.

Outside the town, snow filled the fields we could see in the bus headlights. After the time-mocking unreality of a bus ride through the night it was a shock to climb out of the bus onto streets and sidewalks bare of snow, but wet and cold.

mixture of two ideals coming from students who'd never fought for either.

The hour until seven a.m. seemed longer than an hour because nothing happened and we imagined several more hours like it. Some of us went to the union building for coffee and a sandwich, taking off wet shoes and resting our wet feet against the radiator. We didn't talk much. The experience was too new and

The women watched us through the plate glass windows. They had the beaten look of all women in the limbo of dead-end, meaningless jobs. The men were different — angry. They couldn't afford to be apologetic. They stared at us with looks that tried to poke fun.

We were getting the hang of a picket line by nine a.m. We learned what "tighten up" meant — shoulder to shoulder as you move, don't let any space appear, move slowly.

The picket lines were smaller as we went to the union offices to warm our fingers and frozen feet. Our feet felt like clogs of wood, and icy water dribbled down our necks.

MORE COPS

The morning wore on and our legs got stiff from cold and weariness. Now the cops were more numerous and if we couldn't talk an employee out of going into the building, the cops would clear his way.

"Stand aside, boys," they said. "You're not allowed to obstruct people."

"But they're strikebreaking!" we protested. Law says its OK to strikebreak. Some of us wondered who the laws are for — the same people that make them I guess. The laws aren't made by the two-thirds or whatever it is of Canadian labor in unions.

We had called the bus back for 11 a.m. Before that, two Waterloo kids were arrested for not letting the publisher in with his car — a big station wagon. The line of kids just kept walking, orderly, in front of the car. When the cops decided they'd had enough, the two in front of the car at that moment got busted. The publisher drove through in his station wagon.

NIRVANA

At 11, the bus didn't come. We were cold and tired and miserable. Some of us had taken on that desperate feeling of being trapped in the cold forever. The bus represented nirvana — we couldn't stand any more. That's what a picket line is like when its cold and the rain turns to snow and the coffee they hand out to the lines turns into cold, colored water.

Some of the Examiner men had been on the lines since Nov. 2, eight hours or more a day. We wondered how they stood it.

Just before we left, we heard the presses begin to rumble inside the building, magnified by a covered archway to the parking lot. As the walls shook, we knew we had failed this time, but I guess we didn't care.

All we wanted was that bus, to sit down and be warm, to be students again instead of workers who spend weeks on the lines.

The bus came at 11:30. We piled on. Most of us went to sleep.

As was once said about Italy, this university is only a "geographical expression", and perhaps not even that. Perhaps it is only an economic expression, a collective outlay of the taxpayers' dollars. (It's the taxpayers' hard-earned cash that pays for this university, we are told, and we pray forgiveness, bow our heads in shame, and submit our guilt and our ideals to the economic and social need for academic obedience.) (CYNICISM)

But to think that I started writing this as a literary world view, and wanting to say grandiose things of shattering and universal import — and here I'm talking about the university again. And it's not just because this is The Varsity; it's because you're reading it. But then it's such a groovy beach where everybody is trying so hard to relate and doesn't know how to react when a sincere guy says, "We've got to talk about asking the kind of questions that are relevant to us as students, we've got to talk about the bookstore; we've got to talk about..."

But we never talk about the real world, because we hope it doesn't exist. Only courses, and structures, and committees, and efficient mechanisms exist. (Nihilism)

I was going to talk about how society has lost its conscience, how the powerless, moral individual agonizes in the face of a powerful, amoral state. (ISMISM)

I was going to talk about the end of the inverted American dream, about the death of Hemmingway being the brutal exit of the lost generation. Now there's no worry. There's nothing to lose.

Reporters at the Peterborough Examiner have been on strike since Nov. 2. Thomson Newspapers, the new owners, have offered them a contract which offers a scale of minimum salaries below what they receive now, doesn't pay time and a half for overtime, has no job security and no protection against transfers to non-union newspapers in the Thomson chain.

Twenty reporters don't make much of a picket line, and they have been bolstered by reporters from other Ontario newspapers. On Friday, about 100 students from campus newspapers at Waterloo, York, Glendon, Ryerson, and U of T went to Peterborough to help on the picket lines.

We got some coffee and signs at the bare union office across the street. Some students from Waterloo — they'd formed their own chapter of International Workers of the World, "Wobblies" — were already circling outside the entrances to the Examiner building. Most of us had never picketed, and we had to be told what to do.

"Close to the wall, you've got to keep moving. If anybody tries to get through, tighten up, move together. Keep moving, but keep tight."

"It's warmer that way," somebody joked.

"LAPLAND"

So we walked, around and around. The pickets 100 feet away, at another door, whistled "Lapland", the happiest, most defiant tune I've ever heard, and we tried to whistle too, and sing. The Waterloo kids had little red I.W.W. books with the words to Solidarity Forever and the Internationale and a bastardized version of Onward Christian Soldiers

*"... rape and kill and plunder,

We tried We Shall Overcome too, but it seemed weak at 6:15 in the morning. Beside a hardened union man who joined us, Overcome seemed like a ludicrous too uncomfortable.

At 7:30 people started breaking through our line.

We'd see someone who looked like an Examiner employee. "Tighten up!" "Tight circles!" "Tight picket lines look better, right?" The cops on the corners watched as the night guard opened the doors for the worker who had pushed through. At this hour, seven thirty, they were mostly printers.

CLEAR AND PRESENT DANGER

We were beginning to feel the helplessness of a picket line that isn't strong enough. "We've got to look like we represent a 'clear and present' danger," we were told. If so, the printers would have an excuse not to come through. Some decided we did. Enough decided we didn't to start the presses rolling later in the morning.

At eight the secretaries were pulled through the picket lines by the night guard. It wasn't hard for them — we had to keep moving and they just followed the line to the guard waiting hand. Again the frustration of failure.

"Don't be angry at them," the old hand from the Examiner told us. "They're scared. You know they only make $42.50 a week? They can't afford to lose even that. So don't be angry."

Faculty candidates speak on CUG

GRADUATING IN 1969?

ARTS AND COMMERCE STUDENTS INTERESTED IN CAREERS IN

- ADMINISTRATIVE MANAGEMENT
- ACTUARIAL SCIENCE
- SALES AND SALES MANAGEMENT will be interviewed at the Placement Office

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 5

The Varsity asked the faculty candidates for the Commission on University Government the following five questions:

- Do you believe students and faculty should run the university on a basis of equality?
- What controls should the general public have over the university?
- What is the place of the administration in the university?
- What is the function of the university in society?
- What structures do you think would best accomplish your aims?

The faculty vote for four representatives on the commission is being tabulated by mailed ballots which must arrive by Dec. 6. Statements from the remaining candidates will be printed in Wednesday's Varsity.

Prof. B. Etkin Chairman Aerospace Studies

● Students and faculty have to govern in partnership but it need not be a partnership of numerical equality.

● The general public foots the bill and should therefore say how much money will be put into the university. But allocation of the money must be controlled by the university community.

● The administration should run the organization efficiently.

● The function of the university in society is:

---to provide educational opportunity for its most gifted young people

---supply professionals and specialists in a variety of areas to fit the needs of society

---to provide people who are able to comment with insight on the contemporary scene

---to provide society with people who can organize, record and transmit essential knowledge of our age

---to serve as a place where people can advance boundaries of human understanding in the sciences and humanities

● Although I have no particular structure in mind, as yet, I think it will have to be simple and flexible.

Prof. Ken Fisher Chairman Zoology

● No. I'm not against students participating, but we all have to sit down with experts. It's nonsense to think that students could pass on a system of financing, for example. There is an expertise involved in running a university, and it's unlikely that any group will contain all the necessary experts.

● The general public doesn't have the expertise to run the university, just as they can't run Imperial Oil or the T. Eaton Company. So representatives of the general public are selected to be the watchdogs of the university. At the present time, these watchdogs are the Board of Governors. Whether or not they should be is an open question.

● If I had to describe the sequence, it would be like this: someone should represent the general public, and this is traditionally the Board of Governors. Next comes the faculty. The administration is the servant of the faculty, and of the general public. Next to faculty comes the students.

● The function of the University is training and education. It must also add to the fund of knowledge.

● This question cannot be answered until the Commission considers the evidence.

Prof. J. E. Hodgetts
Political Economy

• There is no point in a committee if the members already have their plans made up. My approach is to take this from scratch. I have opinions but there is no point stating them before I have my homework done. I tried to suggest this to the student candidates. Sure, we all have our pet biases, but the firmer we are, the less hope there is of achieving the necessary compromise.

• (On the function of the university): The university provides a core of professionally-trained people to service the institutions of the community. This function is getting the university into trouble with the leftists, who see it as a producer of fodder for capitalists. But the university has to fulfill this function as long as it is supported by taxes.

But the basic function of the university — and this is difficult to defend to the tax-paying public — is the civilizing function which is accomplished especially by the humanities. This is to produce a person capable of living in the kind of society our technology is creating.

We are probably faced with the hard fact that the university has to fulfill both these functions.

There are so many balancing acts required to satisfy this variety of interests that we cannot decide on the kind of administrative structures necessary until there is more thought and more evidence.

Prof. J. S. Thompson—
Chairman Dept. of Anatomy

• Students and faculty shouldn't run the university by themselves. There should also be people appointed by the government and by the alumni. Within that framework I'd be inclined to say no — students and faculty should not be equally represented, but I'm not sure.

• The public should have control through the government appointees on the governing body and also budgetary control.

• The administration's role is to carry out the executive function. The basic decision-making should be made by a faculty-board type of thing. But the administrator should be a leader in that he recommends changes which the policy-making body may or may not follow.

• The university's role is to disseminate and increase knowledge. One of its roles is not to take sides in political questions. This leaves it wide open for political interference.

• I'd like to see some sort of governing board which includes faculty, student, alumni and government representatives. Whether or not it will be bi-partite I don't know. But I'm not satisfied in my own mind that one board can do everything academic and also financial and administrative.

Prof. L. E. H. Trainor - Physics

• More or less, but not necessarily on all committees — on a curriculum committee I'd say yes, but on a committee for hiring staff no.

• It's wrong to have political influence on the university but you can't expect people to pay without having some say in what the function of the university will be. I would hope staff and students would have the main control.

• The administration's place is with the services not the governing of the university. It shouldn't be in any sense a policy-making element. It is there to carry out, not make, decisions.

• The university is a storehouse of knowledge and a place where new ideas should be generated, challenged and explored. It is not a teaching institution in the same sense as a highschool. It is a place where people come together to share and develop their ideas.

• There should be freer, more open discussion on all levels. Although there are some cases (for example with letters of recommendation concerning hiring of staff) in which keeping information confidential is warranted. But for almost all things, and particularly policy matters, there is no reason to keep information secret.

Prof. J.B. Conacher — History

• No, not necessarily. My chief worry is the transient nature of the students' role at the university.

• Yes of course the general public must be taken into consideration since this is a state supported university. Its influence will be felt through the Committee on University Affairs and the Board of Governors or its replacement.

• I don't accept this dichotomy between academics and administrators. It used to be greater than it is now, but recent reforms have reduced this division and further reforms should continue to do so.

• (Prof. Conacher refused to answer question 4 for The Varsity)

• I am sympathetic to President Bissell's idea of a unitary governing structure. Alternatively, if the existing structure is maintained, radical changes are needed, particularly in the composition of the Board of Governors and the Senate. The Senate is too large and unwieldy and there aren't enough academics on it. There should also be a larger academic element in the Board of Governors and those who are not academic should not be so predominant in business.

U of T residence dwellers hold back fees

By MARY KATE ROWAN

To protest university residence fee policy, students at Sir Daniel Wilson Residence, Whitney Hall and Devonshire House withheld the second installment of their residence fees, due November 30.

The fly in the ointment is the New College mortgages which students in the above residences claim add $90 to their fees this year.

With the completion of Wilson Hall, the New College women's residence, next fall, students estimate the 890 residents in Sir Dans, Whitney Hall and Devonshire will contribute $135 each towards the mortgage costs of New College.

The cost of mortgage payments undertaken by the university is not spread to residences at the federated colleges — St. Mikes, Vic, Trinity and Knox.

According to Peter Kiidumae (III Arch), residence council president at Devonshire, 136 out of 188 students agreed to withhold fees.

However, he added, some of these students had to pay their residence fees in order to get their government grants.

"My grant won't cover my fees anyway," commented Kiidumae, so I can just hold back my fees by refusing to sign the cheque. There is nothing the administration can do about it."

In Sir Dan's, Tony Usher (II UC) a member of the residence committee, estimated that 79 per cent of the students agreed to withhold fees.

"Certainly, there has been no intimation that there has been a break in support," he added.

Response to the fees protest was not as great in Whitney Hall but according to Jane Ferguson (II UC) by the time the petition started, many of the girls had already paid their fees.

At New College, students did not withhold fees. "There was no ideological reason for this," said Peter Heath (III New) residence council president. "There was an executive shuffle and by the time the new executive was settled, it was only three days from the deadline. We just couldn't organize the residence in such a short time."

What are the students' demands? According to Tony Usher they'll pay their fees "when concrete steps are taken to do something about the mortgage payments."

"Sir Dan's feels the best solution is to distribute the cost among all residence students in the university. "We will wait for a step in that direction before paying our fees," he added.

Peter Kiidumae suggests no solution. "Until we know the whole picture, we can't suggest a solution, however, we want to meet with the administration to discuss the issue."

Last week Devonshire students sent a letter to President Claude Bissell asking for such a meeting. As the letter reached him last Friday, the students are awaiting a comment.

Kiidumae added that Devonshire students want the university to at least start a thorough investigation to get the money for New College another way.

"I don't see why people who live in residence ought to be singled out for an administrative blunder."

He also stressed that non-resident New College members who use the facilities are not charged for the mortgage.

Hugh Anderson, Comptroller for the University of Toronto, said the university will wait for two weeks and then advise the residences of those students who have failed to pay their fees.

"From then on its up to the residences," he added.

It is still too early to determine what percentage of students actually paid their fees. At the moment, students await a move from the administration.

University president Claude Bissell said last night the administration had not yet considered what action would be taken about the fees protest.

"We'll have to look at the situation, find the reasons for it, and work out a satisfactory arrangement," Dr. Bissell said.

He said the issue was a provincial government problem. Although the provincial government will make money available for capital construction, the residences are still forced to repay the loan and pay costs of upkeep. This, Dr. Bissell said, raises fees. The fees strike, he said, "will make the provincial problem more sharply vivid. We can't go on this way."

Students will stage Wednesday sit-in if Secret brief not made public

Some 350 U of T students voted overwhelmingly Friday to hold a non-obstructive sit-in Wednesday unless a secret administration brief on the future of U of T for the next seven years is discussed openly with students.

At a mass meeting in Convocation Hall students debated for three hours on how to react to the brief.

In a motion made by Don Ross (III TRIN), students agreed that if the executive council of the Board of Governors and the president's errors and students that the council refuse to publish the report and hold an open president's council meeting to discuss it before giving it to the Committee on University Affairs, they will sit-in, non-obstructively, at Simcoe Hall on Wednesday.

A deadline of 6 p.m. Tuesday was set for an administration reply.

John Oldham, the Emmanuel College SAC member who first made the sit-in motion said, "I consider this issue to be so grave to the university faculty and students that the method has to show the administration how grave a concern it is."

President Claude Bissell took time before Friday's president's council meeting to explain his position.

"I am opposed to sit-ins. They inevitably lead to violence and weaken the university," he told the students. "Short term gains are outweighed by long term injuries," he added.

With reference to the brief Dr. Bissell said he hoped it could be made public "as soon as possible."

Bissell said he was bound by the university structure and had to act through proper channels.

"These are not adequate for the purpose," he said. "But they must do until it is changed."

D'Arcy Martin (III NEW) elected last week to the commission on University government, answered Dr. Bissell with a moving reply.

"Dr. Bissell's speech was a genuine, sincere and reasoned one," he said, "but the effect was to obscure the issue."

"I have a lot of respect for Dr. Bissell. If I felt I had the right to give up my decisions I would give them up to men like him, but I'm not prepared to give them up to anyone."

"The goal of the university structure is not to get ahead with specific business but to make the university governing structure responsive to the needs of the academic community."

"The administration has not been responsive to those needs."

Martin describes the latest development as a colossal step backwards.

"We took for granted decisions would be made in the open," he said.

Bob Rae, (IV UC) another CUG member elected last week said, "The sit-in is a tactic we could use Wednesday."

ATS votes 19% salary hike

U of T faculty members want an average 19 per cent salary hike.

A meeting of the Association of the Teaching Staff last Thursday approved a brief to the Board of Governors urging average $3,000 pay increases for faculty members from lecturers up.

The proposals would raise do not want their salary increases to be bought at the cost of poorer student-staff ratios in the classrooms. "They did not rule out the salaries are "preposterously out of line with those in other segments of the provincial education system."

"At no time during the past 25 years has there been such widespread dissatisfaction as now exists among the U of T faculty," the brief adds.

The professors added they do not want their salary increases to be bought at the cost of poorer student-staff ratios in the classrooms. "They did not rule out the

SGWU students storm senate sitting

MONTREAL (CUP) — Sir George Williams University students crashed a closed sitting of the University Senate Friday and when the confusion ended two hours later, they had succeeded in permanently opening Senate meetings to student observers.

When about 25 students, mostly student councillors, entered the chamber, they were welcomed as observers by administration Vice-Principal D.B. Clarke.

Then the fight started. SGWU Registrar Donald Peets immediately objected to the student presence, calling the student invasion "a force tactic which we cannot accept."

At that point the Dean of Arts and the Chairman of the English and Engineering Departments spoke in favor of open Senate meetings and moved the students be allowed to stay as observers. Peet lost a subsequent motion to adjourn.

Further discussion on the feasibility of permanently opening the sessions led to a resolution calling for all future meetings to be opened without restriction to the university community. It passed 20-2.

Sir George is the third Montreal University to open its Senate sessions. It joins Loyola and McGill.

By JIM COWAN

Devonshire House, the oldest residence on campus offers its residents a library, music listening room, music practice room, kitchenette, TV room and games rooms. That's what the information sheet says.

What the information sheet doesn't say is that most of those facilities are in the basement of the building, and most have been declared "off limits" by the University of Toronto fire marshal.

It's been like that since last January, when the fire marshal, J. F. Westhead, went in to inspect the newly opened Purple Bird Room, an all-purpose party-bar-TV room built by the students in the basement of North House. According to residence president Peter Kiidumae, a fourth year architecture student, "He sort of threw the book at us" when he saw there was only one exit from the basement.

The problem is compounded by the fact that Devonshire House has no dining facilities, but each house has a kitchen — in the basement

"It's absolutely essential that we be allowed to use the kitchens," said Kiidumae, "so the fire marshal has allowed us to keep using them. But that doesn't make them any safer."

Devonshire residents have been fighting for some improvement in their facilities, but are finding it slow going.

Last August, Kiidumae sent out a letter suggesting that students withhold their second term fees. "It was originally a tactical move to put pressure on the administration," he said.

Kiidumae received a letter later that month from Vice-President F. R. Stone stating that alterations would begin by September 30. As of last Friday, they still hadn't started.

The students aren't blaming the administration or the physical plant department for the delays, most of which are being caused by the difficult problems of trying to bring a 62-year-old building up to present day standards.

But two new issues have developed since the original protest was conceived. Fees went up by about $100 this year and it now costs around $17 a week to live in Devonshire. And that's just for a room.

The residents also learned that part of their fees were being used to underwrite the mortgage on residence construction at New College. Since their own facilities have been curtailed, this seemed totally unjust.

"The point is that we've been living under the condemnation since January, but we're still expected to pay the same," explained Kiidumae.

It will cost $230,000 just to bring the building up to minimum fire safety standards. And it's unlikely more than the minimum will be spent on the house, since Trinity College holds an option on the land for 1981. "The University regards that as the effective life of the building," Kiidumae said.

The basic problem is the lack of fire exits from the basements of all three of the houses which make up the Devonshire residence. North and East Houses have only one exit each, while South House is slightly better off with two.

possibility of some kind of strike action — such as refusing to mark final exams — if their demands are not met.

Ten Canadian university senates have now decided to open up their meetings to student observers. Four, including Sir George Williams', were "liberated" last week.

In Calgary the decision was made following the report of a committee formed after forty students sat-in at a general faculty council meeting in September. Three students sit on the 50-member body.

At Queen's, where four students sit on the 50-member senate, 35 students will now be allowed to observe the proceedings, along with ten faculty and five press representatives.

At Loyola College in Montreal, the senate will remain open on a trial basis until spring, when a final evaluation of the policy of openness will be made.

STAFF MEETING: Tuesday at 1 p.m. in the office to discuss a topic of concern to all of us. We can say no more in print.

As well as more exits, all the doors in the House will have to be replaced. This project alone will cost $28,000.

The basement requires the most extensive remodeling, and presents the most complex technical problems. Exits must be punched in the walls at each end of the single long corridor which runs the length of each house. If you're above average height you have to duck under the steam pipes suspended from the ceiling. These will all have to be re-located to make room for exits.

In the other houses, all facilities are technically out of bounds. This means the students can not use the party rooms, TV rooms and so on that are advertised in the information sheet. Most of the rooms were built by the students themselves.

As for stands now, the residents of Devonshire House are paying for facilities they can not legally use, while their fees go up to pay for new residences elsewhere. The University has promised to correct the situation, but so far, nothing concrete has been done.

day if the administration proves to be more pig-headed than we thought.

The International Student Centre's Festival Week opens at 1 p.m. at Nathan Phillips Square with a parade of students and flags from the 75 nations represented by the ISC. The parade, including a band and 12 national princesses, will proceed west along Queen. On University north on Queen's Park and west on Wellesley to the main campus. At 8 p.m. in Convocation Hall, writer-in-residence Jack Ludwig will speak on "International Dialogue in a Post-Ideological World".

Purple Birds deep in

Before dawn Friday morning last week 50 Toronto student newspaper people — many of them Varsity staffers — were walking in circles in the cold rain and slush outside the plant of the Examiner in Peterborough, where reporters and editors are on strike against the Thomson newspaper. An equal number of Waterloo students joined in the mass picket in an unsuccessful attempt to halt publication. Two of them were arrested for obstructing the vehicle of the publisher who was transporting scab labour into the plant. Among the frozen-faced pickets were Paul (baby-face) MacRae, and Rod ("I feel no pain") Mickleburgh.

Bathurst Heights administration afraid of former students' views

By LEAH ADAM

"High schools turn out conveniently packaged, labelled products, graded like eggs," says Ulli Diemer (1 UC). "Employers seek applicants with a high school diploma because it ensures conformity and punctuality."

He was one of five recent graduates who aired their views on high school education at Bathurst Heights last week.

They were originally invited to the staff meeting as a last-ditch attempt by the principal, J. Wilkie Davie, to head off a demonstration during commencement exercises.

Told that this would not change their plans, Davie granted permission for a representative of the 'dissenters' (the move was supported by over half of the graduating class) to speak on the program. But when the time came the ceremonies were formally closed and the microphones turned off.

Most of the audience stayed, but few could hear what Al Marinis (a first year student at York) was saying.

In essence, the criticisms voiced by Marinis concerned the false atmosphere created by a system that values discipline above all else.

Students are taught how to walk the right way in the halls, when to eat their lunch in the cafeteria, how to ask when they want to go to the washrooms, how to raise their hands when they want to speak, and what subjects they are allowed to speak on, said Marinis.

He said many students cannot cope with university because in high school they have been taught to do only what they are told. Like little children, they are lost once the threat of punishment is removed. No-one checks their homework, so they don't do it.

The students offered suggestions for the improvement of high school, based on their experienced at Bathurst Heights. The main changes proposed were:

- elimination of all rules of deportment (dress, hair and so on)
- elimination of the exam system
- elimination of compulsory subjects beyond grade 10
- voluntary attendance
- 'streaming' on the basis of interest
- an introduction to the humanities (philosophy, sociology, economics and political science) at the grade 10 level

The teachers listened to the students, but few seemed convinced that an unstructured system would produce mature 'law-abiding' graduates.

French teacher Mrs. M. Redley said if we wanted to eliminate rules in the high school, why not in the whole society or on the roads, too?

Mr. G. Gillanders, head of English, thought that a high degree of conformity is demanded by our "computer society", and that most people "just don't respond"

Mrs. R. Playfair, a French teacher, agreed with Mr. Gillanders, saying, "We were all idealists like you once, but when you're out in the world for a while, you realise that people are all dummies. You can't do anything for them because they're all dummies."

This from a teacher who makes her classes "sit up straight" at the end of a class, then dismisses the "ladies" first, then allows the "gentlemen" to go.

Most of the teachers thought the students should not criticise the system, but become teachers and work for change from within.

Become a teacher? and perpetrated a system that

- gives a student a detention for eating his lunch in the cafeteria — at 10:30 instead of 11:30?

- forbids a student from wearing a skullcap (a religious duty for orthodox Jews) because "religious symbols are not allowed" at school, and sets up a Christmas tree in the main foyer every year?

- sends a student wearing jeans home to change just before an important grade 13 exam, with the threat that he would be prevented from writing if he didn't change?

- forces a student to sit outside the attendance office all day and bars him from attending classes — because his hair is too long?

— not on your life!

"We're being raped on the instalment plan"

By MARY BASTEDO

Today the arts and science faculty council will be asked to give final approval to the revised Allen report on undergraduate studies. There is still a lot of grumbling coming from the back of the council chamber where the stubborn rhetoricians of the English department sit.

"We've tried our best to maintain the essential integrity of our program," says Trinity Prof. G. G. Falle. "But we had absolutely no support whatsoever on Dean Allen's staff-student committee."

"We're being raped on the instalment plan," exclaims David Knight, a young professor from the Vic department.

What makes the English department so hostile to the Allen report?

"The university is not a democracy but a hierarchy of quality," says Prof. F. D. Hoeniger, a Victoria College bibliophile and grandfather.

"Students must learn that education means you discipline yourself. Sometimes you do things you don't like" says Prof. Hoeniger.

"There's a danger in doing whatever you like. That's not liberty, that's licence.

Intellectual snobbery and conceit are being undercut.

"English Lang. and Lit. was a course unique on this continent — four years of heavy work and a concentration of related subjects.

"Now the standard will go down."

The arts and science faculty council will be asked to approve as a whole Dean A. D. Allen's revised report on undergraduate studies at its regular meeting in the Senate Chamber, Simcoe Hall today at 4:15.

It will also be presented with a report from the Committee on Undergraduate studies which recommends

- that one-hour pass options in third and fourth years no longer be prescribed but be available for those who wish to continue them

- that a first year general arts course in Ojibway be offered next year by the Anthropology department

- that experimental courses be offered next year for credit at Innis College

- that two compulsory honour courses in the political economy department (Pol Sci 328 and 224) be discontinued

The Committee on Disciplinary Procedures will also be presenting a report to the council.

As a humanities discipline organized on a college basis, the English department finds itself in a minority position.

"The Macpherson report was intellectually stupid and retrograde," says David Knight, in bright turtle neck sweater and heavy medallion, a graduate of VIC who dresses as colorfully as he speaks.

"Only two on the commission were from any of the federated colleges and nobody on the commission has been an undergraduate at U of T within the last 20 years.

"It subjects all the departments in the faculty to the pattern of the social sciences.

"It's Procruste's bed," he exclaims angrily, "and that's not liberal!"

The majority of the English faculty members are politically indifferent and don't bother to go to council meetings, confident that Prof. Knight will articulate their disapproval.

"The Allen report is an abomination," he says. "A backward step.

"It's a bureaucrat's dream of a system centrally controlled by a timetable.

"I don't see who it's designed to please, except the timetable-makers, or people who can't see value in something untidy.

"Eccentricity in a system is proof of freedom."

Both he and Prof. Jack Robson argue loudly that the report will not ameliorate but rather intensify the problems which it sets out to confront. Classes will be even bigger, they say, and students will feel even more like cogs in the machine than they do now.

"If you think you have student unrest now," Knight says, "WOW! Wait and see what it will be like five years from now!"

Knight complains most loudly about practical consideration, but at the root of the dissent is the simple fact that the English department is perfectly satisfied with the way things are now.

"We have firm faith in what we have been offering in the past," explains Prof. Falle.

The official submission to the Allen subcommittee allows the existing English Lang. and Lit. program to be translated into new terms. It provides greater flexibility in choosing courses but the courses themselves have not been greatly changed.

"We must maintain the essential integrity of our discipline," Falle reiterates.

But is anyone asking or re-examining what the essential nature of that discipline is, now that they have the opportunity to do so?

One lone voice at Vic, a young American lecturer, is venturing a few of his own ideas.

"People who have taught at other less structured places, know that students who have taken only a few or even no English courses in their first years are often better than those who have been majoring in English," says Prof. Lee Patterson, a Yale graduate.

"There's much too much emphasis on English as the mastering of a body of knowledge and not enough recognition of it as a way of reading.

"Historical structure is over-emphasized. There should be room for other kinds of courses, organized for example by genres — epic, pastoral, romance, satire or realism.

"It doesn't bother me to produce an undergraduate who has gaps in his command of English literature. What does bother me is one who has unreasonable gaps in his general knowledge, and too many people in English Lang. and Lit. fall into this category."

Lee Patterson is an exception. He has given up going to meetings of the department. His attitudes aren't compatible with the self-satisfied conservatism of the department as a whole.

The English department has been accused of being reactionary and almost obstructive, of accepting the Allen report out of political necessity and not being sincere in its willingness to approach education with new philosophical attitudes.

"But at least they're being candid about it," one professor remarked.

At least there's that.

UNIVERSITY HOUSING COMMITTEE

APPLICATION FOR FOUR STUDENT POSITIONS NOW BEING ACCEPTED

In September the SAC publication, Housing the Community, written as a statement of demands arising from Tent City, called on the administration to centralize authority for University housing development and administration by establishing a Student-Faculty Housing Committee to supersede all existing committees.

SAC demanded that students have a majority on the committee, since it is students who inhabit completed university buildings. These Demands have been met.

Seven students and five faculty members will serve on the committee, to be chaired by Professor D.F. Forster.

Four students, one to be a graduate student, will be appointed by SAC. The three others will be appointed in consultation with representatives of residence students.

Please apply in writing, stating your background, qualifications, and your reason for being interested in serving on this committee.

DEADLINE FOR APPLICATIONS: WED. DEC 4

SAC briefs

As well as the action on the administration's brief to the Committee on University Affairs, the Students' Administrative Council made the following decisions at its Wednesday's meeting:

- to give F. Paul Fromm a recount on the last ballot only for the Commission on University Government elections. SAC decided only a last ballot recount would be possible, and Fromm's demand for a total recount by proportion instead of random sampling would mean a complete change in the system decided upon for the election.
- to give the adult education programme, Frontier College, $1,000 out of the SAC fund for community projects.
- that SAC send telegrams of support to students at the University of Ottawa and Simon Fraser who are sitting in.

Drew gives warning to businessmen

A 74-year-old member of U of T's board of governors last week denounced student protest as "hooliganism."

George Drew, a former Ontario Premier, told the Empire Club Thursday that organized hooliganism was threatening Canada's educational structure.

He said student protests in Canada and in Europe were attempts to "weaken the authority of the state and the unity of our people."

Such phrases as "destroy capitalism" and "weaken the power of the establishment," he added, indicated Communists were involved.

On Oct. 17 of this year, the government of Jamaica refused re-entry to the island to Dr. Walter Rodney, a Guyanese lecturer at the University of the West Indies.

Dr. Rodney, a lecturer in African history, was then attending a conference of black writers at McGill University. The decision to deport him sparked a student-led demonstration which escalated into a night of violence and destruction in Kingston, the island's capital.

In a statement issued a few days later, the Hon. Hugh Shearer, Prime Minister of Jamaica, made a statement in which he described Rodney as a "grave security risk" and accused him of "carrying on activities which constituted a danger to the security of the nation."

One week later, Dr. Rodney spoke on the U of T campus. The accompanying article was submitted to The Varsity to supply the necessary background for an understanding of 'the Rodney incident'.

By Elliot Bastien (SGS)

"Caribbean" is one of those evocative exotic words, that crashes onto the awareness of the Canadian to conjure up visions of a tropical paradise, where a smiling sun nods its approval as the frivolous wind chases the waves ashore and tickles the palm leaves to laughter. Where cheer replaces care, and calypsoes, like this one from Lord Baker, fill the air:

For integration our nation is second to none.
Here the Negro, the Chinese, the white man, the Indian,
We jump together in a band,
In this wonderland of calypso,
This wonderland of steel-band.

Yes, this is Carnival! Here, there is "no colour question", the Mighty Sparrow suggests:
So jump and be merry
Don't care how you black

Page 14 — THE VARSITY, Monday, December 2, 1968

In the West Indies, for all practical purposes, race prejudice and class prejudice are synonymous. So that for any discussion on race to be meaningful, the social structure must be examined.

Historically, the black man was brought to the West Indies as slave labour to cultivate the plantations, owned by white men, for the benefit of the metropolitan economies of Spain, France and Britain in turn. This early relationship has determined the present pattern of social stratification.

Lloyd Braithwaite, in his classic study, has pointed out that the social structure was based on the one hand on the positive evaluation of the white group, and on the other, on a negative evaluation of the black group.

It was not surprising therefore, to find that after the abolition of slavery, the indentured labourers, Indian, Chinese, and Portuguese, who replaced the Africans on the plantations, "sought to differentiate themselves from the black group as much as possible".

With an acute sense of the social value of money, these later groups, amassed capital and established a middle class. Part of this middle class was the product of the white master and his captive black harem—the mulatto—who enjoyed certain privileges (one of which was education), from which the blacks were excluded. Right now the social ladder progresses gradually from white at the top to black at the very lowest rung. In terms of physical appearance (and very often of mental attitude) the more unlike an African a person is, the higher the rung he is likely to occupy.

How is this reflected in the West Indian's way of seeing? Novelist V.S. Naipaul characteristically captures it in one phrase—"a nice eye for shades of black". A "darker black" man is not as courteously treated as a "lighter brown" man unless his manner of dress indicates that he is one of high status. (Hence the West Indian's preoccupation with establishment dressing.) The white man, ipso facto, is shown the greatest respect.

To counteract this further, those black men who have made it, either through wealth or education, try to climb higher by choosing a mate of a lighter complexion. There is thus a constant upgrading of the "high brown element" in the society both materially and educationally.

The West Indian ideal of personal beauty is a light skin, straight hair, thin lips and Roman nose in that order. Hence the skin bleaches and hair straighteners.

(Plastic surgery is as yet too expensive.)

Listen to Franz Fanon discussing the book, "Je suis Martiniquaise", the autobiography of a black woman, Mayotte Capécia:

When she tries to determine in her own mind whether the man is handsome or ugly, she writes, "All I know is that he had blue eyes, blond hair, and a light skin, and that I loved him". It is not difficult to see that a rearrangement of these elements in their proper hierarchy would produce something of this order: "I loved him because he had blue eyes, blond hair and a light skin".

The stage has been set now to explore further this desire of the colonised black "to elevate himself in the range of colours to which he attributes a kind of hierarchy".

COLONISATION AND ITS EFFECTS

...there is a constellation of postulates, a series of propositions that slowly and subtly — with the help of books, newspapers, schools and their texts, advertisements, films, radio — work their way into one's mind and shape one's view of the world of the group to which one belongs. In the Antilles that view of the world is white because no black voice exists.

(Franz Fanon, Black Skin White Masks)

The fact of colonisation has created islands of West Indians whose collective unconscious is European.

From the time that the child of the Caribbean learns to speak, he commits himself to an ultimate dilemma — for he learns the language of the coloniser, a language whose implications define and imprison him. His whole concept of the world is contained in the language he speaks and that concept relegates him to the level of the beast. The rest of his life he will flee this image of the naked — nigger — savage.

The schoolbooks read by black children in the Caribbean were written for white children. The black children are thus made to identify with white heroes. The African crawls onto the pages of those books, as either a savage cannibal to be shot at, or a good slave whose worth is judged by his ability to please his white master.

African history begins with slavery and is written to justify it. The European goes to Africa as a pioneer to spread the boundaries of civilization. The Mau Mau reclaims Kenya by acts of terrorism, and savage slaughter of innocent whites, in an attempt to frustrate the forces of progress.

The same pattern is obvious in the comic books that children read, where Mandrake is Brain and Lothar is Brawn, where the white Phantom sits on his skull throne and rules over the black pygmies, in the films that they see, where a white Tarzan can beat up a whole tribe of Africans single-handed; in the stories that are related them of a jolly benevolent, white Santa Claus. In fact in everything that serves to concretize their outlook, to determine their adult reactions in a world engulfed by the deluge of a white mass media.

Is it strange then to find that it is normal for the black man in such an environment to be anti-black?

Since "through the collective unconscious the Antillean has taken over all the archetypes belonging to the European", the anima of the blacks in the Caribbean is a white woman, Venus de Milo, and the animus is a white man, Apollo. It is in this way that little black kids are taught to look upon themselves as ugly, to despise themselves and their race.

At this stage the poet, Aime Cesaire, shouts his protest:

... this attitude, this behaviour, this shackled life caught in the noose of shame and disaster rebels, hates itself, struggles, howls, and, my God, others ask:

"What can you do about it?"
"Start something!"
"Start what?"
"The only thing in the world that's worth the effort of starting. The end of the world, by God!"

The argument is often put forward that this sort of analysis, this intellectualising, has an extremely limited appeal. And the people that it can reach are precisely those who are prone to inactivity, who are certainly not world-enders.

What the unemployed man-in-the-street wants is a bread-and-butter argument! Do the poor need to be told that they are poor?

Rodney did not have to tell them this in Jamaica, as will be shown. He was an articulate voice pointing out the reasons for their poverty, helping to relieve them of their inferiority complex "in a society that derives its stability from the perpetuation of this complex".

THE ECONOMIC REALITY

The visitor to the Caribbean, in search of exotic tropical islands, begins to reconsider the moment that his plane grinds to a halt at the airport in Jamaica or in Trinidad.

This magnificent piece of modern architecture is hardly what is expected in a poor underdeveloped country. On the way to his hotel, the taxi takes an eternity to weave through the long queues of Mercedes Benzs, Chevrolets and Jaguars, intermingled with the less ostentatious makes of automobiles.

Sprawling mansions, with exquisitely landscaped grounds, flash past as the traffic eases approaching the hotel. The end of his illusion! The hotel that Conrad Hilton built! The exclusive playground of the privileged, who in terms of the tint classification in the West Indies, are largely high brown, yellow and white. Their affluence is paraded in a country, where the cheque for dinner, dance and drinks, in one evening, can pay for one month's toil of a black domestic servant or yard-boy, who is lucky enough to be employed.

A bottle's throw from this hotel, Derek Walcott walks in the hills of "Laventille", where the inheritors of the middle passage stewed five to a room, still clamped below their hatch, breeding like felonies, whose lives revolve around prison, graveyard, church. Below bent breadfruit trees in the flat, coloured city, class lay escalated into structures still, merchant, middleman, magistrate, knight. To go downhill from here was to ascend.

The middle passage never guessed its end.

This is the height of poverty for the desperate and black.

In the West Indies 90 per cent of the population is black, and is constantly trying to escape "from lives fixed in the unalterable groove of grinding poverty". Eeking out an existence in the jungle of Kingston or in the shanty town of Port of Spain, they are not far removed from a prosperity that can be so easily identified with colour. Their neighbors in misery are all black — the merchants to whom they are always in debt are not.

They are told that there are no jobs and they see light-skinned Johnnie who left school in a lower grade working in a bank of in the oil-fields. There are no whites amongst the 30 per cent or more unemployed. The company directors living in luxury have no special qualifications apart from the colour of their skin.

ENDING THE MASQUERADE

The black masses living out this reality in the islands of the Caribbean have not been without their spokesmen.

In 1930 Marcus Garvey, Jamaican-born nationalist leader, clearly pointed out this economic domination by the minority. His widow quotes him on the educated black middle class, who were amongst his persecutors:

I had to decide whether to please my friends and be one of the "black-whites" of Jamaica, and be reasonably prosperous, or come out openly, and help improve and protect the integrity of the black millions, and suffer. I decided to do the latter.

Born in 1887, a mere fifty years after the abolition of slavery, Garvey was very much aware of what was happening in the Caribbean. He saw clearly the need to rip the white masks from the black skins that were being suffocated: "I shall teach the black man to see beauty in himself." As a consequence, his weekly paper, "The Negro World", would not allow its pages to be used for advertising skin bleaches and hair straighteners. So powerful an organ this paper proved to be, that it was banned by many colonial governments.

By 1914 Garvey founded the Universal Negro Improvement Association in Jamaica. Five years later it had spread to the United States with thirty branches and two million members.

He started a steamship company in the U.S.A., the Black Star Line, to create links between the black people of the world. The indefatigable Garvey was not satisfied until he had established a Negro Factories Corporation with the aim of running "factories in the big industrial centres of the United States, Central America, the West Indies, and Africa to manufacture every marketable commodity."

In spite of his indomitable spirit, and unflinching courage, the forces against which he fought were too powerful and appeared to prevail in the end with his death in England in 1940.

The spirit of Garvey, however, lives on in Jamaica today in the Ras Tafarians. A literal interpretation of his words — "Look to Africa when a black king shall be crowned, for deliverance is near" — gave the movement its name, with the coronation of Haile Selassie (Ras Tafari) as emperor of Ethiopia in 1930.

The brothers of the cult, realising the dehumanising effect of Caribbean society on the black man, have completely opted out of it. They grow their hair long and do not cut their beards, and as such, are a constant source of irritation to the neat and tidy middle class. They do not accept the legality of the Jamaican Government, the "Black Man Judas", and often occupy strips of land to cultivate crops for their own sustenance and ganja for their religious ceremonies. Their religion is completely black. They have an insatiable appetite for things African and especially African History.

Against the social background of the Caribbean in the sixties, the attempts by Marcus Garvey to remedy the ills of downtrodden blacks may seem slightly comical and indeed seriously lacking.

Further, the withdrawal of the Ras Tafarians from Jamaican society is based on a misunderstanding of Garvey's philosophy. He was not exhorting the black man to forget his sorry plight in the West Indies and to seek to make his home in Africa. He was also concerned with the immediate upliftment of the Jamaican at home. However, too much of his energy was consumed outside of the Caribbean. His movement became international before it was firmly established nationally.

These mistakes could hardly have been repeated by a specialist in African history who has learnt the lessons of history. It is not difficult now to understand how Walter Rodney related to the society and what effect his presence there could have had. The Government of Jamaica, however, was not prepared to wait and learn from history. Their concern was to prevent it.

BLUES RENT LOYOLA 5 - 1

How do you make Varsity Blues fighting mad? Tell them that they're no longer "number one."

Loyola Warriors made that mistake three weeks ago after downing Blues 6-4 in an exhibition match. Last Friday night they limped out of Toronto screaming "It hertz, It hertz!" after a 5-1 drubbing that re-established them as the team that will have to try harder from now on.

There were 4,300 in attendance for the grudge match; they saw a hard-hitting, chippy game with a total of 23 penalties handed out, including a match misconduct to Brian Donnelly of Loyola.

Blues consistently outplayed their opponents. Gord Cunningham and Steve Monteith made it 2-0 by the end of the first period and Brian Tompson raised it to 3-0 13 seconds into the second, on a two-way passing play with John Wright.

Three minutes later Fred Hayes of Loyola got the Warriors single tally for the night.

Glen Burman and John Gordon raised the score to 5-1.

CUNNINGHAM

Blues outshot Warriors 53 to 31. "It was our finest effort of the season" said coach Tom Watt.

Steve Monteith was the game's first star. Paul Laurent, with two assists to his credit, was the second. Fred Hayes of Loyola was the third.

The Monteith-Laurent-Burman line was the most productive of the night, accounting for two goals and two assists for a total of four points.

The next time Blues square off with them they won't advertise the match as a "Battles of the Giants" as they did last time. Gulliver among the Loyola-puts would be more like it.

Vic 20 - Meds 15

VIC TAKES ELEVENTH STRAIGHT MULOCK CUP

By JOHN CAMERON

"Too much" are the only words I can use to describe the Victoria war machine which rolled over the Faculty of Medicine 20-15 on Friday at Varsity Stadium in the 75th Mulock Cup. The victory was Vic's 11th consecutive Mulock. Too much power, too much pride, too much everything.

Meds were by no means outclassed. As a matter of fact, they led by 1 point and had the ball with less than three minutes remaining. But, a strong rush by Vic forced a bad punt from the Meds kicker. Instead of having to work from approximately the 40-yard line, a Vic player was able to field the punt on the 15 and run it back to the two. Randy Myers scored on the next play and then it was all over but the crying.

Peter Fairgrieve opened the scoring for Vic after 56 seconds when he raced 42 yards for a touchdown. Peter Marshall added the convert. At this point, the game looked like a rout but George Vanderberg, subbing for the injured Paul Dedumets, marched his team downfield and on the last play of the quarter, Denys Symons converted and Vic led 14-13 at the half.

Peter Fairgrieve (34) lugs the ball past an unidentified Medsman as Paul Chrysler (41) and Bill Miller (75) move upfield to block. Fairgrieve scored Vic's first touchdown on a 42 yard ramble at the 56 second mark of the first quarter.

In the 3rd quarter, the Meds tough defence kept Vic well bottled up but their own offence ran out of gas. Meds defence forced Peter Marshall to concede a safety touch after a low snap prevented him from punting out of his own end zone. His team now trailing 15-14, Baird started another Vic drive. It wasn't until he was into the 4th quarter, however, that he was able to produce a semi-consistent attack against the stubborn Meds defence. Gambling on 3rd downs, Baird slowly guided the defending champions down the field. The drive stalled on the 15 however, and Vic was forced to give up the ball.

With less than 4 minutes remaining the Vic defence took over. They prevented Meds from fleeing from the shadow of their own goalposts and Meds were forced to punt from their own end zone. A bad snap, a big rush, and a punt off the side of the kicker's foot allowed Vic to take over on the two. On the last play, Baird handed off to Myers who followed a wall of scarlet and gold sweaters into the end zone. 'Twas a hard fought and well played typical championship game.

waltzed over from the 2. A bad snap ruined the convert attempt.

In the second quarter, Vanderberg got his squad moving again. The running of Symons and the pass catching of Craig Retter set up Symons' second touchdown at 3:44. Rich Townsend's convert made the score 13-7 for Meds.

Vic quarterback John Baird took over at this point and led a strong running attack towards Meds' goal line with Myers finally barging over from the two. Peter Marshall

We are lost because we have left nothing we love

We are lost because we have come to nothing we love

By JOHN DOYLE

A country goes mad. Young men kill or go to jail. Or they leave.

One of my friends stayed. Now he's wandering around the country avoiding the law. He's starting to disintegrate.

The United States used to receive exiles. Now it creates them. Most come to Canada, not just as immigrants but as real exiles: people who never forget where they came from and why they had to leave, and who never stop fighting the forces which drove them out.

In Toronto some of them formed the Union of American Exiles. It began this Spring as a self-help organization, to find temporary shelter and jobs for new arrivals, and to provide a social group for draft-dodgers in Toronto. It takes over where the Toronto Anti-Draft Program leaves off. Now six months old, the Union has maybe 75 active members, and is starting to think about going political.

Whether or not I go back depends on events in the U.S., not in Vietnam.

About the only thing exiles have in common is the reason they left the U.S.: they didn't want to fight in Sam's army. Beyond that there is little to unite them. Draft-dodgers range from those who just didn't want to fight, the radicals who thought they'd be more useful to the Revolution out of jail. There are even a few who were radicals but don't care anymore. The horror of America's nightmare sent them into withdrawal. Now they just want peace and quiet to read and groove and love.

It's difficult to create an effective political organization with such a mixed bag of members. They're not even sure they should try.

We were going nuts looking for a fourth. We thought we'd have to place an ad in the American papers — Wanted: one draft-dodger. Must be able to play bridge.

The U.A.E. has an office at 44 St. George in one of the SAC houses. The room is bright, clean, disorganized. There's a kitchen but they can't afford to buy food for it. Any evening there are maybe a dozen people sitting around, talking, playing bridge. There are clicks too — wives and girl-friends of draft-dodgers. One couple says "We got married and 24 hours later we left the country."

They talk about the scene Stateside, about their jobs, about friends who may be coming soon. They joke about draft-dodgers being an in thing in Canada: it's a status symbol to have one at your parties. A deserter is a real thrill.

But behind all the talk is a nagging question they haven't been able to answer: what about politics?

I left the U.S. because I didn't want a revolution there. I didn't think it would succeed.

There is a growing sense among U.A.E. members that it's not enough to be a political. They feel the need for group action, and what more logical group than the Union?

The biggest barrier to this is the anti-political bias of many draft-dodgers. They see a chance to build a new life in Canada. They refuse to care about the forces that caused them to leave, and they start to forget the country they left behind. In fact, they stop living as exiles.

Most of the Union's leaders — who form a steering committee of seven — would like to adopt a political stance, but they aren't sure it would work. "If we took the kind of hard left line I'd like to see," says one leader, "we'd alienate fifty percent of the members."

Others are worried that political action would endanger what they consider the main work of the U.A.E.: self-help for draft-dodgers. They are afraid the RCMP would descend, that the border would be closed, that apolitical draft-dodgers would be alienated.

But the leftists insist they must take a stand against U.S. imperialism and get out of the apolitical bag. It's because so many Americans are in that bag, they feel, that the nation's leaders have been able to perpetrate their crimes. Draft-dodgers must be encouraged to live as exiles.

"We are lost because we have left nothing we love," writes on Union member. "We are lost because we have come to nothing we love. The societies of the U.S. and Canada have atomized us to the point where we are without love for anything but ourselves. . . We must force ourselves to love the United States, to love and encourage and aid those people who are struggling there to bring about change."

The Exiles took a step in that direction on October 26 when they staged a demonstration at the American consulate. They are proud of their discipline in not reacting to the taunts and provocations of right-wind anti-demonstrators. Some of the U.A.E. people had been marching since midnight in rain and drizzle, but they were able to keep their cool in the face of the Edmund Burke Society.

"Hydro" is the word for electricity. Repairmen are also called hydro's, e.g., "The hydro was four hours late." This usage indicates perhaps that the Canadian worker is not alienated from his labor.

The Union publishes a newsletter every two weeks. It serves as a forum for discussion of their aims, and as a clearing house for

What did you learn in school today?

By TOM WALKOM

Ideas of violence occupied the minds of Sociology 120 students Monday.

Lecturing in the bowels of the Royal Ontario Museum, Prof. I. D. Currie was attempting to foster an objective outlook on the worth of force.

Violence, he told 600 impassive faces, is not necessarily an irrational form of behaviour benefitting none. It could also be an "effective danger signal resulting in social reform."

Currie persevered. The American Negro, he maintained, has won most of his legislative rights through "widely publicized riots."

But not only anti-social violence results in reform. Police violence, Currie claimed, has acted as a "catalyst for social change."

As an example of this, the lecturer cited public condemnation of police brutality towards peaceful Negro demonstrations in the U.S. South.

"Widespread revulsion" of "respectable people" at the sight of this violence led to civil rights legislation, Currie said.

Senator gets boot

KINGSTON (CUP) — Senator Grattan O'Leary will resign this week as student reactor on the board of governors at Queen's University.

A referendum in November called for his resignation because the 82-year-old senator did not properly represent student interests on the board. O'Leary had attended one meeting in his year-long term.

A group of professors who make up the University League for Social Reform will hold their first open meeting tomorrow to discuss The Americanization of Canada.

The panel, to be held at 4 p.m. at the International Student Centre, will include political economy professors Mel Watkins, Abraham Rotstein and Ron Blair and history professor Craig Brown.

information on surviving in Canada. Articles tell about getting jobs supply teaching, or which TTC services run all night. One article explained language differences: "If someone refers you to 'Wicket Zed', they are not directing you to the notorious Edmund Zed, but to the ticket window marked 'Z'."

One article explains that when impersonating a Canadian, you must remember that they "do not drink their breakfast coffee along with the rest of the meal."

Wait till you see the sleet storms.

Most of the exiles like Canada, and Canadians seem to like them. They counter little prejudice when applying for jobs, although most have to settle for whatever work they can find because they need the money. They find that most Canadians have a slightly amused attitude to draft-dodgers.

One important point no one that Canadian girls do it differently.

Fac Council okays Allen Report

By SUSAN REISLER

The Faculty of Arts and Science council voted overwhelmingly Monday to adopt Dean A. D. Allen's report which revises the course of studies in the faculty.

"We can manage to implement our new program with current resources," Dean Allen said.

But he asked that distribution of the university budget be examined with great care so that those who require it get the financial consideration they need.

History Prof. J. B. Conacher, was the principal dissenter to the acceptance of the report.

"As I see it," he said, "first and second year students are going to be frustrated next year."

The problem of money seemed to be the only rough edge of the report left to be smoothed. Prof. Conacher's cry that his department won't have the resources necessary for implementing the report were echoed by other staff members. It was even suggested that the report only be put into effect for the first year, holding back on the second year of the program.

Philosophy Prof. David Gauthier argued that the staff should consider the situation from a positive approach.

"If we wait for the Ontario Government to give us money," he said, "we must take certain steps to make it clear that we not only want, but need, to improve our program."

"Start now," he said. "If we find we are running out of money the students will feel this and go to their parents who will in turn go to the government."

Prof. Gauthier saw this train of events leading to pressure on the government which will have to provide the funds.

"If we sit back and do nothing at all, then there will be no pressure," he said.

"We have to be prepared to go forward and generate this action."

Students entering first year next fall will be able to take any five courses they like, provided they have the necessary high school prerequisites.

Departments which now demand Grade XIII prerequisites are being encouraged to offer alternative courses which don't require prerequisites to maximize the freedom of the first year student.

First year students will not be in programs with names. (What used to be called a course in English Lang. and Lit. is now called a program.)

Second year students may, if they want, associate themselves with a named specialist program. This consists of a list of courses (i.e. a course is a single course of instruction such as Chemistry 200) drawn up by the department for the guidance of the student. These advisory lists will prescribe no more than four courses, leaving one free for the choice of the student.

There will be no distinction between honor courses and general courses.

Our world is either-or. .Ludwig

By ANGELA SHENG

Our world is being locked into a tight "either-or" system of values, writer - in - residence Jack Ludwig told students at the International Centre Monday night.

His discussion on the post - ideological world was part of this week's International Festival.

Oversimplification and generalization have dehumanized the world into a tight lock-in system, Ludwig explained, his hands wavering cross-wise into fists.

We are all caught in this "escalation ladder" so that we move from "either this or that" to another "either this or that". "The two are forces on collision course with potentiality of destruction."

Within this structure, when there arises a problem, the fitting - in of the problem into the ladder assumes precedence over the urgency of the problem.

"So the feud goes on and on, shooting up the escalation ladder."

How do you get out of this system?

Ludwig suggested the notion of a third force outside of this giant "either-or" system on the international level.

"The force will consist of that part of every country and that part of every man which refuses to be defined by the Either - Or simplification."

"This recognition is important, for it embodies our hope. It is a tough confrontation and no one will talk of brotherhood and love.

"We are the third generation removed from the generation which caused the Cold War."

"In breaking out of the trap of 19th and 20th century language of Either - Or comes the force of non-power which will become our power."

Was the "secret brief" a Bissell plot?

By BARRY KADE

It is a well-known fact that Dr. Bissell stands for a "democratic" multiversity; that is to say a university whose governmental structure is unicameral (replacing the Senate and Board and representative of faculty and students.) In this way, the multiversity can utilize the energies of "activists" (students who demand only structural change and participatory democracy and who are now alienated by the aristocratic structure of the university) to put down the "saboteurs" (students who dare question the present function of the multiversity in a U.S.-dominated corporate society and who want to change its direction). This is the "Bissell Doctrine" universally accepted by multiversity administrations across the province.

The name of the game, then, is co-option of as many of the now alienated students into the establishment as is possible.

The issue of the "secret" report began when Steve Langdon was invited by Dr. Bissell to participate in a Committee of University Affairs hearing on the U of T projection to 1975. Now the CUA, the government agency for dishing out funds to the various Ontario multiversities, makes an annual trek across the province to explain their allocations and hear what the local administrations have to say. This is what the "secret" report was all about.

"BISELL DOCTRINE"

What has not been pointed out yet at U of T, however, is that administrators across the province have adopted the Bissell Doctrine and make a regular practice of making their presentation to the CUA open meetings with specific student bureaucrats invited.

It is only at U of T where, alas, the Bissell Doctrine has not been accepted by a reactionary Board of Governors, that some subterfuge (on the part of Dr. Bissell) had to be used.

Steve Langdon was invited several weeks ago by Dr. Bissell to attend the CUA hearing, but only if he would keep the proceedings confidential. Dr. Bissell knew full well the SAC stand on openness and against closed meetings.

Now Steve Langdon is a "saboteur" (he questions the function of the university). He was thus put in a quandary over the report. On the one hand, there was the SAC policy on openness (an activist line). On the other hand, he could see that the issue was not a good one to raise questions about the function of the university — what good is it to have a democratically run multiversity that helps American capital to exploit Canada, her peoples and resources?

PLAY DOWN

Langdon raised the issue at at least one SAC executive meeting.

The Executive agreed with Langdon. It would play down the issue as much as possible and only censure Dr. Bissell and the administration.

But Dr. Bissell had more foresight than the Executive. For when the topic came before the SAC general meeting, the general members went hog wild. Langdon had to use all his diplomatic prowess to prevent SAC from declaring an immediate sit-in and to push instead a general meeting on Friday.

At this point, the contents of the "secret" report were fairly widely known. The document contains few surprises and few significant changes. It is also the latest of about six "master plans" developed in the last four years.

Before going on, it should be reiterated that neither Bissell nor Langdon wanted a sit-in. Let us now watch how both manipulated the threat of one to his own ends.

Langdon's aims came out in the resolutions at Friday's mass meeting — 1) publication of the report, 2) an open meeting of the President's Advisory Council (with 7 students) to discuss it, 3) in effect, a warning but no sit-in (the Board may be reactionary but not insane.) In other words, Stevie Wonder and SAC came out of the scrape smelling of roses, "responsible" enough not to alienate certain student elements (Engineering referendum Wednesday) and radical enough to maintain the SAC image and win support for the long electoral road to social democracy. And there would be participatory democracy — seven students and a few observers would get to have a say in ratifying the report.

CRUCIAL ISSUE

Not once in the meeting did Langdon or his followers on stage mention what some of them regard as the crucial issue, the uses of the University of Toronto and how the report affects them. When a dissident challenged Langdon to uncover the "bogyman" and talk about the report, Langdon avoided the question. The meeting was a superb exercise in the mystification of issues before an audience.

Bissell also appeared on stage. What he said in effect, was that he disagreed with the secrecy, but his hands were tied, and he would now go back to the reactionaries and tell them what had been decided. And he knew, damn well, that they would give in.

All in all, it was a superb set of manoeuvres. A plot worthy of Ian Fleming. There will not be a sit-in.

And everybody is happy. Langdon enhanced the prestige of SAC. Bissell gets to co-opt the activists.

Well, almost everybody. But what about the people who want to talk about the function of the multiversity in a US-dominated corporate society?

why can't students park?

There are now practically no parking places for students' cars on campus. That means, if you live far enough away to need a car, that you park on St. George and feed a meter between classes, or you try to grab a bit of property along the side streets.

The trouble with both these alternatives is that this area has to be one of the most closely policed sections of the city in terms of parking. As a letter on page 6 points out, the Green Hornets won't let you park before nine, and they are generally Johnny-on-the-spot at four when parking time ends.

The question is, why?

Parking along the side streets impedes no one, even in rush hour. Who'd be stupid enough to take Huron in rush hour anyway? As for the line of meters along St. George, rush hour runs the other way at 4 p.m. So who is impeded?

why can't lawson park

Remember Bill Lawson, the food vendor who might lose his licence and his job if he gets any more parking tickets? Well, he doesn't have to lose his job at all.

All the administration has to do is authorize a space for Lawson and the other vendors to park their trucks and everything is OK.

Now, city controller Allan Lamport is quoted in yesterday's Globe as saying a U of T professor who defended Lawson was a symptom of professors "running wild". Lamport wants to report the professor to Bissell.

Monte Harris, an alderman and university Senate member, said council shouldn't send Dr. Bissell a letter because "he has enough problems as it is."

Presumably Mr. Lawson's livelihood is reason enough to take a bit of Dr. Bissell's precious time, especially since Dr. Bissell can do something to ensure that Lawson keeps his job. Let us hope Dr. Bissell will feel disposed to do so.

And as for Mr. Lamport and Mr. Harris—they can lose their jobs by vote. Let us hope the rest of us feel disposed to do so.

Maybe it is time the university started thinking about parking when it designs buildings. Underground or high rise parking is expensive to construct, sure, but it pays for itself eventually.

Action, anyone?

hairy plot?

Deep in the bowels of Hart House last Monday, Larry Haiven, one of our staffers was summarily and unmercifully scalped. He went into the Hart House barber shop with three month's growth of hair (his mother said he couldn't come home if he didn't get it cut.) He told the barber in explicit language that he only wanted a trim, just so that he couldn't be able to grab the hair at his temples. Fifteen minutes later, he emerged practically bald.

Last spring, editor Paul MacRae was similarly victimized. City editor Dave Frank is afraid to have his hair cut anywhere now. When is the Hart House Barber Shop going to learn that not every person who enters therein has been inducted into the army? Is this why we pay 25 cents less than anywhere else? If so, raise the price. Is there some kind of plot afoot?

Anybody who can lose money on a small-town newspaper is a near-genius.

Lord Thomson

By PHILIP RESNICK

Philip Resnick is a graduate student majoring in political economy.

Even at my age, I'm still ambitious. I never miss an opportunity to make more money or expand my business. Before I go, I'm going to make it as big as I can and as sound as I can.

— Lord Thomson of Fleet

The strike at the Peterborough Examiner, in which reporters and newsroom staff have been out for over four weeks, raises issues that go far beyond the specifics of the dispute. For the Examiner symbolizes the condition that prevails in scores of cities and towns throughout Canada — the single newspaper monopoly. And since last February, Peterborough has joined more than 40 other Canadian cities, from Arnprior through Yorkton, in the fold of Thomson Newspaper Ltd., the North American wing of the Thomson Empire.

The takeover by Thomson is directly relevant to the present dispute, as the Newspaper Guild stresses. Thomson entrepreneurship has meant greater emphasis on profit ability, an increase in advertising content, and an attempt to squeeze staff costs, by cutting salaries across the board for new recruits.

The pattern, however, is a familiar one, if one examines the rise of the Thomson Empire, from Roy Thomson's purchase of the fledgling Timmins Press in 1934 to today's $300,000,000 concern. For profit is what makes Roy Thomson tick, and he has used one small newspaper after another in building his present fortune.

Thomson's view of the small town newspaper is well-expressed in the following comment: "Anybody who can lose money with a small-town newspaper is a near genius. It's a matter of how much you're going to make. Some we approach will say 'Look, I'm making money.' We'll say 'Look, you're only making half of what you ought to be!' (Fortune, Feb. 1967). As a result, Thomson takeover of a newspaper entails a whip-hand from the Toronto office to ensure that the year-end accounts live up to expectation. The figures for Thomson's North American operations between 1955 and 1964 speak eloquently of just how successful he has been in this task.

Consolidated Earnings before Deductions, Depreciation and Taxes

1955	$1,692,925
1960	3,798,170
1964	7,630,079

Consolidated Net Earnings

1955	1,424,069
1960	1,223,031
1964	2,709,568

In nine years, Thomson's profits leaped six-fold.

WHO PAYS?

Who pays for these profits? Two years ago, the Oshawa Times, another Thomson newspaper, was also struck by the Newspaper Guild. The United Church Board of Evangelism, a fairly moderate organization, declared: "The pitifully low wages paid at the Oshawa Times leads us to ask: Has Lord Thomson earned his millions at the expense of labour? Has he risen to the top of the financial world by trampling on his employees and their families?"

If the workers pay the immediate price, the towns which Thomson "services" come in a close second. Although Thomson affirms that "Each and every one of my newspapers has the interests of its community at heart," that interest is defined in terms of continued Thomson monopoly. Charles Wilson also saw no contradiction between the interests of General Motors and those of the United States, and from the point of view of liberal capitalism he was absolutely right. Monopoly power is community power when the ruling elites define community interests. And Thomson does "not want to come down in the morning and find that somebody has taken me over," especially not the community.

If Thomson is almost a caricature of the capitalist entrepreneur, his newspaper empire is of concern to everyone in this country. For the monopoly power he exercises in over 40 communities finds its analogues in almost every other city. The Bell-Sifton chain, Pacific Publishing Company, the Toronto Star Publishing Company are examples of monopoly power elsewhere. The elites who run the newspapers also control a large part of the private media, and are not lacking direct tie-ins with the corporate elite of Canada.

J. A. TORY

U of T students have an additional interest in the Peterborough strike, moreover, for on their Board of Governors sits a representative of the Thomson Empire, J. A. Tory. If any had doubted the role of the university as a servicing industry for the corporate elites, the man from Thomson Newspapers Ltd. makes abundantly clear what liberal education is all about. The university supplies Thomson with both his proletarian labour and his management cadres. The corporate press and elites know damned well what kind of students they want their university system to churn out.

As students, however, our real interests lie over-whelmingly on the side of labour. We are interested in democratizing the university, but we are no less interested in democratizing the society as a whole. We reject the right of the corporate elites to make any decisions for us, but we also reject the right of those elites to direct the lives of workers, manual or intellectual, whose ranks most of us are destined to join.

The strike at Peterborough therefore concerns each and everyone of us. To see a common student-worker interest is to see our real position in Canadian society. It is fine for students to march on the Ontario Legislature for increased grants. But unless they are prepared to put their bodies on the line in support of their fellow-workers, their demands for grants become nothing but selfish interest-group lobbying by middle class kids.

Community-run newspapers are a logical counterpart to a democratically-run university. The profit motive is not what information is about, and Thomson Thomson should have no more say in how it functions than in how the educational system runs.

MEETING TODAY

Today, at 1 p.m., a representative of the Toronto Newspaper Guild will be speaking at 44 St. George. Friday, at 3:30 a.m., busses will be leaving the Varsity office to join students from Waterloo, Ottawa, and other Ontario Universities, on the picket line at 6 a.m.

The role of the student is not to accept the world, but to change it. Peterborough represents a step along the way to that change.

Why the Engineering Society Executive resigned

The mass resignations which rocked the Engineering Society last night were merely the culmination of months of bitter dissension.

The Society has lost money on a number of events, particularly the production Stop the World I Want to Get Off, and certain members of the committee elected to run Society affairs seem to feel that this is somehow the fault of the Officers of the Society.

There have been many veiled accusations at recent meetings of improprieties on the part of the Officers, accusations which have become more and more open. The persons responsible for these accusations and innuendoes held a secret meeting in the Walberg building Monday to discuss strategy. Reliable sources indicate that the result of this meeting was a decision to filibuster the budget which was presented by the Treasurer to last evenings meeting.

That this was their intention was clearly indicated when the leader of the group, Debates Chairman Paul Gooderham sought, by introducing a series of unnecessary motions on subjects already covered in the Constitution to delay the proceedings of the meeting.

The Officers of the society felt that it was no longer possible to continue on this basis.

They pointed out to the members of the Society who were conducting the filibuster that passing the motion on the floor was an effective vote of non-confidence in the officers, and that they would regard it as such. The motion would tighten financial control on the Society's officers.

The motion was passed, and the officers resigned stating their intention to take their case to the electorate.

It seems proper at this time to indicate that the accusations of the mismanagement made against the officers are absolutely unfounded.

The people who have resigned tonight have done absolutely nothing improper. They have brought to the Society their level best and in the elections which will follow their resignations they will try to convince the students of this point.

What is really involved here is a conflict between two philosophies of Engineering. It is no coincidence that those who have resigned have been in the fore of Engineering Society efforts to gain increased student participation in University affairs.

The people who have resigned want the Engineering Society to do more than just run the dances, and operate the Stores.

They feel that it is impossible to do this given the atmosphere which has come to exist in the Society Executive Committee. When it becomes impossible to even discuss a budget because of a filibuster, it indicates that things have gone too far.

It has become time for the Engineering student to make a decision on exactly what direction he wants his Society to take. That is the opinion of the officers and that is why they resigned.

"immature"

After hearing numerous rumours of the riotous and rowdy atmosphere in the Botany 110 classes, I decided to attend one of these lectures. I was not to be disappointed, as I discovered how some students, at university level, are still as immature as babies, craving the attention of the teacher.

The entrance of Professor Dengler, a tall intelligent blonde, was greeted with whistles, wolf calls, yells. As she attempted to get started on her lecture, more wolf calls came from the back — mainly from five defiant looking characters who sat as if surrounded by an air of superiority.

They repeatedly asked Prof. Dengler to reiterate the statements they had missed while conversing with one another. But Prof. Dengler was not to be daunted by the group as she proceeded with the class. At one point in the lecture, when Prof. Dengler refused to go along with the rowdiness and gave a cold silent stare to the trouble makers, one of them, as if insulted by her attitude, asked a discourteous "why", much to the approval and laughter of his comrades, to a statement which she had made earlier. Prof. Dengler ably answered the question, which one could tell, by the look of the student, that he had not sufficient knowledge to comprehend.

By the attitude of the majority of the students, and on questioning some of them, I found that they too, were very dissatisfied with the troublemakers, who had tried to disrupt every class since September.

So fellows, instead of stuffing pipes into your mouths, try a bottle of milk; instead of wearing beards, try diapers. In other words, shut up and grow up. Others want to learn.

hornets

Yesterday I was chased around the block five times by a Green Hornet. Thank goodness it didn't sting me for $5. What's the point of coming to school at 8 a.m. to find a parking spot on Huron St. opposite Sid Smith if you can't even stay there.

The Green Hornet said to move along, but to where?

Before designing a new building, the parking situation should be carefully studied. The competent architects the university hired don't seem to have done this. Why couldn't they have incorporated an academic building above a multi-storey parking garage available reasonably to students. No new office building in Toronto can be erected unless it provides a minimum of parking spaces for its tenants. We are tenants of the universities' buildings, where are our parking spaces?

"Stalin's statue is ready to rise again — if necessary"

By MIKE KESTERTON

"We found this gigantic statue of Stalin lying in a rubbish heap outside Bratislava. It had been taken down when he died. But it was untouched, ready to be raised again, if — if it was necessary. We took a photograph of it and tried to get it into our paper."

Franz Galan, student journalist from Czechoslovakia, smiled as he described the life of a writer during the Novotny regime.

"The censors for our paper were old Communists. They used to go over everything in minute detail, excising words, lines. But we got past them, in a way. When a story was censored, it left a hole on the page. We filled that hole with an ad: 'Reserved for the store that manufactures shoes.' That way our fellow students knew that the story had been altered.

"We got away with that trick for months before they caught on.

"Mind you, our editors were trouble-makers in a way. They used to submit a story they knew would have to be censored just to argue about it. It took hours and hours.

"After the Arab-Israeli war we managed to get a story printed condemning the official pro-Arab stance our government took. Then nobody wanted to print our paper. The local print shop, run by the Party, said they didn't have time. We had to find a press 200 miles away to do our paper for us.

"After the liberalization the printers in the Bratislava shop came to us and offered to work overtime to do our paper."

Galan left Czechoslovakia after Dubcek was summoned to Moscow. He travelled in Europe for a while and then came to Canada. He is enrolled at St. Mike's studying Russian, ironically. ("It was the only course," he said).

Galan's nervousness about his life under Russian occupation is understandable. In 1950, when he was just a little scrapper, his father was among the first to be arrested in the Stalinist purges and condemned to death. The sentence was later commuted to life imprisonment. He was 'rehabilitated' after Stalin's death, having spent seven years in jail.

"My father was accused of sabotaging his bakery, but the real reason could have been anything. That was the terror in those times: you could have been guilty of a thousand crimes or entirely innocent. We never knew who would disappear next."

Throughout his account of trials, purges and censorship Franz's speech had been mild, his face often breaking into a philosophical apologetic grin. But I struck fire from him when I criticized the Czech nation.

"The war record of Czechoslovakia has been less than remarkable, Franz. Some people say that Czechoslovaks have no balls. Why are they always allowing themselves to be overrun without a fight?"

"Because fighting back would be suicide!" he snorted. "Can the Czech nation alone fight the Russians? Passive resistance is the best means in the long run. We Czechs are a clever people. We use wit and brains instead of fighting.

"We have demoralized the Russians. The first troops were Tartars and Bulgars, primitive men, expecting to kill thousands of us in order to 'liberate' the country. Instead they were met with passive scorn. It was very confusing to them."

"What was it like to live under the liberalized regime?" I asked.

"Well, first of all, understand that things weren't really so bad before the Dubcek accession. People could say what they liked. It was only in publishing things that the state exercised control.

"Young people didn't talk about politics much . . . they were apathetic."

"And after?"

"I think that in four months we learned more truth than in the last 20 years," said the 22-year-old.

SIT-IN FIZZLES

Brief released, students to join discussions

By BRIAN JOHNSON

There will be no sit-in at Simcoe Hall today, as the administration has met student demands to publish its "secret" brief and let students discuss it in an open meeting of the President's Advisory Council Friday.

The University of Toronto seems headed for a period of retrenchment over the next seven years.

The brief which President Claude Bissell plans to present to the Committee on University Affairs says enrollment on the St. George campus has reached capacity and will be levelled off at slightly over 16,000 undergraduates. (The present enrollment is about 15,000.) Graduate students would be tapered off at the 7,500 mark, up from the present level, which is under 5,000. It is suggested cutoff levels be imposed in courses.

The university's general objective in the next several years, will be to "consolidate, improve, and intensify our work in those areas where it is particularly good and particularly necessary." Renovations to enlarge 11 major buildings and also bring them in line with fire safety regulations are proposed.

The brief suggests replacing the Mine Building on College St. with a modern high-rise building in time to avoid piece-meal renovations.

Capital cost figures and the phasing of financing for Three hundred and fifty students at a mass meeting last Friday voted to sit in if those two demands were not met.

The administration announced its decision yesterday at 2 p.m., four hours before the 6 p.m. deadline in College is first on the list of new constructions.

The Hart House athletic wing provides "totally inadequate and antiquated space," the health service and infirmary require expansion, and "housing and food services are inadequate," says the brief.

The campus centre, "does not exist," and there is "an appearance of almost total neglect" of the problem.

The report suggests acquisition of a building to house junior staff members and proposes a new faculty club and an addition to Simcoe Hall.

The brief reveals the university has been conducting traffic survey on St. George St. jointly with the City and Metro Toronto. Until a decision is made about traffic on St. George, nothing will be done about building the Campus Centre or the new Schools of Business or Social Work. The university will also attempt to complete purchase of land on northwest campus.

The report also says the following proposals are on tap:

- increasing Law enrollment from 450 to 675,
- abolishing the Institute of Child Study.

the student ultimatum.

The brief, drawn up by a small group of administrators, concerns plans for the next seven years of the university.

Students' Administrative Council President Steve Langdon called the brief "vague and wisby-wasby."

"It's a pretty vacuous report," he said. "My first response is that there are a lot of different subjects covered in it."

"What we're going to have to ask for is that change be recognized by the students," he added.

Langdon suggested two possible courses of action: that such a long range report not be made this year, or that it be made but that there be discussions to point out its inadequacies.

He said "there could be study days when students and faculty would have time to examine the report."

"It talks about shifting the faculty of Forestry to Erinedale," he said "but it doesn't talk about providing bousing services that students there would need.

"The enrolment projection shows an increased concentration on graduate rather than undergraduate studies, but this has gone far enough already."

He also criticized the report for raising the enrolment figures for engineering without taking into consideration the increased pressure on the job market.

SAC university commissioner Bob Rae (IV UC) also criticized the brief, strongly.

"It's one of the blandest documents I've ever read," he said. "If this is a blueprint for the brave new world, it is neither very brave nor very new."

There will be a special SAC meeting 7:30 p.m. Thursday at the Women's Union (79 St. George) to discuss the brief.

The president's council meeting will take place 2 p.m. Friday in the council chamber of the Galbraith Building.

"Any section of SAC has the right to withdraw" decides committee

The Students' Administrative Council may have to take a new line on the Graduate Students' Union's request for withdrawal, if Monday's meeting of the committee to discuss the question is any indication.

Previously the SAC executive had insisted that GSU withdrawal was impossible and unconstitutional, and SAC

The officers of the Engineering Society resigned last night amid veiled threats of financial mismanagement.

The five resignations followed passing of a motion concerning financial procedures, which the officers interpreted as a vote of non-confidence.

The resolution, which carried 16-10, requires the treasurer to keep invoices and receipts of all monies spent. Treasurer Arthur McIlwain (III APSC) said the Society's finances were being capably handled, and interpreted the motion as a slur on his integrity. The other officers agreed and said they would resign if the motion was passed.

Paul Gooderham (IV APSC), who introduced the finance resolution, said it was simply a matter of instituting controls on the treasurer and other officers. But he hinted that there was some evidence of mismanagement.

McIlwain denied the charges. Engineering President Brian Dunk (IV APSC) suggested that the basis of the problem was a division between two groups of Engineers whom he called "old line" and "liberal". Michael Taylor (IV APSC), chairman of the Science Club, said the same problem was at the root of the SAC referendum.

After the Engineering Society meeting, the officers issued a statement saying they would bring the question before the members of the society by seeking re-election.

schools and artisans. It is partly the job of the engineer to bridge the division between those who are in science and those who are not.

The two groups must interact. The artisans dealing with engineer must decide how "Unions are moving into the white collar areas while the unskilled workers are no longer in industry," he said.

Because of his changing position, Langdon said, "the engineer must decide how

A recount of the last stage of last week's election for student members of the commission on university government has left the results unchanged.

Steve Grant (II Vic) got an extra seven votes in the recount yesterday, boosting his total to 843. Paul Fromm (III SMC), the candidate who asked for the recount, remains defeated with 822 votes.

Reid bill would replace B of G

A private member's bill establishing a Universities Commission to replace the functions of both the Department of University Affairs and boards of governors at Ontario universities, is being introduced by Jim Reid (Lib. MPP-Scarborough East).

Reid sponsored the bill to ensure "the citizens and taxpayers of Ontario are assured that the money being invested in universities is being efficiently spent."

"Boards of governors," the legislator stated, "have not carried out this responsibility as efficiently or effectively as they could have."

His proposed commission would be responsible for allocating all university finances and would attempt to encourage co-operation and co-ordination among Ontario universities.

Black Power

Sandy Black stepped into her room and flicked on the light.

Leaning against a desk, surrounded by shipping wrappings and scattered books was a huge oil painting — a simple picture of a girl with long dark hair painted in thick creams and browns.

"I spent my whole life sav- ings on it," she told me, her dark eyes alight. "It just arrived by Air Canada yesterday."

Sandy is president of the Victoria College Union, a member of the Faculty of Arts and Science Council, chairman of the Council of Presidents of U of T and member of a SAC committee to study the Graduate Students Union withdrawal.

She explained how she had seen the painting at an exhibition near Venice and felt compelled to buy it. She found out the painter's address and looked him up in an ancient villa in Rome.

"With unutterable glee, I told him how much the painting meant to me," she said, "how I had a small fund of money set aside for something special and would he give it to me for that. And then he started talking about shipping arrangements!"

As a student, Sandy is probably one of the most involved persons on the U of T campus.

...committee of college council presidents and other student leaders to discuss the problem.

Langdon called the last proposal parochial (whatever that means), and said the college councils were generally even more bureaucratic than SAC.

There will be further committee meetings to reach more definite conclusions.

But it now seems impossible for SAC to use its former line of "impossible" to prevent the GSU withdrawal.

The interim conclusion of the committee was that any section of SAC had the right to withdraw," said SAC President Steve Langdon, "and then we started to work out methods for withdrawal."

Several proposals were discussed:

- making SAC a voluntary student union where faculties could opt in or out.

There will be buses leaving George at 3:30 a.m. Friday morning for those who want to join the picket lines at the Peterborough Examiner. The bus rides and coffee are free. We urge you to come.

"People say students are so busy with courses they don't have time for this sort of committee work. That's an absurd contradiction in her long dark hair over her shoulders. "If you're so busy learning a bunch of crap without even questioning why and how and where it's getting you, that really illustrates "Mr. Charlie's got your mind."

"If a student is really interested in his field he will be interested in how it's presented," she said.

"I really am concerned with where this university and university education in general are going. I get upset about the Allen Report and where it's going. There are so many fundamental things it doesn't even deal with. I'm afraid it will go through this year and everyone will be satisfied. Then we'll be stuck with a semi-improvement for the next 50 years."

"The Allen report could be so abused, could be so restrictive, if there isn't a very active, sensitive staff-student committee in every department," she explained.

Sitting on the Chesterfield in a blue jumpsuit she curled up her legs and bit into a chocolate chip cookie.

critically the part he plays in the Canadian economy, the SAC president said. He must decide, for instance, whether the best interests of Canadians are being served by foreign-controlled companies he works for.

Engineers must also be aware of the gap that exists between the professional and the engineering referendum on membership in SAC, set for tomorrow, has been postponed temporarily.

The decision was made at the Engineering Society meeting last following the resignation of the executive. The problem was that with no executive in office, no action could be taken on results of the vote.

Nevertheless, they will hold an open forum in Convocation Hall at noon today to talk about membership in SAC and the executive resignation.

"What I'd like to see in education is the freedom for everybody to graduate in his own individualism," she said. "For example I would graduate in Sandy Black."

"The big problem is communication, trying to awaken everyone to a critical examination of what's happening to him."

She talked about the awakening effect the Winnipeg CUS conference had on her last spring.

"I wish there could be a CUS seminar session for every student here. Critical self-examination is so important. If you don't attempt to bring people along, you'll alienate the majority."

"That's where SAC has made its mistake. It has tried to exercise leadership and vanguardism and this is good. But if there's no attempt to communicate it becomes imposition of ideas."

"Communication at Vic is a particularly difficult problem," she said. "You're confronted with an amorphous mass most of whom are never even at Vic. How do you reach these people?"

Perhaps one way is through a film. The VCU has set aside $1,500 for Howard Cronin (III Vic) to produce a film about Vic. Sandy was excited about it.

"It's not going to be geared to anybody in particular," she said. "It's just a perceptible look at Vic, an honest, analytic reflection."

"I don't know what we're unleashing or what we'll learn, if anything, but I hope it will create interest and involve students at large."

"One of my activities occasionally is this course I'm in," she said, laughing. Sandy is in 4th year Biological and Medical Sciences which she termed "terribly restrictive and unsatisfactory."

"What interests me is not specific scientific enquiry itself but rather the ideas behind it, the purpose and validity of the scientific method."

"I'd like to spend a year soul searching and reading, asking questions and reading, and asking questions like "What is a scientist? and how does he relate to the world in which he's living?"

Sandy has applied to Oxford for a non-credit course in next year in the history and philosophy of science.

"This has been the most stimulating and exciting but also the most frustrating and upsetting year I've ever had," she said. "It's been a mind-boggling few months, but it's something that's good for everyone to sweat through."

copy of the old working class is meaningful to him."

"Engineers are becoming the new working class," Langdon continued.

"In our computer society the skilled and unskilled laborers are becoming fewer because their jobs are being eliminated," the SAC president continued.

You could die in OP 135

By ERROL YOUNG

An independent study by The Varsity (see picture) revealed yesterday that the acoustical tile in Room 135 of the Old Physics Building is highly flammable.

The pockmarked gray wood fiber tiles are similar to the ones that were responsible for the death of one man in the fire at the Workman's Compensation Hospital two years ago.

University Fire-Marshal Westhead said that he would look into the condition of the room tomorrow.

"There have been proposals around for the redevelopment of the building for many years now," said engineering dean J. M. Ham.

Architects Page and Steel six months ago completed a feasibility study on renovation of the facilities. Eventually the building could be rebuilt as offices and lecture halls.

"In terms of the cost of modernizing, the question 'is it worth it' is a real one," Dean Ham said.

"The University gets only so much from the province for redevelopment so that it must have a list of priorities," he added.

At the top of this list are the old residences, such as Devonshire House and Sir Daniel Wilson. Meanwhile, room 135 Old Physics is being used to full capacity (around 650) as students continue to smoke under the No Smoking signs.

Liz Willick, Varsity expert on OP 135, tests ignition point of material (circled) which fell from the walls of the room. Also a registered nurse, Miss Willick pronounced the fumes from said ignited material "would be likely to kill, if inhaled."

Sapinette

this may not look like an adventuresome sport, but may we assure you that she is a downright dragracer.

Sapinette has decided that if sportmanship has its limitations, then one it will advise to use the sneaky tools of our technology.

Sapinette tries on the helmet and ponders the problem of such headgear for the raciblic sport.

ah! the trials and tribulations of sport! every morning our fluffy friend would meet up with a chap on the same model of Honda as hers and they would stage an impromptu drag to campus. she could always recognize him by his flashy blue helmet with the big M on the front.

one day she hopped into the Campusbank to talk over a supercharger loan to (heh heh) fake out her adversary once and for always.

We must admit that she was surprised to find that famous blue helmet perched jauntily on the top antler of the manager's coat tree!

"I want a loan to buy a supercharger to fake you out..." she mumbled. The manager laughed politely. "I have been considering the same thing" he admitted sheepishly.

Well—our bank doesn't always lend money. For instance, we know two people who've sublimated their competitive ids to twice-weekly canasta bouts.

More faculty candidates for CUG

The faculty candidates for the Commission on University Government were asked the following five questions:

- Do you believe students and faculty should run the university on a basis of equality?
- What controls should the general public have over the university?
- What is the place of the administration in the university?
- What is the function of the university in society?
- What structures do you think would best accomplish your aims?

Results of the mailed-in vote appear in Monday's Varsity.

Prof. L. E. Lynch (Philosophy)

• No, that would not be practical. But this is not to say that faculty and students shouldn't have the predominant voice.

• The general public's control should be very indirect — a series of buffers between government and the university is best on this score. The public's control should be through their elected representatives, yet there is a great danger if the control is too direct — if every profes-or's salary is on the provincial budget.

• "Administration is a complicated term. If it means financial control, I think this is very largely a "civil service" role — not a matter of policy making. In the area of academic administration, we have to allow the administration a larger role in initiating policies for consideration, but they are not decision makers.

• The university has a heavy social impact, even by just existing. But it should not be the captive of any ideological or political party.

• This is very tough to answer. There must be thorough research before any firm conclusions can be reached. I have thought of the possibility of a strong central body with a variety of committees, modelled on the President's Council, but with more broadly-based representatives including students.

But this may not stand up to the test.

Prof. R. A. Green (English)

• There's no doubt that the two main estates in the university are the faculty and the students. I'm not superstitious about percentages — I wouldn't go to the stake for 50-50, but I feel that students deserve an active voice.

• This is the single most important question before CUG. The most worrisome thing here in Ontario now is that the Committee on University Affairs is governing the universities in fact, without the active participation of either faculty or students.

• The administration is the active servant of the staff and students. It's worth saying that the recent regulations about the term of office of academic administrators have been a step in the right direction.

• The major problem in the university now is the tension between professional training and liberal education, and between graduate and undergraduate education, and the lack of humanistic values in the planning of the university. The university has been traditionally run as a corporation, and we must take a hard look at that.

• This is a bit premature, but I would say that from the moment (two years ago) when Doctor Bissell was critical of the Duff-Berdahl report and proposed instead a single-tiered form of government — at that point he was ahead of students.

Prof. Ion Burton — (Geography)

(Prof. Burton is out of the country. The following comments are from a policy sheet he prepared for his colleagues before leaving.)

I hope that internally we can move a long step away from the unnecessarily authoritarian structures of the past. The running of the university can be made more open, more democratic, more subject to the wishes of all the members of the university community, but especially the faculty, and less subject to political control from outside.

Secondly, I feel that the administration of the university should be improved so as to ensure that the services provided for members of staff are more of an aid in our attempt to achieve excellence in teaching and research and less of a hindrance.

Finally, the relationship between the university and society should be critically examined in the light of the new demands that are being placed on the university. New forms and types of relationships should be considered, involving wider and more representative strata of society, to enhance the more democratic qualities of the university, and especially to facilitate the larger role which universities must play in the affairs of the nation in the future.

Dr. C. Scott Russell — Medicine

• There has to be liberal and free consultation between the two groups, who are in many respects one group.

• The general public can have no direct control. But we must be always mindful that we are funded by the public, and so have a responsibility to acquit ourselves in a reasonable manner.

• The administration was devised to maintain the physical plant and economic structures so the university can exist on a sound basis. The administration's role in academic affairs must be defined, and if necessary limited.

• The function of the university, in the strict sense, is to make one aware of the universe, to be the fountain of all knowledge. In our society, the university must attempt to make students and faculty as aware as possible of things of concern in our world. It must help them cope with the world, learn about it in the broadest sense, and improve it as far as possible. The university is not just a school but a source of knowledge.

• I don't know. This is why I ran — to find out what structures can best accomplish these aims, and to gain information which will help devise structures to improve the university where possible.

SAC to examine prejudice

The Hillel organization asked the Students' Administrative Council to condemn Soviet treatment of Jews last week, but the discussion led to the establishment of a committee to investigate discrimination in Canada.

The motion first read "that SAC declare their concern for the Soviet Jews and condemn the Soviet government's treatment of Jews."

Before an hour of debate ensued, Hillel presented a 750-name petition and a 10-minute tape of information on Soviet Jewry.

"Soviet Jewry do not have the opportunity to practice their religion," said the tape.

"There is discrimination in employment and education. The Russian Jew is left in a cultural and psychological void — he is not a Russian and he is not a Jew." (The U.S.S.R. does not recognize the Jewish nation.)

Ted Dent (OCE) was the only SAC member who said Soviet Jewry was not persecuted to the extent Hillel indicated.

"There are no programs any more," he said, "and conditions are improving."

Edmund Burkite Paul Fromm (III SMC) opposed the motion for different reasons.

"The Russians don't give a holy damn what we say," he said. "And if we make a condemnation, we should condemn Soviet discrimination against other minorities."

Fromm launched into an attack on discrimination against Catholics.

"Let's not get into peripheral issues," interrupted Speaker George Murray (II Law).

"Do you mean to say that a Catholic is peripheral?" asked Fromm.

"It depends upon the Catholic," Murray replied.

One of Fromm's cohorts from the floor, Lawrence Stichman (II SMC) said, "There is also discrimination to an extent against the Arabs who have been driven out of their home in the areas of Jordan occupied by Israel."

A group began to sing Hava Nagila.

"We're making fools of ourselves in singling out the Jews as the only group discriminated against," Fromm added. "It's time to attack all religious discrimination."

"This is beginning to sound like a sociology essay," commented Marian Mowat (II Nurs).

Duncan Chisolm (II UC) said he thought there was "not enough intellect on SAC to undergo a study of discrimination."

Nevertheless, the committee will be formed.

McGill students want hiring say

MONTREAL (CUP) — The thorny questions of undergraduate membership on the Faculty Appointments Committee and the Political orientation of McGill University's Political Science Department dominated discussion as students and faculty met across the negotiation table for the first time Monday.

Over 400 students watched the three hour session on closed circuit television. The start of negotiations was delayed five days while students and faculty argued about the format of talks. The faculty agreed to the closed - circuit system Friday night.

The occupation of the Political Science Department moved into its eighth day Monday and will continue until a solution is reached. Negotiations are scheduled daily at 1 p.m.

Student negotiator Harry Cowen demanded student representation in departmental decision - making because it was the only way they could change "the weary structure of gigantic impersonal classrooms, unrelated theory, wearisome textbooks and more wearisome teachers and exams."

The students went into the meeting with demands for one-third representation on departmental committees. They originally called for parity.

Faculty negotiators continually harped on the question of competence in their reluctance to grant undergraduates seats on the Appointments Committee. They said bluntly that students below the graduate level did not have the capacity to choose the teaching personnel.

Mallory called the argument over the political orientation of professors a "Dangerous confusion of thought." His statement that intellectual inquiry" was greeted by laughter and jeers from the students watching the negotiations on TV.

All you need is love

By LIZ WILLOCK

There are two bases on which human beings interact. "Either they are compelled, coerced or forced", or "they do it because they want to." In the first case, "essentially what we're talking about is power."

And that, according to Dr. T. D. Kemper, is what love is all about. The lover confers status upon the loved one and thereby acquires power over him.

"The introduction of the use of power into the love relationship (usually after marriage) is the beginning of the end. The exercise of power tends to create an aversion to the punisher (the user of power)."

This was the most controversial view put forward by three panelists in a discussion on "Love" sponsored by the Psychology Students Union Monday night. Seventy students attended.

Dr. Peter Moore from the University Health Service, also differentiated between two types of love — "love love" and "in love love." The first "carries with it tenderness, warmth, loyalty and dignity and is complete without the presence of the loved one."

"In love love involves adoration, need, dependency, hunger and a feeling of incompleteness if the loved one is not present. There is a daily risk of degradation. It is too enervating to be sustained."

Dr. Moore felt love love "may need physical expression but not necessarily sexual". Dr. Kemper suggested "rewarding another person sexually is a terrific reward. It also has that universal biological significance which gives it an extra bit of zap!" It is the high point of status conferral in a love relationship.

One reaction to the panelists came from Dr. Ken Clementi of the School of Hygiene who said the discussion was "frankly nauseating" to him.

"They are talking about a man-woman relationship in which each treats the other as a chattel. This accounts for the deplorable state of marriage in the world today."

OBJECTIVITY MYTH SHATTERED

By MARK STAROWICZ
McGILL DAILY

The only sector of American society that has ever produced a viable press is the business community.

The major city dailies, the principal national magazines in Canada and the United States are inseparable from corporate interests, from the community which directs the North American economy.

The reasons for this are obvious: any large newspaper becomes a business in itself, and depends on the business community (through advertising revenue) for its survival.

No other sector of North American society has produced a significant press — not labor, not the intellectuals, not the church, not the political parties. These sectors have produced publications, but never a press that has reached the whole spectrum of society.

This is equally true for all other media, with the exception of a few radio stations in the United States that are run by universities or non-corporate groups and serve the surrounding community.

The capitalist system dictates that only those in possession of small fortunes can control the means of mass communications.

This control of the means of communication by only one of many sectors of society has led to serious abuses, and the creation of several myths we have been conditioned to accept.

And the greatest of these myths is objectivity.

There is nothing wrong, per se, about the business community producing a press. But inasmuch as ONLY that community has produced one, it has created the myth of objectivity to justify its monopoly of news selection and interpretation in the eyes of other sectors of society who might produce a different kind of press.

A press such as that of the labor movement in its radical period in England produced a very different interpretation of society from the London Times. Without debating which interpretation has more merit, it was important that the English public had access to something other than one interpretation.

Today, the Canadian people have no access to such alternative daily interpretation of news. They can only get it if they go out of their way to pick up some esoteric political journal at the end of the month. But the mainstream press maintains the myth of objectivity to rationalize its monolithic interpretation. Objectivity holds that facts rise above all interpretation that there are inviolable truths which no one can deny.

This is patently impossible, and hence the pretence of such is dishonest. The selection of facts, the order of presentation, the play they are given all reflect a value judgement and carry interpretation. Time Magazine has one idea of what stories and whose views are important. The New Statesman has another.

Whenever a story is printed — or not printed — a value judgement is made. Different papers have different ideas of what is significant.

Carlyle wrote a very different interpretation of the French Revolution than did Albert Mathieu. Both worked with facts, but each considered different facts significant. We accept that historians can honestly view the same events with totally contradictory results. No one has gone around pretending there are objective historians. For the same reasons there is no objective press.

If you walk up to someone in Moscow and tell him Pravda doesn't always tell the truth, he's likely to laugh and say of course. Chances are fair that if you walk up to someone in New York and tell him the same thing about the New York Times, he'll call you a pin-ko.

Real freedom of the press is not freedom to say what you want, but freedom for every man who has something to say to be able to produce his own press. We can disagree with the editors of the Gazette and peddle our message on the corner of Peel and St. Catherine, but we cannot disagree on the same level of effectiveness unless we raise $11 million.

An underground press could have some modest but significant success if it could only relate to people other than those that have decided that the formula for happiness was set down by Alice B. Toklas.

I. F. Stone's small but influential newsletter has started off a chain of similar endeavors in the United States, the most promising being Andrew Kopkind's MAYDAY. These small, four-page newsletters at least offer a running weekly alternative to the gospel according to Associated Press. But they are hardly causing the mainstream papers any worry about competition.

There are several other sectors of society that could produce their own daily press: labor, the church, the political parties, the universities. All these have sufficient access to funds to enter the arena.

Labor has failed to produce because of its internal divisions, and because a large part of it has turned to supporting the present order of things anyway.

Political parties have no need to produce an alternate press as the present mainstream press is theirs already; the press barons and the political leaders come from the same sector and indulge in mutual incest.

The church too is essentially interested in the preservation of things as they are and has no reason to produce an alternative.

That leaves us with the university. This is a particularly interesting area of discussion, since the very concept of a university leads one to think that it should produce a daily press.

The university pretends to be an institution which studies society, its flaws and its strengths. It is supposed to be engaged in a continuing examination of the environment. A daily press is the most obvious device for such an examination. Furthermore the university has a duty to serve the community at large. A daily press would be in keeping with that duty.

The university has the funds to produce at least a significant weekly press. But it will not use its funds to perform any service to society which might disturb the business corporations, to whom it owes direct allegiance. Instead, the university will behave even more conservatively than the very corporate elite it serves.

For evidence of this we have to look no further than the McGill administration's current plunge into journalism. The McGill Reporter generously funded by the administration, appeared on the McGill campus this September. If nothing else, the McGill Reporter has shattered many people's unfakeable faith in the idea that it was impossible to produce anything more irrelevant than The Montreal Gazette.

Ont. Rhodes go to Allan, Rae

Derek Allen (IV Trin) and Bob Rae (IV UC) are the two Ontario recipients of the $5,000 Rhodes scholarship awarded this week to graduating students for academic excellence and extracurricular involvement.

Allen, who graduated from University of Toronto Schools, is presently Head of Arts at Trinity College and president of the U of T debating union. A philosophy and history student, he was also president of the Trinity College philosophy club and was instrumental in forming a staff-student club in his course.

He will spend his two years at Oxford studying for a Bachelor of Philosophy.

Rae spent four years at the International School in Geneva and graduating with an A-level diploma was able to enter second year Modern History. He is presently SAC University Commissioner, UC rep for SAC and book editor for The Varsity Review. Last year he ran the UC Festival, was literary director of the UC Literary and Athletic Society and was on the executive of the International Teach-in.

Rae is a member of the President's Council ("when it's open") and was one of four students elected last week to the Commission on University Government.

Like Allen he has been active in university debating and will be one of those speaking for the ayes in tonight's Hart House debate on "It should be as easy to have an abortion as it is to have a baby."

As SAC University Commissioner Rae was instrumental in negotiating for equal staff-student representation on CUG and has fought for the principles of openness and student equality on committees across the campus. He plans to study either politics or history at Oxford before returning to U of T to do graduate work in Canadian history.

SFU strike halts before exams

BURNABY (CUP) — The crisis at Simon Fraser is over for this semester.

The teach-in showed few signs of getting off the ground Tuesday as most classes dealt with regular course material rather than the issues which led to the hlow up.

The Monday night senate meeting went into a six-hour marathon session and, after hearing two major proposals dealing with admission policy, waffled its way to another meeting next week.

The library at SFU was filled to capacity Tuesday as students, behind on their studies because of the two-week action, hit the books hard to catch up.

Militant students and faculty say they will reorganize the teach-in for next term and some say they expect confrontation again in January but do not know what form it will take.

Student Ombudsman, Ace

Hollibaugh, blamed the teach-in failure on a statement last week by Administration President Ken Strand. Strand said he supported the teach-in idea but stressed that regular classes would have to continue.

"It was a cleverly designed statement that effectively emasculated any understanding of the problems," Hollibaugh said. "I think we'll have a good Orientation Week next semester and I think the teach-ins will continue."

Meanwhile, the 114 students arrested in the SFU administration building have been remanded to trial in January but there has as yet been no administration push to drop the charges.

The senate meeting, attended by over 300 student observers, was in session largely to consider two proposals for reform in admissions policy.

The papers, labelled "well-intentioned" but "highly complex" by Arts Dean Dale Sullivan, ran into heavy fire and were shelved until the next senate session. Both papers were presented by student and faculty militants.

One paper proposed a Canadian equivalent to the College Board Test administered by the American Educational Testing Service. It was shot down quickly because of general reluctance to substitute one test of questionable criteria with another one that would be forced to do the same.

The second proposal called for creation of a provincial academic board to regulate course quality and credit transferability. It ran into criticism from people who thought it would infringe on the autonomy of individual institutions.

Exams start on December 9 and right now, no one except a few die-hards and the 114 are worried about anything else.

WOMEN'S SPORTS

Women swimmers winners

The U. of T. Women's Intercollegiate Swim Team has done it again! A combination of a second in synchronized events, a first in the diving competition and a second in the speed swimming put the Toronto team in the winners circle at the W.I.A.U. Swim Meet at Guelph last weekend, over Western (who placed second), Queens, MacMaster, McGill, and Guelph.

In the synchronized figures, Laurie White placed second and Judy Kent placed fourth out of 15 competitors. In the strokes, Judy Maxwell and Fran Evans tied for fourth position out of 18 competitors.

Mabel Ann Brown, Beth Smith and Judy Kent placed a decisive first in the trio routines (30 points ahead of the second place team) with their performance of 'Los Hombr'es'.

Two Toronto divers, Gail Whyte and Gail Wishart, took first and second place, respectively, in the Diving Competition. In the speed events, Ruth Unger managed to slice 9/10 of a second off the 100 yard backstroke record, timing 1:12.2. The free style relay team of Judy Kent, Ruth Unger, Sue Ferguson and Liz Daniels clocked 1:58.1, 1.3 seconds faster than the previous intercollegiate record.

The first Intercollegiate Fencing Meet of the year was held last weekend and took the form of a tri-nect featuring Ottawa, MacMaster, and Toronto. The Toronto team took first place by virtue of their 13-3 victory over MacMaster and their 9-7 victory over Ottawa

HOCKEY ROUNDUP-PASSI READY TO START FRIDAY

Ward Passi, who suffered a torn achilles tendon during a squash workout in September, will rejoin Varsity Blues' lineup this Friday evening when University of Windsor Lancers make their Varsity Arena debut. Passi has been working out in practice for three weeks now and was given the go-ahead last Friday by the team doctor. Ward will likely play left wing on a line with Paul Laurent and Steve Monteith. Life as a goaltender has been rough for Varsity's two incumbents — Tom Little and Adrian Watson — over the past week. Little was sent home with a suspected appendix infection last Wednesday. It turned out to be just a virus but was enough to keep Tom from making his scheduled start Friday evening against Loyola. Little returned to action at practice last night but didn't last for long. An early warmup shot caught the lanky netminder high on the cheekbone and that was it for at least another day. Fortunately, Little's face mask prevented the injury from being anything worse than a painful bone bruise. Not to be outdone, Watson managed to stop another high drive with his forehead and he too was sent to the dressing room with a nasty bruise and a sore head. Again a protective mask averted serious injury. Henry Monteith, Toronto's most distinguished shinny graduate in the past decade, with Fort Worth of the Central Pro League last season and this year up until now. At the time of recall, Henry had scored nine goals and added 15 assists in Fort Worth's 20 games to date. Coach Tom Watt is pleased with the scoring balance of his forward lines, especially in the two recent games with Guelph and Loyola. "Each of the three lines scored two goals in Guelph while the split was 2-2-1 in the Loyola game." Waterloo Warriors already look like Blues toughest opposition in the Western Division this season. Warriors have won both their starts and scored 22 goals (allowing only three) in the process. Blues and Warriors meet three times this season.

WARD PASSI

VETERANS GRADUATE

SOCCER TITLE MAY HAVE MARKED END OF ERA

Three weeks ago, Varsity soccer Blues rolled to their fifth consecutive OQAA championship in Montreal. The hard-fought fast game, played in six inches of snow and bright sunshine, may well have marked the end of an era for Blues.

It was fitting that Blues set a new high in goals scored (12) in the last game played by several of the team's standouts during the past few seasons.

Jim Lefkos played one of his best games ever as he pumped in six of Blues' tallies to win the scoring championship with a total of 24 goals on the season.

Frank Soppelsa also finished his intercollegiate career in fine fashion as did Graham Shiels and Eric Sereda. Bill Nepotiuk and Dwight Taylor are other candidates likely to join the ranks of ex-Blues.

It's hard to talk about these players as individuals (on the field that is) because they were, in the true sense of the word, a team, and while no team in the OQAA has been able to match Blues' lineups of talent over the past few years, team spirit and hustle were still the key ingredients in winning championships.

When the spirit and hustle broke down temporarily at the beginning of the 1968 season, Varsity suffered their first two losses in four years.

As in each of the past five successful seasons, it was hard to point to one individual and say that he was most responsible for making the team click. The two standouts on offense and defense — Jim Lefkos and Eric Sereda respectively — shared this year's most valuable player trophy. Each man has won the award once before at Toronto.

Bernie D'Abreau, Blues' rookie goaltender deserves honorable mention for his fine play all season as well as for taking the biggest dive of his life — he got married two weeks ago.

While it's hard to be optimistic about Blues' immediate future with such an impressive group of veterans gone, coach Ernie Glass has always liked challenges.

If Blues are to continue their almost unbelievable domination of intercollegiate soccer (they've won the championship 21 times in the last 24 years), they'll have to rely on a fairly inexperienced team. This year's rookies, who played excellently, along with a few die-hard veterans will have to carry the bulk of the load next season.

The "down and dirty" the night before and "up and at em" the next morning veterans are almost all gone. The new "milk and cookie" players are here. They'll have a tough act to follow.

Edward English: poet of peace and politics

By SUSAN PERLY

When you gaze into Edward English's eyes, it's like looking into a mirror — you see yourself and your surroundings in multiple images. When you talk to him, you feel the same way. He mirrors man and his environment with his soul.

In the name of Love Charity and Hope
Peace my brother
Peace go with you
God is here
Every living thing is God
Peace

At first reading his verse sounds almost simplistic in its language and thought — in the Love, Hope, and Charity he preaches — from Selma, Alabama (where he was born) to Los Angeles, California ("I lived there for 10 years painting, picking up stuff on the beach, making things and giving them away to my friends. I want to build a hospital for sick children on the beach, someday.")

You wonder what there is to this slightly ragged-looking black man, with his shaggy beard and baggy pants, both gray. Yet those eyes, bibbed by massive bags, tell you that there is something. Something as mystical as the thoughts behind "Nature's Creation", theme for all his verse.

His writing career began as recently as 1957. It is no mere coincidence that he had just given up marijuana and alcohol. "I found God then . . . my mind came clear, like seeing a movie on the wall. The fog lifted and I started to write . . . I realized that I was God. The Church doesn't help you to find God. It just treats you like a little child . . . you must get your head out of the clouds, come down to earth and open your eyes. You have to experience the birds and the worms crawlin' along the ground, man."

For the last 12 years, English has not eaten any meat, or worn any leather products. "Man, what that meat is doing to your body. It's killing you. It's like eating your fellow man. I don't want to fill my body with any more of that crap."

He comes to the end of his non-filter Pall Mall — and just before it dies, pulls a rumpled pack from his pocket and lights another.

I am surprised, and ask: How can you keep smoking tobacco, if you are determined to keep your body pure?

His eyes twinkle. "Why, this ain't no habit. This is a companion. An old friend."

I wondered which poets had influenced his writings. "I don't pay no attention to any of those big guys like Shakespeare. The only thing I ever read I liked was those poets from thousands of years ago. Like translations people gave me. I don't like any of those long words. You've got to stay simple — otherwise people won't understand you."

But, don't you think it's necessary to read others to learn from them?

"If you want to write poetry, you shouldn't get hung up on other poets. You become attached to them and start writing like them and lose yourself. No man, it's all inside you. It's all very simple . . . talk the way you see it. Tell the truth. And the people will understand."

What about the way literature is taught at the universities?

"When I read at Carleton, a teacher came up to me and told me that after my reading, people in his class who had no interest in writing now wanted to write. That's communication. And you must communicate."

"When I read, I give out mimeographed sheets of my work. Not all of it. If I gave them a volume, they would get attached to me. I want them to see it for themselves. To see that they are God To start asking questions."

What do you think about the current student riots?

"Why the university is the finest system of education on the face of the earth. It's just that the students can't cope with it . . . so they reject it as an alternative. They can't understand what education is about."

Once I read at a university and a professor asks me what school I get my degree at and I tell him that I didn't get past the fourth grade. Man, I learn from what is all around me. I never stop learning. I learn something every day I get up from that bed."

But, don't you think the students should have some power?

"To me student power is being able to carry out the powers of the position to which you were elected. But 90 per cent of those elected always have to refer it to some committee . . . then another one . . . I mean let's get this show on the road. Stop all this messing around with committees. Students are treated like little children with daddy protecting them . . . little children playing in the books. They get a degree and put it up on the wall, but they don't start to learn until they get out."

Well, then should the students control the university?

"No way, no way. You've gotta have a boss and an executive."

Edward English was obviously no easy man to classify. Just when you think you've got his bag, he turns it inside-out.

You know the teachers here are threatening to strike for more money. I interjected.

"Hell, what are they hollerin' about more money for. Teachers are humanitarians . . . like nurses, who care for the sick. Years ago, they practised like this. My grand mother was a schoolteacher. They used to bring her meals. That was her pay. Especially eggs. That's how she knew she was doing a good job. Lots of eggs."

But that's not the way it is, I insisted.

"Well," he chuckled, "It's like the two-year-old child. The father tells him a bedtime story and the father falls asleep and the kid has to wake him up."

Do you think the university is afraid of the taxpayer when they suppress the students?

"The taxpayers are the parents of the students. If the kids got a better education, the taxpayers would be happy to pay the money. They just see the kind of person the university produces."

What about the Democratic Convention in Chicago, when they violently suppressed the young people?

"Aw, it was all a small left-wing group that started it. And the press distorted it. An editor once told me he writes the news people want to hear. Tells 'em what they want to hear. But, he don't hear nothing himself. But if they don't read the paper, they won't see the ads and go downtown to the stores, who finance the paper . . . so the press writes about blood running down shoulders. The public loves it . . . but in Chicago there would have been no violence, if these kids hadn't started up . . . so the cops hit 'em upside head. Policemen are human beings, too. They don't know from nothing. But they got to protect people."

"Chicago — I lived there for twenty years . . . Mayor Daley — he kept law and order. I wrote him a poem, telling him to support Johnson — 'Give us this day our Daley bread' — (I envisioned a fat doughy face: perfect image)."

... all over the world is this eagle this eagle is strang he is protecting what he is carrying . . . now you know every living thing is god just say love charity and hope peace by way of us in united states.

Again the refrain Love Charity and Hope

Yet he talks about the Vietnam war . . .

"How can you criticize the war in Vietnam? Do you know the strategy involved? Even though thousands may die, do you know how many in the U.S.A. are saved? If the government ever told the people what was really happening, they would fall over dead in the street. From shock."

A lot of young people think the answer lies in coming to Canada.

"Man, those draft dodgers, they're chicken. They don't want to defend their own house. They have no right to reject anything."

He bends forward, his ridged skin taught.

"But those who say they don't want to kill. Who say the war is unjust. I can show you that 90 per cent of them are born killers."

His bag changes color again.

"No wars are right. I don't believe in war."

If you were drafted, how would you get out of it?

"Man, they know. They sense when you walk in and sit at the table and eat that meat . . . Oh, yes, Canada's smart. They force 'em to take out papers and then they're stuck. They have to build the country."

Here was a man people call him sam

some people call him uncle he was good to all of the people in the world some of people call him holy man in america . . ."

"It doesn't matter who is president. He's just the man who signs the papers. The real power is in the Senate . . . and who controls the Senate? — the South. The 37 states. You know there are two capitals in the United States of America — Philadelphia, Pennsylvania and Montgomery, Alabama . . . after the Civil War, bang bang, after everyone was tired of burning houses, they came together — a union. But America (13 states) still pays union dues to the 37. They chose Washington, D.C. as a compromise. But nobody was fooled . . . things haven't changed since the Civil War."

Do you think Wallace provided a viable threat in the election?

Edward throws back his head, laughing.

"Why he's just another noisemaker. There are five-dollar, 10-dollar, 500, 30,000-dollar noisemakers . . . like the ten cent things you buy at the store. Vroooooommmmm."

I lean forward earnestly. Maybe Wallace was priming for '72.

More laughter.

"Wallace will be in the federal penitentiary by '72. They're trying to get him for spending the taxpayers' money on private plane and things like that. When his wife was Governor, Wallace was in California spending the Alabama taxpayers' money. Practically all the Alabama businessmen have money invested in California. So, Lurleen had to fly from sick bed to pacify the folks."

"Man, do you realize how it really is in the U.S.A.?"

He looks so intensely with those glass-smooth eyes of his and you really believe that he knows things as they really are.

"All those civil rights marches. . . you know Ford Motor Co. finances all the civil rights organizations in the South. After James Meredith was shot, the Meredith Marches brought 4½ million dollars to the Chamber of Commerce of Montgomery, Alabama, and the guy who shot — a trained marksman — could have killed him — he was paid. Why, they never would have gotten all them movie stars . . . and in New York . . . selling souvenirs and all the tourists at least 5 million . . . when SNCC went militant they were cut off without a cent . . . look at the NAACP — the richest organization in the U.S.A."

"It's all based on my life," says English, "But when Wu went to tell, I shut him up. I don't want no disciples."

After I had spoken to English for a few hours, Tony Seed, who brought him here to read, asked me straight in the eyes, "Do you realize how important this man is?"

Edward English will be reading and giving out his poetry today at 2 p.m. in the St. Michael's College lounge.

Majority vote legalized abortion

By LEAH ADAM

Rosemary's baby need not be, a Hart House debate on the legalization of abortion agreed Wednesday night.

"The present policy of the government towards abortion is one of subsidized butchery," contended Bob Rae (IV UC).

Speaking in favor of legalization, Rae said that abortions occur anyway. "It would be better to have them done in a hospital instead of in some kitchen by a drunken quack using a rusty knife and spoon."

The largely female audience voted 122 to 51 in favor of legalization.

Honorary guest Judy Lamarsh, QC, agreed with Rae, saying the government has no business in the bedrooms of the country. "It is no concern of the state to limit a woman's freedom of choice," she said.

But Mary Pat Whelan (SGS) maintained that the life of a child was more important than the perceptions of the mother. It is murder to kill a fetus, since it has the genetic identity of the adult it will become.

Ted Rotenberg (I Law) said aborting a fetus was murder, and if allowed, then "all murder could be legalized as mere exercises in private morality."

He says that the "convenience" of the parents should not be the criterion in deciding on the life or death of a child.

Richard Moore (theology graduate, SMC) added that whether the fetus was a "human being" or not, it has that potential. Human life is sacred and holy, and people should be as outraged by the abortion of a fetus as they would be by the deliberate crushing of a brilliant pianist's hands.

"That is not the point," countered Rae. "There is nothing holy about having a baby. A dog or an ape can do it! The mother is more important than some unknown thing, some egg."

If the mother, he continued, in consultation with her physician finds the baby inside her "unholy, a disease in her body," then the state has no right to prevent her from aborting, safely and cleanly under the law.

2,000 got strap in '67

Education Minister William Davis this week sent letters to high school principals across the province suggesting corporal punishment should be stopped.

More than 2,000 children were strapped in Toronto public schools last year, a report to the management committee of the board of education revealed this week.

Principals who use it say students are never strapped for academic reasons, but used to deal with disruptive behavior, insolence and to reinforce the teacher's status.

The report, written by public school superintendent N.A. Sweetman, says a "more positive and dynamic" approach could be achieved through changes involving smaller classes, a more interesting and meaningful program of activity and special services such as counselling.

The number of students strapped in public schools has dropped by 1,000 in the last 10 years.

The punishment, is applied by the principal of the school using a 16-inch fabric and rubber strap on the flat of the student's extended hand.

SAC at mid-year

John Ayre's letter on this page deserves a reply, not so much for what it says, but for what it does not say about SAC.

SAC this year has attempted, on the whole, to present an alternative to the kind of university and the kind of society in which we live. The concrete examples that Mr. Ayre attacks are in fact the concrete alternatives that SAC has managed to set up.

Mr. Ayre's attack, then, should be based on the very concept of a students council presenting an alternative. Granted, he may have tried to do this in earlier articles, but the letter in isolation is misleading, and sometimes incorrect.

As alternatives, the programs Mr. Ayre attacks have been very successful.

The Free University has attracted hundreds of students despite the enormous handicap of working in the shadow of a larger university that offers a job-granting degree. F.U. has, we think successfully, gotten beyond the free school rhetoric to show that education doesn't have to be uninteresting, can be exciting.

Bettina Aptheker is a person who proposes an alternative to our society. Whether Mr. Ayre agrees or not, it won't hurt students to see another philosophy. And, incidentally, SAC has at other times paid for speakers brought in by the Edmund Burke Society as well as more moderate groups. The picture isn't as one-sided as Mr. Ayre thinks.

As for the initiative referendum—to say that Steve Langdon has tried to make this a secret is sheer ignorance. In fact, probably never before has a student council tried to go to the people as much as this year's, through open-air meetings, floating SAC meetings and the referendum system. There is no secret plot to mislead students, and a referendum procedure for those who fear such a plot.

Tent City and the Student Information Service were set up to help students get, in one case housing, in another information and aid in dealing with university red tape. To say that there is no housing problem because a few places are vacant at one time is absurd. Sure every student has a place to stay, but how much of it is substandard, too expensive, or too restrictive?

SAC has even gone so far as to get financing for its own student residence and our main criticism here is that the council has been so slow getting it started.

And what about the students who couldn't get OSAP this year? The Information Bureau attempts to help them, and organized the OSAP march. Other services are in the works.

The co-op bookstore was set up as an alternative to the university textbook store which was, simply, unresponsive to student demands. As for the discount, students are only paying off the $2,000 it cost to research and start the bookstore—otherwise it is breaking even. Students are getting a better discount than they could at the Textbook store.

As for taking stands on Biafra and Vietnam, the results have not always been inconsequential. Three hundred dollars were sent to Biafra, and the debates on other "external issues" has been interesting and educational. And why shouldn't students take stands on issues? Are they concerned human beings or not?

SAC has come down heavily for the course union approach to education, but Mr. Ayre has been deceived by the $13,000 figure. Of that, $8,000 goes for course evaluations by the unions (a service generally recognized as worthwhile), compared with $15,000 for a university-wide evaluation last year.

Other funds go to publicity for union meetings, and counter-courses in subjects not offered by the university. The History Course Union has used a SAC grant to set up a course in the philosophy of history, for example.

These are some of SAC's concrete achievements. Others not so concrete include establishing a principle of student-staff equality and openness for many university bodies, and making this principle acceptable to the majority of students.

The level of attack on SAC, then, should be whether the council should provide alternatives along with other services such as dances and concerts, or whether it goes back to a social council period.

Possibly SAC is wrong. In this case, Mr. Ayre does have a referendum procedure at his disposal. Or possibly, SAC is simply, slightly ahead of the campus in recognizing problems and working to meet them.

If so, perhaps it is the students' duty to catch up, not the council's to move backward.

LETTERS

SAC's failures

Mr. Langdon in various ad hominem attacks on me has accused me of being somewhat lacking in the concrete discussion of the issues and "achievements" of S.A.C. this year. If he has somehow failed to miss the points I have made in my numerous articles and letters published in the Globe and Mail, The Varsity, and the Strand, I will gladly oblige him with a more full treatment of my views on the "achievements" of S.A.C.

1) The S.A.C. Education Commission and the Free University of Toronto. Recently under the sponsorship of SAC, students were treated with the vituperation of one Bettina Aptheker imported from Berkeley who spent the sum total of one hour spouting the same blather against our "evil, gestapo-run, capitalist, imperialist," society that I could get any day right here on campus from Andrew Wernick. The F. U. of T. which sponsors other such delights as the Marxist, Sydney Ryerson, has shown grave signs of becoming most unfree. Why, for example, was not another American, of right wing persuasions, invited to speak at the F. U. of T. to counter Aptheker? If the Communist Party wants to sponsor her, fine, but why S.A.C.? I didn't pay my twelve hucks to allow SAC to create a "free" university that is fast becoming the vested interest of the New Left on campus, and yet paid for with everybody else's money.

2) The initiative - referendum system. What initiative - referendum system? Has S.A.C. kept it under covers? Is it afraid to actually have a referendum?

3) The Housing Program. While S.A.C. was spending $2,500 of your money on Tent City to "dramatize" the acute shortage of student housing," the Campus Co-op. had verifiable vacancies. When I checked three weeks ago I found that both the Campus Co-op. and Rochdale had vacancies.

As for S.A.C.'s pretentious pontifications to the Government and the people of Ontario on the matter of non-student housing, I can only suggest that S.A.C. was suffering from a malignant case of self-grandeur. If the members of S.A.C. were really concerned about the housing situation and the problems of the people of Ontario, there was nothing to stop them from dropping out of school and entering the real political forum to effect real change. Hell, why play games on campus?

4) The Student Information Service. This "achievement" is an expensive ($7,000) S.A.C. bureaucracy designed to combat "the bureaucratic complications of this University". If students considered this a matter of great concern, they could man the service themselves as volunteers, replacing the full-time employees, one of whom didn't have a clue about some very ordinary information that a friend and I once wanted to know.

5) The Co-operative Bookstore. Do you mean, Mr. Langdon, the one that's always losing money and must be subsidized through the S.A.C. twelve dollar taxation, meaning simply that the student who is saving ten percent on the purchase is having fifteen percent robbed from his other pocket and thereby losing five percent?

6) The debates on Biafra and Vietnam. Who in the outside world is seriously interested in S.A.C.'s pontifications on foreign affairs? Some of these views, perpetrated in the collective name of the university, are deeply resented by those students who do not agree with S.A.C. on such non-student matters, but are constrained nevertheless to listen to such judgements that seem to come from the very heavens themselves.

7) The Course Unions. On Wednesday I attended the formation meeting of the Anthropology Union. There were some 37 of us Anthropologists out of a total of an estimated 2,000 students who take Anthropology courses. The first meeting this year of the History Union, I was told by a friend who attended, drew a grand total of 14. Yet these unions get a budget of some $13,550, a lot of money for a few dozen people to play with. According to David Rogers in the Telegram Sept. 21, the Physics students on their own initiative and without the hoopla of unionism and S.A.C., were able to effect concrete changes in their program to the satisfaction of everyone involved. The real effect of the unions is to drive a wedge between students and faculty who in most cases are really the friends and allies of the students, but who are presently victimized by the paranoid slander and the slave - master fiction of the New Left.

So much for S.A.C.'s "achievements." Shall we likewise consider its failures?

John Ayre
(II VIC)

Soviet jewry

In reference to your article on the S.A.C. Debate on Soviet Jewry published Wednesday, two essential points were somehow neglected;

(1) The S.A.C. voted overwhelmingly in favour of the motion to condemn the Soviet policy toward the Jewish nationality.

(2) The S.A.C. sent a telegram to the Soviet Embassy in Ottawa, informing them of this condemnation.

We are certain that the student body will be interested in knowing that S.A.C. took this moral stand, and regret that this information was not included in the original article.

Vietnam:

A war for freedom

By BOB HOKE

Bob Hoke is a third year student in political science and economics.

Re editorial of Nov. 20 — "invisible chains".

I was amused at the profundity with which The Varsity wrote of Southeast Asian Communism, in the editorial "invisible chains". In the interest of the long disregarded ideal of "journalistic integrity", I feel that several other points deserve consideration.

The statement that, "if Communism as practiced in Southeast Asia is chains, you'd have a lot of trouble convincing the Vietnamese" must stand as one of the most inane, fatuous lines ever to appear in print.

In talks with numerous Vietnamese, and in particular with Thich Nhat Hanh, a well known "neutralist", a totally different picture is created. To these individuals, Communism stands not as a way of life, but as a way of death.

In 1954, when some 900,000 Vietnamese willingly left their homes in the North, to move to the South, they did so to escape something. It is my estimation that they were not leaving because of excessive freedom under which they had lived.

Nghe An is Ho Chi Minh's home province in North Viet Nam. When the North Vietnamese government moved to institute their land reform program in 1956, the peasants of Nghe An revolted. They were quickly and brutally suppressed by the regular army. Since that time very few dissident opinions have been tolerated.

Regarding the statement that the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong do not "fight like people in chains", I would question whether contemporary techniques of indoctrination should not be classified as "chains".

The fact that the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong do not need 500,000 Chinese troops to maintain their war effort points essentially to the tactical nature of the war which they are waging in South Viet Nam. A campaign of disruption, ambush, and terrorism does not require the same numerical force level as does the defence effort directed against it.

Again, the remark that the North Vietnamese "don't have a government so corrupt that it was overthrown" borders on the ridiculous. Our knowledge of levels of corruption within Communist states is very scant indeed. Yet these governments, just as those of Canada, or the USSR, are governments of men. Any suggestion of a somewhat mystical streak of purity in the Communist movement must deal with the reality of the Stalinist purges of the 1930's.

Furthermore, the fact that Ngo Dinh Diem's regime was overthrown, and Ho Chi Minh's was not can hardly be interpreted as empirical proof of the 'goodness' of Ho Chi Minh's government. It is perhaps more likely that Ho's system of control was more 'efficient' than Diem's.

Regarding the analogies drawn between Asian Communists and the Nazis, the fact that Mao Tse-Tung does not put forth his 'final solution' is small comfort. Might I suggest an extension of the Editor's reading list to include the speeches of Lin Piao. As the heir apparent to Chairman Mao, Lin Piao has notably commented that China could 'afford' to lose 200 or 300 million people in a nuclear war, and still emerge as the 'winner'.

In a subsequent description of Asian politics and economics, sweeping generalizations abound. Noting that the 'people' have seen capitalism as an "exploiter and have rejected it", the editor overlooks Japan — soon to be the third ranked industrial power in the world.

While the Asian peasant "has never known freedom" historically, that is no reason to deny the validity of any attempt to begin a heritage of freedom. I will be the first to agree that Diem's regime, certainly in its later years, could claim no superiority over any authoritarian regime. What now remains to be seen, is whether the first hesitant and frequently misguided steps towards "democracy" in South Viet Nam can succeed.

Surely, no one but a naive North American Marxist can believe that there are distinctive and fundamental differences between working under a "feudalistic landowner" and under the area commune.

With equal temerity the US is discarded as a "model of democracy" because the Editor claims the recent Presidential election to have been a "mockery". The US today is faced with many domestic and international problems — yet the essential democracy of the US is nowhere challenged by these problems.

The Editor also stresses the value of the opinions expressed by "the American refugees to Canada", probably the most biased group which could possibly be relied upon for any information. Refugees from all countries tend to exaggerate their grievances and supply to their listeners what they think their new hosts want to hear. This is not to suggest that injustices and problems do not exist, but hopefully the Editor should employ some kind of perspective in analyzing and presenting his opinions and facts.

All of us exhibit the remarkable ability to hear and see that which we want to, and to ignore all else. The Varsity has used this 'faculty' and refined it to a very high degree, particularly on an issue like the war in Viet Nam. It is perhaps worth noting that a campus newspaper should have the responsibility both of informing and persuading, not simply of persuading.

To inform without a point of view may well be impossible, but it is an insult to attempt to persuade without information.

A "religious" war

Dear Bob,

Sorry, but I don't think your article provides an adequate justification for the American presence in Vietnam. Barry McPeake's article against the Vietnam war (we ran it Oct. 23) is complicated enough and should have enough research to satisfy you that such an argument can be brought to bear against the war.

The editorial was short and therefore by definition simplistic. The point is that capitalism is not that much better than communism, and certainly not so much better that it is worth destroying a country to do it. The public justification for the war is just that — our system is better. To my mind, this sounds exactly like the rallying cry of the Crusades — Praise God and save the heathens from hell.

I notice you use precisely these justifications in your article, and therefore just for fun I'll try to answer on that level. But I think one can safely say the underlying reasons behind the U.S. "liberation" of South Vietnam are economic and political. I don't think the American political leaders would spend $30 billion a year to keep the Vietnamese free from Communism so much as to keep their Southeast Asian markets intact.

(We don't for example, see the U.S. going into Spain or Portugal to "free" the people from fascism. Because these countries are "friendly", they get aid instead.)

You bring up some arguments in favor of the U.S. brand of "freedom".

You mention a "neutralist", Thich Nhat Hanh, who hates and fears the Communists. The neutralist who ran in the recent "democratic" elections in South Vietnam has been jailed as a political prisoner. Wonder how he feels about it. And, incidentally, the Communists weren't allowed to run in that election.

(The people of Okinawa recently decided by vote that they didn't want U.S. troops on their island. The U.S. refused to leave for strategic reasons. The South Vietnamese people don't have a prayer.)

People leave their homes after every election. The United Empire Loyalists left in droves after the American Revolution. How does that fit into your theory?

As for the brutally repressed revolt — I hate to harp on this, but that's essentially what's been happening to, say, the Negro for 100 years, and that's what is happening to "revolts" in Chicago, San Francisco, Berkeley and the ghettos generally. I don't think the Americans have any particular virtues in this area.

You assert that these are just little bugs in the system. The system has been around for 300 years, a lot longer than the Russian, Chinese or Vietnamese Communist governments. Maybe they deserve a chance.

And, incidentally, when the founding fathers of the U.S. set up their democratic system, they tried to ensure that the aristocratic classes would continue to rule. That's why they set up the Electoral College — as a buffer against the common workers ignorance.

Your argument that the U.S. is losing because they are fighting a tactical defensive war is good. It must be especially difficult fighting this kind of war when many of your enemy are South Vietnamese. Even the U.S. admits that the Viet Cong control about two-thirds of South Vietnam. Maybe that's why the South Vietnamese government needs foreign troops to keep "popular support".

Your reference to Japan was interesting. Japan was one country which was not a victim of economic exploitation — they developed their own capitalist system. Yet Japan really has little semblance of democracy — the system is still militaristic, riddled with poverty and feudalistically structured.

(Incidentally, did you know there is a lot of anti-Americanism among Japanese students? A lot of it is over a military treaty the Japanese leaders want to sign with the U.S.

Seems the students don't like the U.S. in Vietnam either. Funny, eh?)

Finally, you mention indoctrination. Ever hear of anti-Communist propaganda in the States? Ask a student from the U.S. The ones I've talked to got plenty of indoctrination in anti-Communism.

(How about this one — the filthy Russkis chain their schoolchildren to their desks 12 hours a day. That's what one California teacher told her class.)

The whole education process in any country is one of indoctrination — how much "better" it is for us than them. And the American indoctrination must be pretty effective to make hundreds of thousands of American men submit themselves to fighting a war in a land thousands of miles away, for a system of government that can't keep its people at home happy.

This has all been an essentially liberal argument, and I'm not offering North Vietnam as my particular version of Utopia. But I'm afraid America doesn't qualify in my books either.

And even if the American Way was that Utopia — there's no guarantee that this Utopia is going to be successfully transplanted into an alien environment like South Vietnam. More likely it would be corrupted into something far worse than the "evil" the U.S. says it is trying to prevent.

INNIS COUNCIL BRIEF college as daddy rejected

By HELEN FORESTELL

Innis College has rejected completely the concept of the university having in loco parentis responsibility for its students. A brief stating the Innis College position and recommendations on discipline was approved by the Innis College Council, which includes students, faculty, and administrators, was submitted yesterday to the Presidential Advisory Committee on Disciplinary Procedures.

The brief says student offences against civil law should be dealt with in the courts of the land. The university, however, should have the authority to make rules and regulations defining and dealing with non-legal offences against the university community. The brief divides these offences into two classes: academic and social. Academic offences include infractions such as cheating and disrupting classroom order. The authority for deciding that an academic offence has been committed, and for punishing the offence,

The Americanization of Canada, with Professors Melville Watkins, Abraham Rostein, Craig Brown, Ron Blair and chairman Kenneth McNaught discussed historical and economic factors in the process of becoming "American."

Professor Ron Blair said it would not be wicked Yankees who would destroy Canada, but "wicked Canadians who cease to believe in the merits of their own society." He added that the elite of any country was most likely to go over to a culture which had a mission, believed itself superior, and controlled the country's purse.

Dr. Rostein said the major problem was that of economic domination by multinational, but U.S.-controlled corporations, which had effected what he called the second phase of the industrial revolution.

Dr. Brown noted that Americanization has tended to mean either a progressive system which has democratized Canada, or "a rapacious hold on Canada's national heritage" and "a plot, a conspiracy."

Both the meanings "obscure the question by moralistic connotations," said Brown. He noted that the Canadian government originally encouraged American investment in Canada to offset British influence, but after World War I found that Britain was as dependent on the U.S. as Canada.

said Prof. Watkins, because they are completely familiar with it. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the Canadian attitude to the United States shows a "colonial attitude," he added.

Later Prof. Watkins said "pro-Americanism is institutionalized in this country," so that Canadians cannot even criticize the U.S. without being labelled anti-American. He added the solution was not to institutionalize anti-Americanism.

Several members of the large audience commented on the extent of Americanization. Professor John Holland deplored the fact that President Bissell "has mentioned only Harvard in the last year" as a standard of academic excellence for recruiting university teachers.

Prof. J. M. Bliss, however, insisted that students would protest if they received inferior Canadian teachers instead of superior American ones.

Dr. M. R. Marrus insisted that it was "superficial" to blame the Canadian elite alone for the loss of national identity — all Canadians seemed to share this attitude.

Philip Resnik, (SGS) the only student to make a comment at the meeting, said the League must use "something more than sentimental terms," and accused all Canadians of defining themselves "in terms of an outside imperial power."

SAC prepares counter-report to "secret" administration brief

BY BRIAN JOHNSON

A devastating barrage of criticism was launched against the administration's "secret" brief outlining university plans to 1975 at last night's emergency meeting of the Students Administrative Council.

SAC representatives and prepared what was essentially a counter-report for presentation to today's open meeting of the president's council.

University commissioner Bob Rae (IV UC) opened the discussion with a general critique of the brief.

"This report is a complement of the conventional wisdom of a very small number of people in the university," said Rae.

He blasted the proposed increase in graduate enrollment and the cutback in undergraduate enrollment.

"The St. George campus is becoming the graduate complex at the U of T," said Rae. "This is a very definite trend."

"More and more graduate assistants will be teaching undergraduates, and there will be fewer senior professors with undergrad classes."

"All of these administrators see U of T as the only Valhalla in Ontario for graduates," Rae added.

"This chauvinism is pretty myopic and has a poor effect on other universities."

Rae attacked the brief's attitude to the proposed Campus Centre. The brief termed the building the "Student Centre" when in fact it was designed for both students and faculty.

Rae urged the Centre be moved to a number one priority spot, equal to or ahead of Innis College.

"The report shows a lack of imagination," Rae concluded.

SAC president Steve Langdon said: "The thing that really doesn't come across in the report is the philosophy behind it."

John Oldham (EMM) introduced a motion that also passed that "improved education in small groups will require additional finances for rooms, library and staff, and the training of staff in group leadership teaching; that the Ontario government must be prepared to meet these financial needs period."

Education commissioner Don Ross (IV Trin) introduced two successful motions.

The first called for a study of the feasibility of year-round operation of the university and trimester and credit systems.

"I don't think any brief that talks about the future of the university should ignore such a study," said Ross.

His second motion asked that undergraduates be taught by fulltime professors, and that no useful facilities be denied to any students.

The motion carried when Ross noted that more and more faculty are refusing to teach undergraduates.

SAC also agreed to ask that the university hire additional full-time staff rather than rely on the "expedient" of teaching assistants.

MEDICINE
The whole section on the faculty of medicine is inadequate," said Bob Barkwell (II Meds). "It is a very rough first approximation."

SAC accepted a Barkwell motion that the following be added to the section on medicine:

"Due to the state of flux within the faculty and due to the uncertainty about the amount of capital available for hospital and clinical needs from the Ontario Hospital Services Commission, none of the figures state on the re-

focus:

Varsity: Why did you become a biologist?

Rees: I had a highschool biology teacher who was very religious but who had a tremendously alive attitude toward what the world was all about. He could adapt his religious point of view to every advance that science made. To him, for example, the story of evolution was such a wonderful story it merely enhanced his view of the wonders of God. It strengthened his faith. And I was very impressed with him because I was going through a religious hang-up. That's why, after some years at U of T, I decided that biology was my way.

Varsity: Let's get down to it. Is man's changing of the environment having a noticeable effect on the atmosphere?

Rees: Indeed it is. In a highly industrialized society like the United States the removing of green plants in combination with the burning of carbonaceous fuels — gasoline, wood, coal — is causing far more oxygen to be consumed than the country is able to produce. Production is about 60 per cent of consumption.

Varsity: How healthy is a city?

Rees: It's particularly unhealthy. On a bad day in Toronto, for example, it's comparable to smoking three to five packs of cigarettes a day. There's no doubt that pollution is just as responsible as smoking for increased incidence of respiratory diseases. To give you an idea how important this has been in the past, in 1952 a thick smog over London killed 4,000 people who would not have died under normal circumstances; in 1956 1,000 Londoners died and 300 more died in 1962. In New York city — one of the worst in North America — poison air killed 400 in 1963.

Pollution is an accumulative thing. At low levels which aren't killing people outright, it's still accumulating in your lungs. The lungs of any city dweller are as black as the asphalt of the streets — and this is a non-smoker. The normal colour of a human lung should be a pretty pink.

The problem of environmental pollution is one of accelerating technology. Increased population is constantly confronting us with new problems. Take something like food production where, obviously, with increased numbers of people there is a feeding problem. When something like DDT or other powerful insecticides comes out it is hailed as a solution to the problem of increasing crop production.

So what we do, almost without exception, is apply tons and tons of these chemicals — some poisonous insecticides have, in a season, been applied to a crop at a rate as high as 250 pounds per acre — to a crop to be consumed by human beings. This is all well and good. But, unfortunately, the research stops here. We never pause long enough to research the possible effects this might have on our environment.

Varsity: So you shudder when the government announces programs like the complete elimination of blackflies in northern Ontario.

Rees: Something like that gives a guy like me the creeps. A classic case which is now studied the world over is the attempt to remove the spruce budworm in New Brunswick.

The Miramache river suffered an outbreak of the budworm in 1954. The area was sprayed with DDT. Pilots made no attempt to avoid streams and rivers as they sprayed. Within two days dead and dying salmon were found all along the banks of this stream. DDT was picked up by insect larvae in the water and was concentrated tremendously in their tissues. These larvae are food for fish which also concentrate DDT in their tissues. So, by the time the DDT reached fish on the food chain, it had reached a lethal level. Blindness and sterility were non-lethal results of DDT poisoning. The effect on the Miramache River was complete elimination of that year's spawn of salmon. Salmon breeds in three year cycles. Therefore, every third year we have a blank year as far as salmon catching is concerned. More spraying was done in 1957, 1960 and 1961. In many areas birds, dependent on insects for food, were virtually wiped out.

Elliott: When you wipe out all the birds in the area while trying to wipe out the insects, you wipe out the natural control on insects. So year after year you can expect plague proportions of the pest species you were trying to wipe out in the first place. The result is to need more and more deadly chemicals. It's a vicious circle. The pest species breeds rapidly and can rapidly offset the loss of many of its members; it can also develop mutant members quickly which are resistant to the pesticide.

Varsity: So leaving an outbreak of pest insects alone is often the best solution.

Elliott: Yes, but man is often not satisfied to wait two years and suffer financial loss.

Rees: A difficulty is that

many chemical industries concerned with pesticide research and sales support a vast number of first-rate scientists — particularly entomologists. In the past these men have been particularly reluctant to speak out in cautionary ways because a whole chunk of their research is supported by the industries.

Varsity: Ah ha. So the chemical industries have bought a whole chunk of the zoology field.

Rees: It's not really a question of buying them. These men are doing good work. There is probably a place for pesticides. But the problem is, once we've got pesticides, we don't go beyond that. We don't look for effects at a later stage. It's a great pity that people working for the pesticide industries are cautious in pushing this line of thought. Of course, research would mean expense and delay of products getting on the market — if they got on at all.

Varsity: Many social scientists have spoken of the dangers of over-population and over-crowding. Is man in danger of becoming a pollutant of his own environment?

Rees: Studies have shown that, although suicide is a result of loneliness, attempted suicide is a result of over-crowding in cities.

Varsity: Can you apply our knowledge of the problems of over-crowding to a country like China?

Rees: I think you can. Communism is a doctrine very suited to old China — the coastal cities — where people have been crowded for centuries. Dissent about chairman Mao's cultural revolution and so on has been confined almost entirely to outer-lying regions like Outer Mongolia, or Sinkiang, where the population density is lower.

By the way, an example of crowding and mental hygiene is reported in the latest issue of Bio-Science. In Maryland chronic mentally ill patients were taken to a summer camp. They were people who had been hospitalized between 2 and 30 years. Some remarkable changes took place: some schizophrenics spoke for the first time in five years. The first words uttered by one patient were: "This is freedom!!" Significantly, hiking and nature study became the most popular activities apart from eating. Following the camp experience, 41 of 90 camp patients were able to leave their hospitals within three months. Maryland has initiated efforts to buy more land to put their mental hospitals on.

It's difficult to say how much of an innate need average people have to make con-

Algonquin Park Algonquin Park is world-famous, one of North America's first parks. The term park connotes a lot to a lot of people: most people think of it as an unspoiled area for wilderness recreation activities. But since its inception, it has been managed under a rather twisted application of the multiple use concept. Over 90 per cent of the land area of the park is under what has been until recently permanent timber license. So that in fact most of the park is subject to logging over the years by some 23 logging companies. The controversy developing now is that this situation is going to stay under the new masterplan for the use of the park. The Department of Lands and Forests has set aside approximately 4 per cent of the park area for wilderness and virtually the rest of the park — some 94 per cent — for logging until 1979, when the plan can be renewed — which probably means that it will be renewed.

The point here is that some citizens object violently to the current plan — the Algonquin Wildland's League. They've offered an alternate plan in which roughly 1/2 to 1/3 of the park is "wilderness" — free from all exploitation, motor vehicles, etc. This would be an area left in its primitive state so that nature can take its course.

The loggers oppose the plan. They feel that 4 per cent of the park to be left to the nature lovers is too much. Varsity: Ha.

Rees: Exactly. The idea that the loggers are presenting — and you might think of it as a valid one — is that both of the activities can go on at the same time. They're only cutting two per cent of the park's surface per year. In fifty years they've cut the whole park surface. In the meantime, the trees grow back. As one spokesman for the loggers has said: "In ten, twenty, fifty years, you should have something that resembles a forest again."

Varsity: In all fairness to the loggers, can't a forest become overgrown, need a certain amount of thinning out?

Rees: Well, another argument that loggers make here is that if you let a forest mature, you will be left with what is called a forest slum. They conjure up a ghastly picture of fallen trees rotting, and so on. If this were true, it would take about 200 years for Algonquin Park to reach this stage. Another point is, when we first came to this continent, Algonquin park and other areas consisted of cathedral-like stands of forest. There were mature stands of pine up to 300 feet tall. Today, there are only about 20 pine trees in the whole park at this stage of maturity. The park area acquired these stands of trees without the benefit of modern silvicultural techniques, by the way. And it takes more than 50 years to grow them. But when we first came to this area we said, in effect, "Whoopie!" and chopped them all down. This is happening in other areas: the redwood in California is threatened and so is the Douglas Fir on our own west coast.

Elliott: We should point out that Algonquin is a provincial park. In our national parks no logging is allowed.

Rees: I'm not knocking modern silviculture. It's very efficient at producing wood. I'm just saying that some of the arguments used to defend the multiple use concept are specious.

Forty per cent of the land area of Ontario is productive forest land, and another 35 per cent is potentially so. This is about 400,000 square miles. Algonquin Park is 300 square miles in area. When we conservationists ask for 1/2 of the park for wilderness, we are asking for slightly less than one per cent of the presently productive land in Ontario.

Varsity: I find it rather depressing to think that you are speaking in terms of preserving only one per cent of the land.

Rees: This is one of the arguments we use. Lumber industries have a great deal of the Province's land under their control. The fact that they need Algonquin Park so badly seems to indicate to me that they aren't using the land they have efficiently. They're not really applying the techniques they claim they are.

If we, the second-wealthiest country in the world, can't afford to preserve this little tract of land, we are in a very bad state indeed. Five per cent of the land would be more realistic, spread out all over the place, so that all our citizens would have access to it.

tact with nature, but if they go through a four-hour drive to the cottage to spend a few days or even hours on a lake shore, there must be some need to get out.

It's characteristic of the governments in Canada and other nations that we haven't planned at all for this. There's no reason why there aren't large, good parks within fifty miles of Toronto. The Niagara escarpment from Tobermory to Queenston Heights, could have been saved. A private group is attempting to form the Bruce trail along this area. But how much better it could have been if we'd moved in in time. We've missed opportunities like this all over southern Ontario.

Elliott: The last area of Lake Ontario shoreline could have been saved only two years ago. The Ontario government, however, opted to make money and sell it to industrial development.

Varsity: Is it good for Canada to export as much raw materials as we do? Shouldn't we be saving the forests which we're cutting down to make newsprint with?

Rees: With proper silviculture techniques, which are very advanced now, Canada can continue to supply most of the world's newsprint in the foreseeable future. But what we also need is whole areas of forest set aside for other forest uses. You're probably aware of the current controversy over the use of

you've got to be three dimensional

Canadian Artists '68 at the Art Gallery of Ontario is a must—see. Despite all the bitching about the selection, it's a good sampling of works that have been in art galleries in Toronto and Montreal in the past year. If you haven't been to many lately, go see the show.

Having read about the two Englander artists who picked the show by stacking canvases up against a wall and thumbing through them, I was a bit annoyed and prepared to dislike what I saw. However, their freedom from bias looks like it paid off. Old Santbergen (Saint Berger?

Hamburger Heaven?) was pretty cool to make all that ruckus about withdrawing his canvas. If he hadn't, it would have gone unnoticed among the dozens of really good works.

If I had to pick a highpoint of the exhibit, it would be the Intersystems (i.e. Michael Hayden) entries. They consist of cubes of acrylic filled with fluorescent dye in an organic solvent. Under black light they glow warmly. They are excellently arranged and some of the few pieces that would look comfortable in someone's home.

Walking around all the paintings, I was impressed by the futility of working on two-dimensional surfaces these days (also by the fact that my feet hurt). Practically every canvas was growing out in some direction from its rectangular form, and several came forward at you with tentacles and bas-relief. It looks like painters are gingerly reaching out to bridge the gap between painting and sculpture.

As far as the sculpture was concerned, much of it was disappointing. Giant toys cluttered up the foyer floor and Les Levine contributed a disaster or two. Except for the Hayden pieces mentioned, the sculpture left me with a feeling of dissatisfaction and my old question of "What, is that all there is to it?"

Two pieces deserve special mention. Roger Vilder's "Pulsation No. 5" is a bank of about a hundred interlocking blue cogs with a yellow dot painted on each at the rim. These yellow dots create a beautiful and rather humorous effect of continually-crossing lines.

Johannes Aarden has painted a groin called "Mrs. Aarden". It's so stylistically rendered that I can't decide whether the woman has an incredible tuft of black beaver or a petrified mass of molasses poon for a cork.

I think you should ignore all the ranting of the critics (except this one) and go see a worthwhile show.

gotta see dizzy at the colonial

Thad Jones, the wonderful player of the cornet and flugelhorn, recently told Down Beat that Dizzy Gillespie was the most underrated musician in jazz.

Eh? Because, explained Jones, Diz still has not been universally acknowledged as the greatest.

There is no doubt that many people feel complacent about Gillespie. Even your diligent reporter has tended to take him for granted. After all, he has been around for so long, and he has been a fairly regular visitor to Toronto the past two or three years, and he never really changes. Even the jokes he tells are always the same.

What's more, the first time the reporter saw the current edition of Gillespie's band a couple of years ago, he was ready to scoff in company with the man who now writes about T.V. for a Toronto daily (isn't it nice that he has finally found his true metier?) What a crummy band, they all said. A clumsy, overheated drummer. A wind-up cocktail piano player. Ugh.

They were all wrong. Diz proved it the other night at the Colonial. He knows how to pick his musicians. On each visit to Toronto, the pianist and drummer have given evidence of improvement. The rhythm section (as we call it in the trade) is now very solid and very strong — just what Gillespie needs.

There have been times when Dizzy himself has sounded uninvolved, slipshod, even dull. But on Tues., Dec. 3, 1968, he was soaring heavenward, leaving the drossy old earth behind.

(At this point, the reporter stops and asks himself what else he can say, really. When Diz plays trumpet the way he did on the aforementioned evening, one is simply left speechless. Nevertheless, the reporter decides to make a few general comments.)

Although he has been a professional jazz musician for 30 years, Gillespie is still absolutely on top of everything that is happening today. Not that he adapts his style to current trends. One can't even believe that he has evolved. It's just that Gillespie has always been capable of conceiving and executing musical ideas on a purely musical level — he is not confined to any one school or bag, but simply functions as a great musician. His music is in no danger of aging and his inventive powers show no signs of diminishing.

James Moody is the only musician I (no longer "the reporter" — it's a bit coy, Don't you think, Norman?) can think of who can share the same stand with Diz. In fact, when he plays with the sublime passion that he was possessed by the other night, he threatens to overwhelm Gillespie himself. Like Dizzy, Moody is aware of all the jazz music that has been created; yet, although he has, for instance, absorbed everything that Coltrane did, his sense of identity is so secure that there is no chance of it being obscured by the power of Coltrane's music. Moody may use for his own purposes.

Although he is the master of the flute and two saxophones, Moody makes his strongest music on the tenor saxophone. His ability to spontaneously create intricate patterns is amazing on all the instruments, but on the tenor, the sound itself creates a terrific sense of urgency and excitement. His range on the instrument extends from honking low notes to shrieking, breathtaking highs. His emotional range is just as great.

At the end of one long solo that had everyone sitting on the edge of their chairs, Moody stopped and shouted, "Hey, Diz!" Then he ran across the stage, writhing, screeching and growling on his horn in a parody of the "new-thingers". But the funny thing is that the frantic sounds fitted into the development of his solo, which had reached such an emotional peak that there wasn't any place else to go. Abruptly he stopped, the solo was complete. Yet one wanted to hear more — of the "new music" even.

James Moody is a great musician.

If the band continues to play at this level for the rest of the week, it will surely shake up a lot of jaded jazz fans, who may have to make a radical reassessment of Dizzy Gillespie. He and Moody are playing so well that I recommend that anyone who likes music (never mind if you don't dig jazz) go down and hear them!

Inadmissible Evidence Sustained.

If you do not like Inadmissible Evidence it is because the film deals with the weaknesses and frailties which you recognize as dwelling within your person, and which, with the proper stimuli, may severally emerge.

Lawyer Bill Maitland is one of those unfortunates whose every defect and flaw descends simultaneously; he becomes a host-body for the self-fear, indecision and asininity which is generally released into our bloodstreams in measured amounts, and which we mask or suppress according to our abilities. But Maitland's spiritual edifice has begun to crumble, and the carefully-built grotesque, adultery piled on nominal fatherhood, overlaid with fear and callousness, picks up momentum and refuses to stop or become lodged half-way down.

Maitland has no control over the chaos; he watches with full realization that there are no extenuating circumstances, that there is no tragic flaw. He is faced with the very thing he feared: his own mediocrity.

A dream-like sequence shows Maitland in a Black Maria, in cells, and then, being arraigned in court. The lawyer himself in court, himself charged: it is a rich image, but the concept to 'plead' suffices. Maitland would like to explain, cajole, ask forgiveness, but there is no one left around him: he has been abandoned. It seems instinctive — the social pariah must be withdrawn from, treated in manner like to one infected with disease; he can be rejoined only when he has cured himself. But Maitland has not the strength to cure himself, and he seeks an easy way out, rendering a public plea for punishment.

Maitland does not have a Thomas Beckett on his conscience, and the very tawdry and common quality of his offence hurts. He drowns in reminiscence and hope, by which he would blot out the present mess and postpone decisions. (These flashbacks and cuts are as well executed as any I have seen; for once they belong, and are even necessary to the film.)

The problems with his wife and children he has always had, but now the secretary, his regular crumpet, leaves, and his mistress Liz (well portrayed by Jill Bennett) has no effect on him. Those who understand him he rejects; those who are alien, who would do nothing but hurt him, he carries. He is hurt by the disapprobation of the least of people, and his wounds are out of proportion to the blows. Finally, his clients desert him, and the last person left, Joy, the tele-phonist, finds no pleasure in his embrace.

Nicol Williamson plays Maitland superbly-classically-you might say; his forehead is creased by parallel, wavy lines, his body animated by small, defensive gestures. The role is extremely demanding, for Williamson is in virtually every scene, the camera searching his face for expression and emotion. The excellence has been bought with much practice, as Williamson played the lead in the original stage version in both London and New York. The film's director, Anthony Page, was also director of the play, and several other actors are cast in the part they originally had on stage. The secondary role of Joy, the telephonist with the strategically located zipper, is played by Gillian Hills, one of the two aspiring models balled by David Hemmings on a mass of lavender paper in Antonini's Blow-Up.

Inadmissible Evidence is not a film 'version' of the play; John Osborne's screenplay makes it a film in its own right. The conservative dimensions which theatre imposes, however, seem to have created an opportunity for craftsmanship far removed from the purveyance of those who see film as the medium of extravagance, and who find room for none but the most expansive gestures.

interview with an author

Margaret Laurence recently came somewhat obliquely into the news when her novel A Jest of God, winner of Canada's Governor-General's Award for 1967, was "discovered" and filmed by Paul Newman as Rachel Rachel. Producer-director Newman was deservedly praised for this, his first effort behind the cameras, while the movie itself received sympathetic but, somehow reserved praise. In Life, Richard Schickel, while admitting the film rang "with gentle irony and rueful truth" finally decided it was "too true to be good". The New Yorker's Penelope Gilliat was similarly confounded, although "the picture contains a kind of sense and gentleness that strike me, a foreigner, as true to something deep-running in Americans."

Last winter, before the release of Rachel Rachel, I took a train from London's Marylebone Station to Penn, Buckinghamshire to have lunch with Margaret Laurence, who had agreed to an interview (Although I don't know where you're going to get it published, she smiled). On the train out I passed through miles of gently rolling countryside, canals and telephone towers rising through a low mist which hovered over ponds and small lakes. Matted tufts of grass and green fields and it seemed a long way from Neepawa, Manitoba where she was born, a long way from Somaliland and Ghana where she has lived. When I got to Penn I followed her minute instructions, up the dirt road, past Anderson's Garage, turn to your left, and there was the small cottage, dotting a Heathcliffian 3/4 acres, surrounded by gnarled trees and fresh air.

'Call me Margaret,' she said, thrusting a sherry into my shaking hand, and we sat down to talk. She looked like a charming mother of two, which she is, very kind and engaging, and she wonderfully put me at ease. The conversation rambled on over a delicious casserole and white wine:

Q: It is possible to describe anything other than what you feel and make it true?

ML: Well, I'm certainly not the characters I'm describing. I never knew anyone like Hagar (The heroine of The Stone Angel). Yes, you can get inside people, but perhaps only one at a time. I write every day and I find it very difficult to get inside the character but once inside I find it impossible to get out until I've finished the work.

Q: This is why The Stone Angel and A Jest of God are both written in the first person present?

ML: Yes, to get inside the characters.

Q: Doesn't this tend to get a bit claustrophobic?

ML: Yes, it can. And I think, perhaps, I've done as much as I can with this strict point of view. The novel I'm working on now is both from the inside and the outside. But you can only explain what is true of the individual. You can no longer assume this lordly objective viewpoint and say what every character is feeling, simply because you don't know what every character is feeling.

But there are many books being written in the first person present and I think it is inevitable for the times in which we are living.

Q: Do you think the novel is going back to the myth as Northrop Frye says?

ML: Yes, I think it is. For a long time I couldn't see any future for the novel because once you've expressed yourself in wholly ironic terms where is there to go? I mean, you can describe what is true for you and say something that is true for everyone.

But if you've said what is true for you in realistic terms, then one way to get outside the individual, without employing this lordly objective viewpoint, is through myth, that is, metaphorically.

Q: How about through movies? Did you ever think of doing the screenplay for the movie?

ML: No, I wouldn't have done it if I had been asked

Have you considered this Leadership Profession?

The qualities of leadership show up in men who have chosen Chartered Accountancy as their profession, since those who are resourceful, have a keen analytical sense, enjoy meeting and working with people and can stand strong on their convictions, are the business leaders of to-day. As a Chartered Accountant you may apply your talents in a public accounting practice, in industry, education, or government. Each avenue provides rich rewards for the diligent, for the Chartered Accountant is a key-man in to-day's business and financial world.

Among the many firms of Chartered Accountants who employ CA students are those participating in this advertisement. These firms and others are interviewing on your campus. The names of most local CA firms are listed in your yellow pages under the heading, Accountants — Public.

Have you ever wondered what the phrase "Up Against The Wall, Mother-Fucker" really meant?

Did you find it surprising that Chancellor Solandt told Steve Langdon a dirty joke during the latter's inquiry into how the university uses the grants from the department of defecation?

Did your parents ever tell you to get lost on a Sunday afternoon and you always wondered what the heck they were doing upstairs that was so damned important?

According to Siggy Freud, in the primal horde, there existed, a violent and jealous father at the head, who kept all the females for himself and drove away the growling sons. One day, the sons, took it upon themselves to kill the father and eat him. By doing this, they were partaking of his seemingly magical powers.

However, the killing and eating produced a terrible fit of indigestion, mainly because the sons realized afterwards how much they really loved the father. From then on, whenever they thought of him, they were possessed of a terrible guilt which they could never completely assuage. So they built a giant shrine or totem to the father and sacrificed animals and other humans to the idol so that the spirit of the father would live on.

So? This ceremony has been passed down through the ages and relives itself in the modern Oedipal conflict. And it is more than likely that its unresolved manifestations exist in institutions that imitate the family, one of these being the university.

You find that hard to believe? Let the evidence present itself. George F. Kennan, in his famous "tsk, tsk" essay, "Rebels Without a Program", chided the university students of today for "screaming, throwing stones, breaking windows". His ideal of the university is a quote from Woodrow Wilson, "a place removed-calm Science seated there, recluse, ascetic, like a nun . . ."

Like a nun, eh? Very interesting. Pure, virginal, untouched, but threatened by the biggies. It has long been a theory, and quite a valid one that most socialistic and anti-authoritarian movements are simply acting out mother-rescue fantasies. Pryn Hopkins, a psychoanalyst, and a post Freudian researcher into social movements went as far as to claim unequivocally, "Socialistic appeal takes root in tender feelings toward the mother, the first woman and the first love object in every man's life." If you are a devout Marxist, saying that, "the family deprives the worker of revolutionary consciousness", you can dismiss this, throwing the family on the scrapheap of bourgeois exploitative institutions.

But if you're playing the Erich Fromm game of Freud-Marx leapfrog, then you start to wonder which came first, the Marxist chicken or the Freudian egg (or is it the other way around?)

Let us look at the University of ours and see if any of this applies. The students are desirous of something and the administration will not let them at it. This "thing" will be discussed later in a breathtaking brilliant juxtaposition of Marcuse, Norman O. Brown, Erich Fromm and other thinkers. But for now we shall investigate the father-son conflict.

First let us get out of the way the ambiguity of who's getting screwed by whom. The big businesses screw the university and the government. The government screws the university. The university administration screws the staff and students. The staff screw the students. And everybody screws the workers. The young student, arriving on the scene has a veritable phethora of mother-ravage symbols to choose from. But this presents a dilemma. Who the heck are you gonna take for ma and who the heck for pa, when they're so busy changing roles?

This sets up what is known in the Branislaw Chrtieu school of psychotherapy as the "Queen of Hearts" syndrome. Dr. Chrtieu, from early childhood was obsessed by the figure of the queen of hearts in Alice in Wonderland, who was, at times, a raving, imposing, authoritarian father figure scaring little Branislaw. But at other times she was kind and smiling, fat and warm, the true primal mother. Branislaw, in true analyst style, transferred this hangup to his patients, thereby relieving the tension.

Today's university radical seems to have, for the present at least, worked this out. For better or for worse, he attacks the administration, probably finding in this institution the embodiment of all that is evil in all the others. This is a fairly reasonable choice, the administration standing in the middle of the screwing order. In this way the student can implicitly condemn the businesses and the government by attacking the administrator's complicity with them. At the same time, he can exercise the proper ambivalence towards the staff (the true queen of hearts) and reinforce his identification with the worker, who, of course is the natural loving but totally earthy and primal father that the student so much admires and hopes to emulate. The administration-proletariat duality is the manifestation of the "split" primal father image that accounts for the student's ingrained feeling of original sin

ma, pa, and the kids: student power

(If the above paragraph is at first confusing, read it over, then rub it with a penny to make it clear.)

Now, as all good fathers are wont to do, (being jealous of their son's love of the mother and their possessiveness of her), the administration attempts to castrate the student, having already made eunuchs of the teaching staff. This is done in many subtle ways.

The most devious and most effective of these is called "co-optation", the enfolding of the student rhetoric and dogma into the administration's own backyard, there to perform the nasty deed, the student all the while never realizing what is happening to him. This is, in effect what the president does when, in his President's Report for 1966-67, he lumps the dissidents into two groups, the "activists" and the "saboteurs".

This does two things. It legitimizes the "activists", claiming that they are good for the university, subtly depriving this group of all revolutionary consciousness. It also delegitimizes the "saboteurs", claiming that they are out to harm the university. This, of course sets loose the hordes of castrated "activists" upon the "saboteurs", hopefully wiping them out or incorporating them into the "activists". This is very effective since the student body, being very dimwitted, never questions his idea of "what is 'good' for the university".

ree stages of development at erogenous zones of the which starts with the infant sucking at the breast of the mother. Those who had an ungratified sucking period are always asking for something, pleading and insisting. They need to receive gratification by way of the mouth changes into the desire to give orally. They must always communicate orally to others. Those who were deprived of the biting stage of infantile oral pleasure turn to more violent exhortations. They talk, scream, plead, to achieve this pleasure.

The next stage is the anal stage, in which the infant discovers the erogenous sensations in the anal canal and revels in them. He regards his faeces as little creations of his own. He may play with them, or give them in exchange for love, or assert independence over people with them (this is essentially the property bit), or he may use them as weapons of aggression. If however, the child is deprived of these pleasures catastrophically, then non-bodily objects like property, take on the symbolism of the faeces. The adult exhibits such traits as cleanliness, orderliness and reliability.

Indeed, one analyst goes so far as to say, "Persons with an anal character are very sensitive to an encroachment on what they regard as their field of power, taking the questionings and prongs as an unheard of interference with their way of life. They cling obstinately to their way of doing things, and they expect compliance from others"

You probably think that you have the answer to the whole thing, eh? It's the anals vs the orals? Well, it's not quite that easy, not quite. It's tempting though, especially in light of the fact that student radicals seem to fit into the oral character very well.

And of course, we've already discussed the anal character of the administration and all the other hogey-men, holding true to that famous line from Horace, "The truly upright individual is always constipated."

A true understanding of what's happening requires a transcendence of Freud's psychological determinism and of Marx's economic determinism. Besides, it's real cool in intellectual circles nowadays to transcend them. What we have between students and administration is not so much a clash of oedipal surrogates as a clash of ideologies, whose roots are buried deeply in psycho-sexual tradition, and whose realizations are taken by the more naive of use (those being grad students, and other conservative elements on campus) to be simply the jealous son rebelling against the overbearing father.

We live in a post-sexual era. That is, no longer can we talk about sexual repression as a factor in the neuroses of the mass psyche (if, indeed, we deem the mass psyche a valid idea). Sex has been co-opted too. Suburban couples swap mates as before but no longer feel guilty about it (John Updike was, of course, ten years behind the times). So what we have now is the era of role-playing.

The hippies started it. They questioned the traditional roles of man and woman in our technological society. They had the gall to suggest that the concept of the male is so completely bound up in the authoritarian-capitalistic system, that a whole new idea of "what it means to be a man" had to be devised.

We have come to an age when we question exactly what it is that makes us feel like men or feel like women. And from that, we go on to the question, "What am I doing now that is not making me feel like a man or a woman?" In the university, which is ideally the place of cultural revolution, this questioning, this total abnegation of authoritarianism is what's busting. Wilhelm Reich states that "repression does not necessarily imply the existence of culture . . . and the lack of repression just means the threatening of patriarchal domination" In other words, the old maxims of "discipline begets the leader", or "self-control not birth control" are not, as we have been told, means of propogating and disseminating knowledge and culture. They are only means of keeping the administration and the student body in their respective places so as to bolster the illusion.

Erich Hoffer, that old anti-intellectual and rabid doubter of mass movements, assures us that revolution is a by-product of change. He asserts that "To say that revolution is the cause of change is like saying that juvenile delinquency is the cause of the change from boyhood to manhood." Actually he is absolutely right. The revolution is against the rapid technological advances that are threatening our civilization with dehumanization. Hoffer never asks why there is discontent. He is locked in the prison of Freudian determinism, never acknowledging that there may be a conflict of ideologies.

Hoffer looks with distrust at millennial cults who promise an answer to the world's problems. Let him take comfort with the present day movement afoot in the universities, an anti-movement which really has no demagogic leaders nor any dogmatic plan of action. Daniel Cohn Bendit writes of the Paris student uprising "When I'd gone up to the top of the boulevard, I saw that the students were beginning to tear up the paving-stones . . . But nobody had given the order to put up the barricades. Quite simply, as soon as a few students had begun to build one, everybody realized that it was the best way to occupy a place peacefully."

It is the manifestation of Marcuse's "Great Refusal", a "to hell with everything" movement at its lowest point; but at its highest point a style rather than a dogma a way of changing rather than a set solution. This is what gets everybody uptight. When they say, "but you have nothing to put in its place, they are only refusing to identify with property (remember Mailer) that is completely alien to their own, which they are incapable of co-opting.

The hippie is a dying breed only because his life style has been incorporated in the political struggle now going on in the centres of higher education. It is a style that rejoins the body and the mind and conquers the death in life by making one the father of one's self. Maybe they won't have to kill and eat the administrators. Maybe they can find the father in themselves not have to build a temple to the "great administrator" in the middle of the front campus. Alka Seltzer will go out of business without all the indigested fathers.

And all the mothers can come down off the wall.

Student Revolt, by Gerald McGuigan (ed.), Methuen.
French Revolution 1968, by Seale and McConville, Penguin Books and Heinemann.

Student Protest, a spectacular package of garbage assembled by McGuigan is not worth reading; French Revolution 1968, a journalistic Penguin Special is. The contrast between these two recently published books reveals some paradoxes about radicalism in Canada.

For instance, the colourful journalism of Seale and McConville (they were on assignment this May in Paris for the "London Observer"), has more analytical content than all the phenomenology, personalism, and free-school philosophizing that a Student Protest can offer. In both books, the self-conscious analysis (mercifully little in French Revolution, unfortunately the total content of Student Protest) is very bad. In the book on the May Revolution the bourgeois reformism of the authors conflicts with the interpretation that the events they witnessed must have forced on them. They talk of isolated reforms in the aftermath of a Revolution that they argue was destroyed by the Communist Party and the French Ruling Class.

The description of the situation in Paris says more about Canadian universities than the analysis of student radicalism perpetrated by Canadians in McGuigan's offering. The book is filled with arguments about residence regulations, student jobs, the problems of an "affluent" campus in a slum area of a big city. The book also contains gobbledygook about alienation, anti-consciousness, and sensitivity training.

Imagine, a book by Canadians about Canadian phenomena that does not mention Canada at all. Analyses with no economic or social content to them whatever — and therefore no concreteness.

French Revolution is a colourful, insightful (up to a point) and relevant book. It's all there: sexual revolution; endless ideological debates among a factionalized Left; Cohn-Bendit making hay out of gerontocracy; the General Strike which the students ignited; students and workers in the streets; the utopian vision of every revolutionary; debates about faculty-student parity in decision-making; attacks on course content; workers occupying factories. A trip? But it happened. Anyway, read it, ignoring the "conclusions" the journalists drew from the events. The conclusions the journalists should have drawn are not the "necessity for reforms", but the need to restructure and unify the Left in France, and the need to throw out Communist Party and American social science nonsense about the possibility of a "peaceful transition" of neo-capitalism to some higher stage.

About the McGuigan book more must be said. There are thirteen essays in the compilation, most of them written by liberals masquerading as radicals (oh the moral agonizing over peaceful vs. armed resistance, over organizational forms).

Two essays are by real life activists in Canada, Hardial Baines, and Jim Harding. But I've read better stuff by Harding than the action-freak essay written here. Baines' "Necessity for Change" is OK as far as it goes — the usual stuff about cultural oppression, the necessity to emancipate ourselves from an oppressive socialization process and so on. But his argument is strange for a self-styled "Marxist Leninist who follows the thought of Chairman Mao" in that it has no economic or social content.

Hardial is the head (and chief guru) of a neo-Marxist sect called the Internationalists, operating in Canada under the rather bland and certainly optimistic title of the Canadian Student Movement (no connection with the TSM). They operate under the delusion that monopoly-capitalism has no internal economic contradictions, so that they operate at the super-structural level; that is by attacking capitalism's epiphenomenon: what Baines called recently "corporate sensate culture" I think he means the "fetishism of commodities", but it's hard to say. Anyway his concept of praxis is that of a personal struggle for individual liberation from an oppressive culture. He does not see the labour process as central, nor does he understand that the "new politics" of a student movement is precisely the process of finding out through self-conscious action how to change the world.

What is depressing is that this is yet another book compiled by a mystified and mystifying well-intentioned reactionary who is not engaged in the struggles he pretends to explain. Hence it is worthless — but profitable. And the token Marxist piece selected for publication is both untypical and fatuous.

Even more depressing is the absolute lack of concreteness. Is the book talking about real students in Canada in 1968?

Maybe Canadian student radicals have written nothing about Canada anyway, so that any selection is bound to be a selection of scraps. Even so, better selections could have been made — and will be, doubtless, next summer when some of us have time on our hands.

Oh, when will Canadians discover that they are people who can not only write, but make their own history?

RAPE OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA, Colin Chapman, Longmans Paperback

HANOI by Mary McCarthy, Longmans

These two books are pure journalism and must be evaluated as such. Each takes a current "world crisis" and exploits it much as a documentary film might.

Chapman's book follows the format of the "hard news story" in a newspaper, giving an account of the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia. McCarthy writes "feature" copy, a series of impressions from her trip to North Vietnam last spring.

Their books develop into polemics against aggression. For Chapman, the villain is Russia and for McCarthy it is the United States.

Yet the immediacy of the events under analysis is such that the authors fail to put them in context. The shortcoming is that of any instant history, a lack of perspective. Its consequence is to oversimplify the issues in the interest of vividness and emotional impact.

This could be excused if Chapman were content to simply sketch the excitement the shallowness of the thinking.

As a result, his sense of outrage at Russian tactics is somewhat robbed of its force. A really telling indictment of the invasion would require a much clearer evaluation of its causes. Nonetheless, as a record of its effects, Chapman's book reads like a good detective story, and loses little of its impact because we already know the ending.

Mary McCarthy likewise focuses on the effects of conflict rather than its causes.

Yet her purpose is not simply to penetrate the masses of rhetoric surrounding the war in order to elicit a basic human reaction. She writes about her purpose in writing Hanoi. "Americans need reassurance in their opposition to Johnson's Vietnam policy, while Vietnamese don't".

The fact that a vast number of Americans do not find themselves in opposition to the war in the first place provides a further clue to the book's purpose.

Mary McCarthy is addressing herself to the already converted.

Her book has relevance as the statement of a peace activist confronted by the reality of a nation her country is destroying. If her view of Hanoi is a rosy one — "there are no prostitutes . . . no ragged children with sores" — such faults as she does find are consequences of the war.

"If we had not been bombing his country, Mr. Van might be a free, or at least a freer, spirit . . . Until the Americans go home, translation of American books probably will be arrested at the point of Mark Twain and Jack London".

The recurring theme is that evil is an American import, not a native Vietnamese product.

Perhaps she exaggerates her point, but most of the audience to which the book is addressed will not think so.

For she isn't really trying to convert people to opposing the war, or even to a human sympathy for the agony of a country devastated by it. She provides fuel for those already convinced that the war must be ended. And in the sections reflecting on her reasons for the trip, she illuminates some of the problems facing the liberal moderate in a country where quiet dissent is gradually being drowned out by the roar from both left and right.

Like Chapman's book on Czechoslovakia, like all instant histories, it will become dated quickly. That is a cynical way of saying that its appearance is "timely".

Will FIVE Sunday Afternoons at the Theatre for $4.00 spoil you? Probably

Consider the inflationary prices that students pay for entertainment. A film for you and your whatever could run to $4.50 for admission alone, not to mention the added expense of a drink and a bite to eat after the show. Entertainment for two in Toronto can easily run to $10.*

Theatre Toronto comes to the rescue of those students who desire good entertainment at a sensible price. This season, Theatre Toronto offers FIVE plays for $4 providing you can see fit to attend the Sunday Matinee Performance (2 P.M.) at the Royal Alexandra Theatre. Your seats are reserved but on a first come basis. Therefore to insure yourself of the best sections at the Royal Alexandra, it would be wise to order now.

THE PLAYS or WHAT $4 CAN STILL BUY IN 1968

This season Clifford Williams, Theatre Toronto's Artistic Director has chosen a fine roster of plays for your edification and enjoyment. The fifteen week season opens with Christopher Marlowe's "Edward II" on January 9th. Following "Edward" the company will present in Good King Charles' Golden Days, a "historical" comedy by George Bernard Shaw. The contemporary drama "The Plebeians Rehearse The Uprising" by the German novelist playwright Gunter Grass is next, followed by Carlo Goldoni's Commedia Dell'Arte classic "The Servant of Two Masters". The final play for the season has yet to be divined from a grant pile still resting on Mr. Williams' desk.

HOW TO ORDER

Forward your cheque for $4 with a self addressed stamped envelope, plus the Student Series Order Form found below to Theatre Toronto, 11 Trinity Square, Toronto 1. Each play runs for three weeks, you therefore have a choice of three Sunday matinees you may attend. Please indicate which Sunday you will attend throughout the season in the boxes marked "1st 2nd, or 3rd" provided at the lower left of the Order Form. Leave the rest to us and we'll make every effort to spoil you with excellent reasonably priced professional theatre. *Cost estimate for entertainment for two in Toronto based on a film for two at "popular prices" one drink each (beer) and a hamburger and chips each plus 4 TTC Subway tokens.

"What we wanted was to create for Ireland a theatre with a base of realism and an apex of heauty." — Lady Gregory.

Tomas MacAnna, artistic director of the Abbey Theatre which Lady Gregory co-founded in 1899, came wonderfully close to constructing this kind of dramatic triangle in his direction of W. B. Yeats' Death of Cuchulin at the Studio Theatre this week.

That MacAnna was able to do so confirms the admiration left in his wake; the production faced obstacles as insurmountable as the waves with which Cuchulin struggled after accidentally killing his son. Imported for the occasion by the Irish Theatre Society as part of their seminar on "Theatre and Nationalism in Twentieth-Century Ireland", MacAnna had only a week of rehearsals with a production staff and cast composed of students and professionals from the Graduate Centre of Drama.

In that time they worked out some weird and wonderful performances. Richard Murrell's Cuchulin was rather more inspiring as a vision of heroic stature when he had something to do with his voice and face than when he was posing Prince Valiantly over his shield. His stiffness set in relief a series of wailing, wild-eyed women from Cuchulin's past: Irene Horgan; Maureen Fox, who had many different ways of saying "Kill you!"; and Kevin McGarrigle, whose performance of her own choreography built the show to an exquisitely tense peak. Best performance of all was Graham Whitehead as a blind man who smiled, stroked his knife and sliced off the hero's head for twelvepence.

Another possible play-destroyer was of MacAnna's own making — his sound-light show recounting the history of the Abbey Theatre. It reminded me of the New York World's Fair, where one stood through ten minutes of childish voices babbling "By thy waters gently flowing, Illinois, Illinois" before one could go gawk at Walt Disney's Lincoln robot. The Abbey history ended with Sean O'Casey's message of encouragement after the original theatre burned in 1951: "A new Abbey for a new age — that's our job now." Mr. MacAnna has been with the company since 1947, and I would have liked to know what the new Abbey has been doing in the past 17 years of the new age.

But boredom with the sponsor's plug vanished as soon as the strange ritual of the Death of Cuchulin began. Filled with Celtic in-group allusions to the amorous and military exploits of Ireland's most imposing legend, An Old Man (Michael Fletcher) whose dreaming opened and closed the play warned the audience that they "must know the old epics and Mr. Yeats' plays about them" if they would understand this "last of a series of plays which has for theme — life and death."

With such topics of general concern, the information gap was bridged by a ritual built on the juxtaposition of violent contrasts in character, music, verse pattern and stage business. The "realistic" song of the Harlot (Angela Fusco) to the effect "that the flesh my flesh has gripped I both adore and love" was as stylized as the "beautiful" dance by Miss McGarrigle which it followed. The ritual of love and loathing is ruined by translation through a type-writer, for, as one character in the play commented, "When there are no words there's less to spoil."

faulted promise

In Alexei Arbusov's The Promise death is constantly present. The movement is from a life close to physical death in the Second World War to a life which is spiritual and mental death itself — with a sudden "death-bed" revival conversion in love at the end. But Arbusov has abandoned any parallel between private and universal grief. The characters occasionally cry out sentiments like "How can you play the fool! There's so much grief, children dying next door, but you . . ." But these cries ring hollow. The outside world is never a forceful factor. Despite the irritatingly artificial bangs and flashes through the window, the war in the first act is not a link with external realities but the very force which grows the three young people together in isolation from these realities in a drab little room on a bombed street in Leningrad.

The Promise traces the effect of time on the ideals, ambitions, and relationships of two men and a woman. That's an eternally fertile theme. But it means that all dramatic weight is thrown on developing characterization of the three people. And it is here that The Promise fails.

It is a failure embedded in the very conception of the play. It appears on the surface to be a perfect play for university students to perform and watch — a Soviet play about three teenagers thrown together and consolidating their relationship during the violence of a war and (thirteen years later) striving with their own private romantic wings to escape the rut of bourgeoisdom into which Russia imperceptibly slipped since the war. While all this seems strong stuff, it rapidly becomes apparent that this is the sentimental document of an aging man. The development of the characters is seen from his distant viewpoint. Despite a valiant attempt by Lorna Wilson as a sixteen-year-old Lika, the first act remains embarrassingly nostalgic and unreal — in a sense even slightly dishonest. Consequently Arbusov loses the only chance to establish the dramatic and living reality of the three characters.

And the play's centre is hollow. For all her humanistic, medical generosity (perhaps because of it) Lika is dramatically almost a non-personality. Maybe this is intentional. Maybe initiative is given not to the characters but to the situation and environment in which they find themselves. The decision to Tom Paine was kicked out of just about every country when he was alive: England, the U.S., maybe even France. Now he's been kicked out of Rochdale College! The man who wrote "The Rights of Man", was again written off on a matter of royalty rights.

It turns out that the Theatre Passe Muraille at Rochdale (That's Theatre Without Walls) received the rights for the British Commonwealth from an agent in London. Everything looked just Pietzche kool. But William Door of New York objected in the strongest way waving a court injunction at them. They protested that they were only going to put it on for their mothers and fathers in the basement of Rochdale. But Door continues to jamb the works. The Rochdale people are trying to get in touch with the author of the play, Paul Foster and if he gives the big okay, then it might have been performed last night (we go to press Wed. night). They've been working on the play for almost two months.

Ellen Rosenberg went to see "The Fantastiks" on Tuesday night at the Colonnade. "The Fantasticks is fun," she said, "And that's all that really matters."

"As long as a musical comedy is light, anything is forgivable. Despite it's many inconsistencies, it is still enjoyable."

The director failed to utilize his theatre-in-the-round while at the same time making effective use of at least five different levels of the stage. Davia Kertzer, the mute, held the production together, managing exactly the facial expression of a wall when needed. Jeff Cohen, as Matt, however, looked the part but couldn't act or sing. Wait a minute, he wasn't really that bad, just inconsistent. Both fathers were good, yet Jack Newman played his role like an actor playing an actor."

At this point Ellen became incomprehensible and left.

Mike Kesterton was drilled full of laughter at "Dentantics" Wednesday night. It continues till the weekend.

Daffydil is next week.

Jesus, a new play by Hans

Tolle, at Trinity, has a lot of power, partly because (whether it was intentional or not) the actors were extremely natural and colloquial, acting from the gut, giving us a new dimension on a religious spectacle.

This was in complete contrast to The Death of Cuchulain, in which Richard Murreph, the star, says he had to remove every bit of naturalness for his performance and draw everything from without instead of emoting from within.

Jesus is a pop parable of the age old passion play: Cuchulain is a seread and barren spectacle of words and music. Both left this reviewer completely and utterly confused, which must mean that they were effective.

locate their development within the one small room is a successful one since the symbol of the room (familiar to all Pinter fans) is clearly integrated into the text and action. The room, in fact, more than the characters, makes visually clear the tension between development and stagnation, promise and unfulfillment, which is at the very heart of the play. The choice, however, if it is deliberate, is made at the expense of the characters.

The final doubt about the play is that it seems to end just when the dramatic and human interest really begins. I don't wish to dictate what the playwright should have written, but to have the play finish with Lika quickly swapping one husband for a man she has seen only once in thirteen years is to make naive and glib her final assertion that "everything's going to be all right . . . the sixties . . . I believe in them. They will bring happiness."

I respect the way in which the Alumnae Drama Society team treated the play. Content to fit themselves to the words, the actors rarely rang false. They never injected much excitement into the play but their caution was probably wise. Any degree of over-stimulus would merely have laid bare the shallowness of the text. There were some beautiful moments: the opening scene, the waltz between Lika and Ularat, the moment of Lika's choice. Lorna Wilson might try to give a bit more life and charm to Lika in the second act. John Astington makes Leonidek as uncomfortably credible as possible, but could have shown more determination throughout all of the last scene — he has already made up his mind to leave before the scene starts. Bob Thompson has more going for him as Ularat and uses all the advantages the dramatist has given him.

One suggestion to the director: Arbusov's idea of indicating the passage of time by fragmenting the play into short scenes separated by a blackout is so clumsy that any blackout larger than a two-second freeze is useless and mood destroying.

Don't be a fun dropout

"Who, me?"

Yes, you. On problem days can you honestly say you've never asked for a gym excuse? Or given a feeble answer when the gang decided to go horseback riding or swimming on the spur of the moment?

If your answer is definitely no, never—you probably already use Tampax tampons—the world's most widely used internal sanitary protection. If you have to admit that yes, sometimes you've dropped out of the fun—here's your answer.

Tampax tampons were developed by a doctor over 30 years ago for the benefit of all women, married or single. There are no pins, pads or belts with Tampax tampons. When properly in place, you can't even feel them. No odor or chafing, either. And both the Tampax tampon and its container-applicator are easily disposable. They just flush away.

In short, nothing can force you to drop out of the fun unless you really want to. Unless you just may have another date!

Tampax tampons are available in three absorbencies: Regular, Super and Junior—wherever such products are sold.

don't feel that you can just switch to another like that. Because it is a totally different medium. Visual rather than linguistic terms. Not that I don't see things in visual terms but . . .

Q: Are movies going to obliterate the novel?
ML: No, I don't agree with Leslie Fiedler that the novel is dead. Films, theatre, novels—I like to think that there's room for us all. Movies are important but there are things which just can't be filmed. Things which—for instance, Othello was much better without close-ups, it was much better when you couldn't see details of make-up. And there is a whole way someone carries himself on stage and there are gestures which can't be filmed.

Q: How are they going to film A Jest of God in the first person present?

ML: I don't know. That's one of the problems and I'd be very interested to see how they resolve it.

Q: Do you know how they're filming it?

ML: Well, it's not exactly a cast of thousands. I think they're trying to convey how it feels to be Rachel which is essentially what the book was trying to do.

Q: Who are the important writers now?

ML: Well, in the United States: Styron, Baldwin, Bellows, perhaps Joseph Heller, Malamud . . . England: Graham Greene, Angus Wilson, Golding, John Fowles. Patrick White in Australia . . . Africa: Chinua Achebe and Wole Soyinka . . . and Canada: Richler, Callaghan, Ethel Wilson and then Gabrielle Roy, David Lewis Stein, Cohen, Marie Claire Blaise . . . Dave Godfrey is doing an interesting archtypal development of Canada . . .

Q: Norman Mailer in the States?

ML: No, not Mailer. I wish he were, because he's got a great deal of talent and he's destroying it.

Q: What kind of performance can the author achieve?

ML: The novelist can speak of what is important to his generation and to a few younger and a few older people but not to everyone for all time. You can speak to a few people for a limited amount of time. I don't think that even the very great authors would deny this. No, I don't think that anyone who is honest with himself can believe in any absolute importance for himself. Even the very good novelist—I think Graham Greene is one—can only hope to last for a little while longer.

Q: How about censorship?

ML: There shouldn't be any censorship. Not in literature and not in the movies. This is just because it doesn't work. For instance, someone wrote a piece saying that de Sade should be censored after the murders of the moors. I don't agree. I don't think that it affects one to the point that he'll commit a murder. But everyone is his own censor. For instance, I went to see Joe Orton's Entertaining Mr. Sloane and I had to leave after the first act. It was not only cruel but I got the feeling that the author felt very cruelly about his characters. There was something so depressing in such cruelty.

Q: And swinging London?

ML: I think it's great, I'm all for it . . . yes, it's certainly the centre in that the kids are experimental . . . when you walk along King's road and you see all these kids in their fantastic colours—it's great . . . sure, I'd love to see my daughters in miniskirts . . .

Here, look at this she said as we finished the meal. And she showed me what her daughters had done with their playground. It was a psychedelic wreckroom after Apple. She smiled and thought it was great. And I left her as the kids were coming home from school. I walked down the road and waited for the bus to the station. And there the kids were coming home from school, the English schoolboys in their red caps and raincoats, and the English schoolgirls with their matching legs and their lilly cheeks.

FILM CANADA

In the last seventy years, cinema has developed through the artist's imagination and the inventor's technology, but it is only within the last decade that widespread recognition of film as art has grown. Despite this recognition, universities have sadly neglected the aesthetics and techniques of the cinema. On this campus, however, there are many who are attempting to organize some means of studying film, and are struggling to overcome the lack of experience, resources and money.

Last year, students formed the Centennial Film Board for the instruction in and production of film on campus. Professionals in the various fields were invited to give lectures, and workshop groups were formed to apply the lessons on 8 mm film. Throughout the lectures, it became obvious that practical film techniques could not be taught in a classroom situation. It is necessary in teaching the use of a camera, to use an editing room. All this requires vast sums of money, so that the CFB was forced to discontinue their film course this year.

At the same time, several staff members became interested in developing courses on the nature of film aesthetics. Gino Matteo, a professor at St. Mike's, had a course recognized as an option for fourth year English students called "Film and Literature".

After opening discussions of Jung, Freud, Frye, and McLuhan, the class is analysing literature and literature on film in order to discover the distinctive natures of film and literature. The class will later examine the basic aesthetics of film and its characteristics as mass media. Incorporated in the course are approaches to various philosophical problems in film expression, production of an 8mm film and work on an ETV program with which Prof. Matteo is linked.

In the Division of Extension, Joe Medjuck and Clive Denton are giving a course called "The Cinema from Griffith to Godard". An historical analysis of film aesthetics is covered by film showings and discussions of its major styles and technical characteristics. Although class participation is unusually restrained and inhibited, the contradictions and disagreements of lecturers Medjuck and Denton prevent their views from being too didactic or definitive.

A similar course with French films is offered by the French departments of St. Mike's and UC under the instigation of Father Fink. A film is shown twice a week and then discussed and analysed for the next two weeks. It is intended to show film as a genre separate from literature, and films are examined with attention towards their cinematic attributes.

There are many other cinema seminars, and film is incorporated into various courses. Prof. Morgan, of UC's English department, is studying film theory with readings from Eisenstein, Kracauer and others. Students in Architecture are viewing and analysing films, while scripts and films are embodied in various literature courses.

Father Fink "would like to see each language department set up courses in film for their particular language". These various courses could be gathered under a separate film department and a degree course in cinema would be formed. A prerequisite to the establishment of such a department would be the presence of "instructors with degrees in film so that they would be acceptable to the university".

Prof. Matteo would also like to see the creation of a degree course in film "which placed stress on the technical aspect". This requires a complete studio, with processing labs, editing rooms and recording studios (similar to the set up at the University of Southern California), so that the student can thoroughly acquaint himself with every aspect of film. This needs money. Most community colleges are supplied with some film equipment, and, like many high schools, also have a good deal of video tape television equipment. It is rather sad then, that the University of Toronto has no audio-visual equipment for student use.

At present, only unofficial, experimental courses are available. Most of the "instructors" are relatively inexperienced in teaching film and are approaching it with great care. They are aware and even frightened that film may be ruined by poor teaching methods, the way Joe Medjuck claims "Shakespeare and Eliot have been ruined for many students by English departments". Medjuck further points out that "film is usually taught by English teachers who teach film as they teach literature, and miss the whole point of the motion picture".

Prof. Matteo questions the morality of teaching film aesthetics at all. He is afraid that "we will ruin this thing we have" and lose the natural spontaneity and feeling we receive in viewing film by analyzing, defining and ultimately fossilizing it, substituting for uninhibited instinct a pseudo-intellectuality.

This is basically the opinion held by Paul Evitts, active in film at Rochdale. He is wary of any university course in film and approaches film "education" much more loosely. At the present time, he is examining scripts and script-writing with a group of film devotees which will eventually turn to film production. Evitts hopes to see Rochdale established as "a focal centre for the making and distribution of films" through the purchase of film equipment and the Canadian Film-makers Distribution Centre housed at Rochdale. Until the more sophisticated equipment is acquired, "many are working in 8mm while a major Rochdale project, "The Assassination Generation" is gradually nearing completion". There is also a lot of activity in Rochdale outside of Evitts' group, producing a film environment "not for those who are 'interested' but for those who are 'committed'".

Evitts feels that the only way to thoroughly learn film is to go out and make one. The various techniques will be gradually assimilated in a much more thorough and conscious manner. All the aesthetics discussed, analysed and defined in other courses will be naturally digested and apprehended as people make and view their own films.

There is a great deal of activity and curiosity concerning film in a university that has failed to formally recognize the cinema as an art, a branch of the humanities. This activity is continually frustrated and inhibited by the abysmal lack of facilities and funds, making it practically impossible for a film-maker to give adequate expression to his ideas. There is no access to any complicated, expensive equipment so that only the crudest, most unadaptable apparatus is available at gross prices. Despite these discouraging hindrances, the ambition and determination of so many film aspirants, no matter what their ideas and attitudes towards film education, necessarily portends a dramatic change in the present plight of the cinema art.

a reply to steve langdon

Steve Langdon's review of The Dissenting Academy raises the perennially contentious issue of the desirability and possibility of a value-free social science. It seems that radical students in the social sciences inevitably regard the value-free position as some sort of intellectual cop-out, a kind of sinister intellectual cloak masking support of the status quo, a subtle means of robbing the social sciences of any impetus they might provide for the cause of radical social change. Having once agreed with this diagnosis of the nature and functions of the value-free position, it is now my opinion that this diagnosis is fundamentally misleading and based upon a superficial analysis both of the logic of scientific inquiry and of the nature of contemporary social science.

First of all, what is the value-free position? Essentially, it is the belief that a social scientist must never allow his normative prescriptions to distort his causal or factual analysis; he must never substitute his preference for what "ought to be" for what a given situation actually is. That is, he must avoid bias in describing and reporting empirical facts.

The value-free position does not imply that a social scientist has no right to state his value preferences, to make recommendations, to state the value or policy implications of his findings.

He has every right — in my opinion he has an obligation — to make such value judgments; but the value-free position insists that in making these judgments the social scientist must make clear what he is doing: he is no longer reporting factual findings or engaging in causal analysis but making judgments of value. Factual reporting and moralizing must be kept distinctly separate in the social sciences, just as factual reportage and editorializing should be kept clearly separate in good journalism; the scientist's personal value commitments must not be passed on to the unsuspecting public disguised as scientific fact.

The value-free position, as set out above, does not, as some seem to imply, deny the following facts: (1) Every social scientist, as a human being and a social actor, has certain personal values, attitudes, and biases. (2) The subject-matter of the various social sciences is human conduct which is itself a process in which valued ends are pursued by consciously striving actors. Both the ends of action and the means chosen in pursuit of these ends are subject to evaluation by the actor. Values, then, are inherent in the subject-matter of social science. (3) Social scientists will be influenced by their personal values in choosing a particular problem for investigation. (4) Social scientists will make meta-sociological value judgments in choosing the "best" methods of studying their particular problem and the "best" ways of conceptualizing it.

(5) The scientist's values enter in even in the determination of what constitutes "the facts" in any given case. (6) Once the results of inquiry are compiled, the social scientist will interpret them in the light of his personal values and will likely wish to make recommendations or state value implications.

Ironically, those who, like Mr. Langdon, attack the value-free position in social science are actually missing the mark. The value-free position is not the target because, as we have seen, it is simply concerned with unbiased study of factual situations, and the facts are neither radical nor reactionary. A value-free factual study can lend itself to various ethical and political interpretations depending upon the type of value context within which it is set. The fact that so many Vietnamese babies have been fried by American napalm can be grounds either for rejoicing or for utter outrage depending upon the value position of the person who is exposed to the fact; the determination of which response will be forthcoming is not in the value-free report but in the person who responds to it. Value-free social science can be used for either

Thus, the target is not value-free study but how such research is used. The problem is not that our social scientists are value-free, but that many of them are not and the value judgments which they make and disguise as fact are value judgments with which we, as radicals, disagree. Much of modern social science is supportive of the liberal, capitalist status quo because implicit value judgments enter social analysis as unquestioned assumptions and are passed off as immutable facts of life. We should attack these studies for departing from the value-free ideal and for smuggling in establishment value assumptions.

Where establishment social scientists do produce value-free inquiries our target should not be their value-free position, but the value conclusions which they base upon their inquiries. In other words, it is perfectly legitimate for us to criticize social scientists for not choosing the right problems for inquiry, for neglecting certain areas of research, for using inadequate methods of inquiry, for being biased and passing off their value preferences as fact, or for making value judgements with which we happen to disagree. It is not legitimate, however, to criticize them for adopting a value-free approach — nor is it necessary.

Steve Langdon is simply wrong when he states that, "A belief in amoral consideration of problems is in fact a form of conformity to the current status quo." Conformity to the status quo is more often expressed by a refusal to conduct value-free inquiries into certain aspects or consequences of this status quo — a refusal to look under a few rocks, so to speak — or by passing off research and theory based upon implicit and disguised value assumptions as value-free inquiries.

It needs to be said that just as establishment social scientists often violate the value-free imperative of scientific inquiry by basing their studies upon implicit value assumptions supportive of the corporate liberal status quo, so also is there an increasing danger that value-free inquiry — in my opinion still the best hope both for the advancement of social science and for its contribution to social justice — will be sacrificed upon the pyre of radical commitment to social change by those who are more interested in transforming the social sciences, not to mention the universities in general, into cathedrals of ideological devotion than they are in the pursuit of free and rational inquiry and discussion.

"Amoral consideration of problems" can, as I have pointed out, be a powerful impetus to radical social change and those who are interested in such change (and I certainly include myself in their number), if we are at all confident in the ethical legitimacy of our positions, should be calling for more, not less, value-free social analysis as a means of demythologizing and exposing the status quo for what it is. If our cause is just, what do we have to fear from the facts?

I attended the Dentanics rehearsal Thursday night and discovered a spritely, vivacious, energetic revue that has the U.C. Follies beaten to a fraz.

A lot of hard work has gone into the production and it's a very creditable achievement.

Anyway, it's an unassuming revue that a capacity audience will enjoy tonight and tomorrow evenings, reminding me of the old wheeze: Dents teeth are like stars, they come out every night.

• Campus anti-war activists want the Students Administrative Council to hold a referendum on recruiting by companies supplying war material for American use in Vietnam.

They say SAC has "side-stepped" the question and hope to collect a petition of more than 2,000 names by next week to force a referendum under the new initiative referendum system.

• Fifteen national song and dance groups descend on the Ryerson Theatre again tonight for the International

The week culminates Saturday night with the International Ball at Casa Loma. It starts at 9 p.m., costs $4 a couple, features two bands, food and dancing. All are welcome to both events.

• Twenty women who have joined the F U of T womens' liberation course are doing research into matters such as how the woman's role was created, what effect our society has on the sexes, and evaluation of how the woman (and also the man) relates as an individual in a human, rather than a technological society.

Representatives of the group recently attended a conference in Chicago last weekend, and will discuss it at next week's meeting Monday at 8 p.m. at 44 St. George.

"Tentative plans are for a national womens' conference with other chapters from across Canada sometime in February," says Julie Wierzbicki, a Lakehead University graduate.

Spend a lousy summer in the city doing nothing? — yes, I know. Just odds and ends. No decent hours. And the pay — peanuts. You and 72,999 others here in Toronto. Sounds a bit weird doesn't it? But the press tells us there were 73,000 unemployed students in Toronto this summer.

The U of T Placement Service helped out many of the 865 students who registered between the months of January and August, 862 were placed. On other campuses, such as Ryerson, things were tougher — only 119 out of 226 were placed. Metro agencies reported high placing figures, but somehow some of us weren't among the lucky ones.

To begin with, government jobs were unusually scarce. Following the austerity program, the Civil Service drastically cut its summer employee quota.

One branch which did have a considerable number of students was the Income Tax Bureau. (Death and Taxes for three co-eds from U of T, Western, and MacMaster respectively, was filling returned forms. For $50.00 a week.

Kathy, a Waterloo honors maths student should have been set for the summer. She was an experienced computer operator for a job which pays about $80 a week. All she could do was register with a temporary agency. Luckily, she found a three-month job. But thanks to the agency's rules her take-home pay never amounted to more than $60.

Last summer at Expo, Donna and Sue were earning in the neighborhood of $100 a few real bopes of finding a insult to the Law School," said Law Society president Howard Swartz.

The brief suggests the Law faculty enrolment be increased from 450 to 675. "Our building is designed for only 450," protested Swartz, "and our Law Library is rated eighth in Canada."

"This report was prepared by a very small group of people," he added, "and no attempt was made to discuss the problem in the faculty. This report was made in a vacuum."

SAC speaker George Murray (II LAW) predicted, "The Law School will lose its role as number one in Canada in two years without expanded facilities."

ARTS AND SCIENCE

Michael Ignatieff (IV Trin) a member of the Allen sub-committee, introduced a successful motion from the gallery: "that the faculty of arts and science set aside funds for interdisciplinary and specialist courses for both generalist and specialist students."

Not realizing that this was easier said than done, he paid a visit to all the local newspapers and magazines. Now he is scratching away at local teas and board meetings for a small-town paper earning $65 a week, maybe.

The problem with university graduates is their superiority complex. They usually really leads to the front door.

But with a little bit of foresight and a lot of patience, the BA will pay off. A simple clerical job can blossom into a supervisory position. So if you want to be part of the business world, which as Miss Eleoff says, is fascinating, prime up your attitude and bone up on a skill or two.

It seems that the back road really leads to the front door.

"Time must be given for the staff, the students and faculty to work out all the problems connected with the new curriculum and only after this has been done, should detailed capital requests be put forward. Moreover, given the fact that the faculty must deal with both the department of university affairs and the OHSC for capital funds, it would be desirable if a much closer liaison could be arranged between these two departments."

ENGINEERING

Engineering rep George Richardson was highly critical of this section. He said it sounded "like a publicity release."

SAC adopted his motion calling for an expansion of the engineer's education to include a total approach to the role of the engineer in society and his relation to the humanities.

They also asked for consideration of the trimester system and some mention in the brief of plans for undergraduate expansion.

These magic words close rather than open doors. According to Miss Eleoff, Drake can place these people. Maybe not as easily as a Grade 12 commercial student. But considering the here and now facts, the commercial student has more to offer.

Engineering and SAC withdrawal

By AGI LUKACS

"I'm talking about the one thing near and dear to every engineer's heart—MONEY", intoned Andy Weiner, a graduate chemical engineering student, at a Convocation Hall forum Wednesday afternoon.

The forum was to precede yesterday's referendum on SAC membership, which was postponed after the executive's mass resignation Tuesday.

Weiner steered the Con Hall forum toward discussing financial re-organization of SAC instead of withdrawal from it. He suggested "direct control" of the students council by engineers, who would contribute to SAC's budget bimonthly or monthly, if they approved of SAC projects.

"Certain essential services" would be covered by an automatic grant over longer periods, he said. "Engineers have no interest in social issues. SAC has involved itself in" he continued, citing aid to draft-dodgers as an example of "non-essential services."

"If we don't like the Varsity's editorial policy we can tighten the purse strings," he suggested.

SAC President Steve Langdon said that students who disapprove of a SAC action can use an initiative referendum to control the move.

He advocated "a strong central student council, to handle the things that unite students, as well as strong local councils" such as the Engineering Society.

"If you weaken the central student union," he said "you weaken ability to act on housing, parking, food services, student aid, and a campus centre".

The 125 engineers in Con Hall sounded their impatience for the Centre.

"On the balance, membership in SAC is a good thing" said Art McIlwain (III APSC), until Tuesday Treasurer of the Engineering Society and last year a SAC rep. "I disapprove of aid to dodgers too," he said, "but SAC withdrawal is cutting your own throat.

"Engineers of the future can't afford this isolationism; they will have close liaison with the 'soft sciences' like sociology. SAC has this idea of creative diversity," he said.

"Participation is the word today," he continued, and engineers need a central body like SAC to make presentation of their ideas, and get action on them.

A student in the audience agreed: "There's no difference between a federate and a union system because you can never have totally representative reps".

David Fournier (IV APSC) commented during question period, that "SAC's moral decisions may not influence my personal opinions, but it does affect my actions—SAC doesn't list discriminatory housing, and could have prevented some companies from campus recruitment". He told The Varsity afterwards he would vote to stay in SAC, however, because there are too many common problems to separate over differences.

Shades of the last Liberal government (before Pierre, that is).

You remember the crisis in the House of Commons last year when the government was defeated on a financial bill, and the opposition wanted them to resign?

Well something similar happened in the Engineering Society. Wednesday the entire Engineering Society Executive said it was resigning.

The resignations were over a motion concerning financial procedures, which the officers considered a vote of non-confidence.

At last night's meeting of the Society, the motion was reworded so that it was acceptable to the Executive; ergo there was no reason to resign.

Secretary Mike Sefton (II APSC) said the resignations had not actually been handed in.

At the same meeting the Society voted to postpone the SAC withdrawal referendum until after the new year.

To all and sundry, a very happy, if confused, new year.

What did you learn in school today

By BARRY KADE

I received a failing mark on a French explication de texte, this week and tried to discuss the matter with my professor. This is the result:

"Don't you think that form and content must be related to each other?" I asked.

"Pas du tout," he replied.

"I think Northrop Frye would disagree with you," I said.

"Northrop Frye? He's only concerned with myths and things."

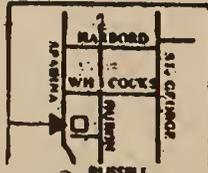

"Don't you think that writers write in a tradition and are influenced by their environment?" I asked.

"Pas du tout," he replied.

The professor said the explication was trash, and that I was naive, that I had no right to make generalizations about the Romantic tradition because of my lack of experience.

However he didn't want to leave me with my below-the-line mark, so I could write another explication according to his outline.

McGill PoliSci students gain demands

Montreal (CUP) — The 10-day strike of McGill political science students ended at 2 p.m. Thursday after the faculty virtually capitulated to student demands in the third round of negotiations Wednesday.

While some 300 students observed proceedings on closed circuit television, department chairman J. R. Mallory announced the faculty was prepared to allow two student seats on the key appointments committee. All committee decisions will be sent back to the department council, a body with one-third student representation.

The faculty will leave selection of the student representatives to the Political Science Association, the union of political science students at McGill.

Arnold August, head of the PSA negotiating team, said the faculty statement represented "A clear PSA victory". He said faculty had been forced to acknowledge the right of students to make meaningful decisions, and to determine the intellectual competence of those who teach them.

Pitman: Hall-Dennis is revolutionary

By ART MOSES

"An educational system which emphasizes exams marks and competitive evaluation is a massive con job," declared Walter Pitman, (NDP, Peterborough), a former high school teacher and university administrator, who is now education critic for the New Democratic Party. He was addressing a meeting of the campus NDP Club yesterday.

According to Pitman, who is also president of the Ontario - Education Association the Hall Dennis Report is a revolutionary document in relation to the existing system. It recognizes that education must be an individual experience, permitting the maximum freedom of choice, that one can't beat kids into learning under the threat of corporal punishment, and that competition over exams and marks is irrelevant to the aims of education.

"In this respect," he said, "it is a radical report, for it challenges the very kind of society which today's conservatives and reactionaries wish to maintain."

Pitman described today's society as one in which competition is the dominant ethic, one which demands programmed, trained supporters of the status quo to run it, one which stresses discipline over individuality.

"This is why implementation of Hall-Dennis could go a long way to changing the kind of society we live in — by challenging it in the schools".

Pitman dealt with the irrelevance of evaluation and marks which the educational system now stresses.

"Eighty-five per cent doesn't mean a thing. But

But the cafeteria in the new Meds Building probably deserves a star or two as on-campus eating spots go. Comments on the food are mostly favorable: "Good". "It's great", "Better than New College", "I haven't eaten here, but the tea's good". "Ordinary sort of tasteless kind of pie". (One might note that the pies and pastries are temporarily coming from New College.)

Yesterday's menu had some interesting offerings — like stuffed green peppers — 65¢, baby beef liver and bacon — 75¢, and club steak — 85¢. The daily special at $1.50 was roast veal and dressing (prime ribs of beef today, gang).

You enter from Queen's Park Crescent through doors that look like they should be a shipping entrance. On the second floor, you follow the signs through barren and brilliant white halls with mustard-colored doors inhospiably closed to right and left.

But don't stop shading your eyes when you reach the source of the subdued bustle and clatter of dishes and silverware. There are dark hardwood floors (of vinyl) but the walls are still white and the ceilings about as dull as a ceiling can get.

But then, if you've only got a few minutes to spare for lunch who needs atmosphere?

Then, again, people make up for a lot too. And there are some friendly people. Like Mr. Gordica. "Tell them he's looking for a raise," he rumbled. "If he don't get it, he quit". Laughing, he continued with enthusiasm. "He buy all fresh meat from Canada Packers. Whole sides. Cut up here. Everything made here. Business improving every day."

Mr. Gordica worked at Osgoode Hall for ten years. "Yeah, I tell you I know 12,000 lawyers. They got nice kitchen there — lovely." His main objections to the meds kitchen is that there is no electric saw and the meat must be cut by hand.

If you're lucky (or Varsity), you may even get a guided tour through the kitchens. But have dark glasses ready because, compounded by the chrome fixtures, the glare's even worse than outside.

Mr. McFeeter (formerly of the U.C. snack bar) explains that everything is sterilized. He was a bit doubtful about having a picture taken of the monster soup vats because they hadn't been washed yet and might look dirty in the pic.

Not all the equipment has been installed yet, but the walk-in refrigerator and freezer are well stocked with all sorts of vegetables and enormous chunks of raw meat.

MR. GORDICA photos by LIZ WILLOCK people are obsessed with numbers and statistics in education. Parents are worried that they will no longer know what number their little Johnny achieved in school if Hall - Dennis becomes a reality."

On the chances for implementing these progressive educational concepts, Pitman was optimistic.

"In the few public schools in Metro Toronto where kids are exposed to the individual oriented approach to education, these students are entering high school and driving their principals mad, refusing to accept unquestioningly the authoritarian nature of their new environment."

Is Pitman overly optimistic about the chances for revolutionary change in Ontario's educational system? The fact that Walter Pitman is having great difficulty persuading the O.E.A. (of which he is president) to admit students to its governing bodies indicates that meaningful participation in the school system is a long way off.

A funny thing happened in the Peruvian jungle

Some years ago, an adventurous individual from The Coca-Cola Company pushed his way a hundred and fifty miles into the jungle outside Lima, Peru. His mission, for promotional purposes, was to introduce Coca-Cola to the primitive Indians.

Deep in the bush, he flushed a likely-looking woman, and, through his interpreter, explained his errand, whereupon the woman reached into a sack she was carrying and neatly plucked forth a bottle of Coke, and offered him a swig. Strange to think that, even in the depths of the Peruvian jungle, things go better with the taste of Coke.

Both Coca-Cola and Coke are registered trademarks which identify only the product of Coca-Cola Ltd.

St. Mary's editor suspended for obscenity

HALIFAX, N.S. — (Special) Two students were suspended from St. Mary's University Tuesday as a result of "grossly offensive material" appearing in this week's edition of the campus newspaper.

Editor Reid Barry and writer Bob Cotie plan to appeal the action which came as a result of a satirical column entitled Mother Tucker in last week's edition of the St. Mary's Journal.

In the column an anonymous student asks for advice from Mother Tucker about how to get his girl friend back after embarrassing her at a dance. Mother Tucker's reply is also printed.

Concerned U of T students who wish to learn the precise nature of the alleged obscenity may do so at The Varsity office, where the controversial issue of the Journal is available.

Lancers, who joined the loop at the beginning of this season have already been given the "glad to have you with us" bit by Waterloo Warriors and Western Mustangs. Tonight, they make their debut in Varsity Arena when they meet Varsity Blues at 8 p.m.

Windsor played their first two games on the road and did not find the hospitality of league members overly warm — at least on the ice. Waterloo crushed them 9-0 in their first start while Western came out on top 5-4 in London.

And, since any club finds it difficult to steal two points from Blues in the Bloor Street arena, the prospect of Lancers accomplishing such a feat is rather unlikely. This is their only trip to Toronto (Blues play them twice in Windsor) so Coach Barry McPherson and his charges will probably be happy just to get the game out of the way.

The Blue and Gold have 11 lettermen returning from last year's lineup which finished with a 6-6-0 record. Windsor came fourth in the Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association league last season.

Winger Bill Wright leads the list of forwards on McPherson's 1968-69 roster. A second team OIAA all-star last year, Wright was the team's leading scorer and most valuable player.

Lancers' top line consists of Jim McDonald at centre, Brian Collins at right wing and Hugh Carroll on the left side. Hank Brand and Neil Donnelly are scheduled to be the starting defense combination.

In goal, Don Bruner will be Windsor's man in the soup.

Don't be surprised if he has to handle something to the order of 60-70 shots this evening.

In Blues' camp, fluke injuries and a razzle-dazzle power play are the most noteworthy events. Defencemen Dave Field will miss tonight's tilt because of a sprained ankle suffered when he slipped and fell into the boards at Wednesday's practice.

Steve Monteith was out for five stitches in the mouth when he was accidentally clipped by a highstick in last night's workout. Fortunately the damage was minor (although he may have trouble smiling for a couple of days) and Steve will not miss his regular shift in the Windsor game.

Varsity fans will be treated to coach Tom Watt's new-look Russian style power play during tonight's game. In the setup, Watt will use his regular forward lines and normal defensive alignments when Blues are enjoying a man advantage. However, on each line, the wingers will change sides i.e. the left winger will move to the right side and vice versa.

Similarly the two defencemen will play their wrong position. Watt hopes to get more mobility and better puck control with this alignment.

NOTES... Tom Little will start in goal for Blues tonight. This will be Tom's first league start since he faced McGill Redmen in 1967. Little missed last Friday's assignment because of the flu... Engineering Society officials tell us that there is a 99% chance that the LGMB will be in attendance for tonight's game. They weren't there last week and this sportsie for one missed the color they always contribute to home contests... John Wright, Paul Laurent, Steve Monteith, Bob McClelland and John Gordon are tied for team's scoring lead. Each has two points. Look for these stats to improve this evening.

Ball Blues head south

By JIM MORRISON

For basketball Blues, that annual exercise in masochism known as American seasoning began with a flourish last weekend. On Sunday, the team was treated to a 116-42 ritual stoning at the hands of Gannon College Erie, Pennsylvania; on Monday, however, Buffalo State forgot their rocks and relieved Blues by only 88 points to 63.

This weekend it's more of the same. John McManus's charges return this afternoon to Buffalo for a game with the U of B, and then travel to Youngstown, Ohio to tango with Youngstown University on Saturday. The latter team, it should be mentioned, has already defeated Gannon College once this season.

Blues were never in the game against Gannon. With a starting five that included three 6'8" forwards, Gannon outshot, outran and outmuscled Varsity in a full-court press. "We were lucky to get even 42 points", said Coach McManus. "I think our boys were psyched out watching Gannon lose to Galvin Murphy (and Niagara) 100-96 on Friday night."

Bruce Dempster, who was high man for Varsity in both games, sparked a fine second-half drive against Buffalo State. State managed only a three point edge during the final twenty minutes, after building up a 22 point edge by intermission.

The team still has ample time to get ready for the League opener on January 15. Forward Mark Slater and guard Larry Trafford are returning to form after a season with football Blues, and Varsity editor Paul MacRae grinned and tried to bear it as Taiké Oike editor Peter Renyi took over production of today's paper. Screaming "libel and slander" the Engineering staff bodily removed the disgruntled Varsity staffers, who tramped off into the night to write essays. "I'm assuming full responsibility for this," Renyi called out the door. "You'd better," countered MacRae, shaking his fist.

What's the meaning of this ?

By BRIAN LEATHAM, II ELECTRICAL

The Engineering Society will soon hold a referendum on the subject of SAC.

The results of the referendum will not matter so much as the implications of the act of holding such a referendum. Does this indicate that the engineers and perhaps by extension the other professional faculties wish to withdraw from the community in which they have existed and turn their attention inward?

It is my impression that the truth of the matter lies in the opposite direction. In the past it is unfortunately true that the attitude of many engineers and indeed, although not widely admitted, of many arts students, could be summed up in the comment: "The hell with SAC. What does it matter to me?"

This attitude is changing and more students are feeling the forces of involvement for a number of reasons. One of them is that SAC now involves itself, to its credit, in things of direct interest to students such as the Campus Centre and housing. These activities have or will have directly benefited all students and SAC should not be attacked for its involvement in these issues.

However, another source of involvement is SAC's rather arrogant assumption that it may speak for all students on matters unrelated to student affairs. I think that the objections are not so much to SAC's taking a stand as to the taking of such an extreme stand.

The fault lies in not exercising the restraint which must go with the responsibility of being the assumed voice of nearly thirty thousand students.

Most Canadians and thus hopefully most students endorse the political philosophy which The Varsity likes to degrade as "wishy-washy liberalism."

We are presented with no center line choice but only right-wingers or socialists.

Imagine, if you will, the Canadian electorate being given no other choice for PM than Ralph Cowan or Chairman Mao. They would stay away in droves as students did during the CUG election, and as many did during the U.S. elections.

Perhaps Mr. Langdon is right when he says that engineers and arts students have common values. What he may not understand is that just as the label "engineer" does not make someone a right-wing extremist, so the label "arts student" does not mean that a person supports violent demonstrations or student power by confrontation.

The quiet revolution

By S. E. KALLOS and ALLAN GILBERT

The Faculty Council of Applied Science and Engineering has formally accepted the request of the Engineering Society for representation by 23 students on its legislative body. The success of staff-student committees on the departmental level has provided the main impetus that resulted in this move; considered a surprise by many.

Students will have a voice in the following studies:

- the feasibility of a semester system; the adoption of this plan would include an increase in the length of the scholastic year, and a reduction in the number of lecture and laboratory hours per week, final exams in all subjects at Christmas, and possibly a credit system.

- an increase in the number of electives, which would include a liberalization of the non - technical options.

- a consideration of tutorials versus lectures, with the possible inclusion of televised teaching techniques.

- the study and possible change in selection procedures necessitated by the abolition of departmental Grade 13 examinations.

The inclusion of students on the faculty council has in no way been a result of student unrest within the faculty. Generally, engineering undergraduates are conservative, with a well-defined academic goal, while our arts colleagues seem to enjoy life a little more.

Engineering students are basically satisfied with the present system, excepting problems such as the class room performance of some professors, and the copious amounts of laboratory travail. With the acceptance of the staff leadership, there is little or no student - faculty rift.

It was the staff that spearheaded the drive to involve students in policy discussions. The basic premise of the staff's philosophy is that a proper course evaluation must include effective student feedback.

Campus centre runaround

By ALEX KITAY
and STEVE KALLOS

Why is it that the Board of Governors' counter-proposal to SAC's original financial solution to the Campus Center problem has not been announced? SAC's plan would have committed the students to a Bank of Montreal monopoly on campus banking for 50 years. According to Non-Academic Vice President Alex Rankin (supervisor of University spending):

"You know, it's sad. We brought a Varsity reporter, and I understand, one of their best reporters, to a meeting in Dr. Bissell's office, in which I tried to get some of this confusion out of the financing of the Student Center.

I went over it very carefully, and I think everyone there understood me, yet the Varsity reporter (Brian Johnson, Oct. 30) had the gall to come out with the story that the governors had refused to grant exclusivity to the bank and offered no other solution.

"This is very far from the truth. Before ruling no exclusivity, they did obtain concurrence from the Provincial Government that the government would put up not 50 per cent of $4,000,000 (the projected cost of the Center at that time), but 95 per cent of the cost of non-commercial space. This left unfinanced 5 per cent of non-commercial space and the entire cost of commercial space. (a little over $1,000,000). The Board of Governors said we'll put up the rest.

"Now this left the students in a better position: here is the building financed, and they can still rent to the bank of their choice — they will not get as much in the short run, but they've got this as revenue to pay for the operation of the building and thus are not pouring operating revenue into bricks and mortar."

To the question "why has this not been accepted by SAC?" Mr. Rankin replied:

"I don't know, but the students have never even had it clearly put to them. I think Steven Langdon understands this and I think he feels that this is a good idea."

When asked if The Varsity had distorted the facts, the reply was:

"I thought it peculiar that they came and I pointed the facts out very clearly, and yet the story came out the other way. Either the guy was asleep, or didn't understand, or he willfully distorted the facts.

"Now what's the Board done? They've given a site for the building, they've walked up to spending over $1,000,000 on a very tight campus position (financially) to get this thing going. WHAT DO YOU DO TO GET THIS POINT ACROSS?"

In view of the present distrust of campus administrators, Mr. Rankin proved his credibility by the extent of his co-operation. His statements were all well supported by records that he was almost eager to produce; the dialogue was never interrupted by "no comment".

Don't forget, all you staffers out there that there will be a staff meeting today at 1 p.m. to discuss us (EGOISTS THAT WE ARE). Please try to come, if possible.

EDITORIAL: UNNATURAL UNION

Those of you who could have avoided reading this inaugural issue, but didn't, will have noticed by now that something unorthodox has infected The Varsity.

So far as we know, it is the first time that the engineers have participated to this extent in the rape of The Varsity. We would like to thank the editor and staff of The Varsity for putting out for us.

We hope this marks the beginning of a new spirit of co-operation, that understanding will be promoted before confrontation, realism valued over pretense, and restraint employed rather than violence.

What are the illiterate injurers doing writing The Varsity? Showing that, if we can set things on fire, we can also express our views with burning enthusiasm, but in more constructive ways.

What has The Varsity to gain by letting the engineers publish? Editor Paul MacRae was reported to have considered saying, "It was a groovy idea. Besides, the money we get from returning the empties will let us print 16 pages per issue for the rest of the year."

Our basic belief is that students should be given a chance to form a spontaneous, independent opinion from factual, unslanted news, news which, as The Varsity has so often told us, cannot be obtained from the other Toronto news media. We believe it the duty of every student to encourage the existence of such impartial reporting on campus.

In our view, impartiality involves the presentation of not only the extreme points of view on a given issue, but the broad range of opinion in between as well.

Should The Varsity reflect student opinion or form it? We think the power to influence minds carries with it responsibility for the results. There is no doubt that The Varsity has this power, but does it exhibit a comparable responsibility? We expect that in general it has, but there have been lapses great enough to significantly destroy the trust and confidence that students once placed in their newspaper.

We expect that this infusion of engineering objectivity has righted The Varsity's apple-cart, and trust that they shall no longer peddle soft and rotting fruit to the student body, adopting instead the engineers criterion, "Elastic and firm".

Peter Renyi

In his article, Mr. Langdon showed that engineers are threatened by American imperialism in that there may be no jobs in Canada for us when we graduate. Yet he and his friends seem willing to encourage the government to stop the production and sales of arms to the U.S. by such companies as Hawker - Siddeley and Dow Chemical. This would result in a still further decline in the number of jobs for Canadian graduates. The answer to U.S. dominance of Canadian industry comes down to money.

The Prime Minister has correctly pointed out that Canadians cannot afford to buy back their country from the U.S. While this is sad, it is also true and a fact which we must accept.

Mr. Trudeau's answer is to retain control of industry through legislation and to invest in Canada's future. Only by graduating as capable and hard-working members of society, willing to work within the community to bring about change, and willing to stick with our country even though the financial grass is greener on the other side of the border.

Instead of encouraging students to commit themselves to society, we find many at the university suggesting that they drop out of society or overthrow it.

Perhaps it is to the credit of our society that there are fewer who advocate those policies than in many other countries or universities. However, those that do exist here are not inarticulate and command much attention.

How then should SAC and students react to the pressures upon them? Too many ignore the forces at work in our society and feel they have no contribution to make to the shaping of Canada's future.

Perhaps this is because the media have created a state of over-kill until a point is reached where we can somehow ignore the horror which afflicts both sides in the Vietnam war, or look at the suffering in Nigeria without asking why the hell can't both sides realize that death is a victory for no one.

I think that students should react by involving themselves in society; the political parties, the social agencies, and the cultural forces among us.

We must do this without preconceived ideas about these institutions; more than one know - it - all, intensely committed student has found that his illusions of what the world was like were shattered in the face of reality.

If SAC wishes to involve and motivate us, here is its 'cause', it will have no trouble getting majority support for moderate and well thought-out initiatives to improve the quality of student life.

Let it realize that as our voice it must be responsible to us and reflect the views of the majority of us. Let it understand that students will receive far more benefits from faculty and administration on the basis of mutual respect than on the basis of power confrontation. Perhaps most important, let it realize that SAC stands or falls together and rather than exhibit itself as a group of bitter rival cliques, seeking to withdraw deeper into the prenatal security of the university, it must emerge as a unified body dedicated to serving our students, our community and our country. Then and only then will our attacks on Steve Langdon and his fellow members be invalid.

If SAC really wants our support let it show that it realizes that action and courage are far superior to the criticisms in today's student.

Column and a half

By JOHN E. KRAULIS

We play games. Games are fun. We talk. Talking helps to kill time. When we talk, we are spared from thinking. Thinking is hard.

Concrete cures well under the influence of water and air, but if it is not mixed properly or the proportions of cement and sand are wrong, the first Volkswagen to travel over it will shake it into a heap of sand.

I scribble this following paragraph sitting in on a socce tutorial (really). They're discussing equalizing differentials: "Let's make everyone equal—same salary, same prestige, same opportunity." A few speak up but most aren't really turned on. Thirty—two minutes from now we leave—unimpressed. Someone suggests, "Let's change the topic. We can't discuss this...we don't know what makes a human tick...we spend our lifetime searching for Utopia." What is truth anyway?

Have you ever spent a couple of hours sitting on a park bench just thinking? Not just excogitating dainty simplex concepts or events but bigger issues like, "Is there meaning in this Universe? What does life really consist of?"

An old man dropped a quarter and a dime onto the subway platform...everyone checked his own pocket.

"Good morning, Jack." "Hi, Bob." "Bit chilly today, eh?" "Sure is. The wife made me wear longjohns." Jack and Bob then began intently reading the morning newspaper. World events—very important, you know. Stock market has taken up scuba diving.

Rhyme with reason, reason without rhyme. What I am suggesting is that despite the intellectual pride we hold as big U students, we actually are intellectual paupers, cerebral weaklings. We contest small ideas and then boast in our mental vigor. About two thousand years ago, Pilate asked "What is truth?" We are still asking the same question. The curious thing, though, is that one answer has been given in history that has answered the question of truth. Jesus Christ said, "I am the way, the truth and the life; no one can get to God except through me."

I know, I'm getting all churchy, going religious, losing rationality. Sure, many other answers have been put forth, but I choose this one because I've experienced the truth of this one. I suggest that meaning to life is a direct product of knowing Christ. Dare you investigate it? I don't mean go to church or get religious. I mean, approach God and his document, the Bible, directly.

"But this isn't really something we do. It's for those who need crutches." This is what I was driving at earlier. We refuse to investigate some of the profound verities of life. Our sophistication and banal bleachedness inhibit our exploration into truth. The things that are readily reasoned out and superficially salient we embrace, but we lose out on some of the ultimate really satiating answers.

Dare you explore? Honestly?

Peace at any price

By GEORGE HOMATIDIS

III Chem. Eng

Ever since the large scale build-up of U.S. troops in South Vietnam, there have been many forms of protest advocating, first, a cease fire to pave the way to peace talks, followed by withdrawal of U.S. troops from South Vietnam.

In the past, these protests have ranged from peaceful seminars, peaceful demonstrations, violent demonstrations, draft-card burnings and mock trials of policy making men in the U.S. administrations. Recently, we have witnessed yet another "peace" overture, namely the Hemispheric Conference to end the Vietnam war which ended in Montreal a week ago yesterday.

The predictable result, when one considers the predominant figures of the conference (Black Panthers, Berkeley radicals, French separatists, etc.) was that the only topic not discussed was "peace". Rather it was "victory" for Vietnam. Needless to say that anti-Americanism was the prevailing atmosphere, but it was by no means restricted to the U.S. In return for the conference supporting French separatism, the Red separatists of Quebec pledged to fight against American Imperialism and Canadian colonialism Eh?

Some people, who truly hoped that a solution for peace could be achieved, must have been terribly disappointed, because all they got were declarations of war. War, as Black Panther leader Bobby Seale put it, "to overthrow the avaricious businessman, the demagogic politicians and the pig police forces (sounds familiar?) Of the world..." How? By force of arms of course.

"We must overthrow," Seale continued, "the paid politicians who pollute the earth. We must remove the decadent governments..." And I ask: When all these evil elements have been destroyed, who then assumes power? The answer is obvious. The Black Panthers and affiliated groups' first move will be to revoke the freedoms of the press, speech, expression, which they are so abundantly misusing now.

Then — my poor, dear, deluded protester — you will regret that you placed your faith on these extremists and did not, instead, "join" a truly peaceful solution. You will regret it! But, then it will be too late.

This is not idle conjecture on my part, for recent history provides excellent examples of this and it is not only restricted inside the Soviet Block wherein Russia professes to rule by "divine right." We have the Hitlers and the Mussolinis who used the freedom afforded to them only to suppress it later

Nobody wanted to write the masthead ad tonight. Kesterian had left, Frank had exams, Sue Perlicue wanted out by "10", none of the engineers were competent enough (and they'd caused enough trouble as it is), Cowan was a five-bug-eyed, harriet was in late and volkie was a lazy activist again, sherry was corned (which was macrae's beef), dayle was here, lix too, and sue, and many others of the crew, and that's why there's no masthead ad for tonight.

An afternoon with Bill Dennison

By BRENT ARLITT, PETER FRASER and ALEX KITAY (Ill Chem Eng.

In typical newspaper fashion, the following quotes from an interview given by Mayor William Dennison last Monday, have been taken completely out of context, scrambled, and re-arranged in the best order we could think of. If some of his comments seem right-wing biased, it is because Mr. Dennison is a rampant New Democrat.

● On the politically isolated university:
"It's an area, in the heart of the city that doesn't pay taxes, and on whose behalf the province doesn't pay taxes. It's an area that is heavily subsidized by the taxpayers of Toronto, many of whom haven't had the benefit of a university education."

● With reference to the present popular thought that the university should be a separate entity immune from social pressure, our mayor said:

"That kind of a movement would not go very far, if the University doesn't get money from the taxpayer. The civic taxpayer essentially still has a bit of power with Queen's Park... Don't push the civic taxpayer too hard, because he is carrying a staggering burden of taxation at the present time." (40 per cent of Ontario's budget is allotted to education -ED.)

● The closing of St. George Street:
"Where would the traffic go that uses the artery? Our north and south streets are crowded now. We gave that problem thorough consideration and there was a group on council that thought at first something could be worked out. But our traffic experts convinced us that it wasn't possible to do."

● Parking:
Mayor Dennison simply was not aware of the critical nature of parking on campus. The only specific details he discussed were proposals to install more parking meters. The problem of parking, not only on campus, but also in the rest of the city, will be solved only when public transportation facilities are expanded and taken advantage of, he said.

● University expansion:
"The expansion will have to be up into the air, in order to give more open space between the buildings. You've buildings scattered all over the place — two and three-storey buildings. If you'd build these 20 storeys high, you'd have only 1.5 or 1.7 the ground cover that you have today."

● Student activism:
"I am frankly puzzled by the attitude of some student groups who seem to want something and yet are unable to define exactly what they want. They want to have power, but with this power must come organization. What organization are they going to set up to provide that the university continue?"

● Draft Dodgers:
"Ontario has so many draft dodgers that below the border they call Toronto 'Dodge City'."

Q—As one involved in news media, what things have and have not impressed you about The Varsity?

A—Well, I think that The Varsity had deteriorated recently because it's lost objectivity. It's not quite as bad now as it was, say, three weeks ago, but there is a good deal of slanted material that never used to be there.

Q—Do you think that your recent criticisms have helped change any of this?

A—I think they might have as a consequence of some things I said on the air.

Q—What do you think is the role of a campus newspaper?

A—The campus newspaper should inform, and be as light in its approach as it can. I don't think it should get so deeply involved with world problems as many campus newspapers do. I'm thinking of Vietnam, Biafra. They are important things and involvement is all right but in taking them up campus newspapers have begun to take themselves pretty seriously. Now, university, and have sort of distant connection with the early Varsity, but it used to be quite an amusing paper, now it's quite a serious paper. Perhaps the times are more serious, perhaps that's the right approach, but I would like to see The Varsity go lightweight.

Q—Do you think that people maturing at the university ought to take a serious look at the world they are entering?

A—Yes, but not exclusively. I think it's all right to be concerned and involved as obviously the current editors are, but I think they go too far. There's been a little too much of the serious in most of the Canadian campus newspapers. Even now, in the same paper, the Star uses Lautens and Jimmy Breslin and some of these lightweight-ed guys — life is not that grim, fellows, it really isn't.

Q—Do you think that political non-involvement should be a role of student government too?

A—No, I don't. Political involvement is all right — non-involvement would be a little too conformist.

Q—Do you think that in any newspaper the editor is justified in maintaining an editorial policy not supported by the reader?

A—He could be justified, but economically he's in a bind. Now The Varsity wouldn't be in that kind of a bind. But some of the most successful and colorful of the old-line editors were fellows that took the attitude that what interested them should interest their readers and quite a few of them went broke, but those that stuck with the idea emerged as persuading their readers around to their view. The big mistake, I think, is in a change of policy. If The Varsity starts to bend like a willow with every whisper of complaint, then I have no respect for the editors.

Q—Do you condemn students who actively question their position in the establishment?

A—No, I do not!

Q—If you were facing the American draft today, what would you do?

A—I think I would be drafted. I would hate it, but I would go in. I think draft dodgers are morally justified — even in leaving their own country and coming here. We should welcome them, because they're faced with a serious problem — they're going to have their self-doubts and the doubts of their friends and they're going to constantly wonder. I have done the right thing? They can't win, and oh boy, I feel sorry for the.

Q—do you have any comment on so called "war recruitment" on campus, where people of one opinion obstruct others in getting jobs?

A—I have a feeling of sadness because I know it happens, and must be the most frustrating bind that you could get in. I don't know how the young graduate can deal with it — comes out of the university with a degree and can't get a job in the field in which he's trained.

Q—What is your opinion of higher education?

A—I say that even today you can still make the grade without a degree. I am thinking now of the election of John Walker as the president of the Bank of Montreal. He never had a year of high school. Now again this is an exception, and there are others. I'm an exception myself — I'm a millionaire and I'm still working at the age of 69 and I didn't get to high school either. Now, I don't recommend this because it's a very exceptional thing, but it still can be done. However I don't think you're wasting your time in going to university. I wish I'd had the privilege of going, but I do think that young men with the drive, the "he can who thinks he can", can still make it. I think another ingredient in here is luck.

Q—Do you think higher education should be free?

A—Yes, based on the qualification of desire. If you have a desire and economics are boding you back, you should not be held back.

ATTENTION GRADUATES

The Noranda Group of Companies offers a wide range of opportunities to university graduates with ability and initiative. Broad diversification promises successful applicants unusual scope to develop skills and gain experience in their fields of specialization. The policy of the Group to select personnel from within our companies to fill key positions as they open up, makes it possible for a trainee to travel widely and, over the years, to get exposure to a great variety of job situations which will help prepare him for supervision and administrative duties. A Noranda Group representative will be on campus here December 13th to interview applicants from among prospective graduates. Appointments can be made in advance through the University Placement Office 928-2538

SAC - get out of my bed

By Deanna and Howard S.
White,
(SGS)

Majority versus minority rights is the key issue now facing campus politicians. SAC, a collection of perturbed minorities, has consistently ignored the demands of its constituent voices by railroading through unrepresentative decisions.

The present solution, we think, is withdrawal. The GSU has withdrawn from SAC. Soon referenda will be held by the faculties of Engineering, Medicine, Pharmacy, Forestry, and Law.

Although SAC has instituted an initiative referendum system (2,000 signatures with a 500 limit per faculty) to squelch such minor uprisings, the solution remains ineffective. Or, have we had a referendum lately? . . .

Federalism is the answer. In order to obtain a strong, united student voice, without loss of minority and individual rights, a federal format of government is required.

The federal solution is not "parochial" as termed by SAC President Steven Langdon, but necessary if a united student front is to exist on campus to confront the administration. Nor is it "impractical" as Langdon would have us believe. Federalism has worked effectively on several campuses, such as the University of Manitoba since 1949, UBC, Stanford, and Harvard.

But how would federalism work at U of T?

It would allow the various divergent campus minorities to protect their rights by giving them fiscal control of non-essential services.

The administration would still collect SAC fees with SAC allocating money for essential services, the difference being that each local council would control its fee portion for disputed issues. As a result local constituents would lose none of the essentials but retain power over more arbitrary decisions.

Interestingly enough, this method also obviates the contingency that individual groups may withhold SAC funds from their local council, since this money guarantees them certain rights.

Can federalism be instituted? It can, even considering the reactionary views of the present SAC executive to such change, as shown by Langdon's uncompromising attitude toward the GSU. Since SAC cannot be reformed internally, the alternative is to reform it externally by each local council holding a referendum and withdrawing.

Withdrawal is not unconstitutional, as Langdon argues. On Dec. 3, 1968, a SAC committee on withdrawals voted unanimously in favour of allowing local councils the right to withdraw. Once a sufficient number of councils withdraw, SAC will be forced to reconstitute into a federal form. Indeed, federalism is the only governing system that would induce the GSU to rejoin.

Can federalism work at U of T? It must.

Fencers slay Rochester entry

The visit of Varsity Fencing Team to the Rochester Institute of Technology coincided with the Gala Opening of their impressive new Athletic Complex, last Saturday the 7th December.

The presence of Rochester Television (WROC) may have sponsored Fencing as a sport but cancelled the expected triangular with Buffalo State University. All bouts were rearranged to fit in with the T.V. presentation.

Unfortunately the Rochester Team is the weakest for many years and was no match for the mixture of experience and enthusiasm in the Varsity Team.

The individual results are shown in detail below with Varsity defeating Rochester Institute of Technology by 24 bouts to 3.

Foil 9:4: Nan Sung Ho, 3 wins, 3 hits against; Richard Wong, 3 wins, 3 hits against; Ron Rice, 3 wins, 7 hits against.

Epee 8:1: Rowland Griffin, 3 wins, 6 hits against; Mark Pfeiffer, 3 wins, 9 hits against; Mike Kerwin, 2 wins, 12 hits against.

Sabre 7:2: Mladen Peros, 3 wins, 3 hits against; Martin Moskovitz, 3 wins, 7 hits against; John Archibald, 1 win, 13 hits against.

The Foil Team showed their class with an effective display of uncomplicated offensive and defensive actions. The Epee Team, although untried, approached each bout with the right attitude and found the opposing team ever ready to rush onto their extended points. Each Sabre bout had an element of the unexpected, posing to each Varsity Fencer and the Director of the bout, problems that only a novice sabreur could devise.

BLUES OUT - BENGAL BUNGLE LANCERS IN 5 - 1 WIN

cutline by ROD MICKLEBURGH

That trickling block thing crowling up Lancer netminder Don Bruner's loins is o puck. It orrived there special delivery from the oki stick of Blues' Bob McClelland (16). Numero quotre, c'est John Wright (4). Collosping from on uninspired Russion cossock dance is Windsor defensesemon Neil Donnelly (2). That's Elly Alboim mumbling incoherently in the top lefthand corner. Only 14 shopping doys till Xmos.

By PHIL BINGLEY

Windsor Lancers left their spears at home Friday night when they made their premiere appearance at Varsity Arena. Varsity Blues whipped Lancers 5-1 in one of the dulcst home contests in the past few years as the Windsor team came, saw and decided not to conquer.

For sixty minutes, Lancers made no effort to win the game. They simply stayed back behind their own blue-line, often forming a human wall in front of their brilliant netminder Don Bruner, and tried to keep the final score respectable.

Blues, on the other hand, concentrated almost totally on offensive hockey. Swarming around the enemy net like hungry wolves, Varsity forwards and defencemen got off 65 shots on goal. Dozens of other attempts were just wide of the mark or blocked by falling Lancers.

Paul Laurent won the game for all intents and purposes with his goal at 1:55 of the first period. Steve Monteith set the play up when he recovered an errant Lancer pass, and moved the puck over to Ward Passi. Passi in turn slipped the disc to Laurent who was standing just in front of the Windsor goal crease, and the latter banged his shot into the open side past a helpless Bruner.

From that point on, Lancers restricted their moves to a backward version of a full-rink press. They seldom rushed more than two forwards on the Varsity goal and continued to check ferociously in their own end.

The most effective scoring unit for coach Tom Watt was the John Wright - Bob McClelland - Bryan Tompson line. Wright scored two goals (he could have had six were it not for Bruner's acrobatics) including the winner, McClelland had a single and made beautiful plays to make Wright's two markers possible. Tompson set up all three of his linemate's successful efforts.

Gord Cunningham counted Blues' fifth goal after taking passes from defencemen Brent Swanick and Jim Miles.

Windsor, who managed but 22 shots on Toronto netminder Tom Little, scored their tally when Tom Mc-Fadden found the top right corner of the twine after some shoddy defensive work in Blues' zone.

Ward Passi made his first start of the season for Blues and looked sharp on the line with Laurent and Monteith. The threesome owned the puck whenever they were on the ice but managed to beat Bruner on only one occasion. Passi also threw the stiffest check of the night - a crushing shoulder block during his first shift out.

Bruner was easy the pick of the visitors with his often sensational puck-stopping. All five shots which beat him were clean ones.

Although there were several exciting moments during the tilt, overall action was generally pretty lifeless. Referee Zip Thompson handed out seven minor penalties (three to each team) in the cleanly-played affair.

CURLING

Lex Mackenzie, undefeated after six games, leads Varsity curlers, in the play-downs to choose the representative for the OQAA championships. Mackenzie and Bob Quinn played to a 6-6 tie on Sunday, while Mark Burch downed John Mather 11-5, to push Mather down to B-Group for the final three games. Dave Lankin, with an 8-2 win over Doug Watson, moved up to A-Group for the final round. In the other B-Group game Terry Lalande beat Bruce Mintz 8-4.

After three more games the Leader of B-Group plays a sudden-death game with the leader of the Recreational Group, the winner playing a best two-of-three with the A-Group winner. The victor represents Toronto at the Western Division at Guelph on Feb. 7-8.

Paul Laurent (8) gives Blues an early start Friday night as he deposits puck in the twine before startled Don Bruner can even move to face him. Ward Passi (9) fed Laurent his perfect pass after an equally perfect pass from Steve Monteith (not shown). The goal came at 1:55 of the first period.

HOW ARE WE # TEACHING

OUR TEACHERS?

By GEOFF MEGGS

Douglas F. Dadson, Dean of the College of Education, is a sedate, pragmatic man whose job it is to provide Ontario with an ever-increasing quota of high school teachers. In his red-brick domain at 371 Bloor St. West, he is the Superprincipal of an institution he admits is unsatisfactory in some respects, but maintains still turns out well-trained teachers.

The College of Education building itself is a high school in disguise. Black-stained wooden doors open onto tiled and terrazzoed corridors reminiscent of the subway. The periodically shrilling bells are for the use of the University of Toronto Schools, the Dean hastens to explain.

Renovation materials and stacks of desks clutter the halls, again drawing forth an apology.

"We renovate to improve facilities and the renovation lowers our efficiency," laments the Dean.

DOWN ↓ ONLY

To depict Dean Dadson as the tyrannical overlord of oppressed students would be unjust. To say on the other hand he is a visionary hamstrung by totally inadequate facilities and an antiquated system is also short of the truth.

He is sincerely determined to give COE students the best possible training and at the same time unwilling to change anything for which he feels there is not a tested substitute.

"I think students are generally satisfied with their courses. The basic program is made up of the same ingredients we have had for 50 years. However, each individual course has been revolutionized."

Dadson chooses his words with great care. He has taken a chair across from me rather than remain behind his desk. On student involvement he says:

"Course critiques are very, very useful. For the last four years the Student Council has prepared a year-end report which has contained many excellent suggestions as well as many cutting criticisms."

The college also has a Staff - Student Council, composed of five faculty and five student members, meeting every one or two weeks, which makes recommendations to the Dean or to the College Council on College affairs. These meetings are, however, closed.

The Dean deals personally with all questions of facilities, but must pass curriculum problems on to the Council and then the Senate of the U of T.

Dean Dadson is wary of some widely accepted educational ideas.

"Smallness influences the efficiency and interest of a class far less than one would expect. Many students would prefer a lecture by Marcus Long to a class of 300 than a class of 30 with someone else."

When asked if any curriculum changes are contemplated as a result of the publication of the Hall - Dennis Report he emphasizes the report consists of the "thoughts and recommendations of small groups of experts."

The COE's math department has done some work on "conducting classes along the lines recommended in the report," he said.

Student participation in organization of the curriculum is "widespread" according to the Dean, "but more prevalent in some departments than in others."

Dean Dadson himself has many suggestions for improvement of the College. Given the money, he would create "a very large resource centre where a student could retrieve data: books, tapes, pictures and so on, as well as extensive studio space where students could make their own materials."

He also envisages a building designed for very great flexibility by the use of modules.

"That way the internal space can be rearranged in a day or two so the building is responsive to changes in programme and enrolment."

Dean Dadson tactfully points out that space, or the lack of it is at the root of the College's most basic problems.

"Although the building has remained unenlarged since 1954 the enrolment has multiplied five times," he says.

"Despite long hours and the addition of rented space the College has no accommodation or staff for the seminars or small classes graduate students are entitled to."

Dean Dadson is in favor of an increased proportion of the academic year being spent on practice teaching, coupled with an extension of the academic year.

The Dean recognizes that some students find their courses irrelevant.

"Some effort must be made to make our courses in the history and philosophy of education more meaningful," he says.

In fact, the College of Education is trapped in any matter requiring staff - student cooperation because of its annual graduating class comprises the entire student body.

Before I left the Dean treated me to a guided tour of the College

He led me from room to room, muttering about the thousands of cardboard boxes the renovators had stacked in the halls and stopping from time to time to acknowledge the smiles of secretaries and in-jokes of subordinates.

The College proved to be a wild melange of Depression Educational and Twenty-First Century Functional Renovation has given some rooms indirect lighting and closed circuit TV and left others with hardwood floors and scratched blackboards.

Ultra modern ETV studios, computer facilities and one of the most up-to-date language labs in Canada are crushed into areas which must certainly hamper their effectiveness.

Preliminary plans for a new building, incorporating Dean Dadson's retrieval centre have been completed but are still a long way from final approval.

Until then, the COE students will continue to tread the terrazzo and avoid the "Staff Only" elevator under the careful administration of Superprincipal Dadson.

The House Committee on Un-American Activities: a circus of comic relief

I By TOM MILLER
College Press Service

WASHINGTON (CUP - CPS) - Several weeks ago, vice-president-elect Spiro Agnew called for a "greater national sense of humor." The House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC) and its subpoenaed witnesses have responded to the call: HUAC by taking itself seriously, and the witnesses by refusing to.

The committee wanted evidence of "subversive activities" in the last week of August in Chicago. It brought to Washington leaders and anti-leaders of the political and cultural peace movement - most prominently Dave Dellinger, Tom Hayden and Ronnie Davis of the National Mobilization and Jerry Rubin and Abbie Hoffman of the Youth International Party (Yippies).

This was the first formal meeting of radical leaders and "system" politicians since Chicago. If what happened is any indication of meetings to come, politicians will begin sidestepping rather than attacking New Leftists.

In a normal HUAC hearing, a case against subpoenaed witnesses is built by the Committee staff; the witnesses refuse to say anything under the protection of the First, Fourth and Fifth Amendments. This time was different.

The first witness, Bob Greenblatt of the National Mobilization, spoke at length on his anti-war work. (He was the first of what HUAC called the "hostile" witnesses. Earlier, the "friendly" witnesses gave a summary of Chicago mayor Daley's report on the week's activities). Dr. Quentin Young, of the Medical Committee for Human Rights, then used his time on the stand to outline the medical needs of demonstrators everywhere.

Periodically, other witnesses would interrupt with comic relief. After Jerry Rubin made an announcement, Committee chairman Richard Ichord proclaimed, "The chair is not conducting a circus here today". Earlier, while one police infiltrator was testifying, Abbie Hoffman asked to be excused to go to the bathroom. His request was granted.

Plagued by interruption and witnesses who didn't see things his way, Chairman Ichord constantly repeated the intent of the hearings: "We want to find out if communists in this country inspired and took part in the riots in Chicago... and if certain organizations in the United States have connections with foreign communist powers."

The Committee was trying to establish that Young loaned Ronnie Davis $1,000 to lease office space for the Mobilization in Chicago. Davis went to Hanoi last spring, Young quietly said he does not ask for travel dossiers from people to whom he loans money.

The Committee hearings were most noteworthy for what didn't occur, rather than what they did. The most articulate and colorful anti-war leaders were not called to testify; the questions of free speech and suppression were not raised.

even the mythmakers - Jerry Rubin, Paul Krassner and Abbie Hoffman - were beginning to believe it. As Realist editor Krassner put it, "When I got to Chicago I looked around and I wasn't sure who I saw. They weren't hippies, they weren't straights, my god, I thought, they're actually Yippies."

The myth-turned-real Yippies were being investigated by HUAC. The policeman named Pierson who tailed Jerry Rubin in Chicago told the committee with a straight face the Yippies planned to take over the country, dutifully reported in the Washington Star under the headline "Committee Told Yippies Plan U.S. Takeover".

The cast of the week's show stayed at a hotel across the street from the hearing room. The hotel restaurant is usually filled with Congressmen, lobbyists and their cohorts. This week the New York entourage monopolized part of it, baffling many of the regulars.

Back at the rally behind the GWU library, Rubin and Krassner announced plans for the coming months. Rubin talked of the fun in Washington on inauguration day. He said he hoped he'd be called to testify - he wanted to present the HUAC with one of his "Fuck Communism" posters and accuse them of being soft on communism if they didn't accept it.

At one of his regular lunchtime press conferences with about 25 newsmen, Rubin also expressed sorrow that he hadn't been called to testify. "I planned to tell them everything," he said. He had the Washington phone book to submit as the Yippie membership list. He said this was the second time in two years HUAC paid his way to Washington only to not let him testify. "And I'm getting pretty pissed," he concluded.

"Excuse me," came Krassner's voice from the crowd of newsmen, "is that spelled p-i-s-s-e-d?"

The Newspaper Guild strike at the Peterborough Examiner has become significant over the past two weeks owing to the mass influx of students to help man the picket lines.

This is the first tangible evidence we've seen in Ontario of the new thing that's going around in radical circles these days, student-worker alliances, in effect due to the realization that only the working class has sufficient economic power to bring about the changes in society which students would like to see.

Hopefully, however, the next student-worker alliance will bear more fruit than at Peterborough which yielded nothing more than frustration and arrests.

But the venture cannot be termed a failure. Students learned a lot at Peterborough.

For one thing, they learned that the role of law and order in any strike is always to keep the wheels of big business turning by protecting the scabs and strikebreakers.

They also learned how a true monopoly works and why it, especially a monopoly of the press, is such a dangerous thing. Who are the people of Peterborough forced to rely on for their interpretation of the strike? The Thomson-owned radio and TV stations, and the Peterborough Examiner of course.

And above all, students saw that, in many ways, the working man is his own worst enemy.

That was certainly the most tragic part of the whole Examiner situation—the daily crossing of the picket lines by the pressmen and typesetters, the fellow workers of the Guild. This wasn't too hard to understand. Three years ago in Toronto, when the shoe was on the other foot and the International Typographers' Union was on strike, members of the Toronto Newspaper Guild crossed the picket lines in droves, dooming the ITU strike to failure.

— Noticeable too, was the general failure of other labor unions in Peterborough to come to the aid of the Guild.

These are the sort of hard facts that students must learn to face before starting out on philanthropic fantasies to aid the impoverished proletariat.

For capitalism has, by and large, bought off the working class. It's managed this with welfare, $3.50 an hour work contracts and multitudinous fringe benefits. These days, except in isolated cases, the working man is doing OK, and he certainly isn't going to jeopardize his position for some other poor stiff trying to effect meaningful reforms in the Thomson system.

Right now the working man is only asking for a bigger share of the capitalist's profits. He's not asking for a new society—one where the people who do the work are the people who call the shots.

Unless he does, student radicals, come revolution time the working class and big business are going to fight you to the death.

Are students at university really happy? Or are they just content?

This question has been bugging me for some time now. Somebody told me recently that the reason for the widespread reaction against student protest is the fact that most students are really happy with the way things are going here. Student unrest seems so Mickey Mouse when students "have never had it so good".

Yet somehow I cannot help feeling that students who never had it so good are having their minds dulled by prosperity. The whole role and reason of a university is being obscured in a welter of material comfort.

Dear student, how many times

ral has helped in and out and in with help by john r. who only develops more. it's coming it's coming why it's the 31st of course and someone here was glad to hear from layola and their managing editor. time flies the dog jumped, she barked, whoops leave room for geoff, mike, henry star, larry long-hair. jim business type and all those who were unable to take this trip on the good ship lollipop an did you know that otto likes acid and us, having missed we will skip out, silently in to the coolness, mass oblivion among the hungry, starving ones to fight our way with unknowns and big brother to guide us sigh...bibl.

have you been turned-on, excited, thrilled by what you learned in class? Chances are, not too many times.

But isn't it the purpose of the university to do just that? I used to think so. But I think I've been enlightened.

The purpose of this university is to make you comfortable. That's the only explanation that comes to mind when I see what is going on around me. It's not to excite you, it's not to get you involved in the world around you. Rather, it's just the opposite. The university is a place where most students become permanently blind.

Recently I had the opportunity to do something that I have never done before, something totally alien to my social and economic background. I went on strike with about 200 other students at the Peterborough Examiner.

Bully for you, you say! What's so great about that?

I can tell you what is so great about it — It was uncomfortably different. I found myself getting up at 2:00 o'clock in the morning, traveling on a bus to a small Ontario town, picketing for hours in the cold with little food, and fighting what for many students is a debatable cause. Yet I learned in that experience more than I'd learn in 100 classes on campus.

I learned in particular the necessity for a common bond between students and labor. I learned in general that the "learning process" if often of necessity uncomfortable and disturbing.

In the years of the Great Depression, up to half the labor force was out of work in some areas. The stock market fell, family savings declined or were wiped out, famine occurred in the West, and there was talk of war in Europe. Yet from what I have learned from people who lived through that degrading experience, one could still find happiness in hardship — often because of it.

Am I saying that in hardship there is happiness? No. What I am saying is that in an easy and prosperous life there is not necessarily happiness. It is important to point this out because it is so easily accepted in our society that comfort is equal to happiness.

So what does this mean to the average university student?

It means that sitting in a lecture hall and mechanically scribbling down notes contributes little to learning. It means that sitting in a tutorial, silent and unprepared, also contributes little to learning.

Our university years are potentially the most exciting of our lives. Are we going to spend them asleep or awake? — paralyzed or in action?

Is university a meeting place for aware, politicized individuals, or is it a barn for contented cows?

In the end, the responsibility for ensuring the former rests with the students themselves.

"We're planning a revolution"

By Don Gregory

Dear Mom,
I hear you are worried about me. You have read in the newspaper and heard on the radio that small minority of dissatisfied students at the University of Waterloo are disturbing the peace and serenity of our campus.

You may even have heard that I was arrested for trespassing while distributing supposedly obscene literature to highschool students. You have heard all this talk about student power and Marxism and revolution.

Well, some of it is true. We do talk about student power and Marxism; and we are planning a revolution. Let me tell you about our revolution.

We are, most of us, well-off. None of us starves.

All of us have somewhere to sleep. Some of us even own cars.

It is because we don't need to worry about our physical well-being that we have time to look at the world around us. We don't like what we see.

On the one hand we are told we've never had it so good. On the other we wonder what's "good" about it. I remember once standing on a corner of Bloor Street in Toronto throughout lunch hour and not seeing one smiling person. The suicide and crime rates are climbing rapidly.

We are told that we live in a free and democratic society. We wonder how the selection of our national leaders is democratic. The local Amish folk are forced to participate in unemployment insurance and medicare schemes they neither want nor need. American troops crusade to force democracy on the people of Vietnam.

The examples are endless and I could write you a letter everyday describing them. Many of us have simply been overwhelmed by the magnitude of the contradictions facing us and have stuck our heads in the sand hoping that if we don't see the problems they will go away.

Some of us have courageously entered the system with hopes of changing it from within. Others despair that nothing can be done before the whole social - political - economic monolith is brought crashing to the ground so a new society can rise phoenix-like from the ashes of the old.

Our revolution is not just political - we don't just want to replace the old establishment with one that is newer and possibly more human.

We want to build a world where there is no place for an establishment; no place for a Hitler or a Trudeau; no place for people to starve as many in the Atlantic provinces and not a few in Ontario do now.

We want to build a world where there is no place for soldiers and bombs as there are everywhere now; no place for "news media" that report only crime and violence; no place for the infection of minds by spurious television.

We don't want this just for Canada or for "the free world"; we want it for the whole world.

We want to stop foreign invasions in Vietnam and in Czechoslovakia. We want a world where a man works for his own needs, not those of the Big Company or the petty dictator.

We want a world where every man can be creative whether it be as an artist or as a mechanic or farmer. We want to speak as we feel and not just mouth polite, meaningless banalities.

We feel that this kind of world is possible - it has to be possible, otherwise there is no meaning to life. Societies have existed in the past where the majority of citizens were happy and creative. Ancient Greek society with all its imperfections maybe a good example.

The Greeks were able to build their famous statues, write their beautiful poems and formulate profound theories because they had thousands of slaves to work for them.

Today we have a different kind of slave - mechanical slaves. Unthinking machines can do nearly everything and a few thinking men can design machines to cover the few exceptions.

When control of the means of production and the means of communication passes from the hands of the few into the hands of all, then we can make the machines which will free us from routine uncreative jobs to think about the fundamental problems of human existence.

Even while fighting for real democracy, whether it be behind the barricades at the Sorbonne, in Wenceslas Square, in the Black Ghettos, in the streets of Mexico City, at the campus center here or wearing black pyjamas in the jungles of Vietnam, we realize that political and economic reforms are but the first step.

Until a significant number of people in the world demand for themselves and their brothers not only "life, liberty, and attainment of happiness and an equal share of the material wealth - until these are universal rights, the revolution will not even have begun.

What you have read in the papers are but the first successes and mistakes of a venture which I hope will someday involve all man in the search for human dignity and happiness.

To refuse the call to arms would be to refuse my birth-right as a human being. Just as my ancestors of two hundred years ago felt impelled to carve a nation out of the wilderness of America; I, today, feel compelled to build a society where man has the power of self - determination.

With Love and Respect,

Your son, Don.

Col um n and a half

By LARRY HAIVEN

At 7:00 in the evening, a student, dishevelled, his hair flying out from beneath a Che beret, ran into SAC office, his eyes full of fire. "Goddamn bastards," he said "Goddamn administration; goddamn university; I'm going to blow the place up!"

Alberto de Giovanni grabbed the stranger's hands and started jumping up and down with him yelling, "Blow it up! Blow it up!"

Andy Wernick arrived just then, an hour late for the executive meeting.

"Well," he said, "I'm going to have to make a concrete social analysis of this, since none of you has the intelligence nor the guts to do so.

"Obviously this fellow is a horny engineer who's been co-opted by the military - industrial corporate elite, who will buy his body when he graduates." With that, he threw his cigarette to the ground and left it burning.

Steve Langdon came out of his office after hearing the raucous. He was absolutely furious. He was raging: "Uh couldja kinda keep it a bit quieter, huh? I have some difficulty reacting to what's going on here. We're gonna hafta ask some kinda relevant questions here."

Schachar stomped out, mad as all getup. "What the hell's going on here? Is this freedom? Is this democracy? This is violence, just like staff washrooms. One of my clinicians gave a urinalysis today, from contents of a staff washroom. I asked him, 'What's your analysis?' He answered, 'If you're in third year meds and you don't know what a urinalysis is, then you can bloody well fail!' I mean, that's violence!"

Just then Martha Tracey emerged from her office. "What's going on here?"

Some people explained to her. "Well," she said, "We need this fellow to channel his destructive impulses into useful actions, maybe write slogans. Now, Andy Wernick you take your hands off of him, he's ours."

A terrific struggle ensued, with Jenny Penney and Wernick pulling one arm and Langdon, Martha, and Norm on the other.

Finally Wernick and Jenny gave up and stomped out. "Bloody liberals," spat Wernick over his shoulder.

Martha picked up the stranger, who was still foaming at the mouth and raving. She brushed off his clothes and straightened his hair, as he raged

"Now you just keep quiet", she said, "I want you to go into Bob Rae's office and be legitimized." And she grabbed him by the scruff of the neck and threw him in Bob's office.

"I find your actions tasteless and idiotic," said Rae. "This office has been the source of more confused hysteria than the day Paul Fromm found out that we had given accommodation to the Union of American Nihilists." "Very interesting!" came Fromm's voice from a crack in the door.

"The red haired girl in the office said you would legitimize me," said the stranger.

"Yes, I think you can be legitimized. We'll swear that this doesn't mean revolution, only rapid and forceful social change with the purpose of replacing the existing socio - politico - economic system

But the stranger was asleep, fast asleep.

LETTERS

indignation

Mr. Patrick D. Lawlor, MPP, Parliament Buildings,
Toronto

Dear Sir:

We the undersigned members of the St. Michael's College Student Council wish to express our indignation at the letter sent to you by Mr. F. Paul Fromm, a member of our council. We disagree entirely with the allegations against Mr. Alberto DiGiovanni and the inferences against Professor William Dunphy. Unfortunately since Mr. Fromm was acting in his capacity as Chairman of the Edmund Burke Society on the University of Toronto campus, the Student Council has no authority to censure him officially. Yet we would like to convey to you our displeasure and disgust with the contents of Mr. Fromm's letter.

We trust that this letter demonstrates that Mr. Fromm's views are not consistent with those of St. Michael's College students. We also hope that these events have not lowered your estimation of St. Michael's College.

and 10 other members of the SMC Council

fromm fights back

If I might, I would like to clarify a few points about the Lawlor - Kirk affair. First, the money given to the Edmund Burke Society by both S.A.C. and the SMC Student Council was given with only one stipulation: that it be used to defray the cost of the Kirk - Lawlor debate. In arranging for an N.D.P. speaker, Mr. Genovese informed the N.D.P. Provincial headquarters that we would be unable to offer an honorarium, due to the high cost of bringing Dr Kirk from Mecosta Michigan and paying his speakers fee ($175.00 all told).

My second point is that up until this week we had received no direct confirmation, in fact no correspondence at all, from Mr. Lawlor to indicate that his interpretation of the agreement was not, in fact the same as ours. Had we at any time learned of his dissatisfaction, we would willingly have sought to keep the peace by giving him the benefit of the doubt and paying him. This week, we did receive a letter from him asking for an honorarium of $25.00. We are, therefore, sending out a $15.00 cheque to supplement the $10.00 one given him last week.

May I take this opportunity to note my disgust at the cynical way in which Mr. Di Giovanni has dragged this matter (a matter strictly between Mr. Lawlor and the Edmund Burke Society) up before the S.M.C. Student Council and S.A.C. Even more reprehensible has been his action in circulating around campus copies of our correspondence with Mr. Lawlor.

It is interesting that a matter of an alleged $25.00 has taken up so much time on two student councils, when huge budgets (eg for the Varsity or Mickitties) are passed with scant discussion

Langdon and U.S. imperialism

In his article on "American Imperialism," President Langdon suggested that it would be irresponsible to propose the abolition of American economic influence from Canada without posing alternatives. Since I feel he failed to do this adequately, I would like to point out a few salient facts.

It seems to be a common misconception amongst Canadian autarchists that independent economic development can be achieved without some very real sacrifices on the part of the Canadian people. Experience in the Soviet Union since 1917 has pointed out clearly that capital investment simply cannot be made without a proportionate cutback in the output of consumer goods. In the light of the extensive amount of capital investment over past years by the United States for which Canadians have had to make no significant sacrifice of consumption, it becomes clear that takeover on a fair basis of American-owned industry would be a very costly affair indeed. In short, one cannot invest without sacrificing immediate consumption.

A few of the implications of such investment should be looked into. It will be difficult to continue, to say nothing of expanding, necessary social welfare programs, since this requires a large-scale channelling of national wealth into pure consumption. It will also be difficult to ask an already-sacrificing public to finance purely self-edifying pursuits such as liberal arts education, something which clearly tends to benefit the student himself rather than society in its newly-defined role. In short, the independent development by our small population of the enormous resources that we have a duty to share, combined with the enormous volume of industry we wish to expropriate, will require great sacrifices on our part if we hope to do this on any meaningful basis.

And to what end? The theme so often sounded here is the control of our own political destiny. Have we considered the implications for democracy and political liberty of the reduction in standards of living, of leisure, and of the scrapping of certain necessary but consumption-oriented programmes? To be more specific, the major theme seems to be the rather dubious assertion of political interference by the American corporation.

Even if this was a clearly self-evident charge, my principal concern would not be with solving the problem by eliminating the American and foreign corporations, but rather with improving our governmental system to eliminate disproportionate corporate influence altogether. Is it really worth it after all to say we have solved anything by restricting big business influence to purely Canadian concerns who probably have considerably more interest in government actions than foreigners?

My point then, is that President Langdon's sentiments reflect only one side of a two-sided coin and his seeming failure to consider the disadvantages and even the advantages of his proposals smacks of the sort of senseless nationalism and jingoism that are so much a part of the world problems today. I would ask Mr. Langdon and other of his adherents to realize that one gets nothing without work and sacrifice no matter what economic ideology one enforces. The vital question he has failed to consider is, "Is it worth it?"

V.D. and you

The advent and increasing use of the Pill appears to have encouraged sexual freedom in the general community, including the University. Unfortunately, it has not done away with extra-marital pregnancy and for whatever the reason, we are becoming progressively concerned and involved with the psychiatric, social, and other complications of such pregnancies.

In addition, while reliable comparative statistics are difficult to obtain, there appears to be a marked increase in venereal disease in the general population. This is certainly our impression at the University Health Service. It manifests particularly as so-called "non-specific urethritis," an affliction traditionally regarded as less serious than gonorrhoea. However, it is frequently a relatively long continued, worrying, nuisance type of illness and, in the general population, not infrequently associated with other debilitating complications in the form of arthritis and eye disease, the so-called "Reiter's syndrome."

While the increase of proven gonorrhoea is less remarkable in the student population, in the past year or so we have seen several cases where the strain of gonococcus responsible for the infection has proven resistant to many of the commonly used drugs, and much more difficult to cure.

Despite the Pill, everyone would be well advised to remember that indiscriminate sexual exposure continues to carry with it very real complicating hazards. Accepting that prevention is generally better than cure, the ideal preventive measure still consists of personal control and avoidance of exposure. For those persons unable to exhibit sufficient personal continence, the use of the prophylactic condom, and such simple measures as extraordinary personal cleanliness immediately after exposure, appear still to be worthwhile, as is also an early visit to a doctor when in doubt.

Students wishing to discuss these and other matters of sex education with a doctor, will be welcomed at the University Health Service.

G. E. Wodehouse, M.D.
Director.

Dear Mr. Bastien,
Why all this pessimism! Surely black History is being made every day and should not be confined to the re-telling of past injustices. Let us try to write some more post-emancipation books that would give a positive outlook to our black schoolchildren in the Caribbean.

What did you learn at COE (COE?) today?

By SHERRY BRYDSON

Taking a trip to the College of Education is like taking a step back into your past.

Remember the high school you attended? Well, COE is just like it, or maybe even a bit worse.

Long corridors, suitably decorated with posters. Buy Twig Ads! (compliments of the UTS magazine) Thursday is Pub Night — Go to the Brunswick House (compliments of the student council, who until recently saw themselves as a social agency).

In the basement, wall to wall lockers and a cafeteria that makes the Devonshire House basement look like Paradise.

And a lot of disillusioned people.

I went to several classes recently, much to my discomfort. First on the list was the much-criticised History and Philosophy of Education.

The assignments for this course: a 1,000-word essay on The Role of the Teacher in Today's Society, and a "report of the student's views on one important problem raised during this course after he has read at least one of the approved books on the subject."

Hmm. And I had just finished a conversation with several disgruntled students who felt their time could be more profitably spent studying contemporary educational philosophers such as Paul Goodman, A. S. Neill — even Montessori.

But no — the topic was Plato and Elitism, and we all got out our notebooks and settled down in the somewhat rickety chairs in a long, narrow classroom.

Instructor J. M. Paton, a kindly looking man with a slight Scots burr, starts by giving us "a little background" on Plato — that he was an outstanding student of Socrates and that he founded the academy.

THE GRADING OF STUDENT TEACHERS

BASIS OF JUDGMENT

a) PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS:

- i) Voice: Is it strong? melodious?
Does it lack tone, range, colour?
Is it properly projected?
(Is remedial work at the College indicated?)
Is it authoritative?

- ii) Speech: Does he use colloquialisms?
Is the student fluent?
Does he speak with an accent?
(What should be our attitude toward the French-Canadian for whom English is the second language?)

ARISTOCRAT

"But these things are not too important," Paton says. "What is important to remember is that Plato was an aristocrat."

Paton then went on to describe Plato's three-tiered education system: the little-educated men of Bronze, the men of Silver, whose main education centered around the arts of war, and the intellectual elite — the men of Gold.

(At this point, a student from the middle of the classroom began waving his arm in the air. It was ignored.)

After further amplification, Mr. Paton asked his class: "Is there any merit in this elitist picture at all?"

"Basically, this is the type of system we have today," offered one student.

No one challenged him. "In the process Plato described, it is an impossible situation," said another. "The student would lose contact with the world."

There was no argument. The student who had earlier tried to ask a question put up his hand. It was again ignored.

Although he had promised to "clear up a few terms" at the end of the class, there was no time, and we trotted off to lunch in the gracious COE cafeteria.

Lunch was a bit of a struggle as we waited in line in the pipe-lined basement room (giving priority to the UTS boys, of course).

FRUSTRATION

I mentioned my frustration at the discussion during the History and Philosophy of Education class. "They acted as if they thought elitism and censorship is a good thing!" I moaned.

My companions told me I hadn't heard the half of it. Only 38 out of the 80 or so students had attended the class, I learned. The rest have just given up. They don't care any more.

"No use rocking the boat," one told me cynically. "It won't do any good, so we just ignore it."

Discussion centered around the lack of a rallying point for the students. The cafeteria, capable of seating perhaps 50 of the 1,000 students registered at COE, is hot, stuffy and unpleasant. (Not to mention the quality of the food, of course.)

The student council doesn't have its own office.

"Everyone goes home as soon as his classes are over. There's no way you can reach the student body."

"Except if you go to the Brunswick House on Thursday nights," said The Cynic.

(I was later treated to beer at the Brunswick, THE drinking spa for COE people. It's just as blah, if not blah-er, than the COE itself.)

My six table companions agreed practise teaching was the best thing about the College, "because you get away from it." But they found a lot of faults with the way the Associate marks the student teacher.

"It's a purely subjective thing. I heard of a girl, a Chinese girl, who got low marks in her French classes, because she didn't have a good accent. Actually, it was more probably because the associate doesn't like Chinese people."

"Yeah — I was given a low mark, not because of my scholarship, but because I was too casual. I said yeah, and O.K. too much."

"One French teacher at Runnymede makes her students swear on the Bible when they tell her why they didn't do their homework. She gave her student teacher a bad mark when he refused to do the same."

And so the discussion went. It was not really a normal discussion, because few COE students feel like talking about their course outside of class — they want to forget it as soon as possible.

It was not a normal discussion because few COE students linger in their cafeteria, or eat there at all, for that matter.

And it was not a normal discussion because few COE students have any ideas about what is wrong with their College and what they could do to change it.

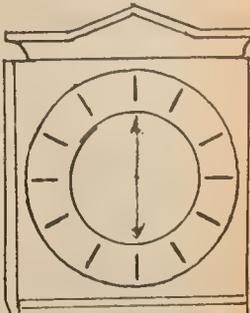

As we passed the Staff Only elevator and began the long climb to the top of the building for another class, I couldn't help but wonder why the students haven't done something to improve conditions.

"You know, on the basis of what I've learned here so far, I'm going to make a lousy teacher," my companion told me, as we settled in our seats to wait for a lecture on Administration and Professional Practise.

Preminger stumbles into generation gap

By SUE CUP

A generation gap exists according to a Great Hollywood film maker. Sixty-five-year-old Otto Preminger said he was very interested in these problems.

"As I see it," he said, "the older generation has less communication with the younger generation than ever before."

"I have tried to examine it and make a comedy about it."

It was a rather dull evening last night listening to this renowned director making comments about our problems. It might have helped if there were more university students there to question Preminger.

His purpose in coming to the U of T campus was to meet young people. Surrounded by actors and cameramen all day, he likes to travel with a new movie so that he can test the reactions of young people and hear what they have to say.

Preminger was very adamant in his feelings that the youth of today want a voice in their future and should be allowed to have it.

"We expect young people to live by our conventional rules, to be grateful for our food, our educations, our cars," he said.

"Young people don't accept us. They feel they must have a voice in their future."

SAC refuses to give EBS grant

A request for a $60 grant by the Edmund Burke Society was turned down at last Thursday's SAC meeting.

This followed immediately on the heels of accusations against society chairman Paul Fromm (III SMC) to the effect that he had refused to pay $25 to an NDP participant in a debate held last March.

On Dec. 1 Fromm mailed a ten dollar cheque to Patrick Lawlor, NDP MPP for Lakeshore for debating with a right-wing American columnist, Russell Kirk, on campus March 22. Lawlor is returning that cheque.

The trouble is that both he, and Alberto Di Giovanni (II SMC) (through whom Fromm contacted Lawlor), and SMC philosophy Prof. W. B. Dunphy (who says he heard the agreement made) say the amount agreed upon was $25.

Kirk asked for and received $150 as honorarium, in addition to his expenses while in Toronto.

"At no time was anyone promised an honorarium," says Fromm.

Throughout history Friday the 13 has been a day of evil and foreboding. Friday 13 has always been a day to stay in bed, and not tempt the forces of evil.

This Friday the 13th, hopefully, will be different. The first meeting of the Commission on University Government convenes this Friday 13 at 2.30 in the Senate Chamber.

The Association of the Teaching Staff, in a mail-in vote, elected their representatives this weekend. More than 60 per cent of the Association voted.

Lawrence E. Lynch, professor of philosophy; John E. Hodgetts, principal of Victoria College; Bernard Ekkin, chairman of engineering science, Faculty of Applied Science and Engineering; and Dr. J. S. Thompson, chairman of the department of anatomy, Faculty of Medicine were the teaching staff's choices.

The four staff and the four students, elected two weeks ago, will be joined by President Bissell, Robert L. Hicks, past president Alumni Association, and two assessors from the Board of Governors.

The assessors for the first meeting will be W.M.B. Ash and Wallace McCutcheon, defeated candidate for federal parliament. Neither the assessors nor Hicks will have a vote on the Commission.

The commission meetings are open to anyone in the university.

The commission will "examine, study, and make recommendations on the structure and government of the university," writing a report for next fall.

Simcoe Hall speaks softly

Campus residence leaders met with top level administrators at Simcoe Hall yesterday afternoon to discuss the fees strike which began Nov. 30, but there was no showdown.

More than 400 students have been getting free room and board at three campus residences since they refused to pay the latest fees instalment. They charge mortgage payments on New College have added $90.40 to their fees this year.

Students came away from the meeting feeling the administration was sympathetic to their demands, but they were uncertain of success.

"The fees problem was not solved," said Peter Blanchard (III UC). "But the administration knows where we stand."

"There was no pressure for us to pay up," he said. "But we're going to have to pay sometime."

Simcoe Hall suggested to the residence council chairmen that they prepare some suggestions on how to run the residences more efficiently and more cheaply.

This could involve such steps as the elimination of maid service and donships.

Blanchard thought if some changes were made a cutback in fees might be possible this year.

Jennifer Penny (III UC) was one of two U of T students arrested Friday in a 250-man picket of students and newspaper editors at the Peterboro Examiner.

She was arrested on a charge of creating a public disturbance and at her arraignment Monday she was charged with assault.

Peter Simoni (III New) was arrested at the strike on two charges of assault.

inducements which totalled up an amazing total of 147 points this weekend.

The Toronto forces, with 103½ points between their teeth, struggled valiantly against their odd and bedraggled (MIT's captain was Jason Bedrag) opponents to win second place in the invitation-al meet. An eight-man crew from Cornell Stork University also competed.

The tournament consisted of 64 games of tiddlywinks, a sport invented by the Roman poet Catullus between snatches of sleep and love-making. This weekend's bouts consumed a total of seven consecutive hours.

"There is a great deal of body contact in the game," team captain Jesse Byron Alexander revealed, "Especially in the final winks."

the discussion will go on for years to come," Dr. Bissell concluded with a chuckle. He went on to explain that the brief was intended to show persuasively to the CUA how a university which has reached almost total enrolment can still need such a large capital building program.

Students' Administrative Council President Steve Langdon, spearheading the student attack on the form of the brief, insisted that future meetings on the brief should be held openly.

"We don't let this be the only meeting," he said. Langdon then asked the Council to hear representatives of Law, Forestry, and the Institute of Child Study, all of whom felt the brief had given them short shrift.

"I'd like to present to the Council Mr. Howard Swartz, President of the Law Society," Langdon said.

"I'd like to point out that representatives of these three groups did appear at a meeting of the Presidents Coun-time. "There's only one thing that you can injure in this game," charged captain Alexander (the Great) Brough, and he did it. The injured team member was escorted from the field by limping comrades, many of them sucking his thumb for comfort, the captain noted.

He says he is still looking for neophytes to bolster his team's sagging morale after this defeat. He wants an intercollegiate winking league formed too. Doug Fether Crombie, who used to write sports for The Varsity, was killed in a more than usually thumb-to-jowl episode of the contest. But it was OK, because he was playing for MIT.

Down demonstration. CEWE is now sponsoring a petition among the student body urging SHC to hold a cross-campus referendum on student recruitment.

The petition has over 1,000 names and is expected by CEWE to have the required 2,000 by next Monday.

If the petition is successful, the referendum will ask, "Are you in favor of on-campus recruitment by private companies and government institutions?"

Thursday will proceed to Simcoe Hall to present a letter to the administration asking that recruitment be halted until a referendum is held. Kopyto said about 75-100 students are anticipated at the meeting.

distribution trucks from emptying and leaving the plant. It was hoped pressmen would not cross the picket line to print Saturday's paper, but late Friday night the printers crossed the line after a brief scuffle.

However Guild members were said to be very happy with the student support and are confident the strike will be won. Both strikers and students are stressing the broader issue of Thomson's near-monopoly press control, and the question of capitalist-owned media.

The 250 student supporters included about 45 from U of T, and others from York, Ottawa and Waterloo. This is thought to be the first time in Southern Ontario that students have joined a militant background. The two-paragraph section on the institute of Child Study was deleted entirely. (Dr. Bissell went so far as to term the Institute "world-famous.") references suggesting the heavier reliance of graduate students for undergraduate instruction were removed or reduced.

a paragraph concerning the predominantly Canadian flavor of the School of Graduate Studies was eliminated (some students felt it to be racist).

The proposed addition to Simcoe Hall and the new Faculty Club, mentioned in the same sentence, were separated into two parts.

Student member Bob Rae (IV UC) said after the Monday meeting: "Sure, we've been co-opted. Nothing in that brief was changed enough to make any real difference. But at least we forced it into the open."

Miss Penny described the incident to The Varsity. "We had been on the picket line for seven hours," she said, "— from 6 a.m. Then this goddam man started driving through the pickets in a truck. There were 45 cops pushing 100 pickets.

"A cop shouted to another cop that I'd beenbugging him all day. Then they grabbed me. I hit them with my arm to try to free me from their grasp, and then they carried me off."

"I was in jail four hours," she said. "They didn't tell us about our rights. They didn't tell us that we could make a phone call. They asked us all kinds of questions — our religion, the school we had attended, and they even asked some of the boys their racial background."

"Secret" brief gets revamped in public

ter forming a committee to meet Sunday to re-draft the brief in light of Friday's discussion. The Council turned down a proposal to allow concerned persons to the Sunday meeting.

Monday, the council met again, same time, same place, presumably to rubber-stamp the brief as re-drafted by the Sunday committee. (Members of that committee were careful to point out they had spent six hours rewriting the brief, but that didn't prevent the Presidents Council from taking another four hours to consider the revisions.)

Featured in the discussion Monday were five, 10 and 15-minute discussions on the use of the word "could" (twice changed to "might"), the deletion or addition of quotation marks, and the relative impact of "merely" as opposed to such words as "only" or "solely."

However, the Presidents Council eventually accepted most of the student demands for revision: The Council adjourned af-our experimental school. "The minister did not know about the proposal, and I suggest he might even be embarrassed by the brief, as he has never been approached about the matter."

The faculty of Forestry made a similar plea, claiming no one from the faculty had been seriously consulted about the proposed move to Erindale.

The Friday meeting went on for four hours, with tempers fraying more by the minute as the dinner hour approached.

When asked by Mr. Sword to sum up the students' requests, Langdon began: "...the Forestry section will have to be changed..."

Dr. Bissell: "It doesn't HAVE to be changed, Mr. Langdon!"
Langdon: "I'm sorry, I didn't mean it in those terms..."
Bissell: "Nothing HAS to be done."
Langdon: "It's your council..."
The Council adjourned af-

finally agreed to hear Swartz (III Law), who described the inadequate facilities—a windowless recreation room in the basement of the Law building, a law library rated eighth in Canada, a lunchroom in which the temperature rarely goes below 85 degrees.

"Unless the university undertakes substantial expansion of the Law facilities, it would be pipe-dreaming to even think about a bigger library or a higher enrolment," Swartz concluded.

The Council was seriously embarrassed by a presentation from the Institute for Child Studies. Although the brief suggests that the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE) should absorb the faculty, Prof. M.F. Grapko, chairman of the department, explained that the OISE is in no position to make such a move.

"Our work is outside the terms of reference of the OISE," he explained. "Their entire by-laws would have to be changed in order to absorb ci," Dr. Bissell interjected. "Their presentations were not lengthy, but they were there."

"These decisions were not made in a vacuum," he concluded, pushing back his chair angrily.

Executive Vice President Sword, acting as chairman of the Council, said: "Dean Sisham (Forestry Dean J.W.B. Sisham) made a brief to this Council."

"We should set a time limit," suggested Vice President (non-academic) A.G. Rankin. "We do want to get to the meat of things."

"We want to keep this discussion as general as possible," agreed Dr. Bissell. "Furthermore this brief must still be approved by the Executive Committee of the Board."

"Regardless of the difficulties involved," insisted Langdon, "this brief concerns the university's future. We must be prepared to spend the time to consider it seriously."

And so it went. The Council

: see what can happen when people are learning for their own interest

By MARY KATE ROWAN

I remember a little blonde bright-eyed girl who used to bounce home from kindergarten and run to her mother with "School was fun today, Mommy".

Somewhere along the line the girl stopped skipping to school and her mother heard less and less the phrase. "School is fun".

Today, she yawns her way through university lectures, attacks her required reading with a little less fire in her eyes, churns out term paper after term paper and somehow always manages to acquire enough "knowledge" to pass examinations.

During your school career how much learning have you done because you wanted to? How much have you done because of the all-important exam? There is a difference in motivation.

There are classes at the University of Toronto where students attend for one reason only—because they want to. Called the Free University of Toronto and sponsored by SAC, it terms itself a "counter-institution to provide meaningful learning opportunities unavailable in the University of Toronto."

The number of courses—"Oh, approximately 25," shrugs Bob Bossin (B.A.6T7), registrar and SAC's full-time education consultant. "It's hard to say because new courses are being added all the time. Anyone who is interested can start a course on anything."

Courses include Anarchism, Non-Authoritative Medicine, University of Toronto History, Latin America—The Role of the Military and Computers for Artsmen. All are tuition-free, exam-free and credit-free.

According to Bossin, the counter-courses, which originated in a campaign promise last spring by student council President Steve Langdon, were established to "see what can happen when people are learning for their own interest."

"It's people wanting to learn as opposed to memorizing what they don't give a damn about."

After the first advertisement in The Varsity, SAC received 300 phone inquiries about the counter courses. As the "counter-institution" enters its third month, Anarchy, Canadian History, and Magic and Witchcraft have been the most popular.

No one was interested in "The Canadian Government" or "Imperialism and the Cold War". Even though a number of people expressed interest in the Film Group, no one was willing to direct the course. It too died.

"I don't see that in terms of failure," says Bob Bossin. "If a person drops out of a course, it's a learning, not a failure. At least people in the Film Group learned where their interests lay."

Format in the FU of T classes varies. Many use the "student-centered teaching" approach in which the typical student-teacher relationship is non-existent.

Ideally, in "student-centered teaching", the "teacher" steps down from his Mount Olympus of the lecture podium to become a resource person—equal in stature to, but with more knowledge than the student.

No one calls anyone "Sir". Often, teacher and student are on a first name basis. They may even share the same ashtray. Because of the casual atmosphere, it is easier for ideas to flow.

"My function," says Frank Park, who conducts a course on Cuba, "is to chair a discussion and add something to it."

Stanley Ryerson, historian and author of several books on Canadian history is resource person in the Canadian History counter-course. He defines a resource person as "someone who is able to be consulted and who is able to make suggestions rather than someone who just gives lectures."

"My function is to get people talking," adds Don Crowe (III UC), resource person for Anarchy: The Political Philosophy.

As motivation for learning the present educational system provides essays and exams—forms of external evaluation. The FU of T disregards this motivation and substitutes interest.

"It's learning as opposed to pretending you know it," explains Bossin. "In this situation there is no one you have to impress with marks so there is no pretending. It's very difficult to pretend and learn at the same time."

"There really is a lot of discussion," comments Crowe. "It's the kind of thing that develops when people are really interested in what's going on."

How does the conversation start? "What happens at a party?" counters Crowe. "However, we're always on topic."

He expressed surprise at the number of students in his course who have done the suggested reading and know exactly what is going on at all times.

However, there are problems in the student-centered teaching approach.

"Some problems can't be solved by pure spontaneity," commented Ryerson. "Also, there is a problem of continuity, since the same people don't come to each class, often we have to start fresh."

"This set-up has the potential to become a valuable learning situation, but it is still in the early stages. It needs perhaps to be more strongly structured and integrated as a system."

Ryerson cited another problem—because some members are graduate students and some undergraduates, there is a variation of the information the individuals have on Canadian history.

Can the counter-courses have an effect on the present university set-up?

"Perhaps", comments Ryerson. "There is a possible stimulus to change in that these courses are going on and are being attended. However, to have a really major effect, the system must be well-organized."

What is the future for the FU of T? "Maybe we'll have a calendar next year," says Bob Bossin. "Later, we might demand accreditation from the university for these courses. However, that's not important. The important thing is what happens in these learning situations."

One of his main objections to the system as it is now, is that students must borrow time from their regular courses to attend the counter-courses. Most courses are held at night or during lunch periods.

Students seem to borrow time willingly, at least in Don Crowe's course where the discussion lasts from two till six on a Friday afternoon.

How often have you wished for a four hour class?

Prof welcomes Viet Cong victory

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

"Unlike most of my distinguished colleagues here this morning, I do not fear or regret the impending Vietcong victory in Vietnam. I welcome it."

These words were spoken in 1965 by Prof. Eugene D. Genovese, then a professor of history at Rutgers University in New Jersey.

Dr. Genovese speaks at 4 p.m. today in Room 203 of the New Physics Building on Slavery in the Americas in World Perspective.

His statement, made during an April 1965 teach-in touched off a state-wide controversy over whether Genovese should be dismissed.

Genovese remained at Rutgers University until the spring of 1967 when he resigned and moved to Sir George Williams University in Montreal where he is currently a full professor of history.

Genovese's outspoken remarks have appeared in other places as well. In 1963 he reviewed a book by Herbert Aptheker which supported the Moscow line of peaceful co-existence. Genovese disagreed violently with Aptheker and wrote that "remarks about several hundred million casualties in a nuclear war are, like all pacifist hand-wringing, irrelevant."

This review sparked harsh disagreement even with an American Communist Party magazine which attacked him for "arguing in favor of building Socialism by the strag-gling remnants of humanity crawling out of a nuclear inferno."

Genovese, who says he is "a Marxist and a Socialist," is also the author of a book on the economy and society of the slave South.

A review in Book Week said "There is no doubt that this is an important book, and both its major and minor themes are impressively and persuasively stated."

Prof. Genovese's visit on campus is sponsored by the Department of History.

Daniels new physics head

A physics professor whose specialty is low temperature nuclear research and whose hobby is mountain climbing, has been appointed to succeed spectroscopy specialist Dr. H. L. Welsh as chairman of the department of physics, Dr. Claude Bissell announced yesterday.

Dr. J. M. Daniels, the new physics head, performed the world's first experiment which successfully "lined up" the nuclei of atoms with their spin axes pointing in one direction. He performed this experiment using generators purchased from the Manchester city streetcar system.

Dr. Daniels joined the U of T in 1961. As department chief he hopes to continue his research and make use of U.S Atomic Energy Commission's Zero-Gradient Synchrotron, one of the most powerful atom-smashers in the world.

Dr. Welsh, who is leaving the headship of the department after six years, will devote his time to teaching and research in his field of spectroscopy — the study of the refraction of light.

This picture was handed out to about 50 members of the U of T Liberal Club yesterday noon by Gary Oakes, one of its co-authors.

Oakes, a former reporter for the Toronto Telegram happened to be in Ottawa during Trudeau's rise to popularity. Yesterday he wore a black leather jacket and yellow and black polka-dot tie.

"I think Trudeau's a superficial swinger," he said, flicking his cigarette ash into the chalk ledge of the black board. "I think he'll last one more election and then quit, probably go back to teaching."

Oakes is presently doing graduate work at Massey College.

CONSOLIDATED - BATHURST LIMITED

BACKGROUND

In 1967 two solid and long-established companies and their subsidiaries joined forces in a dovetailed operation that represents wider geographical dispersion and greater product diversification. This integration brought with it a new name: Consolidated-Bathurst Limited. Consolidated Paper Corporation Ltd. had been linked traditionally with newsprint, Bathurst Paper Ltd. largely with packaging paperboards and containers made from paperboards.

Consolidated-Bathurst is 93% Canadian owned, with its head office in Montreal. Sales in 1967 were $278 million. The Company harvests 22,000 sq miles of woodlands and operates eight mills and some thirty converting plants in Canada. The Company has manufacturing subsidiaries in the United States and in West Germany. One of Canada's largest producers of newsprint. Consolidated-Bathurst has about half of its total dollar sales in packaging materials in paper, wood and plastic. It also sells bleached kraft pulp and has a wood products group of five sawmills.

OPPORTUNITIES

In the structure of the parent Company there are five business or operational groups: Woodlands, Mill Manufacturing, Newsprint and Pulp, Wood Products and Packaging. The Company's management philosophy and its organization into functional and business groups are intended to provide every opportunity for the advancement of promising employees, present and future.

Top quality graduates in the faculties or departments of chemical, mechanical and industrial engineering, chemistry (research-graduate and post-graduate levels), business administration and commerce, will be offered positions that will allow them to demonstrate their ability to perform with competence and progress to management responsibility at an early age.

While on-the-job training will be emphasized, graduates, along with other company employees, will participate in development programmes coordinated by the Manpower Planning & Management Development Department.

DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Performance is reviewed annually and salary increases and promotions are based on individual performance and potential. A complete range of coordinated employee benefits is comparable with the best available.

Consolidated - Bathurst representatives will interview Commerce and Business Administration graduates on Friday, December 6th and Engineering graduates and undergraduates on Friday, December 13th, 1968. Please see your Placement Service for further details.

DISCRIMINATION

By SUE HEIWIG

"I came to this country for one reason: to get a job that recognized my background."

His name, Carl Kemp-Jackson

His qualifications: a degree in economics from the London School of Economics, one year completed and two courses credit towards a diploma offered by the Institute of Bankers of England and Wales.

His age: 31.

His color: black

Eleven weeks and 46 applications later, Kemp-Jackson has been refused even a comprehensive interview from all of the chartered banks, government banks, and trust companies in the city of Toronto.

"I am not complaining that any particular bank failed to hire me. I am complaining about the cavalier attitude with which they treated my application."

Carl Kemp-Jackson is a soft-spoken man of medium height who shrinks with embarrassment when you put him in front of a camera. He chooses his words very carefully when he speaks, often pausing to qualify his ideas.

"I stated in my application that I understood there were openings for trained and experienced personnel and I enclosed my resume."

"These applications were not written in response to advertisements. They were based on a belief that the banks could use someone who could be quite useful in a bank."

Discrimination is not an unusual occurrence in Toronto. It seems to be more subtle than in the United States or Britain (we have yet to produce an Enoch Powell). But it certainly is just as humiliating.

Right now Kemp-Jackson is happy working for the University of Toronto Personnel Department. But he has no intention of applying to a bank as long as he remains in Canada.

"I wasn't under any illusion that Canadians were any less prejudiced than anybody else. But I feel I have a certain responsibility as far as the banks are concerned. If a man is equipped for a particular job he should be given a chance."

"It's very difficult to make a charge because nine-tenths of what we have is based on suspicion. In other words, we can't substantiate it."

"But I believe that if enough people begin to express dissatisfaction with the banks, they will at least have to go through the motions of treating every application on merit. This is all I'm asking that an employer look at my application on merit and not just throw it aside."

There is some bitterness in his voice when he speaks about the first few weeks in Toronto. Bitterness directed not at first impressions of the city and its people but at an important and powerful segment of the business community: the financial institutions.

For the last three years in London Kemp-Jackson was considering emigration to Canada. During this time, he gathered information from a variety of sources.

The first and most important of these was the Canadian Department of Immigration which he visited on a number of occasions. Here he was told that Canada was a land of opportunity where anyone who has a skill, anyone who has something to offer is bound to get on.

Unofficially, he was told by an immigration official in London that as far as the racial situation is concerned, Canada was probably no different from England.

"When we interview people for particular employment categories, we invariably expect colored people to have higher qualifications," he told Kemp-Jackson. "Because we believe that given the situation in Canada, he can only get on if he has higher qualifications or is better experienced than the next person."

Reports from friends who were recent immigrants to Canada were mixed. No one was overly enthusiastic and no one downright pessimistic. And a Canadian friend in London assured him that if he were leaving England because of the racial situation, then Canada wasn't the place to come to.

"As far as the official information was concerned, generally a very nice picture was painted and the question of racial difficulties was raised," he explains.

Prospective immigrants with independent status are judged on the basis of nine categories: education and training, occupational skill and demand, age, arranged employment, knowledge of English and French, relatives in Canada, employment opportunities in the area of destination, and personal assessment.

The officer must explain to the applicant that he must be prepared to take employment in other than his own field. But there is no immigration regulation that suggests to the prospective Negro immigrant that he will face discrimination in Canada.

On the basis of his own experiences since his arrival, Kemp-Jackson feels that department of immigration in London is very misleading.

"You can be misleading without being hypocritical," he explains. "According to the picture painted in London, the only criterion for success in this country is merit."

"But this isn't the reality of the situation in my experience. Nobody has made a greater effort that I have as can be seen by the number of applications I have made."

The Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce did not interview him although he had done well on a preliminary test. The test supervisor told him he had done very well. But this was not enough to warrant an interview.

The Bank of Montreal told him initially they were interested in his background. His application would have to be forwarded to their Montreal head-office for further consideration and he could expect a reply in ten days.

Three days later he received a letter from them disclaiming any further interest. This leads him to believe that the original application was not forwarded.

"I am not accusing the employment officers of being racists. But there is something wrong somewhere and I think the difficulty arises from the fact that I am a colored person.

"They might be worried that I might disturb the pattern of personal relationships in their organization. For instance, they might be disturbed at the thought of placing me in a supervisory position. People might be unwilling to take instructions from me. I am not sure of this, but I feel that it is a matter that has to be given some consideration."

When he felt he had reached the end of the road as far as the banks were concerned, Kemp-Jackson paid a visit to the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

This body was unable to do anything at all for him since banks operate under federal charters. Such a complaint would have to be handled by the federal department of labor.

Ordinarily the commission does everything possible to investigate complaints. It tries to settle through conciliation and will initiate legal action, if necessary. The aim of the commission is to settle by conciliation rather than in court since legal proceedings tend to perpetuate rather than heal bad feelings.

Eric Sisel, the officer at the commission who interviewed Kemp-Jackson explains that large corporations are just as vulnerable to action from the commission as individuals.

He cites the case of a dispute settled by the commission last Spring involving racial discrimination against six welders.

These workers were told by their union officials (Local 46 of the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices) that they could not be included in a recruitment drive by the M.W. Kellogg Co., a large New York-based engineering and construction company. This company was recruiting in Canada for a job in Iowa.

Each of the six men was reimbursed $28,000 and received an apology from both company and union. This has been the commission's most publicized case, Sisel explains, because of the large financial settlement. But the commission does a great deal of less spectacular work and is not intimidated by the size or power of any organization.

Besides looking for jobs on his own, Kemp-Jackson received assistance from the Department of Manpower.

The day after his arrival in Toronto, every landed immigrant pays a visit to the Manpower office at the corner of Jarvis and Dundas Sts.

Here he is greeted by a line of wickets and directed to a waiting section where he fills out an information card describing his qualifications and employment record. He is moved on to another row of benches to wait while his card is sorted by machine according to job classification.

Eventually he is called by one of 25 counsellors who work in six by eight foot cubicles. These are partitioned off from the rest of the room and from each other by walls that scarcely reach five feet in height.

The initial interview may last half an hour or one and a half hours, depending on how many people are waiting in line. Here, the first contacts for employment are made.

This one room handles first accommodation and first employment for 12,000 people per year. Including wives and children, its decisions affect an estimated total of 20,000 persons.

"We try to let them know they are not alone in the city," says Charles White, manager of this reception and settlement area.

"We look after them until they get their first job. As long as we get them earning some money it's up to them to advance themselves. Afterwards they go on to the regular manpower centres.

As far as discrimination goes, White recognizes that it does exist. But he feels his department is dependent on co-operation from the general public.

"They can make all the laws they want. But if the general public does not accept people of other nationalities, then things can't work. We do have this discrimination. Even without color we have complaints. Sometimes I wonder if it's a matter of approach... they fail to establish a rapport. Yet there are so many of all kinds of races and creeds getting jobs and getting good jobs."

Mr. White made what may be the definitive comment for reactions to the whole question: "It's a very delicate area I don't like to become involved in."

But when a man has a black skin involvement is not a matter of choice. It's a fact of life.

To Carl Kemp-Jackson the manpower department is the man at the wicket. And the man at the wicket is the one who is likely to say to him as soon as his face appears, "you shouldn't be in this office. The office for industrial employment is not in this building."

Call it insensitivity on the part of an individual who probably didn't know any better. But this is the kind of comment that is likely to set a man on his guard.

Last Thursday, Secretary of State Gerard Pelletier was quoted as saying that recruitment of immigrants in Europe is limited to 'occupation groups in which there is a shortage in Canada.'

Of the people enlisted in the United Kingdom so far this year, the story says, 19 were computer experts, 14 scientific researchers, and 11 classified under the 'economy-sociology-statistical' heading.

Kemp-Jackson was classified by the manpower department as a financial economist. Presumably under the final heading. It would seem reasonable that he would have little difficulty in getting a job.

But the Manpower officials describe the employment situation in slightly different terms.

"The greater the qualifications, the longer it takes to find a man the job he wants," says Charles White.

"We have a few isolated cases where we have difficulty in finding places for well-qualified people. At present we are trying to run a psychological survey to help us. But this kind of case is definitely not the usual pattern. The regular thing is our being able to find a job."

The federal department of labor is at present investigating Kemp-Jackson's complaints.

And some of the bitterness has gone out of his voice now that the frustrations of being rejected time and time again are no longer an immediate reality.

But as George F. McCurdy an administrator for the office of fair employment practices, explained it in a speech delivered to the Ottawa Rotary Club in September:

"The grievous truth is that discrimination is no less cruel or debilitating because it is practiced with more politeness or subtlety here than in other parts of the world."

"White Canadians, I know, have difficulty understanding what life is really like for people of color who face the trauma of rejection and humiliation in their daily lives. White people cannot claim with any accuracy, to know people of color or understand the hurts until we bring the life patterns closer than they are now... until we have greater dialogue or equal status."

Excerpts from Wednesday's U.C. Lit. Meeting

The University College Literary and Athletic Society met in the Sir Daniel Wilson Common Room Wednesday night at 7:30 p.m. David Hardisty (IV UC) was speaker of the house. The house defeated a motion by president Howie Goldblatt (IV UC) to withdraw University College from the Students Administrative Council.

Mr. Art Stein (III UC): I would like once again to congratulate the Lit. for spending a great deal of time and getting nothing done. In order to insure the same thing happens next time I would like to serve notice of a motion to impeach all five UC SAC members, and then maybe we'll get some meaningful debate.

Some honourable members: Oh, Oh.

The house entered a prolonged debate on the relevance and application of Robert's Rules of Order to Lit. meetings. Tony Pargeter (III UC) about as serious as anything that's gone here tonight.

Mr. Speaker: I'm going to anticipate you and rule that motion out of order right now.

Mr. Pargeter: Can you rule a motion out of order before it's made?

The house moved on to a discussion of a brief to be presented to the UC college council next Tuesday. The brief outlines the Lit.'s proposals for choosing students to sit on the council, and includes a call for openness.

Mr. Pargeter moved that Lit. members be seated instead of having separate elections. The motion was amended to make the scheme operative for only one year.

Mr. Speaker: Did anyone get the motion down?

(Miss) Ruth Wilson (I UC, Lit. secretary): If you mean me, YES I DID.

Mr. Gordon moved adjournment. The motion failed for

The University College Literary and Athletic Society Wednesday night unanimously rejected a motion to withdraw University College from the Students Administrative Council.

The motion, presented by Lit president Howie Goldblatt, stated that the Lit "deems it in its best interests to withdraw immediately and completely" from SAC. There were no votes in favor of the motion, 14 opposed it and two members abstained.

The motion came under heavy fire from several disgruntled Lit members, and was characterized by one as being "an asinine motion presented in an asinine manner". Tony Pargeter (III UC) at one point suggested Lit members "talk seriously or go some where else and play with their toys."

Goldblatt stressed he put forward the motion because he wished to promote a discussion of SAC. "I put it forward like this because you can't make a negative motion under Robert's Rules of Order," he said. "It is for us to discuss SAC. I'm pleading with you to defeat the motion."

shot pool.

Two objections were raised to a motion establishing a committee to investigate and clarify Robert's Rules as they apply to the Lit. The question was put to the house.

Mr. Speaker: All in favour of the motion. The motion is passed.

Some honourable members: Call for abstentions.

Mr. Speaker: Abstentions. Some honourable members: Put that in the minutes.

The house discussed the status of the UC newspaper, The Gargoyle. Mr. Goldblatt stated a meeting would be held during or after Christmas to investigate the matter. He denied knowledge of rumours that The Gargoyle had folded.

Mr. Manny Gordon (Gargoyle editor): I can always put out a Gargoyle even if I run out of money. I can always put it out on toilet paper.

Some honourable members: It would be an improvement.

Mr. Pargeter served notice of a motion for the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Pargeter: I will make a motion to withdraw the UC Lit. from Canada. That's lack of a seconder.

The house continued discussion on representatives to the college council.

Mr. Pargeter: Professor Watt . . .

Some honourable members: What?

Mr. Pargeter: Do you want to hear this or not?

Some honourable members: Go on.

Mr. Pargeter: Professor Watt seemed to oppose the 12 and 12 plan because it couldn't be logically justified. He would accept the plan to seat the Lit. because it doesn't have to be logically justified.

After lengthy debate the motion carried.

The house considered adopting the rest of the brief as minimum acceptable standards for student participation on the council. At 9:50 p.m. the motion came to a vote. As the vote was called, one member left, depriving the house of a quorum.

Mr. Speaker: The meeting is adjourned.

Some honourable members: Hurray.

VIC VALIANTLY AND VORACIOUSLY VANQUISHES VILE V'INNIS

By GELLIUS
LACROSSE FINAL

Vic ended Law's three-year reign as Interfaculty Lacrosse champions (Don Arthurs graduated and Law lost all their games this year) by defeating Innis 5-3 to take their best-of-three series two games to one. Vic thus wins the W.A. Dafoe (you will recall that the VC is awarded for "conspicuous gallantry in the face of Dafoe") Trophy. Blyth (3) and Lily of the Valley (2) scored for the champs; Meek and mild Bob Besley had two and Okihiro one for Innis.

HOCKEY

Sharpe scored twice and Allen once to lead Vic's 3-0 shut-out of PHE.

Dents beat UC, 7-1. Akiyama (2), Sullivan (2), Jones, Pollard and Glazier (the translation of the French "plus gparessoux") hit for Dents; Brunskill (well known insecticide) replied for UC.

Murphy and Pashby were scorers as SMC B and Meds tied 1-1.

Ryan, Armstrong, Kennedy, Michie and Crescenzi (Italian, "getting louder") gave Erin a 5-1 win over Jr. Eng. (Craig).

Griffin's goal was the whole story in For's 1-0 shut-out of New.

PHE B (Hungerford 2, Wasylow) 3, Knox (Gibson) 1.

BASKETBALL

More ethnic than Jaanus Proos! More frequent than the seven-year locust! Once again Lochinvar Sprogis rides out of the West to score 17 points and, aided by Shaw's 17, to give Erin a 55-38 win over Law. Pyne and en Garbe! each had 12 for Law.

Coste scored 14 for Jr. Eng. but lo! it availeth nought, for Bowen's 12 paced Trin's 35-29 victory. Nor were Cook's eight points productive of the desired result: Archimandrite, King of Kings, beat Jr. Eng. 37-25. Kohn scored 16 points.

Deaney (I am an Artsie; A.D. Allen is my deaney) scored 14 as Dents took Scar, 41-33. Dow and Pump scored 8 apiece for the losers (scar; see above.)

NEWS FROM BASKETBELLE FRONT

The Women's Interfaculty Basketball champions were decided last week when two PHE teams, II and VI, battled in the final game of the play offs. It was an extremely tight game with neither team having an advantage of more than four points throughout.

However, in the last second of play in the fourth quarter, with the score tied 16-16, and with the thought of overtime play in the minds of all, a foul was called against team VI. Carol Pascoe, to whom the shot was awarded, managed to sink the shot, allowing PHE II to squeak by PHE VI to win the interfaculty championship, 17-16.

On the Intercollegiate level, York University hosted the first Basketball Tournament of the year featuring Queen's, Ryerson, York and Toronto. Toronto started off her season in great form, defeating all the teams in a decisive manner.

Against Tyerson, the Bluettes managed to run up 32 points to Ryerson's 15. Queen's was defeated by the score of 24-9, and the host team fell to the Toronto girls by a score of 33-15.

The Gymnastics Team travelled to Ottawa for their first meet of the year last weekend. In the beginners category, a combination of skill, power and grace placed Diane Leitch, PHE IV, in first position in the floor routine event.

Sharon Buckingham, ARTS I, took first place for the execution of her balance beam routine. In the vaulting competition, Klara Lendvay, PHE IV and Judy Kimmel, PHE IV, placed first and second respectively.

On the uneven bars, Monique Deruyer and Klara Lendvay took the top two positions for their performances. At the advanced level, Claudia Hunt from Ottawa University placed first in all four gymnastics areas, and as a result, was the individual tournament winner.

Marty Kemeny, PHE III, placed second in both the floor routines and vaulting events. Connie Lindenberger, PHE II, took second place for her routine on the balance beam.

The Toronto Team won the overall tournament, scoring 32 points to Ottawa's 30.

"Nevermore," quoth his companion, the Raven, who was perched above a busted palace.

"Come live with me and by my love," whaled Ishmael, in a fit of coffin.

"Will we all the pleasures prove?" asked the Raven, not a little alarmed at eying Eeyore, an eerie eyesore if ever there was won.

"Gomorrhah and gomorrhah and gomorrhah, replied Ishmael, from deep within the damp November of his soul.

YORK YEOMEN YONK BLUES

One of the main reasons for the fall of the Roman Empire was the decline of the yeomen class.

Last night the yeomen class made a triumphant return to civilization as the York Yeomen registered a stunning 3-1 upset over Varsity Blues in a hockey match played way out yonder at York.

Although it was only an exhibition match, and although Blues were missing defensemen Jim Miles, Dave Field and Terry Parsons, centres Paul Laurent and Brian St. John, and winger Len Burman, the defeat has to be bitter and embarrassing.

York fans rubbed salt into the wounds near the end of the game with a loud chant (inevitably): "We're number one! We're number one!"

Yeomen outplayed Blues most of the game and outshot them 30-20 (13-3 in the second period). It's been a long time since a team outshot Varsity that badly.

Paul McCann opened the scoring for Toronto at the eight minute mark of the first period but the lead lasted a mere minute before York's Andy Raven knotted the counter from a scramble in front of goaltender Adrian Watson.

The winning goal was a three-point bouncer from the point by defenseman Rick Porter scored at 18:05 of the opening period.

York is the loop leader of the OIAA (Ontario Intercollegiate Athletic Association), having won in their last eight games.

Tomorrow night, Varsity travels to London for a key game against the present leaders of the SIHL, surprising Western Mustangs, undefeated after four starts.

The teams return to Toronto for a game at Varsity Arena Friday night.

Blues should have everyone back in the lineup, except for Field who remains a doubtful starter.

Argh, 3-1 to York?

Every year about this time (i.e. when sportsies freeze up) there arrives in my mail a tourist type postcard depicting a lazy, carefree scene in some far off, balmy land. Thus, when the old mercury dipped close to zero on Monday, I was hardly surprised to see a Fiji Island Chamber of Commerce paste-board sitting in the postal slot of my apartment retreat.

The card came compliments of former Varsity athlete Peter Burwash and it told of the wonderful climate and the wonderful people of the Fijis. "Hawaii was also great" remarked Mr. B.

Burwash, you see, is spending his days on the international tennis circuit, a concern he joined last January. While at U of T he won two intercollegiate tennis championships and played on Varsity Blues' two recent intercollegiate national championship teams before his graduation in the spring of 1967.

the world but every one of them is invitational. Therefore, a tennis player that is playing well gets the best deal in terms of expenses and one that is not going so well gets less or is not invited at all."

Burwash's success on the tour to date, while not overwhelming, has been very encouraging. His biggest single accomplishment was winning the Netanga International Tournament in Israel last spring.

PETER BURWASH

Other high points included the Western Ontario Open last summer and the Flanders' Cup tourney in Belgium. He won the former and took all his singles' matches in Belgium.

As far as the future is concerned, Burwash has three distinct goals in mind.

"First and most important, I would like to make the Canadian Davis Cup team. There is something about playing and hearing the referee say 'Advantage Canada' instead of 'Advantage Burwash' that adds to the prestige and excitement already involved."

"With the increasing potential and popularity of pro tennis, I would like to get involved in that area. Also, I have been offered several excellent jobs as a club or teaching professional."

"Finally, I would like to compete at Wimbledon and Forest Hills. Wimbledon is the biggest single prestige event in tennis and every player in the world sets the June tournament as one of his annual goals. Last year I sent my application to Wimbledon officials while I was in Belgium. However, the French Revolution was going on at the time and somehow it got lost. I cabled the tournament organizers just after the invitations were sent out and they told me that they had never received my form."

Currently playing in New Zealand, Burwash is scheduled to be in such places as Japan, Red China, Egypt and Europe before he returns home next July. He plans to write a newsletter some time early in the new year to keep us posted on how things are going. Until then, we wish him the best of luck.

B-Ball a loo-bop in Buffalo

By JIM MORRISON

Varsity basketball Blues continued to provide a high calorie diet for American teams in games played last weekend. On Friday night, a University of Buffalo team enjoyed an 81-37 moveable feast, and on Saturday Youngstown University fattened themselves 75-51.

The Buffalo game was impressively unmemorable, as Blues displayed a shooting weakness all over the court. And the bigger Buffalo players had no difficulty exploiting Toronto's inexperience for their win. Guard Peter Burton was high for Varsity with 10 points, followed by center John Hadden with 9.

On Saturday, the more raths outrage, enabling Blues to keep the score respectable against a highly-touted Youngstown squad. "We're not in their class," said mentor McManus, "but I thought we did very well in holding them to 75 points." The only player to consistently invade Blues' defensive blanket was 6'9" (and 250 lb.) Willie Teague, who commandeered the backboards, scoring 25 points in the process.

John Hadden led Varsity with 13 points. Forward Dale Crouter who once scored 39 points against Newmarket, played a strong defensive game, adding 9 points to the total, while rookie Garth Evans and veteran Mike Kirby contributed 8 and 7 points respectively.

Blues' principal weakness at the moment is shooting. The absence of high-scoring guard Bruce Dempster undoubtedly hurt them this weekend, but one shooter can't carry a team. "We need a lot more practise on those glass boards," says Coach McManus. "We're going to be playing all our home games on them out at York."

FLASH... Blues defeated York last night in an exhibition basketball game played way out yonder at York. The score was 57-44. Larry Trafford led Varsity with 11 points, John Hadden and Mike Kirby had 10 each, while Bruce Dempster added seven. George Dublinsky led York of Yeomen fame by cultivating 11 furrows.

By Means of a Tract

Andrew Gib

THERE was a warm-hearted Christian merchant who closed his shop on Sunday. In the morning he attended church to worship God, but in the afternoon he went on the street and distributed tracts. Feeling very tired one Sunday afternoon he was resting quietly in his library. On the writing desk was a bundle of tracts. Outside it was pouring with rain. He heard a stealthy step,

Pharmacy vote favors membership in SAC

By LIZ WILLOCK

The campus' 450 Pharmacy students have voted by a narrow margin to remain in the Students' Administrative Council.

Seventy-three per cent of the faculty turned out to vote this week on whether to withdraw from SAC if a suitable alternative could be found.

Fifty-three per cent voted against withdrawal while 47 per cent said they would favor the move.

A second question asked: "Are you satisfied with SAC's policy to date?" Seventy per cent were dissatisfied.

John Taylor, Pharmacy SAC rep, saw this dissatisfaction producing "a real drive for Pharmacy to leave SAC by some people, but I really hope and I really don't think we'll be getting out."

He felt the negative vote came mostly from first and second year students who "aren't too well-informed."

"Most of them have just heard the far out things. They don't really see and know and understand the day to day things that they couldn't do without."

Bob Miller, Vice President, thought the decision to stay in was largely due to the lack of a concrete alternative. He hopes to see further work on the possibility of a separate union for professional students.

Miller also said there has been some talk about a health sciences union as "more of an active sort of thing than SHOUT which would pay little attention to SAC. We might get more out of it."

Recruitment as usual on U of T front

FROM OUR FORMER-SITE-OF-TENT-CITY BUREAU

The so-called "war companies" were on campus Thursday recruiting, but outside of the students being interviewed, few even realized their presence.

Perhaps it was because the companies held their interviews in offices attached to Varsity Stadium. ("We were using all available space and we were still about 20 rooms short," explained Placement Service director Allan Headrick.)

Although there were a substantial number of policemen present when the interviews got underway at 8 a.m., the only opposition was a silent vigil by the U of T Communist Club, who paraded three or four at a time in front of Varsity Arena on Devonshire Place until noon.

"We planned it this way," said Tim Walsh (SGS), "as a quiet way of registering our protest."

At 1 p.m. the Committee to End the War in Vietnam held a speak-out in front of Hart House. It attracted a small crowd, mostly hecklers.

"The university should be something different than a servant of big business society," said Joe Young, Executive Secretary of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee.

"M-I-C-K-E-Y M-O-U-S-E," sang a group in the crowd.

"This is a ridiculous sort of protest," said Colin Williams (SGS). "These companies aren't entirely concerned with producing war materials."

"Saran Wrap's gonna kill a lotta people," came a voice from the audience of about 30.

Exasperated with the hecklers in the audience, Mike Stewart (1 UC) took the loud-hailer and challenged one of them to "say something."

"Tell us why you support the industrial-military complex," he said. "Don't just stand there and say foolish things."

The crowd broke up with CEWV asking people to sign a petition calling for a referendum on the question of campus recruiting.

In order that all U of T students may fully enjoy the forthcoming long weekend the Varsity will not be published Monday. Tuesday all staff are required to turn out for mass production of this year's final issue and a party.

The Commission on University Government, which the U of T administration has been calling "the Committee on the Structure of the University" holds its first meeting today, 2:30 p.m. in the Senate Chamber at Simcoe Hall. Wow!

York votes open recruiting

York University students voted this week overwhelmingly in favor of allowing on-campus recruiting by companies supplying materials for the U.S. war effort in Vietnam.

The vote in the referendum, held by the York Student Council Tuesday, was 1,226 to 294 against banning such companies from using the university's facilities.

Students supported the principle of open recruiting by a vote of 1,257 to 273.

Student council president, John Adams, feels the vote represents general campus opinion.

The York administration turned the matter over to the student council, after the Committee to End to War in Viet Nam asked that recruiting by firms supplying materials for the U.S. war effort in Vietnam be banned.

The on-campus recruiting was debated only indirectly by the council, which did not take a stand. Adams says he was "in favour of the referendum as an exercise in real public participatory democracy." He described the turnout of voters as fairly high. Only about 4,400 students were eligible to vote.

Bigelow gives Perly time to finish trial

Magistrate Tupper Bigelow yesterday reversed a ruling giving a University of Toronto student charged with obstructing police a half hour a week to conduct his defense.

Tupper ruled that Gary Perly (SGS), arrested at an anti-war demonstration April 27, could have as much of the court's time as necessary to complete the case. In previous weeks Bigelow had rejected Perly's plea to have the half-hour limit lifted.

No reason was given for the change and Perly was given no advance notice.

Perly continued his examination of policeman Raymond Woodhead, the arresting officer. Woodhead has testified that Perly jumped on his back during the arrest of another student.

The day-long testimony and questioning was punctuated with objections from the Crown Attorney as Perly dug into Woodhead's memory of the incidents surrounding the arrest.

At one point, Magistrate Bigelow offered Perly free legal aid to finish the case, even though Perly is not technically eligible for such aid. Perly refused, saying he preferred to defend himself.

Woodhead said that other policemen were in the vicinity of the arrest, but that only one constable helped him make the arrest. Perly asked why no other police had helped, but was ruled out of order.

Woodhead testified that Perly had jumped on his back while arresting Bill Lewis, also an anti-war demonstrator. Woodhead said he took Lewis to a paddywagon parked 50 or 60 feet away, then came back and arrested Perly. He said "nothing special" happened taking Perly into custody.

"But you testified (in previous weeks) that the situation was a near-riot," Perly said. Woodhead said the people in the area of the arrest were "more orderly" than others further away.

Woodhead said he had recognized Perly as the man who jumped on him by Perly's distinctive face, and described Perly as he stood in the courtroom.

Perly asked him to describe the face Woodhead saw at the April demonstration, but was ruled out of order.

Woodhead also said he would have been present when Perly was searched, but could not say conclusively that he was present, nor where the search was made.

The trial continues today at 10 o'clock in Courtroom 31 of Old City Hall.

How are we teaching our teachers -part II

By KEVIN R. BICE
and CHARLES R. KAHN

We were concerned with the criticism levelled at the College of Education in Wednesday's Varsity. The writer took a decidedly negative approach to the endeavours of the College and, we felt, hurt the cause of the students at the College who are in the midst of attempting to better their courses. Like your columnist we are keenly aware of the problems. Unlike her we are not content to make a blanket criticism. We wish to join forces with the enthusiastic staff at the College to improve the courses so that they relate meaningfully to a professional career.

Miss Brydson felt that COE students suffer by being combined and partly absorbed by the University of Toronto Schools, also housed in the same building. We disagree. UTS gives us the unique opportunity of being exposed to the kind of environment in which we will function next year. Hall lockers, heating pipes, and overcrowded cafeteria and hallways, and TWIG ads are all part of it. The student who finds this offensive is clearly entering the wrong profession.

The article found "disillusioned people" at the College. True. But disillusionment can lead either to apathy or to sincere attempts at constructive criticism. Too many of the College's students come with preconceived notions of a compulsory year "to be spent". Too many of us waste the opportunity to adequately prepare for what is a very complex and demanding profession. We have found the professors genuinely concerned in us and in making us better teachers. They are open to suggestion and prepared to incorporate new ideas into their courses. The way is clear. It is up to us to join with our instructors to make our preparatory year more meaningful.

Miss Brydson's specific criticisms are poorly directed. She attacks the History and Philosophy of Education course on the grounds that it quells discussion. We are both students of the class she criticizes and thus speak with some authority. The class has about 80 students in it by necessity and meets only twice per week. Every professional class faces the same limitations. The professor does his best to recognize individual opinions and some discussion. He is considering the history of education. And why not? Doesn't Plato have as much to say to us today about education as has A. S. Neill? Even so, more emphasis is still being placed on Neill! A solution to the problem of numbers has been approved by the professor. A seminar discussion group will be set up in the new year for those interested.

A further criticism has been levelled at the grading of student teachers. It is an ironic commentary on this grading that it is not the College but the school principals and educators who will be hiring us next spring who demand this grade. Miss Brydson criticizes the grading teachers on the grounds that they are purely subjective. We have found that the vast majority of these master teachers are both factual and incisive in their comments. They exhibit fairness and leniency in their comments. The onus of marking is as offensive to them as it is to us. Students are found to have some bad experiences because these teachers are only human. This probably makes a valid criticism but can we find some alternative that still provides us with that all-important teaching experience?

We would welcome the opportunity to write a series of articles on various specific aspects of the College. We must provide insight into the College not only for Miss Brydson and the public but for the students of the College itself!

Ed. note: the dialogue starts immediately (see below). We welcome comment from students and staff at the COE. Drop us a line or come in, 91 St. George.

By KEN DENT
COE SAC REP

On the basis of an informal survey I made at the College of Education Thursday, most students felt the Varsity's treatment of the COE in Wednesday's edition was entirely TOO FAIR.

Response ranged from "much too kind" to "very complimentary", indicating to me that there is even more wrong with the College than a surface tour could show.

In the front-page interview with Dean Douglas Dadson, I can refute the following points:

Dadson: "I think students are generally satisfied with their courses."

Most students would laugh at that. Discontent is very widespread. It manifests itself in perpetual grumbling and a slacking-off of attendance. The compulsory courses (History and Philosophy of Education, Educational Psychology, Administration and Professional Practise) are very poorly attended.

Dadson: "For the last four years the Student Council has prepared a year-end report."

It is just a report, not a course critique. These reports have been generally shelved and ignored.

This year, for the first time, COE students are preparing a comprehensive course critique. Last month, over 40 students showed up at a meeting to organize this course critique, which will be made public by mid-March.

Dadson: "Smallness influences the efficiency and interest of a class far less than one would expect."

Regardless of the lack of facilities in the present COE building, we could still have more teachers. Perhaps some of the larger classrooms could be partitioned off into seminar rooms.

In the auditorium and some of the larger lecture halls — where many of our compulsory classes are held — it is almost impossible to have a dialogue between student and teacher.

The Dean recognizes that some students find their courses irrelevant.

I think you'll find most students find their courses irrelevant. Certainly the compulsory courses are. And, depending on the quality of teaching, some of the major courses seem irrelevant as well.

Dean Dadson tactfully points out that space, or luck of it, is at the root of the College's most basic problems.

The basic problem is that the College is not doing a very good job of training teachers. A new building won't change the quality of instruction or the content of the curriculum.

Student participation in organization of the curriculum is "widespread" according to the Dean...

We have only two students representing a student body of some 1,400, on the college program committee. The committee, which has over 20 members, sets curriculum.

Some further points I would like to make:

1. Practise teaching is certainly the most important thing we do in our year at COE. Yet it is buried in the morass of the academic year. We should discuss it more deeply when we get back to the College, instead of mentioning it only in passing.

2. Paternalism: most of the teachers at the COE have never taught at university. We call it the Grade 11 syndrome — they come from

ENGLISH

An English professor is like a fly crawling over the surface of a painting. He knows a lot about the brush-strokes, the colours used, and he can even tell you what sort of varnish was applied — but he knows damn all about the subject matter of the painting as a whole.

"Impossible!" cries the fly, upon being accused of this. "I've paced over every square inch of this canvas. There's nothing I don't know about it!"

An English professor is like Honore Balzac, who recommended that a young man dissect several women in an anatomy lab before making love to any.

An English professor is like a madman who, attracted to a young woman's ear, slashes it off with a razor and then takes it home in a handkerchief. When he gets home the ear is just a yellow, waxy piece of gristle — and he discovers that what made the ear look so lovely was that it was attached to a pretty head.

When I was a kid I read Generation of Vipers, which details the sins of society. Being too young to have committed any of them myself, I thought I knew all about sin.

An English professor, in his ivory tower reading the works of Hemingway, is in the same bag.

Irving Layton, when he was a naughty young poet, wrote a long poem making fun of pedants who write poetry. The point was that they are pusillanimous types who have a cloistered view of the world. One of the verses went something like:

But the soundest, most successful plan

Is to compose like Douglas Le Par:

Appear, though men and nations reeled,

A Lanipman on a battle-field;

Express in words vacuous and quaint

The cultured Englishman's complaint

That decency is never sovereign.

That reason ought to, but doesn't govern —

That maids have holes, and men must find them

(Alas, that Nature WILL so blind them!)

In short, here's the sum of this advice:

Say nothing, but modulate the voice:

There are more excellent writers of English now living than at any other time in our history: Anthony Burgess (the chief), John Updike, Norman Mailer, J. P. Donleavy, Joseph Heller, Allen Ginsberg, Mordecai Richler, Red Reed, Robert Fulford, Denise Levertov, Spike Milligan, Robert Ardrey, J. S. Perelman, Richard Roach-of-the-Hesperus, Donald Duck, to name a few. Most are ignored by the English Department.

Writers express ideas, thought, emotions. English professors discuss rhyme, authenticity of authorship, plot.

English professors have a love-hate relationship with writers and the major critics. This results in:

1) A desire to hasten the death of a favourite author in order that work can begin on his collected works.

2) An automatic put-down for a student who disagrees with Northrop Frye.

3) An automatic put-down for a student who agrees with Marshall McLuhan (That show-off! He's just a professor like me!)

Nowadays authors are preparing non-books, experimenting with the printed form. English students are given lessons in how to tell quartos from folios and how to stitch them together.

Modern linguistics concerns itself with semantics, the dynamics of language (that is, the process by which forms and words appear and disappear from usage) and Whorf's hypothesis about the degree to which a nation's language shapes its perception of the world. English students, meanwhile, are poring over word lists in order to be able to understand Beowulf and Chaucer.

English is a living language, written by real people in order to express urgent thoughts and deep emotions. Nowhere in the formal study of English do you get a sense of these qualities. English professors might as well be morons, for their unfeeling, archaeological approach to the study of the greatest language on earth.

flies on the surface of a painting

Mr. Kesterton is a third-year general student in psychology, who has worked for three years as a speech-writer for the Ontario department of Education, and has published several poems. He picked up the ideas for the article from five English courses he has taken, two girlfriends, and talks with English professors who agreed but thought their courses had some value anyway.

housing and rent control

Toronto is in the grip of a "mystery": The mystery centres around housing. Why do rents in a Don Mills apartment building jump from $210 to $285 a month in a single year? Why are students paying $60-$70 a month for rooms worth half that? Why does a "good" landlord, one who charges a fair rent for his rooms, suddenly raise his rates when he hears that he's regarded as a good landlord and that others charge far more?

Another thing; why does the university, which owns a large number of homes in the vicinity of the campus, hand over the mortgages on these buildings to an independent corporation, Crown Trust, with the authority to charge the rents the market will bear?

The biggest mystery of all is why we're so reluctant to spot the cause of the mystery—housing right now is not regarded as a public resource, but a matter of private profit.

The man who is in housing to make a profit has only one aim in mind: more money. He can't afford to concern himself with human needs or the quality of life in his dwellings. That doesn't pay immediate dividends.

And when we're in a high demand-tight supply situation, the landlords

playing the university game

U of T probably has more students on administrative committees than any other university in Canada. So you'd think U of T would be the most democratic university in Canada.

But it's just possible that committees are not the way to change the University. By agreeing to participate in an administration committee, students agree to play the game by the administration's rules. This makes the game a lot harder to win. It also means that even if students win, they only get what the people in control are willing to give.

How much is the administration willing to offer? At most, a share in their power. But is that enough? Perhaps students should be questioning the whole basis of the administration's power and their right to exercise it. Perhaps we should even be asking for a "critical" university — an institution not afraid to condemn the failings of our "just" society and the people who control it.

The students who have been elected to SAC and the Commission on University Government have indicated they want that kind of university. But it's not likely that the powers who run this country will agree. So we'll probably never get a critical university playing by the rules they establish.

Sure, we have to give committees a try — we have to participate in CUG and the President's Advisory Council, to test the administration's good faith.

But if the committee approach fails, then we'll have to find another way to change the university. If we really want to have a field day. They can charge anything they want, kick people out of homes, trample human dignity.

Our governments are just beginning to realize this. For example, the Ontario government announced it may set up a rent review board.

That's a good start, but it isn't enough. All rent control does is divert people from putting money into housing (they can't make enough profit). Nor will jumping taxes on land speculation do anything in the long run.

We've got to start looking at housing the same way we look at water and electricity—as a matter of public concern. Even telephones, although privately run, are still government controlled, and most of us wouldn't have it any other way.

So why the blind spot about housing?

And why do we accept rent-gouging so blithely, as if it's a landlord's right to overcharge, or charge as much as he can get whether his lodgings are worth it or not?

And above all, why do we look on housing controls as infringements on personal freedom? The only people infringed upon are those who exploit the wants and needs of others.

But, then, those are the people for whom our society is geared. We just don't like to recognize it.

perly trial

Those interested in our country's legal system will find the trial of Gary Perly most interesting.

Mordecai Richler (The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz, Cocksure, etc.) was on campus last week to read from a work in progress. And, since he's on the Canadian Literature course, he was put on display before groups of English Lit students. For some of them, it was obviously their first exposure to the fact that books really are written by people, not merely interpreted by professors. They asked questions which might be described either as academically oriented, or stupid.

Richler was placed centre stage between two lesser eminences (a literary three-ring circus), Brian Moore (The Luck of Ginger Coffey) and Jack Ludwig (U. of T.'s Writer in Residence). But it was Richler the students wanted and he knew it.

He sat on the edge of his chair, chain-smoking his cigarette size Dutch cigars and watching the growing pile of crushed butts on the floor between his legs. He's a bantam cock of a man with a head too large for his body and enlarged by its crest of wavy dark brown hair. His eyes are large and deep brown with the tragic undertones that are the cliché of Jewish eyes. In the newly remodelled, stark white lecture room at U.C., they stood out red rimmed and haunted. Richler was the cock in the foxes lair, watching the exits and determined not to be cornered.

He needn't have worried: the literary cannibals were divided in their own camp. One of them wanted a précis of Richler's literary theory with suitable examples but only managed to tie himself up and was singularly dissatisfied when Richler could make no sense of his question and said so. Another wanted to project his own obsessions. "Why did you write Duddy Kravitz as a novel instead of an epic poem?" Richler, totally confused, "But, I'm a novelist!" Some just wanted to touch him, to absorb him by osmosis, a creative transfusion for their hardened critical arteries.

At the end of the hour Richler rubbed his barred eyes, brushed back a shock of hair and fled from the room almost before the erstwhile English Lit prof had finished thanking him for his illuminating remarks. Richler had said nothing about his novels. He said that he felt nothing after he had finished them and could not remember how he felt while he wrote them. He might be on display ("I don't make much money from my novels; I have to do other things"), but he was damned if there would be a vivisection. He was cornered in the hall and asked how he felt about having to go through with a thing like that. Once again the confusion, the defensive sliding away of the eyes—too close to home—and a mumbled excuse "Well, you start to bore yourself, saying the same things over and over again", and off down the dark U.C. hall, looking for a place to hide.

Later that day, I talked to Richler in the more relaxed atmosphere of coffee and comfortable arm chairs in the upper library at Massey College. I accepted one of his little cigars and kept the questions factual.

"What are you doing at Sir George Williams?"

"I'm teaching the creative writing course. They (G.S.U.) offered to pay my way for a year so I decided to come back." It was a good financial deal. Richler was in London for ten years and his return has been acclaimed by the Literary Supplements. After ten years of caustic satire from a distance, he has returned to his homeland. It makes his sojourn in London look like a self-imposed exile instead of a flight from the frontier culture. S.G.W.'s English Dept. has won the envy of every other English Dept. in Canada for their coup.

"How do you run the course?"

Immediately the defense goes up. "I told them right at the beginning I couldn't teach

focus:

anybody how to write. I told them I'd read their stuff and tell them what I thought of it, but that's all. Now, they mostly bring their stuff in, read it and then they discuss it. It seems to be what they want." And later, "You can't just tell them to go home, you can't write. You've got to be . . ." — "Discrete?" "Yeah. You know, it's only one afternoon a week and it's easy money but I'd never do it again." "Why not?" "I'm just not a teacher. I mean, all this . . ." his arm sweeps the leather bound books and book-lined walls, soft rugs and soft lighting. "I'm just not social enough. I couldn't . . ." and even this extends him too far. He retreats, pours another coffee, his right arm shoots out straight to flick his cigar ash at an ashtray—a clear miss—and he subsides.

I start again, gently. He is travelling Canada as much as he can. He's been to Vancouver and now here to Toronto. Back to creative writing. "I don't think there should be creative writing courses. You should be able to take your stuff to a professor you trust. A writer-in-residence is a good idea, depending on how accessible he is."

I suggest that perhaps professors are best because writers see things in the light of their own work. And he's ready now. "Yeah, like that kid who asked me what I felt about Duddy. How could I tell him how I felt? How could I?", hands extended and those guilty-angry-tragic Jewish eyes looking straight at me. And indeed how could he tell the objective, academics about his books? He could no more calmly discuss them than he could remove his soul and dissect it for them on the lecture.

Richler thinks on paper. "I just write everything I can think of and then I cut it down." This is his mode of expression; verbally, he is inarticulate. In his books he creates an illusion which bears some relationship, probably inexplicable, to himself. This is his public image. The last thing in the world he wants is to discuss it objectively, to dissect and analyse it. What mother would give over her children to an anatomy class and then assist at the proceedings? Perhaps it is the fact that he has to do "other things" in order to keep writing that accounts for the bitterness of his satire. And when one considers the man in comparison to his work, the title of his latest book becomes very ironic; Cocksure.

The United States of Heaven/Gwendolyn Papers/Tbat Chainletter Hiway Doug Fetherling, Anansi Press $1.95.

Doug Fetherling, whose poetry in T.O. Now I reviewed earlier in the year, has published one of the most intriguing first books of poetry I have seen for quite a while. It is a trilogy, beginning with the united states of beaven, a crazy upside-down look at american culture that could only be made by a psychotic Socrates in search of an ideal. They are not so much poems as painful dissections of the mind, and these often confuse by being funny or objective right under the blade of a dull scalpel. Fetherling, it could be said, makes his points by irrelevance:

the sinister bartender smiles when he asks for ID but finally i prove to him im a frozen hydrant

(will you sign my meatloaf, sir?)

(you should have bean there you weren't were you i dont remember seeing you)

It's frightening for i could have been arrested for earrying a conealed toothbrush.

It's easy to forgive Doug Fetherling for sounding like an alienated Edward Lear writing in blank verse and typographical freedom, because beneath the flippancy, there is a chill which is not really definable, but catches all of you in it; you can't really analyze intellectually or even emotionally; you just have to let Doug Fetherling's poetry splash into your mind, and resurface later.

Gwendolyn Papers, (logically for Gwendolyn) is supposedly the record of a love affair; but we never really get into it. It is a marvellously varied collection, which hangs together more by virtue of the mention of Gwendolyn's name than by any "striving for the past tense from the beginning" which is the claim made on the back cover of the book. Occasionally, though, the poetry reaches a personal intensity which doesn't appear in the united states of heaven, in which Fetherling is generally content to remain aloof and take notes. An example:

the hair style & slang & clothing wouldve been different but i plainly can see her in 1935 & 1900 and on baek for five thousand years but i cant bring myself to say her heavenly little filthy name

In poems such as Sex Play in Four Acts and The Death of Fetherling in the Celebrated 1959 Canadian Drugstore or Ste Gwendolyn's Revenge, we finally get something of the sense of two people touching and interacting, and the love sequence begins to make a little sense. Fetherling, however, is too involved in his own impressions and expressions to ever hand over an entire sequence of poems to Gwendolyn, and the strongest sense remains that of the poem trying to make sense of what is going on outside of him, and where it doesn't make sense, to further bring out its absurdity:

The CIA called martin luther king 2 his reward tonite shot him down in memphis motel this date year of our lord krishna shile radio played current beatles song something that sounds like La-dy Vagina tho im sure thats not it (Poem in Plain Brown Wrapper)

Chainletter Hiway is a collection of impressions of Canada — chaos as seen through the upside-down eyes of Doug Fetherling. It is not distinctively Canadian, though Canada provides the jumping off point, and there are the appropriate references to nationalism, Quebec, and Air Canada. Basically, however, it is typical Fetherling madness without the down-to-earth presence of Gwendolyn to make it intelligible. Ferry to Levis and She Employed the Fam iliar "Tu" Form, I found especially effective

Fetherling possesses in frightening quantities the essential quality of the poet. He is imaginative to the point of psychosis, and as irrational as anyone touched by the gods has to be. His poetry is the perfect reflection of the absurdity of being 21 in a mad blind world

bofors - existential, allegorical, powerful

I went to The Bofors Gun expecting to see a John Wayne or an Anthony Quinn sling somebody else's blood and guts all over the screen, because I thought it would be "a tough film" about a gun. But The Bofors Gun is not just another war movie. In fact, it's not a war movie at all. It's psychological realism, existentialism, alienated man, Adam and the devil incarnate, all within a British army camp on the West German border in 1954.

Throughout the film I kept having the strange feeling I'd seen it before. Perhaps it was the Tunes of Glory — the absurdity of military discipline warping men's minds. Perhaps it was Incident — progressive insanity in a completely isolated situation. Perhaps it was Lord of the Flies — scraping off the civilized veneer to expose absolute evil in man.

It's a black film. What seems to be a normal situation descends into a hell of insanity.

David Warner portrays Lance Bombardier Terry Evans, a nice-guy-cum-hero, who is going back to England the next morning to become an officer. And everything should be alright. But he has to supervise the guard on his last night, and one of his soldiers is a huge suicidal Irish madman with a prison record. (I don't know why madmen in British movies are always Irish.) As the alienated Irishman, Danny O'Rourke, Nicol Williamson gives a brilliant performance that is worth an Oscar.

O'Rourke hates Evans from the beginning. Evans is the young man who wants to get on, "the little lad who wants to go home to his mother." Motherhood and England are far away. O'Rourke breaks down Evans' composure with various crimes — assaulting a soldier, getting drunk, staying away from his post. Evans doesn't want to charge him, because that way he'll never go home. Evans wants "to get on."

Their guard house is claustrophobic. It's like the subway car in Incident or the island in Lord of the Flies. O'Rourke is the catalyst thrown into the test tube of apparently normal people. Nothing disturbs them from outside. There is no outside: the camp is the world in microcosm and the conflict between Evans and O'Rourke is the schizophrenia of everyone. Nobody knows why they are there, what they are guarding. Bofors guns against all of soviet missledom. There is a stark scene where O'Rourke stands in front of one of these guns and talks to it. The gun sits there in absurd silence. Stupid bloody Tuesday. Peacetime militarism and pointless discipline keep provoking the unanswerable "why-are-we-here?" from the nauseated individual.

Despite obvious allegory the film generally avoids the appearance of cliché and contrivance. Carl Davis' screenplay establishes an almost unbearable intensity.

The dialogue is at times what Life magazine would call "earthy", lapsing into agonizing self-examination.

Whatever contrivances make up The Bofors Gun, the total effect is powerful. Suspense builds up until the hero's goodness collapses. O'Rourke's brutal defiance exposes Evans until all that is left is pathetic, whimpering bitterness. At the end, in the freezing cold, O'Rourke strips himself of his uniform and his life. Evans becomes the anti-hero. There's nothing left that's worth anything. We realize that the film has been bordering on the knife-edge — balancing high drama and farce. We have been led through intense drama to realize absurdity. Sartre's alienated hero is reincarnated in O'Rourke.

autocrat to acid head

Imagine, if you will, a bald, stocky, 64 year-old ex-Viennese director with a marked Austrian accent dropping acid. You now have a visual image of the reborn vizier of old-line American cinema, he whose very steps cause studio walls to tremble, the inimitable, ever youthful . . . Otto Preminger.

"To have complete control over everything is the most enjoyable thing for a director." That's no dirty long-haired hippy. That's the Charles Atlas of Hollywood.

Remember 'Anatomy of a Murder'? 'Exodus'? 'In Harm's Way'? Did you know that Cabiers du Cinema regards Preminger as surpassed only by Alfred Hitchcock and Fritz Lang? Why all this enlightenment? Because writing about Otto Preminger is like writing about God — they both draw big crowds at the box-office.

Thus it was that when Otto descended from the Paramount unto Toronto bearing the reels of his latest film, Skidoo, the press ceased worshipping the current golden calves of Hollywood and turned to Him for inspiration. Everywhere Otto went, from a luncheon in the Royal Suite in the Park Plaza to a symposium on film at Cody Hall, they were there in force — Wendy Michener, Martin Knelman, Robert Fulford — accompanied by their entourage of photographers and sound men from the dailies, CP, UPI, CBC, and CTW.

"The only danger of old age I personally fear is becoming inflexible." Jot, jot as I desperately try to capture the essence of the god-head.

"These things are pretty shitty, aren't they?" mutters Joe Medjuck, a Scotch clamped firmly in his hand.

But no, seriously, Martha — concerning Otto Preminger and his latest release, Skidoo is a perplexing film, not because it possesses some hidden meaning, but because such an insipid comedy-musical like this should stir up so much shit.

When Preminger spoke on campus Tuesday, a typically bland housewife type leaped to her feet and in a cracked voice, babbled, "So many young people who realize that if there is no happiness then there is no money. Young people I feel if they would just wait a little longer would be the great photographers of tomorrow." What? How Otto's slapstick comedy can drive people to incoherence and tears, I just don't understand.

The film itself is comprised of one enormous middle-aged cliché view of that old situation comedy gag — the generation gap. (Pick it up and flog it around some more, Otto.) The plot, as if it weren't pointlessly convoluted enough, is laden to its water line with a mass of choice Hollywood ego — Jackie Gleason, Frankie Avalon, and a cast of thousands, which, excluding Groucho Marx, is about as funny as a steel-toed boot in the groin. Furthermore, the freaky cinematic gimmicks which Preminger supervised after popping pills, supposedly with the intent of attaining a mind-expanded understanding of the under 64 generation, emerge as simply incongruous in this Ozzie-and-Harriet comedy.

The question, of course, which will immediately leap to your mind is: why? Why a comedy in which the characteristic Preminger touches, much copied by Godard and the Nouvelle Vogue generation — minimal use of special effects and avoidance of optical techniques like fades and dissolves — why are they all unstressed in this film? Well, you see Otto has gone hippy lately, or as hippy as Otto Preminger could ever go. But just what is he trying to pull off?

Suddenly, the old Preminger, the renowned tyrant of the studio lot, who controls everything in his films from casting to final cutting, has gone benevolent in his old age? How much credence can you place in his professed sincere intention to bridge the generation gap?

The old Otto Preminger asserts, "In my opinion a film is made solely by the director. It is the director who must have complete control of the actor." No one challenges this dictator.

Now the new Otto Preminger tempers his autocracy with remarks like, "There is something youth feels in common about the world they are inheriting from the older generation. If older people will only take the time to try to give them answers, I hope the problem will be resolved." Presto-chango, a benevolent liberal.

Otto can drop gallons of acid, but I still find it difficult to believe in the sincerity which he ascribes to his motivation. So he has made a genuine social comment piece. After statements like,

"I think films are entertainment but people do not become better people because of films . . ." — I'm skeptical.

Perhaps the safest conclusion to draw from all this is, as Preminger said, "While we have many good craftsmen in Hollywood, there is no dialogue between old filmmakers and new ones." The gap between the old-line American cinema represented by Otto Preminger and the new-line cinema represented by directors like Arthur Penn and Francis Coppola is not a gap anymore — it's a chasm. The old Hollywood view of cinema as a mechanical craft to be learned by apprenticeship is fading into the more European conception of film as spontaneous experience. Hollywood super-director producers like Otto Preminger are a vanishing breed.

If you're nostalgic, see Preminger's film when it opens on the twentieth, and witness the mess that emerges when old autocratic Hollywood tries to become new hippy Hollywood all in one film.

Part II of an interview started last week

REVIEW

Aren't there some people, raised in the city, who have no interest in the countryside at all? And don't these people run the government?

BILL REES

Yes, sometimes. I think it's interesting to note that the big businessmen who oppose pollution or conservation measures as being expensive have large summer cottages or suburban homes on wooded lots. They don't know what it's like to live in places like Sarnia where you have to stay indoors, the pollution is so bad some days. The guys that run the plants don't live next to them, like the workers often do. They're always talking about "growth of the city", but they themselves don't live in the city.

REVIEW

Is there a general conservation policy in the Ontario, the Federal governments?

BILL REES

No. And this is the ridiculous thing. The Algonquin Park plan, as proposed by the loggers, for instance, says that "use of the park may become so heavy that it will be necessary to restrict the number of visitors." Industries plan for increase; our conservation areas don't. That's just one problem in connection with having no policy.

REVIEW

Isn't it possible that families forced to live in the cities for generations without ever seeing the country lose touch with the country?

BILL REES

Yeah. It's environmental feedback. People constantly subjected to grey think grey. Not only that, recent studies have shown that people in boring surroundings have their thinking ability impaired and their responses to stimuli lowered. That's important. If true, we are in our cities turning out a race of dull people. But a city doesn't have to be a dull place.

REVIEW

How do you react to a politician who says "What this province needs is more expansion; what this city needs is more expansion. More buildings, more factories, more people."

BILL REES

I think that, until we know more about the environmental effects of all this, it's insane to talk like this. Expansion means increased pollution, increased crowding, increased inconvenience, increased loss of freedom. Somewhere growth has to stop. Why not stop, or slow down at a point where the situation might still be under control? We are not only depriving ourselves but future generations of much of life's quality by unchecked growth. The generation that lives a hundred years from now can't save our parks when they're all deserts; it's up to us. We're denying our descendants a heritage, just as we were denied a heritage.

I'm very encouraged by young people who reject the old values. I think that older types such as myself can help by providing concrete alternatives to our modern world.

REVIEW

What a fabulous headline for this story. Bill Rees recommends economic coitus interruptus.

BILL REES

Unless we want to live underground like worms, unless we want to become a pestilence on the face of the earth then we still have time to make a choice. I think the choice will be made before the end of the century. I firmly believe that the fate of the human species is in the balance in the next thirty-five years. As some ecologists like Lamont Cole have pointed out, there is no way of knowing at the present time whether or not we have already exterminated the human race. If we stop all our pollution right now, even now it might be too late. We have put so many chemicals into our environment right now that we can't predict what is going to happen. Unfortunately, humanity doesn't react to problems until calamity strikes. What I'm afraid of here is that the next calamity that is going to strike is going to be the ultimate calamity. It's madness to go ahead when all the stop lights are red. We're an adaptable species. We're probably the most numerous mammal on the face of the earth. We're everywhere. It took us a million years to do it. Industry changes the world at a tremendous rate. We won't be able to evolve fast enough to adapt to any drastic changes in our environment industry causes.

REVIEW

You were telling us yesterday about a defoliation agent used in Vietnam.

BILL REES

Oh. Right. A woman scientist in the States developed an enormously powerful defoliant for the army. It kills every green plant, even when applied in almost undetectable quantities. The U.S. wanted to ship this in huge quantities to Vietnam to defoliate the jungles. It could wipe out all the food production of the country for a long term. Now perhaps you'll remember the Torrey Canyon disaster a few years ago. An oil tanker — one of the largest in the world — broke up off the coast of England and the crude oil caused enormous destruction. Tens of thousands of birds and fish killed. Now. This is a nothing thing compared to what would happen if, by some accident, a tanker carrying this defoliant were to be broken up in the Pacific Ocean. Now, we said before that oxygen is a biological product. Seventy per cent of the atmosphere's oxygen is produced by diatoms in the oceans. If this tanker broke up and polluted the Pacific thoroughly, 40 per cent of the earth's oxygen production would be knocked out for four to ten years. It sounds like science fiction, eh? It isn't.

Let's take this a step further. DDT also suppresses photosynthesis. The measurable rate of DDT in the oceans is rising annually. There is a level of DDT concentration at which atoms stop producing. They decided not to send the defoliant to Vietnam. But some day, some way — perhaps before the end of the century — one of these chemicals that we are dumping into the ocean will do it — will cause the oceans' oxygen production to bomb out.

People are talking these days of supporting increased masses of population by using the seas. It's nonsense. The resources of the sea are limited. Incidentally, have you heard about plans to raise algae to feed people? Experiments have been done, and they've almost all been failures. The reason is quite simple — it's the monoculture idea I was talking to you before. The optimum conditions for raising a crop of algae are also the optimum conditions for the spread of algae infections. A bit of infection gets in your crop of algae and — pzazz! — the crop is wiped out. In Japan, they've been using open tanks to raise algae. Rotifers — microscopic animals — are consistently wiping out 70 per cent of the crop. Any infection can do this. At our present state of technology we can't do anything about this. Plans for indoor greenhouses and chemical growing solutions are too far in the future to do us any good. As far as the foreseeable future is concerned, we'll have to rely on standard agricultural techniques.

If all the food raised on the earth were equably distributed, of course, no one would starve. The United States alone consumes more protein than the entire world fisheries production.

I might add that the world fisheries are today badly over-exploited and that all this talk of increasing productivity of the sea is nonsense.

REVIEW

You're really knocking this idea of the sea as the garden of the future.

BILL REES

I am. Our history with the sea has been no better than it has on the land. We've driven several species of whales to the point of extinction.

There are optimum levels at which you can continue to catch a decent number of fish every year. Natural increase in population makes up for the loss.

REVIEW

So you're acting like a natural predator?

CLIVE ELLIOTT

Right. All species tend to produce enough members to offset the natural attrition caused by predators. In fact, taking a little more will stimulate the species to reproduce at a higher rate.

BILL REES

But, because of over-exploitation, in the foreseeable future, the oceans don't hold the answer.

REVIEW

After all this, do you feel that man is a biological mistake, a vicious creature that ought to be wiped out?

BILL REES

Man's nervous system is so advanced that he is freed from the "no-choice" situation. He can foresee problems and take steps for his survival. Yet no other species war on their own species.

CLIVE ELLIOTT

Wrong. Other primates have been observed to do so. But man is the worst.

BILL REES

Yeab. Man hasn't evolved instincts to inhibit inter-specific fighting. You can kick a guy in the head when he's down, if you want to. Animals can't be this vicious to their own kind.

Man devastates his environment but even with our big brain we don't do anything about it. Our brains gave us the technology to devastate, however. So you can say that man's brain hasn't done him a heck of a lot of good.

Man does incredibly stupid things. We spend billions to pitch a rocket onto the moon when a tenth of the sum spent might, if applied to our cities, solve half of our social problems.

It's not that the thinking, the warning isn't there. The press knocks this program, that program. Why rockets to the moon? Why bacterial warfare? But nothing is done. And we'll have to do something in the next twenty-five to thirty years.

REVIEW

Do you think that man would learn anything from a major disaster?

CLIVE ELLIOTT

Yes. We can learn. After every war we've learned what the results of war are. We're still at war.

BILL REES

Man's reactions aren't rational, they're emotional.

REVIEW

As a biologist, would you agree to create a predator for man? An eight-foot green, slaving monster, perhaps?

BILL REES

We've already got the predator of man. It's man himself.

Another thing I'd like to bring up is this: we're sitting here in this room. It's 70 degrees — subtropical — while it's thirty degrees outside. It's light in here, it's dark out there. Man has become free of his environment. It's comforting. But on the world scale of things, man is still part of the natural chain of things. And if we forget this, we're in trouble.

The average lifespan of a species of animal is 50 million years. Man is into his first million years; at the rate he's going he'll never get into his second. Some species this happens to. Perhaps nature experimented a little too much with us. And so what? Sixty thousand years from now this may be a beautiful planet — without us.

PROJECT 999

A vegetable stood up and looked at me today. Call him Allan, that's not his name but it will do. Allan is a fifty-two year old catatonic schizophrenic who lives on a smoke-filled, urine-reeking ward of the Queen Street Mental Health Centre, formerly known as the Ontario Hospital in Toronto or, more intimately, 999.

For the past two years I've slugged it out as a volunteer at 999 and this past summer I mused about in crap and blood as an attendant on the chronic ward of the hospital.

With an average population of about 1,000 patients, 999 stands as an ugly expression of the results of a sick society. Built well over one hundred years ago the building itself was once hailed as the first in Toronto to have running water. Under the old brass dome that houses a now-decaying reservoir, you can see carved in wooden beams and scratched on Allan was a sensitive, intelligent young lad of seventeen who enjoyed painting and reading. Then something happened. He wanted to be alone. He locked himself in his room and he didn't want to talk. For a while he complained about 'superficial conversations' and then he stopped talking. His family begged him. He reacted. He broke funny. His muscles assume grotesque and horrifying, angular poses. He was certified a catatonic schizophrenic. That was thirty-four years ago. Allan just sits now. At least they think he just sits. According to his file he is totally unaware of his surroundings. That was the traditional approach.

I lived with Allan this summer. I helped him comb his hair, tried to teach him how to eat. I dressed him, undressed him and put him to bed. I scrubbed him in the shower and tried to tell him one night alone in his room. Sitting there with his torn shirt, soiled pants and unruly hair, he picked them up, one by one, slowly, over a period of about twenty minutes. He then stood up and reached over, shoving them under a bed.

"Allan" I said, "Allan, you can't hide your past. You think you've done it now, but I know and you know what you once were and what you can be again. If you care at all, pick them up and give them to me."

For ten seconds, for perhaps the first time in thirty-four years, Allan stood up tall and straight, the lines on his face relaxed, his angular posture gone. For just ten seconds he looked at me, straight in the eye. For those few moments Allan was not. To put it simply, a catatonic schizophrenic. Allan picked up the paintings and gave them to me. He almost immediately assumed his old, stance, the attendants shave about two-thirds of the men, with safety razors and I had to make sure that all razors were kept locked away. One day, simply out of curiosity, I left a razor out, with lather on a table. Karl came along, an old German who mutters and hallucinates and laughs inappropriately. In case he might try to hurt himself or anyone else I was ready.

He tried to shave himself. His face was a bloodied mess and he was bleeding all over the floor and me. But he had tried. Other staff rushed in, hurrying to try to stop the flow of blood. I took a cloth and as I wiped the blood away from his face, I saw a quiet, toothless grin that could only have said "thanks". How many changes, I wondered, had Karl been given to shave himself? Sure, his muscles were weak and poorly co-ordinated but how many times did someone

The ward was recently declared an "open ward", permitting patients to come and go as they pleased. Gradually the numbers on the ward were reduced to a manageable size. In January of 1968, fifty-four patients were moved out to "Cottage B" a two storey wooden structure behind the hospital. The ward was put under the direct authority of the chief psychologist of the hospital. Working under his and two other therapeutic personnel's advice, the on-ward staff began a concentrated program of 'activity therapy'. The key here is that the on-ward staff ran the program. Ward staff began to realize that they had some say in therapy with a patient, that their views did count and that however little psychiatric training they had, they could participate in a decision-making body.

The results were astounding and unexpected. By the end of the summer thirty pa-

Cottage B is continuing its radical program and plans are now to have seemingly "hopeless" cases from other wards transferred to the Cottage. Other possibilities for the future, include the evolution of the ward into a Day-care centre, or the eventuality of a mixed-sex ward.

Since last January the program has been experimental. Now that it is a proven success, Mr. Lou Yeats, Chief Psychologist of the Hospital has recently proposed some permanent changes for the ward. He writes, in a brief dated November 7, 1968, that: "... the Cottage B ward staff should be given full authority to continue to develop and direct their own programme."

He goes on later to point out that "the main difference here is that off-ward staff do not direct the programme." Just last week the go-ahead was given for the continuance of the program and the incorporation of the to pour more money into the hiring of new doctors, etc., we would be well on our way to preventing "mental deterioration" in men like Allan. I question that assumption.

There is more to the success of Cottage B than merely an authority shift. Hold a grown man as he hallucinates, alternately shrieking and sobbing in your ear, struggle with another, writhing on the floor in 250 naked sweating pounds of epileptic seizure. Try that for forty-five hours out of your week and you begin to realize some of the agony of mental illness. You also begin to realize that neither yourself nor anyone else is very far away from the same internal torture. A society defines its own deviants. What is "insanity" here is not insanity on another continent, nor that matter in the next province. The realization that between themselves and the go back to the 1800's. That is, if you can dodge the bats that scramble between the cobwebs.

The old decaying dome itself is symbolic — of 999's traditional approach to mental illness used here at the hospital; an approach that serves to shelter the mental patient but not to help him. At 999 as with almost all other Ontario mental hospitals therapy with the mental patients rests in the hands of the psychiatrists, resident doctors in training and a few psychiatric nurses. The function of all other personnel is for the most part custodial — keeping patients physically healthy and clean.

And the outcome of the traditional approach? Well, take a look at Allan. He's been at 999 for a while.

for him and loved him. Allan knows more about what's going on in the ward than all other patients. He sees everything and hears more. He is easily scared — even by the movement of someone in the same room. Alone with him, holding him, trying to soothe him, he will relax, sit comfortably unfolding his bended arms and legs and sometimes even smile. A wrong move, or sound and he 'snaps' back to the old Allan that the attendants have known for years — sitting quietly in the foetal position. Getting to Allan takes time, but he can be gotten to. I know.

Just recently one of Allan's relatives brought in some old paintings of Allan's, dated 1929. I showed them to him

However, he remembers me now — something he didn't do all last summer, even though I was constantly with him.

Allan's case says a lot about 999's approach to mental illness. Locked into an overcrowded, understaffed hospital in 1932, he was lucky to get even the proper custodial care needed to keep him clean and healthy. The only 'therapy' he ever got was the ward psychiatrist's attempts to talk to him. Allan doesn't like to talk. His report on file read constantly "continuing mental deterioration". I hardly talk to Allan, I touch him and I do things with him but I'm not sure this is the best approach.

There are quite a few Allanians at 999. There are many examples of unbelievable disregard for the fact that the mental patient is a human being and not a "thing" to be kept alive and out of the way.

This summer I tried in my own way to care. For in-

It wouldn't be fair to blame things on individually poor custodial staff. That's far too easy. At one time some staff members had to work in ratios of one staff to 50 patients. Small wonder there seems to be many apathetic attendants and nurse-aides. On-ward staff, that is those who worked eight-hour shifts on one ward, were responsible for the health and welfare of all patients. Off-ward staff, that is doctors, psychologists and therapists, were the only people responsible for any kind of attempt at helping the mental patient.

On Karl and Allan's Ward there were, at one time, one hundred and ten men on a sixty bed ward — a catch-all chronic ward for those who didn't react to admission ward treatment within a given length of time. The statistics are nauseating and the farther back you go, the worse they get. But their ward is now one of the best examples of what can be done in the face of such grim numbers. Over a period of four years now, this ward has undergone phenomenal re and improvement.

few had gone to Nursing Homes for the aged or disabled, but the majority went to Boarding Homes or on to Day Therapy. (These are significant steps in the rehabilitation of the chronically ill. At a Boarding Home or on Day Therapy a patient is given far more responsibility for himself as well as the opportunity to participate more fully in society. Admittedly, the extent and degree of participation is limited, but no longer are there any 'vegetables'. Many of them care now, about others and themselves.

The constant complaint here at 999 as well as with other government-run mental hospitals is that there are not enough doctors or nurses, and that present ones are overworked. The assumption here is that if Queen's Park were

The staff on Cottage B feel for their men. Granted, sometimes it is not easy, and they cannot 'take it home with them', they have to try and shut it off. But that is where the success of the Cottage lies. It remains a simple fact that almost all doctors and a lot of nurses either don't have time to 'feel' or else are over-trained in that sacred tradition of 'professional objectivity.'

The whole traditional approach is paradoxical. The more highly trained a person is the more distant he is from those he seeks to help. Obviously, the highly-trained personnel with organizational and leadership ability is a vital part of any hospital but far too often the faceless guy who scrubs the floor and cleans the toilet bowl is overlooked. He comes under the direction of an institutional neurosis that demands specializations and qualification. Why shouldn't he sit down with the boys, over coffee, to shoot the breeze? The likelihood of the old 'trust relationship' that doctors are forever seeking seems somehow more prevalent here. But the cleaner has to know that his 'caring' counts.

The ward staff on Cottage B have tried a new direction and have shown that it can work. It is the small man in the mental hospital, the man who is very near to the personal horrors of mental illness that holds the answer. The Cottage has shown that in spite of decaying buildings, shortages of staff and money and in spite of the many Allanians that are in mental hospitals all over the world, there is indeed hope.

lunch-hour overcoat is palatable

It's not easy to give a dramatic experience to forty lunch-bag-carrying theatre-goers in the daylight reality of University College's West Hall — and all in thirty minutes.

But the UC Players' Guild have done a competent job in their production of Wolf Mankowitz's one act play, The Bespoke Overcoat directed by John Rowland.

The programme notes call the production "an informal presentation," which it most definitely was. No artificial lighting, only a part of the stage raised from the floor, and a pragmatic minimum of scenery and props.

You hardly notice the actors when they first come out on stage. It took a painful half minute for the post-lecture conversation and the rustling of papers to subside. And a one act play is like a short story — no time for labored exposition or lulls to slow down the action. Contact with the audience has got to happen in the first few minutes, and once it's made, there's no going back.

Aaron Marcus, who plays Fender, manages to carry the weight of the role with some credibility. Fender, the chief character, is the Willy Loman of the Jewish garment industry. And Mankowitz's play is in many ways a compact Death of a Salesman. Dying and death are the themes that haunt Fender as he seeks a new overcoat, a "bespoke" overcoat from his friend Morry, a tailor, played by Alex Michaels. (I still don't know what a bespoke overcoat is).

Fender drifts through the play in a tattered coat that is beyond repair and a shirt with a huge hole in it that gapes like an absurd wound. He weaves in and out of reality and dream, until it's impossible to tell which is which. He is either dying or dead, and in either state he wants a bespoke overcoat from Morry and all the status that goes with it. He is always cold; he can not get out of the "terrible cold" back into life. "In the old days the trade was good. Now it is not good."

Fender's life oscillates between his tailor and his starkly efficient employer, Ranting, who is well characterized by Ila Moll. He is rejected by both men as the play moves with suspense and intensity to its conclusion.

The scenes change back and forth from the tailor's shop to the warehouse without warning. At one point the three characters are soliloquizing around the same table and totally unaware of each other: three scenes are sandwiched into one. Director John Rowland effects the multiple transitions smoothly and without excessive gimmickery.

The play is too good to really botch up and too difficult to elicit a great performance from such an amateur company. But the production does overcome the mediocrity that always seems to characterize lunch-hour productions. It's worth half an hour of your time. And besides, it's free!

no fire in wife

Federico Garcia Lorca's well-acted, and don't deal The Shoemaker's Prodigious Wife and August Strindberg's Playing with Fire have much in common. Both were first presented in 1930, both deal with marriage, and best of all, both are being presented by the Centre for the Study of Drama tonight and tomorrow at 8:30 in the 4 Glen Morris Church.

That's good news because the two plays are lively and well-acted, and don't deal with marriage in quite the same angry disturbing fashion as, say, John Osborne. The title of Strindberg's piece has to be a put on. Despite his well-known poor relations with women (he married three times with a remarkable lack of success), Playing with Fire is more farce than hard drama.

The only "fire" for the characters comes from themselves in conflict. As people they are quite empty of the kind of feelings that produce real fire.

Knut's passion for his wife Kerstin comes alive only when his divorced friend Alex visits, Alex and Kerstin quarrel only when Knut has left the room, Kerstin feels love for Alex only when he talks to Adele (who, incidentally, is Knut's mistress).

The characters analyse each other's feelings endlessly — it's all they have. "I'm not ambitious," says Kerstin. "But life is so monotonous —

I want something dreadful to happen."

They can't even have the excitement of a good wife-swap without picking the idea and their motives to pieces. The play itself is probably more difficult to produce than it looks, but even so the acting is more than adequate throughout. Nobody takes his or her role too seriously.

Of the two plays, Lorca's is the longer and lighter, one of his "violent farces". It's about a shrewish young cobbler's wife (played by Bronwyn Drainie) who flays her older husband with visions of suitors on white horses wearing black capes who sweep her away. When he leaves ("Everybody talks about us!") she makes up her own image of him as the suitor and stays faithful until he returns in disguise. It's an old tale, but charmingly told and, again, the acting is excellent.

Harry Lane is especially effective as the shoemaker. His only suffering is that he resembles an excitable Irishman more than an inflammable Spaniard (there is a difference). — paul macrae

daffydil: all stem, no stalk

All your favourite organs are on display this week at Hart House Theatre. You may need your anatomy text to figure out several of the cut-ups in the Medical Society's Umpteenth Annual edition of Daffydil, but with 34 different skits and blackouts in all, there is sure to be something to tickle every funny bone.

Daffydil has several very funny, very entertaining moments, but unfortunately it also doles out a generous "increment of excrement," to go along with them. Most of the script is the product of the fertile mind of one man — Arnold Shoichet, who also directed the show, and wrote the music and lyrics. While the show contented itself with poking fun at medical professors, doctors, surgeons and especially transplants, the humour was generally fresh. But Shoichet and his small crew of geni simply didn't have enough gags to pad out the evening's entertainment, and one wishes they had "borrowed" some laughs from somewhere else to liven up the format. After all, a revue show like "Laugh-In" employs 30 writers, all stealing like mad just to make up a one hour show.

Perhaps the most artistically successful numbers were the musical ones. While the dancing, skilfully choreographed by Steve Levinson, just missed coming off, it displayed some sensitivity at and least the intentions of trying to do something really good.

My mother remembers going to Daffydil, way back when she was my age. The admission didn't embarrass my mother, but perhaps Daffydil as a venerable Medical institution is starting to show signs of hardening of the arteries. — lorne fienberg Followers of the Varsity Review were heartened Wednesday night to see several staffers and one ex-staffer in action portraying roles in the CBC Festival Production of Reddick.

Henry Tarvainen was most noticeable and most effective as Peety, one of the leading characters in the play. Bob Bossin and Alan Gordon also contributed competence to the evening's production.

Unfortunately, Reddick happened to be a terrible show, but not as bad as this review.

billy liar reduced to a dead crawl at the colonnade

Billy Liar is billed as a real gut social comedy depicting the hangups of the British working classes. But since this kind of scene, (if it ever really existed) ceased to interest theatre-goers a long time ago, surely there must be something else to account for the durability of a play such as Billy Liar. Even an essentially dull production such as the New College Theatre Guild's which is playing this week at the Colonnade Theatre cannot totally blot out the vitality of the play.

The action in the play, takes place somewhere between an industrial town in Northern England and Never-neverland. Billy (whose last name isn't really Liar of course), spends part of his time as an assistant to the local undertaker. He spends the rest of his time acting out a variety of roles from Napoleon, to an orchestra conductor to Churchill. It's not really that Billy tells lies; he just kind of bends the truth a bit in his battle to ignore his family, his job, and the fact that he is engaged to three girls at the same time. Practically nothing happens in the play. In fact it's just a tall tale built around one whopper after another. Billy attempts several methods of running away from his insupportable existence, from an absurd retreat into the make-believe to an even more absurd retreat into marriage. But at the close of the play he ends up pretty much the same as he started — a trite indication of man's futile quest for peace of mind. Except for the heavy-handed ending, the play is a very funny, lively study of youth, who aspires to something better in the world, and predictably falls flat on its face.

The New College players manage to retain some of the innocent goodness of the play, but not nearly enough to keep the play moving at a spritely pace. When the lines are funny, and fantasy is the order of the day good things happen on stage. But when we get the reality gig clouding up the scene, the play becomes frankly — a yawn.

The play's most obvious failing besides the limping pace is its overly cautious direction. Director Hilary McLaughlin has some good talent to work with and several good artistic ideas of her own. What is lacking is a certain reckless abandon on all sides to make ideas and players come alive. Bill Peters as Billy Liar displayed wit and much talent as a mime artist but one always felt that he was holding something back.

The two actors who displayed a bit of abandon came across best. Trudy Weiss as the slutty fiancée let it all hang out, (as the saying goes) in her brief performance. Margaret Keith as the aging grandma was most lively in her dotage and senility. Unfortunately she died in the second act, thus robbing the performance of the little vitality it had.

Actually, as campus productions go, Billy Liar has more going for it than most. The cast is better than average; Director McLaughlin sometimes displays a good understanding of what is artistic in the play. As for what ails this production — maybe Geritol is the answer.

Man and His World: The Noranda Lectures, Expo '67
Introduction by Helen S. Hogg

University of Toronto Press,
419 pp., $17.50

One television commentator stated the other day that in his opinion Trudeau's election as leader of the Liberal Party would have been impossible before Expo '67. He felt that before Expo, Canadians were a pretty conservative group, not ready to experiment in a matter so important as the election of a party leader.

After Expo, Canada became a new country. Never before had so many Canadians had a single experience which gave them a sense of belonging to a nation of which they could be unreservedly proud. In several respects, Expo marked the beginning of Canada's maturity. Now that Expo is over, both as a world's fair and as an experience, many books and articles have been written about it in an attempt to re-create a bit of the atmosphere of excitement and optimism for the future which Expo did so much to encourage.

Man and His World is a collection of the twenty-eight lectures sponsored by Noranda Mines and delivered at Expo. These lectures are "original documents" of the fair and ought to be of interest to those who would like to assess what Expo has accomplished for Canada.

In the words of Paul Martin, the lecture series tried "to show how man must adopt new ideas and concepts to survive and develop the human personality more fully in a rapidly changing world."

Many of the lectures do reach the high standard set for them by Mr. Martin: they show how men and women who have great influence in shaping the world deal with the problems facing them, whether they are problems in government or science, architecture or education.

Because of the wide range of subjects covered in these lectures and because of the size of the volume itself, it is impossible either to summarize or to criticize the important elements dealt with in it, for to do that would take pages. That is to say that the essays are rich, both in themselves and in relation to each other.

I hope that I can give a sense of the tension between optimism and pessimism which I have found throughout the book, by tracing a single concept, that of hope for the future, through three of the essays.

Runo Zevi, an architect and city planner, noted that often in the history of architecture there have been regressions after great advances. Professor Zevi says, "When one thinks of architectural history, one cannot be too optimistic. The image of 'the dwarfs on the shoulders of giants' . . . is a myth, a wishful interpretation of history. So far as architecture is concerned, the dwarfs, that is, the mediocre architects, do not climb on the shoulders of giants at all. In fact, they hate the genius, they have an inferiority complex toward him, and they want to forget him."

This view has great ramifications when one is aware of the close connection between architecture and town planning. Zevi maintains that "To speak of town planning without checking all the time its coincidence with architecture is useless. One could say, 'Tell me the kind of architecture you want and I will give you a city plan,' or vice versa. One who believes in a kind of architecture such as the 'grand ensembles' of Paris will produce a type of city consonant with this kind of architecture. On the other hand, an 'architecture of escape' goes with an evasive plan."

The obvious connection is that if architecture is as closely linked with planning as Zevi suggests, then it would seem that any regression in architecture, such as that prevalent after Frank Lloyd Wright's death, would have serious consequences even for the man in the street. A regression in architecture would mean, perhaps, more problems in the urban areas.

Nevertheless, Zevi, because some modern architecture is very progressive, remains an optimist: "Habitat is to Montreal 1967 as the Eiffel Tower is to Paris 1889." A few examples of progress, in the face of the onslaught of computer-designed skyscrapers, seem (in my mind) little cause for optimism.

Economist Karl Gunnar Myrdal said that he was hasty when he titled his talk "An Economist's Vision of a Sane World." Now, he says, "Anyone who attempts to picture a sane world today must climb so high above reality, and the feasible improvements of reality, that the vision can have few distinct contours, and can claim little practical relevance."

Myrdal's analysis of the relationship of the underdeveloped countries to the rich nations is an attempt to show how old patterns of behaviour, which seem rational, are utterly without justification. In this regard, he discusses the two major problems of warfare and military expenditure in general, and of the population explosion and the attendant problem of mass starvation.

These problems, Myrdal feels, are soluble. Aid to the poor countries can be handled, from the point of view of economics, and yet not enough has been given to really lighten the burden of poverty. "The hunger crisis, when it becomes aggravated, will be a real eye-opener to us all."

If there is any question about Myrdal's prediction for the future, he answers it directly. "I am afraid I must agree with those who see our course as the road to mankind's suicide, brought about not simply by nuclear holocaust but by a number of other trends all working toward disaster."

Barbara Ward, also an economist, sees a "new history" developing, one in which the precarious balance of the status quo allows the growth of "something better." Her contention seems to be that modern diplomats are becoming very good at avoiding incidents which might lead directly to a nuclear war. As an example, she says that the Cuban missile crisis merely returned that island to its status before the missiles were brought in, that is, with Castro still in power.

Miss Ward believes that certain changes are possible within the status quo. "I think the last twenty years have already shown that the status quo can be modified — and successfully modified — by other means than force. . . . Not many observers forecast 'the thaw' in Communist lands or suggested that Tito might be the first Communist to risk choice in politics. At the other end of the world, could one have foreseen a South Korea more or less reconciled with Japan, its economy growing by eight per cent a year?"

I find the optimism expressed by Zevi and Miss Ward unsatisfactory, and yet I would like to find an alternative to Gunnar Myrdal's dark predictions. Looking to the world of science, amply represented in this collection, we see only optimism. Hideki Yukawa, Nobel prize laureate in physics, questions aberrations in nature in the traditional way, always assuming that there is a rational description of the behaviour of phenomena. "We have to think very hard in order to find out the reason . . . (why sub-atomic particles behave as they do)." But this optimism, too, is based on rationality, and as Dr. Myrdal and others have pointed out, rationality has its limits. Referring to the arms race, Myrdal says, "According to all historical experience the massing of the potentialities for war tends to lead to war."

Man and His World is in one sense a collection of brain-teasers, challenging the reader to explore the relationships between the essays as well as to think about each essay itself. For this reason, there is no need to read the essays consecutively, and books which can be read bit by bit are always tempting, particularly when the quality is as uniformly high as it is in these essays.

Unfortunately, because of its $17.50 price tag, Man and His World will not attain the readership it deserves.

silence when you're speaking to me

Lyrical and Critical Essays by Albert Camus, ed. Philip Thody (Alfred A. Knopf).

In 1936 Albert Camus, at the age of twenty-two, took a philosophy degree at the University of Algiers with a thesis on Plotinus and Saint Augustine. In the same year he dedicated to his professor, Jean Grenier, a collection of essays called The Wrong Side and the Right Side in which he expressed a philosophy of his own. This work, as he later pointed out, contains the core and source of all his subsequent thought. In these pages we find his first awareness of life's meaninglessness and his adoption of lucidity as one of his highest values, although the comfort it brings is bitter. (Mingling lucidity and nostalgia, the young Camus suggests that perhaps happiness is the self-pitying awareness of our unhappiness.)

These essays are not, however, uniformly pessimistic. The title of the work refers to a piece of cloth of which the inside and the outside are inseparable, just as the joy and anguish of life are inseparable. For Camus, joy almost inevitably proceeds from losing himself in the sun-drenched landscapes of his beloved Mediterranean. He finds it possible to accept the appearances without being taken in.

The first English publication of these early essays deserves the special attention of today's student. Too personal to be possible within professional philosophy, they speak directly to us despite differences in climate and locale. Important as they are, however, they comprise only the first section of a generous collection of Camus' essays, edited with discreet and helpful notes by Philip Thody.

Written over Camus' entire career from 1936 to his death in 1960, the collection is concerned mainly with descriptions of his native Algeria and his emotional and intellectual responses. As such the divisions are somewhat artificial; the work forms an organic whole with the same themes recurring through The Wrong Side and the Right Side, Nuptials, Summer, and into the literary essays. Lyricism and criticism, under the name of irony, pervades the whole. The organic nature of the work is reminiscent of Emerson's essays where one part illuminates another and initial obscurities often disappear on second reading.

REVIEW 14

Camus acknowledges a tension between classicism and "profound anarchy" in his writing. This latter is manifest in the apparent contradictions as well as the loose structure of the essays. At one moment Camus' aim is critical self-awareness; at another it is the submergence of intellect in a carefree paganism. He may curse poetry as a "ridiculous mask laid on the passion to live" ("The Desert") and deliberately seek out the ugly and prosaic towns of North Africa as the homes of truth. But at the same time he is creating a poetry for them. Since he wrote about them, Oran, Algiers, and Constantine are no longer "towns without a past".

Camus both condemns all hope as sinful and affirms his own hope in the triumph of intelligence over brute force.

The greatest paradox of all is that the same beauty which inspires joy also makes life intolerable. He finds supreme irony and ennobling tragedy in the conflict between man and the smiling land which promises so much more than it can deliver. Such a land is Italy which "like other privileged places, offers me the spectacle of beauty in which, nonetheless, men die." We shall be justifiably disappointed if we look to Camus for the simple and the clear-cut. However, while Camus' thought may at times seem ambiguous it is not confused. Let us not forget that behind the informality is working an extremely acute and disciplined mind.

While the essays are fully self-sufficient, they derive added value from the commentary they provide to Camus' other writings, chiefly to his first novel, The Stranger. In The Stranger the protagonist Meursault shoots an Arab. That he never shows grief for his recently deceased mother is taken by the jury as evidence of gross insensitivity and want of human decency. Accordingly he is condemned to death.

The essays of The Wrong Side and the Right Side cast light on Meursault's reticence. In "Irony" Camus describes the death of his grandmother, a domineering hypochondriac, and reports his own reaction in the third person: "... If he asked himself whether he felt any sorrow, he could find none at all. Only on the day of the funeral, because of the general outburst of tears, he did weep, but he was afraid of being insincere and telling lies in the presence of death." This insincere grief makes tears inappropriate for some one truly loved. In "Between Yes and No", an essay principally concerned with his mother, Camus recounts a visit paid her by her grown son. The two sit together in silence: "It's true, he never talked much to her. But did he ever need to? When one keeps quiet the situation becomes clear. He is her son, she is his mother. She can say to him: 'You know'."

But conventional society does not know and consequently Meursault goes to the guillotine. In his 1955 preface to The Stranger, Camus characterizes his hero as a man who chooses to die for the truth. This truth is ineffable; to utter it is to lie.

The depth of Camus' attachment to truth is summed up in a quotation from Descartes which Camus calls "the greatest of our virile poems": "The first (precept) was never to accept anything as true unless I knew without the slightest doubt that it was so." Nevertheless Camus does not fall prey to paralyzing scepticism. By his own admission, a moralist rather than a philosopher, he is concerned with establishing secular values and standards of action. The action he advocates however, is not social or political but personal. While he goes beyond the initial awareness of life's absurdity, he never loses sight of it or pretends to find meaning where there can be none. Suspicious of what he calls "the political Gorgon" and rejecting social and religious myths alike he knows that every man is ultimately on his own.

Appended to the volume of Lyrical and Critical Essays are three short interviews with Camus. The third of these, the most irresponsible and in some ways the most interesting, consists of snap questions and answers on a wide range of topics. The responses often reveal Camus' irritation at the simple-mindedness of his interrogator. Camus always disliked the nuisance of being a celebrity and a Nobel Prize winner. At one point he is asked: "What is the compliment that annoys you the most?"

"Honesty, humanity, conscience—you know, all the modern mouthwashes."

Such words, like a son's tears, have been rendered useless by abuse. In Camus' case where the richness of his work and tragedy of his untimely death make praise and sorrow truly appropriate, the only honest response is silence.

FILM CANADA

Roger HART, Don OWEN, Martin DUCKWORTH (behind the camera) and Jean-Claude LABRECOUE during the shooting of THE ERNIE GAME.

A group of seven young Indians between the ages of 20 and 27 are in the process of becoming the first all-Indian production crew with the National Film Board. The experimental project is under the auspices of the N.F.B.'s "Challenge for Change" programme, using film as a catalyst to effect social change. After a six week crash course on techniques, and a first production experiment, they will undergo three month specialization as trainees in various departments at the N.F.B. and then, 'split up in two crews and fan out to observations across Canada, possibly staying a month with each one, and bringing back some material for later production of a series of films.

Douglas Letterman, former producer of "This Hour Has Seven Days", has formed his own company out of New York. Document Associates Inc., will produce filmed documentaries for American and Canadian television. The first one completed is called Resurrection City, and the next will be a drama-documentary on Cuba since the revolution.

Vancouver artist Michael Morris is making Mondo Arte, a report on the art scene around the world. People in various world art capitals have been asked to submit complete edited film segments on happenings, gallery openings, the student protest at the Venice Biennale, etc., which Morris will put together into a film. "It won't be ready for about a year," says Morris. "It's a question of waiting for events to occur."

Don Owen, writer and director of The Ernie Game has settled in Toronto where he has opened his own production company. He has just undertaken the shooting of a film for the Albright-Knox Gallery in Buffalo.

The Canadian Film Development Corporation has given tentative assurance to several producers of federal funds to help them produce feature films. Marshall-Taylor Co. has received approval in principle for $130,000 to film their science fiction thriller dealing with electronic brain control. The script is by Nathan Cohen and former Telegram Entertainment writer David Cobb. Science fiction writer Isaac Asimov is acting as technical adviser. Funds have been promised to Elgin Films, also of Toronto, who plan to shoot Jack Brundage's Fortune and Men's Eyes. The screenplay is by Brundage, and the production will be entirely in Toronto.

Director's Guild of Canada is presently negotiating with its American counterpart for reciprocal agreements covering U.S. directors who come into Canada to work. The Canadian Guild would like to see the American directors joining their own affiliation when they come to work over here. Under present agreements, Canadian directors who want to work in the U.S. must pay the $3,000 fee of the American Guild, but D.G.A. members come into Canada at no charge, without even paying D.G. of Canada the $400 fee of the Canadian group.

new blues from chicago

Good Chicago blues bands aren't usually very big groups. They have five or six instruments and a voice, and that's it, but a good band puts out an extraordinarily big sound. The reason for this is that all the instruments can be heard with about equal intensity and clarity. Both piano and bass have been taken out of the obscurity of the rhythm section and made important parts of the total sound. Every instrument tends to have a drive which is peculiar to it. In good Chicago blues, all these drives should be heard working together at the same time. If you can't hear the piano along with the harmonica and guitar, the band's sound is that much duller.

Luther Georgia Boy Snake Johnson, The Muddy Waters Blues Band (Douglas SD 781) is a record I have been eyeing with some suspicion for a couple of months. For one thing, the cover seemed to be overly capitalizing on the Muddy Waters name. He's there all right, but only to play guitar behind Sammy Langhorn. And the other thing was that this is the same group that accompanied Otis Spann recently on a not altogether successful album. Muddy Waters has the problem from time to time of having stars like James Cotton go off on their own. In the past he has always had the ability to put another great band back together, but this time I wasn't sure.

But his abilities as a band leader appear to be unchanged. This is a surprisingly fine album. The only thing really wrong with it is that they got the billing wrong. At the bottom of the back cover there's a notethat says that harmonica player Mojo Buford is the singer on side two, but this is his album. Luther Johnson is a fair singer, and the band gives him good backing. He does a dramatic preaching narrative version of "Long Distance Telephone Call" and there is a pretty good band number, with some great piano playing by Otis Spann. But things really get started with Mojo Buford's threatening "Watch Dog" on side 2, followed by a smashing instrumental when the three guitars and piano really get moving. Lead guitarist Sammy Langhorn has a chance to show off his skill on this record, and even without the discovery of Mojo Buford, he would make the album worth hearing. I think this record has been something of a sleeper, and on the basis of side two, I recommend it highly.

The Luther Johnson album has the sort of balance that makes a fine band. Buddy Guy's album, A Man & the Blues (Vanguard 79272) has the material for a good band, but somebody hasn't known how to use it. There isn't any point in getting Otis Spann to sit in on a session if he isn't going to be heard, and on this record he sounds as if he is sitting in another room. There's no doubt that Buddy Guy is a good guitarist, and he may be "the most exciting of the new bluesmen" as the jacket says, but this is hardly an exciting record. The problem is that there is just too much focus on one man, and the band never gets a chance. I was surprised to see that there are three saxophones on this record, because I hadn't heard them, which seems to be a pretty fair indication of what has happened to the instrument balance.

Another thing wrong with this record is that five of the nine songs are written by Buddy Guy. He isn't much of a song writer, and the songs are mostly a few lines and then a long guitar break. Mercy Dee Walton's classic "One Room Country Shack" and Robert Night-hawk's "Sweet Little Angel" (credited to B.B. King) really stand out in this company.

Altogether this is quite a subdued album with very little of the Chicago drive, but it does show off some fine contemplative guitar playing. It's not the kind of record that will get a party going, but it would be a good one for lying under the cigarette smoke afterwards, half high and half asleep.

Muddy Waters' new album is included here because he was a Chicago bluesman, and one hopes he will be again. Perhaps the kindest thing to say would be that the title Electric Mud is howlingly appropriate and leave it at that. I don't begrudge Muddy Waters any money he can make on this record, but I sure hope that Cadet loses a lot so that it won't try other such experiments in catching the mass market. It is said that Muddy Waters walked into a studio and was confronted with an electric pop band he'd never seen before and the session began. He should have turned around and walked out again.

I wouldn't object to Muddy Waters' experimenting with whatever sound interested him, but this record doesn't even begin to reach that level. There's nothing new or interesting about it. The band simply turns out an inferior sound after Pink Floyd, or The Cream, or Jimmy Hendrix, and Muddy Waters is lost in it all. It makes you want to cry.

Santa shuns X-Mas sit-in Santa Claus failed to show Wednesday night at the Blue and White Christmas Tree at Hart House Great Hall.

Abe Mudrik, Blue and White chief, had the reason: "Santa Claus was at Yorkdale, Eaton's, Simpson's, the Town and Country, and so on. How could he be here? Santa Claus has become capitalistic."

But he has promised the abominable snowman for Winter Weekend.

The U of T chorus wasn't there either. But the Hart House Glee Club was, and very good they were, too. About 500 students collected candy canes and gifts and sang Christmas carols. Gina brought her guitar and sang folk songs like "Summertime" and "If I was a Carpenter."

Alan Toff was there to do a marvellous job of reading Dylan Thomas' "A Child's Christmas in Wales".

C. T. Bissell was there. He read the traditional Christmas story after the lights went out, leaving one spot light shining up and casting his towering shadow over the dim portraits of dignitaries past. One student was heard to exclaim "Look at those eyebrows! A Mephistophelean anti-Christ figure if I ever saw one."

But as the reading progressed the hall became very still between the flickering firelight and the glow from the magnificent Christmas tree. For atheist or agnostic, the ancient tale seems to hold in it something of the spirit of Christmas — whatever that may be.

As the students got up off the floor and rolled up their blankets after three hours of concentrated sitting, Mudrik was heard to mutter to himself bitterly "Omigod, we sponsored a sit-in!"

Course Unions to be evaluated

By PAM BERTON

Are course unions here to stay or will students reject them as useless? This is the determining year. SAC has allocated $13,550 to them, although they only counted on giving $3,500 last spring. Course Unions have expanded and sprung up out of nowhere.

In January next year all the established course unions will get together to work out some common problems and aims, and to discuss their future relations with SAC.

As an immediate link, SAC President Steven Langdon proposes the unions nominate one person to attend SAC meetings, especially those of the Education Commission. "This would give a more valid reporting of facts, and give SAC more of a basis on which to react," he says.

Wednesday afternoon he participated in an informal seminar on campus problems with the History Students Union.

"What we're trying to do is establish some feeling of belonging," explained Sheine Goldstein (III UC). She feels that since the university has "mushroomed" in size in the last few years, the student can no longer turn to SAC.

"We can analyse our own problems and do something about it." In turn, the course unions can establish close relations with SAC.

The expansion of the university has particularly affected the history department. "The history department hasn't got the staff or the money to accommodate all history students in tutorials rather than lectures," said Craig Heron (III UC), chairman of the History Students Union. "You either educate a few people well, or a lot of people not so well. Both are too extreme to accept."

Even when the professor isn't there, seminar groups would be more useful than some lectures," Langdon suggested. "Most of the stuff you get in lectures you can get anyway in terms of facts."

He also pointed out that evaluation of course content is just as important as structure. "The course union has to look at the different philosophies of how to approach history and look at areas that the history department doesn't touch.

"In the U.S. there is a controversy over whether history departments will give courses in Black history. Perhaps there is a parallel here in whether we should be teaching Indian history.

school year two weeks longer

Grade 13 students bemoan — you will spend at least two extra weeks in school this year.

According to a memorandum sent to all Ontario high school principals last week, Grade 13 will be extended to June 13. No exams in any grade will begin sooner than June 16.

However, a spokesman for the Ontario Department of Education noted yesterday that final exams will not be written by all Grade 13 students.

"We are requesting that exams be used only for borderline cases and encouraging the school boards to evaluate students on the year's work," he said.

According to the spokesman, the decision was made to make more use of the school year and school buildings. This does not affect elementary schools, which already have a 10-month school year.

The spokesman said the poor summer job situation for high school students "probably had some bearing on the decision."

It is expected some principals may ignore the department memorandum. They are said to be concerned the change would increase the teachers' workload and delay the processing of marks until July.

teaching high school to teaching us, and it shows. Our average age is 24, and some of us are married with children of our own. Yet if we question or criticize a teacher, we are asked: "Do you want to be treated like mature adults?"

3 UTS: We have nothing against the University of Toronto Schools. There simply isn't room for both UTS and COE in the present building. We have two overcrowded institutions fighting for the same space.

Students council Monday (Dec. 9) the council reconstituted itself as a student union. It issued a demand for parity with the faculty on the two major policy-making committees in the College — the Executive and College Program Committees.

We at COE realize that the teachers are trying, approachable, and can change their classes to some extent, but that still doesn't affect the overall problem of COE in general. One big problem, of course, is financing, and we must find some way to convince the provincial government that COE as an institution needs a great deal of money in order to upgrade its standards of teaching our teachers.

That is if COE is to continue at all. But many students feel an entirely different approach is needed. A system of internship or a full-time apprenticeship program would probably be a cheaper and more effective alternative than increasing the academic year. Heaven save us from more COE!

Home is where the SAC sit-in is

From our SAC Bureau — In its continual fight against bureaucracy at home and abroad, in its determined struggle to co-opt co-option, and in its unstinting service to the community of scholars, the Students' Administrative is staging a sit-in.

This one will be in the SAC office. That's right — the SAC office — that's the monastery next to the Innis staff-student washroom.

Anti-revolutionaries, bourgeois revisionists, and elitists may unite and arise and sit down next Thursday, because it's an open house from 2 p.m. on.

It's an Xmas (keep the 'X' in Xmas) party for everyone and it's called the SAC-CUS-BACCHUS-FRACUS.

The Board of Governors and university administrators — Presidents and vice-presidents alike — are cordially invited to attend and be the first on their campus to occupy the student administration building.

Demonstrators will be able to play "find-the-secret-memo" and taste Mod Martha's punch.

Ferguson Fellows retire from SAC

The Master and Senior Fellows of Ferguson College have withdrawn from the Students' Administrative Council "as a disapprobatory gesture of that body's reactionary status." The withdrawal was announced yesterday in a press release from John Holland, Master of the College.

Further investigation by telephone revealed that Ferguson College is a non-Greek fraternity. Holland said "it parallels Massey College — get the connection — Massey-Ferguson.

"Rumor has it that we were founded by a plowman back in the 13th century but records are a little blurred after the 16th."

There are six Senior Fellows in residence. "But we have all sorts of Old Boys scattered around the campus."

Since Ferguson College as an organization is not a part of the SAC, the withdrawal decision involves only withholding of fees. The withdrawal motion was passed unanimously by the Senior Fellows.

IV CIVIL B HOLD VIC TO LESS THAN 25 GOALS

INTERFACULTY SPORTS By GELLIUS HOCKEY

Dents blanked Erin, 6-0. Dents scorers were Alpha Kantsaris (2), Glazier, Pollard, Skelton (a key man) and Akiyama.

Dobkin (2, "a small dob" OED) and Tr... (the man toll bridges were named after) led Innis over Archman's Farm, 3-1. Ortvad scored for Arch.

Celli and three indecipherables scored to give Devonshire a 4-2 win over Wellesley Bus. Filthy Deluca and Cingarle replied for Bus.

IV Civil B O, Vic IV 22. Scar (Healy, Raino, Howson 2) beat SMC B (Rae, Battling Bulger), 4-2.

Goals by Solomon (2, in fact), Wilson and Craig led Jr Eng past Meds, 4-2. Burul ("Roll out the Burul and We'll All Have A Burul Of Fun") and Davis were Meds scorers.

BASKETBALL

Vic (Franklin 12) 40, SMC

(Laglia 16) 34.

Feldman scored 11 and UC took PHE, 35-30. Barker's 8 led PHE.

Dents got 16 points from Rayman and used them to best advantage, beating Innis (Oleszkowicz 18) 46-41.

Vic II defeated UC II, 25-22. Sanderson had 8 for Vic II; Faust played a goethe game for UC II, scoring 8 as well.

South Arch, Ont., beat Bus 30-22 with Verhulst scoring 12 points. Johnston had 16, a fine performance, for the losers.

In the Suburbsqan League, Erin edged Scar, 38-37. Shaw had 13 for Erin, Pump 10 for Scar.

Rossman's two points made the difference as Meds (Kent 10) beat Sr. Eng. (Calahan 15), 29-28.

SMC B, led by George Hoo (George hoo?) with 11 points nisi priused Law, 50-36. Law leader was Rich Pyne with 16.

CONTEST RESULTS

It was revealed today by

Uncle Roderick Mickleburgh, aide-de-camp of Count Michael Ignatieff possessor of the famous eminence greasy black leather Jacket, and head judge for Varsity Sports Contests, that Mr. R.K. Graybiel (III New) has won the recent contest. Mr. Graybiel's answer to the question, viz., "Ou sont les neiges d'antan?" was, "A Antan, un village pres de Montreal" Mr. Graybiel has been awarded the Windsor Star as his prize.

I could have been a judge...

I could have been a judge but I never had the Latin. I just never had the Latin for the judgin'. I just never had it, so I'd had it, as far as being a judge was concerned. They require it to get through the rigorous judging exams. They're very rigorous the judging exams, very rigorous indeed. They're noted for their rigour. People come out of them saying, "My god! What a rigorous exam." So I became a miner instead. They're not very rigorous, the mining exams. No rigour involved, really. Complete lack of rigour... involved in the mining exams. They only ask you one question. They say, "Who are you?", and I got 75 per cent on that.

LARRUPIN' LAURENT'S LARIAT LASSOES MEEK MUSTANGS

Western Mustangs invade Varsity Arena this evening licking the wounds inflicted on them rather severely last night in London.

Before 1,000 silent Western fans, Varsity Blues handed 'Stangs their first defeat of the season with an authoritative 10-3 thumping.

Despite the loss, however, Western remains in first place in the western division of the SIHL with eight points after five games. Blues are tied with Waterloo for second spot with six points, but have two games in hand.

A victory tonight by Varsity would deadlock the two teams for the league lead and firmly establish Blues as the class of the league. Waterloo lost earlier to Western, 6-5.

Last night's win was a sweet one for Blues, whose spark had been sadly lacking in recent games. It was an incredible rebound from Tuesday's embarrassing 3-1 loss to York.

Centre Paul Laurent, who didn't play against York, had a superlative game as he led Varsity with five goals, all picture-play efforts. Four-goal performances have been fairly commonplace in the past for members of Blues' prolific scoring machine, but Laurent is the first player to snare five in a long time.

Laurent's linemates helped immeasurably as Steve Monteith assisted on four of his goals, while Ward Passi had two goals and four assists. Both of Passi's goals were bombs he let fly from the point after moving back to defense in the third period to replace ailing Dave Field.

Other Varsity markers came from Terry Peterman, Brian St. John and John Wright.

Brent Imlach (son of Punch) led Western with a pair of goals while John Makins added the third.

Blues led only 1-0 after the first period on Peterman's goal with both sides feeling each other out rather than throwing caution to the winds.

But in the second period Toronto exploded for five goals to one by Western, and the outcome of the game was no longer in doubt.

Varsity outshot Western 47-25.

There were 19 minors and two majors called in the chip-py match, the majors going to Blues' John Gordon and 'Stangs' Ron Lefebvre for a second period brawl.

Bob McClelland, Varsity's veteran, hard-working centre, was on the sidelines last night with a charley horse, and is a doubtful starter for tonight's return match.

Tom Little played goal for U of T and had little chance on the shots that beat him. All three Western goals came on power plays.

Coach Tom Watt has yet to decide on his goaltender for tonight, but it may be Little again.

Defensemen Bill L'Heureux and Dave Field played exceptionally well for Varsity against their teammates of last year. Field made the second all-star squad for Western in 1967-68.

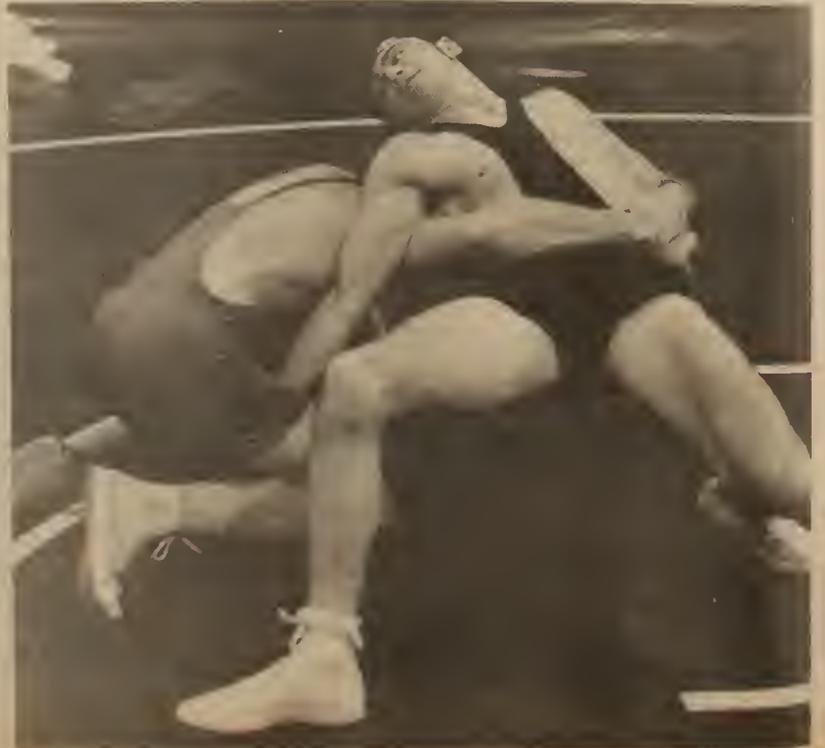

Western weren't really as bad as the lopsided score would indicate. They have a mainly fast skating team but are handicapped by a lead-footed defense.

The score could be a bit closer at the Arena this evening.

Five goal night

The Wild and Wriggling World of Wrestling

The U of T Varsity Wrestling team holds its first home meet of the '68-69 season Saturday afternoon at 2:00 p.m. in the Hart House gym. McMaster will provide the opposition.

The team has been training diligently since mid October and has already had an informal scrimmage match against Guelph. The Mac meet should be a close one and something worth seeing for anyone interested in witnessing an intercollegiate sport that combines strength, speed, co-ordination, and strategy.

Varsity competitors for the match will be: 130 lbs. Ken White; 137 lbs. Ted Sauer; 145 lbs. Morrel Pasquale; 152 lbs. Dave Simms; 160 lbs. Paul Bcswick (coach); 167 lbs. Don Stevens; 177 lbs. Bill Allison; 191 lbs. Larry Barron; Hvywt. Ylo Korgemagi Wrestling exhibition bouts will be: 152 lbs. Dennis Broadway; 177 lbs. Ernie Friedrich; 191 lbs. Greg Rokosh.

Referee will be Roger Doner former Varsity wrestler and member of Canada's Olympic Team.

You better not shout,
You better not cry,
You better not pout,
I'm tellin' you why,
The C.U.A. is coming to town.

We've written our brief,
Corrected it twice,
To prove U. of T.
Is cheap at our price
The C.U.A. is coming to town.

Walkin' in John Winter's Wonderland.

In engineering we can build a straw man,
Let's get them out of SAC, ah wat a game,
Then they'll say "work together?"
We'll guffaw, man,
For grads and undergrads are not the same.

Build a bar,
Serve up sherry,
No politics, we'll just be merry,
Undergrad days are gone,
We can use the staff john,

Perly acquitted after crown attorney witness lies

The case against University of Toronto student Gary Perly was dismissed Monday after Crown Attorney Robert Weiler admitted his only witness had given false testimony.

Police Constable Raymond Woodhead, who arrested Perly April 27 on a charge of obstructing police, said Thursday that he had refused to read a transcript of previous testimony from the trial offered him by Weiler.

But, Weiler, called to the stand by Perly on Friday, said Woodhead had the transcript "open in front of him" for approximately five minutes.

On Monday, after court was recessed for an hour for a conference between Perly, Weiler, and Judge Tupper Bigelow, Weiler admitted on the stand that Woodhead had told him he read the transcript, and had thus lied under oath.

Judge Bigelow broke in. "You don't need to ask any more questions of this or any other witness, Mr. Perly," he said.

"Because Constable Woodhead is the only crown witness, it is not safe to convict you on his evidence."

Bigelow seemed almost amused as he dismissed the case, but he left the courtroom grim-faced.

You must have noticed that a tall stringy Christmas tree made of cardboard tubing and green toilet paper stretched all the way from the floor to the balcony railing for most of the day. From 8:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. yesterday in the lobby of Sid Smith. Who put it there? And why? Who allowed them to do it? And why not?

This is what Mr. Fulton, superintendent of the building felt about the tree. He said it looked terrible. No one gave permission to the three male students who put it up. The reason he left it there was he thought they had gone to get permission. He finally dismantled it at 3:30 p.m. feeling it looked awful in the front lobby.

How did students react? Some stared briefly and then wandered off daydreaming. Others examined the neatly wrapped presents on the floor — with blank labels attached.

The students involved, identifying themselves only as "Santa's elves" told The Varsity last night the tree was "a symbol of friendship." They thought it was unfortunate that the university didn't do something "as a university" for Christmas, but felt there was really nothing it could do.

HELPFUL LIBRARY HINTS OR HOW TO OUTWIT THE BUREAUCRACY.

Problem: You have four books — a, b, c, and d — and they are all late for the Wallace Room 9:30 deadline. But you can return a, b, and c earlier than d.

Observations: You get fined for the number of hours your books are late, regardless of the number of books.

If you return books a, b, and c one hour late, you are fined for one hour.

If you come back later to return book d five hours late, you will get fined for five hours — plus the one hour for books a, b, and c.

Therefore it is cheaper to return all of books a, b, c, and d five hours late (you are charged for only five hours) than it is to hand in a, b, and c one hour late and d five hours late (you are charged for six hours).

Moral: If you've got to return one book much later than the others, return all the books later. Or don't return any books at all.

Student Socialists Conference

The first cross-Canada conference of student socialists will be held in Toronto during the Christmas recess.

The conference will be addressed by international student leaders including Peter Warrian, Steve Langdon and Joe Young.

Harry Kopyto of the U of T Young Socialists says there has been a "fantastic" response to the Conference.

"We're hoping to co-ordinate the activities of radicals and socialists from across Canada," Kopyto said. "The conference will try to formulate plans for socialist students across the country to carry out simultaneously."

"Secret" brief presented to Ont Govt

The University of Toronto's "secret" brief on the future of the university was presented last Thursday to a closed meeting of the Ontario government's Committee on University Affairs.

"There were no real decisions made," says SAC president Steve Langdon, who attended the meeting. "Nothing very exciting happened."

He explained that the meeting consisted of a presentation of the brief with a person from each area concerned outlining his particular interests. The response from the committee was "cross-examining rather than negotiating."

Three days of meetings between students and the presidents council a week ago resulted in a revision of the formerly secret brief. "There were no betrayals," noted Langdon. "The brief was presented as agreed upon."

The next move is up to the Ontario government when it draws up its proposed capital allocations for next year.

Langdon said he felt many of the people at the committee meeting had a "real sympathy with the demand that meetings be open

Revolutions need Communist support: Park

By ART MOSES

"Thirty per cent of the land in Cuba is composed of privately owned profit-making small farms," explained F. W. Park at a recent F U of T seminar on Cuba. Mr. Park returned from Cuba last September after a six-year stay.

He explained that after Castro came to power, his regime's desire to break up large landholdings was checked by the necessity of working such accumulations as sugar estates and cattle ranches as single units. Therefore he set the maximum amount of land any one farmer could hold at 1,000 acres, while turning the cattle ranches and later the sugar estates into "people's farms", on which the farmers work for the government.

Every tenant-farmer at the time of the Revolution who held under 135 acres was made owner of the land he had been working. Then in September, 1963, Castro reduced the maximum landholding from 1,000 to 165 acres.

Gradually the discussion turned to Regis Debray and his ideas on how the Cuban experience can be transferred to the rest of Latin America. The French revolutionary journalist is serving a 30-year prison sentence in Bolivia for his association with the guerrilla movement there.

Both Castro and Debray agree the only way to overthrow the existing order is through armed guerrilla warfare. Both see the vital need for an organization to lay the seeds for armed rising before it occurs and nourish it when it erupts, Park explained.

"But to Castro, the Revolution can be carried with or without the consent of the existing communist party in the country in question, as long as there is some organization to support it. Debray, on the other hand, puts more stress on the importance of communist party approval.

"He visualizes these communist parties being transformed to support the guerrilla movement. It is easy to see why Debray charges that the Venezuelan Communists, in recently withdrawing from their guerrilla movement due to an unfavorable political situation, are betraying the cause of the Latin American Revolution."

Campus centre showdown

A showdown on the problems connected with the Campus Centre is expected this Friday when City of Toronto officials will meet with SAC president Steve Langdon and university president Claude Bissell.

"We've managed to work out a solution with public works and roads," says Langdon, "but not with the planning department."

The difficulties arise from the fact that the proposed building is too close to the street (at the corner of St. George and Russell Sts.). Langdon hopes the meeting will convince the planning department that architect John Andrews' "sense of aesthetics is better than theirs."

Langdon hopes not to relate the discussion to the St. George St. study the university undertook since its talks about closing the street and city officials consider this unfeasible.

"If black people become free the rest of the world becomes free"

By JIM MORRISON

"Black power belongs to black people — peace and freedom to the world."

The Black Panther slogan echoed like a Greek chorus last Friday night before an overflow black and white audience in the Ontario College of Education Auditorium. The occasion, sponsored by the Afro-American Progressive Association, was billed as a fund-raising rally in support of Hughie Newton and Clifford Watkins.

Controversial Olympic medallists Tommie Smith and John Carlos, who were slated to address the rally, stayed in California. "There is no Canadian problem," Smith is reported to have said earlier last week. The remaining speakers disagreed.

"Canada puts up a facade of liberalism, but Canada is the right-hand lackey of America," bellowed Len Brown, Deputy Minister of Education of the Michigan Black Panthers, over a dead microphone. His statement was greeted by thunderous applause.

The principal reason for world unrest is capitalism, which breeds racism, continued Brown. The social and political systems of North America are based on capitalism. To alleviate racism, then, it is first necessary to change the system. "If black people become free, the rest of the world becomes free."

Canada was attacked again by Ron Scott, Deputy Minister of Justice of the Michigan Panthers, who had whites in the audience squirming during his speech. "When we come here," he began, "we see the same things as in the USA. I see myself between two capitalist systems."

Scott took exception to the applause which accompanied his remarks. "This is typical of what goes on with you white radicals. Look at Chicago. The racist mayor told his racist police to hit the racist leaders, who turned on the racist radicals."

Canada's own Rocky Jones blasted the Canadian system, and reminded white radicals that they alone would have to organize white people. The black people in Halifax, he said, are going to fight against being brutalized. "We do not determine what form our struggle takes. Whatever you do to us, we will do to you. It's in your hands."

All the speakers pinpointed the evils of racist capitalism, and stressed the determination of black people to overthrow their oppressors. But the form this struggle is to take was never fully outlined.

Marion Kramer, the last of the Michigan Panthers to speak, referred to alliance of workers and students as the central force behind the struggle. Dr. Gustavo Tolentino of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee painted a glowing picture of racial harmony in Cuba, and insisted that "the right solution is socialism." Only through the wage-earners can we gain a society that will rid us of racism, he said.

Rocky Jones, however, insisted on power first. "Until we have power, we can't talk in terms of systems."

The most eloquent participant of the evening was Guyanese playwright Jan Carew, who drew loud applause for his definition of the black struggle. "Black power, my friends, came to this hemisphere when the first black man stepped off a slave ship."

"In Africa, America and the West Indies, we now have generations of black men who are prepared to fight and die for black liberty everywhere. Being outnumbered doesn't deter us."

Hughey Newton and Clifford Watkins were finally mentioned during the collection of contributions.

Newton, Minister of Defence of the Black Panther Party of California, is now in prison in Yucca Valley, California, convicted in a controversial decision of the voluntary manslaughter of an Oakland policeman. Watkins, brother of the late Ted Watkins, is awaiting trial in Stockton, California, on charges of armed robbery arising from the alleged liquor store hold-up in which his brother was killed.

A film, Free Hughey, followed the speeches.

Blue and White want money back

BY MARY BASTEDO

For the last seven weeks the Blue and White Society has been waiting to get back $250 which the Rock Pile, Toronto's answer to the Fillmore, a rock music showcase, owes them.

The Rock Pile and the Blue and White split the cost of a $500 instruments bond posted Oct. 20 when they both brought Ars Nova to Toronto concerts.

The bond is supposed to be returned to the people that issued it when the group goes back across the border. The cheque was issued in SAC's name. SAC has not yet received any money back.

The district collector of customs and excise told SAC Administrative Accountant Dave Tinker that a $500 cheque was issued to the Rock Pile Oct. 26.

"We're trying to get an answer from Rock Pile to confirm that they got a cheque," Tinker said.

Rick Raylor of the Rock

Pile told the Varsity last night he didn't know whether or not the Rock Pile had received the cheque.

"We weren't expecting it," he said. "We're trying to trace it to see if we did get it back."

"It's just that the Rock Pile has things coming in all the time. Every week we put up bonds."

"I can't quite figure out why they would have trouble finding out if they have the cheque," Tinker remarked.

"They're taking a long time about it. I was promised the money weeks ago."

"I called Rick Taylor at the Rock Pile last week but he hasn't had the courtesy to return my call."

"This is what we were worried about in the first place," says Abe Mudrik, president of the Blue and White Society which sponsored the Ars Nova concert.

"If we hadn't had the assurance that we'd get it back we wouldn't have put the money up."

"I'm not sure whether the Varsity is considered to be a part of the establishment of the Students Administrative Council, but my wards refer to it also: it is the best edited student paper that I can recall, although I wish it could discover in its grim, puritanical soul some small cause to praise the University, perhaps once at Christmas and once in its farewell issue."

We try harder at Xmas

Last night, filled with the Christmas spirit of peace on earth, goodwill toward men, The Varsity staff met to count their blessings, and we asked them, "What do you like most about the University?" Hearts filled with warmth and good cheer, they answered:

"I like the University College front doors": Pam Berton

"Paul MacRae": Dave Frank

"It's a good place to find out what you'd rather be doing": Larry Haiven

"Fraternities": Brian Johnson

"U of T police": Henry Tarvainen

"I can get up at 10 a.m.": Mary Kate Rowan

"I can get up at 1 p.m.": Phil Bingley

"I like Claude Bissell because he came to a football game once": Phil Bingley (bis)

"I like it because it's big and impersonal and I can walk all day without seeing anybody I know": Louis Erlichman

"It let's The Varsity exist": Mary Bastedo

"It's supporting our Canadian University Press conference": Jim Cowan

"It keeps me from having to work full-time": Liz Willick

"The buildings are warm and you don't have to think too hard to be in them": Errol Young

"The political activities": Art Moses

"The hours": Doug Murray

"Hart House": Errol Young and Jim Cowan

"Sitting in O.P. 135 with 3,000 other students": Noel Steckley

"I don't have to go to the same washrooms as the staff": Noel Steckley

"It's a good place to riot in but I wouldn't want to live here": (also) Errol Young

"The people": Agi Lukacs

"The Varsity": Sherry Brydson

"It's close to the city of Toronto": Jim Cowan

"It's close to York University": Errol (bigmouth) Young

"It's near the Babloor": Larry Haiven

"I like the way the sun's rays strike the Simcoe Hall dome": Dave Frank

"There must be something": Paul MacRae

We tried.

To everybody, a Merry Christmas and an interesting New Year.

O MY GOODNESS, I DO HOPE YOU SAVED THE SALES CLIPS!!!

A few unanswered questions

By GARY PERLY

My acquittal Monday left many questions unanswered. They fall into three categories — the evidence that the arresting officer's entire story was untrue; the question of why I was charged in the first place; and what will happen now.

There are many contradictions and untruths in the Constable's testimony from end to end, and I had dozens of witnesses, photographs and other evidence to prove this. Most of it was left out because the trial was cut short.

On Thursday, the Constable testified he had not read a transcript of the trial, while Crown Attorney Robert Weiler took the stand Monday and said he did. In chambers Monday, Weiler said the officer told the lie because "some senior police officer had advised him . . . it was improper for him to refresh his memory from a transcript. Now, this is the reason why he did not tell the truth in the witness box, that he'd read it."

According to Weiler, the Constable did something which he believed to be wrong, and assumed the Crown Attorney would be a party to this.

Where did the Constable get the idea that he and the Crown Attorney could and would do something wrong in order to convict an innocent person? Did he get it from the senior police officers? Or did he get it over the years from seeing other police officers and other crown attorneys doing anything, however reprehensible, in order to convict?

As for Mr. Weiler, Judge Bigelow pointed out to him in chamber. "It was your duty, of course, to disclose to Mr. Perly what you learned, when you did learn it, when Constable Woodhead was in the box."

Weiler testified that he knew Thursday at noon that the officer had not told the truth. Weiler did not speak to me until Friday after court. Would I have heard about this if I hadn't got other information and called Weiler to the stand?

There is much specific evidence that I was prosecuted and persecuted simply and solely because of my political beliefs — because of my vocal and open opposition to U.S. imperialism in Vietnam and here in Canada.

But I am hardly alone. Are dozens now and hundreds in the future going to face the kind of conspiracy which I had to? We are not dealing with an isolated incident here, but with a system. We need revolutionary change in that system.

This whole affair shows again the drastic need for Canadians to have the right to trial by jury for "police" offenses. The situation is so gross that right up to the very last minute, the Constable was sitting outside the courtroom, grinning and assuring everyone I would get about six months.

I didn't but what caused him to think that even if the only crown witness was caught lying on the stand, that I would be convicted anyway?

THE BEATLES (Record) $9.50
 THE BEATLES (Book) $5.95
 THE REAL STORY (Book) $7.50
 MERRY XMAS $22.95

Our world becomes the cartoon obverse and The Beatles the ultimate Space Odyssey by which all may pass. The miniskirt has killed mistletoe.

When you find yourself in the thick of it — Help yourself to a bit of what is all around you.

The authorized biography is an act of faith and to see Hunter Davies on the Steve Allen Show is to be caught in the present which is the fault of none but the death of JPGR for the inexorability and the droppings which build through Strawberry Fields and Penny Lane into Brian Epstein and all the other irredeemables.

Sexy Sadie what have you done

You made a fool of everyone
 You made a fool of everyone
 Sexy Sadie ooh what have you done

The Beatles is advanced. Parody and pastiche is contemporary art. JPGR are optimistic. Does anybody ever think about the Beatles or just parts of them?

THE POLL

Who is your favourite Beatle?

john	15 percent
paul	50 percent
ringo	25 percent
george	10 percent

80 percent thought the Beatles the best example of life as an art form. 22 percent thought Paul the most sad-eyed lady of the singaling set. 77 percent had no more than a hazy opinion of why John was so freaky while 35 percent agreed that Ringo was heading for stardom if he were so blue. 2 percent took exception to the idea of The Beatles but 99 percent thought it a revitalization of the art form of the contemporary song.

The Beatles works 9 times faster than any brand and at only twice the price clears out institutional worries so count you out-in.

A road map. So now when someone introduces the Beatles who can say whether it will be the Beatles or The Beatles. Hubert Humphrey would say of Norman Mailer:

"If the limiting of duration be the only security, it is unnecessary to speak of the importance which ought to be attached to it." And a kiss from all those tiny times.

THE YELLOW SUBMARINE $2.00

After their catastrophic venture into television with Magical Mystery Tour, the Beatles have bounced back to a film triumph in The Yellow Submarine. How much of it beyond the actual songs can be attributed to the Beatles is, however, a moot question. Lee Minoff takes credit for the fairy-tale plot in which a besieged Pepperland manages to send to the outside world for help in their (you guessed it) Yellow Submarine. Arriving as chance would have it in Liverpool, the SOS comes just in time to prevent Ringo (the animated version is even cuter than the original) from throwing himself into the Mersey. Self-consciously epic, the film recounts the return journey through the Sea of Green and (finally) the liberation of Pepperland with songs of love.

The wildly inventive screenplay by Minoff and three others (among whom I am told is a classics scholar is particularly good at providing visual images for some of the Beatles' best known songs, from the collages of Eleanor Rigby to the psychedelia of Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds. I think my favorite is the Nowhere Man, Jeremy Hilary Boob, PhD., who embodies the exasperating yet endearing pedant.

It is to be regretted that more catchy new songs were not incorporated into the film. It looks as if the Beatles were playing it safe. And it seems they have succeeded. Despite what might be considered its undue length, The Yellow Submarine is one of those films that many people will want to see several times. To be highly critical of it would require more effort than it is worth.

MAGICAL MYSTERY TOUR $4.00

Anyone who wasn't in Merrie Olde England around this time last year will have to pay $4 at the O'Keefe, Jan. 2, to see the Beatles' film, Magical Mystery Tour.

— Pity.

It's a good show, but not a great show. I saw it twice, courtesy the BBC, surrounded by a good cross-section of middle class, middle aged relatives (who termed the show "technically good, but I didn't quite understand") and by a number of teenagers (who left the TV screen murmuring "groovy").

If you've got the album complete with pictures, you've got a pretty good idea of what the movie is about. A whole bus-load of strange people rush around the English countryside doing strange things and having a ball.

You really should see the thing stoned to appreciate it. The Beatles are mocking, laughing at themselves and their society, doing take-offs on slapstick movies, acting out their dreams (the Fat Lady eating shovelfuls of spaghetti) and generally having fun.

But don't go to the movie looking for all sorts of hidden meaning and social comment. Magical Mystery Tour was conceived as a "fun" movie — and it's just that, no more. Worth seeing if you really REALLY dig the music and want to see it graphically presented. Sort of like seeing your favorite symphony illustrated by a good artist.

A good movie, but not a $4 movie. So don't set your sights too high.

film/68: critical literary respectability

Time was when a novel found fulfillment, exhausted its potential, only when its screen rights were sold to Hollywood. Somehow the creative act was incomplete, scriptus interruptus, the follow-through, the coup de grace was missing, until familiar powerful faces made the word flesh. Now it's The Shoes of the Fisherman and Nat Turner for Hollywood, and there are sincere intense young independent producers for The Alexandria Quartet, Ulysses, yea, even Finnegan's Wake. But cinema backlash has set in with a vengeance.

It began for me with Bergman's Four Screenplays (I was a slow starter), in hardcover, complete with beautiful stills co-ordinated with the text (I almost wrote "the Text"). And Bergman was a good place to start, because he writes his screenplays in the form of short theatrical novels. All the transitional elements are there. A suitably higher class equivalent to those colourful picture books that sold in the lobby during the intermission of various Ben Hurish spectaculars.

Primarily, they sought to overwhelm you with statistics ("... twenty-eight thousand (28,000) swords and daggers, all authentic replicas, were hammered out in thirteen (13) pre-fab forges flown to Spain from Southern California..."). The new picture books overwhelm by force of intellect, good taste, and literary respectability. You can buy transcripts of documentaries (Don't Look Back), pseudo-documentaries (The War Game), Godard (Alphaville), Truffaut (Jules and Jim), and Fellini, Resnais, silent "classics" (equivalents of Victorian novels) etc. But there is more.

There are works of love and exegesis, beginning, inevitably, with Andre Bazin's What is Cinema?, and continuing through involved explications of theories of cinema, collected critical reviews, estimates of films by director, by individual film, by genre ("the horror film is the only true cinema possible because in this our atomic age..."), by country, by year. The underground is ground well covered. Even Eisenstein's The Film Sense (By Faber and Faber, no less), complete with 4 (four) -page fold out of a twelve shot sequence in Alexander Nevsky. With shot by shot interpretation, co-ordinated with the complete musical score, with "length in measures", with diagram of "pictorial composition", with "diagram of movement" etc. We're back to statistics, but never mind.

When Grove Press ("film is a four letter word") couldn't distribute I Am Curious - Yellow because of a court order banning the film, they promptly whipped out a fat paperback of same complete with text (only "text" this time), proceedings of the obscenity hearings (yes, Norman Mailer was there). I Am Curious - Yellow was recently exonerated of filth by a higher court. Did literary respectability help? People want to possess films they like the way you can possess a book, want to experience the film in as many ways as it can be experienced, flip through the frames like pages, savour the production gossip ("Said Truffaut: 'I shall never work with Oskar Werner again...'", learn enough about film technology to appreciate subtleties of editing even at the cost (if it is such) of experiencing film, not as some kind of natural reality, but as an artifact ("The novel lost its dominance as soon as it lost its magic, its believability as reality...").

You can go to classes and symposia in film, analyse scripts in concert with other aficionados, compare certain evocative sequences from films in stills; words and motion ("The murder of the detective on the steps in Psycho can be profitably compared with the slaughter on the steps in Potemkin...").

And yes, tv. Almost all producers of big budget films realize that they won't make the costs of production back in cinemas. Ever since Bridge On the River Kwai was sold for two million for two showings, tv has been considered an extension of cinema as far as economics go. (Cleopatra in 1970, two showings, five million, first profit made). Documentary on Grand Prix which was better than the film in almost every way. La Chinoise was better on Channel 6 than in the cinema. Maybe that's his true medium. During those sensory deprivation sequences which sparkle throughout Godard's works, you can read about Godard in the paper, punching Iain Quarrier "in the stomach and in the face" over the inclusion of a Rolling Stones song ("Sympathy for the Devil") in Godard's latest, One Plus One. First the pig in Weekend, now a producer (Canadian, of course).

film/68: fraser picks worst

I supposed I should make it clear what I mean by a bad movie. I don't include the rollicking, grotesquely, unpretentiously worthless "B" films like The Glory Stompers, or King Kong Meets Godzilla — both of which I quite enjoyed. Like wrestling, or the stripping at the Victory, these are films whose pretensions are so evident and intentional they form part of the pleasure. Putting down King Kong Meets Godzilla is as pointless as putting down Santa Claus.

The following is a brief list of some of the films still on in Toronto which left me absolutely screaming with rage:

Space Odyssey, 2001 is one of the most pretentious, mindless, infuriatingly gimmicky films I've ever had the misfortune to see. As the final curtain came down, I waved my fist impotently at the screen, and didn't have the courage to scream

"BULLSHIT!" I really don't care about all the fantastic technological innovations Stanley Kubrick engineered to make that atrocity. I considered it a massive personal insult to an audience's intelligence.

Similarly, Secret Ceremony, with Liz Taylor and Mia Farrow made me very very angry. What bad acting! What a grotesque plot! What hideously baroque sets! What a dumb screenplay! What an awful movie!

Don Siegal, according to Martin Knelman of the Star, is pioneering new, relevant, urban cop films. Well, if Coogan's Bluff is any example, no thanks. A Clint Eastwood film, (which is usually a recommendation), this hangover from the George Wallace campaign has one simple message: "If Barry Goldwater took over the New York Police Department, boy, we would be clear of these sex-crazed, left-wing, molly-coddled, dope-fiend hippies pretty damn quick! Those kids and their damn civil rights! Run over them!" As I say, no thanks.

Those three, I think, are the worst of the years crop that are still playing — with Great Catherine, another Peter O'Toole disaster, not much ahead. It was pretty boring, but, except for the acres of plastic snow, it never made me really angry. There are probably more which were even worse — but, with the possible exception of I A Lover, I've forgotten them all.

— graham fraser

film/68: wise on whole scene

During the year, films very slowly became less glossy wrappings and more involving mediums. Despite some pitiful attempts to revive the glossies, usually blockbuster musical movie-stages (Star, Finian's Rainbow), the age of detachment in movie viewing is dying out. Film-makers can no longer get away with it. The best films of the year had an underlying or overriding relevance to contemporary life. Quasi-comedies like The Graduate or Bonnie and Clyde, even The Odd Couple jolted you in laugh. Cartoon features like Yellow Submarine turn fantasy into meaningful dialogues, much the same as Swift's Gulliver or Lewis Carroll's Alice, that dear, dear lady.

1968 produced the usual crop of war movies, anti-war movies, and the like (Green Berets, Charge of the Light Brigade, Bofors Gun), although the number is diminishing. War isn't as attractive an ego booster as it once was. Films on war in the late 60's usually get at the characters who make up the war effort rather than the symbolic effort itself. Directors are now very self-conscious about violence in film, since assassinations featured the subject.

The majority of films have tried to be contemporary, relevant — to say something. 1968 probably marked the end of an era in which black-white social relations are given the benevolent patronizing nod.

The most striking feature of the '68 films has been the increasing interest in the world beyond (beyond what?) . The stars, the depths of the mind. Rosemary's Baby, Hour of the Wolf, 2001, Secret Ceremony have moved films into the world on consciousness, total awareness. Pop art and rock music put to connected images of sound and light, are just beginning to take hold in film. Films, usually the slowest of the media, are trying desperately to catch up with the times.

THEATRE

CEDRIC SMITH AS CHE

that other play

This week some 60 people are floating frantically around the Poor Alex in an effort to make public the confessions of an artist.

The artist portrayed is Michael Bopp, an exile from the U.S. Midwest who bills himself as a poet "employed by the department of psychology as a research technician — to keep me eating." And his cast and technical crew were described by their director, Sean O'Connor, as "all kinds of professional people from psychology who don't know fuck-all about theatre but are doing their utmost to keep this thing going."

Dedicated to "smoke, rain, and the wind", the play is, according to a member of the cast, "all his (author's) life up to the time he wrote it", and its title, Other, is a give-away of his concerns, him and not-him.

The whole picture seen by Michael Fishfather-Bopp — and I was warned that "everything in this play is symbolic of something — includes such figures as the Mod Lovers, the Faggot, Mangod, Mildred, the Lost Bride, and of course Michael, played by himself. In the first nine scenes of brief pantomime, they are subliminally blipped at you and you see them later on in a more embellished context. The blips come from everywhere: voices out in the foyer chant "A man is born alone" while a cyclical dance of birth is performed on a strobe-lit stage; the Mod Lovers' make-out scene is interrupted by a scream of "PIGS!" from the aisle; somebody steals a styrofoam Jesus from over an altar because he "just didn't want to see him suffer."

Rehearsals of these "flash episodes" began with games theatre, in which ad-lib pantomimes and gibberish conversations were used for "getting people out of themselves" and into the scripted bits.

As of Monday night, the web's timing, blocking, and even casting were still dangling. The most convincing and interesting lines were cries of anguish from the director:

—Look, you're playing a teenybopper. You wanna smoke pot and stay out till 4:00 a.m. and fuck and trip but you're always home at 9:00 because your mother said so."

—The people coming to see this — well, for the most part they aren't the beautiful people and they aren't gonna understand this and you've gotta make them see it."

Whether "they" see embarrassing, self-indulgent exhibitionism or a Christmas gift or self may depend on the beauty in the eyes of the audience and how much aesthetic distance and control are required before they can focus.

—marion o'conner

theatre for cocktail radicals

Che Guevara's death was anti-revolutionary. His death produced a romantic martyr. One of the little girls in the audience from a Junior High School was busy asking who was playing Che, as if he were some kind of football hero. But Guevara didn't get carried off the field after scoring a touchdown. He died a filthy death in a little Bolivian town, among people who didn't give a damn and probably will never give a damn. The very poor. The ignorant poor. Che thought they could be the backbone of the revolution and they betrayed him.

The production of Che Guevara, a new play by Mario Fratti now at Workshop Productions, is very consoling. It's like a fairy tale, and it doesn't really give you anything in the gut that you can go home with.
