SPEECH—NO DEBATE

Claude Bissell, returning to his post of University of Toronto president after a year of teaching at Harvard, will perform the traditional term opening address this afternoon at 2 p.m. at Convocation Hall.

"Claude Bissell is superb in formal situations," says Steve Langdon, president of the Students Administrative Council.

Langdon last week challenged Dr. Bissell to replace the traditional speech with a debate between the two of them. Bissell agreed to a debate in principle but has refused to give Langdon equal billing today.

"An exchange," said Langdon, "would show up what he really thinks."

"He is a man who believes in the hierarchical structure of the university we now have. Basically his belief is aristocratic and elitist: that there are some few people with a commitment to seeking wisdom and they must run the university.

"I suppose that makes him a classic conservative," added Langdon. "He is also quite self-confident and almost arrogant in some ways. He knows what he thinks."

"Dr. Bissell is the president of a very great university and his first priority is to settle down the students who are increasingly finding their university experience unsatisfactory."

What Langdon fears is that dissent will be channelled into committees, minor reforms will be implemented, and the university will remain the way it is — authoritarian and undemocratic.

"It would be a mistake," he adds, "to think Dr. Bissell alone can change the whole university. He is under tremendous pressures and almost as caught up in the system as students are."

VOLUME 89 - NO. 1
SEPTEMBER 16, 1968

TORONTO

Hundreds of University of Toronto students are now looking for some form of adequate off-campus housing. Some will be lucky, but many will fall prey to overpricing, deceptive salesmanship, and outright discrimination — obstacles The Varsity encountered in an incident with Mrs. J. Braun, the landlady of a rooming house at 376 Spadina Rd.

By BRIAN JOHNSON

When I talked to Mrs. Braun on the phone, she offered me a $17-a-week room, "very lovely, private, and comfortable, with wall to wall broadloom and furniture." She said she had no objection to students.

When I visited the rooming house, the first thing that struck me was a sign on the door telling all visitors to take off their shoes.

"Everyone does that here," said Mrs. Braun. "I probably have the cleanest house in the city."

As she preached the multiple evils of shoes, I was led down some rickety stairs to the $17 basement room.

The room could not have measured more than 10 ft. by 10 ft. The "wall to wall broadloom" was an overlapping patchwork of 4 or 5 rugs that curled up the baseboards and folded around the corners.

All of the "furniture" — desk, dressing table, and bed — consisted of plywood fixtures attached to the wall.

At first glance, however, the room looked almost respectable, although not for $17 a week.

Then I tested the bed — a thin, springless mattress on a board. The broadloom would have been as comfortable.

I sat down at the desk — the chair was lumpy, impossible for studying. The desk was surfaced with linoleum tile.

Tent City is a home with a difference.

If you can't find a place to live, you can stay here. If you can't afford the places you could find, you can stay here. If you don't like the rules and restrictions where you live, you can try the tents for a few nights.

A lot of landlords don't like students and accepts us only grudgingly — for our money. At Tent City there are no landlords. There is no rent.

Tent City is more than a place to stay. It is a place to go INSTEAD of the accommodation you have.

Try it and see. You'll feel lost at first. That's because no one will tell you what to do and no one will tell you how to do it. You'll have to think for yourself.

At Tent City there are no teachers, only learners. In short, Tent City is a place to go INSTEAD of the university you have.

Dear Mom and Dad:

How are you. I am fine. I am living in a 9' x 9' tent on the lawn in front of Hart House at the University of Toronto. I am having a wonderful time.

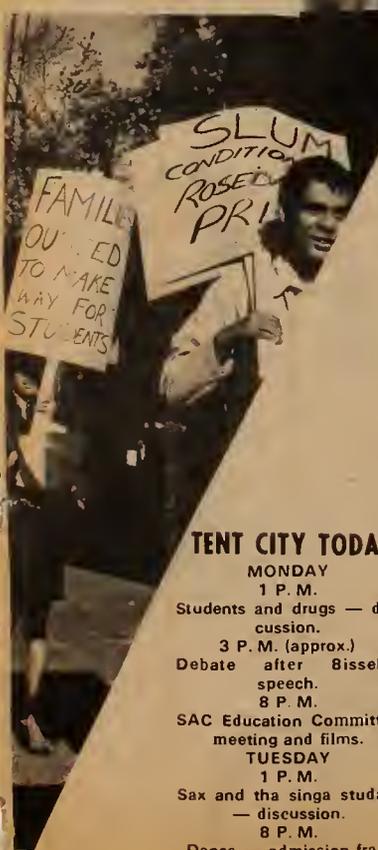

We are having loads of fun. Last night around 60 freshmen from Victoria College came down to join us. At least that's what we thought. We could hear them up in Queen's Park and somebody was yelling, "Okay guys, organize, organize." Then they came pouring down the hill, ripped the guy lines out of the ground and pushed over the big marquee tent. Then they formed up in twos (freshmen always seem to march in twos) and paraded off chanting, "We're the new counter-revolutionary movement; we're the F.A.A.!" (Freshmen Against Activists?) Some of them yelled at us and called us "communist sympathizers" and "hippies". Mom and Dad, how come you never told me about that?

The head counsellor is Andy Wernick. He is the one who organized the camp and he says all those students who have no place to stay can come home to sleep. He says the housing situation is at the crisis level and the Tent City will show everyone that this is so. So far not many people have shown up; they're all out looking for a place to live.

If you are coming to visit me, remember I am not on the front campus in front of Simcoe Hall as originally planned. It turned out that in order to do that, we would have to run electrical cable from out of the manhole directly in front of Simcoe Hall, which is where the president of the university and other notables park their cars. So we are now in front of Hart House and we are drawing power from University College to run the lights, outlets, record players and such.

Oh, yeah — we had a great bull session at 5 o'clock in the morning the other morning with about 10 freshmen who wandered over from their orientation program. We talked about the purpose of the university and student power and all kinds of things for about an hour and then one of the frosh said, "Wait a minute" you mean that this place is just the same as high school, only a lot bigger and more impersonal!" You know I think he has a point there.

KINGSTON (CUP) — Twen- students camped out this week end on the lawn of Queen's University principal John Deutsch to protest the shortage of student housing.

About 60 students met during the weekend to discuss the housing problem, rent control, and their ideas of a new university.

Deutsch, who was away for the weekend, said the action of the students was "ridiculous" and he "wouldn't be influenced by such stunts."

SECRET DECISION

No open PAC meetings

By INGRID VABALIS

The following report is based on a bulletin of the minutes of the Presidents Advisory Council meeting of September 10, 1968, not scheduled for publication until next Thursday.

The Students Administrative Council may not accept the administration's offer of seven seats on the 22-member President's Advisory Council (PAC).

The most important of the three conditions SAC set down this summer for membership on PAC was rejected by PAC members at a closed meeting last Tuesday.

Members were opposed to SAC's demand that PAC meetings be open to the entire university community.

They did, however, fully accept equal student and faculty membership on PAC, the second of SAC's conditions.

"Opening PAC sessions is the most important condition," said SAC President Steve Langdon.

"I don't think any compromise on this is possible," he said.

He thought PAC was happy to grant equal representation because PAC is not an official decision-making body. PAC was established in 1965 by President Bissell to co-ordinate the different branches of university government.

Dr. Bissell does not necessarily have to abide by its decisions. This summer he invited SAC to accept seats on the council.

Dr. Bissell's offer of student membership on PAC had been made in full knowledge of SAC's policy on openness.

Throwing PAC meetings open, the members concluded in the minutes of Tuesday's meeting, would destroy PAC's usefulness and impair the frankness with which all sides of a problem are discussed.

"This view was strongly held by all the members present and supported on the basis of their experience in government and business," was the rationale.

They "believe openness might be appropriate for decision-making bodies but would prove fatal to an advisory body," the minutes go on to say.

PAC members expressed concern that observers with speaking privileges might bog down the proceedings.

Prof. Donald Forster, executive assistant to the President,

"wondered if the active participation of non-members in PAC decisions would make it impossible to get PAC's work done."

And PAC members wondered "whether the degree of openness under consideration has been sufficiently defined."

Langdon was explicit in what SAC meant by openness — that anyone in the university be allowed to attend PAC meetings.

"This is the only thing that would make a basic change in the administration's policy," he said.

"It is really the only way that students can keep track of the attitudes of the faculty, administration and their own representatives on the council," he pointed out.

Dr. Bissell said the definition of "openness" of meetings would have to be defined further before he made any decision.

"The official minutes of the meeting will be published on Thursday," Dr. Bissell said.

The third condition — that selection of student representatives be the concern of SAC — also met with objections from PAC members "because there was no assurance of wide representation."

"It would be undesirable to have all the student representative members from one faculty or division," the minutes read. However, the condition was accepted.

Particularly, PAC wanted to ensure the 5,000 graduate students were represented.

Foreseeing the possibility of a student occupation of one or more buildings, the administration of an eastern university has secretly removed the more sensitive correspondence from its files. Varsity editor Paul MacRae talked to Claude Bissell, president of the University of Toronto, last week. Here's what came out of it:

MacRae: What, in your opinion, is the place of a student in this university?

Bissell: He's the first person to come here and the university's raison d'être in the initial steps. He determines the whole structure of the university by his choice of subjects and by his particular interests. Most of us (administrators) are in that respect simple servants of students. For example, the university budget is made up of 70 per cent funds for academic salaries, preconditioned by the students' choice of subjects.

Consequently, the student's chief obligation is to get himself an education, which is usually a self-education. People don't realize that the university exists for the individual no matter what the structure is. This is a choice anybody can make and most of the criticism I hear is the criticism of people who aren't capable of self-education.

Many students come here feeling that the university has a system to thrust upon them. The university doesn't thrust its system on anybody. The system is an opportunity that only you can realize. It's a promise that only you can bring to fruition.

MacRae: A constant criticism by Students Administrative Council members is that students invited to join committees are immediately co-opted. What comes out is not what students really want, that students are used to validate a decision which has essentially already been made.

Bissell: I don't see much validity to that. Any committee involves a conflict of opinions leading to a resolution. It may well be that the student point of view doesn't triumph. But I don't come out saying the committee is a failure. I come out and say the committee has reached an opinion which I must accept if I'm going to accept the democratic process.

DEMOCRATIC PROCESS

MacRae: But if you accept a democratic process, then students should make up the majority of committees just as they make up the majority of the university population.

Bissell: I was referring to a democratic process — let's get our assumptions very straight. The university is not a political democracy. It's not a head-counting democracy. We use democratic processes here, but we don't use the processes of the state. We don't elect our professors and we don't use democratic elections in many areas.

Increasingly we try to make a representative government. In most academic groups the move toward the resolution of a problem is made without any formal vote as such. We're talking about highly reasonable people, not highly emotional politicians. In most committees you reach a consensus without any vote and sometimes there is a vote. In that case the majority wins. It's a democratic process, but it doesn't have the full techniques of a political democracy.

MacRae: Most of the people I've heard complaining about the system are people who do want a self-education. They find the system hampers them.

Bissell: You've spoken to very few people I think, on the whole. Mind you, you're not going to make me a supporter of every conceivable part of the university. I'm concerned with the reform of the university. I'm concerned with a great many changes. But I would still say that under the present structure the onus is upon the individual.

MacRae: OK, if the university is designed essentially for the individual, why couldn't I come into this university, decide I'm interested in, say sociology, decide I want to take courses X, Y and Z which just happen to be in different years. And I don't want to take the five courses I have to take now. If I do that I'll be prevented by rules and regulations from taking the courses I want to take, and I'll be prevented by the necessity to pass — to take five courses for three years to get a degree. I'd say I'm prevented from getting a self-education.

Bissell: These are just minimal requirements. Any institution has to have a structure and the individual works out his own personal emphases in relationship to the structure. If you were left in an unstructured situation, unless you are a genius, you'll end up by having a very inferior education. There has to be some element of structure and discipline for any activity. Around that you can deviate, you can emphasize as much as you want. A good student is one who goes off on his own, and examinations and structure are just a minimal requirement. These courses should be just a drop in the bucket for anyone with a zest for learning.

MacRae: I don't think so. My zest for learning is directed at the things I want to study.

AUTHORITY

Bissell: Don't you rely on the judgement of others, instead of your own instincts? Don't you rely on the judgement of a professor to a certain extent? Do you accept any authority at all in education?

MacRae: Frankly, no.

Bissell: What do you mean by authority then?

MacRae: Authority is someone telling me what to do.

Bissell: You're talking about an order, a process. I'm talking about a principle. Don't you recognize a principle of authority? In some areas isn't there an institution or individual who speaks with a wisdom which perhaps may be greater than yours? Do you feel authority is something which comes entirely from within yourself with no help from the outside world at all?

MacRae: Of course not. But perhaps I could tell you what I think the place of authority in a university should be. I think I should be able to come here, go to a professor and say I'm interested in a certain subject . . .

Bissell: You do go to a professor, you do acknowledge an authority? Why go to a professor?

MacRae: Because he knows more than I do on certain topics. So let's say I'm interested in studying, say society, and the professor suggests I read . . .

"We're not counting heads at university"

Bissell: And he says what have you studied before? Suppose I come to a professor and say I'm interested in studying math, and I've had no math. He says perhaps I should begin with a basic course and I say, 'Oh, nonsense, I want to respond to the spirit within me.' That's the trouble with you people — you want to study the basic metaphysical questions before you've gone through the preliminaries.

MacRae: You didn't allow me to finish. If I want to study math, I go to a professor. If he says I have to take a basic course, I'll do whatever I must to learn whatever math I have to learn. But there comes a certain point at which I'll decide I'm interested in branching off into a certain part of mathematics.

Bissell: You would then admit to the need for a basic course, or would you prefer to study on your own?

MacRae: I haven't found a course in which I'm interested in the calendar that I couldn't study myself, or just simply by going to the class. But I don't feel the professor has the right to evaluate me — I evaluate myself.

Bissell: But you said a while ago a professor could have authoritative views of certain things.

THE BA

MacRae: I'm talking about formal evaluation, accreditation. The BA is accreditation.

Bissell: You don't like the BA at all? Don't you think it indicates something? It indicates you've gone through a certain discipline which, in accordance with the categories gives an approximate indication of where you stand.

MacRae: Does it give an approximate indication of whether you're educated or not?

Bissell: The BA is one of the factors involved in education. If someone comes in to talk to me about a job, I want to know what he has studied and I think the fact that he has a BA is a factor in evaluating his situation. Otherwise you wouldn't have universities.

MacRae: Why not?

Bissell: Because then you'd have an absolutely unstructured situation.

MacRae: What's the matter with that?

Bissell: It's quite all right, but you wouldn't have a university then. A university does involve structure and the exercise of authority. It does involve evaluation, does involve judgement. These you dislike, and I understand why you do. But these are part and parcel of a structured university and you can't get away from them.

EVALUATION

MacRae: I don't see the necessity for someone to evaluate me. Why can't I be evaluated outside the university?

Bissell: I think we should be evaluated — we should all be evaluated. I would hope this evaluation would take place with justice and mercy at times, but there's no reason why this should not go on.

MacRae: How much power do you think students should have in the university? How much control over their environment?

Bissell: That's a very dangerous phrase because nobody except God has control over his environment and even that is doubtful. I'm much in favor of increased student participation. I've taken the initiative in making certain offers to the SAC which they're having some trouble accepting which could make this university much closer to the kind of university you have in mind. But I wouldn't go as far as you. I'm for a greater degree of freedom, but I'm not ready to give up my structured pattern. I'm working toward that.

The point is this — we're not counting heads at the university. Students don't determine simply by vote what the whole course of the university shall be. Otherwise I'd call in the thousands of alumni, who probably have more right to vote than most students have.

It's a question of working toward goals we all want to achieve. What we're talking about is a rate of acceleration, we're talking about revolutionary change. I don't believe in revolutions, except by process of rational discussion and rational movement.

MacRae: What if a student demonstration camps outside Simcoe Hall and says we've had enough of rational discussion and getting channeled off into non-productive areas?

Bissell: I don't think the student body as a whole is capable of that irrational nonsense. I've got faith in the integrity of the student leaders. A good deal of this talk is simple tribal war dances picked up from other areas.

"TRIBAL WAR DANCE"

MacRae: Then why are we here?

Bissell: To get an education.

MacRae: Why can't we get an education without having conveniences for industry such as, 'What course have we taken and what marks did we get and do we have a BA?' These are very convenient things.

Bissell: Industry isn't necessarily looking for people with a certain training. They look for a wide education and the BA theoretically indicates a wide liberal education.

MacRae: Not any more it doesn't.

Bissell: That depends on the individual. Education is a personal process no matter what the structure. A genius could avoid university and study by himself. But otherwise, a structured pattern gives me a chance to develop myself.

MacRae: Even if I'm not a genius, why couldn't I map out my own program? And why couldn't somebody who is — I'd say very apathetic — go through the more formalized type of course structure. If he needs to be prodded and pushed to get an education, OK. But I don't think that's education.

Bissell: There are very few geniuses. Most people need the prop of an institution. You know, I often wonder to what extent these pat phrases about the university being a factory, the rigidity here, the lack of freedom, being expected to say what the professor says — I wonder if what those who are dissatisfied with university say is true.

MacRae: Maybe those who are satisfied have simply learned to accept their condition without question.

Bissell: They've conditioned themselves. They haven't got the individual energy to respond. I'm not the least bit impressed if a student in my course gives back what I say, not at all impressed. I want someone to take what I said, or some other source, and analyze it personally to show they've thought it through in a personal way.

I think I'm, in my own age group, rather advanced. I'm not just trying to hold the fort — I'm trying to prevent the fort from being blown up in the meantime until we're sure there's something better to take its place.

SAC ends Bookstore monopoly

By INGRID VABALIS

The bookstore monopoly on campus ends today as the Students' Administrative Council opens U of T's first student-cooperative bookstore.

The SAC bookstore, open from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. on Rochdale College's third floor is a student-run service for students.

It sells only first year required texts for all faculties, including the professional ones, but gives a 10 per cent discount to everyone.

"Our ultimate aim is to gain real student-faculty control over bookstore policy," explained SAC president Steve Langdon.

Past generations of students could get required texts at either the Bookroom on centre campus or the Textbook store on Bancroft St. Both institutions are run by the administration and subsidized by the U of T. Press.

Discounts offered to students have been whittled down this year until now there is only 5 per cent off on cash purchases of cloth-bound books.

This eliminates last year's discount on charge account purchases. The Bookstore management considered a 10 per cent across-the-board discount this July but soon retracted the offer.

"We have such a narrow margin to work with," explained Charles Fanning, general manager of the two U of T bookstores. "Publishers only give us a 20 per cent discount. And when we took a closer look at our finances we saw we couldn't afford the discount to the students."

Professors at the university, however, get 10 per cent off on everything.

"On grounds of fairness they shouldn't," Fanning agreed. "But historically the precedent has been set."

"The staff discount is another symptom of the inequality which exists in almost every facet of the university community," said Norm Schacher, SAC vice-president.

With its C.O-OP Bookstore, SAC wants to prove that books can be sold at cheaper prices to everyone.

"We've made studies and reports on the U of T Bookstores and we are convinced they can be run more cheaply," Schacher said.

"The university bookstores give a much wider range of services," counters Harald Bohne, business manager for the U of T Press. "And you can't expect these services — charge accounts, filling of all special orders — for nothing."

Bohne points out that students do have a say in bookstore policies. There has always been a student committee to give opinions on policy, he says.

"As long as the basic aims of the institution are not changed, suggestions by students are always considered," he said.

Really the basic problem of the high cost of books lies with the publishing companies. They have a captive audience and they exploit it.

Where other books are sold at 40 or 50 percent off the list price, textbooks get only a 20 per cent discount.

"The publishers are operating in a monopolistic market," said Langdon. "What we have to do now is try to blow that whole thing."

Meanwhile for students on this perennial book hunt, the picture frames up like this.

For those rare books on the sex life of the fruit fly, the textbook store is your best bet. The SAC store has announced a special order service also carrying the 10 percent discount but requiring pre-payment.

For all required and recommended texts past first year, it's the textbook store again.

A used book corner at the Rochdale location will replace the SAC Book Exchange of former years. That's the place you buy and sell used books cheaply.

During August downpour, $1200 worth of books in the basement stock room were water damaged so they will be available at considerable discount — cost or less.

The U of T Bookroom on centre campus sells peripheral academia to courses — especially good for essays. They also sell stationery and traditional school supplies — but the best buy on these is at the Engineering Stores on south campus or the SAC Bookstore — they are much cheaper.

The SCM Bookstore, also in Rochdale, has an excellent off-course humanities selection, specializing in philosophy.

The campus cops come around every hour or so during the night, always just before or just after a raiding party has gone through. But sometimes the cops stop and talk with us and tell us that if the cars that are parked around the Tent City aren't moved in the morning, they will be impounded. Sometimes, I give them my psychological interpretation of the freshmen's raids, which is that since the strict authoritarianism of the university frustrates their healthy sexual desire for panty raids, they have to turn on us "communist sympathizers" and "hippies". The cops often look bewildered at this.

Hey, it turns out that we may be illegal! The city housing board has sent Robin Ross (the university registrar) a letter saying that Tent City may be contravening a housing bylaw that states that dwellings must be supplied with electricity and must have at least plaster covering the walls. At the SAC meeting on Thursday night Paul Fromm made a motion that in that case, Tent City should be scrapped. He didn't even get a seconder for the motion. Anyway, I could have assured him that he needn't worry. There's an electrical outlet running into one of the sleeping tents, so if need be, everybody can pile in there to sleep (although that probably is against an overcrowding bylaw or something). Also, if we need plastering, I'm sure the Vic frosh will be glad to plaster the tents for free.

Tent City will be going on for another week at least and there are going to be many exciting and unbearably dull things going on there. There will be a mass SAC meeting on Wednesday afternoon and Martin Loney, president elect of the Canadian Union of Students will visit on Thursday.

Claude Bissel, the president of the university, has dropped by a few times. He came by one morning at around 9:15 after his swim at Hart House and said he saw nobody there (we were all still sleeping -- I'd take a morning swim too, but I can't get a Hart House locker until I get my A.T.L. card). At a press conference later that day, he said, "A deadly silence prevailed". One of our people talks in his sleep, however. It also seems Dr. Bissel was not informed about Tent City until four hours before it opened. That's a mistake on our part; we forgot to tell him about it.

Oh well, I have to go now, some St. Mike's frosh are starting to tear down the tents and we have to confront them non-violently and ask them politely not to tear them down. I'll be home as soon as I can spare a day and a night to get out to North York.

The purpose of this game is to simulate as realistically as possible the first year at university. In the interest of realism, personal choice and luck have been almost completely eliminated from play. You are moved smoothly through the game in the same way you are moved smoothly through the system. However, at two points you will be offered a CHOICE. Here your understanding and knowledge of the educational system will be tested to the utmost. Admittedly this isn't a very good game.

But then, that's the price you pay for stark realism.

I tried the drawers of the chest — they were almost immovable.

Although this was "the cleanest house in the city," there was dust on everything.

The only ventilation was by two very small windows; there was a musty smell. Later former occupant Jim Ford (IAPSC) told me that in a month he had $45 worth of clothes ruined by mold.

The only apparent source of heat was an electric fire with two unconnected wires dangling . . . Although Mrs. Braun told me she had another heater, Ford said she often refused to lend it.

Of the ten residents of the rooming house, two are students — "nice boys," said Mrs. Braun. There are three bathrooms and no kitchen facilities, although she provides board for an additional $10 a week.

As I examined the room, Mrs. Braun described the conditions of her "happy community."

No liquor, no girls, no shoes, no long hair, no beards, no typing late at night. "Our morals are very high," she said. "We are like a big family."

My haircut, which would be acceptable even on a Board of Governors member, was too long for Mrs. Braun. Before moving in, I would have to get it cut, she said. I asked her what was wrong with people with long hair.

"All people with long hair are awful," she said. "Nice people don't have long hair."

"I'm very selective. I only take one out of five who come here. I don't take any laborers here either," she added proudly.

I asked why. "They're awful people. They work in the dirt all day. Anyway, they're not intelligent and wouldn't fit in with the rest."

"That's called discrimination," I said.

"Oh, no! That's a horrible word. Don't say that. That's only used for colored people."

Mrs. Braun is not breaking a law by her policies and prices. There is no such law to break: this city has neither a tenants' bill of rights nor rent controls.

Twelve U of T students last week picketed an apartment building where they claim the landlord is forcing out families to bring in students at exorbitant rents.

Last month the landlord, Arnold Blundell, raised the rates at his 120 Dowling Ave. apartment building from $140 to $240 a month per apartment.

The 15 families who could not afford the rent hike moved out. The building was "redecorated" and is now occupied by students from Ryerson Polytechnical Institute.

The students are paying $65 a month each to live four and five to an apartment. They say they'd be happy to move out, but can't find other accommodation.

The protesting group — which calls itself Students Organization for Fair Accommodation (SOFA) — has sent letters to Toronto Mayor William Dennison and Ontario Attorney General Arthur Wishart urging some form of rent controls.

U of T president Cloude Bissell has said he considers the ousting of families to make way for students willing to pay higher rents "a deplorable business."

He said he would ask the U of T Housing Service to report to him on whether this was a general trend in the surrounding community.

Housing Service director Mary Jaffary said last week that although housing is a sellers' market, there are both good and bad landlords.

She said student protests such as Tent City and the Blundell demonstration antagonize landlords.

"The best advice to students," she said, "is to learn what is expected of them in the contract."

When asked about the immediate housing shortage, Mrs. Jaffary said, "The people all descend en masse at one moment. There just aren't enough places at one time."

The housing shortage is a problem faced by 3,000 students who have so far applied to the Housing Service for accommodation.

There are quite a few old houses near the campus owned by the university and managed by Crown Trust Co., which has a specific directive from the university not to evict old tenants to make way for students.

A pamphlet titled "Housing the Community", put out last week by the Students' Administrative Council examines the housing crisis and delivers suggestions to the federal, provincial and municipal governments, and to the U of T.

It advocates such reforms as greater government investment in housing, a tenants' bill of rights, fairer leases, an end to land speculation, rent-control, and the university's approval and support of the SAC College Street project.

SAC claims the university does not recognize that here is a housing problem, but President Bissell denies this.

"Housing has been the university's number one priority for the last two years in terms of time and resources," Dr. Bissell said in an interview last week.

WHAT HAS SAC DONE ALL SUMMER?

Hear about the executive's summer vacation at the Sac office, featuring:

- What happened at the CUS Congress?
- Will there be an October revolution?
- Should students withhold their Sac fees?
- Should graduate students vote to withdraw from SAC?

WASHINGTON (CUP-CPS) — Dave Harris, a West coast draft resister, has finally come up with a program for girls who have no draft cards to burn during anti-war protests.

When Harris was asked what women could do to effectively protest the draft, he replied: "Well, you can refuse to sleep with anyone who carries a draft card."

GSU considers SAC withdrawal

By MARTY MOSKOVITS

The Graduate Students Union is asking the university's 5,000 graduate students for a mandate to allow it to withdraw from the Students Administrative Council.

Because of the difficulties in contacting graduate students once they have enrolled and dispersed all over the university, the graduates are being asked to vote on the issue when they register.

GSU executive claims SAC is primarily an undergraduate body interested in undergraduate problems.

SAC President Steve Langdon claims the GSU's actions are in complete bad faith. He says a compromise was reached by the two groups this summer in a deal that included financial assistance to the GSU as well as joint SAC-GSU programs.

Langdon, in a recent letter to GSU President John Winter, said SAC agreed to give the GSU $3,800 worth of aid to finance the organization of a teaching assistants' association, the publishing of a graduate student opinion survey conducted last year by the GSU, which shows the "depressing state of the students in SGS," and a joint conference designed to make teaching assistants aware of changing teaching methods and techniques.

The GSU feels that as a subordinate to SAC, it is unable to deal directly with the university hierarchy, a right which it sees as an absolute necessity.

"We would like, for instance, to see a graduate as one of the student representatives on the presidents council," says Mike Vaughan, GSU executive vice president.

Vaughan says he would "hate to see the GSU withdraw from SAC to move into oblivion," but he does not see the division as a weakening of the students' position in their stand against the administration.

Vaughan would like to see an active GSU, co-operating with SAC's programs.

Langdon says he sees no logical or intellectual reason for the graduates to pull out of the university-wide union. He fears fragmentation might undermine the quest for a "university community."

The present executive, headed by Winter, was elected last spring on a ticket that included withdrawal from SAC, refurbishing of the GSU house, and obtaining a liquor licence for same.

Though the present executive has elicited enthusiastic response to their social programs, Vaughan says "most grads just don't give a damn as far as student politics are concerned."

He could not say whether they are in deed apathetic or busy or in open disagreement with present SAC policy.

The truth is that most graduates view with apprehension the militant activism exemplified by ex-CUS-president Pete Warrian's burn-statement of last August, and they see in SAC the embodiment of that opinion.

Liber-action generates Glendon

By MARY KATE ROWAN

The Platonic Facts of Plato, Mick Jagger, Major Daley, the Board of Governors.

Potpourri? Not in a "people-generated" course offered at York University's Glendon College.

Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones received a heavy drug sentence. The magistrate later admitted the sentence was harsh because Jagger was well known.

Was the judge honest? Was the sentence just?

Is Mayor Daley of Chicago an honest man? Does might make right? Does honesty pay?

About the Board of Governors — if a man donates a million dollars to a university, does he have a moral right to dictate what should be taught and how? Would you?

What does all this have to do with Plato? These examples question the concepts of justice and honesty. So did Plato.

Marc Dwor, the student discussion leader, let the group of eight students chew the fat themselves to see if they could determine what constituted justice.

He interjected infrequently, usually with "You'll find references to that in Plato. Find out what he things about it."

"Plato was only a man. Don't accept what he says — evaluate it."

It's all part of Liber-action '68, a movement designed by the Glendon student council to start the liberal arts college's 900 students thinking about the type of education they want.

A student handbook entitled Liber-action encourages students to register in the college and pay their fees but not register in any specific courses. (The deadline for course registration is October 15.)

It invites students to participate in an "educational experiment" during the first month of university to enable them to make a better choice of courses in October.

Part of the "educational experiment" is the "people-generated" course.

Liber-action '68 was conceived during last February's boycott at the Ontario College of Art, during which OCA students opposed the firing of two instructors.

To further explore the idea of educational reform, the Glendon College Student Union held three meetings this summer and consulted with people such as Peter Warrian, president of the Canadian Union of Students and Brian Switzman, president of the Ontario Union of Students.

The result of this soul searching was the Glendon Student Union Manifesta: A University Is Far People.

The Manifesta charges the university has "a utilitarian approach to education, an approach which places usefulness to the society above criticism of that society."

According to Jim Park, student union president, the aim of the university should not be in producing people who fit in, but in producing people who question society and will try to alleviate the wrongs.

"The university is a micro-plasm of society and should try to alleviate social change," he says. "Right now it's behind the times because it is too concerned with getting funds and producing people who are going to fit in."

One of the aims of Liber-action '68 is to do away with rigid faculty-student relationships.

Ideally, in a "people-generated" course, the faculty member is removed from his position of authority and becomes instead a resource person with more knowledge than the student.

This type of arrangement is supported by the Manifesto because it enables faculty and students to come together on a person to person basis from which both can benefit.

The Manifesto calls for abolition of the formal course structure and no formal exams or marks.

It asks for one college government democratically chosen by the college community to replace the faculty council, student council and residence council.

To enable each student to pursue his education in the manner he considers best, the Manifesto calls for a bill of rights.

It wants to abolish social stratification in the college community by having all common rooms, washrooms, cafeteria tables, etc. open to all members of the college.

H. S. Harris, Dean of Glendon College, called the people-generated course a good idea but termed them "essentially extra-curricular activities."

He warned that "the very students who are most concerned about careful and deliberate choice of their program are likely to find themselves squeezed out of the course they want."

He assured that the administration would do its best to accommodate all requests for a change of program within the official period.

To date, most students have registered in their courses but the people-generated classes have been popular.

"There is nothing spectacularly revolutionary about Liber-action '68", says Park.

"We're still operating within the system. If we're successful, we won't have to go beyond the liberal phase."

What happens now? "We can't pre-plan" says Park. "It depends on the response."

Park admitted that a system of personal evaluation, with a faculty member being used strictly as a resource person, takes more initiative on the part of the individual student.

"Some students need a formal course structure like a crutch. The student in a people-generated class isn't being fed. He's not being told what to learn, when to learn it and how to present it."

The fall term officially opens today. Escott Reid, Principal of Glendon College will make the traditional opening address. Student leaders are waiting for his response to the Manifesto, while the students themselves actively discuss the merits of Liber-action. "The ordinary student doesn't have the discipline," commented freshman Ian McAskile.

Donna Larson, also in first year, said: "Maybe next year I could study without a prof standing over me, but this year I need discipline."

Comments Karen White, first year: "Take away all but self-evaluation and people won't work. It's difficult if you don't have goals."

Jim Park calls Liber-action '68 a success because it was allowed to happen.

"Perhaps for the first time in their educational career, people are trying to answer the question of what education means to them personally."

Karen White agrees. "Its made everyone think about what they're getting into and about why they are here."

CUS congress formulates student critique

By ANNE BOODY

THE Canadian Union of Students shrugged off a minor flurry of withdrawals during its recent 1968 annual congress to mount an attack on society at large as it analysed the problems of the modern university.

"The overriding fact of Canadian society is that it is a colony, economically dominated by a neo-capitalist metropolis centred in the United States. Our educational system serves to further the development of this metropolis," Peter Warrrian, president of CUS, told the delegates.

For a long week of hassling, these thoughts formed the basis of an argument around which the congress revolved.

And the University of Toronto delegation, lead by Students Administrative Council President Steve Langdon, had its share of influence in the congress policy making.

But by the end of the week it was evident that Toronto had ceded its lead position to the enthusiastic Simon Fraser University delegation, which now calls itself Louis Riel University.

Between disavowals and commitments to the Canada-wide union, delegates worked out an anti-capitalist, anti-imperialist critique of society — although they balked at a four-square stand for socialism — labelled corporate capitalism as the cause of repressive instincts in Canadian universities, and demanded that student unions have control over "learning process and university decision making."

EDUCATION

The education resolution, master-minded by Toronto, presented a scathing attack on military research in universities, demanded that campuses refuse money intended for military research and urged members to oppose financial gifts to their universities if these contradicted CUS policy.

"The research and counterinsurgent studies on Canadian campuses is a blatant example of ties with an imperialistic form of society centered south of the border," the resolution charged.

Other resolutions adopted by the congress included a re-interpretation of universal accessibility which called for opening universities to non-students. Another called for curriculum control by students and faculties.

STUDENT UNIONS

In a resolution emerging from three days of commissions, arguments and study, CUS demanded control by student unions "over the learning process and university decision making."

One of the four position papers read: "The operating principles of our approach to bargaining must be those of parity, mass participation (instead of representative models of democratization) in open structures and parallel decision making with a veto vested in autonomous student unions."

The resolution was based on this analysis.

"These are wishy-washy resolutions. They will be meaningless without confrontations and hard work," warned John Cleveland, a Simon Fraser-Louis Riel delegate.

The same resolution called for the establishment of student departmental union locals with veto power and student committees parallel to all departmental faculty committees.

It called for the abolition of boards of governors and for equal student representation on senates. CUS also clamored for an end to accreditation in universities — the abolition of exams and grades.

Course unions, student newspapers, open forums were suggested as means to critically evaluate the course curriculum.

The goal in mind was to do away with the authoritarian repression of the present educational system.

QUEBEC

After much debate in caucus, the Toronto delegation threw its support behind a motion calling for recognition of Quebec as a "sovereign nation". It was finally passed despite vigorous opposition.

The motion, which was critical of English Canada's exploitation of the French national community, passed by a vote of 51-35.

It calls on the citizens of Quebec to decide whether or not to establish a "bi-national" government with English Canada.

The congress came out 3-1 behind a statement condemning U.S. war efforts in Viet Nam and endorsing the Vietnamese National Liberation Front in its struggle for "national liberation."

As the congress drew to an end, solidarity within the union was growing. Uncommitted members drew themselves into the stream of reform.

Martin Loney, 24, of Simon Fraser, a firm supporter of democratization of the university, was acclaimed president-elect.

"Out of confrontation comes consciousness and out of consciousness comes action," said Loney in his acceptance speech.

He urged all members to go back to their respective campuses and "turn people on to social reform."

CONFRONTATION AT HILLEL

By LARRY HAIVEN

Richard Reoch, one of four students who attempted to organize a boycott of the $12 SAC fee, told a packed Hillel audience last night that student power advocates are:

"People taking the easy way out, trying to put students in a pigeon-hole, trying to create a cheap, martyr image."

The audience gasped as Andy Wernick, in worn denim jacket, face covered with hair, put down his cigarette and told Reoch:

"That's the monumental patronizing idiocy of bourgeois thinking." Reoch was unperturbed in unwrinkled tweed suit, hair thin and in place.

Wernick, SAC Education Commissioner, and Reoch, a third-year English major at Trinity, were debating the subject of student power.

student body. Reoch replied:

"One of the main features of behind-the-times thinking is democracy. That's mob rule."

Reoch said independent thought and individual action were the bases of survival in an increasingly threatening future.

Wernick's comments became more impatient and pithy as Reoch quoted everyone from Julian Huxley to Pope Pius III to reinforce his image as an independent liberal intellectual.

Reoch tore into a recent SAC meeting he had attended. "One quarter of those members were sitting there saying, 'Please Mr. Langdon and Mr. Wernick, tell us where we're at.' This is not a vanguard, this is some kind of prayer meeting!"

Wernick pursed his lips, rolled his eyes. "Does a prayer meeting set up a bookstore that offers lower prices? Does a prayer meeting set up a housing project for students? Does a prayer meeting look into the purpose and the structure of the university?"

CHAMPION BLUES BACK TO BUSINESS

Halfback Mike Raham (22) through opening in defensive line as OQAA defending champion Varsity Blues hold their first scrimmage on Saturday morning. Blues' crisp display was a pleasant surprise for head coach Ron Murphy and his staff. Murphy reluctantly cut nine players following the workout to trim his squad to forty-seven for next Saturday's exhibition game with Western Mustangs in London. The encounter will be Blues' only preseason match.

College football goes big time

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

As treacly tradition gradually fades off into the sunset, Canadian college football is expanding enormously in excitement, prestige and interest across the nation.

And this year seems to mark a high water mark. When the oldtimers of 2001 get to talking around the old pot belly radiation stove just before U of A (University of Aklavik) and U of T (University of Toronto, of course) play off for the Grey Cup, they'll probably finger (?) 1968 as the year the collegiate gridiron started to eclipse the professionals.

To begin with, this year, for the first time, there will be a true-blue, genuine national intercollegiate championship with every serious football school in the country eligible. On the hopefully warm, sultry evening of November 22 before a packed Varsity Stadium and a cross-Canada TV audience, the Vanier Cup will be at stake in the fourth annual College Bowl.

The two teams involved will be the survivors of the Atlantic College Bowl between the Central Canada and the Maritime Conference champions, and the Western College Bowl between the winners of the five-team western conference and our own Senior Intercollegiate Football League. Is that clear?

For the past two years, the College Bowl has existed in a rather hollow fashion with the SIFL prominently absent from the core of activities. (That makes it hollow, get it?) However, the petty squabbles and acrimonious kinks that brought this about have all been ironed out, and a tremendous finale shapes up.

Speaking of the SIFL, that's the other big change of 1968. Persistent knocking has finally opened the prestigious chambers of the league to some new anatomy, in the form of Waterloo Warriors and McMaster Marauders. These two teams previously played in the cumbersome, twelve-team Central Ontario Conference.

To facilitate schedules and such like that, the SIFL has been anesthetized and amputated into two divisions. Queen's, McGill and University of Toronto make up the eastern division, while Western, Waterloo and Mac form the division of the west.

Each team plays a home and home series against the members of its own division, and one game against the teams from the other division. Home games are alternated from year to year (as opposed to ear to ear).

According to the Varsity Sports Department HAL-computer, that makes a seven game schedule.

The season opens for Varsity Blues on September 28 against McGill Redmen. They have an exhibition game this Saturday at Western.

Notes:

In week-end intercollegiate exhibition football, University of Alberta Golden Bears ripped McMaster 34-3 in a rematch of last year's Canadian College Bowl. Mac appears woefully weak for their return to the SIFL this season. In other games, Queen's Golden Gaels whipped Queen's grads 27-8 and University of Manitoba Bisons edged Waterloo Lutheran Golden Hawks 15-13.

AUX ARMES

An affront to medical science has taken over the Varsity sports department this year. In a dramatic move, organized in an "underhanded and surreptitious manner", Phil Bingley has taken over as sports editor. Not only that, Bingley is actually hoping to attract new blood to his aging metabolism.

So, he's holding a meeting this afternoon at 1:15 in a herculean effort to attract staff. Bingley says the confrontation will take place in the unlikely place of the Varsity sports office at 91 St. George on the second floor. There are lots of new writers needed, for obvious reasons, and PHOTOGRAPHERS, PHOTOGRAPHERS, PHOTOGRAPHERS, too. Women are also invited, for obvious reasons.

Bingley would like to warn those coming to the meeting that uncouth editor, Paul MacRae is to be ignored at all times, and trod upon often. Walk right through to the sports office, trampling as many gross newswires as possible. You may even win a Bingley Award of Merit.

Tendon claims Passi

Ward Passi, all-star left-winger of Varsity hockey Blues, may well be out of this year's competition before the opening of training camp. Passi suffered a torn achilles tendon during a squash workout at Hart House last Wednesday.

He underwent surgery the following morning and, although the operation was considered a success, he will wear a cast for at least the next eight weeks.

The freak mishap follows two years of tendon trouble caused by a faulty pair of skates Passi was wearing. It is also the second serious leg injury for the Sudbury native in seven years at the University of Toronto. He broke his leg in an intercollegiate match in Montreal, six years ago.

Passi, who announced his retirement at the end of last season, changed his decision during the summer vacation, and planned to return to Blues as a defenceman.

Monday mo

When I was a freshman, a freshman, dressed like a And when someone said to m (One was supposed to answer Uncle Tom frosh.) Every see it and came to the conclusion was a BMOC.

So now I should be a BMOC (that's big man on campus for uninitiated). Right? Wrong! Being a lousy athlete, a square to the hippies, an average student and an unlikely candidate for the Mr. U. of T. title, I am reduced to punching out reams of hackneyed comments and quotations on the local sports scene.

The truth of the matter is that I (i.e. me and by bagful of dillipated sportsies) will provide something for you to read when lectures become boring, or at least something for you to look like you are reading when you want to appear industrious.

ATHLETICS

Getting to sports, University of Toronto provides one of the finest interfaculty athletic programmes available anywhere in the world. Competition is held in soccer, rugby, track and harrier, volleyball, hockey, swimming, water polo, basketball, gymnastics, squash, boxing, wrestling and fencing. The current setup lends an excellent supplement to (and, in a few cases, a replacement for) university academic excitement.

On the intercollegiate level, our Blues always rate among the best in the country in football, hockey and swimming. Sporting world "experts" have already ranked the gridders, skaters and swimmers number one in the nation in pre-season polls.

Not to be forgotten are the soccer, rugby, track and harrier, water polo and fencing teams, all of whom are defending Ontario Quebec Athletic Association defending champions.

FAT CHAT . . . Former Varsity hockey coach Joe Kane was recently chosen president of the Central Pro Hockey League in the United States. Kane, a Toronto lawyer, coached Varsity Grads and Senior Mariboros during the past three seasons after several years at Varsity. He now moves to league headquarters in Kansas City, Mo. to replace the late Jack Adams. . . Brian St. has returned to Victoria College following workouts with Boston Bruins of the NHL. Picked first by Boston in the average junior draft, St. John will be starting his second season with the hockey Blues. . . Varsity Basketball Blues will play all their home games at York University this season. Seems the hallowed halls of Hart House aren't big enough for major intercollegiate events (nor have they been for the past fifteen or twenty years). . . The university has spent a cool $90,000 this past summer on renovations to Varsity Arena. Improvements include a new floor and pipe system and new boards with unbreakable glass shields. . . For those who don't follow the sports world during the summer months, former Varsity and SIFL all-star griddler Mike Eben is now with Toronto Argonauts of the CFL. . . So is Paul Markle brother of Blues' Glen Markle. . . The Canadian Intercollegiate Athletic Union has signed a ten-year contract with the CBC calling for $100,000 dollars. The network in exchange will have the exclusive television rights to all major CIAU events during that period.

Bissell Says No To Democratic University

To 2,000 students who filled Convocation Hall Monday, President Claude Bissell had little new to offer.

In his traditional opening address Monday afternoon Dr. Bissell told a capacity student audience, he believed in strong student government.

But he added it would be difficult to honour his commitment if that government "has become disorganized and confused through your neglect."

He stressed his definition of democracy which carried with it a commitment to openness, "a willingness to carry on discussions so that everybody can be aware of the issues."

But Dr. Bissell saw the weight of the non-democratic element greater in the university than the state.

"It arises from the fact," he said "that the university is not concerned with general welfare . . . but with a particular area, where there can be only one principal goal — the preservation, dissemination, and expansion of knowledge.

"The devotion to knowledge, to scholarship, to the intellectual life," he said, "is the reason that a university is not the arm of a political party, an exercise in group therapy, or an institutionalized love-in; and those who proclaim the alternatives are talking about another kind of institution."

Bissell warned students that although they had seats on the administration's councils, "We work by discussion towards the resolution of differences."

Bissell summed up his position by placing himself on a middle course, "Opposed to all orthodoxies, whether of the right or the left."

Earlier in his speech, the president repeated his reasons for refusing a debate with SAC president Steve Langdon.

"We've already had a debate for Maclean's Magazine," he said. "This is the only formal opportunity I have to talk with the university students. I didn't want to give it up."

Bissell added he would like to increase these meetings and hold more informal student-staff gatherings.

The hand that cuts the watermelon rules the university.

Paul, the editor, says he doesn't give a damn the way this little blurb is written, just so long as it gets people to come and write for the Varsity. So if you have any compassion for your fellow man, come up to 91 St. George. Whereupon you will be surrounded by a cast of thousands and ushered into the editor's office so we can say, "See, see: we got somebody." Whereupon the editor will growl, spit and say "So What!" If you want to know where it's really at, come up and have a chat with us. We're here at every hour of the night and day. We also sell used cars and life insurance

"Free watermelon. Get your free watermelon here. It's in honour of Claude Bissell's return."

They came, they ate. They came to welcome back their president after his year of teaching at Harvard University.

As the crowd filed past the front door of Convocation Hall, the watermelon was pushed into their hands. "It's in honour of Claude Bissell's return," they were told.

One suspicious looking man, in grey flannels, and a fat cigar in his mouth, circled about the food area.

"Ah, what's that you are handing out, maybe I should have a look," he commented. Someone shoved a copy of Jerry Farber's article, The Student As Nigger, into his fist.

"Get your free watermelon here". The sharp knife flickered in the sun as an expert hand sliced one piece after another. Students clamored anxiously around the table. U of T police circled about, eyes focused on the food.

"Watermelon, Claude Bissell? Is it supposed to be symbolic?" asked one confused freshman.

"Watermelon, Claude Bissell! Oh! Student as Nigger! Now I get it," exclaimed another, a grin of comprehension beaming on his face.

It was soon time to join the performance inside. Almost 2,000 eager freshmen and older students filled every seat in the hall, while others spilled out of the doorways. They were all expecting something, but just what, nobody was really sure.

The organ groaned through its hallowed hymns. The noise in the hall rose to a crescendo. Someone began to clap enthusiastically and everyone followed suit.

Then, in came Claude Bissell. In patriotic style all 1,800 in the hall rose to their feet to give him a standing ovation.

A broad banner across the top of the balcony rustled in the breeze. "Welcome back Mr. Charlie."

Bissell, in a neat olive green suit, approached the podium. All ears strained as Bissell explained his concept of the nature of the university, of the necessity to have secret caucuses and the necessity to deal with knowledge rather than human welfare.

Most students liked it, and signified approval with their applause, but there were a few who didn't. Halfway through the speech, three students suddenly appeared at the front of the hall. Bissell came to a halt. In a short pantomime skit they mimicked the motions of the president and his intent audience.

People applauded. Dr. Bissell quietly wrapped up his speech and again scored a round of applause.

Following the president's address about 200 students assembled on the steps of Convocation Hall to voice their reactions to the speech.

"Knowledge is important," agreed SAC President Steve Langdon, commenting on the speech, "but it is important only when it is applied, not as an abstract commitment to search for truth."

Phil Resnick (SGS), one of the students who walked out during the president's speech, explained his protest was an act of "guerilla theatre."

He urged students to follow his example by walking out of lecture halls and classrooms.

Bissell, said Langdon, "has firmly positioned himself as a radical of the centre, passionately committed to compromise."

He accused the university president of "picking up the rhetoric of the left" by using words such as "people-generated" and "resource person" in his speech.

Prof. Donald Evans of the philosophy department disagreed with the comparison of the student's lot to that of an American Negro.

"It shows a lack of moral sensitivity," he said. "The comparison shows a lack of true compassion or humility."

The Students Administrative Council executive will recommend today that the controversial President's committee to examine the structure of university government be made up entirely of students and faculty. Administration would be in a non-voting position.

The invitation was discussed briefly at last week's SAC meeting, where the general consensus was against unconditional acceptance.

The proposal will be put before SAC at its meeting tonight at 7:30 in Loretto College. Dr. Bissell has called his commission, designed to examine "the structure of the government of the university," the most important body formed at the university in more than 60 years.

SAC president Steve Langdon said last night there was "some possibility the faculty would go along with this proposal."

"It's just a follow-up of Dr. Bissell's suggestion that the people inside the community decide how it will be governed," he said.

"The president and Board of Governors can hardly be on the commission as voting members — it's their positions that are being evaluated," he said.

Dr. Bissell has proposed the commission comprise himself, two members of the Board of Governors, two faculty members and two students.

SAC President Steve Langdon said the commission would "just replace the separate entities of government by a single authoritarian body."

Cultural Affairs Commissioner Mark Freiman (IV UC) also hedged:

"Potentially, they can and will gang up on us and ram through a structure not too different from what we have now."

Said education commissioner Andy Wernick: "I don't think we should be even talking to these guys. We should be talking to ourselves and to students."

Wernick and other SAC leaders will talk to students at 1 p.m. today at a mass meeting of SAC at Tent City, where anyone is invited to speak or join discussion on problems of the university.

Engineers support Tent City

BY HARRIET KIDECKEL

The engineering society last night voted overwhelmingly to support Tent City.

The motion said Tent City was "an effective dramatization of the student housing shortage at the University of Toronto."

"This shows the willingness of engineers to support the rest of the campus in a protest of such importance," said Jim Ford (I APSC), the Students Administrative Council representative who sponsored the motion.

Ford would like to improve the image of engineers on campus and felt passage of the motion would help to do so.

Mike Sefton (II APSC), the society's secretary, objected saying he saw the protest "as a protest against the university as a whole, against Bissell."

Ford explained to the members it was a protest against only the housing shortage, "not only student housing, but the problem in society. This does not reflect on the administration or SAC."

Bob MacCallum (IV APSC) vice-president of the society was next to disagree, on financial grounds.

"How much does Tent City cost? How much will it cost me?" he asked.

SAC education commissioner Andy Wernick, who was invited to the Hart House meeting, estimated the total cost of Tent City at $2,500.

MacCallum also charged Tent City was illegal and contravened a city housing by-law.

"How will it look," MacCallum asked, "for the engineering society to support something illegal?"

"Under age drinking is illegal," called out one of the engineers.

Ford explained he wanted his motion to show this was the type of protest the engineers would support even if it is illegal — "a valid student protest."

Later in the meeting Ford also won a second battle by beating back a move to take away his seat on both the society executive and SAC.

According to the society's constitution, SAC representatives must be from "second, or third or fourth year depending on plurality of votes."

Speaker Les Segal, an engineering graduate, ruled that Ford could not maintain his seat on council.

But the council unanimously voted against the speaker to accept Ford as a full member.

what a speech!

How many of you really listened to Dr. Bissell's opening address Monday? If you did, three aspects stand out: his stress on participation by students in the governing of the university; his stress on strong student government; and his insistence that the university "is not concerned with general welfare".

Underneath the velvet, reasonable rhetoric was both a strong plea for moderate support, and a slap at student power advocates intended to either make them hang their heads in shame for being such naughty boys, or at least crawl off into a secluded corner and leave the nice people alone.

Dr. Bissell told us the university was democratic. Not completely democratic, of course, but that just makes it more democratic. Sure that sounds inane, but that's what he said.

"You might say then that even where the procedures of democracy are not observed in the university, the outcome is democratic, provided the student choses to make it so."

You can't choose to make it so through democracy because, according to Dr. Bissell, your student government isn't representative. Seems we didn't get enough people to the polls. The fact that the majority voted for Langdon and his platform doesn't seem to matter beside the fact that the greater majority didn't vote at all.

How's that for a franchise!

We did, however, get a call for strong student government. If that government is more amenable to what the administration wants, they might even get somewhere.

UNIVERSITY AND SOCIETY

But Dr. Bissell's views on the place of the university in society was the real shocker. The radicals practically came out of convocation hall whistling the tune. They couldn't believe it.

There isn't any other place in our society where a real critique of this society can develop, and where any sort of movement to correct abuses can begin.

But we're not even going to be able to correct the fundamental abuses we have at university. It's the same philosophy — talk about it and eventually something will seep through to those in control. Confrontation is too embarrassing.

In a way, it's what everybody wanted. To the moderates it's the definitive defense of their position; to the right wing the speech was an indication that at least those nasty student radicals wouldn't get into power; and to the radicals it was almost a clarion call to action.

Wonder what'll happen when he hits the windmill?

we're all here

If you've borne with us this far, through Monday and again today, you've perhaps noticed some of the things we talk about in these pages.

They're not all satisfactory.

Some aren't even passable.

Some, when you look at it, really do make you want to blow it all up.

How you react — well that's up to you.

You can grin and bear it. Be at every class. Cross-reference for every assignment. Plug on to your graduate slot.

Or you can talk about what's wrong. And be at almost every class. And cross-reference almost every assignment. And plug on . . .

Or you can maybe, even, get a little involved in what's wrong.

Try dropping in at Tent City and finding out what the problems are, and then adding your own ideas to it all.

Keep tuned in to your friendly student government — they've got problems, but Lord knows they try harder.

Read us — we can make you laugh one way or another.

And through it all, try and stay mixed up, as involved as possible, in what's going on around here. You may have to miss classes here, there and everywhere, or even crib an essay or 10, and when it's all over that graduate slot will suddenly, maybe, not be important either.

Because these problems are real.

People really do get stuck because of housing crises.

And in Chicago a lot of people get pushed around — and not just during Democratic conventions, we might add.

And the university you're in does manipulate you according to whatever requirements the society at large lays down.

And what those requirements reflect is an economic and social system that needs to be countered, fast.

It's really one big problem, of course. But you can connect with some of the smaller problems that get reflected all the time around here.

You can, really.
So do it, now.

BISSELL and SOLANDT

Smash team hit in theatre of absurd production

By LARRY HAIVEN
Varsity Theatre Editor

Rampant rumor has it that New York producers are interested in bringing The President's Opening Address to Broadway. David Merrick attended Monday's performance at Convocation Hall and was ecstatic.

"It was one of the best pieces of theatre of the absurd I've ever seen — I don't know much about drama, but I know what sells and New York will love it," Merrick said in a telephone interview.

"I want the whole thing: The president's address, the pantomime, the cameramen, the kids outside, the watermelon. It was great."

This is the first time that the age-old ceremony has been noticed by showbiz entrepreneurs, and deservedly so. With a few brilliantly masterful strokes, Claude Bissell this year directed a chilling modern-dress production of the spectacle.

VERTICAL MOSAIC

He dispensed with the cast of a thousand gilt-robed members of the administration and staff sitting behind him and sat students in their place. This produced a brilliant "theatre-in-round" impression. The retaining of vestiges of former glory such as Purcell and Handel on the organ reinforced the existentialist aura of meaninglessness left in the abandoning of the religious passion-play.

In a stroke of genius, the organ played a processional as Bissell and Chancellor Solandt forlornly marched onto the stage to the two seats marked for them. There was a striking picture, a sort of sad cross between Don Quixote and Sancho Panza and Happy and Pozzo in Waiting For Godot. Perhaps a more effective play would have been to have Solandt leading Bissell by a rope tied around the latter's neck as in Godot. This would have made even more cogent Solandt's line, "My predecessor told me the chancellor is the head of the university. He said he wouldn't advise me to assert it too strongly."

Perhaps most of the credit for the effectiveness of the production should go to Solandt, a character actor from way back, who did the prologue and postlogue to the actual address.

"I am the man who confers degrees and since students like to get degrees, I'm not short of business," Merrick has suggested that this little bit be done in a song and dance fashion so popular on Broadway.

He also suggested that a 100-voice choir of Canada's leading businessmen chant or hum as Solandt says, "But the university has little in common, in organization anyway, with business and industry." This would be particularly effective in the postlogue as the Chancellor bids the audience goodbye with, "The ferment now prevalent in the university is one of the most reassuring things I've seen. Work hard, play hard, get involved and you'll get a good education here. Edward Albee would like that.

HIGH POINT

But the high point, and most brilliantly realized part of this theatre of the absurd, was the president's address itself. One of the problems that the Broadway production will have to solve is duplicating the breathless anticipation of the audience and the press for any hint of what the president will say about student power. In the superb performance Monday, this nervousness could be found everywhere. Such creative strokes as having "Welcome Back Mr. Charlie" draped across a wall, free watermelon, rumblings in the press and on the student's council, contributed to the general tension.

All this was necessary so that the actual president's address could be the great and empty let-down that it was.

Claude Bissell was superb. He took a speech that was utterly devoid of intellectual substance and totally lacking in challenge. By sheer force of personality, he transformed it into an eloquent oration that was utterly devoid of intellectual substance and totally lacking in challenge.

Particularly ingenious was the way in which he evaded the question of student power. The audience was sitting there, thinking, "C'mon sock it to us, Claude, baby. Give it to us in the teeth. Tell us in your own intelligent and keen way exactly what you think of student power. If a university is for thinking, then give us something to think about."

But Bissell cleverly denied them the satisfaction of a provoking speech, one that would stay with them. In a truly meaningless manner, he came on first as the humble father, apologizing for his absence, and then as the humble teacher, explaining, in Mother Goose fashion, the way the university runs.

He said that questions could be asked when he finished his speech, but none were asked, presumably because he said nothing that anyone could question. In an unusually memorable moment, which occurred just after Solandt had finished the postlogue, Bissell hesitated for a few seconds in his seat, amid a heavy silence, and looked up to the balcony where Steve Langdon was sitting. Langdon looked back in bewilderment. Then Bissell shrugged his shoulders and walked off the stage. The shrug was a masterpiece of timing. It occurred just as some people were rising for a standing ovation and others were simply rising to leave the hall. No Beckett or Ionesco could top that scene for emphasizing the inherent anguish at meaninglessness.

Another high point occurred when Bissell took his glass of water from the podium back with him to his chair after his speech. Whatever it meant, the effect was excellent.

SCRIPT "MASTERPIECE"

The script itself was a masterpiece of incongruity, empty flattery and hollow didacticism. It spoke of the obvious, the ideals that everybody in the university would like to see, and contained not one original insight into the state of the university today. Why student power? Why the unrest? Why Mister Charlie and the watermelon? Reporters must have been up to all hours of the night looking for things they could quote, there being so little available.

The fact there were two opposing ideologies present in the hall and the fact neither one acknowledged the validity of the other emphasized the absurdity of the situation. Bissell alluded to the fact that he had competition in writing the script.

"And there will be plenty of journeymen, both within and without the university, who will want to write the script for us." A small pantomime in which students mimicked the president's speech was very effective in making the breach between the two camps obvious.

Perhaps most typical and revealing was the poem by Yeats that the president quoted. "There is a poetry of tradition as well as a poetry of revolution. William Butler Yeats wrote both kinds of poetry and his apocalyptic visions are often quoted by the New Left. But he was at his best when he sang the strength and beauty of custom and tradition."

MOMENT OF TRUTH

Bissell couldn't have planned more beautifully this moment of truth that showed that he and the activists outside were speaking two different languages. "How but in custom and in ceremony are innocence and beauty born?" he quoted, while pantomimes were being acted out, watermelons were being carved and students were playing house at Tent City to make their demands for a better university.

The stark disappointment of the production made it a perfect piece of existentialist theatre, theatre that says more by its being absurd than by the content of the play itself.

The New York producers are justifiably worried that the costs involved in transporting such a large university to Broadway will lessen its chances for a success there. However some have suggested making it a year-round exhibition right here in Canada. That would make it even more famous than Expo.

This year the frosh will be looked after, it was announced last night.

Highly reliable sources said preparations for the annual freshman welcome were going ahead at full speed.

But Blue and White Chairman Abe Mudrik, who is organizing the festivities, would merely say it would be "a good show."

In an exclusive interview in his cluttered office in the tumbledown SAC building the bright-eyed blue-shirted entrepreneur revealed there would be two bands at the dance.

"The Rifkin and the Invasion," he said.

Mudrik also said information booths from all campus clubs would be available for freshmen to inspect.

Reid rejects revolution

Escott Reid, principal of York University's Glendon College launched a broadside attack on "unstructured" education Monday in his traditional opening address.

Abolish formal courses and Glendon College could not survive, Reid warned.

"The essential feature of this college is its determination to become bilingual and bicultural by 1976," he said. "There is no hope of obtaining that goal unless we continue to require students to study French for two years.

The Glendon College Student Union has advised students to delay registering in their individual classes and participate in an "educational experiment" to enable them to make a better choice of courses by October 15.

In a manifesto issued this summer the student union asked for abolition of the rigid course structure and no formal exams or marks.

Part of the educational experiment is the people-generated class where the professor becomes not a figure of authority but a resource person with more knowledge than the student.

Reid admitted that Glendon has a structured curriculum but said the structure "is adapted to the needs of young Canadians who want a liberal education."

He encouraged students to make the revolution "with fire in your bellies, excitement in your eyes and a smile on your lips," but added:

"How is a revolutionary most likely to be able to apply a cool, calculating head to the problems of how to mount and sustain a revolution?"

"I suggest that his chances of being able to do this will be greater if at university he has become accustomed to turning the full force of his mind on tough disciplined sustained studies of the society which he wants to revolutionize."

University recruitment will be reviewed

The placement service advisory committee decided yesterday to re-assess its policy on campus recruitment by companies involved in Vietnam war production.

At its first meeting of the academic year, the committee accepted the recommendation of faculty member Prof. Melville Watkins (dept. of political economy), that the new membership on the committee — four new students and two new alumni members on the body of 14 — justifies a new policy debate.

The committee decided last December 20 not to ban "war-complicit" companies. Two student members voted against that SAC-supported resolution.

The time and place of the open meeting to be held on the issue has not been set. Non-committee members will not be allowed to speak, it was decided.

Prof. Watkins said the new policy should be worked out before a crisis evolves. Last year's decision came in the wake of a sit-in protesting Dow Chemical Co. recruiting.

On-campus recruiting this year begins Nov. 4.

Toni McNamara, a SAC member from St. Michael's College, was unanimously elected chairman of the committee, replacing university Registrar Robin Ross, who resigned as ex-officio member. Miss McNamara is the only female member of the committee.

A Visit to Chicago:

They Take to the Streets

A Bloody Route

Roosevelt University inhabits a squat, grey and grimy building on Chicago's Michigan Avenue. It doesn't look like a university, and except for a small name-plaque could easily be mistaken for any of a thousand office buildings in downtown Chicago.

Roosevelt has no residence. Its 6,000 students are all commuters. There is a midnight curfew and anyone found in the building later can be charged with trespassing.

In the spring of 1968, the hundred-storey John Hancock Insurance Tower was slowly rising in the shadow of the Playboy building seemingly undisturbed by the life of the city.

Beneath on the streets there was a lot to be disturbed about.

First, there was Negro rioting following the assassination of Martin Luther King. Then a group of students at Northwestern University in suburban Evanston took over the administration offices, Columbia-style, to protest the university's treatment of Negroes.

The siege was short and effective. The frightened administration capitulated, promising more active recruitment of Negroes, courses in Negro history, and separate Negro dormitories.

March 29: The president of Roosevelt, Rolf A. Weil, started in motion a chain of events which would draw that university into the pattern of revolt that was woven in so many places in the spring of 1968.

On that day Weil rejected the unanimous recommendation of the history department that Dr. Staughton Lynd, who had been a part-time lecturer in the department, be given a full-time appointment.

Weil said the grounds for his decision were "ad hominem", that in effect Lynd had certain personality defects which would for some reason prevent him from performing his job well. He refused to specify his objections.

There were more cogent reasons for the refusal. Lynd is a pacifist and a virulent protester against the Vietnam war. In 1966, while a professor at Yale, he had allegedly visited Hanoi.

Roosevelt is in the midst of a fund-raising campaign for an expansion program, and the presence of the controversial Lynd on the faculty might have scared away potential donors. A full-time three year contract would give Lynd tenure, and make him almost impossible to fire.

Friday, Apr. 19: Sixty-four of 370 Roosevelt staff members signed a petition asking Weil to reverse his decision for the sake of "academic freedom" and "departmental autonomy." The battle lines were quite clearly drawn.

The issue was basically whether a professional administration led by Weil (at 38 an up-and-coming young bureaucrat) was justified in overruling the academics in matters of hiring.

Monday, Apr. 29: Roosevelt's student government held a mass meeting on the Lynd situation. Weil told a student delegation he had nothing to add to his previous remarks, i.e., that he would not disclose his "ad hominem" grounds.

Tuesday, Apr. 30: At Columbia University in New York, the police stormed the administration buildings, driving out the students and faculty who had occupied them in protest of the university's policy with respect to the surrounding slum. Over 100 students were injured and 230 were arrested.

Wednesday, May 1: A student group at Roosevelt calling itself Students for Quality Education held another mass meeting on the Lynd affair, and afterwards presented a petition of protest with 600 signatures to Weil.

Thursday, May 2: The "Poor People's March" on Washington began in Memphis, Tennessee.

Friday, May 3: As the American government agreed to meet the North Vietnamese in Paris to talk about peace in Vietnam, student rioting flared in the French capital.

Students protesting archaic university structures and curricula, barricaded themselves on the Boulevard St. Michel and hurled paving stones at the gendarmes sent in to disperse them. More than 600 students were arrested.

Monday, May 6: At Roosevelt, a newly-formed group, the Faculty for Academic Freedom, began picketing the school. Students for Quality Education simultaneously held a teach-in and called for a boycott of classes. The administration remained silent.

Moderates, Militants

In Paris, on the nights of the 6th and 7th, there was a pitched battle between police and close to 15,000 students. The fighting raged brutally for 14 hours. At Columbia the university was open for business for the first time in ten days. Bobby Kennedy won the Democratic Primary in Indiana.

Wednesday, May 8: The protest at Roosevelt became more strident. After another mass meeting, a number of students occupied the president's office. Several faculty members signed a statement assuming complete financial responsibility for possible damage to property, so that students might hold a peaceful all-night sit-in. In addition, a joint faculty-student guard was formed to protect property.

But President Weil is not a man to look kindly on student sit-ins. Two years before, he had brought in the Chicago Police Department to arrest anti-war protesters. On May 8, he called in the police again. The 24 students occupying his office were arrested.

At this point a growing reaction in Chicago to student militancy of any kind was becoming apparent.

The Chicago Tribune ran a cartoon captioned Higher Education. It depicted History bearded and robed holding in one hand Northwestern Surrender and Columbia Disgrace. The other hand pointed out to a mortar-boarded "university official" that "Appeasement and Blackmail Never Pay Off." Beneath the cartoon was an article containing the denunciation by state representative Robert Michel of the "Shameful Surrender ted their chances of winning any concessions from the administration were slim.

Since Weil was not likely to admit that his stand was incorrect, their only hope would be a reversal of his decision by the Board of Trustees. Because Roosevelt is a private university, this was unlikely in the face of a hostile press, a hostile public, and a student body largely unmoved by the issue.

One demonstrator, a small fellow with a shock of wild and curly black hair, complained that he had to go home and study, as exams were approaching. "I haven't studied all week," he said.

"Don't worry," was the hopeful reply from a sweet young miss, "There may not be any university at the end of term." She said it innocently almost as if she believed it.

But he went home anyway, after stopping to shout "stop the War" at a passing soldier. At 3 p.m. 10 students walked into the President's outer office and were arrested. The demonstration broke up by 4:30.

Tuesday, May 14: Ronald Reagan, a man well-beloved by student activists everywhere, received 22 per cent of the vote in the Republican primary in Nebraska.

It was a hot and muggy day in Chicago. Another 11 students sat in the president's office all day before being arrested at 11 p.m. A group of students calling themselves Students Who Car About Roosevelt! (SCAR) presented Weil with a petition supporting his stand. It had 110 signatures. At about 3 p.m. a delegation of students led by Paul Shain, a graduate student in political science, began negotiations with President Weil.

The Chicago Daily News reported on its front page that the suicide rate of students was at an all-time high. They attributed the increase to parental pressure to make good grades. On the editorial page was a syndicated article by Carl Rowan lamenting the fact that "today's campuses are being convulsed by a motley assortment of student 'activists' who express an arrogant certainty that they need to educate their presidents, deans, faculties and most of the rest of mankind." He demanded that "anarchists and nihilists" be promptly expelled.

Wednesday, May 15: The board of trustees of Northwestern University reluctantly ratified the agreement of the university administration with the black militants, vowing that such a "surrender" would never happen again.

The Chicago American featured an article explaining what "anti-American sit-in beatniks could expect in their beloved Russia." The suggestion was that they would end up either starving or in Siberia, or both.

But a little public support for the Roosevelt protest was beginning to appear. Studs Terkel, a Chicago "personality," wrote a letter to the newspapers condemning Weil's "mockery not only of academic freedom but of simple human decency."

Swedish economist Gunnar Myrdal resigned from the university's advisory committee. Chicago community organizer Sol Alinsky, a great believer in the value of confrontations, described the student protests in an interview as "a basic part of student education."

Thursday, May 16: 35 black students at the University of Chicago sat-in in university administrative offices to press their demands for more active recruitment (there were only 71 Negroes at the university) and an end to the expansion into the neighboring Negro district. After four hours the President delivered an ultimatum. If they were not out of the building within a half hour, they would all be suspended. They left.

The conflict between ages

At Roosevelt, Jeff Siegel, an alumnus and a national board member of SDS told the students to use force, if it becomes necessary. At 5:45 p.m., Weil made the negotiating students a tentative offer to take back to the protesters at large for ratification. If demonstrations were halted, a complete amnesty would be given for all students arrested and suspended, and students would be given a token say in hiring. The Lynd decision remained, as did the President's veto power over appointments. The agreement would leave things substantially the same as they were before the protest.

In response the demands of the Black Students Association, the administration offered half an office and $200. Calvin Stewart, President of the BSA, called this offer "acceptable."

Wednesday, the oppressive heat broke in torrential rainstorms, and tornados swirled through the suburbs of Chicago. The next day was clear and cool and 200 Roosevelt students rejected Weil's offer.

Thursday, May 16: The Chicago Daily News reported that graduate students would stand a 50-50 chance of being drafted.

Friday, May 17: French Premier George Pompidou called up 10,000 reservists as workers took control of several large factories.

The same day, the Chicago Tribune ran an article saying South American students had fallen victim to "clever scheming purveyors of foreign ideologies."

Library Stacks up

No first year undergraduates will receive stack privileges at the Sigmund Samuel Library this year.

This decision was taken at a meeting of the Library Council last May 23.

In a compromise decision it was decided all students in second year arts and science courses will be allowed stack privileges.

These are the only changes made from last year. All third and fourth year students are permitted to use the closed book stacks.

The new policy is set up on a one-year trial basis to determine its effectiveness. It will be reviewed at the end of the academic year.

The exclusion of first year students was deemed necessary to prevent overcrowding of the stacks.

A library spokesman said any universal extension of stack privileges was out of the question.

U.C. GIVES $ TO TADP

The University College Literary and Athletic Society Monday voted to give $250 to the Toronto Anti Draft Program.

To raise the money, the Lit decided to purchase Christmas stamps at cost and sell them at a mark-up. The stamps will carry messages and peace symbols. They will be on sale in the near future.

This marks the second year in a row the Lit has awarded money to the TADP.

All talk, no action

"You sound like bitches, you are worse than prostitutes," said the angered middle-aged woman to three girls at Tent City yesterday afternoon.

"Is it socially acceptable to have sex on the first date?" he asked.

For a short while after this, the talk became franker and more personal, involving more of the girls in the discussion.

But after 15 minutes of this, the middle aged woman who in a mixture of shyness and curiosity had been lingering at the edge of the crowd stepped in and levelled her accusation at the girls.

PENNY POWER

Two girls sat in the Arbor Room in Hart House quietly eating lunch. It was 1:40 p.m.

"We just want to eat here, that's all," said Jennifer Penny (III UC). Women are not allowed in the cafeteria before 2 p.m., but the only objection came from the cashiers at the lunch counter, who were women. They phoned the authorities upstairs, who decided to let them through.

"Girls with lunch bags are O.K.," Miss Penny said. "They're not noticed." Yesterday however she and her friend Jeanne McGuire managed to buy their lunches at the counter.

"Two years ago it was different," Miss Penny said. "Then the boys threw things at us, hooted and jeered. Today nobody gave us a second glance."

There are still restrictions about concerts, meetings and art gallery hours to be overcome by women.

"They say we're restricted because we're not members," said Miss McGuire. "But they never check for memberships so it's not that."

Bank loan rates stagger students

You are one of those foolish persons who did not put in for a POSAP grant until late, and now the bureaucracy is checked with applications and you don't have any bread to live on, eh? Is that your problem?

The Varsity pities you. Try and get a short term loan from a local bank, just to tide you over.

The Varsity tried.

The control situation we set up was one of someone with an account — empty — at the bank in question.

He wanted to get $50. For one month.

WHERE TO GO: In the first place, don't go to a major branch, especially the ones in the area of the Colonade.

Understand, on $50 the interest is not the prime charge. We were assuming it would take one month for the POSAP to arrive, so you would be after a $50 one-month note.

Interest varies with the branch and the nature of your circumstances, from about 7.5 to 11.8 percent. On $50 this would be around 50 cents but because of the paperwork involved, the banks say they must charge a minimum rate.

The Bank of Nova Scotia at 130 Bloor St. W., (CIL building) and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce at 151 Bloor both charge $5. The Nova Scotia branch at Bloor and Spadina charges $2.50, and the Commerce at the same intersection charges only $2.

The branch nearest the campus, the Royal Bank at Harbord and Spadina, has a minimum charge of $2.50, up from $1. The Bank of Montreal at Bloor and Bay charges $2.

An Emergency Control Centre has been set up by the University of Toronto to provide help in case of injury, fire, poison or other emergencies.

Dial 2222 from any 928 Centrex telephone on the St. George campus or 928-2222 from any other Toronto telephone.

The caller is requested to state the precise nature of the emergency and its exact location. If the circumstances permit, he should remain on the line in case additional information is required.

To date the Emergency Control Centre has received 13 wrong numbers, two calls to check on the right number, two people caught in elevators and one caller trying to find an electrician's shop.

Land taxes threaten universities

By ART MOSES

University administration reaction to an Ontario Legislature study recommending taxation of university property ranges from qualified acceptance to great concern.

One of the main recommendations of the Legislature's Select Committee studying the Smith Report on Provincial Taxation supported Smith's call for an end to the exemption from property taxes now enjoyed by universities throughout Ontario.

But the report also suggested "that provincial grants be used to reimburse approved institutions for payment of these taxes."

Alex G. Rankin, executive vice-president (non academic) of the university, said he would be "quite agreeable" to the taxation of university property provided the provincial government increased its grant to the university to make up for the loss of revenue.

"If such a grant was inadequate, cut-backs in expenditure would be necessary, such as a cutback in enrolment."

Mr. Rankin pointed out that taxation on U of T property would be "fantastic". But he saw the matter as essentially a matter of redistributing taxation between the municipalities and the province, not as a matter of concern to the university.

Mr. Rankin said the recommendation has merits especially in cities such as Kingston where a large proportion of real estate is university property.

But F. C. Stokes, bursar of Victoria College said the recommendation could be "a serious financial blow" as the inherent increased expenditures could not be borne by the students, but must be covered by increased provincial grants.

Rev. J. M. Owen, provost and vice chancellor of Trinity College saw the problem as a question of the province having to reimburse the university adequately with increased grants. He said church colleges receive grants through the university on a base which considers 1966-7 costs and then adds to that base only slightly each year to account for increased costs.

"It is a fairly rigid cost-of-living bonus", Rev. Owen added, "A removal of the tax exemption would only increase the difficulty."

Father J. M. Kelly, president of St. Michael's College, also saw difficulties for the church colleges. He had misgivings about the Smith Committee's recommendation that "Provincial grant support . . . be confined to those institutions recognized for the purpose by either the Department of University Affairs or the Department of Education."

"I would be extremely miffed if this regulation excluded the church colleges which are not provincially chartered institutions," he said.

"Contrary to some ideas these colleges are not finding it easy financially.

Langdon hopes for non-violent revolution

The Students Administrative Council has a total commitment to non-violence. It has other ways of articulating the need for change. Tent City, for instance.

In a rare angry mood last week SAC president Steve Langdon lashed out at organizers of a fees protest initiated during registration weeks, saying in effect the four students didn't know what they were talking about.

"Any suggestion the SAC favours violence is totally irresponsible and reprehensible to the kind of university we want," said Langdon.

Now, as the year begins, Langdon finds the campus largely worried and confused about where its leaders stand.

The four Trinity College students who urged fellow students to withhold their $12 SAC fees when registering are typical.

"It was necessary to take some extreme action to clear up a very very damaging image and strengthen the commitment to non-violence," explained Richard Reoch (III Trin), one of the leaders of the protest.

He added he did not oppose the SAC's general aims, but merely wanted to provoke debate on what the council is doing.

That, foresees Langdon, will be his chief task this year as president.

Response to a questionnaire mailed to all students indicates about 60 per cent agree with SAC's aims, 15 to 20 per cent are very hostile (largely because they believe SAC advocates violence) and another 20 per cent have disagreements with specific SAC policies.

Langdon contends most students are not apathetic. The university system as it is, however, promotes in them an attitude of cynical non-involvement.

"It's not that they're happy that way," he says, "They play the game and try to beat the system."

The trouble is the system can easily be beaten. The real challenge is to change it.

Freshmen, says Langdon, arrive here with a "sense of excitement," expecting the university to be a "vital and creative community where they can learn broadly how to be people."

That's where Tent City comes in. It's not just a place to sleep over if you can't find accommodation. It's also a place fundamentally different from the surrounding university.

"Basically," says Langdon, "I believe people are good enough and trustworthy enough to have a role in shaping their environment."

That makes Tent City a symbol of what the university could be.

"This is the year SAC will change from a student government to a union that has to work along with the students and build up mass support."

The first stage is asking questions. Tent City belongs to that basic stage.

The answers — or lack of them — will hopefully motivate organization and action at the classroom level, which is where reform must first occur.

Above all Langdon wants students this year to break out of the "accept it or reject it," the "drop out if you don't like it" syndrome.

He believes prospects for implementation of the Macpherson Report this year are very good.

At the same time SAC will be providing counter-courses to demonstrate the possibilities for real learning once students discover how routine and boring their lecture courses are.

"There will be a major non-violent confrontation on campus this year," predicts Langdon. "But it will come not because I want it, but because that option appears best to a great number of people uptight about a given situation."

Handbook Hassle Rocks U.C.

An article in the University College freshman handbook charging SAC education commissioner Andy Wernick (SGS) with being a "Communist" has created a small furore among handbook editors.

Irv Weisdorf (IV UC), freshman coordinator, tore the article by UC graduate Paul Socken out of the 2,500 copies of the handbook and replaced it with a less controversial article.

The editors are up in arms about Weisdorf's actions. They deny his right as freshman coordinator to control the content of the handbook.

"He's destroyed the balance in the handbook," said editor Manny Gordon (II UC). "Now we have three left-wing pieces and only one right-wing piece."

Gordon had commissioned Socken to comment on articles by Wernick and Ken Stone, vice president of the Ontario Union of Students.

Both compared the university to a factory.

Weisdorf says Socken's article contained personal invective by calling Wernick a Communist and ridiculing Stone's action of tearing up his diploma during graduation ceremonies last spring.

"The more I read the article, the worse I thought it was," said Weisdorf. "It's a libelous, ad hominem argument and it's anti-intellectual. I would have done the same had the article slandered Paul Fromm." (Fromm, president of the campus Edmund Burke society, also contributed to the handbook.)

Socken's article accused Stone and Wernick of trying to "shove their opinions (oh, I'm sorry, I mean their truths) down everybody's throat anytime they please — because it's good for everybody whether everybody knows it or not."

Scott Young a sportsie at heart

Good sports fiction is a pretty rare commodity these days, and when high calibre sports literature does appear, it is generally ignored by the reviewers of "serious" prose. In an attempt to reverse this lamentable trend, The Varsity Sports Department today presents the first-ever Varsity Sports Book Review.

Scott Young, presently an editorial columnist with The Globe and Mail, is one of the most prolific writers of sports fiction. Before he escaped to the first section of the Globe, he wrote a sports column for three years, and previously spent time writing sports for the Canadian Press and the Winnipeg Free Press.

His latest contribution is a collection of short stories, all of which have appeared before in magazines. We Won't Be Needing You, Al (Ryerson Press, $4.95) includes nine stories from baseball, hockey and the outdoors. The stories uniformly show Mr. Young's familiarity with his subject.

If there is a weakness in the book, it is the utter predictability of the plots. All the good guys win and all the bad guys lose. As suggested by the book's title, some of the stories involve men who are failures, or whose days of stardom are over. But in every case, the hero gets one last chance to be the big man on the team, and he invariably makes good.

Most of the stories in We Won't Be Needing You, Al were suggested by real incidents, derived from the author's days on the sports beat. The title story, about a catcher who isn't quite good enough to make a class "D" baseball team, came from his days on The Winnipeg Free Press.

Some of the characters seem strangely familiar. In "Player Deal", an aging defenseman is traded from the team with which he has spent his whole career to a team in last place. He must decide whether to retire or to report to the new team.

Perhaps there will be a sequel about his election to Parliament and his career as a coach of an expansion team.

It is disappointing that there are no football stories included, disappointing and puzzling. Football in Canada is far more popular than baseball, and yet there are four baseball stories and none on football. And of the nine, only two are about hockey.

On the whole the book is a success, with Mr. Young's style covering up the occasional flaws in structure and plot. It will be a sad day for sports fans if he ever decides to forsake the sports field entirely.

Varsity Blues already number one

By RDD MICKLEBURGH

SIFL coaches probably rank near the bottom of the list as fanatics of today's electric music.

Still, there's one group over in England that might command quite a bit of their attention if it could only give some guarantee of living up to its name. That's John Mayall and the Bluesbreakers.

For, if there's one cry resounding among five of the six teams in the SIFL this year, it's "Break up the Blues!"

The consensus of tout le monde is that Varsity Blues' head coach, Ron Murphy, has got himself another winner. A pre-season poll already has Blues, defending champions in the SIFL, picked as the number one collegiate team in the nation. Rare is the coach who doesn't preface his remarks about the coming season with "Well, Varsity is the team to beat . . ."

Back at the home front, Murphy is completely non-plussed about the added pressures that go hand in hand with the unpopular role of favourite. Last year, if you remember, Blues were distinct underdogs all season, and Murphy used this to tremendous psychological advantage. Queen's Golden Gaels, on the other hand, considered shoo-ins (is a sock a shoe in?) by just about everybody, including the Varsity 1 blush to admit, suffered from over-confidence all year, and Blues knocked them off twice, 19-14 and 16-13.

"I like to have a little vresure on; it makes me work harder," says Murphy. "The team will have to work a little harder too, of course, and I'll have to keep the fellows up for every game. When you're the favourite, everyone takes a real shot at you."

Despite their pre-season pinnacle, Blues didn't exactly escape unscathed from the annual plague of non-returnees.

Gone from last year's offensive squad are perennial all-star pass catcher, Mike Eben, quarterback Bob Amer, ends Jim Ware and Brent Morris, huge tackle Jim Kellam, and centres Steve Brown and veteran Don Rodgers. As Murphy adds, "That's quite a big chunk of the offense gone."

Defensively, replacements are needed for linebackers Dave Church, Larry Lukas, Mike Wright (last year's defensive captain) and dependable halfback Riivo Iives.

As always though, Murphy's done a good job of recruiting, and the only real hole still left to fill is an offensive tackle spot. Some of Murphy's prize catches are halfback Eric Walter, former McGill all-star, quarterback John Ritchie from Princeton, rookie end Stewart McSween from Jarvis Collegiate, ex-McMaster centre Rich Agro and guard Derek Turner.

Blues' genial mentor was more than pleased with his training camp this year. "We had a good training camp all right. There are a lot of little hurts but nothing serious. Only Roman Bukata (a new end) is on the limp; he's got a gimpy knee."

Right now, Blues are preparing for Saturday's exhibition game in London against Western Mustangs. Mustang coach, John Metras, has issued his annual warning to the rest of the league: "We're going to pass more this year," quoth Metras. Ho hum.

Thin pocketbook? Cheap near-campus restaurants, where you can buy a meal for $2 or less: Maison Suisse, L'Europe (Hungarian) the Candlelight (Indian) all on Bloor west of Spadina.

"I like a little pressure on; it makes me work a little harder. The team will have to work a little harder too . . ."

Rugger regulars rough and ready

The 1968 season looks like another big one for the Rugger Blues. Only five of last year's championship squad have moved on, leaving good strength in all positions except the front row forward.

Among the returning veterans are hard running backs Doug Phibbs and Peter Sutherland with outstanding scrum half George Wraw playing inside them on the three quarter line.

Blues also have considerable strength in the scrum this year. Returning from last year's fifteen are Peter Hand, David Ledson, Andrew Bethel, Maris Apse and Paul Henry. Newcomers John Rook from Queens and Graeme Wynn, a graduate student from the University of Sheffield are expected to add considerable experience to the team at their positions.

Rugby is a fastmoving exciting game to watch and one which is growing very rapidly in North America. The University of Toronto team, undefeated in last year's season, has had several successful trips through the United States and visited the British Isles in 1965.

The Blues' first game this year is against the University of Michigan on the back campus at 2:00 p.m. this Saturday. In last year's contest at Ann Arbor, Blues edged Michigan 9-3 in a tough game.

At 12:30 the B team takes on Trent University, coached by ex-Blue great Paul Wilson.

A NEW LOOK . . .

. . . A NEW BUILDING

By Phil Bingley

A long time ago, forty-two years to be exact, University of Toronto officials tapped their private reserves as well as a few government treasure chests and came up with enough credit to build what was and is now Varsity Arena.

At that time, 1926, there were only 2,200 students enrolled at Toronto and the existing sports' buildings — Varsity Stadium, Hart House and the arena — were considered modern, sufficient, and even ahead of their time.

To-day, there are over 12,000 male students attending this institution of higher programming, yet little has been done to improve or expand these same athletic facilities. Meanwhile, academic buildings have sprung up all over our supposedly fenced-in campus.

Despite this lack of growth of recreational opportunities, things are finally looking brighter for the near future. Varsity Stadium, as a result of new sod, fresh paint and tender loving care, is still one of the finest football outlays in the country. With a seating capacity of over 27,000 persons, there is not a single pew in the house which does not allow its occupant a clear, unobstructed view of the field. (This of course depends upon said occupant's state of sobriety and optical capabilities).

STEADY TED

Under the very able direction of manager Ted Steadman, the Varsity arena freezing system recently underwent a summer reconstruction scheme (at a cost of $80,000) which should result in near perfect ice conditions. The old pipe system has been replaced, insulated and covered with a nifty trap-rock floor (For interested Skule personalities, new headers have also been installed).

Following last year's confrontation between the end edge of the metal screening and the brow of Terry Cooke (a Waterloo Warriors hockey player), Steadman approached the higher ups of the bureaucracy with a request for safety glass shields. Today the ice cushion is completely surrounded by plexiglass screens which are in turn supported by inside posts. These changes along with fresh paint, new washrooms and several other minor improvements have transformed the Bloor St. rink into what we sportsies refer to as an "ice palace".

WHAT! A NEW HART HOUSE

Probably the most over-discussed and under developed project in the history of the university has been the building of a men's athletic complex, that is, a new one. The sites and possibilities have been kicked around more than a used Volkswagen, but something concrete is at last appearing on the horizon.

One person who is very interested and involved in the new setup is assistant athletic director J. E. McCutcheon. A member of two committees which were specially created to study specific plans, McCutcheon was able to provide a few new facts.

"The new complex will be located on a site just west of the Benson Building on Harbord Street." Most people were under the impression that the area now occupied by Wycliffe College, to the north of Hart House, would be the final site.

How far past the talking stage have the current plans proceeded? "A feasibility study," Mr. McCutcheon continued, "is being conducted to determine what facilities will be required and where they will fit into the overall structure. The results of this study will then be turned over to Dr. R. R. McLaughlin and the University Planning Division. Following this, the purpose of the university will be to rush the scheme through the various stages — The Board of Governors and student and financial approval — as rapidly as possible."

Mr. McCutcheon also has a satisfactory answer to the biggest question of all— when? "In my opinion, everything should be ready for operation within two to three years. This, of course, takes into consideration only mechanical and administrative problems, and not red tape."

Thought for the day: If red tape is combustible, let it burn, let it burn, let it burn.

No vote for administration on presidents council

The Students Administrative Council will sit on President Bissell's committee on the structure of university government — but only on its own terms.

By

The Varsity SAC Bureau

At Wednesday's meeting SAC adopted a proposal that the presidential committee on the structure of the University of Toronto should consist of four students and four faculty members, with non-voting memberships for President Claude Bissell and two administrative appointees.

The committee was authorized by the Board of Governors last August. As originally proposed, it would have been composed of two Board members, two faculty, two students and two administrative officers. All would have been voting members.

About 100 students jammed the overheated library at Loretto College to hear SAC members discuss student participation in what Dr. Bissell has called "one of the most important committees in the history of the University."

In a statement yesterday, Dr. Bissell said any change in the structure of the committee would have to be approved by the Board of Governors.

"Any counter proposal must go through the same process: it will be considered by the President's Council and I will take the President Council's recommendations to the Board," he said.

While a Trinity-Victoria College waterfight raged outside, Bob Rae (IV UC) introduced the motion. He said it was "an evolution of democracy."

"The students and faculty must have the right to decide on the future of the university or else our hopes for democracy are nothing at all," he said.

"This is idiocy," responded F. Paul Fromm (III SMC). "I find it rather uppity and juvenile to suggest there are only two sides involved, the students and the faculty."

To exclude the representatives of the Board of Governors was to exclude the taxpayers' representative, he said.

History professor Kenneth McNaught, secretary of the Association of Teaching Staff but speaking in an unofficial capacity, said he believed the faculty would support SAC.

But he cautioned against "smashing the committee before it gets started" by refusing any participation.

SAC later approved a motion urging the ATS to consider the SAC proposal at a general meeting today.

The original motion called for three students and three faculty members, but this was later amended to four each. The motion passed with only two dissenting votes.

CUS blames media for false image

The Canadian Union of Students yesterday blasted the nation's news media for creating a false image of the student movement as a "conspiratorial elite, dedicated to chaos and violence."

In a statement issued from its national office in Ottawa, CUS condemned the image as "patently false," and blamed the press and TV for "de-liberate, cynical propaganda."

The stand comes in the wake of extensive press, radio and TV publicity following CUS President Peter Warrarian's controversial and often-mis-represented statement at August's CUS congress in Guelph.

In Toronto last week, Warrarian gave the full text of the often-misquoted passage:

"Some people say this is the year to sock it to the administration and sock it to their buildings, but we must also take it to the students, knowing that democratization and liberation are achieved not by manipulations of a few but by the struggle of all."

The news media took Warrarian's statement to mean this is the year students will burn university buildings.

The CUS statement said the student movement "has its roots deep in the struggle for peace."

The statement warns that radical tactics are not to be confused with violence. "The movement still depends on pacifist (sit-in) and union (strike) techniques."

"Violence in the student movement has been initiated by the state and the police," the statement charged. "Brutal repression of student protest by the police or army has been matched only by the skill with which the media has blamed the violence on the students themselves," says the document.

In the coming year, the statement predicts, "We may see students demanding changes in their university and using their power to see them occur. But we need see no violence, unless administrators decide to use police against student action and student demands."

Liberal envoy flies to tent city

The Trudeau government is sending an expert on housing to visit Tent City today.

Barney Danson (Liberal — York North), a member of the Hellyer task force on housing, will speak and answer questions at 3 p.m. this afternoon at Tent City.

The Students Administrative Council Wednesday night sent a copy of its white paper on housing — Housing the Community — to the Hellyer task force, inviting the minister to reply in person.

Mr. Danson will represent the transport minister.

"I think there needs to be improvement in housing," said Mr. Danson in an interview from Ottawa last night. "More money should be provided for low-income housing," he added.

"But I'm afraid of rent controls. They are unnecessary and not the answer."

"I don't really know what the problem is in student housing," he said. "That's what I want to find out tomorrow."

Mr. Danson was elected to Parliament in the June 25 federal election.

U of T stifles its students: Langdon

Our university is boring — that's the problem!

That's how Steve Langdon, president of the Students Administrative Council, kicked off a three-hour mass meeting at Tent City on Wednesday before about 400 students.

"The real failure of the university is that students have not been turned on" said Langdon.

"Education has become a mere transferal of knowledge. Creativity and imagination are stifled in a morass of programmed learning."

Langdon strongly criticized the housing shortage on campus and the restrictive rules and regulations of existing residences.

But primarily, he discussed the quality of university education and how it could be improved. He wanted more responsibility given to students in the determination of their education.

"We must have enough trust in students to decide their own educational destiny," he explained.

The meeting was interrupted for half an hour by the engineers' Lady Godiva Memorial Band. Led by band-leader Mel Solomon (III APSC), the engineers heckled and shouted questions at Langdon.

"Today the engineers heckled, but they listened. We disagree on condemning the administration," explained Jim Ford (I APSC).

"We realize we can't have all the say on books, professors, course content, and so on.

"We make a plea to the rest of the campus to recognize that students can have only so much power. Yes, we have a social conscience. But let us not overstep our bounds and destroy our position."

Comic relief was provided by the LGMB's "SAC critic", George Zukovs (II APSC).

In an impassioned but facetious harangue, he analysed SAC's merits, concluding with timely words of advice.

"Thrust forward, SAC!" he cried. "Hard on! Hard on!"

Langdon said he hoped SAC could hold these kinds of "freewheeling discussions" more frequently, and university Vice President and Registrar Robin Ross, who also spoke, termed the open forum "an important event."

"This kind of self-criticism is the only way an institution stays alive," explained Mr. Ross.

"It is not really significant that we are having this meeting today," said Paul Fromm (III SMC), "for the SAC is hearing but not listening."

"SAC has been brazenly political against, I am sure, the opinions of the students of this university".

Fromm wants to hire a public-opinion testing firm for the campus so that SAC would be in constant communication with the student body.

Steve Langdon addresses mass SAC meeting at Tent City.

With Martin Luther doing his thing in the Reformation years ago, University Lutheran Chapel can applaud campus efforts to do away with the mickey mouse courses, techniques, and outlook. Such reform takes power, political power all said and done. But such power must be used precisely to ensure and enhance the learning experience, and not just for power's sake. Certainly not for the sake of violence and destruction.

We recognize that democracy implies leadership and structure, plus the prerogatives of leadership. As practical idealists we have learned the hard way that all corporate groups demand structure and leadership. Even the apostolic community, despite her purit; of faith, needed strong leaders and structure. Certainly the student leaders have discovered this. Students, faculty, and administration must beware of the person(s) who seek power just for the sake of power. Niebuhr put it succinctly a bit ago "Power corrupts, absolute power corrupts absolutely." Beware of the neurotic and psychotic anywhere whose self-loathing must be projected upon the community, who must destroy Campus power should seek the true growth of the spirit through dialog with persons in truth, meditation, and social action.

University Lutheran Chapel will share power, although it might be more than anyone bargained for. We will share full involvement, instant voice. We don't claim to have all the answers. In fact we might raise questions more disturbing than the most idealistic power devotee. But we have a confidence knowing that our faith is rooted in 4000 years of empirical, existential, and behaviorist action and faith-reflection. We unashamedly share the good news of Christ as it is known to us through our heritage of Luther's barrel-chested scholarship, earth-loving involvement, and catholic outlook.

WINTER CLAIMS

Grads favor withdrawal 4-1.

Graduate students are voting by a four to one margin in favour of withdrawal from the Students Administrative Council, says John Winter, president of the Graduate Students Union.

Winter made the announcement at a Tent City debate yesterday afternoon.

But last night he refused to reveal any precise figures.

"I wanted to know how the vote was going," he explained. "I directed someone to count it up.

"The record I had I threw away," he added.

He said final results would not be available until voting ends at the end of the graduates' registration period and all ballots are counted.

Winter has been conducting a campaign to receive a mandate to take the 5,000 graduate students out of SAC. To do this he must receive 2,500 yes votes.

"SAC needs us more than we need SAC," said Winter at the Tent City debate.

Winter maintained graduate student needs were different from those of undergraduates.

"Undergraduates are here for enjoyment, while graduates are here for..."

"For sherry parties," countered Wayne Hankey (SGS), as the 50 onlookers laughed and clapped their approval.

Winter charged the best reason for withdrawal was that "graduates want out of SAC.

"They have not been asked, but forced to join SAC."

It was then that Winter said results showed graduate students were voting "four to one in favour of withdrawal."

SAC President Steve Langdon said he could see no "logical reason" to withdraw.

"It is possible to involve as many students as wish to be involved in SAC," he said.

He added that if it seemed funds were allocated primarily to undergraduate needs it was because graduates were not as active in their demands.

Langdon advocated "strong local societies" to work hand in hand with a campus-wide union for general improvement.

GSU Vice-President Michael Vaughan said graduate student interests were neither "reflected nor realized through SAC to any great extent."

He recommended separation from SAC and direct negotiations with the administration instead.

Fees protest generates little action

A campaign urging students to withhold their $12 Students Administrative Council fees has met with limited response.

"I have no idea what will be done with them," said Mr. Anderson. He said any decision was up to the board of governors.

About 10,000 leaflets were distributed on campus during registration week accusing SAC and the Canadian Union of Students of "incitements to mob rule and violent insurrection."

The purpose of the campaign, the leaflet read, was to "demonstrate that the student body refuses to be railroaded into support of irresponsible agitation."

It urged students to request the $12 portion of their fees be withheld by the university.

In a survey conducted by The Varsity all students interviewed were definitely opposed to violence.

Most said they thought they should be allowed to withhold fees if they wanted to, but support for the leaflet itself was scant.

"The leaflet was hasty and superficial in its analysis," said J. Hibowych (IV SMC).

"Too many people tend to take a single statement and define it in terms of a whole radical movement."

But opinion was divided on the part SAC itself was playing on campus.

Some felt the council was getting "power hungry" and "not tying in" with the entire university.

"I think the leaflet is a splendid idea," said J. Coombs (II Meds), "It might help us get rid of the shit-disturbers and let SAC start on something constructive like Rochdale College."

He thought projects like Tent City were a waste of time.

"Students should have more say in the university," observed another student, "but the radicals seem to want all or nothing."

"They have lost control of what they're doing and become just like the workers, who are striking for the sake of striking."

Richard Reoch (III Trin), one of the organizers of the fees protest, said last night he thought the campaign had been successful.

"It provoked a great deal of discussion which wouldn't have occurred without it," he said.

Fewer exams to be held

Students in 275 courses in the faculty of arts and sciences will not be writing final exams this year.

"If a department feels it can do without final examinations, it can apply to the faculty committee on examinations, which then weighs the request," said A. C. H. Hallett, associate dean of the faculty of arts and science.

In cases where final exams have been abolished, the final mark will be made up of a combination of the results of mid-term exams, essays and seminar work.

"These are confined largely to subjects in third and fourth year honor courses," said Assistant Dean W. D. F. Foulds, secretary of the examination committee.

"For the first year, students will be sitting on the committee," he said. The students will have full voting privileges.

The two student representatives are David MacKidd (III New) and Joseph Blonde (III SMC).

When the committee meets for the first time this term, there will likely be other exams dispensed with.

Review of the Press

BY ROD MICKLEBURGH

One of the most widely-held views on campus these days is a feeling that the Varsity has lost all relevance as a campus newspaper because of its subjectivity. A newspaper should be completely objective, the argument goes, and not try to ram anything down anyone's throats as the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Only the facts should be reported with interpretation left to the reader.

Many of the people holding this view, it seems, are specifically upset at the Varsity's handling of President Bissell's freshmen address last Monday.

Admittedly, the tone of Wednesday's Varsity was heavily anti-Bissell. The front page news story ran under an unfavourable headline, "Bissell Says No To Democratic University". And pages four and five were devoted almost entirely to opinions critical of Dr. Bissell's address.

Drama critic Larry Haiven's clever review of the event as theatre of the absurd contained paragraphs like the following: "Claude Bissell was superb. He took a speech that was utterly devoid of intellectual substance and totally lacking in challenge. By sheer force of personality, he transformed it into an eloquent oration that was utterly devoid of intellectual substance and totally lacking in challenge."

Well all right. Where's a guy who wasn't there supposed to get some "objective" information? Of course. He turns to the daily newspapers where sober, hard-boiled reporters are sent out in pursuit of "the facts, ma'am, nothin' but the facts". These papers are put out and run by professionals; they don't stoop to innuendo and inaccuracies like those punk, college kids with so many bones to pick.

If you were fortunate enough to read the Globe and Mail or Telegram, you got what you were looking for: a straightforward report of events before, during and after President Bissell's address. If, on the other hand, you chose the Toronto Daily Star as your reading matter, supposedly the most liberal daily in Canada, you read one of the most distorted articles I have ever seen in an 'establishment' newspaper (there have been lots worse, naturally, but not of events where I was present; therefore, it was only hearsay that prompted one to feel an article was distorted.)

The story ran under a banner red headline on the front page which said, "1800 cheer as Bissell says; 'College not a love-in'". What Dr. Bissell actually said was: "a university is not . . . an institutional love-in." But of course that doesn't make a sensational headline.

The first paragraph of the story read: "University of Toronto freshmen — 1800 of them — broke into prolonged cheers yesterday as university president Claude Bissell declared that students must pursue knowledge and scholarship, not political power." The impression given is an outburst of applause which interrupted Dr. Bissell, as he made that specific point. This did not happen. The audience applauded as the president began his speech and applauded at its conclusion — as they have for the past hundreds of years. At no time were there "prolonged cheers."

The article goes on to say the, in another subtle put-down of student radicals, that, following the address "fewer than 100 students turned out to a meeting where student radicals — who demand control over university courses — attacked Bissell's speech." This is also inaccurate. The Tely mentioned 400 students, the Globe and Varsity said 200, with the latter figure probably nearest the truth. At any rate, there were certainly more than "fewer than 100".

The article's description of Philip Resnick's 'guerilla theatre' incident, which momentarily interrupted the speech, read: "When student power demonstrators tried to mimic Bissell during his speech, they were laughed down and retired in confusion." Again, this did not happen. The three students retired in dignified order, as they had planned, and were not "laughed down". There was even some applause for their action (this is mentioned in the Varsity). Laughter did occur after they had left the stage, however, when Bissell's next sentence emerged as a pointed reference to what had just occurred.

A further minor inaccuracy contained in a later reference to the incident was the mention of "two girls" accompanying Resnick. In fact, there was a boy and a girl (the male didn't even have long hair.)

Finally, in another paragraph written to sustain the impression that students applauded specific points of Dr. Bissell's address, the reporter quotes Bissell as saying; "From the ferment today will come a finer sense of community. There can be no community in a university unless it is based on community of ideas." Then, he says, "The audience reacted with sustained applause." What the reporter didn't say was that this was the conclusion of his address. It would have been most unusual and rude if the audience hadn't reacted with applause.

Is it only a coincidence that the Star's editorial policy recently has come out so strongly pro-Bissell and anti-student paper?

The Days of May—

By PHILIP RESNICK

Now that the CUS Congress is over, and radicals on universities across the country are donning helmets for the days of October that lie ahead, it is well to go back to that high point of this revolutionary year, the Days of May. To return not for purpose of reminiscence, but the better to prepare ourselves. To analyse, because any program of liberation we set for the colonial universities of Canada and the larger Canadian colony must in part at least follow in its steps.

"Take your desires to be reality" read one of the inscriptions on the walls of the liberated Sorbonne, summoning the peons of the university system to that mass outpouring of creative imagination that brought Gaullist France to its knees. "The duty of the student is to make the revolution" read one of the proposed resolutions at the CUS Congress, calling in its own way for the liberation of desire from repression, of the student from the process of alienation called education.

That the events of May caught the whole of French society by surprise, that the student revolt developed with a spontaneity and fervour that swept even the most timid along in its wake, is something that radicals must ponder. For the French student body as a whole was no more rebellious in January of last year than its Canadian counterpart in recent months. It is a parallel which the Canadian university establishment and its friends in the corporate press have not forgotten, in their efforts to head off the revolt of the damned.

It was only through revolt that the French student became conscious, for the first time, of the walls within which he had been confined. Between the university and the asylum, between the intellectual tyranny of the academic cop and the physical tyranny of the armed cop, the thread of repression ran unbroken. Bourgeois society moulded its new working class, more subtly but no less inexorably, than it had moulded and crushed the first proletariat. Nanterre, the French Simon Fraser, was truly a graveyard for the young.

At its height, the French student revolt with its open forums and numerous struggle sessions, its imaginative posters and graffiti, its festivals in the street and living theatre in the corridors, represented nothing short of liberty unchained. Gone the mind-fuck of the formal lecture, the grimace of master lording it over slave, the crumbs of culture that substituted for a vision of the whole. "Professors, you make us grow old" they shouted. "We have made a revolution greater than ourselves."

The movement broadened, embracing first young workers, then the whole mass of the French working class. For a moment, all institutions were in question, from the centralized state and the paternalistic factory to the distributive mechanisms of a consumption society. The moment passed, order reentered, the promised land yielded its place to Reality.

But during those weeks, the elites of all advanced industrial societies were in terror. There was no pretending the French revolt was merely one of backwardness, of a society still trying to achieve the chrome-plated opulence of America. The most sophisticated branches of the French economy were seized, the future technicians and administrators were rejecting their role. Manipulation had failed to banish the snake from the Garden of Paradise. Revolt was still possible in liberal "classless" society.

Since May, the watchword of the new Metternichs has been reform. From de Gaulle's sudden fancy for participation to Bill Davis's recent fancy for student representation on Boards of Governors, the process of repression through co-option has gotten underway. The Trudeau's offer papier-mâché models of a just society, and the Bissell's wheel out new versions of Arcadia, a liberal community of scholars.

The fear of student revolts that has suddenly overtaken the university establishment of Canada borders on panic. For they have recognized the profound lesson of the Days of May, that revolt creates consciousness, and becomes thereby subversive of all existing social structures. "The revolution is intelligence" read still another slogan on the Sorbonne walls. It is this intelligence that the Canadian establishment has good reason to fear.

The vision of a Toronto commune, in which students and sympathetic faculty might give full rein to their imaginations, evokes fear of the last judgement. If one took one's desires for reality, would one not see Canadian society, much as French students saw theirs, as a carnivorous flower? Might one not question the ties between universities and the corporate elite, the tyranny of diplomas, the roles bourgeois society moulds us to assume? Might one not postulate freedom and self-realization as incompatible with the educational system as it now is, as incompatible, in fact, with a social order whose final measuring rod remains the marketplace? The danger to Canadian society, i.e. to the corporate elite that directs it, would be extreme. Intelligence when pushed to its logical conclusions, i.e. when liberated, can become subversive both of the liberal university and of liberal capitalist society itself.

"Every view of things that is not strange is false" declared a participant in the Days of May. "Every view of the university that seeks to legitimize it is false", might be the slogan of a Toronto commune. For it is the mark of the university in advanced industrial society that it has become reified, that it divorces its members from their true intelligence, even as the capitalist society that Marx described alienated the worker from his product. The skills taught in the university are by and large techniques of social engineering; the manipulation of minds that takes place within it is a microcosm of the manipulation going on in the society at large.

It is only natural that under certain conditions, the process leads to rebellion. The presence of an exposed new university in Nanterre, plunk in the middle of the worst slums in France, a concentration of particularly talented students in sociology, capable of applying critical concepts to society, an archaic university structure, were among the preconditions of the student revolt in France. A tradition of student syndicalism also played its part, defining the student's role in society as that of a committed young intellectual worker. Still the Days of May were the result of chance, even if in retrospect they appear to have been inevitable.

In Canada, and at U of T in particular, there is nothing inevitable about student revolt, indeed there is much militating against it. There exists no ideology akin to student syndicalism, though before and since the recent CUS Congress, the concept of common student-worker interests has gained ground. Liberalism preserves its legitimacy for much of the university population, and the view of the university as a stomping ground for the corporate elite is far from majoritarian. The deference which characterizes power relationships in Canada as a whole, is reproduced here.

On the other hand discontent with the structures of education is spreading through the universities and high schools. The reformers are trying to keep up, but the generational turn-over is even faster. Within the universities one is beginning to find an expertise among activists which was lacking two or three years ago. Simon Fraser was a good example of this, and something similar may be taking place elsewhere. The issue of American imperialism, and Canada's junior partnership to the United States, is beginning to exercise a larger number of Canadian radicals, and provides a basis for a critique of the branch plant university.

Finally, for a growing number of Canadian students, much like for their French counterparts, the statement of Paul Nizan is beginning to ring true: "I was once twenty years old. Don't let any one tell you this is the golden age of your life." The contradictions are too great between the would-be and the is, between the liberal university and the possibility of a liberated intellect. The Days of May may cease to be simply a dream, to become a reality. "Let us not change masters, let us become masters over our own lives."

And they said it couldn't happen here . . .

By

MICHAEL IGNATIEFF

At 8:45 a.m. on October 27, 1968, Robin Ross, Registrar of the University, walked into the marble solemnity of Simcoe Hall to find 50 students sitting on the stairs leading to the President's Office, standing under the portraits of Presidents and Chancellors and squatting on the Commissionaire's inquiry desk in the front hall. They drowned out his efforts to speak to them with a chant taken from a Rolling Stones' song: "Surprise! Surprise! You never thought it git so bad . . ."

Mr. Ross had been taken by surprise. There had been no controversy to trigger what he saw before his eyes. Despite the 'confrontation' talk at SAC, it had been a curiously peaceful autumn. Of course the newspapers were still full of interviews with Warrian, Loney, Wernick and the other radicals, but Mr. Ross had discounted the talk of revolution as wishful thinking on the part of city editors, and students.

What was even more surprising was that Langdon, Schachar and Wernick weren't among the demonstrators, though they arrived at about 9:30 a.m. just before Mr. Ross was able to get Lawson and the University Police to close the Simcoe Hall doors. Obviously SAC wasn't leading this 'incident'. Mr. Ross was to learn later that a small group of veterans of the Dow chemical demonstration in 1967 had planned and mobilized the demonstration in secret. SAC had been left behind.

By the time the President, Mr. Bissell, arrived there were 100 students inside the building chanting

"We aint gonna be Charlie no more". Mr. Bissell decided not to try to enter the building or ask the Metro police riot squad to dislodge the demonstrators. He refused, however, to speak to the leaders of the demonstration Joe Young, and Chandler Davis. Mr. Bissell and Mr. Ross then walked to the spare, functional office of Dean Allen in the Sydney Smith Building to decide how to deal with the situation.

President Bissell was as surprised as Mr. Ross. The President was a moderate, intelligent and sensitive administrator who took justifiable pride in his knowledge and understanding of the currents of discontent on Canadian campuses. His speech to the freshman in September, 1968, had been firm but conciliatory. Though many radicals had regarded it as a classic example of what Marcuse called "repressive tolerance".

The President, like the Registrar, expected that if trouble came it would be led by the radicals who got their name in the press and that it would come after increasing controversy or after the radicals had seized upon some small incident or accident as a pretext. The President was sure his articulate reformism had averted a Sorbonne or a Columbia on his campus.

He was to learn that the silent radicals had decided to challenge the administration without using any pretext or controversy as a warning. The Radicals decided that the President's gradualism was the real danger at the university: that it would prevent effective politicization of the student mass, that it would anaesthetize the student community and render impossible the conversion of the university from a liberal haven of dissent into a dynamic, democratic model for society. The radicals knew that the only way to politicize the student mass was to create an incident themselves and force the administration into repressive tactics which would strip the mask of smiling liberal gradualism worn by the university administration.

By mid-day hundreds of students were milling around Simcoe Hall. Some were silent and pensive, apparently deciding what they should think of the 'incident'. Others, engineers and science students, shouted and beat on the doors of the building screaming support for the President and the Registrar.

Graham Fraser of the Star, Sue Swann of the Tely, John Kelsey and Warren Gerrard of the Globe as well as Moses Znaimer of the CBC circulated through the crowd collecting reactions. Personally, they were almost glad the 'incident' had happened. They had been writing for months that the campus was due for an explosion, and had become increasingly uneasy as the autumnal calm of President Bissell's return spread across the campus. Now they had a hindsight raison d'être for all that revolutionary copy after the Guelph meeting of CUS.

The reporters discovered a major truth of the incident as they gathered reactions from the crowd watching and shouting outside the building. The real division revealed by the reaction to the incident was not between student and administrator but between student and student. And this division was far more bitter than the one that had occurred after the Dow demonstration in 1967.

The demonstrators spent the night in the building, the hot lights of TV splashing across them through the windows of the building. Next morning the President announced with obvious unhappiness and regret that he was about to ask the Metro riot squad to clear the building . . .

After the incident, the recommendations of the President's Commission on University Government called for more extensive administrative re-structuring of the university than had been expected. Some radicals claimed this as a result of the 'incident'. Other radicals claimed that thousands of students had been 'politicized' because they had been forced to take a personal position as a result of the Simcoe Hall battle. There was some truth in this. Many liberal students were horrified at the way the Metro police dragged and clubbed the demonstrators as they cleared the building. Many of these students vowed to be part of the demonstrations which at this writing are planned for the fall of 1969.

Other liberal students and faculty, however, were frightened by the divisions the incident had caused on campus. They said the campus was bitter, unhappy, tense. Like an American city. But the radicals claimed this as a victory too. We have shaken the liberals from their slothful ease they said. As for myself I cannot judge.

Southern Comfort

By BOB RAE

The New Romans A.W. Purdy (ed), M.G.

Hurtig, $2.95

"Canada could have enjoyed:
English government,
French culture, and American know-how.

Instead it ended up with:
English know-how,
French government, and American culture."

This is John Robert Colombo's contribution to this odd collection of tirades, apologies, confessions, and exhortatory perorations. The subject is the United States, the American way of life, and what they have done to Canada and Canadians. We discover in the process a great deal about the contributors.

The opinions of this multi-coloured group of intellectuals, critics, and poets range from the conventional irrelevancies of a Peter Newman or an Arnold Edinborough to the gut reactions of Farley Mowat and Dennis Lee. All are intensely personal: nearly all the writers discuss the beginnings of their disillusionment with the American dream (George Grant's began with the beginnings, Robert Fulford's with Lyndon Baines Johnson), and how some of their best friends are Americans but things ain't wot they used to be south of the border.

Unfortunately, none of the pieces are long enough or really substantial enough to make this collection particularly profound. If there is a common mood, it is emotion; the work essentially is an anthology of harangues. If ye seek a scholarly interpretation of American corporate liberalism, keep seeking.

Margaret Laurence's "Open Letter to the Mother of Joe Bass" tells more about the tragedy of violence in the United States than any longer work could possibly do. Robin Mathews' "Centennial Song" must surely replace Frank Scott's too-oft quoted poem on Mackenzie King as the outstanding satire on the Country of Compromise. Indeed the poetic contributions - by Dennis Lee, Bill Bissett, Earle Birney, et al. - perhaps represent the outstanding feature of the book.

The other common theme is Vietnam. That war (and internal events of the past years connected with it) has done more to give Canadians a sense of both their separateness and their complicity; we feel superior (or at least different), but at the same time know that we are a part of the machine.

The plaintive cries from Edinborough and others that "some of my best friends are Americans so therefore it must still be a civilized place" just don't make sense. It is no longer a question of whether individual Americans are amicable and charming (they most clearly are), but what sort of society has grown up in the United States. It is not the men who drive the machine but the machine itself we must examine.

That is not to say that Canada is lily-white, or that one is personally anti-American, or to deny the genuine worth of Eugene McCarthy, the New York Times, and Mark Twain. It is simply to say that Canada is different, that we should be more determined to go our own way, and that if we are to be "inextricably linked" with America, let it be with those elements in the U. S. that - as George Grant Says - "have seen with clarity the nature of that which chokes them and seek for ways to live beyond it."

The American dream has been shattered; for a nation that has been kept going on myths for two centuries it is a traumatic experience. America has given Canada some good things - as William Kilbourn writes "it was not Governor Simcoe or Doctor Strachan who taught me freedom from the paralysis of the European class system" - but surely we should not have to apologize for wanting to cut loose from an official America that has produced Richard Nixon, Hubert Humphrey, and George Wallace as its political spokesmen.

This is by no means a great book, but it is a lively book, and an important one. The question of America is without doubt the outstanding dilemma facing Canadians. Its presence, its influence, its size, its expansionism, all affect us more permanently than they do any other country in the world. Canadian fear of America is not new; but perhaps we are only just beginning to understand and interpret the colossus of the twentieth century.

I

It could have been an interesting election - it certainly started out that way. There was considerable dissension in the Democratic Party, mostly over President Lyndon Johnson's handling of the Viet Nam war, but the shrewdest, most experienced political observers would not have predicted that the president was to be challenged by a senator within his own party.

Thus, when Eugene McCarthy officially announced his candidacy for the Democratic nomination of president in November of 1967, very few Democratic regulars were anxious to join his ranks. (Among established political power groups pledging support, the California Democratic Council, the New York Reform Democrats, and the ADA were the most notable). And until the New Hampshire primary in February, 1968, most of the noise of McCarthy's campaign was being made by college students under the voting age.

The results of the New Hampshire primary surprised everybody. New Hampshire turned McCarthy's pin-prick threat into a festering wound in the side of the Democratic Party.

Although he ultimately lost his bid for the Democratic nomination, McCarthy nevertheless became the biggest single influence on the campaign and the campaigners: Richard Nixon found it politically expedient to infuse the word "peace" every now and then into his otherwise empty rhetoric; Hubert Humphrey began to make equivocal statements about how Hubert Humphrey would be his own man if elected president; President Johnson himself decided it would be less embarrassing not to run; and some of Johnson's earlier hawk supporters quickly sheared their talons and searched about for olive branches, thereby enabling the American public to witness some of the most marvelously hypocritical displays of ideological quick-change artistry ever seen on the American political stage.

The choice of Republican and Democratic candidates who, from day to day, were jumping in and out of contention, was a very sad choice indeed. Lyndon Johnson, Hubert Humphrey, Robert Kennedy, George McGovern, Eugene McCarthy, Nelson Rockefeller, Richard Nixon, George Romney, Ronald Reagan, Lester Maddox and, of course, Harold Stassen, all, at one time or another during the past year, threatened to be president.

Some might have proved worse than others but on the whole, all have one thing in common: all of them are inextricably woven into the fabric of the present American political establishment - hence, their inability to appeal to the ever-increasing radical left wing of the American public. (Although George Wallace is a renegade from the political establishment, he and the radical left are something of a square peg and a round hole.)

II

But there are those in the GOP who, in the interest of broadening their popular support, refer to a "Left Wing" of the Republican Party. God only knows who it could be. Perhaps it is that flaming radical, Mark Hatfield from Oregon (who supported Nixon even before the latter was nominated); or John Lindsay (who, before he became mayor of New York City, had been a congressman from the 17th district on New York's East Side, the fashionable "silk-stocking" district); or Nelson Rockefeller (Ha).

But Rockefeller is worth our attention. Since he was elected governor of New York State in 1958, he has been considered a bulwark of Republican liberalism, and has made three unsuccessful bids for the Republican nomination for president. Even some of Rockefeller's most ardent supporters (not the least of whom was that Republican notable, Spiro Agnew) grew tired of his prima donna tactics of "I will - I won't" run for the nomination in 1968.

But what is most intriguing about this Republican "left-winger" was that by the end of his campaign, he had succeeded in attracting large numbers of dissatisfied voters to the extent that by the time of the convention, two major pollsters concurred that Rockefeller was more popular than his opponent, Richard Nixon. His success, though it was too late to sway the convention, is interesting because it was not based on the usual Rockefeller style, but rather on a Kennedy style of campaigning that Rockefeller assumed after Robert Kennedy's assassination.

Rockefeller began wading into crowds, smiling and shaking hands; he began to take a stronger dove position on Viet Nam; and most significant, he began to style himself as the friend of the poor, particularly the black, urban poor. All of this is highly ironic considering, first of all, what his name stands for in American society, and secondly, his record as governor of New York and his earlier Viet Nam statements. Two years ago, Rockefeller was more hawk than Johnson, believing that American intervention was necessary wherever "freedom is endangered". There was never a defense budget satisfactorily high enough for Rockefeller. Furthermore, under Nelson Rockefeller, New York State enacted the stop-and-frisk law, the shoot-to-kill law, and a law justifying civil commitment of narcotics addicts. With these laws, Nelson Rockefeller no doubt thought he would endear himself to the black, urban poor.

Instead we have that grand champion of truth, justice, and the American way, Richard M. Nixon. But if there is nothing else to say of Dick Nixon (a distinct possibility), it cannot be denied that he is one of the most resilient, one of the most durable politicians in American history.

Considering, he is still around in spite of not winning an election in eighteen years, his association with Whittaker Chambers against Alger Hiss in 1948, the censorship he received for using smear tactics against Helen Gahagan Douglas in his campaign for the senate in 1950, the Nixon Fund scandal in 1952, his loss to Kennedy in 1960, and his loss to Pat Brown for the governorship of California in 1962. How very obliging of him, then, to re-enter the political scene.

Furthermore, he has a loser's image, he has never appeared well on television, and he has a reputation for being untrustworthy ("Tricky Dick"). One would think that Nixon's success in receiving the Republican Party nomination was a miracle.

It wasn't. He did it by gradually accumulating enough political debts within his party over the past six years and by selling his soul to South Carolina racist Strom Thurmond and his mob of Southern convention delegates: he promised not to choose a vice president that would displease the South. Hence, that well-known statesman, Spiro Agnew. (Agnew gained "prominence" by being a member of a Maryland zoning board, his local Kiwanis club, and as president of a junior high school PTA.)

the bombing halt. And, although it is one of the unwritten laws of American presidential politics that a president in power may, if he chooses, run for a second term with the full support of his party, this did not stop McCarthy from challenging Johnson. It did stop Kennedy until after the New Hampshire primary, when he suddenly realized he was about to be left behind. Again, as with the peace issue, it seemed as though Kennedy was waiting for an assurance that he would be well received before he committed himself to an action.

It was this kind of moral criterion, based on whatever was most politically expedient, that turned me off Bobby Kennedy.

IV

What is most annoying about Hubert Humphrey is that he is his own vociferous and most enthusiastic proponent. Liberal record? Why, there hasn't been a major piece of civil rights legislation without Hubie's plump little hand in it. Anti-Communist stand? Who, more than "Pinky" Humphrey (as he was affection-

Americans no longer live in a safe, predictable national political system

Can we consider Donald Duck as a serious choice in 1968? Nixon's PR men have been pushing "the new Nixon" for '68. And indeed, Nixon seems more confident and does have a smoother delivery than he had in 1960. But this merely indicates that sometime before the recent campaigning began, he took a Dale Carnegie course in charm.

To me he is still a ghoul.

This year the Republicans are inviting me to "take another look at Dick Nixon." Do I have to?

III

Robert Kennedy was always an enigma to me. Far be it from me to say he had no charisma. And although he could not approach his older brother Jack in grace and manner, he still had more style than most politicians. (An editor of Ramparts Magazine quoted Kennedy as having said "I'm going to chase Hubert's ass all over the country. Wherever he goes, I'll go.") My bone of contention with Robert Kennedy is that he was always a Johnny-come-lately to the reform scene.

As late as 1966, by which time many respectable Americans had thrown their weight behind the anti-war movement, Robert Kennedy had not made any anti-war statements. His name was not among the sixteen senators who addressed a letter to President Johnson asking him to continue ately called back in his Minne-his days) was responsible for hunting out Commies in the Farmer-Labor Party during the forties? Loyalty to the Democratic Party? Isn't four years serving under Lyndon Johnson proof enough? All too true.

So Humphrey busies himself skipping back and forth between scared "moderates" and "concerned liberals", trying to persuade the first that he is for "law and order" and an "honorable settlement" to the war in Viet Nam, and reminding the second of his brilliant career as a fighter for human rights.

But we are beginning to have second thoughts about Hubert Humphrey's brilliant career.
How concerned about "human rights" can a man be if for the last four years he has supported and furthered the most disastrous and most immoral political and military venture ever embarked upon by the United States. "What kind of a world do you think it would be," said Hubert Humphrey in October, 1967,
"if the United States didn't stand guard around the world?" And it was none other than Hubert Humphrey who was most responsible for preventing the seating of the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party at the 1964
Democratic convention.

At this point, instead of taking him as a serious candidate for president, one searches around in frustration for nasty names.
Humpty-Dumpty is somehow satisfying, and The Hump, as in "Dump The Hump" is also quite good. I am partial to Humbert-Humbert myself.

V

George Wallace says some good things for the wrong reasons. For example, his argument that a strong centralized government should give way to a greater amount of state's rights has broader possibilities than merely non-governmental interference in a state's racist policies. What, for instance, would happen if New York and California decided they were no longer interested in participating in the Viet Nam war? And Wallace's attacks on the limitations of a two-party system are particularly valid. By creating a third party, he has done a fine job of filling a political vacuum on the far right: bigots, racists, and hate-mongers no longer have to bend their own political (or perhaps a-political) principles to fit the watered-down bigotry, racism and hate-mongery of the Democratic and Republican parties. They now have George Wallace to vote for.

VI

Mr. Humphrey was in Sea Girt, N.J., for a fundraising gala, and said he has been told some Democrats are thinking of sitting out the election this year.
If they do, he said, the Democrats will be splintered into "many parties" by defeat.

- Toronto Globe and Mail,
Sept. 13, 1968

The last Gallup Poll showed that 42% of the American people identify themselves as Democrats, 31% as Independents, and 27% as Republicans. The unlikely history of the Democratic Party's seizure of power during the last thirty-six years is worth a moment's discussion, for it may serve as a hint to why it is presently in the process of splitting apart.

Between 1860 and 1932, a period of seventy two years, there were only two Democrats elected president, Grover Cleveland and Woodrow Wilson. It was Franklin
Roosevelt's ushering in of the New Deal, which, over the years, had a little something for everybody, that established a very confusing coalition of power groups.

Workers were brought in by the Wagner Act of 1935 assuring them of a strong, legal foundation for their unions. Social Security brought in retired persons.
Price support programs for major crops brought in the mid-west farmers. Negroes, for the first time received political patronage and to some extent, access to federal programs. Whatever the case, they received better treatment under FDR than they did under the WASPish and big business-conscious Republican Party.

Intellectuals, young professionals, and ex-radicals were attracted by the general mood of social reform that the Democrats were beginning to introduce. Ethnic minorities were told that FDR and the Democrats were for "the little man".

And, of course, Southern whites had been Democrats since Reconstruction. Men like Lyndon Johnson and Hubert Humphrey formed the political power base for this incredible conglomeration.

VII

The obvious question is, of course, why try to hold together a political party made up of people and ideas so completely out of joint with one another. But the question is merely swept under the rug with the answer that it is necessary to protect the sanctity of the two-party system.

While George Wallace makes megalomaniacal noises from the right, intellectuals and, to some extent, militant blacks have established a coalition party in New York and California, the Peace and Freedom Party.

Peace and Freedom will be on the ballot in these two states in November with Eldridge Cleaver, an ex-convict, a senior editor of Ramparts Magazine, and the Minister of Information for the Black Panthers, their nominee for president.

Furthermore, what with the seating of the Mississippi Freedom Party and the removal of half the Georgia delegation in favor of Julian Bond & Co. at the Democratic convention this summer, Democrats have already written off most of the South as either Wallace or Nixon country. (Southern Democrats are more apt to go to Wallace than Nixon, however. Wallace is, after all another disillusioned Southern Democrat.)

And although the Democrats can once again boast of the support of the union leaders in 1968, it is questionable whether they can attract rank and file union voters. Even the farmers are dissatisfied with low prices on crops and are beginning to move to the Republican Party again.

But Hubert Humphrey cannot understand why his so-called liberal appeal is being shunned by the left wing of the party, why his nomination has left hundreds of thousands of Americans without a vote this November. It is exactly this splintering of the Democratic Party, an absurd and paradoxical coalition of contrary elements that has been held together over the years more out of habit and convenience than for ideological reasons, that propo-
achieve.

They are dissillusioned with the ideological bankruptcy of the self-styled "hard-headed and pragmatic" liberal establishment which, in Viet Nam, is responsible for one of the most organized and most terrible programs of destruction and murder ever perpetrated on a people. The Black Panthers see the United States as a racist-imperialist police-state trying to suppress the world-wide revolution of colored people.

For the militant blacks, the armed resistance against police is not just a matter of revenge or an outlet for pent-up frustrations, but a matter of self-defense, a matter of survival. The recent beating of twelve Black Panthers by two hundred off-duty policemen in Brooklyn, New York is merely one isolated instance of police-instigated violence and hated.

The United States cannot cope with or understand the spirit of revolution abroad — the American history of foreign policy in Latin America is a history of America's support of fascist dictatorships — it is unlikely to do much better at home.

VIII

But dissatisfaction with the present state of affairs extends beyond the radical left and the blacks. Even the ordinary, middle class whites find it impossible to achieve participation in huge bureaucracies, both corporate and governmental, which inevitably control their lives.

The Democratic Convention

this summer was just such a display of the monolithic character of American government. It is not surprising that practically all the opposition to Hubert Humphrey came from states (New York, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, South Dakota, Oregon and California) that had Democratic primaries, that is, that actually sounded-out the will of the people. We wonder if Humphrey would still have received the nomination if the will of the people had been solicited in other states.

How can a socially and politically conscious American voter, in all honesty to himself, vote for a man who, to a large extent, owes his nomination to an anachronism from Chicago, that latter-day Al Capone, Richard Daley?
This is why the Democratic Party must not win the election in November and why, as a consequence, the party must splinter.

For extreme leftism and extreme rightism come about, not as a reaction to one another, but as a result of the disintegration of the political center. The Johnson-Humphrey, welfare-warfare state is collapsing around itself and from amid the ruins must arise a whole new political order, a polarization around rightist demands for "law and order" and leftist demands for justice and a conscious striving toward a radically revolutionized society.

The happenings in Chicago are proof that the McCarthy campaign was doomed from the beginning. The effect it had on American politics was profound, for he managed to move a large segment of the population away from the Johnson-Humphrey syndrome.

These radical liberals, for until now they were not authentic members of the radical left, are among the disenfranchised of America, and they must express their disenfranchisement in November by not voting for president.

It is only one's duty to vote when there is a reasonable field of alternatives from which to choose, as is not the case in 1968, when the American electorate is forced to choose between a Tweedledee, a Tweedledum, and a Tweedledumber.

In New York and California, where Peace and Freedom are on the ballot, clearly there is a choice. But in other states, where the only choice will be Richard Nixon, Hubert Humphrey, and George Wallace, what use is there to vote at all?

Thus, the best way to express disenchantment is to vote for state and local offices and to vote "no" for president. The difference between the total state and local vote and the total presidential vote will express the dissatisfaction of the American people. (Clearly, this will not happen on a large scale. What is most important is that, come the January inauguration, the winner will not be able to boast of the support of anywhere near the majority of the electorate.)

IX

There are those who say that if the Radical Left wishes to become a "realistic force" in American politics, it will have to compromise its idealism. Morality and natural human rights, they say, are mere abstractions, too intangible. But how can anyone who seriously believes that the United States is profoundly wrong in Viet Nam align himself with a policy, such as that held by Senators Young and Symington, that takes exception to the war in Viet Nam only because it is costing us too much money, or because the South Vietnamese Army isn't contributing its share of the fighting, or because Ky is corrupt.

Not a word about a nation's right to self-determination or about the utter havoc the United States has wreaked in Viet Nam over the past four years. One gets the idea from such pragmatic criticisms of the war that everything would be justified, money and men's lives included,
if only we were winning.

It is exactly this sort of compromise that the radical left wishes to avoid. There may be a compromise; there may even be a gradual despairing of ideals.
But in order to remain a viable political force in America, the radical left must retain its solid identity as a radical left and nothing else.

The awakening came for many this year when it was discovered by way of Eugene McCarthy that one can no longer work within the framework of the given political structure. The compromise will come, but it will be a compromise with strategies and hard-core, grass-roots organizing.
As Carl Oglesby said in Ham-parts, "The business of the left is the liquidation of social inhumanity....when it deviates from that goal, it has already failed to survive."

Poitier as Uncle Tom

By STEPHEN KATZ

Why write a review of For Love of Ivy, a very ordinary, not particularly good product of the Hollywood machine? Why not let this mindless romantic comedy fade away unnoticed. Why write anything about it at all?

Why? Because this picture is the Hollywood product with a Difference! This is the Negro Romance: a Sidney Poitier Wonder-Nigger Production. The Blacks invade Doris Dayland!

To Mr. Poitier must go a Dubious Achievement Award; in the interests of emancipation he is proving that the Negroes can be just as stupid on the silver screen as the Whites.

If this were a normal Hollywood romance, there would be nothing much to say, and the review would end right here. On the surface, Ivy is simply one more light comedy of the sort which has been churned out by Dreamland since the thirties. Once you have seen one, you have seen them all, and if they are worthless, at least they are harmless.

We are shown a family with some money and social standing. The father constantly loses self-control like a five year old brat.

His wife is a neurotic fool who flaps her arms and babbles compulsively; his children: a girl who is a pea-brained simp, and a son a plastic hippy.

This whole lovely family, we are told, depends on Ivy, the maid, for their meals, their laundry, and just about everything else. When the movie opens, Ivy has just landed in her resignation. This results in panic. The son suggests that what Ivy really wants is some sex life, and he and his sister set about blackmailing one of dad's business associates who runs a shady trucking business cum gambling ring into dating the maid. What happens then? Do they fall in love or not? Does she find out or not? Does she leave or not? It all gets worked out eventually in the silliest manner possible.

Well alright, what did you expect? But here is the catch: Ivy, the maid, is a Black, and the man found to act as her stud is Sidney Poitier. And when you strip away all the fancy trimming, you find that the premise on which the entire picture is based, is that if you put any two Negroes of opposite sexes together, they will without failure, mate.

And the upsetting thing is not that the blacks in the cast went along with this ridiculous and degrading notion, but that it originated . . . actually originated with Mr. Poitier who wrote the story in the first place.

Poitier has said that he is tired of playing the good Negro. He insists that race has nothing to do with this film at all. Ivy's colour is purely coincidental.

Some people believe that a Black today must constantly speak for his race, and is honour bound to proclaim the differences between black and white in every public statement. One hardly expects Mr. Poitier to do this (Rap Brown he is not). But his is more than merely a sin of omission, for surely in this movie he is perpetuating the myth that all is ginger peachy between the whites and blacks. And although the neurotic mother keeps telling Ivy that she is looked upon "just like one of the family", one finds it hard to accept this without some scepticism.

It seems to me that the role of apologist for the whites ill befits Mr. Poitier. It would be nice to believe that we were all one big happy family. It would be nice to believe that the blacks were willing to forgive and forget all, to join the clubs and marry the daughters, and live happily ever after in Doris Dayland. But although this would indeed be nice to believe, the fact remains that nothing could be further from the truth. And until we stop getting hypocritical little sweetness-and-light pictures like this, which attempt to gloss over everything and paint it technicolor, things are not going to get any better.

For the truth is that For Love of Ivy is, way down deep, completely dishonest. It is one more in a series of sops which have been thrown out lately to a public which does not like to see anything unpleasant. Like Guess Who's Coming to Dinner, Ivy is the sort of picture which an audience can leave patting itself on the black and saying, "Look how liberal we are!"

At the end of the movie all is forgiven, and the blacks seem to be happy, and there is no guilt. What a warm nice feeling!

This is exactly the sort of reaction that the Hollywood machine is after. The movie business is, after all, a business, and the center of it is the dollar. In making a race movie one does not think in terms of black and white, but green. So obviously one does not want to upset the audience . . . they might not come back again. Pictures such as Ivy are clearly designed not to offend anyone; to preserve the status quo; to assure the audience that they are doing just fine . . . don't change a thing.

Expensive Soup

By LARRY HAIVEN

We were walking up Broadway, my friend and I, and I had just about had enough of all the stark grey. The streets were absolutely empty. Newspapers eddied high into the air and drifted down through the canyons of steel to the street. It started to snow in New York on a Christmas day.

I wanted to run but we eventually came to Greenwich Village and at least there were a few people there. Times Square was ahead and we were anticipating the excitement of "The Great White Way". Well, we could smell it a mile away.

The odour of hamburgers, onions and french fries and thousands of people and carnie barkers and girlie movies hits you like a sock in the head. You spill out onto a teeming, jostling, flashing confluence of streets and for a minute you can't think straight.

But we decided we were going to see a Broadway show, come what may. So we plunged into the flow of bodies gazing up at the lights like a pair of hicks in from the farm.

There weren't any tickets for "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern Are Dead", for "You Know I Can't Hear You When The Water's Running", or for "Hello Dolly" or anything. And we weren't going to go home to Toronto without having seen at least one Broadway show. So we found one.

We paid four and one half dollars for tickets in the back of the balcony of the Music Box theatre to see "that smash success in London", "the funniest, sexiest show in town". It was a play called "There's A Girl In My Soup".

Now, I don't know whether it was the experiences of the day or whether I was tired or what, but "There's A Girl In My Soup", was a trivial, coy, snarky, pseudo-sophisticated bedroom farce that I just could not stand.

This is the kind of theatre that people go to "get away from it all", the kind of theatre that suggests social problems and then skips shy of tackling them. People laugh simply at the lines and not at the features of human nature that they represent.

I'm not saying that the play is bad. It isn't. The production that is playing at the Royal Alexandra now is entertaining, witty and quite funny. It provides a good evening's entertainment if you dig that sort of thing.

Maybe I would have dug it at the time had I not felt so uptight about the big, mad city called New York. But I found the play presenting a glossy, neo-aristocratic view of life that just simply doesn't exist nor carry any relevance today.

Let me tell you a bit about this play. A wealthy food connoisseur and ladies' man picks up a leggy and saucy young hippy type and through a genuinely witty hour of cross-fire dialogue, gets her to go to bed with him. They fall in love (sigh), but her hippy boyfriend claims her back. Alas she must leave gramps for the younger man (whom we all know is inferior in all respects except physical fitness, to the hero).

I don't exactly understand what the play is driving at, if, indeed, it is driving at anything. As an attempt to portray the generation gap, it never shows the reasons behind the gap. The sweet young thing turns out to be just as unhip and bourgeois as the elderly Cassanova. One wonders how her hippy boyfriend would react to her new ideas. (How you gonna keep her down on the farm, after she's seen Parree?)

If it is an attempt to show the battle of the sexes, then we must believe that men and women have to be coy and false to each other before either succumbs to the other's sexual prowess.

"There's A Girl In My Soup", I'd say, is typical of the state of popular theatre today. Impressarios, in order to please their middle class, suburban audience, think that they have to mount huge productions. The price of producing these shows drives the prices up. Nobody goes to the theatre unless it's for a big night out on the town, dinner, drinks, theatre, the works. It's a "getting away from it all" thing, an escape. After all, if you're going to pay twenty dollars for a night out, why do you have to think?

So as long as this kind of situation persists, plays like "There's A Girl In My Soup" will persist in being the fare offered on Broadway and in the legitimate theatres. They are plays that present hollow-plots for hollow laughter, meaningless lines that are funny only in their phrasing and innuendo, characters that are one-dimensional and drama that has no relevance to the world as it exists today.

Perhaps it takes a mind-blowing experience of modern turmoil or a bit of hard-edged anger before we enter the theatre to make us realize this. Because this kind of theatre thrives on the sonoric, passive beings that modern living has made us.

Dell Knocks the Establishment

By BRIAN JOHNSON

"You Blow Yours, I'll Blow Mine" is neither good comedy nor bad social criticism. But as satire it is excellent — by inducing its audience to laugh at itself.

The Dell is a tavern with a stage or a stage with a tavern, and the cosy atmosphere of scotch and soda, business suits, and cocktail titillations make the audience as integral a part of the decor as the stage itself.

The revue consists of a rapid fire series of light musical skits that are connected by a disturbing undercurrent of black humour.

Superficially the comedy of the revue is often corny and trite. In the set piece of the drunken-airline-pilot-on-a-computerized-plane, the play descends to a Wayne and Shuster level of slapstick.

From the first scene, we are led along through a core of stereotypes — the film director with a foot fetish, the senior vice president who must never use a ballpoint pen; and "the stripping nun's going to show you her bum." It shocks. It entertains. It carries the audience.

But the revue achieves maximum force in the first Act when it suddenly breaks the frolicking mood to interject, a song of intense sobriety — a moving interlude sung by Christine Scott, "I Can Only Die." Her life is a smile of conformity, and her death is her resignation to it; she becomes a female Prufrock (see DELL page R-12)

Riel scores royally

By HILARY McLAUGHLIN

Louis Riel, as an opera, is a complex machinery. Originally a play—by John Coulter—it has switched media; it is a modern Canadian opera, a genre which has yet to prove itself in general terms; it presents with a bold slant one of the most touchy racial problems of the Canadian nation's history in the two languages of the opposing factions. And, as with any other stage spectacle, it involves the rigours and disciplines of The Theatre and its demands.

On Monday's opening at the O'Keefe Centre, the most apparent aspect was the transition from stage play to 'music drama' as the program labels it. Coulter's original play could make an electrifying evening's entertainment. The addition of Harry Somers' music tends to curb that possibility although, handled skillfully as the production was, it is still good theatre.

Somers' music is at its best when it is of the folk nature, especially the aria sung by Riel's wife at the beginning of the third act. Most of the arias are strong, by dint of their juxtaposition with the jangly, discordant score and the abundant use of recitative. Whether in English or, as more often, in French, the arias provide high points in a mixed bag of musical methodology. The pieces for solo voice are the best evidences of Somers' operatic abilities. The peak of the entire score comes immediately after the wife's aria in a quintet, brilliantly arranged, involving Riel and his wife in protest against the appeals of Dumont, Isbister and Poundmaker that Riel return to Saskatchewan. Garnet Brooks, Lloyd Dean and Oskar Raulfs in those respective roles are glowing in their cameo appearances. Roxolana Roslack, as Marguerite Riel, has perhaps the most moving moment on stage in the Indian lullaby aria.

The writing of the characters, largely Mavor Moore's playing with Coulter's play, is at times strange. Sir John A. is almost a buffoon, and delivering so much in recitative (remember The Music Man?) adds to the effect. William Pickett's portrayal is faithful to libretto; he would probably do a good job in the play. Riel is shown in a madness perhaps above and beyond the call of duty, but it is convincing in preparation for his ultimate breakdown. His David-fixation seems to be placed earlier in his career than history records it, but it is well-sustained. Bernard Turgeon plays Riel in the Grand Old Style—he rarely moves too far from eye-to-eye-with-the-conductor position—and he is, less than the other members of the cast, an actor. Despite that, he characterizes Riel well and, in Coulter's interpretation, very sympathetically. Bishop Tache, played with verve and sung with clarity by Joseph Rouleau, is the most ambivalent character on stage: more than anyone else he bridges the wide division of operatic demands—singing and acting.

Let there be no doubt as to the bias of the play. Written more than half in French, its political slant definitely favours the Cause and its Heroes, less by glorifying them than by pointing out the inadequacy of Macdonald's action. The Riel case, if a closed book, is not a closed issue, and while many English can aesthetically lionize Riel along with their French compatriots, the ball does not bounce both ways. Tactically it is more valuable to present any artistic feature about Riel with sympathy towards him—i.e. William Hawkins' long poem—and the writing of this production has been handled in the best of taste.

The production which parallels last year's world premiere, has many fascinations. Opening with a total environment effect, with a throaty voice calling 'Riel' and some electronic music coming separately from four speakers in various parts of the theatre, then a stage-wide screen featuring a montage of photographs from the archives of the Riel case history, it is reminiscent of Expo '67 film technology. Murray Laufer's sets, which float in and out, up and down, consist of variously sized and placed screens and a few pieces of office, fort fronts and other motley. The lighting is simple, a pleasant theatrical relief in this age of psychedelia.

Leon Major's direction, while even and smooth, is somewhat unexciting. It tends to be Brechtian in a number of ways: the titles (neatly two English, two French, two English) flashed on the screen at the outset of some scenes; the groupings are Brechtian in their precision—any single instant captured in a still photograph would show a perfectly balanced arrangement (cf. Brecht's notes to The Life of Galileo, wherein he wished that any single instant would look like a Renaissance painting in its overall arrangement). The whole mixed-media effect of the screens and set pieces, the differences in tone between one scene or another—the seriousness of the rebellion compared to the almost burlesque tempo of the rabble-rousing scene in a Toronto railroad station, or the stylized Meredith Wilson effect of the trial scene when people rise in unison chanting, "Hang him!"—are also pure Brecht. Opera itself is, of course, in Brecht's etymology, alienated; thus the whole composition is reminiscent of the methods set down by Brecht in establishing a modern dramaturgy.

There is a unity and polish to Louis Riel which its book would not suggest. The music, although discordant in nature, is skilfully handled by Victor Feldbrill. Major is a competent and confident director who makes every element of a production count: the words, the actions, the gestures and the tone. The performances were almost unanimously good, Riel and Taché were outstanding in the heavier roles; Patricia Rideout, as Riel's mother, Roxolana Roslack as his wife and Gwennlynn Little, his sister, had some of the finest moments on stage. The whole production moved at a swift, well-maintained pace and showed none of the operatic hazard of lagging.

Louis Riel at this viewing managed to avoid anything glaringly brilliant or appallingly bad, without being mediocre.

The Jazz Giants

By JACK McCAFFREY

It was only a few months ago that a New York booking agent asked Claude Hopkins to put a band together for one gig only at the Colonial tavern. And once again, Hopkins, one of the more successful bandleaders during the so-called Swing Era, showed how well founded is his reputation as an organizer.

When he showed up in Toronto, Hopkins had a very fine band consisting of one "name" - Wild Bill Davison - and five other musicians whose talents equal or excel that of Davison, but whose fame was unjustly more limited.

Davison's hot and driving cornet dominates the ensemble work, which is in the Chicago Jazz idiom; but around his blazing melodic statements, Herb Hall and Benny Morton weave equally interesting lines. This richly textured ensemble work, which always opens and closes each tune, is the most exciting part of the music.

Although his older brother Edmond has always been more famous, clarinetist Herb Hall consistently proves that he is just as great a musician. Hall always takes the first solo, providing a tough challenge for those who have to follow him. Besides the hot, raspy tone for which Edmond became so well-known, Herb also employs a soft, breathy sound and sometimes a sweet middle-register tone, providing an unusual variety of timbres in each solo. Moreover, Hall is a superb improviser, never falling back on pet phrases and clichés, but always creating new solos every time he plays.

Benny Morton is one of the great trombone players in jazz. A veteran of the Count Basie band in the '30's, Morton seems to have picked up some of Dickie Wells' mastery of interesting and sometimes tricky rhythms (not that there is anything derivative about Morton's approach.) Unlike Wells, however, Morton isn't much interested in smears, growls, and other odd tonal effects; rather, he prefers finesse and careful control. Not that he is timid: his work is authoritative and his solos are always well constructed.

Claude Hopkins is one of the few pianists left with an orchestral approach to his instrument. Rather than relying on brilliant monophonic right hand flights, as most pianists since Bud Powell have done, Hopkins explores every possibility for expression that the piano offers. But his work is always well controlled and thoughtful; he doesn't get messy, as Earl

THE JAZZ GIANTS: l. to r., Claude Hopkins, Herb Hall, Wild Bill Davison, Buzzy Drootin, Benny Morton and Arvell Shaw.

Hines sometimes does.

Although he spent 14 years with Louis Armstrong's all stars, bassist Arvell Shaw has not stagnated. His physical presence dominates the band, and his powerful lines cut through the ensemble, which is uncommon for a bass. Apparently a player in the Oscar Pettiford idiom, Shaw is probably the most interesting bassist to be heard in a band of this kind. His solos are excellent, sometimes really amazing.

Propelling all this along is Buzzy Drootin, who drums with vigour and just the right touch for the Jazz Giants. His emulations of Zutty Singleton are good fun and musical as well.

It is hard to categorize this music. There is Chicago style ensemble. But some of the men are Swing Era veterans. And Arvell Shaw is distinctly "modern". But the main thing is that this music swings and it is jazz. No one would argue about that.

This tremendously fine band can be heard at the Colonial Tavern until the end of the month. Even if you heard them the last time they were in Toronto, you will find another visit rewarding, for the band is constantly expanding its repertoire, which now includes material from almost every jazz idiom.

As a result of the unusual excitement that the group generated in its first appearance, a new recording company was formed to get this music on tape. Two early morning sessions (after the last set at the Colonial) produced a representative selection of the band at its best. Now available on Sackville 3002, this is a superbly produced record. The music is memorable and wears very well indeed; after listening to the record every day all summer long at Sam the Record Man, I still find THE JAZZ GIANTS a very enjoyable record. That is pretty unusual.

Those of you who were breast-fed at the Jazz At The Philharmonic concerts will no doubt remember the gasps and shrieks and wild applause that greeted the frantic flights of Illinois Jacquet. At the Town Tavern this week and next, the former Count Basie sideman reveals that he has not lost any of his intense drive. With a huge tone that ranges from breathy sensuality to a buzzing rasping intensity like a saw ripping through a plank, Jacquet swoops passionately all over his tenor saxophone. His control on the high notes way beyond the normal range of his instrument is still awesome.

Surrounding Jacquet are a couple of men who can play well, but prefer to be clowns and "entertain the people". Jo Jones occasionally demonstrates the subtle swing that made his drumming with Count Basie so great; but most of the time he just twirls his sticks and grins a lot and plays in a rather plodding, heavy fashion.

Milt Buckner can create skilful background sounds, but his solos are bombastic and only rarely swing. He likes to sit at the organ and make lewd noises when women pass by the stage. He believes in "showmanship".

Dell knocks

The target of the satire is the establishment, a society of a Spandex credit card and Permadeb accounts — "All our preferred customers bounce cheques."

But the target is also the establishment's attempt to be anti-establishment. French Fries in motorcycle grease and chocolate ants with beer become the latest kicks of the bored jet set.

As a social criticism, the revue is often as commonplace as the conventional form of freaking out that it satirizes. But by mocking its own frivolity, it perfects the object of satire — depth — depth mirrored through the self-realizations of the characters and the audience.

In the final few scenes (Games — Part 1, "Games — Part II"), the tone of deliberate frivolity is broken once and for all by shock-satire. The establishment is caught in its own immaturity as two middle-aged couples try to play the disco-teque games of their teenage kids. The establishment at the Dell laugh. They see themselves.

Then in brilliant juxtaposition, the same two couples are portrayed as children playing "house." They play the parts of their parents through "happiness," "sadness" and so on to "divorce". The audience is no longer laughing; they see the horror of their own responsibility. The game has escalated into a war that betrays a stark, Lord-of-the-Flies brutality.

We begin with a "Lost Generation" and end with a "throwaway world".

Movie Guide

By STEPHEN KATZ

Well here we are once again: back at the Intellectual Community after a summer of highway construction at Banff, serving tables at a lodge near Perth, or fresh off the chartered flights. Anyway we have to be clued in on the movie scene: what to see; what to avoid; and what to say about the movies to make us sound intelligent.

Here is a brief guide to begin the year with. It includes movies which have come during the summer and are now playing.

Rosemary's Baby: This one is not an art film although Roman Polanski directed it. In point of fact, Polanski never has made art films, so do not be caught saying that he has sold out in this one. If you have not seen this movie already, be sure not to miss it, for it is one of the best movies in town right now. Mia Farrow turns in a surprisingly fine performance as a young wife who believes that she has been chosen by a coven of witches to bear Satan's child. In this brilliant modern horror picture, Polanski keeps the audience guessing right to the end, throwing in mysterious deaths, suspicious potions and hints of madness for good measure.

2001: A Space Odyssey The most expensive, most elaborate science fiction movie ever made is really enjoyable if you believe that the medium is the message. Getting there is all the fun, with countless gimmicks, gadgets, machines, models and special effects which come into play on a long, long voyage to Jupiter. Once you get there, you find only a pretentious ending in which Kubrick, (the director) tries to convince the audience that all of his technical virtuosity has really been used to deliver a profound message. It hasn't. The ending will probably fully satisfy speed freaks and half-baked transcendentalists, but most others will leave thinking that Kubrick has copped out. Perhaps it doesn't really matter, especially since there is plenty in the movie worth going for. The special effects are by far the best, most fantastic ever seen. Visually the entire movie is superb. The June edition of American Cinematographer is given over to explaining how the special effects were achieved, and is easily worth the price (75c).

Ulysses: A movie made with the best of intentions, but not complete success, since no camera can be as eloquent as James Joyce. The best moments occur when the images are used only to back Joyce's narration, but this happens all too rarely. If you have read the book the movie will doubtless be of interest, and probably provoke a great deal of discussion. If you have not, the movie is no substitute. In the case that you saw the film and had no idea what it was about, but wish to talk about it anyway, you will be on safe ground saying that much of the poetry was lost, and that it had been better left un-filmed. Do not talk about Molly Bloom's Soliloquy: it is passé this year.

The Producers: This outrageous farce about a pair of crooks who try to get rich by producing the perfect flop and end up instead with a Broadway hit on their hands derives most of its laughs through transgressions of good taste. Most people are not inclined to find amusing the idea of a musical entitled Springtime for Hitler, which features chorus girls goose-stepping in swastika formation, yet somehow in this movie it becomes cripplingly funny. Zero Mostel and Gene Wilder, two extraordinary comedians carry most of the load, and usually manage to hide the fact that their script is weak and rather like an extended television sit-com.

Belle de Jour: A genuine art film! See luscious Catherine Deneuve undergo all sorts of unspeakable sexual degradation, all in the interests of art. Luis Bunuel does his usual thing about erotic fantasy, repression, guilt, violence, and perversion, skipping back between reality and wish fulfillment. The images are striking and the themes disturbing. The picture is often obscure, and obviously rich with possibilities for Deep Talks which you may wish to have in the next few weeks.

Prudence and the Pill: An exceptionally stupid movie which is advertised as a comedy. Be sure to miss it.

Interlude: If you enjoy reading Brenda Starr and True Romances, you will love this maudlin exercise in self-indulgence. It is weepy, misty, sentimental, and awful.

The Thomas Crown Affair: Because this picture stars Fay Dunaway, fresh from Bonnie and Clyde, the social message picture of '67, it is generally assumed that this movie too is a meaningful statement about our society. This is really not the case. It is an empty slick picture about a pair of decadent rich people, trying to relieve their boredom by playing cops and robbers. It takes place in the Fantasyland of television commercials and expensive advertisements from Esquire and the New Yorker. The movie does not really say much at all, but it is a glossy entertainment, and you can read social significance into it if you really try.

The New Yorker Fall Festival: Running through until the middle of October, the New Yorker is featuring a selection of the best films of the last few years, as well as a few vintage pieces. The movies change every evening. Film Festivals have a lot of prestige, and you can impress many people by telling them that you are going, even if you do not know which picture is playing. As it turns out, it does not much matter, because almost everything in this series is worth seeing.

SAC consolidates to the left

BY BRIAN JOHNSON
— Varsity SAC Editor —

"You're watching the disintegration of SAC," said Andy Wernick (SGS) at Wednesday's meeting of the Students Administrative Council.

Wernick, SAC education commissioner and avowed Marxist may be a cause of that disintegration or may be the remedy to it — if there is a split at all.

ANDY WERNICK

The question is what will happen to the moderates.

If last night's meeting is any indication, SAC is not disintegrating but being radicalized into one group that is developing its own political and social conscience.

An example of SAC's increasing radical unanimity is the refusal of an unconditional acceptance of President Bissell's invitation to SAC to elect two students to his Commission on University Government. A proposal that the commission consist of four students, four faculty and some ex officio administration members was passed with only two or three no's.

"I was very surprised," said Bob Rae (IV UC), the proposer of the motion.

With brilliant diplomacy, Rae presented the motion in such a way as to offend only the most reactionary conservatives.

"It is not a conspiracy," he said, "it is not an open revolt; it is not violence; it is not revolution. It is an evolution of democracy."

Rae made what was essentially a radical motion acceptable to the moderates.

The course that SAC is taking is towards total change rather than compromise. Even last year SAC would have grabbed up lesser reform opportunities than what Dr. Bissell has called "the most important commission of the university since 1906."

Now SAC is becoming more and more intent on pursuing change outside the structured system of the university.

"It isn't the rhetoric of the administration that's going to change this university," said Rae. "It's the faculty and students."

This term's SAC is not the same SAC that was elected last spring. The swing to the left can be compared to the radicalization of the Canadian Union of Students over the summer conference.

Although the conference started with what appeared to be a group of moderates, Wernick and CUS President Peter Warrrian had effected a dramatic radicalization before it was over.

If the same process is taking place in SAC, although it is leading to a major consolidation to the left, paradoxically it could mean the splintering of the professional faculties. This is the disintegration that Wernick is talking about — bad for SAC but good for the revolution.

There is also a major split between Wernick and Langdon. Langdon is working towards reform through immediate and tenable political manoeuvring. Wernick is advocating a total revolution, not just of the university, but of the complete capitalist and consumptive nature of the society.

The split was visible at Wednesday's SAC meeting when the two leaders conflicted in their conceptualization of SAC's role in this Saturday's demonstration by Workers Union Local 183 at City Hall.

Wernick referred to such participation as a "mobilization" of students in the interests of the workers. But Langdon tried to relate the outside political factors to the university, and successfully reworded the motion to:

"That SAC participate in the Saturday demonstration recognizing the common struggle in which student unions are involved with labor unions on such issues as housing, democratization of institutions, and accessibility to university."

Langdon is trying to keep a tenuous control over SAC and the university; Wernick is challenging this control and still argues that SAC is not a very effective means of change; Fromm and the conservatives are using a referendum for every issue as an excuse to undermine the authority of the left.

The outcome will be neither revolution nor a maintenance of the status quo, but perhaps the splintering of SAC.

GOV'T SPENDING CUT BY HALF

Campus centre still a dream

The proposed $4,000,000 Campus Centre is still in the talking stage four months after construction was slated to begin, and vice-president Norm Schachar says SAC "may have to jump up and down on a few desks" to get it underway.

Meanwhile, the site for the centre, the corner of St. George and Russell Sts., is likely to remain untouched until someone decides to take the initiative in relieving the volume of pedestrian and vehicular traffic on St. George St., says Schachar.

The city of Toronto has said it may waive several zoning bylaws the proposed centre breaks if the St. George traffic problem is solved.

But no one seems to want to take the responsibility.

The city maintains it is the responsibility of Metro Toronto to relieve the congestion. Metro has argued that the Ontario government should provide the funds.

Suggested solutions to the traffic problem range from closing down St. George St. entirely to building a series of pedestrian walkways and underground tunnels.

Another factor in the hold-up is the financing of the centre. The Bank of Montreal has agreed to provide half the cost of the building provided it is given an exclusive franchise on campus for 50 years.

The Board of Governors has not made a final decision on permitting the bank exclusive campus rights.

To further complicate matters, the Ontario government has revoked its initial commitment to pay 50 per cent of the capital cost.

After the university's request for capital building finances this year was cut to $6,000,000 from $14,000,000, the government announced there was no money for the centre.

SAC BRIEFS

• The Students Administrative Council last night appointed George Murray (II Law) as permanent speaker.

Murray, last year's SAC secretary, has a B.A. from Queen's University and has had much experience in chairing committees, both for SAC and the Undergraduate Law Society.

• SAC President Steve Langdon was the sole supporter of a motion presented last night to back a memorial ceremony commemorating the death of South American revolutionary Che Guevara. The motion was suggested by a representative of the Latin American Justice Association.

The motion was particularly humiliating for Langdon in the eyes of the council, since Paul Fromm (III SMC) called for a stand-up vote.

Rugger champs host Michigan

After a week and a half of rugged practices, Varsity rugger Blues will receive their first trial by fire in exhibition games with the first and second teams of the University of Michigan. Saturday's afternoon's game (at 3:00 p.m.) promises to be an re-enactment of last year's exciting contest at Ann Arbor which Blues won 9-3.

University of Michigan, who have been playing rugger for over a decade, have proven in the past to be a formidable mixture of British graduate students and American college football players.

Blues' starting lineup contains several new faces — Anthony Pierre from Trinidad at centre, John Rock from Queens at Prop, and Al Hamilton and Richard Van Banning up from the junior Varsity side. Blues' back line will also be strengthened by Andrew Gibson who has recovered sufficiently from knee injuries to start in his usual position on Saturday.

Rugger is an internationaly played game and Blues' lineup on Saturday will contain players from five commonwealth countries. Although the sport is not yet too widespread in Canada, it is becoming very popular, especially in Ontario and British Columbia. Canadian rugby received definite encouragement in 1967 when the national team was able to defeat British Lions in Vancouver.

Coaching Blues this year are Jim Hamilton, a past president of the Ontario Rugby Union, and Al Giachino, a member of the 1965 team which toured Britain.

Three senates open meeting

VANCOUVER-MONTREAL. After a year-long fight, University of British Columbia opened its senate doors, but space restrictions will limit the audience to 30.

At McGill University, after a year and a half of bitter debate, the senate approved opening its sessions "to observation by any member of the university community and the accredited press subject to limitation of space, good conduct, and special considerations of confidentiality."

It is also expected that eight students will be added to the McGill senate and the number of elected faculty members (now eight) will be almost tripled.

Elected faculty and students would then have a numerical majority on the senate over administrators and governors.

Meanwhile, at Lethbridge University, the general faculty council voted to open its meetings to "all members of the university community", with the provision that majority vote of the council would be sufficient to send it back into secrecy.

Blues face first test at Western

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

The football genius of Varsity Blues' coach, Ron Murphy, is a matter of fact. In two years as head coach and one as assistant, Blues have won two SIFL championships, losing out in a sudden-death playoff for a third.

Now Murphy is setting out to prove his mathematical genius as well. For this Saturday's exhibition game against Western Mustangs in London, not only does he plan to dress the unwieldy total of 45 players, and not only does he plan to take a look at every one of them, but he also hopes to see each one in action both offensively and defensively, in effect giving him 90 different players to work with. You've heard of  $E=mc^2$ , Observance of the above formula will ensure a total of twelve players on the field at all times. It's easy. Why didn't Einstein think of it?

However, the formula does contain one major omission. That's all-star halfback Mike Raham who will be missing from Murphy's mathematics on Saturday. In the first serious injury to hit the Varsity camp, Ra-ham, last year's scoring champion, suffered a chipped bone in Wednesday's practice which will keep him on the sidelines for the next three weeks. That means he'll miss the opening home against Queen's.

Replacing Raham in the offensive backfield is hard-hitting, Curt McQuire. At six feet, two inches and 210 pounds, McQuire, says Murphy, will "put a few bruises on people". And that's what Murphy likes from his ballplayers.

Also injured in Wednesday's practice was Mike's brother, Peter Raham. He suffered a broken nose, but Murphy expects him to play Saturday, with an extra vertical bar added to his helmet. From his defensive halfback position, Raham plays some of the hardest football on the team.

Although, as mentioned, Murphy intends using all 45 players, he already has announced his starting line-ups. They contain quite a few newcomers.

OFFENSE: Centre, Rich Agro (from McMaster); Tackles, Arnie Carefoote and Alex Squires (moved over from defensive end); Guards, Gord Whittaker and Derek Turner; Ends, Stew McSween (from Jarvis Collegiate) and Mark Slater; Quarterback, Vic Alboini; Halfbacks, Eric Walter (from McGill) and Glen Markle; Fullback, Curt McQuire; Wingback, Nick DiGiuseppe.

DEFENSE: Ends, Jim Bennett and Alex Topps; Tackles, Doug Dempster (from Western) and Ylo Korgemagi; Linebackers, Gord Squires, Mike Bukovac (from Western), Ian Kirkpatrick and Don Fraser (from Northern Secondary); Halfbacks, Walt Sehr (from North Toronto), Ron Kishimoto, Peter Raham and Paul McKay.

For an exhibition game, Saturday's contest shapes up as a pretty interesting one.

There will be some heavy head-knocking among old teammates. Blues' Doug Dempster and Mike Bukovac played for Western last year, while Mustangs boast ex-Varsity guard Ron Wakelin on its forward wall.

Then, there's the traditional rivalry between Western and U of T. 'Stangs always seem to save their best shot for Toronto. Last year Blues left London clutching a precarious 26-20 victory and with five regulars sidelined for the season due to injuries. At home, Blues had to wait until the final play before eking out an 18-18 deadlock.

BLUENOTES . . . Western's Bill Hendershot, the elusive flanker who gave Blues so much trouble last year, missed his year . . . Blues' sensation rookie of last year, Wolfgang Gut, is at Laval this year . . . Mustang coach John Metras also plans to use a whole horde of ballplayers . . . ex-Queen's player, Larry Plancke, has been a good catch for Edmonton Eskimos with three touchdowns already . . . John Ritchie and Don Karn are still battling for the job of back-up quarterback behind Vic Alboini, apparently fully recovered from his torn ligaments of last year.

MIKE RAHAM

WHAT WOULD HAPPEN IF ...

BY PHIL BINGLEY

Only one week of production gone, and already I am out of ideas for column material. Therefore, to give us all a break, to-day's copy is a quiz, compiled by former sportsie Paul Carson and dedicated to the faculty of Physical and Health education, the faculty of Engineering and all other football oriented experts.

The first athlete to arrive at our offices (91 St. George, second floor) with the correct answers to each of the hypothetical situations, will be awarded two free tickets to Varsity Blues first home football game of the season. The decision of whoever happens to be here is final.

PROBLEMS

How would you sort out the confusion of these plays?

First, on second down and ten yards to go at the Varsity 35, quarterback Vic Alboini fakes a plunge to Mike Raham and drops back to throw the bomb to end Mark Slater. Unfortunately, so effective is the fake to Raham that when he is tackled on the 40, the umpire blows the "ball" dead. At that moment, the pass is in the air at about midfield and seconds later Slater makes a fine grab at the enemy twenty. Where is the next play?

Second, on a crucial third down gamble, Eric Walter gets the call but is stopped about six inches short. The referee blows his whistle but because of a pea malfunction, there is no sound. By the time another official has blown the ball dead, Walter has picked up another three yards. First down or loss of ball?

In our next situation, Blues decide to go for a two-point convert following a successful touchdown drive against Western. On instructions from the bench, they ask the referee to place the ball on the Mustang 20 instead of the 10 as usual.

Suspecting a trick play, the Western captain claims Blues must first obtain his permission to move the ball from the ten and he refuses to give the permission. The referee makes his decision.

Blues indeed have a trick play in mind — an inside punt by Paul McKay with halfback Peter Raham as the inside player. 'Stangs are completely confused and Raham legally recovers the ball deep in the end zone. Now, where was the ball placed for the convert and how many points do Blues get?

In another possible situation, Blues lead Queens 18-10, with only two minutes remaining to play. Gaels are working against a very strong wind but somehow they manufacture a sustained drive and with five seconds left, a touchdown plus a two-point convert ties the game. One play later, Blues win the game 19-18. How did they do it?

Finally, Blues lead McGill 18-16 as Paul McKay punts from his own 15 on the last play of the game. Redmen block the punt on the three, but before they can recover, the ball bounces across the goal-line and then rolls out of bounds. McGill players claim they are allowed one more play from Blues three yard line, or a safety touch to tie the game. How would you rule it?

FAT CHAT . . . Athletic Director Warren S. Stevens has disclosed the reason for his decision to move all home basketball games to the York University athletic wing.

"The switch was made in an effort to help player recruitment. Who can blame a new boy entering the university if he becomes disillusioned with the idea of playing in the Hart House box. Hopefully, as the season progresses, Coach (John) McManus and the players will be able to have a few practices at York. Until then, all workouts will be held here at Hart House. . ."

Soccer Blues face stiff test

By JIM COWAN

Varsity Blues soccer team this week find themselves in the unusual position of being the underdogs in an exhibition match, to be played this Saturday. The reason: their opposition will be the Toronto contingent of the Canada World Cup team.

Such a prospect would give an experienced team food for thought, and the Blues are not an experienced team this year. They lost half of their fourteen regulars from last year, and despite a good crop of rookies, they lack intercollegiate experience.

But the team is looking forward to the game, hoping it will provide them with stiffer competition than they have found in the intercollegiate league of late. They are undefeated in the past four years.

Ernie Glass, coach of Blues for the last six years, refuses to take credit for the team's success. "I don't take much credit, because these guys are good to start with," he said last night. Most university teams, he pointed out, have only one or two really good players, while Blues are uniformly strong.

Glass rejected the idea that Blues were avoiding a game with a team from Ryerson Polytechnical Institute, as charged in the Daily Ryersonian last week. "We've played Ryerson every year," he said, "and it's turned into a real kicking match. One of our players was hurt on the very first play of the game last year."

"We play in a league and that's what we have to win," the coach continued. "We use all preseason games to develop teams. We're not interested in a feud."

Saturday's game against the Canadian World Cup team starts at noon on the back campus.

Interfac. tennis on tap

The 1968-69 Interfaculty Tennis Tournament begins this Tuesday at the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club with many of last year's top players already entered. Paul Kent (Meds III), a 2-3 loser to Mike Zimmerman in last year's final appears to be the top player among the early entrants.

However, Kent, one of the university's best all-round athletes, is certain to get plenty of competition from the likes of Gord Gibbons (Trinity II), Frank Blyth (Vic, Special Student) and Peter Chow (Meds II). Newcomer Brad Robinson (Vic I) could be a dark horse here. Robinson finished fourth in the Ontario Junior Open this past summer.

Last year's champ, Mike Zimmerman, has taken a year off school to travel in Europe, leaving 64 (hopefully) entrants to compete for the title as well as a spot on the Varsity tennis team.

Doing our best on housing says MP

The federal government is doing everything it can to alleviate the shortage of student housing, a Liberal spokesman said Friday.

Speaking to about 150 students at Tent City, Barney Danson, Liberal MP for York North, said federal aid to the University of Toronto for housing has reached $20,000,000.

"This is enough for close to 2,000 students," he said.

He urged students to submit a brief to the Toronto public hearing of the Hellyer task force on housing.

He also advised students to send a delegation to the Sept. 30 public hearing.

"The government has no direct plans for the solution to this crisis," said Mr. Danson. "We are talking about a long range program when we talk about solving the problem."

But the MP went on to say he did not believe rent controls would be imposed.

"It can be self-defeating," he said, "Where rent controls are applied, building usually stops and soon the government begins to build."

"And government building — well — it can be deplorable."

Mr. Danson also said he did not support government land ownership to prevent speculation, but preferred subsidies.

"Private companies can build much more desirable housing units than the government. We would provide a subsidy to the best bidder."

The MP asked students to give him specific suggestions he could take home to the task force.

"The problem with student housing is that students are suckers," argued one student. "We are too willing to take too little for too much."

"Sure people are willing to take us in. They give us a place and then go ahead and double the rent."

"I suggest the government stop making deductions from our summer pay cheques," stormed a second student. "This would at least give students money to pay for these atrociously expensive places."

Mary Jaffary, director of the U of T housing service said later she didn't know what the solution to the housing problem was. But unlike Mr. Danson, she favors rent control.

"What I'd like to see is a number of high rise private residential dwellings where students could stay temporarily while they look for a permanent residence," she added.

"This would be especially beneficial to foreign students who reach Toronto after most of the housing near the campus is gone."

Although Danson made no specific promises on his fact-finding tour of Tent City, he repeated he was "deeply concerned" about the problem.

"We're going to do our very best," he said, "But we can't satisfy everyone."

Danson's rather uneventful visit to Tent City marked the end of the two-week-long life of the canvas encampment on front campus.

The cost of Tent City was estimated by SAC education commissioner Andy Wernick at $2,500.

VOLUME 89 — NO. 4
TORONTO

By Mary Kate Rowan
Hey! It's here. Visa is here.

Save. Save. Save. Last week Visa placed two full-page advertisements in The Varsity urging students to "fight the high cost of learning".

"Live a little, save a lot with Visa, your very own special passport to student savings."

Students were invited to take advantage of power-packed specials offered only to Visa members.

"Specials" include half-fare flights on 10 airlines, a 25 per cent discount on the CNR on Red or White days, savings from 10 to 50 per cent on clothing, entertainment, hotel accommodations, etc.

"Join the millions of card carrying Visa members on over 700 American campuses and save while you swing," the ad continues. All college and university students are eligible.

"Use discretion when presenting your Visa membership card for purchases. Remember Visa sponsors are not offering Visa rates to all customers."

Very interesting. Canadian Pacific, Air Canada, Trans World Airlines and United Airlines were all very interested when I phoned to inquire about their connection with Visa—mainly because they had never heard of it.

There is nothing new or exclusive about the half-fare flights. They're known as youth fares and available to anyone between the ages of 18 and 22, on a standby basis, subject to space.

United Airlines assured me that only air lines issue youth fare cards.

"Buy your card from the airline," they advised. "I doubt if we would accept this Visa card." (They asked me for Visa's address so they could make their own inquiries.)

"Go the CN Escape Route on Red or White days and save 25 per cent" the advertisement reads.

Again, this is the regular youth fare plan, open to anyone 18-22 years of age. Although not on a standby basis, you may make reservations only 24 hours or less in advance.

After checking through their files and finding no mention of Visa, CN asked for the phone number. Unfortunately, it wasn't mentioned in the advertisement. CN took the address.

According to the directory in the Bloor St. Britannica Building where Visa is located, the full name is Visa Marketing of Canada Limited.

Visa's secretary was very enthusiastic about the student plan.

"For only $4 you get an airline card, a CN card and of course, our Visa card. The savings are fantastic," she gushed.

"Anything you've got to spend money on, we can offer you a discount on."

Along with the cards, a Visa member is supposed to get a college guidebook cataloging all the sponsors.

I asked to see the guidebook. It hadn't been printed yet but the secretary assured me it would be ready by next week.

"These travel deals sound great," I said wide-eyed and very innocently. "Do you work in conjunction with the railway and airlines?"

"Oh, yes, we handle their accounts for them."

Bright smile. "Really, it is a tremendous deal, Miss. The discounts are fantastic—up to 50 per cent sometimes."

How much can you save with a Visa card? To find out, I visited several stores sporting a Visa crest in their window.

George's Kibitzaria on Huron St. signed up with Visa last July and hasn't heard from them since. The proprietor admitted he wouldn't offer any discounts he doesn't now but "Visa lets people know about it."

Another pizza house on Yonge St. doesn't offer any discount with the Visa card that it wouldn't offer without.

"Why do I need the Visa card?" The answer—a smile

Fees protest peters out

A campaign urging students to withhold their $12 Students Administrative Council fees has met with limited response.

H. C. Anderson, comptroller of the university, says he has received "about 100" forms requesting the SAC fees be withheld.

"I have no idea what will be done with them. Any decision will be up to the Board of Governors," he said.

SUNNY LAND SLIM TRIO

Innis-soon to be a reality

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Innis College's new building is once more alive and kicking — at least on the drawing boards.

A revised $8.5 million plan for the building, to be situated on the north side of Sussex St. between Huron and St. George, was approved last week by the university administration.

It should be ready for use by September, 1971.

The original project was shelved during the summer after the Ontario government announced a cut-back in grants for capital construction costs at the University of Toronto.

The cost of the new plan has been cut by $1 million, principally by eliminating suites for dons and deans of residence, by reducing common room and recreational space, and the number of classrooms and faculty offices.

But the modified project still includes such facilities as a theatre, squash courts, cafeteria-style dining hall and two common rooms with snack bars.

The common rooms are on opposite sides of the building and each is to serve a different purpose. One will be an "action" room with activity such as billiards, cards, and ping pong; the other will be a quiet room, a place to relax.

The building is a quadrangular complex with an inner court flanked by two nine-storey residential towers on east and west, and three-storey academic and administrative blocks on the north and south sides.

The residence will house 576 students in communal groups of 16 single rooms and one double. Each group will surround a lounge and kitchen area.

The residence will be an "anti-institutional" community where an arcade on the ground floor replaces corridors, where there are no dons or deans of residence, where there are integrated staff-student common rooms.

"We don't want just another monument to the university," said Sue Stoess (III Inn) Innis Student Society president.

Innis Principal Peter Russell wants "an ethos of independence" at his college.

A combined staff-student Academic Affairs Committee is devising new course structures at Innis.

"There are many questions that must be discussed," said Mr. Russell. "Alienation in modern society, the film, the political novel — these should be courses for credit."

Although the administration has called the project the "highest priority" in its submissions to the provincial government, "the road ahead is by no means clear," he said. The provincial government must approve it.

Of the total cost, the province will pay $5,100,000, the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Ontario Student Housing Corporation $2,400,000, and the university $1,000,000.

The construction costs are considerably lower than those of existing residences on campus, said Mr. Russell.

But he could not say whether that saving would be reflected in lower residence fees.

It's no go via Visa . . . cont'd from P. 1

and a shake of the head.

"It's just advertising—nothing special. All our prices are reduced anyway," shrugged the clerk in a sports shop.

At a sewing machine centre the clerk had only been on the job for two days and had never heard of Visa until I showed him the crest in the window.

"I guess that means with the card you get a discount but since you're a student, we could probably arrange one anyway."

My quest for sensational savings looked futile. "Somewhere, someone must offer a legitimate discount and I intend to find it," I vowed.

I found it—in an art gallery on Yonge St. only Visa card carriers are offered a 15 per cent discount on paintings and other works of art.

Career Miss, a dress shop on Bay Street offers Visa members only a 10 per cent discount on full price items.

"There is no financial agreement between Visa and us," the clerk explained. "It's up to the individual store to give the discount."

"It's a matter of good will, all in the interest of students."

Last week, in the interests of University of Toronto students, The Varsity cancelled the Visa advertisement.

The purpose of Newspeak was not only to provide a medium of expression for the world-view and mental habits proper to the devotees of Ingsoc, but to make all other modes of thought impossible. For example, the word "free" still existed in Newspeak, but it could only be used in such statements as 'This dog is free from lice' or 'This field is free from weeds'. It could not be used in its old sense of politically free or intellectually free, since political and intellectual freedom no longer existed as concepts, and were therefore of necessity nameless.

student power, anyone?

The student power movement is coming in for a lot of criticism from students who do not want to be responsible for their own actions.

These people have been subject to the authority and decision-making processes of others from toilet-training on. They have always done as they were told. It is not surprising they reached university.

They are used to situations where no alternatives are seen, where responsibility for action does not rest with them. So, it is understandable that they should view student control of education with misgivings.

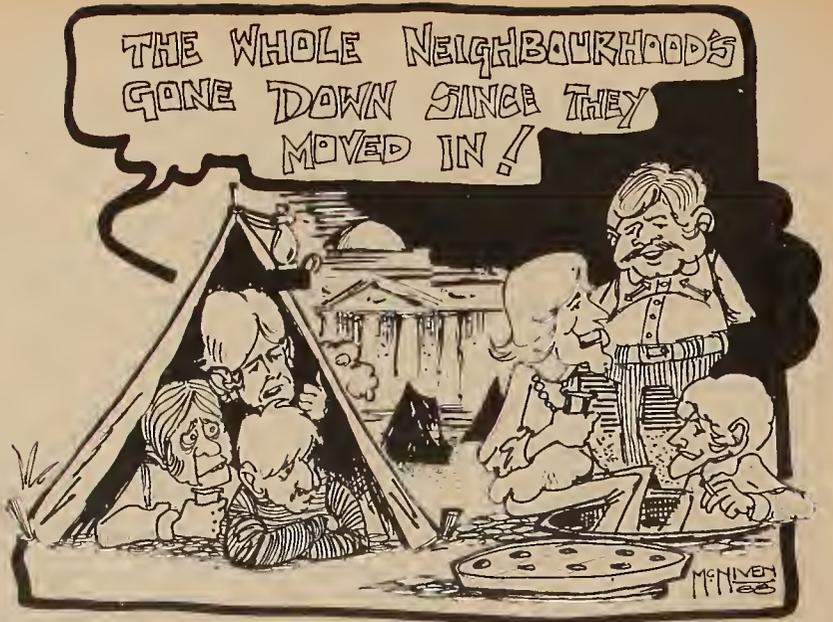

Obtaining a degree is not all that difficult, let's face it. It's all neatly laid out: a few essays, a few lectures, lots of books and exams. You're told what to read, what to write, where to go to the washroom, (revere the doors marked 'Staff'). The sweat involved in filling authority's prescription is nowhere as great as that needed to make up and follow your own mind.

Northrop Frye defined education in the Star in a manner which applies to Pavlov's dogs as well as Toronto's students:

"Education is incessant repetition and practice and drill, and going over the same things over and over again until they become automatic responses."

Those who respond best to this Pavlovian training are also those who accept modern society's rhetoric of freedom.

George Orwell writes, in '1984', that the 'Newspeak' definition of 'free' can only mean 'free from lice', or 'free from weeds'. There is no meaning of the word 'free' that applies to intellectual or political freedom.

Students are falling into the same trap. To them, 'free' means doing what society expects, not what they want. The disparity is known as the "price of being free."

Student power has a different definition of 'free'. Free means desiring and being able to follow one's own interests, without coercion, while respecting your fellow man and society.

In practical terms, student power means refusing to accept strictures lodged against you, finding alternatives, and fighting to make them stick. The violent reaction to these ideas shows how scared students are by the idea of personal freedom.

What can you do. Act. Organize. That history class with 400 students can be broken down into groups of human size if everyone will pressure the department.

Form groups on your own, if you must, and invite your professor along. Those interested in history will participate in this free atmosphere. Those who are not interested were wasting yours and the professor's time anyway.

When you are under way, ask your professor, nicely, to give everyone a 'B', whether they participate or not.

For, if education is anything more than an exam mark, only those who don't take the course will be the losers.

LETTERS

Sir: revealing

As reported in Wednesday's Varsity, Irv Weisdorf, a SAC rep., and UC's freshman co-ordinator, tore an article by Paul Socken out of 2,500 copies of the UC student handbook because he found it objectionable, and replaced it with an article more to his liking.

How revealing this little incident is! According to Weisdorf's professed political views, this sort of arbitrary action is precisely what makes him so antagonistic towards the University Establishment. Would it be unfair to suggest that he has failed to direct to his own actions the same piercing analysis to which he subjects the other side? Or is it simply another indication that behind ideological arguments lies the simple desire for power?

From this optique, the conflict between Student Power leaders and the University Establishment is less one of "Reaction" vs "Progress", and more one of the "Ins" vs. the "Outs"!

ALAN RUBIN

Sir: I would like to clarify a remark made by me that was reported in Wednesday's Varsity. It is concerning the Engineers' support of Tent City to which I apparently objected to because I saw the protest "as a protest against the whole University, against Bis-sell". Despite the poor grammar this remark has been taken out of context and as such does not express my true feelings. I objected to the working of the original motion which did not explain why the Eng. Soc. supported Tent City. As such I felt that some people might incorrectly think that we supported a protest which as an example of "student power" was directed against the University as a whole.

I, personally, support Tent City as a dramatization of the housing shortage at U. of T. Therefore instead of the original motion, I seconded the amendment which changed the wording of the motion to "... endorse Tent City as an effective dramatization of inadequate student housing at the University of Toronto."

I hope that this helps to explain my views on Tent City.

Popsicles and Things

By BOB BOSSIN

This is ultimately going to be a comment on the state of SAC and on the press, the Varsity in particular — although this may not be apparent for several paragraphs. If this interests you, bear with me; if not, you should spend your time more profitably. I include this preamble because I began with a misleading analogy and also because it is 2 a.m. and I'm drunk.

I heard today that another long-haired kid got thrown out of high-school and that his parents were appealing to whatever schoolboard it is that Ying Hope is chairman of. The board has to decide whether to reconsider its 1966 pronouncement that the local principal has ultimate authority over discipline in his school and therefore can order hair to be any length he damn well wants it to be.

Now, if the board was smart, which I doubt, it would re-instate the kid, not because it is nice but because its the most conservative thing to do. (This presupposes a conservative school board; if on the other hand they were "radical", they should throw him out.) The reason being that the hair-cutting bit is by now so flagrantly ludicrous that it is begging to be revolted against.

And as President Bissell and history have pointed out, once the students rebel against the particular, they invariably test the general, or, more parochially, when the shit hits the fan it flies in every direction. Hence the board should take the opportunity to shield the system by chinking the dam, or — sorry for two metaphors in a row — shaving the crown off the ice-berg.

WRIST BURN

The same thing — and this is where I think I begin to say something worth reading — applies, though less obviously, to the press. It is not the flagrant misquote that is ultimately dangerous, although this is extremely irritating (every time I hear someone say that Peter Warrian advocates "burning down universities", an inanity perpetrated by the Star's Donna Mason — may she develop a migraine — I feel like someone is applying a Chinese burn to my wrist). However no-one ever died of Chinese wrist-burn but people have died of syphilis, the symptoms of which are sufficiently less obvious so that they can be ignored.

I realized this reading Friday's Varsity. Not that the Varsity isn't admirably flagrant about its biases which it keeps about as well concealed as an Egyptian airbase. The danger comes with well-written and even thoughtful pieces like Brian Johnson's SAC Consolidates to the Left; even a well-researched analysis can become totally misleading through the use of stereotyping. Or else maybe its just an example of how his analysis differs from my own. It is well past two and I'm still drunk.

Johnson has SAC "consolidated to the left", having been and being radicalized. Because of all this lefticity, the professional faculties will perhaps split away.

"CRAP"

Crap. If the professional schools split away (and this would be a great loss both in real and tactical terms not "bad for SAC but good for the revolution" as Johnson suggests. Brian, why do you think the radicals at the CUS conference tried so desperately to keep the union together?) then it will be because of this sort of inaccurate picture.

1) I have counted up the number of SAC reps who could be expected to take a consistently left line: Langdon, Schacher, Rae, Wernick, Freiman, D'Giovanni, the guy from New who's name I can't spell, Hankey, Swaigen, maybe Barkwell. There are probably five or six more I haven't thought of. My apologies to anyone I forgot, or to anyone I remembered who will now be impeached. That totals 16. Out of 52. And the 16 don't consistently bamboozle the rest. With only a couple possible exceptions the SAC REPS ARE NOT STUPID. People like the girl with the short hair from Trinity listen, weigh and vote accordingly. Thank God.

2) Johnson says "Now SAC is becoming more and more intent on pursuing change outside the structured system of the university".

The example given is the motion to sit four students, four faculty and two non-voting administrators on the Presidents Committee on University Government. If that's supposed to be "outside the structured system of the university" we are in for a long quiet revolution. The truth is more likely exactly as Bob Rae said, quoted in Johnson's article: "It is not a conspiracy . . . not revolution. It is an evolution of democracy." One can debate that the community outside should be represented rather than the those-who-are-governed-by-the-rules-make-the-rules line, but that still doesn't make the course that SAC is taking one "toward total change rather than towards compromise."

POPSICLES

This one especially bothers me: STOP PUTTING PEOPLE IN CANS! Last year the Toronto papers, Varsity included, invented Paul Fromm and the Edmund Burke Society. If there is any doubt about the EBS's significance ask how many members it has. I believe last year there were eight. What is worse, is when a person of some significance is turned into a snow sculpture, like David DePoe. This year it seems to be Andy Wernick. I saw him at the office yesterday and I touched him on the cheek to make sure he wasn't made of paper.

If Andy was the mad Trotskyite he was depicted (sorry, Andy) he wouldn't be on the SAC he is supposed to think is all but useless and wouldn't be voting for resolutions like Rae's. Don't turn men into popsicles. Ditto re Langdon: "Trying to keep a tenuous control over SAC and the university". If he controlled the U., he wouldn't be bitching so much. AND NOBODY CONTROLS SAC, as I said before, thank God. That's what the bloody "revolution" is about. If you don't know that you don't know L. or W., and you don't read the Varsity. We don't want Langdon, me or anybody else for pope. One is already too many.

Johnson's piece, in spite of the above, shows he might well write the best stuff on SAC in years. But the situation is serious. There are too many common problems to be labelling parts of the student community with value-laden terms. The union makes us relatively strong. People not popsicles. I'm sober now. I do none harm, I say none harm, I think non harm. And if this be not enough to keep a man alive, in good faith I long not to live.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE

University College's orientation was centered around the political aspect of student life at U. of T.

During the week of initiation, the freshmen were often lectured at and the conclusions of many of these speeches offered a surprisingly one-sided view in favor of some of the most radical political elements on campus and in SAC.

For instance, the focal point of a day spent at Albion Hills was a "confrontation" between SAC President Stephen Langdon and Ernest Sirluck, Dean of Graduate Studies. Langdon used the occasion to outline many of SAC's planned programs for the year.

Many of the freshmen seemed to feel threatened by this, but there were others who accepted it all very naively.

A Calgary boy in MPC said it was really great all this "activism" is out in the open. "It shows what a really democratic place the University of Toronto must be," was his comment.

But, he added seriously, he has not accepted the SAC line word for word. He is "weighing it out."

Freshmen found they had an opportunity to evaluate some of the comments presented to them in the discussion. But they often felt the confrontation went on solely between the assigned speakers and the senior students who were in charge of the weekend.

"You see," said one UC freshman, "I don't mind listening to all this activist talk. I'll wait until classes start before I decide whether or not I want to criticize professors or the system."

This was the general tenor of the freshman comments at UC.

But the program was saturated with student political talk and literature. This created a lot of dissatisfaction among students who had come to the university with high academic and social expectations.

These freshmen were particularly upset by the negative bent that many of the talks had taken and by the negative picture painted of the university in this year's handbook.

An Honors science student proclaimed the activists "idiots" and felt that too many complaints about the university had ruined her weekend.

A Soc. and Phil. student from Ottawa said, "I wish they would say something nice about this place."

Another summed up his reactions as follows:

"These monstrous groups serve to point out how apathetic the university really is. That's why they want us to become involved. This is really a great opportunity for freshmen to do so if we can do it intelligently. And I loved the discussions — it was much better than just having fun all the time."

SCARBOROUGH COLLEGE

But the confrontation and student activism didn't radiate from all college orientation programs.

"We had a great orientation," commented a freshman from Scarborough college. "We had big brothers and kissing cousins and yelled 'Down with SAC the whole time. But my feet are killing me!'"

INNIS COLLEGE

At Innis College, the program had been planned for weeks. The goal was to turn people on, to make them aware of just what kind of an institution they were entering.

In August, a mailing list was sent out to all freshmen. Included were articles by Innis graduate Bob Bossin on

THE TEXTBOOK STORE

"How Highschools Wreck You", by Varsity Editor Paul Macrae on "Varsity as Education" and the President's Report for 1966-67.

First day of registration, new students were confronted with a display model illustrating the production-line type of registration process they were to plow through.

Monday night was discussion night and once again the popular topics were student power and the democratization of the university.

Ken Stone, vice-president of the Ontario Union of Students and a recent graduate of the college spoke to freshmen, pleading with them not to accept everything in university life blindly.

Claire Booker, chairman of the orientation committee, was happy with the results of the program.

"At least we got them talking and thinking about education," she commented. But other members of the Innis executive were critical of the program, she said.

Apparently, some of the students had been "turned on." Later in the week they set out themselves to construct a university game modelled after snakes and ladders on the front campus. But it was torn down by a group of Pharmacy freshmen before they were finished.

"Innis frosh were really disappointed about that," Claire said.

Thursday night of orientation week an education seminar had been planned. But the committee found themselves with a very small group. Freshmen had gone either to attend the first SAC general meeting or to watch films the committee had provided.

At the end of the week, it seemed that some students had been disappointed. But there was a hard core who thought the week of events had left them more aware of the environment they were entering.

"Now I won't be surprised if I find that lectures are un-inspiring," said one new student. "Now I'm prepared for some disappointment and I guess it's our job to try to improve things around here."

VICTORIA COLLEGE

"Perhaps if we'd had some advice from SAC we could have had a more politically oriented program," said Susan Black, president of the Victoria College Union Council.

"We knew from the start that our program would have to be structured because of the large number of freshmen — 800. But we arranged it so that there were a number of activities going on simultaneously so that students could choose what they wanted to do."

The Vic program was socially geared with picnics, dances, and a trip to Bolton Camp for underprivileged children as well as the traditional library and campus tours.

"I would have liked to have seen more chances for confrontation about aspects of the university," commented one Vic freshman interviewed last week.

"For a program to be really effective it takes a good year of planning," Sue Black said.

"Next year I hope to have a more politically geared initiation," she added. "But the important thing is to present alternatives to the freshmen."

NEW COLLEGE

Like Vic, New College freshmen were wrapped up in the swing of social activities.

"I was surprised at the freshman class this year at New College," said Barbi Reisman, chairman of the orientation committee.

"They were more outspoken and they really expressed an interest in student politics."

One night an unofficial debate between New College Dean Stager and SAC vice-president Norm Schachar resulted in mixed and often hostile reactions from freshmen, she said.

"What a lot of bullshit," one freshman commented in disgust.

The student felt that each of the debators was trying to win the students to his side. He suggested that being at the debate was like being presented with a critical review without having read the book.

"It's like a three-ring circus. You don't know just who you're supposed to listen to. Can't we decide for ourselves, after we've tasted the system?" he commented.

"We didn't want to push any one idea down their throats," Barb added. "We want to give them time to judge for themselves."

ENGINEERING

Even the engineers cut out the traditional hazing they've been famous for. Interest turned more towards course content and controversial issues such as the relevance of their English course and the high cost of their books and equipment, EngSoc President Bob MacCallum reported.

Freshmen who gained early admission were invited to a series of five evenings of informal discussions throughout the summer where they discussed their courses and met professors.

There were basic objectives for these meetings — to raise Skule spirit, to answer questions, and to acquaint freshmen with the university.

There was even an engineering handbook for the new students.

"Its purpose was to explain the engineer's place in the university," MacCallum said "and to go over important areas that the SAC handbook failed to discuss."

Many of the frosh thought the SAC book was merely a profile of the view of a select "new left" cadre. "It gave them the wrong impression of what the university is all about," MacCallum said. "It relied on the freshman's innocence."

"In our program, we didn't attempt to smother anyone with any kind of political stand. Discussion about the handbook came up among the freshmen themselves. We want to give them time to evaluate themselves and make their own decisions regarding the whole spectrum of student politics."

"Most engineers don't understand SAC and it's up to the individual to find out where it's at," he commented. "We told freshmen to accept the handbook at its face value."

But the engineers didn't give up all their ideas about fun. They spent an afternoon at Hart House Farm where they labored under eagle-eyed seniors.

"But they don't have respect for age unless its bottled," said MacCallum with exasperation. "They attacked us — all 300 of them — and I mean attacked!"

MEDICINE

The medical faculty has no initiation as such since its pre-med students are registered in either Innis or New College.

But Stan Kushnir, president of the Medical Society had some comments to make regarding the medical faculty's role in relation to SAC.

"There are students on the Faculty Council who are in a position to influence significant curriculum changes. We prefer to work within the system although many of my personal goals in the Faculty are in general agreement with SAC's."

"This does not however necessarily reflect the general view of students in the faculty. Many were upset by the content of the SAC handbook," commented Kushnir.

HELP SAC NEEDS PEOPLE FOR SACWORK

The questionnaire distributed with the Handbook indicates that many of you in conjunction would like to work for SAC. The following groups will work with SAC and are free to make proposals — action, financial, or policy — to SAC at any time.

CRUG

The CRUG group will draw up a brief to the commission co-sponsored by the national unions of students, faculty, and administrations to look into relations between Canadian universities and governments. What is university autonomy? What about academic freedom? Can the university be free from the society which pays so much of the bill?

Community Action

There are many groups on campus working on projects in different lower income areas of Toronto. Community Action people would keep track of them all, study developments in Community Action programs in other urban areas, and perhaps arrange a conference later this year to bring all concerned groups to gether.

Faculty Liaison

Students on this campus have little contact with the faculty about mutual problems, e.g. the housing shortage, parking, overcrowded lectures, etc. We need to meet with concerned faculty members and study the possibility of common action.

High Schools

High School students are beginning to challenge the lack of control they have over their affairs: such as student newspapers, student government, etc. They have many questions about university life. The High Schools group will meet with High School students to discuss common projects and to plan visits to the High Schools which can be relevant to the students.

Political Action

A group to keep track of the stands of various political parties and politicians on matters of concern to us, such as housing, government financing of universities, student aid, etc. The group might choose to publicize stands taken by various people or parties, or to meet with politicians to discuss our concerns. Student action taken during the last provincial election is an example of what could result from the group.

University Research

A group to investigate where university research grants come from, and the implications, if any, of funding by particular agencies. Is our university becoming a servant of industry?

Campus Centre

A Campus Centre with recreational, eating, and meeting facilities, is still on the drawing boards. It faces many hurdles including conflicts with city zoning by-laws, inadequate government financing, etc. The group will consider ways and means of getting our Centre off the drawing boards and into the ground (at Russell and St. George).

Trade Union Liaison

We have many common concerns with the unions. Housing and accessibility to higher education are the most obvious and there are others. This group would establish contact with various unions in the Toronto area and discuss problems that concern us both.

Please leave your name, address, phone number, and the group you are interested in at the SAC office, south of Hart House, or phone 923-6221. The group chairman will then contact you. Most groups should be functioning by early October.

If there is sufficient interest, we will establish groups on the following:

Nigeria and Biafra
The Watkins Report and Foreign Ownership in Canada
The Czechoslovakian situation
Rhodesia and South Africa

DIRECT SAC WORK

SAC Commissions will also be looking for volunteers to work on:
Communications
Cultural Affairs
Education
External Affairs
Finance
Services

Still Nothing Interesting?

If you would like to set up a group on something entirely different from any of these topics, call Martha Tracey at 923-5664.

SAC is an unjust élite: Fromm

Over 80 per cent of the Students Administrative Council is "rebellious and leftist", says Paul Fromm SAC member, (II SMC).

Fromm levelled the charge at a St. Michael's College meeting, where about 20 of his constituents gathered to hear his appeal for a public opinion poll on campus.

"Most SAC members feel democracy means more power for SAC and not for the general mass of students," Fromm said.

"SAC is an unjust elite unresponsive to the students' views."

He called for an independent opinion testing poll on SAC and on membership in the Canadian and Ontario unions of students.

He said a referendum on CUS membership is "essential".

He also charged a "radical majority" in power had rigged SAC election laws making it almost impossible to impeach SAC members since one quarter of all students in the college have to sign the impeachment proceedings.

Fromm also attacked the image of students projected by some student leaders.

He elaborated on this point by reading extracts from a speech by OUS vice president Ken Stone in which the words fuck and shit appeared repeatedly.

Registrars rarely razzed

One of the few university departments not to come under heavy student criticism this year is the office of the college registrar.

Despite large enrolments at Victoria, University and Trinity Colleges, appointments are NOT needed for a student to discuss course or subject changes with a competent advisor.

New and Trinity College registrars take one hour for lunch. Innis and Victoria close two hours, while UC closes one and a half hours. No colleges report complaints about their hours.

LGMB Storms York

University of Toronto forces Friday engaged in limited skirmishing with York University units Friday, according to a usually reliable source.

The action took place after dusk on the Keele and Steeles campus. The Toronto attack was led by LGMB guerillas.

Earlier in the evening, the LGMB had brought a breath of culture to the otherwise animalistic Freshman Welcome.

Following this, the battalion proceeded in convoy north to York. LGMB propaganda chief Balex explained, "We wanted to bring some cough to the culturally deprived peoples of the north."

Arriving at the York ice rink, the U of T forces deployed in marching formation. Supported by commandos of BFC division, they stormed the building and quickly captured the stage.

The LGMB Cong, known also as the "Symphony Orchestra Band" (SOB), gave a stirring performance. Technique was faultless, and intonation superb. The highlight was "Mickey Mouse" in D Major. The Staccatos, an Ottawa rock group, joined forces with the LGMB for the number.

At this point the skirmish occurred. There was scuffling as York units attempted to capture the SOB banner. The enemy was repulsed and both the banner and the causes of Liberty and Culture saved.

Further limited action occurred as the LGMB Cong and BFC Cong attempted to retire. An LGMB helmet was lost.

The thief was pursued for three miles but managed to elude the People's forces by a subversive trick.

Our Boys returned to harass York students.

The LGMB expects Friday's brief encounter will result in escalation of the U of T-York conflict which has been simmering for several years. Apparently on Saturday the LGMB purchased several trench mortars, two incendiary bombs and a Sherman tank, in anticipation of further incidents.

As a public service to the York student who stole the helmet, the LGMB wishes to announce that headgear self-destructs when placed on a non-LGMB head.

A group of about 50 students joined more than 400 trade unionists at City Hall Square Saturday morning in a mass two-hour protest against cancellation of the Winter Works Program. Students council President Steve Langdon told the crowd many problems, including housing and unemployment, were common to both worker and student.

Frosh Comment On Varsity Welcome

BY AGI LUKACS

For an unexpected moment the manswarm in Varsity Arena froze. Then the writhing to the rock n' roll group's blasting sound began again.

Then it was all repeated. Abe Mudrik, Chairman of the Blue and White Society says two inebriated guys kept pulling out the amplifiers' plugs.

But what about those tales of freshie virgins unable to escape the clutches of Older Men on Campus? This observer saw a lot of men and girls milling about on the floor and just not mixing at all.

But maybe the other diversions offered were too distracting. The LGMB turned up, for instance, with a frenzied go-go girl in tow.

There were politicos there too. The Communists were there. The Edmund Burke Society was there. So were conservatives, Liberals, Teach-In people, Toronto Student Movement-ers, and a Canadian-Canadien.

And if the freshie chicks came away with nothing else, they could grab a copy of a pamphlet put out by the U of T committee on Birth Control.

First dance I've been to where there were such opportunities.

Friday . . . maybe I'll meet some Toronto women. (Hey, I've only been here a week and already they're women, not girls!)

Freshmen Welcome, eh? So bring on the women!

Well, no luck yet.

Oh, hi there, friend! Having any success? Have you figured out how to break up these little gaggles of girls? Do you interrupt them in the middle of their obviously fascinating conversations? Do you have to get a bunch of guys to ask the whole group to dance? Sure is different from a high school dance back home in the stix.

Enter the LGMB. They've won competitions? You must be kidding! Well, they've got spirit, anyway.

"Clear back, outa the way"

. . . Man, that little cannon makes a helluva noise. But why did the guys run out like that? What's the cop doing? Oh, it's illegal, is it? The principal sure wouldn't have stood for that last year. Toronto girls aren't half bad, once you meet a few. But you've got to be careful you don't say too much until you make sure she's a frosh too

— you never know how an upperclasswomen (bow, scrape) might react to one of us pariahs.

Overheard: ". . . took off everything and was standing there naked! . . ." What's this I missed? Damn! A little excitement and I didn't find out about it until too late. Oh, well, the dance wasn't that bad. I met some okay girls — sorry, women — and there's that dance tomorrow at Hart House, and there'll be more next week, and the week after. I can afford to take my time.

I guess.

MINIMUM FOUR STUDENT SEATS

Graduate Council accepts GSU brief

The Graduate Council of the School of Graduate Studies last week approved in principle a resolution to seat at least four elected students on the council as full voting members.

The motion was presented in a brief submitted by the Graduate Students Union.

The council, which now consists of 24 professors and nine university officials, sets academic and financial policy for all four divisions of SGS.

If the resolution is approved by the Senate and the Board of Governors, the student members will be elected next spring in each of the four divisions.

The resolution also stated that a committee be set up to recommend to Council appropriate amendments to the Senate statute governing the SGS.

The number of student representatives on the council will be determined by the committee, but the minimum will be four.

"This was a very important decision," said GSU President John Winter. "It's the first time it has happened in Canada. The council has accepted everything we asked for in our brief."

Winter said he did not consider the four seats in a 37 member council as tokenism.

"Although they will be in a minority, four people could swing a decision on an important issue," he said.

Swimmers swarm with superb strokemen

By DAVE POWELL

No one will ever accuse the Varsity swimming team of being complacent. Blues, perennial OQAA and three-time Canadian Intercollegiate champions, might be expected to rest on their laurels and take it easy until meets begin later in the term. Instead, they open their earliest training camp ever — this afternoon.

Toronto, who lost three of their top freestylers — Robin Campbell, Alan Pyle and Steve Gerring — to graduation last spring, do not intend to let any of their improving competition throughout the country catch up with them.

Campbell, who has moved up to share coaching duties with Juri Daniel, is eager to see new faces out at practice this week. There should be several places open on the team for new men.

Blues, of course, still have a wealth of talent back from last year. Team captain Gaye Stratton and veteran Theo van Ryn are the two top intercollegiate swimmers in the country. Sophomore Terry Bryon should make that a threesome by the end of this season.

The tremendous improvement of Doug MacIntosh and Bob Heatley places them among the best in the free-style and butterfly respectively.

Veteran freestylers Chris Fisher and Bob Watt, Morris Vaillancourt, Barry Bowerman and George Goldsmith, butterflyers Cliff Gentle and Klaus Koch and backstroker Don Carr round out an impressive lineup of swimming talent.

One of the open spaces available on the team will be amply filled by freestyler Mike Guinness. Guinness, a TSSAA champion in high school, should reach intercollegiate stardom in short order.

POOL PATTERN... Practices are held at Hart House on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, beginning at 4:45 p.m. ... Anyone interested in trying out for the team is welcomed by the coaching staff.

Curve ball a myth

University physics courses are being used by major league baseball to perpetuate the curve ball myth, says Ernest Lowry of Ball-Flight Research.

Lowry, in an open letter to Prime Minister Trudeau, warns that "Canada's World prestige as a leader of science could suffer as a result of the introduction of major league baseball in Montreal."

He claims "professional baseball in America expanded as a result of an optical illusion of curve being exploited as an actual spectacular feat by pitchers."

Correction—Professor Kenneth McNaught's remarks at last week's Students Administrative Council meeting, as reported in The Varsity Friday, require clarification.

The professor said he felt the Association of the Teaching Staff would support SAC's request for three rather than two seats on the University Government Commission, but doubted the ATS would support a demand to deprive the two Board of Governors members of voting rights.

MUSTANGS USE LATE SURGE TO UPSET GRID BLUES

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

The recipe for an SIFL exhibition game is relatively simple to follow. Just mix warm sunshine, shirt-sleeved spectators, multitudinous mistakes, and, above all, enormous yawns as two coaches experiment endlessly with huge, unwieldy rosters.

For three quarters Saturday afternoon in London, Varsity Blues and Western Mustangs followed these directions perfectly.

Unfortunately, just before the game was done, Mustangs threw in an unlooked-for, added ingredient — excitement. The result was a 29-21 victory over Blues as Western thrilled more than 6,000 jubilant spectators by rampaging for all 29 points in the final quarter.

Young, second-string quarterback, Kevin St. Michael, was the main culprit, coming off the bench to fire two touchdown passes, including the winner to Bruce Hough with little more than two minutes to play. Moments later, 'Stangs' Gairey Richardson iced the game (that wasn't in the recipe, either) by romping 34 yards over the goal line with an interception.

Though only an exhibition game, victory was sweet for coach John Metras who has become almost a Newfie joke over the years with his two-yards-and-a-cloud-of-dust football. True to ol' Jaw'n's warning, Mustangs unleashed a pretty potent pass attack on Saturday, which tore holes in Blues' usually competent secondary.

Joe Cipparone and St. Michael combined to complete 14 passes for 224 yards and bree touchdown.

Blues' aerial work, on the other hand, was woefully weak. Vic Alboini had a miserable afternoon with only four completions in 16 attempts.

This was the tiny quarterback's first real taste of action since he suffered severely torn knee ligaments last year. Asked if, perhaps, he was a bit self-conscious about re-injuring his leg, Alboini shrugged, "No, it didn't bother me at all. I was self-conscious about the ten man rush!" Western had a good, strong pass rush all game.

However, the game was pretty much a Toronto success story for the first three quarters.

Varsity opened the scoring at the seven minute mark of the second quarter when Paul McKay broke free through the middle from 23 yards out. He converted his own touchdown.

Rookie Don Karn, who quarter-backed Victoria College last year, replaced Alboini for the remainder of the half. Karn showed well, smoothly directing an 80 yard march for Blues' second touchdown. Keith Johnson bulled over from the three. McKay converted.

The half ended with Blues ahead 14-0 and snores filling the air.

Rugged Peter Raham gave Toronto their seemingly insurmountable 21-0 margin by carrying an interception of a Cipparone pass 20 yards into the end zone. Bill Stankovic converted.

Then the deluge began as the fourth quarter opened. Cipparone lofted a short pass to Stu Behie for the first Western touchdown, Dennis Walt Sehr (30) breaks loose for big gain on play which led to Blues' second touchdown in 29-21 loss to Western. Mark Sleter (dark 70) and Alex Squires (61) look on after providing key blocks while Ottevio Collisimo (55) and D'Alton Coleman (light 70) give chase. Bob Larose (73) checks to make sure Sehr's boots are securely tied.

Walker kicked a 44 yd single. St. Michael passed 48 yards to Bruce Macrae for the second, and Hough and Richardson completed the job.

As the result would indicate, Toronto was a tired, listless, disorganized team at the end. And surprisingly, Western's late surge came against the first string defense.

But for all those ready to push the panic button at a relatively poor showing by a team generally considered the best college unit in the country, a few observations should be made.

First of all it was an exhibition game, and coach Ron Murphy treated it as such. Disdaining ordinary punt and field goal situations, Blues gave up the football five times on third down.

And it's true, the team was a trifle over-confident, especially with a 21-0 lead going into the final quarter. The loss may even be a blessing in disguise as Blues were made painfully aware that reputation alone isn't enough to win ball games. Remember what happened to Queen's last year.

Also, Western has been vastly under-rated. They came on strong at the conclusion of last year, and have a lot of men back. When Coach Metras claims he has the best secondary in the league, one is forced to agree with him.

Finally, double-threat half-back Mike Raham was on the shelf. He was sorely missed.

One bright light for Blues, who did take up some of Raham's slack, was speedy back Walt Sehr. He rushed for 49 yards in five carries.

Anyway, hopefully, one Mustang player will prove prophetic. In the happy Western dressing room after the game, he confided, "Sure we're real glad to win this one, but Blues are still number one."

Even gang teckling had little effect on Varsity Blues as they whipped University of Michigan teams twice. Here, Tony Pierre stretches over Michigan goal line for an early try.

Rugger teams sweep

Varsity rugger Blues began their season over the weekend with two convincing wins over their opponents from University of Michigan.

In the "First" game, Blues won 18-3 on tries by Tony Pierre, Harding and kicking by Andy Gibson. Blues, who seemed to have an edge in speed and experience over their American opponents, scored three quick tries in the first half to dominate the game.

In the scrum, Peter Hand, Al Hamilton and Richard Van Banning all played aggressively giving Blues possession of the ball for the greater part of the contest.

Michigan's lone try came from a short run after a penalty had been called late in the second half.

In the junior match, Blues' backs performed beautifully in winning 18-0. Putting in outstanding performances were halfbacks Doug Woods and Bob Noble, and forwards John Milkeraitis and Gord Richardson.

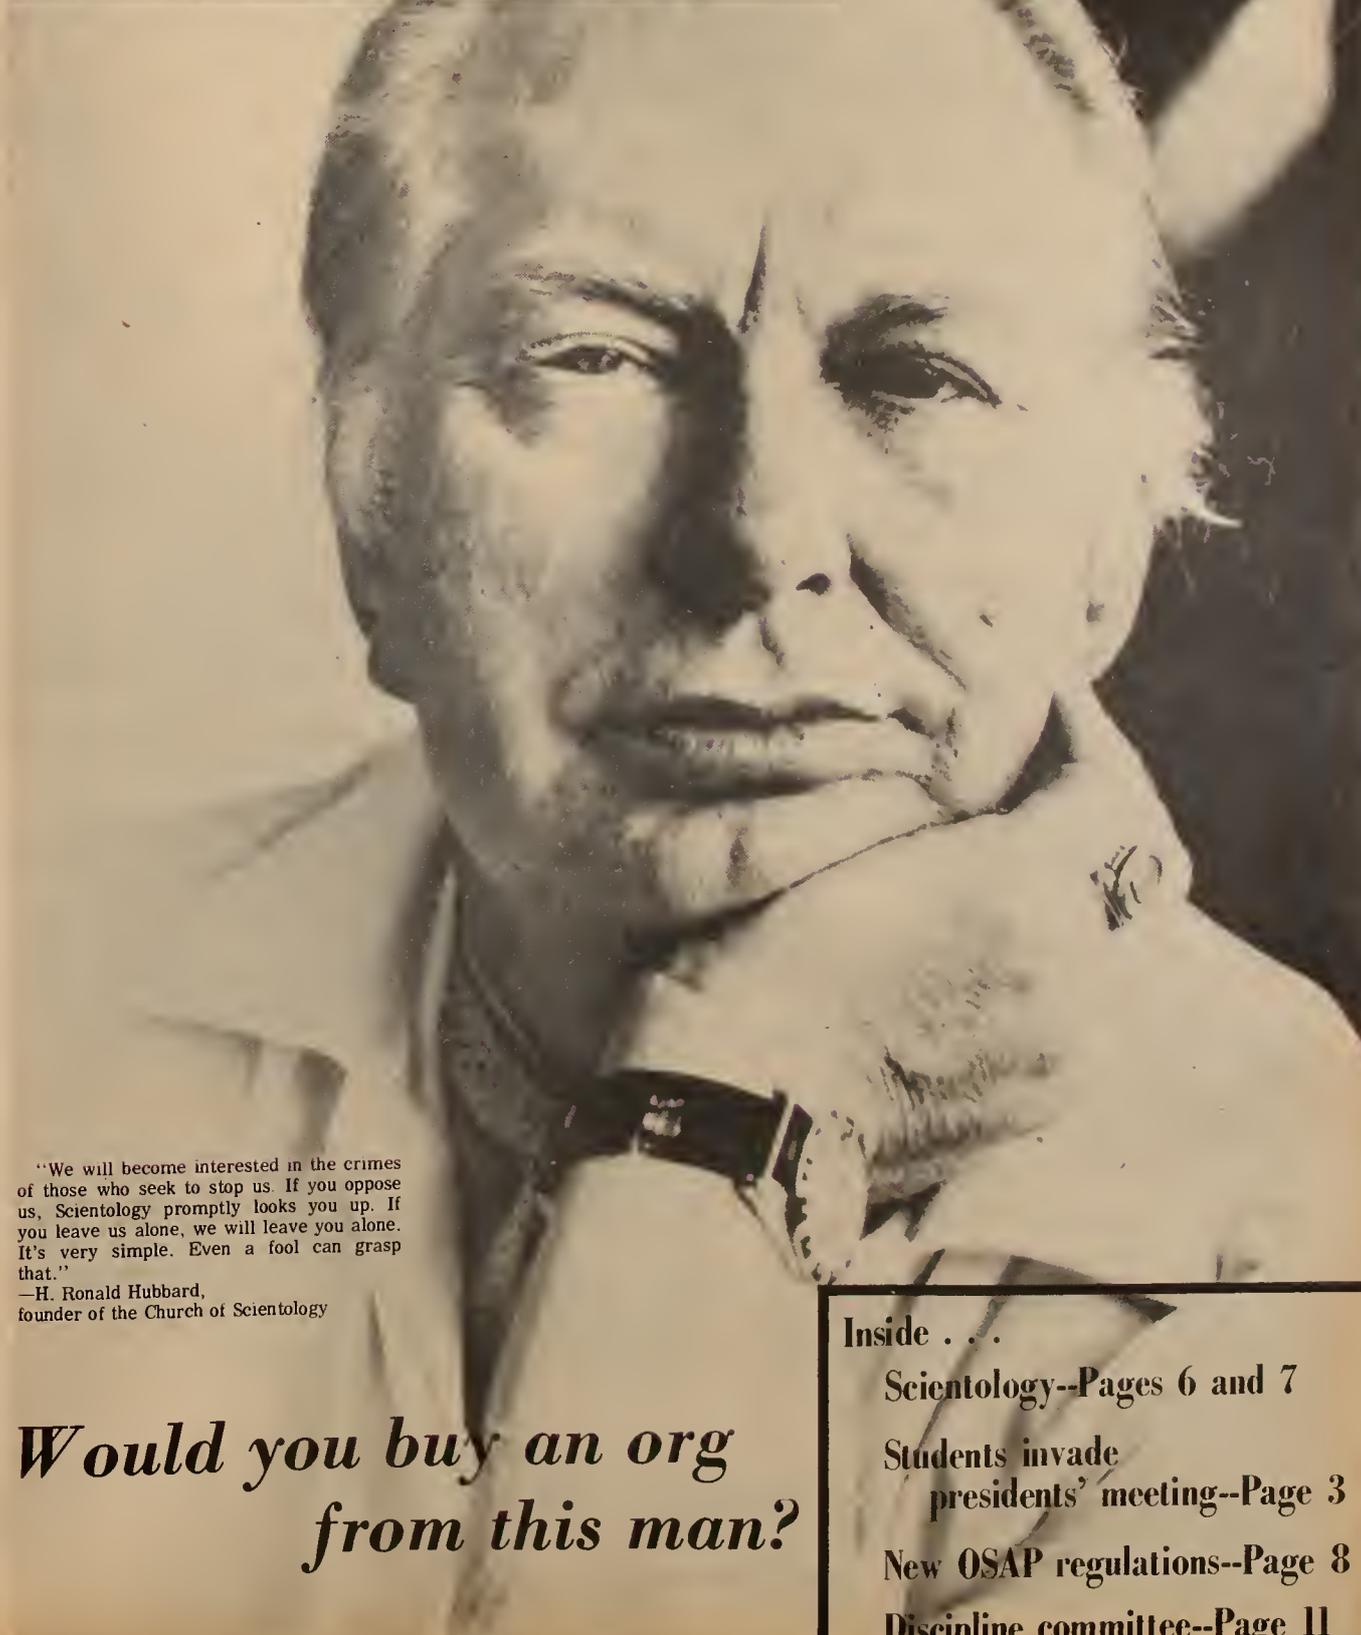

Because of the large number of experienced players trying out for the first team this season, Junior Blues are fielding one of their strongest teams in year. Their next game is against Osgoode Law School next Saturday.

IN THE SCRUM . . . Peter Hand, injured early in the second half, is expected to return to the lineup for next week's contest with U of T 'Old Boys'. This team of Varsity Graduates includes such stars of past seasons as Paul Wilson and Richard Hayman and should be one of the toughest Blues face all season.

FIVE STUDENTS TAKE PART

Presidents' Meeting Invaded

By ANNE BOODY

Two members of the Ontario Union of Students and three students Monday crashed a top-secret meeting of the Committee of University Affairs, to protest "unfair representation" of universities on the committee.

The CUA is officially "an advisory body to the minister of University Affairs and the government on matters of higher education." In fact it acts as a buffer, mainly on financial matters, between the minister and Ontario's 14 universities.

The five were protesting the CUA's recognition of the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario (CPUO) as the official voice of the academic community.

To speak to the secret committee, the intruders slipped into an elevator and headed for the 10th floor board room of a University Ave. building.

The stop light went on and the doors opened on the seventh floor. They stood face to face with the CUA members. There was a blank stare from both sides and an embarrassed silence.

Finally: "We're going up, what about you?" asked Ken Stone, vice-president of OUS.

The visitors received a big surprise at the top. Not only was it a meeting of the CUA — it was a joint meeting of the CUA and CPUO.

"We'll kill two birds with one stone," one visitor joked.

The presidents and their academic colleagues sipped coffee and caught up on the latest news, casting curious glances at the five students seated at the back of the room.

"Mr. Ken Stone from the OUS wants to make a few remarks before the meeting gets underway," CUA chairman Dr. Douglas Wright said.

Stone said: "We don't think the Committee of Presidents should be the official voice of the academic community on this body."

Dr. Wright replied that matters such as salaries were to be discussed, and felt that this wasn't really a matter of public concern.

"As members of the academic community I don't think this information should be private," said Stone. "I make $75.00 a week minus deductions."

"I'd say you're overpaid," Claude Bissell laughed.

"The university belongs to the students and the faculty as well as the administrators, and we should have fair representation on these committees," Stone called out.

"Each president here has an academic colleague with him elected by the Senate," Dr. Wright replied. "I'd say that is fairly representative."

"If you consider the senate a true representative body of the University," Stone shot back.

There was another embarrassing silence.

In exasperation Dr. Wright finally asked the group if they'd like to be excused.

"No," replied Stone.

"Pardon?" answered Dr. Wright.

"No, thank you," said Stone.

Dr. Wright told the group if they didn't leave, the meeting would be adjourned. At this, the five students stood up and left without a fuss.

And the joint meeting began.

SAC Bookstore — no profit

By JOHN THOMAS

"Us? $7000?" asked David Shute (IV UC), the boss of SAC Books.

We were sitting on some books in his temporary stockroom on the third floor at Rochdale College. The Cream was on tape. And a lovely blonde lass was pleasantly wound around Shute.

"No, $7000 would be the gross. The point is that we make absolutely no profit. That is the purpose of the store," he explained.

If the purpose is to make no profit SAC Books is doing very well. In fact, it will probably even lose money this year.

But this is normal for a bookstore and the response has been "very encouraging" although the store handles only first-year texts at present. Features include a 10 per cent discount on all books and a book-order service with the discount.

"The idea is to give the margin to the students," said Shute. "It all began last winter when the Textbook Store refused to give the students a real hand in operating things."

"SAC's idea was that the most important thing is discounts. The Textbook Store's is not big enough. We wanted to reduce superfluous services like charge accounts and excessive staff, economize the operation, and give as big a discount as possible."

By Monday, the store will have moved to the second floor of Rochdale directly above the SCM Bookstore.

A used-book counter will also open Monday. You bring in your old books and set your own price. SAC Books then takes 10 per cent of the profit if the book is sold.

"Am I planning any retaliation did you say?" asked Textbook Store manager Charles Fanning over the phone last night.

Fanning said he didn't think SAC's competition was hurting the university store's sales.

"I mean it's probably easy to give a 10 per cent discount if you've only got 50 titles."

Just in case any of you still think this is a community of scholars dedicated to developing the individual, a few golden moments.

Moment one: Three Political Science courses are offered in the general program at this university — Pol Sci 300, 301, 302. Two of them — 300 and 302 — are scheduled at the same time.

One co-ed, who PWH'd her second year honors course, decided to take third year general. She was particularly annoyed at the timetable conflict because she had already taken the 301 course in second year honors. So she raced to her college registrar to get an explanation.

"Why, when only three courses are offered, are two at the same time?" she asked the registrar's assistant (who is a very nice person).

The assistant muttered something about a computer, and the fact you are only allowed two courses anyway.

"But I don't want to take a course I've already had," the co-ed explained. "Why can't I take an honors course instead?"

"You had a PWH last year," the assistant said. "This is a chance to do a better job on the course."

The co-ed explained that while she got a PWH overall, she had gotten an "A" in the course in question.

"Well, all you want is a degree, don't you?" the assistant asked.

"I'm more interested in an education," replied the co-ed.

Instead of being transferred to an honors course, she had to take the general course again.

Moment two: A young Cambridge graduate was applying for a fellowship at U of T, but he had one problem. Cambridge doesn't, for some obscure reason, give out transcripts of marks. U of T, for some equally obscure reason, demands transcripts.

The graduate pondered this a while. Then he wrote a long letter of application, including every mark he had ever gotten, plus the names of several tutors the university could contact to check him out. He even included the name of his MA advisor at a university in the Maritimes.

In due time he received in the mail a mimeographed letter with four lines stating, in essence, "We need a transcript".

Now, fortunately, the fellow in question knew somebody who knew the head of his department and was interceded for. He got in, as he deserved to.

A small bureaucratic point, transcripts, which could have affected his whole career.

The point of these golden moments, in case you haven't guessed, is to indicate the place of the individual at this university. The moral is as follows:

"In a toss-up between individuals and rules, the rules win (almost) every time."

Maybe we can do something by ## mini-profits?

Well, the Bookstore is at it again, using mini-skirted guides, piped-in music, and nifty sales gimmicks. This year the gimmick is wooden matches, dispensed by a co-ed with the longest legs on campus. The music is pure Cohen and Co., which we suppose might put you in the mood to buy your Philosophy 101 texts but doesn't do much for the Engineers.

The Bookstore seems to operate on the theory that if it adds enough frills, the students will forget they still only get a five per cent discount when the professors get ten, forget that they usually have to buy the most expensive editions, and forget that the chances are good that the books they are looking for probably aren't even there.

Actually, the Bookstore might be outsmarting itself. We went in last week, and after getting past the entrance wicket, the mini-skirt handing out shopping bags at the bottom of the stairs, the shorter mini-skirt handing out shopping bags half way up the stairs, and the various micro-skirts wandering around the second floor, we found ourselves in front of the Economics section, without the slightest idea of what we came in for.

But we got our matches on the way out.

printing these stories and maybe we can't. If you want to try we're at 91 St. George, second floor.

HELP SAC NEEDS PEOPLE FOR SACWORK

The questionnaire distributed with the Handbook indicates that many of you in conjunction would like to work for SAC. The following groups will work with SAC and are free to make proposals — action, financial, or policy — to SAC at any time.

CRUG

The CRUG group will draw up a brief to the commission co-sponsored by the national unions of students, faculty, and administrations to look into relations between Canadian universities and governments. What is university autonomy? What about academic freedom? Can the university be free from the society which pays so much of the bill?

Community Action

There are many groups on campus working on projects in different lower income areas of Toronto. Community Action people would keep track of them all, study developments in Community Action programs in other urban areas, and perhaps arrange a conference later this year to bring all concerned groups to gether.

Faculty Liaison

Students on this campus have little contact with the faculty about mutual problems, e.g. the housing shortage, parking, overcrowded lectures, etc. We need to meet with concerned faculty members and study the possibility of common action.

High Schools

High School students are beginning to challenge the lack of control they have over their affairs, such as student newspapers, student government, etc. They have many questions about university life. The High Schools group will meet with High School students to discuss common projects and to plan visits to the High Schools which can be relevant to the students.

Political Action

A group to keep track of the stands of various political parties and politicians on matters of concern to us, such as housing, government financing of universities, student aid, etc. The group might choose to publicize stands taken by various people or parties, or to meet with politicians to discuss our concerns. Student action taken during the last provincial election is an example of what could result from the group.

University Research

A group to investigate where university research grants come from, and the implications, if any, of funding by particular agencies. Is our university becoming a servant of industry?

Campus Centre

A Campus Centre with recreational, eating, and meeting facilities, is still on the drawing boards. It faces many hurdles including conflicts with city zoning by-laws, inadequate government financing, etc. The group will consider ways and means of getting our Centre off the drawing boards and into the ground (at Russell and St. George).

Trade Union Liaison

We have many common concerns with the unions. Housing and accessibility to higher education are the most obvious and there are others. This group would establish contact with various unions in the Toronto area and discuss problems that concern us both.

Please leave your name, address, phone number, and the group you are interested in at the SAC office, south of Hart House, or phone 923-6221. The group chairman will then contact you. Most groups should be functioning by early October.

If there is sufficient interest, we will establish groups on the following:

Nigeria and Biafra
The Watkins Report and Foreign Ownership in Canada
The Czechoslovakian situation
Rhodesia and South Africa

DIRECT SAC WORK

SAC Commissions will also be looking for volunteers to work on:
Communications
Cultural Affairs
Education
External Affairs
Finance
Services

Still Nothing Interesting?

If you would like to set up a group on something entirely different from any of these topics, call Martha Tracey at 923-5664.

Column and a half?

If you have to go...

This is going to be an angry Column and a Half, so if you're looking for something light and frothy, please go elsewhere. You might start with the editorials on Page Four.

Scene one: A grade 12 Latin class. The teacher, a little woman with orange hair, is writing on the blackboard. Behind her back, the students throw paper darts at the ceiling, roll soft drink cans down the aisle, pass assignments back and forth and discuss what they will do after school. When the uproar becomes too great to be ignored, the teacher turns and glares at the class. She returns to her writing, and the noise resumes.

Scene two: A second year honours university class. The lecturer is writing on the blackboard, while the students behind him divide their time between copying down his notes and talking about last Saturday's football game. He turns and asks for quiet; the noise drops momentarily, then picks up again.

For all intents and purposes the two scenes are interchangeable. And for me they point up the greatest single stumbling block in the path of educational reform. That stumbling block is the attitude of the individual student.

REACTIONS

Now let's get one thing straight. I'm not talking here about the reaction of students to the spectre of campus violence, or even their supposed apathy to on-campus politics. Nor am I concerned with the so-called democratization of university government.

What I'm talking about is the student's reluctance to accept even the most minimal reforms, including those generated from within the system. You can't change the system without changing the student's attitudes, and that attitude right now seems to be, "O.K., here I am, now educate me."

CHALLENGE

The first manifestation of this attitude may be seen in every class on the campus. Each contains students who are there for no apparent reason. They are unprepared, ignore the lecturer, and generally are a disruptive influence within the class. Their contribution to a lecture is nil, their negative value infinite.

Perhaps this condition has become so prevalent we no longer notice it. But; (a) why go to class if you don't get anything out of it, and (b) if, given (a), you're there, why not try and make the best use of your time? Anything else is not only inconsiderate, it's completely illogical!

The challenge the current attitude poses to reforming the educational system is, I think, obvious. Until students are interested in their courses, they won't be interested in changes. They can beat the system as it stands, so why change it?

This type of reaction is already at work. This year, three third year economics professors decided to implement some aspects of the MacPherson Report. They have combined their classes, cut lectures to one hour a week, and instituted a system of workshops which will require more individual work than the old tutorial system. Students chose the subject that interests them, and the professor they want to work with during the year.

To ice the cake, lectures will not be designed to produce a course text, and the professors have applied to the Faculty of Arts and Sciences to abandon the final exam.

STUDENT STATIC

You know where the static is coming from? Not from the administration. Not from the Faculty. Definitely not from the lecturers, who are accepting a much greater work load.

The threat to these rather moderate reforms is coming from students who see the course as one with no easy way out. Typical of the comments was "I'm not taking this course, it's too heavy." Or the girl at the end of the class who asked if we were still taking the course, because to her it "looked too hard."

Faced with this type of reaction, the professors could be excused for going back to the old system of two lectures and one tutorial. The majority of the students would be happy, because they can beat that system, without even thinking.

So the ultimate question seems to be, "Can the system be changed without first changing the attitudes of the students?" To which you can add the corollary "Will the students ever change under the system as it now exists?"

Before you try to answer those questions, look around your own classes. And then ask one more question. "What happens if we don't change?"

Someday you may be walking down the street, minding your own business, when a smiling young man presses into your hand a small leaflet which offers a free personality test. The sheet goes on to describe the new confidence you will have, and promises that "You will know what you know."

Along the bottom is the underlined cry SCIENTOLOGY IS THE ROAD TO TOTAL FREEDOM.

The Hubbard Scientology Organization of Toronto is housed on the bottom floor of an old Avenue Road mansion. The casual visitor climbs a flight of stairs to enter the walk-up office, staffed by a group of determinedly friendly and decidedly firm people, who clutter the room enough to give the appearance of an efficient, business-like operation.

All hold court over small oak desks, each with a title taped across the front reading variously 'Test Evaluation', 'Registrar', or 'Accounts'. To their backs, stretching the entire length of the white wall, is a chart detailing the make-up of the world-wide Scientology Organization, headed by L. Ron Hubbard, founder, who cracks the whip over the backs of such diverse workers as the Particle Speed Flow Clerk and the Bank Reconciliation Clerk. In the middle is a dormant Telex.

The prospective test-writer is warmly welcomed, and is guided to the test area, past peering photographs of the omnipresent Hubbard. The rear of the office is taken up with extensive files which are carefully tended by a small group of the faithful. The instructions are read aloud, a question booklet and answer sheet provided, and you are left to your own devices in an unusual and often amusing contest with 200 questions.

Be prepared to answer yes, no or maybe to these probes into the hidden you.

"Do you suffer from muscle jerks or spasms? Do you think modern prisons coddle prisoners too much, and thus interfere with much-needed punishment? Do you often feel quite exhilarated (sic)?"

Your completed sheet is held overnight for evaluation, and an appointment made for explanation.

The evaluation is quite simple. A graph is drawn on a scale, and the darker the shade, the more desperate your plight. The line may soar to an 80 per cent for In Motion and plunge to a 30 for Being Effect Subjective. Once the findings are understood the subject is sent to the Registrar for advice on which Scientology course would be most beneficial, if in fact he desires help.

It is at this point in his travels through world of Scientology that the subject realizes that perhaps all is not so clear-cut as they would have you believe. Prices range from the one weekend fifteen dollars Communications Course to the 30-Hour Intensive Processing which markets at $780.00. If you ask where the money goes you are told with a cheery smile that it's none of your business and the Registrar never thought to ask. No one knows what Hubbard is up to — for the same. If you wish to know more about course activities it is suggested that you take the course and see for yourself.

None of the literature is free, because no one would give Scientology away any more than one would give gold away. In fact all further information must be bought. The cheapest pamphlet costs 50 cents and think about the implications of that.

THE RO

In an era when mankind's problems have become unprecedentedly numerous, the man who claims to hold the key to a better world can depend on considerable attention.

If he plays his cards right, he may even start a religion.

Lafayette Ronald Hubbard is such a man, and his visions of heaven have given him command over the loyalties of thousands of near-fanatic adherents to his Church of Scientology.

The aims of Scientology are simple: "A civilization without insanity, without criminals and without war, where the able can prosper and honest beings can have rights, and where Man is free to rise to greater heights..."

Scientology was resurrected in 1950 from the ashes of Dianetics, a mind-science promulgated by Hubbard in his best-seller, Dianetics: The Modern Science of Mental Health.

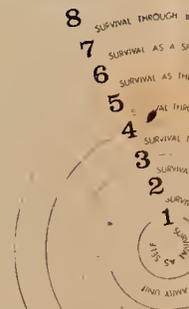

Dianetics, heralded as the ultimate cure for mental illness, collapsed under the pressures of bad publicity, internal dissension, and the mental breakdowns of several patients.

Hubbard went into seclusion, regrouped his forces, and returned with Scientology, a sort of hybrid Dianetic cult which promised men self-confidence, control over their environment, and even a higher I.Q.

The 57-year-old Hubbard is a shadowy personality. The Field Staff Member Magazine (a sort of Hubbard Manifesto), describes Hubbard's life as one of scholastic triumphs and glorious military feats, culminating in a crippling injury and blindness. Hubbard somehow cured himself and now spends his time researching the soul of man.

Hubbard's many degrees, including a Ph.D. from an American university called Sequoia, have been chal-

THE EIGHT

DAD TO CLEAR

led by many reputable sources. Recently a London newspaper called the degrees fraudulent.

In any case, his claims of having personally handled the human spirit (which he says is one quarter to two inches in diameter) and of having visited heaven twice seem incredible to say the least.

Although no one seems to know his exact whereabouts, Hubbard reportedly flits between his yachts and his Rhodesian and Spanish estates.

Scientology is nothing if not carefully organized. Running the whole machine, with three ships and branches in Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Japan, Britain, South Africa and the U.S. is Hubbard himself. Under him are several completely independent divisions who rely for guidance on a few top people at the Saint Hill Headquarters in England.

As far as one can gather from available information, each local "org" (Hubbardese for group) is run by an advanced Scientologist, usually a veteran of Saint Hill courses. He (or she) is a Scientology Clergyman, and is called either Chaplain or Ethics Officer.

Would-be converts are given a free personality test, invariably demonstrating one or more personality defects. If the initiate is concerned he may elect to sign a contract for a Scientology course, the cheapest of which costs $15.

This is the first step on the road to "Clear," the object of all Scientology courses.

"Clear" is a state of complete freedom from all emotional problems and inhibitions. It is the "highest state of existence yet attained in the universe." This "Total Freedom" costs about "as much as a car", according to the world's first "Clear," John McMaster. Actually it can cost a virtually unlimited price both financially and mentally.

Scientology courses are a confused mixture of the confessional and technical hocus-pocus. Each student is paired with an "auditor", whose task is to fire a continuous barrage of questions designed to reveal hidden inhibitions.

A few of the queries ran like this: Have you ever been blackmailed? Have you ever had sex relations with any other student or staff member? Have you ever assaulted anyone? Have you ever raped anyone? Have you ever practised sex with a member of a race of a different color? What are your views on Communism?

Carefully filed answers to these questions were discovered by Australian officials investigating Scientology in that country. They formed only part of the evidence which led to the banning of the cult in the state of Victoria.

Lending a professional air to the examination is Hubbard's own "E-Meter", "perfected after many years of painstaking research." An E-meter ($140) measures the "mental state and change of state of individuals."

Unfortunately, Scientology ensures that no one can get even as far as an E-Meter without contracting to complete each course to the movement's satisfaction. For instance, a Saint Hill intensive processing course lasting 50 hours carries a $1,000 price tag, but may be extended indefinitely under the contract at the auditor's discretion. Each additional hour costs $20.

In August of this year, an anguished Englishman appealed to the House of Commons to expose the group which he claimed had mentally tortured his 23-year-old daughter and alienated her from her family. As a result, several hundred Scientologists from Sweden and the United States, attempting to attend a conference at Saint Hill were denied entry to Britain.

The people of East Grinstead, a small town near Saint Hill, are also appealing for help in the face of a Scientology land-buying binge that has left the organization with ownership of one hotel, 20 houses and several shops.

It is a well-known fact that Scientology does not take kindly to criticism. A young American who left a course and refused to pay his outstanding fees was written: "To use the argot of the streets, I'll just start my people to work on you, and then, before long, you will be broke and out of a job and broken in health. You won't take long to finish off."

How to have an Org without really trying

BY PAUL COLEMAN

No sooner had I stepped inside the door of 116 Avenue Road than I was pounced upon by a smiling young man who assured me that Scientology was the only road to total freedom, the test was completely free, I would leave after the test "knowing what I know," and would I mind waiting?

"Well, I suppose not," I admitted and he ushered me to a flea-bitten couch which was totally surrounded by pictures of the Grand Exalted Poobah of Scientology, L. Ron Hubbard.

Close at hand were pamphlets and books which would help me, I presumed, in my great long trek from the general public to what scientology is really all about, total freedom as manifested in the state of org.

It was at this point that I began to wonder what the running price for an org was.

After waiting for some 15 or 20 minutes, I was led into a back room and seated at a long table.

Nothing very fancy here—dust, an old broken clock, and a frightening sign that read, "Personal Disputes and Complaints Handled in the Chaplain's Court". Over my right shoulder I noticed another confused young man who obviously was taking all of this in his stride. "More than likely another one of those plants from The Varsity," I thought.

But something else struck me about this floundering lost soul—he had a blue pencil; mine was green! Naturally, I asked my guide if there was any significance in that. "Well," he replied, "if you think there is—then there really is a big significance!"

It was at this point that I knew I was being put on. I wanted my mother.

The test itself, devised by Julia M. Lewis, H. D. A., B. A., B.Sc., D.Sc., D. D., consisted of 200 questions—some of which were plausible, others of which were unbelievable! Now, no one is allowed to carry this test booklet outside of the testing area, but by the use of that old sleight-of-the-hand trick common to all up and coming cub reporters, I managed to steal one. If we look at this booklet objectively we find a tremendous emphasis on physical abnormalities:

"Do some of your muscles occasionally jerk, with there being no reason for it? When unexpected things happen do some of your muscles have jerking motions? Do you have a habit of blinking your eyes, pulling at your hair, nose, ears, or some other such mannerism? Do you sometimes become so frightened or apprehensive that you have physical reactions?"

Another area of questioning, although interpretative, could be taken quite offensively:

"Do you think modern prisons coddle the prisoners too much, and so interfere with needed punishment? Are you opposed to criminals being paroled? Are you in favour of restricted residential areas to keep "inferior" races in their own places?"

Yet another set of questions was so straightforward that a wrong answer, or perhaps an honest answer—would likely set you up for an eight-week correction course which would, in turn, set you off on the right foot to the attainment of org.

"Does life seem worthwhile? Do you make tactless blunders often? Do others push you around? (shades of Charles Atlas here). Does life seem rather vague and unreal to you? Are you so pleased by life that you never considered committing suicide? Do you have any phobias?"

Finally, there is the element of confusion. Scientology has quite adeptly repeated similar questions differing perhaps only in personal interpretation, and has neatly dispersed these throughout the booklet—presuming, I suppose, that the candidate will forget question 25 when dealing with question 200 and perhaps contradict himself. But, such a contradiction may be perfectly logical and not contradictory at all, if taken within the context of personal interpretation.

Contrast, "Do you have only a few close friends rather than a large circle of friends and acquaintances? with: "Are you really fond of only a few people?" with: "Are you cordial only to close friends if at all?" with: "Do you greet people cordially?" in turn with the booklet's final question, "Do you think you have many warm friends?"

So you titter around for half an hour with these nonsensical questions, then trundle out to the front room where you think you're about to be torn apart for what you really are.

But things just weren't meant to go that way, so you make an appointment for the next day—very business-like—and then head out the front door muttering to yourself and intentionally twitching your torso.

Well, that next day for me brought an unexpected turn. Having heard various little tidbits about Scientology before taking the test, I was firmly prepared for the worst of character revelations and an all-out, hard-sell campaign to get me to sign my life and soul away to L. Ron Hubbard. This was just not the case.

The results presented me as a person who is more self-controlled than dispersed, acceptably composed, responsible, and warm-hearted, a person who scores as high as a "clear" (a clear is some kind of apostle of the Grand Exalted, who has attained a state of mind which has not as yet been even thought of by the common man) in areas of energy, aggressiveness, and feeling for others.

Ah, what the hell—I'll go along with that. However, (I began to shudder and grit my teeth at that "however") I do tend to be unhappy too much of the time, I'm slightly subjective, and a wee bit critical. Now, with a "one week-end course" which would run me $15 they could correct these slight faults of mine and mould the perfect man.

Suddenly, as I asked the young lady if L. Ron Hubbard was in any way related to Jahweh, a barrage of booklets descended from the sky and began to sell themselves to me. "The Fundamentals of Thought", "Scientology is Here to Rescue You", "The Language of Scientology"—$1, $2, $3 — this thing was getting out of hand!

Better I should save my money for Harvey's.

DYNAMICS

SAC to discuss OSAP rules

By PAUL COLLIER

New restrictions this year in the Ontario Student Awards Plan have led to such severe difficulties for U of T students that the Students Administrative Council will hold an open meeting today to discuss the problem.

The meeting will be in Room 1083, Sidney Smith Hall at 1 p.m.

A major student complaint is the altered requirements for eligibility for independent status.

Under the new rules, one fourth year Engineering student and his wife, also a student, received a total of $4,000 while a single classmate, self-supporting for two years and working full time for the last year, is still classed as a dependent.

Education Minister William Davis made it clear in a recent statement he considers the prime responsibility for providing funds for education to rest with the student and his family.

In keeping with this policy, several OSAP regulations have been tightened, partly because the Student Awards Branch overspent its 1967 budget by nearly $6,000,000.

Although the anticipated number of aid applications this year is 55,000 (12,000 more than last year) the amount of money estimated to be available in Federal Guaranteed Loans — $23,000,000 — is only $500,000 more than last year.

Despite repeated charges by the press, cheating on aid applications does not appear to be an important factor in the present restrictions.

Lin Peebles, a department of university affairs spokesman, said that in 1967 about six per cent of applications were rejected, most because the students' parents earned too much. "In fact," he added, "I don't know of any single case where cheating has been proved."

Some students whose applications were delayed by the recent mail strike or which are under appeal have been forced to negotiate short-term loans with the banks to cover initial instalments of fees.

The student with no established credit often has difficulty obtaining such a loan and no provision has been made for deferment of fees under these circumstances.

A SAC source sheet on OSAP also draws attention to the failure of the plan to alter the essentially middle and upper class composition of the universities. It calls on those trying to change the program to seek improvements which would assist groups presently excluded from universities.

Nurses protest lack of choice

By MARY BASTEDO

About 70 third and fourth year nursing students met yesterday afternoon at Cody Hall to prepare two petitions protesting restrictions on the arts options offered them.

Fourth year students are protesting a recent cut-down in their choice of sociology options. Last year's four sociology courses have been cut down to one — industrial sociology, which most nurses don't want anyway. The other three courses conflict with a compulsory clinical course.

"What we want is the option of deciding for ourselves," said Maureen Montemuro (IV Nurs.). "We're old enough to take the responsibility of missing classes if we decide we want to."

The second petition, initiated by third year students, protests the narrow choice of arts options available to first year students in the new curriculum introduced this year.

The petitions will be presented to the nursing faculty tomorrow.

Students council president Steve Langdon was present at the meeting for "advice" and "organizational guidance" at the request of Miss Mowat.

"This raises some important questions about the need for greater choice of arts options in all the professional faculties and better treatment of the professions by the arts departments," he said.

"I'm excited to see that the students are actually doing something and not just accepting what they don't like."

Hansard records freedom of speech

OTTAWA (CUP) — Student As Nigger has been introduced into the Senate Hansard as "indoctrination papers" of the Canadian Union of Students.

Liberal Senator Donald Cameron introduced the article to expose the student activists as "the suppurating sore of intellectual subversion."

Mr. Cameron based his criticism on CUS President Peter Warrion's misquoted statement about student power burning the universities down.

According to Cameron, "hippie professors" and academic "also-rans" are aiding the activists.

The motion to append the article to Hansard was passed without debate, though several members, including the Senate speaker, had not read it.

An effort is being made by Postmaster Eric Kierans to prevent "such filthy and immoral literature" from being distributed in the universities.

Incidentally, you can find Student As Nigger in Senate Hansard, Vol. 117, No. 5.

..and Memorial puts it into practice

ST. JOHN'S, Nfld. (CUP) — The 16-member student council of Memorial University was threatened with expulsion Friday after the council advised freshmen to boycott the formal freshmen admission ceremony.

Administration President Lord Stephen Taylor said the council could suffer the "gravest personal consequences" as a result of the boycott.

The council was protesting the placement of students who are weak in some subjects into a "foundation" year.

Only 250 out of 1500 students showed up at the ceremony Saturday.

Discipline takes priority over change

The Presidential Advisory Committee on Disciplinary Procedures (Campbell committee) will hold a public meeting today at 7 p.m. in Sidney Smith Hall, Room 3050.

Students have been invited to speak and address questions to the committee members.

Wayne Hankey (SGS), one of the three SAC appointees to the 10-man committee, discussed the Campbell committee recently with Varsity reporter Joe Laufer.

By JOE LAUFER

The university is more interested in minor adjustments to the rules in order to appease students than in a commitment to basic reform, says Hankey.

"For the university, discipline is first, change comes second.

"The real question is who controls the university, and decides what the rules are?"

Hankey feels the university used the wrong priorities in setting up a committee on university government seven months after the Campbell committee.

"The structure of the university must be reformed before disciplinary procedures are," Hankey argues.

"Discipline is now based on power. Whoever has control decides the rules.

Thus the power is now entirely in the hands of the faculty and the administration.

"The university agrees that present disciplinary procedures are archaic", says Hankey, "but the fact that the disciplinary committee was set up after the University of Columbia riots indicates that they are scared, and set up the committee not because they feel there was any real problem now, but because they want to control future change."

At present the top disciplinary body on campus is Caput, composed of all the heads of colleges, faculties and schools, as well as the president and a few others.

The councils of the colleges, faculties, schools, and institutes have disciplinary jurisdiction over all students in their divisions on matters of local or internal concern subject to Caput.

"To uphold and protect the reputation of the university" Caput may, at its discretion "suspend or expel a student from the academic privileges of the University." Final appeal is to the Board of Governors.

This means a student can be punished twice for the same offense — once by civil law and once by Caput.

The discipline committee is now accepting briefs from campus organizations.

After November 30 the committee will begin formal discussion. It hopes to present a final report to President Bissell before the end of the school year.

Western loss wears off as Blues prep for Redmen

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Varsity Blues' head coach, Ron Murphy, quaffed the last of his coffee, looked up and started to talk about last Saturday's exhibition loss to Western.

He wasn't happy about the result, of course, but this didn't hamper his objective analysis of what happened.

"They just kept getting stronger and stronger and we kept dying," said Murphy. "Our offense, which had sat out for more than a quarter, showed no zip at all in those final fifteen minutes."

Blues' normally genial but reticent mentor continued: "And our defense wasn't all that bad. Don't forget, Western got only 50-odd yards along the ground. It was mainly shoddy tackling that hurt us at the end of the game."

"Before that, though, we were really hitting. Almost every time I looked up, one of their guys was being helped off the field. You might say we won all the battles but they won the war."

However, it's all water under the bridge by now, and Murph's working the team extra hard in practice this week in preparation for Saturday's season opener in Montreal against McGill Redmen.

Blues did appear a trifle out of shape against Western, a fact which ex-Blue and present Mustang, Ron Wakelin, commented on after the game. Quarterback Vic Alboini also mentioned it. "Near the end of the game I could hardly hear myself call the plays with all the huffing and puffing going on," smiled Alboini.

The team got some good news this week when it was learned that all-star halfback, Mike Raham, will be back in the line-up for the McGill game. His chipped bone injury was originally expected to keep him out for three weeks.

So Blues' backfield is set for Saturday. Glen Markle and speedy rookie, Walt Sehr, will work out of the halfback positions, with Raham at fullback. Former McGill Redmen star, Eric Walter, moves over to split end, while Nick DiGuissepe stays at wing back. Alboini and end Mark Slater are the other potential touchdown nabbers.

As far as injuries are concerned Blues remain relatively healthy. Huge Doug Dempster has a bruised sternum and newcomer, Pete Lamantia, from Notre Dame, is hobbling with a bruised knee. Lamantia, who was one of Blues' more impressive players on Saturday with a sound display of running back punts, may miss the season opener.

Tracksters stacked

By PAUL VESA

The Varsity track and field team appears a good bet this year to retain possession of the Tait McKenzie OQAA team championship Trophy they won last year at Western. The overall strength of the contingent will probably show in firsts in as many as half of the events while depth will be evident in one-two placings in four or five events.

The field events promise to provide the greatest strength of the team especially in the pole vault and weight competitions. Jukka Heikurinen and Ron Nastiuk finished one-two in the pole vault in 1967 and the duo should repeat this season. Heikurinen seems likely to break the OQAA record of 13', having done 13'6" this year.

Gord Homer and Bill Watts also finished one-two in their event, the javelin, and Matijo Genanovic, with a best distance of 215', appears a threat to the record of 193'.

In the discus there is Dave Arnold, first last year, as well as a promising freshman in Grant Tadman. Arnold was also second in the shot put last season, followed by Bruce Tucker, who this year in practice has come within a whisker of the intercollegiate record. John Hilliard is a high, long, and triple jumper who was second in the latter event last year.

Turning to runners, we find a one-man team in the sprints in Dave Quibell.

Quibell has posted times of 9.6 in the 100 (.2 seconds off the record), 22.0 seconds in the 220, and 49.4 seconds in the 440. Another excellent sprinter is Bill Franklin who has done the 400 metres in 49.7 and the 880 indoors in 1.55.0. These two should have a hand in breaking the mile relay record set last year by Blues.

In the hurdles, Blues have Steve Wetmore who placed second in the 120-yard high hurdles last year and in the distance events are Dave Tong, (4.20 in the mile) and Brian Richards who ran a 14.02 in the three-mile while with the Canadian team in Europe last summer.

Even though the team looks like a sure winner, there is always room for more talent. Practices are from 4:00 p.m. to 6:30 p.m. weekdays in Varsity Stadium. The next meet is at McMaster on Friday afternoon.

PIGSKIN PREVIEW

McMASTER MARAUDERS
WATERLOO WARRIORS

Mac,W'loo-league doormats

By PHIL BINGLEY
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

Two teams who have felt in the past that they were as good as if not better than the existing members of the Senior Intercollegiate Football League, get their first opportunity this season to prove once and for all they can compete on a par with Toronto, Queens, McGill and Western.

McMaster Marauders and Waterloo Warriors are the two squads involved and it will be their very difficult task to try to unseat the traditional football powers of the SIFL.

McMASTER MARAUDERS

For Mac head mentor Jack Kennedy and his players, entry into the league may have come just a year too late. Marauders had a very successful season in 1967-68 as they rolled through Central Canada Intercollegiate Competitions undefeated with five shutouts in seven games, pocketed the Atlantic Bowl by downing St. Francis Xavier 7-0 and just lost out to Alberta Gol-Bears in the third annual College Bowl.

With the one-year Phys-Ed. course scratched from the McMaster Academic Curriculum, Kennedy has lost an excellent source of player recruitment as well as twenty-four players from last season's national finalists. Gone are the likes of quarterback Dick Waring, halfbacks John Watson and Cass Quinn, fullback Henry Wysocki and the entire starting defensive unit.

However, before everyone saturates their hankies with tears, it should be pointed out that Mac is not totally void of gridiron talent. Centre Byron Fordyce, tackle Tom Krawczyk, guard John Smees, end Ned Kozowyk, halfbacks Greg White, Johnny Krawczyk and Larry Fedosoff and quarterbacks Pete Quinlan and Pete Rosser have all had intercollegiate experience.

Kennedy also has several promising newcomers in his camp. Gerry Mays, an end, and Terry Otto, a tackle, have both been impressive to date and may see action on offense and defense.

WALLY DELAHEY

JACK KENNEDY

Kennedy and his staff are the first to admit that 1968 will be a rebuilding year and while any coach has high hopes at the beginning of the schedule, any measure of success will probably be acceptable. McMaster's only other entry in the SIFL ended disastrously in 1953-54 when they failed to win a game. Unless unforeseen miracles come to pass, Marauders should be losers in a nip and tuck fight with Waterloo for fifth place.

WATERLOO WARRIORS

While McMaster personnel remain understandably humble in their expectations, Waterloo's brain trust under the direction of head man Wally Delahey, have high hopes of breaking into the existing fearsome foursome of the SIFL. And, while Warriors are never known for their lack of optimism and fighting spirit, Delahey's confidence may not be unfounded.

Waterloo also did away with their one-year physical education programme but the results were certainly not as devastating as at McMaster. Returnees Ed Scorgie at defensive end, tackle Brent Gilbert, linebacker Billy Poole and guard John Moser should form a solid core around which Delahey can build his lineup.

Among the rookie units, John Reimer, a thirty-year old playing coach should prove to be a steady influence from his halfback position. Other first year men, tackle Shaune Lawton, fullback Gord McClellan, and quarterback Dave Groves, along with returning ends Don Manahan and Al Haehn, and veteran halfbacks Rich Anderson and Ron Howse will undoubtedly give opposing teams something to think about.

Coach Delahey has his largest problem with depth. Convinced that his starting lines are adequate, his offensive backfield quick and balanced and the overall outlook good, he feels third place is not beyond Warrior's reach.

So sorry Wally, your prediction is but folly, your Warrior squad may finish fourth but we can see you coming fifth.

MACPHERSON REPORT IN '69?

By DAVE FRANK

A plan to implement many of the key recommendations of the Macpherson Report by next year will go before the council of the faculty of arts and science Monday afternoon.

The proposals, if adopted, would give students an almost unrestricted choice of subjects.

There would be no required courses. Students would be free to devise their own course of studies.

A report prepared this summer by a seven-man working committee chaired by faculty Dean A. D. Allen proposes:

- the distinction between general and honour courses be abolished,

- all students in the faculty have a free choice of any five courses in their year. First year students could not take more than two courses in any one subject.

- students who wish could follow a specialist program after first year, with a maximum of four specified courses, and one free option in any other course,

- no pass courses or one-hour options will be required,

- not less than one-third of the final mark in each course will be based on termwork,

- the individual departments may decide whether to hold final examinations. First year exams would remain compulsory.

- standing will be granted if an average of 60 per cent is maintained in the five courses and no more than one course has been failed with less than 40 per cent,

- at the end of third year every student may elect to receive a degree,

- students with standing of 70 per cent or better may enroll in a fourth year program leading to an Honours degree.

Courses would be of three kinds: those requiring a prerequisite, those with one co-requisite in the same subject, and those open to all students. They would be numbered in the calendar accordingly.

This set of proposals was presented Tuesday to the faculty sub-committee on undergraduate studies.

The committee has forwarded the plan to the full faculty council which will meet in closed session at Simcoe Hall Monday afternoon.

It is expected two public meetings of the faculty council will be held in Convocation Hall next week to promote widespread discussion of the proposals.

No decision on implementation is expected for several months. If the faculty council approves, the plan will then go to the senate and board of governors.

But the major stage in implementation will be the faculty council. This body consists of about 1,000 teaching staff — those with rank of assistant professor and up — and, for the first time this year, 16 students.

Participation of students in the faculty council was one of Macpherson's recommendations. A complicated electoral system based on the joint staff-student committee in the faculty's departments has yielded a group of 16 student members and 16 alternates who will take their seats Monday.

At that meeting one of the student members will announce he will present a motion for debate at the council's regular November meeting calling for opening the closed meetings to all members of the university community.

Conspicuously absent from the proposals to be submitted to the faculty council are several of Macpherson's most controversial recommendations.

His report said lectures should be limited to one a week in each course and equal time devoted to seminars and tutorials.

The present plan calls for no more than three hours a week in each course. Distribution of time is left to the individual departments.

Macpherson said termwork should count for 50 per cent of the final mark in all years. The proposal only sets a limit of at least one-third of the final mark.

Macpherson wanted examinations abolished in second year in favour of a comprehensive exam at the end of the third year. The proposal now asks for the decision to be put in the hands of the individual departments.

Before the proposals were drawn up, the working committee conducted extensive consultations with faculty departments.

Almost all felt it would not be desirable to adopt a rigid rule limiting the number of lectures to one a week in each subject.

Many felt students would be unwilling to undertake the additional burden which would result from such a move.

But in general the departments indicated they would, depending on the nature of the subject, move in the direction of substantial reductions in classroom hours.

The same philosophy was applied to the reduction of emphasis on examinations. Individual departments would be free to abolish final exams in their courses except in first year.

In first year final exams will remain compulsory. At least one-third, but no more than two-thirds of the final mark would be based on term work.

Professor C. B. Macpherson said last night he thought the proposals followed the basic philosophy set forth in the 96 recommendations of his report last fall.

He added he had "no idea why" his proposals on reducing lectures had not been followed.

"I suppose they were not as widely supported as expected," he said.

"Now that my report is in I have adopted the stand that my commission is finished."

He expected the proposals could be decided on this fall.

Warrior to speak here today

The controversial Canadian Union of Students president Peter Warrian will speak at 1 p.m. today at a mass meeting on the former site of Tent City.

Warrian gained his notoriety by a much publicized and often-misquoted statement:

"Some people say this is the year to sock it to the administration and sock it to their buildings, but we must also take it to the students, knowing that democratization and liberation are achieved not by manipulations of a few but by the struggle of all."

U.C. gate crusher

A second year student narrowly escaped serious injury yesterday when he was the victim of a vicious attack at the iron gates now being erected at the northwest corner of University College.

"I bent down to pick up a fallen book and two guys shoved my head through the bars," said Norman Rogers (II UC).

A copy of Toike Oike was found near the scene of the incident.

Rogers suffered lacerated ears and was last reported in fair condition in the UC Refectory.

The gates, which cost about $7,500, are a gift from the Varsity Fund and, says Principal Douglas Lapan "are an attempt to draw together architecturally" the north and west wings of the college.

Anti-riot clause compromise leads to confusion in House

WASHINGTON (CPS-CUP) — Attempts by the U.S. House of Representatives to limit demonstrations on university campuses have been thrown into confusion.

The confusion comes about from inability to interpret the intent of a compromise anti-riot clause to the 1968 Higher Education Bill, still under consideration by the House.

The compromise would deny federal financial assistance to students or employees who are "convicted of a crime involving force, disruption, or seizure of school property, or who violate a university rule if the institution judged the offense to be serious and substantially disruptive."

Such penalties are especially severe since persons denied federal funds are not eligible to re-apply for three years.

The provision had been widely criticized on the grounds that it poses a strong threat to academic freedom, and that it will place those students subject to discipline under its provisions in a state of "triple jeopardy".

Punishment to demonstrators can already be inflicted by university administrations and normal court action.

Anti-war bombings

Police investigate U of T students

By MARY BASTEDO

Prominent anti-war leaders on campus are having their homes searched by police suspicious of their involvement in the Tuesday morning bombings of the homes of 13 Hawker-Siddeley executives.

Wednesday police raided eight homes with warrants to search for "chemicals, explosives and plumbing." (The bombs were made from threaded conduit pipe containing ammonium nitrate.) The majority of those investigated were U of T students.

The bombings, which occurred in homes in Etobicoke, North York and Scarborough, were preceded in each case by letters which read, "You have been judged guilty of active complicity in America's war against the Vietnamese people. Until you desist it is our avowed program to carry the war back to you."

Inspector Splet of the Metro Police Intelligence said, "The letters of course seem to be from someone connected with anti-war demonstrators but we are not ignoring the possibility that they could be from the John Birch Society or something."

The aircraft company has been accused by anti-war groups of supplying aircraft parts to support the American war effort in Vietnam.

"The news suggests Hawker-Siddeley executives' homes were attacked in reprisal for their supplying war goods to the U.S.," said U of T Prof. Chandler Davis, spokesman for the End the War in Vietnam Committee in a statement issued last night.

"These acts of individual terrorism obscure the peaceful ends of our movement, and achieve nothing.

Only political action by large numbers of thoughtful Canadians can end this grave atrocity on this country's conscience."

Prof. Davis also denounced the police for using a "shot-gun approach" in questioning and searching the homes of just anybody they could think of.

Campus activist Eleanor Kirzner (III UC) commented police were using the issue as an excuse to crack down on the anti-war movement.

"The primary aim of a group such as the anti-war movement is to mobilize masses of people for political effect," she said.

"As soon as you resort to individual tactics such as this you have no hope of becoming an important political force."

A $10,000 reward is being offered for any information leading to the arrest and conviction of the bombers.

RCMP recruits U of T student

By A. S. BARKER

Two nights ago I lay awake attempting to fathom the implications of my new status — me, an informer for the RCMP! I mean, here's my chance to make a significant contribution to my new native land of the free (as distinguished from my former land of the brave).

The first step I took (unknowingly) was to accept an invitation to the party — not The Party, of course, although I can't think of a better place to meet RCMP officers. In due time, I found myself in conversation with the man to whom I owe so much.

Uncle Albert (a fictitious name): a gentle soul at heart was quite sincerely (and rightly) angered over the Hawker-Siddeley bombings. We concurred, and drank; moved on to a discussion of censorship and homosexuality, each scoring points the other had to agree with.

We got back to Hawker-Siddeley. This time, campus radicals came into the conversation. I began to connect:

"Well, there's the Edmund Burke Society on campus," I nodded sagely.

"We know about them. Anybody else?"

"I think there's Trotskyites too. But I don't move in those circles, really."

"Yeah, well, we think the Hawker-Siddeley thing was done by some campus group, maybe perhaps."

Uncle Albert produced a slip of paper torn from an empty pack of cigarettes. I meanwhile kept smearing the fingerprints in my beer glass. I felt somewhat paranoid, not realizing I wasn't the one he was hoping to bust.

"Write it down," Uncle Albert said in hushed tones. "Write down everything you know about subversives."

It took about 30 seconds to write down all I knew about subversives on campus. It would have taken less time if the cigarette packet wasn't wet with beer from the bar-top.

I scribbled: "Edmund Burke Society," and "Trotskyites". He looked away while I was writing, humming "O Canada."

"Yes, we know about them," he nodded in grim agreement. "But is there anything else?"

I said no and Uncle Albert shook my hand solemnly, telling me I could find out all sorts of things if I really tried.

Uncle Albert wanted the note back, but I refused. Somehow I felt this was valuable information. Somehow I felt I might have set in motion the wheels of a mighty purge. Finally, I told him he could remember what I told him, and he relaxed.

Once again I denied that I had access to the inner councils of campus radicalism, but he merely countered with "just between you and me. You don't like violence, do you? This is just between you and me."

And that's how I became an informer for the RCMP.

I had a sacred trust, despite the fact that my promise was given under duress, so to speak, and despite the fact that I had no intentions of keeping it at the time (less willing to fink, as opposed to condoning violence).

Be on your guard, all you campus radicals, you people operating behind the campus commie fronts (the Board of Governors, for example). I'm watching and waiting to do my bit for constructive social action.

House yesterday. About 60 attended.

In defining the goals of TSM, Wernick said "TSM is distinguishing itself by not fighting just for itself. . . It does not want an ivory tower or to get out of involvement with the world." Its goal, he said, is to create a university which will not serve as a tool of capitalism.

Wernick advocates radical body outside SAC

An effective student movement on the University of Toronto campus requires a radical body outside of the Students Administrative Council, Andy Wernick (SGS), said yesterday.

Wernick, SAC's education commissioner, was addressing the first open meeting of the Toronto Student Movement at Hart

President (Bissell) recognizes the legitimacy of dissent but would like it articulated in a non-political way. By using the word "politics" as a kind of swear word and by appealing to the rhetoric of individual rights, students are being persuaded to dissent, if they must, but on no account to reflect that discontent in organized activity intended to change the nature of the social reality which makes them discontented.

—Andy Wemick, founder of the TSM, in SAC's reply to the President's Report.

a step in the left direction

The newly-formed Toronto Student Movement can expect a lot of opposition in the next few months, particularly because the TSM members have a number of unpopular ideas.

For one thing, they think students should run the university and control their own education. They base this ideal roughly on the classical definition of democracy which means government elected by the governed.

That definition is bound to be criticised, especially by those who run the university. The administrators don't quite have the classical definition in mind when they talk about democracy in the university.

The TSM and the administration have an honest difference of opinion on this point. The administration sincerely believes they have to keep a certain amount of control on the content of education, and that they have a function of providing trained people to keep this society functioning smoothly.

The TSM belief is that students should be free to choose their own education, and that the society should change to match.

So far the movement doesn't play the "violence" so feared by moderates and conservatives. They see the next two years in terms of consolidating their position, gaining mass support and gathering information about the university.

They are setting up committees to examine the university's relationship with war research, and land deals run by the university. And they will probably attempt to gain influence in the channels set up by the university (course unions for example).

The movement is, in another way, a sign of health. So far the Students Administrative Council has taken the major steps toward making this a more democratic university, and the brunt of the criticism. SAC could not by its nature go as far as it should in confronting the administration or students with SAC's concept of freedom.

The TSM can be expected to make certain demands of the administration because the TSM view is that partial democracy isn't democracy. Partial democracy sanctions power groups who do not rule with consent of the governed. It is just possible the TSM will demand consent of the governed at this university.

Since you can't vote out a non-democratic administration, this may lead to confrontations, "violence" if you like.

And then we can expect the forces of law and order and good to sweep down upon them with cries of "freedom of the individual" and suppress them, brutally if necessary, for trying to impose democracy on the majority.

privacy

Sir:
Invasion of privacy — Is that the concern of the University Bookstore?

Interested in obtaining a charge account, I filled out an application form. A female senior student asks, "Is your home address the same as your present address?" Answer — yes.

"Parents' name?"

Disturbed by this question, I thought myself to be a responsible adult with my financial umbilical cord severed several years ago.

Finally I mumbled, "Why?"

Surprised, female senior student turns to fellow employee, "Why?" Jolted.

Male Senior Student chokes out, "Because . . . we call your parents . . . if you move without paying."

Thinking to myself that my parents would tell them he is a big boy now; he is over 21.

The University already has the pertinent facts including my genotype in being registered.

Capable only of checking these forms, Senior Student reiterates what he has said.

The issue raises two points; the lack of coordination within the bureaucratic structure and the need to be dependent.

Having my registration number, these people have access to such information; although I have some trust in the Administration's discretion to trust such details. Personally I resent anyone sitting behind a table asking this information.

When can students grow up? To exaggerate a ludicrous situation, imagine a student in his 50's being asked, "Parents' address?"

Turning to leave I said, "Tear it up." J. D. Fecht (Social Work 11)

revolt "passe"

Sir:

In returning to the University of Toronto this year, I could not help but notice a feeling of revolt anticipated by the Varsity. It came to be not so much a question of whether to revolt or not but whether the revolt should be a wild Parisian one, or something a little more on the conservative side.

With revolt on the brain, it was refreshing to walk into a class (Religious Studies No. 300) where nothing had been preplanned and no endless booklists distributed. Instead the professor equated himself with the students and attempted to involve them completely in the course by declaring that they would make up the course themselves through their own suggestions. By this unique method evolved such topics for study as, Black Magic, post Vatican conflict, contemporary films, the ethics of transplanting, and the Playboy Philosophy to name a few.

With the outlook of the professor (Dr. Freeman) and such contemporary questions on the agenda revolt is now "passe".

Tepid Canadiana

By KASPARS DZEGUZE

The influence of the machine on modern art was never more apparent than last Friday night, when a psychosomatic disorder in my twelve year old automobile caused me to be late for the screening of Canada's newest film, Isabel.

Never has art been more truly served. I regret not one minute that was missed on account of this mechanical imbroglio. Genevieve Bujold's latest is not a bad film, just very dull. Boring.

I have on previous occasions subjected myself to various cinematic outrages in the interest of you, the reader. On this occasion, I did not feel that it was necessary to stay and see the beginning. A really bad film is sometimes interesting to watch, just to see how bad it gets; in a film which is competent and dull, you presume any reasonably lengthy segment stands for the whole.

Not that Miss Bujold, wife of the film's writer, producer and director, Paul Almond, is a bad actress. It's just that she cannot sustain a sedentary role; she is much too voluble for introspection. In a situation where she can act on other people, provoke them, she is excellent. I was hoping she might break loose with the mischievousness she displayed in a few excellent comic scenes, but the director kept her in tight check, plodding through to the end.

Humour, after all, is not what the film is about. Isabel is the young adult coming out from the shell of a severe upbringing by a strict mother on a Gaspé farm. She has come back to the farm for her mother's funeral, and in the process, begins to discover the Gothic recesses in the family's Puritan facade, recesses that include madness and incest, materials which should be productive of the most stark and sombre moods.

However, even the addition to these subjects of a supernatural aura, the spiritual manifestations in a girl serving out her virginity, fails to create any mood of suspense, dread, or disquiet. Instead, Almond has created a flat surface clothed only in events. The appearance of a ghostlike figure on the hill, the stopping and starting of clocks, and the beheading of a chicken serve no purpose beyond suggesting, in the moment of their appearance, something of Isabel's mental state. But they are only events, and not the fecund and frightening symbols which a master like Bergman would have made them.

The most annoying feature of Isabel is the apparent irrelevance of many scenes. "What's he included this for", you ask yourself, only to discover that there is no reason. The Gothic features of the family acquire no topography, but lie flat on the screen as they might in the pages of history of their lives. Action does not quicken, it simply continues. The attempted rape of Isabel provides the sole emotional focus before the overblown climax, which occurs in a violent tangle of dimly exposed film.

Probably the most outstanding feature of the film is its technical competence, which is the product of more than just the $250,000 which Paramount provided. The photography is good, especially in some closeups of Miss Bujold. In places, though, it seems the photography exists for its own sake, rather than for the sake of the film. The shots descriptive of the landscape and nature, the early spring, seem like grafts from an NFB documentary (ie., good documentary) of Canada. They stand out, as if seeking the comment "What good photography". The device of telegraphing the upcoming scene by splicing its soundtrack to the end of the preceding scene, in an effort to raise tension, simply did not work.

Miss Bujold's coming of age in the context of her adolescent surroundings could have made a much more interesting film. The present form would have been quite successful in a program of an hour's length on television. Paul Almond still seems to be creating for TV, the medium from which he derives his experience.

Zita Confuses Critics

A film like Zita makes it difficult not to feel a little cynical about much of the new wave of sentimental cinema . . . It is difficult to imagine Joanna Shimkus, playing Anna, Zita's niece, as a truly sincere character. She is a sophisticated, well-educated middle-class Parisienne playing at her own civilized version of the Spanish Civil War. She is simply too spoiled, too affected to be a convincing sentimental character. Yet, the times when all this affectation piles up are the best moments of the film because the director, Robert Enrico, lets it run into a sort of comedy of the absurd.

— Ian Ritchie

Joanna Shimkus is skinny and she has a big nose. But she possesses that transcendent and totally egocentric sense of herself which commands attention. When she is on the screen, you watch her — and she never looks quite the same from one scene to the next. Like Julie Christie, Catherine Deneuve, and Monica Vitti, she is the cinematic embodiment of the feminine inexplicable.

— Howard Cronis

Throughout Zita, a message struggles to show itself, and out of a confusing and unrealistic plot, it finally emerges, naive and insignificant. Joanna Shimkus' acting is superb, and the photography, production and direction are surpassed by few current movies. But where there is nothing of great quality to produce, direct, or act, the result remains the same: nothing.

— Michael Fuhrman

If 'art' movies have begun to intimidate you, then go and see Zita, at the Capri. It's the ideal movie to restore confidence in one's ability to 'interpret' films. Zita can be an ego-trip. As soon as you catch on to the 'loss of innocence' theme, you start asking . . . which one . . . the doctor, the truck-driver, the bass-player . . . who? Director Enrico uses artsy touches picked up from here and there . . . opening credits against old photos, as in Bonnie and Clyde, a slow-motion, ballet-like love scene that's been overdone . . . the film is derivative in many aspects.

—Peter Kaldas

Annie meets a bass player who drives a semi-sportscar, and races a toy Lotus. She lies to him, then trundles into bed with him, after a mating dance designed to set the coldest palms perspiring. Throwing her bosom and caution to the wind, she shacks up while Zita passes into the hereafter. Zita is a DEEP movie. I don't profess to 'get it', but I thoroughly enjoyed it as smoothly elegant entertainment.

— David McNiven

Director Enrico deserves raves in bringing off the tender and dance-like love scene. Seen through a yellow filter, and accompanied by a gentle guitar, the lovers float in lyrical and graceful motions. As the bubbles of love linger, Annie finally accepts the whole circle of life in all its varied colours. She has cast aside the hesitations and fears that occupy a child's mind . . . but the final scene still shows an empty corridor: young Annie calling out for Zita

— Arny Wise

There's nothing wrong until Enrico wades in with the now-prerequisite grainy, amber-tinted newsreel clips, the soft-focussed-through-sun-dappled-foliage shots, and the slow-motion love scene, and generally succeeds in creating another Elvira Madigan.

— Ian Ritchie

Joanna Shimkus fades from one disposition into another, from a celebration of life to a powerful awareness of death, then back again, with subtlety and credibility . . . the two fuse and then are resolved.

— Jim Purdy.

Sunnyland Slim

By PETER HATCH

Blues singers drift into this town from time to time and then drift out again without anyone paying very much attention. This week the Sunnyland Slim Trio is playing at George's Kibitzeria and it deserves a great deal of attention. It is the best blues group that I have heard in Toronto in the three years that I've been here, and it will probably be a long time before we have as good a group again. These are three seasoned Chicago musicians who turn out a driving, solid blues of the sort which is now being picked up by such pop-rock groups as The Electric Flag and Canned Heat (Sunnyland has recorded with Canned Heat and next week he is flying to California to turn out a new record with them). Anyone who has listened to The Electric Flag's "Killing Floor" owes it to himself to hear it done by drummer W. C. Williams. He has a deep, emotional voice which compels one's attention, and he plays the drums with a feeling which matches his singing. Drummers tend all too often to be simply metronomes for the rest of the band and virtuosity in drumming is usually a much colder affair than it ought to be. Williams doesn't play with the sort of brilliance which removes him from the rest of the band, but rather his drumming contains a feeling of the song which is being played, and even in solo passages this feeling comes through. The result is often intensely moving.

In contrast to Williams, Eddie Taylor, who for many years has been Jimmy Reed's guitarist, plays with an easy professionalism, and sings a smoother, and at times a humorous blues. Traces of Jimmy Reed can be heard in his singing, which is natural enough after many years of close association, but he isn't in any way imitating Reed. His voice doesn't have the same sort of whine in it which I find limits Reed's expressiveness.

I need hardly say that he plays excellent guitar, although there were times on Monday night when they opened that I felt that he concentrated too much on rhythm guitar. The addition of a bass to the group would undoubtedly help free him, and it's too bad they weren't able to bring one with them.

Sunnyland Slim, the leader of the group, has run with some of the greatest singers in the history of the blues. He's played piano with Blind Boy Fuller, Big Bill Broonzy, Memphis Minnie, Sonny Boy Williamson, Robert Johnson, and Ma Rainey, to name just a few.

Violence has all too often been an unfortunate part of a blues player's history. Scrapper Blackwell was shot to death, Sonny Boy Williamson II was stuck with an ice pick, Robert Johnson was poisoned according to Sunnyland, and not too long ago Little Walter Jacobs was beaten to death. When Sunnyland was in Toronto with Willie Dixon last spring, he was just beginning to recuperate from his share of violence, which happened at three o'clock one morning as he was walking down a street to get a pack of cigarettes. "You know I was dressed kind of nice that night. They figured I'd have some money. They got me for eight dollars and a nice watch." They also cut him up somewhat. Sunnyland is a big man, over six and a half feet tall, and he didn't let them get it easily. "I was fighting. I wouldn't give up, I was going to die first. I put three of them in the hospital." He ended up with forty-two stitches in his arms, and he was playing with the stitches fresh in his arms when I first heard him. I wouldn't say that he played or sang badly then, but the fact that he couldn't stretch out the fingers of his left hand severely limited what he could do. He had to play with his hand like that for a couple of months, and he took it easy, sticking mostly to the organ. Fortunately, his left hand is now about as good as new, although he still has some pain in his lower arm. His singing last April had also been affected and his voice was weaker and more subdued than I had expected, but now that he is back in form, he shouts out some of the old blues like "Dust My Broom" and "Harlem Can't be Heaven" with tremendous strength while his barrelhouse piano swings beautifully under the forceful drive set up by Williams and Taylor.

Sunnyland started out playing the organ when he was a kid in Mississippi. "I would go, when I started to playing, I would just sit up and listen to somebody playing the organ, and if I had had a hundred dollars, I expect I would have just shanked off and done everything I could to hear it, I liked the music so well. So I learned a little old key in F from Jeff Morris, and he learned me and he showed me how to hold my hands up there and all. Well I took me a shoe box and made me a keyboard of that. I draw it at the piano. You see, I was pretty apt at school, when I was going. I made the keyboard of this organ. And you know at that time, this woman, she'd get tired of hearing me. I had good mother wit and common sense. I said, 'Mrs. Panker,' I said, she was a mother of my father's church, I said, 'Mrs. Panker, would you mind, I can cut you some wood — all the boys was trying to run around courting the girls and I was sticking by the organ — and I cut up wood, cut up the stove wood and hrang it in. And I was trying to play "If I Could Hear My Mother Pray Again," that's the title of the song, "And When the Trumpets Sound." That's the first two things that I played. And the boys would be saying 'Let's go to the ballgame, play some hall.' I'd say 'No.' I was just trying to go down to Mrs. Panker's where the organ was. And I learned how to play a little march, "Tramp Tramp the Boys are Marching." So one day they all come in there, and she said, "Be nice and we're going to let Mr. Luandrew play the organ." My daddy got up and looked — he was pastor of the church. And then I started up and I made kind of a little introduction and played "Tramp Tramp the boys are Marching," and my stepmother looked at me, man and they looked at me like this, and my stepmother said 'where did he learn that?' And Mrs. Panker told them, 'You know that kid has been practicing for a year at my organ. And he's the best kid. When all them kids are playing with the girls and fighting, that kid is sitting up at the organ, and he's going to learn how to play.' " He did learn how to play the organ and then a few years later he discovered a piano near a railroad where he was working and after getting over the differences between an organ and a piano, he was able to play that too.

He ran away from home when he was about fifteen because his stepmother made it unpleasant for him around the house. From then on he travelled to wherever he could find someone willing to pay him a couple of dollars to play and he finally ended up in Chicago, and he has been knocking out the blues with the best in Chicago ever since.

The trio is only going to be in Toronto for a week, which means that tonight and tomorrow night are the last chances to hear the tight sound that they are laying down. As a bonus on Friday and Saturday nights Salome Bey will be singing with a Jazz group. I really need another column to write about her. Let me just say that she has a beautiful and powerful voice and leave it at that. One final note. Keep the week of October 14th in mind. Lightnin' Hopkins is coming to the Kibitzaria.

Only Blood, Sweat and Tears

By JOE MEDJUCK

Some groups sell sex, some sell mass hysteria. Blood, Sweat and Tears sell music.

History: Blood Sweat and Tears was born when Al Kooper and Steve Katz, organist-vocalist and guitarist respectively of the late lamented Blues Project decided to form a new group.

They wanted it to have more scope than the Blues Project and added horns (2 trumpets, 1 trombone, 1 alto sax) to the basic rock rhythm section of organ, guitar, bass and drums. Kooper wrote most of the group's material and was also their lead singer.

The group met with reasonable success and recorded an album Child Is Father To The Man. Then dissension set in. Kooper left the group as did a couple of the horn men. It was rumoured that Katz and drummer Bobby Colomby were also planning to leave. They didn't. Instead the horn men were replaced, a new organist found and David Clayton Thomas wafted from the wilds of Willowdale to become the new lead singer. The group became a co-op.

The spirit of Al Kooper still hovers over the group. Not surprisingly so, since Kooper was the "star" of Blood Sweat and Tears, and the group still uses most of the numbers which he wrote for it. Kooper's importance to the group's original popularity is reflected by a piece of graffiti making the rounds in New York which reads, "Al Kooper is God." In spite of losing their one big name BS&T is now the group on the East Coast, and their first set at the Rock Pile Saturday showed why.

To begin with the original conception of adding horns to a typical rock band was a great idea. Imagine The Stones with Count Basie and you have some idea of the power generated by BS&T. (Actually you don't need much imagination — a lot of

What you have here is a deliberately pessimistic, deliberately dogmatic, deliberately general piece about our chances for salvaging the twentieth century. Maybe someone will reply with some angry optimism.

The 20th century will not salvage itself. This is what makes it different from other centuries. Our value systems have led us to toss, carelessly or unconsciously, too many ticking bombs into our environment for us to assume that somehow we will muddle through the explosions, as we have in the past.

Why?

Because this is the first century in which man's impotence cannot save him. In previous centuries man did not have total control over Nature. He could not precipitate his total destruction. He could not generate change at a rate sufficient to baffle himself.

Man is now omnipotent. He can control and manipulate Nature and himself. I am pessimistic about our chances for a really human life in this century because the very manifestations of man's omnipotence which could save us are being misused for our degradation.

We have the technological capability to recreate human society. The Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations knows that we have sufficient technology to develop incredible amounts of unused or under-used food production sources. FAO looks at the gorged and sated grain elevators of this continent and says the world food problem should be increasingly seen as one of distribution. Distribution! The industrial grid of the North Atlantic has developed distribution-communication systems to near perfection. But we are paralyzed because we cannot take the global political decision to use our technology for a decent human end.

We can save the urban environments of the globe. Philip Johnson estimated in Esquire that it would cost the United States $4,000,000,000 a year for 15 years to re-make New York. A lot of money. But the point Johnson was making was that we have sufficient knowledge of urban design, sufficient technological capacity to undertake the project. The problem confronted is not overwhelming; it is more or less soluble. The horror is that we have simply not decided that it is a question of life and death to make the place where civilization is forged, the city, human and liveable.

The paralysis lies not in our failure to formulate technological solutions to our problems; it lies in the failure of our institutions to revolutionize themselves and be able to apply our knowledge globally to the job of making human life private, dignified and occasionally joyful, in the 21st century. We know what the problems are, we are even quite good at forecasting what they will become in the 21st century. (see Kahn and Weiner's The Year Two Thousand). We have thought of limited, but basically sound responses to these problems. But we cannot decide in the whirlwind of changes which changes we should control. We cannot coalesce by polical decisions the vague, platitudinous, almost pathetic rhetoric of concern about our future (to which this piece is a strident contribution), into any series of actions sustained long enough to do anything more than perpetuate bad institutions by symbolic reformist gradualism.

Why?

Perhaps because we are still not used to the fact that this is a century unlike the others. Perhaps we don't have a sufficiently frightened perception that in this century certain problems permanent to our existence through the centuries will need an answer or we will perish. For instance, we have always had the poor with us. We have always polluted our environment, but because they are permanent problems we have no sense that at a certain point they suddenly become massive and therefore insoluble. With such a strong sense of history, and of our past, we have no real perception of time running out. And we have no sense that the problems we have generated in our own era take far less time to become insoluble than problems generated in previous centuries. It took a staggeringly short time to develop the atom bomb, then the hydrogen bomb, compared to the generations and generations in which the problem of racism in the United States developed. And because it takes less and less time for monumental problems to develop in this generation we have less time to formulate solutions and combat their menace effectively.

Perhaps the problems so bludgeon us with their menace that we become numb and unable to act. We become so frightened by the paucity of our political decision-making grid when faced with these problems that we are numbed and silenced.

Perhaps we are incapable of responding to our self-generated crisis because our institutions of decision-making are so entirely administrative in their operations and in their goals. Developed nations are highly integrated systems: circuits made of four components-government, labour, industry and educational institutions. Each is dependent on the other. A change in one component affects the other components. Increasingly the managers of the system understand its interrelated operation. But so complex does management become when one has a full understanding of the system that the day to day operation of the circuit prevents its managers from evaluating where the system as a whole should be oriented. The goal of the system is administration, efficiency. The input of any goal more extensive than mere maintenance of the circuit is discouraged because the managers have a clear idea of the drastic, disfunctional effects of unprogrammed inputs in a highly interrelated circuit. Government becomes administration, and a method of administration, the income tax form, comes to define government far more clearly to ordinary people than any tired rhetoric about its supposed functions, or goals.

The thinkers in the circuit, the learning industry of uni-selves: the awakening to full intellectual and moral consciousness of its members.

But even if you grant that two components of the circuit, the university and government, are disfunctional in the eyes of millions, a total revolution of the order required to face the year 2000AD is still not possible. Because very few Americans have any sense that their total system is disfunctional. Until masses of the population have a sense, as their French and Russian ancestors did, that their total system is disfunctional, a total revolution of the magnitude of the Russian and the French revolutions will be impossible.

Why do we have no sense of total disfunction? Because one component of the system is stunningly efficient at meeting its self-set goals: Industry.

Industry is the one institution which is in a continual state of revolution. Because it has set non-human, limited goals (the provision of goods and services to people), and because it is staggeringly successful at ingesting technological change, it can appear functional to the citizens. Because it is so pervasive, and because it has blasted its goals into the minds of us all, it alone conveys to ordinary people the sense that the whole society is functional. People feel the system is operative because they can still get what they want: consumer goods, rapid transportation and communication. Disfunction in government and universities does not visibly impinge upon industries' efficiency. Even when black men burn the block, the liquor store soon opens up again.

Obviously there are staggeringly disfunctional elements in the industrial system: needless unemployment, needless poverty. But these disfunctional elements are not sufficient to cause a sense of total disfunction. Unlike conditions in France or Russia prior to their revolutions, most ordinary people in the North Atlantic triangle can still get bread, clothing, and consumer equipment. And many of them feel that the system is just, is good, not because of government commitment to justice, but because the industrial system seems able to supply goods and services more efficiently than ever before.

The Industrial system has, of course, a major social and human disfunction in that it is increasingly inhuman. The modern Inferno is the sterilized, quietly humming bottling plant in which men and women spend eight hours a day dressed in white linen pressing buttons which somehow, somewhere produce COKE after COKE after COKE after COKE after COKE.

Yet the ordinary people's sense of becoming a dehumanized electron in a human administrative circuit encompassing the North Atlantic triangle is not likely to make ordinary people revolutionary. Dehumanization robs the will of the anger and the sense of private, personal deprivation which makes men revolt. Dehumanization is numbing; it is not a revolution-causing disfunction.

Thus, revolution will only occur in the developed world when the industrial system ceases to produce sufficient goods and services to convince people that their society is just and functioning. That might occur if we had a more serious financial dislocation than the one in February and March of this year. It might occur in the acutely difficult period of industrial adjustment after the end of the Vietnam War. This latter possibility is especially unlikely since a disfunctional, troubled government will not want to increase disfunction by reducing defence contracts or encouraging the re-tooling of the defence industry to civil uses.

Though total revolution is impossible (I mean the kind of revolution which could set up a completely new order to administer global schemes for salvaging the century) sporadic but increasing violence and chaos is extremely likely. As we stand today post-Columbia, post-Paris, post-Columbia, post-Watts we see a different apocalypse than that seen by George Orwell in 1945. We see not 1984 and a rigidly organized, totalitarian, world authority. Instead a world of steadily disintegrating administrative systems flailed by chaotic but massive acts of revolt and violence, and flailing back at the dissidents with steadily more repressive but less effective tactics. The vision is heartening to the true believer. But while the system collapses the population bomb will still tick, the hunger and death will continue, the ecological rape will remain. The big problems will become still more desperate.

consultants etc. are freed from and thus have the detachment of their detachment. They cannot, because action is the business of maintenance not of revolution. In 1968 with a remarkable before us and the solutions needed the wretched litany of concern not only have no value-sense, but transform single action reformism into a making of our environment. They even as administrative operations the problems of today, let three tiers of Canadian government their own making, battling each other while our urban centres are apocalypse in 2000 of what now.

ive system of our society is in-ary then we must have political tion shaped not by an ideology ve must face. A re-organization of society to snuff out the population bomb, to rebuild the cities, to halt our ecological rape.

Yet revolution may be impossible within the system. Revolution occurs (here I am more than usually derivative) when elements of the administrative system become demonstrably disfunctional to the people at large. Thus, the question of whether a revolution in Canada is possible is not answered by saying that radicals across the country are busy outlining an ideology and a strategy for that revolution. Revolution will become possible when ordinary people decide that the system is not realizing the goals that it has set for itself. When it is not actualizing its mythology.

For example, in post-August Chicago millions of Americans, radical or otherwise, decided that the American political system was no longer functional in terms of the goals set for it by the mythologies of Jefferson, Lincoln, Hamilton etc. The system was no longer effectively representing the policy and personality alternatives called for by the people (or a significant minority of the people). That realization coupled with the awareness of the system's administrative disfunctionalism (ie: the sclerotic, myopic Congress) makes young men mount the barricades. Similarly millions of Americans are deciding that universities are disfunctional in that they do not realize the goals which these institutions have set for them-groups are starting to bring in studio men to play horns on their record dates, but in person it's something else.) All of the musicians can really get around their instruments and David Clayton Thomas is one hell of a singer. When, Blood, Sweat and Tears are together they come on stronger than just about any rock group around. And for the first set Saturday night they were really together.

The first set began with a couple of Kooper's tunes, including I Can't Quit Her which Thomas sang with a vitality that makes Kooper's recorded version sound pallid by comparison. The horns were constantly booting him along — usually with as much volume as possible and often with the trumpets blasting away at the upper registers. As a result their intonation was often far from perfect and their attack sometimes a bit sloppy. So what.

The Duke Ellington and Gil Evans bands are sloppy too. Precision is for military bands. That's not what jazz or rock bands are about.

The best number in the first set was a great version of Billie Holiday's God Bless the Child. It began with a lovely mournful introduction by the horns (some of their introductions are pretty wild — along the lines of Archie Shepp or Albert Ayler) and then Thomas dug in. It had nothing to do with Lady Day's version, but rather like most of BS&T's interpretations of other people's tunes it retained the spirit of the original and at the same time came out as something quite new.

The second set was a let-down. It started well with Spinning Wheel, a new number by Thomas. However, in the second number, a ballad, the band fell apart a bit and it never really got together again. During the long Something's Goin' On everyone but the trombone player and one of the trumpets took solos. The solos varied in quality but the chief trouble was that they had nothing to do with one another. (For example when the bass player took an encore to his solo he simply started a new tune: Miles Davis's So What.) As soloists none of them seemed ready to challenge any of the more inventive jazz musicians around, but at the same time the mere fact that they tried extended solos makes them more adventurous than most rock groups. I like that word "adventurous" when talking about Blood, Sweat and Tears. Their repertory ranges from Stevie Winwood to Billie Holiday to Erik Satie. The organist doubles on trombone, the alto saxophonist (Fred Lipsius, who also arranged) doubles on electric piano and three of the group double on flute. BS&T take chances. Because they take chances some of their sets don't come off so well. And because they take chances they can produce music as exciting as that in their first set.

Bobby Colomby is one of the better rock drummers around. He doesn't have the power of some other rock drummers and power seems to be what impresses the teeny boppers. But most rock drummers are still in the Gene Krupa league as far as technique goes. Colomby plays like he's studied Max Roach, Roy Haynes and Elvin Jones. As a result BS&T have rhythmic subtlety and flexibility, as well as drive.

Steve Katz sings on some numbers. His mellow voice contrasts nicely with Thomas's.

If David Clayton Thomas sang as well when he was giggling around Toronto with David Clayton Thomas and The Sheas then perhaps entertainers are right when they complain that Canadians ignore their artists. Between Thomas and the Big Pink boys, the strip on lower Yonge Street may soon have a reputation as one of the important breeding grounds for the new rock. Thomas can't do all the things Kooper could. (The band has stopped doing some of the "cool jazz" type numbers since Thomas joined.) But Thomas sings with power and emotion while eschewing histrionics. He can do a lot of things better than Kooper — or for that matter better than almost any singer on the scene today.

on Books and Making up one's Mind

By BOB RAE

Last week I wrote a review about a tiny and pretty insignificant tome, The New Romans. I felt so badly about the rather maudlin comments I wrote that this week I wanted to try something else.

No one reads book reviews in The Varsity, or at least very few people. As a loyal bibliophile and aspiring literatus, I have written a good many. I have, in my time, reviewed Paul Martin Speaks for Canada, Polish Writing Today, and The Penguin Dictionary of Surnames, and countless other works of similar interest.

Graham Fraser, the guiding spirit and guardian angel of the weekly publication, once wrote a long article on what the magazine should be all about. It was a self-conscious and vaguely pretentious piece, as all such odes are bound to be, but it was also very honest, which is far more important. 'Writing it all down' was what it was about: from the violence in Detroit (remember 1967?) to General de Gaulle, from the War Game to Rene Levesque, one had to talk about it all, lucidly and toughly, with "perception and consciousness".

The Review's traditional book policy has been to give out the rejects from McClelland and Stewart that they send us to keep. Dahomey and the Slave Trade, and Restrictive Trade Practices in Canada have been among our more exciting titles. Rather than do that again, I would prefer people to review books that mean something to them.

No serious literary criticism of Norman Mailer, Tom Wolfe, Marshall McLuhan, or any other remotely significant writer has blessed the book review page for some time. Perhaps we should give it a try.

Maybe not all the books will be given out free; maybe somebody will have to borrow a new book. But isn't there something more real about that than the irrelevant droppings that have previously besmirched these pages?

Whenever man has had something important to say, the saying goes, he has put it down in a book. That's only part of the truth: in fact, whenever man has had anything totally unimportant to say, he is just as likely to have made a book out of it. And there are far more unimportant books around than important ones.

The point about criticism, literary, political, or social, is to make up one's mind.

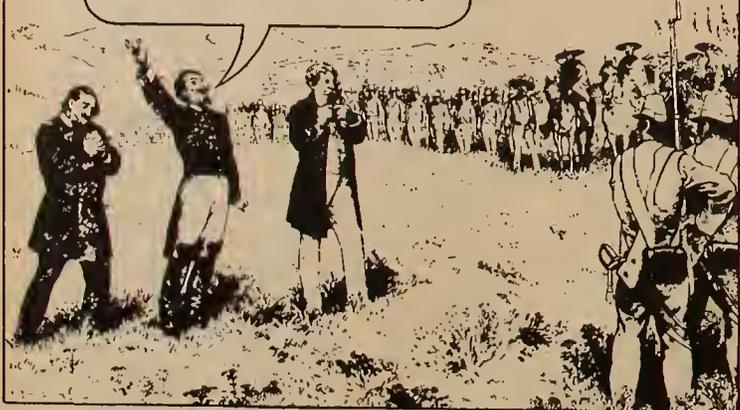

The point about writing is to say something of permanent value. Short of that, to say something. George Orwell, who is far and away my favorite critic, wrote several essays on the importance of being trenchant, and on avoiding "purple passages, sentences without meaning, decorative adjectives and humbug generally."

Book reviews have never rivalled hockey night in Canada in their popular interest. But there is no reason why that should be so. The point of criticism is not to keep your on the one hand aware of what your on the other hand is doing, but to explode myths, to demystify, to make sense.

Reading the Saturday book review sections of our Toronto papers is like being slowly beaten to death with a warm wet sponge. It is a sponge that this writer has at times wielded with a soft vengeance. We are living not only in a bland society, but in a 'value-free society': a society that is not so much anti-intellectual as anti-critical. It is the ideology of anti-ideology; a distinguished liberal says that he "rejects all orthodoxies, of the right and of the left". Presumably this means a commitment to the orthodoxy of the middle.

Reviews should be about things that matter to students in the university. We can write about America, about the student revolution, about the latest Canadian novel, about Ginsberg's poetry; about the democratic left, about the non-democratic left, about violence, about anything under the sun. But for God's sake, let's make up our minds.

Bright Black Comedy

By HILARY McLAUGHLIN

That Peter Shaffer is one of the most versatile writers of the decade has been conclusively proved in Black Comedy. He has come from the almost Faulknerian deviations of Five Finger Exercise, to the splendid panoply of The Royal Hunt of the Sun and, not content with this display of unqualified agility, he has produced a comedy which could be most accurately described as sophisticated farce.

Black Comedy runs like a Coward drawing-room scene and much of Shaffer's writing reads like an up-dated Coward at the latter's best. The repartée is more than reminiscent of Present Laughter and some of the situations look like reincarnations from Blithe Spirit. But Shaffer goes a lot further; as the comedy blackens, quickens, maddens, he comes very close to the machinations of Peter Weiss.

The plot is fairly formula: we have impoverished sculptor Brin and his nit-witted fiancée waiting in his apartment to (1) meet Carol's military daddy for the first time and (2) show Brin's sculpture to the wealthiest man in the world, a stone-deaf German. The only quirk in the opening moments, as we learn all this, lies in the fact that Brin and Carol are moving about the flat with complete dexterity — in total blackness.

There are, of course, stock complications: an old flame in the background/about-to-be-foreground; a collection of antiques which has been surreptitiously-and-temporarily-looted from a neighbour's place, with Brin's junk substituted. The neighbour is away; predictably, he will show up (Oh, Gawd, not with her) to throw a spanner in the works as the inept Brin skirmishes with Daddy-pegs.

The action is kicked off with the failure of a main fuse which perversely floods the yet-black stage with light and leaves the young (laughingly known as) lovers totally helpless in the 'dark'. Introduce an equally helpless maiden lady who arrives to 'take shelter from the storm', as it were; plus the arrivals of neighbour Harold, who turns out to be a Gay Blade if ever a blade was gay, gamin girlfriend Clea, and a German electrician who is briefly mistaken for the awaited millionaire, and you have the main ingredients in a prescription for one of the most uproarious entertainments in town.

The Toronto premiere of Black Comedy at the Toronto Workshop Theatre is a lively and dynamic introduction to the play, thanks to the bold presentation by Trio Productions, Ltd. The cast is vivacious, alert, expert, and functions intricately as a team, each cooperating with the other, yet managing to stand out individually with well-defined strength. Eric House's direction is the basis of the production's assurance: he has injected an antic pace into the doings which never lags for a second. The audience is whirled along with frenzied involvement, aided by the circus-ring mood of the theatre's construction. The play is so eclectic and still so oblique in its tone of absolute, determined comedy that the effect is cathartic, to say nothing of catalytic: the audience's spirits is well past the danger point.

Top honours in acting must go to Moya Fenwick, as the maidenly Miss Furnival. The part has little keystone power in the progression of the plot, although the character is extremely amusing. Miss Fenwick never puts a foot wrong in her lamentations of the state of the world today. Her sense of comic pause is faultless. Brian Petchey's flip portrayal of Harold is likewise masterful—he combines the idiom of a certain type of Englishman — straight or otherwise—with an easy but occasionally monotonous string of appropriate gesticulations. Paul Craig's Brin is done largely by shows of incredible physical stamina, as he bangs forcibly into walls, falls down a long flight of stairs backwards and gets knocked by pieces of furniture in the most painful looking places. Angela Roland pulls off Carol successfully as the nauseating bitch that she is. The smaller roles are handled with comparative aplomb, with Davena Turvey's tongue-in-cheek Clea adding the most fun to the proceedings as she prances around the room like Noel Coward's Elvira.

The play moves evenly from start to finish; there is a high-gloss polish to the whole affair that can be jointly credited to the script, the direction, the performances and the skill of the production. All things considered, Trio Productions has made a substantial contribution to the Toronto theatre scene by bringing us Black Comedy.

Notes on Canadian Paintings

By BRANISLAW CHRTIEU

All those hours of walking past the Tom Thomsons and A. Y. Jacksons on the dismal walls of my public school couldn't have helped but make me immune to the beauty of Canadian painting.

The J.S. McLean Collection of Canadian Painting now on display at the Art Gallery of Ontario was like a reunion with childhood friends plus all the grown-up insights into their character mingled with the childlike awe.

There are things that I had never noticed before, that came to life walking through the hundred or so paintings on display.

I discovered the paintings of Paraskeva Clark, a Russian lady now living in Canada. They are a strange and beautiful mixture of vivid and realistic colour and distorted symmetry of rocks and trees. One, called "Sun, Wind and Root" looks like dancers in a ballet. Up close it turns out to be driftwood in a pool of water. (I've got to start wearing my glasses).

There are the water colours of Carl Schaeffer that have a blend of lightness and darkness that is both realistic and fanciful. Especially one called "Storm Over the Fields" which is a painting of great, black storm clouds moving over a golden field.

David Milne is an enigma. Where all the artists in the Group of Seven and friends look at the Canadian winter with a sort of romantic panache, Milne, in his oils especially, takes a very sombre look. The paintings are dirty (artistic dirty not dirty dirty) and sometimes the actual canvas shows through the paint. His water colours, however, are very colourful and sparse.

Those three artists aside (their work is somehow different), there comes the "sweep and dash" school, including the Group of Seven, Emily Carr and Tom Thomson. These are the majestic, sweeping, rugged works that have become famous around the world because they are distinctively Canadian.

There is only one A. H. Casson on display but this is "Old Store at Salem", a picture in which the hills and the ground in front of the store look like rivers that flow and merge while the store stands solid and immovable amid them.

A. Y. Jackson is the most human and perhaps the most versatile. His paintings are always flowing and rugged, yet there is a kind of sophistication and human touch, especially in his sombre blend of curve and rigid line in "Mining Town".

My personal favourite is Lawren Harris. While you can see that the other works were drawn by men with human temperament and passions, Harris' monolithic, simple and overwhelmingly imposing rocks and water seem coldly inhuman, even more beautiful than the striking works of the others. He has captured the stark and awesome beauty of the Canadian Shield in almost surrealistic colours and forms.

The minute you enter the gallery, you can't help being impressed by the boldness and colour of these works. It's a boldness and sense of exhilaration that you feel when you behold the beautiful north of Canada.

dialog

About thirty critics descended on the Capri theatre this week, eager to prove my theory that, given the chance, they would eat each others' words. The composite review of Zita is the result. A fair number of those who set out to the show did not reappear, causing me to wonder if they might have choked on something other than the words . . . Perhaps they found it hard to take the ridiculous $2 admission charge that has become standard in Toronto. What has happened to Students' rates; when did we stop being special?

Why not use the English method of pricing, which is standard in theatre anyway, though in reverse: the closer you are to the screen (there are about 3 or 4 ranges), the less you pay. Legit theatre is now often cheaper . . . The Trinity Square players are unleashing the live Marat Sade, for those of you who missed it the third time in film . . . K.D.

Peter Hatch's article on page four of the Review is an excellent piece of journalism crafted with the care and intimate knowledge possible when a person is truly in love with an art form. The amazing thing about this story is that it could be written in Toronto at all. What is a man such as Sunnyland Slim doing in Toronto at all — a city which is less renowned for its knowledgeability and dedication to folk-blues than for its patronage of baseball?

Harold runs George's Kibitzeria on the corner of Huron and Harbord — not twenty yards from campus. All week Sunnyland has been playing there to dismally small audiences and has had to groove with himself rather than be able to share with a crowd the joy he gets from playing. Except for weekends Harold has had to accept a loss because it costs money to have the best folk-blues people in the business. Why are they doing this — Harold running in the red and Sunnyland grooving with the band?

Harold loves this music; the real stuff is as incredibly beautiful as you can hear, (read Peter's article to find out about it) and he is hoping that the campus will get as turned on by it as he does. Sunnyland will play because this is his life and he too wishes to share in his experience.

Sunnyland will be leaving very soon and you can still catch him, but there will be others following him and for $1.75 on weekdays and $2.50 on weekends with no necessity to buy coffee or food and the best music going it is a superb bargain. L.G.

Even eternal pessimists will be hard pressed to say that the theatre scene is bleak in Toronto this winter. Starting with a fine production of Strindberg's "Ghost Sonata" by Montor Production last Tuesday night, there will be over twenty plays presented by small professional groups in the next three months. And if they're all half as good as the production of "Black Comedy", now playing at Toronto Workshop Productions Theatre, then we're in for a season of excellent theatre.

That's not counting the extravaganzas at the O'Keefe Barn and the Royal Alexandra Canyon. And besides two almost professional productions at Hart House next month, that doesn't include all the fine plays to be offered by the various theatre guilds around the campus. And that doesn't include guerilla theatre appearances by hit and run subversives in engineering classrooms and Convocation Hall. It seems as if Toronto the "well, we should have things for the working man (if there is such a creature to be found)" is attaining a bit of culchur, by gar!

Rochdale College has a very interesting drama programme, in which permanent professional actors will be hired to teach classes in technique, form a group and produce plays. There will also be splinter groups in improvisation and the aforementioned guerilla theatre. More about that in a later issue.

Interesting notes: L.H.

there will be three different plays by the German playwright, Gunter Grass, this winter. There will be a handful of original Canadian plays. There will be milk and cookies served in the Review office at ten o'clock.

Sir,
Three cheers to Rod Mickleburgh for pointing out to us that the Toronto Star may not be the bastion and pillar of unbiased reporting that we masses believed it to be — and that in fact it is almost as inaccurate as is the Varsity.
Marvin Sigler
(C&F IV)

Sir,
Michael Ignatieff wrote a prophetic article in the Review (September 20). "And they said it couldn't happen here . . ." traced the story of a projected campus revolt. The protesters were a small group of "silent radicals" who "had decided that the President's gradualism was the real danger at the university; that it would prevent effective politicization of the student mass". The major participants feared that the steady liberalization of President Bissel might eradicate justification for radical protest.

The revolt had some beneficial effects. Suddenly a socially aware student body was created. Immediately there was drastic university reform which surpassed previous hopes of liberal student leaders.

I suggest that the ultimate results would be quite different.

Student radicals are obsessed with their own power. But there are at least five other power blocks interacting on the University of Toronto campus. These are: the Public (operating through their Government), the Faculty, the Alumni (operating through their membership of the university), the Administrators, and the Federated Colleges. Any one of these power blocks has a de facto veto on the smooth functioning of the university. For example, the Administration of Faculty could withdraw their labour. Some Federated Colleges could opt out of the U of T system. Or, as Mr. Ignatieff describes, the students could protest and capture the Administration buildings.

But the most devastating power lies with the Government. Universities become less and less able to maintain their autonomy as they grow in size and dependence on public money. Clark Kerr, ex-president of the University of California, in his book The Uses of the University maintains that "the university has become a prime instrument of national purpose". This is new, and also dangerous (for the only option of those students who cannot accept society is to destroy the universities which are its mouthpieces). Education has become a major growth industry, and shock absorber of surplus manpower. A slight diversion of government resources from education to public works (i.e., road construction) or investment (i.e., industrial expansion) can profoundly affect the economy. And it can profoundly affect the universities, if they increase their enrollment without increasing their budgets. And a violent student revolt could be taken as a pretext for a reorientation of government priorities.

"And they said it couldn't happen here . . ." Oh, but it can! Governor Ronald Reagan cut Berkeley's financial support after the famous confrontations. Now Berkeley has severe financial problems. Whatever Reagan can do — so can Davis.

A few years ago William Davis, Minister of Education in the Provincial Government of Ontario, was heir-apparent to the Premiership. He controlled, and still does, the lion's share of the budget. But he is no longer golden boy of the cabinet.

Davis could regain cabinet and public popularity by decreasing the amount spent on education. Lower taxes are always popular.

Alternatively Davis could divert money to the Community Colleges. Public opinion would support transferring money from an unruly student elite to an underprivileged group. The universities could lead their case based on academic excellence. But this is essentially an egalitarian argument, and the intellectual cafeterias of the Community Colleges are the visible signs of an educated citizenry.

So suppose a small group of fanatics manufactured a successful revolt. They could easily halt the university for a day or a week. Suppose this occurred on a number of Ontario campuses. The newsmedia would undoubtedly overexploit the situation. There would be public demand for government action against the pampered students. William Davis could seize the opportunity to increase his personal popularity by diverting university grants. And the quality of university education suffers.

It is a frightening prospect!

What can save us?

We need education reform, but it must be led by responsible people who are committed to the idea and ideals of a university. There are some of us not ashamed to come to terms with our society and to use, if necessary, the channels of Pio Pepe diplomatism to achieve our aims. We need greater student involvement, both materially and intellectually. We need to reject deceptively simple cliches. We need people who can think for themselves, and not be misled by "silent radicals" of the left or right. We need people, not political fodder for the realization of abstract sociological ideals.

Russians suppress minorities

By CHRYS TOMKIW

The Soviet Union is conducting a campaign to destroy the rights of all minorities in the U.S.S.R., says a man who has belonged to the Canadian Communist Party for 30 years.

Speaking to over 400 students on campus Wednesday night John Kolasky said the Soviet Union is "ruthlessly eroding the rights of all but the Russians."

"Capable students with non-reliable political views are not aided in their studies," he said, "and often they are not even allowed to attend university, particularly if they prefer to study in their native languages."

He told members of the Ukrainian Students Club that during a two-year visit to the U.S.S.R. where he studied at a special Communist Party school, he discovered "the Russians were lying about freedom."

"Russians are placed in key positions to control government on the national as well as the local level," he said. At a Party Congress to elect the Central Committee to direct work in the U.S.S.R., 63 per cent of the delegates were Russian and only 3.6 per cent Ukrainian," Mr. Kolasky said.

"Screws of Russification were tightened to force the minorities to teach Russian instead of their national language; publication of Russian texts for elementary and secondary schools in the republics increased and control over education was vested in Moscow." "The results of Russian policies of discrimination in education," he continued, "is reflected in the lack of non-Russian scientists."

"Popular reaction to these policies has been widespread opposition. In answer to this opposition, mass arrests of young nationalists and students took place. The trials were held behind closed doors, and sentences ranged from imprisonment to death penalties."

Students Plan to Fight OSAP

Students must generate their own proposals for changes to the Ontario Student Awards Plan and seek ways to dramatize the need for their implementation.

This was the consensus of 40 students who met Wednesday to assess student dissatisfaction with changes in OSAP. The students have formed a committee to plan action before the October 31 application deadline.

The committee will hold its first open meeting at noon today at 91 St. George St. and urges all concerned students to attend.

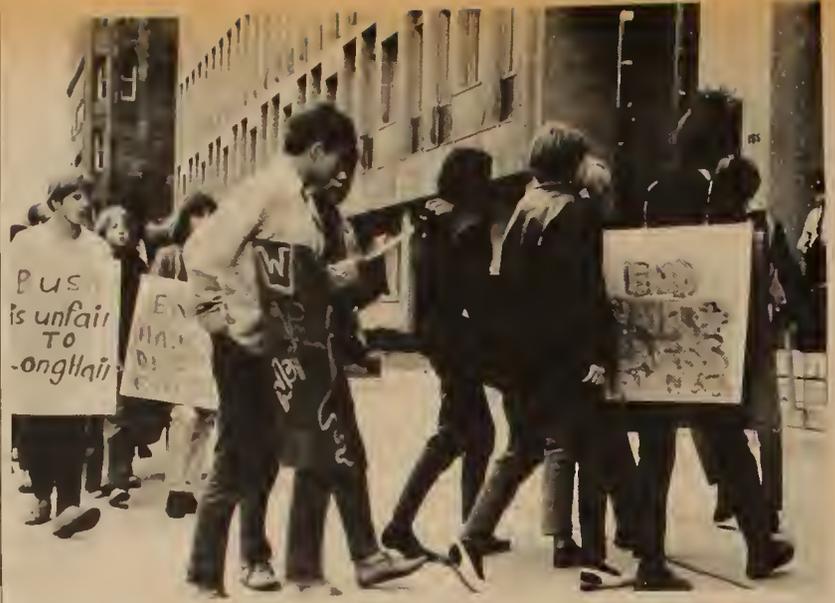

Among defects criticized Wednesday were inadequate grants, too heavy assessment of parents, the $600 dollar ceiling on loans, and the delay in processing applications and appeals.

Several faulted the new definitions of independent status and cited examples of students who are now obliged to return to their parents for aid after several years of self-support.

M. L. Reimer, of the U of T Student Awards Office, said the "...first whimperings have been heard..." from the Department of University Affairs that appeals may be delayed again this year in spite of the new application deadline.

One bearded student proposed a boycott of second term fees. Miss Reimer replied that fees are deducted before the OSAP grants are distributed.

Another student drew several angry retorts when he suggested that no one present had ever gone hungry for lack of student aid.

At Castle Frank Students still striking

By ANNE BOODY

The Great Castle Frank Hair controversy enters its fourth day this morning as more than 75 striking students plan a sit-in at the high school auditorium.

Yesterday, two of the protesting students were suspended by principal Wilburt Bush after they returned to classes.

One was later reinstated when his father complained to the principal.

The students began their walkout Tuesday in support of fellow student Doug Harburgh who was told last week to leave school until his hair was cut. He is now back in classes with a new haircut.

Students are now demanding both the abolition of hair and dress regulations and a pledge from principal Bush of no reprisals for their boycott of classes.

Yesterday they marched from Castle Frank to the Education Centre at College and McCaul Sts.

Six representatives of the Castle Frank Union of Students delivered an open letter to board chairman Ying Hope.

Mr. Hope spoke to the students outside and urged them to return to school with notes from their parents as Bush had demanded. He told them their grievances would be discussed at a board meeting next week.

"In the meantime wait for the results of our meeting before you take further action," he told students.

"He's given us no hope," a student spokesman told the group. "If we go back with notes we'll be giving in. We have legitimate complaints and we're not going to give in until our demands are met," he said.

Students are afraid if they return to school individually they will be dealt with individually by principal Bush. They are afraid they may be expelled because of their actions.

They have decided to return en masse and stay in a group until their demands are met.

PIGSKIN PREVIEW WESTERN MUSTANGS

Western - at least a show

1967 REVIEW

It was a rebuilding year for Western coach John Metras. And his team's record in 1967 indicated just that. Faced with replacing 21 lettermen, including almost the entire offensive backfield, ol' Jawn was forced to reconstruct slowly and carefully. To a large extent he succeeded and by the end of the year, Mustangs were close to the best team in the league.

After two exhibition losses, the regular season opener saw 'Stangs storm into Queen's and stumble out again with a 42-14 shellacking.

JOHN METRAS

Next week, before the home folks, Western gave Varsity Blues bumps, bruises, injuries and heart failure, before going down in exciting fashion, 26-20.

Then it was on to Montreal and Expo '67. Unfortunately, Metras' boys left their football, as well as their funds, at the fall Fair, giving McGill Redmen their first victory in two years, 15-13.

After this debacle, the team had nowhere to go but up. They did, mangling McGill, 47-1, and tying Toronto 18-18, before suffering an unlucky, mud-filled loss to Queen's, 10-5.

1968 PREVIEW

Last year Western lost 21 lettermen. This year they have 21 lettermen returning. Their only big losses are all-stars, quarterback Bob Israel, flanker Bill Hendershot, centre Peter Tasker, and defensive tackle Brian Murray. Western also lost two players to Toronto — tackle Doug Dempster and linebacker Mike Bukovac. As compensation, all-star guard, Ron Wakelin, has moved over from Blues.

Back for further action are sub stalwarts as offensive end Carl Lindros, punter-end Dennis Walker, fullback Jeff Hilton, defensive linemen Bill Martin and Ottavio Colosimo (both all-stars), plus secondary men Jim Henshall and Bob LaRose.

The big questionmark, of course, is at quarterback, where the big, bold boots of Bob Israel must be filled. Metras insists that Joe Cipparone is his number one helmsman, but young Kevin St. Michael looked a lot more impressive in last Saturday's victory over Varsity Blues.

Metras has to have a passer and St. Michael was much more agile and accurate than Cipparone. There's no way for 'Stangs along the ground. As the veteran coach says, "We'll win or make damn good pass defenders out of the other teams when we get through with 'em."

PREDICTION

The latest cross-Canada poll had Western moved up from no. 8 in the country to no. 4, based on their upset over Varsity. That's pretty accurate.

Playing in the SIFL division with Waterloo and McMaster ensures at least a 5-2 record for the Purple-White horsemen. However, it's no great advantage being in the inferior division, as Metras points out, since it means meeting both Toronto and Queen's on the road.

Lack of a strong running game and the uncertainty at quarterback dooms Western to a probable third place finish. But a good pass defense and some excellent receivers offensively, will make them a solid third, and they only need a fluke victory over Queen's or Toronto to put them on top.

BANDWAGON LIGHTENS AS BLUES OPEN AT MCGILL

By
ROD MICKLEBURG

Already people are starting to jump off the Varsity Blues' bandwagon.

The cross-Canada poll has relegated them to the third ranked team in the country behind Alberta and Queen's.

And a writer for the Globe and Mail, while grudgingly conceding first place in the SIFL to Blues, blasts the team for over-confidence and lack of condition. He calls them the worst-conditioned club in the league.

It all breeds ominous as Blues hop the Rapido this afternoon for tomorrow's SIFL opener in Montreal against McGill Redmen, traditionally a team short on ability but long on wind. Redmen head coach, Tim Mooney, believes that the road to victory is paved with hard work and strong discipline. He doesn't allow smoking or drinking, and as for dating, "I don't encourage it."

Although Mooney's driving has produced only two victories in the past three years, his club is always in shape, ready to ambush an unsuspecting opponent on an off-day. Last year, Western obliged a la Custer, losing 15-13. Second-place Queen's also had trouble with McGill, squeezing out only a 15-10 victory at home.

So, with all this rhubarb going around about conditioning, as even Lubor J. Zink might expect, Varsity Blues have been slogging it pretty hard and heavy at practice this week. "They've worked their butts off," says coach Ron Murphy with a big satisfied smile.

Murphy's not too worried by the lightened bandwagon resulting from last week's loss to Western. "Good! Good! That'll take the pressure off us," he replied, when informed of Blues' lower ranking in the cross-Canada poll.

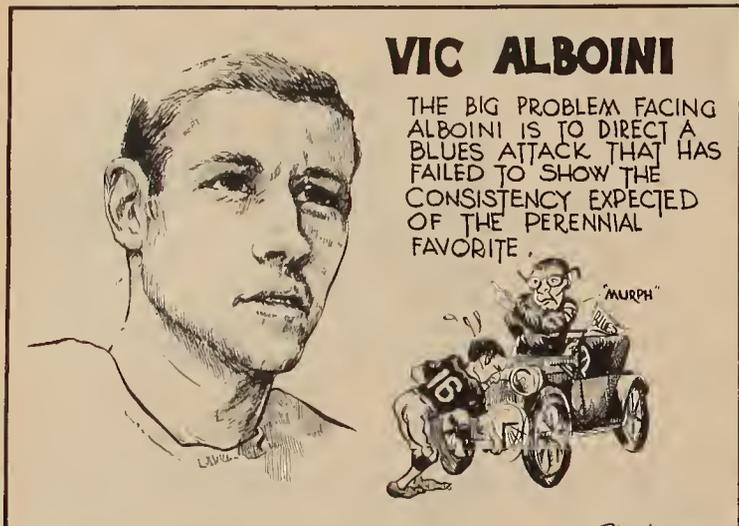

Looking toward the McGill game tomorrow, Blues can expect a tougher time than last year's 38-7 waltz in the Molson Stadium slop. Redmen, for the first time since Mooney took over four years ago, have a sound nucleus from the previous annum to work with.

McGill's only two all-stars are back, halfback Pete Bender and middle guard Jeff Ashpitz. Also returning are pass receiving, and second in punt returns.

Murphy is hardly unaware of the improved club he'll be facing. "They're bigger and stronger and better than last year. They've got two excellent running backs and, very important, there's a lot more depth on the team."

Despite all this, however, Blues should win with relative ease. Although their starting line-up includes nine men who were not members of last year's Yates Cup winners, only two are intercollegiate rookies, halfback Walt Sehr and linebacker Don Fraser.

Other new men are end Eric Walter, who starred with Redmen a few years ago, tackle Norm Trainor, who played briefly with Blues two years ago, centre Rich Agro from McMaster, guard Derek Turner from University of Ottawa, defensive tackle Doug Dempster from Western, Ian Kirkpatrick, an all-star with Blues in 1966, and cornerman Mike Bukovac from Western.

Starting at quarterback is Vic Alboini with Don Karn as his back-up man. Alboini's problem will be to get Blues' attack generating again after its dismal fizzle against Western. The backfield wields a much more worrisome whallop this week, however with the addition of Sehr and Mike Raham. Murphy's been waxing enthusiastically about the two all week.

Defensively, Blues promise to be their usual emasculating, maiming and maiming self.

Blues' last preseason match

Varsity soccer Blues, undefeated in more than four years of intercollegiate competition, are currently engaged in a rugged pre-season schedule which should prepare them for the 1968 campaign. The next game is Saturday at noon on the back campus and the opponents will be Emeralds, presently in third place in the premier division of the Toronto and District League. The game will give coach Ernie Glass one last look at this year's crop of newcomers before cutting the squad to the fourteen man limit.

Although seven of last season's championship team are missing this year, the rookies are holding their own quite well.

Last Saturday, Blues lost a close game with the Canadian National team 1-0 on a goal scored during the last five minutes of play. Considering the fact that the Canadian team is made up of professional soccer players including six members of Toronto Falcons, it seems Blues are capable of playing a very good brand of soccer.

Returning to the team this year are Frank Soppelsa, Jim Lefkos, Eric Sereda, Bill Nepotiuik, Ron Muir, Dwight Taylor, John Gero, and Jim Kalman. These veterans will be complimented by the likes of Miles Sosa, Ken Cancellera, Aduan Verhulst, Roman Zakaluzny, Bernie Dabreau and George Nomatielis.

On paper, the club looks capable of running away with the Ontario-Quebec Athletic Association championship and the accompanying Blackwood Trophy quite easily but as football coach Ron Murphy and his players found out last week in Western, things don't always work out the way they should.

Right now, Blues are looking forward to their big match with Emeralds in hopes that they can polish up their attack for their home opener with Guelph on October 5th.

Bender, in particular, is a real standout. One of the best players in the league, he finished fifth in scoring in 1967 with four touchdowns, fifth in Action in Soccer Blues' 1-0 loss to Canadian Nationals.

Kent vs Steele in tennis final

Paul Kent (Meds) looms as a heavy favorite to defeat Don Steele (Vic) in the men's singles final today. Kent had a fairly easy time in his division defeating Van Dusen (SPS) 6-2 and 6-2. Third seeded Steele defeated Meds' Peter Chow 8-6, 6-3 in his flight final.

In flight No. 3, Frank Blyth (Vic) had to struggle to get by Osamu Iwao (SGS) 7-5 and 6-3. In the other flight, frosh Brad Robinson (Vic) surprised Mike Wilson (Innis) 7-5, 2-6, and 6-3 after Wilson had upset 4th seeded Gord Gibbins (Trin) 6-1 and 6-0.

In the semis, top-seeded Kent downed Robinson 6-2 and 6-0, while Steele upset 2nd seeded Blyth 6-4 and 6-1.

The Kent-Steele final (best of five sets) goes today at 1 p.m. at the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club.

Rebel—use naked power! Farber

"Rebel — organize and rebel if you don't like the way you're being taught," Jerry Farber, author of the controversial article student as Nigger, told students last night.

At a panel discussion in Hart House students in the audience also forwarded blistering attacks on the educational system.

"We must transform the schools which society uses to transform us — this can be done only by naked power," Farber claimed.

The whole problem of the system is that there is a forced dependency upon the students, Peter Warriar, president of the Canadian Union of Students charged.

"Our educational system is the heart of the nature of our society," said Farber. "But our education is a stumbling block to the kind of society we really want.

"People don't learn democracy unless they practice it."

How can they practice it in the power structured educational institutions? students asked the panel.

"We are products for the corporate elite," a student participant said.

"You've got minds of your own," Davidson Dunton, vice-chancellor of Carleton University commented.

"But they belong to someone else," Warriar retaliated.

"For heaven's sake take them back!" Barry Callaghan, moderator of the debate exclaimed.

"You can't really know what freedom is unless you try to use it," Farber said quietly.

One student blamed "they system" for making students afraid to take group action. "After 12 years they've lost their will to fight it," he said.

"They've been put down on so many little points they don't want to get involved," he said.

Farber said he favored the type of school that allows students to pursue their own course of study.

"I look to Summerhill (a prominent British free school) as the type of schooling I'd like to see now and in the future.

"What alternative to the present structure can we have," students pondered.

"Students and faculty must have the ability to govern as an autonomous institution," Warriar replied.

"We recognize that there are some differences between students and professors — therefore there should be parallel committees of students and faculty which would each have veto power."

"I have this utopian idea that students are in school to learn — they look at their professors as useful people," said Warriar.

"Well if that's what's happening we can all go home," Farber said with exasperation. "The trouble is kids worry more about passing those final exams then developing themselves."

UNB PROF SUSPENDED

Students sit in for Strax

FREDERICTON (CUP)—Students at the University of New Brunswick are heading into their fifth day of a sit-in protesting the administration's suspension of an activist professor.

Dr. Norman Strax, a nuclear physicist, was suspended last Tuesday by administration President Colin MacKay and told to vacate his office by Thursday morning.

Strax has been active in the formation of a group calling itself Struggle for a Democratic Society (SDS). The organization led demonstrations Friday, Sept. 20 against the use of identification cards at the university library

The library was forced to close early that day because of the demonstrators, who called the ID card "an invasion of privacy and a breach of civil liberties."

MacKay refused to explain the suspension but said it was for "obvious reasons."

Thirty students and Strax began a sit-in in Strax's office Thursday to forestall his eviction. By Sunday evening, there was still no reaction by the administration other than a Board of Governors resolution approving MacKay's actions.

Over 30 students have participated in the four-day sit-in.

SEPTEMBER 30, 1968

Nobody will reveal what happened at last Thursday's monthly meeting of the Board of Governors.

The meetings are closed and only major decisions are announced, university President Claude Bissell told The Varsity last night.

"No crucial decisions are made in the Board of Governors," he said.

GSU may leave SAC

By LIZ ENNIS

The university's 5,500 graduate students have voted to withdraw from the Students Administrative Council, according to John Winter, president of the Graduate Students Union.

The decision is a result of a mandate conducted during the three weeks of graduate registration.

"Seventy-five per cent of the graduate students who voted wished to withdraw from SAC," says Winter.

"But at the present time I am unable to release specific figures either about the election results or about the percentage of graduate students who voted," Winter said last night.

"The GSU executive, with this substantial mandate, will formally request withdrawal from SAC and reimbursement of the $12 fee at next week's SAC meeting," Winter said.

SAC President Steve Langdon considers the mandate invalid.

"I personally encouraged graduate students not to vote because it was not a valid election," Langdon said last night.

"I know of a substantial number of graduate students who took this position and have not been recognized by John Winter," he said.

"During the first half week of registration the ballots were attached to a piece of literature stating GSU grievances against SAC," said Langdon. "This is invalid election procedure, and many of these votes may have been counted.

"SAC tried to circulate literature saying that this was not a valid time to have an election. No discussion or debate has taken place.

"We were forbidden from voicing our opinion during this first half week," Langdon added.

Langdon also took issue with the method of voting.

"Not all graduate students are members of SAC—only 3,500 out of 5,500," he said. "The qualification has something to do with residence requirements.

"But," Langdon charged, "all 5,500 of these students register and were probably allowed to vote.

"Until these points are cleared up we do not seem to have a true picture of this mandate.

"And we will fight it."

Castle Frank High School Vice-Principal casts a worried glance at Varsity photographer Ron Clark, while presiding over a sit-in in the school auditorium, Friday morning.

Warrian sees danger of violence

By GEOFFREY MEGGS

Peter Warrian looks completely unlike the stereotype of a campus rebel.

Dressed in white slacks and turtleneck, the crew-cut bullet-headed Canadian Union of Students president delivered a low-key address to about 250 students in Convocation Hall Friday afternoon.

"When war research is done on campus," he said, "the institution itself is acting in a violent way. We do live in a violent society."

Warrian has acquired what he considers an undeserved reputation as an advocate of student violence.

"There is a real danger of violence among the students," he said. "It is not difficult to imagine, without definition of common problems, a confrontation between SAC and the engineers."

After questioning he agreed he meant "conservative elements in general" and not engineers specifically.

Excitement reached a peak before Warrian took the podium, when the audience of about 250 applauded loudly in support of 40 Castle Frank High School students at the meeting.

The applause was repeated for a burly CFTO cameraman who took a light meter reading about three inches from Steven Langdon's left ear. When asked to desist he whiled away the next two hours by checking his equipment with a monacle, and munching peanuts.

Discussion centred largely around determining an acceptable level of democratization in the lecture hall.

"If democracy was applied to academic questions," protested a physics lecturer, "It's conceivable my engineering class could vote not to study Newton's Laws"

The Bull and The Bear

In The Sutton Place Hotel • On Wellesley just east of Bay

At the university of Toronto the liveliest activity takes place in the departments, particularly in the Faculty of Arts and Science, where joint student-faculty committees have been established and have already contributed much to the reshaping of curriculum. From these committees will come 16 representatives on the Faculty Council — which is certainly a far cry from tokenism.

— President Claude Bissell in his opening address

"You'll take what you're given, boy"

At a time when students are pressing for a democratic university, the seating of 16 students on the 1,000 member Faculty Council can only be described as an expression of contempt.

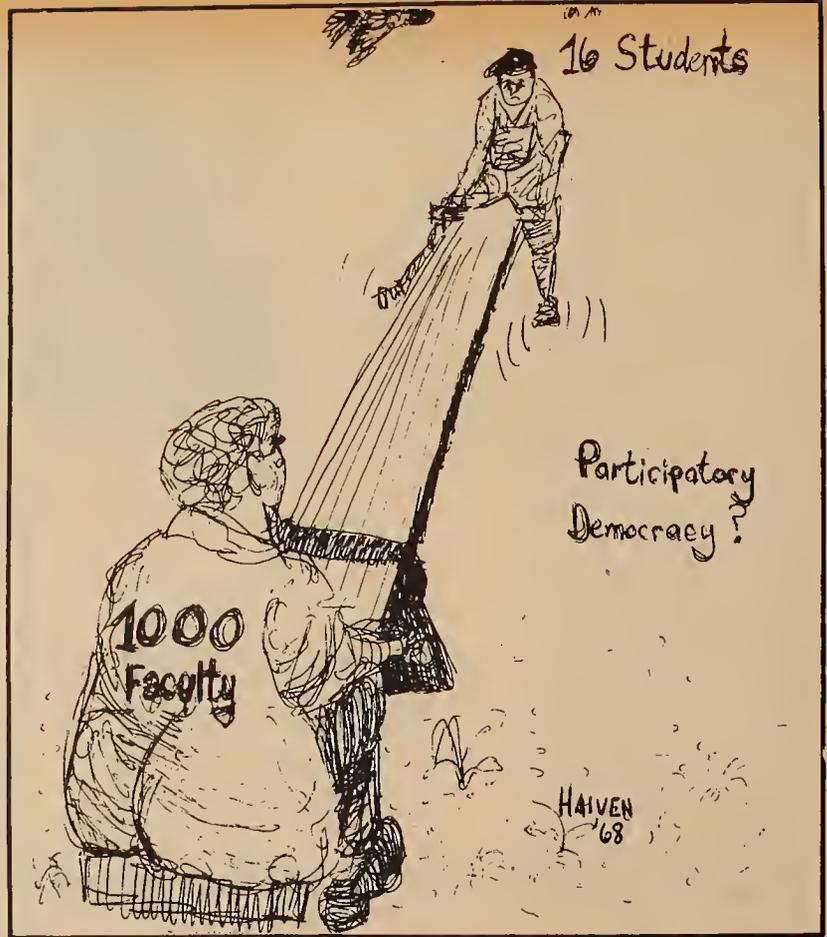

The Council meets today to begin discussion on recommendations based on the Macpherson Report — a report affecting staff and students. As it turns out, 1,000 faculty members will decide the system under which they want to teach, while 16 students will represent 27,000 in deciding the system under which they want to be taught.

This parody of democracy was concocted under the nose of the students council, which has a policy against tokenism and against closed meetings. Instead the faculty "elected" its 16 token students through a series of staff-student committees — some set up just for the occasion.

Today's meeting takes place at 4 p.m. in the Senate chambers of Simcoe Hall. The meeting is secret.

The 16 students have indicated they will ask for an open meeting at the first session, but if they get out-voted, well . . . what can you do? They seem firmly welded to the liberal deceit of dialogue leading to action.

Too bad it doesn't work that way. The power structure of the university doesn't move unless threatened by a power as great as itself. Sixteen students isn't much of a power too many, the Council can be restructured to fit. The principle is simple: students have at least an equal right with faculty to make decisions on educational policy.

Until this happens the Council's decision, however popular with students (and they will include a few student-generated reforms to show their "good faith"), should not be accepted as legitimate. If the 16 do not get equal representation and open meetings, they should resign and submit no longer to this incredible caricature of democracy.

Let us hope that students will let this farce go unchallenged, that they will recognize their right to participate as equals in decisions affecting the university. And if that involves taking over Simcoe Hall until the situation is rectified, so be it.

ures it now has. One essential ingredient is the dissolution of ascribed us differences between students and faculty as they recognize a common commitment to real learning in a atmosphere.

Many graduates who voted to draw from SAC because of "different interests" will find themselves in the faculty as students and faculty to resolve their differences.

Graduates, undergraduates and faculty do have similar interests, or they don't. The most important thing in running this university a place where education means more than training a job, means more than learning to look like a Board of Governors mem-

"Beware the extreme left"

By JOHN AYRE
(II VIC)

This article could be taken as McCarthyite witch-hunting, but ... what I say is true—ie. that it takes only 150 students to fuck up the rights of 25,000 students. As a conservative moderate (once a liberal moderate until Columbia) I don't want the paranoid psychoses of that 150 to erupt into substantial violence — and I want to warn the students of that possibility.

Says Philip Resnick, "Gone the mind-fuck of the formal lecture, the grimace of master lording it over slave, the crumbs of culture that substituted for a vision of the whole." Thus, apparently, the Marxist millennium, "the vision of a Toronto commune, in which students and sympathetic faculty might give full rein to their imaginations..." Yet when we think of Czechoslovakia, we are quickly reminded exactly where Marxists stand on the matter of "liberated imagination".

Having been a spectator of the Columbia riots in New York in May, I am well aware of what a small band of ideological fanatics are capable of doing when there is apathy or tolerance on the part of the vast majority of students. I am aware of what a small band of fanatics are capable of doing at this university this year if given free rein by the moderate student majority, who out of ignorance at the present moment are oblivious to the consequences of tolerating the growing power of the extreme leftists.

We hear a great deal of a power elite, an imperialist, bourgeois pack of thieving, repressive capitalists bent on the destruction of all of the creative powers of a poor, repressed, and whip-scourged student body. Yet it is the carriers of this "vicious" capitalistic system, our parents, the administration, the society at large, that repress so brutally that they pay for almost all of the expenses involved in educating us; that repress so brutally that they have offered our leaders substantial student representation on an advisory council; that repress so brutally that in many of the honour courses exams have been abolished and lectures cut down in favour of more effective seminarial discussions; that repress so brutally that they have taken the brunt of obscenity and insult with reasonably good humour; that repress so brutally that they (unbelievably) have continued to tolerate a small minority of exceedingly dangerous students now harboured in our campus.

Most of what the leftists have been saying about the so-called repressive system is today bogus, an agglomerate pack of Marxist fairy tales designed to eat on the ordinary frustrations of the average student in order to gain the ascendancy over one so-called elite, to put their own elite into a position of power.

A brutal fact of elementary sociology is that if a society — in this case, the university — wishes to survive, it must set limits on membership. If elements are admitted not in basic agreement with an expansive consensus, then there is the potential danger that the society will be destroyed from within. The society must adjust constantly to shifts of consensus among its members, but at no time must it allow members that are in complete opposition to the basic principles under which the society was instituted.

In this context I would warn the student body that there are such elements in this university that are completely at odds to those basic principles of scholarly study and endeavor. If they, as they have in the past, continue to be allowed to openly flaunt that which is so basic to the majority, then I can only predict a year of violence, and black anarchy, where the goal of those that play such dangerous games is raw power, and not as they would have it, the freedom and creativity of the so-called "repressed" individual.

RUGGED DEFENCE, STRONG RUNNING GRIND MCGILL 22-3

By Rod Mickleburgh

MONTREAL—One doesn't normally associate bump 'n' grind with the gridiron, but Varsity Blues made a notable exception Saturday afternoon. Before a wildly lackadaisical crowd at Molson Stadium, Blues put on a lascivious production extraordinaire as they bumped and ground their way to a 22-3 victory over McGill Redmen to open the SIFL season for both clubs.

Spectacular rookie halfback, Walt Sehr, led the team down the runway with a brilliant, will-o'-the-wisp display of running agility. Included in his repertoire were 157 yards rushing and one touchdown on a dazzling 95 yard punt return. It was hardly an inauspicious debut for the six foot, 172 pound speedster.

Disheartened McGill coach, Tom Mooney, called Sehr's touchdown the turning point of the game. It came late in the third quarter with Blues ahead of the pesky Redmen only 10-3.

"I thought we were coming 'till then," said Mooney. "We had six guys down there waiting for Sehr to make his move. No one went after him; they all just waited. Then when he did make his move, he flashed right by."

As expected, McGill proved a fairly tough nut to crack, but Blues proved methodically equal to the task. Their method certainly wasn't spectacular, nor was it particularly exciting, but it won them a solid two points in the standings.

Almost disdaining the forward pass, Varsity quarterback Vic Alboini directed a slashing ground attack which yielded 339 yards. Alboini completed only four passes all afternoon, although two were short touchdown tosses to split-end, Eric Walter.

Fullback Mike Raham proved a worthy complement to Sehr with 118 yards rushing. More than a hundred of these came in the first half before the freezing started to wear off in his dislocated toe.

Defensively, McGill's puny three points and ten first downs attest rather significantly to the customary, superb job done by Flue's rugged defensive unit. Once again, this year, it appears defense is Toronto's ace in the hole.

Varsity drew first blood following recovery of a McGill fumble on the sixteen yard line. After two incomplete passes, Paul McKay booted a field goal at the 13:35 mark of the first quarter.

McGill evened the score with a determined march precipitated by 30 yards in Varsity penalties. When Blues kept clean, the drive bogged down and ex-cop, George Springate, flat-footed a 32 yard field goal.

With little more than two minutes remaining in the first half Blues went ahead to stay when Alboini threw a perfect strike to Walter deep in the end zone from ten yards out. The play was set up by Sehr's 23 yard ramble.

The opening of the second half saw Toronto pile up lots of first downs, but fail to dent the scoreboard as McGill continued to hang tough. A blocked field goal, an intercepted pass, and an unsuccessful third down gamble helped keep the Murphymen at bay until Sehr finally broke the game open with his long punt return. A key block by Keith Johnson at centre field removed the final McGill defender as Sehr sped his 95 yards through the middle. The convert attempt was blocked.

A twelve yard touchdown strike from Alboini to Walter midway through the fourth quarter completed the scoring.

Kent wins racquet final

By JOHN CAMERON

Paul Kent (Meds) overpowered Don Steele (Vic) 6-3, 9-11, 6-3 and 6-4 on Friday at the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club to capture the McEachern Cup, awarded annually to the winner of the interfaculty tennis championship.

Kent's combination of power and accuracy proved too much for his bigger but slower opponent. On more than one occasion, Kent's remarkable serves caught Steele off balance and forced him into costly errors. Although by no means out-classed, the loser tended to get down on himself when he made an error and he appeared much less at ease than the champion.

In the first set, Kent captured the first three games while Steele was unable to get untracked, losing his serve in games one and three. Thereafter, Kent split the remaining six games to win 6-3.

Set number two was hotly contested and saw Steele come back from a 5-3 deficit to triumph 11-9. Finally, Kent regained his edge in sets three and four to win out after some three hours of competition.

For Kent and Steele, it was just a friendly match — a prep for the western division final of the intercollegiate tennis championship to be held at McMaster this weekend.

The two players along with Vic's Frank Blyth and Meds' Peter Chow, make up the Varsity tennis team which last year was defeated by University of Montreal after winning the western section of the OQAA playoffs. Brad Robinson (Vic I) will act as a substitute for the intercollegiate squad.

Emeralds' late goal wins 2-1

By AUSTRIS LIEPA

A goal by John Johnston in the 87th minute of play gave Toronto Emeralds a hard-fought 2-1 victory over Varsity soccer Blues on Saturday.

From the beginning of the game, Emeralds seemed to assert themselves in midfield where Leaim Cahill and company beat Blues to the ball on many occasions. At the twenty minute mark, a high cross from Alan Cairns was headed in beautifully by Tom "Twiggy" Walters to the bewilderment of Blues supporters and the three defenders who surrounded him on the play.

Within a minute, however, a perfect pass from Cancelara put Frank Soppelsa in good position for one of his booming shots. The ball was in the back of the net before you could say "Goal", and Blues had tied the score.

Another minute later, Jim Lefkos set up Soppelsa but the latter's shot just grazed the post. Thereafter, the game settled into an even midfield battle with little action around the goals.

In the second half, although slightly outplayed at midfield, Blues managed to set up several excellent chances but poor finishing by the forwards combined with excellent goaltending by Malcolm Warton thwarted them.

At the other end of the field, Walters just missed with a header and Bernie D'Abreau, Blues' rookie goalie, stopped a hard drive from Cairns. Three minutes from the end, Johnston got the winner on an excellent shot from thirty yards out. Blues desperately attempted to mount a scoring drive before the final whistle, but were unsuccessful.

Blues' next game is Wednesday when they meet the Canadian Nationals at Varsity Stadium.

Rugger Blues whip Old Boys

A UTRFC SYNDICATED SERVICE

On Sunday Varsity Blues A rugger squad invaded the bastion of gridiron frolics, Varsity Stadium, to defeat Varsity Old Boys, 15-6, thus continuing their undefeated streak.

Although the rigid ruggers seemed on top, it was well into the last half before their efforts began to show on the score board. Two penalties a piece kept the score tied up until George Wraw crossed the line after a fine piece of running. This was followed shortly by a try from Tony Pierre, whose running up till then had often left him yards short of the line.

Blues were in better shape than their elders: despite this, they were well contained for most of the game. Paul Wison's Commandos were bolstered by some of the "not so old": Ranny Parker, Andy Szandner, and recent exports Bill Kyle and Dave Imrie, all of whom made sure that there was no gentleness in the game.

Blues looked like the right squad that should have little trouble cleaning up the intercollegiate championship for another year. Some new faces showing promise: Geoff Ellwand and Victor Harding combined with fine play by veterans Peter Hand, Doug Phibbs and George Wraw to make the game as good as any we have seen.

And yet, you reticent sports fans there is plenty more to come, so lets flock to support your own jock strap ensemble.

UNB SITS ON

FREDERICTON (CUP) — A demonstration that started out as a protest against the use of identification cards at the University of New Brunswick library is into its seventh day as a full-scale sit-in.

Dr. Norman Strax, a physics professor who was instrumental in organizing a demonstration which closed the library briefly, was suspended by university President Colin Mackay last Tuesday and ordered to vacate his office.

Last Wednesday, Strax and more than 30 students occupied the professor's second-floor office in the physics building. They say they will not leave the office until the university administration meets three demands:

- reinstatement of Strax;
- recomposition of UNB's board of governors to make it more representative;
- an end to the ID card system at the university.

Dr. Strax was served with a contempt of court charge Tuesday after refusing to obey an injunction ordering him off university property. An affidavit signed by Allen Boone, head of the physics department, told the court he believed "irreparable mischief" may result if Strax is permitted to trespass on the UNB campus.

Strax expects to be arrested today when he does not appear in court as ordered.

Vincent Kelly, a Toronto civil rights lawyer, and Barry McPeake, a Canadian Union of Students field worker, arrived in Fredericton this morning.

The executive secretary of the Canadian Association of University Teachers, J. Percy Smith, is also reported to be on his way.

CUS has not issued an official statement, but President Peter Warrian is "very much afraid" violence will erupt some time today. (Last night more than 70 students invaded the physics building, attempting to throw the demonstrators out. They were dispersed by two administration officials and the demonstrators bedded down for the night.)

At U of T, 30 professors have sent telegrams to President MacKay and New Brunswick Premier Louis Robichaud registering support for Strax.

The Toronto branch of the Canadians for the NLF (of which Strax is an active member) will collect signatures in Sidney Smith Hall today for a petition in support of "academic freedom and the right of free speech."

And the Canadian Rights Defense Committee (c/o Prof. Peter Rosenthal, dept. of mathematics) is collecting funds to help cover Strax's legal costs.

Telephone service to Strax's office has been cut off, and demonstrators must enter and leave by a rope ladder through the window because the building is locked between 7 p.m. and 8 a.m.

Faculty council open meeting

By JIM COWAN

An open meeting of the council of the faculty of arts and science will be held today at 2 p.m. in Convocation Hall to discuss implementation of key Macpherson Report proposals.

The precedent-setting move came at Monday's closed council meeting, which also saw students take seats on the Council for the first time.

The council will consider four resolutions proposed by faculty Dean A. D. Allen and seconded by Associate Dean A. C. H. Hallett. Council members will be given first chance to speak, but after the first half hour of discussion on each item, the debate will be thrown open to the floor.

Those of the 1,000 faculty members who attend will be seated on the ground floor. The galleries will be open to the public. President Claude Bissell is chairman of the council.

If adopted by the Council, Dean Allen's proposals would result in implementing four major recommendations of the Macpherson Report. The resolutions state:

- That Council approves the principle of freedom of choice for students in the selection of courses (from those for which they are qualified) with the restriction that in first year not more than two courses may be taken in any one subject;

- That Council accepts the proposal — the present Honor and General Course programs be discontinued;

That departments (or groups of departments) be encouraged to offer specialized programs for the second, third and fourth years that Winter: perhaps it was that last minute resolution...

GSU referendum questioned

Although graduate students have voted to withdraw from SAC, the move will not be made for at least three weeks.

In an election conducted during the three weeks of graduate registration, the vote was 1,949 to 642 in favor of withdrawal. 1,298 students did not vote.

A general meeting of the Graduate Students Union called last night to discuss President John Winter's report and the budget erupted into a noisy debate which ended in a decision to adjourn and meet again in three weeks.

The subject of the debate — the legality of the mandate conducted during the three weeks of graduate registration.

Chalmers Harderbergh (SGS) claimed the election was invalid "because the vote was forced."

"GSU propaganda was on the top half of the ballot," charged Andy Wernick (SGS)

Not all graduate students pay SAC fees. According to John Winter, it was impossible to check who belonged to SAC.

"If such a referendum had to be run again, we would not be able to separate those who paid SAC fees from those who didn't," said Winter.

"It was only a public opinion poll, not a legal vote," added Philip Resnick. "Until we have a formal referendum, graduate students on SAC have as much right to speak for graduate students as GSU members."

Resnick made a motion to have GSU remain in SAC. Voices started to rise and it looked as if the debate would go on for hours.

But, one graduate student called for an adjournment on the basis that 70 graduate students could not vote for the whole GSU.

The motion of adjournment passed quickly.

"Nobody was forced to vote," said Charlie Zabrowski, GSU treasurer. "Nobody twisted anyone's arm to fill out the ballot."

Winter called the referendum valid.

"Its ridiculous to suggest we deluded 2000 graduates to vote for our opinion."

"If people feel they were pressured into voting," he added, "they can come in and ask that their vote be subtracted from the total."

In a last minute motion the GSU also issued a public statement of support for Mexican students in their "struggle" against the army and police. A telegram of solidarity was sent to Mexican students and another to the Mexican President urging "all political prisoners be immediately released."

Wishy washy-or just content?

By ANNE BOODY

Student "apathy" might just be student content with the university, Don Ross, Trinity representative on the Students Administrative Council, said last night.

"I guess I speak for the liberal wishy washies on the campus," he told 75 students at a Trinity College debate.

The solution for student discontent with the course structure is to change the structure for them. But those who want a piece of paper to show they worked four years in the university should also be allowed to have it, he commented. Reform is the method for change, not confrontation, he said.

Steve Langdon, President of SAC, disagreed. Gradual reform that Ross wants doesn't work, he insisted.

"Real qualitative change means a real shaking of attitudes," claimed Langdon.

"Look at POSAP. There was no response until students marched to Queen's park two years ago."

Through reform, he said, we are only playing into the hands of the status quo. Progress becomes defined in the terms of the status quo.

"I'm committed to non-violent confrontation, but violence which will destroy the university will come if basic changes do not."

will permit students who want to do so to follow specialized programs of study comparable in academic merit to the present Honor Courses;

- That Council accepts the proposed distinction between a three-year bachelor's degree and a four-year degree with Honors open to both specialists and non-specialists;

That only students who obtain at least second Class standing in third year are eligible to enrol in a fourth year programme;

- That Council endorses the general proposals of the Macpherson Report with respect to the reduction of formal teaching hours and accepts the maxima recommended in the sub-committee report.

Much of the discussion

Monday centred around the question of openness. It was proposed the special meetings this week be open only in the sense that students could attend but not participate.

An amendment proposed by Sandra Black (IV Vic), one of the student members, and seconded by a faculty member, changed the terms of openness so that students could participate.

Yesterday it was decided to let students speak after each item was introduced, instead of just at the end of the meeting.

There will be a second session on Friday.

"It is definitely essential students go on and press for openness," said Tom Kuttner (IV SMC).

Bruce Roberts, (III Vic) believes students should ask for open meetings but doesn't think students should "move

"If we want democracy in the university, we can't ask for it until we prove we have it in our own ranks," said F. Paul Fromm, SAC member for St. Mike's.

"And we don't," he stormed.

"I'm always disturbed to hear extreme rightists use the rhetoric of the new left — their talk about pacifism and motherhood," Andy Wernick, SAC education commissioner, said bitterly.

"In fact, the Hall-Dennis Report claims that education is Ontario's fastest growing industry," Wernick stormed.

He said the only way to change the "exploitative" nature of the university was through mass confrontation.

"And the people who want to smash SAC for its actions are reactionaries. They're not attacking SAC because of its illegitimacy, as the honorable Mr. Fromm states, they're attacking it because they're afraid of their image."

Bob Rae, University College representative charged that the nature of SAC was the responsibility of all students.

"It's your own fault. You're stuck with us because you elected us. And if you don't like us," he blasted, "it's your business to do something concrete about it."

"And I'm not scared of democracy. I'd take on Fromm any day.

in and try to take over. That's not the way to do it," he said.

Asked if she felt some members might hesitate to take part in open discussion, Miss Black said, "People who refuse to participate will be left behind, because things are definitely moving. These are no longer hearings. We're at the legislative level now."

It seems unlikely any final decision will be made before early next year, which would be the latest date for implementation of the new program for next year.

Students from Castle Frank and Parkway High Schools will demonstrate in front of the Education Centre at 4:30 p.m. on Thursday in protest against school restrictions.

The students are demanding an end to restrictions on hair and clothing styles, and abolishment of the use of slips and forms which they must have to go to washrooms and lockers.

The demonstration precedes a meeting of the Board of Education scheduled for 8 p.m. Thursday. About 200 students are expected to show up.

In a front page story Monday The Varsity quoted U of T president Claude Bissell as saying "No crucial decisions are made in the Board of Governors."

In a letter to The Varsity Dr. Bissell explains that "no important decisions were made at the meeting on Thursday Sept. 26."

"The Board, of course, makes many decisions that are crucial to the University," he writes.

Loney speaks here Thursday

Martin Loney, President-elect of the Canadian Union of Students and the new author of the politics of confrontation, will be on campus tomorrow afternoon.

He will speak at 1 p.m. on the former site of Tent City, or in room 2118 of Sidney Smith in case of rain.

Loney was elected by acclamation at the CUS conference in early September after an active career in the student power movement at Simon University, where he is a graduate student. He takes office next fall.

As president of the Simon Fraser student council Loney led Canada's only successful student revolt this summer.

Students and faculty forced the resignation of university president Patrick McTaggart-Cowan. The present president, Kenneth Strand, is the third man to head the university since early this summer. A permanent replacement has yet to be found.

"Out of confrontation comes consciousness," is Loney's theme.

His philosophy is that education demands participation, choice, and democratic control.

In the past we have been working in rural Mexico concentrating on community development, during the summer. This year we are planning new projects in urban Mexico, with the Mexican students. Glendon Principal Escott Reid at Ridley College June 8

"revolution yes -- but not NOW"

It hasn't been formally announced yet, but the SAC counter-courses start next week.

In these extra-curricular courses, students and resource people (some of them faculty) will get together to decide what they want to learn and how they want to learn it.

We can get a rough idea of how these courses will fare by examining a parallel attempt at Glendon College this fall — Liberation.

Liberation began to take shape in Winnipeg, last spring, at a Canadian Union of Students seminar. There the emphasis was not only on ideas, but putting these ideas into action.

The Glendon student leaders at the seminar organized meetings of the student council over the summer. They decided to focus their action on orientation week at Glendon, and called it Liberation Week.

Glendon is an eminently liberal college, headed by an eminently liberal principal, Escott Reid.

In conversation the word "revolution" is often on his lips and he encourages his students to work for change in society.

It was natural that the Glendon council would organize their attempt at change in a liberal way. They asked students not to enroll in classes until the last day of registration (Oct. 15) and try "people-generated" courses instead. In these courses students and faculty designed their own educational environment.

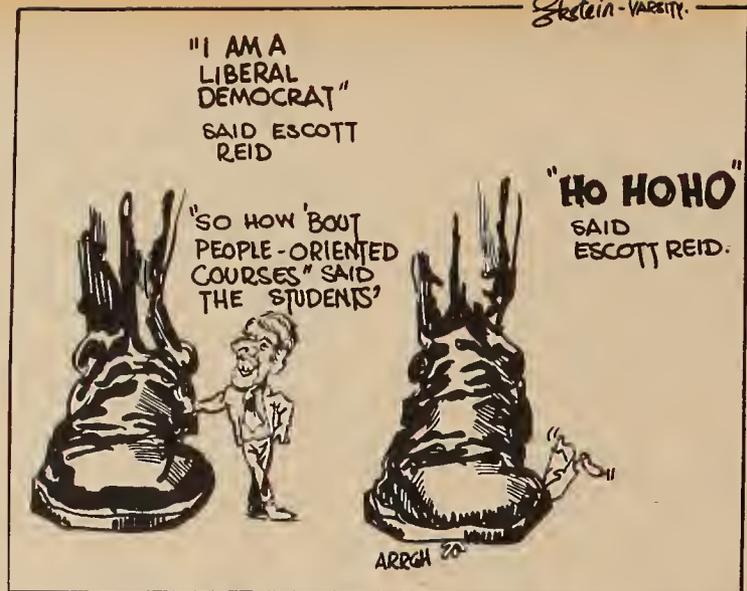

The council wrote up a Manifesto on the aims of education which contains enough liberal rhetoric to choke even an Escott Reid. It said education should:

"Enable the individual to think independently and critically, to appreciate and understand compassionately, act courageously and knowledgeably. Education may be defined as a process of enlightenment by which one shuns the constraints of tradition, prejudice and ignorance, in the search for a truly human existence, both for one's self and one's fellow members of society."

Why couldn't Glendon students get that kind of education in the regular courses? One council member put it this way:

"People should be allowed to define for themselves what they feel is a truly human existence."

The Glendon council didn't want to disrupt the university — they only wanted to change it. That was where Escott Reid decided he had to draw the line.

Let's be fair: he had a lot of pressure acting on him. The Board of Governors had threatened to close out the college because it costs $500 more per students there than at the main York campus. With this extra expenditure, how could the students help but be happy?

Escott Reid set out to make sure they were happy — in the old system.

He told the college at a mass meeting that Glendon was just beginning to develop a "constituency" after two years. If the college changed, it would take another three years to develop a new "constituency" and the college would fold. That $500, remember?

Then he applied more subtle pressure.

If students didn't make their course choices soon, he said, the college wouldn't know how many professors to keep in each department: some might be fired unnecessarily. Furthermore, students had better hurry up and make their choices or they might not get the courses they wanted. Some (since the college was a bit overcrowded) might be asked to leave.

Liberation collapsed as a viable force for change at Glendon. A few counter-courses are still going, and about 25 students haven't registered yet. Students and faculty are a little closer than they were, and hundreds of students at least had to examine their educational goals.

But like most liberals, Reid didn't want real change — at least not now. He didn't have to call in the police — counter-courses can't survive alongside credit courses because credit courses lead to that degree. So students who might have taken the counter courses, didn't.

How does this tie in to U of T? Simple: counter courses won't work without confrontation, Glendon proved that. Even "liberal" reforms are unacceptable if they produce too much change too soon.

In effect, this means that if the counter courses are to work, the university will have to be shut down, students will have to quit their present courses and set up their own.

Doesn't this mean engineers and lawyers and English majors and psychologists will be denied the right to take the courses they want? Not at all.

They could set up courses on a parallel committee basis. This means students and faculty design a course together, each having a veto over the other. This system is already working at Simon Fraser University. The two elements come together in reason, not because of structures imposed from above.

That's what free education is all about. Free education doesn't deprive any student of his rights to an education because he will, at last, control that right himself.

The (New) Macpherson Report

The following is an abridged version of the Report of the Sub-Committee of Undergraduate Studies on the Implementation of the Macpherson Report. Portions of the Report will be debated at an open session of the Faculty Council today at 2 p.m. in Convocation Hall.

First Year Programme

(1) There will be no named or prescribed programmes of study in first year, but within the limitations imposed by (3) below a student may, if he wishes, specialize in and identify himself with any subject area.

(2) A first year programme will consist of five courses, each to be given equal weight in the determination of final standing.

(3) Each student will be free to select any five courses, restricted only as follows:

(a) not more than two courses may be taken in any one subject;
(b) any prerequisite or co-requisite stated must be complied with.

(4) Students will be admitted to the Faculty under the same general regulations as presently hold, viz., Ontario

Grade XIII, or equivalent, standing in two of English, another language, Mathematics A; and at least two optional subjects comprising three credits.

(a) Wherever possible, the main or "Basic" course given by a Department should not require any specific Grade XIII subject as a prerequisite. Where it is desirable for a Department to offer a course that builds on Grade XIII and requires Grade XIII standing in its subject as a prerequisite, the Department should be encouraged to offer another course without prerequisite for students lacking that subject in Grade XIII.

(c) The number of lecture hours in each course should not exceed three per week, of which at least one should be a tutorial or small group hour. In those courses where laboratory work (including language laboratory or equivalent language practice) is required, the time equivalent of the laboratory shall be counted as one-half of the actual laboratory time. In such cases the total number of lecture, tutorial and "half-laboratory" hours must not exceed four per week for any course.

(d) No "pass" courses, or courses equivalent to the present one-hour options may be required as part of a programme. However some of the present one-hour options might be converted into half-courses. Voluntary general-interest lecture series will also be encouraged.

Second Year Programme

Beginning with the second year a number of named Specialist Programmes may be defined and stated in the Calendar. By his choice of courses a student may identify himself with a Specialist Programme, but if he chooses not to do so, then he would be considered a Generalist student who will be free to choose, as he did in the first year, any five courses for which he has the stated prerequisite(s) or is taking the stated co-requisite(s).

Prerequisites and co-requisites (if any) must be stated for individual courses, not for programmes. Departments should attempt to make each course available to the maximum number of students by keeping pre- and co-requisites to a minimum consistent with maintenance of the quality and intensity of each course.

The time-table will be arranged so that as many specialist programmes as possible will be provided for, plus maximum flexibility for students who do not follow any such programme. If it is necessary to achieve greater flexibility the formal University day will be extended by one hour.

Where necessary because of course requirements or other circumstances one, or at the most two, first year courses may be included in a second year programme, but only with the permission of the Department offering the first year course(s) chosen.

ment must be made to a committee of Council.

In the first-year programme a final examination will be held in each course. These examinations will be conducted by the Faculty, as at present, in a prescribed final examination period. Final standing is to be based on an average of term and examination marks, with the proviso that not less than one-third nor more than two-thirds of the final mark shall be based on the term mark. There is to be no requirement of a separate passing grade in either the term or the final examination.

In the second and later years a final examination in a course may or may not be held at the discretion of Departments. The decision whether or not a final examination is to be held must be made before the beginning of each session. Where no final examination is held in a course the teaching year will continue until the end of April, with appropriate arrangements being made for students to take examinations in other courses. The students and the Faculty Office must be informed of the examination arrangements for each course not later than the beginning of the session. Since in all years term work shall count for not less than one-third of the final mark in all courses or half courses, students must be told at the beginning of each course the term - examination weighting to be used.

LETTERS

To Ayre is human?

Sir:

John Ayre, in his rather uncarefully written comment "Beware the extreme left" (Sept. 30), exposes himself to verbal destruction in almost every sentence.

Here, for example, is one unthought-over tidbit: "The society must adjust constantly to shifts of consensus among its members, but at no time must it allow members that are in complete opposition to the basic principles under which the society was instituted."

Would Mr. Ayre not have allowed the presence of the future revolutionaries in colonial America? One fancies him à la Louis XVI trying to get rid of those — only a few at first — calling for liberty, equality and fraternity in the years before 1789.

Wait. On second thought, I see Mr. Ayre will be able to crush my opposition mercilessly and with ease. For obviously his principle could not be applied in those democratic bygone feudal-colonial days.

But now, of course, that we are basking in liberty, equality and other good stuff . . .

Still, Mr. Ayre could have avoided the slightest possibility of criticism by cleverer wording. May I offer him a quickie course in composing and proofchecking arguments? Or perhaps campus conservatives could petition for the creation of a one-hour option in polemics . . .

Brian Mossop (IV VIC)

Sir:

My admiration for and gratitude to John Ayre for his reasoned and impassioned article in Monday's Varsity.

Having been encouraged by "the mind-fuck of the formal lecture" to write an essay comparing "The Wonderer" (a tenth century Old English poem) to the doctrines of Sartre and Merleau-Ponty, and having incorporated an unbounded enthusiasm for Earl 'Fatha' Hines into an essay on Walt Whitman, and having been sufficiently inspired by the music of Eric Dolphy to write my French 120 paper on the poetry of Apollinaire, I'm becoming more than a little pissed off at those frustrated artsies whose creative faculties are being harnessed by an oppressive administration.

One of my personal revelations last year was that not all clichés are meaningless, and that you get out of university more or less what you put into it. It's more than ironic that the self-styled Leroi Jones' at the head of the student power movement are focusing their attention at the administration rather than themselves.

As for the currently fashionable analogies comparing the movement to the really significant social and political events (viz. the Vietnamese struggle for national self-determination, the rise of black nationalism, etc.) put Stokely and Phil Resnick together and see how much they have in common.

Brent Orenstein (II VIC)

Specialist Programmes

Each Department or group of Departments may propose named Specialist Programmes for the second, third and fourth years. The maximum number of courses that can be specified each year will normally be four, leaving one free option for the student who wishes to follow that programme. Any or all of the four courses specified in a specialist programme or the prerequisites stated for these courses may allow alternatives selected from a number of courses where this is academically acceptable.

Third and Fourth Years

These will be similar to second year. It is recognised that the number of prerequisites is bound to increase in later years, but it is clearly in the interest of students and the disciplines concerned that the maximum possible provision be made for students to begin specialising late in their undergraduate career if they have the interest and ability to do so.

Standing in a Course

For a course to count as a prerequisite a mark of 50 percent (Pass) or better will be required. In some few cases there might be justification for demanding better than the passing grade in a prerequisite for a given course. Academic justification for such a require-

Standing in a Year

Standing in a year will be granted if an average of 60 per cent is obtained in the student's programme, and not more than one course has been failed (below 40 percent). No restriction is placed on the number of BL (below the line) standings, except that the individual courses cannot be used as prerequisites (see above). The student must assume a condition in the one failed course to be carried (and cleared) in the next higher year.

Except for some students who fail very badly in first year, any student who fails to obtain standing in first, second or third year may repeat the year but will not retain credit for individual courses passed. Two failed years will automatically disqualify a student from further enrolment in the Faculty.

Qualification for Fourth Year

At the end of the third year any student who obtains standing may elect (by a date to be decided) to receive a B.A. or B.Sc. degree. The name of the degree to be awarded will be based on the student's programme.

Any student who obtains II Class standing (70 percent or better) in his third year programme may enrol in a fourth year programme. If he is successful in his fourth year he will be awarded an Honours degree B.A.(Hons) or B.Sc.(Hons) (or B.Comm.?) with an appropriate class of honours. If he fails fourth year he will be entitled to receive the degree he could have taken at the end of third year, and will be ineligible to repeat a fourth year.

On the status of women

BY SUE HELWIG

In the first week of June the ladies came to the Roof Garden of the Royal York Hotel.

This time they didn't come to raise money for a building fund or to select their summer wardrobe from a designer's collection. They had far more important business at hand... they were there to examine their status.

For the Government of Canada, anxious to avoid at all possible cost the embarrassment of a sex war, had established a commission, a Royal Commission. Its purpose?... to determine the status of women and to make such recommendations necessary for the elimination of injustice, the alleviation of distress, and the future happiness of the women of Canada.

The ladies in the Royal York had been invited to speak.

Much to the disappointment of the yawning press, they didn't arrive in militant hords. One week's hearings in Toronto failed to discover even a single re-incarnated Lysistrata.

No-one, it seemed, yearned to fan the flames of feminism into a twentieth-century sex war. But at the end of the week a strange thing happened...

A housewife's voice out of the wilderness of East York cried, "FEMALES ARE NIGGERS!" And the ladies in the audience applauded for five minutes in standing ovation.

The proceedings had been genuinely dull. Day after day a parade of well-intentioned women expressed their concern in cool, correct, and reasonable terms.

Their submissions dealt with the same worn-out topics — the need for day-care centres for the working mother, the need for tax-relief for those who are now able to afford child care, the necessity for equal-pay-for-equal-work legislation that cannot be mocked in practice by slight variation in job classification.

And finally the oft-stated complaint that a society in which it is illegal to distribute birth-control information and where the termination of an unwanted pregnancy is criminal, belongs to another age.

All week the audiences, which rarely numbered more than twenty-five were subdued and almost embarrassed in their restraint.

The fact that in Prince Edward Island a mother has no legal right to direct the education and rearing of her children or to seek their custody in the event of separation was not particularly shocking. And if there is no equal-pay-for-equal-work legislation in Newfoundland or if only the province of Quebec mentions the word "sex" specifically in anti-discriminatory legislation, this was hardly enough to awaken righteous anger.

Someone from the Ontario Federation of Labour compared Canada unfavorably to the U.S.S.R.

"In 1960, the New York Times reported there were 300,000 women engineers, 110,000 scientists and 300,000 physicians in the Soviet Union... Our women are more reluctant to enter the professions.

"The fault with our society is that it has done little if anything to encourage women to enter these fields," she explained.

And one evening a pretty young woman took the microphone. She had shoulder-length wavy brown hair and wore a navy spring suit. She said that she was a student at Osgoode Hall and that she hoped the commission would encourage young girls not to be afraid of studying law.

But it wasn't until Friday that the audience broke into a spontaneous burst of approval at a speaker's words. Her name was Bonnie Kreps. And she had come to the hearings with a feminist tract that swings into its analysis with Jean-Paul Sartre and finishes off with the Black Power Movement.

She began by criticizing the work of a similar commission dedicated to Eleanor Roosevelt and released in 1963 when John Kennedy was President of the United States.

"It is my opinion that the American commission was largely useless insofar as assisting women to achieve full equality is concerned," she told the panel of commissioners.

"The reason is that it never analyzed the roots of the problem and therefore failed to work out a theory or frame of reference, which could provide a starting point for effective action..."

"Let us take it as axiomatic that one is not born, but rather becomes, a woman or a man... Man has consistently defined woman not in terms of herself but in relationship to him. She is not regarded as an autonomous being; rather he is the Subject, he is the Absolute — she is the Other..."

"And in accepting the traditional view of herself as inferior, woman has provided justification for the charge of inferiority..."

Bonnie Kreps strikes one immediately as a very forthright person. She is of medium height with short dark-brown hair and a taste for the classically simple and utilitarian which, perhaps, betrays her Scandinavian origin.

"In terms of how emancipated women are, Scandinavian women are easily twenty-five years ahead of America," she told me one evening early in September.

"And America is easily twenty-five years ahead of Canada. That's in general. Canada seems to me to be quite reactionary in this kind of thing. They are not hostile, which is nice. So it's more ignorance than anything. But why it should be so... that's a very hard thing to say."

But it is fairly obvious that Bonnie is at heart a true child of the New Left, bred if not born, on the North American continent... A familiar photograph of Bertrand Russell hangs on the wall of her study. And her stairway is lined with personality posters... a buxom Mae West and the perennially crafty W. C. Fields, in particular.

Perhaps her most profound criticism of the North American female lies in her attack on the accepted and glorified image of the housewife. This is the "gilded cage" image which is painted in the myths of our own time, myths which are created by the demands of advertising and perpetuated by all forms of popular fiction.

This comes as no surprise. But placed within the pattern of her analysis, the acceptance of the image becomes synonymous with a retreat into a kind of living death. Such a person will have no true identity because she has abdicated all real responsibility in favor of the proffered comforts of the gilded cage:

"There is a deeper reason for such a trade," Bonnie Kreps writes in her brief: "For it seems to be a fundamental truth about mankind that it will tend to opt for contentment over happiness, because the journey towards the ultimate self-realization is arduous and uncertain."

This is the core of the problem as Bonnie sees it. And she feels very strongly that it can be met and conquered by legislation, by education, and by a great deal of publicity and discussion.

In order to effect the revolution, she turns to the theories of political analysis: "Women are not aware of themselves as a group in terms of how they experience the same kinds of oppression if you like."

"Some of my feminist friends think that that's too extreme" she explained. "But we do have common problems as women and we don't seem to get together on this. There's no real awareness at a general level though a lot of women are feeling very frustrated. They are not talking about it beyond complaining to their husbands. But not in a constructive manner."

"This is why I would like to see first of all a whole lot of publicity on the problem. In terms of speakers in schools, and university campuses."

"You can forget about the older women. I mean women over..."

At this point Bonnie stopped speaking to laugh.

"Well I hesitate to say over thirty since I am over thirty," she explained. "Over forty, then they are really hopeless. They are not likely to change and it's just not worth it in terms of the return you would get."

A great deal of such publicity would be an attempt to demonstrate that women are conditioned into accepting self-demeaning roles right from the time they are born.

"Parents already have certain ideas about girls as opposed to boys by the time their child is born. They want boys for certain reasons and girls for other reasons. Consequently they start right in. You can begin in the nursery for instance... Girls are given dolls and role-playing toys, mother's helper toys; whereas boys get aggressive, assertive, exploratory toys."

With her own daughter, Bonnie has tried to over-compensate for the traditional influences by giving her the things that boys normally get...

hammers, saws, and microscopes.

"If I didn't have to over-compensate I would provide a wide variety of things so that she could choose for herself. I myself prefer to see her choose toys which are creative in the sense that you don't just have to push a button."

As far as formal education is concerned, Bonnie does not feel that the system itself can be blamed for contributing greatly to the problem.

"The faults in the school system as I see them are different kinds of faults. They have to do with authoritarianism, bad learning and not stimulating the children's minds. No, it's within the attitudes of the whole society. Especially television. Aside from the obviously stupid shows like Greenacres, and The Beverly Hillbillies and Petticoat Junction which are perpetrating this kind of myth, the commercials are just incredible."

In view of this one thing one can do is legislate against types of advertising, she maintains.

"In the same way that you can legislate against the type of ads which discriminate against black people. It's the same kind of thing."

But even in schools girls will experience a kind of gentle persuasion directing them towards only the accepted roles.

"It's a very subtle kind of pressure. I remember it myself from American schools, not so much from Denmark. But then Denmark is a little ahead. One can tell, I think, from the way in which a teacher approves or disapproves of choices..."

"The tendency is to say to a little girl what do you want to be when you grow up? And if she says a teacher or a nurse then you say that's nice. But if she says that she wants to be an astronaut, then you ignore her."

"This kind of attitude is there right from the beginning. But it doesn't become really vicious until later on when women have more of a stake in the way they're living. I mean primarily after they are married when they have made a choice between one kind of a life over another, at least temporarily."

"They often feel somewhat defensive about their choice, especially if they are so-called housewives. And they can become quite vicious in the way they treat people who do not go along with their way of thinking."

In any theory of the status of women, the nature of marriage immediately comes under strict analysis. At the extreme end of the feminist movement are those who want to throw out marriage altogether. Bonnie supports a modified form of this view.

"It's my own private feeling that marriage as an institution is on the way out and should be helped along. I think that marriage means in the large majority of cases end of freedom. Especially for women but also for men."

"Marriage is detrimental in all kinds of ways. That's not to say that I want to do away with the conjugal family or that I think that most people would not like to live together in couples. But not this idea that at nineteen you commit yourself to be everything to someone else for the rest of your life. That's just nonsense and the longer we go on fooling ourselves, the worse off we'll be."

The institution of marriage, as Bonnie Kreps sees it is based on two false assumptions. The young husband is led to believe that he will have "adoration forever more" and the wife to expect "material support, material well-being for the rest of her life."

"And the kind of thinking that leads a woman to expect to live through her husband is, I think, terrible for both parties. No-one should live through anyone else. At least not as a major approach to life. With this kind of basis, most marriages become, as Strindberg says, a fight to the death."

In listening to Bonnie, one recognizes in her the spirit of the crusader... her cause is a human one based on personal feeling and her arguments are simple, direct, and often persuasive. But in the final analysis, she is trapped by the rules of the crusade... for one can only campaign for a universal cause in shades of black and white. For instance, when she condemns the double-standard marriage, she feels bound to maintain that there are necessary undesirable consequences to this kind of relationship, i.e. "dull wives" who can never be "life companions in any sense of the word."

Yet Bonnie is obviously aware of the trap — that in order to crusade she must be prepared to make herself vulnerable. When she speaks out she is a prey to criticism and she describes with a touch of humor the kinds of reactions that her ideas call forth...

"Most often when I speak up on the question of sexual discrimination, people begin to laugh. I have a button that says "Freedom for women" and when I wear it people say "What's all this about freedom for women?" It's just a question they consider absurd."

"I find that it's a rare person who will accept a feminist on ideological grounds and not immediately look under the carpet for some little thing that he can describe as being dirty. You come to expect that if you speak up on these matters people are going to treat you like a mannish woman, like a woman with sex problems. They do not seem to understand that you can be involved in this, or in something like the Black Power movement, as an intellectual position without making it into an overtly emotional thing."

But early in June the ladies at the Royal York Hotel found nothing to criticize. And the spirit of feminism may yet conquer the Royal Commission.

By JAY JERVIS
"We don't realize that we are on board a spaceship," said the intense white-haired man on the stage at Convocation Hall.

"We are all astronauts," U.S. architect Buckminster Fuller was telling an overflow audience of about 2,000 Monday night. "We are making 60,000 miles an hour around the sun."

All the universe is in constant transformation giving off energy, he said.

Fuller compared our knowledge of the universe to the thin band of colours that can be seen by the naked eye out of the whole range of the electro-magnetic spectrum.

"We are all on a spaceship but we know very little about what's going on," he said.

But he added the individual in the universe was like a trim tab on the rudder of a great ship. And although small, this tab could influence the whole motion and direction of the ship.

Fuller went on to deal with the question of whether man has a function in the universe. We always seem to be storing specific information in our brain.

Man's function must be a metaphysical one — that of integrating all the information we are receiving to discover generalized principles.

Fuller pointedly asked his audience if any of them believed that with all our wealth we could alter one iota of yesterday.

"We can only alter tomorrow," he said.

He predicted an automated future where everyone would be paid to go back to school. We will need thinkers, he said, and wondered how many are in University today only to gain the means to earn a living.

"In future people will go to University to learn how to think," he said.

Fuller expressed great hope in the youth of the world. He felt that young people would use the technological resources available to eliminate the conditions of poverty that lead to wars.

In conversations with students at Berkeley, California, Fuller said he found the younger generation "extraordinarily well-informed."

"These young people are the first generation of man brought up with television as a third parent," he said. "They are the only generation brought up to think of all of humanity."

U of T enrolment reaches new high

Total enrolment at the University of Toronto is expected to reach 31,000 this year, an increase of almost 3,000 over last year.

The figure, released yesterday by chief statistician Dr. W. Szenci, includes graduate and undergraduate students both full and part time at all three campuses.

The increase is accounted for largely by the Scarborough and Erindale campuses which registered 1,993 and 810 students respectively. The St. George campus received 21,206.

Of the total 17,750 are full-time undergraduates, 5,300 are full-time graduates, 4,650 are part-time undergraduates and 525 are part-time graduate students. About 2,600 graduate and extension students have yet to register.

Victoria College is still the largest, with an enrolment of 2,469, followed by UC (2,077), St. Mike's (1,881), New (1,110), Trinity (725) and Innis (383).

A total of 5,860 freshmen registered this year. Of those, 2,987 chose an arts and science course, 791 chose engineering, 144 music, 138 pharmacy, 134 pre-meds, 107 physical and occupational therapy, 105 physical education, 103 nursing, 64 architecture, 63 forestry and 42 food sciences.

Eighty-eight per cent of U of T students live in Ontario and of those 63 per cent are from Metro Toronto. Foreign students make up 7.56 per cent of the student population.

TRACK AND FIELD

By PAUL VESA

Over the past week-end, the Varsity track team gave fourteen athletes, most of them rookies and second-stringers, an opportunity to prove themselves at the McMaster Invitational Track Meet.

Many personal bests were achieved by these students and an excellent prospect has emerged in the person of freshman Hung Lee. Lee, who previously bettered 23" in the long jump, leaped 20'9" at this meet after only three days of practice.

Among the regulars who were there, Jukka Heikurinen eclipsed the pole vault record at 13'1" and Steve Wetmore posted a fine first in the 120 yard hurdles.

Above all, however, the meet provides a convenient means of gauging the opposition. Here is the way Varsity's opponents stack up for 1968-69:

McMaster Marauders: Along with Toronto and Waterloo, Mac will be one of the powers this year. They show excellent strength and depth in the sprints coming 1-2 in the 100 and 220 and 2-3 in the 440.

In the longer races, Marauders do not have the same degree of strength, but should still place men in the top five in each event.

Brian Hayman could well break two records for Mac at the OQAA championships this season. He won both the discus and the shot put and was well above the record in each.

In the relays, Mac is a real threat as they won both and were a full second under the record in the 4 X 110.

Waterloo Warriors: Waterloo sent the largest contingent to this meet and came out with the most points. They took only three firsts but were consistently in the place and show columns. Their depth is probably best shown by the fact that they were shut out of the first five places in only three events.

Waterloo's strongest event was the 880 in which they placed 1-2-4. Outstanding performances were turned in by their javelin throwers, Arbreaux and Wilson, both of whom were close to 20' above the record in coming 1-2 in that event.

Queens' Golden Gaels: Gaels have two of the top competitors in the OQAA in hurdler Brian Donnelly and miler David Ellis. However, Queens lacks the depth to be a real power this season.

Guelph Gryphons: Leigh Hammond is the star here with a first in the high jump and a third in the 120 yard high hurdles. Grant McClaren won the three-mile run for Guelph. Again a lack of depth.

York: York's team consists of Bob Brooks who won the 440 in 49.3 seconds and tied for second in the 220.

Someday

Before you take Broadway by storm, you'll have to learn to be an actress. That's common sense. It also stands to reason that becoming a mature and graceful woman will be easier if you learn certain things now, like proper posture, speech and manners. There are some other things, too, that'll make femininity easier. Like Tampax tampons. The sanitary protection that was developed by a doctor to be worn internally. Tampax tampons are made of pure surgical cotton. The silken-smooth container-applicator assures hygienic insertion and easy disposal. Your hands need never touch the tampon. And there'll be no more pins, pads and belts to limit what you can wear. Try Tampax tampons. They're one of the little things that just might make it easier to become a famous woman.

Rugger, soccer begin Saturday

Despite two recent exhibition losses, Varsity soccer coach Ernie Glass is quite optimistic about his team's chances of retaining the Blackwood Trophy.

Both losses were to top notch teams and in both instances the winning goal was scored in the last five minutes of play.

The two games Blues have played so far have shown that the defence is there and capable of playing solidly. However, the name of the game is goals and Varsity should score quite a few. Judging from a 7-1 walkover against Toronto City Junior 'B', a side which toured England this past summer, Blues again are going to be a scoring machine.

The forward line will include Frank Soppelsa (SGS) and Jim Lefkos (PHE IV) both of whom have won intercollegiate scoring crowns. (Lefkos did it last year and Soppelsa the year before).

Ron Muir (Food Sci. III) and John Gero (U.C. III) now have one year of intercollegiate experience under their belts and should be ready to start popping them in.

Rookies Ken Cancellara (U.C. III) Adrian Verhulst (Arch I) and Bernie D'Abreau (SGS) have stepped into starting roles and performed very well. D'Abreau originally started as a forward and ended up as the team's goaltender.

GRADUATE STUDENTS

Does the Library frustrate you?

Learn how to use library resources quickly and efficiently. The Reference Department of the University Library offers seminars on the use of reference aids which provide greater access to material in the library. Instruction is available for graduate students throughout October. Apply in the Reference Department for seminars relating to either Humanities materials or to Social Sciences materials. Special seminars may be arranged upon request.

RUGGER

Doctors always seem to be bearers of bad news. For Andy Bethel, rugger Blues' six foot, seven inch second row forward and captain, the doctor's diagnosis of a minor ankle injury as torn ligaments spells the end of the season.

Bethel's size and leadership qualities will not be easy to replace. His successor will have to be culled from the strong Varsity second squad.

Last Saturday Blues showed their muscle with a 17-0 win over Osgoode Hall Owls. Five tries were shared among Zepp, McKenna, Noble and Dickie. Only one try was converted.

Playing a very combative game were second row forward Joe Donohue and wing forward Gord Richardson.

The second team pack played well, providing coaches Jimmy Hamilton and Al Giachino with a difficult decision as to Bethel's replacement.

His successor as team captain was chosen last night at a team meeting. The new captain is George Wraw who plays scrum half.

Saturday morning at ten a.m. on the back campus, Wraw will lead Blues' first team against University of Guelph.

Lake Ontario looked cold and black in the early morning darkness, as the two thin shells of mahogany slipped out from the Argonaut Rowing Club at the foot of Jamison Avenue. It was 6:40 A.M., the temperature was 53 degrees, but it felt colder. The University of Toronto Rowing Team was half-way through its morning practice.

The eight oarsmen in each boat hunched over their oars and on a word from the coxswain began pulling rhythmically, 22 strokes per minute, west along waterfront just inside the breakwater.

Rowing used to be a major sport at U of T. In 1924, the University sent a crew to the Olympic Games in Paris, France, and they brought back a silver medal, coming second to the United States and beating crews from Italy and Great Britain.

The team had its own club house at the foot of York Street, but when the building was destroyed by fire in the 30's, the team folded.

The modern era of rowing at U of T started ten years ago when the Argonaut Rowing Club offered to let the University use their facilities and boats.

Today, about twenty-five U of T men are involved with the rowing team. The only word to describe them is dedicated.

When this bleary-eyed sportsie arrived at the Argo Club at six, most of the team had already arrived and was out on a one mile run, which precedes the real work. After calisthenics, they were ready to take to the water.

The two boats the team would use that morning were walked out of the shed. These boats, or shells, are beautiful things. They are sixty feet long, but no more than two feet wide at their widest point. When moving at their top speed of 13 to 15 miles per hour, they draw less than five inches of water.

The hull of the boat is made of quarter-inch mahogany sheets formed around a frame. Inside are sliding seats and foot rests for the oarsman. Oar supports extend about three feet out on each side.

All intercollegiate rowing is done by "eights". These are the largest boats, powered by four men pulling on each side and captained by a coxswain.

It was still dark when the two boats took to the water, dark and cold. Geoff Wright, one of three coaches, provided a heavy trench coat, and introduced, Ingo Schulte-Hostedde, coach of the lightweight crew. The head coach is Jim Lyttle, a commercial artist who rows for the Argos.

We piled into an aluminum boat and set out after the shell. As we passed Sunnyside, Ingo shouted across the water and the pace was raised to 34 strokes per minute. The shell lifted out of the water and sped forward, catapulted by eight ten-foot oars. From the pace boat Ingo timed them, and then, satisfied, yelled, "Take 'er down", and the pace dropped off to the original 22 strokes.

We turned opposite the Seaway Hotel and headed back east, repeating the pattern of sprints and rests. Ducks and gulls were frightened off the water ahead of the shell, and the sun appeared as a red streak below the clouds on the horizon.

Paul Lysy (III UC) said later that the cold doesn't bother the oarsmen too much, because they're working hard. "But they tell me it gets worse later in the Fall," he added.

Jack Gibbins, a fourth year Physical Education student is the team captain. "Probably the main reason I'm in rowing is because it's a conditioning sport," he said. "Studies have been done on the other side of the Iron Curtain, and they've found rowing is the most strenuous sport there is, in terms of calorie consumption and oxygen burning. And it's the type of sport you can continue with after university."

The rowing season is a relatively short one. There are four regattas, the first one here in Toronto at the Argo Rowing Club this Saturday at 10 A.M. Teams from York, Brock, McMaster and Western Universities will compete.

Meanwhile, back on the water, the shells skimmed past the Argo Club and on to the western end of the CNE. Traffic was building on the Lakeshore and the Gardner, and a traffic helicopter circled overhead. The Shell Tower in the CNE read 7:12, 53 degrees.

Brian Delorme, coxswain for the lightweight, straightened out the shell ready for the run back to the Club. "Let 'er run... half up... ready... ROW!" and they headed back east for the last time. As they approached the finish, Ingo shouted "Hit it, hit it" and the practice finished in a burst of speed. And as the sun finally fought free of the horizon, twenty oarsmen and one tired sportsie headed north to start a day of classes.

Polo poolsters prepare

Varsity Blues' waterpolo squad began tuning their aquatic skills Tuesday as veterans and rookies prepared for the first home game, just four weeks away.

Returning to the reigning OQAA champions are three year vet, Chris McNaught, swimming ace and rover, Gay Stratten, experienced defenseman, Skip Bergman, and manager-forward, Dave Brech.

They are joined by reservists and rookies vying for vacancies which have opened at all positions. Most important is finding a replacement for retired four-time OQAA champion netman, Hartley Garfield.

All swimmers, regardless of waterpolo experience, are urged to come to the 4:30 practices Tuesday and Thursday.

National coach Eddie Szakacs, who for five successive years has coached Blues to the coveted Herschorn Cup, is leaving Thursday for the Olympics and a year's coaching in California.

His successor is Otto Demjen, former Hungarian player of world class and now a widely known coach and author of several books and technical articles on coaching of swimming and waterpolo.

TOUCHDOWN!

The three pictures above and to the right are an illustrated sequence of rookie Blues' halfback, Walt Sehr (30), as he returns a punt for 85 yards and a touchdown in Saturday's 22-3 victory over McGill. Photo one shows Sehr beginning his long run by hursting past Redmen George Springate (79) and Dave Fleiszer (34). Photo two has Sehr at mid-field with only Fleiszer to beat. Rookie lineman Don Fraser (53) is about to eliminate him with a gorgeous block that sealed the touchdown for Sehr. (It was erroneously reported Monday that Keith Johnson (33) threw the block). And finally Sehr crosses the goalline with Redman Mike Auerbaech (72) in futile pursuit.

Students demand equal vo

12:30 Today: Student rally outside Sid Smith (see letter)
2:00 Today: Faculty Council second meeting at Convocation Hall
Report on Wednesday's meeting below

Clusters of students watched from the galleries of Convocation Hall Wednesday afternoon while about 300 faculty members below floundered about in an attempt to define their stand on proposals to implement proposals for reform of teaching in the faculty.

When the council adjourned after two and a half hours of freewheeling debate, no vote had been taken on any of the four preliminary resolutions drawn up for the unprecedented open meeting of the council.

The first resolution, calling for "freedom of choice for students in the selection of courses from those offered for which they are qualified, with the restriction that no more than two first year courses may be required in any one subject," will again be discussed this afternoon.

"This proposal provides freedom for the students and for the disciplines," said faculty dean A. D. Allen introducing his proposal.

"The departments will offer a variety of courses to suit the needs of students and provide for the proper study of that discipline," he added.

The doors to the floor of Convocation Hall were guarded by police who had instructions to admit only members of the council.

Among the most vocal in the course of the discussion were teaching assistants and lecturers, who are not members of the 1,000-man council.

Microphones on long cords were rushed to the hands of any member wanting to speak. Students who were recognized by chairman Claude Bissell were permitted onto the floor to use the microphones.

About ten students took advantage of the opportunity.

The 14 student members of the council, attending their second meeting, sat in a silent row throughout the two and a half hour debate.

Several faculty members, who dismissed lectures to enable students to attend the meeting, were disappointed at the scant student turnout of about 300 students.

Prof. G. B. Payzant of the department of philosophy attempted to allow students complete freedom of choice in their first year subjects.

"I do not think that it is our duty as faculty to prevent the disaster that students bring about by their own choice," he said.

His speech was greeted with loud applause from the students in the galleries.

"Students should be given the right to make their own mistakes," agreed Bob Rae. (IV UC) the first student to address the council.

"One of the principles of education is the process of self-evaluation which functions best when the individual is responsible for the consequences of his own decisions."

A second wave of applause from the galleries greeted remarks made by SAC president Steve Langdon, who stressed he was speaking only as a fourth year Trinity College student.

He branded the seating arrangements as symbolic of the "reprehensible" and "obscene" allocation of membership on the council.

"This body, unrepresentative and undemocratic as it is, should not be deciding the future of undergraduate education while the students who will be affected by the changes sit in the galleries."

Langdon went on to say the proposals represented no more than the addition of a four year general program to the present system.

"The specialist course will still be determined by the departments and there has been no suggestion that students will have some say in determining programs or course content."

He added the proposals were "probably valuable but not an earth-shaking change."

Today's meeting will be the second of the two special sessions. Unless it decides otherwise, the council will then retreat behind closed doors to continue discussion and reach their decisions.

TO THE STUDENTS OF THE FACULTY OF ARTS AND

In a chaotic meeting on Wednesday afternoon and Science Council demonstrated the complete lack of a large body to come to grips with such reforms as the Macpherson Report. Clearly a body must be called upon to consider important matters, if any effective action is to be taken.

What kind of body should this be? The Council of Undergraduate Studies -- as indeed the Faculty Council itself -- is not a legitimate body to deal with it is not effectively representative of the student in the community. We believe that the content of the Macpherson Report must be examined in the presence of students and faculty, consisting of not more than 10 members, half of which shall be democratical in nature. Using the proposals presented in the Macpherson Report as a starting point, the committee will have an open discussion at all its meetings.

We urge all students in Arts and Science to attend a mass meeting today at 12:30 in front of Sidney Smith Hall to discuss the student position.

Now is the time to act if we are going to have the important educational reforms of the Macpherson Report considered and implemented by an open body truly representative of students and staff in this faculty.

Strax goes to court

FREDERICTON (CUP-Staff) — Norman Strax, the University of New Brunswick physics professor whose attempt to abolish library identification cards sparked a sit-in now entering its eighth day, was remanded to Oct. 18 for sentencing on a contempt of court charge yesterday.

Strax was held in contempt after failing to obey a Sept. 25 injunction ordering him off university property.

He refused to attend a hearing Tuesday, but his four lawyers advised him to leave his office in the physics building (the scene of the 30-student sit-in) to appear in court.

The Wednesday hearing was adjourned to a closed session yesterday.

Barry McPeake, a Canadian Union of Students field worker, said last night it appears unlikely police will be called in to remove the demonstrators. They are still insisting they will remain in Strax's office until the professor is reinstated and the administration gives a "meaningful guarantee that such incidents will not occur in the future."

UNB President Colin MacKay said Strax's dismissal last week was for "obvious reasons" but the demonstrators, backed by all eight graduate students in physics, view his suspension as "punishment for non-academic activities".

McPeake says Strax is planning to fight the injunction, which is keeping him off the UNB campus. He has held several conferences at the gates to the university.

It was rumored that the administration had planned to fire Strax at the end of the academic year.

At U of T, a student-faculty group has collected 300 signatures on a petition of support for Strax and over $50 to help defray his legal fees.

For Jon Pierson, Wyatt Day, Joe Hunt, Jimmy Owens, Art Koenig and Sam Brown, ARS NOVA was a long time coming. Each had lived with music most of his life and had perfected his own style and reputation.

Jon son of Lutheran minister, studied for the ministry before making the decision to study music. He excelled on the bass trombone and played with several symphony orchestras before forming the "New York Baroque Bass Ensemble" with Wyatt.

Wyatt studied classical composition and guitar. At one point Wyatt (half Spanish himself) lived with a Spanish gypsy colony near Seville studying flamenco guitar. After returning to the States he concentrated on writing classical works including among them 12 preludes for guitar, a string quartet, several choral works and two short suites for viola and cello.

Sam Brown began playing banjo when he was four and guitar when he was twelve. Sam went to Detroit and played with local jazz groups while studying classical guitar. He has played guitar and travelled extensively as accompanist for Miriam Makeba. Sam has performed and recorded with artists such as Dianne Carroll, Harry Belafonte, Chubby Checker, Judy Collins, Astrud Gilberto, Gary MacFarland and Dionne Warwick.

Jimmy Owens and his trumpet are well known in the U.S. as well as Europe and Asia. He studied trumpet with Carmine Caruso. He played with the bands of Lionel Hampton, Charlie Mingus, Herbie Mann, and Clark Terry as well as the "Symphony of the New World" before forming the "New York Jazz Sextet". He has been featured on over twenty jazz albums and his own album, "You Had Better Listen" (with Kenny Berron) has recently been released on the Atlantic label.

Art Koenig moved to New York in 1965 and began establishing a reputation as a bassist, working with such performers as Luiz Bonfá, Oscar Brown, Jr., Nancy Wilson, Maynard Ferguson and Astrud Gilberto. Before becoming a part of ARS NOVA, he toured Europe, Africa and South America with Miriam Makeba.

Joe Hunt played tympani with the "Indiana Philharmonic" in 1960 he came to New York to work with the "Stan Getz Quartet" and during the next year and a half he travelled with Getz and appeared on the Verve recordings of "Getz Au Go Go" and "Carnegie Hall Concert". In 1964 he left Getz and became part of the "Bill Evans Trio" where he could be found until the summer of 1968 when he decided to take his drums and join ARS NOVA.

ARS NOVA — "new art" — seems to be the right name. At least it's a culmination of the art and talent of six outstanding musicians. In fact, ARS NOVA exists only after the passage of distance and time. ARS NOVA, (A new sound? Could be!)

If you dig the sound of the "Doors", then you won't want to miss the fantastic "Ars Nova". They have the closest sound to the "Doors" of all the modern groups without actually copying their material, for the "Ars Nova" write their own songs. Tickets are going fast, so you'd better get yours today, at the S.A.C. Office. After all, where could you get a better deal than $1.50 a ticket?

Faculty opposes Bissell

By BRIAN JOHNSON

The Association of Teaching Staff last night approved equal voting representation for students and faculty on the President's Commission on university government.

The ATS motion resembles closely the Students Administrative Council's Sept. 19 proposal that the Commission be composed of four students, four faculty members and non-voting members of the administration.

The ATS proposal, formulated at a Sept. 20 meeting of the ATS executive and faculty members of the President's Council, recommends the Commission be composed of:

- four faculty members, to be chosen by the entire faculty in an election;
- four students, one of whom shall be a graduate student;
- the President of the University;
- two non-voting members of the Board of Governors;
- one non-voting member of the senate to represent alumni;
- a non-voting chairman chosen outside the academic community.

President Claude Bissell's original Commission was to consist of two faculty members, two student members and two representatives of the Board of Governors.

Although they were not allowed to participate in the discussion, President Bissell and a 3-student delegation were allowed to speak for 20 minutes each to present their proposals to the ATS.

President Bissell said the Commission would be the most important of its kind since 1907.

He called it "the means by which the university makes a transition from a 19th century model to a form that can carry the weight of contemporary ideas."

Dr. Bissell divided the university into five estates: the students, faculty, alumni, Senate, and Board of Governors.

"There are not five estates," said Bob Rae. "There are two estates, students and faculty. Here I venture to disagree with the President."

NO NEED TO DESPAIR AND LAMENT, valiant staffers with bitch-in type problems. The session has been postponed till Monday 1 p.m. YOU ARE STILL LOVED, however. There is a party tonite. Come to the homestead and find out where.

Bob Rae

Dr. Bissell said the Board of Governors members must be on the Commission since they represent the public.

"To maintain that the Board represents the public is an affront to common sense," Rae replied in his presentation of the SAC counter-proposal.

"Bay Street and the public interest are not synonymous," he added.

Prof. Kenneth McNaught of the history department introduced the amendment that the two Board of Governors representatives have no voting privileges.

When both this amendment and the amendment that the Senate member be non-voting were passed, President Bissell was sitting in the corner of the room with his head in his hands. He looked very haggard.

He left before the motion was carried overwhelmingly.

The meeting was carried on with a general confusion of amended amendments being moved with other amendments still before the floor.

One frustrated professor moved to adjourn the meeting before the motion would finally come to a vote.

A young lady tried unsuccessfully to increase the number of faculty members to five. It was getting late. The members groaned and were quickly railroaded into defeating the motion by the Chairman M. F. Grapko.

The meeting agreed that the report of the Commission be sent directly to the provincial government for approval without any changes by the Board of Governors.

Notes on the open meeting

COLORED SECTION

— Sign in a Savannah, Georgia, bus

A few jottings on the open meeting of the Faculty Council Wednesday:

• The Council seemed to be debating the question of choice of subjects—free or not; what they were doing was trying desperately to keep as much of the old system intact as possible. That they managed to fool most of the audience, or seemed to, is a credit to their verbal skill.

For example, one professor wondered if perhaps students shouldn't be "encouraged" to take a wide range of courses in their first year to give them a good grounding before specialization. Of course, "encouraged" is just another word for "force" in this context, yet the professor probably thought he was being very liberal.

• The general feeling among students that they were invited to a faculty meeting, that students were sitting in on "their" meeting and should be grateful, is incorrect.

"Faculty" in Faculty Council refers to the department (or Faculty) of Arts and Science, not faculty as teachers. Students are either members of the Faculty of Arts and Science (and therefore have a right to sit on the Council) or no decision made by the Council can be binding on those students.

• At least one faculty member thought it was "their" meeting. He complained about students who applauded at statements they liked—it disturbed the "decorum" of the meeting.

Far from it. Applause was the only vote students had at that meeting. Even this was to be taken from them.

• Not one of the 14 token students appointed to the Council spoke during the 2½-hour meeting.

• Dean A. D. Allen noted at one point that the students-in-the-gallery/faculty-on-the-floor (with guards to make sure students knew their place) was suggested by students during staff-student negotiations at Simon Fraser University.

In fact, as ex-SFU president Martin Loney points out in a letter to Allen:

"The students of Simon Fraser did not, do not, and will not, support such authoritarian arrangements. This does not mean that at Simon Fraser we have not been subjected to the same arrangements, but the arrangements were not suggested by the students but were enforced on the students by the Faculty who did not, at Simon Fraser, find it necessary to say that these arrangements had been suggested by the students at the University of Toronto.

"Perhaps in future, you will allow the students at Simon Fraser to make their own suggestions and not try to legitimize your own authoritarian relationships by using our name."

• A political science professor told the meeting that "general course students can't be expected to meet the same standards as those in the honors courses."

This was a surprise to one student who got an "A" in that professor's honor course but failed another and had to go into general. Presumably her IQ dipped several points as a result.

• In the debate on choice, Dean

Allen said that those taking honors political science have so much choice they could not possibly complain.

Evidently he has not yet read this year's calendar. In second-year political science, four of six courses are compulsory. In third year two of six are compulsory. Only in fourth year is the choice relatively free.

• Without eliminating the year-system, the question of "choice" will be settled long before students arrive next September. No doubt much of this "free choice" will be carefully buried in well-thought-out timetable "conflicts" — conflicts designed to "encourage" students to take certain groups of courses.

• A bit of hearsay. After the meeting a mathematics student observed that his department was going along on the assumption that the Allen Report would be passed. This department is busily designing a system of co- and pre-requisites such that students will have to take virtually the same courses to "qualify" as they do now.

• Setting up a democratic staff-student committee to study the report, even with elections, shouldn't take more than two weeks. The open meeting proved a body as large as the Faculty Council cannot deal with the Report adequately, and it will probably be referred to a smaller committee. That should take about two weeks.

LETTERS

open letter to editor of U of T
Staff Bulletin

Sir:

I wish to protest most vigorously the totally misleading report of my comments at the meeting of the Arts and Science Council which graced the front page of your issue of October 3, 1968.

The seating arrangement itself was not the subject of my adjectives, be those adjectives "reprehensible", the term I stressed, or "obscene", my one lapse into emotionalism. A seating arrangement is an irrelevancy except insofar as it physically illustrates a particular fact.

That fact is that the Arts and Science Council is a completely unacceptable body to be making decisions that will affect the future academic course of the student body. Not only is it unmanageably large, totally undemocratic in its own composition (lecturers, for example, are not Council members), and subject to manipulation from the top, but it rejects the principle of open meetings in its regular procedure, this special meeting is only committee-of-the-whole and cannot make binding decisions.

The division of membership is incredible, as well; 1,000 faculty staff members and, presently, 14 students. Moreover, these students were selected in a double-indirect system that effectively prevents any accountability of representatives to constituents, and eliminates any real role for students in their choosing.

It is the fact that this body, undemocratic and unrepresentative as it is, should be deciding the future of undergraduate education while the students who will be affected by the changes sit in the galleries of Convocation Hall, that is the subject to which my adjectives were referred. "Obscene" may sound too strong, but it expresses the strong emotional rejection of this situation which many students on this campus feel.

We call for a democratic and legitimate body to consider the Macpherson recommendations. To suggest that our emotions are affected by a mere seating arrangement is ridiculous. It is the fact that arrangement represents that we attack.

Yours sincerely,
Steven Langdon
SAC President

good faith

Sir:

The Wednesday open meeting of the Faculty Council given its circumstances (with which there is just cause for fundamental dissatisfaction) was nevertheless conducted in good faith. It was a preliminary meeting not intended to be decision-making.

It illustrated, however, the difficulty and complexity of implementing the Macpherson Report.

The council would seem to be too large to arrive at the point of effective action and students must have equal say in the decisions of such far-reaching and direct concern to them.

I urge all students to attend the mass meeting Friday at 12:30 to agree upon a workable alternative to the present situation.

U of T students managed to be on the spot in summer '68. Some of them are bringing you their experiences in this Review. Derek Allen (R-2) visited Resurrection City. Jennifer Penney (R-3) headed the Canadian delegation to the World Youth Festival in Sofia, Bulgaria. Bob Bossin (R-4) toured the world via a singing job on an ocean liner. And Susan Perly (R-8 and R-9) was in Mexico where people shouting for student rights were being killed.

the mud of resurrection city

by derek allen

"The Great Society rests on abundance and liberty for all. It demands an end to poverty and racial injustice, to which we are totally committed in our time." (L. B. J. Ann Arbor, 1964.)

On June 24th the permit of the poor to protest their misery in the shadow of the Capitol expired. The angry tensions exacerbated by the six weeks of demonstrations subsided slowly in a final flurry of rock and bottle throwing. A slow return to Denver hovels and Appalachian huts began while the protest leaders argued what effect the mud of Resurrection City would have on the reactive consensusocracy that ruled the American Senate.

I spent twenty-four hours in Resurrection City near the end of May. While I was there a constant drizzle fell, swelling the puddles of mud which separated shanties sodden by a week's down-pour. A loudspeaker appealed endlessly, "Citizens of Resurrection City, may I have your attention." Above its voice could be heard the wails of bored and hungry children. At night the floodlit Washington and Lincoln memorials to the inalienable rights of liberty and equality bracketed the irony and misery of Resurrection City.

I stayed in a mud-clogged shanty with three young Negroes from Philadelphia. Like two-thirds of the City's occupants, they were high on pot. According to Stephanie, age twenty-one, only the drug's utopian fantasies prevented the multi-racial encampment from exploding. Across from me sat Tyrone. He had come to Resurrection City to organize recreation programs for the children. He was reading Kant:

"Through compassion for the plight of one individual, government fulfills its purpose as the servant of all the people." (L.B.J. My Hope for America, p.59.)

Beside me sat Mel, a twenty-one old Vietnam veteran. His thin frame shook from an incessant cough as he told me why he had come from his near death-bed in Vietnam, his lung tissue burned by phosphorus, to demonstrate with his "brothers" in Resurrection City. "Black is beautiful, baby, you dig me?" Mel describes himself as a moderate. He was enraged by the Uncle Toms who frowned on protest other than by petition as by the "white liberals" who had conned and exploited his unsuspecting father.

About nine o'clock we joined a stream of people wading through ankle-deep mud to the entertainment tent. Some two hundred Mexican, Spanish-American, Indian, hippy, Negro and white men, women and youngsters were singing "Silent Night";

"I want my freedom and I want it now." "You better listen to me white man before I get mad." The songs were punctuated by cries of "soul power". In one corner two elderly Negro women read aloud to each other from frayed bibles.

Sweaters proclaimed slogans like "The Brotherhood of God" and "It's so painful but I will change it". A ten year old boy stared vacantly ahead, his lips unsmiling, his face joyless. Many sat alone, silent and weary, losing themselves in the raucous chant of the singers.

At the door a woman was handing out leaflets which defined "Your Rights under Federal Welfare Regulations" and explained in simple terms the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. I asked her how long her group was planning to stay. She turned on me fiercely and cried, "We ain't leavin'. We'se stayin' heah 'til we have wot we come foh".

"Our concern is with the quality of the life of our people." (L.B.J., Detroit, June 26, 1964)

Despite the large scale evacuation of citizens to Washington churches, many women and children wandered barefoot through the mud. Flu was rampant. Prostitution and homosexuality

world youth festival

We crossed the Yugoslav-Bulgarian border in the muggy late evening. The train stopped so that all the pompous little border officials could do their thing, and we leaned out the opened passageway windows to get a glimpse of the dreary station that was Bulgaria. A group of eight hippy-looking kids who had been draped over the platform across the tracks ran to the train and shouted for someone who spoke English. They were Americans and British who had been refused entry to Bulgaria and access to anyone who could speak English or who had authority to change the orders, left abandoned on the platform with no way of going anywhere. They didn't have official delegation cards (neither did we — they weren't sent) but, unlike us, had been stopped because they had beards and were carrying packs — potential troublemakers I guess. A Dutch fellow in a similar situation went off, shaved his beard and got in with no trouble. So began my first open and prolonged confrontation with entrenched and authoritarian bureaucracy.

"Solidarity, Peace, and Friendship," the theme of the festival, quickly degenerated into superficial ceremonies. One of the favorite games became the collection of national pins which delegates brought and proudly displayed on their chests. A children's black market quickly sprang up downtown where delegates could trade theirs in for more colorful or rare were practised blatantly. The children suffered.

"We are going to wipe out poverty in America" (ibid.)

Most of the Negroes I talked to had jobs. In the main, the citizens of Resurrection City were not the poor but the sympathizers of those who feared reprisals from their welfare boards if they demonstrated.

But it was the poor who testified the next day in the Senate. A hundred citizens of Resurrection City shuffled silently past the shibboleths of liberty on the Senate walls.

A Spanish-American woman cited her litany of despair. She told Senator Javitts (R., N.Y.) she had $40 a month to pay the rent, feed, clothe and care for eleven children. Her nineteen-year-old son could not afford to complete high school. He had been unable to get a job but he was in Vietnam now and writing his mother that he would settle for only the best when he got home.

"No one will stop America from wiping out racial injustice" (ibid.)

or nationally desirable ones. Other contests encouraged were "See who can give the loudest, least-factual harangue on U.S. or Israeli imperialism," or "Who can make the longest speech about socialism and its merits without ever touching upon concrete situations, or differences in the interpretation of its development and application." Everybody nodded in agreement about most of the words, but the delicate nature of international relations so inhibited the delegates that they feared to examine the meanings.

And thus we took part in the opening parade, and shouted "Peace" with the rest and marched alongside the Quebec delegation of seven with their own flag and watched the uneasy silence that fell over the stadium when the Czechs entered chanting "Dubcek, Dubcek."

And we fought for tickets to concerts (the few that weren't already filled up with the bureaucratic potentates from the World Federation of Democratic Youth, the Bulgarian Communist Party and the army).

And we attended forums, with audiences of hundreds, dominated by invited speakers pouring out irrelevant, rhetoric-ridden, long, boring speeches.

And on the fourth day, when the unreality was leaving the more political members of the group numb, the West German SDS called a meeting to protest a couple of relatively obscure incidents that had occurred and pointed What boy would fight for his country and not expect a job in return? What employer would hire a Spanish-American high school dropout?

She told the men who governed her of the practical difficulties which crippled the food stamp program in her community. The stamps came on a Friday but couldn't be exchanged until Monday because the stores had closed by the time her twelve hour work day ended. That meant a week-end without food. These were the details the administrators of the program, isolated in Washington, wanted to hear.

Behind the statistics of poverty was its grim reality heard in the woman's choked voice, etched in her face. The senators listened with embarrassed concern. One spoke of a "vast reservoir of sympathy" which the poor people's march had tapped. The poor listened in dignified silence.

Outside in the now bright Washington day a taxi driver wondered "why the hell those damn niggers came down here to cause trouble."

up the dissatisfaction that many of us had felt. All of a sudden we had something to relate to. In the release of the moment the questions poured out. If we are seriously discussing world peace, why wasn't China invited? Why did Cuba refuse to come? Why were some passports held for as many as three days by officials? Why were the Czechs so carefully guarded by police and army? Garbled answers, translated by amateurs and confused in the excitement of minor rebellion, brought about similarly confused plans for shit-disturbing action, including a march of solidarity to the Chinese Embassy which fell through the next day.

We weren't the only ones confused. Rattled army men were saluting middle-aged, grey-suited and scowling secret police and the CIA went crazy taking pictures. Some of us were accused of being CIA (and probably were) planted to cause disruption and disunity.

The Finns, Italians, West Germans and many South Americans, with the support of a motley crew of a few Canadians, disaffected Americans, and other groups, were the main force in a series of unofficial teach-ins and speak-ins held in the next few days. We talked about authoritarianism in both capitalist and socialist bureaucracies, about the tactics that revolutionaries in South America were taking and what that meant in terms of socialist progress. We even tried to talk about Czechoslovakia without the Czechs — who, after the first reaction they received, seemed to acquiesce in their isolation. We questioned the subservient role of women in all countries and the relations of the sexes in future technological societies.

Unfortunately, little political or intellectual excitement was transferred to the mainstream of the Festival. (Only about a thousand of the twenty-six thousand delegates were involved.) While eight members of the Canadian delegation met with the NLF of South Vietnam, the other twenty-five or so went on a sight-seeing tour, in the rain, of a mountain close to Sofia. And our reaction was late in taking form and confused throughout, so that what we learned was fragmented and uncritical.

Still, people had stopped to listen and argue when a couple of us held forth on the steps of the National Assembly. And when we sat around drinking Polish beer on the beds in the dorms with surprised, invited Yugoslavs and Russians whose own meetings had been considerably stiffer, we maybe accomplished something.

I travelled 18,000 miles and lost the ability to write sentences in the China Sea. I worked from Florida to the Orient singing Tipperary for the little old ladies and the young drinkers who stayed up past ten on an ocean liner. Some learnings:

*****

The poor have the suffering to which they are fairly accustomed. They have it in Hong Kong, in Christobal, in Vancouver.

The Americans own the Panama Canal and two blocks on either side of it. At 2 a.m. the streets are empty, wide. The buildings are white and there is a mango tree. The slum begins after the second block. Many blacks eating on the curb. Loud music from the bars. Green peeling walls. Smell.

The ship warned us to stay in the two blocks. On the third they hit Tiny on the head and grabbed his pocket. They disappeared into one of the green alleys, though they only got a key and a handkerchief. (We had left our wallets and watches on board and tied our money — that we might need for an exhibit — to our underwear with shoelaces.) Then a police wagon pulled up and a cop jumped out and threw his nightstick at a black head on the other side of the street. It cracked against the wall. The cop turned to us and shouted "You no go here. They thief you." We went back to the main street (between the second and third block) and drank weak beer while the girl stripped to Lara's Theme.

*****

In Haight-Ashbury people live by begging or by rolling drunks (heads) or selling drugs. Michael had spent the night in the can which wasn't bad except that he could have robbed somebody if he was out. He was trying to sell the tranquilizers the police shrink had given him for 50¢ a hit. Dove would beg a quarter and then spend it on Mrs. Martha pies which we would all eat. She gave me her army shirt because I looked too straight. I was sitting there in it, playing guitar on the sidewalk, when a bus tour from the ship came by.

The other girl I met in the Haight was Hellcat, thin, gentle, dingy blonde. She got the name from two years with the Hell's Angels. She left them because of the violence: like killing cops, she said.

*****

The second time in Haight I went with two nice Hawaiian girls I met at Fisherman's Wharf. We bought a French loaf and some 50¢ shrimples which we ate on the trolley. When we got to Haight St. this guy came up and said, "Hey man, how about some bread?" We gave him some bread and he went off to tell his friends about these unbelievably straight people.

*****

Betty is a beautiful, beautiful person in Vancouver. She was doing social work. The kids stole her pills. She forgot and got pregnant. The abortion doctor she trusted got arrested. I'm happy about that: her child will be beautiful. He won't be afraid of the dark and he will even choose his own first name ("what would you like to be called this week").

Because she was pregnant she got fired (unwed social workers don't get pregnant) and lives on seventy dollars a month which is what we call welfare. She wasn't even mad.

I couldn't find her the second time in Vancouver. She had been kicked out of her flat, because she kept taking in dirty hippies.

*****

Wan Chi is the Suzy Wong area of Hong Kong. Except the streets are full of families. They smile and tumble over one another. Vegetables rot on the stairs. I kept pitying Torontonians who hide in their houses and only touch in bed, and then only close friends.

*****

The castle of the shogun is preserved by the state. The hugs of the poor preserve themselves.

*****

Jack Stamm, expatriot Greenwich villager writing ad copy in Tokyo ("Turn on with Sony and grow yourself some flute flowers") said after much saki, "You know what to say to them when they say to you 'Sure, drop out, but don't expect our society to support you?' Well then you say, 'Fine, I'll just raid your garbage can'."

*****

A poem by my thirteen-year-old friend Peter: Christmas comes but once a year, The rich have wine and the poor have beer. All have a turkey tender and light Merry Christmas to all and to all a goodnight.

*****

I ate dinner the first night in Hong Kong with a retired professor from the University of Louisiana. He was a Christian and wasn't ashamed to admit that, but sometimes he really had to stop and wonder why God allowed this poverty and suffering to go on. Smiling Bill, the Entertainment Officer, agreed, as he always did, but said it was after all the government's problem and we changed topics.

*****

During the summer I read: "At twenty before he lost his teeth and took on that indeterminate age the common people have, that man may have been handsome. He may have had one night of love, one minute when he was a king, and shed his fear. Afterwards, his pauper's life went on eternally the same. And he and his wife no doubt forgot it all."

*****

During the summer I heard the one about the little Harlem kid who spoke his first half-word: mother.

*****

There is a power in the land. Not a power to push, not a force: metal, machines have that. I stood in the guts of the ship with the engines driving all around me like a mad Expo, mad because it was not on display but moving 29,000 tons through the sea. Force. But the land endures, even submits. Eventually the armour, as Cohen says, turns lace, and the vines grow around it soft and breakable. Shibui is a Japanese word meaning taste, beauty and patience. The cracks in a teacup and the stains are part of the shibui. I learned this in New Zealand.

Eighteen per cent of the children in the Maritimes are undernourished. The average Canadian Indian girl dies at twenty-five.

Poems for all the Annettes Al Purdy $2.50
T.O. Now: The Young Toronto Poets ed.
Dennis Lee $1.95

Puhl. House of Anansi reviewed by Bob Allen

Like Topsy the House of Anansi just grew. Now, along with the Coach House Press, it is probably the most important publisher of poetry (new poetry? Canadian poetry?) in Toronto. Yes Virginia, Anansi is where it's at. In the last year it has published Ginsberg's Airplane Dreams, Dennis Lee's Civil Elegies, the two books reviewed here, and several others.

From "The young Toronto poets" to Al Purdy is quite a distance. T. O. Now is a collection of apprentice poetry. It is what might or might not be significant in five or ten years time, and it's interesting to speculate on how many of the contributors will eventually make it as poets (who decides, anyway?), how many are poets already, and how many will sink to the depths of being included on a Canadian Literature Course (hopefully none).

Al Purdy, on the other hand, is finally getting some of the recognition he deserves. He published his first volume of poetry in 1944, but went almost unrecognized until he won the Governor-General's Award in 1966 for The Cariboo Horses. Even now, he could hardly be called a household word like Layton or Cohen, which is rather unfortunate, since he is more vital and more Canadian than either of them.

Poems for all the Annettes is a collection from his earlier books, and a republication (extensively revised) of a private printing in 1963. So most of the poetry is not new. It dates from the early 1950's to a few new poems that Purdy has slipped in here and there.

Purdy's poetry is alive. It moves. It is about people and places and things, and feelings, all at once. It is as if they were all composed extemporaneously by a man possessed and living all the minutes of his existence in one. Purdy can be funny and touching in the same breath. At the Quinte Hotel seems for a while to be nothing more than a barroom brawl:

and I notice that the bartender is a sensitive man too so I tell him about his beer
I tell him the beer he draws is half fart and half horse piss and all the wonderful yellow flowers
But the bartender is not quite so sensitive as I supposed he was the way he looks at me now and does not appreciate my exquisite analogy.

At the end, however, the tone has subtly changed:

and it was brought home to me in the tavern that poems will not really huy heer or flowers or a goddam thing and I was sad
for I am a sensitive man

Purdy is full of sex, and love, and the cold Canadian winter, and mythology and Indians. He can also be damned funny. And serious. And sometimes you don't know which. He is aware in his poetry of his being a poet, but there is no mask to tear off. You can get into Purdy like you can't get into Cohen. Read Archaeology of Snow or Meaningless Poem and it all comes through. Al Purdy should make a lot of poets take a long look at their own poetry and wonder how long they've been dead.

T. O. Now is subtitled "The New Toronto Poets". Dennis Lee, the editor, calls the contributors "apprentice poets" in his apology. On the other hand, he remarks on "the extraordinary range and verve" of the poets included in this anthology, apparently meaning us to reach the conclusion that the young Toronto poets are suddenly more significant than they used to be, when compared, say, with the Vancouver poets, or more often with (Oh God!) the poets of the United-untill-death-do-us-part-States of America.

A friend of mine is constantly reminding me of the necessity for the radicalization of Canadian Poetry (needless to say, he is American). The poetry in the T.O. anthology sometimes approaches radicalism in form if not in content. There is, for example, the elaborate shape poetry of Charles Douglas, one of the five Victoria College poets in the book (They all seem to be editors or associate editors of Acta Victoriana, which may or may not be a coincidence.) The only one, to my mind, to successfully make use of eccentric typography, and the concept of the page as space to be utilized, is Peter Skilling, and even he is rarely profound. In Skilling's poetry we are forced often to read between the lines and provide our own significance. When we can, the poem works. When we cannot, it doesn't. For example:

There are places
The dead man.
Two umbrellas part sadly in the rain.
There are places I can never return to.

In such a case, our reaction depends more on our own imaginative reconstruction of what it means than what the poet originally meant to say.

One of the severest limitations of T.O. Now is its limited range. The majority of the poets included can be grouped into two categories: the Victoria College circle, and the New Writer's Workshop circle. These two groups, although obviously among the most prolific and imaginative, are by no means representative of all the "New poetry" currently being written in Toronto. Still, the anthology does represent some of the better poetry now being written by young (and primarily unpublished) poets. As can be expected in such a collection, there is the occasional startlingly good poem and quite a large amount that is mediocre. There is very little poetry, however, that does not manage to say something, even if only with one striking image among a plethora of words.

And there are poems like Visiting Roselynn Crystalle by Ted Plantos:

how are you roselynn Crystalle can i hold you in my fingers just for while the lamplighter goes by holding a dark city in his arms and you look well roselynn crystalle and his superbly funny In Memory of Hank Williams:

three carnival boys gamble for the chick who's freezing her ass off outside their fiftyeighthalfonfordpickup

Plantos' poetry, some by Ian Young, Peter Skilling, Greg Hollingshead, and Wayne Clifford stood out for me. But that's a very personal reaction. Despite the inconsistency of the poetry, you'll find something that hits home if you take the trouble to search. It's worth it.

pepper adams at george's

by jack mccaffrey

Pepper Adams looks just a bit out of place on the bandstand at George's Spaghetti House. Surrounding him are the regular lot, who look very much like your average stereotype of a jazzman: mustaches, beards, hair a little on the longish side (jazz long, not rock long) and more or less hip threads.

Just a bit taller than average, quite thin, whiskerless, his short shock of hair beginning to recede, and dressed in an ordinary suit, Adams looks more like an ascetic dentist than a jazz musician. To look at his slight frame, you would never guess that he could manage a baritone saxophone.

But when he played the other night, Adams once again showed that he is a first-rate jazzman. There is probably no one else around who can equal his facility on baritone sax, which is a brute of a horn. When it comes to tone, of course, no one can match Harry Carney; nevertheless, Adams gets a big robust sound.

With no strain at all, Pepper Adams can pour out streams of notes that carry the listener along with great force. The man has a superb drive which never lets up, and it is this extraordinary energy, this exuberance of his, that creates a sense of breathless excitement when he plays.

Although his style is very effusive, it is not mindless pyrotechnics. Adams' long, complex lines are composed of patterns which careful listening will reveal, although there are no "melodies" in the simple-minded sense.

The rest of the group is not quite up to playing at Adams' high level of musicianship. Although guitarist Ed Bickert and drummer Jerry Fuller give authoritative, sympathetic support, the bassist is not always capable of sustaining the fast pace and intense drive that Adams demands. Pianist Art Ayre, who looks like a dissipated elfin, often seems to be puzzled about what he ought to do. His comping is weak and his solos are generally negligible. One wonders (and perhaps Ayre wonders too) what he is doing on the same stand with Pepper Adams.

Unfortunately, I do have one small beef with Mr. Adams himself. When I arrived, the group was just finishing a set. It was an hour before Adams picked up his horn again — and then he played only two numbers (although they were long.) This may have been because it was opening night.

Adams, well known for his work with the Thad Jones-Mel Lewis big band and various New York small groups, is the second act in the fall music festival at George's. The series began this summer with Blue Mitchell, Zoot Sims, and Bob Brookmeyer. Encouraged by the response, the management resumed the policy last week with George Coleman, former tenor saxophonist with Miles Davis. For a reason which is obscure at best, they have booked Kai Winding (of the trombone wasteland) for next week. It is rumoured that Pee Wee Russell will appear soon. (What will they do for a rhythm section when he comes?)

*****
Keep your eye on the newspapers. Rumour has it that Roland Kirk will appear next week at the Town Tavern.

McLuhan rites: "One thing about which fish know exactly nothing is water, since they have no anti-environment which would enable them to perceive the element they live in. It appears that they can hear pretty well but have scarcely any power of directional location for the origin of the sounds they bear. In some species they discharge electric shocks as a means of spatial orientation..."

We have been waiting nearly two hours for this man who now stands before us with nouveau frontiersman's stetson and greatserape made in ground brown and shade green. We have been told that he is tired and we know why he is late. We have endured Magical Mystery Tour and suffered Transfusion. There are no seats only places to sit and for some of us there is only the floor to watch the light show play while we light our cigarets.

Toru Takemitsu 6: "It has been demonstrated that dolphins communicate not with their gibbering voices but with the varied intervals of silence between the sounds they emit — a provocative discovery."

We have been waiting nearly eighteen months to hear this man speak who says "This is called ..." and it is lost in expectation and guitar chords that tell us what we already know that the man is tired that the man is to be excused. "Alright you creeps come on out," he calls but it is his soft voice tired or cold.

Nathan Phillips, Q.C.: "As a matter of fact, I won only two scholastic prizes in my life, both in my last year in Public School in 1904. One was given by the Women's Christian Temperance Union for an essay on the effects of alcohol on the human body. The WCTU gave me a book entitled Wild Animals I Have Known..."

Country Joe is joined by the Fish. They all break into the Masked Marauder which is what Joe has been playing. When it comes time for Joe to serenade us la la la lala lalala it is no lullaby. When it comes time for Barry to tuck us in with his harp it is no way to treat a friend.

Fred Lipsius, Blood Sweat & Tears: "I think if music's good, it's good, you know ... freedom doesn't mean the music is better."

Joe, Barry, David, Bruce, Chicken, getting together: "Love, get myself together (David is clapping). I'm gonna tell you about my baby, she makes me feel like a natural man, she makes me feel so good." Fast bridge into Flying High which Barry says left as Joe sings right understated and quick 'we'd like to help you make your trip' then another bridge with a lot of guitar and organ. Chicken has a coke.

Che Guevara, M.D.: "Marzo 1967 (25): Nothing new happened today."

There was more to the first set. Bill Symons scored two touchdowns and Green Bay was upset by Detroit. Some time after Don't Wait Around for Jesus and the Fish Cheer wherein the gathering was exhorted to yell fuck in time to whatsatspel? the boys in the band turned confusion into non-sense with an uptempo vocal version of I-Feel-Like-I'm-Fixin'-To-Die-Rag so fast that the absurdity of their vision of the United States with its head in the sand was obvious to no one as if reality as anarchy as if Country Joe as madman were just not true.

What everyone there knew was clear. That the one thing about which some people know exactly nothing is violence, since they have no anti-environment which would enable them to perceive the element they live in. So Country Joe is mad because he takes a lullaby and turns it into a cook-up. So the Fish are mad because the FCC says they do not play together. So the Rock Pile reaches out at you with its similes like the music falling into your head out of sight.

Buckminster Fuller, call him Bucky: "When people talk about up and down what they really mean is in and out."

In the second set Joe no longer wears his greatserape and he is bareheaded so that his haircut is no longer invisible but I am too curious to ask why. Barry is chanting Superbird's refrain: "Superbird, he's a jerk, he don't work" simultaneous Joe is singing the lyrics simultaneous Cross rhythms are pounding now. New refrain: "Tricky Dick, he's a prick. He won't work, he's a jerk." Simultaneous Joe moans 'yaall, ahhh, he's just another LBJ. Go back to Orange County and take off your pants."

Gossip, Take One: Leonard Cohen is in Nashville cutting a record.

We were waiting for the lyrical Country Joe we thought we knew whose voice doesn't break out of fragility whose voice hardly breaks at all while David Cohen's organ cleanses the Arabians' windowless nights and guitar chords rise and fall with the ins and outs of everyone's anti-environment.

You can talk about purity you can talk about the unwashed.

Gossip, Take Two: Faye Dunaway and Michael J. Pollard attended the festivities following Country Joe and the Fish's opening night at Fillmore East last Friday night.

This band knows about silence and they know about electric shocks. They have a sense of spatiality a speciality of theirs. I don't care if they are anarchists, they have their rights. What I'm interested in is this: Stockhausen says that when he writes music he goes physically out into space. I'm not going to ask George Wallace about that. If he and Hubie have something all worked out so much the difference.

Law and Order, AP: "Two policemen looking for a burglar met in a darkened building early yesterday. One policeman attacked the other with his nightstick, and was shot and seriously wounded, before the mistake was discovered."

Meanwhile there are just two many things not happening in Rock these days to get uptight about how to end this picture: (1) the traditional or back to our roots movement which broke through with John Wesley Harding and continues with the new Byrds and Music From Big Pink; (2) the discovery of new sounds or if you haven't heard this before it's got to be good movement which broke through with Revolver only to be corrupted by most every record company in search of the new messiah.

Throatal Environments, Sunday Dept: At the same time as Country Joe and the Fish were giving their second concert CHUM-FM was devoting an hour to the vision of Lenny Bruce and CTV was presenting the Smothers Brothers version of the good life. CBS stuck its tongue in briefly before reverting to its old reliable position: cuts were made "on a question of taste" basis.

White Elephants only, remember?

marat/sade at trinity square

The concept of total theatre, a term thrown about very loosely in modern dramatic criticism, implies a great deal of involvement. Too often, as in Trio Productions' Marat/Sade, it is left hanging, a clever use of lights, from all angles of the theatre, or a lot of noise, preferably electronic, and, of course, people running through the audience. Trio came this far but failed to achieve the ultimate involvement, that of moving the spectator out of himself and into the milieu, to take a place somewhere inside it all. Marat/Sade was not a bad production, indeed in some instances it was quite admirable, but it was never what it ought to have been, to quote a European critic: "a night on the lunatic fringe." It was always a play and we, the audience, watched.

Watched a series of interesting, sometimes striking tableaux arrange themselves on the T-shaped stage. Or watched Vivian Reis struggle manfully with the demanding role of Charlotte Corday, almost coming to grips with it a few times. Watched Robert Christie look good and sound good but not be good as de Sade. Watched Kenneth Wickes' expressive face in the portrayal of Marat; unfortunately Wickes ceased to be anything related to expressive when he opened his mouth or stood up. Watched the inmates writhe, foam, twitch, scratch, spit, moan, never too obtrusive but always in disconcerting evidence. And watched as the singers climbed up on to scaffolds that resembled the go-go cages of 1966, and listened.

Listened as they sang, (still looking like regulars on Hullabaloo); listened to the progression of the script with all due respect for the skilful arrangement of the great quantity of things which had to be said by the cast of thousands: listened in horror which continued to grow as the vandalism of Paul Hoffert's new score unfolded. It consisted of a series of pointless, boring and wasteful so-called tunes which completely nullified the effect of every song in the book. Particularly frustrating in the 'Homage to Marat' and in the 'Fifteen Glorious Years' songs, the score, played by electric guitar, organ and drums, formed the most grievous default in the entire production.

The set, by Les Lawrence, was distinctly impressive: a huge fishnet formed a kind of traveller for the Charenton production. Behind it was a shower-curtain set-up and innumerable coke-cases; on each side of the stage were scaffolds—one side for the musicians, the other for the singers. Gord Edmunds and Piers Gilson designed some very effective lighting schemes from a well-equipped booth: in almost all instances they paid off aesthetically. A possible exception was the revolving stripes of red, white, blue and green (?) in the scene of Marat's memories.

Vivian Reis was beautiful as Corday: her facial movements and her tiny, dignified gestures were often very touching. In the final analysis she turned in the best performance for at times she, at least, was credible. Tony Moffat-Lynch was a rather piratical herald, resembling an escapee from Penzance and frequently sounding like one, but his playing showed sparkling personality. Jeremy Ransome was a leonine and lecherous Duperret; he stomped the stage with great vigour and demonstrated the most stage presence of all in his brief appearances.

The initial confrontation between Duperret and Corday was the high point of the play. A pale blue strobe played on them as they wrangled at the tip of the T; they executed a slow-motion dance, exquisitely choreographed, and the garish flickering made for a magnificent, memorable sequence. It was the first evidence of the audience at Trinity Square being affected by the play; the eerie aura of unreality was not to be resisted. The impact of the effect was, however, utterly ruined by its repetition in the second confrontation.

Other supposed interior climaxes were not as successful. The whipping of de Sade by Corday, all bathed in an amber glow, lacked impetus somehow. The indescribable, embryonically graphic copulation scene, an attempt at theatrical bravura, was merely gross and not worthy of being accoladed 'shocking'.

Technically the production is quite satisfactory. The difficult blocking is always tidy, the lighting smooth, the choreography occasionally brilliant and the dialogue at least consistently audible. But director William Marshall has failed to work excellence out of a cast that was capable of it, or to generate the necessary excitement out of the elements at his disposal. His use of devices is heavy-handed and too often trite, to wit the inevitable slide projections featuring the inevitable soldier in Vietnam battledress. These are not by any means coups de théâtre, although they are set up that way—they are banalities in the all too transparent guise of imagination. What is lacking, it would seem, is seasoning. For all its dash and panache, this production of Marat/Sade is pretty plain fare.

a rather flimsy staircase

Put two actors on a tiny stage, with no supporting cast, no noticeable action of any kind, and give them nothing to do but talk to each other and sip tea for two hours and you have all the makings for a disastrous theatrical happening. Lest you may think from the start that Charles Dyer's Staircase which opened last week at the Colonnade Theatre was one such disastrous experience, I may as well tell you that for several reasons I enjoyed it very much. And yet, I left the theatre feeling that somehow I had missed the whole impact of the play, if indeed Staircase has any impact at all.

The play deals with two Brixton barbers who lead a very modest, ordinary life. Ordinary except for one thing — they are both queer. Aha! you say, rubbing your hands with glee. Charles Dyer is going to tell it like it is — a frank and simple story of homosexuality in suburban London. And perhaps that's what Dyer had in mind initially. But he so carefully avoids what we might call shocking or sensational details that the whole play falls flat and becomes as insipid as a cup of British tea. What we end up with is a day in the life of two barbers who are supposed to have lived together intimately for twenty years, but who show none of the emotions which such a relationship implies.

The first thing you have to ask yourself, even before you get settled in your seat, is what are these two guys doing together in the first place. Harry who is the elder is a corpulent, effeminate type who hides the fact that he is totally bald by wearing a towel turban. His life consists of cleaning house, serving up tea and hot chocolate and recalling his happier days as a Scoutmaster. Charlie who keeps every hair on his head meticulously in place, fancies himself to be an actor although his only role in the past twenty years has been an advertisement for duffel coats.

There are of course certain complications which make up the "plot". Charlie is not only a fag he is a transvestite as well, and he receives a police summons for impersonating a woman in a public bar. This would be as serious to Charlie (and to us) as a speeding ticket were it not for the fact that he is expecting the arrival of his daughter whom he has not seen for more than 20 years. There is some doubt as to whether Cassie is actually his daughter, but she is the only proof of his heterosexuality and he cannot bear to be disgraced before her in court. Charlie's wild fears and his verbal barrages at Harry, who only craves a bit of love and a show of fidelity, fill most of the two acts. The only other aspect of the story is a Freudian obsession which both men have for their senile mothers. At the close of the play Charlie and Harry are back together again having survived some stark confessions and bitter name calling, and I suppose if you're one of those who has to look for a message, it must be "true love will find a way."

Charles Dyer's script provides a great challenge for two actors willing to try to do something with very little. Director Paxton Whitehead chose for the task two of Canada's finest, Jack Creley and Sandy Webster. Their performances, while lacking in sensitivity, and perhaps even a true understanding of what homosexuality is all about are nonetheless powerful and extremely energetic. Creley's amazing bravado and activity combined with his sardonic wit cannot fail to impress. We are impelled to laugh at his barbs at first until we too feel the pain and pathos generated by the situation. Webster, as Harry is a fine complement to this performance. With just the right touch of meek motherliness he is no match for the bragging, bullying Charlie and he presents a vivid picture of the need to feel wanted and loved by someone, even an arrogant creep like Charlie. Working in the rather intimate confines of the Colonnade Theatre's stage they seem in perfect touch with each other at all times.

Charles Dyer's play leaves many questions unanswered, (for instance, why is it called Staircase anyway) and quite a bit to be desired. But the production at the Colonnade Theatre, though somewhat unfulfilling emotionally and intellectually is most certainly energetic.

I was waiting in line outside the Old Vic Theatre at ten o'clock on a Saturday morning innocently reading my London Times, when I was accosted by an American tourist complete with Bermuda shorts and camera.

"Ya know if Olivier is gunna be on tunight?" he asked in a voice that made the whole queue turn from behind their newspapers.

"I'm afraid I really don't know," I said.

"Well I dunno," he said. "I hear he was sick or sumthin'. And I don't see much point in lining up here all day just for one play . . . specially if he isn't in it. The wife an' I have already seen two theatres here, and we've still gotta do the Tower of London."

And before I knew it, he was across Waterloo Bridge.

Sir Laurence Olivier was playing in Strindberg's Dance of Death that night. I watched his brilliant performance for forty cents — standing only ten rows from the front.

The National Theatre at the Old Vic is merely one part of a phenomenon known as the West End, a controlled cultural explosion in the centre of London, a small area where forty plays are going on every night of the week except Sunday.

London theatre is probably one of the most enduring rituals in the city, with the possible exception of the English pub. The days of the Globe and the Fortune are being relived with a renewed magnificence, a renaissance of pomp and creativity. The stage is a focus for the traditional and the underground, the rich and the poor, the commercial and the artistic. It is always the theatre of the absurd as the audience is always the most diverse selection of minks, dilettantes, intellectuals, queers, tourists, and starving students that have ever been assembled under one roof.

Like the theatre, the London pub also presents a diverse cross section of society. There you can see a dock worker wearing a business suit and the local Welsh poet-in-residence wearing a turtleneck and jeans. Usually, though, every pub serves a particular breed of clientele, and when the pub and the theatre are juxtaposed, there is a new breed of environment — the theatre pub. Inevitably I found one.

12 review

I had just seen Oedipus at the Old Vic, and, in desperate need of a post-catharsis drink, I stumbled upon a small pub tucked away behind the stage door. When I walked in, I had the feeling I'd been there before. I knew I'd seen those faces somewhere. And then I recognized Creon ordering a pint of Guinness and Jocasta sipping a half of bitter beside him. There was the whole cast of the play except for Gielgud, who was probably too old and rotten to go to a pub anyway. I felt I was at a private party without an invitation. Even the 'guvnor behind the bar had a faint theatrical look about him. I drank down a quick pint and left for home: it's very disillusioning to find that actors are real people — seeing Tiresias playing darts.

The audience at the Old Vic never seemed worthy of the performance; they were less real than the play itself. Whenever I would buy a rush seat in the stalls, I would have the dubious honor of mingling with the front row society during the intermission in the bar. This was the smoked-salmon-sandwich crowd who would pay more for half time hors d'oeuvre than I would pay for my ticket.

Their invaluable commentary would be: "Oh, isn't Laurence just marvellous tonight," or "The decor is simply divine," or "I just can't imagine the Vic without Sir John."

On the other hand, if I sat in the gallery, I would mix with the modern 'pit' of the London theatre. There wasn't a bar in the gallery, and so the mob would bring along their pork pie and their salami sandwiches. They were mostly students or intellectuals or just the person who wanted to see the play and couldn't get seats because he wasn't a friend of a friend of Kenneth Tynan.

It's ironic that the twentieth century pit is more literate than the royal circle.

London theatre is still a social phenomenon as well as an artistic medium: a place to be seen for the aristocracy, the evening's entertainment for the bourgeois, and the regal show for the common man. It is a cross section that is reflected in the prices. You can pay sometimes as little as thirty cents for a standing room ticket and no more than six dollars for the best seat in the house.

You can see no matter where you sit, for most of the theatres are small, Victorian structures.

There is a sense of nostalgia in the trappings of a former age: the caste system of stalls, royal court, upper circle, and gallery; the fading red velvet and polished brass, the sixpenny opera glasses, the huge chandelier that dims in anticipation of the curtain rising.

Before I came to London, my conception of 'live' theatre was paying $2.50 to sit in the back row of the O'Keefe Centre to see a play that wasn't worth it anyway. But in the West End, I became an addict. In three months, I saw twenty-four plays. Most were first rate theatre, and most cost me half the price of a movie in Toronto.

In Toronto theatre is still in the embryonic stages. But the West End, through an evolved tradition, is now becoming an end in itself, an art form breaking out of its social ritual and examining its own form as much as its social environment. It's not just entertainment, although there is admittedly a great deal of commercial creativity on the London stage that goes no further than pure entertainment. The result is often a prostituting of the medium in such hard-sell "successes" as the sixteen-year run of The Mousetrap, now little more than a tourist trap. Even with the emphasis on pure entertainment, however, the product is often palatable. Few critics question the brilliant burlesque of Canterbury Tales or the comic romanticism of There's a Girl in My Soup.

Outside the commercialism, however, there is an involvement with the audience that is taking one of two directions. First it is moving outwards, away from the self consciousness of the stage.

In Man of La Mancha, we feel the "suspension of our disbelief," as the characters — even the incredible Don Quixote — become convincingly real. The "Impossible Dream," the ideal of the quest, becomes indivisible from the physical presence of the song itself. The audience is moved nearly to tears by the pathos of the human fight against the unbeatable foe, and by the virtue of righting the unrightable wrong. And when they come out at the end of the play, we do not applaud the performance, but the spirit of Don Quixote. And the applause is thunderous.

Even the most objective critic would be moved, for the play cannot be criticised just as structured drama, well-timed comedy or good music. It was a play that transcended the fact that it was a play at all.

The other creative direction that London theatre is taking is perhaps far more what's happening for producer Peter Brook and the other authors of the West End's dramatic evolution. It's the look inward to the audience and the theatre itself to such an extent that the mode sometimes becomes the subject matter.

The Old Vic's production of Seneca's version of Oedipus makes this emphasis by stressing the social ritual that lies at the foundation of theatre. The chorus of the tragedy is scattered throughout the audience in raised positions in front of the pillars. There is a return to the birth of Greek tragedy where the audience actually was the chorus. At the beginning of the play and at certain crises during the play, the chorus builds up a rhythm of strange clicking and rushing sounds as each member slowly takes up his role one at a time. From one sound, a frightening crescendo is reached through rhythmic combinations. The choral forms are paralleled by the almost orgasmic chants of some of the speeches. Seneca's barbaric descriptions form a horrifying vision. The words and sounds become the action of the play.

This is the theatre of recurrence and repetition. By sheer vocal tension it is the most 'live' theatre I have experienced. The audience identifies with the primitive rhythms of fertility that remove the play from chaos into the first world of regeneration. Left on the stage at the end of the play is a gigantic, erect, golden phallus. The audience is shocked, but not half so much as when the cast, formerly dressed in black, returns dancing to the stage in white togas and playing "When the Saints go Marching in." It was like the Bacchanal comedies at the end of every tragedy of the Greek period.

Oedipus at the Old Vic is experimental theatre. Ironically, it upsets the classical decorum by returning to the basic classical ritual. It was a standard play presented in a revolutionary form.

The National Theatre took a similar attitude when it presented Shakespeare's As You Like It with an all-male cast, modern dress, electronic music, and an obsession with homosexuality. The directors claimed that they were just trying to return to Shakespeare's format — having no female actresses and being contemporary with their own time as Shakespeare was with his. The result was less successful. It was again a revolutionary production, but the form detracted from the substance of the play. There is a fine line between invention and gimmickery.

But the whole vitality of London theatre is innovation itself. There is a growing feeling that a change in theatre environment can produce a new concept of theatre. In an attempt to get away from the commercialism of the West End, Peter Brook and the intellectual elite of the stage founded last year an underground project called the Open Space Theatre. And it really is underground. It's contained in a very unlikely looking basement which holds about 150 people in folding chairs around a space which is the stage. It is a private club so that the productions can pass uncensored before the scrutiny of the Lord Chamberlain.

I saw Fortune and Men's Eyes at the Open Space, a play written by Canadian John Herbert and performed last year in Toronto at the Central Library Theatre. The subject is homosexuality in a prison camp. I am still trying to decide whether the vast array of environmental gimmickery effectively enhanced the play. You entered the theatre through an iron gate where a prison guard demanded your ticket. Before you could enter the actual auditorium, you had to have your fingerprints stamped on your programme. The audience seemed more amused than impressed by the proceedings, and the shock value of the play itself left an unadulterated impact.

There was no 'pit' at that play. The audience was a hybrid of fun-seekers who had been told that it was 'dirty' and socialites who had been told that it was 'kinky'. I imagine some people were there because they heard it was a good play. Don't ask me what category I belong to.

Amidst the confused London theatre scene, the steady production by John Osborne — no matter what it is — is always a safe bet. He is permanently in vogue with high society and intellectuals alike, and it doesn't matter whether one understands an Osborne play, as long as one goes to it and says it was good. The obscurity of one of his plays often confounds the audience, especially when it ends without finishing. At the conclusion of Time Present, the whole audience was left waiting for the rest of the audience to applaud.

In regard to his latest play, however, I cannot be cynical — Hotel in Amsterdam. It was the last play I saw in London, and it left me with a more simplified conception of what theatre should be. The play consisted of a brilliant script, and the lead role was delivered in the best acting that I have ever seen on stage or screen. Critics called Paul Scofield's role the performance of his life.

When you pay less than a dollar to see an immortal performance, it's a very artistic form of commercialism.

Someone might argue that standing to see Scofield or Olivier is worth more than two pints of beer in a pub — they cost the same — but it's a question of taste. Of course, you can't take English draught beer out of England, but Olivier was in Toronto last year.

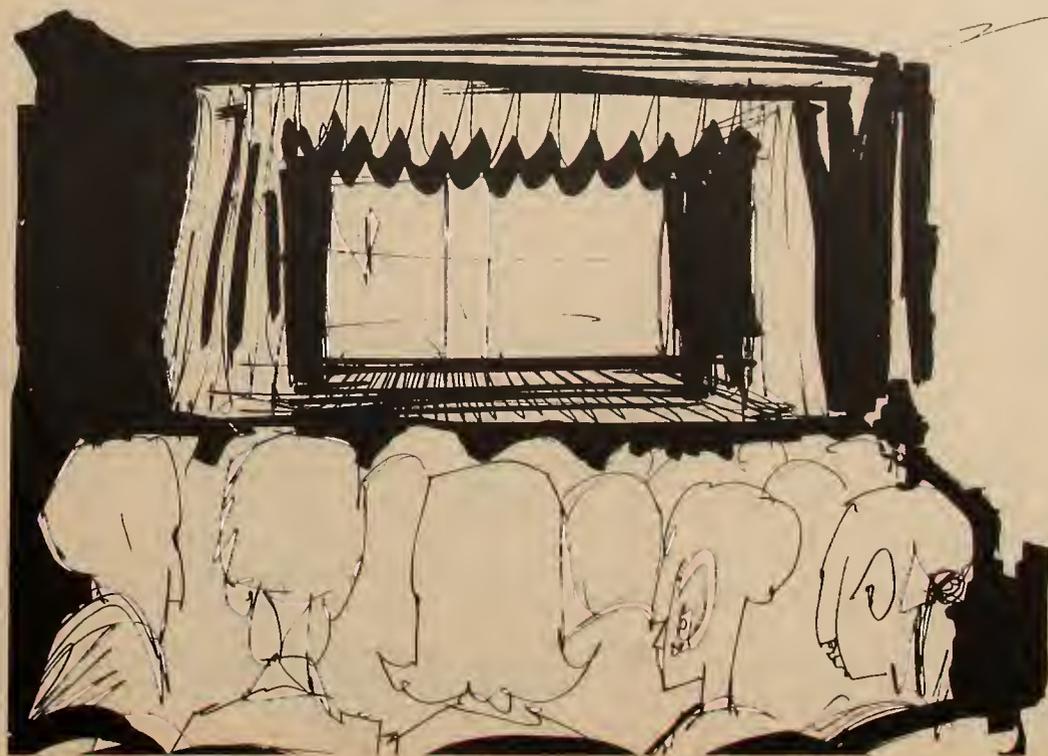

Nevertheless, just as the pub is an institution native to England, the West End is a theatrical tradition native to London. It's a culture that is inseparable from the way of life, a reflection of the society and an attempt to speak to it. Whether or not the audience sees itself on stage may be the problem of the players, the play, or the audience itself. In London perhaps there are too many watchers, not enough participants.

There is now the conflict between the social and artistic rituals. Art is fighting within the traditional social structures of the theatre. And so we see the underground worrying about the audience — their involvement and perception.

Perhaps the thinkers of the new mode are so absorbed in technique that they forget the play. Perhaps they are like the tourist who went to London to see the view from Waterloo Bridge and was so intent on getting to the other side that he forgot to look.

goldstein -- "dreamy, amusing, pathetic, and tragic"

If the theme of Goldstein seems familiar, it's because the story of man's search for meaning amidst chaos has pre-occupied writers for years. Yet in this film, co-directors Benjamin Manaster and Philip Kaufman articulate this theme from a new point of view. And though their film is contemporary with contemporary relevance, it contains an element almost biblical in origin — the appearance of a prophet who induces man to seek a new order.

As the film opens, we are given a few hazy starting points — a pregnant girl, a worried young man. Everything else is remote and undefined. This dream-like quality is further amplified with the appearance of a bearded old man standing knee-deep in the sea. Who is he — a harmless eccentric, a mad rabbi? There is no time to decide because suddenly we are slammed into the reality of the grimy city of Chicago.

At first, the old man remains apart from the chaos around him, but inevitably he is abused and persecuted by everyone, until a young sculptor, played by Tom Erhart, allows him to escape the confusion by saving him from a piggish nightwatchman in a sausage factory. The old man begins to take on the appearance of a prophet, and the messianic sculptor sets out on a search through the bowels of the decayed city to find him.

ise in this search and nothing to guide him. For when the sculptor undertakes his quest, he inherits the irrationality of an entire civilization. Yet, unlike his friend, a house wrecker, who embodies all the useless, destructive impulses of disorder, the sculptor must bring some kind of meaning out of the rubble. His scrap metal sculptures are an attempt to transform "technical chaos into primitive order", as a flighty art dealer says in the film.

It is this technical chaos that the prophet alludes to when he warns, "If ya don't watch out, they're goin' t' dance ya down the street." If the artist's quest is to lead steadily toward self-identity, the sculptor must resist being caught up and hurled about by the men who live in our confused society.

It is not really important to this sort of theme that the character of the prophet himself be realized as human, but rather, that his presence be realized. It's that quick, accidental intrusion of the prophet's words into the sculptor's life that sets him off on his search for conscience. The prophet's appearance is only a catalyst. He can return to the sea to re-appear in some future generation. The act of realization has been put into motion, and if the man achieves his goal at the end of the film he has done so himself.

All this abstract plotting produces a beautifully balanced film; directors Manaster and Kaufman carefully calculate the effect that each scene will produce on us. It may be the depression of a desolate garbage dump, the whimsical fascination of a mechanized sausage factory, or the profound peacefulness of a forest, but there is a feeling throughout Goldstein that the mood of each scene has been precisely gauged and smoothly achieved.

Goldstein is not essentially a psychological film in the way in which Bergman's films are psychological. It is closer to a picaresque sort of story — an account, incident by incident, of the hero's journey, to a set goal. What is different about Goldstein is that its goal is not set. The sculptor does not know what he is searching for until suddenly he stops, and discovers that he has found it, at the very end of the film.

Since the plot structure is loose, the film can be dreamy, amusing, pathetic and tragic, all at the same time, without compromising any one element. Goldstein does not operate on any one level but rather on a series of levels, often operating simultaneously. It must be the world's first film to inject comedy into an abortion scene, but it does, and does so successfully.

The result of Goldstein is an unusual view into a Wasteland world with an indication of hope and escape. It is a subtly written film, imaginatively made and with a very real, very relevant point of view.

Goldstein starts today at Cinecity.

repertory at rochdale?

Just as the Student Handbook was plugging the Electra Theatre on College Street as the place for consistently good films, it dropped dead. It is no more.

Bob Huber's two-year experiment with repertory cinema in Toronto has died a death natural enough as businesses go. After a financially profitable first year, the Electra just scraped through to August 1968, often not covering its expenses. Even with a peak mailing list of 2000 people, who received a colorful and informative brochure each month, attendance dropped off. Toronto film-goers, many as there may be, just lost interest.

The original idea, borrowed from Montreal and New York, was to have a theatre where film-goers could see movies they missed the first time around, or even films that never made it commercially. A good film cannot be shown or seen only once. To Bob Huber "films, like any other art form, should be seen again." The idea was to create a rotating library of films. The audience was expected to know what it wanted to see and not just "go to the movies".

The double bills were arranged to attract the real film nuts as well as merely interested film goers; often, they succeeded in putting off both. "I didn't really give the repertory idea a chance here. After all, we were only open from Monday to Thursday, and regular commercial theatres get 50-60% of their business on the weekends". Only 1/3 of the audience turned out to be students — "an unreliable clientele".

As early as two months ago, Bob Huber, director of the cinema, was all set to pack it in and head to Montreal, where the repertory group is anxious to set up a second theatre. Then, things started to rumble at Rochdale. Word got around that there might be space on Rochdale's ground floor for a theatre. Maybe the area occupied by the proposed coffee-house would do? Rochdale-types wanted Bob Huber to know about it ("he really knows his stuff"), and he suggested a large (28' x 61') space in the back of the building. It looked ideal for an intimate theatre accommodating maybe 200 people.

All sorts of ideas popped up, and, as with most Rochdale projects, the excitement exceeded the plausibility. Bob Huber's plan is to set up a small art cinema for the whole city. It could end up as a combination commercial first-run theatre by night, and by day, a service to anyone interested in film. "It could be what Cinecity isn't. They don't know films, or how to manage superb theatre. They're like dilettantes playing with a movie theatre", says Huber. The Rochdale idea hopes to use the theatre during the day as an outlet for student productions, almost a cinematheque.

It could act as an on-campus showcase for films made on campus, with perhaps a regular bi-weekly screening for students, all free, of course. At night, why not revivals of good oldies as well as first-run efforts on a commercial basis, and maybe late night midnight shows for student-types? After all, there's going to be a 24 hour restaurant there. The theatre would also be available for screenings by Rochdale's own film groups (filmmakers co-op), NFB films, Canadian underground (sic) films, high school showings, and even screenings for films used in U. of T. courses.

The idea is good. With the Electra dead, the film audience has lost an outlet. It's happened before. But for Canadian filmmakers, the whole concept is new. The whole film thing in Toronto just may get a shot of . . . adrenalin. Rochdale's all for it, Bob Huber's all for it, the filmmakers are all for it, in fact everyone's all for it except the guys who own the property.

You see, the Rubin Corporation, which owns all of Rochdale's commercial space, is not convinced that the whole idea will make it financially, and no wonder. But all is not quite lost. The Rubin group are reasonable businessmen with some appreciation of the significance of such a venture — the old Ed Mirvish complex.

As things stand now, Bob Huber et al must raise enough money to convince the owners that they can make it. They may even float some shares. The governments won't or can't (same thing) help, now that the freeze on Canada Council money has been announced. If all that fails, the film people can only hope that Rubin itself may want to get involved, which is not completely implausible.

In fact, by next week the whole thing may take off, or miscarry.

alternatives to apocalypse

To use a "trivial" example to signify a momentous event: 'Alternative' and 'choice' are used interchangeably in English. Of course, there are those among us who know better, but how do we forestall this decaying process: 'Pedant!?' Will the next generation have had the opportunity to realize that these two words had different dynamic meanings? Will the parentheses in Webster's be the only recourse to unveiling the dynamism that existed in our language?

Unfortunately I am not a linguist. I cannot point to the decadence involved in the other Western languages. Out of ignorance I shall say that decadence exists in our other Western languages. That is to say that our words have come to stand for less than the reality they originally denoted. And, if words are the substance of our thought, where does that leave Western Thinking? In a state of decay! Need I make further corollaries? About societies? institutions? I want to set myself straight on the influence Toynbee might come to have on my writing here. Historically the 'root-rally-root-rally' of passing civilizations exists. But, contrary to what Toynbee believes, I know there to be no significance to this pattern. The Universe convulses—and the story of man, his-story, convulses with it. There is no cyclical order to the rise and fall of civilizations—not even in retrospect. Only convulsions. Men in their various societies collide, and in so doing give us the convulsive pattern which is in tune with the golden music of the cosmos. The outcome of this collision is dependent on the dynamism of one or both groups. The outcome of this collision opens a vast realm of possibilities for the resulting culture(s). The 'Barbarian' invasions at the beginning of the Christian era represented the collision of a dynamic culture with one in decay: "The finer qualities of the new language were not so easily perceived, especially by the educated, as the mummified elegance of the Latin of the vanished past." Unfortunately or otherwise there seems to have been too much taking in this give-take relationship. The dynamism of the barbaric languages was superimposed over Roman institutions to yield that phantasmagoria we have come to call Western Thought. God (Ger.: Gott) and the Devil (A.S.: deofol) became the alternatives (L.: alter). The dynamism disappeared; gone was the realm of possibilities: Thor, Oden, et al. And the story goes on from this point until today our choices have become alternatives: still God or the Devil, Democracy or Communism, The Administration or the Students, Them or Us, and so forth.

We are indeed heading for another collision (and parenthesizing our vocabulary probably will not "save" us.) I don't know whether the Eastern half of the world has a more dynamic language(s), religion(s), et cetera. But it seems to be from Them that We can expect a collision. And does it matter whether or not Eastern Thought is more or less dynamic—since Universal convulsions (of which our global ones are rather insignificant) probably follow none of our anthropomorphic laws or hypotheses anyhow? The fact is that dynamism will ensue not because it is a Universal "necessity", but because it is a Universal fact. But the Bomb!? And the Apocalypse!? To speak of the Apocalypse is to speak the language of a decadent—to realize the outcome of another insignificant cosmic convulsion as having this alternative. But the outcome of these convulsions is open to a realm of indeterminant possibilities. Should the bomb be The weapon used in this convulsion, the dynamism of the Universe will not be impeded. The omnipresent elan vitale will realize itself with or without man.

Don Garner
(IV Mod. Hist.)

"Do I dare disturb the universe?"

Eliot, Prufrock.

The 20th century can salvage itself. Apocalypse, in last week's Review, presupposed the inevitability of global genocide. But its obscurities and unargued-for assumptions can be challenged (however sketchily in the space permitted) to offer an alternative.

"We are paralyzed. . . we have simply not decided. . ." Who is "we"? Is it our society, government or all of us as individuals?

Our paralysis is not institutional but individual. Controlled by a science he doesn't understand and by administrators he doesn't know, the individual finds the collective omnipotence of his species has been won at the expense of his integrity as a human being. Hence, his fears, his emasculating frustration.

He is depersonalized. Human relations are not conceived in human terms in our media-bound environment. The questions of inter-personal relations most pertinent in avoiding the "unexamined life" challenge the quality of deodorants and laxatives.

How can an individual who is preparing a face to meet the faces that he meets tune in to the suffering of the poor?

In a sense it is not true that "we know what the problems are". They are not stated in terms meaningful to the individual. As Michael Harrington observes in The Other America the poor "are not simply neglected, they are not seen" (p.14). The suburbanite bypasses the ghetto on his way to work. The poor exist in Government Reports. They are not part of the political experience. It is not true that we, as individuals, stand "in 1968 with a remarkably clear picture of the perils before us".

Nor is it true that our institutions are "unable to handle the problems of today". The fact is that they won't. As Robert Kennedy frequently observed, LBJ responded to the summer riots of 1967 by saying a prayer and appointing a commission. He responded to Kennedy's death similarly.

The possibility of an alternative to apocalypse lies, I believe, not in "total revolution" (which Apoc. leaves tantalizingly undescribed) but in the mobilization of the individual human will. The solution to our problems lies not in the hands of administrators and politicians (Apoc. to the contrary) but with the individual who must come to feel a partner rather than an alienated victim in the struggle to survive. A crisis must be meaningful to him, not an abstraction like "ecological rape". The "problem" of "violence" isn't defined for him in Government Statistics nor in the pretty glamour of Bonnie and Clyde but in a stinking kitchen alleyway.

The fate of the urban ghetto dweller must not be decided in Washington's stony anonymity. As Robert Kennedy realized, he must not be the passive beneficiary of Federal Welfare but must be involved through his ideas and labour in redeveloping his environment.

"Though total revolution is impossible" (Apoc.) I believe a salvaging of our social order is not. But we need help. We need a redirecting of our knowledge, philosophic and scientific, from esoteric abstractions to human concerns. Our "marginated thinkers" must answer the questions of the individual at all his levels of development and sophistication by questioning the answers of the elite and the complacent.

We need this and we need more. We need the redirecting of scientific resources from military to environmental problems. We need inspired leadership. And, strange as it may sound, we need faith. And courage.

If this is to happen — and it can — the individual must be made aware of his opportunity to help and his responsibility to save his fellow man. He must understand that you don't need the power of a Kennedy or the influence of Martin Luther King to make a difference to the welfare of humanity. It won't be easy to save the human race. The question is not "Can we?" but "Do we dare?"

Ryerson rejects free school

Dave Maxwell, president of Ryerson students' council, went down to defeat Wednesday on a platform advocating student control of courses and a "free school" concept for Ryerson. He is expected to announce his resignation shortly.

The vote was 427 for and 955 against the referendum circulated by the council, and represented 23 per cent of eligible voters.

"I think the council will flounder now," Maxwell told The Varsity last night. "It has no sense of direction. It will turn conservative and revert to dealing with the petty types of issues which we had been trying to avoid."

SMC proposes to impeach Fromm

A petition to impeach F. Paul Fromm is being gathered this week at St. Michael's College.

A group called SFEAR, Students for Effective and Acceptable Representation, feel Fromm's stands in the Students Administrative Council misrepresent the students of St. Mike's.

"His influence is out of proportion to his views," say Joe Blonde (II SMC), the leaders of SFEAR.

"We want the issued involved brought out into the open, not necessarily to remove Fromm permanently from office."

About one-third of the required 470 names have been collected by the petition.

Martin Loney: a pragmatic radical

Martin Loney is an English socialist from Durham University who came to Canada because he wanted to see the country and take political science at Simon Fraser University.

Now he is President-elect of the Canadian Union of Students, and one of the most effective student radicals in Canada.

He is a pragmatist who produces results, not an idealist who is used to projecting ideas on deaf ears.

In public meetings his delivery is haranguing but rational rhetoric. In private conversation it is almost casual banter.

At the campus of the University of Regina he spoke for two hours to a crowd of 1,200 students, and when he came to the U of T, the largest university in Canada, he spoke in front of 75, most of them on his side to begin with.

I asked him if he thought CUS was losing contact with the students.

"We're not losing contact," he said. "We never had the contact. Up until now, CUS has been little more than a social gathering."

He said the alienation against CUS in the East is due to the propaganda of the mass media.

"I don't see the utility of violence. CUS has never advocated violence. What is logical for the militant student in Columbia is not what is logical for the militant student in Canada."

"We don't need violence when we can shut down the university with a national student strike."

He says the only way CUS can achieve reforms such as democratization is to organize a mass student movement through the local student councils.

At U of T he will meet apathy. Seventy-five students out of 31,000 is not a workable basis for a student movement.

The apathy of students against the movement is the same apathy towards the educational process.

The radicals direct their attack against the administration rather than the faculty because it epitomizes for them a central problem of the university—its link with society.

For people like Loney, Peter Warrian (CUS President), and Andy Wernick (SGS), the university is a bad society because it is influenced by a bad society, a consumptive, exploitive, industrial society by which students are being used.

Making the students realize their servility essentially means converting them from capitalism to socialism.

The obstacle to strong support for their movement is the very upper-middle class attitudes among students against which they are organizing the movement.

By ROB LEE

Students at the University of Toronto must break through the "culture apathy" and confront the faculty the way unions confront management, says Martin Loney, president-elect of the Canadian Union of Students.

"If students want a part in the decision-making process they must organize," he told about 70 students at Sidney Smith Hall yesterday.

"If students don't like exams or other means of grading people like eggs, they should go on strike," he said.

But, admitted Loney, students are not yet organized enough to achieve these goals.

"The task for 1968-69," he said, "is to build a base on the campuses around these issues and to get people involved in them."

Standing on a ledge and speaking rapidly into a portable microphone, Loney sharply criticized the way the government and universities are run.

"The housing problem is one which the Liberal government has done nothing to solve, and Transport Minister Paul Hellyer is expressing only a pious interest in the housing shortage," Loney charged.

The housing problem in Toronto, he said, is a good issue with which to link the campus to the community.

Later Loney struck out against the media.

"The newspapers have said that CUS is a Communist-dominated organization that wants to burn down the universities," he said.

"No wonder some universities wanted to withdraw. I'd want to withdraw from an organization like that myself."

CUS would rather take over the universities and democratize them than burn them down, Loney added.

Soccer Blues host Gryphons

Blues soccer team extended their pre-season losing streak to three games last Wednesday. They were hammered 8-1 by the Canadian World Cup team, a side that possibly represents the best that Canada can offer in terms of soccer.

Despite the lopsided score, it was the Varsity team that scored first on Dwight Taylor's twenty-five yard boomer. The score remained 1-0 in Blues' favor until about the thirty-five minute mark when the roof started caving in.

However, inevitably the defence had to crack, simply because the Canadian side had too many guns. Tibor Vigh (seventh leading scorer in the North American Professional Soccer League), scored three goals in five minutes near the end of the first half. The second half belonged strictly to the Canadian team as their conditioning began to tell. They pumped in five unanswered goals in the last forty-five minutes.

The game served as a final tune-up for Blues who open their regular season this Saturday against Guelph at 11:00 on the back campus. In the past the Guelph Gryphons have proved the toughest intercollegiate team that Varsity ever met on its home field. Last year, only two goals in the last ten minutes salvaged a 3-2 win for Toronto. The game in Guelph was a different story as Blues out-classed Gryphons 11-0.

Rugger

On Saturday Varsity rugger Blues open their season against Guelph at 11:00 on the back campus.

In preparation for their opener, Blues thrashed Toronto Canuks 35-3 on Wednesday night. Varsity was led by their new captain George Wraw who contributed 14 points to the cause.

The halfbacks constantly cut through the Canuk defense and single tries went to Tony Pierre and Peter Sutherland. Two tries were scored by winger Doug Phibbs. Also sharing in the scoring were prop forward Larry Barron, fly half Andy Gibson and Dave Ledson, the ex-hooker for Rub City.

In the first half, play was scrambly and penalty-ridden. But when Blues wanted they had little trouble mounting a cohesive attack. Most responsible for the fine work of the forwards was Graeme Wynn.

Appearing at practices this week were two prominent ex-Blues' ruggerites of yesterday. Both Bill Charlton (wing) and John Murray (prop) hope to be in condition in several weeks.

THE BIG ONE - BLUES VS. GAELS

FOOTBALL - 68

FOOTBALL AND THE FRESHMAN

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

By PHIL BINGLEY
VARSITY SPORTS EDITOR

Thursday night — the last full-dress practice before the big one. Just watching Blues go through their exercises, drills, and scrimmages, one didn't need a schedule to know that Queen's Golden Gaels will be in town for this Saturday's football home opener.

Cries of "Way to fire that pea, Beany" and "Atta baby, atta grab that ball" and "C'mon gang, hustle hustle, gotta be there on Saturday" and "Let's go, let's do it right they get psyched up for a week-end matinee.

More than forty players work out at daily practices but only thirty can dress for each SIFL contest. Many of the team members are assured of starting assignments on the basis of past performance yet even the coaching staff would have been pressed to pick out their big guns during the past few days.

Everyone involved has simply been putting out and out and out. Minor injuries and even major hurts have constantly been played down by suffering individuals, all of whom are determined to make it to the post or at least prove they are physically capable of doing so.

With only seven games in the schedule, every game is certainly a critical one. However, since Varsity and Queens' are again the titans of the league this season, to the victor of to-morrow's match may well belong all the spoils — Yates Cup, Western Bowl and Canadian College Bowl. The two teams do not meet after Saturday until the final week-end of the season. By then, any cinderella comebacks could prove to be too late.

For Blues, the ground game is their biggest plus — both offensively and defensively. Walt Sehr, Mike Raham and Glen Markle were dynamite against McGill and unless Gaels have come up with a field-wide brick wall, this yard-eating threesome should digest a few long gains.

The Varsity passing attack, if practices are any indication, is on the brink of maturity. Starting pivot Vic Alboini has been throwing the ball cleanly and accurately to receivers Eric Walter, Nick DiGiuseppe and Mark Slater.

Gaels as usual are all but an unknown quantity coming into their first meeting with Blues. Coach Frank Tindall likes to throw a few surprises into his attack but his tricolor is expected to come out running. Backfielders Jamie Johnston, Heino Lilles and Ron Clark along with quarterback Don Bayne have all this time" rang through the chilly evening air.

Coach Ron Murphy has become almost a sorcerer when it involved preparing his squad for key games — especially those with the Kingston tricolor. Bystanders in the dressing room during the week before such a contest swear they can see a cushion of air between the players' soles and the floor as been successful up until now on the ground.

One big question that should be answered early is whether Gaels' offensive line can handle the Varsity front four of Alex Topps, Jim Bennett, Doug Dempster and Ylo Korgemagi. If not, Bayne must look to flankers Tom Chown and Syl Apps and ends Don McIntyre and Rich Van Buskirk to establish an aerial attack.

Back in '65 I huddled with my luv in the frozen November stands of the J. O. Little Stadium as Varsity Blues and Western Mustangs clashed 'neath a murky sky for the Yates Cup.

We'd risen and taken off in the early morning chill from Newmarket, after celebrating something or other late into the previous night. The road to London seemed filled with Toronto students grinning and shouting and thumbing their way through the cold to the big game.

1965 was a good year to be a freshman and a football fan, and I was both. After five or six years of woefully inept teams, Varsity Blues clicked in 1965. They've been sharp ever since.

It felt good to sit in the stands that year among those strange engineers with the coarse cheers, among the weird and wonderful LGMB, among the fraternity men with their roll of paper in one hand a half-empty mickey in the other.

Overawed freshman that I was, I laughed heartily at all these crazy, drunken, lovable people around me — people pulling just as hard as I was for Blues, but determined to have their fun too. I helped pass people down, I joined in the jolly refrains, and learned to sit down during the engineers' song.

As you 'mature' of course, you find yourself losing the old "Fight, fight, Blue and White" bit. Issues like academic freedom and students' rights become more and more important. But in 1965, when student power meant something like tearing down the opposition's goalposts, nothing meant quite as much to me as a freshman than the warm solidarity of excitement and pride that filled the stands during the singing of the university song after a Varsity touchdown.

I felt, then, that I belonged here and that as I sang along with the other students they were glad to have me. In the classroom I felt lost and alienated.

Those Saturday afternoons are my fondest memories of first year, U of T.

That particular Saturday in London was the culmination. Before our disbelieving, wind-wracked eyes, Varsity came from behind with three spectacular touchdowns to win the Cup, 20-14.

As the final seconds ticked off, pathetic fallacy became rampant. Ominous, grey clouds hung lower and lower, the wind picked up, and there was a trace of snow in the air.

Finally, the gun went off and I rushed out onto the field and wildly embraced the first thing I saw — a gigantic, Varsity lineman. And he didn't mind that I was small and pimply and young. He embraced me, and we laughed. That was being a freshman in 1965.

Faculty council goes for 100 more

One hundred more students will be seated on the 1,000-member council of the faculty of arts and science until a decision is reached on implementation of Macpherson Report proposals.

The council decided Friday afternoon to allow the extra seats after rejecting a student proposal to refer the matter to a smaller committee with equal student-faculty membership.

"I believe this matter should be decided by both students and faculty," explained Tony Pargeter (III UC) in presenting his proposal.

"I don't believe that faculty are intrinsically stupid or evil," he said, "but these reports affect students more than the faculty."

He suggested the committee include 15 students, 15 teaching staff and faculty Dean A. D. Allen as chairman.

"A committee of this size would effectively disenfranchise half the departments of the faculty," said English Prof. D. J. Knight.

Dean Allen admitted that setting up such a committee would delay implementation of the Macpherson proposals at least a year.

"I have found that I as a member of the faculty have no rights," said mathematics Prof. M. Fischler in support of the motion.

"These meetings have generated a certain amount of good will and that indeed is an accomplishment," said English lecturer P. D. Seary.

"We are amenable, reasonable people and will accept or reject the students' proposals on the strength of their ideas."

SAC president Steve Langdon descended from the balcony to urge the formation of parallel committees — one of students and one of faculty (including lecturers) — each to hold open sessions and to have veto power.

When the vote came only a handful of professors supported the student motion.

A second proposal, made by philosophy professor R. B. de Sousa, to seat 100 more students as full voting members of the council for the rest of the current meetings was accepted by a scant majority.

Sandra Black (IV Vic), a student member, called the motion "an attempt at tokenism" and moved it be tabled until its full implications could be studied.

Faculty response was angry. "I think this young man need not blackmail us," one member burst out.

Prof. A. F. Johnston of the Vic English department said, "We rejected the first proposal because of practical considerations. It was not an anti-student vote." She received loud applause from the floor.

The motion to seat 100 more students was carried, with all of the student members either voting against it or abstaining.

Langdon commented last night he thought the gesture irrelevant and was doubtful about it getting through a regular meeting of the council.

"It was merely an attempt by those who had guilty consciences about the defeat of the first motion to prove that they really liked students," he said.

The council meets again Wednesday afternoon.

Prof. Loren Smith: "Even if it is tokenism — no reason to reject it."

P. D. Seary (English lecturer): "Students do not need to vote to get their wishes recognized."

Prof. R. M. Fischler: "As a faculty member I have no rights."

Steve Langdon (SAC president): "I have seldom been as angry as today."

Prof. R. B. de Sousa: suggested an extra 100 students to discuss the proposals.

Tony Pargeter: "We're not representative of anyone."

For Jon Pierson, Wyatt Oay, Joe Hunt, Jimmy Owens, Art Koenig and Sam Brown, ARS NOVA was a long time coming. Each had lived with music most of his life and had perfected his own style and reputation.

Jon son of Lutheran minister, studied for the ministry before making the decision to study music. He excelled on the bass trombone and played with several symphony orchestras before forming the "New York Baroque Bass Ensemble" with Wyatt.

Wyatt studied classical composition and guitar. At one point Wyatt (half Spanish himself) lived with a Spanish gypsy colony near Saville studying flamenco guitar. After returning to the States he concentrated on writing classical works including among them 12 preludes for guitar, a string quartet, several chorel works and two short suites for viola and cello.

Sam Brown began playing banjo when he was four and guitar when he was twelve. Sam went to Detroit and played with local jazz groups while studying classical guitar. He has played guitar and travelled extensively as accompanist for Minam Makeba. Sam has performed and recorded with artists such as Oianne Carroll, Harry Belafonte, Chubby Checker, Judy Collins, Astrud Gilberto, Gary MacFarland and Oionne Warwick.

Jimmy Owens and his trumpet are well known in the U.S. as well as Europe and Asia. He studied trumpet with Carmine Caruso. He played with the bands of Lionel Hampton, Charlie Mingus, Herbie Mann, and Clark Terry as well as the "Symphony of the New World" before forming the "New York Jazz Sextet". He has been featured on over twenty jazz albums and his own album, "You Had Better Listen" (with Kenny Barron) has recently been released on the Atlantic label.

Art Koenig moved to New York in 1965 and began establishing a reputation as a bassist, working with such performers as Luiz Bonfá, Oscar Brown, Jr., Nancy Wilson, Maynard Ferguson and Astrud Gilberto. Before becoming a part of ARS NOVA, he toured Europe, Africa and South America with Minam Makeba.

Joe Hunt played tympani with the "Indiana Philharmonic". In 1960 he came to New York to work with the "Stan Getz Quartet" and during the next year and a half he travelled with Getz and appeared on the Verve recordings of "Getz Au Go Go" and "Carnegie Hall Concert". In 1964 he left Getz and became part of the "Bill Evans Trio" where he could be found until the summer of 1968 when he decided to take his drums and join ARS NOVA.

ARS NOVA — "new art" — seems to be the right name. At least it's a culmination of the art and talent of six outstanding musicians. In fact, ARS NOVA exists only after the passage of distance and time ARS NOVA. (A new sound? Could be!)

If you dig the sound of the "Ooors", then you won't want to miss the fantastic "Ars Nova". They have the closest sound to the "Ooors" of all the modern groups without actually copying their material, for the "Ars Nova" write their own songs. Tickets are going fast, so you'd better get yours today, at the S.A.C. Office. After all, where could you get a better deal than $1.50 a ticket.

CAUT supports Strax

By SUE REISLER
The Canadian Association of University Teachers has decided to support Dr. Norman Strax in his battle against University of New Brunswick authorities.

The Strax case was on the agenda of the Academic Freedom Committee when CAUT met in Montreal this weekend.

The kind of support they will lend Dr. Strax will not be made public, but they will be behind him.

Dr. Strax was suspended by UNB President Colin MacKay two weeks ago.

Thursday he said Strax was suspended for "disrupting the normal work and activity of the university, specifically the operation of the library."

He was also accused of counselling students to break university regulations.

Thus far the handling of the Strax case has resembled a "kangaroo court" according to one of his lawyers, Vince Kelly.

The committee in charge of the administration's hearing consisted of three faculty members appointed by the Board of Governors. These men were not made aware of the nature of the charges at the time of the hearing, and they had no decision-making power, Kelly said.

"It was no real trial," he said. "They just sat and listened."

Strax walked out in the middle of the hearing saying he had not been allowed to call witnesses, nor informed of the charges laid against him.

The sit-in by 30 UNB students still continues inside Strax's office. They plan to stay until Strax is reinstated.

Che Guevara's spirit is alive and well

By JOHN THOMAS

Che Guevara died in the Bolivian jungles one year ago tomorrow, but the fierce spirit of the Cuban guerilla fighter was alive in Toronto Friday night as 300 people gathered in the auditorium of the Ontario College of Education to commemorate his death.

There was Che with his heavy black beard and ubiquitous cigar, alternately making speeches and joining the workers in the cane fields.

The film flickered and broke. The sound came on only near the end, but this merely underscored the theme of the evening: Che lives.

After faltering in English, Antonio Breton of the Cuban Embassy switched briefly but passionately into Spanish. The sympathetic crowd loved it.

"Evidently I was quite good, eh?" Mr.

Breton concluded happily. "I feel that I am among campaneros and campaneras tonight."

Poet and editor Al Purdy read a poem from his anthology The New Romans. He told of a meeting with Che in Cuba in 1964 when they had shaken hands, and Purdy remembered the strong hand and the fingers which were later cut off by the Bolivian authorities for fingerprint date.

Andy Wernick (SGS) of the Toronto Student Movement delivered a terse eulogy of the man who is "serving in death the role of martyr, saint, revolutionary hero, a model for the young around the world."

And while the appreciative crowd applauded there was Che on the wall bemusedly taking it in. Someone had irreverently taped a poster of him over a portrait of Dr. William Parkenham, dean of the OCE from 1920 to 1934.

now we know

Well, it's official. Students are inferior politically as well as intellectually to faculty.

The Faculty of Arts and Science Council voted by a huge majority not to allow students an equal voice in examining the Macpherson-Allen Report on educational policy.

Instead they gave students another 100 seats on their 1,000-man body. The grand total now stands at 100. That means students are roughly one-tenth as worthy of political power as faculty.

The students had a much better rating Thursday night when the Association of Teaching Staff adopted almost in toto a SAC proposal limiting the Board of Governors to non-voting status on the commission for restructuring university government. Students got equality with staff in that proposal.

How do you explain the disparity? Possibly, after its taste of power Thursday, the faculty decided they didn't want to give any of it up, and certainly not to students. Not unless it's convenient.

Oh, the faculty are willing to listen to students all right — no doubt about their sincerity in that. But what else?

The 250 students at Friday's open meeting of the Faculty Council were almost unanimously behind equal staff-student consideration of the Macpherson recommendations; they indicated this by their applause.

THURSDAY: ASSOCIATION OF TEACHING STAFF MEETING

FRIDAY: FACULTY COUNCIL MEETING

But the student voice was heard, and ignored.

What can students do to get equality? The majority don't care, or satisfy themselves with their "democratic" staff-student committees in course unions. In the process, they conveniently forget that democratic decisions aren't much good when they're overruled by dictators.

The minority who support a democratic position don't have enough mass support to be effective or credible.

The faculty have won this round, but maybe students — moderates and radicals — can learn something from it.

Working through the established channels doesn't work unless you've got power. As long as students are split, they don't have enough power. The radicals have known this for a long time; perhaps the moderates will now learn it.

LETTERS

mired idols

Sir:

There was a time once, in the Middle Ages to be more exact, when the institutions of higher learning were universally respected, not because those attending were necessarily worthy of such reverence, but because as a group, these scholars stood for a far loftier goal than the mere attaining of economic and social advantage over other men. Within the confines of their mighty Gothic walls, universities in those days came to represent those things which all men everywhere have at one time tried to achieve: the right to search for, and to know the truth. This did not mean the narrow, bigoted causes of rabid political movements, but rather, the truths of science, history, the ultimate truth — that of God, and a thousand different philosophies: these were the motivations — the quest for knowledge.

Today, and in our very midst, these idols are cast down before us into the dust, and that which men once held as the illumination of the world, is trampled under the soiled and unwashed feet of jeering mobs, and is shouted down by voices animated through sterile minds. Where are the truths now? Where is our faith?

We are led by the nose into defiling that which is clean, and blindly, through faulty leadership, we retard, rather than aid, the great evolutionary process that our universities are going through today.

We are now in a period where few truly support the men who were chosen to head the student administration, both left and right. Nor is it too difficult to see that those presently in control flagrantly abuse their power for they believe that once elected, they are then free to do as they please without ever giving a thought to the wishes of the student body whom they supposedly represent. Were these not elected to speak for us all, and not just a handful of radicals and anarchists?

Strangely enough, one of the most often-heard comments about any student body, is its apathy and disinterest in its own affairs — do not let your apparent silence be interpreted by others as a sanction for the activities of a few.

Students of U of T, unite! You've nothing to lose but the shame.

Graduates criticize OCE

Students at the College of Education don't feel that they are being properly trained to become teachers, according to a recently-published course critique.

Two graduates of the elementary school option, Mrs. Susan Gibson and Mrs. Judi Lederman undertook this summer to canvass their 88 classmates in the 1967-68 year. Despite the mail strike, 53 per cent of the students answered. Among the findings:

- 30 per cent of students felt that the two major courses, Elementary Home Room and Elementary English were "valueless."
- many felt that too much time was spent learning the administrative duties of teaching, and too little time learning about the psychology and development of the child.
- students were critical of the fact that some of their lecture hours were spent copying definitions from booklets of definitions compiled by the lecturer.
- lecturers sometimes used out-of-date curricula and methods.

Among the many suggestions were requests for seminars and changes in course emphasis. Many of the students felt they were not being treated like university graduates.

The report has been submitted to the Department of Education.

Hankey proposes student veto

By LEIGHTON REID

Teachers must have the consent of their students in deciding how a course should be taught, says Wayne Hankey (SGS).

Speaking at a three-hour open meeting of the Presidential Advisory Committee on Disciplinary Procedures Thursday night, he admitted students were willing to accept the "scholastic authority of a teacher."

"But the teacher has a duty to recognize the students' direction of interest in the course."

"In more concrete terms, the students should have a veto over teaching methods proposed by the professors," he said.

Hankey's proposal met with stiff opposition from several faculty members of the committee.

"If a student does not like the way I teach, he can complain to me, to the department chairman, or he can drop the subject or course," argued psychology Professor M. W. Laurence.

"If he stays, I take that as consent that I may teach in my own style", she said.

Prof. S. P. Rosenbaum of Erindale College wanted a formal structure set up where student complaints about incompetent teaching could be heard.

"We should no longer have to depend on arbitrary decisions of departmental chairmen," he said.

"Student protests should be dealt with as close to the origin as possible, but there should be ultimate recourse" agreed engineering Dean J. M. Ham.

The meeting was the second open session of the committee. Eight members of the 10-man committee were present.

The committee will meet again Wed. Oct. 9 at 7 p.m. in Room 3050, Sidney Smith Hall.

Recruiting agents looking for 25 hosts and hostesses for the Ontario Pavilion at Expo 70 in Japan will be at U of T this month beginning tomorrow at Scarborough College.

The jobs will involve crowd control, information services and VIP tours at the Ontario Pavilion.

Successful applicants will receive return transportation, uniforms and accommodation, in addition to a good salary.

Preference will be given to those who can speak Japanese but it is not essential.

SAC to hear referendum proposal

The Students Administrative Council will be asked Wed. Oct. 9 to allow SAC members to call for a cross-campus referendum on any SAC decision.

Steve Langdon will ask that with the backing of 2000 signatures only a SAC member can force a cross-campus vote on an issue.

As a constitutional amendment this "initiative referendum" proposal requires a two-thirds vote of the council.

This proposal is a response to some of the criticisms of last year's SAC which forced the December re-election confrontation between President Tom Faulkner and challenger Bill Charlton. Neutral factions claimed SAC did not have the right to take stands on political issues. Others, particularly the Edmund Burke Society claimed SAC's decisions were not representative of the students.

Initiative referendum was part of Langdon's campaign platform last spring.

Rugger teams sweep

The first Varsity rugger team continued its winning ways with a decisive 37-3 triumph over Guelph Gryphons.

The forwards won the majority of scrums and lineouts and fed the ball back to the halfbacks who carried the ball often and well in Guelph territory.

An excellent feature of the game was the interpassing between the forwards themselves. It was truly a forwards' contest.

Another high point for Blues was the kicking of backs George Wraw, Scott McClure and Tony Pierre.

Wraw led the scoring with four tries while wing Doug Phibbs added two more. Pierre, Harding and McClure, who filled in ably for injured

Andy Gibson, each scored three-pointers.

Pierre counted five conversions for Varsity while Serge Silver had Guelph's single try.

The Varsity Seconds in a much tougher contest were able to subdue Queens' irregulars 8-5.

Wing Rick Rowland scored one try for Varsity and Andy Cairns added a convert and a penalty goal. Cairns' play, highlighted by his conversion at the sidelines from forty yards out, was superb.

GALLOPING GOLDEN GAELS BLOW DOWN BLUES 35-0

This was a typical of Varsity Blues' shoddy tackling efforts in Saturday's stunning 35-0 defeat to Queen's Golden Gaels. Here Gaels' elusive halfback Allan Strader (21) dances through the Toronto defense while Jim Bennett (41) gropes at the thin air and Gord Squires (42) moves in too late. Also trying to get a bead on Strader is Ian Kirkpatrick (38). PHOTO BY LEN GILOY

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

As hordes of Queen's termites devoured the north goal posts, Varsity punter Ron Kishimoto booted the ball off the side of his foot ten yards into the stands, the gun went, and the curtain mercifully descended on an abominable afternoon of football futility for Varsity Blues.

The final tally shone brightly from the scoreboard through the 4:30 gloom: Queen's 35, Varsity 0 — one of the worst home defeats ever suffered by a University of Toronto football team.

Before 18,000 disbelieving spectators, the favoured Blues found themselves completely mauled, pushed around and stomped on by a fired-up band of Midasmen from Queen's. The Golden Gaels, it seemed, could do nothing wrong while Blues saw everything they touched turn to dust.

The dust involved five fumbles, two interceptions, a staggering 117 yards in penalties, a puny 13 yards through the air, and a number of missed tackles. Gaels' gilded treasure chest, on the other hand, coffered up five touchdowns, 450 yards total offense and a defense which truly "ate 'em raw".

Queen's quarterback, Don Bayne, probed and penetrated Blues' injury-riddled defensive backfield for four touchdown passes and 213 yards through the air. Along the ground, Gaels' onslaught was equally as devastating, effectively demolishing the myth that Blues were impossible to run against.

Twin halfbacks Allan Strader and Keith Eamon led the way with two touchdowns each. Strader, supposedly a second-stringer filling in for the injured Jamie Johnson, was dynamite in the first half when Queen's tucked the game away, running up a 27-0 margin. He rushed for 71 yards in 7 carries, including a six yard touchdown romp, and collected three passes for 53 yards, one a 35 yard scoring strike from Bayne on the last play of the first half.

Eamon got his touchdowns on short two and nine yard passes, while end Don McIntyre notched the game's opening score with a 30 yard pass and run machination.

Varsity helmsman Vic Alboini wilted disparagingly in the face of a ferocious pass rush from the Gaels' front four, completing but two of 16 passes. A number of times he rarely had time to look downfield before unleashing the ball. It's a tribute to the tiny quarterback's manoeuvrability that he was caught only once, but his accuracy suffered irretrievably.

In fairness to the Blue and White cause, however, it should be pointed out that five first stringers were on the sidelines by the end of the game. All-star guard Arnie Carefoote and linebacker Bill Bennett were ineligible for the contest. All-star defensive halfback, punter and field goal kicker Paul McKay suffered a leg injury in practice last week. And second-string punter and touch defensive backfielder Peter Raham along with all-star defensive end Alex Topps were injured during the game. Both may be lost for the season. The absence of Raham and McKay was sorely felt as Blues' pass defense became one gaping hole.

But even with all five in the lineup Blues would have been snowed. As someone once said, "they shoulda stood in bed."

Even soccer team collapses

It finally happened. Varsity Blues soccer team lost a game. The loss — a 4-3 decision to Guelph University Gryphons — means the end of an undefeated streak (in regular season play) that had extended over four and a half years. The game also extended Blues' current losing string, including three pre-season setbacks, to four.

The game itself had two distinguishing factors. One was Varsity's seemingly lackadaisical play and the other was the spirit and hustle exhibited by Guelph.

Gryphon's first goal was scored by Don Blackburn, a member of Victoria College's interfaculty team last season.

Guelph continued to come on strong and from there on Blues, especially the defence, started to falter. Gryphon's second tally, scored by ex-Blue Norm Bracht, was a gift, courtesy of three defenders who stood and watched as Bracht tucked the ball away.

Varsity came back to score one goal by John Gero before the end of the first half.

Two minutes into the second half, Jim Leikos rifled a ten-yarder to even the count at 2-2. It looked as if Blues were finally going to pull away as they started to dominate play.

Then Norm Bracht struck again and coincidentally enough, the three defenders who had appreciated his first effort, repeated their act and watched as Bracht shoved in another gift goal.

Blues then came back again and Ron Muir deadlocked the score on a penalty kick. However, Bracht was not to be outdone as he fired the winner with just ten minutes remaining in the game.

The loss, while distasteful, should serve to wake up several of the players who had figured on an easy romp to the OQAA championship.

Coach Ernie Glass, obviously disappointed with his team's performance, plans to make some changes in an effort to get his club rolling.

Sole bright light in Blues general dismel showing was reliable fullback Mike Raham (22) who managed to wreck up more than 80 yards along the ground end contributed several fine kickoff returns. Gaels' Jim Turnbull (36) puts a firm grasp on Raham's sweater in an effort to halt the Varsity running ace.

Engineers last night joined arts and science students in the struggle for membership on their faculty council.

The engineering society voted unanimously to choose 20 students to take seats on the faculty council of the school of applied science and engineering.

The council, which now has 160 members — all engineering professors — will consider the engineers' request at their regular Nov. 1 meeting.

Engineering dean J. M. Ham told an engineering executive meeting last night he thought the proposal "an eminently sensible idea."

"Any method that can reflect intelligent interest of students cannot do us anything but good," he said.

"But the real work is done in the committees," he added.

He said the committees would be considering reforms such as changing from a year to a term basis and the possibility of a credit system.

If the proposal is accepted students would also be seated on the seven committees of the council.

During the two and a half hours of debate the engineers rejected the original proposal asking for only five seats on the 160-member council.

"Five articulate representatives are enough," said Art McIlwain (IV APSC). "We are not experienced enough to run the university."

Engineering society president Brian Dunk (IV APSC) also agreed five was "a bit more reasonable" a demand than 20.

"We have to start somewhere," he said, "We can go on from there if we need to."

"We can't study what we want to study — it's what we need for our profession," said Ron Factor (IV APSC).

Most of the 50 students at the meeting favored only a representative voice on the council rather than full equality with faculty.

"We should not have control," said Jim Ford (I APSC). "But we should have good representation on all the committees."

He said five students would be unable to represent adequately the 2100 engineers, but that about 25 would be more realistic.

"We want to show that we will not accept tokenism."

At the end of the meeting the engineers accepted Wayne Richardson's (III APSC) proposal the 20 members be elected through the engineering club.

Scarborough sleeps in

By DOUG MURRAY

"It's not so cold, but the mornings are terrible," said Mary Ann Kelly (II Scar).

She and two companions spent Monday night in a tent pitched beside the main building of Scarborough College.

They were joined yesterday by 37 students and nine more tents in a protest against government delay in approving residences for the college. They call the location "Davisville."

The government's decision to build residences at Scarborough has been delayed a year. This has also delayed the building of athletic and academic facilities which are part of the same addition — Phase IIB.

E. E. Stewart, deputy minister of education, says the principle of developing residences is still under review, although residences were included in the original plans for expansion.

"We need residences if the college is to achieve full development," Jim Debarbieri, student council president, said last night.

"We have invited William Davis, minister of education, to come on Friday. If he doesn't come we will march on the Department of University Affairs."

"The administration is fully behind us," he said. (Registrar James Jackson has promised to join the sleep-in.)

"The one-year delay must not be extended," said one student.

One obstacle is the high fees of John Andrews, the original architect. The Ontario Student Housing Corporation prefers its own architect.

At UNB it's Board over bodies

FREDERICTON (CUP) — Members of the Board of Governors at the University of New Brunswick had to be carried over the outstretched bodies of twelve protestors sitting in at yesterday's Board meeting.

The demonstrators, who were picketing the session, were invited in to give their views on the suspension of Professor Norman Strax. Strax was suspended two weeks ago for organizing a protest against the use of identification cards in the university library.

After about 15 minutes, the students were asked to leave. Instead, they linked arms and sat down in the chamber doorway.

When the meeting broke up two hours later, it took seven campus security officers to convey the Board members over the protestors.

As the sit-in at Strax' office continues, several UNB Professors have organized a fund to provide him with legal aid.

Any money left over will be used to establish a Canadian Union of Students — Canadian Association of University Teachers fund for all faculty members and students whose academic rights are violated.

A petition on U of T support containing 410 student and 66 faculty signatures was sent to UNB President Colin MacKay last night. At the University of Toronto, the fund has raised $100. It is being administered by Prof. Peter Rosenthal of the mathematics department.

On Monday, mathematics lecturer Gerald Paololke of UNB followed Professor Strax' lead and tried to sign books out of the library without showing an ID card. He failed, but no action has been taken against him.

He said there was no disruption of library service, and concluded it was the administration that was responsible for the disruption, not Strax.

This Castle is Bush League

By ANNE BOODY

"There is democracy in education if and only if a child — any child — cannot receive a better education anywhere other than the one that his society makes freely available to him." — Alexander Wittenburg, Priorities in Education.

Castle Frank High School, a modern structure surrounded by heavy black fences, has been considered a model school — a school demonstrating the qualities of a selective education process for a selected group of individuals.

The school was called unique — a showcase for the industrial market. When opened in 1963 it was considered a school of opportunity for prospective dropouts — offering 22 different trade shops, from hairdressing to horticulture, related to all aspects of industry.

Castle Frank has a goal — to squeeze "prospective dropouts" into slots in the industrial complex. There is a drawback however. Students graduating from the school are put into low income jobs where many are not protected by unions because they have served no apprenticeship.

Students choose to come themselves or are referred to the school by the Child Adjustment Services Department of the Board of Education. The referrals are usually made by psychologists who believe that slow learning is not simply a matter of IQ.

They consider many factors — IQ, environment, economic status and emotional tendencies — as determinates of the student's academic ability.

Most kids at the school have never had a break in life. Many come from low income backgrounds and many others from broken families. Their parents would normally find it financially impossible to send their children on in school even if they did have the capability to handle a higher education.

Loiter at your own risk!

LONDON, ONT. (VNS) — Students at the University of Western Ontario will be required to carry identification cards if they wish to remain on campus after classes. The move is part of a new program designed by the UWO police to prevent "illegal entry to and loitering in University buildings."

The cards will be distributed by department heads and will have to be shown on demand after class hours. Social events and late-running activities will receive special consideration if the police are notified beforehand

"Each year this university loses thousands of dollars through theft," said security head C. W. Brown, "and it has been proven in some instances that these thefts were committed by persons not connected with the university."

"This is the individual we are trying to keep out of our buildings."

But student council President John Yokom sees it differently.

"The restrictive measures stated in this letter cannot be condoned. They would deny students free access to the university and its facilities."

Integration for Hart House?

BY INGRID VABALIS

A committee which may make sweeping recommendations on the role of Hart House in the University of Toronto will be appointed shortly by president Claude Bissell.

It could be the body that finally recommends integration of the house — something the late Governor-General Vincent Massey opposed all his life.

For almost 49 years now Hart House has been the student centre for males on campus. The new campus Centre may usurp this traditional role and leave the House to fill other functions.

When the men's athletic department moves to the new athletic centre already approved by the university, it will leave the entire north wing of Hart House empty.

The advisory committee was requested last spring by Arnold Wilkinson, warden of Hart House, "to examine the future role that Hart House should play in the University of Toronto."

In a letter to Warden Wilkinson dated Sept. 25, Dr. Bissell agreed to the formation of this committee and suggested it be composed of a member of the board of governors; Dr. Donald Forster as the presidential appointee; four students nominated by the Hart House board of stewards — a student dominated organization; three faculty members and one graduate (alumnus) member of Hart House.

At tonight's SAC meeting, Gary Segal (1 Law), a student appointee to the Board of Stewards, will propose that both the board of governors' member and the presidential appointee be ex-officio (non-voting) members, and to have two of the four students appointed by the SAC.

The latter term may mean that there will be women on the committee — women involved in defining the future role of the House.

Dr. Bissell agreed the committee could contain women, but did not know if the rules of the house would be changed to admit women as full members.

"This would have to be discussed with the executors of the Massey estate," he said. "The Massey trust and deed of gift still stand, but I hope a change would not have to go through the courts — that this could be done by common consent. I'm just speculating on this, however."

Busy day on campus

o SAC President Steve Langdon will meet U of T President Claude Bissell in open debate at 1 p.m. today on or near the East Terrace of Hart House.

Langdon challenged Dr. Bissell to the debate to replace the President's opening address last month, but Dr. Bissell instead agreed to hold it later.

o The Faculty Council of Arts and Sciences will again consider the Macpherson Report in a third open meeting at Convocation Hall today at 2 p.m.

Dean A. D. Allen will ask the council to instruct him to present a revised set of proposals Oct. 28 after wider discussion has taken place.

He will also ask the council to establish a committee made up of one elected student and one staff member from each department in the faculty which would also discuss the proposals.

Submissions and briefs from the departments and students in the faculty would be accepted until Oct. 15.

SAC president Steve Langdon said last night he felt Allen's new proposal preserved most of what was contained in the student motion rejected by the council Friday.

o Scarborough College will be the site of tonight's SAC meeting at 7:30 p.m. SAC's current policy of "roving meetings" in large halls is an attempt to meet more students from all areas of the university.

Cops negligent: Radio

A Radio Varsity technician says the campus police were neglecting their duties at the Queens-Toronto football game last Saturday at Varsity Stadium.

Ronald Kroll (IV APSC) charges two campus police and one metro officer refused to stop three drunks who twice broke a wire, cutting off the game broadcast.

"The damage was so slight," said Chief Constable

B. West, "that we did not feel it was a serious matter."

West added that at the time all the available police were preparing for more serious damage from an extremely rowdy Queen's section.

Radio Varsity is preparing to sell game broadcast to a local AM station, and any interruptions in coverage could ruin this deal.

THE WEEK OF OCTOBER 21-26

Maybe this is the year to sock it to the administration and sock it to their buildings
 —Peter Warran, president of Canadian Union of Students.

violent year

This was to be the year of campus violence, of "socking it to their buildings", and we haven't been disappointed.

Queens University students last weekend tried to dismantle a Toronto hotel for the second year in a row, and got blacklisted for the second year in a row; U of T students threw and broke bottles on the playing field at the Queens—Blues game.

Victoria College frosh contributed more than $1,000 in damage to their residence during freshman weekend.

New College residents said goodbye to their alma mater last spring by burning carpets, tearing down doors and smashing windows.

And then there's the McGill train we didn't have this year. Last year students did so much damage the train was cancelled.

There's been lots of student violence all right, most of it by drunken jocks and mob-conscious engineers and repressed artsies "blowing off a little steam".

Curiously enough, there hasn't been any of the feared "student radical violence" (also called anarchy) on any Canadian campus. Not just this year, but ever.

The fact is that all the moderates and conservatives who are so uptight about violence by SAC or the CUS don't know what they are talking about.

Most of the "violence" comes from their own ranks — kids so repressed by our society they'll use any excuse to strike back. But of course, these "nice" kids don't get clubbed and jailed.

a loss?

Morality cop William Pilkington is leaving the Toronto force to become Whitby's police chief. Now, is that a loss or not?

Pilkington headed the Dorothy Cameron Art Gallery bust in 1965, remember? But how much can we fault him personally for that? He was just doing a job.

Another example then. This summer a group of nice liberals — social work and church types — met in the dining room of the Anglican diocese offices downtown to chat about Yorkville and what can be done for (about) the kids who called themselves hippies.

LETTERS

not consistent

Sir: May I take exception to the views expressed in your October 7 editorial, "Now We Know"? I fail to find the lack of consistency you attribute to the teaching staff's attitude toward student-faculty equality.

Let's clarify terms: the Association of the Teaching Staff represents some 90 per cent of the full-time faculty of this University. The Council of the Faculty of Arts, which does not even include all the undergraduate divisions, represents about 50 per cent of the staff. Isn't it a bit misleading to term both organizations "the faculty"?

As a member of the Executive Committee of the A.T.S. I can say that we invited S.A.C. representatives at Mr. Langdon's request and primarily for educational reasons: we wanted to hear from them and to learn from them. Most of us attending Thursday evening's gathering seem to have done so, considering the way we voted.

As a member of the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, I voted against Mr. Pargeter's motion because the last thing this university needs is yet another committee to rehash matters that have been amply discussed both in and out of committee. You don't offer cheesecake to an overweight man with heart trouble. While I favour greater student participation in the settling of curricular matters (as well as in the planning of the university structure), I am not sure that a quickie motion altering the already unwieldy balance of the Council of the Faculty of Arts is the way to get it.

Doubtless I resemble many of my colleagues in feeling confused about the manner in which this community is to become more human, and am therefore reluctant to make hasty decisions. If students or their representatives feel compelled to book passage on the Titanic, I cannot stop them. But I'll wait for another to come along, thank you.

As for Mr. Langdon's theory of guilty consciences: no one can convince me I'm laying love on the line in voting according to my brains and conscience on highly complex matters.

Dennis Duffy,
 English Dept.,
 Trinity College.

no woodpile?

Sir:

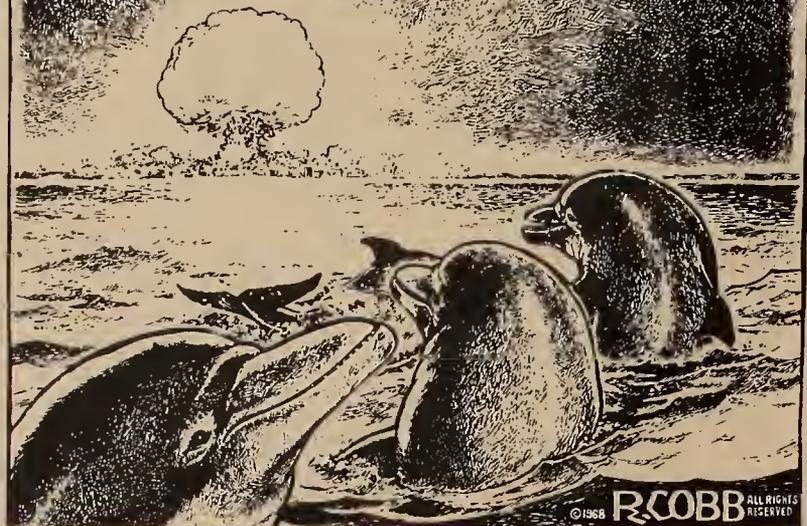

With regard to your issue of Monday, 7 October, and its reporting and editorials concerning the Friday meeting of the Faculty of Arts and Science Committee of the Whole, it is apparent that your paper is attempting (if I may adjust the usual imagery) to make the staff the niggers in the students' woodpile. But what is really disheartening is that there was no reference to the speech made by Professor Robson. The sanity, wit, and reasonableness of his performance, one would have hoped, could not go unappreciated. Neither should his proper concern about the requirements of a good Honours program.

Your failure to report or consider Professor Robson's contributions to the afternoon is beginning to lead some of us to question the sincerity of your motives with respect to the issue of course reform.

Peter Seary,
 English Dept.,
 University College.

Actions speak louder than words,
 Mr. Seary.

During the meeting someone mentioned that Mrs. Whitehead, wife of the governor of the Don Jail, was trying to start another hippie hostel — one that would take kids in and suck them back into society.

Pilkington stood up and said he was pleased to hear that and added, "I am sure some of our boys would be pleased to staff it in their spare time. After all, we already work with cadets and gymnastic clubs."

Can you imagine? Come on fellahs, on the floor for pushups.

Pilkington may have been a good cop when it was more definite as to who were the criminals, and what was disorderly behaviour. But things have changed. Just because the hippie subculture has disintegrated doesn't mean the disciplined-as-ever cops won the confrontation.

Cops like Pilkington and Chief Mackey may be wondering why the police aren't getting along with the public as they used to. They usually chalk it up to an alarming rise in crime and disorder and usually propose stricter police action as the remedy. Except that it doesn't work like it used to.

The police have missed the importance of the changes in personal life style. What exactly is the role of the police in the society that is evolving?

So, while Toronto wonders why such a good cop got away, don't grieve. Pilkington may be moving on to a happier scene, where a cop can still be a cop without all these doubts.

Student as Mr. Charlie

By Prof. CHANDLER DAVIS

Big day. New scene at orientation. Among the usual newcomers (professors, deans, straight upper-classmen) welcoming the freshmen in the usual way, here is the strange new fire-breathing SAC leader, accessing a first-year-nik and thrusting into his hand — "The Student as Nigger" by Jerry Farber. First-year-nik gulps hard.

Gee, are you really SAC Plenipotentiary Steve Werndorf?

That's right.

— come to welcome me to this wonderful university?

Well, not exactly.

What do you mean?

Read the article. Tells it like it is. Go ahead.

But but but — he seems to be saying college students are as badly treated as colored field hands! Is he talking about ME? Give me a choice whether to spend the year as a U of T student or a southern field hand, if Jerry Farber doesn't know which I'd choose, I'll be glad to tell him.

No, it's figurative — you know — the system robs you of your dignity, puts you in second-class status. . .

Actually a southern field hand probably envies me. Why do you want Farber to spoil my day just when I'm thinking how great my year's going to be? Almost anybody in the world would envy me. My father and his friends envy me because I'm young and carefree, my brother envies me because I've made my escape from Donside Collegiate.

But aren't you concerned about your autonomy? You know, having some part in the decisions which affect you. Here it's the system that tells you what to study. . .

More than at Donside Collegiate? More stupid assignments every week than in high school?

No, I guess not quite as bad as in high school, but —

Here I was just thinking how free I was going to be, not having to worry about stupid assignments every week like my brother, not having to worry about the business all the time like my father.

MIND-CAGE

— but the system keeps conditioning you to conform, puts your mind in a cage, doesn't leave your mind free to challenge. . .

Well I'm planning to have two nights and a weekend free every single week, altogether free, and a couple of weeks I'll take off to go skiing. If I want to study something that isn't assigned, instead of going to shaws and going skiing, I'll be able to do it. I can do it a hell of a lot easier than if I was working in a grocery store or in my father's office. But I think I'll go to Mont Tremblant, frankly.

Most pitiful is the prisoner who loves his chains.

Chains? Are you kidding? Who's chaining me?

Oh, the professors, the. . .

Hah, the PROFESSORS are supposed to be the privileged class around here? They probably envy us too. I sure as hell don't envy THEM. Anyway, how can I be a prisoner when I can leave any time I want? If I find out it's as bad as Jerry Farber says, I could always leave the University.

Maybe you will drop out, when you find out what it's like

I don't think so. My father thinks I'll be more use to the firm when I've got a degree, and I'm glad to have the freedom of not deciding just yet whether to go into his firm.

BEAUTIFUL PERSON

Well you, young man, you are without doubt one of the beautiful people. Born into a peaceful, contented realm — an assured future in plastics — with luck you might get to be seduced by your girl friend's mother. Tell me, what does your father's firm sell?

Oh, I don't know. . . Instrument housings, for one thing.

Made of plastics?

Plastic and aluminum.

And of all the people who handle the ingredients and parts that go into those instrument housings, and all the people who notice their progress through the stages of production, how many of them get half as well rewarded from it as your father does?

Well, a couple of executives of the aluminum company must make more than he does, I guess.

Just so.

Look, what are you suggesting, that we should fight the labour union's battle for them? If they think they can get more for their workers than they're getting, let them try

Not only organized workers, I'm suggesting that even the unemployed, the Indians — the disinherited, who haven't got any place at all in modern industry, have just as much right to the goods we produce.

FREE COUNTRY

Well, it's a free country. If you want to go help the unions or the Indians when you graduate, that's your privilege.

Right.

And you can try to talk me into doing something like that too. But you've got to take account of good old human instincts. See I LIKE all this money my father has, and if I just want to go ahead and enjoy it, that's my privilege.

That's not self-evident. Maybe the worker who is making those instrument housings, or even the Indian who isn't, has just as much right to all that money as you do.

What do you mean? Don't you get it. My father OWNS that company. That money belongs to HIM. Don't they teach you at University to understand a simple thing like that?

I've got to agree that some students study here for years and still understand things like that. That's sort of what I was saying a minute ago. Tell me, who does your father's firm sell instrument housings to?

The US Air Force.

What does the US Air Force do with them?

Look, you aren't suggesting that that's any responsibility of mine, are you? Why should I worry about that any more than your union man or your Indian does?

Well yeah, let them worry too, but you seemed to be willing to take responsibility for the money. Also it was probably your father who made the decision to sell to the US Air Force, so he or somebody in his office must have thought about it.

Sure, he had to figure out the terms of the contract and stuff. And when he saw how much he stood to make on that product, he COULDN'T turn it down. That's just business. You can understand that can't you?

Some students study very hard here and still understand things like that.

Well that's a relief. I was beginning to wonder about this University for a minute, but I guess it'll be okay.

Students risk losing reforms: Macpherson

By Prof. C. B. Macpherson

I have been reluctant, since my return to the university last month after a year's absence, to make any statement or take part in any debates about the implementation of the Macpherson Report. But now we are in danger of losing the lot, not from opposition within the faculty but from the position being taken by the more advanced students, who are apparently willing to risk losing the substantive reforms in order to assert a principle of equality of student and faculty power.

I want to point out (1) that the risk is greater than they may think, and (2) that it is unnecessary.

(1) The substantive reforms now proposed in the structure of degree programs are a response to a demand that has been building up, from students and faculty, over several years. Only now, after a year's work by the original Committee and another year of widespread discussion and of work by many other committees, has the pressure for these reforms acquired the momentum that could put the reforms into effect.

My point is simply that in a body as large as the Faculty of Arts and Science of this University — students and teachers together — that momentum is now easily or quickly built up. But it can be quickly lost, and will be lost if the force behind is deflected into quite another channel. The risk is not that the implementation of the Report will be put off for an extra year; it is that it will be put off altogether.

And (2) the risk is unnecessary. A choice does not have to be made between the achievement of these substantive reforms and the attempt to establish a principle of university government — the principle of equality of student and faculty power. If that were the choice that had to be made by the student leaders, their present inclination to choose the latter would be understandable. But that is not the choice that has to be made.

They can support the implementation of the Report through the existing channels, however inadequate they may find them, and at the same time make their case on the issue of university government in the only forum where it can be finally effective, namely in and around the new Commission on the governing structure of the University.

I do not suppose the student leaders are under any illusion that the issue of university government can be settled straight away. It is going to take a year or two at least, even with all the forces now committed to drastic change.

But the students' position there will not be strengthened if they now, in the inappropriate forum, ally themselves in effect with those members of the faculty who would like to see no change at all.

"These kids look tough and talk tough but they're very timid".

When you begin working you will spend many hours every day at your job, thus it is important that you choose work that is satisfying and enjoyable to you" — Board booklet.

At the end of six weeks in a particular shop the students are tested. If they fail their test they move to another shop. They have no choice as to where they will be placed to train for their life occupation.

There is dissatisfaction not only with the choice of courses but also with the content.

Horticulture students rake the school lawns for the first six weeks of school and shovel snow for another six weeks in the winter.

Kids in food preparation courses wash pots in the school cafeteria for their first six weeks.

When noisy protests and a strike by the ranks occurred two weeks ago no one was more surprised than the administrators of the school. The first day of the strike, 383 of 777 students were reported out of their classes. Principal Wilbert Bush claims only a sprinkling of the strikers were Castle Frank students. He blamed outside agitators for the unrest.

The protests stemmed from the expulsion of a Grade 11 student Doug Hamburg. His hair was too long for the liking of Principal Bush. Complaints also arose over the lack of freedom at Castle Frank. Many personal complaints were launched against Bush himself.

Bush has a particular ideology to get as many of his students as possible into the industrial market.

"But as soon as employers see long hair they say 'Don't send any of that kind to me.'"

"You and I may not like that but it's the man who pays the piper who calls the tune. I want employers at the school to see our product. So dress and manners are just as important as skills" — Principal Wilbert Bush, Toronto Star Oct. 3, 1968.

"These kids look tough and talk tough, but they're very timid. We mustn't wreck the confidence of these kids or they go down," said Bush.

They were so timid they came out in large numbers to protest their position in the school. They were timid enough to risk expulsion by Bush for their part in the campaign to gain some student rights.

What were they up against? Hair and dress regulations which the principal claims are there to enhance a better working environment. Kids working in shops are not allowed to wear jeans.

Boys must have shirt tails tucked in at all times and long hair is strictly forbidden. Those who don't like the rules are threatened with expulsion.

Bush, a graying staid Victorian of 58, carries his ideology into the halls. Single file down the aisle, and no gum chewing are two hard and fast rules. And students are not allowed to carry cigarettes or tobacco in their pockets, let alone smoke in the school.

If you're sitting in the class, just hope you won't need to get to a washroom. Mr. Bush wants his students to get admit slips to get back into the class before they are even excused. Same goes for all thirsty students.

Rules written in the student handbook come under the heading Conduct Outside the School and include "Do not eat lunches in cars or on the streets", be good ambassadors to your school, "the main entrance is reserved for staff and guests. Students will NOT enter and leave the building by this entrance."

A former English teacher at Lawrence Park Collegiate, Mr. Bush has a reputation for Victorian authority. "If you can't answer me in six words or less don't bother answering," he used to tell his former English students. He insists students stand at attention when speaking to him. They must address him Sir.

It isn't just students who are dissatisfied with Bush and the authoritarian nature of the school. Some of the teachers are dissatisfied as well. When Bush became principal, 16 teachers — including the heads of the science, mathematics, physical education and English departments — left the school.

Only 30 of the 58 teachers of the staff in 1966, when Bush became principal, are still teaching at the school.

Most student complaints are not with their teachers, but the administration. "All my teachers are pretty good," said Edith Pollard, a grade 10 student. But they too are under the thumb of Mr. Bush.

When striking students went to a Board of Education meeting to present their grievances they were forbidden to speak, because, according to the trustees, they had not gone through the proper channels.

Who do the students take their complaints to? Mr. Bush doesn't listen. And to further the problem, they haven't got a student council.

They do have class representatives elected by each class. But meetings are called by the teachers perhaps once a month. The purpose is solely to discuss dances and year books.

When students protested, Bush retaliated. He suspended all striking students until they returned with their parents and a note explaining their absence.

"Now people will know what you really are, when they see this all blown up in the paper," Bush told his students. "They'll think you're trash," he said.

CASTLE

"Education is Ontario's fastest growing industry" — Hall-Dennis Report.

The Board of Education apparently has the solution to the problem facing kids from low income brackets. Place the kids in the two, three and four year courses offered at Castle Frank — a model school and try to find them jobs when they have completed their program.

But Frederick Sneyd, Head of the school's guidance program, says it is impossible to find all students jobs. No more than 50 per cent of Castle Frank's graduates find work in their field of study, Sneyd claims.

"Your choice will be important to your future education and occupational plans. Because of the importance to your future and the next years of education, it is extremely important to consider your own abilities, interests and achievements." — a Toronto Board of Education booklet given to all grade eight students.

Many students going into Castle Frank haven't been placed into the courses they requested. One student now in a dry cleaning course asked for hairdressing as first choice and food preparation as second.

They are not the only ones. In interviewing, many kids showed the same dissatisfaction with the manner in which their programs were decided for them.

"In the first year you spend time sampling the work in many different shops. As you work in each area you can observe your feelings toward the work and toward the people you work with. This helps you choose one or two shops which you will continue in your second year.

Ludwig in residence

By LARRY HAIVEN

Jack Ludwig works in a cozy room with a fireplace in Massey College and he doesn't give straight answers.

"Lean to the left. Lean to the right. Stand up. Sit down. Fight, fight, fight!"

The sound of cheerleaders from the back campus drifted over the walls of Massey College. Ludwig turned and guffawed. "I told the president of this here university when I came here that I think the best university is where education goes on outside the classroom."

Behind him, in the courtyard, where goldfish swim in a heated pool all year round, two fellows of the college were parading in their scarlet academic gowns. Ludwig grimaced.

He was wearing a bulky turtle neck sweater and flannel pants. His face is a harsh one that bears a look of concentration always, perhaps because the hair is greying.

He's worried about old age, but not his own. "Some of the oldest people I know are high school and university students . . . the ones that have let their minds get slack."

Ludwig, the new writer-in-residence, has been here only three weeks. He hasn't seen much of the university but he's been to Kensington market nearly every day.

So he didn't talk much about writing. He talked about bags. Not shopping bags, but bags you put people into, and bags that you put yourself into by putting other people into bags. The university puts people into bags.

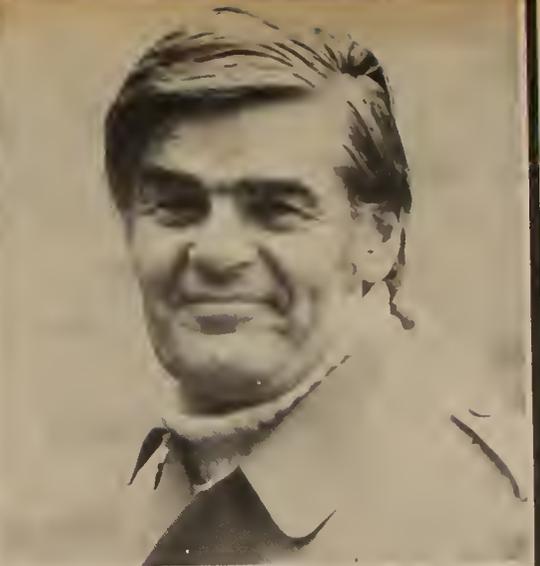

"When you come to university, you should be made to drop all preconceived ideas of the world. It should be a completely new experience, but it's not."

"Yeah, so what do we do to, this may sound trite Mr. Ludwig, sir, to 'blow people's minds?'" asked the eager reporter. But Ludwig wasn't answering — not directly at least.

He stopped walking around the room, sat down on the sofa and filled his fountain pen with zest. Then he turned to the reporter and smiled. It was a warm smile.

He talked about the tendency for people to classify issues as to right and wrong, good and bad, either or. "Doing the either or thing is a sign of old age."

"Yeah, I see what you mean," blurted the reporter. "Then the antithesis or the either or way of looking at things is . . ."

No either ors for Jack Ludwig

"The either-or way of looking at things," Ludwig broke into a grin, then into a laugh. The reporter laughed too. "Hahahahaha . . . hmmm"

Then they were both quiet. "I read your latest book, Above Ground, and I thought it was just great," said the reporter. "I especially liked the fact that your hero had an optimistic outlook on life. Not like all the rest of those 'existential' Kafkaesque heroes."

"Didn't you think that the her in Above Ground was an existential hero?" asked Ludwig, looking out the window.

"Uh, yeah, sort of a Sartrean existentialist hero, one who has come to terms and has committed himself." The reporter searched Ludwig's face for approval. Approval came.

"No, seriously," said Ludwig. "I think it's too late for Kafka's kind of below-ground man. People can't afford to do that any more, the way things are going, in the United States, around the world."

Then he talked about politics. The reporter ventured to suggest there was no basic difference between Johnson and John Kennedy.

"Well, I knew Kennedy, I knew the man and he was miles apart from Johnson," said Ludwig. "He didn't stand for any of the chauvinistic, patriotic crap."

"Once he was in Texas and they offered him one of those ten gallon hats. He didn't even put it on; he just refused."

"Oh".

"Kennedy didn't let Rusk or McNamara touch his foreign policy."

"So where are all those people now?"

"They're still around".

But Ludwig looked a little sad when he talked about the political situation in the U.S.

"I mean, these SDS guys, saying there's no difference between Wallace and Nixon and Humphrey. That's ridiculous. That's your either-or situation."

"So where do you stand politically?"

"I believe in medicare, social welfare, and now that automation is coming, a guaranteed minimum wage. I don't see how you can argue about those things."

"But Marcuse — he's not going to work in a country like the United States, or even in France. It might work in Mexico; I don't know."

And this year, he's writer-in-residence at U of T, where he's open to any student (or non-student, if he has anything to do with it) to discuss writing or anything else. Besides that, he's working on a novel, on a book about automation and doing a film about Einstein's theory of relativity.

On Sunday, he was working on a poem about the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg where the Czar's Cossacks massacred a group of peasants and workers protesting outside in 1905. He stared intently out the window for long moments, methodically coming back to his typewriter, clicking off a flurry of lines.

Ludwig wouldn't give a straight answer when asked how he would treat the work of a fledgling writer.

"Sometimes you might hate the work but you may have to admit it's very good," said Ludwig.

"Oh, come on," said the reporter. If you don't like it, then you should say so and leave it at that!"

"Can you do that?" asked Ludwig, smiling.

Jack Ludwig is not the easiest person to talk to because he trails off at the end of a thought then brings it up again just as you think you ought to say something.

If you go to see him you won't get straight answers, but you'll meet a very, very complex person who worries about people getting old

Russia was torn by war and the composer was living in Geneva, Switzerland when L'Histoire de Soldat was written in 1918. The theme was drawn from a collection of Russian fairy tales: the bitter-sweet atmosphere is common to many Slavic stories. The story is told by a Narrator with a cast comprised of the Soldier, the Devil and the Princess. The instrumentation has a distant resemblance to a Dixieland jazz band.

Shiels returns to soccer lineup

In an effort to bring team play alive, Varsity soccer Blues have coaxed ex-star Graham Shiels out of retirement. Coach Ernie Glass was rather pleased to see that the speedy winger is in fairly good shape and should be available for some action this Saturday.

Shiels, a member of Blues for the past four years, should prove a steady influence to a forward line which has scored only six goals in the four games played so far this season.

The team, gradually recovering from the shock of seeing their winning streak snapped by Guelph, are working hard and should be well prepared to meet Waterloo Warriors at Varsity Stadium this Saturday at noon.

This game will show if Blues are capable of coming back after being on the ropes. If they hope to repeat as OQAA champs, victory is a necessity in each of their seven remaining games. Even a tie could prove disastrous to the Varsity cause.

Coach Glass is thinking of several lineup changes for Saturday's game.

KORNER KICKS . . . The defence which played poorly last week have worked especially hard during practices. So far their efforts have been successful . . . Austris Liepa, a super-star with Blues for the past four years, was shocked at the 4-3 loss to Guelph, he almost enrolled in graduate school.

INTERFACULTY ROUNDUP

INTERFACULTY SPORTS
By GELLIUS

Now it can be told. All that excitement and hoopla ("that hoop"; cf. Fr. hoopci — "this hoop") around centre campus yesterday was due to the opening of Interfaculty Football's Diamond Jubilee season. (I thought diamonds were baseball.) Vic, by the way, has won the Mulock Cup 27 times in the last 75 years, including the last ten years. UC, by contrast, has won seven times, the last time in 1944 and the last time before that in 1911. So UC and Sir Robert Borden are even from 1911 on. Scarborough joints the league this year.

SOCCER

Wong and Davey scored as Jr. Eng. edged Knox, 2-1. Kabush (no relation to the Burning Kabush who addressed Moses) scored for Knox.

Werneburg's goal gave UC a 1-0 victory over Meds.

SMC B beat Meds B, 2-1. Agueci and Vivona hit for the winners (elegant variation for SMC B). Omole (a character in the Irish version of "The Wind in the Willows") scored for Meds B.

Galati, Newhol, Sardone and the Seery yellow leaf led Scar past For, 4-0.

Innis got goals from Murik (2), D'Ornellas (2) and Glicksohn to defeat New Gnus 5-0. (The gnu is a small South African antelope related to the Iliupersis.)

POLITICS

Al Parrish of Trin defeated Andy Wernick to win election as the Intramural Sports Committee's representative to the Athletic Directorate.

Once more Dave Breech (Varsity water poloist) was elected as chairman of the ISC. Bob Kram of Law is Vice-Chairman.

VARSITY AND HHH IN '68?

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

For a lot of people, the SIFL season effectively came to a close last Saturday when Queen's whupped our Blues 35-0.

Due to the College Bowl, there is no play-off in the league this year, so that Blues, to stay alive, must beat Gaels by 36 points in their Kingston confrontation come November 9. The only other possibility is a shocking upset over Queen's by such powerhouses as McMaster, Waterloo or McGill.

Objectively, Blues would appear to have as much chance of repeating as Yates Cup winners as Hubert "Drugstore Liberal" Humphrey has against tricky Dicky Nixon.

But didn't Harry "down on the farm" Truman win in '48? Maybe Blues and Humphrey will romp home together in the cool November climes and stun the world. Don't bet against it. (Well, you can bet against Humphrey.)

Varsity head coach Ron Murphy and his players are quite notable absentees from the swelling ranks of campus pedlars of pessimism.

"We'll be ready for them, said one player, "and they'd better be ready for us."

"Anything can happen in a football game," adds quarterback Vic Alboini. "Who'd have thought Queen's would win 35-0 on Saturday?"

However, in the meantime, Blues have four games on their schedule before meeting the Golden Gaels. The first of these is Saturday's game in Waterloo against one of the league newcomers, Waterloo Warriors.

Last week, Warriors gave Western Mustangs a ruff, tuff battle before succumbing 31-27.

As might be expected, Blues are working diligently in practice this week to overcome the painful inadequacies that showed against Queen's.

The big handicap under which Blues' offensive attack has been labouring, of course, is the complete lack of threat through the air. Alboini, who showed remarkable passing ability last year before being injured, has been consistently off the mark this year, completing only six passes in two games.

"I don't know what the trouble is," reflected the genial quarterback yesterday. "Sure, Queen's put on a big rush, but even when I had time I was missing badly. Murph's added some new plays which are going to help a lot by varying the functions of the hackfielders. There'll be more receivers to throw to. We've got lots of potential; it's just a matter of putting it together."

Alboini's right. Blues do have the potential. With Arnie Carefoote, Bill Bennett and Paul McKay back in the line-up for this week's game, it could be ready to pop. Watch out Waterloo.

BLUENOTES . . . Stories that all-star defensive end, Alex Topps, broke his leg against Queen's proved a bit premature. X-rays showed no break, 'merely' a bad leg bruise, but he'll still miss at least one game . . . Rookie lineman Bart D'Onofrio has impressed both teammates and coach with his hard-hitting, aggressive play.

BLUES ALIVE AND WELL

By PHIL BINGLEY

For those faithful Varsity Sports' readers who have been either in a coma or temporarily blind and deaf, for the past four days, Saturday was one of the blackest days in University of Toronto sporting history.

Not only did our beloved football team fall 35-0 to Queens' Golden Gaels but Varsity soccer Blues saw a four-year unbeaten streak go down the drain when they dropped a 4-3 decision to Guelph Gryphons.

Since then, Toronto fans around campus have offered post mortems, criticism and excuses as they shake their heads and tell each other that the football season is over and the soccer team is crumbling.

Well sports' fans everywhere, I for one beg to differ. At the risk of sounding a little more insane than usual, I tell you that the football situation is far from decided and the soccer team will rise again to glorious heights.

Intercollegiate sports is second in unpredictability only to a halt in the United States bombing of Vietnam. Already the Senior Intercollegiate Football League forecasts of almost every member of the fourth estate have disintegrated into hilarious errors. And, all the "I told you so" pseudo pigskin experts around the league have disappeared.

The point here is that Blues are not dead. In fact, they are alive and kicking, running, passing, blocking, tackling etc., every night inside the stadium. And, if you find that hard to believe, just watch what happens on Saturday afternoons for the next five weeks.

Blues still have two distinct chances to retain the Yates Cup and a possible berth in the Canadian College Bowl. If another team in the league can beat or tie Queens', or if our boys can rally to crush the tricolor by more than five converted touchdowns, the coveted silverware will remain in the trophy cases of Hart House.

Head coach Ron Murphy, an individual never known for his pessimism, is far from calling it a season at this point. "Sure, it will be tough to beat them (Gaels) by thirty-six points," said Murph. "but we still have the potential to do it. We plan to make several changes and certainly we will have to work on all aspects of our passing attack. Don't count this team out yet. We'll come back."

As for the soccer team, one setback does not equal a losing season. Coach Ernie Glass has far too much talent available to push the panic button now.

And so, friends and sportsies, don't be surprised if these two teams win the rest of their games this year. Just remember who you heard it from first.

BAD ACTORS EVERYWHERE

First it was student apathy, then student power and now student immaturity.

A number of Queens' types who attended the game here on Saturday became standing members of the third category as a result of their idiotic post-game behaviour.

Not content with disturbing the peace late Saturday and early Sunday, these apes ripped phones off the wall, smashed television sets, ripped carpets and generally demolished the hotel at which they were staying.

In return, the manager of the hotel has promised to keep his doors permanently barred to all Kingston U. students in the future.

To be fair and honest to these individuals, it should be pointed out that quite a few Varsity inmates were also guilty of babylike behaviour. Hundreds of liquor bottles, most of them from the Toronto student section, were hurled toward the playing surface throughout the game. Toilet paper and confetti are all part of college football but bottle throwing is part only of ignorance and irresponsibility. Fortunately, only one person is known to have been hit (not seriously) by the falling debris.

Hopefully, the next clown to heave a liquor dispenser at a Varsity football contest will be thrown out of the stands along with the rest of the garbage.

NOTES: Varsity basketball Blues under the direction of coach John McManus began workouts Monday at Hart House . . . The Lockey team with Tom Watt at the reins starts practices October 21 at Maple Leaf Gardens.

Vic opens with 5-0 victory

In this day and age of constant flux, few things remain unchanged in the world. However, University of Toronto interfaculty football seems to have resisted the evolution process with the gridiron squad from Victoria College the party most responsible for the stalemate.

Winners of the Mulock Cup for the past ten years in succession, The Scarlet and Gold opened their 1968-69 season with a 5-0 win over the fighting Irish of St. Mike's.

Always ahead of their opponents in organization, conditioning and poise, Vic has almost reduced intramural pigskin activities to an annual battle between the other faculties and colleges for the right to lose to them in the cup final.

In the St. Mike's game, the two teams see-sawed back and forth without being able to move the ball with any consistency. Vic counted all their points in the first half when Peter Marshall kicked one field goal and added a single on another missed attempt. John Glennie also kicked a single to round out the scoring.

In other football action,

Dentistry scored an impressive 27-6 victory over Pharmacy. The dentists who were popping leather for the first time this season, showed no signs of lack of conditioning.

Greg Mason, Gary Jackson, Nels Ravka and Mel Pearson were the big offensive guns for the winners as they each counted single majors.

Ex-Vic player Gary Kushner rounded out the tooth-pullers scoring with three converts in four attempts.

Larry Ura was the whole scoring show for the medicine mixers when he scored his team's only touchdown.

Bossin starts F.U.

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

The project is half-jokingly called the Thomas Hobbes Memorial Free University.

"Because Hobbes is the most unfree person I know," says Bob Bossin, the university's registrar.

Hobbes, a 17th century English philosopher, believed people were basically evil and therefore needed discipline to control them.

The philosophy of the free university is just the opposite.

"University of Toronto is supposed to be a place of learning. Some believe it is on the right track but I don't think so," says Bossin, an Innis College graduate who is now educational consultant to the Students Administrative Council.

So he has started a totally free university — free both financially and structurally.

"It's the poor man's Rochdale," he says.

Students will decide where, when and how often their course groups meet. They will also choose the content of the courses.

"The Free University (often abbreviated to F.U.) is for people who are interested in learning and especially people who are bored by where it's at in the university," Bossin explains.

Stanley Ryerson, historian and author of the new book

Unequal Union, will lead a course called Canadian History — Nationality and Social Structure.

This course is particularly useful, Bossin pointed out, since many students were turned away from the general course in Canadian history at U of T this year 'due to overcrowding.

A course called Peace and War — Problems of Aggression, Stability and Hostility will be led by Carmen Guild, assistant warden of Hart House.

Ron Duksta, an Ontario Hospital psychiatrist with some very different ideas about authoritarianism in the medical profession, will lead a "free medical course."

Prof. H. N. Milne, University College archivist, will lead a group on the history of the University of Toronto.

Jack Ludwig, writer-in-residence at U of T, wants to lead a group on the problems of education.

There will also be a course on the study of films as an art form.

Other resource people include Don McCulloch, psychiatrist, Rosemary Harrop, of the U of T advisory bureau, and Steven Chisine, a young Canadian poet.

Bossin is eager to institute or aid any other courses in which students show an interest.

Quebec students strike

STE. THERESE DE BLAINVILLE, Que. (CUP) — Quebec students have occupied nine junior colleges in a protest over that province's education system.

More than 700 of 11,000 striking students at Lionel Groulx College slept in the building Tuesday night to draw attention to the need for changes in Quebec's educational system.

The junior college students charge they cannot get into universities and they are not being properly trained for the job market.

Last night, students occupied junior colleges in Ste. Foy, Chicoutimi and St. Jerome.

In an emergency session in Montreal last night, the Union Generale des Etudiants de Quebec decided not to call a general strike of all Quebec students.

It will be up to individual colleges and universities in the province to decide what support they will give to the junior college strike.

UGEQ plans a session next Thursday to "evaluate" the situation and plan further action.

At press time, McGill and Sir George Williams University students were holding late-night strategy sessions.

- re-instatement of the $5,000,000 removed from the money available for student scholarships this year.

- abolition of the two per cent increase in the annual interest rate on student loans.

- a complete study of the whole educational system in Quebec

Bissell and Langdon debate role of university

By ANNE BOODY

The university should be a place concerned primarily with the pursuit and expansion of knowledge, President Claude Bissell told students Wednesday.

Bissell and students council president Steve Langdon confronted each other before some 50 students Wednesday on the former site of Tent City.

"Mr. Langdon has called me a classical conservative," Bissell laughed. "I haven't called him anything yet — at least not in public."

He argued that the university, out of necessity, is a servant to society. And research is one way we serve this society, he claimed. But he denied any war research was being done for the U.S. defence department.

The training of professionals at the university is another way we serve society, he said.

Dr. Bissell told students the university tries to maintain a neutral position in society. "Once we identify ourselves with a political party position, there's no turning back. Political ideology would determine every action — the hiring of staff, the selection of students and the choosing of course programs.

Before the role of the university in society can be discussed the context of that society must be looked at, Langdon argued.

He urged students to look at the existence of class divisions in society and the accessibility of education.

"Look at the concentration of capital, the extent of U.S. control in our society, the 10 per cent rate of unemployment in the Maritimes. Look at the statistics of our economy.

"In Canada, over 20 per cent of the population is under the poverty line. This is the kind of society we're creating," Langdon claimed. "What role can the university play?" he asked.

It should be a place for freedom and tolerance, a place of academic freedom for faculty and students, Langdon said. "There should be a free interplay of ideas.

"The kind of university Dr. Bissell talks about is not a neutral university. He is representing the position of a liberal.

"Right now the knowledge of the university is being used to keep society active," Langdon stated.

But it must integrate the needs and desires of the community around it, he emphasized.

"Instead of changing the university why not cop-out and form our own institutions like Rochdale?" one student in the audience asked.

"I sympathize with you," Dr. Bissell answered. "But it would have been difficult even to have Rochdale if it hadn't been for a letter from me saying Rochdale was a good idea," he said.

"Don't leave the university," Langdon urged students. "Make use of the good facilities here. People will continue to enrol in the universities despite Rochdale. We must change from within."

Langdon shivers while Bissell smiles

CORDIALLY INVITED

- Problems stimulate me.
- Problems upset me.

If you want to earn a living in a field that constantly offers new and exciting perspectives—new problems to solve—consider the work of the Chartered Accountant.

The CA has to grasp the essentials of many different fields, and have the independence to form objective opinions about them.

He's more in demand than ever before, by corporations, non-profit agencies, government bodies at all levels.

Why? Because the increasing complexity of business requires new concepts of fact-gathering, problem-solving, and communication of economic information.

The CA, for example, is one of the leaders in planning new ways to use computer systems.

He might also be called upon to weigh the relative merits of social programs in terms of available resources, helping to shape an urban renewal program.

So if problems intrigue you, and if you have aptitude for concentrated, meticulous, creative thinking, you might make a good CA—in a public accounting firm, in industry, education or government. At some point, you might even decide to form a firm of your own.

Experience has proven that graduates of all faculties become successful Chartered Accountants. For more information see your placement office, a local CA, or contact—

Students revise Allen Report

Students Wednesday won equal representation with faculty on a committee that will be instrumental in revising Dean A. D. Allen's proposals on the Macpherson Report before they are brought before the arts and science faculty council Oct. 28.

The 25 student representatives will be elected at general meetings next week. Members will be chosen on a departmental basis, but departments with small enrolments have been combined to provide more proportionate representation.

To represent General Arts and Science students two "members at large" will be elected on the St. George Campus, and one each from Erindale and Scarborough.

At its third open meeting in Convocation Hall, the Council unanimously agreed Dean Allen revise his proposals in the light of:

- submissions from the departments that he is to receive by Oct. 15;
- discussions that have taken place in the council;

- written submissions from staff and students received by October 15;

- recommendations of the staff-student committee.

Student members of the council supported the resolution as an "acceptable first step" and a "reasonable compromise."

The council at the same time rescinded its decision of last Friday to seat one hundred more students on the Council.

Bob Rae (III UC) spoke in favour of the withdrawal, urging concerned students "only become involved in a way in which equality is recognized."

The principle of equal representation on the Dean's committee had the full support of Prof. C. B. Macpherson.

"Rather than confront one another, students and staff have a great deal to learn from each other," he said.

"Since it cannot be demonstrated that one has more to learn from the other, it seems to me the only reasonable basis of representation is equal representation."

SAC, students support Strax

Students Administrative Council Wednesday decided to contribute $300 to paying the immediate hills of University of New Brunswick Professor Norman Strax.

Strax, suspended three weeks ago for his part in organizing a protest against UNB library identification cards, is obeying a court injunction to stay off campus while about 40 supporters continue to sit-in at his office.

Prof. C. B. Macpherson told The Varsity last night that the Canadian Association of Teaching staff has issued a statement "regretting that the University of New Brunswick authorities have not so far employed the proper procedures in dealing with this case."

Bissell votes for student power?

By AGI LUKACS and JOHN O'GRADY

President Claude Bissell supported student power last night—but it may have been tokenism.

He sat and voted with the "nos" at a Hart House debate which, by a vote of 116 to 111, defeated a motion saying "student power works against the best interests of the university community".

"I am a well-known undercover man for student power," he explained.

Dr. Bissell said he favored student participation in decision-making that was based on "both interest and competence."

In academic matters only student interest was equal, he added.

He said he saw student power as "a struggle for identity", but condemned tendencies to become "pressure groups" making "irresponsible demands."

SAC president Steve Langdon, one of the four debaters, described student power as "the drive to decentralize and change the structure of this university." He added the movement was "anti-power" and "attacks concentrations of authority".

Ars Nova on for Homecoming

The Ars Nova rock group will definitely appear at the October 20 Homecoming concert, Abe Mudrik, Blue and White president, announced yesterday.

The group had cancelled their U of T engagement last Monday when threatened with cancellation by John Brower, owner of the Rock Pile.

Ars Nova was to appear on Friday and Saturday night at the Rock Pile at prices considerably higher than those the Blue & White was charging for Sunday night.

Yesterday, Mudrik and the Ars Nova agents agreed to let the Rock Pile have the group for both nights for $1500, and the Rock Pile agreed to lower its prices to $2.00 per ticket.

Tickets at the U of T concert are $1.50 advance sale.

"Mudrik and I are both annoyed at the Ars Nova agency for having put us in this position," said Brower last night. "We will get together on other engagements after this."

But Mudrik says his private agency told him that "it was Brower who created this situation in the first place."

"This is the first time a college has made a professional withdraw this type of threat," he added. "Most people would have been forced to accept the cancellation, refund all the tickets, and find another group to fill the time slot."

Macpherson Report: the problem

It's time to get rid of year divisions in a course, and it's time to get rid of a compulsory number of courses in each year.

This reform isn't brought out in the Macpherson Report, and yet it is necessary if we're going to take the Macpherson Report seriously.

Students are discovering that Macpherson-type courses are tough. A lot are trying to get out of these courses because there's "too much work". And they are right.

Macpherson courses require interest in the subject, and they go a long way to freeing the student from course structures to follow his interest.

But what happens if you aren't interested in the course? Or your other four courses when you like the fifth?

Why be prevented from taking a course you think you'd like because it's in another year? Yeah, yeah, we know. You need the background to understand the course.

So we put the cart before the horse, requiring a dullening apprenticeship in hopes that eventually you'll get to something interesting. Sometimes it's too late when you get there.

the solution

Unless the year-course system is destroyed, the Macpherson Report won't work. We'd be better off under the present system. In fact, students are happy under the present system.

Trinity SAC rep Don Ross got a big hand a while ago when he said the average student isn't apathetic, just contented with his education.

Why destroy a good thing? In fact, why not make it even better? Therefore, instead of the Macpherson Report, why not institute the Average Students' Report? It would provide that.

- 1) A professor would give only lectures, not time-wasting tutorials or discussion groups;
- 2) Assigned reading in any course would not exceed 1,500 pages in any course except in special cases. Then the reading must not exceed 2,000 pages;
- 3) Essays and term work would be eliminated in favor of a comprehensive final examination;

"MacRae, why are you always cutting up the average student? You just make him feel uncomfortable."

criticizing today's editorial

4) The final examination would be based entirely on the lectures and reading, with not less than 50 percent given to lectures.

The advantages of this Report are obvious.

The average student could get his degree with a minimum of fuss and bother, even easier and more efficiently than he does now.

The student who is interested in learning would not have to spend much time on courses he didn't want to take, and could spend the vast majority of his time following his own interests.

A class could get one student to take the notes for all, and another to précis the required books. A few days of memorization before the exams, three hours of regurgitation to make sure you know what the professor wanted you to know, and that's your year.

This would be a boon for professors. No more time spent in fruitless discussion with disinterested students. Just one or three crisp, short lectures a week, and marking the final.

That would leave a lot of his time free for teaching students (also with more free time) who are really interested in his subject.

clarification

We are anxious to clarify our reasons for rescinding our own motion that 100 students be co-opted into the Council of the Faculty of Art and Sciences, since we have encountered some misunderstanding on this point.

First, we do not see the Dean's Advisory Committee as superseding our motion. It was on the contrary on the understanding that it would be formed that our proposal was premised.

Second, we did not suggest that we were offering a definitively acceptable form of student participation; only that for the present purposes it would be an important and effective step in the right direction. We have not changed our mind. But in some quarters it was received as a manifestation of "Tokenism". We reject this interpretation. So do those among the faculty who are opposed to the spirit of the Dean's report, and who were as unconcerned by the presence of 16 students on Council as they were incensed by our proposal.

However, we were unable to persuade members of the SAC Executive of its desirability. Others have since complained that this opposition may not have been representative. But as far as anyone could judge (particularly one looking for a pretext to oppose the motion) the official voice of the students had declared itself against it. This would have made the defeat of the motion certain, while strong and vocal student support might have had the opposite effect.

Under these circumstances it seemed inappropriate to press for effective student power on this issue. The opportunity to do so will arise anyway, and the present urgent concern of all is the implementation of curriculum reform. Hence we are willing to accept the compromise, even though the experiment might have provided a useful and instructive precedent. (Indeed, The Varsity, which opposed it, has now hailed the Engineers for "joining" them in the "struggle for members on the Faculty Council").

In a wider perspective, one more point needs to be made. There is no general opposition between staff and student interests. We hope that as this becomes increasingly clear, the propaganda media may reflect some more realistic alignments within the University.

visual impact

Sir:

Although, I'm not sure how effective the Faculty Council can be with such an unwieldy size, it is imperative now for students to express their desire for fair representation on and to this body. Our initial goal should be to present a visual impact, through sheer numbers (hopefully spilling of necessity onto the lower floor). By not carrying this through effectively, we are giving a mandate for maintenance of the present power structure.

I would point out the spirit of Prof. Tony Doob (Psych), who cancels lectures coinciding with Faculty Council meetings, urging his students to show their numbers in full force.

Leon Major, returns to his Alma Mater to direct the debut of professional theatre at Hart House, choosing Middleton and Rowley's "The Changeling" and Goldoni's "The Fan". Larry Haiven's profile of Major on R-2 begins a new Review department which will focus on persons of interest.

focus: leon major

"All right, ready for the next scene! Here it comes! Crash, aaaaargh! Kachoong kachoong ding dong ding dong ... Mmmmmmmmmnnnn ... BOOM!"

When Leon Major directs a play, he's Gerald McBoingBoing, a one-man orchestra of sounds. He's also Rubberman, Captain Marvel and Tom Terrific.

He'll bound up to the stage and start mimicking one of the actors, playing the part himself and flitting around the action like a ghost. Then he'll jump off and run up into the orchestra, pile himself into a seat and chuckle with mirth at something an actor has done well.

You can't help thinking of a kid directing a school pageant, such is the vigour and unbounded joy he exhibits.

But he's thoroughly professional and he smokes a cigar and has an ulcer.

"He directs as if he were conducting an orchestra," says Jack Medley, a professional actor, in the two Hart House productions.

"He's especially good at finding the rhythm in the text," comments Ron Hastings, another professional. "And he'll never ask an actor to do something physically that he couldn't do himself.

Once he tried to jump over a chair and strained himself pretty badly. So he decided that maybe it wasn't such a good idea to do that."

For the opening scene of "The Fan", by Goldoni, one of the two plays in repertory, Major stood at the edge of the stage, his feet together as if he were going to do a back flip. He waved his hands in great flourishes, pointing to the entrances.

"Shmm, bang! Go! Carnato, with the wine. Timmoteo-sweep, sweep, sweep. Now Cavetzo moves away. Carnato goes hahahahahaha. Right," Major claps his hands. "Enter Giannina!" Major rolls the r's off his tongue, sounding like Toscanini.

Sculptor, conductor, dancer, actor, director and human whirlwind, Leon Major is probably the best person in Canada to take over the artistic direction of the U of T Drama Centre.

The Centre is committed to presenting plays that would otherwise not be shown off-campus, plays like Middleton and Rowley's "The Changing" and Goldoni's "The Fan", which they are doing this year with a professional company including Francis Hyland, William Needles, and Rex Southgate.

When Major talks to you, alone, he looks right into your eyes. Sometimes, he jumps up, comes over to you and faces you to make a point. He's always smoking his cigar and sometimes he says "sgwllmmmmphgh", before he takes it out of his mouth when he gets excited about something.

"Putting on student productions at terrific costs like they've done in past years was a big mistake," says Major. "It took student actors and ruined them. There was too much pressure on the amateurs to do professional work which they just couldn't do. So the audience was cheated and the actors were cheated.

"What I'm trying to do now is set up a professional company that would become, hopefully, something like the APA. It would play for three months at the university and then go on tour, if the productions were successful.

"At the same time, we'll be doing ten shows in the church on Glen Morris St. with students only. I'm going to direct one myself. It's going to be an experiment. You know, I believe that students can teach me a lot. We may even come up with a 'whole new concept' of theatre. Or maybe not but it doesn't matter. Because working there will be just as exciting as working with the professionals perhaps more so."

Major leaned back in his chair in the office backstage at Hart House. "This may sound corny, but the theatre is my whole life." In his case, it's probably true. At one point, six years ago, as the curtain went down on two of his productions at Vancouver and Stratford, he was in Toronto beginning work on two operas and going to a C.B.C. studio the next day to adapt an opera for television.

"If they can afford to hire me, I want to be able to direct a play that I can present to an audience professionally and not waste talent and money. And when I work with students, I want to be able to try out completely new things without having to kill myself only to have it fail. In the studio, if it fails, we learn something."

But Major doesn't believe that the university is the place to train actors. "I think that an actor should go to university to learn about his society, to become a better person, but not to learn to act. That you learn by acting."

Major believes that the theatre of social comment comes second to theatre as entertainment. "Part of the pleasure of coming to the theatre is watching actors perform. Watching somebody die beautifully is a valid reason for coming to the theatre.

Just seeing the breath control of a guy like Bill Needles is a pleasure in itself."

Discipline is very important to Major. Without it, you're cheating the audience, not giving them the best effort all of the time. "I sat up in the last row in the balcony for Olivier's "The Entertainer," and I cried."

But when you see him work on the stage, he seems to wield no discipline at all. Actors work around him and with him, not because of him.

He lets the actors do their own thing and will not tell an actor he couldn't hear him until the scene is over. Then the actors will have to do the scene all over again. But the repetition isn't souring.

Major does everything but direct the play. When he's on the stage, he's acting out the part with the actor, humming, groaning and giggling with him. And when he's in the orchestra, he's a member of the audience, laughing at the funny scenes. After the scene, he goes off with the actor and says things like, "We can't hear you," or "We can't follow this line of action," using the word 'we' to connote the audience.

Ron Hastings says that Major works so intimately with the actor that by the time he's finished, he can't tell how much of the action is his and how much is the director's. But the actor feels completely free in his role.

star weekly

I wanted to write something because the Star Weekly died this week and I was afraid no-one would notice. The blue boxes are still there on the street corners and still full. The cover design and type-face of the magazines in the boxes are still the same. star weekly is still printed in lower case. Only where the date used to be it now says in small letters "The Canadian Magazine" and where it used to read "Magazine Twenty Cents" you now find the date. And the yellow strip cutting across the lower right hand corner that said "Important news about a NEW MAGAZINE see page 21" is gone and the new magazine is here.

There is a neat symbolism in comparing covers. This week Bobby Hull, smiling, tanned, surrounded by the helping hands that are making him a million dollars merchandising Bobby Hull products. ("Farmers like Bobby Hull use the best — Monova Barbed Wire")

Last week it was another blond, tanned kid, wearing an army fatigue shirt common among the New Left. His nose is bleeding from half way up the bridge, the blood has gone down his face making his lips and teeth all red and leaving purple stains on his shirt. An anonymous helping hand is daubing the wound with a handkerchief.

The people in the background are all looking in the other direction, where evidently the real action is taking place — as Auden said in one of his poems:

About suffering they were never wrong,
The Old Masters: how well they understood
Its human position . . .
In Brueghel's Icarus, for instance: how everything turns away Quite leisurely from the disaster; the ploughman may
Have heard the splash, the forsaken cry,
But for him it was not an important failure.

The star weekly's was not an important failure which is why this model comparison of covers is too neat. Certainly the new star weekly is crap. It is the same crap that I remember seeing thumbing through Weekend Magazine on the living room floor ten years ago, looking for pictures of the Rocket. How Canada Smashed the Germans, How Two Kids Survived in the Wilderness, Canada's Answer to the Grand Ole Opry, Volcanoes: today or ten years ago?

But the star weekly that died October 12 was not roaring hell either. It had its fair share of the timeless hobby, fashion, interesting pastime articles as well as the omnipresent fourteen pages of a thoroughly forgettable mystery novel (condensed). It labelled Phil Givens as one of the bright young men of the new government. In another issue it congratulated the new parliament, including Robert Stanfield, "the ideal man to provide the sort of sober appraisals some of the new government's more daring legislation will need." Daring legislation? And I remember an editorial ending, "It's a marvellous land we live in. And you're not really a Canadian until you've seen it." Not bad sentiments, perhaps, but will they sell magazines?

The answer of course was yes. It sold the star weekly from 1910 until a year ago when Peter Gzowski took over as editor. After that it still sold a few, but more and more nice Parry Sound housewives were cancelling.

They didn't like blood on their covers, or headlines like The churches spurned her plea to let the kids sleep in their basements. One minister feared his congregation might catch VD. Or having their comfortable world view challenged: (from one issue) 'It is a mental convenience . . . the middle-aged back-lash to lump all the dumb, yearning, bewildered and ill young strangers who head for certain parts of town under the vaguely derogatory label of "hippie" . . . Call them "hippies" and you do not have to wonder why they lack your guts. You can avoid thinking about the staggeringly high rate of mental illness, what it's like to be a fifteen-year-old dope addict in a friendless city . . . Call them "hippies" and you know that they aren't really suffering; they are just rich kids who reject their Parents' materialistic values. They do need "a stern talking to" but it is not necessary to enquire what's bugging them because . . . you know at a glance what they are.

So they changed the name to SW, the Magazine for Young Adults, but the young adults didn't buy it, in fact they don't buy magazines at all except Time, Playboy, a few Esquires, Ramparts and Mad. So they changed the name back to the star weekly and this week they changed back the format.

All things considered it was never really a very good magazine. So why lament?

Because, dammit, it did some random, scattered unforeseen beautiful things. It had style: With just 31 1/2 years left to run, the twentieth century has pretty clearly fooled Sir Wilfred Laurier. It isn't going to belong to Canada after all. Well as someone probably said before the twentieth century even began, you can't win them all. And at the end of the same editorial (praising Trudeau): The twentieth century still won't belong to Canada. But, now, hopefully, Canada will belong to the twentieth century.

Style. Margaret Daly, the regular writer who rejuvenated Phil Givens also wrote about getting busted with June Callwood: "This girl has a tiny baby and she has to see that his formula is made before tomorrow morning." June said frantically after having once more been refused the phone.

"She should have thought of that beforehand", the officer said . . .

June was crying softly in the next cell and the matron coldly informed her that she was hysterical.

Sometimes the star weekly told it like it was. It found Ralph Cowan's "Golden Moment of Consolation: He said he had built up a pheasantry of 4,000 birds on the Christian Islands near Penetanguishene where he has a winter home. "I intend to go there and hunt them, I have only killed three in all these years but I am now going to enjoy myself."

And it gave us Harry Bruce.

We bought the cottage a couple of summers ago, and there was the hot day when the old man and the old woman came out here for the last time . . . The old man, who was correct in everything I saw him do, wanted to make sure I knew about all the tools, and the storm shutters, and the fact that occasionally it was a good idea to spread a bit of tarpaper on the roof. The old woman . . . sat outside, where it was not so hot and you could hear the lake flopping on the shore, and she drank some tea from a cup she had used how many times before? Perhaps a thousand. The flies hothered her and she looked as though she might cry. He walked for a while near the water, then they hoped we would be as happy there as they had been, and they left, and we all went swimming.

How many writers can roll the stuff out like that? Bruce also wrote about the garbage strike: *It piled up at the rate of several thousand tons a day, garbage-bag sales boomed, and the strike had been under way only four days when the local CBC news came up with the charming calculation that there was already enough garbage lying around to fill both towers of the city hall to a height of six floors. Good plan, that. And he wrote about Chicago last week: *Already, even the people who still believe that the bulk of the police clubbing was unjustified by the demonstrator's taunts, even these are using a comfortable new euphemism to describe what the police did. They call it "overreaction". It hurts to be the victim of police overreaction. It splits open your head and makes you cry.

That was the last issue, the one with the bloody-nosed kid on the cover. It was one of the four or five I bought. I read a few more. No, it wasn't an important failure: a Canadian mainstream magazine that tried on occasion to tell it like it was.

Boo! to whatever facts of life ended it. Hooray for Peter Gzowski who tried harder, may angels help him find a new job, and Hurray for Harry Bruce. May angels help him as he tries to protect his long marvellous sentences from the editorial desk at the Daily Star.

strange things done in the swedish sun

'491' is a Swedish freight-train that bears down on you with an inevitable load of violence, menace and perversion, delivered by juvenile delinquents, social workers, and a charitable tart.

A group of juvenile delinquents are ensconced with a social worker, Krister, in a ramshackle building, as a pilot (rehabilitation) project. The idea is for Krister to work with the boys by being one of them, but he finds he can't begin to approach them. His desire is sincere enough; performance alone is lacking.

He wants to be involved, but he also wants to keep part of himself back, reserved and private, somewhat in the manner of a lifeline which would sustain him, should the work fail. And, since he will not give of himself fully, the work must fail. Living a schizophrenic life — the public one full of hollow wishes and formless platitudes, and the private expressing what he denies publicly — he cannot take a stand, cannot forbid the boys anything.

One of the boys, the dark, taciturn Nisse, is angered by the artificiality, the duplicity of Krister and his superintendent; he seeks vengeance.

One day, Nisse discovers Krister's locked room, and understands the meaning of what he finds there: fine volumes, furniture, a grand piano — all locked away from the boys, Krister's buddies!

Krister needs to be taught about himself, Nisse decides, and prepares to administer a savage lesson.

Nisse gradually pilfers the books, selling them second-hand, while the hopeless Krister watches, unable to stop him. But petty thefts constitute small atonement, insufficient to satisfy Nisse. He finds his vehicle for destruction in the plump tart which the boys bring home after a night's foraging.

When vengeance descends on Krister, all are ranged against him but one, the youngest boy. It is through the blood of this lamb that atonement is bought — Nisse's goal achieved, Krister faced with himself.

Lief Nyimark, as Nisse with jutting jaw and bulging eyes, delivers a fine cool-guy performance, without relying on the stock exhalation-of-smoke or tight, clipped speech routine. He is a thick-lipped, menacing presence, yet one for which we can find sympathy because he is, in his own demented way, seeking to right an imbalance, and in grotesque fashion, administer justice. He is honest — for what that may count — in the ethic he lays down for himself, inexorable and unforgiving in the manner of the Old Testament.

'491' was directed by Vilgot Sjöman, whose later work, 'I am Curious', has been widely banned. The version of '491' playing in Toronto has been cut, though enough has been left that we may pose such questions as, if a blonde and a German shepherd are mutually attracted, can they achieve anything but a passing physical relationship? The film also contributes to my stock of one-liners, the little tart remarking after a long day's night in the throes of ecstasy "... it feels like it's made of glass".

See '491' unless you have a delicate, perishable mind. It's at the International Cinema.

a boilerhouse is not a home

After a year's absence from the Toronto theatre scene, Belmont Theatre Productions has opened a new season at the Central Library Theatre with Henry Living's Eh?, a bizarre fantasy about one man's confrontation with the age of automation. First produced in London in 1964, it enjoyed a very successful Broadway run as a showcase for Dustin Hoffman in his undergraduate days.

The plot is simple enough. For twenty-three hours and fifty-five minutes every day, the huge, benevolent boiler beneath an anonymous British dyeworks runs all by itself, providing heat, and chugging innocently in a corner of the stage. But every night at five minutes to twelve, Valentine Brose, a pale, pathetic young man, has the onerous task of activating the boiler — by pushing one button. That's all: check and oil the gauges, and push one button.

The chaos created in Brose's five minutes of "work" is enough to set in action all the major characters for the rest of the play. The plot receives its major complication when Valentine decides to make a home for his bride Betty, a slightly less than intelligent red-head — in the boilerhouse.

Man's inability to master the machine provides most of the laughs in the play. But it is man's inability to understand himself and those around him which provides the true stuff for the drama. There is the bald, moustached foreman Price whose only job is to see that the machines work, not the people. There is the rather ineffectual Reverend Mort who is able to establish no relationship with his congregation, and so he seeks recognition as the head of the local anti-smoke committee. The plight of the frustrated, middle-aged Mrs. Murray is even sadder. She is the personnel director, capable of spouting psychological jargon, but incapable of understanding real people.

Played, in theatrical terms, for all its worth Eh? would make a quite hilarious farce. All the makings are there. We have the buxomy-scatterbrain, and an impotent reverend who does little ballets for himself when no one is watching. And then there is the set, perhaps the most amusing of all, with big-brother type voices calling from the ceiling, musical doors, and a near human boiler which seems almost to smile at the audience at times, and then chug, burp, fart and explode all over the stage.

Unfortunately, I missed the laughs. I wanted to laugh very much, but instead the production left me feeling quite foolish as I tried to figure out what it was all about. Director Brian Meeson's interpretation places stress on the intricacies of Valentine's fantastic mind, on a wild, extended dream sequence near the end, Valentine's giant mushrooms and a mad ritualistic ending in which Valentine gains his final triumph, by "shattering" both machine and men. Meeson has transformed what is billed as "a wild comedy" into a bizzare, powerful and perhaps ultimately more rewarding experience.

David Hemblen of PLS fame, in the role of Valentine is not Dustin Hoffman. And it is much to his credit that never at any time does he try to be. He gives a polished, intense performance. But he comes across as too energetic and too confident to inspire the pathos of Valentine Brose. He thus sacrifices many of the funniest lines in the entire play and is at times hard to believe. But with a demonic twinkle in his eye he shows moments of brilliance when the fierce, imaginative side of his character comes to the fore.

Lyn Wright as Valentine's Betty is not only very human and funny but pleasantly decorous even when she says nothing. Kenneth Dight gives a strong performance as the Reverend Mort, and provides the play with moments of real hilarity both as ballet dancer and as pugilist.

Henry Living's Eh? is a satire on man and automation which is sure to entertain. When you go to see Belmont Theatre's production plan to be amused, but also plan to be challenged and perplexed.

ROLAND KIRK

"All the myths I had to go through about being black and blind . . . they think you're going to have to fall or be on dope or you're going to bug them, and you have to go through a lot of jokes . . ."

The crowd sits there in hushed anticipation, staring at Roland Kirk. Dressed in a yellow jumpsuit, with a whistle, a siren, a watch, and a nose flute (which resembles a powder horn) hanging around his neck, Kirk looks like a cross between space explorer and frontiersman. In a sense he is both of these, as his astonishing music reveals.

"I began to take an interest in music when I was about two years old. My family liked music and I found that they didn't separate music . . . so I wasn't hung up worrying about what it was, how long as it was good music."

sound reaches a shattering level and he is swooping and soaring fiercely all over his horn with fantastic virtuosity, exploring every possibility of tonal combinations, making music like you've never heard before.

"I know I'm a good musician and I can play any type of music if you just give me a chance. But if I say I'm a progressive jazz musician then I'd have to play on just that one level. I have nothing against the word 'Jazz'. Jazz is something America doesn't recognize but it's the only thing they have. But I still don't want to be put in

Roland Kirk was born in Columbus, Ohio in the mid-thirties ("I don't keep track of dates"). He began his professional career by playing his tenor sax at dances around Columbus and on the road with a rhythm and blues band. It was quite some time before he finally made the big move to New York. But finally, playing with Charles Mingus for a few months in 1961, Kirk began to attract attention. However, some critics put him down for what they thought was mere gimmickry, failing to realize that Kirk's multi-horn technique was an honest and musical Picking up his clarinet, Kirk plays, with a very acrid tone, There's No Business Like Show Business.

After dancing around and having to be restrained, the old lady is finally led out of the club. "You better be careful out there," warns Kirk, "cause I'm driving my car tonight. Blind drivers don't have to pay any insurance."

"Moving to Europe isn't the answer. My roots are in America. As much as I play music and as much as I got to present, ain't nobody got a right to tell me I don't belong in my own country."

imagination. He plays double and triple stops (which he used to practise all the time when he was 17) and makes other tones that you're not supposed to be able to do on the tenor sax.

Finally, when everyone is breathless from the tension, Kirk fades into his own conception of We Three Kings, announcing the theme simultaneously on tenor sax, manzello, and stritch (a long, huge, straight instrument.)

The sound is rich, the harmonies ingenious. Soling on manzello, Kirk quotes from Coltrane's A Love Supreme, and then goes "out" playing Roland Kirk is an amazing musician. Dedicated, serious about his music, he is always exploring new musical territory, and refuses to allow anyone else's preconceptions to set limits on his search. Whether or not you dig what he does, you can't remain unmoved by the extraordinary force of his music, which encompasses all the sounds he has heard and all the experiences he has gone through.

"Music is just music and words are just words. People want to put you in a bag so they know how to associate you. Which is all right, I

Kirk begins to blow gently into his tenor saxophone, playing an old popular song from the '30's. After stating the melody, he starts to improvise, his tone becoming louder and more vehement. His lines become longer and more complicated. For choruses after chorus he builds in intensity until finally his that one category, to have that one tag on me."

Kirk segues into the next piece, establishing a stomping beat and a driving rock rhythm. Out of his large collection of instruments, he selects a manzello, a medium-length slightly curved horn which he found (along with the strich) by rummaging in antique stores and pawn shops. He plays manzello and tenor sax at the same time to produce a fascinating unique sound.
"I had a dream that I was playing with more than one horn and so I tried to interpret the sound I heard in my dream. I love Lester Young and Chu Berry and all those guys; still, I have my own voice. When I talk to my son, I like him to know that it's me."

attempt to create the sounds he heard in his mind."
For the last few years, Kirk has been working steadily on the club circuit.
"I hate to keep saying it, but that's where they tend to put black musicians. I enjoy playing everywhere, but I think we should be able to play anywhere that anyone else plays. Like in other countries... we play the same place as the symphony."
"You can play concerts in America if you want to go through a whole lot of other changes — laugh and grin and singing Mack the Knife all night long... I still say it's a drag Louis Armstrong had to go through all that — look at how much trumpet he plays."
"Or maybe if I get to be 60 years old and my thing gets recognized by a few people — then I'll be able to do it."
"Some people are making concerts but it still isn't like it should be. They could give me 10 concerts in a row, but that still isn't going to make up for 13 years of sleeping in flea-bitten hotels and going through them changes... people calling me "boy".
Kirk does a very moving ballad, My Ship, humming along and whistling while playing flute, making strange and wonderful sounds. As he is going into the next piece, a little old white-haired lady croaks "Take it away, boy."
"I wouldn't allow anyone but you to say that," retorts Kirk. "My mother brought me up to respect people like you."
Unperturbed, the septuagenarian approaches the bandstand. Kirk kisses her hand to show that he isn't putting her down.

"Even though I don't dig some of the things they do in America, it still isn't the answer for me to leave my country. There are people there who dig me so why should I desert them because of a bunch of fools? Once you get to Europe and stay there for a while, you're just another exile from America."
After a break which he needed "to smoke some hash (is there a doctor and a policeman in the house? — 'cause then I could do it in front of them and everything would be legal," Kirk announced) the musicians returned to the stand.
Some one mentioned that one of the Toronto Argonauts was in the audience.
"Crazy," said Kirk into the microphone. "I used to play football. I'm blind, you know, so I'm going to bump into things anyway, so I might as well bump into the biggest thing. I used to grab that ball and just run like a crazy man all down the field, knocking everyone down, and people would say: is that man crazy?"
"But my favourite sport was rasslin'. We used to have these big rasslin' bouts. I used to fight these white marshmallow people. So here's the scene: in this corner, the white marshmallow from Mississippi. So rasslin' with this kind of person is like fighting with the tar baby, you know? So I just turned all the lights out and knocked him down and stomped on him. The moral of this story is: don't rattle with blind people in their own homes."

With his tenor sax, Roland Kirk blazes through one of his own tunes, in which he interpolates Have You Met Miss Jones, Desifinado, and a few other standards. At the end of the piece, he embarks on a coda which takes him through some more tunes. Sustaining the solo expedition, he reaches way beyond the range of the instrument, discovering the sounds he hears in his don't put none of that down. I'm trying to get out of putting people down. I'm trying to raise myself above all this, because we've been talking this way for 7 years now."

"I'm trying to get my whole life straightened out so that I can play my music and any cat can say what he wants about it. People ought to be able to do what they want to do."

"I look at Archie Shepp and Albert Ayler as musicians. Who am I to say they are bad musicians — 'cause they're playing their thing; they have something to say. I'm proud of that music."
"I come out of that realm of music, but I interpret the views of the day the way I hear them. Ten years from now, I'm not going to put down the saxophone players that my brother or my son dig — 'cause they might not be able to hear me then, I might sound so square and out of it. But I hope to keep up with what's going on."

Roland Kirk ended the set with Satin Doll. Playing three instruments, he reminded one of the sound of the Duke Ellington saxophone section, a formidable accomplishment.

WHO RULES COLUMBIA?
(Published by the North American Congress on Latin America)

The epiphenomena of student revolt have recently been getting a great deal of attention from the press, media, and publishing houses. The tactics invoked by students from Berlin to Mexico have been reported to death, and much has been made of the generational gap, or the alienating character of the university, in explaining and rationalizing student discontent.

Serious documentation on the causes of revolt has been another story. Part of the problem has been that radicals themselves have been too preoccupied with organizing and actions, to sit down and do the type of serious analysis required. More importantly, the manipulative character of Western capitalist society, and the anti-theoretical character of its dominant ideology, liberalism, ensures that structured analysis takes a distinct second place to "hard news", where reports in the bourgeois press are concerned.

For these reasons, a publication such as Who Rules Columbia? is to be especially welcomed, insofar as it represents the kind of hard analysis which journalistic accounts of the Columbia uprising of last April ignore. Every one knows that one of the main charges of Columbia SDS against the university, regarded the corporate links between the university Board of Governors and the major financial and industrial power brokers in New York. Most people have heard of the Institute for Defense Analysis, involving classified research for the US Defense Department, relating to Vietnam.

But so far, little attempt had been made to show these activities as part of an interacting whole, or map out the full extent of the corporate university's cooption into the military-industrial complex.

As Who Rules Columbia? shows, the elite ruling a major university such as Columbia is coterminous with the elite that presides over the destinies of the United States and of the American Empire. The revolt against the Columbia Administration was in a real sense a revolt against the entire American power structure.

There were five basic conglomerations of interests represented on the Columbia Board of Governors, namely, 1) mass media corporations, 2) international corporations administering the empire, 3) national corporations administering the home country, 4) the defense-research nexus, 5) real-estate and finance. The ties among the twenty-two principals involved were multitudinous and intense, with most governors performing two or three roles in the five major interest areas.

Thus, Grayson Kirk, President of the University, was also a trustee of Socony Mobil Oil, a large international trust, sat on the boards of IBM and Consolidated Edison, was a trustee of the Institute of Defense Analyses and was a director of one bank and two insurance companies. William A. M. Burden, a Director of CBS, was a founder of the Fairfield Foundation, used as a front by the CIA to pass over $1 million to the Congress for Cultural Freedom, sat on the Boards of Allied Chemical and Lockheed Aircraft, key elements in the American military machine, and was the director of Manufacturer's Hanover Trust. And so on down the line.

Three representatives of CBS and the Chairman of the New York Times ensured Columbia a favourable public image (witness the Times biased coverage of the Columbia events), and at the same time ensured themselves, through Columbia's School of Journalism of skilled labour for the media industry.

Seven Columbia trustees had ties to international corporations, and were concerned with providing the American Empire with the skilled managers capable of defending US economic interests. Through Columbia's School of International Affairs, and the numerous research institutes attached to it, the US State Department and intelligence community were provided with large numbers of their recruits. At least twenty foundations, on which Columbia trustees were represented, were overtly or covertly supported through CIA funds.

Five representatives of the military-industrial complex sat on Columbia's Board. The Institute of Defense Analyses, specializing in evaluations of advanced weaponry and counter-insurgency, had a Columbia trustee as its Chairman.

No less than fifteen trustees had primary interlocking relationships with New York's real estate and financial companies. Four were associated with Uris Building Corporation, which in turn, conveniently enough, frequently served as contractor for the university. The Rockefeller Brothers were represented through two of their financial concerns. It was David Rockefeller's Morningside Heights Inc., which ensured the entrenchment of the university in the Morningside Heights area after 1947, redevelopment of property involving the eviction of low income groups, and the institutional expansion of Columbia, exemplified by the proposed gym in Morningside Park.

Thus the student revolt at Columbia represented the logical and inexorable working out of the contradictions flowing from the corporate function of the university. For the propertyless and powerless of Harlem and Morningside Heights, the university was the personification of their repression in America. For those fighting against American imperialism abroad, and the domination of the corporate-military elite at home, Columbia's Board of trustees was the epitome of the property-holders of America. Their legitimacy had to be challenged as surely as that of the institutional decision-makers in government and business. To deny the university to the military-corporate elite appeared as the first step in the liberation of the United States from its Frankenstein.

Who Rules Columbia? is therefore a seminal document, underlying the social character of the Columbia revolt, and the forces in American society against whom the students were rebelling. If the alliance of forces in Canadian society is not identical, the Canadian corporate elite enjoys a dominant position in this country, analogous to that of its American counterpart. Canadian universities are also involved in providing the skilled labour to service Canadian industry, Canadian foreign policy, the Canadian media, even if the latter are not the imperialist institutions of the United States. Instead, we in Canada are faced with a colonial reality, and our elites must be viewed as junior participants in the American Empire. For Canadian radicals the task becomes to demystify the Canadian university, even as their confreres have done for Columbia. Who rules Toronto?

Young Radicals, Notes on Committed Youth. Kenneth Keniston. $2.50. A Harvest Book.

— "Most of the active student radicals today come from middle to upper middle-class professional homes. They were born with status and affluence as facts of life, not goals to be striven for. In their upbringing, their parents stressed the right of children to question and make judgements, producing perhaps the first generation of young people both affluent and independent of mind."

—Tom Hayden,
Former SDS president

"Theirs is the egoism, the personal chauvinism of the isolationist self." That's how Daniel J. Boorstin described young radicals in a recent article in "Esquire", called "The New Barbarians".

Boorstin's article is provoking because it reminds one of the drunk man at the party, who appears sane and rational when sober, but who, when plied with a few drinks, makes remarks like, "You know, there are too many niggers in this neighbourhood!" or "You Jews are all alike." There's one good thing about that: you find out what he's really thinking.

He contends that the new raison d'être of the New Left is "sensation" and "thrill" as opposed to "experience", claiming that "now the 'New Left' is the LSD of the intellectuals". The revolutionaries today, unlike those in his time, are not interested in "ideology" or looking into the basic problems of life. They are interested in mouthing four-letter words, in inciting crowds to violence and indulging in self-gratification.

Kenneth Keniston, in a serious and incisive study of the New Left, called "Young Radicals—Notes on Committed Youth", sums up the criticisms against radicals in one paragraph:

"It is very easy to find good grounds to criticize the young radicals. Their outlooks are incomplete, changeable, hard to pin down. They seem 'unrealistic' in their firm adherence to principle in the face of social and historical actualities that appear to demand compromise. They are anti-institutional, even anarchistic, in their fondness for the small scale, the participatory, and the face to face. They lack any detailed program of specific reforms. They are romantic in their identification with those who are superficially unlike them, as in their assumption that every man has a real self waiting to be actualized beneath his social role. They consider themselves involved in politics, yet shy away from the exercise of power."

However, Keniston spends the rest of the chapter, explaining why these criticisms miss the point completely. Dogmatism, coherent and rigid political philosophy, passivity are largely irrelevant to the problems of political action and thought in an affluent, changing, middle-class society.

What Boorstin and so many others fail to realize ultimately is that so-called "power groups" do not survive by dint of their ideological structure. "Black Power" and "Student Power" are not so much political as they are "anti-authoritarian". They are against the kind of paternalistic authoritarianism that Boorstin and his liberal intellectuals reinforce their egos with (cf. Northrop Frye's "authority of academic superiority"). Power radicalism deals with facts and human situations as they exist and not as they are studied in the musty volumes of some long-gone philosophers.

Keniston's study could have been invalid to start with for a hundred different reasons. It is a credit to his personal academic brilliance and intelligence that he realized these problems and dealt with them.

First of all, had he studied the New Left on a political level, it would have been convincing only to those who held the same political views that he holds himself. It would have broken down in a useless political dialectic. Instead, Keniston, a psychologist, with an impressive record of research in alienated and uncommitted youth, attacks his subject on the personal, psychological level. He treats them as individuals, trying to find common themes running through their lives.

Secondly, he could very easily be guilty of extrapolation as he makes his observations on the basis of interviews with merely a dozen young men and women of the New Left. This is always a weakness in the study, but it is strengthened by many factors. The young men and women were highly individual, with greatly varying backgrounds and personalities. They were unusually open and frank.

The people he talked to had been with the "Vietnam Summer" movement for at least two years and were fairly committed to the cause. Keniston picked the elite (if such a term is proper) thereby limiting himself but concentrating on the type of people who do most of the rabble rousing and organization. Nevertheless, the credibility gap persists throughout the book.

But ultimately, what raises the book from a scientific survey, to a relevant handbook on dissent, is Keniston's underlying theme: this generation is unique.

The things that make this generation unique are the things mentioned by Tom Hayden above. Also the Global Village, mass starvation, the sham made of democracy, the adolescent subculture, the threat of the nuclear holocaust, things that never existed before and do now.

Well, fine. It's an excellent book and all that, but who's going to read it? If you're a young radical yourself or have fantasies of becoming one you might read it to find out how groovy you are. Or if you are a professor locked in your ivory tower who studies people like specimens, you can put it in your library. But if you're the ordinary kind of person who makes quick critical judgements about radicals, then you probably can't be bothered. You probably say that it's just another rag supporting the commie front.

If you're doing that, you're negating Keniston's worth as a scholar, an expert in psychoanalysis and alienation in American society. Because this book, while not supporting any political movement, states that people involved in radical groups are generally great, un hung-up, unalienated and self-confident people. They do not want to destroy American society. In fact, they are reaffirming the basic American ideals by cutting through the myth to get at the reality. So don't read it unless you're prepared to hear the truth.

robert aitken at hart house

At its best, Robert Aitken's flute assumes a mellow, reed-like resonance very reminiscent of an oboe or an English horn. At Hart House last Sunday night it admirably filled every cubic inch of the Great Hall. Aitken's fluid performance coupled with his technical virtuosity left us with the impression that he was a musician who had mastered his instrument well.

And yet there was nothing memorable about the recital as a whole. The programme, clearly selected with a view to displaying Aitken's versatility, illustrated nothing so much as his disappointing lack of it. The performance was flawless, but there always seemed to be something missing: Aitken played with polished bravura but there was nothing of the spontaneous, electric communication that turns a good solo recital into a work of art.

He attacked his first number, the Sonata in G by C.P.E. Bach, with considerable brilliance, but with a tonal breadth that one would have thought more suitable to Brahms or Tchaikovsky, and that only in a symphonic piece. Indeed, it occurred to me more than once that Aitken's talents lie not so much in solo performance as in orchestral work. Aitken appears to lack the internal motivation and depth of understanding that a soloist must possess.

This became only more evident in the Beethoven piece, a flute sonata in B flat. At first we had some difficulty in distinguishing it from the previous number; it was played with exactly the same expression (or lack of it) and with the same sort of on-the-surface, flabby interpretation. His lackadaisical entrance at the start of the largo movement spoiled what would otherwise have been a very dramatic effect, created by his accompanist's expert sense of pause between this and the preceding movement. The only point that I felt convinced that what I was hearing was actually Beethoven was in the slow variation of the fourth movement which was, for once, handled with due sensitivity. Unfortunately, by the time Aitken got into the proper frame of mind, the piece was over.

Having thus fallen behind the hectic pace of his programme, he proceeded to play, without an intermission, two very contemporary works: a short atonal exercise by Japanese composer Kazuo Fukushima and an electronic "Synchronism" for flute and tape recorder by Mario Davidovsky. The results were almost predictable: his heavy-handed, romantic use of vibrato in an intense, sombre piece like Fukushima's Ekegra was not a little irritating. The performance was rescued by the very competent accompaniment of Marion Ross: although her playing tended at times to be just a little too violent, it was she, not Aitken, who seemed to have a clear conception of what the piece was actually about.

In the electronic piece the vibrato finally disappeared and the flute assumed the dry terseness it should have had all along. The result was quite pleasing. Aitken's playing, filled with frail leaps and some brilliant tonguing, blended delicately and almost indistinguishably with the electronic sounds on the tape. The use of stereo speakers here gave the performance a three-dimensional effect which I found quite involving, despite the brevity of the piece.

The Prokofieff Sonata in D constituted by far the finest moment of the evening. Aitken, at least at the beginning, was quite prepared to do it justice: the first and second movements had the gentle, melancholy playfulness that Prokofieff almost always requires; and he rendered the quiet, flowing andante movement with a sensitivity that was almost moving. In the final movement, Miss Ross stepped out of her role as accompanist in a powerful display of virtuosity that was brief, but which just about stole the show; she fought Aitken, overpowered him, and carried the piece to a brilliant conclusion. It was, of course, unethical for her to do so, but I felt almost grateful to her, just the same.

FILM CANADA

Canada has a heritage of borrowing culture, or having it thrust upon her. First, she adopted British traditionalism, and then succumbed to successive waves of American philistinism and pop culture.

This type of overpowering cultural domination has bred a timidity and lack of confidence in Canadian artistic ventures, particularly in the cinema—one of the most expensive art forms in which to work.

The effect of this has been to place Canadian Cinema in an unfortunate dilemma. One sector of the public demands a Canadian feature film industry, while another wails about the cost whenever the government attempts to subsidize one. Witness the minor furore over the expense of "The Ernie Game" and "Waiting for Caroline", two features produced jointly by the C.B.C. and the National Film Board last year.

In the past, of course, Canadian cinema was hampered by a lack of financial support, commercial outlets, and an interested public. Because of this there were few opportunities for film work available for many talented Canadians; they were forced to go elsewhere, resulting in the much publicized "exodus to Hollywood".

This set up a vicious circle. Talented people left the country looking for work, and Canadian film makers couldn't get the support they needed because there weren't enough talented people.

The circle was broken, at least temporarily, by a resurgence of confidence in Canadian cinema generated by Expo 67. Films like the N.F.B.'s "Labyrinth" and Chris Chapman's "A Place to Stand", showed Canadians that we had the ability to make excellent features.

In addition to this, many people were making films in spite of the obstacles. Allen King's "Warrendale" was able to find commercial outlets, and a public.

There was also a new interest in private film ventures. "Winter Kept us Warm" by David Secter was shown all over the country, Larry Kent's "High" had the distinction of being banned in both Ontario and Quebec, "Palace of Pleasure" by John Hofsess was showing in Art Movie Houses in the United States, and Jean Pierre Lefebvre's feature "Il Faut Pas Mourir pour Ca" shared the Grand Prix at the Montreal Film Festival.

Canada now has at least a nebulous feature film industry. What it needs to keep developing is continued financial, critical and public support. This was made clear by the results of the 20th Annual Canadian Film Awards last Friday, and the screening of several award winners at Cinecity on Sunday.

The best film shown last Sunday however was a beautiful black and white short by Norman McClaren, "Pas de Deux", which won the prize for the festival's outstanding artistic achievement.

Using the technique of over-printing McClaren transformed his film of a ballet dance into a mesmeric kaleidoscope of blending bodies.

Other good shorts were also screened, but most important was the quality of the feature films shown. "The Ernie Game" which won for Don Owen the best direction award, and "The Paper People", are both entertaining and very Canadian. Particularly "The Ernie Game" which has a soundtrack composed and played by the Kensington Market.

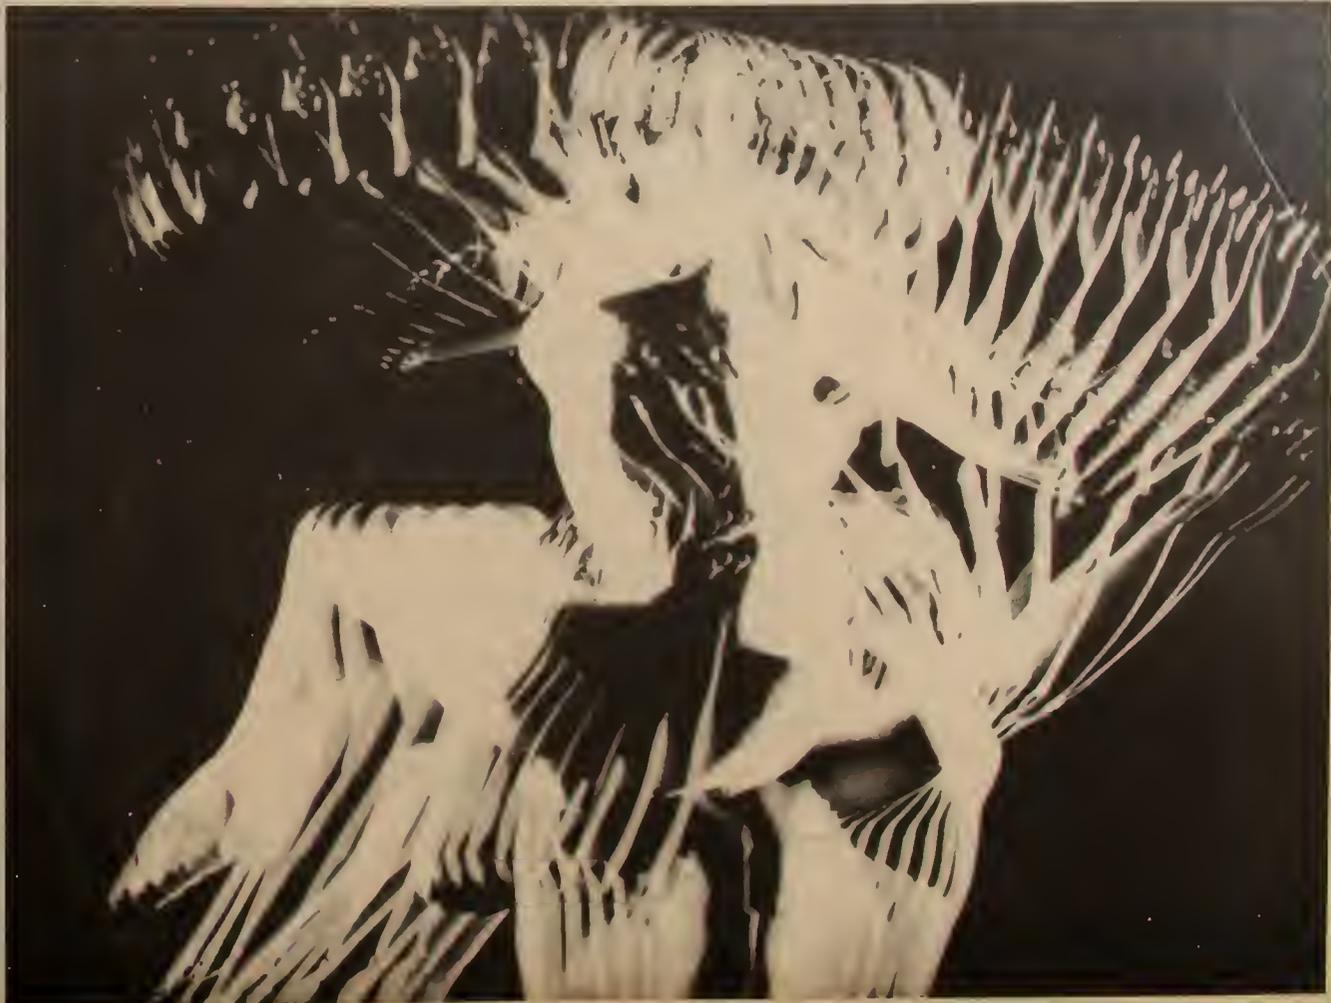

Isabel, directed by Paul Almond won four awards including best actress, Genevieve Bujold, and best actor, Gerard Parkes. "A Place to Stand", Ontario's film at Expo, won three awards including film of the year.

The most crucial factor in the film production process is the public. Fortunately there are some signs that the Canadian public are finally beginning to support their native cinema.

However this still leaves the problem of distribution. "Isabel" is currently playing at the Towne Cinema, but this is an exception and there are usually no theatres willing to run Canadian features with the exception of Cinecity, which showed some of the award winners last Sunday.

Canadian cinema deserves much better than this. It is the art of a country that ultimately bestows the identity on the culture which it mirrors.

Located in the main lobby of the Sigmund Samuel Library is an audio-visual teaching machine designed to aid in library orientation.

The machine consists of 10 minutes of slides of library facilities, shown through a picture screen.

Narration is provided by several phones and is accompanied by music from the Sugar Shoppe.

Student reaction to the device was mixed.

One said it was "impressive", another thought it would be "very useful for first-year students." One girl thought the music "was great". "I listened to it twice," she said, "just for the music."

However, many got up and left in disinterest before the end of the slide sequence.

Sig Sam sends students elsewhere

In the four years I've been at U of T, I've never taken a book out of Sigmund Samuel library. I got a library card my first year and used it for ID a couple of times in theatres and campus events, but finally destroyed it without using it.

I'm not trying to suggest that this is very smart; it's more in sadness than in anger that I remember a gigantic library rule book, professors who wouldn't sign stack passes and rumours of rude librarians and book-hungry graduate students who pre-empted everything in sight.

When I came here, I imagined the campus would be one gigantic library where students could spend hours browsing through hundreds of shelves of books. Paradise, I fancied, was a huge book-room with helpful librarians. Its nearest approximation on earth was the U of T Post-secondary education. I thought, was synonymous with reading.

Ha.

The thing that saves this place from being a dead loss is the two excellent book-stores we have. I have made a habit of regular browsing and have parted with $150 for books, magazines and pamphlets every school year. But it's a bit expensive.

The public library system operates under the assumption that it is better to have a couple of hundred books stolen each year than make it virtually impossible for the public to borrow materials. The drawback with the public system, however, is that it is sadly behind the times.

A recent report on the Toronto Library criticized every section heavily; unless you're doing superficial, general reading, you won't be able to find the material you need.

I guess Chairman Bissell has got his heart set on turning the U of T into a gigantic graduate school, and so he probably doesn't want to waste money on undergraduate facilities, but it would be nice if we could build a "nigger library" on campus where us undergraduate niggers could get a wide selection of books and not have to be fingerprinted every time we borrow something.

iTi theme: Crisis of Numbers

By LINDA YARMOUTH

Male sterilization is the best method of birth control, says zoology professor Dr. Henry Regier.

Even the pill is an ineffective method of contraception, he told an audience of 40, citing his and his wife's "third mistake" as proof of this fact.

Labelling the Pope's condemnation of birth control as "injurious" Dr. Regier named specific biological consequences of such an explosion — including an increase in carbon dioxide circulation and disease from the rise in air pollution.

The rhythm method of contraception presently condoned by the Pope is fallible, he noted, and thus does not help to curtail overpopulation.

The rising birth rate also places an immense strain on food availability, and Dr. Regier questioned the theological rationale of sacrificing the earth's other species to keep "God's children" alive.

Dr. Regier is program chairman of the Fourth International Teach-In, Exploding Humanity: The Crisis of Numbers, to be held Oct. 25 to 27.

His talk was one of several pre-teach-in sessions anticipating the major addresses to be given on topics which include: the inevitability of man's extinction, the present stage of the problem, plans for survival considering massive starvation, family planning and external aid and "A Dilemma for Affluents".

Paul Beswick as rassling coach

by PAUL VESA

After finishing behind such upstarts as Guelph, Western, and McGill for some years, the Varsity wrestling team should make a stronger showing this year under the coaching of Paul Beswick. Beswick, a graduate student in chemical engineering, comes to us after two years as co-coach at R.M.C. In 1967 he coached R.M.C.'s first ever wrestling team, composed almost entirely of rookies, and led them to the Ontario-St. Lawrence championship. As a competitor he was second in the Canadian Intercollegiate championships in the 160 lb. class that year.

Among the nucleus of Varsity returnees, are two of the finest wrestlers in the conference, Larry Barron and Bill Allison. Barron is a recruit from McGill who has won the OQAA 177 lb. class several times and was second last year. Allison was 2nd in OQAA in the 160 lb. class. Among others returning will be John Clarke, Rob Caldwell, and Ted Sauer. Footballers Ylo Korgemagi and Alex Squires should join the team after the football season.

Some of the more auspicious rookies are Dave Simms, Peep Korgemagi (Ylo's brother), and Joe Hodgson, weighing in at 230 and carrying a Black Belt in judo. As of press time, bodies were badly needed in the 115, 123, and 137 lb. weight classes.

Anyone who wishes to work at an excellent conditioning sport, with the chance of wrestling for a team headed for the top, should turn out in the Wrestling Room, Hart House at 5:00 PM Tuesday.

BLUES OFF TO WATERLOO

SOCCER

This Saturday, as Coach Murphy and his lads travel to Waterloo, the soccer Blues invade Varsity Stadium at twelve noon to do battle with the Warriors. Both teams are recovering from identical 4-3 losses suffered last week, so that both should be up for the game.

Blues' main worry may be unfamiliarity with the wider and longer confines of the stadium, as compared to the smaller back or front campus. To offset this, the team has spent considerable work on long passing and conditioning, especially the latter. The long grass and vastness of the pitch will aid the team that is in better shape, and undoubtedly this will be Blues, who are always better conditioned than the other teams in the loop.

Coach Emile Glass has made some lineup changes which will strengthen mid-field play. Personnel problems have cropped up this week during practice. Two players, Don Muir and John Gero, both members of Scarborough, have a Canadian final game Saturday night and as a result, are available only for limited service in the morning.

KORNER KICKS

Look for the forwards to start bruising the net. Frank Soppelsa, Jim Letkos and Miles Sosa have been hot during practice. Let's hope they continue on Saturday.

HARRIER

Five members of University of Toronto's defending Canadian champion harrier team will carry Varsity's colors into the Silver Relay in High Park tomorrow. It will mark the first time a collegiate team has ever competed in this event which comprises five-man units running a total of fifteen miles.

Varsity has an outside chance for second place behind Toronto Olympic Club. Although TOC has five runners at the Olympics they still have strength enough to garner first and possibly second place.

At the same time sprinter Dave Quibel and 880 yard man Bill Franklin will head up a complement of trackmen competing at RMC in the last prep before the OCAA finals a week hence in Windsor.

RUGGER

It seems to be the fashion for favoured teams to suffer humbling defeats. Blues soccer, Blues football and St. Louis Cardinals are cases in point. Last evening, the Varsity rugger firsts were overwhelmed by their second team 18-8.

Tries by Rick Rowland, Chris Compton and Chris Rous paced the seconds. Three conversions and a penalty goal were booted Varsity offensive guard Gord Whittaker wound up with his hockey stick and blasted the roll of tape past halfback Glen Markle. "He scores," yelled Whittaker, and then turned to provide your roving reporter with a quote about this Saturday's game against Waterloo Warriors. "We'll beat them," said Whittaker, as Markle glumly fished the tape out of his "net" with a broom.

There wasn't much more to be said so Whittaker went back to his hockey and your roving reporter went back to his hotel, contemplating an ever-diminishing navel and wondering how he was going to get to Waterloo.

For, 'tis true, Blues are playing in Waterloo tomorrow, and 'tis true as well, that Warriors should be beaten.

In their first season as full-fledged members of the SIFL, Warriors are already residing in the league's basement with no victories in two starts. They opened their season with an ignominious 34-6 defeat at the hands of McLaster. However they scared the hell out of Western last week in London, before succumbing 31-27. Their real potential lies somewhere between the two.

Although rookie head coach Wally Deldady has a strong nucleus of returnees to work with, the team's weak defense off-set by fullback Gord McLellan, gave Mustangs lots of trouble last week, and they outstatisticked Western everywhere but on the scoreboard.

McLellan runs the hundred in 9.9. Another interesting sidelight about Warriors is their centre Bob Padfield. The 6'4", 245 lber was recruited from the rassin' ranks, and had never played football until this year.

Blues, of course, are eager to weak revenge on the nearest thing that moves following last week's 35-0 trauma against Queen's.

One change that will help is the return of Alex Squires to defensive end now that guard Arnie Carefoot is back in the lineup.

All Varsity fans are asked to play tonight — Rod Middleburgh Queen's. Okay?

Would you believe this was a play in Blues' 35-0 loss to Queen's?

STUDENTSCABSTUDENTSCABSTUDENTSCABSTU

By LOUIS ERlichMAN

It was a warm, clear day in May. At the Thermotex plant in Rexdale, students were driving out to deliver shipments of glass to different parts of the city.

A normal enough scene, students working for their tuition in the summer. But there were other people too, men in work clothes and other students, milling about in front of the plant, carrying placards. Two of these read "Student Scabs Get Out" and "Per Quanto avete venduto vostra dignita?" $1.85 per hour?

The pickets bunched up in front of the delivery trucks as they left the plant, hurling abuse in English and Italian at the student drivers.

They were on strike and the students, "scabs" to them, were taking away their only weapon in their fight for better conditions.

It was only one incident, but it is an indication of a trend which is causing concern to the labor movement all across Canada.

As summer jobs become more and more difficult to find, desperate students and strike-bound companies are tempted into marriages of convenience. In addition to weakening the union cause and providing a disruptive factor in industrial disputes, scabbing students could be creating a labor backlash so that the good summer jobs available previously only through the unions' good graces will disappear.

But labor disputes tend to be complicated and emotional and the decisions of a job-hungry and only partly-informed student are perhaps not entirely rational.

At the Thermotex plant, the Steelworkers Union had obtained certification as the bargaining agent of the workers, but it had been unable to reach any agreement with the company. Since the union faced de-certification it an agreement was not negotiated within a year, a "wildcat" strike was organized to put pressure on the company.

The company responded by hiring students at higher rates than they were paying their regular employees.

Joe, one of the U of T students who worked at Thermotex, admitted he was told that the workers were trying to form a union before he applied for the job.

"We were told it was an illegal strike," he said, "but no one told us about the certification problem."

"I felt badly but I didn't think I was harming the situation. Most of us quit after a few weeks anyway. It's just so hard to get jobs."

Joe said he wouldn't have applied if it had been a "legal" strike.

"As it was, there were a couple of fights. Somebody threw a brick through a truck window and I was followed on some of my deliveries," he said. "If the union had been bigger and more organized, there would have been more fights and squabbles, and it would have been a lot more dangerous."

The company received limited benefits by hiring the students since they were inexperienced and not particularly competent. It fell farther and farther behind in filling orders until an agreement with the union was finally reached.

The Thermotex incident had immediate repercussions. In the University, the Advisory Committee for the Placement Service, which had advertised the Thermotex jobs, passed a motion that the service would not list positions which are the subject of a labor-management dispute.

Keeping abreast of labor developments is not an easy job. "We keep a close eye on the newspapers," said Allan Headrick, director of the Placement Service. "and hope we don't get caught. Most large disputes get into the papers quickly."

"Actually," he continued, "attempts to hire students through us to replace strikers is pretty rare, perhaps once or twice a year. Most companies feel that the short-term benefit is outweighed by the hostilities aroused."

There have, however, been other, more subtle instances of student "scabbing" during the past summer. In Valleyfield, Que. students were reportedly working as long-shoremens at below union rates. During the postal strike, students in several cities ran postal delivery services.

The Graduate Students Union at U of T ran one of these postal "services", delivering letters for foreign destinations to the post office in Buffalo, New York.

"It was not our intention to be strike-breaking," said Michael Vaughan vice-president. The executive saw a need for an emergency service to help overseas students.

The service was not, however, restricted to overseas students, but in fact received wide local advertising seeking mail from all sources.

"SAC took a negative position on the issue, but we didn't get one complaint during the period of service," Vaughan said. "We didn't discuss the implications, we just tried to follow our good intentions."

Student actions draw varying amounts of anger from union men. Henry Wischack, executive secretary of the Ontario Federation of Labor, says he is "not really worried about it."

"It doesn't happen often, but I would be worried if employers and students made it a habit," he said. "I don't think workers are, in general hostile to students."

But in an article titled Student Scabs in the August/September issue of "Confrontations," the New Democratic Youth newspaper, Alan Gottlieb accuses students of being "trained to believe they are superior to the 91 percent of 18-24 population not in school", of being "contemptuous" of unions and unwilling to "dirty their hands." Yet even this article ends with a reasoned suggestion for a solution to student employment problems: free university education and voluntary student service in the summer.

In its first meeting this year, SAC passed a resolution supporting a union demonstration at City Hall, recognizing "the common struggle in which student unions are involved with labor unions on such issues as housing, democratization of institutions and accessibility to university." The question remains as to whether other students have made the same recognition.

The problem has not yet fully materialized, but it would be both ironic and sad if the university, fount of the New Left, and unions, the core of the Old Left, were to be dragged into bitter confrontations over the "scab" issue.

Teach-In explores exploding population

To many, the theme of this Year's Teach-In is about a relevant aspect of the bomb movement — How I Stopped Worrying and Learned to Love the Crisis of Numbers.

But on closer inspection, this analogy is gutless, because the numerical explosion is not sealed away behind barbed wire fences and controlled by electronic signals.

Its evidence stares us in the face from the square mile of green algae on Lake Erie to the 2,000,000 I.U.D.'s dispensed by the government of India to a fraction of its female population.

Yet some pragmatic solutions do exist — this is the feeling behind the Teach-In. And significantly enough the forum is being organized for the first time with the leading role played by a section of this university that is not strictly arts — the department of zoology.

The idea has been taking form for about two years, explains Dr. J. B. Falls, Chairman of this year's committee and an ecologist by profession.

"About two years ago, four of us, all but one ecologists, were sitting around discussing the things which are of greatest concern to us — mainly conservation of one kind or another, and we discovered that we were all very disturbed about population increase.

"We realize we have a different point of view because of our biological interest. But we see it as the most important general problem in the world. We thought of ways of bringing it to the attention of the campus — by giving courses or inviting speakers. But the Teach-In offers us a ready-made format for the dramatic presentation of the issue."

On the weekend of Oct. 25, psychiatrists, agronomists, economists, sociologists, philosophers, and ecologists — all with direct experience dealing with the human problems created by over-population will pool their expertise in four sessions in Varsity Arena.

In the abstract, the focus of their attention will be Man in the Technological Society — creator and destroyer in a new dimension.

And in concrete terms there are two direct political issues behind the probing attempts at defining human status:

Population control — as much a controversy in Canada as it is in Latin America or in India.

Foreign aid — how to share wealth and knowledge between rich and poor nations.

But there has been no attempt by the Teach-In organizers to emphasize ideology, since all of the questions dealt with will be in some sense political.

What the program does try to do is shake the assumptions of the audience about the virtues of the Canadian experience.

"In our own internal and external policies on the question of birth control, for example," Dr. Falls commented, "Canada is extraordinarily apathetic. At international conferences we either abstain or vote against resolutions dealing with the implementation of birth control programs."

In the final session, a Swedish psychiatrist with a great deal of international level experience in sex education and birth control has been invited to speak "precisely because Sweden has a policy and we don't," in the words of one organizer.

Right now the hub of activity is on the fifth floor of the Ramsay Wright Building.

A white-coated young man in an elevator sees you with Teach-In brochures and comments, "So you've been roped in too!" Radiating from the fifth floor office of Dr. Falls, the forum organizers have grabbed all available bodies — until they now have a force totalling 300.

A lot of their energy will be spent of the Pre Teach-In which for the first time will reach the Scarborough and Erindale campuses. The scope of this program reflects the policy of Dr. Falls:

"Instead of trying to run everything on our own, we went around to the rest of the campus asking people to set up programs in related fields. In other words, do your own thing . . . and we even have a contribution from the engineers."

Perhaps the highlight of next week's events will be a display of contraceptive devices to be set up in the foyer of Sid Smith accompanied by two doctors.

But only the events on the weekend will prove the validity of the forum as a sounding board of expert international opinion on crucial issues. This year the focus of protest will be Canada itself where, in Dr. Falls' words, "It is not unreasonable to think that our ideas may have a direct effect."

"In the structure of the program, we are trying to do two things," he explains: "present as many of the aspects of the problem as possible and suggest opposing points of view."

"But in this we are faced with a huge task. For the main opposition is apathy and you can't give equal time to apathy."

"Certainly the old dispensation that began with The University of Toronto Act of 1906 is at an end. That act tried to preserve the academic community by establishing a protective corporation of lay representatives. The academic community is no longer prepared to accept this kind of industrial feudalism and is determined to work out its own solutions to the problems of identity and autonomy."

resign? nonsense!

A perennial joke in any campus newsroom is starting a rumor that the university president is going to resign, and then ask him to deny it. To actually do this would be journalism of the worst kind.

That's why we ignored a rumor that Dr. Bissell was intending to resign — a rumor current two days before it was revealed in a Saturday article in the Globe and Mail.

Does Dr. Bissell actually intend to resign? We doubt it.

Bissell is the strongman juggling the different elements of the university into an uneasy harmony. Without him, the university would slip into chaos as students and faculty escalate their demands for power on a new, and therefore weak, president.

Bissell knows this, his aides know this. No matter how tired he is of bickering with the Board of Governors, and of dickering with students and faculty, Bissell isn't going to leave the university in that state.

It is more likely the rumor is a planned leak from the president's office intended to show Bissell as a man torn between two forces: a healthy desire for reform, and a recognition that the Board of Governors holds the power and won't let it slip away easily.

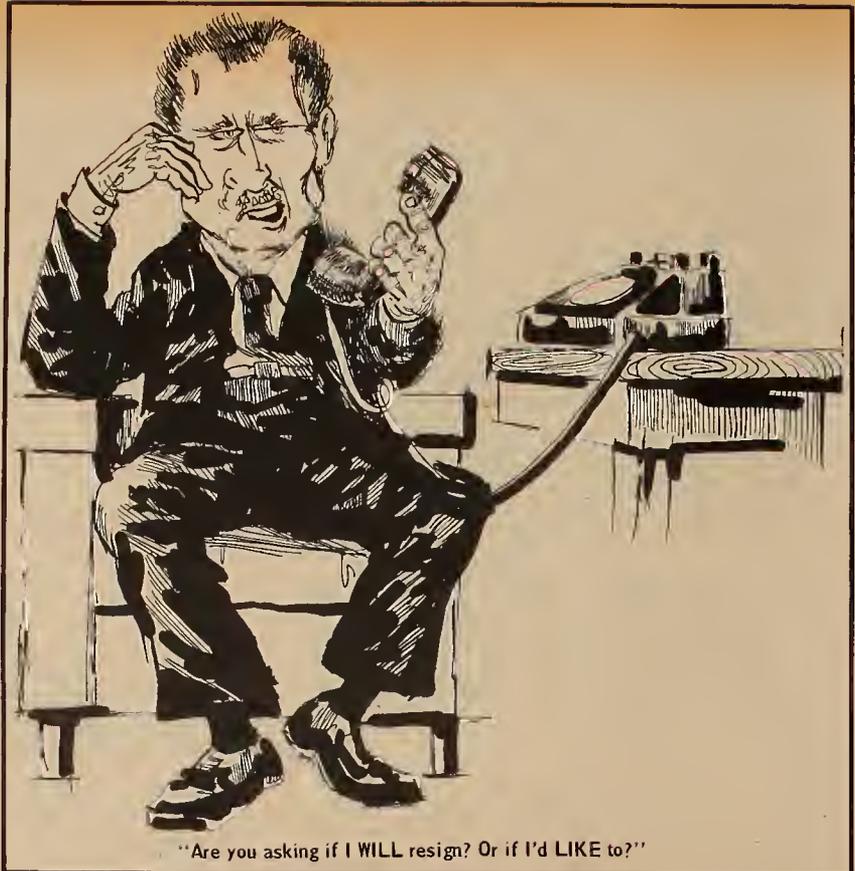

Dr. Bissell's actions seem to contradict his reformist side, but he is obviously under pressure to get the Board onto the important Commission to Restructure University Government (CRUG). The threat of resignation is thus aimed particularly at the Association of Teaching Staff, which accepted a students council proposal to deny the Board voting membership on CRUG.

If the ATS falls for this ploy, the Board and Bissell can reap an additional dividend by driving a wedge into the slowly developing solidarity between students and faculty arising out of their agreement on composition of CRUG.

This agreement is well-founded, and students and faculty will have many more grounds for agreement in the future as each recognizes its powerlessness without the other.

If the ploy fails, Dr. Bissell will finally have to declare himself. He must say he stands with the academic community of this university, or with the Board.

In his speeches he has left no doubt where he stands, now he will have to prove it.

"Are you asking if I WILL resign? Or if I'd LIKE to?"

blue and white, fight, fight, fight

The Blue and White Society struck a major blow for student power on the rock music front last week, but campus response has been less than enthusiastic.

The Blue and White successfully beat back a move on the part of a local promoter to muscle them out of their competing Sunday night engagements this weekend.

They forced the promoter to lower his prices and back down on his threat to have the campus show cancelled.

Consequently Ars Nova fly into Toronto Friday for three engagements — Friday and Saturday at the Rock Pile and Sunday at Convocation Hall.

The only hang-ups are:
o in the course of the hassle the pros wound up with a cheaper price for the group, while the Blue and White — with a smaller auditorium — is paying a higher fee per night.

o so far only 109 seats have been sold for the campus concert.

Blue and White decided last night to halt negotiations on several big-name concerts for the rest of the season.

There's no reason they should run the risk of losing their shirts on a risky venture.

But then there's also no reason a promoter should be free to ride the market for what he can get.

That's a perennial problem of student power — it's hard to mobilize the masses.

"No" said Harriet Kideckel to Mike Kesterton yesterday, and was immediately showered with gift coupons. She was the one-thousandth Varsity female to have done so this year.

"I was pretty sure that the number would be reached today," said a smiling Kesterton. "Before ten o'clock it stood at 927. I knew that with a little effort on my part we could go over the top."

Mr. Kesterton added that he was particularly happy that Miss Kideckel had been the one to win, since it was the first time in a long time that she had said "no."

bogus referendum

GSU President Winter admits the irrelevance of his "referendum" on SAC membership when he offers to subtract the votes of those now criticizing it. He might as well add in the number of graduate students with umbrellas and subtract the number without wives. The vote was and still is meaningless because 60 per cent of the graduate school comes from outside Toronto, and perhaps 30 per cent were on campus for the first time when they were asked to vote. They could not have known the issues; there is some evidence that they were discouraged from knowing them.

(Varsity, 30 Sept.)

When we learned these facts I and others felt conned. Mr. Winters and his executive can add votes, subtract them, or light their pipes with them, but they will be less than honest with SGS and the university if they continue to quote the results of their mock plebiscite. The SAC's responsibility and openness in dealing with this and more important issues stands in sharp contrast.

Doug Hay, (SGS)

the real "liberal"

The presidents' debate got down to fundamentals last Wednesday when the two speakers started tossing around the word "liberal". Mr. Bissell said that the university must remain a "liberal" institution and not become the servant of any faction. Mr. Langdon replied that the "liberal" position is just as doctrinaire as the marxist.

Mr. Bissell's liberal seems to be a nineteenth-century philosopher; Mr. Langdon's is a Bay Street capitalist. The real issue (perhaps one that we ought to refer to the author of the Macpherson Report) is: Are these two liberals one and the same? If so, Mr. Langdon wins the day; if not, Mr. Bissell.

The radicalization of Medsmen

By BOB BARKWELL
(II MEDS)

I. Medical School: Where It's At

Probably the first thing to stress is that medical "education" is really a technical training. Even the Faculty of Medicine acknowledges this; the pre-medical course is supposed to educate the student in the broader fields of the humanities before he starts his "professional" (i.e. technical) training. The fact that such education in a broad sense does not occur (even in the terms of education defined by the university) cannot be blamed on the Faculty of Medicine. Rather, this is a product of the general malaise affecting the university.

In the rhetoric of the Faculty, medical students are being trained to be professionals, providing an essential service to the community. The student is taught, both directly and by example, to gather all the evidence available before making decisions, to treat the patient as a person who interacts with a complex environment (social, economic, familial) and not as a disease or syndrome, to exercise the greatest care, caution and restraint in the management of patients because of the immense responsibility which is attendant on handling matters of life and death. He is taught that medicine is an art requiring tact and sensitivity as well as a science requiring precision and knowledge.

This is the rhetoric, and even to a large extent, the reality of medical education. Yet this education also has some unfortunate side effects. Students come to feel that because they have a considerable amount of specialized knowledge, carry a grave responsibility and supply an essential service that they are somehow superior to other people (even other professionals). This feeling of superiority leads to the conclusion that no other person or group has either the ability or the right to question or interfere with medical practice. Moreover, they feel that they are entitled to high material rewards for shouldering this responsibility and providing this service. (This is not unexpected given the materialistic basis of our society.)

These attitudes help explain the dichotomy between the rhetoric of the selfless doctor, tirelessly performing a needed service, regulating his own profession so that quacks and incompetents will not be inflicted on society, and otherwise nobly serving the community, and the reality of a situation where many doctors refuse to make housecalls, others do not work on Wednesday afternoons or weekends, and the professional ethic is often used to protect and hide quacks and incompetents.

The medical school scene is admirably suited to inculcating these sorts of values since the student tends to learn attitudes and outlooks from his clinician unconsciously at the same time as he picks up technical knowledge consciously. Moreover, the situation at medical school is very much a master-apprentice one. Students are presumed to be inferior members of the "guild" and hence to have no particular contribution to make to medical education until they have proved themselves in practice. The whole system is beautifully designed to produce people who believe that age confers authority and that worth is based on seniority. (However, it is worth noting that as early as II Medicine, students are taught by example that they are superior to other members of the medical team — nurses, pharmacists, physiotherapists, etc.)

A complicating factor is that many medical students come from the upper echelons of society. Their fathers are corporation executives, lawyers, doctors, or successful businessmen. Hence, before they ever get to medical school, they are imbued with the values of that stratum of society. Many medsmen are aware of the inequitable organization of society and the economic disparities involved, and they consciously accept this organization and their place in it. Medical training merely reinforces attitudes already present.

Thus, we see that the medical school is carefully (though probably not consciously) designed to produce people who will fit well into the social and professional niche which has been created for them.

II Medical Students: Attitudes and Outlooks

Students who decide to enter medicine as a profession are qualitatively different from their peers who enter other courses. Not only have they gone through the same socialization at public and high schools, but since they tend to come from a higher socio-economic group in society (as previously noted), this socialization "takes" better. They enjoy their comfortable niche in society, with its status and material rewards, and often a contributing factor in their choice of courses is to maintain or even raise their position in society. (To be fair, this is seldom a major conscious factor). In general, this leads to political conservatism, or at best, moderate liberalism, since from their point of view, society has little wrong with it.

Political conservatism might also be tied to the fact that, as a rule, good medicine is conservative medicine — that is, the doctor does the least damage and follows the most moderate regimen consistent with producing a cure in his patient.

It is also concern for the welfare of the patient and the quality of medicine which he gives which determine the medical student's attitudes towards medicare and specialization.

Medical people oppose medicare because they fear that it will destroy their freedom as people and compromise the quality of medicine available to the community. Generally speaking, if the scheme is carefully outlined, these objections can be overcome, but the initial emotional reaction tends to give the unfortunate impression that doctors don't care about the community.

Similarly, specialization follows from a sense that the sheer volume of medical material precludes any one person adequately knowing it all. Therefore, the student decides to give good care in one field rather than mediocre care in all fields. The hierarchical caste system of medicine is a by product of what is an essentially valid outlook.

III What We Must Do Now:

(or how I learned to stop worrying and accept a radical analysis)

It should be fairly obvious from the rest of this paper that the radicalization of medical students is going to be a long difficult process. There are, I suppose, two problems: how to reach medsmen with a radical analysis; and how to get them to do something about it. There are some general approaches to the problem which I feel would probably be more fruitful than others.

First of all, the radicalization must occur from within the Faculty, since medical students by and large, simply will not listen to non-medical people. Thus, it is essential to build up a group (or groups) of medical students who can be turned on by ideas and turn them on to a radical perspective. This is quite difficult since most med students feel that student politics in general, and radical student politics in particular are simply irrelevant. In fact, in their terms, this is perfectly true, it is always easier to radicalize someone who perceives himself as exploited and oppressed than someone who does not. Seminar groups, individual discussions on a private basis and involvement of these people in functions of the wider university community are some of the ways this might be accomplished.

But this sort of approach is not going to reach large numbers of medical students. Here is where the interaction between thought and action comes in. Students at the University of Toronto Faculty of Medicine have given a number of nice, liberal reforms — students on curriculum committees and an Undergraduate Student Affairs Committee with equal membership of staff and students. If the students push for the widest possible definition of these committees and insist on bringing up really central things, rather than the peripheral details (like dress regulations) which they have been allowed to deal with, the point will come when the difference in interests (if one exists) between the faculty and the students will become manifest. At this point, radicalization can begin to occur.

At the same time, one should be prepared to take advantage of situations which come up. For example, an edict from the Dean banning beards, sideburns and long hair could cause a radicalization of students, not because that is a particularly meaningful issue (it isn't) but because it would call into question all the nice liberal reforms (see above), since the Undergraduate Student Affairs Committee has already decided that no such edict should go out. However, while pressure is building on the Dean from staff men at the hospitals to make such a ruling, he is unlikely to fall into that particular error.

IV Ultimate Goals:

A highly personal view of where Medicine should end up.

The changes I would like to see in medical attitudes are (in terms of where medicine is at now) fairly substantial. I would like to see doctors regard themselves as part of the community, as people who are doing their own thing (a thing which is not more and not less valid than anyone else's thing). This would imply that doctors felt that other members of the medical team were equal in importance and ability to themselves, and that the good of the community comes before the good of the profession. I guess what this adds up to is that doctors should live up to their own rhetoric.

This change in attitude would have to be accomplished by a change in the values of society from materialism to humanism, so that a doctor would not feel the need to measure his value in terms of material benefits or status in a hierarchy.

Would you rather wear dark, full skirts 5 days in a row or your sleekest clothes in the palest colors—even white?

Would you rather worry about "What do I do now?" or simply dispose by flushing away?

A notorious group of actors is coming to Canada for the first time — the last time they tried they were kicked out.

The company is the San Francisco Mime Troupe, and it is coming to Varsity Arena October 23 at the request of the SAC Cultural Affairs Committee.

The troupe will perform the commedia dell'arte presentation of The Farce of Patelin, an adaptation of a 15th century French farce.

Reviewers find it difficult to define exactly what the Mime Troupe actually is.

"The Mime Troupe is rowdy, vulgar — I'm sure they would insist on this epithet — bunch of actors who spend much of their time on the road, some of it in court, and a little of it in prison," said the London Times.

A special citation for "uniting theatre and revolution and grooving in the park" was the dubious honor given the Troupe in the Village Voice Off-Broadway Awards.

The Farce of Patelin depicts the world of man as ruled by jungle law, where the characters resemble various animals.

"We have kept the antiquated details," says Troupe director R. G. Davis, "to point up the ironic fact that this play is as true now as it was in the 15th century — in terms of peoples' motives and the way they operate, humanity hasn't made a lot of progress."

Action is the basis of theatre, and this is emphasized in pantomime where the only speaking is narration.

Patelin is based on the original play, but, although it starts out with a full script, everything is open to improvisation.

"A good Mime Troupe actor can make a dog barking offstage part of the show," says Davis.

Tickets for the Troupe will go on sale today at the SAC office.

Purpose: The Free University is a counter-institution to provide for meaningful learning opportunities unavailable in the University of Toronto. The F.U. of T. will provide inter-disciplinary courses that our compartmentalized departments do not cover; there will be problem-centred courses that the slow-moving calendar apparatus cannot keep up to; and there will be parallel courses where the U. of T. ones offer little opportunity for education.

Most important is the atmosphere of learning in the F.U. of T. — people gathered together because they want to learn, people controlling how they go about it.

It is our hope that the F.U. of T. will provide a more intellectually rigorous and more enjoyable program.

- Courses:
1. Anarchism: the Political Philosophy (Donald Crowe)
  2. Art and the University (Warden A.E. Wilkinson)
  3. Canadian History: Nationality and Social Structure (Stanley Ryerson)

Hall-Dennis ignores human factor

By ANGELA SHENG

"The Hall-Dennis Report did some liberal thinking but it did not come to grips with the aims of education," says an Ontario College of Education professor.

Prof. T. W. Goodenough was participating in a Student Christian Movement Seminar at Hart House.

True, the Report advocated a progressivist child-centred reform program. But it was more concerned with rather practical and technical aspects of education such as the sources of finances and the design of a school.

"These are not the aims of education," said Eilert Frerichs, the Hart House United Church Chaplain at U of T.

Of the 12 students and faculty at the seminar, the majority agreed that in making the Report effective, it was necessary to have "deep integration of the community and the school."

Often, Mr. Frerichs pointed out, it is the parental block that destroys any hope of free learning in cases where the school boards have given the teachers enough liberty, to experiment with the courses.

But one woman who insisted children could not articulate why they liked or disliked certain teachers or courses, agreed on this.

One student threw the question: "How far did the research committee of the Hal Dennis Report reach the children?"

He said the children had little to say at all, although they were represented in the beautifully printed pictures, and diagrams and photographs of the Report.

The aims of education should be centred on "What people are and what people should be," said Prof. Goodenough.

After all, the human factor is, by far, the most important and the most essential one in the question of education.

theatre journal

by Michael Smith Thursday, November 9, 1967 New York, N. Y.

I'd heard about the San Francisco Mime Troupe for years but saw them first last Friday night, when they performed "L'Amant Militaire" at Columbia University. I was astonished by their excellence. They are committed to "making the theatre, in content and in style, a living radical force." The style of the present production is commedia dell'arte, the content leftist revolutionary protest. This is brilliantly entertaining theatre with a purpose: to stimulate, ~~if~~ not create, revolutionary enthusiasm. Its success was unmistakable. At the end of the first act the players had the whole audience, in Columbia's main theatre, chanting in unison: "Hell, no, we won't go!" At the end of the evening the director, R. G. Davis left us with the Troupe's motto: "This is our society. If we don't like it, it's our job to change it; if we can't change it, it's our job to destroy it."

Quebec protest mounts

MONTREAL (CUP) — L'Union General des Etudiants de Quebec will meet Thursday to plan future action. If no government action has been taken, it is likely that a general student strike will be called.

CEGEP stands for "College d'Enseignement General et Professionnel" and is the Quebec equivalent of a junior college or trade school. The first step in the massive overhaul of the Quebec educational system, the CEGEP are intermediate to industrial or university training.

Students at the Universities of Montreal, Laval, and Loyola have either boycotted their classes or occupied buildings or both in support of the 40,000 CEGEP protestors.

Mexican student flies here

Heavy security shrouds an active Mexican student leader who will speak on campus later this week. Because of fear of arrest in his home country, the name of the student, the time and place of the meeting are not being disclosed until the student is in the country.

The Students Administrative Council has invited the speaker to tell of the nature of the student movement and of the struggle to reform the Mexican educational system.

On September 13 more than 120,000 students marched through the streets of Mexico calling for the freeing of prisoners arrested in earlier demonstrations in July, and an end to the use of Police to stop political opposition.

A few days later the government sent police onto the campuses. Hundreds of students and teachers were forced to lie on the ground and be searched before they were arrested.

A U of T Young Socialist spokesman has urged SAC to unite with other student groups throughout Europe and North America to protest the Mexican Government's actions.

Architecture goes free school

By INGRID VABALIS

In a very quiet way, U of T architecture students are radicalizing their whole process learning.

In fact, it's so quiet that the university Senate actually approved these changes at a closed meeting Friday night.

On paper the changes don't look very radical.

Architecture students are still taking ten courses and two optional subjects as shown in last year's calendar.

The radical change is in orientation, goals and thinking.

First, the freshman is confronted with a series of introductory problems designed to challenge and excite him.

He is told to go out and solve them — on his own time in his own way, rather than in the previously established drill methods.

Secondly, one central or "core" problem is developed through the year to give the course a continuity it lacked under the old fragmented system.

Workshops, seminars, lectures and speakers are brought in at various stages of the core problem when they become necessary and relevant.

For example, a core problem for fourth year is building an oasis (one of those restaurant cum gas station affairs on the 401).

A stage in this problem may be building construction. Last year, the problem was confronted by giving students challenging students to solve relevant problems.

so that students were dealing only in academic problems and confronting them in an established way, rather than looking at them in an "open-end" way.

"The student must believe that his solution may be unique," Pragnell's report reads.

Communication is quite rapid in the small department — there are 200 students and 25 professors. With this ratio, change comes through direct faculty student discussion.

A student-faculty forum meets regularly twice a week and is responsible for ironing out difficulties arising from arising from this experiment in course change.

"From the day you walk into the building you start acting as an architect," said Pragnell.

"Lectures and exams are brought in when they serve some purpose."

The reaction of the students has been enthusiastic. Fourth year students built their own classroom environment.

From moveable screens and aluminum paper they created a 20 foot square room out of a huge sterile lecture area.

They put in an old tattered rug, a dilapidated couch, tables and a dozen chairs.

In this casual, den-like atmosphere, the first year class of about 40 students held their seminars and talk

Protesters can't pounce on pavement

Police have refused demonstrators permission to use Yonge St. or its sidewalks for a massive march to protest American involvement in Vietnam and Canadian complicity in the war.

Sheila Lewis, a spokesman for the Vietnam mobilization committee, says the permit was "flatly and outrightly denied" by police. When asked whether the organization was planning to march on City Hall in protest of the police decision, she replied, "not tomorrow."

The marchers planned to proceed from Queen's Park along College to Yonge ending at Nathan Phillips Square. Some demonstrators also plan a protest at the American Consulate on University Avenue. Now, they must march along University or Bay Streets.

It means the end of a gradual consolidation to the left in the executive and in the parallel leftist swing in the council as a whole. (Like it or not, Bob Bossin, the executive does to a large extent control SAC).

It means the end of a politically-tensioned executive, a body that was split between the moderate leftism of President Steve Langdon and the pure radicalism of Wernick.

It also means the loss of a certain vitality in the executive, a progressive friction that has led SAC to an effective "intellectual confrontation" with the administration over such issues as student representation on the President's Commission on University Government.

This series of generalized predictions does pertain to a fundamental conflict within the executive. The Wernick-Langdon split in SAC stemmed from a basic difference in concepts of what a student movement should be.

CEWV plans to ask the Students Administrative Council tonight to sponsor a rally on campus before the march, which will join the main demonstration at Queen's Park. They expect at least 2000 U of T students will participate in the rally.

They expect the International Day of Protest on Oct. 26 will draw more than last year's 6,000 participants because of public dissatisfaction with the failure of the Paris peace talks and the lack of a U.S. peace candidate in the coming election.

As a preparation for the day of protest CEWV hopes to show the movie "Inside North Vietnam" and hold debates and speakouts in which students can voice their opinions. An inquiry desk has been set up inside Sidney Smith Hall.

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Andy Wernick has finally resolved the split in the executive of the Students Administrative Council.

He resigned his executive position as education commissioner at last week's SAC meeting so he could devote more time to the Toronto Student Movement.

What does Wernick's resignation mean to SAC?

Wright reports criticizes OCA govt.

The Ontario College of Art must restructure its current government and administration pattern, according to a government report released yesterday.

"The recent unrest in the College can be largely attributed to an obsolete and faulty pattern of government and administration, according to the OCA Wright report.

Dr. Douglas Wright, Chairman of the Ontario Committee of University Affairs, was appointed in March by Education Minister William Davis to investigate the structure of the college.

He has now proposed that the College can be governed by a council; that the college be organized into four divisions: foundation year, fine arts, applied arts, and evening & extension programs; that academic boards for each division be established.

Ten students would be allowed to sit on the academic boards, along with all "full-time" faculty members. These boards would have responsibility for deciding the division's rules and regulations, courses of study, examiners and examinations. The board would hear applications for enrolment and petitions from students.

The initial reaction from the college's student council was mixed.

"We commend the body of the report," said SAC president Jeff Fear. "We feel that it is a complete vindication of the student's role." "It points out the bad decision-making and the patronage which we objected to. It recognizes that our problems were only brought to light by our militant cy."

"However, the composition of the proposed governing council is too vague," he said. He added that he didn't approve of Wright's making a distinction between "full-time" and "part-time" faculty members in the proposed formulas for the making up of the division and department governing bodies.

Langdon is hampered by the fact that SAC is a student government dependent upon the consensus of an electorate — the student body.

The TSM, however, is a minority group that is trying to build a student movement by raising the consciousness of the student body, not just by representing their wishes.

"There's a limit to how much SAC can play a vanguard role," Wernick told me

Andy loses SAC knack

He listed the possible solutions to the difficulty, and showed how each of them were limited:

- o Langdon's creation of a student movement through SAC — not impossible, but a utopian ideal
- o the impeachment of SAC to establish a new consensus council — but this would lead to a more right wing council.
- o the pulling out of the professional facilities and graduate school — but this would weaken SAC and only institutionalize the present splits.

o to have the student government stay within the limits of the system — but this would lead to more moderation.

"I see SAC moderating already," said Wernick. "The election of Don Ross (IV Trin) as new education commissioner is an example. Through an uninstitutionalized organization like the TSM which is not bound to the electorate, Wernick will find it easier to radicalize students.

"Consciousness is determined by how you can make connections," he says.

Does this mean that violence is a good way to bring home that connection to the student?

"No, I'm a pacifist," he replies.

one lecture a week on building construction.

This year they will investigate building construction. They get lectures on it when they come to the relevant point in their core problem — when they have to decide how they will put up the building.

The third major change is in options. Last year, students could choose religious knowledge options and very little else.

This year they can choose any two courses on campus.

Professor Peter Prangnell, the first year course coordinator, was responsible for one of the reports which began these changes.

He came to the U of T last year from Columbia.

Professor Prangnell said his ideas for change were based on three assumptions:

- o that architects now are not providing a useful service to mankind.
- o that this was happening because the school was not out the wishes of the electorate.

Where does Langdon actually stand?

He supported Ross in the election.

That is ironic when one considers that Langdon is a socialist who sees SAC at least as a vanguard for confrontation.

Despite the emphasis on the tactics of building a student movement, he is working from an ideology towards a concept of education.

The concept is expressed by catchphrases: "radical courses... radical critiques of society... war of ideas... multi-level activities, etc."

The Macpherson Report is a reformist rather than a revolutionary proposal. Wernick regards it as "a shoddy and inadequate document."

The change from Andy Wernick to Don Ross is dramatic, to say the least. It is a change from radical attitudes to mildly reformist attitudes.

Ross describes himself as just left of centre on the political spectrum but offers no comment regarding his recent self-declaration of being "a wishy washy-liberal."

He is a moderate who regards SAC as neither a vanguard of revolution nor a student union, but as a purely representative body to carry out the wishes of the electorate.

Where does Langdon actually stand?

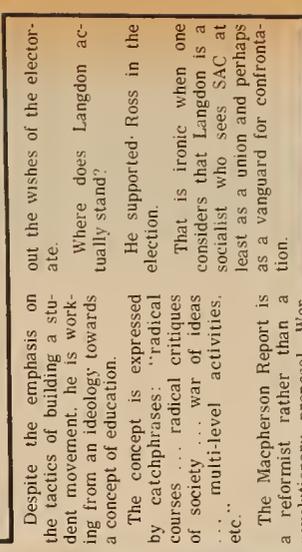

He supported Ross in the election.

That is ironic when one considers that Langdon is a socialist who sees SAC at least as a vanguard for confrontation.

This morning The Varsity will look different, it was announced early this morning.

"I don't know how it will look different," confided Moo Sperlly, who knows about these kind of things. "But it will..."

Furthermore, she added it The Varsity doesn't look different, what will?

JOURNALISTS TAKE NOTE

Christian Science helps meet deadlines

By AGI LUKACS

"Christian Science can protect you. Christian Science can explain God. Christian Science can help you meet deadlines", read the poster on the door.

As this agnostic always planned to investigate a Christian Science Reading Room and never did, I attended a 35-minute service, at Sidney Smith Hall. "All are lovingly invited to attend any Tuesday", explained Fred Buckland (SGS), who read several Bible passages.

The turn-out this time totalled 16. The predominance of men resulted in a slow, resonant recitation of The Lord's Prayer.

A principal feature of the Quaker-like meeting was the giving of testimonials by various participants of what Christian Science meant to them.

There was also a reading of Mary Baker Eddy's guide to the Scriptures.

According to the readings, the basic tenets of the religion are that the "life-giving power of truth... makes man free" of both physical and moral bondage.

This liberation is desirable because "slavery is not the legitimate way of man."

This creed, explained several students at the meeting, has been of practical consequence to many Christian Scientists.

Kim Brady (SGS) found the sense of order his religion gave him helped him in managing his father's contracting firm for the summer.

Paul Plaittner, a graduate student from Chicago, found his religion gave him "a sense of guidance and control" over the panic of not being able to find lodging for this fall.

C. Butler, a regional assistant for the Boston-based Christian Science Church and a former serviceman, felt his religion brought him through a forced march despite a sprained ankle.

Such faith can't help but awe an observer. I had planned to write an article talking about how Christian Scientists are O.K., but I wouldn't want my daughter to marry one, because then my grandchild may one day go without a vital blood transfusion.

I couldn't write satirically about this small sincere group on campus.

But I still have reservations about the evangelistic group's attempt to "cast out error", as they put it.

Biafran blames British

The idea of a united Nigeria was originally a British idea which has gone sour, claims a Biafran graduate student.

Bearded Rex Ugorji, carrying a heavy wooden cane and dressed in tan clothes and forage cap, was addressing about 50 Scarborough College students as part of the Nigeria-Biafra Week program.

Nigeria is split not only by the diverse demands of the 250 tribes which comprise the country, but also by a religious difference which divides the country from north to south, he said.

The Moslems inhabit the north with tribal religions dominating the southern area.

Ugorji blamed the government of Great Britain for many of the Nigeria-Biafra problems.

"Britain tried to superimpose British democracy on 250 different tribes," he said.

The Ibos felt the only chance for the survival of their culture and their people was in secession from the Nigerian Federation, he said.

Ugorji is impatient with those who challenge the legality of the secession.

"Since when were states defined in terms of legality?" he demanded. "States exist for the people, not the people for the state.

"If a nation claims to exist separately, then it has a right to exist separately."

In the Biafrans' conviction of the validity of their cause lies the source of their will to survive.

"If your enemy invades your mother's kitchen you do not surrender."

According to Ugorji, Federal forces will never defeat the Biafran people. While there is a single Ibo alive the Biafran nation is still a fact.

The Biafran is understandably bitter about the British arms supplies which keep the federal army going.

"The real interest in Nigerian affairs stems from the Arab-Israeli War which cut off Britain from Arabian oil coming through the Suez Canal," he charged.

At that time Britain signed contracts with Nigeria for exploitation of the large oil deposits lying under what is now Biafra.

"It's a case of let the Nigerians kill the Biafrans and let the oil flow," says Ugorji.

Ugorji will not accuse Nigeria of genocide outright. "We will not know finally until the war is over."

"However, if you define genocide as the indiscriminate killing of noncombatants, there is definitely genocide going on in Biafra."

Engineers count virgins again

Are you a virgin? Do you want to buy a beautiful woman (virginity not guaranteed)?

Again this year the Engineering Society is running its Computer Dating Service to raise money for the United Appeal. This service is guaranteed to match you with your ideal mate (a 103-year-old spinster doing advanced graduate work in basket weaving).

You can pick up your computer form at the Engineering Stores for only one dollar. This form, as well as getting you a date, will give you free admission to a Computer Dating Dance on November 8.

There are 69 questions on the form (Balex says that there is some significance to that), and question 23 (one third of the way to 69) is very important and must be answered.

If you don't want to fill out a computer form to get a date you can buy a woman at the charity auction Thursday October 24, 1 p.m. in Mechanical 102.

All proceeds will go to the United Appeal, and Eng Soc is expecting 4,000 participants.

By ART MOSES

Why was a graduate English student sitting on a tree stump at the northeast corner of St. George and Hoskin for six hours last week, counting the number of people who crossed the street?

Why was a third year St. Mike's student doing the same in front of Sir Dan's, and a brown haired co-ed next to Sid Smith?

Every time you crossed St. George St. Monday, one of 11 U of T students hired by Damas and Smith Engineering Consultants, counted you off on his tally sheet.

The exact purpose of this exercise in higher mathematics was unknown to most of the amateur surveyors. Some couldn't have cared less.

"I'm just doing the job for the money," remarked Fred Owens (III SMC). Others speculated that the count had some connection with the long-awaited closing of St. George St. to vehicular traffic.

The whole business has been shrouded in the utmost secrecy to prevent any hasty conclusions from being drawn.

One employee of Damas and Smith, interviewed in front of the Forestry Building, refused to answer any questions whatsoever, including the name of the firm he worked for. But another engineer reluctantly volunteered it was Damas and Smith that had been hired by the university.

"The whole thing is really not very exciting at the moment," said A. T. Dakin of the university planning department. "We are merely updating a 1964-65 survey of pedestrian and vehicular traffic, seeking facts and figures on the relationship between vehicles and pedestrians, facts which we could lay on the table in any discussion of the university traffic problem."

"I wouldn't want any conclusions drawn that we are seeking the closing of St. George," he added.

"All we are seeking now are facts on which to build a policy and it would be unfair to draw any hasty conclusions."

The survey continues off and on for the next few days and will also include Hoskin St. and Queen's Park Avenue.

So if you're crossing a main thoroughfare on campus, hold your head high. You may be contributing to the noble cause of university policy making.

Hints to the activist: If you really want to convince the authorities that there is an acute traffic problem here, look for people making notations on a clip board on the roadside and either

(A) Walk back and forth across the street in front of him for an hour or so or (B) Bring a mass of people to one point at one time and march them across the street.

Moral: God bless engineers.

THE RIGHT TO CHOOSE!

The only world you know is the world of personal experience. You are what you have done, are doing, and will do.

Frequently the individual does not seem to be in control of his experience. If you have felt the frustration of not being able to direct your experience in more fulfilling channels, the opportunity is coming to regain control over your life.

Your experience is determined by your thinking. Tomorrow at 8:00 p.m. The Christian Scientists at the University of Toronto invite you to participate in an introduction to the Science of controlling your experience through making right decisions.

A free lecture entitled "What Choice DO YOU Have?" will be delivered Thursday at 8:00 p.m. in Seeley Hall, Trinity College by Miss Jane Robbins of the Christian Science Board of Lectureship.

Everyone is invited. A question and answer session follows.

Mimes Grace

U. of I.

IOWA CITY, IA. — The stage of Macbride Auditorium was the scene of a great deal of vulgarity over the weekend.

The occasion was a performance by the San Francisco Mime Troupe. The actors used words of vulgar language, made obscene gestures and urged the audience to commit acts of an anti-social nature.

It was shocking. It was unparliamentary. It was blasphemous. I don't know when I've enjoyed an evening of theater more.

SAC to debate Vietnam

Vietnam will be the focus of attention at tonight's meeting of the Students Administrative Council at 7 p.m. in the East Hall of University College.

SAC Cultural Affairs Commissioner Mark Freiman (IV UC) will present a motion that SAC support in principle financial aid for draft-dodgers in Toronto.

A motion to the same effect was defeated last year in SAC by two votes.

Freiman said yesterday the motion would probably pass since SAC is considerably more left-wing this year.

Another motion advocating a unilateral condemnation of the war in Vietnam will be presented by SAC Finance Commissioner Bob Barkwell.

The motion reads that SAC:

- demand the withdrawal of all U.S. and allied troops,

- condemn the Canadian government's political and material support for U.S. aggression,

- sponsor a program of debates, forums and films during the International Protest Week Oct. 21 - 27.

- sponsor a protest forum Oct. 25 to focus on issues of Canadian and university complicity in the war.

The Edmund Burkite SAC rep Paul Fromm (III SMC) will introduce a different kind of motion of principles — that SAC "unequivocally renounce and repudiate the use of violence as a tactic of student government on this campus ... by violence we include sit-ins or any other form of obstruction which denies free passage or use of university facilities to any student, faculty, or administrative member of this university."

Booze for sure

A lot of things are uncertain about the Teaching Assistants Association conference and seminar to be held this Saturday.

They don't know exactly where it will be held (somewhere in Sidney Smith it's rumoured), and they don't know who the closing speaker will be.

There is one thing that is definitely known; when the conference is over there will be all the booze you can drink at the Graduate Students Union.

The organizer, GSU president John Winter, said there are still places left before the 200 limit is reached. The main speaker will be Dr. W. C. Winegard, President of the University of Guelph.

Quibell finds victory and Shakespeare's love

By GELLIUS
TRACK Fieldque

"Shakespeare cares for nothing so much as a quibell" — Dr. Johnson, "Life of Shakespeare". And New College's Dave Quibell certainly repaid the Bard (cf. "As You Like It": "the soldier bearded like the Bard and full of strange oaths") for his interest by winning the Cody Trophy (located at the corner of Russell and St. George) awarded to the competitor at the Interfaculty Track Meet scoring the most points. Full stop. Quibell was 1st in the 100; 1st in the 220 and 1st in the hearts of his countrymen; 2nd in the 440; 3rd in the Triple Jump; and ran on the winning sprint relay team.

PHE repeated as meet winners, taking the Rowell Memorial Cup (named after former Hart House Warden Edgar War Memorial) with 51 points. New was second with 33.

IMPORTANT

The Intramural Sports Committee and the Athletic Directorate have ruled that students registered in a faculty or college not represented in any interfaculty sport may register for a pool of players who will be allocated to the various teams.

For FOOTBALL and LACROSSE, students may register up until 1:00 p.m. on Friday of this week.

The Standing Committee for each sport will meet at that time to allocate players.

George's Kibitzeria, Harbord and Huron Streets, regretfully wishes to announce that Lightnin' Hopkins' proposed engagement for this week has been cancelled.

DAY OF INDIANS AS WARRIORS TIE, REDMEN WIN

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

It was a great day for football, October 12. I wish we could have another one like it.

The sun shone, the breeze waxed gently through the autumn leaves, and Varsity Blues staggered to a 19-19 stalemate with Waterloo Warriors.

As the final gun echoed and Blues trudged dejectedly from the field, your roving reporter resigned himself to a long, slow night with the bottle in an effort to drink away the sorrows of watching his favourite football team come up with a big zero in effort against an inferior opponent. Gone now, it seemed, was the team's last chance of winning the Yates Cup.

Riding sadly off into the sunset, he switched on the radio to catch the Argo score. "Queen's 21, McGill 28" the announced said and your roving reporter swerved exuberantly into a ditch.

For, with no thanks at all to themselves, there were Blues right back in the thick of things (so to speak). They don't even have to beat Queen's by 36 points any more; one point victories will suffice.

However, judging from Saturday's disaster against Warriors, even these may be hard to come by. Before 5,000 hometown fans at Seagram Stadium, Blues celebrated Thanksgiving a bit early as they served up a big, fat turkey. They were lucky to tie.

Only some fine individual performances salvaged the team's overall dismal display. Rookies Walt Sehr and Stewart McSween showed well, along with ever-reliable Mike Raham, but after these stalwarts there weren't many hosannas to bestow. Warriors tore gaping holes in Varsity's defense which operated at negligible effectiveness throughout most of the game.

Quarterback Dave Groves and fullback Gord McClelland were the chief culprits. McClelland scored all three Waterloo touchdowns while Groves passed and ball-handled the handles of the ball well all afternoon.

Urged on by the vociferous rantings of the multitudes, Waterloo nudged their way to a 7-0 lead in the first quarter on Paul Knill's 50-yd. single and a 50 yard touchdown run by McClelland. Luckily the convert was wide.

Toronto narrowed the score early in the second quarter when Sehr swept 13 yards for a touchdown. Unfortunately the convert was blocked.

Near the end of the quarter Blues looked like a football team for one of the few times this season, moving the ball 93 yards in three brilliant opuses for a touchdown. Quarterback Vic Alboini passed to Eric Walter for 32 yards, then to Sehr for 19 yards, and finally Mike Raham straightarmed and tack-lebrock his way 42 yards over the goalline. Unfortunately the convert was ruined by a bad snap.

But Waterloo came on in the final thirty minutes to take 19-12 lead. McClelland got the first touchdown of the half with a five yard run. Luckily the convert was blocked. Seven minutes later, McClelland caught a third down, nine yard pass from Groves for his and W's third touchdown. Luckily the convert was missed.

Varsity seemed on the ropes to the underdog Warriors who blew other scoring opportunities when McClelland nabbed yet another pass in the end zone but with his baby toe out of bounds, and when coach Wally Delahey gambled and lost on third down from the Toronto 22 when he could have kicked for a cushioney 8 point lead.

Blues took over at that point and slowly surged down the field for the tying touchdown. Alboini crashed over from the one yard line. Luckily Bill Stankovic kicked the convert. It came at the 6:02 mark of the fourth quarter.

Varsity had one chance to win but a fumbled snap on the second last play of the game ruined an attempt to kick a single from the 33.

While how sweet it was to have McGill shock Queen's, pretty soon Blues are going to have to start making their own breaks. So far, the team once thought "number one", numbers one only in victories.

WALT SEHR

Trackers finish tuneup

By PAUL VESA

On Saturday last, the Varsity track team sent 13 men to a meet at R.M.C. For most of the athletes sent, it was their final chance to make the team, although some of Varsity's top-notch men went along to round out the team. At this meet the team was not out to win any points and they succeeded well in that.

Among creditable performances by Toronto athletes in this meet was the sixth-place finish of Alan Tucker in the 100. Tucker accomplished this despite having run three races in the previous hour.

Our top sprinter, Dave Quibell, was kept from the final in this by a muscle pull in his thigh suffered in the heats. Quibell will be fine for the OQAA, however.

Bill Franklin turned in the second-fastest time in the 440 heats yet did not run in the final. A fine showing was put in by freshman Mark Minden, with a sixth in the 880. Mike Miller pulled off a fourth for us in the mile in a slow time. Aris Birze placed a respectable 4th in the grueling 440-yard hurdles and by his effort gained a place on the team.

Our pole vaulter at the meet, Ron Nastiuk, passed until 11', then missed three times and settled for last place, although his best jump would have won by more than a foot. John Hilliard asked me not to print his name so I won't.

Our relay teams, both make-up squads, managed creditable showings in spite of this fact. All in all, the brightest note of the afternoon was Bruce Tucker's 2nd in the shot put, although he could have won it according to his past record.

The quality of this meet was not the best as shown by such winning performances as 5'9" in the high jump and 85'9" in the hammer throw. However, along with the McMaster meet it shows Toronto will not retain the championship this year. We will probably finish third overall with Mac winning and Waterloo close behind. In spite of a fine crop of rookies, it appears that this year it must be "next year".

ROWING

The second O.Q.A.A. rowing regatta was held last Saturday at Hamilton's Leander Boat Club, and under ideal conditions, the Varsity crew virtually duplicated its finishes of the previous week at Toronto to defeat crews from Western, McMaster, Brock and Buffalo.

In the freshman race, Toronto was third behind McMaster and Brock but the same eight rowing in the junior varsity division finished second behind Western. This strong crew has been rowing well in practice and is expected to show an improvement next weekend at St. Catherine's on the longer Henley course.

In the second race, the experienced Toronto lightweight crew passed Brock in the final 500 metres to leave open water between the two shells at the finish. Rowing again in the senior varsity race, they finished second to a fresher Western crew.

Toronto accumulated 75 to Western's 62½ points, followed at some distance by Brock, McMaster and Buffalo, and presently leads the point totals.

Next weekend at St. Catherine's, however, with Brock rowing on its familiar Henley regatta course and several American crews expected to attend, Toronto will meet its stiffest competition of the season.

Ruggers impress twice

Over the long weekend both Varsity rigger teams were successful against teams from Waterloo.

The seconds from both universities squared off and played scoreless ball for the first half. There was a great deal of good up and under play by both teams. In the second half, Varsity scored nineteen unanswered points to win going away 19-0.

Peter Zepp scored two tries on blazing dashes while little Andy Cairns converted both tries, kicked two drop goals and added a penalty kick for a thirteen-point afternoon.

Following the seconds' match, Varsity's first unit took on their Waterloo counterparts. Blues triumphed 35-0 but they should have been charged at times with loitering. Blues' backs only occasionally showed the hard slashing running game they possess and will need if they hope to repeat as OQAA champions.

A bright light for the firsts was Peter Sutherland whose power bursts up the centre netted two tries. Also playing a strong game was centre Tony Pierre who scored two tries and kicked two converts.

Top scorer again this game was captain George Wraw who had 16 points on an assortment of ties, converts and penalty kicks. Maris Apse, the pack leader also crashed for a try.

Perhaps the most serious test Blues will face all season will be tonight at 8.00 p.m. at Varsity Stadium. Varsity will meet Toronto Irish.

Irish represent Ontario next week in Montreal in the Eastern Canada championships and have six all-Ontario selections on their team.

While Irish are the best club team in Ontario, Varsity rates itself the best inter-collegiate squad in the province. Who will be number one? Come and see, the admission is free.

An Historical Guide to Contraception

By MIKE KESTERTON

Did you know that Casanova had golden balls? Well of course you did, but I mean it literally. He had three of them. They were inserted into his seductees for contraceptive purposes. They didn't work too well because they often became dislodged during flight and the poor girl felt like a pinball machine. (Tilt.)

This is just one interesting detail that can be derived from display called The History of Contraceptives, coming to the St. George campus Monday as a part of the pre-Teach-In program. It will be set up in the foyer of Sidney Smith Hall.

Contraceptive methods are surprisingly ancient. Cave paintings in France illustrate the use of condoms by stone-age man, and their original inspiration seems to have come from a protective sheath widely used to protect against insect bites (the penalty of wearing a breech clout).

The Egyptians had recipes for spermicides used in the uterus — crocodile dung was one. Some have stood the test of time surprisingly well. One formula recommended today as 96 percent safe:

Lactic acid	1 part
Boric acid	10 parts
Ung. glycerini ad	100 parts was mentioned in essentially the same form in old papyri.

Greek women used to leap up and down on their heels after copulation to expel sperm. (Jeez, was I that good?)

The Bible's only reference to contraception is the story of Onan, who "spilled his seed on the ground" — used coitus interruptus. He was criticized for this, and in later years his practice erroneously became to be associated with masturbation (Onanism).

Protective sheath against insect bites

Interesting beliefs sprang up about conception. In the eighteenth century it was believed that complete female passiveness could prevent pregnancy. In the 1860's a U.S. medical doctor, Thomas Ewell, believed coition would result in con-omended as it tended to cause sleeplessness).

The condom developed from a primitive sheath made from the dried gut of a sheep (the Japanese had a form of condom known as the "kabutogata" made from tortoise shell or horn) to the latest in latex. The vulcanization of rubber in 1844 was a red-letter date in the development of the product. Previous to this a linen bag tied on with a scarlet ribbon (for decoration) was used.

(Some connoisseurs of the condom have returned to gut and skin products; they heat better than rubber, thus interfering less with sensitivity).

Each new advance in medical knowledge brought with it new methods of contraception. Radiolo-have been tried, principally on the male because of the convenience. Australian aborigines slit the base of the phallus. Tying off the vas deferens was recommended by a woman doctor during a hearing of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women; she did everything but recommend the wife do it herself with pliers.

Seriously, birth control is the only humane method of limiting population. There have been other suggestions. In 1838, a gentleman who called himself Marcus, writing under the influence of Malthusian doctrines, suggested that all children after the third born to a family be killed. They should be gassed during their first sleep. Furthermore, three out of four "third" children, to be chosen by lot, should receive the same treatment. The resulting corpses should be buried in ornamental gardens called "Infant's Paradises." (Although this sounds suspiciously like Swift's "A Modest Proposal", it was apparently offered seriously.)

The lives of many birth-control propagandists was interesting. Marv Stopes in England, after several years of an unhappy marriage, went to the British Museum and discovered, after doing some reading, that she was a virgin. She embarked on a program of information dispersal so save other women her fate.

Anthony Comstock, well-known bluenose and founder of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, noted that birth-control advocates were often believers in free love and anarchism as well. This aided him in his efforts to suppress these people whom he literally believed were doing "the devil's work."

The exhibition concludes by examining some of the current research projects and problems: the "morning-after" pill, the male pill, and so on.

We have come a long way, and often, since men and women first decided that they wanted control over their destiny and the destiny of their children. But the humane limiting of population is still the central problem of life on this planet.

ception only in the presence of oxygen. He thought that Negroes were particularly fertile because of their habit of copulating in the open air and believed that conception was less likely to occur in the morning in bed, as the air inside the bed became foul during the night and held less oxygen. He therefore announced that people could prevent conception only by making out in vessels filled with carbonic acid or nitrogen, so that the penis would be unable to introduce oxygen to the uterus, a major function of that organ, according to Ewell.

The methods of contraception of the past left much to be desired, and extensive experimentation was carried out. Among the spermicides introduced into the female after copulation were iodine, vinegar, hot soapy water and quinine (not rec-gists discovered that x-rays brought about sterility (discovered accidentally by the way), and so many women took x-ray treatments, a process discontinued when the word "mutation" came into use. Heat, it was discovered, destroyed sperm in the testicles. Experiments were then conducted wrapping the scrotum in asbestos to raise the body temperature, a process known as "thermo-sterilization".

(Thermosterilization can also mean direct application of external heat, as with a poker, but this method is considered unfeasible.)

(Interesting sociological note: in the U.S.S.R. they use "American condoms"; in the U.S. they use "French letters"; in France they use "English riding coats"; and so on.)

Biafran plight 'inhuman'.. MPP

By ANGELA SHENG
 Only cease-fire can prevent the coming of total starvation in Biafra. Stephen Lewis said on campus Wednesday afternoon.
 Lewis, the Ontario MPP who has just returned from a visit to Biafra, reviewed the "inhuman situation" there for a meeting of the SAC Committee on Biafra-Nigeria Crisis discussing the action the Canadian government should take.
 The 25 students, faculty, and church representatives present agreed humanitarian relief alone was not enough.

 "The demand of at least 3,000 tons of supplementary food per day is only met by a meagre supply of 50 to 60 tons per day," said Lewis.
 "And what happens when the basic subsistence of carbohydrates such as garri and yams and rice runs out by December or January if the warfare is not made to halt?"
 "A demonstration" of all concerned will be organized to urge a Canadian proposal of cease-fire at the U.N. Assembly," said Gary Webster (Law) leader of the committee.

 He said, "Such a proposal would, with enough support, generate definite action on the basis of the Declaration of Human Rights."
 "Canada is believed to have the ability to draw such support in the U.N.," he added.
 The Biafra Crisis is not "a problem the black people have with themselves," said Moses Makindie, a Nigerian student. This concerns the immediate life and death of the starving ten million.

what did you learn in school today?

One of the primary aims of this university is learning, and teaching more than likely has some bearing on what we learn while we're here.

In fact, some of the lectures available to students at U of T are more interesting than some of the speeches The Varsity has been reporting.

To give you an idea of what's going on in the lecture hall these days, what did you learn in school today explores classrooms at random — what the profs are saying and how the students are reacting.

By NOEL STECKLEY

"Othello and Coriolanus should be required reading for anyone in the Pentagon," said Professor M. Mueller yesterday.

This remark was generated in English 301 during a discussion of Sir Philip Sidney's "The Defens of Poesie."

Sidney wrote that poetry was a better teacher than history or philosophy. In a further discussion of this Prof. Mueller pointed out that poems like Paradise Lost and Don Quixote generated the desire to act heroically. And were therefore, better in getting people to act correctly in society.

In a roundabout discussion of other authors who had commented on the same theme, or who had disagreed with Sidney, it was pointed out that Shakespeare had taken an opposite position. Nobly motivated acts did not necessarily result in heroic actions.

It was pointed out that the heroic figures of Othello and Coriolanus did not finish as courageous and heroic men, but as incompetent soldiers. This, then, is one of the reasons why Pentagonians should read Shakespeare.

Professor Mueller apologized at the beginning of the class for being a little clouded in his thinking — he had an upset stomach.

One question was asked during the class.

PoliSci course countered

Ten students have established a counter-course to run parallel to a scheduled political science class, and they are getting credit for it, says Andy Wernick (SGS).

The 25-student group is a graduate fourth-year seminar called, "Ideology".

Prof. Stephen Clarkson says he is playing the role of "resource person" in his seminars.

But Wernick charges he "rejected demands for a change in his projected course outline," and also plans to go on marking papers in his "people-generated" class. Prof. Clarkson said last night he would act as a "resource person" when students lead the seminars themselves by presenting individual research.

"The credit hasn't really been worked out", he said, "but those who want credit will have to present some sort of work for me."

The course outline is "too eclectic", claims Wernick. He and the others now in the counter-seminar feel the "comparative politics" course is too broad in scope, "too liberal".

"Social science is not value-free and shouldn't be taught without a conceptual framework", says Wernick.

The students involved in the counter-seminar include Gary Webster (SGS), Phil Resnick (SGS), and Toni McNamara (IUSMC). They plan to attend the "official" course, also says Wernick, "to urge intellectual war on poor or contradictory ideas".

Jacques Larue-Lalonde, journalist and separatist, will speak today in front of Sid Smith hall at 1 p.m. in support of the two-week old student revolt in Quebec.

Some 40,000 students from the junior colleges are now out of class to protest the lack of university space for them, as well as the inadequate distribution of loans and bursaries and the lack of employment services for graduating students.

pay up

Students should support faculty demands for higher wage scales for three reasons:

- A university lecturer (the bottom of the rung) with eight year's experience makes a minimum of $7,800. A higher school teacher with five years training makes a minimum of $8,000.

- If faculty are to work hard and become increasingly competent — thus improving the quality of education — it is hard economic fact that they must be paid a wage comparable with those in the rest of society;

- Students and faculty, usually with the full support of the university administration, are both fighting the provincial government for more money. In the students' case, enough money for more than a dingy room and hamburger four times a week.

sick, sick, sick

Sometimes students really make you sick. Take the SAC debate on Vietnam and draft dodgers last night.

Sure they voted $500 and condemned the Vietnam war. But not until about four SAC members indicated, yes, they thought the war was bad, but they didn't want SAC coming out with a statement on it.

And then there were people like Jim Ford and Don Ross. Ford is probably a big hero with engineers now because he opposed giving money to draft dodgers. Doesn't he realize that these people come to Canada as political refugees under the same conditions as Czechs now, Hungarians 12 years ago and Jews in the 1930's?

Ross is even more interesting. He wanted a cross-campus referral whereby students would sign away 50 cents of their SAC fee voluntarily. Ross didn't want SAC to make a moral decision on an issue as vital as helping someone leave his country forever.

Afterward Ross gave the Toronto Anti-Draft Program $5 from his own pocket.

If that's how he felt, why not just say so? If you oppose the war in Vietnam, why be afraid to say so?

It's a typical example of the kind of gutlessness most students show today. Don't make moral decisions, somebody might not like it.

And those people getting killed in Vietnam and jailed in the U.S. are, after all, far away.

disgusting mime

I am writing to protest the fact that such a notoriously filthy group as the San Francisco Mime Troupe has been allowed to appear on this campus. They are infamous for their crude, barbaric displays of disrespect for society. One of their performances was cancelled in their home town, and they caused riots elsewhere.

In one of your Wednesday advertisements for the Troupe, you quoted them as saying, "We're not out to destroy you, we're out to like it, it's our job to change it; if we can't change it, it's our job to destroy it." They are dedicated to stimulating "leftist revolutionary protest". We don't need violent radicals like that on U. of T. In a third ad, some anti-social type wrote that he actually "enjoyed" the "shocking ... unpatriotic ... blasphemous" "vulgarity" of these so-called actors.

I think it is a disgrace that such a dangerously controversial troupe will be appearing at U. of T.

Let this letter serve as a warning that this group will do a lot more than nut on an act. Rather, as Good luck to these professional agitators.

our money

Disgusted as I was after reading The Varsity's article on the Che Guevara rally at OCE, I was not provoked enough to write the editor. To see how much support the left wing has in our university sickens me. However, learning it was my money through CUS and OUS fees which sponsored this convention promoted this letter. Remember when your support or fees are requested by these unions that this is the type of activity you are financing.

An interesting note on the history of dog food: pre-revolutionary Russian aristocrats kept peasant women as wet-nurses for their pet wolfhounds (makes its own gravy).

A recent development in chemistry is the study of photochromicity, the change in a chemical over time due to the effects of lighting. Actually, this science has its roots in classical times. Alexander the Great of Macedonia kept a strip of linen impregnated with chemicals wrapped around his arm. Sunlight caused these chemicals to change color during the day, and so Alexander had a sort of primitive watch. The textile became known as "Alexander's rag timeband."

Escott Reid replies

The editorial on Glendon College in your issue of October 2, "Revolution Yes — But Not Now", indicates that you have failed to distinguish clearly enough between three separate though related proposals of the Glendon College Student Council and that you may also have failed to appreciate fully the peculiar problems — and peculiar opportunities — of a liberal arts college which has no graduate students and can take only 1,250 undergraduates; which was established only two years ago; which is determined to become bilingual and bicultural within 10 years of its establishment and to draw its students from all across Canada; which is dedicated to the fostering in its students of an informed and active interest in public affairs.

The first proposal of the Glendon College Student Council was that the students of Glendon College should during registration week register in the college but not in courses.

The second was that students and faculty should join in creating courses which interest them rather than courses chosen from the college calendar. These courses or seminars were called student-generated or people-generated.

The third proposal consisted of three parts: there should be a bill of rights for members of the college granting to any individual the right to pursue his education in any manner deemed best by him; the abolition of the formal course structure, compulsory and non-compulsory, created by anyone but the members of the college; and the abolition of all evaluative processes which are other than self-induced.

First proposal

First year students coming to Glendon College are assigned faculty advisers. Students in other years have their advisers in the department in which they are specializing or majoring. Faculty advisers normally see the students before registration. Since the faculty advisers, many of whom are new to the College, would need guidance on the advice which they should give to students, the Academic Dean of the College, Professor Harris, who was a member of the Macpherson Committee, informed his fellow members of the Glendon College faculty:

"The main reason why it is not a good idea for any student to delay his course registration past the regular time is that it is impossible for us to meet the legitimate wishes and desires of most of our students if we do not have adequate notice of what their desires are. Any student who delays to register for courses runs the risk of not being able to get into the courses that he eventually decides he wishes to take . . .

"We will do our best, as we always do, to accommodate all legitimate requests for a change of programme within the official period. All students should by all means be encouraged to "shop around" within the limits set by the available seats in the classes that they wish to audit".

Second proposal

In his memorandum to the members of the Glendon College faculty, Dean Harris went on to say: "I think the "people-generated courses" are a very good idea; and certainly no one should be discouraged from taking part in them.

"But they are essentially "extra-curricular" activities, and, speaking purely as an individual faculty member, I myself would not wish to serve as a "resource person" or even to take part as an ordinary group member in any group which included Glendon College students who were not in good standing; and the first prerequisite for being in good standing in my view is to be properly registered as a full-time student in the regular academic programme of the College."

Third proposal

In my address to the students at the opening of the College on September 16, I said of the proposal that Glendon College should become a college in which every student could pursue his education in any manner deemed best by him:

"Glendon College, situated on its own campus thirteen miles from the main campus of its university, could not become such a college. In an unstructured college the desires of students for assistance from their resource personnel would be unpredictable. One year half the first year students might want help in trying to learn to speak French. Next year only one-third might or perhaps two-thirds.

"Such a college could operate only if it were on or immediately adjacent to the campus of a great university where the college could call on the teaching resources of the whole university. If Glendon College becomes unstructured its teaching staff will be cut by at least a half and it will be moved to the main campus of the university".

I also said, "Only one out of 20 high school students who this year included Glendon College in their list of the four colleges or universities they would like to attend also included the main campus of this university. This means . . .

that we have to mount our own recruiting campaign (in the high schools) independent of that of the main campus.

"The fact that over the past three years we have gradually been building up our own constituency in the high schools has a bearing on proposals that we should now make radical changes in our curriculum.

"I submit to you that if we should now change radically the kind of thing we are trying to do at Glendon College we will have to start once again from scratch to build up our constituency in the high schools. We would have to build up a new constituency. We would be thrown back three years. At this stage in its history Glendon College cannot afford to be thrown back three years. To be thrown back three years would probably finish us".

The cartoon which accompanied your editorial asserted that I was opposed to people-oriented courses at Glendon College. My views on these courses are identical with those of Dean Harris. I think it is a very good idea for students in good standing to take part in them.

SAC to give TADP $500

The Students Administrative Council voted Wednesday night to give $500 to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program.

Mark Freiman (IV UC) presented the motion with an outline of why people dodge the draft, what the TADP is, and why SAC should support it.

"Washington does not allow people to be neutral regarding the war in Vietnam," he said. "You must be either for or against."

He described the predicament faced by a conscientious objector in the United States everything from being assaulted and sexually molested in a five-year prison term to the inability to get a driver's licence.

"The people who are coming up to Canada are not towards," he said. "They are the people who cannot fight on principle."

He denied that TADP was a political organization.

"In aiding the TADP we are not doing anything illegal," he said. "We are just helping people who need help."

Don Ross (III Trin) supported the aid in principle but advocated instead a voluntary donation — that each of the SAC reps be given a petition reading "I wish to give 50 cents of my SAC fees to the TADP."

Bob Rae (IV UC) attacked Ross for "agonizing in public" over the issue.

"We're dealing here with life and death," he added. He votes.

SAC made another moral decision at the meeting.

It passed a motion presented by Bob Barkwell (II Meds) that SAC

• demand the withdrawal of all U.S. and allied troops from Vietnam.

• condemn the Canadian government's political and material support for U.S. aggression.

• sponsor a program of debates, forums, and films during the International Protest Week Oct. 21-27.

• sponsor a protest forum Oct. 25 to focus on issues of Canadian and university complicity in the war.

Fromm said SAC had no mandate to speak for students on Vietnam, since most members' platforms hadn't had a Vietnam plank.

SAC President Steve Langdon noted this reluctance to become involved in international affairs had not deterred Fromm from supporting aid to Biafra at the last SAC meeting.

"It's time someone spoke out against the limitation of freedom," urged Mark Freiman. "In the name of freedom, students have to do this through an educational program."

Joe Young, head of the Committee to End the War in Vietnam, asked that SAC also support the Oct. 26 demonstration.

"I can almost guarantee that this march is going to be violent," Fromm replied.

U of T faculty considers "striking" for increased salary

aries for other categories increased comparably;

• that as the enrollment of the university — and in turn the provincial government — increased, "the resulting revenues be used to increase the salaries of the teaching staff."

The present minimum for a lecturer at the university is $7,800, for an assistant professor $9,500. Associate professors and others receive upwards of $11,500.

Graduate students employed as teaching assistants usually receive less than $2,000 a year and are not members of the ATS.

Any faculty pay hikes depend on a change in the province's method of financing university budgets. Last year

The University of Toronto teaching staff will be asked to refuse to mark final exams if the provincial government doesn't come through with more money for salaries.

The teaching staff of the University of Toronto may go on strike if its wage demands are not met.

But a strike would not mean the closing of classes — faculty would simply refuse to mark final exams.

A special meeting of the Association of the Teaching staff has been called for Oct. 30 next week to consider two tentative proposals:

• that the minimum salary for assistant professors be raised to $13,000 from the present $9,500 floor, with sal-the administration asked for sufficient money to grant faculty a 16 per cent increase. The actual grant permitted an increase of only 10 per cent.

Asst. Prof. P.D. Seary of the University College English department, drew up the motion and called the special meeting of the ATS. He puts his case to the almost 1,500 faculty members in an 8-page statement circulated yesterday.

He stresses that the proposals are submitted mainly for discussion and debate, in hopes of coming to a better solution.

His first proposal — that teachers refuse to mark exams if the demands fail — "interferes temporarily with the labelling process of the university," he said, but leaves the educational process itself "unimpaired."

"It is hoped that the motion, if adopted," he adds, "would never have to be implemented."

"The proposals," he said last night, "are probably more unpalatable to the staff than anyone else."

The Varsity asked professor Seary what the reaction of the students would be to his proposal of increased enrollment and poorer staff-student ratio.

"If this condition was accepted, it would be most unfortunate for the students," he replied. "The better way would be for the students to deal with the Provincial Gov-

Davis nixes Scar. rooms

By MARY BASTEDO AND HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

Education minister William Davis told Scarborough College student leaders Wednesday he could do nothing about their demand for approval of a $1.9 million 330-bed residence.

Approval of the plan would mean reversing a four-year-old policy that Scarborough and Etendale be commuter colleges only, he said.

He told a seven-man group led by council president Jim Debarbieri the matter would be discussed at a November meeting of the Committee on University Affairs.

After the closed meeting in Davis' office, Debarbieri said he planned to attend the November meeting in person to present a detailed brief.

"Scarborough right now is just a nine to five place with no corporate spirit," he explained. "There are no athletic facilities and only one cafeteria."

Until the government approves expansion, the 1,400 students must continue to use the facilities of neighboring high schools.

Rousing cheers.

A TADP representative that the dodgers were middle class. He said half were from the working class and that the TADP was not a welfare organization.

"Any draft dodger on welfare is liable for deportation," he added.

He said the $500 was needed largely for a pamphlet to convey information to Americans about the draft and Canadian immigration.

Most of those in favor of the motion defended it on humanitarian rather than political grounds, and it was finally passed by a vote of 24-14.

A similar motion was defeated last year by four

My trouble is that I'm tired of talking about Trudeau, but somehow can't seem to stop.

Anyone who went to the convention or who worked in the election has discussed The Wit, The Charm, The Elegance, The Arrogance, The Just Society, The Women-In-His-Life themes for about 8 months. We have been eating the same meal over and over since last winter. Yet we keep at it with an unrelenting and prurient fascination.

I know why I can't stop playing Trudeau-scan. He always wins.

He remains inscrutable after eight months under the hot klieg lights of innumerable Insight-ProbeAnalysisTheWayItIsHere 'TheRealMan' interviews.

But we have probably been going about it the wrong way. Instead of attempting to rip off the inscrutable mask in search of the 'real' man beneath, we should accept the mask as part of the real. We should accept his inscrutability as the one solid piece of personal data upon which to base further analysis. We should regard the fact that we know nothing about him as significant.

He tells us nothing about himself because he doesn't need to. He appears to be a remarkably self-contained, self-sustaining man.

When tired or under strain, he seems to retreat within himself to a never discussed store of victories won over himself and over experiences in the past.

He is an emotional man. Some say he wept on that Thursday night at the convention when Mike Pearson said goodbye under the hot lights and the delegates cheered and cheered. Because he is both emotional and highly disciplined he has fought within himself and the battles may have been hard. But he feels he has won. At least the battles are behind him. They were perhaps fought alone when he travelled in the East after the war.

"WHO ARE WE TODAY SIR . . . NICCOLO MACHIAVELLI OR JAMES BOND?"

Long ago he established what he needed of people and what he could give to them. He seems in a curious way an old man, in the sense that he has charted his limits and his needs and is no longer disconcerted as we are by the discovery of some hidden font within our personality.

These personal qualities of discipline and self-knowledge (they are inseparable) may explain much of his success. When you know yourself you can manage other men. You cannot be as easily intimidated: When you know who you are you know what you want to present to the world. The presentation of image in fact becomes unconscious, or more correctly, unself-conscious. Hellyer, by contrast, fumbled his image, alternatively authoritarily paternalistic. Perhaps because he entered politics at 25 and never had time to find out who he really was. Trudeau had the time out of politics Martin-SharpHellyer never had: to establish that sense of self so essential to political success and to emotional survival. I say 'emotional survival' because for many contenders for the leadership at the convention defeat was a profoundly shocking emotional experience. Paul Martin's being was politics. Though Trudeau is easily the shrewdest and most effective politician in Canada, he does not regard politics as his life. Perhaps he is the only man at the Cabinet table who does not believe that thought can only be considered as a prelude to action, or that action is the essence of being human. He values his thought, his solitude more than he values his politics. That will protect him.

Having said all this one must immediately be careful. What I have said is veriest intuition. All men remain mysteries. That is what makes life worth living. What makes Trudeau's mystery perplexing and mythic is that it is deliberate. He knows what he wants to tell us, he knows how much to give, he knows what he wants from those around him. He appears conscious of his own distance.

So we have a politician of myth and mystery in Ottawa. Perhaps what this country has always needed is a priest, oracle, sage, devil, whipping boy wrapped into one larger than life political figure. The Americans have always had such a figure at their heart of their mythology and at the centre of their institutions. Now we've got one, and our frustrations and our aspirations about our country are thrust upon him in anger and in hope.

Whether he does anything or not does not alter the fact that his presence as an extraordinary object of mystery, interest, hatred and awe will irrevocably change the nature of the Prime Ministership and our political character as a country. And I'm damned if I know what this means for us.

Trudeaumania dissolves in Winnipeg

Trudeau invited Peter Warrian, David DePoe and several others to dinner last week. He wanted to bridge the large "communication gap" that had revealed itself in Winnipeg.

That was last May, the first week of the campaign. Both Trudeau's and Stanfield's advisors had them open in the West. Stanfield's opening rally was in the Winnipeg arena. Trudeau flew in two days later to do the shopping plaza circuit. The Canadian Union of Students conference was taking place all that week at the University of Manitoba.

About 70 delegates to the conference decided to demonstrate at the Stanfield rally, mainly for a laugh. We carried posters with slogans like 50 to 1 He Says Nothing or Dirty Unwashed Hippies for Bob. Someone had a sign saying The Black Flag Flies Over the Sorbonne. Surprisingly, we were allowed into the arena. However, when we tried to carry our placards to the front as the kids with the Sock It to 'Em Bob Stanfield signs had done, the police shoved us back — not sadistically as the Chicago police would have done it, but roughly, roughly enough that a lot of delegates came back to the campus with their views of Canadian electoral politics shaken up. But then no-one was going to vote for Stanfield anyway.

They were going to vote for Trudeau, which is why the Trudeau rallies had the impact they did.

The post-mortem for the Stanfield appearance became a planning meeting for the Trudeau rallies. No Black Flag and no anarchy allowed. All slogans went through a poster committee, where a small movement for Fuck Liberalism was headed off. When the committee reported to the general meeting, several more titles — Tweedle-Dun, Tweedle-Dee, Trudle-Dum Bobble-dee and Trudeau Has Mono — were weeded out. Most of the final slogans demanded the Prime Minister speak on the issues. This satisfied the radicals who knew that he wouldn't and the Trudeau supporters who knew that he would. 50 to 1 He Says Nothing and Kiss Me somehow snuck through.

If he did give a Mickey Mouse speech, then it was decided we would sing Mickey Mouse and a choirmaster was elected to begin to sing where he felt Trudeau was irrelevant. The position went to a moderate. The meeting finished at 2 a.m. and there was a certain air of unreality about it.

Sadly, the next day was very real.

The crowd at Polo Park, "the largest shopping plaza in the West," was smaller than the Liberal Party organizers had hoped, though it did number in the thousands. Our bus arrived early. People looked perplexed; these were not the posters that were expected.

"But I thought all the young people liked Trudeau," someone said. We passed out a leaflet headlined Issues Not Images. It said we supported no party but merely wanted to hear policy: would the Prime Minister speak about federal aid to education, about the new government's Indian policy, about selling weapons to the States, about the Carter report? Some read the leaflet; some refused to look at it; some ripped it up. Don Mitchell and Hugh Armstrong spoke over the bull horns we had brought, and passed them around to people in the crowd.

Jim Harding had painted his face with war paint and was passing out leaflets and chanting "Tweedle-dum, Tweedle-dee What's the Difference, You Tell Me."

Trudeau arrived in noise. You heard it for about thirty seconds before you saw him lifted up onto the Rothman's truck that served as a platform. I was surprised that he looked so tanned and so small.

With him was a phalanx of local candidates and party officials, grey flannel young men with red carnations. Someone threw Trudeau an orange and black Trudeau pinwheel. He blew at it playfully then passed it on to one of the nearby candidates who also blew at it.

He bent and kissed some of the front row and accepted a rose which he constantly turned around and around by the stem. The local candidates were introduced and then a woman from the Women's Hospital Association of Winnipeg gave him a copy of Marie Chapdelaine, that great book of French Canada. Trudeau smiled.

When the cheering died down he thanked the Woman's Hospital Association and said it was a pleasure to be here opening the campaign in the West and to meet all these people.

"Issues! Issues!" "GIVE HIM A CHANCE TO SPEAK."

Trudeau ignored the first shouting from the crowd. He said that the Liberal Party spoke with one voice right across Canada.

What does it say? Some laughter. Trudeau picked it up: "There's a young man over there with a sign that says '50 to 1 He Says Nothing'. Well I advise you to bet with that man." General cheers.

Then say something! What are the Issues!

The heckling was growing but Trudeau was still in control: "I'll tell you what the issue is: who will make the best government for a strong prosperous Canada". Shouts of "the Liberals", booing and cheering mixed.

What about regional disparity?

"... one unified Canada".

What about the Indians?

What about Dosco?

"One question at a time," said Trudeau. Cheering.

What about the Indians?

Trudeau didn't answer but hurried through some statement about the bright young men who were running.

Issues. Issues. Issues. Issues.

He looked peevish, certainly not as poised as he had been at the start. "You are impolite. This is a chance for me to meet the people of Winnipeg, not to debate policy. If you want a detailed policy statement, here is a nickel — buy a newspaper."

I was stunned. The week before Trudeau was on The Way It Is disowning Trudeaumania and calling for the public to make a rational decision. A few began "Who's the leader of the club". But Trudeau finished before we realized.

The whole speech was maybe five minutes. All the delegates were now singing Mickey Mouse. There was much cheering and a good deal of yelling and non-scatological swearing at us, especially by middle-aged women. One of the Trudeau supporters from the conference was crying.

The crowd was moving with Trudeau, pushing up against his car. Peter Allnut from McGill held one of the black and white pictures of Trudeau against the windshield. He had scribbled on it in felt pen Roi Negre, the old anti-Duplessis slogan. Trudeau stared at it without expression.

Four Trudeau youth pushed up beside me and ripped up my sign. They laughed. Why do you support Trudeau? Because we like him. Why do you like him? Because he's the best man. Why do you think that? He'll keep Canada together. They pushed away and ripped up Martha Tracey's sign.

When Trudeau was gone we passed the bull horn around again. A crowd of about three hundred gathered. Steve Langdon was at his most demagogic: "We asked him about education. Did he answer?" A chorus of noes.

"We asked him about Indians. Did he answer?" No.

A man in a three piece suit took the megaphone and told Langdon he was wet behind the ears; if he wanted to change things to wait 20 years. A woman beside me said to her friend "I think they're a bunch of drop-outs."

The other rally was at the end of the afternoon in a field near the airport. The human setting was the same: Orange-sweatered Trudeau cheerleaders, an orange-jacketed rock band (who never got to play because an engineer from Queen's stole the evaporator cup from the power generator), the same grey platoon of bright young men, and us with our signs now held together with scotch tape and band-aids.

Only this time Trudeau won the bet.

This was the youth rally — only the CUS people were old enough to vote. It was past the newsmen's copy deadline, so they had gone to their hotels. Contrary to the whisperings of his advisors, Trudeau agreed to answer five questions. Yes, Quebec should be a province comme les autres, yes we will continue to sell arms to the States, no, a capital gains tax will not be implemented.

Federal aid to education was unconstitutional, as education is a provincial matter. He hedged on the voting age: any age was arbitrary: why 18? Even the Trudeau kids shouted "why 21?" This answer they understood and it hurt them just a little.

This was the one time in fifty that something was said, but it was the cautious conservative who spoke, not the dashing young reformer of the newspapers. A few still hurraed the P.M., but if CUS can be said to have "turned radical" at any one time, this was it. It was as if McCarthy had won the nomination and then adopted Johnson's policy in Vietnam.

After the rally, one Trudeau-bopper asked Harding for his address and wrote it on the back of a "poem for Pierre." He promised to write if she would. Langdon got a letter from another Trudeau girl, last week.

Most of the teen-agers didn't stay to talk, but piled onto the buses chanting "Go Go Trudeau." We rode back to the campus on ours singing "Solidarity Forever," every loving middle-class one of us.

Sly reports from a friend in the field

There they were, two pretty little birds by the movie marquee and I slipped up behind them, ready to pounce, when one said to the other, I know Julie Andrews is the star of "Star!" but who's

Julie Andrews

Gertrude Lawrence

Gertrude Lawrence? Why would Robert Wise make a musical biography about her? This bird unnerved me so that I broke from cover and bowed. Gertie, I informed them, or Gee as she was known to me, her theatrical intimate, was only fabulous. The first bird gasped. Oh, she asked, was Gertie an actress? I shuddered. An actress? She was one of the most glamorous and fantastic and fascinating English personalities American audiences ever stood up to cheer. But there is no one in show business today who could bring her back to life like Julie Andrews. When I told them how Julie belted out Gee's ever-popular hits like "Limehouse Blues," "Someday I'll Find You," "My Ship" and "Jenny" in sizzling new arrangements that will zoom them to the top of the charts, they shivered in anticipation. The old songs are the great songs, they sang, joining me in a chorus of "Piecedilly." Wait until you hear the soundtrack album, I added. Rock and roll will reel! And my dears, I leered, just wait until you see how Gee sent the stuffed shirts of the 'twenties and 'thirties into shock! She drove to her bankruptcy proceedings in a chauffeur-driven Rolls Royce. When she went into a show, even fellow actors were unnerved. She delighted in stuffing dressing room keyholes with soap and sewing up the cuffs of coatsleeves so that her victim found it impossible to make quick changes of costume. I fixed both little birds with a hypnotic eye and exposed my canines. Hippies, take heed! Donald Brooks designed the wardrobe for Julie and, he says, girls should prepare to adopt the over-jeweled look Gee made famous. She made it a badge of courage and a mark of status for all females! She was the highest paid entertainer of her time and she used to toss away fortunes on jewelry. What about the men in Gee's life, the second bird asked me, fiddling around a little behind my ears. I swore my downy beauties to secrecy. I'm not given to gossip, I whispered, but there's Richard Crenna, Michael Craig and Daniel Massey who plays Noel Coward... I'll tell you more, I went on, slipping a paw around each of them, but why don't we make ourselves comfortable in the three seats I've got reserved in the balcony? 'till later,

rachel sops it to you

Why did Rachel, Rachel ever get produced in 1968? Why couldn't someone have directed this soapy sob story back in the '50's where it belongs? At least then we could watch it on a Wednesday night late show.

The script for Margaret Laurence's novel A Jest of God had been lying about Hollywood shelves for some time without any takers. And no wonder: her story deals with one summer in the life of a small-town 35 year old virgin schoolteacher, desperately trying to work out her problems. With that contemporary theme as a base, no director would touch it.

The film unfolds the slow development of an undertaker's daughter who leads a very uneventful life in New England (Manitoba in the novel). She is a lonely woman living with her mother, afraid to face up to her problems. During her "last ascending summer" at 35, she gives religion a go at a frantic, orgasmic revival meeting. She then falls into an empty love affair with a slick childhood friend. By the end of the summer she reaches some conclusions.

Evidently Paul Newman saw the book and was mildly impressed. He not only produced and directed the film, but he used it as a vehicle to display his talented wife, Joanne Woodward, in the lead role. Bravo to Newman in his directing debut for not blowing it completely. But, for my part, he doesn't exactly deserve raves either. I can think of very few directors, Newman not among them who could have rescued this born-loser of a script by injecting the ingenuity of their style. The sympathy the theme evokes demands subtle and very delicate handling. Otherwise, it comes out as pure sentimental slop.

Rachel, Rachel has many tender, even brilliant moments. Director Newman is clearly fascinated by his wife's face, as the camera envelopes Miss Woodward's features entirely. There are not pretty, but exciting close-ups of her nostrils, twitches, toes, her walk, and her baleful eyes. The woman suffers with her face, as bags form under her eyes, and she manages little else than a self-conscious grin. "It's just a new experience having contact with anyone". Her face is at the same time an old woman's and a little girl's.

Newman often flashes back to Rachel's childhood, in usually effective attempts to parallel her feelings in the past with the present. Her mild fantasies in new situations and self-conscious moments flash on the screen: we can see her mind even as she acts. The lesbian advances made by her friend Cara (Estelle Parsons, Blanche in Bonnie and Clyde are also treated with a non-dramatic natural quality, so that it barely shakes us. Scenes like these, that betray the director's emotional sincerity for the subject, are too inconsistent, unfortunately. Their random inclusion raises this film only a few cuts higher than drivel. For the remainder of the film Newman plays it straight, and that's bad news. At home, for example, Rachel listens over and over again to her protective mother's trite conversations and advice. It's damn frustrating. She asks Rachel to bring home a chocolate bar three times, or tells her the latest town gossip. And so it goes.

Newman doesn't know where to stop. Scenes are simply constructed and stretched to emotional limits, to impress on us something that is obvious; they leave little to be filled in by the viewer. The pitifulness of Rachel's situation is hammered at until it obscures the tenderness of other scenes. By trying too hard, Newman has missed the total effect.

The story has for me, the scope for a treatment that could have avoided many of those corn-filled straight scenes. The workings of Rachel's mind are far more interesting than the inanity of her circumstances. She can't get out of herself. She is so uptight she can't see who she is; she performs without being aware. We feel her conflicts throughout the movie, but we never see her searching for herself. In this way, the theme is not only contemporary, but ageless.

hot millions is a 1,000,000 laughs

I have yet to meet a single person who dislikes laughing; this is why Hot Millions is such a success.

The film isn't hung up in trying to put across a complex theme, or in establishing a suspenseful and intriguing plot. Neither does it contain satirical or critical elements, nor those other complexities that writers and directors have a habit of snarling up viewers with.

The simple fact of Hot Millions is that it's funny. Sure, it may be nice to investigate the great flaws in society, as some directors are always doing, or get wound up in the plot of a mystery. However some people just don't care for social criticism or murder plots. Everyone has their own taste, but love of laughter is universal.

Of course, humour comes in many forms, ranging from slapstick to subtle, sophisticated digs. Whatever your taste in humour may be, you'll find it in Hot Millions. The movie tries to please everyone and does just that.

Peter Ustinov plays an ordinary man with an extraordinary lust for money. He decides to satisfy his need by defrauding a corporation which is controlled by a supposedly flawless computer. His wistful sense of humour impels him to use the machine to do his work for him.

Ustinov's employer is an exaggerated character, made to look foolish right from the start. He hires Pendleton (Ustinov) with the notion that he will be greatly beneficial to the firm. Mr. Gnatpole, Pendleton's equal in the company, suspects that something is amiss. He tries to foul up the swindle while at the same time attempting to make Pendleton's wife.

The characters and plot are patently fake, but the unreality actually enhances the movie. It would be phony to try and draw a moral or lesson from this beautiful and very light-hearted film.

Good entertainment for all fun-lovers at the Hyland.

Marcus' (Peter Ustinov) secretary, Patty (Maggie Smith), is surprised by Klemper (Karl Malden) after removing her dress to change a typewriter ribbon. (huh?)

a masterful production of a difficult play

A home-made bomb explodes and a Russian Grand Duke is blown to bits. Political sabotage by a small group of socialist terrorists.

What came before and what comes after? In Albert Camus' long and often tedious play, Les Justes, he looks into the lives of five of the terrorists and confronts the audience with many of the basic questions inherent in any revolutionary movement.

Can one who kills for revolutionary cause live with himself?

Can life still hold beauty and innocence while the struggle goes on against the tyranny that prevents beauty and innocence for all?

What is more important, justice or love?

The fact that any director chooses to work with this wordy and potentially static play, implies that he didn't back into it. The Just Assassins (as it is known in English) isn't the type of play that you back into.

Martin Hunter, the director of the production now playing at the church on Glen Morris St., has successfully coped with the difficulties this play presents and come up with a masterful production.

The play is in two parts which hang together very loosely. Camus takes the rap for that. In the first half, the plot to bomb the Grand Duke flops once because there are children in the carriage on its way to the theatre. The second try succeeds and the duke is killed. Considering the tension built up, the play could end here, after the bomb has been thrown. Trouble is, there's no resolution. We have to wait through an intermission to find that the assassin has been captured and condemned to the gallows.

In the second half, we see the plight of the assassin, Janek, (played by Bob Thomson), who has to come to terms with himself and the killing he has committed. (We can't use the word murder.) The Grand Duchess comes to see him and confronts him with the fact that by killing a man, he has only killed another living being, not the whole cause. He must bear the full burden of the killing on his shoulders.

Sometimes it seemed a bit silly and naive, this trying to vindicate the killing by the fact that you're going to get killed yourself. And by heavily emphasizing this frivolous notion, Thomson playing the young, poetic and idealistic assassin, comes off a little short of believable. We did not see enough personal struggle within himself. In order to put action into a play that has too little action, Thomson did too much jumping on tables and flailing of arms.

Somehow it was never really believable that death would redeem the souls of those who threw the bombs. And it detracted from the subtlety and art of the rest of the play.

The rest of the action, however, brought home the dilemmas that plague any group of people that put themselves against all of existing society.

Paul Mulholland, looking like Captain Ahab, his cheekbones protruding and his eyes glaring out of deep sockets, gave a chilling portrayal of an anarchist leeching of any human concern.

It was he that this reviewer was most able to identify with. Because in any question of humanity, the question arises, "Can you really love humanity?" It's very easy to hate humanity. When you hate humanity, you hate life. But when you start talking about universal love of humanity, then you're standing on pretty shaky ground.

The others in the group, who agree that killing children would be intolerable, show up the glaring inadequacies in the philosophy of terrorism. If you won't kill children, why should you kill their father?

Then there arises the question, "Is there any place for love between a man and a woman in a group dedicated to terror in the name of love of Mother Russia?"

Mary Hulholland plays Dora, the maker of the bombs and the only woman in the group. In a half desperate attempt to get Janek to say that he loves her, she uncovers the painful plight that Janek cannot afford to allow himself this escape.

Somehow, Dora seemed too full of life. Mary Mulholland spoke the lines as a wan, old-before-her-time, hardened woman, which clashed with her pretty, blonde appearance.

At one point she said, "I was young and pretty once too." It just didn't look congruous. Dora, I think, should be tired and oldish because that's what Camus meant her to be. But her being young and pretty livened up the play. What can you do?

It's a play full of questions, none of which is really resolved. In order to retain the audience's attention, the questions must arise, the dilemma be dramatized and then be cut off at the moment of highest tension. Martin Hunter manages to do this well. Like Marat-Sade, one of the other great dramatic works about the nature of revolution, this production keeps the audience on a string, pulling them up just as they feel they have reached the end of the rope.

Hunter and his actors have maintained an intensity throughout that is fully engrossing and that at times breathtaking, especially when the bombs are thrown, when Janek confronts Stepan on the question of innocence and terror. And the scene in which the group sits through the hanging of Janek is skillfully built up to a dramatic finale.

Camus is never easy to produce. There's too much problem and ideology and too little dramatic style. But it's a credit to the company and a good start for the studio productions of the Drama Centre that the play comes off as convincing and moving.

resounding tinkle tinkles

Victoria College and its Drama Club have resolved the problem facing most small theatre groups on campus this year — the lack of stage facilities — in a more than satisfactory way.

They have infiltrated a new lecture hall — Room 3 — and turned the lecture platform into a large stage. "It's going to be enlarged — soon —" said Julian Field, director of the opening production, and he added something about a permanent balcony on one side.

He had a more confident air than U.C. students do when alluding vaguely to the Women's Union Theatre, so perhaps there will be results. Meanwhile, as a vehicle for the necessarily restrictive lunch-hour format, Room 3 is quite adequate.

Designer Anne Kewley put up two painted flats and added some living room furniture (Canadian Arborite and early classroom combined cunningly) to suggest the home of Bro and Middie Parodock in Julian Field's production of A Resounding Tinkle by N. F. Simpson.

The only non-theatrical aspect of the vision was in the lighting. Unfortunately, in places like Room 3 there are only two varieties, on and off. However, even this was made the best of by the Vic Thespians.

The production showed, on the whole, too much concern with technicalities and not enough with the spirit of the play. Blocking was evenly arranged and properly motivated, but unimaginative. The pace was smooth, whereas it might have benefitted from some variety in rhythm now and again.

The dialogue was almost a monotone, an occupational hazard in small productions. Don Rempell and Anne Kewley, as Bro and Uncle Ted, managed to be convincing, occasionally delightful. Diane Hoar played Middie as a Vic undergrad, neither sitting nor moving with any stage sense to speak of.

The small-talk of Tinkle was transposed deftly from British local to Canadian yokel jargon, a most banal effect indeed. The play, which is extremely funny, raised hardly a chuckle — neither the actors nor the director seemed to have captured the essence of the comic sense.

Technically, A Resounding Tinkle is a simple piece, but it can not be done in a simplistic manner. Despite intelligent and interesting program notes, recognising the play as an 'absurdist social satire', Field has almost treated the production as serious social commentary. To do so destroys the whole impact of the biting satirical approach.

This entire reading lacked vivacity; rather than resound, the Tinkle tinkled.

Once there was a madman who fell in love with a young girl's ear. It looked so pink and beautiful that one evening he followed her home from work, cornered her in a dark alley, and slashed it off with a straight razor. He then wrapped it in a handkerchief and ran home.

With trembling fingers he unwrapped it and held it under the light. But when he undered, he was surprised to see that it looked like a piece of cheddar cheese, just a yellow, misshapen piece of waxy gristle. He suddenly realized that the whole was greater than the sum of the parts, that he had fallen in love with the ear because it was attached to a head.

"Sonuvabitch!" he muttered, "I guess I'll be a good buy and return it to her by mail."

anne's antics amuse all

"Anne of Green Gables never change
I like you just this way
"Anne of Green Gables in my heart
You are forever young."

Anne (spelled with an "e") hasn't changed at all from L. M. Montgomery's book version you read when you were eight, and nine, and ten... well, I read it six times!

For those underprivileged types who haven't read this children's classic, the story goes that a skinny, freckled orphan with red hair is adopted by an old bachelor and his spinster sister in rural P.E.I. In spite of her chattering tongue and rampant imagination (or perhaps because of them) she wins the hearts of all Avonlea.

Great Shades of Pollyanna? NO! Anne is a very real person who works herself into very real scrapes (drunken tea parties and green hair are real?) As well, throughout the production, there are all kinds of snide little cuts about society's values and prejudices, which may encourage cynics to go and see for themselves.

The production itself is excellent. Alan Lund's direction and choreography do more than justice to Donald Harron's and Norman Campbell's musical comedy.

Gracie Finley as Anne, is much better than the original Jamie Ray. At 17 she fits the child's part better, and she probably has that P.E. Islander "feel" for the local heroine.

Anne's romantic interest is Jeff Hyslop, a 17-year-old Vancouverite, who plays a young, very natural Gilbert.

Barbara Hamilton and Peter Mews, (remember 'Timber Tom' on the Howdy Doody show?) in their fourth season as Marilla and Mathew Cuthbert, continue to send the audience from the theatre groping for Kleenex.

Trudeau:

Purveyor of the just as it is society

Pierre Elliott Trudeau captured the imagination of swinging young Canada in a way no one thought possible. There is no need to recount Trudeau's rise to the Liberal leadership. It was all very exciting and has been duly recorded for posterity in the pulp literature on the Man.

The two new books on Trudeau. This is Trudeau by John Harbron, and Trudeau: The Man for Tomorrow, by three reporters for 'The Telegram', would have been barely tolerable had they appeared during the leadership race or during the election, when Trudeau's style and personality were the subject of such incredible public interest. But in the post-organismic atmosphere of October they appear as slightly quaint and outdated views of the Patron Saint of the Pepsi Generation.

I worked in the general election for Charles Caccia, the Liberal candidate in Davignon, and the effect that the name, Trudeau, and the smiling visage of the man had on the voters was almost unnerving. The bloodshot, tired, unfriendly eyes of the voter peering through the screen door would be transformed by the apparition of the smiling technicolor Mr. Trudeau.

Yet one cannot help feeling that in four years time the vision of a slightly more lined, slightly balder, slightly greyer Mr. Trudeau will not have the same effect on your average Canadian voter. He who rises by the law of the pop idol will presumably decline with the same rapidity.

The 1968 Liberal campaign, as all the Conservatives and New Democrats claimed, was a campaign without issues. The Liberal party had found what they knew to be an unbeatable vote-getter; they saw no reason to worry too much about a platform. Their position on the constitution and federalism, thanks to Mr. Trudeau himself, was loud and clear. And it was a position which was the principal intellectual justification one could use for voting Liberal. As in 1968 so in every election since 1896. The Liberal Party is the National Party; Mr. Trudeau was the only candidate with strong roots in both parts of the country.

But on vital questions of the economy, attitudes to social change, and foreign policy, the Liberal party was silent. "What about the Carter Report" should have replaced "Wot abah the workers" as the piping chant of the unhappy and the unheard. And, in fact, it did. But against the din of "I touched him, I touched him" and "There are not two Canadas but one" those who would have acted as the conscience of the campaign had no chance.

The campaign revealed a good deal about the Liberal Party, as well as about Mr. Trudeau himself. The Party never had an ideology, which has, of course, been the perpetual lament of the Canadian left. But in 1968 it also ran out of ideas.

The Trudeau campaign bore (except superficially) no resemblance to the crusades of the New Deal, or of the New Frontier, or even of Harold Wilson or (seriously) Lester Pearson later on in the 1960's. There was no redeeming social content in Mr. Trudeau's speeches (there was really no content at all); instead of talking about mountains to climb, wars to win, and diseases to conquer, Mr. Trudeau talked about limitations of government, about people helping themselves, about pragmatism, pragmatism, pragmatism.

The approach could have been refreshing, and indeed at first it was, but it eventually became apparent that the pragmatism had no substance behind it. There have been no public statements about Watkins or Carter, about poverty (except that it's bad), about housing (except that it's good), about education (it's none of our business) and unemployment (that's no good either).

And so the Liberal Party, which in its own wishy washy Pearsonian way had started a War (of sorts) on Poverty, initiated Medicare (wherever they could get away with it), and worried about foreign investment and unequal taxation enough to set up Commissions to study them, has even given up trying to maintain a progressive image.

1968 was the Year of the Crusade in Canada, not for an ideal, or for a set of ideals (as it was for McCarthy in the U.S.), but simply for a Man and a Style. Daniel Bell's pragmatic world without ideology has become the consensus nightmare of "these are complex problems, we must examine them carefully, expect no miracles." And, from what one can gather, expect no coherent attempts at solutions either.

Mr. Trudeau, for all the fire of his youth, the anger of La greve de l'amiante and Cite Libre, and the vigour with which he attacked Mr. Duplessis, is an intellectual conservative. His is a legal mind, his intellect austere. He sees things legally and institutionally. When asked by Patrick Watson in an interview about there being two laws, one for the rich and one for the poor, Mr. Trudeau argued that this was false: "there is one law, for all Canadians". The economic and social realities appeared to have little meaning.

And so it is with a tremendous sense of limitations and austerity that he attacks these problems. To those who criticize the Canadian government for its complicity in the Vietnam war, Mr. Trudeau talks about economic realities by resurrecting that old technique, reductio ad absurdum: "Then we could stop selling to these bums. You'd have pure hands. You'd have clean hands. But you'd have empty bellies and you'd be lying on your faces." This remark is, of course, patent nonsense. Canada would not be reduced to a state of complete economic and physical degradation if it started asserting its economic and political independence.

It is a favorite debating tactic of Mr. Trudeau's. Almost out of guilt for his own conservatism, picketers and hecklers in Quebec are called "peddlers of hate", and "punks", and (this is the ultimate insult) "students". And again on the question of foreign investment, "You could get rid of it. Cuba did it very quickly. But either you fall and economic responsibility are other features of his conservatism, as is his total adoption of the myth of individualism. Lord Acton and Cardinal Newman were, he said recently, two of his greatest mentors. Where Harold Laski fits in here is hard to see.

The triumph in June was the victory of medium over message, of style over substance. Trudeau has great personal qualities, charm, wit, intelligence. His rise to power is not 'inexplicable' or 'astounding' at all; he is far and away the most attractive and vital politician on the federal scene. And style, in its own way, is important.

The almost unbearable self-righteousness of the NDP was revealed in all its glory when David Lewis claimed that what had really happened in the election was a great Mistake, that the Canadian maiden had been momentarily seduced — much against her better judgment — by that flower-waving, bilingual Hedonist down the street, but that she would soon realize her Error, and like the Fallen Woman of old, return to the True Path a sadder but oh! how much wiser soul.

There is no reason, apart from sheer blind stubbornness, why the Canadian left should be stuck with leaders sounding (and looking) vaguely like Beatrice Webb and Annie Besant addressing the London Workingman's Association Convention in 1922. The grey old spinster with wire glasses and sneakers has become the national image of the NDP.

There is no reason that those who seek fundamental social change should be satisfied with that image, or worse, say that image politics are inherently evil and should certainly not be adopted by God's chosen people. Images and stereotypes have been around since politics was invented; they are, in their most grotesque forms, a symptom of political idiocy, but there is no reason why they should be shunned as the recent invention of some swinging Beelzebub in a cravat.

But the victory of style has been an empty, if not totally disillusioning one. The conservatism and legalism of this swinging new government have become an almost unbearable reality.

Witness the Speech from the Throne, witness Biafra. The first reiterated the Rhetoric of Limitations, the second revealed an obsession with legalities and political niceties. The response to the Report of the Economic Council of Canada has, thus far, been an aggrieved silence. On Vietnam the government has been more conservative than most elements within the American Democratic Party. And the unemployment evident last summer and clearly in store for this winter has been met by cutbacks in government spending and determined attempts to balance the budget. Whatever happened to that great Liberal, John Maynard Keynes?

On June 25th, 1968, the Canadian people opted for John Stuart Mill in a miniskirt. Individualistic conservatism has been Christmas wrapped, and tied in a bright red bow. Beatle music now plays where Frank Sinatra was once the vogue. Sussex Drive may swing, but the lyrics are still the same, if not even more hesitant than those of the past five years.

Hence we have Trudeau as the conservative. One cannot but admire the discipline of his mind, the simplicity of his prose, the rigour of his considerable intellect. It is a sad reflection on the intellectual sterility of Canadian politics that so many sympathizers of the NDP came around for Mr. Trudeau in 1968: the only explanation — apart from his position on Quebec — is that the man was so much more intelligent and tough-minded than anything Canadians had been exposed to in living memory that the social and economic philosophy he was enunciating went conveniently unheard.

But surely the infatuation with intelligence should come to an abrupt halt. Those interested in radical social change and reform should no more look to Mr. Trudeau as an idol than the Progressives and CCFers looked to Mr. King.

For Willy King is alive and well, jazzed up and wearing sandals. The language is new — indeed Mr. Trudeau can speak the language of compromise in both French and English — but the message is the same. Go slow, don't take chances and, whatever the cost, stay away from basic principles. Keep the country together and happy, even if it means perpetual stagnation. Trudeau Liberalism has become the new opiate of the people: we shall continue to swing and sing our way down the path to nowhere in particular, at no particular speed, for no particular reason.

flat on your face or you have to replace it with your own investment. There's no sense getting rid of American capital and then replacing it with Russian capital."

One could almost make a party game out of this technique. Quickly reduce an argument to its most absurd common denominator. Then stand it on its head. Insult those who put forward the argument. Stress your own refutation by ad hominem guilt of association. (i.e. you are an idiot, ergo your argument is idiotic).

The only drawback to this weapon is that it does nothing to solve the problems, like foreign investment and the Canadian position on Vietnam. Mr. Trudeau is no longer the gadfly of Quebec politics; he is the defender of status quo Canadian Liberalism. He attacks his political enemies with guts and pizzazz, but the action is all verbal. Doubtless the two "problems" I cited above are included in the "extremely complex" category "for which there are no easy solutions". What we have now is government by rhetoric, and even then it's a conservative rhetoric.

Such important legal structures as federalism and provincial rights become self-imposed limitations. Housing is a provincial responsibility, as is education. So, presumably, is social conscience.

Mr. Trudeau's great emphasis on economic stability

Catalyst: A poetic Review

i sat down to review catalyst this morning, from the galley proofs, which was rather difficult; now however i have a pre-distribution copy which makes me feel incredibly superior & in the position of arbiter of all that is good & fine in the poetic cosmos;

this time out the format is much better, you know, more professional & on the cover is a green universal egg & a lot of c's which makes it look rather as if it were put out by collier which it is not;

i talked to john holland for an hour & he smiling told me ruthless it was what i should be so here is what i don't like: (being a highly opinionated & thoroughly subjective view of the negative aspect) first off, the play by r. barretero-rivera takes up twelve pages & while it is not a bad play i really couldn't sympathise, especially when i considered how many short beautiful poems could have been included in its place—a biased view i suppose but really, all that poetry . . .

and while on the subject of things which take up a lot of space where poetry should be—well elizabeth greene's short story a matter of directions is beautiful & elizabeth greene who & wherever you are, thanks; i wouldn't even replace you with dylan thomas or al purdy or even doug fetherling whose poem ferry to lewis is very good; doug fetherling's poetry used to leave me cold but it grows on one:

2 policemen are standing there w / smiles on their faces im going to Halifax to pray and double dactyls? why cannot all of my subjects write double dactyls? they as far as the rest of the poetry is concerned, it is generally of very good quality & i single out helena kaminski whose poem vibrations has a rare underlying rhythm & an exquisite sense of colour. (critical jargon is rather limiting isn't it? read it for yourself) & pat ryan's peter prick, lsd which has the president of those united states benignly smiling & saying they're all my helicopters, son. & among all of the poets taking themselves pretty well seriously there is david loaring:

And never did come back Never did come back.

among all the poetry in catalyst i tend to be rather uncritical when it hits me as effective & much of it does, although margaret atwood rather disappointed me; i had expected more.

unfortunately catalyst has ads which i guess is unavoidable. money again: why won't someone give catalyst some money so they wouldn't have to go commercial?

p.s. i just read jack ludwig's short story which i thought i wouldn't like, but did. a wonderful uninhibited sense of language.

dare i say i don't like the name catalyst? a small point. it is a very good magazine & only costs fifty cents. buy it; it is better than the beloit poetry journal.

N.B. Mickleburgh & Rae:
Herewith a poetic review of Catalyst. Maybe i did it because my critical faculty deserted me for the moment. (Presuming I had one to start with). Anyway, I wasn't moved to prose, which probably says more for Catalyst than I could say. Let me know how you like it, preferably by mail. # a look at prairie politics

Politics in Saskatchewan edited by Norman Ward and Duff Spafford

When one considers that interest in Saskatchewan politics spills far beyond its borders, it is surprising to note the paucity of publications about the subject since Lipset wrote Agrarian Socialism.

For that reason, the new book, Politics in Saskatchewan is welcome indeed. Its editors, Duff Spafford and Norman Ward, are probably in the best position to fill the gaps which exist in the subject. Both have stayed aloof from partisan political battles. As professors in the Department of Political Science at the University of Saskatchewan, they have always encouraged their graduate students to explore the complexities of Saskatchewan politics.

The editors suggest they have refrained from duplicating material already in print. Two essays, however, by Evelyn Eager and Duff Spafford refine and re-interpret material which has been accepted as gospel in Lipset's Agrarian Socialism. Spafford's article contributes a wealth of insight into "The Left Wing 1921 - 1931". Although he does not criticize Lipset, there is an implicit rejection of Lipset's application of the theories of Michels, Marx and Weber to Saskatchewan politics. Spafford's article should survive the test of time.

It is perhaps surprising to find two articles about "The Legislature and Responsible Government" and "The Referendum and the Plebiscite". To this observer, they are the most important articles in the book. It is a disappointment, however, that there was little attempt to relate the two articles to contemporary Saskatchewan politics — particularly because Norman Ward has elsewhere provided astute comments on the Liberal Party's revival of the plebiscitarian view of democracy.

The 1961 conflict over the proposed county system of local government and the 1962 medicare conflict involved more than a dispute between those advocating and those opposing the programs. The conflicts were intensified by disavowals of the legitimacy of the principles of responsible government, and demands for plebiscites.

The Liberal Party took a position after the 1960 election that the CCF did not have a mandate to proceed with a medical care plan without a referendum because the CCF received less than 50% of the popular vote. The 1962 federal election was freely interpreted as a plebiscite on medicare, and the NDP setback, as a victory for those demanding a referendum. When, in 1964, the Liberal Party observed the popularity of medicare, it strongly supported the program, but said the CCF government was "arrogant" because of its method of implementation.

The Liberal Party's revival of a plebiscitarian view of democracy enabled it to consolidate the support of those opposed to medicare and the proposed county system without taking a strong position. A demand for a plebiscite takes debate out of the legislature and gives it to the electorate. If the government does not hold a plebiscite, the electorate is told the government is arrogant.

If it does, and a plebiscite kills a program, the government has, in effect, lost its ability to govern. That was the dilemma the CCF government faced between 1960 and 1964.

The article by Escott Reid, "The Saskatchewan Liberal Machine Before 1929" was written in 1936. It has become an outstanding classic, probably cited more frequently than anything printed in The Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. As such, it has a definite place in the book. However, perhaps it is time for someone to compare the post-war organizations of the CCF and Liberal Parties.

Both Parties have large membership lists. On July 23, 1963, the membership of the Saskatchewan NDP was 30,763; that of the Liberal Party, 23,761. Vigorous Party organizations provide civil servants and politicians with opportunities to rapidly evaluate their programs. They also provide a source of conflict between the professional standards of the civil service and the particular frustrations of those being administered. This conflict can be mediated by Party Executives and MLA's. C.E.S. Franks contributed an insight into a possible consequence of this conflict when he wrote, "... the exodus of senior public servants since 1964 was not because they were patronage appointments, but because the Liberal Government had a quite different attitude towards professionalism in the public service and planning in government." (p. 37)

The book, Politics in Saskatchewan, does not fill all the gaps in the subject. Its editors make no pretensions that it does. The articles offer a reasoned balance to many aspects of the subject which becomes more complex with each new publication. Perhaps in ten or fifteen years, the editors will provide another book: More Politics in Saskatchewan.

The CA, a quiet revolutionary.

In the last few years business has changed as much as skirt lengths. So has the work of the Chartered Accountant.

Today the CA helps solve a host of problems rising from new technology (including the computer) and the changing social scene.

He must be able to develop and interpret a wide range of economic data as a basis for decision-making and corporate planning.

If you are a creative thinker, with a strong analytical ability, accountability may be the profession for you.

You might join an independent accounting firm, serving a varied list of clients, perhaps becoming a partner eventually. Or you might start your own practice.

Or you might become a key man on the management team of business, or join a non-profit enterprise, or work in education or government.

toronto symphony opens

Something has happened to the TSO this year. It is, and will continue to be a highly polished piece of musical machinery: this much at least has been taken for granted since the arrival of conductor Seiji Ozawa three years ago. But much of the infectious vitality that Ozawa injected into the orchestra in the past now seems to have drained away, and although the sparkle is still there, it too often appears to be artificial. Perhaps the symphony has become too "professional", too wrapped up in its fast rise to prestige; or it may be that Ozawa, drawing toward the end of his stay in Toronto, is no longer as enthusiastic about his work here as he once was. It is hard to say.

These observations, based on the opening concert of the season, are possibly somewhat premature; first performances are not usually the best. The overall air of nonchalance that pervaded the evening was a little disappointing, but there were enough high points interspersed throughout to leave ample room for optimism.

Most of these occurred in the performance of the Concerto for Orchestra by Bartok. As the title implies, this work displays various sections of the orchestra at various points throughout until, by the end, almost every section has had its turn in the limelight. Several of these "solo" sections were extremely well handled: the dialogue between the woodwinds juxtaposed over the quiet tremolo of the strings at the beginning of the third movement set a delicate but sombre mood for the Elegy, so much so that it effectively formed the central point of the entire work. The introduction of the main theme of the fourth movement by the viola section was precise, elegant and expressive; it contrasted well with the ensuing development. The rondo structure here was very clearly accentuated, although there was always a little too much stress placed on the intermediate sections. The performance gained life as it went along: from a rather uninspired first movement (accompanied by an annoying discrepancy between the two violin sections) it proceeded by gradual degrees to an exciting conclusion.

The Concerto in F minor by Chopin was certainly the most enjoyable part of the evening. Maurizio Pollini is a refined, sensitive pianist; he took command of the piece from the very outset in a manner that was subtle and highly skilful. One simply forgot that the orchestra was there. Pollini's performance indicates no small resource of artistic control; at the same time, one cannot help but question his interpretation of Chopin.

The one other number on the programme was Stokowski's transcription of the Tocatta and Fugue in D minor by J. S. Bach. The exact value of these transcriptions is doubtful; it seems extravagantly useless to mutate a piece such as this when it was so perfectly suited to its original medium. The point would not be worth making, were it not for the fact that, in playing the piece, both orchestra and conductor lost track of Bach altogether. What emerged instead was a neo-romantic monstrosity, beset by several weak passages in the first violin section. It was rather disconcerting to see Ozawa grasping the baton in two fists, pounding out the final section of the fugue with the energy of a locomotive; in any case, he was flogging a dead horse. The Stokowski transcriptions of Bach do not seem to merit performance by any major symphony orchestra.

Ars Nova, a vastly underrated group coming to Convocation Hall on Sunday

"It has been a long day. Some of us are torn between the idea of waiting for sounds to be produced out of a sense of social need and some of us have no patience. Another (read in the newspaper that Hugh Curry has interviewed the Beatles), remembering an experience some time ago, remarked that personal taste cannot go far enough with regard to what one would rather hear than do on the radio even if and if you are not reading this it is of no importance there is but one station in town. That one does not listen to the FM preferring instead to walk the streets and ride the subways where it falls to the enterprising observer the rewarding practice of aural iso-metrics that is the enjoyment of random found vibrations. This one prefers to satisfy his ego in other ways so has avoided all manner of radios for weeks until the inevitable Beatles last night."

... translated from the text with additional notes ...

1. "The new musical style which was introduced at the beginning of the fourteenth century in France, and slightly later in Italy, is known as the Ars nova (new art) from the title of a treatise by one of its first practitioners, the French composer and theorist, Phillippe de Vitry."

1a. Blue and White and Convocation Hall.

2. Varsity Arena seats 7,000. Donovan tells of the reedy river: "I abhor bad pop music and feel that the average 14-year old girl listening to pop shares my feeling."

3. Julian Bream have you ever bent over a 12-string guitar and shoved your voice into your pocket?

4. Tim Hardin may finally be coming to Toronto Tuesday. If he does you will surely read more about him but nothing you will read will be a viable substitute for hearing him in person. Nothing you will hear or have heard of him on records will be a viable substitute for hearing him in person. Extremism in the defence of liberty is no vice.

5. There are loose names and thoughts loose somewhere in the back yard with the llamas but there are too many pictures lying around just waiting to plug and Blue and White Sunday gig so time will have to wait for space to get together.

no chagrin at chagalls

A Moulin Rouge by Lautrec

I went to the Kar gallery this week to see its lithograph collection, but mainly to see the Salvadore Dali lithos. However, once there, I became mesmerized by some Chagall prints.

After standing and staring at the brilliantly colourful work for a while, I fell to considering the violence that photography does to paintings. You see, in the past, I had only seen Chagall in reproductions and wasn't particularly impressed. The drawings seemed so childish and the colours so crude. What do people see in him, I used to think.

It's well known that many works of art suffer when presented in facsimile. A huge ceiling painting, covering many square yards, often becomes a rectangle of hen scratchings when reduced to page-size in a handbook of art. A plaster-of-paris copy of a Henry Moore work wouldn't be the same as the full-scale work itself; the size is important. (And well Moore knows it; he surveyed Nathan Phillips square personally before allowing the Archer to be positioned there. He didn't want its size overshadowed by the building). A stained-glass church window viewed in the pupil-dilating darkness has a brilliance and luminescence that is lost when a photo is made and displayed in broad daylight.

Colour prints of a particular painting can run from garish to muddy even in expensive productions, and who knows how many artists have turned you off simply because you've never actually seen their work?

With Chagall's paintings, the texture of the coloured areas seems to have an important effect on their brilliance and "freshness". The screening process must ruin this in colour prints.

To me, the effect of seeing a real Chagall up close is one of controlled freshness and brightness. His drawing, far from being childish as I had previously imagined, adds to the total effect.

Go and see Kar's Chagalls if you haven't seen any real ones before.

While the colourists often suffer from being reproduced, people who use lines and masses to achieve their primary effects don't. There are a couple of Toulouse-Lautrec posters that illustrate this. Lautrec didn't "stoop" to commercial art when he produced his posters for the Moulin Rouge and so on, he experimented and extended the capabilities of lithography. Seeing some of the areas in these posters spattered with ink, I was reminded of Jose Ferrer's fooling around with a tooth-brush in the film biography of Lautrec.

Salvadore Dali's single litho shows the meticulous craftsmanship that separates this nutty Spaniard from most of the other Surrealists. The curse of Surrealism is half-assedness; Dali has never been that. If he has repeatedly called himself a genius, he has certainly tried to live up to Edison's formula of 99 per cent perspiration, 1 per cent inspiration.

Speaking of Spaniards, old Picasso has a few "efforts" in the showing. All show the lack of imagination and effort that characterize his work and make him so dear to art students. But don't let that keep you away from the show. For goodness sake, go and see the Chagalls.

allen "warrendale" king

CBC documentaries.

King refers to the period as a "marvellous weaning process" and surprisingly still regards himself as having an affinity to the CBC. Even more surprising, considering the absurd manner in which the CBC handled the release of Warrendale, is that he feels no bitterness.

In a sense Allan King did to the CBC with Warrendale what Don Owen did to the National Film Board with Nobody Waved Goodbye — he forced it to re-examine its attitudes towards Canadian feature productions. But King's film did not only challenge just the CBC. By conveying an unflinching, eye-level, blow by blow account of psychiatrist John Brown's

The offices of Allan King Associates consist of one room in an inauspicious looking building on Bedford Avenue. The room is cluttered with 16 mm. film cans, a movieola, a sound synchronization unit and editing equipment. A projector rattles away behind a heavy curtain. The soundtrack sounds muffled but occasionally a phrase can be heard above the roar of a pneumatic hammer breaking up the sidewalk down the street — "John Brown now opens up the group to a discussion of . . ."

A secretary apologizes that Allan will be about a half hour late but would you like some coffee? An hour later Allan King arrives, picks up the telephone and asks some mysterious individual across the street for some more coffee. He sits down and begins answering questions. He speaks assuredly in a low voice but somehow appears faintly apart from that office. Yet, somehow everything that happens there always seems to happen at King's touch. He is a one man film industry and probably the most talented feature-documentary director in Canada. His jarring view into the daily life of a group of emotionally disturbed children has brought him so much recognition that writers now keep referring to him as Allan Warrendale King.

King's background as a director/producer, like his manner, is not flamboyant. In 1952 he left university saturated in film society presentations and started his film career as a director of hackneyed musical programs with CBC-Vancouver. He arose through the ranks of what was then a relatively non-bureaucratic corporation to become producer of his own seemingly unorthodox methods, Warrendale succeeded in challenging all of us.

Antony Lorraine in a review which appeared in Take One after the release of the film wrote of King's documentary, "For its so-called frankness (In allowing the use of the word 'luck' we have denied the film the right to be shown over the national television service, we have replaced John Brown and his staff with government accepted psychiatric workers and we have heralded as a film of integrity and power a piece still shackled by the inhumanity and lumpidity of the culture from which it comes."

The Cannes Film Festival acclaimed King's venture but the CBC in its infinite wisdom refused to air the film. If King's attitude today towards the network still carries a degree of respect, his tolerance runs deep indeed.

King's approach to the documentary film is in his words, "extremely empirical". Like Jean Luc Godard, who he admires in conversation, King works for the moment. He brings a concept to his documentaries but stretches and moulds it until the finished product bears little resemblance to the initial idea. The classic example of this is Warrendale (which is the classic example of all King's work). Originally the film was to be an examination of a child's world but somehow the idea exploded into a documentary.

The films of Allan King have a tight cohesiveness about them — an almost feature film quality with veracity replacing fiction. The actuality of his films is immediate and striking.

Like all Canadian producers Allan King worries about money, but he never seems to worry about it to the exclusion of all else. He has developed the great Canadian tradition of producing films from the proverbial shoe-string budget to an art. Canada he feels is about the only place in which a novice filmmaker can operate independently on a reasonably large scale. But the optimism about a future national film industry stops there. "The country is in no way serious about being a country," he says. "It'll take more money, a lot more money" before we ever achieve that utopian goal.

If Canada ever does establish a distinguishable identity in its cinema it will probably be in large part due to Allan King. The same touch that rules that one room office on Bedford is also ruling a great many English-Canadian documentary makers.

audiences of the world unite by larry haiven, review theatre editor

There was a time when somebody asked me, "What do you look for when you review a play," I felt like punching him in the mouth. But now I have matured and I realize the validity of the question. Now I have no qualms about punching him in the mouth.

Or else I can give stupid answers like, "Well first of all I try and find the theatre. That's essential." or "Well, I always look for Nathan Cohen. Then I watch his reaction to see whether the play is bad or worse."

Anybody who has seen enough plays to make himself broke realizes that once you've seen that many, you no longer worry about what you look for. You start worrying about what you've been looking for. (Think about that a while.)

Because when you've seen the different tricks of the trade, you begin to realize which are authentic and which are only seductive. At this point, you can decide what you like and what you don't like.

For example, in a production of Barefoot in the Park, that recently embarrassed me, the audience laughed themselves silly at the flutterings and ravings of the characters. But no matter how hysterical the audience became, I could not make myself laugh. I prodded myself, "Come on, you bastard, laugh." But to no avail.

Yet I could see exactly which lines were funny and which deserved laughs. I'd say to myself, "Oh yes, that was a very funny line, it was. But not once did I laugh. And as the play wore on, I became more and more dismal.

Then it occurred to me that the audience was only laughing at what they were supposed to laugh at. The actors were thoroughly removing any humour that the lines could ever have had. The audience had been seduced by the glamour of the stage and were probably equally as embarrassed as I was.

The fact that I wasn't laughing doesn't imply snobbery on my part. Anybody who takes it upon himself to criticize a play cannot afford snobbery. But when he doesn't like something, then he just plain doesn't like it.

The next step is the worst part. Because if you don't like something, and you hope to criticize it, you have to know why. Why, why, why. That question must ring through your head all the time. You have no right criticizing if you can't back up your feelings. Again, this comes through practice. Soon it becomes almost second nature, this self-critical evaluation.

Another thing that a critic has to put up with is the audience, especially the opening night audience. The level of theatre and the experience of playgoing is so depraved in North America, that the audience has suffered enormously. They become neo-sophisticates for one night, whom nothing can shock, dismay nor move. They are unbearably polite, to the point where they are impolite. — laughing at the wrong times, doing anything not to become involved. (Not physically, as this is not the audience's role, but mentally).

Opening night audiences are the most fun to watch. You see, they don't know what the critics have said yet and so they are wary.

Take, for example, the opening night audience at the production of Staircase, now playing at the Colonnade Theatre. It was almost more entertaining to watch them than the play itself. First of all, if you have a play about homosexuals (the vogue now), you've got the audience in the palm of your hand. Especially if you can laugh at the characters.

Announcing the ALICE'S RESTAURANT MEMORIAL WALL MAGAZINE

Dedicated to the proposition that literary or for that matter any kind of magazine need not be printed on paper.

Why not a wall? A few distribution problems, I suppose. This hare-brained scheme, rumoured to have been started deep in the murky confines of Massey College by a group of commie-pinko deviates, is already rolling. It will officially commence on Saturday, October 19, when our first issue will appear on the hoarding around the New Medical Building. All contributions welcome, nay, demanded. We turn down nothing: poetry, prose, epigrams, paintings, posters, shrunken heads, and all manner of artistic expressions. Bring your own paints, paper, stapleguns, lawyers, etc. And all those wanting subscriptions to the ALICE'S RESTAURANT MEMORIAL WALL MAGAZINE, come and look at it, or take pictures of it, or something.

11 A.M. Saturday, October 19. At the blue hoarding. You can't miss it, or, at least, you won't when we're through with it. Look for the wall marked "WALL"

That's what the audience was doing all right. They laughed at every allusion, every limp wrist, every hint of a lisp they could find. Some of them were overcome with mirth. Which is okay, if the play had been funny. But after the first act, two ladies in the row in front of me restrained their jollity long enough to turn to each other and ask, "Do you understand what it's about."

Then there was the man who turned to me after the complete and utter chaos that reigned at a performance of The Glass Menagerie at the Kawartha Festival this summer and remarked, "Wasn't that great?" I was going to answer back, when it struck me, "Who am I to say it's bad?" It's just that so many people have come to me and said, "Wasn't it great", and I say, "Do you really think so?", and they say, "No, it really wasn't that good, was it?"

What I think is essential to the survival of the theatre today is a critical audience, one which will come to see many plays, even if they are terrible, and not be afraid to say that what they saw was awful, or good. But in order to receive the benefits of the theatre, you have to be critical and then you have to be self-critical.

There are two major things that "make" most plays. These are timing and rhythm. These are not things to "look for" because they don't make themselves evident by the looking. They come through the feeling.

Leon Major says that seeing an actor die beautifully is a pleasure in itself, and I agree. But unless these moments of genius can be supported by a production that moves and has proper timing, their whole effect will be lost.

Timing and rhythm are most important because they are the hardest for the critic to write about. You can't just say that the timing in a certain production was bad and you certainly can't say that the rhythm was off. Because your reader won't understand you. Yet unless they're there, the play usually is totally ineffective.

This, essentially, is what separates amateur from professional theatre. The amateur is fascinated by the action and word as they exist alone. He has no concept of how they can work together by correct orchestration and timing. The professional, while perfecting his own mastery of action and word, is capable of surrendering himself to the total scheme and to being used as an intelligent tool of the director.

The amateur audience is captivated by the one-line gag, the striking pose and the unrelated action. The professional audience appreciates these things but demands a more total experience, seeing how the actor's portrayal strengthens the whole production not how the actor was one-man show.

The professional audience moves with the flow and rhythm of the well-done play. They feel pleasure and satisfaction when the timing is right on. The professional audience speaks very little after an effective piece of theatre, because there is really very little to speak about.

How can we get this audience? Go, see plays, make them tear the prices down. If you don't like what you see, don't withhold your presence; go and make it known. If theatre is for the audience, then the audience deserves the best. Critics are a ruling class. That's because the audience has to be catered to. They aren't what theatre is all about now.

Take the theatre away from the critics and give it to yourself. Audiences of the world unite, you have nothing to lose but your complacency.

Johnny hits the spot at Engineers' sod turning

The sons of Godiva have discovered there is no Campus Centre on the corner of Russell and St. George.

The unhappy, aroused Skullemen — 400 strong — massed on the site Wednesday afternoon to stage an unofficial sod-turning in protest.

During this caper, the homeless APSC's brought their own home — a dilapidated Johnny-on-the-spot — to the Centre site.

It had a stolen air about it but the engineers claimed it was donated.

"SAC promised us a campus centre would be erected," shouted George Zukovs (U APSC) from the top of the sad grey outhouse.

"To date there has been no erection."

He invited SAC President Steve Langdon up to explain why.

The Lady Godiva Memorial

"Third," Langdon went on hoarsely. "The provincial government promised up $2,000,000 dollars three years ago and now has refused to give us the money."

The engineers howled and meekly on an opposition platform.

The engineers howled. "First the city of Toronto won't close. St. George Street."

The engineers growled. "Second, the Board of Governors has refused to give the Bank of Montreal a permanent lease in the building therefore the Bank won't put up the money they promised for the building."

The engineers sang 'Jesus saves at the Bank of Montreal'.

Four members of the Board of Governors are also directors of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

Only three U of T board members are directors of the Bank of Montreal.

Langdon gasped, "the most important thing is to close St. George St."

The engineers howled and went back to their classes.

Two policemen and six U of T security guards were on hand to escort them safely across St. George.

"If they want their god-damn campus centre so much why the hell don't they sit on St. George St. and close it."

rumbled a disgruntled engineer, "I don't think I've ever seen a car being bused by a car."

Last week Scarborough held a five-day tent-in protest called Davisville.

"We feel residences are essential for a good intellectual community," said Debarbieri.

"If the situation is not soon ameliorated, there will be a lot of trouble."

Scarborough principal A.F.W. Plumtree said last night he "couldn't agree more" with Debarbieri on the importance of residences on campus.

"They change the whole character of university life," and affect the quality of one's attitude towards one's education."

Scarborough registrar J. Jackson last week agreed to sleep overnight at Davisville in support of the student demands.

wide more capital to reduce the staff student ratio. "One would hope that the students would rally behind us," he added.

He said that the financial priorities of the university were, first a good library, second the faculty, and third the students.

"The academic might be expected to be at least as well rewarded financially as the other professions," said Prof. Seary.

He said the present salary structure is characterized by "niggardiness" and amounts to "subsidy of higher education by the academic."

Students Council Steve Langdon said jokingly. "I hope the strike will never be finished. Then we'll never have final exams."

"I hope the demands are extended more widely than salaries," he added.

He said students and faculty should co-operate to see if they could get a better financial set-up as a whole.

How I won a Woodrow Wilson

(without even trying)

and humanities — lots of money, lots of prestige, and a virtual pass to just about any North American graduate school. There were about a 1,000 awarded each year.

I'd just like to add here that I now regard such "North American" fellowships as instruments of the brain drain of Canadians to the U.S. According to a study I made of Woodrow Wilson recipients in the social sciences, almost all of the Canadian recipients took theirs to do graduate work in the U.S. and about a quarter of those stayed there. Hardly any Americans brought theirs to Canada.)

At the beginning of my third year I put together the results of all my trials and errors and came up with what I decided was an infallible system — and again, one that required the absolute minimum of work. Now At Last It Can Be Revealed.

For the first two years, I tried the whole range of studying and exam-writing techniques, with varying results, and came off with averages in the low seconds. Most of my time on campus during all four years, I spent doing my own thing — from reading to writing for the Varsity to shooting the bull in the Arbor Room and the J.C.R. Actually, I learned a lot that way.

But in my third year I wanted to get good enough marks to win a Woodrow Wilson Fellowship. The Woodrow Wilson, in those days, was the top North American fellowship in the social sciences material and an ability to transcend it? When I was an undergraduate here in political science and economics, I tried what might be considered an experiment, with results that have some bearing on this question.

I found many of my courses interesting, but never as interesting as some other things I might be studying on my own, or as a variety of non-academic activities. So I set myself the objective of getting acceptable marks, while spending as little time as possible working at it.

Or is it necessary, as administrators assure us, to display intelligence and creativity, to demonstrate both an understanding of the course

I attended all lectures and took thorough notes. I wrote good essays. (Essays didn't count in the final marks in my department in those days, but they helped on the exams.) I did just enough reading for my courses to write the essays. I never read a single chapter of a single textbook all year!

On each of the three days before each exam, I read over the lecture notes I'd taken (and the essays I'd written) for that course out loud — practically memorizing them.

Some of my exam answers I based on my essays, and for the rest I regurgitated, regurgitated — tossing in a bit of my own bullshit here and there for flavouring.

As soon as the exams were over, I threw out all my notes and immediately forgot everything in them. I stood first in my course, and that winter I got my Woodrow Wilson.

Woodrow Wilson National Fellowships of $2,000 plus tuition are granted to 1,000 North American students each year. The purpose of the fellowship is to "encourage promising students to enter graduate work to prepare for college teaching."

Students obtaining an undergraduate degree in humanities and social sciences or natural sciences and mathematics (when the candidate has clear commitment to teaching) are nominated by faculty members and elected by a committee of college teachers and administrators.

In 1962, twenty-one Woodrow Wilson scholars were elected from University of Toronto. One of them, Dan Roebuck, now a special student at U of T describes below how he prepared for the fellowship.

By DAN ROEBUCK, UC 612

What does it take to get good marks at the University of Toronto?

Is it true, as students have charged for many years, that university is really basically the same as high school — that the way to make the most favourable impression on your profs is to regurgitate back at them at exam time what they originally fed you in their lectures?

Or is it necessary, as administrators assure us, to display intelligence and creativity, to demonstrate both an understanding of the course

Eleven members elected so far to student-faculty committee

Eleven students representing various departments were elected to Dean Allen's student-faculty committee considering revisions to the Macpherson Report.

The elections took place at open meetings on Wednesday and Thursday.

Elections continue today and Monday for the 25 student members, chosen on a departmental basis. The committee is to present its recommendations to Dean Allen before Oct. 28.

His revised proposals on the Macpherson Report will then be presented to the arts and science faculty council.

Among the newly-elected representatives are: German — Carol Nicoll (IV Vic); Slavic Studies — Maylaine Maybee (II Trin); English — Susan Kee (III UC); Chemistry — Michael Sinkelman (IV NEW); Math — John Scherk (IV Maths 3/4 Physics); Group D Honours Science — Pat Remy (IV UC); Anthropology — Eero Pyykkonen (II Gen. Arts); Italian and Hispanic — Alberto Di-Giovanni (II SMC).

Zoology rep Morty Fine (II UC) ran for the committee because "things need to get done NOW". He would like to see an elimination of the distinctions between general and honors subjects, establishment of a credit system instead of the present year system, and a general strengthening of the power of the course unions.

Fine would like to see the faculty council, which he describes as "unrepresentative, unwieldy, undemocratic and obsolete", decrease its power with the newer advisory committee assuming the central role.

Representing Classics, East Asian Studies, Islamic, and Near Eastern Studies is Tom Kuttner (IV SMC). He hopes the present committee will continue to study other aspects of the University after the Oct. 28 report.

Art Leader (IV UC) representing political economy is "basically critical of the Macpherson Report". He finds the University "too place oriented instead of problem oriented".

Problems do not belong uniquely to one discipline but are multi-faceted, and should be united to achieve a systems approach to arts and science education, he says.

The election meetings were characterized by light attendance. Poor publicity, students voting only in their major subject, and last minute changes in meeting rooms all helped to keep the turnout light.

2,000 may call SAC referendum

A major constitutional amendment was passed in Wednesday's meeting of the Students Administrative Council.

The amendment provides that a campus-wide initiative referendum may be taken on any SAC motion defeated or passed in council, if 2,000 voters (no more than 500 from one constituency) call for one.

Several of the more radical members of council opposed the motion.

"We want participatory democracy, but this motion is just a system of checks and balances," said Mark Freiman (IV UC).

Andy Wernick (SGS) suggested instead that a provision be made for a mass meeting on any issue and that the quorum be 1,000$

Bob Rae (IV UC) said it would be a useful way to conduct political discussion on political issues, to have SAC make decisions, and to judge campus reaction.

"I'm not afraid of public opinion," he said, "because SAC is not that alienated from campus opinion."

SAC President Steve Langdon said the motion would enhance the leadership role of the council.

He said it puts the onus on the right-wing on campus to prove the non-representative nature of SAC.

Right-winger Paul Fromm (II SMC) had been continually asking SAC to put many of its decisions to referendum.

The Varsity asked Fromm last night if there would be a referendum on SAC's decision Wednesday to give $500 to draft-dodgers.

"I know there is a movement afoot to start a referendum," said Fromm. "I told the person who is organizing it that he would have my full cooperation."

Fromm would not reveal who was starting the referendum.

There will be an EXTREMELY IMPORTANT meeting of the Review staff this afternoon at 1:15. It is imperative that all section editors and other staffers attend. Much relevant information will be gained, including the name of the Review's new editor, Michael Ignatieff. So be there. All hail the king!

Placement Service Councils too

The placement service has expanded this year to include career counselling as well as job-finding.

Its efforts so far have met with varied response from arts students. Group counselling sessions have been going on for a week now in Sid Smith 1073, and feature professionals and specialists who lecture and invite questions.

"We've had as many as 135 and as few as eight attending," said Alan Headrick, director of the placement service.

"We've just got to try harder to publicize this thing."

The Placement Service

does have a career counselor, Rosemary Gaymer, and will be hiring another shortly.

"But these (career) sessions can do more in group counselling than the Placement Service could probably ever do," Mr. Headrick added.

Upcoming sessions are banking (Tues.), life insurance (Wed.), and teaching (Thurs.) at 1 p.m. in Sidney Smith 1073, and are open for all students who still don't know what they want to be when they grow up.

The first meeting of the Free University of Toronto is today (Fri.) at 3 p.m. in the Bickersteth Room, Hart House. It's called People Meeting 'cause people is where its at. Dr. Don McCulloch, beautiful Farrell Toombs, author-Jack Ludwig, Rose-Mary Harrop (!) are some of the people. To develop whatever topics or groups people want. Free. Free. Free.

Soccer Blues prepared after first victory

Last Saturday, the Varsity soccer team proved it can come back after being knocked down. After four straight losses, including a demoralizing defeat at the hands of Guelph, Blues came through with an impressive 5-0 win over Waterloo Warriors.

The game itself was an indication of things to come for there were quite a few occasions when Blues showed their sparkle.

The defensive trio of Jim Kalman, Eric Sereda and Bill Nepotiuk, after their terrible display against Guelph, had a point to prove. During the first half, Varsity dominated the game so thoroughly that their goaltender Bernie D'Abreau didn't even touch the ball.

In fact, D'Abreau handled the ball only twice during the game and on one of these occasions, it was one of his own defencemen who passed to him.

The forward line, although accounting for five goals, did not play effectively and wasted a number of fine chances. However, the talent is there and it is only a matter of time and work before the forwards will start to gell.

Rookie Miles Sasa proved to be the spearhead of the attack as he notched his first tally as a Blue and set up two other goals.

Frank Soppelsa, playing centre forward for the first time this year, responded with a fine two goal effort. Jim Lefkos and Ken Cancelara rounded out the scoring, each assisting the other on his goal.

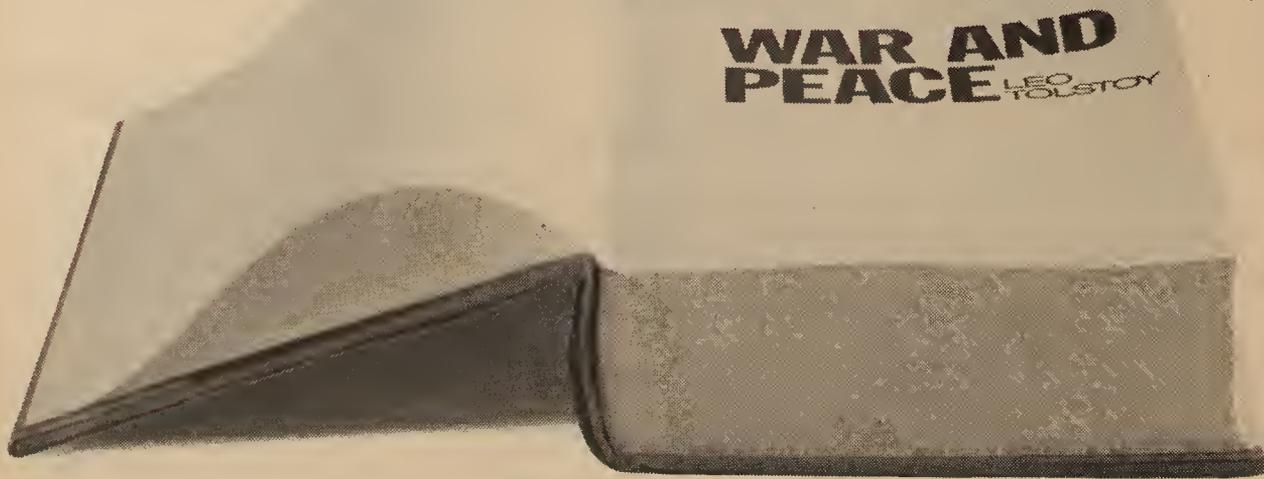

Coach Ernie Glass, who made a number of major lineup changes before the game, was pleased with the result.

Adrian Verhulst fit in very well along side Dwight Taylor and the pair controlled play at mid-field. Taylor, however, suffered a head injury in the second half and it is hoped that he will be ready for Saturday's game.

Tomorrow, Blues host McMaster Marauders who defeated Guelph 1-0 during the week.

The average reader takes about two weeks (35 hours reading) to read Tolstoy's 'War and Peace'. It's long, a 'heavy' classic. By learning to read much faster though, you can change any novel, any of the 'musts', into an evening's entertainment rather than a week's labour.

After taking the Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics course, you'll have time for reading pleasure. It teaches you to concentrate

INTERFAC FOOTBALL

Dents became the first interfaculty team to win two games this season when they defeated hapless Trinity (0-2) 14 to 1 on Wednesday. Dents majors went to Mel Pearlman and Gerry Sikolski. Parish got Trinity's single point which gave his team a slim half-time margin. Second place Forestry (1-0) had previously beaten Trinity 19-0.

Meds and Scarborough are tied for first place in Group B with identical 1-0 records. Meds defeated UC 27-0 while Scar blanked New 13-0. Third place UC (1-1) defeated winless New 18-13.

In Group A, PHE downed Eng 21-10 to tie Vic (1-0) for first place. The Skuleboys (0-1) and St. Mike's (0-1) must knock off one of the top two in order to gain a playoff berth.

2. Besley (4), Okihira (2), Balan, Scott (2), Kril and Norman Tanaga scored for Innis. McCubbin and Harvey hit for the losers.

Cooper (3), Elliot, Griffin (no relation to the well-known mythical animal of that name) and O'Reilly (an Irish exclamation used to summon Reilly) led For past Phe B, 6-2. Christie and Blocki ("Blocki that Kicki"—Finnish cheer) replied for Phe B.

SOCCER

Galati scored twice (actually, each Galatus scored once) and (note paratactic construction) Scar beat Gnu Gnus, 2-0. (The Gnu is a small South African antelope related to the Iguanid.)

PHE blanked Eng, 2-0. Eizanas and Gaetan Godin (Gaetan Godin!—one of the strange oaths the Bard is full of; cf. "Varsity", Oct. 16, p.15.) had the goals.

PHE B's Hanna's goal sank Arcuillain, 1-0.

Trin B took Meds B, 1-0. Gryndoch (you remember the famous team of Hansel and Gryndoch) scored.

RUGGER

Vic beat UC by default ("who's fault" asked Moo Sperly, uncowed.)

Eng beat Law, 9-3. Hunt,

Kocur and Seppala (my cotage has a Seppala tank. Does yours?) had tries for Eng. Arthur for Law.

WOMEN'S INTERFAC

West Hill Golf Course was the scene of the Historical (hysterical?) Women's Interfaculty Golf Tournament, held last Thursday. Tension mounted as 68 girls playing a 2 ball foursome teed off. Record breaking scores ranging from 28 (on one hole!) to 3 were recorded. Cathy Naismith and Margaret Kelly defeated all opposition with a nine hole score of 47.

The league semi-finals of the Women's Interfaculty Field Hockey schedule were played this week. A hard fought game between two well matched teams resulted in PHE I defeating VIC I by a score of 2-1. Marilyn Richardson and Carol Snell scored for PHE. VIC'S lone goal came from a blistering shot by Ann Thompson directly from a penalty corner.

MAC HERE FOR HOMECOMING DUEL VERSUS VARSITY

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

Ed Norton, ace Varsity manhole reporter, has been listening in on campus this week, and reports that the natives are restless.

"They keep asking, 'What's wrong with Blues?'", says Norton, "and then usually degenerate into low mumbles and dark mutters that what those bunch of prima donnas need is a boot in the ass."

RON MURPHY
twelve years ago at McGill

However, a well-placed kick to the posterior raises the intriguing question: does the end justify the means (pun unfortunately intended). Probably not in Blues' case.

With the team stumbling around in fourth place heading into Saturday's Homecoming duel against McMaster Marauders, what's really needed is a lot more drive and effort from the big boys in blue.

A real sockittoem victory over McMaster would go a long way to restoring some confidence to the team, which has managed but one victory in four starts this year.

For, surprisingly and luckily, Blues are still very much alive in the annual search and destroy quest for the Yates Cup. Successive victories over Mac, Western, McGill and Queen's are the sole requirements demanded by the SIFL before returning the silverware to Toronto.

A win over McMaster Saturday shouldn't prove overly difficult but then the same held true for the Waterloo game.

To add to coach Ron Murphy's misery, sparkling rookie Walt Sehr has gone home for Homecoming and will be unavailable for gridiron duty. Sehr's laid up by an uncompromising influenza virus which has also claimed wing-back Nick DiGiuseppe as a doubtful starter.

Sehr's spot in the offensive backfield will be taken by first year man, John Chapman, one of the few Blues who has managed to turn in steady performances in the past two games. He's swift as a gazelle, and strong as a bull, to Murphy's delight.

COACH "AHAB" MURPHY CUTS LOOSE GOOD SHIP VARSITY FOR HOMECOMING BATTLE WITH McMASTER

Also to the genian guru's pleasure is the return of general Mr. Clean and Batman, Paul McKay after a two game absence. Not only will McKay shore up the leaky defensive backfield, but his talented toe restores distance and accuracy to Blues' punting game.

McMaster promises to be a small but determined outfit. Marauders' coach, Jack Kennedy, has done a good job of rebuilding with the team, and they gave Western a strong game last week, before two late touchdowns iced the game for 'Stangs, 30-14.

BLUENOTES: . . . Varsity curling starts Sunday.

Rugger Blues upset Irish 11-0

If you heard shouts of joy coming from Varsity Stadium on Wednesday night, it was the rugger Blues celebrating an 11-0 triumph over the best club side in Ontario, Toronto Irish.

If you were there, you saw an exciting, hard hitting and rough match. Irish are noted for their attempts at stretching the rules in this game of discretion but Varsity beat them at their own game. Although Irish controlled the scrums, Blues dominated the line-outs.

The game was won however by the superb team play of the forwards led by Graeme Wynn. For followers of rugger, Wynn is a player's player and no superlatives could aptly describe his play against Irish. Prop Larry Barron was also singularly outstanding both in the scrum and in covering the ball.

Blues scored on two penalty kicks and a converted try. Andy Cairns who had been playing scrum half for the seconds was inserted at fullback for the Irish game. His magic toe found the mark on two 40 yard penalty kicks and the conversion was made from a difficult angle.

The lone try was scored by winger Doug Phibbs who stormed across the Irish goal line in the second half and touched the ball down seconds before being availed by Irish knees and elbows. Phibbs set the keynote for the first half with a vicious tackle of his Irish counterpart.

Apart from the scoring it was a forwards' game and they were responsible for the victory.

Varsity hopes to continue its winning ways this Homecoming Weekend when they host McMaster.

The Second Varsity will play Mac seconds at 10:30 and the firsts will play their Mac opposites at 12:00 on the back campus. McMaster should provide the first serious opposition in the intercollegiate league for Varsity.

The Irish game showed how well Varsity can play but it is hoped that the firsts remember how badly they played a week ago against the seconds.

Trackmen at Windsor

By PAUL VESA

Tomorrow afternoon, at University of Windsor stadium, twenty-one of Varsity's finest track and field athletes will step forward to defend the OQAA championship they won last year. Their chances of retaining the trophy are minimal, however this will not be their fault, but rather the fault of some other track men who chose not to come out. Nevertheless, those who have been working, will put on a good show — third behind McMaster and Waterloo. Here is how the team looks:

100 Yards: Alan Tucker, a recruit from New Zealand, is our competitor here. Tucker has run 10.4 in intercollegiate competition this year, and stands a good chance to take a 4th in this event.

220 Yards: Our runners here are Dave Quibell and Alan Tucker. Quibell has a 22.5 in competition and should take at least 3rd. Tucker has a clocking of 24.1 which may gain him the final.

440 Yards: Our quarter-milers are Bill Franklin and Chris Rutherford. Franklin has a clocking of 51.6 which should guarantee him at least 2nd. Rutherford has no times this year in intercollegiate competition and thus is an unknown quantity.

880 Yards: Mark Minden and Dave Lismore will both make the top six with Minden perhaps taking a 3rd.

1 Mile: Rich Pyne and Ron Field are both definite contenders for the top four.

3 Miles: Three of Brian Richards, Brian Armstrong, Bob Cairns, and Dave Tong will be running. Richards and Cairns could make the top three.

120 Yard High Hurdles: Steve Wetmore is way ahead of the rest of the field, except for Donnelly of Queen's who is ahead of the rest of Canada.

440 Yard Hurdles: Wetmore also runs this as does Aris Birze. Look for Wetmore 2nd and Birze in the top six.

Long Jump: Hung Lee has the potential to win this, but this year's record gives him only a place in the top six.

Discus: Scott Aikman will require one of his better throws to crack the top six.

Pole Vault: Jukka Heikurinen has a record first in the vault locked up.

High Jump: Jim Dodd and John Hilliard each have a crack at third place in this event.

Triple Jump: John Hilliard should be in the top six.

Javelin: Gord Homer is now over 200' and may take 2nd.

Shot Put: Bruce Tucker will take 2nd in this event, not bad considering he's 5'9" and 170 lbs.

BIAFRA'S STRUGGLE FOR SURVIVAL

by Gary Webster

Mr. Webster is a student at the U of T School of Graduate Studies. His story is based on personal experiences in Nigeria Oct. 1965 - July 1967

Have you ever wondered just how true-to-life George Orwell's 1984 was? Have you doubted the existence of the memory-hole at the Ministry of Truth in which all unpalatable versions of the past were incinerated in order to facilitate the brainwashing of a manipulated public?

Two years of living and teaching at the University of Nigeria, Nsukka, and a continuing study of Nigerian politics in the year since my return have convinced me that the memory-hole is alive and well in Lagos and boasts flourishing offspring in London, Washington and Ottawa.

The history of Nigeria, as presented by these four governments, is bunk.

In the Lagos version of Nigeria's history, all the trouble was started by the Ibos of present-day Biafra.

The Ibos, it seems, were never good Nigerian nationalists. They alternately spent their time hatching schemes to run the Federation in their own interest or plotting the secession of the Eastern Region when prospects for the domination of all Nigeria looked gloomy.

In January, 1966, by this account, the Ibos staged a tribalist coup d'etat against the legitimate government of Nigeria and against the wishes of all the other Nigerian tribes.

On July 29, 1966, the other tribes struck back in just revenge, murdering the Ibo Chief of State and numerous other Eastern army officers. In September, 1966, we are told, the Ibos began to massacre the Hausas of Northern Nigeria resident in the East and, of course, the Northerners retaliated in kind.

From that time on, Colonel Ojukwu, Eastern Region Military Governor, and a small clique of tribalists are supposed to have begun to manipulate their people into an undesired secession from Nigeria. Ever since the success of that secession on May 30, 1967, the valiant Nigerian Army has fought to liberate the oppressed Biafrans from their tyrannical and unwanted rulers.

The truth, however, somehow does not correspond to these allegations.

The people of Eastern Nigeria (of whom about 35 are Ibos) were in the vanguard of the struggle for independence from the British. Their political leader, Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, strove mightily to make his NCNC party a nationally-based political grouping. He was partially successful by 1959, despite the growth of two rival parties, the Action Group of Western Nigeria and the NPC of Northern Nigeria, which based their power on avowed tribalist and regionalist appeals.

While Azikiwe and the Action Group worked for and nearly attained independence in 1958, the NPC leaders of the North were reluctant to break with Britain at all, feared entering a federation with the more advanced southern peoples, and managed to postpone independence until 1960.

The Federation was never a viable one. Following the accession of portions of the Cameroons Trust Territory into Northern Nigeria in 1961, the North controlled an absolute majority of the seats in the Federal Parliament and had a veto over all the wishes of the southern parties. In the 1964 elections, the NPC won 172 out of 174 Northern seats (61 without opposition).

To say that the Ibos dominated the Federation is laughable. In the first Federal Cabinet they were ever the junior partner in an uneasy coalition with the NPC. Every Federal investment but two (in oil and cement) was poured into the Western and Northern Regions. But for the discovery of oil in the early 1960's, Eastern Nigeria would have remained an extremely poor weak sister in the Federation.

A tremendous drive for education enabled the Ibos to fill large numbers of posts in the Federal civil service and in the universities, alongside their advanced southern brethren, the Ibibios, Yorubas and Binis. But the Northern Region forbade any southerner to enter its civil service, preferring British ex-colonialists to fellow Nigerians.

The result for the area was a miasma of corruption and inefficiency presided over by the reactionary emirs, their relatives, and their servants in the Moslem alkali courts. Southerners in Northern Nigeria were forced to live in ghettos — the strangers' quarters or sabon gari. The difference in cultural levels between North and South (in which Northern resentment was based) is shown by the figures for regional origin of university graduates in Nigeria, 1965-66: North 369; West, over 1700; East, over 2000; Mid-West over 350. The population of the North exceeded that of all the other Regions combined.)

Nigerian parliamentary politics was corrupt and undemocratic in every section of the country. When, after a fraudulent Federal election and an even more blatantly rigged Western Region election, the Army struck down the politicians in January, 1966, coup all sections of the country greeted the coup with joy.

The rebels, led by three Ibos and two Yorubas and employing numerous Hausa and Tiv troops in their Northern Region takeover, took power in the name of nationalism, seeking an end to tribalism, nepotism, bribery and election-rigging.

Their goal was to install jailed Yoruba leader Obafemi Awolowo at the head of a neutralist and mildly socialist government.

They were frustrated, however, by the Ibo Supreme Commander of the Army, General J.T.U. Aguiyi-Ironsi, who took power at the behest of the rump of the Federal Cabinet (the Prime Minister and Finance Minister having been killed) and declared a government of national reconstruction.

Every newspaper and every political party greeted his accession with joy. BBC at-

GRADUATE STUDENTS

THE CASE FOR WITHDRAWAL FROM S.A.C.

The need for withdrawal is not just based on dissatisfaction with the previous performance of the Students' Administrative Council, but it is a step to create greater involvement and prestige for graduate students in all spheres of university life.

Graduate students were made members of the Students' Administrative Council, without their consent, by S.A.C. unilaterally petitioning the Board of Governors in 1955. S.A.C. requested this action due to a lack of funds and not because of a desire for greater student unity. In the past 13 years, S.A.C. has obtained few solid advantages for graduate students. S.A.C. has neither adequately represented the interests of graduates nor provided services suitable for this mature group of students. For instance, when S.A.C. talks of educational reform they mean undergraduate educational reform.

All applications for reimbursement of funds from S.A.C. to compensate for S.A.C.'s lack of interest in graduate students and to support graduate programmes have been refused. A recent grant of money from S.A.C. to the G.S.U. had stringent conditions attached (that, for instance, would have transferred the control of the Teaching Assistants' Association from the hands of the Teaching Assistants to the S.A.C. executive.)

S.A.C. has actively fought direct graduate student representation on University Committees. It has held up the operation of the Presidential Advisory Committee to the Advisory Bureau because graduate students were directly asked by President Bissell to participate on the committee.

The G.S.U. Executive believes that withdrawal of the majority of graduate students from the Students' Administrative Council will improve the status of graduate students on this campus. The Administration will be forced to ask the Graduate Students' Union for its opinion on University matters, and these decisions will usually be taken by all interested graduates in a general meeting.

Justifications for graduate students leaving S.A.C. as a group are: evidence of S.A.C.'s past record, the opinion of the Laskin Committee, the opinion of all past G.S.U. Executives (except one — which was removed by the graduate students), a recent G.S.U. survey, the last G.S.U. elections which were held on this subject (2:1 majority for the platform in favour of withdrawal), and the overwhelming response in favour in a test of opinion at registration.

Vote to withdraw from the Students' Administrative Council at a G.S.U. General Meeting TOMORROW at Convocation Hall at 4 p.m.

Biafra's struggle

tempts to portray the coup as an Ibo takeover were vociferously denounced in private and public statements by non-Ibo tribesmen at my university. A tremendous wave of nationalism swept the country. Meanwhile, Ironsi arrested the radical leaders of the original coup and, at the time of his own death, was preparing their trial for treason.

Unfortunately, the wave of nationalism in Nigeria soon passed.

A decree on unitary government sparked a series of riots in Northern Nigeria in May, 1966 — grounded in fears of a unified civil service open to talents. Crowds of Northerners paraded signs saying "We don't want one Nigeria" and murdered hundreds of Easterners living in the North.

In September, during a constitutional conference in Lagos, mobs of Northern civilians, troops and police attacked the Eastern populations of the sabon gari in their homes and churches.

Thirty thousand Easterners were thus murdered by their neighbors and the security forces in the North and West. Nearly two million refugees, most of them having lost nearly everything, flooded back to the East.

It is arrant nonsense to say, as Nigerians do today, that these massacres were begun by the Ibos. No Northerner or Westerner was touched in the East, despite the May, July and September events, until early October, when trainloads of mangled refugees from the North sparked angry riots at Enugu, Owerri and Port Harcourt.

I remember thinking at the time that the patience of the Ibos exceeded that of Job. Around thirty Northerners were killed in the retaliatory attacks and a few Westerners were threatened. Eastern Region policemen quashed every outbreak as rapidly as they could.

Colonel Ojukwu quickly and sadly ordered all Westerners and Northerners and some Mid-Westerners to be transported (at Regional government expense) out of the Region so as to avoid a counter-pogrom which he feared he could not prevent and which would have ended all hope for Nigerian nationalism.

The September and October massacres effectively destroyed the Easterners' role within the Federation. Thousands of skilled individuals returned to unemployment in the East rather than risk death or beatings in Lagos, the West and the North. The Federal Government expressed no regrets.

Most Easterners hoped to return to their jobs elsewhere in Nigeria as soon as their safety could be assured. At Aburi, Ghana, in January, 1967, a conference of all Nigeria's leaders arrived at a formula of government which would have provided the basis for a gradual return to unity. Yet, on returning to Lagos, the Federal Military Governor, Colonel Gowon, announced that, having gone unprepared to the meeting, he could not abide by the agreements he had signed.

This outrageous breach of faith stimulated Colonel Ojukwu to press harder for implementation of the Aburi agreements. The response was nil. When in May an illegal repartition of the country's internal borders by Colonel Gowon threatened to divide Eastern Nigeria into three parts, with no consultation of the Eastern Government, Colonel Ojukwu requested that his Consultative Assembly grant him permission to secede from a Federation which would neither protect the lives and property nor listen to the wishes of the Region's people.

Secession and declaration of the sovereign state of Biafra was greeted by massive spontaneous demonstrations, amid fears of a Federal invasion.

On July 6, six weeks later, the Federals attacked from the north and the process of systematic destruction of Biafra and her people, who had dared to ask for the right to live unmolested, began. The slaughter, fueled by intensive hatred and jealousy of the Ibos in all parts of Federal Nigeria, continues to this day. It will go on — as every trained visitor to Biafra has observed — until Biafra wins or is utterly destroyed.

It was 6 million a quarter century ago. Will it be 14 million this time?

Whether or not the Sorbonne stayed closed another day or several days was no longer of any importance. The situation was grave, and the only way to avoid deaths was to make the police forces go away. The students would

fighting unrest

We've been seeing a lot of Dr. Bissell this year. From a newspaper's point of view, we've never been able to get so many photographs of the man who runs the university, and we've never been able to get so many pictures of his lieutenants.

The administration is getting out to meet the people, and that's good. Dr. Bissell has debated with Steve Langdon twice, and is more available for speaking engagements than he ever was before.

At first we thought this sudden metamorphosis was due to rumblings of student discontent, discontent which was to be focussed at U of T.

To meet this threat, Dr. Bissell first used Divide and Conquer in defining two kinds of troublesome students—activists (good) and saboteurs (bad). A lot of students bought this one.

Then Dr. Bissell took some good advice. That advice is simply treat the radicals seriously. Don't pass them off as an unimportant and unrepresentative minority; don't ridicule them and don't get angry at them.

So Dr. Bissell has listened to radicals' demands with more attention than you'd expect, thus opening up the possibility of change. In doing so, his political acumen has earned the radicals' grudging respect.

But there's more to it at U of T than just forstalling student unrest. There's CRUG—the president's commission to restructure university government.

Dr. Bissell and most students agree on abolishing the Board of Governors, for different reasons perhaps. The question is, will the Board play along?

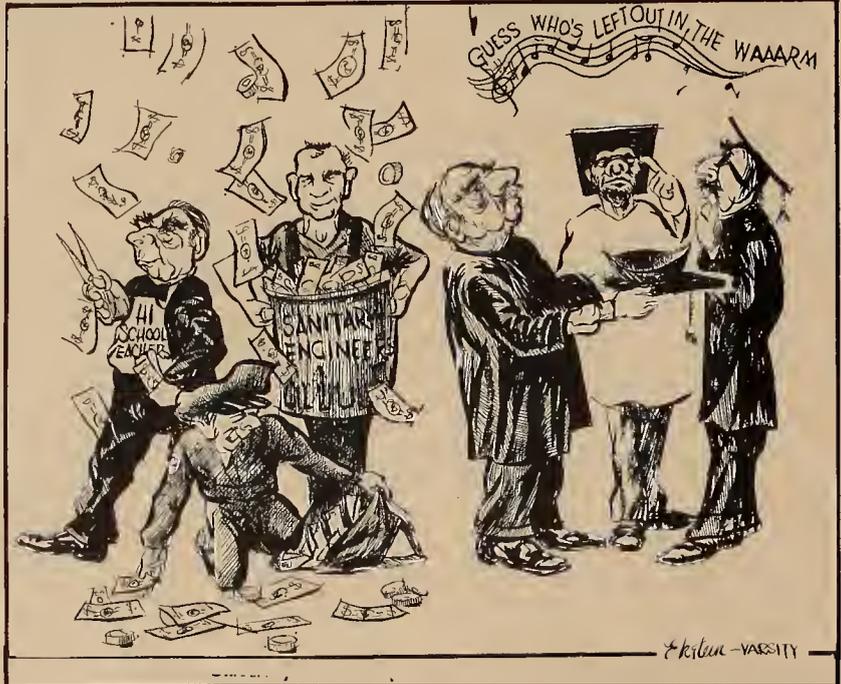

The Board still sees itself as a buffer between university and state, as a representative of the public good. The Board also has a hefty stake in keeping the university pretty much like it is.

As long as the natives aren't restless, Bissell knows the Board might go along with its own suicide. If the natives are restless, and if it looks like the university might be taken over by left-wing elements unalterably opposed to the business interests represented by the Board, the Board is going to stay.

So Bissell is dealing with two elements: the fact of student unrest, per se and what that unrest will do to his chances for restructuring the university.

Restructuring the university isn't going to do that much for students. Restructuring at the course and faculty level is more important.

With so little to lose, students might as well begin pressing hard for the kinds of change they want—hopefully radical change. For starters, we should demand a university less geared to the demands of industry and more to the demands of learning. That in itself would constitute radical change.

Given the unique U of T situation, such unrest is likely to have greater impact than at any other Canadian university, and the greatest chance for success in producing change.

Or at least, enough change to keep the natives quiet for a while.

self-fulfilling prophecies

The Telegram informs us that the police are training a riot squad to handle campus disorders, and are infiltrating campus organizations that might cause trouble.

With a few reservations about the Telegram's rather gung-ho kind of reporting, we submit that the campuses are going to learn the same sad lessons Democrats learned in Chicago.

Lesson one is this: if you expect trouble and arm for it, you will find your dreams coming true.

And lesson two: any and all violence that has happened in U.S. and foreign campuses has been initiated and carried through by the police themselves. They have been the ones with weapons, not the students.

The cops have been the ones busting heads. So watch for them at your local campus. Coming soon.

LETTERS

ross replies

In your Friday editorial you stated that I was opposed to allowing SAC to make moral decisions, that I refused to oppose the war in Vietnam, that I was insensitive to the killing going on there and that I was generally "gutless". The first three statements are not true as my support for Bob Barkwell's motion on Vietnam makes clear. The fourth is an inaccurate, personal value judgement which has no place in any thoughtful or responsible piece of writing.

When I outlined my position on aid to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program during the SAC debate, I explicitly stated that, "I am not saying the Students Council cannot make moral decisions. If we wish to vote this money we have a perfect right to do so." However, I felt we should not exercise our right on this occasion by making the contribution compulsory.

Instead I proposed that a petition be circulated throughout the University by the SAC representatives to enable students to sign 50 cents of their SAC fees to TADP. (Let us remember that financial aid was the issue; we had already condemned the war.) The petition would probably have meant more money for the TADP than that group received, but the money would have been volunteered. To have done so would have evoked a conscious response from the student body on this issue. This action would have been a more effective demonstration of student concern for the problems facing their American counterparts than was the grant made by SAC on Wednesday night.

Many students believe that to dodge the draft is to break or evade the law and they do not wish to be forced to support this action with their money. Others think that it is not fair for any government to force an individual to kill and to give his life for a cause which he believes is unjust. Many of these latter students wish to help draft-dodgers.

SAC was under no obligation to respect both views. It had a perfect right to force those who did not wish to contribute to do so for SAC represents and can impose majority rule. I only asked that we not do so on this issue.

I do not object to being outvoted on SAC for that is fair enough. I do object to your fallacious remarks, personal attacks and inadequate coverage of other than personally acceptable points of view. I suggest that you give more space to reporting events and less to complaining about them. In turn I will then be able to stop cluttering up your editorial page with my letters.

Biafra: 'belief in a basis for unity'

By OLUSOLA AVOSEH

Olusola Avoseh is a Nigerian student taking a PhD in educational theory at University of Toronto. He was in Nigeria until last year.

There is, in recent weeks, a resurgence of interest in the Nigerian civil war. Much of the information which gets to the public is either incomplete or biased. It is true that in this war innocent citizens are starving and a great number of them are dying. We see photographs of these things every day. We are all very sorry about this aspect of the war.

But we cannot say that there is any evidence of genocide simply because people are dying. Is there any war in which innocent people do not starve or die? A war brings a disruption of normal life

Even in less severe disturbances hundreds of innocent people die.

The Nigerian Government started a police action against the Ibo rebel leaders because of the genuine belief that there was still some basis for unity. The police action was directed against the rebels and not against the Ibo as a group. This police action has since been escalated into a civil war.

It was the atrocities perpetrated on the Ibo in the north that made the Ibo become disenchanted with the former federal structure. But these atrocities were a spontaneous reaction against the army revolt of January 1966.

MILITARY REVOLT

This military revolt was enacted by young Ibo officers who killed non-Ibo top politicians and senior army personnel. No single Ibo politician or army officer was killed. The rank and file of the Nigerian army then, mainly northerners, and the northern civilians found it difficult to become reconciled to their loss. It must be mentioned, however, that in the riots which occurred in the wake of the army revolt atrocities were perpetrated on members of many Nigerian ethnic groups, not only on the Ibo, though the latter suffered the greatest loss.

To show the genuineness of the Federal Military Government that the war is waged "to keep Nigeria one", it should be pointed out that there are still in Lagos, the Federal capital, more than 40,000 Ibo who are pursuing their lawful business unmolest. In Western Nigeria there are about 500 Ibo still in the civil service and a much greater number are in other business as well.

Even in Northern Nigeria, where the killing of the Ibo took place, there are still a few of them. The Governments of the Northern states have taken adequate measures to protect the property left behind by the Ibo.

SINCERITY

Another evidence of the sincerity of the Nigerian Government concerning the unity issue is the treatment of the captives of war. There have been reports of the humane treatment of the refugees and the prisoners of war by the Federal army.

The Federal soldiers are under strict orders to be kind to these war victims. A few deviant cases occur and it is unfortunate that these are the ones which are maliciously publicised.

The supposedly neutral visitors who go to Ibo area not yet in Federal hands either inadvertently ignore what goes on in the Federally-held areas, or are overcome by the Ibo propaganda that they fail to be objective in their reporting. The foreign visitors are shown round camps where the refugees are preponderantly members of minority ethnic groups detained by Ibo leaders. Because they opposed secession, the detainees are made victims of inhuman treatment.

The unwary visitor is not aware that the Ibo keep two kinds of camps - refugee camps where conditions are not so bad as we are made to believe; the other kind which are really detention camps for minority groups from where most of the pathetic photographs come.

HETEROGENEITY

Most of those who argue in this country with all the vehemence of their passionate nature that the best solution was for the independence of the Ibo area have failed to grasp an important factor in the Nigerian social structure - the heterogeneity of the Nigerian society.

The former Eastern Nigeria which the Ibo now call 'Biafra' is a heterogeneous area. It consists of seven million Ibo as well as over five million others - minority elements. These include the Ibibio, the Kalabari, the the Ijaw. During the time of civilian administration, these minorities always voted in opposition to the Ibo dominated (N.C.N.C.) party. Then they had agitated for their own separate states which would remove them from Ibo domination. It is unlikely that these people will want to have anything to do with any independent state created by the Ibo.

Besides this factor, the concept of Biafra as it was known at the beginning of the civil war now has no more foundation than a shifting sand bank.

Of the three states carved out of the former Eastern Nigeria two of them, namely, the Rivers and the South-Eastern states are now in Federal hands. Roughly three-quarters of the area inhabited by the Ibo in the Central Eastern State of Nigeria is in Federal hands. In this area, life is returning to normal and relief materials get to civilians.

'The O.U.S. blew it'

By GARY SEGAL

This summer the Ontario Union of Students blew it for Canadian students, 40,000 of them across Canada. Brian Switzman, O.U.S. President, decided unilaterally that he would not inform unemployed students of over one million dollars in benefits available to them.

In the first week of June, I came across a little publicized regulation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in its application to students. In brief, under U.I.C. rules any person who has made 30 contributions (30 weeks work) in the two years prior to their date of application, eight of which must have been made within the past year, is eligible to apply for benefits.

This is not to say that benefits are automatically received by people who have complied with this minimum requirement. As an information officer for U.I.C. said so demurely, "Of course all applications are handled on an individual basis".

100,000 UNEMPLOYED

Given the unemployment of a large number of university students this past summer, variously estimated as high as 100,000 in the early summer months, I called Switzman and outlined the above facts.

I asked Brian if he would utilize the facilities of both O.U.S. and C.U.S. in order to get this information to students on campuses across Canada.

Yes, I know that 35 or 40 dollars per week isn't going to pay anyone's way through school, nor is it any answer to the problem of universal accessibility. However, this was a concrete problem with a partial answer. Three or four hundred bucks is better than nothing - not much better - but it could have been, and probably was, the difference for a lot of unemployed students.

O.U.S. president
Brian Switzman

Well, in my naivete I thought Brian would circulate this information. He didn't. Six weeks later I ran into O.U.S. Vice-President Ken ('down with all paper tigers') Stone who said he knew nothing of the situation.

The outcome was that Ken, over the later objections of Brian, tried to get the info out during the mail strike. He failed to do anything effective and by the end of the strike

GROUP HOME STAFF

Davenport House for boys seeks staff. It is planned to rehabilitate Juvenile Court referrals. Applicants should be experienced in working with delinquent boys. Residence staff group leaders and cooking cleaning staff needed. Contact R. Holmes 1515 Bathurst St. Toronto 10 giving resume in August it was too late for most students to apply.

In early September Brian told me that he had decided that since he disagreed in principle with the form of welfare state we have in Canada, he would not inform Canadian students of the existing possibilities within the system.

This is not meant to be a polemic against O.U.S. My disagreement with Brian in certain ideological areas does not prevent my support in principle, if not in practice, of some O.U.S. policies. The exploitative nature of Western society is as undeniable as the exploitative nature of the Communist bloc. But I will not hesitate to attack Brian for a unilateral stand which denied students the opportunity to decide for themselves.

Unilateral decisions made in the name of socialism are no better than similar ones made in Rhodesia, Vietnam, Czechoslovakia, or South Africa.

Companies may be barred

By LOUIS ERICHMAN

A plan which would exclude companies involved in Vietnam war production from campus recruitment will be debated tonight at an open meeting of the placement service advisory committee.

Prof. Melville Watkins of the department of political economy said Friday he would propose a plan which was instituted at Harvard last May.

"There are two stages in the procedure," Prof. Watkins explained. "First if a petition with a given number of signatures (500 at Harvard) is collected, the company in question will be required to participate in a public discussion of its policies. If it were to refuse, it would not be allowed to recruit on-campus.

"After the discussion," he continued, "the company could still be barred if another petition with a greater number of signatures (2000, the SAC referendum figure, might be reasonable) were obtained."

"It's a compromise proposal," Watkins said. "If no action is taken, we will surely have a repetition of last year's Dow sit-in and demonstration."

Last fall on-campus recruitment by Dow Chemical led to a sit-in by anti-war demonstrators and bitter confrontations with the administration and engineering students.

Following the demonstrations, a motion to deny placement service facilities to "war-complicit" companies was defeated when two student members of the advisory committee voted against the proposal.

The committee's decision tonight is difficult to forecast. Four of the committee's 14 members are students. They can be expected to support it, though SAC might object to being bypassed by the petition system as the voice of the student body.

There is some support for the anti-war position (notably Watkins) from the four faculty members.

The position of the administration appears ambivalent since Registrar Robin Ross was the one who brought the Harvard scheme to the attention of Prof. Watkins.

There might be difficulties in implementing the plan this year, since placement service recruiting is scheduled to start November 4, while gathering signatures is a time-consuming process.

Tonight's meeting will be at 7:30 in the International Student Centre. It will be open to the public, but only committee members will be allowed to speak.

Glendon College fees jump

Glendon College voted last week by a narrow margin to increase student activity fees to $27 from $17.

This increase matches one approved by York's Board of Governors last spring for the whole university, at the request of the students council at York campus, on which Glendon is not represented.

Glendon successfully demanded that its own students be permitted to decide on any increase in activity fees at their own campus, which has few ties at the social level with the main campus.

Most of the increase will be used to set up a $6300 bursary fund for any Glendon students who are unable to meet expenses because of last summer's scarcity of summer jobs and the more stringent regulations regarding student loans.

The Varsity Friday incorrectly reported that in Prof. M. Mueller's English 301 class Thursday "only one question was asked." In fact about half of the 24 students present participated in discussion.

The average reader takes about two weeks (35 hours reading) to read Tolstoy's 'War and Peace'. It's long, a 'heavy' classic. By learning to read much faster though, you can change any novel, any of the 'musts', into an evening's entertainment rather than a week's labour.

After taking the Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics course, you'll have time for reading pleasure. It teaches you to concentrate more easily and to retain more of what you read. And, if you don't at least triple your reading speed, your tuition fee will be refunded.

Invest a little time now. Just eight weeks, for a lifetime of advantages. Call us at 923-4681. Or better still, come to a free demonstration. See how you can become a dynamic reader. Find out what dynamic reading can mean to you.

Homecoming '68

By MARY POWELL

How can you describe what the homecoming parade was like if you were abducted while peacefully watching the floats go by?

My friends and I were walking along Bloor St. mind- ing our own business Satur- day morning when we were suddenly engulfed by a 12-foot long scarf. Two rowdy engi- neers were attached to each end of it. We helpless girls were swooped up, kicking and screaming, and deposited in the midst of the Lady Godiva Memorial Band.

Then the fun really began, as other captured girls, in- cluding an Eaton's salesgirl, would testify. In fact, we all had tears in our eyes when rather by the smothering Mace-like diesel fumes.

At UC Claude Bissell was having a hard time judging the floats with their "Get- Claude" theme. Not unex- pectedly the engineers float didn't win, although they should have received first prize for spirit. The Interna- tional Student Centre float, with its steel band, placed first. Second prize went to Architecture's "Claude-hop- per" shoe with students being trampled under the symbolic boot. Erindale placed third, testifying to Dr. Bissell's good nature.

By the end of the parade the grey weather and rain- boots had dissolved into sun-

The Canadians for the National Liberation Front (of Vietnam) has challenged the Vietnam Mobilization Committee to a campus debate this week.

Both organizations have planned an anti-war demon- stration for Saturday, Oct. 26, the International Day of Protest.

The marches will both convene at Queen's Park, CNLF at 1:30 p.m. to the U.S. Consulate and the VMC at 2 p.m. to City Hall.

Big boost in police training

Metro and provincial police — wor- ried about the increasing crime rate — are stepping up plans and training. Included in the plans are:

Machine-gun and tear-gas training at Downsview for members of the O.P.; increased manpower in the downtown areas, including an end to unmarked patrol cars; an improved $1,750,000 communications network for the Metro police.

Part of the reason for the stepped-up training is police fear, reinforced by reports from informers, that major trouble will erupt at Toronto universi- ties by the end of the year.

Included in the heavy-arms training are Sten-type machine guns. The Metro and provincial forces are worried about two things: the runaway increase in the crime rate and the possibility of Berkeley-like violence in Ontario.

Police officials are reluctant to ad- mit but all Ontario's major universi- ties have been infiltrated by policemen doing intelligence work on student ac- tivist groups.

Provincial police spokesmen contacted by the Varsity knew nothing about the matter. They said machine-gun and tear-gas training were part of their course already. Metro police were unavailable for comment.

During Wednesday's student council meeting there was some debate as to which organization's demonstration the council should support. SAC ended up making no decision on the matter.

"I was a little disappointed that I didn't get to rebut the comments of Paul Fromm and Joe Young (of the Mobilization Committee) during the SAC meeting," said Gary Perly, chairman of the CNLF.

Young, full-time executive secretary of the VMC, claimed during the SAC meeting that "his" demonstration had the support of the Canadian Union of Students.

"This is a pack of lies, Committee is pretty desperate and they're running around trying to look like they have a lot of support."

Perly says the difference between the two groups is both ideological and practical.

"The VMC refuses to condemn American imperialism. That's why they want to march to City Hall instead of the U.S. Consulate.

"What can they do at City Hall? Condemn Mayor Denison?"

"We are also not anxious to be involved in a demonstration with the VMC leadership who have been provocateurs at many past demonstrations," he added.

Frost leaves B of G for ROM

The Varsity regrets to announce the departure of Leslie M. Frost from the University of Toronto's Board of Governors on Friday, Oct. 18. The reason the former Ontario premier gives is that he is too pressed for time as a result of his new job as a trustee of the Royal Ontario Museum. May he rest in more leisurely peace at his new position.

The Canadian Union of Students received mixed student reaction last week as Laurentian University (Studbury) voted to stay in the national union and the University of Lethbridge voted to pull out of the movement.

In the first round of referendums on 10 campuses, Laurentian voted 399-235 in favor of CUS. Forty-one per cent of the student population voted.

At Lethbridge, 55 per cent of the students turned out to defeat CUS 422-135 Friday.

CUS President Peter Warran was on the Lethbridge campus Thursday to address the students, but was viewed as "incompetent and inarticulate," according to Arthur Joevezzo, editor of the student newspaper, The Meljorist.

However, Lethbridge voted 364-187 to retain membership in World University Services of Canada.

Earlier this month both Windsor and Waterloo Lutheran universities withdrew from CUS following referendums.

Strax fined $1

FREDERICTON (CUP) — Norman Strax, renegade University of New Brunswick physics professor, has been fined one dollar plus costs for being in contempt of court.

Last Friday, Magistrate Lloyd B. Smith said Strax was in contempt for the 24 hours during which he ignored an injunction forbidding him to enter UNB property.

Definition

No definition of neoplasia is possible A definition of a disease or a group of diseases must define the disease by listing

a group of characters present in all examples of the disease and never all present except in examples of the disease

A definition of neoplasia is impossible because there is no character present in all neoplasms and no character of neoplasms not sometimes present in non-neoplastic lesions Instead we can list the properties of neoplasms and so gain understanding of the nature of the group

Benign and Malignant Tumours

It is usual to divide tumours into benign and malignant forms In theory the division is clear benign tumours cannot invade cannot metastasize

malignant tumours

may invade may metastasize or both

In practice

the division is usually clear the majority of tumours are clearly benign or clearly malignant but intermediate forms do exist which invade little or slowly or which metastasize in only a small proportion of cases

Tumours are sometimes described as "more" or "less" malignant these are vague terms "more" malignant tumours tend to kill the patient more quickly or to metastasize more extensively or to metastasize more quickly "less" malignant tumours tend to be less dangerous

Stress is sometimes placed on the presence of a capsule around a tumour and it is suggested that capsulation suggests a benign tumour which is usually true and slowly expanding mass in the body tends to become encapsulated as the damage to the compressed surrounding tissue is repaired by scar formation tumours are no exception slowly expanding neoplasms form capsules and such tumours are usually benign Malignant mesenchymal tumours often form large masses sometimes with obvious and extensive invasion sometimes well defined but this is not a good sign

Malignant haemopoietic tumours appearances differ according to the type of tumour

if lymphnodes are involved they are enlarged soft and white fish-flesh perhaps with necrosis or fibrosis

"That's why I only got nominal punishment."

Strax has filed a suit against the University, seeking to have the injunction lifted and punitive damages awarded because, he claims, the injunction was improperly filed. He has obeyed the injunction since it was served.

Hearings of the suit began in Fredericton on November 1. James D. Harper of Fredericton is representing Strax.

Tutorials not enough

"Tutorials are not going to solve the problems of our education system," said Dr. W. C. Winegard, president of the University of Guelph.

Dr. Winegard said one of the reasons tutorials will not work is that teaching assistants are often afraid to ask the senior professor what he is doing in his class and why. This creates a lack of co-ordination between the lectures and tutorials.

"This," he said, "is carrying academic freedom to a ridiculous extreme." And with the senior faculty and the junior faculty not working together good students are resentful.

No Canadian university, he emphasized to about 35 teaching assistants in a conference here Saturday, will go to a complete tutorial system because the costs would be about 14 per cent over any acceptable budget.

HH Stewards revise SAC motion

The Board of Stewards of Hart House Thursday rejected a student council proposal for the composition of the advisory committee on the future of Hart House, but substituted one which is essentially the same.

The SAC proposal asked the committee consist of four students, two each nominated by the Board of Stewards and SAC, three faculty and one alumnus members, and non-voting representatives of the Board of Governors and the President.

This arrangement changed that suggested by President Claude Bissell, which gave votes to his representative and a board member and required the Board of Stewards nominate all four students.

Under the revised motion of the Board of Stewards, there would be three faculty and alumnus members together, one voting member representing each of the Board of Governors and the President, and five students: two chosen by SAC, two by the Board of Stewards, and the SAC representative to Hart House, Gary Segal (I Law).

Segal explains he was "relatively pleased with their decision" and that, since students still control half the votes on the committee, the composition remained relatively unchanged.

The committee may decide, among other things, whether women will be made full members of Hart House.

SAC indicated its support of this integration when it voted last week to make at least one of its appointees to the council a female student.

This change in the composition of the committee must still be approved by President Bissell.

In a news story Friday The Varsity conveyed the incorrect impression that Moses Makinde (SGS) a Nigerian student at U of T, was a supporter of the Biafran cause.

"I went to the meeting as a Nigerian observer with the intention of arguing that Mr. Stephen Lewis' arguments were purely emotional," he explains.

Davis promises legislation

The idea of a single government body with student, faculty and community representation, as recommended last week for the Ontario College of Art in the Wright Report, has received the endorsement of Education Minister William Davis.

"Legislation dealing with the Ontario College of Art will be introduced at the next session of the Legislature," Davis announced Friday.

The report, commissioned in response to the rebellion at OCA last spring, offers an alternative to the two-tiered structure of most university governments which involve a senate dominated by faculty and a board of governors dominated by community representatives.

Davis told The Varsity last week he thought the paper a "very good report."

"Although only a specific situation is involved, the report is of interest to other post-secondary institutions," he added.

Mime Troupe message is rebellion

By ART MOSES

"We try in our own humble way to destroy the United States", says Ronnie Davis in this week's edition of Time Magazine. Davis is the director of the San Francisco Mime Troupe who will appear at Varsity Arena on Wednesday afternoon.

These dramatic revolutions have but one purpose: to radicalize their audience into action and rebellion. "They believe that theatre without a political and social message is sterile junk," the Time story claims.

"Art which does not speak to vital concerns is soulless; it's not worth seeing if it has nothing to say."

"They're far different from the usual pain-in-the-ass drama and musical groups on radio and television," says Dale Wilson of SAC's Cultural Affairs Committee. "This is theatre with a purpose."

With such confirmed ideas on how theatre should be and how the stage should be used to arouse people to radical social action, it is small wonder that the Troupe has evoked violent reaction wherever they perform. The response is either enthusiastic determination to carry out the work which was called for on stage or bitterly hostile condemnation of the antics of the Troupe as "obscene, lewd, disgusting."

By using pantomime, words and song the Troupe works for, and demands audience participation. One doesn't come into contact with it and go away unaffected. He is either disgusted or aroused by the political confrontation of the performance and the subtle, skilful way it is conveyed. He is forced to question his own previously unchallenged assumptions about Western society.

Ordinarily, each actor receives 5 dollars per show, the balance going to pay expenses. Some live on this 25 dollars a week, others have part time jobs. They don't mind their unbelievably frugal existence, contending that "it's better to have work you enjoy than to have two barbecues and a colour T.V."

The Troupe still labours under a large debt accumulated from expensive legal hassles with an affronted Establishment. Once it had a $1000 grant from San Francisco's Cultural fund, but lost it when a commissioner objected to the "vulgar" content of a play.

Charges of obscenity have frequently been levelled by public officials and college administrators against the

Bogus Gazette sold fast

MONTREAL (CUP) — The editor of Logos, an underground newspaper, was arrested Wednesday following distribution of a Logos-produced take-off on the Montreal Gazette.

The substitute paper, following almost exactly regular Gazette format, was distributed to drop boxes and vendors

Troupe who reply that "reality is obscene."

To the self-styled campus "moderate", the Troupe's rebellion against society's institutions, and the assumptions on which they are based, may be anathema.

But those who are not afraid to question many of our Sacred Cows, should find the performance stimulating.

less than an hour before the real edition hit the stands.

It carried a banner headline reading Jean Drapeau Shot by Dope-Crazed Hippies—a reference to Montreal's summer vendetta against Logos and the hippies.

Editor John Kelder said people bought about 600 copies of the bogus Gazette before police seized the remaining copies. The bogus papers sold fast because Montrealers thought it was an extra.

"I did it to add some life to the Montreal night scene and to show how dead the Gazette is," said Kelder, who was arraigned on a charge of public mischief.

The Gazette printed a disclaimer on page 3 of its final edition.

Why not Hart House as centre?

By Harriet Kideckel

Why is it that almost every other university in this country has a government financed student centre except University of Toronto?

For over three years, the Students Administrative Council has been working hard to make a reality out of that promising sign at the corner of Russel and St. George. But there are always new hang-ups.

First it was money — the government copped out on the cash it had originally promised. So SAC arranged another means of raising the dough. So SAC arranged another means of raising the dough. They planned an advance contract with the Bank of Montreal whereby the bank pays in advance for a lease to one of the stores in the centre. The advance rent they promised was more than enough to at least get started on the building.

But then the city put its two cents worth in. Some by-law insisting that all buildings be set back from the roadway twenty-five feet screwed the architect's plan to obtain maximum space by building right to the curb.

But if we've got the money why do we have to build on that site?

The university is tearing down buildings for residences only the rich can afford and libraries only staff and graduate students can use.

A campus centre is important, too. There must be other sites that will facilitate the building. Surely the university owns enough land that it can find some little corner somewhere.

And if it can't, we already have a student centre.

Hart house is perfect. It has the necessary committee rooms and relaxation areas. The men are getting a new athletic building so the gyms in Hart House could be used for co-ed activities. Why not co-ed pool parties?

There are offices for SAC,

The Varsity, and Canadian Union of Students. (Now spread all over the campus.) There are lounges for relaxing, chess rooms, card rooms, a cafeteria, a snack bar. What more could you want?

Plus, Hart House is one of the most beautiful architectural structures in North America.

During the summer, Hart House demonstrated how appropriate it was for this type of use when it opened its doors every Wednesday night to male and female summer students. There was ping-pong in the gym, splashing in the pool, bridge and monopoly in the card rooms. Hart House never had such a warm atmosphere as then.

Why not every night and every day, all year round?

We don't have a place to go. Let's keep students off the streets. If we can't build a campus centre, let's take advantage of the facilities we have.

Quebec crisis confrontation today

MONTREAL (CUP) — A major confrontation in the Quebec CEGEP crisis is expected today, as an education ministry ultimatum expires and a student march moves on Quebec City.

The education ministry sent letters Thursday setting today as the final date for resumption of normal classes at Quebec's junior colleges. Any school not running smoothly will lose its semester.

Meanwhile, L'Union General des Etudiants de Quebec have asked all secondary school students to join in a march on the provincial capital. It is the first such march in the history of Quebec student-government relations.

The central co-ordinating committee of UGEQ has also appealed for the support of the 225,000 members of the Confederation of National Trade Unions. The CNTU has worked closely with UGEQ in the past.

The committee has also approved the establishment of committees throughout the province to deal with the education crisis, inform the public and endorse the principle of school occupation to stimulate free discussion and thought.

Six schools are still occupied by students, who have vowed to stay until there is some definite government action. They are protesting against the current educational system, which they say makes an individual a depersonalized and anonymous number in a labyrinth of committees and layers of superstructures.

... cancels convocation

MONTREAL (CUP) — L'Université de Montreal has cancelled its fall convocation in the face of "the climate of unrest among the students in Quebec."

Instead, 914 degrees and diplomas will be distributed by registered mail. A university spokesman said it would be "unwise to hold special ceremonies," citing the province-wide OEGEP unrest as one reason for cancellation.

Students in the social science faculty at L'U de M are occupying their building in sympathy with the CEGEP strikes.

Cox Commission reports in Columbia aftermath

The Cox Commission, established last May to analyse the reasons for revolt at Columbia, has strongly criticized the University administration and New York police.

The administration, the report said, "conveyed an attitude of authoritarianism and invited mistrust."

Police were described as "excessively violent".

Students' actions were "in no way commensurate with the brutality of the police," the report said.

Students were criticized for their "disruptive tactics." The "free university" requires the "entire community's active rejection of disruptive demonstrations," it was stressed.

Andrew Cordier, acting president of Columbia, thanked the commission for its "extensive work and candid analysis". Student leaders have yet to comment on the report.

Thirty students, including Mark Rudd, leader of Students for a Democratic Society, remain suspended from the university. After attempts to get them registered resulted in a disturbance registration day, the SDS was forbidden to use campus facilities.

Criminal courts have dropped charges against 443 of those charged only with criminal trespass, following a plea for leniency made by Columbia Law School Dean William Warren.

The university has its own discipline procedures for "members of our family who have breached the rules," he said.

Over 400 cases await trial, including 154 multiple-offence cases.

SDS leaders say the period of "mass revolutionary action" is over at Columbia and are now intent on recruiting, organizing and educating students.

Regents allow Cleaver to lecture at Berkley

Black Panther leader Eldridge Cleaver is being permitted to lecture on a new course at the University of California at Berkley.

The new controversial course will be called "Social Analysis 139X".

Cleaver is currently free on parole from the state prison. He had been charged with assault with intent to commit murder after an alleged gun battle with Oakland police in 1958.

California Governor Ronald Reagan demanded the black militant be fired before he ever reached the lecture podium.

In a conciliatory move the Board of Regents agreed to allow Cleaver one lecture.

But 2,000 Berkeley students demanded in a mass meeting that the Regents rescind the limitation.

Cleaver lashed back at Reagan, calling him a "punk, a sissy, and a coward".

He described the United States as "the successor to Nazi Germany, the number one obstacle to human progress — not Russia, nor China, but Babylon right here in America."

The next step for the students and faculty is to get the course recognized as a credit. They put their case to a meeting of the Regents this weekend.

As yet there is no news of the Regents' decision.

Recruiters resent rivalry

SAN FRANCISCO — (CUP-CPS) — Military recruiters objected to sharing space with anti-war groups at a "military information day" at San Francisco State College this week.

The idea of having both the military and the war opponents together at the same time came as a result of last year's demonstrations against recruiters.

"We're not out to get into a debating society," said one military spokesman, "We're out to recruit students."

500 students marched to the office of college President Robert Smith after the recruiters failed to show. Amid jeers and boos, Smith stated his decision that ROTC would remain on campus as long as a majority of students wanted it.

RUGGER, SOCCER BLUES WIN; TRACK TEAM FOURTH

By PAUL VESA

Jukka Heikurinen was the story of the Varsity team which finished fourth at the OQAA championships at Windsor on Saturday. The third-year Forestry student won the pole vault, taking Varsity's only first with a vault of 13'8", breaking the old record by a full 8 inches and leaving his closest competition 7" behind. Heikurinen narrowly lost out to Glen Arbeau of Waterloo in the coaches' balloting for the Hec Phillips Memorial Trophy, awarded to the outstanding athlete at the meet.

Arbeau won the award on a javelin throw of 215'7", twenty-two feet over the previous record (set in 1938). Terry Wilson gave Waterloo a one-two finish in this event, coming within 6' of Arbeau as Waterloo went on to win the meet championship and take the Tait McKenzie trophy from Varsity.

Another outstanding performance was turned in for Waterloo by Kip Sumner, coming within a half-second of Bill Crothers' intercollegiate record in the half-mile while running against a strong wind.

Ralston Johnson and Bill Lord finished one-two in both sprints for McMaster, as well as running on their record-breaking sprint relay team.

The javelin record took the most abuse as the first four finishers eclipsed the old record, among them Gord Homer of Varsity, who took third behind the aforementioned Arbeau and Wilson.

Brian Donnelly of Queen's lived up to expectations, taking both the 120 and 440 yard hurdles and tying his own record of 14.5 in the 120 high hurdles.

Mac took both the sprint and the mile relay, changing the record book in each case. The sprint went in 42.8 seconds and the mile in 3:20.4, breaking last year's record of 3:21.0 set by Dave Bailey, who has travelled two countries south for another meet this year.

Outside of Heikurinen, the only medal taken by Toronto was the second-place silver by Bruce Tucker in the shot put. Thirds were garnered by Steve Wetmore in the 440 yard hurdles, by Gord Homer in the javelin, by Brian Richards in the 3-mile run, and by the 440 yard relay team, composed of Wetmore, Hung Lee, Alan Tucker, and Dave Quibell as anchor.

SOCCER

University of Toronto soccer Blues made their best showing so far this year in defeating McMaster Marauders 4-1. It was a solid team effort and Blues, without exception, played a clean, hard-hitting game on a muddy, slippery field.

Early in the game, Blues went ahead on a well-taken penalty shot by Jim Lefkos. Shortly after, following a defensive lapse, the McMaster right winger lofted a shot high into the net from an almost impossible angle for the equalizer. Although keeping the play in the Mac half of the field for the most part, the slippery field spoiled some Blues' chances which would ordinarily have been goals. Finally, Miles Sosa slipped an almost unbelievable pass from 70 feet out into the net past the startled McMaster defence.

Early in the second half, the forward line put the pressure on and some ten minutes into the half, after a good effort by John Gero in a scramble around the McMaster net, Ronnie Muir neatly tucked the rebound into the goal for Blues' third counter.

From here on, Blues' potent offence showed their might as the ball whizzed back and forth in front of the Mac net with a seemingly stunned McMaster defense trying their best to clear the ball. Particularly close tries came from Frank Soppelsa and Graham Shields but the old timers just failed to score.

Jim Lefkos reciprocated John Gero's good effort earlier in the half by setting him up for Blues' final goal. Mac had several good chances late in the game but Blues' goalkeeper Bernie D'Abreau was up to the task.

Under difficult field conditions, Dwight Taylor and Adrean Verhulst controlled midfield ably and Bill Nepotnik almost looked like a winger on several plays in moving the ball up the field.

Eric Sereda, Blues' burly centre half, showed the way for the defence as he completely manhandled Mac's centre forward. Blues substitutes looked determined and able in the second half.

Corner kicks — Blues' next encounter will be an exhibition game at York University on Wednesday.

RUGGER

The first Varsity rugger team continued its winning ways Saturday with a 9-0 victory over McMaster Marauders. Varsity seconds trounced Marauders' backup squad 24-0.

The first were singularly impressive in their effort. Winger Rick Rowland and fly half Andy Gibson scored tries and George Wraw booted a forty-yard penalty kick. Mac played well considering this was their fourth game in ten days.

Blues played well in flashes but seemed uninterested in playing the hard hitting aggressive ball which characterized their play three days earlier against Toronto Irish.

The game was marred by muddy field conditions, an excess of kicking for touch and a referee who had just been issued a new whistle and wanted to see if it would work.

Varsity seconds moved into a 10-0 half time lead over Mac when Andy Cairns and Paul Henry each counted tries. Cairns converted one of the tries.

In the second half, Varsity backs overwhelmed their opposition. Peter Zepp scored twice, once on an excellent defensive play when he snagged an errant Mac kick and sped down the sidelines unopposed for an easy three-pointer.

Strong performances by Vic Harding and Larry McKenna yielded a try each while Andy Cairns thrilled spectators as he has in the past with two conversions from impossible angles and some amazing flukes on his downfield scampers.

Fullback Bob Noble scorned his positional play because of the nonexistence of a Mac attack and moved into the half line to make some long dashes before passing off to the other backs.

In the pack, Brian Hamill won praise for his ability to get to the loose ball quickly and advance it through the straggling Mac defence.

BLUES DO EVERYTHING WELL IN SLASHING 42-8 WIN

Mike Rahom (22) bursts through middle of the line to count Blues fourth touchdown in 42-8 homecoming win over McMaster Marauders. The score, Varsity's only one along the ground, come on first play following Stew McSween's runback of an interception to the Moc five yard line. Norm Troinor (60) threw key block to spring Rahom loose.

By Rod Mickleburgh

Varsity Blues' choo-choo train got back on the winning track Saturday afternoon as they superbly engineered a 42-8 derailment of McMaster Marauders.

Before a Homecoming crowd of 13,713 fans at Varsity Stadium, quarterback Vic Alboini caseyjonised supreme, throwing four touchdown passes and completing 19 of 25 passes for more than 200 yards.

Three of Alboini's touchdown tosses went to split-end Eric Walter (5, 14, and 27 yards), while the fourth was snared by rookie John Chapman (5 yds.). Mike Rahom, on a five yard run, and giant defensive end Alex Squires, on a five yard fumble rumble, got the other majors. Bill Stankovic gogolaked four converts, with Paul McKay adding a convert and a single to complete Toronto's scoring.

Bob Baytor etched his name faintly in the archives by scoring the McMaster touchdown on a 75 yard pass and run play which caused the Mac spotter to nearly fall out of the pressbox with excitement. "Love it! Love it!" he screamed as Marauders narrowed the score to 28-8 early in the fourth quarter.

Quarterback Peter Quinlan hoofed a single and Pete Fuller added a convert for Mc-Master's other two points.

It was a solid team effort by Blues who were being slowly buried by brickbats following a 35-0 loss to Queen's and a fortunate 19-19 draw with Waterloo over the past two weeks.

Defensively, Varsity kept shuffling Mac quarterbacks to the bottom of the deck all afternoon and dealing aces off the top to the offense. Blues' mangle-and-maim men not only set up three touchdowns with two interceptions and a blocked kick, but they scored one as well.

Rookie defensive halfback Stew MacSween was particularly outstanding, making both Toronto interceptions and chiming in with numerous deadly tackles. Mac got their only touchdown when MacSween slipped and fell leaving Baytor momentarily open. Even so, the gap was lessening appreciatively as Baytor crossed the goal line.

Also deserving special mention were defensive ends Jim Bennett and Alex Squires (happiest man in the dressing after the game, with his touchdown), linebacker Bill Bennett, who blocked one kick and partially blocked another, and corner linebacker Bob Bloxham, making his intercollegiate football debut. Bloxham was called in by coach Ron Murphy following the injury to regular Don Fraser at practice Friday night. He did a helluva job.

Offensively, of course, there were many sweet moments, especially for Alboini who has so stoically weathered the volley of criticism levelled his way since the beginning of the season. Varsity fans, whose last glimpse of the plucky quarterback was his two for fourteen completion record against Queen's, can be forgiven for wondering if perhaps Eddie LeBaron hadn't snuck into a Blues' uniform and started winging the ball all over the lot.

Ever since the Queen's game (will I never shut up about it!), Murphy and offensive coach Dave Copp have been working hard to get the once accurate Alboini back on the beam. He showed marked improvement against Waterloo and then flowered gorgeously Saturday.

Walter's three touchdowns give him 24 career touchdowns in the SIFL, within reach of Ronnie Stewart's record of 29.

John Chapman, filling in for injured will-o-the-wisp Walt Sehr, was a more than adequate replacement, catching seven passes for 104 yards.

Jim Cholckley (37) and other Moc runners found trouble making yards against Blues Saturday. Here, Peter Von Bodegom (63) makes the grab and Gord Squires (42) and Alex Squires (61) move in for the kill.

No ban on war complicit companies

By LOUIS ERlichMAN

The placement service advisory committee has again refused to ban companies engaged in Vietnam war production from on-campus recruitment.

The committee Monday night defeated by a vote of 8-4 a motion proposed by economics professor Melville Watkins which would have compelled companies to publicly discuss their "policies in relation to the war in Vietnam" if 500 students and faculty demanded it. Companies refusing would have been denied use of placement service facilities.

Peter Cooke (IV APSC) and John Duffy (IV SMC), joined the alumni administration and two of the four faculty members of the committee to defeat the motion.

Prof. Watkins said he wanted not only to protest the war, but also to "strike at the present structure of the university in society, to free it from the social structure of corporate capitalism, to help the structure to change in more humane directions.

"To deny access to certain companies is a political act, but to permit all companies is also a political stand," he said. "The university must take a stand as a collectivity, or leave itself prey to outside forces."

Economics professor John Crispo protested that "no one has a monopoly of morality.

"There are no absolute rights and wrongs," he said. "It's all gray.

"How are we going to draw the line? Why don't we condemn Russia, Nigeria, polluters, or tobacco companies?"

"I'm frightened we will set a precedent," Prof. Crispo continued. "Now it's the placement service, next it will be hiring, admission standards, research."

Placement Service Director Allan Headrick estimated that two-thirds of the companies now coming to the Placement Service would not come if the motion were passed.

"The vast majority of students are here to learn how to serve their community," said W.F. Graydon, associate engineering dean, "and must therefore seek connection with the industrial complex. If we force companies to undergo a star-chamber treatment it will hurt students who have career objectives."

Perhaps the night's most prophetic voice was that of Prof. Crispo who said there were "other means of protest" available. On-campus recruitment begins November 4.

Two Queen's execs resign

KINGSTON (CUP) — Two Queen's University student executives resigned their positions Monday in order to seek a radical mandate from the campus.

Student president Chuck

Edwards and his vice-president Jan Lichty are members of Students for a New University, an activist campus group.

Edwards outlined the type of campaign they will wage.

"We want a positive campaign of politics against politics, ideas versus ideas, strategies versus strategies."

The move came after a series of intense personality clashes on the council executive. Medical representative Al Maloney said, "I don't agree with the way Chuck is going about things.

"He sees things as principles that are unsacrificeable. There are some things which you have to sacrifice. Compromises are sometimes necessary to achieve one's aims."

Edwards was elected SNU treasurer recently. Lichty says SNU is "the only hope for meaningful change in the university."

No population explosion

There is no population explosion, a student told Prof. George Phillipot Monday.

Prof. Phillipot was chairing a discussion on the population explosion and archeology.

Western ethnocentrism, the belief that western culture is best, created the population explosion, the student charged. A large population is appropriate for the Indian culture, he said.

He said India's population has been stable since the beginning of British colonialism. Censuses have increased because of greater accuracy, not greater population.

Indians have not suffered the cultural destruction that archeologists associate with overcrowding, he added.

There was no rebuttal to these statements.

Chapter two: Professors

Look, look. See the young professor.
He is a secret radical.
He secretly sympathizes with student power.
He secretly sympathizes with Vietnamese villagers.
He signs petitions.
But he forges his name.
After all, it would jeopardize his career.
He likes undergraduates.
He wishes he were an undergraduate again.
He takes his coat off when he lectures.
To show he's a regular guy.
He smokes under the No Smoking sign.
To show he's a regular guy.
He uses risqué words like "broad".
Which is pretty hard in a computer science course.
He leaks the exam questions to his class.
Mainly so they don't all fail.
He is openly critical of the system. The solar system.
One day he will grow up. Then he will be a secret conservative.

Chapter one: SAC members

Look, look. See the SAC member.
He is earnest and idealistic.
See his bulging briefcase. What's in it?
A salami sandwich and the Yellow Pages.
He knows "Robert's Rules of Order" backwards.
And that's the way he usually applies them.
He is always looking for a New Student Direction.
He couldn't find his ass with both hands and a road-map.
He presents all sorts of briefs.
But never gives a brief presentation.
He confounds his enemies: "If Mr. so-and-so would be willing to retract his remarks concerning the minutes of the last meeting, Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to entertain an apology."
Prolonged, stormy applause.
Several Honourable members: Hear hear.
He thinks Jenny Penney is a case for withdrawal.
He ask Janus Proos what the letter "J" stands for.
How long will he be in office?
Until February. Then he will discover that he's behind in his work and resign from SAC on a matter of principle.
What's his future?
Robarts can't live forever.

Chapter three: The Average Student

Look, look. See the average student.
 He hates university.
 He hates work.
 He hates "homework", "teachers" and "school."
 He doesn't like the course he is in.
 But most of all he hates student activists.
 Because he doesn't think they are interested in getting an education.
 This story is very short.
 After all, what can you say about the average student?

Chapter four: Graduate students

Look, look. See the Graduate Student.
 He is mature.
 He has a mature philosophy of life.
 It is: "Look out for number one."
 He doesn't want SAC to spend his money on draft dodgers and student power.
 He wants a liquor bar, social events and a smoking lounge.
 Just like your little brother in high school.
 He is part of the teaching staff.
 Professors hire him to assist their undergraduate courses.
 He talks rudely to freshmen, publishes a fictional tele phone number and learns to say "Why don't you look it up in your text?" when he doesn't know the answer
 If he is good at this they make him a full professor.
 If he is not good at this, he compensates by writing letters to newspapers, solving all the problems of the world.
 Poor graduate student.
 He was high-school valedictorian.
 He won a scholarship by writing an essay on
 The Necessity of the British Commonwealth of Nations (competition restricted to boys of good character).
 He brushes his teeth
 three times a day.
 After all these years, he studies hard as ever.
 When will he get his just reward?

Chapter five: Student newspapers

Look, look. See the student newspaper.
 If you've got the guts.
 A guaranteed surprise on every page.
 Vulgar, vulgar, vulgar.
 It pays to increase your word power.
 It is re-sold in Montreal as "Confidential Flash."
 See the editor. He is interested in commitment.
 Having been committed three times.
 He writes editorials about Life in General.
 People are so specialized these days.
 The paper has a special supplement for U.C. students Called After Fourskin.
 Once a month it runs another special supplement.
 Called News.
 The editor is always talking about democracy and equality.
 Not only that, he really believes in these things.
 We're trying to have him declared mentally incompetent.
 The paper is different from the dailies your parents read.
 For one thing, everyone on staff can spell.
 Not only that, the belief in democracy and equality results in "bias."
 The daily papers believe in democracy and equality too, but they're not biased.
 Maybe that's because they don't believe hard enough.

Chapter six: Janitors

Look, look. See the school janitor.
 How do you know he is a janitor?
 Because when you talk to him he answers you in fluent Bulgarian.
 He is surly, bad-tempered and thick.
 He hates his work.
 Why does he do it?
 He is financing his son's education.
 His son isn't going to be a bum.
 He's going to be a university graduate.
 He won't have a bad back when he's forty-three.
 He'll be able to say more to the world than "No Smoking" or "Don't Walk on the Grass."
 Although not much more.
 He won't have to attend meetings of the Board of Governors with a wet broom.
 He'll become an aristocrat, oppose Medicare and tell stories about the notorious laziness of the working classes.
 Only in America.

'Russian Jews not oppressed'

By LEIGHTON REID

Jews are not being discriminated against in Russia says Yuri Aneric, a post-graduate fellow in chemistry.

Aneric was speaking at a Symposium on Concern for Soviet Jewry at Hillel House last night before about 20 students.

"I cannot believe the stories about Soviet oppression of the Jews," he said.

Many Jews were saved from the Germans by Russians during the Second World War.

"We have many Jewish heroes in Russia, as well as many high-ranking Jewish doctors, lawyers and scientists."

He was sharply challenged by several people, most of whom pointed out the notable lack of support for Jewish education in the Soviet Union.

"The Jews number about 3,000,000 in the Soviet Union. They are guaranteed equal rights under the Soviet Constitution," said Peter Ruzohorsky (I Meds).

"Yet there are no schools in the major cities that teach students about Jewish history and culture."

Several students attacked two anti-Israeli cartoons, allegedly from the Soviet press, as being anti-Semitic as well.

Aneric emphatically denied any anti-Semitism in the cartoons, although he did admit the cartoons to be anti-Israeli.

One student said experts, recently returned from the Soviet Union claimed a disproportionately high number of Jews were being tried for "economic crimes".

Aneric questioned the truth of these observers. He termed articles by the Western press on the subject as "interesting propaganda".

Born in the Republic of Georgia in the Soviet Union, Aneric has been in Canada for about a year.

One hundred U of T students yesterday afternoon marched in silence from Sidney Smith Hall to the Soldier's Tower of Hart House. The students were protesting "the plight of Soviet Jewry."

Meds, Dents get 'new image'

How important is his image to a struggling young doctor-to-be?

There have been rumors that if a student in a professional faculty like Medicine or Dentistry does not reflect the "clean-cut" image required of him by society, he may be expelled from his faculty here.

"There's nothing of that nature that I have ever heard," said A.G. Read, secretary of Dentistry. "We expect students to be reasonably groomed when dealing with patients", he added.

Asked if beards were permissible, he said a student who wore one for religious reasons was not restrained from this last year. There have been no incidents of someone refusing to shave his beard for other reasons, he noted.

The Medical Faculty was "rather stringent" in the past, says SAC rep Bob Barkwell (II Meds) but dress affairs are being left to individual clinicians, following a staff-student decision of the Undergrad Student Committee.

Assistant Dean L.F. Loach said three weeks ago that students are to meet the professional image in clothes, adds Barker, but no mention was made of beards. Secretary Read said no political or cultural restrictions are placed on dental students. "I don't think the medical faculty would be medieval enough to oust people because of their political convictions", said Barkwell.

Strax gets $135

Norman Strax, the University of New Brunswick physics professor who lost his job after leading a student demonstration last month, received support from an unexpected quarter yesterday.

The Ontario Institute for Students in Education teaching staff executive sent a telegram of support to Strax expressing shock and dismay at the procedures. UNB President Colin MacKay followed in dismissing Strax plus a $135 donation to help defray Strax' legal costs.

He still faces an administration suit charging him with disrupting the university.

The university still maintains its injunction against Strax, keeping him off UNB property.

A small group of supporters still has control of Strax' ex-office. They have turned it into a co-op residence, and the administration has as yet made no effort to evict them.

What did you learn in school today?

By TOM CURRAN

Insurrection in Sydney Smith Hall. Grave government crisis threatens to topple the Fifth Republic. Daniel Cohn-Bendit presents position paper written in Frankfurt jail.

Political Science 324 demands complete student participation.

Associate Professor Stephen Clarkson has set up the first half of the course as a simulation of the political system of the Fifth Republic of France.

Prof. Clarkson was in Paris during the May revolt and it is with this crisis in mind that he plans to structure the simulation.

Each member of the class has been given a role in the French system. Students play out the parts of the prime minister, the minister of education, the police, the press, the student revolutionaries, the Church and so on.

Each student writes a background and position paper, which gives a general picture of the organization or person he plays. These papers have been distributed to the class as a whole.

Soon a crisis situation will be created and the students will have to react according to the role they are playing. Prof. Clarkson thinks his course will be much like a war game, demanding a great deal of knowledge and complete involvement.

The crisis time will start at the beginning of November and will probably involve fantastic numbers of bulletins to be released by interest groups, the government, the radicals and the other members of the society.

Students will receive marks on the basis of the papers they submit, confidential self-appraisals on their performance during the crisis, and confidential evaluations made by the other members of each student's group. There are no exams in this course.

All the students in the course seem very satisfied with the simulation approach and excitement mounts as the crisis grows nearer.

Graduate students say scaaat! to SAC

Amid a confusion of Robert's Rules, the Graduate Student Union voted 287-86 in favor of withdrawing from the Students Administrative Council.

In the course of heated debate GSO president John Winter, condemned SAC as acting against the interests of graduate students.

As part of the graduate school registration program, the GSO executive circulated a request for a mandate to withdraw from SAC.

"Not many voted, because they didn't know what it was all about," said Winters, "but of those who did there was a two-thirds majority in favor of withdrawal.

"We have enough substantive arguments for withdrawal so we should be given the chance to show what an impressive organization we can run," Winter claimed.

Philip Resnick (SGS) spoke out strongly against the executive's motion.

Despite the claim in a GSU publication that graduate students have more prestige than under-graduates, "we're all students and we all share common problems," said Resnick.

"There are some differences between the two ranks of students' age and professionalism, for instance," said Resnick. "But we should work together in the area of educational reform.

"We could work together in course unions, work toward a common student interest."

Foster Stackhouse (SGS) condemned the GSU for being a "liberal organization."

He also questioned the expenditure of his GSU fees. "They spend my money on wine and cheese parties and full page ads in the Varsity," he snorted.

"At least with SAC we get

some services. We get deductions of summer flights, and are provided with entertainment at reduced rates. And you can't tell me graduate students don't take advantage of this," he said.

needs a two-thirds, majority vote by SAC.

"It will be very hard for the GSU to persuade SAC members they should withdraw," Legend warned.

Biafra sympathy fast begins today

A three-day starve-in to protest widespread death from hunger in Biafra will begin this morning at Queen's Park.

Organizers have called on students to assemble in front of the Ontario Legislature at 10 a.m.

"People should fast one day or two days or three days according to their commitment to the cause as well as their physical ability to starve," explains Grant Wanzell (SGS).

"We want our government to propose a cease-fire in the United Nations," said Rev. Eliert Freirichs, at an organizing meeting Monday.

The starve-in, which will continue around the clock, is expected to last until Friday night.

"I'm starving for Biafra" buttons will be sold to help raise funds for hunger relief.

"The money may not be that much," explained one Biafran group member. "But it's our care and concern and anxiety that matter."

"While we will be starving for just three 10,000.

days, the starving 10 million in Biafra may well all die by Christmas if the war continues," said Jerry Caplan, another member of the SAC Committee on the Biafra-Nigeria Crisis.

The whole protest, however, may be in vain. Prime Minister Trudeau said Monday Canada's position in aiding the Biafrans is the "only realistic one."

"We have expressed our concern to the International Red Cross in the strongest possible terms... our planes are there; they are available and we want them to fly supplies."

Canada's senior observer in Nigeria told the Commons external affairs committee yesterday that he saw no evidence of genocide against the Ibo people by advancing Nigerian federal forces.

In the same committee meeting Dr. Cleyve Shepherd — just back from Biafra — said the number of persons dying of starvation daily in Nigeria has risen from 6,000 a day to 8,000 or

Shop and comp are contraceptives

"If they tried several brands instead of being discouraged by the bad effects of one, about 95 per cent of this world's women could find a perfect birth control pill."

said Dr. William Cornett yesterday. He was addressing a pre-Teach-In meeting on Family Planning.

Dr. Cornett said the "combination pill" (same pill all month) is the most effective but that the "sequential pill" (two types of pill in one cycle) is also 99 per cent effective.

Dr. Cornett described the pill as the most suitable contraceptive for the North American woman, who is mainly interested in limiting an individual family.

But, he added, in backward countries — which must reduce their populations to feed them — intrauterine devices + about 96 per cent effective) are the most practical device, since they are cheaper.

Dr. Cornett showed his large and interested audience slides of some earlier contraceptives, which he described as either ineffective or difficult to use effectively.

He said that this accounts for the phenomenal acceptance of the pill and the "loop" when they were introduced in the early 1960's.

THE WAR IN VIETNAM

At its October 16 meeting, the SAC passed the following motion:
Be it resolved that the SAC:

1. condemn the war currently being waged against Vietnam by the United States of America and its allies;
2. demand the immediate withdrawal of all U.S. and allied troops, and further demand the immediate cessation of all acts of war against Vietnam in order to permit the Vietnamese to settle their own internal affairs;
3. condemn the Canadian government's political and material support for U.S. aggression in Vietnam and elsewhere;
4. sponsor a program of education (including debates, production of background materials, forums, films, etc.) during the International Week of Protest, October 21-27, and sponsor a protest forum on October 25 to focus on issues of Canadian and university involvement in the war. CARRIED (24-13-4).

This edited version of a working paper from the Canadian Union of Students' National Congress provides an outline of the reasons for which this resolution was passed. We urge you to read this paper. A bibliography of readings on Vietnam is available in limited supply from the SAC Office, or from the Canadian Union of Students, 246 Queen Street, Ottawa 4, Ontario.

There is need to analyze official U.S. policy in an historical perspective. The reason for this analysis can be stated simply: the rationale for U.S. intervention in Vietnam is based in large measure upon two questionable assumptions; 1) that South Vietnam is a sovereign state and 2) acts of aggression are being committed against its legal authority by external forces.

So we must determine whether Vietnam is divided into two separate sovereign states, North and South and if so, whether South Vietnam is being attacked by the North in order to defeat the legal government. We can do this only by looking at the development of Vietnam from its origins to the present time and the nature of the body politic in Vietnam.

HISTORY OF VIETNAM

Before the Second World War the area that is now called Vietnam consisted of the Colony of Cochin-China and the two protectorates of Annam and Tonkin. These territories were part of French Indochina and as such were ruled by French Governors. During World War II French authorities in Indochina collaborated with the Japanese invaders but were resisted by the people of Indochina led by Ho Chi Minh. The resistance group was called the Viet Minh (League for the Independence of Vietnam) and consisted of a coalition of several parties of varying political views.

When Japan collapsed in August 1945, Ho Chi Minh immediately proclaimed a provisional government. The emperor Bao Dai abdicated his throne and called upon the people of Annam to support the revolutionary government of Ho Chi Minh. On March 6, 1946, a convention signed between the French Commissioner and President Ho Chi Minh recognized the Vietnam Republic of Ho Chi Minh as a free state.

There was considerable disagreement as to the extent of "freedom" to be allowed to the Vietnam Republic and mutual accusations between the French and the Viet Minh developed into armed hostilities and eventually, into the bitter and protracted French Indochina War (1946-1954). This "war of independency" as the Vietnamese termed it, was in fact just that, a war between the French Colonialist army and the people of Vietnam. During that war the French established a rival regime, the "State of Vietnam", with former Emperor Bao Dai as its President. Yet in establishing this regime, France maintained the same degree of control over the government of the "State of Vietnam" as it had always had. Decisions of consequence regarding the new state had to be approved by the High Council of the French Union which itself was merely an advisory body subordinate to the President of the French Republic.

Hence when France officially recognized the "State of Vietnam" on September 30, 1949, both parties realized fully the extent of the French Government's control over the new state and that it was legally committed to carrying out the will of France. But by recognition of the "State of Vietnam" France did not a special supplement published by the Students Administrative Council article by Barry McPeake, associate secretary, Canadian Union of Students

intend to create two separate states in Vietnam, for the primary issue at stake throughout the eight year War was whether the French-Bao Dai regime or Ho Chi Minh's regime was to rule over the whole of Vietnam. In other words, it was the intention of the French to defeat the Viet Minh Government, set up the Bao Dai government as the provisional authority of all Vietnam, and then and only then would it consider giving Vietnam its independence.

U.S. ENTERS STRUGGLE

However the War went badly for the French, and in 1950 the United States formally announced that it would furnish "economic aid and military equipment" to meet "the threat to security of Vietnam". American aid during the remaining four years of the war (1950-1954) was approximately two billion dollars. To most Vietnamese such massive, if indirect, participation made the United States an ally of France, a role that further prolonged the "colonial" civil war and made it even more bloody and costly.

By Spring 1954 the French military situation had grown even more critical and on March 29, 1954 the U.S. publicly proposed "United action". The proposal was rejected by the British for fear of confrontation with the Soviet Union and or mainland China and because of Britain's determination to end the war through an international conference then in preparation. It is noteworthy here to point out U.S. opposition to the negotiations (at Geneva) and that in fact their only concern was to win the war.

"On April 4, 1954, President Eisenhower sent Winston Churchill a personal note in which he emphasized that there was no negotiated solution of the Indo-China problem and that what was required was concerted action against communist aggression . . . According to the London Times of April 9, 1954, "Dulles with the President's support . . . has suggested that communist victory, even if achieved with Vietnam forces alone, it not to be tolerated." (America's Vietnam policy, by Edward Herman and Richard DuBoff.)

GENEVA CONFERENCE

The Geneva Conference opened on April 26, 1954. The Geneva Accords and Declaration were signed on behalf of the French Union Forces, that is, on behalf of France and also on behalf of the Democratic Republic of Vietnam (the North). As pointed out earlier, the "State of Vietnam" was legally committed by the 1949 agreements to carry out policies, treaties, agreements etc. made on behalf of France.

The ruins of Hue in South Vietnam

Furthermore Article 27 of the Geneva Accords states that "The signatories of the present Agreement and their successors in their functions shall be responsible for ensuring the observance and enforcement of the terms and provisions thereof." Finally, by Article 2 of "Heads of Agreement on Vietnamese Independence", the State of Vietnam agreed to "take over from France all the rights and obligations resulting from international treaties or conventions contracted by France on behalf or in the name of the State of Vietnam or all other treaties and conventions concluded by France in the name of French Indochina, insofar as these affect Vietnam." This latter document gave the State of Vietnam (the South) its freedom within the stated limitations and only the Geneva Accords were signed. That South Vietnam was bound by the Geneva Accords, is an undebatable legal fact.

To what was the South Vietnamese Government committed? In Article 6 of the Final Declaration of the Geneva Conference it was stated that "The Conference recognized that the essential purpose of the agreement relating to Vietnam is to settle military questions with a view to ending hostilities and that the military demarcation line is provisional and should not in any way be interpreted as constituting a political or territorial boundary. The Conference expresses its conviction that the execution of the provision set out in the present declaration and in the agreement on cessation of hostilities creates the necessary basis for the achievement in the near future of a political settlement in Vietnam".

The nature of the "political settlement in Vietnam" is outlined in Article 7 of the Declaration. It states: "The Conference declares that, so far as Vietnam is concerned, the settlement of political problems . . . shall permit Vietnamese people to enjoy the fundamental freedoms, guaranteed by democratic institutions established as a result of free general elections by secret ballot. In order to ensure that sufficient progress in the restoration of peace has been made . . . general elections shall be held in July 1956".

It is quite clear from the Geneva Agreements that the South Vietnamese Government of Ngo Diem having been set up by France after the Conference was committed to regrouping her forces to the South (as were the Viet Minh forces to the North) of a "provisional military demarcation line" during the first year after the Cease-Fire and during the second year" from July 20, 1955, onwards . . ." to consultations regarding agreement of the methods of general nation-wide elections by secret ballot for the unification of the two temporary zones. These elections were to be held unconditionally "in July 1956". Yet these elections were never held.

It should be clear that the Geneva Conference maintained that Vietnam was an independent and sovereign country divided only temporarily into two zones (North and South) for the purpose of providing the peace and freedom considered requisite for unification. That the Southern Zone still refuses to recognize the legitimacy of the Geneva Conference in no way alters the Conference's definition of one Vietnam and the Southern Zone's legal commitment to that concept.

It should also be pointed out that the Government of South Vietnam has yet to prove that their position is derived from the will of the people. The Diem regime remained in power from 1954 until its overthrow in 1963 without recourse to elections as did the regime of General Ky from 1963 to the questionable "elections" in the fall of 1966.

In that election and the subsequent one in 1967 the following is undisputable: that the assembly elected in 1966 was to have no legislative or executive powers. Its function was merely to write a constitution to which collective self-defense. They are, however, adamant and, in fact, consistently reaffirm their right to collective self-defense on the basis of aggression from the North. We should examine then the nature of the conflict in Vietnam historically dating from the Geneva accords.

According to Jean Lacouture: "a careful study of the history of South Vietnam over the last ten years will show that from 1956 onward, strong resistance groups, the surviving member's of political-religious sects crushed by Diem, were in active opposition to the regime in the South; they were in fact already called Vietcong by the Diem regime at that time. Furthermore, this essentially North Vietnam were initiated before 1957 under the direction of U.S. General Lansdale, Diem's military advisor in 1954-56 and that 3,000 Vietnamese were trained in Special Forces for raids of this kind.

Finally, when analysed, the State Department's February White Paper shows that over 90 per cent of the fighters for the NLF have been southerners and that only two per cent of their supplies came from the North. Even more concrete is the fact that this evidence is only available for the period since 1964: in other words there is no evidence of material support by the North before 1964 — well after indication of hostilities created by the U.S. and the Saigon regime.

amendments proposed by the Junta could only be rejected by a two-thirds majority of the Assembly. In both elections neither Communists nor neutralists were allowed to run for office, with the decision as to legitimacy resting solely with the Junta. (The general definition of Neutralist in South Vietnam is one who recognizes and states the need for negotiations with NLF or the North.)

AGGRESSION OR CIVIL WAR

If in fact then there is only one Vietnam, does aggression from the North constitute an armed attack on the South by the crossing of an international boundary and thereby allowing the invocation of the right of collective self-defense or does it constitute a civil war? There are two components to be examined in this question before it can be answered in whole: 1) the nature of Vietnam as a sovereign state and 2) whether in fact there has been aggression from the North. I think that 1) has been adequately discussed and it has been shown that this is at least questionable.

Now we have arrived at the Americans' basic assumption (in official terms) for their involvement in Vietnam: that there is aggression from the North and possibly China (although of late even the U.S. Administration discredits this latter possibility). The U.S. Government is vague about the sovereignty of Vietnam or South Vietnam and the possibility of the conflict being of a civil nature, thereby lacking the right of nationalist dissident movement gained additional support as a result of the rural discontent which led Diem to suppress the elected municipal councils in 1957; it spread further after the promulgation of the terrible law of 1959 which prescribed the death penalty for all accomplices of Communists — and Communism comes cheap in South Vietnam.

At this time the resistance was composed of nothing more than Southern groups organized in self-defense against Diem. Hanoi had made no connection with them. The North Vietnamese did not begin to exploit this situation and infiltrate agents until 1959; and it was only after pressure from a Southern congress of former Vietminh resisters in March of 1960 that they prepared to intervene.

Bernard Fall supports the views of Lacouture on the origins of the conflict: "It is Diem who created the movement of discontent in South Vietnam. North Vietnam and the Vietcong fed on it . . ."

As pointed out earlier, North Vietnam and the Vietminh took great caution not to provoke the South Vietnamese lest they be accused of violating the Geneva Accords. In fact, the Vietminh's emphasis on a political solution was acknowledged in the State Department's White Paper, A Threat To Peace: "The primary focus of the Communists' activity during the post-Geneva period was on political action — promoting discontent with the Government in Saigon and seeking to win supporters for Hanoi." It is also not generally known that commando raids into

The U.S. cannot prove the legality of collective self-defense. But not only is the U.S. intervention in Vietnam a criminal act: the evidence begins to suggest other motivations.

UNOFFICIAL U.S. POLICY

The refutation of the American position in Vietnam is not only complete but it also appears to be too easy. It begs for an analysis of possible alternative rationales. A new explanation becomes exceedingly clear when one historically reviews the basis of American Foreign Policy, the needs of the contemporary American political economy, how that basis necessitated Cold War strategy, and, finally, its implications for Vietnam. Obviously the constraints of a paper of this nature will only allow the barest sketch of these forces but without such a sketch a solution for the Vietnam conflict can only be, at best, stop gap. In other words, the Vietnam war is only symptomatic of a greater disease, that is American imperialism.

HISTORY OF U.S. IMPERIALISM

Almost since its birth, the United States has had an expansionist policy grounded in the needs of its economy. In 1823, Monroe's famous doctrine laid the groundwork for North American hegemony in Latin America. In 1854, the Ostend Manifesto, noting that "self-preservation is the first law of nature," declared that "Cuba is as necessary to the North American republic as any of its present members." Nearing the end of the 19th century America had become a major world power as evidenced by Senator Henry Cabot Lodge, who said in 1895 that "We have a record of conquest, colonization, and expansion unequalled by any people in the Nineteenth Century. We are not to be curbed now . . ."

This policy continued into the Twentieth Century when in 1907 Woodrow Wilson stated: "Since trade ignores national boundaries and the manufacturer insists on having the world as a market, the flag of his nation must follow him, and the doors of the nations which are closed must be battered down." The most explicit conception of American policy; however, was formulated by Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan, who in May 1914, told the National Council of Foreign Trade that it was America's official policy to "open the doors of all the weaker countries to an invasion of American capital and enterprise." "My Department is your department; the ambassadors, the ministers, and the consuls are all yours. It is their business to look after your interests and to guard your rights."

Although cloaked in less explicit and more bureaucratic tones the policy remains to this day, as expressed by Secretary of State Dean Rusk's 1962 speech to the National Business Advisory Council: "(American) business must expand its present role in the world economy. The dynamism that has been central in the development of the United States must now be employed on a global scale . . . Future profits will go to the firms which are enterprising and foresighted today. An American firm whose managerial skill, political sophistication, and contribution to development win the confidence of a developing nation should be in an enviable position."

Finally, the uses of American Government come into question when one reads in the U.S. Department of Commerce publication "Commerce Business Daily" an announcement for bids from private enterprise on the following government contract "services and materials as required to perform (for the army) a research study entitled "Pax Americana" consisting of a phased study of the following: (a) elements of National Power; (b) ability of selected nations to apply the elements of National Power; (c) a variety of world power configurations to be used as a basis for the U.S. to maintain world hegemony in the future."

While this history is selective, it is also quite representative, and it is clear that the history of American government is a history of U.S. attempts at expansionism. That the nature of American imperialism cannot and will not be discontinued is evidenced through an examination of the thrust of capitalism and hence of the needs of the contemporary U.S. political economy.

NEEDS OF U.S. ECONOMY

"Democratic capitalism" assumes that personal freedom and economic freedom are interdependent. Our personal freedom can be obtained only if we are guaranteed our rights of property, if we are free in the quest of material goods and hence if we are free to exploit property for commercial ends. Our economic system becomes a determinant of our mode of living for man cannot rise above the quest for material goods if his life expectations are precluded by the necessity for the quest of material goods and shaped by social goals which are in essence the acquisition and consumption of material goods.

While the central theme for our society still insists that we have personal freedom because we have economic freedom, it rings even less true in the face of monopoly capitalism and the multinational corporation. Economic freedom in essence means the freedom for the corporate elite to expand even further their commercial operations.

While the existence of these corporate conglomerates and their singular identification with government is evident, it is the former's internal structure as more machinery is introduced (to increase productivity and produce technologically advanced products) cost per unit may be lowered, but the level of basic fixed costs to be covered is raised. Therefore, the volume of sales necessary to reach the "break-even" point constantly rises.

The potential of higher profits through greater productivity leads corporations into a situation of higher fixed costs which requires a higher volume of sales in order to realize the potential higher rate of profit.

This self-perpetuating expansion could be solved domestically if it were not for the inherent structural impediments of capitalism. No matter what the absolute economic level of various strata of the population, the relative maldistribution of wealth occurs as a structural feature of capitalism. This comes about for several reasons: accumulation of capital (for investment) is done privately; private control over the means of pro-ware of national and social interests.

COLD WAR STRATEGY

In the transformation of economic needs into political strategy, it should be remembered that while economic priorities strictly affect many government decisions, they are not the sole and direct determinant. That is, government decisions are often made for primarily political and ideological reasons, many of which are incongruent with immediate or long range economic needs of individual corporations. It therefore becomes a question of the context in which the politics and the ideology develop.

Loud and Gilbert attempt to suggest this frame of reference, as follows: Corporations with foreign interests become sources of "experience", "responsible" personnel for the State and Defence Departments; large corporations and business associations have direct political access through lobbying and campaign contributions; mass media are owned by the wealthy and corporate elite who are also dependent on these sources for advertising revenues; given the dominant ideological assumptions, certain political problems such as maintaining prosperity have solutions; given the structure of capitalism, the country is dependent on the well-being of the large corporations.

So while government policies (foreign and domestic) are not always oriented toward maximizing the profits for any given firm, they are in large measure reflective of the interests of American monopoly capitalism.

Such is the context in which Cold War strategy was and still is developed. After World War II it became evident to the West through George F. Kennan's famous "X" article of 1947 that Communism was not fascism; it did not assert the inevitability of self-caused capitalist decay; hence it did not consider itself to be committed a timetable for conquest, so the capitalists could wait without war, confident of a victory in the decay of communism; and it was in their interests to do so.

But there had to be an iron curtain so that on the one hand the Russians would have a buffer zone in order to internally consolidate their economy and on the other hand, so that the U.S. could be assured of an open market place. There also had to be a tacit agreement that these territorial lines would not be violated, for at least in the case of the Americans, access to markets meant that there could be no revolution which would prevent "stable markets".

So while during the fifties, incentives were hurled across the curtain and countries were tempted to bolt from their respective sides, the early sixties saw an East-West strategic balance of power which was confirmed by the Chinese ideological attack on Soviet Revisionism. The explicit Soviet-American animosity became a facade for a more fundamental implicit alliance. This alliance, as Olgesby points out "proceeds from the broadly held assumption that the mutually qualifying aims of American policy are the dynamics unresolvable by a domestic solution which requires the latter's policy of expansionism and imperial ism.

The need for expanding markets is the central dynamic of modern American corporate capitalism — a dynamic growing out of continual technical innovation in the means of production. Individual corporations recognize price competition as unmoded yet they still accrue incentives for technological innovation for the following reasons: to minimize costs within a given price structure to develop new market areas through a new product or process; to be able to enter foreign markets — especially given lower wages abroad — through advanced productivity and or technologically advanced products. All these considerations give an intrinsic value to technological advance within the capitalist corporation.

Yet these same incentives act as countervailing forces within the economic structure. The more technologically advanced a corporation, the higher the fixed costs, for once it is paid for, the cost of machinery is fixed whether it is used or not. Also, machinery depreciates in value readily since more productive machines are constantly being developed. Therefore, corporations have an incentive to utilize machines as much as possible within a given fixed cost duction is partially based on relative wealth: the various status privileges related to such control are partially realized through relative wealth.

The difficulty is that the further people get from basic human needs, the smaller the percentage of income they devote to consumption (as opposed to various forms of savings). Since capitalism denies social control over either production or consumption according to human needs, private corporations seeking a profit ferret out money irrespective of the social consequences. Therefore while modern America is plagued by advertising to create demand, compelling consumption, waste production and military expenditure have provided only partial solutions to the growing "over-production" necessitating an increasing commitment by U.S. business to foreign markets.

Also while U.S. industry solves the problem of technologically induced "over-production" by expanding abroad, the greater the pressure for technological development — which is key to maintaining a world market position. Thus the vicious circle feeds on and nourishes itself.

It should be noted that this is only one aspect of U.S. economic penetration into foreign countries. The attempt here is to show the necessity for U.S. capitalism to expand una-avoidance of war and the creation of a stable global society in which liberal values will predominate" and can be generalized in four very basic propositions:

- 1) Each side must commit itself to the view that global war is an unsatisfactory means of securing global objectives. This commitment must be established. Hence the power build-up and the credibility of its use created deterrence especially among the other nations.
- 2) A global truce line must be unambiguously drawn. The establishing and maintenance of this line are top-priority matters. Under most conditions, in fact, no objective is more important than its protection. One must be prepared to go to war to keep it intact. The other side must understand that.
- 3) It is through the process of defining and securing the truce line that the rival powers build up a store of information about each other, develop and habituate themselves to a modus vivendi and begin to create a communication system.
- 4) The dividend of this patience is that the common interests so necessary to a more productive relationship will have had time to incubate.

We have evolved thus far two not mutually exclusive perspectives on the development of American Foreign Policy: that is the needs of the U.S. political economy and the Cold War Strategy. That these two perspectives are greatly integrated is not to be denied, yet it is a useful distinction to make.

COMMERCIAL BENEFITS

We shall begin with the economic imperialist's view of Vietnam and the War. While it is not generally recognized, a direct American commercial interest in Vietnam exists. For the most part it is potential but that makes it no less real.

In its issue of January 1, 1966, Newsweek ran an essay called "Saigon: A Boom Town for U.S. Businessmen." A similar piece by Edmund K. Faltermayer appeared in the March 1966 issue of Fortune under the title "The Surprising Assets of South Vietnam's Economy". Faltermayer wrote that "A Vietnam preserved from Communism has the potential to become one of the richest nations in Southeast Asia." While the list of potential markets is too long to be documented here, there is sufficient evidence to suggest that the expenditure in the War could be offset by revenues derived from the exploitation of resources in Vietnam.

Yet there are other considerations; for example when one looks at the extent to which the economy is addicted to federal government subsidy and in particular to military subsidy one begins to wonder whether or not the war is good for the economy. It is well known that since 1946 the federal government has laid out about 60 per cent of its budget for support of the military industrial complex, a 20 year total of better than $850 billion.

It is also known that over one-sixth of the American labour force is employed by the Defence Department, either directly or through defence production contracts. What a high employment economy produces has to be vended, whether it be at home or abroad.

However, the most important economic aspect of the war lies in the trade relations the Americans have with Japan. Behind only Canada among U.S. trade partners, Japan is of major commercial importance (1965 volume of trade was close to $17 billion). But China is also an important Japanese trade partner and cannot fail to become increasingly attractive. If Japan has no long-term alternative to a massive China trade and thereby develops economic interdependency with China, they will be left without an alternative to a more progressively pro-Chinese orientation.

Japan's only chance for a long-term alternative to the developing market of China lies with the more slowly developing and less organizable markets of the South Pacific, South Asia and southeast Asia. In the latter, South Vietnam's position is central owing to her coasts, harbours, resource wealth, and the fact that the war has made it central. South Vietnam's markets, once developed, will exert a great pull on Japan regardless of who develops them.

This is not a new or an abstract theory for in April 1954 President Eisenhower made the statement that "In its economic aspects . . . (loss of Indochina) would take away that region that Japan must have as a trading area, or it would force Japan to turn towards China and Manchuria, or toward the Communist areas in order to live. The possible consequences of the loss (of Japan) to the free world are just incalculable."

What the West faces in the Pacific then, is the formation of a regional economic system whose potential and power are inherent in the Pacific situation itself, which must include Japan, and which would quite naturally be dominated by China. This is the "threat" and America feels it the most because of her dominant economic position in the Pacific.

POLITICAL ASPECT

Viewing this essentially economic situation in terms of the Cold War strategy propositions, we find a neat but unsurprising fit. First there shall be no war with China, the primary reason being that her army is too big and her land too vast. Secondly a truce line has to be fixed and no violence must be done to this line. As long as the U.S. does not attempt to conquer North Vietnam, the Chinese will not retaliate. This situation does not occur through a conscious alliance with China. It exists because of the essence of Chinese revolutionary theory. Once Red China accepts, as the Cold War strategy goes, this tacit alliance, the other propositions follow with the resultant "peaceful co-existence".

Aside from China's unwillingness to comply with this strategy, "peaceful co-existence" is nothing more than an attempt at the containment of China and consequent access to free markets. On January 30, 1966, in what was described as a "major" foreign policy speech, George Ball, then Under Secretary of State, said "a main focus of the (East-West) struggle has shifted recently from Europe to Asia because the Soviet Union, having grown powerful, has begun to have a stake in the status quo. The purpose of the forcible containment of Communist China is to include a similar change in its outlook . . . This is the issue in Vietnam. This is what we are fighting for. This is why we are there."

In other words, the U.S. intervention in Vietnam, the prevention of self-determination for the Vietnamese people, is an outgrowth of the necessity to sustain the American economic elite. It becomes quite clear that the American policy in Vietnam is nothing less than imperialist in nature.

CANADIAN COMPLICITY

Canada's complicity in support of American intervention in Vietnam is of a dual nature: through our foreign policy and through our arms shipments to the U.S. destined for Vietnam. What is even more damning is that this complicity occurs while Canada sits as a supposed neutral member of the International Commission on Supervision and Control. But is it really? When one looks at the make-up of the Commission in an ideological perspective the picture becomes clear.

Ideologically Poland represents the Communist interests, India the neutral interest and Canada represents the capitalist ethic. That Canada plays this role is evidenced both by her action on the Commission and through her Foreign Policy.

In the Fourth Interim Report of the Commission, Canada submitted a minority report in which she asserted that South Vietnam was not formally committed to the Geneva Accords and thereby not committed to holding the general elections which the Commission was to supervise. Canada was in fact laying the groundwork for a legal basis for the American intervention. This became painfully clear in an historical sketch of South Vietnam made by Paul Martin before the House of Commons Standing Committee for External Affairs:

"Realizing only too well what the objectives of Viet Minh leaders would be, the South Vietnamese leaders rejected the terms of the Geneva settlement, before these documents were signed, on the grounds that the division of Vietnam was inimical to the interests of the Vietnamese people because under these terms half of Vietnam was turned over to Communist control". With these fallacious and historical notions of Vietnam, the Canadian government adopted the posture molded by the U.S. State Department.

On November 13, 1967 the Honourable Paul Martin stated in Toronto that "Canada does not supply war materials to war areas either directly or by trans-shipment". Yet a week earlier, a Pentagon spokesman in Washington stated that "the bulk of military equipment Canada has sold to the U.S. will be used in the Vietnam War."

Further, to quote the Financial Post of Sept. 9, 1967, "Peace in Vietnam, if and when it comes, would hit Canadian aerospace factories hard. Right now the demand for some items by the U.S. military is so acute that competitive pricing takes second place to fast production capabilities." Our Defence Production sharing agreements do not require Canadian arms sales, they merely define an arrangement allowing companies to bid for American arms contracts.

Yet an additional feature of the defence sharing agreement is that Canada buys from the U.S. roughly the same dollar amount of military hardware as the U.S. buys here. In 1967, for example, the American military purchased $370M in equipment made in Canada. In terms of the U.S. military procurement, this is hardly a drop in the bucket, about 1 per cent of their total dollars spent for hardware. But when Canada spends a comparable amount in the U.S., it is a sizeable amount of our budget. Canada becomes a member of the American team and in effect U.S. enemies become Canadian enemies — we become enmeshed in making war on them. We are oppressing the people of Vietnam.

TOWARDS AN END TO THE WAR IN VIETNAM

Unless the U.S. based imperialist system, which generates a war economy to protect its external source of natural resources and markets, is defeated, there can be no American withdrawal from Vietnam except by internal and international moral pressure. Almost everywhere outside the U.S. the American myths about aggression from the North, the threat of Chinese expansion and NLF terrorism in areas they hold are being exploded, and U.S. aggression is being revealed for what it is: colonialism in disguise.

In Canada this reality is often overshadowed by the still prevalent myths of the Cold War. Because the Canadian government has seen fit to accept the continentalist's contention that Canadian and American interests basically coincide with one another, Canadian policy and actions in areas concerning Vietnam have aided the U.S. war effort. At the diplomatic level Canada has towed a milder variation of the American position on the war; in the ICC Canada consistently represents the U.S. viewpoint; and, by encouraging war-related industries to continue and intensify their trade with the U.S., Canada has acted as the silent partner in the rape of Vietnam. The rhetoric has been that of neutrality but the reality has been that of complicity.

The American position in Vietnam is completely indefensible however one cares to approach it: whether legalistically, morally or otherwise. Even militarily the Americans are losing, and liberated areas extend to the outskirts of Saigon. The U.S. economy, which has required overseas expansion and which has demanded increased military spending (even in times of 'peace'), has come face to face with the bare reality of its own brutality, just as French colonialism was forced to look at itself at Dien Bien Phu. We must learn the lessons of Vietnam, but not just to keep the records of history straight. We must learn them and apply them. Our first task is to actively join those who are struggling against U.S. imperialism for their own liberation.

War, famine and disease killed off large numbers of children, and other mistakes were disposed of through infanticide and abortion.

Dr. Cornett, a director of two drug companies, also expressed pleasure in the new legislation which will make it legal to distribute birth control information. He pointed out that none of the major religions is opposed to birth control, but rather to certain methods of contraception.

He said the Canadian birth rate has been declining since 1951 and therefore the pill (which was not in common use until about 1964) was not a factor in the decline.

Dr. Cornett noted that he would not need to explain conception to his audience, about 99 percent students.

Students occupy building as UWO president rebarrs

More than 100 University of Waterloo students who have occupied their students centre since Monday may win their demands after all. Led by Waterloo student president Brian Iler, they want legal control of the building vested in the students instead of the Board of Governors.

Waterloo President Gerry Hagey will meet with the rebels today to consider the demands. He is expected to give in to five proposals which would place the building under student control.

The demonstrators evicted centre director Paul Gerster from his office and then evicted his furniture. Students slept in the office and in a large lounge in the building.

Despite the change in management the building is operating as usual. The student council first presented its demands Oct. 10th and has repeatedly extended deadlines waiting for agreement from the administration. On Monday night a general meeting of students voted overwhelmingly to seize control of the building. The administration insists ultimate control must remain with the University's Board of Governors, but Iler has refused to accept that position. "Students are the primary users of the building and they should have control," he said. "We regard the Board as an illegitimate authority."

Waterloo (CUP) University of Waterloo president Gerry Hagey Friday denounced local and national student leaders as "communists."

The charge was made in his office to 12 students, in response to a demand that control of the student union building be handed over to the Student Council.

Monday, Hagey reiterated the statement, describing Waterloo student leaders as "Marxist-Leninists" who embraced an "act first and negotiate afterward" philosophy.

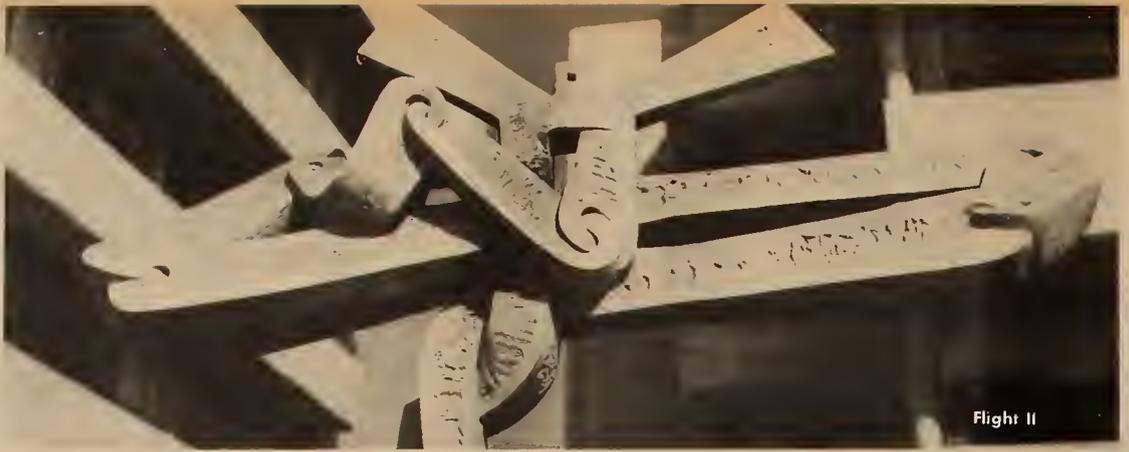

Student council president Brian Iler denied the allegation, lashing out at an administration which labelled any advocates of reform as communists.

Hagey reportedly feels the Canadian Union of Students to be responsible for these "local communist leanings."

"You work in the round. You start with only powder and water . . . it's fantastic. The beautiful moment is when the liquid turns solid . . .

I use quick-dry plaster. Plaster is a more masculine material than clay. You have the experience of both modelling and carving."

Sorel Etrog was telling me about his sculpture. We were sitting in his Toronto studio over a cluttered, newspaper-covered desk and trying to communicate about something I didn't understand. Spectre shapes of white plaster vertically filled the room — both abandoned ideas and unborn works.

From this room has come the art of one of Canada's most prolific and creative sculptors. Thirty-six of his works are on display at Scarborough College.

And Sorel Etrog has been a sculptor for only ten years. He started as a painter in Roumania, his birthplace, in 1945, went to Israel in 1950, to New York in 1958, and to Canada in 1959. As he experimented with construction-paintings mounted on wood, he felt that colors were giving way to shape, painting to sculpture.

"It seemed more natural that I give in to sculpture," he told me. "Today we have a lot of painters who are trying to take sculpture and make a painting — there's no longer a definite border where one starts and the other takes over."

"Picasso molded on the canvas; he almost carved on the canvas," he said in his slightly broken English. A tone of enthusiasm, an almost religious awe radiated from this man. He talked about Picasso for 10 minutes before I could change the subject back to Etrog.

The actual physical process of Etrog's sculpture is inextricable from his idea of creation. He starts with powder and dust and finishes with bronze. But first, he makes many sketches — "it's like automatic lighting, these notations" — and then develops the ideas in three dimensions with small models in wax and plaster. Then he molds and carves the full-sized piece in plaster. From there it is the precise craftsmanship of the lost-wax process in a foundry in Florence, that converts the ideas to bronze — a living but permanent form.

The process of creating sculpture from nothing is the theme of the works themselves. Blossom is a plant that grows from nothing into organic fulfillment. This motion of organic, vertical growth is usually structured on a physical object — a flower, a man, a woman, a couple embraced.

"I don't think in terms of abstractions," he says. I start completely with the unknown. Titles are unknown at the point of starting the sculpture. It is not a preconceived idea."

He defines the basis of his sculpture as "the connection between the organic and the geometric." It is the relation between growth and structure, ideal and reality, man and the order of nature. They come together like an explosion in his art.

There is a vibrant tension in all his sculpture; it travels along lines and is connected by links.

"I slowly began to get involved with the link," he told me as he traced the motif through pictures of earlier works.

"The link appeared to me some time ago as a culminating point, particularly at the top. I have always been concerned with duality in my work — two lines coming together — or the life of two forms interacting, like human beings — a duality of life. I needed to prevent lines and forms from running away from one another. The links seemed a potential solution."

He pointed to the "caligraphy" in Flight — "a lyrical line that suggests a new kind of rhythm." It's an organic movement that is shown kinetically by the use of the link, a device that makes the eye stop and start and creates the visual experience.

"The stiff Egyptian figures have a very static kind of impact. The tighter the hand is closed, the more you can feel the bloodstream going back in the body. You want to have an inner experience with this movement. You can only make the point of kinetics by implication."

He was trying desperately to make me visualize his own experience. Speaking on my level. Never condescending. Always alive — like his sculpture.

I looked for the tension, and I thought I saw it. But he was always one step ahead of me in his observations. It was like trying to link through somebody else's mind.

Saturday afternoon I went to see his work in front of Hart House, Survivors are not Heroes. And for the first time I really saw it: the kinetic power in the wheel, the dynamic, forward-thrusting motion, the explosion from the central organic tension to verticality, the shaft that transcends the geometrical strictness of the rectangle. The sculpture is an unfinished explosion — that ray of bronze could surge upwards through infinity. But it doesn't — there is always a greater tension in structured, kinetic motion.

Sunday morning we went to Scarborough College.

"This building is like a piece of sculpture," he said. "It is a masterpiece that is still clumsy, still growing. The sky between the two buildings breaks in on them, but they are organically connected."

He pointed out the "breathing spaces" of the organic elements of the building, and the geometric structures contrasted with the organic roundness.

"Some buildings are strong enough to take a great piece of sculpture," he said. "Scarborough has such power. It is one of the best buildings in Toronto."

Behind us was always the backdrop of grey sky and autumn color. The building and the sculpture were dynamically alone against this "curtain", as he called it.

But whether or not you like Etrog's sculpture, go out to Scarborough College and look at the building. You might begin to understand the man.

By LIZ WILLICK

Big ideas from the littlest college?

That's what's happening at Innis College, where an experimental program is presently in the works. If adopted, the experiment could mean radical changes in both the content and method of teaching.

A basic rethinking of the structure of University education has been conducted by the academic affairs committee of the Innis College Council for the past year. Their results are to be presented to students tomorrow in an open meeting at the College.

The final version will be presented at the November meeting of the Faculty of Arts and Science. Approval is necessary for initiation of the programme in September 1969.

If you're interested in big ideas, come, comment, revise. Thursday at 12 noon Innis II Common Room.

In a paper on The Rationale of Experimental Programs, philosophy Prof. C. W. Webb says "under present conditions there is a shocking lack of communication between departments concerning what if offered to students.

"It would seem desirable in at least one of a student's courses, for professors to come down off their high horses and engage in genuinely cooperative projects with undergraduates."

According to Prof. Webb, an experimental program tries out a new method of learning in a new area or focus of study. It entertains a new conception of knowledge while maintaining flexibility, adaptability and a continued appraisal of the course by its participants.

The proposed program outlined by the committee of five students, 16 faculty and five administration, meets all these specifications.

Innis College Registrar David King emphasizes this is a separate issue from the current Macpherson Report debate. It is not a restructuring but an addition to the present curriculum.

The Webb paper suggests four kinds of courses:

- examination of a contemporary problem (possibly involving psychology, sociology, religion, and English).

- an area of human activity not presently included in the curriculum (eg. cinema or folk poetry).

- exploration in depth of the work and contribution of a prominent individual.

- and one in which the needs of a particular group of students are served (such as Canadian society and culture for overseas students).

The courses would be fluid and vary from year to year.

They would be structured, but by the people involved. These people would work out their own evaluation system and format in each course.

Credit would be offered on the same basis as religious studies or as a free option. The experimental option would be open to Innis students in all years and to others with the permission of their college. It is seen as composing one-fifth of the student's entire program.

Mr. King says the courses are designed for the "more aggressive and intellectually curious student" and would possibly be more "demanding" than the standard courses.

According to Prof. Webb, "the inauguration of such a program at Innis College would do much to meet the criticisms of those who charge the kind of education now offered at the University of Toronto is boring, irrelevant, authoritarian, inflexible and inhuman."

He suggests professors would not cease to be critical judges of excellence. Perhaps in this sort of program they should be seen as "Socratic mid-wives of something of educational value."

Innis is already trying out "non-credit, unstructured, people-oriented" courses, given by Jack Newman (Drama), and Bob Bossin ("tutor-at-large").

TAA to improve teaching standards

Rather than treat teaching assistants as a "necessary evil" in undergraduate education, the Macpherson Report urged their contributions be considered positive ones.

The Graduate Student Union has helped to establish a Teaching Assistants' Association to bring about improvements from within.

The purposes of the TAA, according to GSU president John Winter are:

- "Foster a responsible professional attitude among T.A.'s and promote their position as academic teachers;

- "urge minimum standards of qualification as a T.A. and arrange some type of training;

- "protect the T.A.'s interests (protection against arbitrary dismissal, urge satisfactory pay and working conditions, work for standardization of pay scales between departments, acquire job stability, lay down conditions of hiring."

After the Teaching Assistants' Conference held Saturday, Winter pointed out some of the problems the association may confront.

He said some departments have cut back on the number of T.A.'s they employ rather than do anything about demands.

The TAA hopes to establish locals in each department to gather information on discrepancies in pay rates.

UNIVERSITY LUTHERAN CHURCH AND STUDENT CENTRE

REFORMATION FESTIVAL SERVICE 11:00 A.M.
Luther's German Mass to be celebrated.
Coffee and discussion following each service.

University Lutheran Chapel, 610 Spadina recently installed the Rev. Lawrence E. Martin as Chaplain to the University. The chaplain has been associated with campus ministries at Oregon State, San Fernando State in Los Angeles, Oberlin College, Oberlin-Ohio. Long committed to ecumenical and liturgical movements in the Church, he has studied at McCormick Presbyterian Seminary, Chicago, and Yale University, New Haven, Conn. His work has been published in church journals of theology such as DIALOG, AMERICAN LUTHERAN PULPIT DIGEST, CHRISTIAN CENTURY, CHRISTIANITY AND CRISIS. Mr. Martin's field is the Psychology of Religion, researching the concept of wholeness in Religion and Medicine. The Chaplain lectured at the Oberlin Graduate School of Theology.

Prior to entering the pastorate he worked in the entertainment field, radio broadcasting, and served as vice president of a college. As a student, and as a college administrator, Mr. Martin has for years been committed to reform and change of college education. With the university more and more becoming the hand-maiden of industry and the military, the faculty and student (especially the student) has increasingly become a mere tool to be manipulated. Most universities need to change to the classic concept of education, which was (incidentally) not merely learning, but to help make the person truly human. The Lutheran Chaplain is committed to this goal.

He has worked extensively in civil rights movement in the United States and is a member of Clergy and Laymen Concerned About Viet Nam.

The Rev. and Mrs. Martin have 3 adopted children, representing an international racial lineage.

Jamaican government fears mass unrest

C. J. R. James, a leading socialist and political philosopher from Trinidad, Monday called on University of Toronto West Indian students to "effect social, economic and political reform by whatever means necessary" in Jamaica.

James was introducing Dr. Walter Rodney, a professor of history at the University of West Indies. Rodney was refused re-entry to Jamaica by special parliamentary bill, after attending the Black Writers conference in Montreal last week.

Rodney accused Jamaican Prime Minister Shearer of "reacting like a giant computer, programmed to lash out in defense of a worn and outmoded capitalistic structure".

Rodney felt the government action was based on his previous association with the black activist movement and his travels through Communist Russia and Cuba.

"My expulsion was merely an indication of the Jamaican administration's fear of mass unrest resulting from economically and socially backward conditions among 95 per cent of the island's populace," he said.

CEGEPS lose Quebec battle

MONTREAL-QUEBEC (VNS)

More than 5,000 Quebec students marched through the streets of Montreal and Quebec City Monday in a demonstration of solidarity.

But despite the march, students at all 23 of Quebec's junior colleges voted to return to classes. The vote came as a result of an ultimatum delivered by Education Minister Jean-Guy Cardinal.

Cardinal said that if all students did not return to class by Monday, Oct. 21, they would face cancellation of their first term's work.

Two of the junior colleges were declared closed Monday by administrators when no agreement with students could be reached.

Buildings at four colleges are still occupied. The Ecole de Beaux Arts — a fine arts school in Montreal — and buildings at the University of Montreal and Laval University in Quebec are being held.

The junior college students started their protest because, they say, French language university facilities in Quebec are inadequate. They are also protesting a student-aid plan that includes a cut in scholarship funds and higher interest rates on loans.

By THE MCGILL DAILY

MONTREAL (CUP) — "I have all the requirements and all the marks", said Jean-Louis Poirier, a student at CEGEP Maisonneuve, "but I bet I won't be able to go to l'Universite next fall."

Poirier is in his second year at the school, in the cours general or pre-university. But there are 5,000 fewer new places in the French universities (Montreal and Laval) for the upcoming year, than there are students like Jean-Louis Poirier.

Jean-Louis' dilemma is one of the keys to why most of the province's CEGEP's have been occupied by their students this past week.

The immediate problems are due mainly to administrative bungling and indifference on the part of the government. Promises for increased loans and a second French university in the city both lie unfulfilled.

COMMISSION

In 1960, the new Liberal government commissioned an inquiry into the state of education in the province.

The Parent Report was firm in its reply: Quebec must initiate and complete a unified public school system, making educational institutions of both language parallel and offering to both sectors secondary and post-secondary educational opportunities. One of the Report's proposals was the creation of "Institutes" to incorporate the twelfth and thirteenth years and offer both a pre-university course and a trade and technical curriculum. Hence the name CEGEP — College d'Enseignement General et Professionnel.

This was in 1964. The first CEGEP's were opened in 1967. And along with them, the Union Nationale government made two pledges — a second French university in Montreal and a move toward universal accessibility.

But by themselves, the CEGEP's mean nothing. What's the use of giving students pre-university training while making no provisions for expanded universities?

"They take only the budding geniuses, one CEGEPois complained. "I have 65 per cent but I'm not inferior to anyone else and I want to — I deserve to — go to university. I don't want to be a street cleaner with a fancy diploma."

SECOND REPORT TABLED

The old Liberal government, recognizing the problem, commissioned the Rocher Report in 1965. It recommended the immediate construction of a second French-language university in Montreal. But when the Union Nationale came into office, the Report was tabled. It has been at the bottom of a big pile of papers ever since.

Last year, though, under increased pressure from UGEC, the government promised the school would be in operation this fall. Intelligence sources in student circles say its creation was drafted as part of a bill on education presented to the legislature this summer. But the section of l'Universite de Quebec" never got before the House in any form.

LOANS AND BURSARIES

Another more immediate sticking point is the scandal over loans and bursaries. Back in 1966 the government set up a Comite du Plan to project the amount that would be needed for loans and bursaries each year. Before UGEQ would send representatives to sit on it, it extracted from the government the promise that a police of universal accessibility would be pursued, and that the government would increase bursaries over loans.

This year the government ignored the Comite's recommendation and not only decreased the total allotment but made the greater proportion in loans. In practical terms, this means the student will have to take a $800 loan (as opposed to $700 last year) to become eligible for a bursary.

There is no tuition at the CEGEP's — they are part of the public education system — but for the students who are taking the pre-university course the prospect of not being able to attend university next year is worse than bleak.

Regional disparities (ironically one of the things the CEGEP's were created to overcome) within the network of colleges is another complaint. Courses cancelled at the last minute, poor facilities (most are old schools and other buildings bought by the government and hastily transformed into CEGEP's) add to the students' ill feeling.

TEST-TUBES

"We are just test-tubes in an experiment," one said. "We spend two years here but if it doesn't work, it's our tough luck."

But these are the superficial problems, nothing that can't be overcome by better organization and a more concerned government. There is nothing remotely radical in these complaints: you can't radicalize an education system which doesn't exist.

However, some more basic problems are involved.

For instance, early estimates were that the relation of vocational to pre-university students would be 70%-30%. In fact, it is almost exactly the reverse.

And worse, more than 60 per cent of the professional (vocational) graduates have not been able to find jobs in their line of work.

Neither of these is the fault of a bungling government. Both are parts of the basic Quebec fabric — a new desire for higher education and an economy as yet unable to absorb well-trained technicians.

The Metropolitan Central Library at College and St. George Streets is at last being opened on Sunday afternoon — as of Oct. 20.

This year Fine Art, Theatre, Baldwin and Toronto Rooms will be opened for reference and circulating use.

Everyone is invited on Sunday afternoon — and throughout the week.

Toronto Anti-Draft Program

By HENRY MIETKIEWICZ

"The Toronto Anti-Draft Program provides help to those Americans who do not believe their only course is either to fight or to go to jail", said John Levy (UC) at a meeting with the nurses yesterday.

"A conflict arose," explained Marian Mowat (III Nurs.), the nursing representative to SAC. "When I voted in favor of the Vietnam motion and the grant of $500 to the TADP."

"Some nurses disagreed, and even wanted a referendum. This meeting was called to talk to those who disagreed with the decision."

Levy, a financial manager for the TADP, said they needed $2000 for the third printing of the Manual for Draft-Age Immigrants to Canada. The original 25,000 copies were bought so quickly that another printing was requested.

"You must realize, however", said Levy, "that the manual is not being published to encourage draft-dodging. Through it we offer a third choice."

"This is why SAC has supported the TADP and given money for the booklet", added Bob Barkwell (II Meds) Finance Commissioner for SAC. "Even if you support the war, you must still respect the right of some to object because of their beliefs."

Ad pushes principal power

The Toronto District Council of the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation will meet Thursday to discuss an advertisement promoting "principal power".

The ad was placed in Toronto newspapers last week by the federation's executive, calling for public support for principals to maintain "proper order and discipline" in schools. It said the current unrest was part of a general revolt against society.

Robert Brooks, district president, said "We felt it was 'holier than thou' and full of implications and innuendoes."

D. S. Felker, Federation general secretary said that out of about fifty letters, only about ten were critical. Twenty per cent of teachers replying suggested "we should have tried it another way."

Kaikkonen gets kicks with sick

By GELLIUS RUGGER

Kaikkonen (6), Reid (3), Kour (3), and Seppala (3) scored the points for Eng, 15-0 winners over Meds A.

Trin slaughtered Innis, 18-0. McIntyre had seven points. Parish (5), Smalley (3) and Compton (3) completed the scoring.

Archilochus defaulted to Eng II.

UC burnt Wycliffe at the stake 3-0. Arnott (are so!) had the UC try.

BOTCHED LACROSSE

Wolfe (2), Hamilton (2), Coldwell (3), Munroe and D.

Trying for their umpteenth defence of the Mullock Cup, Victoria College tripped up PHE 7-5 last Thursday to remain the only undefeated team in Group A. Peter Fairgrieve gave Vic (2-0) a 7-0 halftime lead. PHE (1-1) got a third quarter field goal from Gene Vincez and a fourth quarter safety from John Gordon. In other Group A action, St. Mike's methodically crushed Engineers (0-2) 30-13. The victory evened SMC's record at 1-1.

Meds (2-0) remained the only undefeated team in Group B with a 39-1 victory over Scarborough (1-1). University College is also 1-1 while New is winless in two starts.

In Group C Pharmacy (1-2) split two games beating Forestry (1-1) 20-13 and then losing to Trinity (1-2) 15-6. Dents holds the first and only playoff spot with a 2-0 record.

"Old" Yellow led Eng over Meds B, 10-1. Minaker replied for Meds. Skule then edged PHE C, 3-2. Brave Wolfe McNiven (no relation to actor McDavid McNiven) and William owsleyed for Eng. William Blake and Vinter hit for PHE C.

PHE B beat Vic 11, 9-4, on goals by Karandjas (Russ., "pencil") (2), Christie (3), Blocki (2), Moore and Coutts. Vic scorers were Semple and Birze with three. (Thomas Hardy novels are full of birze and birze-cutters.)

PHE beat SMC 6-2 as Vanilla Rudge (2), Connelly, Trafford, Harris and the swiftly-running Fawcett scored. SMC scorers were Baker and Schields.

Hoves had eight goals to pace Meds' over Vic 11, 12-6. Murnaghan had three and Baycroft the other. Williams

(3), Bull (2) and McLellan led Vic 1st's. (no relation to Janus Proos II Vic.)

SOCCER

Homatidis (an infectious disease not as common in Toronto as the newspapers think) scored twice and Schiarone once to give Eng a 3-0 triumph over Trin.

Law and Vic tied, 1-1. Glover (that's what you call it when Vinter frowns) scored for Law, Clark for Vic.

Kovacs and Hanna's goals produced a 1-1 tie between Trin B (a street near the Village) and PHE B.

Skelton's key goal enabled Dents to tie Jr Eng, 1-1. Wong hit for Skule.

SMC B and Trin B drew scorelessly.

SulphuricGlycerineStyroxide blanked Meds A, 3-0. Sodek had all three goals.

Bluettes in triple sweep

The first quarter of the Women's Intercollegiate Field Hockey Tournament was held at McGill last weekend. Toronto defeated the host team by a score of 2-0 on goals by Ann Thompson VIC III and Marilyn Richardson PHE II.

Meanwhile, the Women's Intercollegiate Archery Team was also making quick work of its opposition. A new Intercollegiate record for total team points was set by Toronto who scored 4105. Close behind were McMaster with 3962 and Western with 3953. Toronto's high scorers were Kit Koehler PHE II with 1063 and Lynn Haddad with 1027. Kit's effort in this tournament has earned her the Archery Plaque donated last year by Marion Ferguson.

Determined to make this a successful weekend all round, the Intercollegiate Tennis Team defeated all opposition at McMaster last weekend. Queens' Western and McGill all tested the skill of the Toronto team unsuccessfully. Congratulations to Marnie Seifred PHE III, who won the 1st Singles Tournament, to Dale Butterill, VIC III, winner of the 2nd Singles Tournament and to the winning doubles team of Sue Long PHE III and Linda Chevrier St. Mikes I.

ROWING

The Varsity rowing crew barely maintained a slight lead in the E.C.I.R.A. point totals after a disappointing performance in Brock's invitational regatta which was held last Saturday on the St. Catherines Henley course. Only one meet remains at London next weekend before the championship is decided on the same Henley course on November 2nd.

Toronto now has 206 points and a narrow 5 points margin over Western with Brock, McMaster and York far behind, after being able to finish no better than second in the senior varsity and lightweight races.

Western's strong senior crew with a nucleus from a heavy eight that placed second to St. Catherines in the Olympic trials, won the senior heat and the final, followed in both cases by Toronto.

The freshman crew has still not found its style and after a disastrous freshman race, managed an improved third in junior varsity.

For the first time in intercollegiate competition, a 500 metre sprint was included in the program and because of the length of the race, the starting docks at the end of the course were not used. Officials' attempts to align the crews were hampered by wind and current, and while the Toronto lightweight crew won their heat by a sizeable margin, they received an unfavourable position at the start in the six boat final from which they were unable to recover. The race, won by Western, did not count in the final totals.

To take the points trophy now, Toronto must win the lightweight race and defeat Western in the junior varsity and freshman divisions. Next week's regatta will be held on London's exceptional Lake Fanshawe course.

Football First Aid

By JIM COWAN

Football is a violent game. Just ask the spectators at last Saturday's Varsity-McMaster game.

While Blues were busy demolishing Marauders on the field, the "fans" were equally busy demolishing each other in the stands. Amid the barrage of eggs, tomatoes and the occasional bottle, cries of "Go, Blues, Go" were only slightly more frequent than "Duck!"

But it was all just good clean college fun. It's a real good joke to break a girl's elbow and it's even better to drop someone on his head while passing him up and down the rows. And just to show what good sports you are, try pelting a cameraman with tomatoes, and whinging a few bottles at the cheerleaders.

Of course, some of the fans did come to watch the game. They were the spoil-sports who cheered the Metro constable when he chased a loud and very drunk fan out of the stadium. And they were the ones who saw Blues come up with their best effort of the season.

And there were a few unwilling spectators there, too. They were the Blues forced to sit the game out through sickness or injury. Coach Ron Murphy had eight of his starting line-up out of action.

As rookie half-back Walt Sehr put it, "We could have had a game of our own right there in the stands."

Sehr, sidelined by a bout with influenza, saw it as a much better hitting game than others this season. "The guys really came through," he commented. Agreed, Mr. Sehr, agreed.

Another rookie, Don Fraser, aggravated a knee injury in Friday's practise and will probably be out for the balance of the season. Fluid was drained off the knee on Monday, and no final diagnosis will be made until next Monday. If it turns out to be just a bad sprain, he could be back.

Fraser saw Saturday's game as a "solid effort from everyone. It will really do the team a lot of good," he added.

Ron Kishimoto will probably be back for next Saturday's game against Western, but last week he was helping assistant coach Tom Watt spot from the press box. "We found out they had one guy who was very weak," he said, "and Vic (Alboini) told us after the game it really helped." Ron predicted that Blues would have no trouble from now on.

Half-back Keith Johnson, out with a bad ankle, said "It's pretty tough to sit and watch, especially a game like that. I hope to be back in next week." Johnson was out and running at last night's practise.

Mike Bukovac, Bart D'Onofrio, Peter Raham and Alex Topps also sat out the game. Raham and D'Onofrio are out for the season, while Topps is a doubtful starter in next Saturday's contest.

BLUENOTES . . . Cheerleader Dave Wiggin injured his neck when a back flip didn't quite come off . . . if there was a return on liquor bottles, the cops at the top of the stands could retire . . . Watch for a shakeup in Blues' backfield next Saturday against Mustangs. With Sehr back in action, Murph has to find a spot for John Chapman who filled in so admirably against McMaster . . . a big help in Blues' win against Mac was the return of Paul McKay to do the punting. His 40.6 average kept Marauders consistently bottled up in their own end . . . Attendance at home has averaged 16,000 so far. Saturday's game should surpass that figure . . .

STEW MACSWEEN

Freshman Stewart MacSween (71) has been a real find this year for Varsity Blues. Playing regularly for only the past two games, MacSween has considerably shored up Blues' leaky pass defense.

Against Waterloo two weeks ago he knocked down numerous passes and barely missed two or three interceptions. And last Saturday of course, he set up two Varsity touchdowns with timely picked off passes. The picture at the top of the page shows him in the process of returning one of them 23 yards to the five yard line.

MacSween has proven to be a deadly tackler as well. The bottom shot shows Mac full-back Jim Handson (31) being tripped up by the prostrate MacSween, merely one of 14 tackles he made on Saturday.

The 6'2", 190 pound rookie impressed right from the opening push-up sessions at training camp. Coach Murphy originally used him at end, where he was an All-Star during his Jarvis high school days. However, following Blues' exhibition loss to Western, Murphy shifted him to the defensive backfield.

"He'll be a great end but right now he's too inexperienced," said Murphy at the time.

Soccer Blues at York

Varsity soccer Blues will play a guessing game to-day at York University. Meeting York in an exhibition game, Blues have as yet no clue either to their own lineup or their opposition's strength.

Last year when this exhibition game was scheduled to be played here in Toronto, the team from York decided they really couldn't afford the time to play. However, they forgot to mention this fact to Blues who had dressed and were on the field warming up.

This year, scouting reports have it that the situation at York is much more organized and it seems safe to assume that the game will go on.

York lost an exhibition game to Guelph Gryphons 12-0 a couple of weeks ago but since then have improved considerably and should provide Blues with a stiff challenge.

Meanwhile, Blues' own ranks are riddled with injuries and absences. Captain Eric Sereda and three year veteran Graham Shiels, both from O.C.E., have teaching commitments and may not be able to make the game. Ron Muir (swollen ankle) and Frank Soppesa (flue) are both doubtful starters.

Coach Ernie Glass will have to count heavily on his rookies for the game on the wide-open York pitch. Roman Zakaluzny, who has seen some action in games so far, will probably get more field time to-day. His play this season has been most encouraging and he should develop into a top performer.

Another player having a fine season with Blues this year is Jim Kalman who was converted to a defenceman only two games ago. His play against McMaster last Saturday was very effective.

Korner Kicks . . . Blues are still one point behind Western in the standings.

At the International Collegiate Regatta Finals held in Detroit on the weekend the University of Toronto sailing team handily defeated top crews from both Michigan State and Ohio State Universities.

Toronto's sailing team has in the past few years been the dark horse in intercollegiate sailing competitions; however for the finals in Detroit a finely honed team was sent down to represent Toronto. Despite overstagging odds, Toronto's crews consisting of Ron Factor (III APSC), Madeleine McLaughlin (I SMC), Wendy Thompson (II TRIN) and Jim Cringan (I NEW) proved themselves capable of competing with American competition.

Hohum, another report?

Allen committee writes its report

By MARY BASTEDO

The arts and science faculty council Monday will be asked to consider recommendations for a new program of instruction in first and second years to be implemented next year.

The 50 student and faculty members of faculty Dean A.D. Allen's advisory committee last night reached agreement on proposals that:

- there be an unnamed first year program consisting of five courses,
- a first year student may take any five courses offered, specializing or not as he wishes,
- no course involve more than three hours a week, of which not more than two be formal lectures,
- a named specialist program may be started in second year if desired.

The report strongly urges an effort be made to provide tutorial instruction and suggests that as few prerequisites as possible be required for specialist programs.

Several student members abstained from voting on the report.

"We'll put this through for expediency," said Art Leader (TV UC) "It's good as far as it goes but we're not totally satisfied."

He wants a fundamental discussion of basic educational principles.

Dean Allen, with his watch laid out in front of him, constantly reminded the committee of its duty to come up with concrete proposals for council meeting.

1,000 UBC students occupy faculty club

VANCOUVER (CUP) — More than 2,000 University of British Columbia students look over the faculty club yesterday.

The students, led by American Jerry Rubin, paraded a squealing pig (presidential candidate for Rubin's Youth International Party) into the opulent faculty-only restaurant and bar.

Late last night 1,000 people were holding the building and preparing to spend the night.

S. Huberman commented: "This is just delightful — there's nothing against you being there as long as you don't break into the liquor cabinet or damage the building."

Students had cleaned out the club's open liquor supply and, at last word, were trying farce! I don't even want to speak," one student muttered.

"We should be discussing basic principles and how reforms are going to affect students in society," said Alberto DiGiovanni (II SMC).

"We're moving," said faculty rep. Prof. J.H. Walker. "If we were standing still I'd be worried, but we're moving."

Monday's meeting will be closed but Dean Allen will ask for the 25 students on his advisory committee to sit as assessors.

During the day many students openly smoked pot and hazz. Political discussion buzzed through the building. One student took a skinny dip in the club fountain.

Student president Dave Zirnhelt said the council would take no action.

The RCMP confess to be "unconcerned."

Acting Administration President Walter Gage had a terse "no comment."

And Singapore Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew, who is staying in the Club's Presidential suite during a visit to Vancouver, commented: "I'm totally unconcerned. . . . I can't see the point of it all but it's rather funny."

U of T students starve-in on Parliament Hill

By MARY KATE ROWAN

The band played enthusiastically as the demonstrators marched slowly and silently.

The group of 40 protesting Canada's lack of aid to Biafra held a circular march in front of the Parliament Buildings at noon yesterday.

Beside them stood the band playing for the United Nations flag raising ceremony.

Yesterday was UN Day, 1968 — set aside to honor the United Nations and symbolize Canada's active participation in world affairs through the UN.

The demonstration — to support an appeal for a Canadian initiative to end the Nigerian - Biafra conflict.

The demonstration started Wednesday morning. In a statement issued Wednesday, the group summed up its purpose.

"We are all of us motivated by a single nightmare — that we stood by and did nothing while an entire people was exterminated from the face of the earth."

"We ask our government to attempt to arrange through the UN a ceasefire between Nigeria and Biafra.

"Every legal means to arrange a ceasefire has been attempted," commented David Douglas (II Scar).

"We felt we needed something dramatic to get the focus of attention."

To further express their concern, the demonstrators will continue their fast until tonight. Since Wednesday, they have allowed themselves only water and chewing gum.

Wednesday morning at 10:15 26 protesters entered External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp's outer office.

As an extremely bemused secretary watched, they deposited themselves on the floor.

The washroom doors were locked.

Enter Mr. Sharp. According to David Caylee, his manner was "somewhere between smooth and oily."

In a 15-minute meeting he repeated his stand that Canada can not raise the Biafran issue at the U.N. because the African states do not want intervention.

Stating that he had an appointment with an African dignitary, he said he assumed the demonstrators "as loyal citizens would not want to interfere with the workings of his office".

He added that he would hate to give the visiting dignitary the wrong impression of Canada.

No one budged.

One by one, the suddenly limp bodies were carried out and deposited on the pavement outside the centre block of the Parliament buildings.

No one was hurt but Jim Osborne (SGS) commented: "When we hit the sidewalk we usually hit it pretty hard."

One Ottawa newspaper described the demonstrators as a "molody group" and several newsmen asked where to find the hippies.

It was an odd group of hippies camped out around the eternal flame on Parliament Hill. Most of the girls wore skirts and the men wore white shirts and ties. The group included priests and nuns.

They came from all over — Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto.

Some students, some professors and some interested citizens.

Many have worked for CUSO and have been to Nigeria.

Jack Lecher-Kimel (SGS) spent September in Biafra.

"I have seen the aftereffects of massacres. You just have encourage, sometimes to question and infrequently to heckle.

"You're complaining about the Biafrans eating rats," shouted one irate woman. "They have always eaten rats."

One woman walked by silently and threw a dollar bill.

"Thank you lady," responded the group.

The protesters sleep — or try to sleep — on the lawn and on the pavement — in between the choruses of bells from the Peace Tower.

An RCMP officer stands at a discreet distance.

A smiling Mitchell Sharp met with the group yesterday afternoon. Sitting among the protesters on a folded sleeping bag, he repeated his position.

He said U Thank, secretary general of the United Nations, has advised him that raising the issue at the UN would produce a smaller change of settlement.

"We need negotiation, not talk. The UN is a place to debate not negotiate. If we had a debate countries would be forced to take a position from which they would find it difficult to retreat."

Sharp assured that the Canadian government is doing all it can to help the starving Biafrans. When asked by Dr. Gerald Caplan, assistant professor of African studies at U of T to state specifically what Canada is doing, Sharp refused on the grounds that if the information were made public, the negotiations would fall through.

Gayle Cooper, who has spent two years with CUSO in Nigeria shocked everyone when she said that while in Nigeria, the Canadian high commissioner of Nigeria told her that "in the context of history, the Ibo is getting what he deserves."

Sharp turned white, but said he could not accept Miss Cooper's statement. "I'll be had checked with the high commissi-

It: to explode or not to explode

By LEAH ADAM

"We are exporting death control to underdeveloped nations, but we are not willing to give them life control", Dr. Bruce Falls said Wednesday.

In a pre Teach-In discussion at St. Michael's College, Rev. D. V. Wade (Department of Religious Studies, Victoria College) added that the population rise in underdeveloped countries must be checked, or "the possible benefits of industrialization will be choked off".

Professor D. J. Dooley (English Department, St. Michael's College), said the organizers of the Teach-In "have prejudged the issue", in regarding the population explosion as an "acknowledged fact".

He said latest figures show that the population is not rising as fast as previously predicted, and technological progress can ensure that there will soon be no need for famines to occur. He saw no necessity for curtailing "natural human processes".

Rev. D. V. Wade

A torchlight parade of 60 students marked the end of Hillel's Week of Concern for Soviet Jewry. The silent march expressed sympathy for Jews suffering cultural persecution in the U.S.S.R.

(Department of Religious Studies, Victoria College) said we cannot look at it "merely as a food problem", and if so many experts say there is a population explosion, "we ought to listen to them".

He disagreed with Prof. Dooley's opposition to artificial birth control. He noted that in the 19th century, the Church did not allow the use of chloroform for women in labor because it was "removing the primal curse on woman and not allowing her to pay the price for original sin."

Philosophy Prof. D. D. Evans later said artificial birth control is no more immoral than the use of anaesthetics.

pretty pictures

Those cows guts in front of Sidney Smith Hall yesterday weren't very pretty. We don't often see the reality behind the attractively packaged chunks of meat in supermarkets. The cellophane wrapping shields us from the images of cattle being fattened, only to be slaughtered by a power they don't understand.

The same thing is happening to thousands of humans every day, but we don't have to see the reality of that either.

Occasionally, of course, when it suits the commercial media's purpose, we see a glimpse. But generally we are shielded from the stinking guts and rotting corpses by the protective wrapping of the newspaper and the TV tube.

It's just as well. If we saw everything that happens in, say, Vietnam or Biafra, we'd be sick.

But while human beings are treated like slaughter animals, the university has no right, and students have no right, to remain neutral. To quote (of all people) Edmund Burke: "The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing."

Do you think there's nothing you can do? You could help have companies making a profit on the Vietnam slaughter banned from recruiting on campus. Or you could join the students fasting at Queen's Park to draw attention to the plight of the lbo in Biafra. Or you could march on Saturday, urging an end to the Vietnam conflict.

Cow entrails thrown on Sidney Smith steps. The sign reads "Stop the American Butchers, March Oct. 26"

Demonstrations, you say, don't do any good. But why not try an experiment?

Skip lunch and dinner today, just to see what hunger, even a little, is like. And go to tonight's session of the teach-in, and find out how many people won't have bacon and eggs for breakfast tomorrow.

On Saturday, if you think the Vietnam war is unjust, join the march on City Hall. Not because it will do you any good, but just to find out what it feels like to do something.

But for God's sake don't fast or march just to ease your conscience. Do it to get some understanding of the human reality that lies behind the protective wrapping of your evening news report.

That's not much, but it's a start.

VISA replies

Re your article on VISA by Mary Kate Rowan September 23, 1968:

Shield International Limited handles all national advertising and marketing for VISA in Canada. It is in relation to our TWA and CNR accounts that I wish to set forth in proper perspective what VISA is; what it is trying to do; and what value it has for the student.

Shield International Limited markets three (3) cards:

1) VISA membership card, which is for special student savings.

2) CNR card: Shield International Limited is a marketing agent for Canadian National 25 percent off card.

3) TWA 50-50 club, once again VISA is marketing agent for TWA cards.

The rates that VISA charges for membership automatically have recognized values. VISA offers 3 price lines:

VISA-CN	- $2.00 (No. 1)
VISA-TWA	- $3.00 (No. 2)
VISA-CN-TWA	- $4.00 (No. 3)

Should you go to Canadian National Railway counter and purchase a CN reduced fare card you would pay $2.00 for it. As a result the VISA card in the VISA-CN deal is free. Should you go to any airline and purchase a 1/2 fare card you would pay $3.00, as a result the VISA card is free.

Should you go to purchase both a CN card, value $2.00; a TWA card, value $3.00; you would be paying a total of $5.00 which we offer for $4.00 with a free VISA card.

The TWA card is the card recognized by all airlines for youth fare, not the VISA card. VISA is simply the marketing company in this case for TWA, and as a result it is no wonder that the other airlines, including TWA in Montreal and Toronto have not heard of VISA.

The VISA card which gives you various discount and savings of one type or another is only a method of inducement to get the student to shop there. However, as you can see, by the VISA sponsor's contract, the rate of discount is supposed to be exclusive to VISA. We confess we did make an error in advertising; by not including the 12-22 age limit, however, we are presently refunding all monies paid to VISA at our expense to those who cannot participate in the program.

Enclosed you will also find a copy of an American VISA College Guide to show you that VISA does publish guides and does have National Accounts.

In no way do I ask you to retract all that you have said before, however, I would appreciate it if you would print the facts as they really are.

SAC's oleaginous treatment of the draft dodgers has left me with a murriatic taste in my mouth. Those recreant mollycoddles who reveal a revolting otiosity towards their responsibilities appear to have obfuscated SAC's perspicacious thinking.

When SAC is only capable of reprehending America's participation in the war, it is time that SAC's actions be condemned as non liquet.

Only recently have Americans come in any number to Canada as political refugees, and these, mostly draft resisters, are a small minority. The overwhelming number of Americans at the University of Toronto have come for academic and financial reasons: the education is good and inexpensive.

Most American students, when they complete their degrees, return south. A few, who had every intention of returning when they first arrived here, remain behind. Something in them reacts to the experience of living in Canada, and they do not go back to the States.

ii

How well do I remember?

I encountered that snowy, cold day's first grey light on Buffalo's Main Street during a quiet walk after coffee. The bus trip had begun early the previous evening, and my legs badly needed exercise. Dawn was muted in the wake of a blizzard which had paralysed all the territory behind me.

On this bleak December 30th almost three years ago I first felt that emotion which I have since come to recognize as relief whenever I am reapproaching the Canadian border from the South. It occurred then only for a moment in the hindmost part of my consciousness, and I did not formulate it in words much less realize that I might someday expatriate.

iii

It seems to have been different for my friend Barney. It came on him all at once and wasn't a small seed of awareness a few years back which matured in a process of conscious thought.

Barney graduated with me from St. Michael's in 1967 and decided to go to New York. He had a couple of friends and a girl there and thought he might look into social work. The job and the girl fell through for reasons beyond his control, and, without them to occupy him, he found New York lonely and oppressive. He went home to see his parents in Chicago, to live there for a short while and think things over. A couple of weeks later, for something to do, he made what was to have been a brief trip to Toronto; he hasn't left yet.

"As I came out of the Wellesley subway station and walked up the alley, the sun was shining and the people were smiling and everything was beautiful. And I realized I had a huge grin on my face, I was happy to be back. And I knew then I would stay here."

THE TELEGRAM, Toronto, Wed., Oct. 23, 1968

"Power is a thing (Bassett) likes to be able to play around with. It was just as important to him to be able to make Larry Grossman as it was to have someone on the paper who would do his best to destroy the attempt."

— ron haggart

'It's the final touch that makes the difference' — so the saying goes.

And with Toronto's New City Hall, the ultimate final touch must be the man who polishes the leaves of the plastic potted plants that stand beside the wooden doors as you enter the building.

In at least this corner we are a city indulging in luxury. Nowhere is this more evident than in the council chamber. Here, in a circling room with golden carpets, a double horse-shoe of men and women meet to haggle over the fate of the city. One of the mottos above their heads reads: 'Industry Intelligence Integrity.'

But if you care to scratch beneath the surface the golden picture will quickly fade . . . there's at least one man in the city who has established a reputation for doing just this. He is Ron Haggart.

Haggart is a man who commands respect by the very nature of his writing, a definitive style that is powerful and persuasive not by sensationalism but by humor, sarcasm, and a wealth of detail.

"I feel . . . and this is something that Frank Tumpane used to say even if he didn't always follow it . . . that in writing a column one should always leave the reader with a new piece of information.

"I'm not the kind of hit-them-over-the-head with it polemicist. Although I do regard myself as a polemicist . . . with a leaning to the left. In writing a column I consider that I have a kind of jurisdiction over the public interest.

"This is of particular relevance in civic politics where so much of the argumentation tends to defend either of two positions. There is always what one might call 'consumer interest'; and the residents' interest usually has at least one defender on the council. But neither of these necessarily speaks for what I would call the public interest."

It's a liberal creed . . . not to be despised because of the current unpopularity of the label. And it reveals a careful kind of thought that is . . . characteristic of the man. For instance his reference to Tumpane suggests an ingrained professional habit of always attributing statements to their correct sources.

Ron Haggart's defense of public interest is illustrated perhaps by a stand he took on the construction of the Toronto-Dominion Centre about five years ago.

The bank came to City Hall with an offer on the purchase of last sections of land required for the tower site. This land, consisting of a number of laneways owned by the city, should be sold for one dollar, the bank claimed, because the planned centre would be in all respects an asset to the city of Toronto.

Councillors seemed to be persuaded by this argument. But Haggart took a stand in his column against such a decision.

First of all he noted that in terms of the price paid to the other private owners, the land was worth $250,000. This high value was related in part to the number of services in the vicinity — highways and subway — items which are financed by public money. Why should the taxpayer not receive return payment for facilities he has paid for Haggart suggested?

Secondly, he questioned the integrity of the bank in choosing as their representative before council none other than Frederick G. Gardiner. Not only had he been a member of this council, but his tenure had been recent enough so that many of the present councillors had worked with and under him.

Finally, Haggart researched the board of governors of the bank itself in the minutes of annual meetings and in speeches of the bank president. He was able to quote the bank president to the effect that the citizens of Toronto were well enough off 'not to be rattling a tin cup for handouts.'

So much for the bank's altruism! It paid the $250,000.

On the first impression, one would not associate power of this kind with Ron Haggart. He is of medium build with reddish waving hair and a quiet hesitant voice . . . not an immediately overwhelming personality but one that inspires trust. Whatever this particular image conceals or reveals, it's a very good mask for a newspaperman.

He grew up in Vancouver where his first journalistic experience was as the editor of the Ubysey, the University of British Columbia paper. Most of his time in Toronto was spent working for the Toronto Star . . . as city hall reporter, as a columnist and finally as the muscle behind 'Help Wanted.'

(When this public service gem was started by the Star, the passing of Haggart's regular column was mourned in Saturday Night in an article entitled 'Requiem for Ron Haggart.' It was at this time that he gave York University the leather-bound volumes which are his Bible — city council minutes.)

There's a great deal more than detail and rhetoric in Haggart's column. He is a man respected above all for his opinion. The Telegram hired him as a 'reporter with an opinion' a position apparently sacred even to owner and publisher John Bassett.

"Only two weeks ago Bassett wrote a column in the paper stating that only the actual editorial writers were bound to represent Telegram policy," Haggart pointed out to me. And his experiences with the paper seem to bear this out.

When he was hired, Bassett told him he was free to say anything he wished "about the Maple Leafs, the Toronto Argonauts, or Maple Leaf Gardens, or anything else I own."

The only requested limitation was on criticism of Eatons. "John David Eaton is a long-standing personal friend of mine. He gave me the five million needed to buy this paper fourteen years ago and I don't want to see him criticised in the Telegram," Bassett told him.

And when a short time later the paper's editors started to push for Larry Grossman (son of Alan Grossman who is a good friend of Bassett's) as a replacement for Alderman Caccia on the city council, the next day Haggart replied in full strength in his column.

"It gave me the opportunity to use phrases like 'Larry who?'" Haggart remarked.

"And Bassett wasn't upset. Power is a thing he likes to be able to play around with. It was just as important to him to be able to make Larry Grossman as it was to have someone on the paper who would do his best to destroy the attempt."

With comments like this one can only suspect that Haggart's truest identity is that of Puck.

I mean, anyone who says that the Toronto Star sees itself as "a kind of monolithic bloc marching like a Chinese people's army spreading culture and enlightenment" just can't be all that innocent.

reinis zusters at sobot

The Australian flag is flying over the Sobot Gallery this week as Australian artist Reinis Zusters exhibits his works there.

His paintings are very good stuff, mostly. Regardless of the colour scheme of your living room, you are bound to find a Zusters painting that matches the drapes.

All the oils are done with palette knives, and it's nice to see someone who can use them. Knives are actually an advanced technique; to a beginning artist, the use of the insensitive blades is like trying to play a piano with mittens on. I went to a lot of amateur exhibits around the city this summer, and at least a third of every show consisted of crappy knife paintings. I've never liked Freud's theory that oil painting is playing with your bowel movements, but in this case I'd be willing to concede the point. I think that many art teachers are encouraging beginners to use knives because they are easier to clean than brushes.

Rembrandt, suffering from rheumatism in his old age, strapped brushes to his wrists and painted by the movement of his arms. That's analagous to the limitations a beginner places on himself when he picks up a knife. To conclude my sermon: whatever talent you have for painting is as pitilessly revealed by the knife as the brush, and is perhaps even under-played and shown in a bad light.

Even in the hands of a good artist like Reinis Zusters, the knife has its limitations. It is best used to render man-made structures and geometric figures; and in his exhibit Zusters has some breath-taking aerial views of a city done on large surfaces.

But where the knife fails is landscape, and there are some works in this collection that look like hell. Unless Zusters has been there and is trying to represent it, I think he has failed to do a good rendering of whatever it was he was looking at.

The thing to notice about his city pictures is that, although done with a sense of dash, they have been carefully laid out with proper, conventional perspective. This is what distinguishes a good knife work. You can render the surface of a painting practically any way you want as long as it has a good skeleton underneath.

Zuster's work, I should mention, is being shown at the Church of The Redeemer, Bloor and Avenue Roads, as well as the Sobot Gallery. The paintings in the Church are the better ones on the whole, and so, if you are interested and passing by Yorkville, you'll find this location more convenient.

In the Galleries: Hart House is showing the paintings of John Anderson, the Walter Engel Gallery has a collection of sixteen Latin American artists, some of Giacometti's lithos are at the Albert White Gallery and Durer engravings are being exhibited at the Mazelow Gallery.

near-sighted water colours

Watercolour is a difficult medium. If you don't get a passage down right the first time, you've had it. Unlike oils, you can't scrub around. This results in two drawbacks of most watercolour works:

happenance. ("That sky of yours looks just a leetle accidental, Lady Beeder — as if the cat spilled its breakfast." "I think I see what you mean, Mr. Jimson.") and hackneyed "bits". The best watercolourists in the world are the English and the Japanese, because they have the patience to develop the control and technical facility that enables them to be original while being technically sound.

Marjorie Pigott, who's works are being exhibited at the Roberts Gallery, 641 Yonge St., is a British woman who was born in Japan and studied art there for twelve years, so she has enjoyed the best of both worlds.

Her paintings are very pretty. She gets excellent atmospheric effects by working on wet paper and letting the paint ooze where it may. The trouble is, she uses the same technique for her close-ups of flowers, fungus and such. One gets the impression that she is an owl-ish, near-sighted woman who paints these fuzzy pictures to be romantic.

There are about forty works in the show, and they all have the same foggy quality. While walking around I kept cleaning my glasses before I realized that it was the paintings.

If you're the sort of person who likes cotton prints or kimono backsides, you'll like the ethereal, innocuous, very female waters by Pigott.

dinner with the mime troupe

I had tagged along with the San Francisco Mime Troupe all day Wednesday because I was supposed to get this super-cool news story. I had all the techniques of high-pressure journalism at my fingertips and it was going to be an in-depth story, the kind of thing that looks good on the entertainment sections of the dailies or Time magazine.

But after their show at Varsity Arena, I was very tired, and as they were putting the last of their equipment in their truck, I stood around, alone. I harrumphed and got their attention. "Uh, would you guys mind very much if I, uh, sorta came with you for supper?"

Michael London, who seemed to be a bit uptight all day, turned and said, "No, you can't." I couldn't tell whether he meant it or not. They were all kind of uptight about the fact that the Varsity photographer had followed them around from the moment they arrived in Toronto. That was my fault. I had told him to keep hot on their trail.

But they all said, "No, Mike. He's a pleasant enough guy, we don't care." So, self-consciously, I climbed into the VW microbus and we left.

After having driven all the way out to Keele St., it occurred to me that they didn't know where they were going. But we stopped and we got out and shouted, "Where the hell are we going?" The people in the other VW and in the truck said they didn't know but they saw an Italian restaurant. So we went in.

The people in the restaurant couldn't speak a word of English, so we ordered in Italian. Stuff like "bringa us mucho bread cum la veal parmegiana." After an hour everybody was eating something he hadn't ordered.

I was sitting beside Michael London so I wasn't saying much, feeling that he'd jump down my throat. But finally, after looking through the Village Voice, he said, "Dammit, makes me mad!"

"Ahem, what makes you mad?" I asked through a mouthful of spaghetti. He didn't answer. So I continued eating. Two minutes later he said, "The way these guys keep on telling you, 'now you have to be careful and not upset the apple cart, don't rock the boat. I mean, that's shit.'"

Then it hit me. It hit me like a ton of bricks in the head. "Who the hell are you anyway, Haiven? Some kind of hard line straight square journalist? This is where you're at man. There's absolutely no difference between you and these guys except for a few trivial facts like they live 4000 miles away and they have funny accents."

Daniel Chumley, another group member was saying earlier in the day how he had grown up in a slum and that he had nurtured a slow-burning hate of all rich people. But he had channeled all that hate into activity. "Like, dig it, man," he had said. "Protest marches aren't any good, because our brothers and sisters are being hit on the head and thrown in the can so's they can never get out. And hippy nihilism just doesn't work any more. People gotta organize."

I told him, "Yeah, okay, stop telling me what I already know. I'm where you're at. Let's talk about turning people on. Let's talk about socialism and continuous cultural revolution." So we talked about that for a while until he had to leave for London, Ont.

I thought about that conversation while eating supper and I wasn't worried any more about getting my all important story.

The girls in the troupe collected some plates and took them back into the kitchen.

We had been in the restaurant about two hours and were talking about the election. "I mean, if ice hockey were relevant to my life," Charley Degelman was saying, "then I'd be playing ice hockey. That's what the election is all about. It's not relevant to my life. There's no democratic process left to speak of."

After supper, some decided that they wanted to see a horror movie, others that they wanted to sightsee around Toronto. It isn't very important that they wanted to see a horror movie but it brought home a striking fact to me.

In the youth of North America today (the radical youth that is), there is a strange kind of kinship, a kind of solidarity that I don't think ever existed before. We are all the children of horror movies, the atomic bomb and Vietnam. We all grew up into an affluent society in which exists squalor and poverty.

And though we want desperately to change the society in which we live, we still cherish horror movies and hamburgers and french fries.

And when young people from Toronto and San Francisco and New York and Chicago get together, they know where all the others are at. It doesn't matter where people were from when they confronted the cops in Chicago. They all knew what they were there for.

The San Francisco Mime Troupe travels about the country in two VW microbuses and a truck. And their little bit is called guerilla theatre. They perform fifteenth and sixteenth century mime plays, that are relevant nowadays, because of their simplicity and universality. They also do puppet plays and "Gorilla Marching Band" that originated during an anti-Dow demonstration in Madison, Wisconsin in 1967.

During their show, one girl in front of me turned around and said: "Well, they're okay, but after all the publicity they got, I thought we'd see some professional theatre group. This is really disappointing." And all through the play, she squirmed as the Mime Troupe gleefully flaunted mock sexual organs that were part of their costumes and made fun of Yankee imperialism and the Canadian acceptance of it.

The audience booed and hissed and groaned at the bad puns and laughed when they mentioned the morality squad or Willowdale or Chancellor Solandt. For one, I don't think I've seen very many audiences as responsive as that. And it wasn't because the troupe was presenting especially good theatre, although they are accomplished. The people were laughing because there was a genuine rapport between them and the people on the stage. They understood what was going on and the jokes were strictly between performers and audience. Theatre is finally returning to the streets and to the people.

When a group like that gets together, they don't want to spend all their time justifying themselves to two-bit newsmen. So Ronnie Davis, their leader says, "We're out to destroy the United States or some such bull-baiting and shit-disturbing thing" that Time magazine prints for the sake of sensationalism.

But you can't put a dynamic and relevant group under glass, not if they can help it.

— Larry Haiven

the world of madness and the madness of the world

Perhaps the only thing that makes Middleton and Rowley's "The Changeling" of any interest to a modern audience is its psycho-sexual realism. But when moments of lust and sensuousness seem strangely ludicrous and out of place in a play that is all about suppressed sexuality and madness, then the production can have little impact.

This Elizabethan play, now being performed at Hart House theatre under the direction of Leon Major, tries to link the madness of the world and the world of madness. In the house of a nobleman, a man is murdered so that the nobleman's daughter can marry another man. The murderer is madly in love with the daughter, and together they are damned. In a madhouse nearby, noblemen dress as fools to woo the wife of the keeper.

Partly because of the incompatibility of the madhouse subplot with the main plot and partly because of the shallowness of the characterization, the production fails to plumb the depths of psychological drama inherent in the play, which though not particularly good, holds promise for a gripping story.

Frances Hyland, playing Beatrice, the willful instigator of the murder, is uneven in her portrayal and comes up empty-handed when the question of her motivation for the murder arises. She detests de Flores, her hired murderer, and yet at the end, says 'I'm forced to love thee now,' and then dies with him. It seems that this detestation would be more believable if it were at least a morbid fascination for de Flores. Anything would have been better than the one-dimensional portrayal that only achieved a depth too near the end of the play.

William Needles, lurking and evil in the background, gave a de Flores that was too blatantly "mean" to be anything but ludicrous except in certain long scenes with Beatrice in which there had to be some variation of his character. In these scenes, one gets a taste of what a good interpretation might have done for the play.

Perhaps because of this lack of depth, the gap between the plot and subplot was far wider than it should have been. The madhouse scenes were performed ably, although they could have had even more excitement. But there was absolutely no relation to be seen between the events that took place in the madhouse and the events at the castle. Middleton and Rowley probably intended to draw an analogy between the two and if they failed, the production shows it well.

The production far from exhibited the talents of its professional cast and in some instances was even embarrassing, as in the case of the voice of Robert Silverman, swallowing and chewing his words as Vermadero, the father of Beatrice.

Major's usual mastery of stage orchestration was sadly irrelevant in a production that lacked a soul to stir the action to music.

p.i.s. like will will likely please

Somewhere in the caverns of University College unhampered by the affairs of the world, is a door to the past. Behind it is the office of the Poci Ludique Societas, a group dedicated to the studied and artfully executed performance of Medieval and Tudor-Elizabethan drama.

Their first production this season is a semi-comic semi-seriously intended good bit of acting, called "Like Will To Like" available gratis at Seely Hall.

According fully to the tradition of the time (mid-sixteenth century) the play is one in which the virtuous life is ultimately rewarded while those who choose instead the course of licentious living are brought eventually to repentance, and must accept the punishment that is their due.

The central figure and trouble-maker, instigator, wit and Vice-above-all, is Nichol Newfangle, tauntingly and mockingly played by David Klausner. His gestures and facial expressions, coyly tempting monologues and hearty enthusiasm pulled the play together and forward, and, sometimes, even into the audience. The audience's sympathy is initially with Nichol, and although the advocates of the Virtuous life chastise us for this weakness, gravely warning all of the perils that must necessarily befall the vice figures, it is to little effect. Perhaps the actors felt the same way for they acted far more convincingly — and fluently — in the saucier roles. Especially well done was Paul Mulholland's feathered and feminine knave, Tom Tosspot. Other attractive interpretations were Lucifer, Tom Collier, and Cuthbert Cutpurse. John Reppar provided a mellow and beautiful aria to virtue as clear and as disarming as a soloist choir-boy at High Mass.

It appears that the play was written before the familiar adage that opposites attract had been discovered. The theory here, loosely and humorously emphasised, is that people seek company with those who are similar to themselves. In this way, the lowly, corrupt, wicked and vicious band together, and are brought to their inevitable shame and "pain eternal".

What's hard to believe is that Fulwell really meant all this virtue-always-wins-in-the-end stuff, whereas the pathetic repentance (of a previously quite successful purse-snatcher who seemed to enjoy his work) could only bring laughs today.

The play itself may be trivial, but it's fun, and worth seeing. It's a piece of a different era and adherence to the convention of the time is its most successful and consistent feature. PLS hasn't let us down although "If Virtue beats Vice be the point of the play—Poci performs better bad guys, I say."

nominated Republican candidate for president, and, while we had no interest in that sort of business, a local celebrity of such importance deserved some exploratory kid attention. We no doubt would have been more enthusiastic about the Cisco Kid or another of the idols of the time. For the entire autumn, in the afternoons after school, we sat on the curb in front of Ike's house and amused each other reciting new dirty words we'd learned.

Winter came, and Ike had been elected, and we returned to more ordinary little kid neighbourhood activities like watching the big kids toss burning garbage and flaming Christmas trees over Morningside Heights at the people below. It was okay to do this because they were negro.

Morningside Heights is the west boundary of central Harlem and is something like the Berlin Wall. From the wide sunny avenue above, where white people live in a buffer zone between Columbia and the Heights, to the park below, which is a similar zone between Harlem and the Heights, drops an almost vertical stone wall of about seventy-five feet. The first time I can recall anyone calling attention to the fantastic symbolism of this wall and being paid attention was during the Columbia business last spring.

A state of warfare existed between the big white kids above and the big black kids below. The little kids on both sides just watched. On their infrequent sorties down into the park the white kids used the steep stone steps located every second block. Usually, when they came up, the black kids used the stairs too, but sometimes they would try to scale the wall in which the spaces between stones served as foot and handholds. Few made it to the top. Most gave up in exhaustion and frustration, and some fell, occasionally hurting themselves badly. We little kids, as usual, just watched these efforts uncommittedly, but the older white kids participated by jeering at the climbers and throwing stones and old tin cans at them.

The last time I visited the Columbia neighborhood I didn't get to Morningside Heights. I arrived in the city at about two in the morning one Tuesday last May after helping a friend navigate an overloaded station wagon home from Toronto. I intended to visit someone who had dropped out of the U. of T. at Christmas (she has since returned) and was living in New York.

The day began beautifully. Since Toronto's winters are so inglorious, spring is that much more pleasant. The sun was bright, the air warm, and I packed a bag and a lunch, locked my catacomb quarters in Kensington Market and walked along Spadina munching a piece of fresh fruit.

Insofar as I did visit my friend, that we had a long talk and renewed our friendship, the journey was a success. But New York was a workshop of fear, a living playhouse of ugliness. My friend had a triple lock on her door—not because she excites easily but because, if you live in central New York, you must take such precautions to keep yourself and belongings safe. She remarked about robberies, beatings, racism and rapes in an off-hand way, and I abandoned then and there any thoughts I had about doing graduate work in New York. The idea of having to tolerate living in a nightmare, of having the worst atrocities of a generally insensitive and violent culture become commonplace, repelled me thoroughly. The following morning I escaped, fled from New York as quickly as I could.

Because I was going from there to visit my parents, I thought to shower, shave and dress up a bit before leaving her apartment. A new Mothers of Invention record had just been released, and I listened to it for the first time while I was tying. Frank Zappa sang.

"All your children are poor unfortunate
Victims of systems beyond their control.
A plague upon your ignorance
And the grey despair of your ugly life."

vi

Another friend, Mac, will probably return to the States when he has finished his degree. He says he believes in patriotism and that his family will be disappointed if he stays here.

Patriotism. I think I used to feel it. I used to believe the United States was basically a good idea and that, if there were ills in its system, they were the fault of men who didn't measure up to the idea. I have since begun to judge institutions not by their claims or ideals or failed efforts but by what they are. When Mike called me "idealistic" (an all-purpose bullshit term for anyone who mentions politics and morality in the same paragraph) because I approve of Mc-

"... living in a neighbourhood with families a and enlightening contrast with the round of life mostly by old and young single people in which was constantly exposed to Toronto as a city rather than to be where the university was located."

Carthy's not supporting Humphrey, I replied that he was the idealist: by assenting to the tradition of two-party states that "lesser" differences should be compromised for the sake of the party, he was asserting that American political parties and the American political system work effectively. McCarthy is not being deceived by the ideals of the system but is being brazenly realistic.

Patriotism is something I can't feel for the United States; I feel no positive emotion toward the place and no sense of identity beyond family roots. If I ever return there for a political reason, and I may someday, it will be to change things, to help alleviate some of the troubles of the poor people of whom there are thirty million.

This is not to say that the actual governmental system of the United States is, on paper, a bad idea. No, the trouble with the States runs much deeper, is much more serious than simple government structure. The totalitarianism in the States is accomplished by non-governmental institutions—the newspapers which, with few exceptions, have rewritten the history of the Democratic Convention; the Democratic Party which effectively ignored what occurred in the streets of Chicago while it paid little attention on the convention floor to the hopes and wishes of a large segment of its own grass roots faithful; the Republican Party whose bland convention in this turbulent year rivaled a Mickey Mouse cartoon for drama and political dialogue. (McCarthy is failing to support Humphrey not because he has no sense of fair play and democracy but precisely because he does.) Zappa again:

"All your children are poor unfortunate
Victims of lies you believe.
A plague upon your ignorance
That keeps the young from the light."

When the Democratic Convention was held in Toronto I was two hundred miles north of the States. If there has been a point at which the history of the States has become an affair of the heart, it was one of these—confuse Canada with the States. My trip north last August barely touched the States, but I went just far enough to see that beautiful this country is.

Too often I have heard Canadian people refer to the States in terms of its lack of national identity, the focus of sociologists.

A country like India, weathered by its history, needs the sacred ground of its history. It was argued by an Indian gentleman recently. "When crisis happens, the sociological factors which unite the people of a country are never been need for nor effective."

was actually occurring, Toronto in the lake country. My flirtation with Canada was while I paddled a small Canadian lake at sunset. Toronto—and for some time I lived with southeastern Ontario. I moved from southern Ontario to realize in fact how big and people whom I regard as sensibly, to their country in a variety of some other hocus po-ing the most critical phase of national identity. Or so I thought with whom I talked powerful ideological and psychological people are desirable." or path crisis, and there has been a cause of the emergence of a national identity. It is precisely this lack and the absence of strong, popular nationalistic feeling which appeals to many Americans who migrate here. It appears to us as though there is much less emphasis here on certain proper and correct ways in which people should act and feel. Constantly one sees ways in which Canada seems to have significantly more cultural and political freedom than has the neighbor to the south.

There are other differences perceived by expatriate Americans. For example, a friend of mine, Mort, once remarked that, while in the states personal hang-ups often were given vent in some violent striking-out, similar hang-ups among Canadians are as often as not simply inverted in depression and unhappiness: rather than trying to blame other people for their problems, Canadians frequently seem to take too much personal responsibility for their anxieties.

viii

I can recall some misgivings when I first moved to Kensington Market. I had always lived before in the familiar environs of the Bloor-Yonge neighborhood, and Spadina-College was strange to me. The landlord whose cellar I rented spoke little English, very few other students or people with my background lived on the street.

But the place began to feel at least somewhat like home as the year progressed, and living in a neighborhood with families and children and local groups was a sharp and enlightening contrast with the round of life of the mobile neighborhood populated mostly by old and young single people in which I had been the three previous years. I was constantly exposed to Toronto as a city rather than as just a place which happened to be where the university was located. It wasn't the Anglo-Saxon old Toronto though, it was new Toronto — Portuguese, Hungarians, Italians, Chinese.

My hope is that, while these groups become more favorably situated economically and become more tolerant of one another, the lack of a strong Canadian assimilation process will enable them to maintain some cultural singularity. The growing diversity of Toronto is encouraging to a newcomer. Some of us would rather be here than in Montreal because Toronto has no stereotype.

My barber when I lived in the Market was a Hungarian who came to Canada in 1957. He explained to me one day that he had gone to the United States after his escape from Hungary in 1956. But, he explained, after a visit to Canada, he decided to come here instead because everyone took life easier here, more people minded their own business and there was much less emphasis on having to make it economically. "It's quiet here; everything there is loud," he said.

"Canada is the only place in America where the dream of the new world is still possible," said Barney the other night. The key word is possible. The biggest decisions in this country have yet to be made.

During the next fifty years the development of Canada, both of settled urban areas and of wilderness, will increase rapidly. This development could be dominated by the same sort of people who dominated American growth in the last century, those whose only real motive is profit and self-aggrandizement. If this happens, places which are now beautiful could be ripped apart by miners or torn down by lumbermen. Fly across Pennsylvania sometime and look at what massive strip-mining can do to a landscape; read about the struggle to preserve the California redwoods.

It is possible, on the other hand that sound planning at neighborhoods, city, metropolitan, provincial and federal levels will be the basis of Canadian development. Ideally these levels will be in constant conflict with one another, will generate enough intergroup squabbling and tension that some of the population at large will be interested in participating. It is encouraging to see in Canada today the beginnings of popular awareness that planning is necessary—that what you do over here affects what happens over there and that, if you want to live in a nice place, you've got to be aware of all the implications of the various ways of developing the place. (Planning involves much more than where schools and houses and stores are put; much broader ecological variables have to be considered.) The premise of this approach is that development and ugliness aren't synonymous.

The purpose of recounting these impressions, stories and beliefs is not to make Canada a hero and the States a villain. It has not been my intention to encourage the often irrational anti-Americanism of many Canadians but rather to discourage their anti-Canadianism. Some of us from the south who live here for a while perceive differences between the two places, and in some important ways Canada seems a better place.

Joe, who is of our parents' generation, and is American, told me once he thought some of the younger people today find political boundaries uninteresting. He said they often only seem able to think in terms of people they know and beliefs they hold. They are citizens of neighborhoods and citizens of the world, and intermediate groupings, like countries, are unimportant.

If this is true, it's a good thing, but it may only be true in a small sense. Because, for every young person in the States who thinks this way, there are a dozen who do not. For that reason my attitude toward those Americans who want to return there from Toronto and "work within the system" is not hopeful. If they do really pour themselves into the system in an attempt to reform it, the struggle will consume their whole lives. There are very few people who are ever able to make that commitment; and I wonder if the whole notion isn't missing the point completely. But whether or not it misses the point, I question if one can return to the States for any other reason. And the commitment implied by that reason is one that some of us cannot make quickly or easily.

Whether one remains here or returns, the effort is to make one's own life worth living according to what is perceived as being good and desirable. From Zappa once again,

"Do you love it?
Do you hate it?
There it is,
The way you made it."

He'd turn up on a coast somewhere for a few weeks or a few days and the people who heard him came back with stories that no one could believe without believing. I went to Montreal in the spring to hear him when he finally made it to Canada because I had every reason and not much time.

He had a beard then and a sextet that wasn't very together unless they were playing up tempo. They used to drown him out a lot and some of the time he'd forgotten the words anyway but each night he'd start with the same two songs, Danville Dame and Reason to Believe.

Sometimes those two tunes would fill out an hour of lonely joy with Hardin singing the pain in his heart and his fans clapping their hands, Hardin an unlikely looking existential hero in his pointed orange near boots bouncing up and down turning his back on the crowd announcing dedications with the desire to please. Forgetting the words to If I Were A Carpenter.

robin kenyatta's black jazz

Anyone who wants to understand the present revolution in black America ought to pay attention to Robin Kenyatta.

For the past two years, Kenyatta has been presenting a series of concerts in the black community of New York. At first he met with apathy, but gradually people began to be turned on to what he was doing.

Kenyatta's main aim is to make black people aware of their heritage and proud of their culture. Like most of the young men involved in the black revolution, Kenyatta understands that black political structures cannot become a reality until black people — and white people — have some awareness of what it is to be a black American.

Perhaps to his disadvantage, Kenyatta has been lumped in with the musicians of the so-called "new music". To old reactionaries like your grumpy reporter, the incredible, horrifying sounds of Albert Ayler and Archie Shepp et al have not encouraged hope in the "new music".

But Kenyatta is a much more "legitimate" musician than Ayler and friends. Although these radical musicians may be able to play their horns in a way that could be described as musical by a conventional musician, doubt remains. Unlike the others, Kenyatta does not scorn to play his horn in a conventional manner when it suits his purposes. In fact, he is able to play any kind of music.

Kenyatta's roots lie in jazz, which is the only native American art form, and which was invented and developed by black people. His favorite musicians are Fats Waller, Art Tatum, Eric Dolphy, and, of course, Miles Davis and John Coltrane. He has recorded with Sonny Stitt, Andrew Hill and Roswell Rudd, among others.

Next week, Kenyatta will be presenting a concert in Toronto which he calls Bold New Black Worlds: revolutionary voices, ethnic sounds, and black visions of the African cultural evolution from the negro ghettos of the U.S.

The title ought to give you an indication that this will be no ordinary presentation of straight music. Indeed, it could well be the first time in Canada that anyone has tried to achieve a total theatre effect in support of the black American point of view.

In addition to the music there will be a showing of the film, "Malcolm X." Larry Neil, who has been published in "Black Revolt", will read his poetry (not all of it), and Makeda Mayorba will present African dances.

Appearing with Kenyatta (who plays alto saxophone and flute) will be pianist Don Pullen, percussionist Rashied Ali, who played with Coltrane's last band, and bassist Walter Booker. I've seen Booker with Art Farmer and Donald Byrd, and he is an exceptionally fine musician.

The event takes place on Saturday, Nov. 2, at 8 p.m. It's at the Centennial College on 651 Warden Ave., just a block below the Warden subway station.

I urge you to go and see Kenyatta's concert, not because I have money tied up in it, but because what he has to say is important in understanding just what is happening in the United States today.

UNEQUAL UNION

Stanley Ryerson, $3.75, A Progress Book

This is my first book review since I did Restrictive Trade Practices in Canada.

I phoned up Stanley Ryerson the other night to talk to him about publishing, Canadian history, universities, and his latest book, Unequal Union. Ryerson is a persistent marxist historian of Canada who has been publishing since 1937. He discovered socialism while attending Upper Canada College, the famed Toronto Establishment school, and he's been bucking the liberal-capitalist bias of Canadian historians ever since.

I asked him why he always published through small left-wing publishing houses rather than working through larger organizations. He replied that the situation arose naturally from his work with socialist groups; roughly translated, this means he knew perfectly well that Copp Clark wouldn't touch a marxist history with a barge pole. However, he says marxism is becoming "more fashionable", and as a result excerpts from his work have recently been published in recognized anthologies of Canadian history published by major firms.

The same automatic anti-marxist bias, he says, accounts for the fact that his name and views are rarely if ever mentioned in university courses on Canadian history. Canadian academics will not even consider the possibility that the class struggle had something to do with Canadian history. Presumably he plans to redress the balance slightly in the counter-course he is offering at the Free University of Toronto.

Unequal Union studies the period 1815-1873, centering around the "people's risings" of 1837, the rise of the industrial proletariat and class conflict, and Confederation. It is well out of the mainstream of Canadian historical writing, and is probably worth reading for that reason alone. His argument, if kept in perspective, can be very thought-provoking.

Ryerson gives an interesting study of labour unrest in the decades before Confederation, a field relatively unploughed by most writers. He reveals an extent of disorder and agitation which to him marked the real beginnings of the Canadian industrial proletariat as a significant force. Other historians probably ignore this industrial strife because little of wide consequence arose out of it; Ryerson probably disagrees, but his examination of the field does open the question of why the unrest did not develop into a continuing force. Ryerson sees the strife as the beginning of a great proletariat movement, ignoring the fact that labour never has counted for too much in Canadian politics.

The author's description of

the capitalist pigs who opened up this country just goes to reinforce what we have suspected all along. Corruption and interest-peddling were the meat of politics in those days, and the gory details Ryerson supplies give valuable insights into the actual operation of the business.

This leads into the Great Confederation Plot. The drive for Confederation came from the industrial capitalists, of course, who wanted an expanded home market. Chief among these were the Evil Railroad Promoters: Alexander Galt, Georges-Etienne Cartier, and other fascists. Together with bank interests (George Brown, Cartier again, William McMaster, etc. etc.) the railroad men "engineered" the union (Ryerson's pun, not mine). No wonder the new country was undemocratic; universal suffrage was anathema to Macdonald and most of the other Fathers of Confederation.

The story ends with another people's rising (Red River, this time). The French get screwed as usual, but in the end "the peoples of the Canadas, facing the need to rectify the 'unequal union' of a colo-niaist Confederation, begin to sense the need to call in question something else as well: the social system of corporate-business rule, the unequal society of 'masters and men'."

The book includes a portrait of Karl Marx (reprinted from the Canadian Illustrated News, Dec. 16, 1871), along with various other extranea.

Ryerson does tend to look for certain things in Canadian history to support a marxist interpretation, but liberal historians exhibit the same tendency in a different direction. The difference is that Canada is and has been, for better or for worse, a liberal-capitalist society, so perhaps the liberal bias is the more relevant one.

FILM CANADA

What happens when you go through the hassle of making a 16mm. film and then find you can't distribute it?

You've got three alternatives: commit hari kari, contemplate hari kari, or set up a distribution centre.

Peter Rowe and John Hofsess, faced with this problem, opted for the latter, and formed the CFDC — Canadian Film-makers Distribution Centre.

The CFDC — known by more settled members of the film industry, as "those delinquent kids down the street", is the place where budding film-makers bud.

In Toronto, at about the time CFDC was born, Film Canada was having a hell of a time persuading Jonas Mekas, undisputed big daddie of N.Y. underground, to send them his films. It seems that Mekas, editor of Film Culture, director of American Film-makers Co-Op, and head of the N.Y. Cinematheque, distrusts commercial businesses, and consequently deals only with non-profit types.

In April, when Film Canada got wind of the CFDC, they lured its founders Rowe (Buffalo Airport Visions) and Hofsess (Redpath 25, Black Zero) to Toronto with promises of love and support, which would be in return for prints of Jonas Mekas' films.

Through a series of letters, phone calls, and visits, Hofsess assured Mekas that the CFDC was a young film co-op, full of hope and empty of pocket. Convinced that they were "o.k." people, Mekas sent up his films and those of several other N.Y. film-makers.

Armed now with a catalogue of 16 films, the CFDC opened its doors and waited for business. But all was not quiet on the home front. Rowe and Hofsess's moral integrity was being questioned by the censors; Hofsess got into the papers for stealing a camera, and Rowe was dismissed as President of the MacMaster Film Board for going over budget and producing an 'obscene' (Black Zero) film.

So, the reins of control fell into other hands. Four new directors were chosen, two of whom subsequently disappeared into the faceless mob.

The third, Jim Plaxton, defected to work for Film Canada, leaving the fourth, Bob Fothergill (Solipses, Picture Poem for Cindy), to look after business.

By now, word about the CFDC was drifting through film circles, attracting such varied people as Dick Ballentine (The Most, Mr. Pearson), Don Shebib (Summer of Love for CBC), David Sectar, (Winter Kept Us Warm), and John Straiton (Portrait of Lydia), to the fold. So in September '67, when the second catalogue was printed, it listed over fifty films.

With September came the fifth director, Iain Ewing (Picaro), who, after a scant two weeks, left for greener fields with "The Way It Is", leaving his friend, Clara Mayer, at the helm.

Clara has remained true. Now entering her second year as manageress, she has seen the CFDC through its "halcyon" days, spent in a white-on-white cubbyhole on Yonge St., between a modern dance school and yoga forum, to the more elevated accommodations of Rochdale, where "the scenery, at least, will look different."

The principles of the co-op remain the same, however: fifty-fifty split between the film-maker and distributor, but the ranks within the CFDC keep changing and growing. In June '68, CFDC's third catalogue listed over one hundred films from seventy-five film-makers.

In the cans of film that fill Clara's office are the first fumbling fingerings of many an ambitious lad, who read his McLuhan and had decided to forgo the honour of writing the Canadian novel for the hassle of making the Canadian film.

Little knowing that his efforts would be copied by Godard and Warhol, he hand-held his Bolex a la Pennebaker, and swore that he was tired of Hollywood, and wanted to make a completely unstructured film. One that "told them where it's at" and "turned them on to what's going on", etc. etc. and other such honourable aims.

Many of these films are first efforts, a fact reflected in the uneven exposures, shaky camera work, and borrowed techniques. But whatever these directors lack in technical know how they make up for in their penchant for new ideas, and their desire to push film to its limits. They want to start a "Nouvelle Vague" here in Toronto.

Most of these young film-makers (about ten hard-core, eg. Iain Ewing, Michael Hirsch, David Cronenberg) are now working on feature films. These are all shoe-string efforts; hopefully the bills will get paid, and their films will say something meaningful to us.

This ties in with the ultimate aim of the CFDC — to distribute as many films of new film-makers to as many film societies and groups as will show them, and to channel this money back to the film-makers so they may go on to make more and better films.

With this in mind, Clara Mayer sends out catalogues to all prospective viewers, holds midnight showings at the Electra, and rents films to Cinecity and university groups across Canada. Last year, Clara showed films on campus through the Centennial Film Board — a venture that just threatened to break even.

In this month's new catalogue, about twenty films have been added, and there will be more opportunities to show Canadian film, possibly at Rochdale. For until a film is seen, there can be no feedback of money, audience response, or recognition for the film-maker, and without these, there's no way Canadian film culture can exist.

CFDC would like to run an equipment rental, ideas exchange, and talent pool, into which film-makers could dip their hands and come out with a feature length film. Joined together in mutual self-interest, CFDC'ers form a film mafia. Sharing their knowledge of conmanship — the many and creative ways of tearing up monthly bills that threaten court action — and their gripes against the "them" — Film House and Kodak — has united them in a non-joiner kind of way.

Through the film network, they have fingerholds with CBC and NFB types, and tenuous though the connections might be, Cote de Liesse (NFB), Jarvis St. (CBC), and Front St. (Film House) are all part of CFDC vernacular.

Working in film in Canada may not prepare you for much, besides extortion, blackmail, arm twisting, and trips to Montreal. Nevertheless film seems to be everybody's bag today. This revival of interest in film is indicative, if anything of the preparedness of Canadian audiences to support a film industry. When the likes of John Lennon and Norman Mailer start subjecting us to their "home movies", something's got to give.

But no one in film hopes for, nor expects miracles, least of all the CFDC. They realize that the years ahead will be blight-ridden and have plans for weathering them, to emerge, to everyone's surprise, the archival home of Canadian cinema.

dialog

Dear Mike,
I read your piece on Trudeau and an excellent one it was too. I feel you really did convey a feeling to me of what its like to be Pierre, but Michael, so what? Trudeau is not Trudeau but the Prime Minister of Canada. When are people going to stop playing Confidential and realize that; I mean that's ok for the new Mrs. Onassis (except in as much as it hurts her) but Trudeau has, more than any one person in the country, the power to make life happier for a large number of unhappy people. Will he do it? That is the question.

You, Rae and I all started out supporting Trudeau. I read his book early in the campaign and dropped off the wagon. Rae now seems convinced of the master's conservatism. You, to the best of my knowledge, still support Trudeau and I hoped to find out in your article why. I know you too well (I mean we sat-in over Dow together) to accept your statement "perhaps what this country always needed is a priest, oracle, sagc, devil, whipping boy wrapped into one larger than life political figure."

Tell that to an Indian whose wife just died at twenty-five, whose plumbing is outdoor, tell it to someone sentenced to the whip (Trudeau's projected reforms left that one in), tell it to the kid imprisoned for pot no matter what section of the drug act it comes under, tell it to a pregnant woman living on $70 a month welfare, or the family paying sales taxes so the insurance companies and oil refineries can have special exemptions. Even the U.S. has a capital gains and stock transfer tax. "No new social legislation after Medicare" — Trudeau said it, I didn't. No capital gains tax, no Carter, no more federal aid to education (and there is nothing unconstitutional about aid). Cut the winter works program, the vote will stay at twenty-one, and we'll go on stalling over Biafras and making our hundreds of millions selling arms to Uncle Sam. Isn't that what we sat-in about?

You told me during the leadership campaign that Trudeau had to hold back in order to win; it's not nice but it's politics. Do YOU still think he's holding back? Do

YOU follow the Liberal party right, left or wrong so that the young Turks can someday take over and then set about change? Dammit, Ignatieff, you are one of the most sensitive, intelligent, etc. people I know; point out to me where I am wrong or forgetful or whatever. Because I am afraid that while Trudeau is busy being likeable (I find him likeable) and enigmatic, the woods may very well be burning, they just might be burning.

—bob bossin

Bob:
You cannot separate the personal style of political men from their actions. It was Johnson's vulgarity, his drawling, flabby, maudlin speech which made it impossible for him to fulfil a vital Presidential role: that of oracle for the goals and hopes of his people. Prime Ministers, Presidents and revolutionary leaders ARE priests, Bob. To be successful as leaders they must use their personalities to inspire and overwhelm enemies.
to I wrote about Trudeau's personality, Bob, in terms of the use he makes of it as a political weapon. Because he is a 'formed' personality, he cannot be intimidated by the personality pressures of 26 highly ambitious Cabinet Ministers. He can subdue them by what the Chinese philosopher called 'power in personality'.

And because he knows himself so well the presentation of image to the Canadian people can seem artless. Only when you are unsure are you self-conscious. Trudeau looks 'natural' to the Canadian people because he can react artlessly to spontaneous situations. Only clowns or Thomas More's can do that. The real man and the image he emits are one.

Why did I shy away from talking about his politics and his philosophy? Because my reading of his personality leads me to believe that any forecasting of what he will do politically is bound to be inaccurate. I honestly don't know what he is going to do.
There's another reason. To me the real issue raised by Trudeau is whether one remains within the Liberal Party or not. If you decide the political system is irrevocably condemned by human weakness and by its own procedures to irrelevant flutterings at reform then Trudeau doesn't matter much. He becomes only the most brilliant of a series of pragmatist-conservative politicians. If one accepts the system then one can decide whether to work with him or to seek others. I haven't made up my mind. But don't worry. Until I do, you won't let me sleep.

Blood, guts and peace

By BRIAN JOHNSON

Blood, guts, and skulls from cows were dumped on the front steps of Sidney Smith yesterday afternoon by a group of anti-war protesters.

The demonstration was designed as a humanitarian protest against killing in Vietnam.

Nearby first-year engineering student Andy Rippin was handing out leaflets for Saturday's march by the Committee to End the War in Vietnam.

A campus police officer stood by watching.

Two youths broke out the crowd to attack Rippin and try to push him into the cow guts.

Two other students, Rob Ewart (Spec) and David Buhler, a second year psychology student, broke up the struggle.

Ewart said the officer allowed the incident to occur by walking away from the scene.

Ewart issued the following statement to The Varsity (he said he would swear to it in court): "I heard one of two attackers ask the officer if he would mind if they threw Andy into the carcasses and blood. He said he wouldn't mind.

"I told this to Andy who went away for a moment. When he came back, the two men walked towards him. Each one grabbed one of his wrists and they started to drag him towards the mess.

"David and I each grabbed one of them ... the officer reappeared from the building and told the crowd that had gathered to break up. When I later questioned him, he denied he had allowed the fight to take place by leaving, even after I had told him what I overheard. The two men who attacked Andy refused to give their names."

When the policeman finally came back, Ewart shouted at him, "You're wearing a uniform because you're being paid to do a job and you're not doing it."

"You fucking communist," shouted one of the attackers.

"Don't call me a fucking communist," Ewart retorted.

"Oh no, communists don't fuck at all," replied the first.

Ewart denies he is a communist. He is considering contacting a lawyer to see what could be done about the policeman's action.

"But there's not much I can do about it, because it's his word against mine," he said.

The officer involved denied Ewart's allegation saying, "We didn't have to take any action.

"I just have a job down there," he said. "I try and keep the peace. That's all."

He said a plainclothes campus officer was with him at the time.

Rippin, the student attacked, said he was not too angry about the incident.

"But it makes me wonder about certain people on campus," he said.

He said he thought the blood and guts were a good idea but said the idea was not sponsored by CEWW.

Barbara Reid (IV Vic) was chosen Miss U of T during homecoming ceremonies last weekend. She is to be found around campus at modern history classes.

BLEED

For the next two weeks the Red Cross will be out to milk the campus—of hemoglobin.

At least 80 per cent of U of T students are able to give, but last year only one sixth of that potential supported the drive.

Donors will receive a button reading Be nice to me, I gave blood, and each pint will be credited to the donor's college or faculty.

A trophy—the Carling Cup—is awarded to the college or faculty giving the most blood on a per capita basis. Last year Dents barely nosed out the Engineers.

First clinics are at St. Michael's College Monday and Trinity on Tuesday.

A funny thing happened in the Peruvian jungle

Some years ago, an adventurous individual from The Coca-Cola Company pushed his way a hundred and fifty miles into the jungle outside Lima, Peru. His mission, for promotional purposes, was to introduce Coca-Cola to the primitive Indians. Deep in the bush, he flushed a likely-looking woman, and, through his interpreter, explained his errand, whereupon the woman reached into a sack she was carrying and neatly plucked forth a bottle of Coke, and offered him a swig. Strange to think that, even in the depths of the Peruvian jungle, things go better with the taste of Coke.

Both Coca-Cola and Coke are registered trade marks which identify only the product of Coca-Cola Ltd.

What did you learn in religious studies 300 today?

By GEOFFREY MEGGS

About 100 students enrolled in Religious Studies 300 at Victoria College marched to Queen's Park Wednesday to protest Nigeria-Biafra and demand an immediate United Nations ceasefire.

They wanted the Canadian government to press for a ceasefire and to begin an investigation into the delay of relief flights.

At Queen's Park the marchers were welcomed by about 30 members of the Nigeria-Biafra committee sitting-in in support of the takeover of Mitchell Sharp's office.

Monday afternoon MPP Stephen Lewis, recently returned from Biafra, spoke in Prof. R.M. Freeman's Religious Studies 300 class (entitled contemporary problems in religion and ethics).

Prof. Freeman said he invited Mr. Lewis because students were concerned about the problem and wanted to discuss it.

"Mr. Lewis made a strong case for action and between Monday and Wednesday a spontaneous student committee thought of the petition and introduced the idea in class," he went on.

"Our action is humanitarian in the true sense of the word," said Ron Archer (III Vic) who proposed the march. "We must work through the march and hope to get a response."

A majority of the class agreed on the march Wednesday morning, and the group gathered on the steps of Old

RK 300 students leave Vic for Queen's Park

Vic at 4 p.m. to vote on the placards.

The students turned down a sign reading "Relief is not Enough" on the grounds that a desire for military aid was implied. "We want Canada to propose a ceasefire in the United Nations," said John Cameron (III SMC). "This has nothing to do with arms."

Students participating in the march did so out of a desire to take a more active stand.

"This is more of a moral problem than a political one for most of us," said Gwen Sweet (III Vic). "I didn't believe what was happening until I heard Lewis."

The demonstration was over by 5 p.m., and the class has nothing additional planned.

More than 1300 tickets have been sold for the Population Explosion, which will begin tonight at Varsity Arena. Students can get into the three-day teach-in by buying a $2.00 ticket. Available at the door.

Varsity Waterpolo Blues begin Saturday the intercollegiate season with an exhibition game against RMC. Although probable starters will be Alen Leroy, Andy Hackett, and Hunter Milborne, who will join veterans Chris McNaught, Dave Breech, and Skip Bergman, Coach Otto Demjen plans to let all the rookies show themselves in competition. # Rugger team ready

First place is up for grabs come noon tomorrow when Varsity rugger Blues play host to Western Mustangs in an Eastern Division showdown. The two teams met last year in their section of the OQAA championship with Blues the eventual winners.

Both teams have already met the other three teams — McMaster, Waterloo and Guelph — in the east and their scoring records are amazingly similar.

Blues are 81-3 in their three games including last week's close 9-0 decision over McMaster. Western rolled over Guelph 20-3 in their last outing and have a 71-6 for-and-against total to date.

Tomorrow's contest shapes up as a grudge match following last year's exciting 11-6 Blues' win. In that game, Varsity scored five points in the dying moments of play to take the title and consummate an unbeaten season. However, this year's returnees have not forgotten the fact that no less than three of their teammates were knocked out of the game with injuries.

Blues' big offensive guns so far have been Anthony Pierre, Dave Phibbs, Scott McClure Andy Gibson and captain George Wraw. All five are ready willing and healthy for whatever Mustangs hurl their way.

Varsity seconds will also be placing an unblemished record on the line when they meet the Western backup unit in the second match. The play of Blues' Andy Cairns this season has been as exciting as that of any individual on any of the Toronto teams and is well worth seeing.

The first game commences at 12 noon on the back campus with the game of the "bridesmaids" following at 1:30 p.m.

If football is violence, rugger is war. Not only do competitors in the latter sport play sons pads, but the ball is alive even when it hits the ground. The result is depicted above.

Blues soccer York 8-0

Varsity soccer Blues overwhelmed York University with a decisive 8-0 victory on Wednesday but the score is very misleading. It could easily have been as high as 12 or 13.

The crew from York, although eager, lacked many of the finer points of the game of soccer. Conditioning, fundamental skills and positional play were all but lacking from the York side. Only one man knew what he was doing and the poor chap, the goalkeeper of all people, was buried under a 40 shot barrage from Blues' forward line.

Jim Lefkos had four goals to lead Blues attack while Graham Shiels (his first), Ken Cancellara, John Gero and regular goalkeeper Bernie D'Abreau added singletons.

Pursuant to the article in Wednesday's Varsity entitled "Football First Aid. Injuries Everywhere," The Athletic Directorate wishes to express its concern over the increasing incidents of bottle-throwing at Saturday football games. This is a dangerous practice which hopefully can best be curbed by mature "university" students themselves.

Coach Ernie Glass, with the score 6-0 at the half, shifted the team around so that the forward line played defence and vice versa.

Blues' next game is Saturday when they host Western Mustangs at noon on the back campus. The game is a big one since 'Stangs are unbeaten while Blues have lost one.

Korner Kicks . . . Blues will be without Frank Soppelsa who has a previous engagement. Eric Sereda is still sidelined with the flu but it is hoped that he will be able to play.

Students starve here too

by ANGELA SHENG

"Food for Life, Not Arms for War" reads one of the placards demonstrators are holding in front of the Ontario Legislature at Queen's Park.

Students from Toronto universities and high-schools Wednesday began a three-day fast protesting government inaction in the face of starvation in Biafra.

The 40 protestors want the Canadian government to arrange a ceasefire between Biafra and Nigeria through the United Nations.

Nick Decarlo (IV APSC) is fasting, because "I'm living here and they are dying there in Biafra."

"How did the people on the street react to us? An old lady told us to do something more worthwhile like go back to school and get educated."

"She is living and she probably fears her own death, but not the deaths of the ten million people in Biafra," said Alberto Di Giovanni (II SMC).

Wednesday the protestors tried to spend the night in Nathan Phillips Square in front of City Hall, but police told them to go away, because they didn't have a permit to use the square.

"They slept overnight on a platform in the basement of the St. Paul's Church."

"It kept us warm all right," said Gary Webster (SGS). SAC president Steve Langdon said the SAC executive would show their support by fasting today.

Tonight as a finale to their three-day fast the group will meet the 26 Parliament Hill delegation. Then they will head for Nathan Phillips Square for an Ibo sing-song celebration.

around campus and through Soldier's Tower.

The march could not continue to Hillel House because organizers had not obtained police permission in advance to march on the streets, said Abe Pesses (IV UC).

The procession halted at Hart House where students, biary-eyed from the now-smoking torches, sang and listened to a reading of Yev-tushenko's poem, Babi Yar, which commemorates a German massacre of Russian Jews.

Earlier in the week, the present plight of Soviet Jewry was described by Dr. Allen Pollack of the University of Pittsburgh, who spoke to a packed crowd.

"Now that more non-Jews are in university than before, this trend will make Jews into second-class citizens in economic terms as well as cultural."

"How can you sit back and say nothing in face of this cultural pogrom?" he asked.

SUDDEN DEATH!!

"I spent two years in Biafra with CUSO," said Osborne. "I saw refugees bringing back the heads of relatives slaughtered in the north. There were three hospitals in Ennigo (former capital of Biafra). All were filled with mutilation cases."

Some Ottawa citizens have shown their concern. People have donated blankets and sleeping bags.

OR-ELSE SITUATION FOR GRID BLUES

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

There is something magical about the very word "sudden-death". It sends shivers down your spine, you start to shake a bit, and your blood runs cold.

No tomorrow dawns for the loser to recoup his previous day's mistakes. Produce or die.

Sudden-death.

Which is a pretty macabre way of introducing Saturday's football game at Varsity Stadium. Western Mustangs are the opposition for a game that aptly deserves the "sudden-death" label.

Both teams trot out onto the gridiron tomorrow (what is a gridiron, anyway?) faced with the haunting spectre of elimination from the Yates Cup trophy race.

Blues have to win all their remaining games to cop the Cup, while Mustangs must do ment hill with the protestors and several Members of Parliament. Mitchell Sharp was invited by the demonstrators and said he would attend if he had time.

Caplan was displeased because Sharp refused to tell what the government is doing about the Biafra issue.

"After Prime Minister Trudeau's extraordinary statements and the government's fuzing of the issue, we cannot accept Sharp's word that something is being done."

"If he had just told us one or two courses of action, we would have packed our bags, taken the next train and started to eat again."

The sit-in will continue until tomorrow night.

CHOOSE YOUR MARCH

The Toronto protestors will arrive at Union Station at 10:10 p.m.

They hope to be met by sympathizers.

"Have people meet us at the station," said Caplan. He paled and smiled. "Have them welcome the mar-tyrs home with huge baskets of food."

The Toronto protestors will arrive at Union Station at 10:10 p.m. They hope to be met by sympathizers. "Have people meet us at the station," said Caplan. He paled and smiled. "Have them welcome the mar-tyrs home with huge baskets of food."

Western's attack is built around the strong passing arms of quarterbacks Joe Cipparone and Kevin St. Michael. And, unfortunately, aerial defense has been Blues' biggest weakness so far this year.

To add to coach Ron Murphy's misery, whizzy half-back Walt Seir will be absent from the lineup again. He suffered strained knee ligaments in Tuesday night's practice.

The two teams have already ground arm pits once this season in an exhibition game. Blues were mauled by a fourth-quarter horror show, 29-21.

Varsity quarterback Vic Alboini, who passed so brilliantly against Mac last Saturday, will have a slightly tougher time tomorrow (alternation). Western coach John Metras has been crowing all year about his defensive backfield as the best the SIFL has seen in decades. Unfortunately, of Jawn could well be right for a change. His team has 11 interceptions after only four games.

Metras has also been forcing various roving reporters to eat their words, after hoh-umming his switch to a passing attack. ("They laughed when I said we'd go through the air.") Stangs have thrown and completed more passes for more yards than any team in the league.

If Blues hope to stop Western, it is imperative for them to come up with a rip-roaring pass rush. The play of middle guard Bill Bennett and the front four of Jim Bennett, Ylo Korngemag, Peter Van Bodgom and Alex Squires will probably decide the outcome.

Blues by six.

ITI: great anger and sorrow

By LARRY HAIVEN

At the last session of the Teach-In, after all the speeches had been made and host of the people had left, somebody asked an unobtrusive question of Donald C. MacDonald, the chairman of the session and a federal cabinet minister.

"As Canadians, we have always been known as apathetic, and we have always felt the inability to influence our government in matters of great importance. What can we do, Mr. MacDonald, to influence you and your colleagues in Ottawa about the population problem?"

MacDonald muttered something about trying as hard as possible to do something and then he said that our responsibility lay in convincing the people who didn't believe to come over to our side.

By the time he was finished, nobody was listening. It was the most significant moment of the Teach-In.

Somebody had asked Lamont Cole the same sort of question earlier. They asked what could be done to effectively we get the wealthy industrialists to alleviate the pollution problem that they themselves had produced.

Cole, who had given perhaps one of the most passionate invectives against the laying to waste of our natural habitat, spoke out and said that many things could be done, but that it would cost an enormous investment of capital at first.

Then, in the only time he became outright angry, he said, "But I don't think they're going to do it unless someone tells them to."

I had the edifying experience of working for the Ontario Water Resources Commission two summers ago and I learned about the main frustration in a government agency whose prime job it is to stop the pollution of our water resources. For most of the big companies, it is economically much more feasible to pay the fines, no matter how large they be, than to foot the expense of building a plant to refine the wastes. And so they pollute and pay the fines. And the Commission manages only to close down those small firms who cannot afford it.

On the problem of population perhaps the most thought-provoking speech was made by Brewster Kneen, a resource person at Rochdale college, who spoke on "The Imperialism of Population Control".

He defined imperialism as "any intentional or unintentional imposition of one group's values on another group."

And he also reminded us of something that we often forget in our fervent and often gutless willingness to help people of other countries. "Sometimes," he said, "Isn't it charity just to leave someone alone?"

Which brings to mind the fact that missionary zeal and rushing over to India to solve her problems isn't the answer. There are more than enough people in India who know more than well exactly how to solve India's problems. The answer is... well what is the answer? Nobody seemed to know. Share the wealth, said George Borgstrom, a food technologist, in the angriest speech of the Teach-In on Saturday. Okay, but as individuals we can only give what we own. As countries, only our government can give on behalf of the whole country.

But our government can't even give food to Biafra without worrying about involving itself in a war "like the United States in Vietnam."

Perhaps one of the most relevant aspects of the Teach-In was demonstrated time and time again Saturday morning, a session which dwelt not on limiting the hungry Asians and Africans who will soon, when and if they get the power, be knocking at our doors. June Callwood and Brewster Kneen spoke about getting rid of our negative attitude towards creation and finding the bringing of life to the world, an occasion for rejoicing and love, not squalor and hate.

George Carstairs, a psychiatrist made his most significant point about us affluents right here. He told that throughout history, there arose "millennial cults", preaching love and brotherhood. These groups grew and often acquired unbalanced leaders. As their strength grew, the establishment of the time reacted and tried to stop them. The groups then became disillusioned with the love and brotherhood idea and began to react.

Bloodshed and death inevitably followed. Carstairs ended his speech with no conclusion except to note that the cry of the young protestors today is no longer, "Flower Power", but "Kill The Pig!"

The events of the weekend, the Teach-In and the anti-war demonstrations, for those who went to both, perhaps was one of the most significant of their lives. It brought up perhaps more questions than one could ask in a lifetime. It brought a feeling of great humility and a feeling of hopelessness. It brought a feeling of great anger and of unbearable sadness. Many people broke down and cried as the police horses crashed their way through the mobs of people. Many people gritted their teeth as Lamont Cole spoke of the pollution that industrial firms dump into our atmosphere unheeding of a government that they appear, to all intents and purposes, to control.

Alice Cowan, Secretary of the Family Planning Federation of Canada, came to the microphone Sunday afternoon and read a poem she had composed and scribbled on a piece of paper:

Please? Yes, Not done.
Please? Yes, Not done.
Too many other things to do.

Toronto cops earned the badge of "pigs" this weekend

They weren't the Chicago kind of pigs with clubs, not yet, but rest assured the police state has come to Toronto.

It is hard to believe that Toronto cops would deliberately provoke demonstrators at the anti-Vietnam rally outside the United States consulate Saturday afternoon, provoke them enough that the cops could Bust It Up.

But how else do you explain arresting people just for trying to speak?

How else do you explain that only anti-war protesters were arrested when right and left-wing elements skirmished? Why were the Edmund Burke Society people let go?

How else do you explain police on horses charging into the demonstrators "to clear a path for pedestrians", when such a path already existed. The path only ceased to exist when the marchers gathered to protest the arrests.

The cops broke up a peaceful demonstration, without provocation. Why? Orders from higher up? Obviously, since the American consulate has apparently become sacred territory.

But there was more to it than that. The cops were too well-organized, too slick (see Bob Bossin's article on page five). They were going to break that demonstration up no matter what, and they did. As practice.

Practice for the anti-riot training the Toronto cops are going through now. And that is why Toronto cops are pigs.

The club-swinging wasn't there, but the intention was. And in the meantime, the Toronto cops used a peaceful demonstration as a dry run for the other kind.

We can expect more of the other kind from now on. Because the Toronto cops are pigs.

And the only language a pig understands is violence.

It'll come

pigs

On Friday Waterloo students did something U of T students should have done long ago. They conferred a degree on a pig as their university conferred an honorary doctor of law on our Chancellor O. M. Solandt.

Not that Solandt is a pig. He is a human being, a human being who wants Canada to make money manufacturing war material.

Solandt, if you recall, is the one who urged last year that Canada become a world leader in producing equipment for triphibious warfare. He has also been director-general of defense research and chairman of the Defense Research Board.

As such, he shouldn't be getting a degree, or be Chancellor of a University. He should be in jail along with all those who support war to make a profit.

— MacRae

pigs

The teach-in on the population explosion was worth it, if only for one piece of information. In 20 years, if industrialization continues at its present pace, we'll all die of oxygen starvation.

It seems we're dumping too much of our human and industrial waste into our lakes and rivers, destroying too many forests, ploughing up too many grasslands for subdivisions. And since plants (even microscopic ocean plants) produce oxygen, we're slowly killing off our oxygen supply.

But I guess that's the price you pay for making a buck. Let's hope the industrialists enjoy themselves in the next 20 years, with the money they make killing our atmosphere.

letters- "We deplore leadership"

We deplore the actions of the police at Saturday's demonstrations. But we also deplore the manner in which the demonstrations were led.

The major organizers of the marches advertised them as part of an international protest against U.S. presence in Vietnam. Instead of focusing on this, the marches became attempts to challenge police at Yonge St., and right-wingers with police at the Consulate, to physical battle.

We object to this diversion for two reasons: It turns the major attention away from the burning and central issue — the U.S. murder in Vietnam; second, by deliberately forcing a mainly artificial confrontation with the police, it helped give the police commission the excuse it will need to justify the real brutality which we believe they are preparing against students, workers, and peace demonstrators.

All of us who are fighting for peace must prevent Canadian police from following their American counterparts in violence. There will be ample opportunity for direct confrontation. Fabricated confrontations now can only confuse the issue. Future plans for the peace movement must be closely scrutinized by all concerned.

Police stage dress rehearsal for . . . ?

By BOB BOSSIN

The first draft of these comments began as a neutral assessment of the actions of police and demonstrators outside of the American Consulate on Saturday. It did not remain neutral however.

I find the actions of the Toronto police deplorable, and it would be unfair to the reader to try and mask this feeling with a biased choice of incidents and examples. There was no reason for 34 arrests, a number that would indicate a sizeable riot, or would have in the days before the mass knowledge of the American use of riot control techniques to quell non-violent demonstrations.

What happened on Saturday demands serious analysis for it showed "it can happen here" — not that it did, or that it must, but that it can, and appears almost likely to.

There can be no mistake made that Saturday's demonstration was a dress rehearsal for the "new" police problem. The escalation was too smooth, the operation of stopping the protest too successful for it to have been a simple response to a situation.

First the police acted as a barrier — not even an unfriendly barrier — between the "Win with Wallace" counter-demonstrators and the marchers. This is the normal and expected practice. Police quickly stopped a minor scuffle between one of the protesters and one of the Edmund Burke Society.

The first sign of an unusual response was when the protestor was summarily frisked and arrested. This elicited the first cop booing, a reaction that was not unjust. (It was perhaps intensified by the fact that the Edmund Burke man was not arrested.)

Then, as was announced, one of the speakers began to talk through the megaphone from one of the square planters on the sidewalk. A senior policeman told him formally to stop, as the speaker was causing a disturbance by gathering a crowd which was blocking the sidewalk. The gathered protesters then shifted so as to leave a lane of sidewalk free, as is done by queues outside movie-houses. The speaker was then arrested, as was the next and the next.

POLICE ESCALATION

The escalation by police continued; the protesters were told to keep moving, although police blocked several directions. Then some officers demanded the sidewalks be cleared while others pushed those on the road back on to the side-walk, and still others told those on the grass to keep off. It was a frustrating Scylla and Charybdis situation.

It is difficult to describe what followed unemotionally. There were a constant stream of protesters being carried and dragged along the street and thrown bodily in to the police wagons. Then mounted police road out from behind a building, formed up and on the sidewalk and rode into the crowd. The policemen were carrying long riding crops. While I did not see them used (in a non-reportorial way I was running in the other direction) the CFTO news showed one mounted policeman swinging about furiously.

Next I observed, from the relative safety of a planter, some 60 to a 100 police marching towards us from about two blocks south. This seemed to be a good time to leave.

The horses were now being used to keep the marchers split; those nearest the Consulate were blocked from moving north, and those of us in the north, where the attempt to speak had been made, were not allowed to go south. One girl was not allowed to return to the march site to pick up her umbrella.

It is commendable that little — though a little — blood was shed, although this is certainly a sad sort of commendation to have to fish for. Nonetheless, it is apparent that the police here approach public dissent in the same way as the police in New York, California or that other city, and that freedom to speak or have access to the streets — indeed the law — doesn't mean a horse's ass. Or rather I supposed it does mean a horse's ass.

DRESS REHEARSALS

For the demonstrators as well, Saturday became a dress rehearsal.

You learn quickly how to hide between cars when the horses come, how to squirm through a crowd; and you also learn that playing fair may not be enough.

I think you have to feel the chill of hearing someone yell "horses" and then turn to see them pulling at the reins on the sidewalk of our own University Avenue to comprehend this. At first I was embarrassed to chant too loudly as we marched down, but shouting "THE STREETS BELONG TO THE PEOPLE" came naturally at the end. The name-calling follows provocation not vice-versa, despite what you may hear on the CBC.

As I have said there was little blood: the frightening question is, if there had been, would I be yelling "pig", would non-violent I pick up a rock to try and stop someone like me from getting whupped with a riding crop. The real fear I have now is that within the year I will know the answer.

This is important to note, because of the tendency to congratulate ourselves because, "it didn't happen like Chicago". In fact it did, it is just that the rest of the black week is left to come.

At the first meeting, indeed on the first two days of the Chicago convention, the blood did not flow. The police formed up (as they did here) and removed their badges (as they did here) They made arrests (fewer than 34) and they denied protesters the right to use the streets. As was done on Saturday. In Chicago, on the third day, the next step in the escalation was tear gas.

It is worth noting that I am referring only to the University Avenue march. The only knowledge I have of the other group who tried to march onto Yonge St. is from the CFTO news film clip. It looked uncomfortably like the scene in Dr. Zhivago in which the Workers' Peaceful Demonstration found themselves faced down by a wall of mounted Cossaks. It reminded my friend, on whose set I watched the Metro final, of Selma.

varsity goofed again?

I would be grateful if you would let me reply to two criticisms made against me in Wednesday's Varsity. Part of the misunderstanding derives from the standard of reporting by Varsity staff.

1. Mr. Hay and the G.S.U. "Referendum". The G.S.U. Executive called for a mandate at registration to support their policy of S.A.C. withdrawal. However the Varsity called it a "referendum". There is a distinction. A referendum implicitly carries an official sanction, so that the result is automatically officially policy. The G.S.U. constitution has no provision for legal referendums. A mandate is a call for support for certain policies to test whether the executive has the confidence of the majority of graduate students on a certain policy.

There have been accusations that we, to use Mr Hay's term, "conned" the graduate students at registration. That we duped 1,949 students to vote for a certain party line. There is a simple way to ridicule this assertion: to offer to deduct the votes in the mandate of people who later felt misled by the G.S.U. actions. Nobody has replied to my offer of October 2nd and I repeat it now in case anybody did not read that front-page story.

Mr. Hay ends by commenting that S.A.C. stands in sharp contrast to the G.S.U. in the way it deals with important issues. He is indeed quite correct. The G.S.U. put out a survey last Spring requesting graduate students viewpoints on the Graduate School, the University, and the role that was expected of a graduate organization. I wonder how often S.A.C. has asked Mr. Hay's opinion, before taking any action?

2. "Booze for Sure", was your caption over a story about the Teaching Assistants' Association Conference and Seminar. Your interviewer phoned me on Tuesday night to obtain a place at the conference, and said nothing about writing a story. Indeed I was unable to tell him the exact rooms in Sidney Smith Hall that were to be used (as there are twelve, and they have four digit numbers). However, I did describe the location of the room in which the conference will begin (2102). If requested I could have easily obtained the complete information and phoned back. So the statement "They don't know exactly where it will be held (somewhere) in Sidney Smith it is rumoured" is plain bad journalism.

I think you should institute a code of ethics for your reporters. Each interviewer should ask explicit permission to publish any comments that have been made. This would restrict the number of times you can be facetious but it would aid objective reporting. At least, when Radio Varsity phones one can hear the recording device attached to the phone and can direct one's remarks accordingly.

post-mortem

No doubt there will be varied verbal post mortems on the results of last Saturday's anti-Vietnam War demonstrations. Many people are drawing parallels with other student demonstrations, notably Paris and Chicago violence as a voice is finally catching up with Canada. Others claim that there has been a greater polarization of view that will force confrontation and submerge dialogue in comparison with the October demonstration last year.

The march this year differed greatly from last year's. Aims were ill-defined. Although many people knew why they as individuals were demonstrating, few were aware of what the demonstration was to accomplish.

Organization was lacking. Last year the demonstrators controlled their own ranks. This year we allowed the police to do it for us. Hence closer contact with the police and an increased possibility for violent confrontation were a result which we, the demonstrators, permitted.

What is the next step? If we continue without consideration of and agreement of our ends and means, then mass violence will be inevitable. Will this help or hurt the influence which we are trying to achieve? What will be the effects upon public opinion, especially among members of the working class with whom students share common problems? Perhaps the possibility for peaceful change is now dying, or perhaps it never existed.

Gals gyrate for bids at Skule slave auction

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

The engineers stood erect with excitement.

They were cheering for the girl in the snug black jersey who was dancing on the lab desk in front of 800 engineers packed into a room which legally holds (according to fire regulations) about 250.

She was writhing to the sounds generated by the Lady Godiva Memorial Band at the Engineers' annual slave auction to raise money for the United Appeal.

Her name is Sylvia Peters. She is a second year artsie, general. And she had every engineer in the room panting. She gyrated and rotated and when the raucous crowd yelled "We want skin," she slowly inched her black jersey out of purple hip-hugger slacks.

The engineers howled for more. But that was all she was prepared to do — even for charity.

She managed to raise over $100 herself, though, by being auctioned twice to the raving mob.

Her fate now lies in the hands of those Skulemen who pooled their money to buy her name, and phone number.

She was only one of the twenty-five nubile young maidens who put their bodies up for auction for the sake of charity.

To the shouts of "Pull up the skirt" and "jump up and down" these girls were auctioned off to raise close to $550.

Some of the girls danced while others just stood, petrified by the hundreds of eyes gawking at them from the lusty audience.

For those boys who were unable to buy their dream girl, the engineers are also selling computer dating forms at the Engineering stores, behind the Mechanical Building, and at the SAC office, front campus.

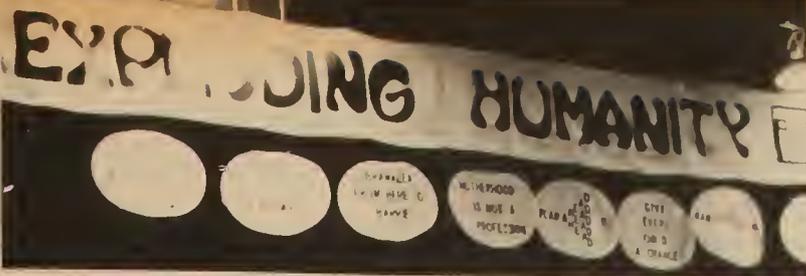

The forms cost one dollar and all proceeds go to the United Appeal.

Computer Dating, an annual event, is climaxed by a dance on Nov. 14. Those who buy forms get to go free, with their ideal computer date. (Others have to pay, and miss all the fun.)

Stycos advocates birth control for Latin America's economy

By PAUL MACRAE

International agencies should be set up to assist nations wanting population control, the director of the International Population Program at Cornell University said yesterday.

J. Mayone Stycos said that while international agencies cannot set goals for nations, "they can assist nations in reaching these goals."

He stressed that population control was the most effective way of improving Latin America's economic picture.

"Given a social structure which generates economic growth with painful slowness," he said, "the extremely rapid contemporary rates of population growth (in Latin America) can only be viewed as an expensive luxury."

Stycos strongly condemned Pope Paul's encyclical banning birth control, especially as it applies to Latin America. He added that while Catholic authorities in South America seemed to offer cautious support for the encyclical, middle class women ignored it and many lower class women had never even heard of it.

"When professional women are willing, in small countries with even smaller professional classes, to speak out publicly and semi-publicly, with intensity and frankness, it means that something real and important has happened to professional Latin American women in this decade, and that their freedom from certain ancient religious and sexual tabus is becoming a reality."

Stycos described three obstacles to birth control programs in Latin America:

- The cult of machismo, which ostensibly drives the South American man to have a child a year to prove his virility. Stycos said this was mainly a myth, that most Latin American couples want no more than three or four children.

- Ideology: the South American conservatives oppose birth control for religious and economic reasons (more people equals more profits); the revolutionary Marxists fear birth control will moderate evils which might lead to revolution. Stycos said the middle-road social reformers are coming to recognize that birth control will not jeopardize reform.

- The Catholic Church. Stycos concluded that changing the Church's attitudes toward sex and birth control could be "perhaps the last chance the Christian Churches will have for a meaningful unity."

Let conscience decide morality..Dupre

By SUSAN REISLER

"Catholics ought to cooperate actively in making birth control available to their neighbors in need," Dr. Louis Dupre told the Teach-In audience Saturday morning.

In trying to reconcile the Catholic's position in regard to the Pope's Humanae Vitae encyclical, the American Catholic philosopher emphasized "that the believer should give his assent only when he can do so without violating his intellectual integrity."

"It is intellectually not justified to give an absolute assent where one knows the possibility of error exists."

— Dr. Dupre said the ultimate norm of morality for all men ought to be their conscience.

"All intrinsic moral norms ought to be considered carefully, but they do not replace individual moral judgment."

Dr. Dupre said Catholics should not oppose legislation dealing with the population explosion problem.

"Religious freedom demands more than non-interference with a non-existent freedom," he said. "It includes giving a choice to those who had no choice and even making accessible information of which they might not even have suspected the existence."

— The Catholic Church agrees with birth control; it is the means which must still be considered.

Why should this personal dissent of a relatively small minority be a reason for depriving the poor and underprivileged from the right of practising their own freedom?"

Are proponents imperialists?

By AGI LUKACS

The Imperialism of Population Control is the title of Brewster Kneen's contribution to the Teach-In — a mind-teasing speech which questioned the basic assumptions of population limitation.

Kneen, a resource person at Rochdale, used New Left lingo — and delivered an unstructured speech which the audience found difficult to distill into a meaningful message.

— "Vastly improved birth control information and equipment ought to be available to everyone, without cost or restriction, in the same way as chest X-rays are now, and paid for out of public funds."

But population size is not a value-free technical matter.

The counsel of experts should not be taken at face value, Kneen continued. We must ask if the authorities who talk about the necessity of birth control speak for the rich or for the poor, what color they are and what their class background is.

Are the proponents of birth control "nations or political groups who have reasons to fear large numbers of people ... those concerned with the survival of special interests?"

Are they, in other words, imperialists? Kneen defines imperialism as the intentional or unintentional imposition of one group's values, or social intent, on another.

"The Alliance for Progress set the desirable growth rate of the Gross National Product for developing South American countries at 2.5 per cent while citing four per cent for industrial economies," he pointed out.

"If we're not concerned with redistribution of wealth," says Kneen, "we're insincere".

The problem may not be population size at all but the structure of the world economy and national economies and the distribution of wealth, he feels.

"Population control must be examined within the context of political or natural resource control."

Birth control aim - mental health

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

Toronto journalist and author, June Callwood added a touch of feminine emotionality to the Teach-In Saturday morning.

Rather than discuss actual physical family planning, Miss Callwood spoke of mental and emotional family planning.

"Civilization's most sophisticated advance, it appears, is this — that wretched, wrecked adults are free to wreck babies," she said.

Miss Callwood pointed out that the only criterion for parenthood is fertility regardless of "desire, preparation, competence or sanity."

"In this country, the definition of mother is a functioning uterus," she said.

And even then, many babies are unwanted.

"Evidence of this is found in those countries which permit unlimited abortion on demand, where abortions promptly exceeded the birthrate," Miss Callwood stated.

Miss Callwood did not see abortion as a total solution but she did suggest either a "d and c" or "distribution of birth control devices" to those women who want them, without society's interference.

"Many say unlimited distribution of birth control devices and permitting legal abortions on demand would tear the fabric of our society, destroy decency and goodness.

"I submit that the fabric of our society is in rags, and decency and goodness are having a steep time of it," she said.

The audience immediately burst into applause.

Canada bears "the burdens of the developed countries," Miss Callwood stated.

"We have adults so hassled that their life-loving instincts are pounded flat, prisons and mental hospitals bursting with the lonely, sick and angry, a generation of teenagers who commit the partial suicide of alcohol, drugs, promiscuous sex and violence as a technique for enduring their existence."

Miss Callwood's "simple start to unravel this mess" is to "guarantee that every baby born will receive loving care."

"It could not prevent the big disasters of death, illness, deformity," she said ... but the baby could go forth into whatever fate decides armed against total collapse with the one weapon that matters, the hallelujah of feeling safe in the human race."

From this, Miss Callwood envisioned "that people who feel good about themselves feel good about strangers, and hostility and loneliness would lift."

Progress? or extinction?

By DOUG MURRAY

"What is now popularly known as progress begins to look very much like the path to extinction," Dr. Lamont C. Cole, professor of Zoology and Ecology at Cornell University, told the International Teach-In Friday night.

"Industrialization creates pollution like engine exhaust, radio-active waste, junk yards and garbage, he said.

Dr. Cole has calculated that for the year 1966 the United States replaced less than 60 per cent of the oxygen it consumed. For the rest, it was dependent on oxygen produced outside its borders — a characteristic of highly industrialized nations.

Erroll Barrow, the Prime Minister of Barbados explained his country's position on this problem. "Small countries such as Barbados can only gain prosperity by intensive industrialization, and it is necessary to cultivate forest land," he said.

"Technology could deal with these problems but the remedies are considered too expensive," said Dr. Cole. Diverting $5 billion from the United States' space program would not adequately finance a crash program against pollution."

Dr. Lamont C. Cole

Swedes control births

By AGI LUKACS

An evaluation of Sweden's population policy is worthwhile because Sweden can be viewed as a model both for Canada and the world in this field.

As Dr. Thorsten Sjovall told the Teach-In, Sweden has had a definite population policy since the 1930's.

There have been financial subsidies aiming at family support and also programs to limit the birthrate.

"Growing opinion", said Dr. Sjovall, "holds that of legal restrictions on advertising and selling of contraceptives (1938); Sweden's becoming the first and only country to have legally compulsory sex education in public schools (1956); and liberalization of abortion laws.

"It is rightly assumed Sweden would hesitate to advocate policies or methods for any other country that she would not be prepared to adopt at home . . . the Swedish approach to these matters is comparatively soundly founded on ideological and humanitarian considerations."

"Planned parenthood is an integrated part of any development programme", and presently makes up 12 per cent of our total foreign aid budget.

"It would be rather unrealistic and indeed illogical to attempt to promote economic development without an accompanying effort to reduce births", he concluded.

"The importance of planned parenthood . . . has been grossly and propagandistically exaggerated as an outstanding remedy against the so-called population explosion."

The Swedish National Board of Health and Welfare last year approved more than 90 per cent of the 10,000 applications it received, requesting abortions, noted Dr. Sjovall. However, he cautioned, foreigners who came to Sweden for abortions, generally found themselves part of the ten per cent who were refused.

eventual under - population problems (which Canada also has) should be solved by immigration rather than by stepping up national birth rates."

The other side of the population policy was begun in 1933 by the Swedish voluntary planned parenthood movement.

Results include: the repeal

Women biological tools in Egypt

By WANETTA LAMWATT

Family planning would allow a woman to maintain her status as a person instead of being a biological tool, an Egyptian birth control expert said at the Teach-In's Saturday session.

But, added Mrs. Aziza Hussein, delegate to the United Nations Commission on the status of women, present concern over family planning results not from concern over women's personal well-being, but "from the fact that the pressure of growing population has begun to hamper their national development."

The status of the Egyptian woman, she said, derives to a great extent only from her childbearing potential.

It is the woman's lack of education and ambition that is found in most developing countries which makes acceptance of family planning unlikely, she said.

Traditions of early marriage, of segregation from men in the barem and of Moslem family law, have all led to the Egyptian woman's status being to a great extent dependent on her childbearing potential only.

Education would bring "a new concept of self" making possible the acceptance of new values such as family planning.

Canadian policy.. 'The Great Abstainer'

HERE AND NOW

By HARRIET KIDECKEL

A combination of humour and seriousness characterized Hugh Keenleyside's address on "Canada's Foreign Policy in Relation to Human Numbers" at the Teach-In Sunday night.

Keenleyside said Canada has "no policy except a sort of dumb but obstinate resistance to doing anything or even of encouraging others to do what was and is obviously necessary" in the problem of world population.

"This is one of the reasons Canada became known in United Nations circles as 'the great abstainer'," said Keen-leyside, chairman of the B.C. Hydro and Power Authority.

"The title had no relationship to the social habits of our delegates," he added.

"In 1966, 12 heads of state presented . . . a declaration urging immediate and effective action be taken to deal with world population" and Canada's Prime Minister did not sign.

"In 1967, U Thant established a Trust Fund for Population Activities and invited governments, organizations and individuals to contribute. Within a year eleven governments had responded, providing just under a million dollars.

"But nothing came from Canada," Keenleyside pointed out.

Keenleyside foresaw as "horrible" solutions such as sterilization or "deciding to let the babies be born and get rid of them afterwards," possibly being necessary in the future.

"Nuclear weapons could wipe out all humanity and population growth if unchecked will make life unbearable," he said.

"The bomb and the womb must both be controlled."

The more practical solutions Keenleyside offered to Canada numbered five:

- "we should insist Parliament wipe out the imbecile prohibition of birth-control that has stained our criminal code. It is violated a million times a day.

- "we should assist those who are trying to change ecclesiastical attitudes.

- "we should radically increase our aid to the underdeveloped countries.

- "we should urge World Health Organization and UNICEF and the United Nations itself, to increase enormously their concern with this aspect of their duties.

- "Canada should devote a significant amount of money to research in the field of population control.

Wraw's rugged ramblings reap Varsity harvest

Once again Varsity's rugger teams executed a double victory over Western.

The firsts outmuscled Western in a hard-fought game 16-0. Varsity led 6-0 at the half on two penalty kicks by scrum half, George Wraw. Western's coach was very upset by the penalties called on his team in their own zone which resulted in the Varsity scores. And at the other end of the field, the Western kicker added to the frustration by missing two easy penalty kicks.

The second half was a different story as the Varsity forwards crashed for two tries in the centre of the field. Peter Hand scored the first of these after a long run by Andy Gibson who drew the tacklers to him before passing off to Hand. Maris Apse powered his way over for the second try after excellent forward play set him up. Wraw and centre Tony Pierre each kicked a convert to complete the scoring.

Early in the first half a Western player was put out of action for the remainder of the game. From that point Western seemed bent not on scoring but on maiming Varsity players. Captain George Wraw was the main target of the opposition who took aim at his injured right leg.

The Varsity seconds also fought a hard-hitting Western team but still triumphed 18-3. Leading the Varsity scorers was forward Harley Griffiths who notched three tries. Winger Mahar shoed across for another try. Three of the four tries were converted by golden toe Andy Cairns.

The smaller Varsity team won because of excellent running and tackling in their half line and the scrum's dominance of the loose scrums.

Soccer toes topple Western 5-2

University of Toronto soccer Blues moved one step closer to the top of the Western conference as a result of their well-earned 5-2 victory over Western Mustangs Saturday.

The game was played under trying conditions as the back campus, poor in itself, was made very slippery and muddy by the intermittent rain. On top of this Blues found themselves three men short when Frank Soppelsa (academic commitment) Bill Neoptiuk (flu) and Rom Muir (quit school) did not even suit up for the game. A fourth player, Dwight Taylor, also had the flu but was able to play the second half.

The Western team, undefeated until this game, opened the scoring when their winger slipped through the defence and rapped one in.

Blues came back to equalize the score when Jim Lefkos let go one of his bombs after taking a pass from Miles Sosa.

Three minutes from half-time, Western took advantage of a temporary defensive lapse and went ahead 2-1.

However, when the second half began, it was quite obvious that Blues had too much power to be held in check. Lefkos, last year's scoring champ, went to work and counted three more goals.

Miles Sosa, who set up Lefkos on two occasions, scored Blues' fifth and final tally.

Coach Ernie Glass was quite pleased with his team's performance, especially in the second half when they began to display the form which made them the number one intercollegiate soccer power in Eastern Canada last season.

Korner Kicks . . . Graham Shiels played his best game of the season. He was brilliant in the second half when his play on left wing allowed Lefkos and Sosa to work themselves free for good shots on goal.

HARRIER

The Varsity harrier team seems certain to repeat as OQAA champs and probably as Canadian champs as well after finishing a strong second to the University of Pittsburgh in a meet at Canisius University (in Buffalo) in Saturday. About 20 U.S. member schools of the NCAA competed in this exhibition meet, along with MacMaster, Guelph, York, and, of course, Varsity.

The individual winner at the meet was Terry Ritchie of Pittsburgh, who succeeded in navigating the 4.7 mile course in 22 minutes and 15 seconds. Ritchie is a sub-four-minute miler and was a finalist in the U.S. Olympic trials.

Close behind Ritchie was Grant McLaren of Guelph, followed by another Pittsburgh runner, Dave Smith of York, and Varsity runner, Brian Richards, fifth and only 40 seconds off the pace.

Nine seconds after Richards came Brian Armstrong of Varsity, finishing eighth. Jim Smith of Mac was 14th, hotly pursued by Dave Tong of this university, who was fifteenth and 72 seconds behind the leader. The other Toronto runners finished well, with Bruce Thompson 18th, Rich Pyne 42nd and Bob Cairns 48th.

Varsity finished well ahead of their closest Canadian competitor, McMaster.

GRAPE VICTORY FOR VARSITY OVER WESTERN, 32-17

By Rod Mickleburgh

Distinguished British etymologist, Concise Oxford, lists two meanings for the word mustang: "wild horse of Mexico and California" and "small red Texas grape".

Judging by the performance of some Mustangs from Western on Saturday, Mr. Oxford knows whereof he speaks. After horsing wild to a 17-7 lead over Varsity Blues early in the second quarter, Mustangs suddenly turned into those meek little Texas grapes as they were squished and devoured all over the field by a ravenous U of T football team.

Before 13,407 fans at Varsity Stadium, the final score was 32-17 for Blues, one of the most thorough victories ever recorded by a Blue and White team.

For the final thirty-nine minutes of the game, it was like watching a re-run of the Democrat Convention in Chicago where the big bad Daley machine ran roughshod over the helpless McCarthyites, only this time it was the Murphy machine and the good guys won.

Somewhere, sometime, after falling behind 17-7, Blues discovered the key to the Western strong-box, finding a vast treasure of weaknesses inside. They discovered a porous defensive line (it became very porous during the rain, ho ho) and a pair of quarterbacks who couldn't work under pressure. So, offensively, Varsity kept the ball on the ground, and, defensively, rushed everything but the kitchen sink whenever Western went back to pass.

The results were staggering.

Led by fullback Mike Raham, who scorns second effort as ordinary, giving out fourth and fifth effort instead, and halfback Glen Markle, Varsity bulldozed their way to 304 yards rushing, two centuries of it coming in the second half. And Western's much-vaunted aerial attack went completely phfft, yielding three interceptions and only five completions for 32 yards after half-time.

Raham, who has probably never had a bad game, had a superb one Saturday, battering through the Western line 26 times for 178 yards, a scant two yards short of matching Mustangs' entire offensive output. Markle bulled for 91 yards, a personal best.

Quarterback Vic Alboini complemented another excellent field marshal performance with two touchdowns, both on one yard sneaks. John Chapman also had a pair of touchdowns, with Markle getting the fifth. Bill Stankovic kicked two converts.

Western's points came on touchdowns by Carl Lindros and Bruce Hough, plus converts and a field goal by Otavio Colosimo.

The afternoon dimmed damp and dreary, and Toronto took the lead in the first quarter on an 11 yard touchdown run by Chapman, made possible by a gorgeous block from guard Gord Whitaker. The convert was tried and it was good.

Then Western had their five minutes of sunshine at the outset of the second quarter. Colosimo kicked a 21 yard field goal, Hugh stumbled for a four yard touchdown two plays after Western recovered a Varsity fumble, and Lindros caught a short pass from quarterback Joe Cipparone for the second and last 'Stang major. The converts were tried and they were good.

In arrears 17-7, Varsity started to fight back and with a mere 11 seconds left in the half, Alboini lofted a perfect pass to Chapman for a 33 yard touchdown play. The convert was tried and it was good but it was wiped out by a penalty.

The touchdown was extremely important psychologically. Blues went to their dressing room all fired up, while Mustangs moped and almost forgot they still had a four point lead.

Freezing rain descended en masse at intermission — drenching the spectators, and as it turned out, any spark in the Western attack.

Blues' defense was magnificent, holding Mustangs to two first downs and 15 yards total offense.

The offense chimed in with third quarter touchdowns by Alboini and Markle, and a fourth quarter effort by Alboini.

And the victory was won and it was bloody good.

ROWING

By STEVE THOMAS

The U. of T. rowing crew won last weekend's final invitational regatta at London, and as a result took the E.C.I.R.A. (Eastern Canadian Intercollegiate Rowing Ass.) points championship trophy.

The trophy, won last year by Western, is awarded to the total points winner of four regattas preceding the OQAA championship.

After their performance last Saturday, Toronto will be the favoured crew although stiff competition can be expected from Western, McMaster, Brock and also York. Western and McMaster tied with 60 points apiece, a scant 2½ points behind Toronto for second place.

Races were rowed on a rough Lake Fanshawe course with a headwind that at times exceeded 20 knots. Toronto's best showing again was a first in the lightweight race.

In the senior race, won for the fourth week by Western, the same 155 lb. crew was forced from second place for the first time by McMaster.

The freshman crew, who also were rowing two races, finished a strong second in the freshman race, although farther back in junior varsity.

The lightweight crew celebrated Saturday's success with a long Sunday morning row up the Humber to the Bloor Street viaduct and a dip in the chilly waters of Lake Ontario.

Rowing out from under the Lakeshore bridge they were caught in a three foot chop that had built up as they were practicing on the calm surface of the Humber. Two waves filled the shell and a third put the bow under.

With waves swirling about their waist and stroke oarsman Jack Gibbons humming a medley of old rowing songs to himself, the crew abandoned ship for the shoulder deep water. A two-hundred yard wade brought the shell safely to calmer if not warmer waters.

A somewhat numbed eight oarsmen set an unofficial time from the western end of the breakwall to the showers of the Argonaut Rowing Club, leaving a scattering of morning walkers rubbing their eyes.

Great blocking by the offensive line was a major factor in Blues' 32-17 win over Western. Here, pulling guards Gord Whitaker (50) and Derek Turner (51) clear way for John Chapman's (26) TD sweep.

UNIONISM HITS U OF T

BY LAUREL SEFTON
IV MOD. HISTORY
ST. MIKES

As the Macpherson Report progressed, the problem of how to implement the idea of greater student representation at all levels of the university has become very crucial.

Who is to give the students views and how? Could course unions like the History Students Union be the answer?

The question of whether students were capable of achieving their goals within organized structures was pointed out two years ago by Frank Buck (then a graduate student and member of the Macpherson Committee) in an article published in The Varsity.

He advocated a three-tiered system of student representation: at the university level, i.e. the Senate and Board of Governors, at the faculty level, i.e. the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science, and at the departmental level, i.e. the history department.

It would have been difficult to democratically elect students to the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science. And at the departmental level, there was no localized student organization whose representatives would be responsible to the students who elected them.

ORGANIZATION OF THE UNION

During the summer of 1967, SAC set up a committee to discuss what are now known as course unions, and to contact students who would take on the responsibility of organizing them.

Many students came forward and it was at this time that the History Students' Union, was founded.

This group defines itself as: "an inclusive body of students registered within a department, who have organized themselves into a cohesive unit in order to provide a forum with the faculty to discuss problems . . . arising out of courses or departmental policy, and generally, in order to bring about significant educational reform in the university."

FACULTY COUNCIL

The H.S.U. first had to consider the Committee on Undergraduate Studies' proposal to seat 16 students on the Council of the Faculty of Arts and Science.

Totally dissatisfied with the re-organized its own governing structure. An Executive Committee for the Undergraduate Department, composed of seven faculty and three student representatives, has been formed. This committee will be responsible for curriculum changes and will set the agenda for full department meetings.

The old staff-student committee will be replaced by a permanent sub-committee composed of the three students and three of the staff from the executive committee.

ANTHROPOLOGY

A staff-student committee is considering the Allen sub-committee's report. An anthropology club exists which can submit suggestions to the department faculty. A student-faculty co-ordinating committee and a graduate student association are in the process of developing constitutions.

PSYCHOLOGY

A course union was formed in March and has submitted a list of recommendations to Dr. Macdonald, head of the department. The PCU and MacDonald have held several meetings during which changes in the teaching of psychology were discussed. The PCU also presents programs of general interest dealing with psychological problems.

A staff-student committee, formed in the spring of 1967, was eventually abandoned as unworkable.

MATHEMATICS

No course union in existence. Student representatives chosen originally from the existing Maths and Physics Club have been sitting on the Curriculum committee of the department for two years.

During this time, the department has re-organized its honors program making changes (an increase in the number of options) in line with Macpherson Report recommendations. Student members of this committee, until recently honors students only, are chosen by the out-going representatives.

PHILOSOPHY

A staff-student committee has been in existence for about two years.

This year an ad-hoc committee (two students and four faculty) was formed to discuss the Allen report recommendations. Their report was submitted to the full department council for discussion and vote. There are seven elected students (six honors and one general) seated on this council. Recently, the Philosophy department has

ENGLISH

Attempts to form an English-students union are being made. Last year, an executive representing students from UC, Innis, and New was elected. But this group was unable to win active support from a significant number of students.

Last year, a Combined Departments Staff-student Liaison Committee with student and faculty representatives from all colleges met several times. This group had no authority to make curriculum changes and was used only as a means of providing dialogue with students.

GEOGRAPHY

The department has put forward a list of recommended changes and is calling for four undergraduates with voting rights to sit in on a series of closed committee meetings.

The 75-member Geography society is trying to expand to form a representative student union for the course. However, at a mass meeting held a couple of weeks ago, only 12 people out of an estimated 300 taking geography attended.

SOCIOLOGY

A staff meeting a few weeks ago set up a committee under Prof. P. A. Griffin to discuss the Macpherson report. There is no student union or staff-student committee operating at the undergraduate level.

basis of representation, (via of a prefabricated electoral college system — no doubt invented by the mind of Dean W. D. Foulds . . .) the HSU spearheaded the drive for reform.

This drive proved unsuccessful partly because of SAC's reluctance to pick up their plea and carry it through. To effectively counter the administration's proposal there would have had to have been a concerted effort by well-organized course unions in EVERY DEPARTMENT of the faculty of Arts and Science.

These course unions were unformed at that time, and in fact are just being organized.

As the present 16 student reps on the Faculty Council are not happy in their position, and as new proposals for fairer student representation will undoubtedly be negotiated this year, these unions will necessarily play an important role. They should be the basic form through which responsible representatives can be elected.

HISTORY DEPARTMENT

Undeterred by the hopelessness of the Faculty Council situation, the HSU Council decided to turn to reform in their own department. They presented a brief to the policy committee of the history department asking for student representation on a number of the department's standing committees, including the curriculum and library committees.

They were turned down on the grounds that "too much of the committee's business was of no interest to students." (continued on page 11)

What did you learn in school today?

BY AGI LUKACS

"The capitalists will have to be suppressed . . . there may be bloodshed", said J. T. McCloud to his Canadian Political Science freshman class. He was arguing from the Marxist point of view, in one of three lectures on this alternative political theory.

Students are not exposed to this in their first year, but several have asked for it, says Prof. McCloud. "Many are interested in theory, and aren't exposed to it in high school", he says.

Perspective is gained through contact with a "relatively undemocratic system," he continues. Though there is a danger in his boiling down Marxism for students without thorough background, he can't justify teaching Poli Sci 120 without provision of alternatives.

"It is not my purpose to suggest that this is the theory, but that it's an important one in the world today," he adds. "Marx was a genius not only because of his widespread influence, but because of his critique of capitalism."

— Marx admitted that capitalism, as the most recent economic system developed in his time, had made improvements, producing individual and political liberty, but only for one class, McCloud said.

Perhaps another Marxist theory is even more applicable today than it was last century, said McCloud: that in affluent society, less and less incentive is needed to produce material goods, and more to distribute them. "You don't need competition anymore."

Marx's concept of human nature was not necessarily incorrect, the class was told. Competition isn't intrinsic to man; it may appear so, but only because "man's social consciousness is shaped by his economic system."

"It can be argued," McCloud continued, "that Marxism has never been tried." Just because his theory was misapplied doesn't mean it is invalid.

Marx's ideas pioneered such fields as alienation, when he argued that man is often cut off from the fruits of his own labor, said McCloud.

Just before two students walked up to ask him about The Exam and The Essay, McCloud asked, "Are you not being alienated from the enjoyment of curricula . . . from the system?"

"It's a point of view", he concluded. "You pays your money; you gits your choice."

Mac students to boycott cafeteria

HAMILTON — (UNS) — McMaster students to starve this week?

Not likely, although a boycott of Beaver Food facilities on campus is to take place. Students will continue using the Arts II Cafeteria tables but will bring their own lunches or eat sandwiches provided by the boycott committee.

Beaver Food Services have taken over on the Mac campus from Versafood, and the students want them out. Why? Mainly because the new company dismissed senior employees and union stewards without notice.

The issue centers around Annie Davidson, veteran coffee-server of seven years and a student favorite. The new caterers promised to rehire old employees on a seniority basis, but Annie returned from vacation to find a new management and no job.

At an open meeting last Tuesday, the McMaster SDU initiated the boycott proposal despite a letter from Beaver Food Services and the Building Service Employees Union recommending the student body "keep hands off the Annie Davidson case."

Employee interviews revealed that workers had been warned they were on probation, they were being closely observed, were forced to work extra hours without pay, and some were placed on permanent night shift.

Said one angry student: "Beaver's got to go. If it's trying these things now, just wait till it gets established around here!"

A joint statement by company and union says the union will assume responsibility for the employees involved. It also suggests the students leave "negotiations between the two principle parties, to settle these matters."

Students feel they are being given a public relations run-around with no action in sight. So the boycott gets the green light. All food will be prepared by students under Board of Health regulations in graduate and faculty kitchens.

Nigeria-Biafra debate could be one-sided

The Nigerian-Biafran crisis will be debated at Convocation Hall tomorrow night, but already one of the major participants has withdrawn.

The Association of Nigerians in Canada (Toronto) announced yesterday it will not participate in the debate, sponsored by the students council and World University Services. This could mean only the Biafran viewpoint will be represented.

E. O. Fagbamiye (SGS), president of the ANC(T), says the decisions of a committee which decided the membership of the forum panel were arbitrarily overruled. The original panel was to have consisted of two representatives from Nigeria, two from Biafra and External Affairs Minister Mitchell Sharp.

The association is specifically objecting to the inclusion of MP Stephen Lewis, who recently returned from Nigeria-Biafra. They feel he would not represent anyone, and say his name was included even after the suggestion was defeated by the committee.

An ANC(T) statement says "we are prepared to abide by the decisions made by this committee, but we refuse to be toyed with by those who feel they have to impose personal opinions on a committee of grown-ups."

SAC president Steve Langdon said last night the Nigerian students were "still quite welcome to send two or three people to participate in the panel."

One of the panelists, he said, was to be picked by WUS, and they chose Stephen Lewis.

Were Toronto cops "pigs" at Saturday's demonstrations?

By PAUL MACRAE
Varsity Editor

As indicated by the volume of letters about the editorial entitled "pigs" in Oct. 28 Varsity, a number of students (not to mention broadcaster Gordon Sinclair) are furious because, among other things, I called the Metropolitan Toronto police "pigs".

The reference was, as some writers pointed out, borrowed from United States jargon and refers to police—like those in Chicago and other U.S. cities—who have given up all pretense at decent law enforcement and concentrate instead on venting their hatred, from a position of power, on those without power.

It is my opinion that the Toronto police deserved the badge of "pigs" for their actions in breaking up the Canadians for the National Liberation Front demonstration against the war in Vietnam outside the U.S. Consulate Saturday. I am NOT referring to police action regarding the other demonstration which attempted to use Yonge St. for their parade.

While I sympathize with their desire to use Yonge St. because I believe the cause of ending the war in Vietnam to be more important than the annual Shrine Convention, I also recognize that the leaders of that demonstration attempted to use their followers to create a violent, physical confrontation with police. I am opposed to such a confrontation started by students.

My belief that the Metro police acted like "pigs" at the CNLF demonstration centres around three assumptions:

1) that there was no acceptable reason for breaking up that demonstration;

2) that the police created a situation which they could Break Up in order to try out their new anti-riot techniques (as reported in The Toronto Telegram of Oct. 19).

3) That police were politically motivated in breaking up the demonstration.

If anyone can prove to me that these were not the overriding factors in the police actions, I will apologize—and apologize sincerely—for calling them pigs. I do, however, think the facts bear out my hypothesis.

First, I am not a cop-hater. At no time during the demonstration outside the consulate or anywhere else did I call the police "pigs" or "fascists". Witnesses such as David De Poe can testify that I was, in fact, angry and upset at the name-calling and felt, at the time, that it was undeserved.

Only afterward, when the melee was over, did I realize what had actually happened. True, the police did not behave with overt cruelty or brutality—for good reason. If they had, their actions would have been universally condemned. As it was, their lack of individual physical brutality serves as a mask for what they really tried to do—break up a rally for practice.

The police and demonstrators did not clash until the police decided they would not allow CNLF members to speak to the marchers. Ostensibly the cops' reason was, at first, that by standing on a concrete tree planter, the CNLF people were breaking a city bylaw.

(Here we have a situation analogous to Chicago where police forced demonstrators onto the streets by unearthing a bylaw forbidding people to sleep in the park overnight. In Washington, a month earlier, the authorities allowed Resurrection City to remain in a park. The decision to enforce or waive the law—here and in the U.S.—depends almost entirely on whether the cops and their superiors feel public support will be on their side or not.)

Yet, although the cops used the bylaw as an initial reason for asking speakers to stop speaking, the speakers were in fact arrested on charges of obstructing police and creating a disturbance.

Then, when Prof. Peter Rosenthal began to speak, Police Inspector Walter Magahey told him to stop speaking because the crowd listening to him was "blocking the sidewalk." Rosenthal asked the crowd if anyone wanted to pass. There was no reply.

Insp. Magahey then decided that a disturbance was being created by speaking. The crowd was asked if anyone was being disturbed by the speaking. There was no reply.

Insp. Magahey then announced he objected to the use of a megaphone by the speakers. He was asked if people could speak without a megaphone. He replied no. Rosenthal was arrested.

Each one of the speakers taking his place asked the crowd if anyone wanted to pass and couldn't and each one asked if anyone was being disturbed. No one replied.

In the midst of this "potential riot", the CNLF megaphone was handed back and forth between speakers and Insp. Magahey.

Four people were arrested because it was "dangerous" to allow them to speak in front of the U.S. Consulate. Many others were arrested for listening to them. (This is called creating a disturbance by impeding).

It is curious that in the midst of all the impeding, a woman with a baby carriage was able to get through the crowd without difficulty. It is also fact that the demonstrators were attempting to clear a path for pedestrians before the arrests began to occur.

(Insp. Magahey, incidentally, is commander of the police emergency task force" (Toronto Telegram, Oct. 28). This "task force" was hitherto unknown and comprises hundreds of specially selected cops whom the Telegram revealed have been training with tear gas and machine-guns.

(A Telegram reporter also noted that "scores of policemen with tear gas, wooden clubs, hard hats, plastic body shields and other riot control equipment were poised around corners in case violence erupted between the rival factions". Oct. 28)

It was while the last speaker was talking that the police brought in their reinforcements to break up the demonstration. At this time the demonstrators were angry and shouting at police, but at no time was there any question of a riot. A small number of demonstrators who urged the rest to "surround the police vans" were ignored, and the police were virtually unimpeded in making their arrests, even though these arrests were probably unwarranted.

There were about 50 policemen at the Consulate, including three on horseback, before the reinforcements arrived. The immediate reinforcements included about 75 men who marched up on foot in formation north on University Ave., about 20 men on horseback; plus two busloads of police who came from the east along Centre St. This army was soon joined by about two dozen men who roared up on motorcycles, as well as many more from squad cars that were constantly arriving.

Did the cops need all this firepower? And did the demonstration have to be broken up? The Toronto dailies all emphasized the "excellent" job done by the cops, but reading through the lines, the picture is somewhat different.

The Toronto Telegram notes:

"Then Insp. Magahey, sensing that the situation was degenerating into a potential riot, ordered in six high-stepping police horses to clear the sidewalk." (Oct. 28)

"Sensing"? Wasn't he sure? "Degenerating into a potential riot"? If it was degenerating, then at the time he made his decision it wasn't anywhere near a dangerous situation. And what is a "potential riot" anyway?

Finally, if he just wanted to "clear the sidewalk", why six horses? Why not just one? And why were demonstrators chased away from the Consulate and held at bay by men on horses and by foot troops?

When the cops had finished, the entire block was cleared of demonstrators.

The media, particularly the CBC, have been claiming that the police were lenient in the charges against demonstrators and that demonstrators were charged with only minor offenses.

In fact, 15 were charged with indictable offenses, for which they could be sentenced to two years in a federal penitentiary. One of these is a 14-year-old boy. Thirty-four were arrested in all, out of 1,000 demonstrators. In London, with 30,000 demonstrators, the figure was also 34.

Thousands of demonstrators tried to storm the U.S. embassy in London, and the JFK Memorial was bombed. After the terrible Toronto riot, no one could discover the slightest scratch on the U.S. Consulate.

Did the police have a political motive in breaking up the demonstration, the same kind of political motive we find in the "pigs" to the south? And did the cops break up the demonstration for "practice" in riot training?

Chief James Mackey was informed by letter that the CNLF planned a peaceful demonstration. The letter also outlined plans for the demonstration which were followed scrupulously. The letter read in part:

"It should be noted that we have nothing whatsoever to do with the demonstration organized for the same day by the Vietnam Mobilization Committee. We are not interested in their provocative chest thumping about marching on Yonge St.

"We are marching to the U.S. Consulate, not City Hall. We are not coming out to oppose Mayor Dennison or the Toronto Police. We are marching against the U.S. war of aggression in Vietnam."

Mackey's reply to the letter was to mobilize 300 cops complete with horses, riding crops, motorcycles, buses, tear gas, wooden clubs, hard hats, plastic body shields and other riot equipment. This was the first public action by the "riot task force", which in other cities (in the U.S.) are used to smash demonstrations and picket lines.

It has been decades since there have been anywhere near 300 police (including reinforcements) out to break up a demonstration in this city. Why, all of a sudden, this time? And why for a peaceful demonstration?

Although it was the Yonge St. march that announced it would "confront" the police, 22 of the 34 people arrested were arrested at the U.S. Consulate. The police knew the difference between the two marches. Why was the CNLF march picked for arrests?

After the Hawker-Siddley bombings, police visited members of the CNLF and threatened their organization with police destruction. The police have admitted the CNLF were not responsible for the bombings and no CNLF members have been arrested for the bombings.

CNLF leader Gary Perly reports that two detectives—Det. Carr and Det. Sgt. Quinnell of the Toronto force—visited him and told him that although they knew the CNLF was not responsible for the bombings: "We're cracking down on you people in general—we'll make your lives miserable—we'll get you up in the morning and at night—we'll smash you like a pack of beetles."

Were the police politically motivated? In April the cops broke up a 1,500-strong CNLF demonstration at the consulate. The cops claimed they were preventing potential trouble between the marchers and a band of 50 Nazis and Edmund Burke Society members already in front of the consulate.

The right-wing groups had said then and now that they would "attempt to prevent members of the Vietnam protest group from getting near the U.S. consulate". (Toronto Star, Oct. 23)

Were the police politically motivated? In April, no Birchers were arrested. This time police arrested anti-U.S. demonstrators for fighting

"Irresponsible and emotive editorial"

As a demonstrator on the Saturday march at the American Embassy, I feel impelled to denounce Monday's irresponsible and emotive editorial, "Pigs Pigs Pigs". Surely it is the responsibility of a university editor to use his editorials not to create hysteria, but to offer intelligent criticism.

The issue at stake was not the police, whose quiet reserve deserved and commanded respect from many of the demonstrators. The issue, rather, was — were the police politically motivated?

Why didn't the organizers of the CNLF demonstration have the right to speak? If the Police Commission or city council refused such permission to one group and not to another, then it is only such groups which can be blamed for political bias.

If the CNLF organizers did not exhaust the avenues to secure permission to speak, then those arrested for insisting upon that right were martyrs for no cause. (A request was made to city council.) If they did and were refused — then the police were put in a position of not enforcing the law, but of enforcing a law which was given a political bias. In that instance, it is not the police on the street to blame, but the higher authorities. Particularly in this case, because given their orders, the Toronto police acted with restraint.

Surely those questions are the ones which have to be answered. They are no mean questions, because only when the police become a political arm will the call to the barricades be heard.

The Chicago police were political police because Mayor Daley and his lieutenants transformed them into political police — indeed, into storm-troopers — due to the orders which were given to them.

VMC "ATTEMPTED CONFRONTATION"

In your editorial of 28 October ("Pigs, Pigs, Pigs"), while blaming the Toronto police for provoking demonstrators and breaking up the rally at the U.S. Consulate, you neatly passed over the attempt on the part of the VMC leadership to confront the police over a question of civil liberties. Regardless of the fact that the police were wrong in not granting a permit to march down Yonge Street (while allowing the "socially significant" Shriners to block traffic a few weeks ago), the point of the march was to demonstrate against American intervention in Viet Nam and Canada's complicity with that intervention. By attempting a confrontation with the police, the VMC leadership weakened the impact of the demonstration. You could have mentioned that.

More serious than this oversight is your suggestion that people like Chancellor Solandt of U. of T. should be in jail for their beliefs. Reprehensible as Dr. Solandt's position is, you seem to want to circumscribe his freedom of speech in the name of freedom. It seems, Mr. MacRae, we have come full circle.

"SICK VIEW"

The art of demonstrating seems to have evaded the issue which it so decidedly states it represents. The Varsity editorial represents the rather sick view of a small minority on this campus. The policemen are far from the "pigs" you so emphatically label them. Excessiveness reacts to excessiveness. Policemen are as human as demonstrators. If demonstrators wish to provoke reaction it is they who suffer. Demonstrations are as peaceful as the demonstrators who lead them. Either the techniques of protest must change or violence will continue to be precipitated. As for the editorial so gamely printed in the Varsity, I have only one word to say and that is probably unprintable. Varsity, grow up.

"CROCK OF BULLSHIT"

Monday's lead editorial was maybe the most irresponsible crock of bullshit that has appeared in a campus publication during my several years at Toronto.

Do you want a Chicago here, MacRae? Do you want the people of this city to hate one another? Do you want blood to flow through the gutters and young kids falling to the streets screaming in pain?

My impression of your editorial was this: that you, MacRae, were almost disappointed that tragedy did not happen last weekend; that you somehow think a full-scale violent confrontation with the authorities is necessary for any revolutionary activity in Toronto to be legitimate.

I did not find many of the cops last Saturday to be pigs. I talked with several of them; they were not hostile. I saw some marchers joking with cops — not many, mind you, but enough to assure me that several of the cops didn't have their heart in what they were doing.

Why pick on the cops, MacRae? They played their game in a businesslike, unemotional and, for the most part, reasonable manner. They tried to do the job they were ordered to do. They are not the pigs.

The pigs are the people with power who refused the march a parade permit. (The precedent of last year's orderly, peaceful march eliminates, as far as I am concerned, any reasonable grounds for refusing a permit this year.) The pigs are the people with power who forced civil rights in this city, rather than the Vietnam war, to be the crucial issue which emerged from the weekend. The pigs are the people with power who, as Bob Bossin rightly observes, made last Saturday's march a "rehearsal" for further repression of political ideas which threaten their power.

The police can be confronted, talked with and revolutionized. There is no reason to assume that they will necessarily fall in behind (or, more accurately, in front of) the pigs when the chips are down. There is no reason at all to assume that except for people like you, MacRae, who assume that revolution has to be bloody, that the authorities in society are welded together by some mystical force which only violence can rend. If force which only violence can rend. If blood spills, MacRae, it will be as much the fault of obsolete ideologues like yourself as it will be the fault of the pigs.

"You tell me it's the institution . . . you better free your mind instead," MacRae. Come off your soapbox and turn on your love vector.

"COPS ARE HUMAN TOO"

At the risk of finally showing my "liberal" colours, I must protest.

I must protest the editorial "Pigs" on the Toronto Police in to-day's paper. I am afraid that your analysis of the police action and their motives is quite correct. I also believe that further confrontations with the police must be sought and brought about, but name-calling won't solve the problem, unfortunately. Surprisingly, not only are Paul MacRae, Dr. Solandt, and numerous other people human, but the Toronto cops are human too.

I do not think we can talk about humanizing the University and society while we call some people "pigs". It seems to me that we would be much better off organizing a counter-course in anti-riot training (non-violence, and all that liberal stuff), and inviting the Toronto Police Commission to send its men to this course. I, for one, would be willing to explore this with some other people.

U of T WAR RESEARCH

When the million dollars' worth of research that the United States armed services pays this university to do is used as evidence of campus complicity in the war, the argument is inevitably given that this research is basic university research.

is not really war research. There are many people who hold this view quite sincerely, including professors who do such research while publicly criticizing the Vietnam war.

The Pentagon seems to feel differently about it, however. They have sent letters to many American mathematicians who protest the war, threatening to discontinue their contracts, and have actually decided to terminate upon expiry the contract of two Berkeley professors, Professors Lucien Le Cam and J. Neyman.

Their reasoning seems to be that "basic research is supported because of its ultimate value for military operations" — in fact, as they pointed out in their letters, "the results of the research done under these contracts have been used in various activities related to the Vietnam war" and that "if researchers protest current operations, the Department of Defense is justified in raising the question of conscience".

So, in my opinion, is the anti-war movement.

In the light of the activities and programs already laid out and committed to, a cut in the budget is unthinkable.

The money the chorus is asking for is well spent. The conductor's honorarium is what is to be expected if the university is to be represented by a professional chorus. It takes a Mr. Bradshaw to demand and get such a repertoire as the chorus boasts. It was through his good offices that the chorus has been able to sing, with the Toronto Symphony, thereby directing the university's talents toward the community and across Canada.

The matter of money for music is an obvious one. How sing without music?

As concerns a tour, this is standard fare for any high school chorus. Does the commonwealth's largest university deserve less?

Such matters as advertising, publicity and programs are equally dear.

In summary, sir, I urge the people who are on the SAC to reject this cut in light of the commitments already undertaken by the U of T chorus and in light of their record of good accomplishments.

U of T CHORUS OUT $700

I wish to express publicly my concern over SAC's proposed cut of the University of Toronto chorus' budget. I understand from the executive that the budget that they submitted had been sizeably reduced at the SAC's request due to last year's residue fund (the existence of such a fund was the result of the group's tour being cancelled).

Student centre

game

By BRIAN JOHNSON

The plans for the Students Administrative Council Campus Centre have been lying around for about two and a half years now. Each month the centre is delayed, the cost is hiked by $20,000.

The cost has been increased by $80,000 since the first sod should have been turned last June.

These alarming facts were presented in a meeting Monday in President Claude Bissell's office. Also on hand at the meeting were SAC President Steve Langdon, Wayne Richardson (III APSC), architect John Andrews, and high level administration officials.

All agreed the campus centre must be started soon, but no one had an easy solution.

There are two major obstacles hindering the construction:

1. The City Council will not give the University a building permit because the design violates a bylaw—the building would encroach upon pedestrian traffic, since it is flush against the sidewalk.

2. Priorities—there is not enough money to cover the entire building and operating costs. Over $1,000,000 more is needed of the total cost which has risen from $4,000,000 to $4,6,000,000.

Three ways have been suggested to skirt the problem of the by-law:

- St. George could be closed to traffic, but all attempts to do this in the past few years have failed, since the road is considered a vital traffic artery. Again the City Council is in the way. It has nothing to gain by closing St. George.

- The road could be depressed—the idea is attractive but financially impossible.

- A raised sidewalk could be constructed to facilitate pedestrian traffic—this plan is financially feasible. It would cost from one to two million dollars over an extended period of time.

Mr. Andrews said he could easily modify the plans of the building to include a walkway, "but I'm not going to build any bridges," he added.

Dr. Bissell feared that such a construction might be a blight on St. George. But under pressure from Langdon, he decided it was the only workable solution, and that the time had come for a "high-level push" to Metro and City Council to let the construction begin if the walkway was promised.

A.G. Rankin (Executive vice president, non academic) mused over the possibilities of taking aldermen out to lunch, while Dr. Bissell joked that he could promise to vote for one in the next election.

So Dr. Bissell himself is finally condescending to step in after remaining aloof from the matter for two and a half years.

But after all, he is little more than the hired servant of the Board of Governors, and that body has not reacted favorably to the campus centre. One can hardly expect it to, for a focus point for student activity (and possibly student power) is not in the best interests of the administration.

And the Board of Governors represents that second obstacle—finances.

Since the cost of the project has been escalating at an exorbitant rate to approximately 4,6,000,000, the budget is still over $1 million short. Operating costs are part of this sum.

The Bank of Montreal offered to contribute $1,837,500 for a 50 year lease for a branch on the site and exclusive rights to all on-campus banking for the 50-year period. The Board overwhelmingly turned down the offer, and suggested no other alternative to provide the money.

Although Board meetings are secret, rumor has it that the Board voted overwhelmingly beyond that margin anyway. What other motive, then could the Board have except for a fear of exclusivity—which would be unusual for men who base their lives on monopoly—or disregard for student interests?

So if you've always accepted the line that the Board is a body that makes financial decisions that have nothing to do with the students, you'd better think twice.

Apart from lack of funds and lack of direction on the matter, the administration has been guilty of incredible incompetency.

For instance, there are still oil tanks under the site of the campus centre. There is no reason why they could not have been removed more than two and a half years ago. The project cannot go ahead until something is done about them. People knew they were there. Why was nothing done?

What can students do about the problem?—demonstrate? strike? march on city hall? occupy Simcoe Hall? perhaps.

But effectively and directly the students are powerless to do anything. This is unfortunate when one considers that the project was initiated by students, partially financed by students, and designed for students.

You do not have to be a radical to oppose hierarchical, bureaucratic, and just plain inefficient administrative practices and structures. If you are a self-proclaimed apathetic and "average" student, you will not need Marxist ideology to protest.

Gaze round eyeball a star bound

By GEOFFREY MEGGS

A tour of the McLaughlin Planetarium is like a mind excursion into a robot brain. Each convoluted corridor is a section of this brain, crowded with innate intelligence and millions of tiny pieces of information. The space inside this brain is never quiet. Dull lights flicker on and off and the perpetual pings and moans of electronic music pursue the visitor through the halls.

There is an air of excitement in the Planetarium as it nears the day when it will finally shoo away the last rich donors and socialites to open its doors to the Toronto public Nov. 2.

Set back in the middle of its own cobbled square, the planetarium rolls its immense eyeball at the heavens with which it is vitally concerned. From deep inside this mechanical sphere in the space of 90 minutes the planetarium visitor is lifted from his feet and blown into the stars.

The first note is struck in the lobby. "The Heavens are calling you and wheel around you" says a quote from Dante on the wall. Roundness is a theme of the planetarium too. Nowhere is there a square angle or a straight wall. A curved staircase leads to the display area on the second level.

The partitions twisting and turning through the room are illuminated from within to show hundreds of portraits of the early greats of astronomy. Copernicus, Galileo, Newton and others stare down on space capsules, meteorites and aurorae. Slowly but surely, the mind is drawn from Earth as the centre of a universe pasted to the edges of the horizon, to Earth, as a speck in the galaxy.

In a very short time the earth-bound viewpoint disappears and the visitor enters the final area of the displays, a huge circular chamber with another staircase in the centre. Scattered about like expensive beachballs are scores of plexiglass spheres, each containing a photograph of some infinitely distant nebula or galaxy.

The staircase leads to the Star Theatre, the centre of this brain intelligence.

The Star Theatre is located under the dome itself. Mounted on a pedestal in the centre of the room is the Zeiss projector, looking a rampaging alien insect from a science-fiction nightmare. This great black monster moves soundlessly around three different axes. In a few moments the panorama of Southern Ontario disappears into dusk and thousands of stars dot the sky above.

Hang anarchists says Lampport

By TOM WALKOM

Saturday's anti-Vietnam war protestors are "trouble-makers" "bums" and "anarchists", charged city controller Allan Lampport.

"Bringing about anarchy should be punished by hanging," Lampport added later in a speech yesterday at Hart House. The Saturday march, he claimed, had cost Metro taxpayers $150,000 for police crowd control.

The controller's noon-hour speech dealt with law and order, injustice and demonstrators.

Injustice, according to Lampport, occurred when judicial punishments were applied inconsistently. His answer to this was "more laws with penalties in them."

"Lack of law and order," he said, "is the fault of weak politicians."

After attacking the Saturday march for wasting the money of Toronto property owners, Lampport was asked why the city didn't cut costs by sending fewer officers out.

"When you go out to fight a war, you go out to win," he replied.

"These revolutionary marchers," the politician stated, "are merely attention grabbers, operating under the guise of free speech." Lampport had nothing but praise for the "decent young kids fighting their way through life."

Asked to differentiate between these "decent kids" and the Vietnamese demonstrators the controller castigated the latter for disrupting the social order and labelled their efforts as "useless" and "laughable."

Marches in this city such as those protesting Soviet occupation of Czechoslovakia, though, Controller Lampport called more useful, in spite of the fact that they too cost the taxpayer money.

These show "a concern for the world," he said.

APSC grad backs Wallace

By DOUG MURRAY

When questioned about Campaign worker Louis de Boer explained "why I'm for Wallace" to an unruly S.R.O. crowd of more than 200 at Sid Smith Monday.

F. Paul Fromm (III SMC) of the Edmund Burke Society introduced the mustached speaker, who wore sunglasses for the occasion. A Wallace campaign poster and a Confederate flag backed him up.

Some friends said later, "Louis acquired his southern accent when he campaigned in the U.S. this summer during his holidays. If you mention it to him he speaks normally."

De Boer, a U of T engineering graduate (6T7), was continually interrupted by shouts, comments, applause and hissing as he outlined the Wallace platform.

"The U.S. should shit or get off the pot in Vietnam," he said.

"Strengthening states' rights would cause government to be more responsive to what the people want, such as segregated schools, segregated housing and more police."

Alabama's high sales taxes he answered, "people should pay taxes and businesses should make profits."

He paused while Fromm singlehandedly tried to shout members of the audience.

"Is this democracy when people cannot speak?" shouted Fromm.

Various rhetorical questions followed. Was Wallace a racist, a demagogue, an authoritarian and against the United States Constitution?

"What does Wallace mean when he tells hecklers that his day will come on November 5?" asked Andy Wernick (SGS).

"Mr. Wallace means to appoint an Attorney General who will charge Vietnam war protestors with treason," de Boer answered.

A crowd of supporters of arrested Vietnam war protestors led by a student with a bull horn concluded the event by chanting "We want Cleaver," and "Yankee fascist go home" until de Boer and Fromm left.

A U. of T. policeman was present, but there were no mishaps.

WAR RESEARCH

BY GEOFFREY MEGGS

Is there secret war research at the University of Toronto?

The Varsity tried to find out.

The answer is maybe.

Research grants from military organizations totalled $699,839.86 in 1967.

The Office of Research Administration has refused to reveal what these grants are being used for.

Until tomorrow, that is.

"All questions you have concerning any of these matters will be answered at that time," Dr. G. deB. Robinson, vice-president of Research Administration, told The Varsity.

Tomorrow night a special open meeting of the president's council will be held. War research is on the agenda. Seven SAC members have been invited to attend with full voting rights.

"I can't tell you anything at this time," Dr. Robinson continued, "for fear of undercutting the board's position at this meeting."

The Varsity asked specifically about a United States Air Force grant of $24,049 made to the faculty of arts and science in 1967.

"We have nothing classified," Dr. Robinson insisted, "We have

Faculty council opens up

All future meetings of the arts and science faculty council will be open to the public, it was decided Monday afternoon at a council meeting in Cody Hall.

Tom Kuttner (IV UC), one of the 16 student members on the council proposed the motion "to facilitate meaningful and effective communication between faculty and students." He met with considerable opposition.

Classic Prof. G. M. Grube termed the motion "irresponsible" and "foolish". He said the efficiency of open meetings would suffer from "playing up to the balcony" and that members would be moved by the fear of being thought illiberal "however unfounded the charge may be" when speaking before students.

"Those students who have the time and the inclination to attend these meetings can't be representative of the student body," said one member.

"We can't give too much influence to the views, applause and hisses of a certain group."

Mathematics Prof. Chandler Davis compared increased student interest in the business of the council to "a window being opened and a breath of life entering."

"What has prevented us from moving forward has not been lack of efficiency but lack of imagination, lack of communication and tradition-bound rigidity approaching rigor mortis."

After an hour and a half of debate the motion was carried 180-89.

All grants, solicited or not, must pass through the Office of Research Administration. Before acceptance can be considered the precise nature of the proposed project must be outlined.

Individual projects are approved if, in the opinion of the research board, they fall "within the framework of the policies and objectives of the university."

Other considerations are "that it will not be detrimental to undergraduate or graduate education" and "that adequate facilities are available."

College will hold draft-dodger referendum

But executive member Jon Fidler (II NEW) opposed the motion saying it was necessary that council representatives "feel out" the sentiments of college members toward such a donation.

"The council has two functions," President Brian Schnurr (III NEW) pointed out. "A service function, for dances and activities and a responsibility to deal with items involving students at the college or university level."

Maibaum insisted that "it is our duty to discuss issues of the day without merely turning the council into a debating union."

"The student council has to consider the role of the student and how he plugs into both the university and society," Chris Szalwinski (II APSC), a New College SAC representative, said in support of Maibaum.

"These relationships are inseparable and cannot be isolated if any true perspective is to be found. A student cannot totally ignore what is going on," he said.

But opposing council members, including Fidler, felt the council members should vote as representatives of their constituents and not as they wanted.

"There are two kinds of moral decisions," Fidler said. "one of support and one involving a donation of money. It should be left up to the students whether or not they give money to organizations not directly related to the university."

John Levy, a TADP representative, said money will go for the publication of a manual explaining Canada's immigration laws — not to support draft-dodgers.

The referendum will be voted on Thurs. Nov. 7. The wording will be, "I approve-disapprove of donating $100 to the Toronto Anti-Draft Program for the printing of immigration information"

Students psyched out of courses

applications of the subject with psychologists working in such fields as psychiatry, sociology, and prison reform.

Psychology department acting chairman, Dr. G. E. MacDonald, will address an organization meeting of the counter-course to be held on Thurs. Oct. 31 at 7:30 p.m. in the East Common Room of Hart House. His topic will be "Clinical Psychology Today". The P S U has urged all psychology students to attend.

"The word 'HUMAN', says Green, "is the drawing card for many psychology students." But they are disappointed when courses bearing titles like "Human learning and memory" fail to relate to real human situations and problems. The free course will give students the chance to pursue this aspect of the subject this year and will pressure the department to institute changes in the formal courses.

Enough resource people have been approached to initiate seminars during the next month after which groups will direct their own studies and seek out authorities in areas of interest. The course, which has the support of Dr. MacDonald, will carry no academic credit.

Column and a half

By MIKE KESTERTON

We'll have slave labor in Canada if Gerard Pelletier, new Secretary of State, has his way.

In a speech yesterday, he suggested that young people be forced into "a year of civil service, similar to military service in other countries but devoted to peaceful ends."

Pelletier says drafting youth would be in the interests of the Just Society. In other words, he figures on ending the exploitation of the Indians and the poor by starting to exploit the country's youth.

The way he sees it, youth is discontent because it is not being allowed to "participate in society" — the system. And his proposed participation would mean something like shouldering shovels, living in barracks and working for conscription wages — perhaps no wages at all.

Pelletier says the idea of a non-military draft was suggested to him by "some youth groups." At a guess, I would say these "youth" groups were the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Edmund Burke Society and the Greta Garbo Home for Wayward Boys and Girls.

In justifying the suggestion people will undoubtedly speak of the "duty" and "self-sacrifice" that young people owe to society.

It's a con job — the only duty of young people to society is to learn to stand on their own two feet and get jobs. And by jobs I mean work that is voluntarily undertaken for decent wages.

This argument, of course, won't be enough to deter most people. Business and government officials have long been accustomed to regarding youth as a "natural resource" to be "developed." They will paint pictures of "people helping people", social work and "working to reform society."

There won't be any social improvement or reform in the proposed "civil service." It'll be pick and shovel work, and a hell of a lot of that

The infuriating thing is that the projects undertaken will undoubtedly be projects like public works up north, urban renewal, and attempts to raise the living standards of Indians and Poor to middle-class levels of consumption — things that will benefit the business establishment.

With a cheap source of labour like conscripted youth to develop the country, I'm sure many Canadian companies will be able to increase their profits in years to come and be able to move into regions hitherto inaccessible because of poor roads, lack of electric power, etc. — all of which will be provided cheaply by the government by using young people.

If the government really wants to create a Just Society, really wants to give jobs to youths and improve living standards, it can start by offering young people jobs at decent rates of pay.

Where will it get the money? Corporation taxes — if big business is going to benefit from this scheme, let it pay for it.

Down with hypocritical, grandiose schemes of civil service that are actually plans to conscript cheap labor and increase profits for business. If the government wants to use youth's energy, let it pay for it.

Don't let the cheapskates get away with slavery.

St. Mike's students managed to top the goal for Monday as they dripped 438 units of blood into the little plastic bags. This is still 37 units below the projected quota but the slackers are perhaps to be forgiven as most blood tends to have more coffee than haemoglobin in it on Monday morning.

Trinity College, and others who donated at The Buttery squeezed out 246 units (A unit is 380 c.c. or about 15 shot glasses). That's even up from last year!

The place to be today is the Galbraith Building in the 3rd floor common room. Anybody in Architecture, Engineering, Forestry, Nursing, and me is expected there. Thursday is a repeat performance at the same times — 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Besides a badge, donuts and coffee, they tell you what kind of blood you've got. Did you know that Sherry Brydson has blood type "O" positive, which is the most common type, and Noel Steckley has "AB" positive which is the second most rare, and Tim Koehler has "O" positive too, but they told him not to come back because he always loses consciousness before they take half a pint?

Symposium:

Varsity, Oct 30/68

Students in class struggle

The Canadian Student Movement will hold a symposium on Students in Class Struggle starting Friday night.

"Youth and students suffer from cultural oppression" says the CSM. "Students have a choice: to remain passive consumers or to become active anti-imperialists."

The symposium will discuss the problem and what can be done.

Speakers will be H. S. Bains, chairman of the Montreal Necessity for Change Institute of Ideological Studies; Steve Queller, a graduate student from McGill University; Kenny Charles, a Sir George Williams student. One of the topics under discussion will be the recent Québec junior college revolt.

Half-mast protest

Bluefield, Va. (CUP — CPS) — The students and administration at Bluefield College have decided to keep the school's American flag at half-mast until the end of the Viet Nam war.

Dr. Charles L. Harman, President of the Baptist junior college, said he approved the idea after the 250-member student body voted unanimously for it.

Future issue in USSR will be nationalities

"The problems of nationalities in the Soviet Union may, in the next several decades, become more politically important than the racial issue in the United States," says Zbigniew Brzezinski, director of the Research Institute on Communist Affairs, Columbia University.

This is the basis of the symposium "Inside Three Soviet Republics", sponsored by the Baltic Students Federation. The three republics — Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania — belong to the 14 controlled by the Russian Republic.

Discussion of the effects of this domination on social, political, and educational matters will be led by three professors. Two are from the University of Oklahoma, the third from the New School of Social Research, New York.

The program begins Saturday morning in Hart House. The discussion is followed by a panel of recent visitors to the Baltic republics. Sunday morning, Father F. Geisicunas will discuss religion in the Baltic States.

Bell Canada

At the policy meeting, Craig Heron says, "We were petrified . . . it was like psychological coercion." The students were at a disadvantage since this was the first time most of them had been in a negotiating position with the faculty.

In discussing this request with his class a few weeks ago, Prof. W. H. Nelson argued that technically the department was right; the policy committee discusses salaries, the curriculum committee discusses appointments, and God knows what the library committee discusses!

Prof. Nelson did admit however, that had the attitude of the department been favorable to the students, the present nebulous policy-making procedure could have been reformed. The structure in the department could have been formalized and students allowed to sit on a new policy committee that did actually make policy.

He said that he had in fact made such a suggestion to the department at that time.

At the same time, the HSU also suggested the formation of a staff-student committee within the department.

This suggestion met with no objection probably because it is convenient to be able to have the student opinion expressed when it has some bearing on departmental business (which is often). But it is inconvenient WHEN that student opinion represents considerable voting power which could affect departmental decisions.

It is obvious, then, why with regard to the important request for student positions on decision-making committees, the students were turned down.

SERVICE TO MEMBERS

In providing services to their members, last year the HSU was more successful than it had been in its political endeavors.

First of all, it organized and published quite a presentable course evaluation of 18 history courses representing a good cross-section in both subject and years.

While the aim of any course evaluation is admittedly limited, it is one way a course union can accomplish some of its goals by advising professors of students' reception of courses and by providing students with information to aid them in their choice.

Secondly, at the beginning of this year the HSU set up a voluntary advisory system. This replaced the system of the two previous years whereby every history student had been assigned to a faculty advisor whom he had to see at least once before choosing his courses.

While the HSU agreed that some sort of advisory system should be made available to the student, it felt this should be voluntary. It also felt it was better to receive advice from a student who had taken the courses involved, than from a faculty member who might only know about the few courses in his area of concentration, but who was expected to give advice about all the courses in the history department.

The new advisory system was well received by students.

Mark Sydney, one of the students most instrumental in setting up the HSU last year, has very definite ideas about the value of course unions: "They act as a catalyst for academic reform," he suggests, "and they involve students where they're most affected, at the level of their own courses."

However he feels that the number of changes in the history department have not really been made BECAUSE of the HSU. Three years ago some changes were initiated, when a group of enterprising fourth year "A" students submitted an informal brief to the department. However, this method of making changes points up the need for a formal body to express student opinion.

Sydney does feel the HSU has been "a successful method for learning about the department." But he emphasizes that students still have no say in the actual running of a course . . . in its structure, methodology, and content.

Starting January next year, counter courses sponsored by the HSU will begin. They will cover material the formal courses do not offer. For instance, a course in the philosophy of history, given by a lecturer from the department of philosophy, will be offered to any student in history who is interested. At present, this invaluable course is open to 20 students only.

As for the future, I asked Craig if he envisaged a council of course unions as has been proposed by SAC: "Definitely, it's got to come. And this year we would like to start to talk to people from the other course unions since

CHEMISTRY

The present staff-student liaison committee is composed of the executive of the Chemistry Club, elected student representatives from the general science staff members.

This body is being used as both an advisory body and as a curriculum committee. It was responsible for the formulation of the list of proposed changes that was submitted to Dean Allen. This list was unanimously accepted by the whole chemistry faculty.

Oct 30/68

right now we have no communications with anyone."

There are problems to be worked out. The question of whether the HSU will levy a fee on all members independently or whether it will continue to be financed by SAC has not been settled.

This decision has implications as to whether this organization will exist on a short term basis with limited goals, or whether it will develop any long term plans.

However, the important point is that the History Students' Union is alive and well. It is ready for a year of hard programming and hard bargaining and it stands as an example of what students can do in an effort to improve the quality of their education.

POLITICAL ECONOMY

A student union open to all students who are taking at least two subjects in the department is being formed this month. There will be five basic interest groups in the union: political science, political science and economics, commerce and finance, and general arts.

There have been some limited changes in the department in line with Macpherson report recommendations. Final exams in some subjects have been abolished.

Confidence vote on Waterloo student council

By PETE HUCK

WATERLOO — University of Waterloo students will get the chance tomorrow to turf out their students council.

Council voted Monday night to hold a general meeting of all students at 3 p.m. Thursday in the campus centre.

The meeting is to give the student body the chance to vote confidence — or lack of it — in their council.

Monday's decision came after a petition bearing 690 signatures was presented to council by rep Jim Belfry. The petition, signed to date by about eight per cent of the students, called for council to resign en masse and force a general election.

If elections were required after the referendum, they could not be held until the first week in December. This was considered to be too close to the end of term.

The vote at the general meeting will not be legally binding on councillors, but many have indicated they will abide by the decision of the meeting.

Dissatisfaction with council centres around its alleged left-wing policies and radical actions.

Students help educate adults!

Student power has a very special meaning for 10 University of Toronto students, members of the highly successful Frontier College.

The College is a private organization trying to fill a need left by the adult education programs of the provincial and federal governments. It seems that with all the money these agencies spend they have been unable to help the labourers — loggers, miners, and so on — who work the remote regions of this country.

Students participating in the scheme work in outpost communities during the summer, slugging it out alongside the men who are their students. Any spare time is devoted to teaching such subjects as basic English and mathematics, and discussing the meaning of Canadian citizenship. Some Frontier College teachers also take an active part in organizing a social program for their students.

The College's biggest problem is money. Only a small percentage comes from government grants. The rest must be raised from contributions of unions, business and individuals.

Another source of support has been the student councils of various universities, notably in New Brunswick, Manitoba and Alberta. Tonight delegates from Frontier College will go before U of T's student council. They are hoping for a substantial contribution, since there are more U of T students in the field each summer than from any of the other 25 participating universities.

Community college federation

KINGSTON (CUP) — More than 100 delegates representing 25,000 community college students in Ontario met here this weekend to form the Colleges of Applied Arts and Technology students association of Ontario (CAAT).

The result — a loose federation, with no central agency or staff, to "improve the public image" of the colleges and their students and to improve communications between them.

The group rejected membership in the Ontario Union of Students and the Canadian Union of Students primarily on ideological grounds. Mike

Smith, a delegate from Mohawk College in Hamilton, stressed co-operation with administration and said, "Burning is not something the CAAT'S want to bother with — the image that CUS has created is not what we want."

Gord Goldsworthy of Centennial in Toronto, the present head co-ordinator, was pleased with the conference: "It has instilled a new awareness that results can be achieved by co-operative efforts."

A strong federation will come when it is desired, said Goldsworthy.

Spiro vs "scroungy students"

SAN FRANCISCO (CUP) — Spiro Agnew, American vice-presidential candidate Saturday called for a crackdown on "scroungy student dissenters".

Student protestors, he said, "should be treated like the naughty children they are."

Agnew said the time had come "to protect young minds" from the "militant criminals" on American campuses. "Trying to learn from such criminals," said the pithy politician, "is like trying to take a bath in a sewer."

He drew wild applause for the remark from some 3,000 partisan republican adults, who wore buttons, waved balloons and yelled slogans.

with the Birchers (the charge is "creating a disturbance by fighting") although it takes two to fight. No Birchers were arrested although dozens of witnesses saw them attack the left-wing demonstrators.

Scores of witnesses saw one Bircher picked up by the police, taken over to the paddywagon, and then released.

Were the police politically motivated? While the demonstrators were picketing the Consulate, the Birchers were chanting "We want Wallace!" A number of witnesses will swear they observed several policemen nod in agreement and say, "We want Wallace too."

Police have never had so many men out for a demonstration. Is it only a coincidence that Metro Police are in the midst of riot training as well? The evidence shows there was no need to break up the demonstration, yet it was broken up. Is it a coincidence that, again, all these riot-trained troops were present?

Was it necessary to arrest those speaking, even though nobody who wanted to use the sidewalk was being blocked and nobody was being "disturbed"? Were the police politically motivated in making their arrests in the first place? Det. Carr, for example, was seen at the demonstration site.

Finally, did the police have enough grounds to break up the demonstration? Or was the slightest pretext used by police Insp. Magahey so he could give his freshly-trained troup a tryout?

The praise the cops received for their "restraint" sounds vaguely like praising little Johnny for putting out the fire he started, because we are so relieved it didn't get any bigger.

In fact, if there had been a riot, it would have been directed only at the cops. The CNLF demonstration was peaceful, and only a handful of cops were needed to keep the right and left wing groups apart. The fight which did flare up was broken up by no more than three policemen. No more were necessary at any time.

(There is a human dynamic involved when police appear on the scene. The cops expect trouble, brace for it, and nearly always get it. Yet, when the demonstration was in its early stages, there was no trouble with the handful of cops then watching the proceedings.)

Some people believe that I advocated violence against the police in my editorial. I said "violence is the only language pigs understand". I only point out that if the cops continue to break up peaceful protests as they did this one, we will have to fight for the right to protest. It is further worth noting that virtually all violence in student demonstrations around the world has come from the POLICE. They are the ones with arms, not the students.

I have been criticized for drawing from the U.S. terminology in calling the police "pigs". I have been told that Canadians exist in a unique situation which does not require such terms.

I reply that if the Canadian situation is so unique, why have the Toronto cops borrowed from U.S. techniques of riot control?

I have been criticized for saying that Toronto has entered the police state era. When a group of police are permitted, and even encouraged by the daily media, to break up peaceful demonstrations, deny people the right of assembly and freedom of speech, then I reply that if the police state is not here, it is coming.

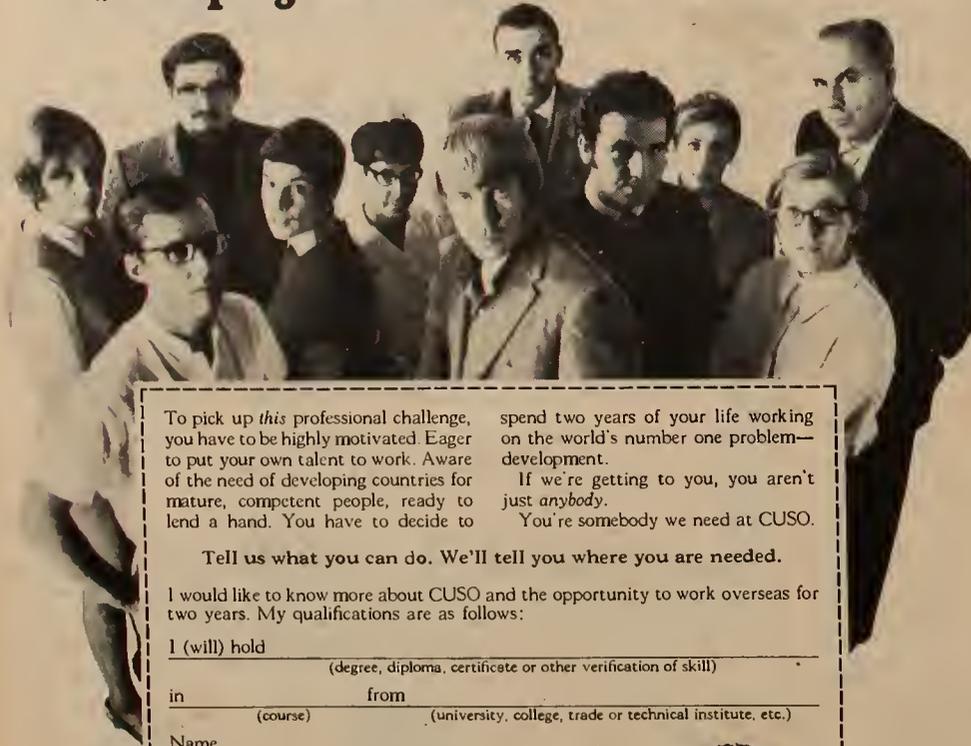

The police state exists in many American cities, and it is folly to claim that Canada will be immune from the same situation. We share American culture and values, we share the American economic and political systems.

Canada lacks only the Vietnam war, the racial problem, and the huge urban slums.

But above all, we saw in the Toronto cops' reaction to the demonstration, another manifestation of the U.S. "law and order" syndrome, a syndrome which only exists when peace, equality and freedom are lacking.

Weekend water warriors win

Varsity water poloists won the season's opening game Saturday by the narrowest margin in five years when they outlasted RMC 12-9.

The much improved cadets, riding the crest of the previous week's upset 11-9 victory over McMaster, fought tenaciously but futilely against a better-balanced Varsity attack. Blues generally showed good if uninspired control of the play at both ends of the pool, but evidenced weakness at mid pool.

Coach Otto Demjen will be trying new combinations to strengthen the middle. He was, however, pleased with the performance of several of the new men on the team.

Forward Hunter Milbourne opened the scoring with a tally at the three minute mark and showed a good sense of team work in setting up veteran Chris McNaught for six goals.

Another rookie in his first Varsity game, Alex Leroy, earned a starting berth because of his team play and the addition of two goals.

Varsity's scoring was completed by McNaught's penalty shot, a single by forward

Dave Breech and a breakaway shot by Skip Bergman on a pass from Breech.

Rookies Brian Barras and Alden McEachern played well in goal but lacked the crisp command of the net that can come only with experience.

The RMC shooting barrage (25 shots) were less than optimally potent because of the small size of the Hart House pool. Their offensive line tended to bunch in front of the goal allowing Blues' defencemen Bergman and Hackett chances to break up their scoring attempts.

Consequently, only one goal was scored by a RMC forward. The most effective cadet was the rover, Beaman, who contributed eight of his team's nine goals, most of them on well-placed shots from Varsity's achilles heel near mid pool.

Both rookie goaltenders gained valuable experience with their real test to come against McMaster next week. McMaster is expected to be dangerous in their Olympic-sized pool.

MOST UNSUNG HEROES OF THE GRIDIRON.. OFFENSIVE LINEMEN

By ROD MICKLEBURGH

The crowd hushes in anticipation as the quarterback yells his signals. At just the right moment he gets the ball slapped into his hands and wham! biff! pow! crunch! schmozzle! (schmozzle?) the offensive line delicately gropes its way into the opposition. Sometimes you can hear the thud for miles.

Along the line of scrimmage — that's where the real hood-and-guts of football takes place, where football becomes a true contact sport, and where the giants of the game congregate and hit, unnoticed by the crowd.

While the spectators roar their appreciation as a swivel-hipped halfback bobs and weaves through a maze of frustrated defenders, the four or five linemen who got him there munch the turf in anonymity. For an offensive lineman, the only satisfaction is a personal one, or perhaps a friendly pat on the butt from the coach, one of the few people who notices when a job's well done.

Last Saturday afternoon against Western, when Varsity Blues put on such a tremendous offensive performance, plaudits were appropriately showered on quarterback Vic Alboini, running backs Mike Raham and Glen Markle, etc. And, of course, the plaudits were well deserved.

But, as Alboini and the hoys would be the first to point out, they all came about because of an incredibly top-notch job turned in by Varsity's offensive line. No team piles up over 300 yard on the strength of their running backs alone.

Varsity blockers ripped gaping holes in the Mustang defense which, by the end of the game, resembled torn mosquito netting with Blues flitting through at will.

Anehoring the left and right tackle positions are two of the biggest men on the team, Arnie Carefoote (6'4", 245 lb.) and Norm Trainor (also 6'4", 245 lb.).

Carefoote, Blues' veteran eo-captain has been an all-star tackle for the past two years. His return to the lineup after sitting out the first two games has been a 'big' factor in the line's rapid improvement.

Trainor played briefly with Blues in 1966 and has waited until this year to return. He's filled in admirably for departed all-star tackle, Jim Kellam. Both Trainor and Carefoote are used defensively by coach Murphy on third down situations and goalline stands. Just seeing them lumber onto the field is usually enough to halt the enemy drive by petrification alone.

WHAM! BIFF! POW! CRUNCH! SCHMOZZLE!
Note pulling guards Whitaker (51) and Turner (50)

(6'1", 205 lb.) and Derek Turner (6', 200 lb.).

Whitaker, one of the team's supposed wits, is in his third season with the team. After missing the latter part of 1967 with a concussion, Whitaker has bounced back with renewed vigor and his best football yet for Varsity.

Turner comes to Toronto from University of Ottawa. He's fitted in well with the team, and me and Whitaker may well be the top pulling guards in the league. Turner plans to be a pulling dentist upon graduation.

Centering these 890 pounds of beef is smiling Rick Agro (6', 210 lb.). An all-star guard with McMaster last year, Agro was moved to centre by Murphy when both of his centres from the previous year graduated. If Blues happen to make it to the College Bowl, it will be no new experience for Agro, who's been in the last two, with McMaster in 1967 and Waterloo Lutheran the year before that.

Lefkos is ace in hole

Varsity Blues invade Hamilton this afternoon for a soccer match that can only be called crucial. For the past four years, McMaster has finished second to Blues — a situation they would love to remedy.

A win for Marauders would vault them into second place while a victory for Blues would leave them in first place, one point ahead of Western Mustangs.

Blues defeated McMaster 4-1 here at home two weeks ago and in the process were forced to come up with their best effort of the season. Any output short of the best in Hamilton would mean trouble as far as the championship is concerned. Varsity cannot afford to lose a single point.

Blues do, however, have an ace up their sleeve in the person of Jim Lefkos. Lefkos, last year's scoring champ, has been hot the last couple of games with four-goal performances against York and Western. If he continues to come on strong, Blues' task will be made a little easier.

Coach Glass is looking for a big effort from link-men Adrian Verhulst and Dwight Taylor. The twosome must control midfield if Blues are to build up any sort of a consistent attack. Korner Kicks... Blues will not be missing any players for today's game. This is the first time since they played Guelph that all fourteen regulars are ready to go.

ARCHERY - GOLF

Neither — but a combination! University of Toronto students plus three staff from the School of Physical and Health Education and the Department of Women's Athletics took their bows and arrows and off they went on Thurs. October 24th, to West Hill Golf Club for a round of Archery Golf.

Nothing was altered on the golf course for their arrival. They "teed off" with what they call a "flight" shot and after many approach shots along the fairway as do the golfers, they arrived at a 4 inch rubber ball perched on a stand 12 inches above the ground.

With accurate aiming on the part of each of these girls, the ball was knocked to the ground, bringing several girls in attendance, scores at or just above par for the seven holes played.

The top shooters of the day were Kit Koehler, PHE II and Pat Murray, PHE III.

Perhaps someday golf courses will be used by as many archers as golfers seeking a recreational outing???

Meanwhile, back at the tennis courts, Marguerite Moore, VIC I and Olga Predkoe, PHE IV, defeated all their opposition and are this year's winners of the Interfaculty Doubles Tennis Tournament.

Ghoul escapes UC tower

Late last night a ghoul escaped from the University College Tower.

The creature is presumed to have broken the glass of a narrow casement window and lowered itself by means of a length of sheets knotted together.

It then stole through the pale blue shadows of moonlight, across the UC courtyard, and into the world beyond.

The hideous ashen-faced fiend carried a goody-bag at its side, obviously bent on shelling out.

First stop was the home of president Claude Bissell. A white-uniformed woman batted not an eyelid as she dished out his reward: 2 peppermint chielets, two licorice sticks, 2 suckers and a roll of penny candy.

Next on the list was Chancellor O.M. Solandt. Outside his door was a large paper bag and a sign saying "Help Yourself". Our friend did so, but unhappily, the chancellor's numerous previous visitors had left only 3 peanuts and a handful of popcorn crumbs.

Finally, in search of revenge for his long years of imprisonment, the ghoul headed for the home of UC principal Douglas LePan. The principal was just departing when he arrived, but a charming woman met out friend with open arms, and bounteous gifts: candy kisses, foil-wrapped jube-jubes, saran-wrapped licorice and lots of good humour.

Highly pleased with his evening foray, the ghoul returned home, sweating eternal fealty to the Hallowed Evening when the gods pleased to release him from his long years of torment and suffering.

Hey, did you hear the one about the war research grants?

By DAVE FRANK

"Have you heard the story about the girl who was offered a million dollars," Chancellor Solandt was saying to Steve Langdon, who said he hadn't.

"Well, this guy offered her a million dollars if she'd hop into bed with him," the chancellor went on, "and when she agreed the guy said:

"O.K. Now that we've established the principle, how about 10 dollars?"

"You see," said the chancellor, "If you're going to oppose war research then it doesn't matter for whom or how much, does it?"

"No," answered Langdon, "I think I would oppose it on principle."

Solandt went on to try to convince the SAC president that there was no reason to oppose U.S. military grants to the university while accepting funds from the Canadian defence establishment.

"The amount we receive from the U.S. is trivial," said Solandt. "Most is from the Canadian government. Do you oppose that?"

That conversation came at the end of a three and a half hour meeting of the president's council in the Simcoe Hall senate chambers yesterday afternoon.

It was cool in the huge chamber. Sunlight streamed in through the high windows, and smoke floated in layers through the air.

Wallace McCutcheon, puffing on a cigar and leaning forward on one hand, sat opposite Andy Wernick, who also leaned forward on his elbows on the long boardroom table.

Bob Rae sat beside Claude Bissell, white Steve Langdon rubbed elbows with Dean Ernest Sirluck, John Ashe, a corpulent pink-faced "retired industrialist", sat beside McCutcheon and watched Wernick too.

John Sword, sat at the head of the table as chairman, to his left was chancellor Solandt, to whose left was an empty chair. Solandt sat sideways on his seat, leaning on and toying with the empty chair.

Altogether there were 28 people there, seven of them students.

"We have no classified research at the University of Toronto," vice-president for research administration G. B. Robinson told the special meeting after distributing listings of military grants to the university.

"Research support for the year 1967-68 was derived from the following sources," he explained:

- Canadian government, $12.5 million.
- Canadian private sources, $2.5 million.
- Ontario government, $1.0 million.
- U.S. government, $5 million.
- U.S. private sources, $9 million.

"The concern of this University is to turn out good scientists," he said. "We must rely on them to decide, later on, what they wish to do with the knowledge and scientific training they acquire here."

"The professor initiates his own project," argued chemistry Prof. W. H. Rapson. "Over the past several years I have received several substantial grants, but it is my research. It is carried out in the way I want and published when and where I wish."

Langdon described how an SAC researcher placed a long distance phone call to the U.S. Defence Department to ask what criteria they used in awarding grants.

"If it is not going to be beneficial to the department of defence, they can't give it," said Langdon. "That was the answer."

"A laissez-faire attitude towards research grants is not sufficient," said D'arcy Martin. "Some extremely difficult moral decisions have to be made. They are not being made now."

He and the other SAC members present urged the university adopt a coherent policy with regard to research grants.

President Bissell, to whom the council may in the future make recommendations, sat in on the session, interposing several questions in the manner of an astute seminar leader:

"Is military research ipso facto bad?" he asked.

"In and by itself, yes," replied Langdon. "But it is of less immediate concern than research which could be contributing to the American war effort."

"To what extent," asked Bissell "does research in general undermine or weaken the quality of teaching?"

"Often it is a case of an ill wind that blows some good," explained medicine dean Dr. A. L. Chute. "Discoveries which could be of benefit to the whole of humanity are made on funds from defence sources in the U.S."

The SAC members said they were most worried about the general drift of all university research, that there were aspects of society

The Chemical Engineers are planning a Varsity burn-in for those whose hatred of The Varsity has reached those proportions outside Convocation Hall today at 1 p.m. For the story of the last Varsity burning, see page 2.

besides the industry and the military which should be served by research facilities.

Aerospace studies institute director G.N. Patterson invited students to visit his institute to find out for them selves what was happening

"If there's any war research," he said, "Find it and I'll get it out."

Chemistry Dept. chairman D.J. Leroy also invited students, and said he'd be glad to "explain exactly how we operate and our philosophy."

SAC vs GSU — a draw

Wednesday's Students Administrative Council meeting was the scene of a two and a half hour debate as members questioned the right of the Graduate Students Union to withdraw.

Last week the GSU voted at an open meeting to withdraw. The decision threw SAC into a quandary since the constitution provides no legitimate means for such a move.

Allowing the GSU to withdraw would be "an invitation to anarchy and the end of the student movement at U of T," said Bob Rae (IV UC).

SAC rejected GSU President John Winter's suggestion that a joint commission (5 SAC and 5 GSU members) be formed "to see that the withdrawal is carried out as smoothly as possible."

The GSU's unilateral decision cannot be accepted because SAC is designed to represent all students, SAC President Steve Langdon argued. "The withdrawal is financially unfeasible since it would be impossible to keep grads out of SAC-sponsored events," he said.

"If the GSU withdraws because of political reasons any other group can do likewise and fragmentation of the university would result," he added.

"There is no kind of community here," said Andy Wernick (SGS). "It's a political fact that the majority of grad students consider themselves a part of the university in a very different structural sense than the undergrads."

SAC eventually decided to refer the question to a commission of student leaders from across campus.

• SAC will challenge CFRB radio's Gordon Sinclair to a debate on campus.

Sinclair described Monday's Varsity as full of lies in news, editorial and art, on his daily commentary Monday.

SAC voted to "blacklist" CFRB until Sinclair withdraws his statements and CFRB allows The Varsity editor and members of his staff to reply on CFRB to the charges.

Open meeting ousts Waterloo student's council

WATERLOO (Special)—University of Waterloo students yesterday forced the resignation of their student council.

A general meeting of students defeated by a 550-to-450 vote a motion of confidence in the council. Following this, council decided to resign.

Elections for president and councillors will be held Nov. 27. Almost all reps are expected to seek re-election.

Yesterday's general meeting came after a 690-signature petition called for council to resign and face a general election. Reps voted instead to put the question to a general meeting.

About 1,000 of the 8,000 Waterloo students jammed the campus center for yesterday's vote.

President Brian Iler outlined council's views and actions over the last months. "We seek democratization of the university and the democratization of our society, for only by elimination of authoritarian institutions in our society can we solve the serious problems which beset it, and make the world a more human one."

Iler contended that all major decisions this year, such as the residence protest and campus center takeover, had been taken in general meetings. He admitted some of council's mistakes, particularly a premature flyer which proclaimed, "Administration Yields to Activists."

The student president went on to attack reps who had attended only a few council meetings and then led the petition against it.

"Perhaps they should resign, not because council is unrepresentative, but because they have not been doing their job."

Jim Pike, Engineering Society president, said council should seek a new mandate as students were unhappy with its "confrontation tactics."

Nostalgic Note

In 1929, Varsity editor Leonard Ryan wrote an editorial: To Pet or Not To Pet in which he defended the right of undergraduates to trade smooches against the claim of a Toronto clergyman who said it "debased the coinage of the soul."

The Board of Governors, coming to the conclusion that The Varsity "no longer represented undergraduate opinion," suspended the editor. Engineers burned copies of the paper in front of University college after hanging Ryan in effigy from the rafters of Hart House.

Until the end of term two papers appeared: The Varsity, under a tame editor, and the "Adversity", published in the Toronto Telegram and distributed on campus. Campus cops tried to chase away newsboys trying to sell the paper, but the demand was so great they were helpless.

Clearly, young people are the most discriminated group in our society; moreover... it is the discrimination that produces the category in the first place; it is absurd that people should continue to be treated as if they were incapable of self-direction or of judging their best interests for a decade or more after puberty, and even more absurd that adults and in large measure youth themselves should accept this as natural...

your choice

SAC may finally do something about the "new" OSAP in the near future, or it may not. The decision depends on whether the SAC executive thinks it can get enough student support for an effective protest.

Yesterday was the deadline for OSAP grants this term, the "new" OSAP which makes it even harder for students to get enough money to complete their education (such as it is). Not only that, at least half of it has to be paid back, with interest.

We wonder how many hundreds (or thousands) of students were counting on a substantial OSAP grant to get through this year, and couldn't even afford to enroll. We wonder how many others will find their financial situation pretty tight around March.

It doesn't have to be that way. Student passivity and an almost wholehearted acceptance of the myth of student as second-class citizen have allowed this to happen.

The myth holds that a student should have to live on $2,000 a year, paying about $600 for tuition and books from that. The myth holds that students should live in cramped, overpriced residences or rooming houses if they aren't "lucky" enough to live at home. Nobody else is expected to live that way, of course, but students are "different".

The myth that students accept holds that students are just learning and contribute nothing to the society. Therefore they deserve only minimal support from that society.

Let's forget for a moment that contribution to GNP is anything but a humane way of measuring a person's worth. Instead, let's consider some other people who are also "just learning".

Apprentice plumbers are learners, and they draw a salary. First year of training they get 40 per cent of a journeyman's wage of about $5 an hour. Second year, 50 per cent, and so on up to 80 per cent in the fifth and final year of training.

Apprentice steelworkers make roughly the same percentage per year toward a journeyman's wage of about $4.25. So do woodworkers, electricians, carpenters, most occupations with unions.

That's the crucial difference—the strength and cohesion that comes from a union. And it's not good enough to say that students are being "educated" not "trained" and the union analogy doesn't apply. That's nothing but snobbery.

Most students are just apprentice workers. Of last year's enrollment of regular, full-time undergraduate students, 30 per cent were in the professional faculties and schools—direct job-training. That's 6,468 out of 15,994 students.

What about Arts and Science? Is that "education"? Well, of 9,526 in that faculty, about 50 per cent were in honors courses aimed largely at graduate school, which in turn produces teachers, sociologists, biologists, and so on. Job training.

Overall, about 70 per cent of students at this university are engaged in direct job-training, and it would be puerile to think the other 30 per cent are here just for their minds.

It isn't right that the university should produce only a pool of trained (as opposed to educated) people, but that's reality at the moment. And, like other workers in training, students should get adequate financial support.

We're not going to get it handed to us. The myth is too convenient, it's cheap. But it's also exploitative, if you just realize it.

Professors used to be in the same position, but professors are getting wise. They may strike for more money.

Students might take a leaf from that book. Why shouldn't students strike for better "wages"? If the answer is "they can't", blame the myth.

Anyway, SAC will be feeling you out in the next few days, testing your support for some kind of action to get a better deal for students. This time, it's up to you.

HAPPY HALLOWEEN

editorial

As members of a client state beside an imperial power we are a blinded people. And never more so than four days before their election. We observe with prurient fascination their miseries in the cities, in the Asian battlefields of their empire and in the heart of their political system. Often we hate them, but we still watch, absorbed by their nightmares, blinded to our own.

This Canadian blindness to our own reality is the most worrying effect of their imperialism: not their economic, social and cultural domination over us but the psychically disorienting effects of such control. Their influence upon us is so pervasive that many of us can only identify with their problems and can only be roused by their hatreds or affections. Many of us know more about the Chicago cops than we know about our own, more about Lindsay's New York, than about Dennison's Toronto, more about their political conflicts than about our own. And more worryingly still, we perceive their society in exactly the same way they do. It is I.F. Stone, The New York Review, Senator McCarthy etcetcetc which shape the Canadian view of America. We have never produced a Canadian Tocqueville or Bryce, though we have lived with the Americans longer than any other people.

And if we cannot produce a Canadian critique of American society, we are even less able to produce a critique of our own. We seem unable even to turn our criticisms of American society upon ourselves. We make the usual derivative statements about violence being innate to American life. Yet when Wilfred Sheed said that violence is generated when people feel lost, he was saying that most urban environments, in whatever the country, have a potential to dehumanize, frighten and isolate people. Our urban environments contain in potentia the same inhuman elements which in America tend to disorient and further isolate the unhappy, lonely and the insane.

While we watch the collapse of the American democratic system shouldn't we cast anxious glances at our own system? Our present housing crisis suggests that the constitutional and functional division of powers among the three tiers of our government system make effective amelioration of our urban environment increasingly difficult.

The vortex of American collapse prevents us from looking at ourselves. I don't mean that we haven't written enough earnest, cosmic manifestos about 'what it means to be Canadian'. That we have done to excess. All one can do is decide that Canadian cities, Canadian poverty, Canadian government, Canadian history, Canadian poets and Canadian sculptors are valid subjects for reflection, and then write about them. We tend to ignore these subjects because we judge them inferior to American or European models. But that's not the point. They are valid subjects for reflection simply because they exist and shape our thoughts about ourselves as a people. To judge them by other people's standards of excellence is not really productive because we just become insecure, unsure. Let's take them as they are and think about them as they are, right now. Once we have produced a description of our past, of our culture, and of our environment then we can start to talk about 'what it means to be Canadian'. Right now, we don't really understand our present. We have a vague feeling that we are ruled by an elite, but who has followed up John Porter's study of our ruling class? We have a feeling that we have no past. But how many of us know a goddam about Canadian history? The intellectual history of our perceptions of ourselves as a people is still to be written.

Which brings me to the Review. We have spent so much time in these pages demythologizing and unmasking American myths. A valid and important exercise, to be sure. But surely the more description of our experiences in this city, in this country is incredibly important if we are to know who we are as Canadians. Let's discuss Canada this year. It is a vast uncharted field.

I hope you will write for us.

From 1964 to 1967 Mike Eben of Toronto Argonauts was a football hero for Varsity Blues. An all-star end for each of those four seasons, he helped his teammates to two league championships and one Canadian crown. Last year he capped a superb collegiate career by winning the Hec Crichton Trophy as the outstanding college football player in the nation.

His pass-catching exploits caused paragraphs like the following to appear in the Varsity: "Seldom is the gridiron graced by a sight as aesthetically satisfying as Mike Eben diving full-length after a wayward football. He seems to unfold in slow-motion, terminating with an elegant lunge at the vital moment when the ball arrives."

He was perhaps one of the greatest players ever to perform for Varsity.

So what does Mike Eben himself have to say about those four years?—"I was hindered to quite an extent for my first two years. Professors type-cast me as the 'football hero'. As a result my marks weren't that good. But in third and fourth year things improved. They finally accepted the fact that I could write a literate essay."

For, you see, Mike Eben is not quite your average, every day, rock-em-sock-em sort of football player, the sort who lives only for the big game on Saturday afternoon. For Mike Eben, football has always played, and always will play, a secondary role in his life compared to academic pursuits.

Even now, while holding down a spot as a rookie on the Argos, Eben continues to work full-time at U of T on his Masters degree in German Literature. In fact, he has already set one record on the team as the first player to go directly from a medieval lyric class to the football practice-field.

"I don't need football," he says. "The money's very handy, but no one's doing me a favour by letting me play. For me football is a matter of pride. I play because I want to."

While most players wallow in words like "tough" and "aggressive" and "guts", Eben prefers to think of football in much gentler terms with words like "intelligence" and "grace".

Listen as he talks about his position.

"Contact doesn't particularly thrill me. I enjoy flanker or split-end. There's a certain amount of grace to it. It's not as brutal as the other positions. I like to call it the 'class' position. You're all ## focus:

SCULLER

SCHOLAR

Like hundreds of other University of Toronto students, he wears a faded university jacket, spends a lot of time in the library, and munches on salami sandwiches for lunch at Wymilwood. Like no other University of Toronto student, he also plays professional football for Toronto Argonauts.

mike eben

alone, on your own against one, maybe two, men. No dirt and elbows flying like along the line.

"I like my position for the intelligence involved. Take Bobby Taylor (Argo's all-star flanker) for instance. Although he's perhaps one of the crudest people I've ever met, he's also an incredibly smart-minded person, a real professional athlete. He knows exactly what to do in a given situation."

Eben made the professional football world painfully aware of where his heart really lay when he steadfastly refused to report to British Columbia Lions who had claimed him in the college draft. As he said at the time, "Why should I go from the best to the second-best graduate school in the country."

For five long months, his future football status was in jeopardy until finally Argonauts made a deal for him on July 20, long after training camp opened. Eben is still bitter about the whole affair. "I was really put off with football and just about ready to pack it in. The five months of bickering bugged me a lot and bothered me right through my exams. Finally, in all sincerity, I told Argos and B.C. I was quitting football. I was signed within the week."

Now Calgary has expressed interest in drafting Eben in payment of an earlier deal. Eben finds these professional wheeling-and-dealings hard to take. "I can't believe Calgary. They must know what I went through with B.C. Calgary is a bigger hogtown than anywhere else. When we were out there for a game I sort of scouted around the university library, and the books reminded me more of Dick and Jane books. If Calgary takes me I'll just quit football."

Eben has enjoyed his season with Argos despite spending most of his time on the bench. ("I've thought of taking a book to read during the game. Once I asked the trainer to order me a cheeseburger and some french fries.

He almost fell off the bench.")

Surprisingly, considering his passion for academia, Eben gets along well with his coach, Leo Cahill, whom one might expect to express distaste for a "brain". "We get along okay. He doesn't seem to mind the sort of smart-ass little remarks I occasionally throw at him. Actually I have a lot of respect for Cahill. He's an excellent handler of people and he has a very articulate manner, which rather surprised me."

But with the players, although relations are cordial, it's a slightly different story. "They're not my type particularly, but we're friends, you know. The fact that I'm still at school is my great separation on the team. I get a lot of hazing and they call me 'Doctor' or 'professor'. Every time I use a big word they get all excited."

"I did go pubbing with a few of the players in Calgary. I had my Cokes. They couldn't believe it. And I have my verbal banter with the players. Once, on the road, I was in a room along with (Bill) Frank, (Bill) Symons and some other American ballplayers and we started talking about Vietnam. Well, I was the only one there arguing against the American position and I took a real lambasting. I was really quite surprised. They made a pretty intelligent case for what their country is doing there."

Despite spending four such satisfying years with Varsity, Eben has no regrets at leaving the team even if it would mean playing every game as a regular and as a star.

"I missed it at first," he says, "but, to be honest without being haughty, I couldn't play with Blues anymore. Just take the practices for instance. With Argos there's a seven minute warm-up, and an hour and ten minutes running through plays. And that's it. With Blues there were always two hour sessions, and the coach really used to drive the guys. Sometimes it seemed they went on only for the sake of making them two hours long."

"Without meaning to malign Blues, it would be like coming back to Grade 13 to play ball after I had made the Blues."

One thing you notice very much when talking to Mike Eben is how remarkably sure he is of himself. He doesn't mince his comments nor does he hide behind a facade of meaningless rhetoric. He knows what he thinks and says it, clearly and to the point. No political smokescreens.

"I'm very tired of sitting on the bench during games. I feel I've learned quite a lot and I'd like to be in there. But realistically, Argos are awfully strong and there's no one to replace. It's getting kind of frustrating. I don't doubt my ability at all; it's simply that there's no opportunity."

As the conversation drew to a close, Eben became a bit more introspective. "I'm a sensitive guy and I don't like the hard-nosed attitudes some coaches have toward the game. To me football isn't that way, or at least I haven't adapted to it that way."

"Sometimes I just like to be left alone, run my patterns and then go back to the library." He grinned self-consciously. "And work on an essay."

It was a convenient point to leave Eben alone and off he went to the library, to work on an essay no doubt.

I went out whistling into the cold, thinking just how nice it was to have someone like Mike Eben playing professional football.

constructions--both sides of the coin

Maybe the art of making constructions is particularly suited to females — I don't know. At any rate, two interesting shows by constructivists, both women, are in town now and are worth seeing.

Louise Nevelson's show at the Dunkelmann Gallery just may turn out to be the most important and exciting exhibition that will be offered this year. Miss Nevelson is the acknowledged master of constructivism and her influence on the working ideas of younger sculptors has been considerable. The show she has sent to the Dunkelmann is made up entirely of new pieces, pieces created especially for this Canadian showing. Twelve of the seventeen works in the gallery are further developments of her wooden sculptural walls. The rest are new concepts in plexiglass. It is interesting to see how Miss Nevelson has transposed her ideas into the new medium while maintaining the essence of her earlier work.

The black wooden pieces are surprisingly colourful. By the manipulation of shadows, highlights and all the nuances of light in between Miss Nevelson is able to produce a range of subtle colours from deep velvet black through shadowy blues to startling whites. The ability to control light is equally evident in the plexiglass sculptures which despite hard edges and industrial precision can appear almost organic.

The materials used are transformed entirely by the context in which they are placed. If you look closely at the Black Night Rhythm series, you will see pieces of clothes-pins, rubber stamps and old, worn pieces of wood among highly polished and carefully cut forms. The familiar objects no longer have any associations with our society. They are included only because of the textures they can produce. In the plexiglass walls, screws are used to hold the components together. It is unimportant that they are not structurally necessary. They are there only as textural punctuation. Miss Nevelson, thank God, does not think only in terms of structural necessity. Louise Nevelson's vision is a romantic one. Her sculptures have the quality of totems, cult images but the exact meaning of the symbols always escapes you. The Uninitiated Spectator. By the same token, you are sure that the complex elements in each work follow a logical pattern, but when you strain to discover the key to the arrangement it escapes you. Each piece is a mystery, but one that haunts, not one that frustrates.

Go and see the show. It's at 15 Bedford Rd. until Nov. 9. The Gallery is open from 11 'til 5:30 every day except Sunday and Monday.

If the Nevelson show has interested you in construction, go up to the Pollock Gallery on Markham St. where the works of Sheila Hirtle are on display until Nov. 2. The gallery is open in the evenings so you will have time to see it before it comes down. Like Miss Nevelson's work, Sheila Hirtle's is mysterious and totem-like.

However, it is the flip side of the coin as far as constructions go. Unlike Miss Nevelson's sculptural walls, her works are essentially paintings with additions. They are brightly coloured and a good deal of fun.

A Canadian trained in New York and living in South Africa, Sheila Hirtle takes her images from both worlds. The old wood that forms the base for her constructions is painted in brightly primitive colours and often has a simple geometric pattern carved into it. When this is all that happens in a piece it falls flat as only a hard-edged geometric painting can. However, to most pieces familiar bits of modern hardware have been added. "New Africa 5-Door" exhibits a Yale lock; another has large nails sticking out of it. A beautifully ornate faucet attached to a coloured board drips water into a blue pail on the floor. By rights these constructions should not work. They ought to have turned out to be old-hat, ineffective, coy. But they didn't. They're cheerful and amusing. The artist believes that the meaning of art lies in the purely individual enjoyment of it. That is all the meaning her constructions need. And if you are collecting, the prices are surprisingly low.

'the freedom and responsibility mean a lot to me'

Dave Shelly, a London Life representative in Montreal

"In my last year of university I talked to recruiters from several different types of companies. All of them offered jobs with training programs which would eventually lead to a position of responsibility. But I wanted something more. I wanted something that would let me get out and meet people. I wanted a position that would give me responsibility right away and at the same time a degree of independence and freedom. In other words, I wanted something more than just a job. That's why I joined London Life."

Dave Shelly graduated from Loyola College in economics in 1966. After a three-month training course, he chose the agency he wanted to work in from among the 100 operated by London Life across Canada. In the following months, he established himself as a successful life insurance underwriter. If you are interested in a career that offers you something more, ask your placement officer about London Life sales positions. Or write to the Personnel Department, London Life Insurance Co., London, Ontario.

a time of torment

James Eayrs, Minutes of the Sixties, Macmillan, $5.95
I. F. Stone, In a Time of Torment, Random House (Vintage) $2.25

The Sixties have been, for the most part, the worst of times. The winter of our discontent has been a long and grim trial. And in that trial perhaps the only solace in a morass of political chaos is the occasional voice of sanity which gives cause for faith in the future of homo the sap.

Neither James Eayrs, who is a professor of Political Science at the University of Toronto, nor I. F. Stone, the more renowned gadfly and critic of American politics, has written scathing ideological attacks on the American and World Scene, nor more personal soul-barrings on the perennial theme 'The World and Me.' The value of their books is in their honesty, their lucidity, and the toughness of their judgment.

Eayrs' book is written "in the agitation of the moment, within days, often hours, of shattering events." The title, Minutes of the Sixties, reveals its nature: Eayrs is acting as recording secretary to the world. It is a collection of reactions to immediate events, from the inaugural of 1960 to the Commonwealth conferences over Rhodesia.

Many of his judgments in light of what we know now, make amusing reading indeed. To cite the most outstanding misprediction, written in 1965:

"The Johnson administration, though its personnel remains largely unchanged, has already demonstrated a different style in its approach to international affairs. It is more detached, more philosophical, slightly less frenetic, than its predecessor... the new priority now attached to domestic problems is the result of the passing of the illusion of American omnipotence..."

But the strength of the book is the strength of a good diary. Eayrs' detachment and discipline lead him to record events with perception and cohesion. He captures some of the hopes of the early Kennedy era, the total folly of the Bay of Pigs, the quiet beginnings of the Johnson administration and its disastrous pursuit of the communist menace in Vietnam.

There is an essential honesty about the book that has characterized much of Eayrs' writing. It is a diary of the 60's, in addition to being an analysis of such diverse subjects as NATO, the UN, the Commonwealth, and Canadian foreign policy.

That it records his personal reactions to events as they happen is its great quality. It reminds us that hindsight is perhaps the greatest distorting element of all: in the interest of truth, rather than mere self-analysis, it would be a good idea if more 'By-standers' would simply record their impressions and, more, what really happened.

If Eayrs is a distinguished and analytical observer of international politics, I. F. Stone has the bite and brashness that Eayrs lacks. Eayrs is an academic; the tone of his collection is one of detached reason.

Stone's book, a collection of his writings over the past seven or eight years, is a brilliant addition to the literature of criticism. Stone's one-man-band publication, 'I. F. Stone's Weekly' has been a lonely battler for common sense and reason against American administrations since 1953.

The best series of pieces is, of course, that on Vietnam. From the very beginning, right from the first 15,000 observers in 1963 and even before to the days when the then Vice President Johnson referred to Ngo Dinh Diem as the 'Winston Churchill of Southeast Asia' (I would hate to think what that makes Johnson), Stone has been hammering away at the administration — and American liberalism in general — for its embarkation on its Struggle against Evil.

His technique is masterful. He reads everything; he appears to forget nothing. He takes great pleasure in producing masses of evidence given by Dean Rusk and Robert McNamara about 'limited commitments' and Westmoreland's remarks about 'Victory around the next corner', and then gleefully points to similar statements from French generals and politicians in 1950.

Stone's criticism of Vietnam from the start, and his refutation of the administrations' variegated justifications of the war, must be one of the great journalistic tours de force of our age. His is one of the few voices of pure reason and common sense coming out of Washington. It is also a voice of considerable courage. Murray Kempton, in his introduction to Stone's book, calls him a Whig, a radical Whig, "not afraid of the King. It is the tone of a long-distance runner."

He writes with pungency and humour; his criticisms are directed ruthlessly at nonsense and political hypocrisy wherever he can find it. But his indignation is never maudlin or self-righteous. He can be kind to those who he thinks speak with a true voice, as reflected in his obituaries of Estes Kefauver and A. J. Muste. But his condemnation of the liberal establishment, from Johnson to Schlesinger to Richard Goodwin, is as brutal and ruthless as any I have read.

Good critics cannot save the souls of nations gone awry or salvage lost generations. That is not what they are about. Their task, primarily, is to point out that the Emperor — or the King — is, despite his angry reassurances to the contrary, in fact wearing no clothes at all and that it's time we all awoke to the fact.

Eayrs is everyman's Boswell, recording for posterity the grandeur and folly of human politics as they occur. Stone is more trenchant, more angry, more determined to convert and to indict than to merely record his reactions for an interested public. Eayrs' Minutes is a considerable achievement, a revealing and valuable record of a turbulent eight years. Stone's essays are a triumph. Read them.

We Bombed in New Haven, Joseph Heller, Knopf, 196 pp., $5.95.

"It was love at first sight. "The first time Yossarian saw the chaplain he fell madly in love with him."

And so Catch-22 was off on its mad, sprawling, frustrating, hilarious, convoluted, tragic course. It will probably be judged (by whatever shadowy Hellerian generals do such judging) as the best American novel since A Farewell to Arms.

Remember Major Major Major named by a father with a sadistic sense of humour and promoted by a computer with the same sense of humour as the father? And how the colonel looked at everything as a black eye or a feather in his cap, just like your high school principal? And the great classical plagiarisms ("Men we must remain right on the bombing schedule. Ripeness is all")? And how they would let you go home if you were insane, but only if you asked — but of course, if you asked, that meant you wanted to go home and therefore you couldn't be insane so you would have to stay? And remember when "Yossarian ripped open the snaps of Snowden's flak suit and heard himself scream wildly as Snowden's insides slithered down to the floor in a soggy pile and just kept dripping out". And Snowden kept whimpering "I'm cold, I'm cold." Catch-22.

Of course what made Catch-22 great was the reali-

The Algiers Motel Incident, John Hersey
Alfred A. Knopf, 397 pages

"At this point in the narrative, enter myself. Reluctantly. I have always, before this, stayed out of my journalism, even as a manipulative pronoun, having believed that it sufficed for a writer to "come through" to the reader — by the nature of his selections from the whole, his filtering of all that had gone through his eyes and ears and mind . . . But this account is too urgent, too complex, too dangerous to too many people to be told in a way that might leave doubts strewn along its path; I cannot afford, this time, the luxury of invisibility." (P.30)

With this statement John Hersey begins unravelling a Gordian knot which twists the Detroit riots, racism in America, the criminal psychology and a series of personal tragedies around a central cord—the killing of three negroes at Algiers Motel. The "nice people" in Detroit and American society as a whole are ipso facto racists—and it is perhaps too late to redeem them. This latter point is probably not one that Hersey would admit to, but then he is from a different generation than myself and much more optimistic.

The vilest aspects of racism appear in the interviews with Detroit police authorities, but it is soon evident that the sickness has spread throughout the society. The reader probes social hypocrisies while he probes the events leading to the systematic execution of three unarmed negroes in a Detroit motel by "decent, God-fearing" police.

Hersey's own prejudices in the case are obvious, and he himself points out many of them. But by making himself a part of the story, he clarifies his own role in the action much more than, for example, Truman Capote in In Cold Blood. Perhaps Hersey is in his own way indicating that the author of Hiroshima zation that began about page one hundred and grew into a surety by the end, that all this madness was real and happening today in the U.S. And here too.

Heller says the same thing in We Bombed in New Haven, his first play. Except here, perhaps by realizing the difference between the drama and the novel form, he irons out all the marvellous tangled folds. The result, unfortunately, is flat, and because it is flat, abstract, and unembellished, the message (that we are all guilty, that we are all putting our sons on the suffering block and then driving the knife home) does not penetrate our intellectual guard. We know all that, it can't be helped. Henderson-actor (the character is half the time himself and the other half the actor who plays him) does not kick the bull-shit out of us the way that Yossarian would have.

Perhaps this is because I read the book but did not see the play. In the theatre Marat/Sade seems to speed past at something near the intellectual speed of light. When read, it seems almost shallow.

Yet I suspect the sight of soldier-actors playing with rattles is too straight-forward to give an audience much intellectual or emotional exercise. "Do you think that I, — (the actor's real name) would actually let my son go off to war and be killed, and stand here talking to you and do nothing?" We know he would—does—and we would too, but We Bombed in New Haven, doesn't make us believe it. Pity.

— bob bossin

(1946) is not altogether removed from the realm of the "non-fiction novel." Not since Hiroshima has John Hersey produced a non-fiction work to equal it, but I think The Algiers Motel Incident not only equals but surpasses it.

Hersey's personal involvement is extremely refreshing. Early in the narrative he confesses that his mind was "ventilated" on the racial problems of the States "by that surpassingly remarkable document of our time The Autobiography of Malcolm X, which every white American with any pretensions to racial understandings simply must read. (If you have not read it, close this book now and read that other and come back to these premises, if you will, later . . .)" An honest suggestion, albeit mixed with a slightly idealistic hope for solutions in following lines.

I began with a metaphor of the Gordian knot: the ingenious invention of eastern sages which Alexander was asked to untie as proof of his right to enter their lands. This book is like a complex puzzle. The murder of the three young men by white police becomes a small version of the rioting of that summer, and finally of the larger "knot" of racism in North American society. Mr. Hersey does not seem to believe that the problem is "too far gone" to be solved. But as I recall Alexander disdained further talk. He simply hacked the knot apart with his sword.

THE SECOND COMING: THE AMERICAN ELECTION AND BEYOND THE INFINITE

... Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold; Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world, The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere The ceremony of innocence is drowned; The best lack all conviction, while the worst Are full of passionate intensity.

Surely some revelation is at hand; Surely the Second Coming is at hand.

... And what rough beast, its hour come round at last, Slouches toward Bethlehem to be born.

And it came to pass that a great despair fell upon the people, for it had been told them in days past that they would become a great nation; that all the nations of the world would look to them with wonder; that they would inherit a land flowing with milk and honey. But they looked about them, and about their cities and about their people and behold! they did not see the greatness. They said "Where is our king? Where are our leaders? Who will bring salvation?"

And a great spirit of uneasiness crept over the leaders of the nation and they said to each other "What will we do? For the restlessness of the people hangs heavy over our necks." And one from among them said "We will give them a messiah."

And another from among them said "We will give them three messiahs."

And it came to pass that the three messiahs went out among the people, promising rich and comfortable days in the land of milk and honey.

Now in those days there were many children among the people of that nation, and these children were unskilled in the mysterious arts of political truth. And yet they said unto their elders "Wherefore say you that there are three messiahs? For we see only one messiah, and he is one in the same, there being no difference between him." And lo, the people were ashamed for they saw that the children spoke truly, that there really was only one messiah cleverly disguised as three messiahs; and from that day forth, they called the one messiah Boredom, meaning this is what happens when you have one messiah claiming to be three messiahs.

And seeing the masses of people, Boredom went up onto the mountain of television and said:

"My friends, Blessed are the middle-class urban whites, for they shall have order.

Blessed are the cops, for they shall have law.

Blessed are the rich, for they shall get richer.

Blessed are the established leaders for they shall continue to rule.

Blessed are the Mayor Daleys, for their kind shall inherit the earth.

Blessed are the people of Vietnam, for they shall have no population problems.

And a great confusion went out over the people, for they did not understand such matters of great weight. And so they asked again saying "What about peace? Is Boredom the swords and their pruning hooks into spears..."

But the spirit of uneasiness once again crept upon the three messiahs called Boredom, and thus he said "I will give them honorable settlement."

And once more Boredom went out among the people. And said "Verily I say unto you; it has been written that the government shall be upon my shoulder; and my name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Honorable Settlement."

But it came to pass that there was no honorable settlement and the people asked "What about honorable settlement?"

Thus once again did Boredom crawl back to the three-messiahs-in-one who was called Boredom, and they said

"We have heard its over now

And war must surely come The cities they are broke in half

The middle men are gone For we cannot walk in the parks by day

Nor the streets by night But there is great stealing of purses

And beating of men and ravishing of women

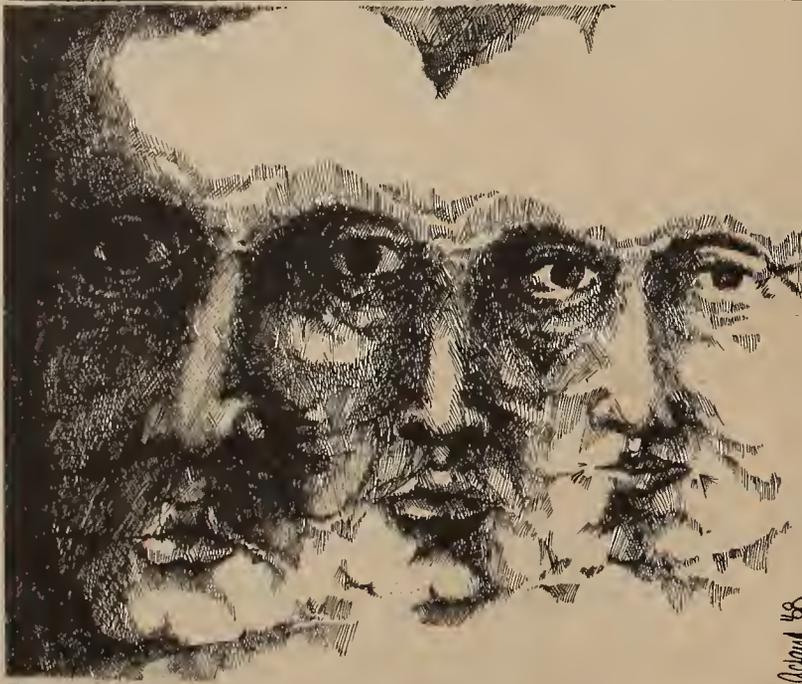

And beating of women and ravishing of men

And drinking of wine in the back alleys

And rioting through the streets

And great looting and burning of department stores

And also there is great sniping."

Prince of Peace?" And they remembered what had been told them in former days, that the government shall be upon His shoulder; and His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.

And it came to pass that Boredom experienced considerable uneasiness, and he turned to the mighty generals of war and said "The people call 'Peace, peace, but there is no peace' ". And the generals said "It is not for the people to call for peace. It is not even for the nations of the world to call for peace. We shall judge between the nations and shall decide for many peoples; and we have judged that they shall beat their plowshares into mighty generals and say "I am uneasy, for the people cry 'honorable settlement, honorable settlement, but there is no honorable settlement.' "But the hearts of the mighty generals had been hardened against the people and they said to three-messiahs-in-one who was called Boredom "We will give them war."

And Boredom again went out among the people and he said "Verily I say unto you; it has been written that the government shall be upon my shoulders; and my name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of War."

And behold! there was war. Hosanna.

Yet some there were who murmured against the

Boredom went out among the people and he said

"My friends, Woe to him who steals purses, for he shall be jailed.

Woe to him who beats men and ravishes women; and beats women and ravishes men, for he shall be beaten and ravished.

Woe to him who burns and loots and smashes private property, for he shall be burned and looted and smashed.

Woe to him who snipes, for he shall himself be sniped.

And greatest woe to him who is innocent of all of the above but has earned our displeasure, for we shall suspend habeas corpus."

Yet some of the people did not understand and they asked "But will this bring peace to the cities?"

And Boredom said "It will bring law and order."

A great confusion fell upon the people for they did not know what this meant, and they asked "What is this law and order that it could be a substitute for peace?"

And Boredom answered saying "America for the Americans."

And the people knew what it meant. Hosanna.

Yet there was still a great murmuring from some others from the cities, for behold, there were many plagues among them and some of these were rats, lice, cockroaches, high rents and absentee landlords, coldness in winter and great heat in summer, abundance of children and scarcity of jobs, and they could not see the sun by day nor the moon by night, for there was a great poisonous vapor visited upon the city. And these people said to the three-messiahs-in-one called Boredom, who was by this time diminishing in stature in the eyes of many, "How much longer will these plagues be visited upon us?"

But Boredom's heart had been hardened against them and he said "law and order" and "America for Americans".

And a great anger fell upon these inhabitants of the cities and they said "We will unleash a great fury upon the cities

Of Fire and brimstone will it consist

And we will wage war upon the cities

Until the cities lie wasted Without inhabitants and without men

And until the city is utterly desolate."

And there was great confusion among the people, for they did not know what this meant; and they asked "What meaneth this fire and brimstone for us?"

And it was answered "It means, mo'fu', that you better be black or we gonna beat you ass! Hosanna!

And the people knew what it meant.

And in those days there was a great wall within the city to divide up the inhabitants; into two parts were they divided, and the two parts were different like night and day; and one part was called black and the other was called white.

One day a great miracle

occurred, for behold, there was discovered handwriting on the wall.

And this is the writing that was inscribed on the wall: MALCOLM X CITY. And this is the interpretation of the matter: the days of the nation have been numbered and brought to an end; Boredom has been weighed in the balance and been found wanting; the nation is divided and given to the Blackman and the Indian.

And it came to pass that a great fear fell upon the mighty generals and the three-messiahs-in-one who was called Boredom; for they were afraid lest they be utterly laid waste and despoiled and one of the generals was heard to say "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we will surely die." But Boredom said "I will go out among the people and win their support with my charm." And the three-messiahs-in-one who was called Boredom went out among the people and said to them:

"All you like sheep have gone astray."

But the people did not listen and they threw fire.

And again Boredom

cried out frantically saying "Have ye not known? Have ye not heard? Has it not been told you from the beginning? Have you not understood from the foundations of the earth?"

But the people did not listen and they threw brimstone.

And a third time Boredom cried out saying "The Dove will dwell with the Hawk, and the Elephant shall lie down with the Donkey and with the Panther together, and I shall lead them."

But the people said "Get thee behind me Satan." And they turned away, for behold, they had discovered many other new messiahs among them. Hosanna.

It was drizzling and the cold soaked up into our feet as we made our way across the park. We were speculating on the numbers which would be drawn on such a wretched day and on such an apparently cold issue as Vietnam. But as we rounded the Parliament Buildings the sun came out on 4000 protestors and for a moment Queen's Park was a carnival scene. To our right, people were selecting placards from a pick-up truck with "Vietnam Mobilization Committee" painted on its side. Two hundred yards to the south, the other protest group, the one sponsored by "Canadians for the National Liberation Front" was lined-up and ready to start. People milled wildly between these two, while the media men stood around looking helpless and confused. We were going with the C.N.L.F.; and as we followed their banner up to the parliament steps, through the ranks of the V.M.C., I was thinking very hard. Through the kaleidoscope of my impressions, only one thing stood out clearly: something drastic had happened to the Left over the summer. Last year at this time, a radical group like the C.N.L.F. would have drawn 200 at the outside, probably no more than 150 in weather like this. Today, the line stretched on and on behind me. Yet, despite the turnout, I couldn't abandon my feeling that Vietnam just wasn't the issue it used to be for these people. So why were they there? And why as a separate demonstration?

And then we were in the midst of the V.M.C. and they were accusing us of splitting the peace movement, asking us to join with them... "Withdraw U.S. troops" "Withdraw U.S. troops"... while the C.N.L.F. placards waved defiantly in the sun and the answering chants came rolling back — "Support the National Liberation Front" "You're obscuring the issue" "Ho Chi Minh" "Hi Chi Minh". Gary Perly shouted steadily into the loudspeaker "Down with American Imperialism" and a girl went skipping along, calling excitedly to the crowd "Come and fight the Edmund Burkers" — and gave it all away. I understood then, despite C.N.L.F. claims, that if any one group was really marching to the topic it was the vast, amorphous, essentially non-political mass of people sponsored by the V.M.C. — a crowd whose members' dissatisfaction with the status quo ran from the particular situation in Vietnam, to the whole capitalist-imperialist-bureaucratic-technological complex. A crowd which was united solely on the grounds of necessarily vague moral, humanitarian concerns about the war. The people I was marching with were a much more homogeneous group, almost exclusively in their early 20's or younger, and committed to each other by the strength of their radical alienation from most existing Canadian institutions, including the university. I realized that for them, the Vietnam struggle was simply a touchstone, the most powerful symbol they had for their own felt situation. (Support the N.L.F.!) And because Canada is a land of blurred outlines and fuzzy, low-keyed issues, because the enemy here has not yet seen fit to show itself and be defined, "Down with American Imperialism", the main chant of the marchers was carrying almost more meaning than it could literally bear. And so they were marching today to let out a summer-and-autumn-full of frustration and general uptightness. But more than that they were marching with the secret, fearful hope that this march might just yield a definitive raison d'être for the Canadian radical movement — a confrontation with the Edmund Burke Society and the Toronto police.

We turned our backs then on the V.M.C. and headed down University to the exciting rhythm of our hidden expectations. Along the way, we were joined by five policemen who marched in a straight line at the head of the demonstration. Somehow, they didn't seem very formidable. At one point, people halted behind them and they kept walking erectly, comically on and on by themselves until one of them, without slowing his pace or moving his head noted to his neighbour out of the side of his mouth, in a tense, panicky whisper—"They've stopped."

Then we were approaching the consulate and there were cops and plainclothesmen everywhere and the roomy traffic island which runs down the centre of University was jammed with spectators and the newsmen were clustered in small groups on the road and in the consulate's flower beds, and a hundred assorted E.B.S.'ers, Nazis and European refugees were waiting for us on the outer edge of the sidewalk in front of the building. We became a long double line marching slowly back and forth in front of the American consulate, brushing the inner wing of the counter-demonstration to permit pedestrians unobstructed passage on the sidewalk. We walked up and down, preparing ourselves for the few intense yards where the two demonstrations mingled and were almost indistinguishable. The rival chants rose and fell—"Victory for the Viet Cong" "We want war" "Down with American Imperialism" "Kill the Cong" "Kill the Cong" "Wallace for President". A young girl pushed her baby in a stroller—he had a pacifier in his mouth and a Viva Che button on his sweater. A Burkner marched with us for half a block before he realized he was with the wrong demonstration and photographers were falling over themselves taking pictures and the girl behind me swore she'd kick one of those Fascists in the groin the next time she passed them and traffic piled up as drivers stopped to gawk and isolated scuffles broke out briefly here and there and some protestors argued with a fat old man with glasses who stood contentedly on the curb, placidly announcing to the world that we were all "Red Nazis" and the plainclothesmen made jokes and cleaned their nails. And we were all so hyper with waiting for something to happen only nothing happened and we were just marching up and down. And then Rosenthal got up on one of those concrete flower-pots that edge University Ave. and began to talk to us through a megaphone about American aggression. The orderly double line fell apart as we all massed forward to hear him and several police officers pushed their way hurriedly through the crowd to the base of the planter. One of them, a tall, grey-haired distinguished-looking cop told the speaker very politely, very firmly to get down before he was arrested for obstructing the sidewalk. Rosenthal ignored him and kept speaking. The policeman repeated his request in the same controlled even tone but Rosenthal was asking us if we wanted him to step down and the crowd was roaring

"No", drowning everything out. The officer's mouth went into a taut, straight line and he tried over and over to make himself heard but it was no good. He shrugged his shoulders and four cops dragged Rosenthal to the sidewalk and hustled him into the police van. Danny Drache was already up on the planter with the loudspeaker, waving his arms and yelling about the U.S. war machine and its colleagues, the Metro police. He quickly joined Rosenthal in the van. Laurel Limpus was the next to go and we were getting rather frustrated and tense as the march's main organizers were farcically carted off, one by one. And the cops were everywhere in the crowd, pushing us away from the speakers' concrete platform—"Move along" "Move along, please". Then another protestor was up there shouting into the loudspeaker and as the police moved towards him, the people at the base of the planter linked arms and shoved them back. And then everything exploded and the quivering young cops were smashing people against the concrete and the sidewalk and men and women were pushing and kicking and clawing hysterically and the crowd seethed and moaned and whirled around a spindly little tree. And suddenly there were four mounted police riding their horses into us on the sidewalk and we were running blindly for safety in every direction—and we'd done it—we were over the edge into the big time and this was Columbia, and Paris, this was Chicago and we were the N.L.F., we were the Yippies, the powerless, the dispossessed.

We walked back to Queen's Park in a driving shower of sleet, accompanied by an efficient squadron of motorcycle cops. There were close to two thousand of us by the time everybody got there and the cops were turned out like they were on a May Day parade. A guy with a megaphone asked us if we wanted to go to the prison—the answer was a deafening "Yes"—"Do you want to go back to the consulate?"—"Yes"—"Do you want to go to the prison and the consulate?"—"Yeeees!" So we turned and marched again, this time through the campus, our own territory, with the black-caped horsemen following us, and we, so strong and exhilarated in our righteousness, we were going to show them, all of them exactly where things were at. We passed the library and Bob Rae remembered that he had to get a book and disappeared inside. And then we were on College St. and passing the prison, only there were too many of us to demonstrate there so we kept on going. Then the consulate was just ahead of us. The mounted police were right beside us as we approached the long line of blue uniforms edging both sides of the sidewalk. We marched through them, left them behind and we were still moving in the same direction down the street, getting further and further from the consulate. People kept trying to get back the other way but the cops were gently herding the mass of us south, spintling and confusing the whole demonstration. One officer had his arm, in a fatherly manner, around the shoulders of a young protestor who was screaming insults and yelling about his right to go where he pleased—"It's all right, son," the cop was saying, "just walk down a little farther and then you can come back." Then they let us all go back again, up through the line of bored policemen and one of them was telling a demonstrator how he was supposed to be home with his wife and kids this afternoon and the guy asked him if he was getting double time and the cop laughed and said are you kidding and the demonstrator asked him why he didn't join us and the cop laughed again—and the whole thing just fizzled out like that. Someone was announcing over the loudspeaker where the party was going to be that night and over on the edge of the traffic island, a demonstrator was leaning far out into the wind, defiantly waving a Che banner high above his head. But we were cold and tired and everyone was going home for dinner.

primates progress. . crimea to viet nam

Man's courageous assault on reason, crushing the skulls of his fellow man, is on display in a new Tony Richardson film, Charge of the Light Brigade, and in the anti-war play by Megan Terry, Viet Rock.

Each age has its ideal of what a soldier should be. Lord Raglan, Secretary of War and leader of the Crimean expedition insisted that soldiers be gentlemen amateurs, who do not study their craft and who go into battle with not too clear an idea of what they are doing. "Men must be driven into battle with whips at their backs; it is the Christian way. God help us if they need not be driven."

Raglan's ideological opponent, Captain Nolan, is the exponent of professionalism. Pay the soldier, he says, treat him like a human being. But does it really matter which prevails — the one idea produced Crimea and the Charge, the other, Viet Nam. War is an art form: each age chooses the spectacle most entertaining to its paying public.

The only difference there is between the amateur and professional soldier is the style of his death: Light Brigade and Viet Rock offer us a choice. Do you prefer a futile charge or a purposeful ideological death?

But we have no choice, no freedom in death. We cannot any longer have one brilliant moment in our lives, when, for a whim, we throw away what is most precious; we have only serial-number deaths. Why not a futile, utterly stupid death, that poet laureates may cram dead entrails down throats of those unborn. Is the imagination so dull that we need utility as reason for dying? Where is the exaltation of death — wrap my body not in shrouds but symbolism.

Man can die on Turkish hillsides and in Asian swamps, but who shall raise his body; where is the holy terror that right and might strike into enemy hearts. Can I desire death when there is no sacred fire to consume my body, just the cold glow of the television tube highlighting the day's fighting? What has become of blood and savagery: are we no longer to behave like human beings even on the battlefield?

American soldiers die much tawdry deaths; see them die in Viet Rock, the play at the Coach House. Five boys and five girls play all the characters in a birth-to-death cycle of the American male. Born, drafted, trained, airdropped into Vietnam, shot, and — home in a box. But all parts of this cycle have been overexposed, so that the entire play or rather, series of skits, now seems redundant.

The amateur cast gives a very spirited performance of indifferent material, but the point of the whole Viet Rock exercise escapes me. It had an effect for a reason quite apart from the play or the actors: it was the first live theatre I had seen in a long time, and, after a steady diet of film, even the closeness of the actors (there are four rows of seats in the Coach House) threw me off balance.

I felt jarred from the first moment the ten came on stage; these people had real, craggy faces; they walked and made noise. At times, I could hear them breathing. Often, I could see them straining to act. They looked and talked at me, and I didn't know whether to be offended that they acknowledged my presence. Film, after all, can unwind in an empty cinema, but actors play to people.

These actors, though, had not convinced themselves of the roles they were playing, and they were as acutely aware of their context as I was of mine. Only, I could suffer in the dark, while they were in the light, not knowing where to put themselves, how to move their bodies.

Charge of the Light Brigade, directed by Tony Richardson, shows the spirited death, for Richardson uses film for what it is most suited: massive, visual portrayal, in this case, of the decimation of the Light Brigade. The destruction could only be suggested in a play, though it might produce greater feeling than the film does. Film tends to lose effectiveness because of its omniscience, while theatre intensifies because of the very narrowness of its portrayal.

Light Brigade follows the life, in Lord Cardigan's famous unit, of Captain Nolan, David Hemmings. Thus, the film has taken over one of the most basic functions of theatre, the telling of story, and creation of a complete, closed-end little world. Film is well adapted to this; the links in the story — the actual film splices — are seamless, while theatre intermissions are not. Intermissions intrude on fantasy's flight.

The film depicts the stupidity of the entire English war effort, from the heights of Lord Raglan (John Gielgud), who keeps forgetting that the French are now his allies, not the enemy, to the common soldier, who cannot tell his right foot from his left. It ridicules the officers, those favour-currying, idle and privileged peacocks who lived for the name gentleman, for the cut of the sword. Few were gentlemen: all were magnificent, disciplined soldiers.

Captain Nolan is the true gentleman, the counterpoise to the feeble-minded but strong-willed arbiters of England's future. When the news of Russia's attack of Turkey reaches London, Raglan gathers his staff about him and queries "That, um, threatens our communications with India, doesn't it gentlemen?" No one is sure, but it does seem right; something must be done.

For those who do not know the history of the period, there is an excellent summary of its essentials in the animated cartoon, done in the style of Punch, which begins the film. A bear is shown plucking the feathers of Turkey, while the great British lion, summoned by the anxious cries of two birds, France and Germany, slowly raises his majestic head. Usually, intrusions such as these cartoons do nothing for a film, but I found the several instances in which they were used to be excellent. One sequence shows how the world "war" grows, emanates from the mouth of the mass, in fine anti-war fashion.

But, after all the carnage, and fine carnage it is, what has been achieved, what does the audience remember? The mutilated horses, of course. It is easy to feel sorry for horses; after all, to a city dweller, what are horses?

hollywood's great white woman

"... it is about all the Hollywoods as they coalesce in the amalgam of memory ... for Hollywood ... has shaped their characters and given them the precise details of their personal style."

— Norman Mailer, The Deer Park

From the M.G.M. press releases on Cristina Ferrare:

"The lithe, willowy, honey-blond beauty is that rare combination of 'child-woman'. Fore or aft, with Cristina Ferrare aboard, you are bound to have an eventful trip!" (with photograph of young starlet in bikini posed on the bow of cabin cruiser.)

American dream-girl of the sixties — fresh, vibrant and sexless. Criticizing her is like criticizing grandmother's home-made borscht, like being cynical about motherhood. She is the archetypal young starlet and the embodiment of the Hollywood view of the American dream. "How do you feel about the portrayal of Negroes in Hollywood films?"

"Oh, I think it's marvellous that people can see both sides of the way Negroes live. I'm not prejudiced myself. They will find out that they have feelings and are sensitive just as much as white people are. I think it's marvellous that they finally do television and movies. I think it's wonderful." Like Phil Ochs says, she believes in God and Senator Dodd.

Still, no matter how clueless the Hollywood mentality may be, you can't really fault the assemblage of the movie industry. Cristina Ferrare, like all movie stars, is only a composite image designed to satisfy the "public". She is simply a face and a body which the Hollywood machine has ground to a certain finish and packaged to realize our fantasies. The dream of the girl-next-door is alive and hiding in Cristina Ferrare. "What kind of character do you enjoy playing?"

"The character sympathetic to her audience ... a very sensitive, a very real type of individual who the audience would take to. Sex is so short-lived. I would rather be someone the audience would be struck by than appalled." The little old lady with the Honest Ed's shopping bag who goes to the afternoon matinee will love her.

Platitudes like that are always preceded by a searching glance at her manager who does the translating whenever the old image begins to get a little cloudy.

"The first thing she said when asked to play a sexy role, if you don't mind Cristina darling, was, 'But I wouldn't feel comfortable walking down the street because everybody would look and realize what kind of body I had.'"

What do you say about the myth (Cristina Ferrare) and the reality (Marilyn Monroe) of Hollywood after you have heard it speak? M.G.M.'s stock answer is that the Cristina Ferrares are products of their own characters but how can you respond seriously to all the Doris Days and John Waynes without accepting the hypocrisy which produced them? What's the link between The Green Berets and Bonnie and Clyde?

Norman Mailer, the contemporary American novelist, wrote, "I would have told America some people got souls, and some people are spirits. People with souls are the ones who make the world move ... and if they fail ... they lose their soul. That's a sad thing to be because you can't live with other spirits — too sad."

In one of those rare moments that her manager didn't censor, Cristina Ferrare, 17-year-old M.G.M. starlet, said, "This business could really destroy a person." Coming from a seventeen-year-old girl that's pretty sad.

don't talk, just listen to the music

I hate talking to jazz musicians.

Suppose you are a jazz pianist, 45 years old. That means you began your professional career when Charlie Parker was making the bebop revolution, with a little help from his friends, in the middle of the second world war. If you have been "successful", you have been working 6 nights a week during most of the weeks in the last 25 years.

Most of those weeks found you playing in bars. Between every set, you had half an hour to kill, and usually some guy wanted to buy you a drink, and because there was no dressing room or anywhere else to go, you couldn't escape. Half the time, these people were drunk. Even if they were sober and nice, they probably patronized you because you were black. Often, they wanted to impress you with how hip they were. Or they wanted to talk about your past, and when you've been playing for a quarter of a century, you might not want to think about it.

Or maybe you got roped in by an intense young man who wants to talk about "music" and expects you to be a great man and tell him lots of significant things that he can write down.

In spite of the fact that I sympathize with the musicians, I have occasionally forced myself to bug them. When I was 15, I just had to talk to Coleman Hawkins, because he was the greatest and I admired him more than anyone else for his music. A year later, I went to Duke Ellington's birthday party and talked to Harry Carney and John Lamb; this was easy because everyone was relaxed and no one was trying to prove anything.

But after a while, it got more difficult to talk to jazzmen. More often than not (especially if they are old) there just doesn't seem to be anything to talk about: they don't want to be interrogated about the last 30 or 40 years, and they don't want to expound on music, and quite often they aren't interested in what is happening in the world. (Hawkins just sat in his hotel room all day and drank, and watched television.)

But if you are going to write about jazzmen, sometimes you think it is necessary to ask them questions. This week I tried to talk to Sir Charles (the knighthood was conferred in the same manner as Ellington's dukedom) Thompson, who is playing piano at the Colonial Tavern. Thompson made some great records with Coleman Hawkins and Howard McGhee in the middle '40's, and lately has been heard with Buck Clayton.

Reporter (that's me, folks): "Well, Mr. Thompson, I hear that you're going to be opening a lengthy gig at the King Edward Hotel." (I don't really talk this way).

Thompson: "Oh yeah? I haven't heard anything about it."

Reporter: "Uh, let's see; you played for a long time at the ----- on Bloor St. a few years ago, didn't you?"

Thompson: "Don't mention that in your column. I don't want my name associated with that place."

Reporter: "Uh, I see. Well, could I just get a few biographical facts, like where and when you were born and so on."

Thompson: "Well if you have to ask me questions like that, you shouldn't be writing. You've got a lot of research and reading to do. Anyway, I don't want to talk about that. I'm only interested in the music that I'm playing up on the stand."

Reporter: "Uh, O.K., well what do you think about jazz today?" (Pay close attention to the probing, incisive interviewing technique used here.)

Thompson: "Jazz is in a state of transition."

Reporter: "Oh."

Well, patient readers, to end this long boring aside, I will confide that, after a long, searching examination of the pianist, I still did not understand what he meant by his cryptic comment. I did, however, learn that Thompson had never listened to Sonny Rollins or John Coltrane, but that he was willing to say that, to him, they were just trying to carry on the tradition of Charlie Parker, and had failed. Thompson also said that he had not heard Jelly Roll Morton until he listened to a record of him last year.

The music is the thing. Thompson is a very accomplished pianist who is quite unpredictable. Sometimes he reminds one of John Lewis, with his beautifully simple, yet elegant and highly original little melodic phrases. At other times, Thompson uses the insipid "modern" chordal sound popularized by George Shearing. On one ballad the other night, he was as profuse and bombastic as Earl Hines at his worst; on another, as concise and lyrical as Hines at his best.

But the best moments of the evening occurred when Flip Phillips played. I didn't even try to talk to him. ("Like Mr. Phillips, where have you been for the last 20 years?") The tenor saxophonist made his name playing with Woody Herman just after the war. For many years, he toured with Jazz At The Philharmonic; people jumped up and down and screamed when he did his frantic thing (Norman Granz, the garbage-man of jazz, liked his musicians to get the crowd worked up.)

Now, after many years of relative obscurity, here was Phillips, rapidly going bald on top, but with his hair curling defiantly over his collar. His playing suggests an unusual blend of Ben Webster and Lester Young. When he is going to play a particularly Pres-like phrase, he even tilts his horn just the way Young used to do. On faster pieces, the Pres element dominates, resulting in relaxed, spare melodic lines. Sometimes the Webster element creeps in with a rasping sound and more tense phrasing.

Yet he is not simply derivative, for his empathy with the two great jazz tenor men has resulted in a very distinctive style: easygoing yet not facile, with the emphasis on a very pleasing tone and on swinging effortlessly. Phillips has excellent control and good ideas, and no longer strains for false "excitement".

The music is the thing, and Phillips' music is definitely worth hearing.

You're Tuff Enough — Junior Wells
Coming at You — Junior Wells
Taj Mahal

Junior Wells has had two records out in the past few months. One of these, on a new Mercury label, Blue Rock, is "You're Tuff Enough" (SRB 64002), and it is the first bad LP he has made. It is Wells' attempt to cash in on some of the soul market, and it doesn't work. He isn't a singer with a melodic voice, but he is capable of communicating a wide range of feelings. But a big band putting out a blanket of sound with a loud brass section is not the sort of backing that he should have. Instead of using his voice as the lead instrument in a small, tight group, he is placed in the position of having to shout too much, a la James Brown, just to be heard. On a couple of the cuts, he's even given one of those smooth vocal groups to sing along with him here and there. In fairness, I should mention that there are two cuts in which he sings with a small group, and on these he is infinitely better; but what is the point of trying to make Junior Wells into just another soul singer, and of putting out a record on which he hardly plays the harmonica?

His other record, "Coming at You," Vanguard 79262, is good rather than bad, but I do have one criticism of it in common with "You're Tuff Enough." There are too many added instruments. On his first record (Delmark 9612) the band has four pieces and it is his best record. His second record (Vanguard 79231) has him playing with groups of four or five and it is just about as good as the first one and has the added attraction that some of the cuts are live. On both of these records, he plays with Buddy Guy on guitar (the guitarist "Friendly Chap" in the Delmark release has to be Buddy Guy), a bassist and a drummer, and both of these records really swing. A lot of the excitement of a good Chicago group is in the amount of sound they can manage to get while still keeping the clarity of a small group. Three trumpets and a trombone are added on this Vanguard record, and they don't seem to add anything to the total effect. In some cases they detract. For one thing, a certain amount of spontaneity is lost because the brass parts have had a separate arranger. However, none of this is as bad as it might be because of the way the record has been balanced. The sound is focussed on Junior Well's singing, his harmonica playing, and on the guitar playing of Buddy Guy. Almost anytime these two play together the sound is great and this record is no exception. Not all the cuts are good, but there is some great material, including two Sonny Boy Williamson tunes and one by John Lee Hooker. His singing of Willie Dixon's "Hoochie Coochie Man" isn't quite up to Muddy Water's version, but Muddy Waters was the one who made the song a classic and it will probably never be done that well again. In general, the album isn't quite up to the high standards of his Delmark and earlier Vanguard albums, but it is far better than "You're Tuff Enough".

Another recent record is from a newcomer on the blues scene, a back country harmonica player from New York via Amherst, Mass. called Taj Mahal (Columbia CS 9579, CL2779). Most records don't try to make a point, but to some extent, this one is an exception. The point of this record seems to be that a modern, electric blues band can make exciting music from the very old songs. Of course the Chicago bands have been doing this for years, and not only with a few of the old classics. Otis Spann's song "Nobody Knows Chicago the Way I Do", was originally "Nobody Knows Poole County the Way I Do", and that was a long time ago. But the Chicago musicians, most of whom came from the deep south, never really lost contact with the old blues and the old ways of singing them. The instruments changed somewhat and new styles evolved, but it was no long jump for them to recall one of the old songs and redo it. But for Taj Mahal, this is probably not the case. He has had to listen to the old records, learn to know them, and then try to find some way that he can change them to make them more contemporary, while at the same time keeping some of the quality of the old songs. He isn't trying to use the songs as the basis for a pop-rock tune as some groups have done. Rather he seems to be trying to do for himself what happened naturally to the Chicago music. The record is full of the old great names. Three of the tunes are by Sleepy John Estes, one is by Sonny Boy Williamson, one by Robert Johnson, one by Willie McTell. Some of the songs are done pretty much as others have done them. "Dust My Broom" is quite close to the version done by James Cotton and Otis Spann a few years ago, and Taj Mahal's version suffers by comparison although he does quite a good job of it. On the other hand, I think he should have stuck closer to the original on "Diving Duck Blues", which is a good tune, and not turned it into something that sounds a little too much like Jimi Hendrix. However, on several of the rest he has struck a good middle, particularly on "Leaving Trunk" and "Statesboro Blues."

This record is an ambitious beginning. The band isn't good enough yet, and in some places the tempo lags disconcertingly; Taj Mahal seems to be forcing effects with his voice where they should sound natural, especially on the long "Celebrated Walkin' Blues"; but by and large this is a very enjoyable album and with more work this group should turn out some very good stuff.

only 50-50 for the hart house fan

One of the best ways to judge for yourself whether a comedy is successful is this: if the comic situation makes you think how funny the author is or how much you should be laughing, then it's failed. If the situation is so funny that you forget about the lines and laugh at a purely hilarious turn of events, then it's a success. Most plays, unfortunately, consist mainly of the former. The best, while never reaching 100% of the latter, sometimes seem to do so.

The Hart House theatre production of The Fan rates a square 50-50. With the help of a few brilliant and zestful performances and well-paced action, Goldoni's eighteenth century farce turns out to be more than just amusing in the hands of director Leon Major. But there remains a lot of fat to be cut, excess verbiage and moments of pure dullness, that at times, threaten to throw the production into boredom.

The Fan is a comedy of personalities. The old count, a blustering, broke, power-wielder; the young and ridiculously impetuous Signor Evaristo, who seeks the hand of the twittery Signora Geltrude; they all are revealed as funny little people in a sequence of events that is set off by Candida dropping her fan. The fan passes through nearly everybody's hands, arousing suspicion, anger and slapstick comedy.

Had everybody played out the absurdities in their personalities as well as Colin Fox, the comedy might have been unforgettable. Fox performed the part of Timoteo, the apothecary, with a superb sense of timing and rapport with the audience. Thin, harried, stumbling, he literally stole the show.

To emphasize the bustling life of the city streets on which the action takes place, Martha Mann's set of gay awnings, overhanging windows and balconies was very effective.

Francis Hyland, as the short-tempered and spirited, Giannina, the peasant girl was delightfully spunky, especially in her fights with Susanna, the prim and haughty shopkeeper across the road, played ably by Meg Hogarth. Their exchanges, consisting of flailing chairs and other weapons of destruction at each other are well executed.

Other moments of pure slapstick like the Keystone Cops sequence where everybody runs through everybody else's store and a man emerges draped in woman's clothes are close to hilarious. Even the clumsiness of a fight between the two suitors for Giannina added to the general delight.

So much for the good points. It was plain to see that the professional company at Hart House is not up to the very best professional standard — when the show clicks, everybody clicks. At times, perhaps mainly due to the inadequacies presented in the translation from the Italian, there were long, uncomfortable lapses which sagged in the middle.

These lapses were especially noticeably in the scenes where Rex Southgate, playing the old count, had a major part. Both in the Changeling and the Fan, Southgate exhibits too much superfluous flailing of the arms, too much unneeded gusto and not enough concentration on the part he is playing. Besides Francis Hyland, he is the one person who is absolutely recognizable from play to play. (Miss Hyland, however, is not guilty of unimaginative acting; it's just her physical appearance that betrays her). Southgate varies little in his physical movement and creativity; his count could actually liven up those moments of the play.

William Needles and Deborah Kipp were overwhelmingly adequate, there's not much else to say about them. But Needles could have helped Southgate by adding a little more humour to their scenes together, plotting how the old count would arrange his marriage to The Signora Candida.

The very small parts of the servants, played by Ronald Mlodzik and Robert Silverman were inadequately played. Silverman spoke his few lines woodenly and Mlodzik seemed to be happy about everything, a constant smile playing on his lips. The small parts, are very important, because if they aren't done well, they tend to drag the whole play under. And it's easy to make the most of a small part in a Goldoni farce, as Colin Fox displayed admirably.

But, despite these failings, the Fan shows promise for professional theatre at Hart House. The audiences have been poor for the Changeling and not much better for the Fan. Leon Major says he doesn't know what the reason is.

Perhaps it is that the professional company is displaying too many faults, due mainly to the inexperience of many members of the cast, (this doesn't mean the student members). People expected something miraculous and don't realize that Major is building from scratch.

Perhaps it's the fact that the type of play presented doesn't appeal to the university audience. There's a genuine dilemma there, as the drama centre feels it has a duty (and justifiably) to show little produced and known works. Many people, however, just don't dig. This reviewer sees the policy of the drama centre as valid and feels that they should continue in presenting little-known plays in the hope that by giving them excellent productions, these authors will be shown up in their best possible light.

The Drama Centre will have to be given at least two more seasons in order that we may judge at all whether the present policy is successful.

FILM CANADA

"Take One" is a simple, unassuming little journal on film that comes out every two months. During its two year existence it has developed a reputation which has attracted many favourable comments from the press and radio, and has tripled its circulation. Yet, despite its growing distinction, it remains a non-descript, modest sort of pamphlet, one which is not easily noticeable in a bookstore.

Its beginnings were very humble. Editor Peter Lebensold gathered friends and acquaintances interested in film and invited them to submit articles. With a part-time staff, he approached well-known personalities such as Patrick Watson and Judy La Marsh to contribute to the journal. Soon, many readers, known as well as unknown, began mailing in suggestions and articles for publication. "Take One" cultivated a correspondence with each of these writers and film-makers, until a multitude of people throughout the world were donating articles.

One of Lebensold's earliest correspondents was Joe Medjuck of Toronto. Medjuck has been with the magazine since the beginning and presently holds the position of Associate Editor-Publisher. He is a free, easy-talking fellow who gave an hour monologue on his impressions of what the magazine is and what it should be. Having waded my way through all eleven issues, I had already drawn my own conclusions before hearing Medjuck's dissertation. His analysis provided interesting parallel commentary to my own review.

"Take One" contains many knowledgeable articles on all facets of film, but its main characteristic is its inconsistency. Many articles treat interesting topics with intelligence and insight, while just as many are superficial, and too curt to be informative.

"I think our last three issues have been the most consistent. That is, until the last three, we would have one good issue and one rotten issue."

The highlights of my own reading were a couple of essays by Patrick Watson, an article by Godard on two films he was shooting simultaneously, a devastating portrait of Stanley Kramer, a brief piece by Arthur Penn on "Bonnie and Clyde" and an even briefer word from Alfred Hitchcock describing his complicated use of the travelling mat in "The Birds". Low points were articles on Norman McLaren, the Expo films, and Andy Warhol, in which the authors hardly delved into their subject matter at all, but skimmed over it so quickly that there was nothing new to be gained by the reader.

"One of the big faults of the magazine is space. We're so worried about getting everything in we end up cutting stories by ridiculous amounts, and sometimes cutting them very badly.

"A magazine has a feel to it which you get by picking it up and leafing through it and seeing what the stories are. Now, the trouble is, magazines do not always back up that feel. The issue before the last had a great feel to it, probably the best feel ever. It had Godard, Hitchcock, Warhol on the cover. The trouble was, and we never realized it until the whole magazine was out, that there was only one article in the whole stinking magazine that was more than two pages long. Now, you've got to be fairly superficial in two pages."

There are many interviews with those connected with film in one way or another, such as Godard, Hitchcock, Kenneth Anger, and Marshall McLuhan. Like the articles, these conversations vary in quality. Often, the reader can feel the character of the person interviewed and gain some personal appreciation of that individual's philosophy and work. Such is the case in a panel discussion with Godard; this is not the case with a perfunctory, shallow confrontation with underground star Donna Kerness.

A main weakness is the failure to supply any background of the person being interviewed, especially when the person is obscure. Kenneth Anger may not be well known to a novice, so an otherwise excellent interview does not become relevant because the reader cannot link Anger's passion for occultist Edward Crowley with Anger's recurrent film themes.

"When you do an interview with Kenneth Anger, you just sort of do it for people who know who he is to some extent. We forget these things. We make a lot of mistakes that way. What we have discovered is that if we print stuff that interests us, then it is going to be pretty good. The minute you start saying, 'Well, I'm not really interested in this, but our readers are dumb and they will be interested', you get a rotten magazine. The minute you start printing stuff that bores you, then, most likely, it is going to bore your readers. The danger there, of course, is that you presume your readers all have the same background, which they don't. I find the magazine very inconsistent that way. Some of the articles explain who Alfred Hitchcock is whereas others do not explain who Kenneth Anger is."

Take One is printed on cheap, flimsy paper, with few photographs and an often sloppy, amateurish layout. But although it lacks the polished slickness of other film magazines, "Take One" is more sensitive to film as art and as mass media.

"Like a lot of things, you can do something for the wrong reason. We started using this paper, this type of design, just to save money, and having done it a couple of times, we discovered people really like it. The only people that want us to go glossy are advertising agencies which are interested in advertising glossy magazines. I do not think the people buying it care that much. Some covers are more successful than others; sometimes it looks particularly cheap."

"Take One" describes every aspect of film: its sociological effect as mass media and as an art form expressed through the film-makers and trends from Hollywood, Europe, television and the underground. The latest issue is among the best yet published and serves as a good example of typical content. It includes three views on film violence, the wit of Groucho Marx, a study of the American Negro in film and a look at the special effects in "2001. A Space Odyssey."

In surveying the entire history of "Take One", the magazine does not seem to have an evolutionary development or unified identity. A magazine need not have a unique editorial philosophy, but in the case of "Take One", this lack of unity seems to contribute to its fluctuating quality.

"The magazine has no editorial viewpoint; its writers do. The magazine shapes itself. Our writers take stands, we don't. Very often we'll print articles because we like the way they are written, then arranged in different viewpoints. In the latest issue, for example, Wally Gentleman, who did the special effects for 2001 is crapping all over 2001. Then at the back, there is a very intelligent review of the movie by John Hofess who really, really likes it. As I said, we do not have viewpoints, but we like having conflicting views."

Although the next issue of "Take One" may not approach the quality of the latest effort, anyone interested in films as art must be always aware of the journal and on the watch for its worthwhile moments. Despite its varying excellence, the reputation and circulation (from 5,000 to 15,000) continue to grow. Medjuck hopes the magazine will flourish in the United States and feels it could do so with the proper publicity.

"We have yet to get a bad press, which makes us worry a bit. Anytime we have been written up by anyone, they liked us. Anytime we have been mentioned on the radio, they liked us. Maybe you can be the first to crap on us for something."

BLUES

Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry are going to be back in town for a three week engagement beginning at the Riverboat on November 5th. It is said by some that Junior Wells and Buddy Guy may join up for an appearance here soon, and it is said by others that B.B. King and Wilson Pickett are going to do a show. However, both of these are still in the talking stages. The most exciting thing coming up is that Big Joe Williams, the nine-string guitar player and great Mississippi blues singer is opening at the Kibzeria on November 4th or 5th, depending on when he gets back from his European tour. No one should miss him while he is here.

THEATRE

I'm going to tell everyone where to go this weekend. Go see, for God's sake, "Comings and Goings" at the Studio Lab Theatre. We didn't have room for the review of it and it deserves to be seen. It's improvisational theatre with audience participation at 41 Collier St., rear. Gunter Grass' "Flood" opens Tuesday at TWP theatre. Ionesco's "The New Tenant" is the second drama centre studio production at the church on Glen Morris St. If it's as good as "Les Justes", it's very good. Hilary says "Passion, Poison & Petrification" at Vic is not bad. Oh year, if you're a campus theatre group and you're putting on a play, please leave me a note or see me in the Review office. My spies are inefficient. For the best analysis of SAC, read Andy Wernick's article in this month's Harbinger. Clear away his rhetoric and you've got an acute observation of the campus scene politically. Bob Rae says it isn't so, but then he's got a vested interest. It's plaid with the bottom button left undone.

FILM

Tonight: House of the Sleeping Virgins, at the New Yorker. An elderly Japanese revisits his youth through the medium of a beautiful, sleeping virgin. He passes on original sin to his virgin daughter's suitor to exonerate his own transgressions. Saturday matinee: Charge of the Light Brigade, or Barbarella, a fairy tale with breasts. See Jane Fonda's little black box, adore the angel who is love. (k.d.) Saturday Night: The Two of Us, a phenomenon, beautiful; just people, imperfect, laughable, weak, strong, poignant people (b.b.) or I Love You Alice B. Toklas, featuring a real Jewish-American wedding with twin cantors and a groom who is stoned. A very funny Peter Sellers eats marijuana brownies; what does the other one do? (a.w.) Sunday, if you have a family, and only after church, Finian's Rainbow, which finds a racist senator changed from white to black and back again. "I tend to be suspicious of people who smile as much as Tommy Steele". (l.f.)

Flash News . . . Thursday 11:30 p.m. . . ignore all above. Godard's Weekend starts today at Cinecity. The earth is a charnel-house populated by cannibals. Radical, blatant, forceful. See Godard bring back Roman Polanski's rabbit in marvelous colour.

JAZZ

• Robin Kenyatta at Centennial College, 651 Warden Ave., Sat., Nov. 2, 8 p.m. Black Power total theatre.
• Next week at George's Spagbetti House; Booker Ervin, intense, passionate tenor saxophone from Texas, formerly with Charles Mingus.

Go see the McLaughlin Planetarium, if you can get in. Bring a pair of binoculars and take a look at the dome during the show. Workmen have scratched words and pictures on the ceiling, but they are too small and faint to be seen without optical aid. A prize of five dollars will be given to the person who turns in the most complete description of them to the Varsity office, 91 St. George Street. Deadline: November 11th. All submissions considered.

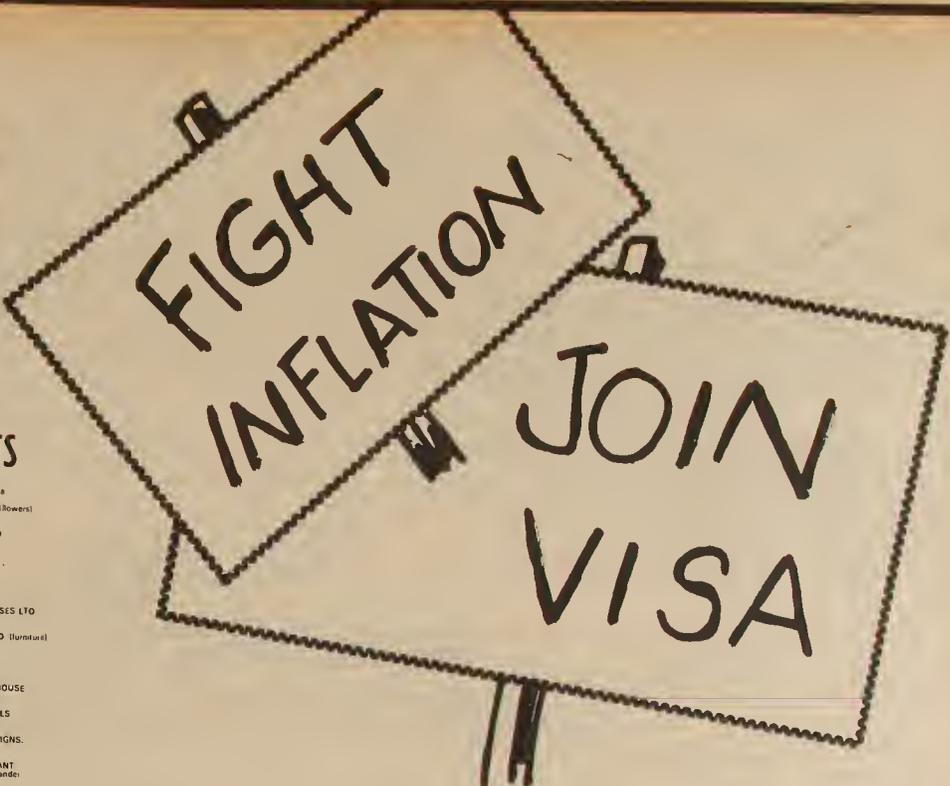

Next week, if you have a chance, pop over to the Buttery (Trinity's refectory, coop, wymillwood, or whatever on Devonshire Place) and see the photography exhibit of Paul Carter. There is no explanation there of who Paul Carter is (Trinity grad, or student, or faculty??) but his photos are fun to look at. Concerned almost exclusively with people, I felt that though the pictures were technically very competent there seemed to be a lack of perception of the full range of human emotions. They dwelled upon happiness and joy, and the unhappiness was that of old age or a passing situation. There was very little attempt to convey the misery of futility.

ATS rejects strike tactic, but salary push is still on

The U of T Association of Teaching Staff voted Wednesday for higher salaries but suspended any will to take direct strike action.

Assistant English professor Peter Seary originally presented a motion calling for a faculty-wide refusal to mark examinations if the salary floors for assistant professors were not raised to $13,000 from the present level of $9,500.

He also called for increased student enrolment to raise the university's operating budget, and that the resulting revenues be used to increase teaching staff salaries.

The ATS, however, passed what some professors called a "watered-down" version of Prof. Seary's motion. It agreed to:

- endorse the concern, spirit and resolve of Prof. Seary's brief;

- urge the executive of the ATS to act upon these proposals in negotiations with the university;

- call upon the executive of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations to "immediately embark on an examination of the most appropriate strategy and tactics to adopt" in pursuing salary demands.

The counter proposal was moved by Prof. John Crispo of the School of Business.

Although the ATS general meeting was one of the largest in its history, the 300-member attendance would not have been a strong enough element to carry out effective strike action, since the entire ATS comprises 95 per cent of all U of T teaching staff.

Prof. Seary said he was happy with the outcome of the meeting, although his motion was replaced.

"It was quite right and proper that a substitute motion be introduced," he said. (Prof. Seary comes from Oxford). "We have a basic loyalty to the university."

He still insisted, however, that salary demands must be met.

"There's only an institution in Canada with an international intellectual reputation — the University of Toronto," he said. "And that reputation is not because of the buildings, nor the students, but the faculty."

Prof. Seary's point is that U of T faculty are paid less than many other academic institutions in Canada that don't have the same reputation.

The U of T salary scale is 18 per cent below that of OCUFA, and 28 per cent below the scales of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and Ryerson.

After 10 years, an average high school teacher with an M.A. is earning more than his U of T counterpart, the ATS reveals in a memorandum to the Board of Governors.

Varsity editor's blood questioned

TORONTO (Special) — Varsity Editor Paul MacRae gave his last pint of blood to The Cause Wednesday.

After the ordeal was over, the nurses advised him he shouldn't give blood again.

"This unit," said one, holding up a plastic bag, "is Type O positive.

"However, what is left in your veins," she informed MacRae, "looks more like printers' ink than blood."

At last report, Varsity Spiritual Advisor Mike Kesterton was trying to get MacRae certified as a Baltimore Oriole.

He urged all U of T students to attend the clinic today.

"Go to the University College Junior Common Room between 9 and 4," he said, adjusting his halo.

"Or try the school of dentistry 11 to 2 and 3:30 to 4:30"

Election opposes student+Cardinal

MONTREAL (CUP) — Quebec students have been out to shake up Education Minister Jean-Guy Cardinal ever since he refused to take any action in the CEGEP disturbances two weeks ago.

Michel Mill, a 24-year-old student at L'Universite de Montreal, has found a way.

Wednesday he announced plans to run against Cardinal in a by-election December 4 in the provincial riding of Bagot, formerly held by the late premier Daniel Johnson. He is the only cabinet minister who does not hold a seat in the legislature.

Mill, who will run under a socialist banner, said he did not want the minister to run without opposition: "This would be anti-democratic, especially at a time when Cardinal has been the object of student opposition because of his guilt in the post-secondary education fiasco."

Lightweights key to rowing title

The O.Q.A.A. rowing championships will be decided at St. Catharines tomorrow afternoon, and after last week's success at London, Toronto is in its strongest position in a number of years. Toronto has traditionally rowed well during the season only to be edged out in the finals: last year by Western and the preceding two years by MacMaster. Their last O.Q.A.A. victory was in 1964.

Without a senior heavyweight crew this year, the lightweights, among whom can be counted a number of oarsmen with Henley and American championship experience, have had a successful season rowing in both categories. They have won three of their four races as lightweights, and have regularly finished second to Western in senior varsity.

O.Q.A.A. rules require a weigh-in at 155 pounds before the race, and for some of head coach Ingo Sculten-Hostedde's crew, this has meant working down from a pre-season weight of 170.

The freshman crew, coached by Jim Lyttle and Geoff Wright (who rowed on Toronto's last successful O.Q.A.A. team) while winless thus far, have on different occasions taken second in both junior varsity and freshman.

The 2000 metre races will again be held on the Henley regatta course. The meet will begin at 1:00 P.M.

McGILL GAME LAST REGULAR HOME CONTEST FOR MIKE RAHAM

By JIM COWAN

Class. It's a hard quality to define, but it's one that's instantly recognizable in some people. It's like that with Mike Raham.

Tomorrow's game against the invading Redmen from McGill will be the last chance Varsity fans will have to see this classy half-back in regular season action at home. Next spring he graduates from the school of dentistry.

Raham has been with the Blue and White squad for four years now. Standing in the early fall chill last night, he talked about the team and the last home game.

GLEN MARKLE

"The fact is that the four years have been the most enjoyable I've had. I've really enjoyed my course, and football has been just as rewarding. There's never been a team I've been as enthusiastic about as this one."

Raham's tenure with Blues has corresponded with a great revival of interest in football on the U of T campus, brought about in no small part by the winning nature of Varsity teams under coach Ron Murphy. And although he'd be the last to admit it, Raham has played a big role in the Varsity success story.

Last year, as Blues rolled to their twenty-second Yates Cup, Raham led the team in scoring (seven touchdowns), rushing (322 yards in 67 carries), and punt returns (21 for 317 yards). Not surprisingly, he also leads the league in those same categories this year.

"I'm not that big for a running back," he said yesterday. "I always say I rely more on my guile and my head than on brute strength."

"The coaching staff here is just terrific, you couldn't ask for anything better," he added. "We're in really good hands."

Raham has been drafted by Calgary Stampeders of the Canadian Football League, but says he has no serious plans for playing pro ball. "But I'm keeping the door open," he says.

One man who hopes Raham won't be playing for Stamps next year is Ron Murphy; he hopes Raham will come back and do graduate work. But neither really entertains the idea seriously; it's just nice to dream.

Meanwhile, Murph has more immediate problems to attend to. He knows tomorrow's game is crucial and although Blues have continued to improve since their drubbing by Queen's, they aren't out of the woods yet.

"They'll be rough," he said yesterday, and in response to a foolish question about the outcome of the game, added laconically "We'll defeat them."

Blues will receive a big boost with the return of rookie halfback Walt Sehr, out for the past two games because of sickness and a bad knee. Sehr, you will remember, made an 85 yard punt return to break up the game in the league opener in Montreal against the same McGill team.

Visitors to the Blues' dressing room last night could be excused for thinking that the game had already been won, as Halloween came to the Stadium. The Bennett boys (Bill and Jim) blacked their faces with lamp black, prompting comments like "Now you have to sit at the back of the bus" and Murphy's "Have you figured out how to get that stuff off without coldcream under it?"

Thursday morning, persons unknown put Murphy's car up on blocks, wrapped a snowfence around coach-for-all-seasons Tom Watt's car, and tied the bumper of assistant coach Dave Copp's to a fence. In retaliation, the coaching staff threatened to keep the team out practicing until 10 p.m. last night, and then serve bologna at the team dinner.

All in all, Saturday should produce a classic to close the season at Varsity. McGill has been the surprise team of the season, putting up a stubborn battle against Blues and going on to defeat Queens in their first meeting. True, they were stomped by the Mustang's two weeks ago in London, but as Blues know, any team can have a bad day. It should be a good one.

BLUENOTES . . . Watch for another big game from halfback Glen Markle, one of most consistently under-rated players on the team.

THERE HE GOES, FOLKS!

Jim Lefkos still big chief hotfoot as soccer Blues continue to blaze

Jim Lefkos continued to come on with his hot toe and, as a result, Varsity soccer Blues posted a tense 3-2 win over McMaster on Wednesday. It was the third game in a row that Lefkos has potted three or more goals and he now has registered 12 of the 20 markers Blues have had in their last four games.

Blues opened the scoring after only ten minutes of play when Miles Sosa crossed a long left-footer that Lefkos tapped into the corner of the net.

However, Blues could not sustain their momentum and Mac continued to press before equalizing the score on a hard twenty-five yarder which goalie Bernie B'Abreau couldn't reach.

With 15 minutes left in the first half, John Gero went to work. He stole the ball from the Marauder fullback, beat the goalie and slipped a pass to Lefkos for a layup.

Minutes later Gero pounced on another loose ball, passed to Lefkos and Varsity's "deadeye Dick" made no mistake for a 3-1 lead.

The second half opened with Blues pressing but not being able to score. In one span of five minutes, Lefkos had the misfortune of hitting the goalpost twice and the crossbar once.

Blues' bad luck seemed to give McMaster a lift as they came back to score their second goal on brilliant drive by the centre-forward. However, the Varsity defence tightened quickly and the score remained in tact to the end.

Victory enabled Blues to retain sole possession of first place in the Western division, one point ahead of Western Mustangs.

Saturday, Blues travel to Waterloo to meet the winless Warriors. Judging by Warriors' last two performances (a close 3-2 loss to McMaster and a 1-1 tie with Guelph), Blues will probably encounter a tougher team than the one they beat 5-0. Korner Kicks . . . Only Bill Nepotiuik (usher at a wedding) will be missing from the lineup Saturday. His place will probably be taken by Mario Palermo who plays for St. Mike's in the interfaculty league.

McGuire touches down the hard way

Varsity rugger Blues executed a double sweep over inept McMaster sides in games played Wednesday in Hamilton.

The first Varsity started slowly with only ten points in the first half before breaking loose for an impressive 30-0 final count. Blues played perhaps their best rugger of the year as the forwards overpowered Mac in the loose rucks and scrums while excellent passes from the fly half initiated some fine runs and plays among the backs.

Maris Apse, playing back forward, bulled over for one try and Andy Gibson, (two tries and a drop goal) Vic Harding, (two tries) Peter Sutherland (1 try) and George Wraw (nine points kicking rounded out the scoring.

The game was marred only by the attitude of several McMaster players. They soon realized they couldn't make a contest of the game and their solution to the problem was to rough Blues up at every opportunity. They, however, proved inept at even this task.

The seconds whipped their Marauder opponents 8-0 as hooker Brian Hamill and prop Curt McGuire counted tries and scrum half Andy Cairns contributed a convert.

McGuire, an ex-football Blue, was so thrilled with his first rugger "touchdown" that he forgot to touch the ball down until he was helped by five Mac tacklers.

The two Varsity teams will be regrouping their bones and muscles for games with Waterloo (in Waterloo). It is Blues hope that they can ruin Warrior's Saturday homecoming.

Authorities in the Soviet Union have developed the first athletic supporter for women.

A lady shot-putter is as apt to get ruptured as the next Ivan, but in the past they've had to make do with make-believe hem-hem.

Many hockey-players are refusing to use them, however, because they don't come yet with auxiliary fibre funnels. Also, Russian athletes have a tendency to fail their sex tests, anyway.

Another disadvantage of living under the Communist system.

The Varsity Women's Athletic Association has refused to stock them because of the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia.

WHY THEY SOLD

By Mark Starowicz
The McGill Daily

MONTREAL (CUP) — The latest move in newspaper monopoly building occurred Oct. 22 in Montreal when Charles Peters, president and published of The Gazette, announced he had just sold his paper to the Southam chain.

As rationale for the sale, Peters said it was difficult these days to sustain a newspaper as a one-family business.

Peters, ironically, was telling the truth. But only part of it.

The sale of the Gazette brings to light other facts:

- Two powerful newspaper chains are close to sewing up Canadian monopolies.

- These two chains are locking into a newspaper war over advertising.

- Canadian newspapers are fighting for their lives because American publications are sweeping the advertising market.

Fundamentally the sale of The Gazette is a victory of powerful monopolistic interests over independent outlets.

Southam is one of three very powerful newspaper chains that account for about 35 per cent of all newspaper circulation in Canada. The other two are Sifton-Bell and the Thomson chain.

Fighting for control of the metropolitan newspaper market are Southam and Sifton-Bell. Thomson's empire rests on smaller papers not in major urban concentrations.

The Southam complex is still basically family-owned, although it is listed as a public company. Three Southams sit on the Board of Directors. Southam directors hold, or at some time held, three bank directorships, three directorships in insurance companies, and four other directorships in large corporations.

It is a somewhat schizophrenic empire. John Southam, the most powerful man in the operation, does his business out of Ottawa, while keeping an eye on The Ottawa Citizen, which Southam owns, and which is commonly known as a Liberal government mouthpiece.

The Tory side operates through the Hamilton Spectator and The Edmonton Journal is the Social Credit side — virtually a party organ for Alberta Premier E.C. Manning.

The Southam Company, including Pacific Press Ltd., of which Southam owns 50 per cent controls the following newspapers:

Wholly owned: Ottawa Citizen,

Hamilton Spectator, North Bay Nugget, Winnipeg Tribune, Medicine Hat News, Calgary Herald, Edmonton Journal, Montreal Gazette; with total circulation between 800,000 and 1,000,000.

Partially owned: Vancouver Province (50 per cent), Vancouver Sun (50 per cent), London Free Press (25 per cent), Kitchener-Waterloo Record (47 per cent).

Beyond this, Southam controls 21 business and professional magazines, and has large interests in at least seven television and radio stations.

Southam has strong links with Great West Life, as does the second chain, Sifton-Bell (F P Publications Ltd. and Sifton Group).

Victor Sifton operates out of Toronto and is in partnership with Max Bell, best known as a race horse owner. Bell has a myriad of interlocking corporate interests in the West, and negotiates many of the major oil sales to the United States.

The Sifton-Bell empire outrightly owns the Winnipeg Free Press, Ottawa Journal, Calgary Albertan, Lethbridge Herald, Victoria Daily Colonist, Victoria Daily Times, Regina Leader-Post and Saskatoon Star-Phoenix.

It also owns Canada's most "respectable" paper, the Toronto Globe and Mail.

The Southam and Sifton chains had been unable to get a foothold in the major cities until Sifton got The Globe and Mail. Southam has now grabbed The Gazette, and thus the two empires have broken through on a country-wide scale.

Why this desire to get a Montreal paper and to break into the large eastern urban market?

One of the most desperate battles in Canada is being waged against Time and Reader's Digest, who threaten the very lives of these newspapers.

There are two levels of advertising, regional and national. Products which span the country (Coke for example) constitute "national advertising" and are the most lucrative. Regional advertising (Steinberg's) is less lucrative.

Time and Reader's Digest are nationally circulated and have a combined circulation of three million. This means they reach more people faster, which in turn means they attract national advertising.

Independent newspapers, consequently, must try to survive on regional advertising.

The Gazette

Star Weekly magazine folded this year because it could not get the national advertising.

Both Southam and Sifton are pouring vast sums into their respective magazines (The Canadian and Weekend) to try to outstrip the two American giants.

Another corollary of this inurement by Time and Reader's Digest and the need to attract national advertising, is the expansion of newspaper chains. That is why Southam ogled The Gazette for years. That's why Sifton went for The Globe and Mail.

A newspaper chain has an infinitely better chance of attracting national advertising (offering the advertiser a nation-wide package) if it can become national itself. Hence the development of a Hearst Scripps-Howard style dual monopoly that will spawn a stiff advertising war.

The way magazines like Time and Reader's Digest are allowed to choke Canadian journalism provided cause for comment in the following excerpt from John Porter's The Vertical Mosaic:

"Anyone familiar with the reading habits of Canadians knows that the handful of magazines and periodicals published in Canada does not represent the ideological exposure of the general population. Publications from the U.S. circulate far more widely than do those of Canadian origin. The consumption of American periodicals in Canada is an ideological counterpart of the external control of the economic system."

Yet the Canadian government, which has frequently debated taxing Time and Reader's Digest as it does other foreign publications, has allowed this cultural imperialism to flourish by accepting the absurd proposition that Time and Reader's Digest can be considered Canadian because of their throwaway "Canadian content."

As for The Gazette itself, it is insignificant what happens to it. Whether Charles Peters owns it, or whether Southam owns it, the public is only a consideration on the balance sheet.

Anywhere in Canada, to produce an independent and outspoken press is an uneconomical proposition, based on poor business logic.

It requires courage, and a dedication to the ideals of journalism that few Canadian publishers possess, ideals that certainly do not encumber Charles Peters.

York opens senate meetings

TORONTO (VNS) — York University has joined three other Canadian universities in opening Senate meetings to students.

The University of British Columbia, Simon Fraser and McGill all have open meetings.

At York only four senators opposed opening the meetings.

Senator David King, one of the five student members welcomed the opening of the Senate's meetings.

"The answer to the question of whether the Senate should be open is self-evident. The business which the senate considers is important to the university as a whole, but especially to the students."

York Student Council endorsed the Senate's decision to open its meetings.

Sorry!

The Varsity misquoted Louis de Boer, a pro-Wallace speaker last week, according to F. Paul Fromm.

De Boer did not say "Mr. Wallace means to appoint an Attorney General who will charge Vietnam protestors with treason", Fromm said.

"De Boer quoted Wallace as saying 'People who advocate the murder of American soldiers or a Viet Cong victory and the defeat of the U.S. should be indicted for treason.'"

Fromm said de Boer did not say Wallace favored "segregated schools, segregated housing and more police".

"De Boer said Wallace said that the government should respond to what the people want," Fromm said. "De Boer said 'States have the right to have separate schools (as in Alabama) or forced integration (as in New York or Massachusetts).'"

CSM links students, imperialism

By TREVOR SPURR

"The rise in sexuality and the use of drugs is proof of degeneration among students," says Harold Bains, "It has weakened the struggle against imperialism."

But Harold S. Bains, chairman and director of the Necessity for Change Institute of Ideological Studies in Montreal, failed to win many converts for the Canadian Student Movement Friday night when he was keynote speaker at a weekend symposium in Sidney Smith Hall.

"Student unions such as the Canadian Union of Students have played the role of lackeys to the bourgeois society," he said.

Bains went on to say students have been misled in their current struggle for student power by such bourgeois ideologies as anarchism, pacifism, and existentialism, instead of following Marxist-Leninist thought.

Many in the audience of 30 had come to find out what the CSM was about and specifically to discover the meaning of Friday night's topic, The Influence of Corporate Sensate Culture on Anti-imperialist Struggles.

In spite of repeated questioning, the speaker refused to define "corporate sensate culture" and many left.

The Canadian Student Movement hopes to link the student power struggle with the labor movement so as to establish the "dictatorship of the proletariat," said Bains.

"A genuine anti-imperialist struggle will not only be consolidated but it shall be one in which the students participate."

A member of the audience who simply identified himself as a "laborer" said he had never heard such "jargonistic crap" in his life. Although he was an example of the type of person that the CSM hopes to work with he was unimpressed.

Police prevent student support to pickets

PORT ARTHUR (CUP) — Police Thursday tried to prevent students from Lakehead University from joining a picket line set up by retail clerks striking against Lakehead Department Stores.

One Port Arthur cop told the students to "pack it in."

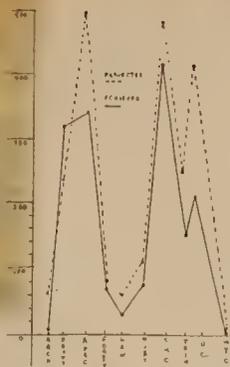

"Any demonstrations," he said, "and you're all arrested. Put that damn camera down and don't use it."

In Fort William, a police sergeant stormed down the picket line and broke up a television interview between students and CKPR - TV.

"If you're going to do it, keep moving, no talking. If my picture is in there cut it out. If I see it on TV you'll hear about it," he told the camera man.

The students were invited to join the picket lines by the Retail Clerks Union. The union has been on strike since

Varsity burn-in

1. demonstrations

About 1,000 students demonstrated against America's policy in Vietnam last Saturday.

On Friday about 200 engineers demonstrated against a Varsity editorial, and Varsity editorial policy in general.

The anti-war protesters were arrested, initially, for breaking a city bylaw by standing on a concrete planter.

The engineers were not arrested for breaking a city bylaw against burning material on public property.

The anti-war demonstration was broken up by police after the protesters hurled angry words at police for making the arrests.

The anti-Varsity demonstration continued without interruption.

But what if it hadn't? What if your demonstration had been broken up? What if you felt your legitimate right to protest had been trampled by police?

2. a challenge!

One of the unfortunate features of the burn-in was that we never got to hear why its leader, Andrew Janikowski, was so incensed at the paper.

He told reporters for the daily press that Varsity coverage is "one-sided, biased and sensationalistic", obviously referring to more than the editorial he disliked so much.

Unfortunately, we never found out what stories he was referring to specifically.

Perhaps Mr. Janikowski would consent to a public debate with The Varsity editor in the near future to outline his charges in detail, since he didn't have a chance at the burn-in.

3. the question of power

Mr. Janikowski told the daily press that the Varsity should represent the "view of all of us" and that students whose fees pay for its operation should have a say in the paper's policy.

Let's be consistent then. If the average student should control Varsity policy, he should control university policy as well. Varsity costs each student about $1.50 a year, compared to $500 or more tuition a year.

Sure, students are subsidized by the state, but newspapers are subsidized by advertisers. We don't let advertisers run our editorial policy, students shouldn't let society set policy for their university.

But the same arguments for student control of the university don't really apply to The Varsity.

The fact is that students do have a say in Varsity policy — the students who work for the newspaper.

Varsity staffers — students — elect the next-year's editor in March, and do have a say in day-to-day editorial policy. No editor of a college newspaper can continue long without staff co-operation and support.

The only criterion for voting on the editor is that you contribute to a minimum of eight issues of the newspaper a year. That means anyone can join the Varsity staff and vote, regardless of ideology.

Engineers always say they can't work for the paper because they haven't got time, their courses are too heavy. That is a symptom of powerlessness in the university sphere.

Engineers have established a certain amount of student power, more than most of the other faculties. If they want a say in newspaper policy, why not use that power to get more time? If they don't have that power, why not get it?

It seems fair that editorial control should be left to those who spend hours a week working for the newspaper. Further, a newspaper controlled from outside is rarely an effective paper, because it cannot criticize or examine what the powers-that-be don't want examined.

It's called censorship and it's the worst possible principle on which to run a newspaper.

Mr. Janikowski obviously thinks otherwise. Perhaps this is another matter that could be examined in the (we hope) upcoming debate.

this may be the last time you get to read a masthead ad in peace... pray tues nite for jerry rubin's pig or drop your tears in the office as we mourn for big brother to the south. nael knows about that. we had jim laughing all the way to the press as we finished early for the first (read only) time this year. agi and pam deserted the cause for the rhaotah and may went library all the way. jack spent the evening as hitl (or was he in the darkroom; we can't be sure) angelo pondered the cm and sa did tread, perly bless him. rad, we don't believe it was your sister but we do know it was alex's bazex (watch the news pages for develops on the tiddly-winks taurney). lyn and rosemary found it hard going and we only found space for one brian story. bab fielded in and out and even the chevron loves us. succup and suefeet got together for a front-page and mike worried about the flat earth society, eric rump and t.o.m.f. tim went home early and sa did phil, who resorted to phoning confidential Ottawa fash. kevin-take 99 % of this, drop in a glass of beer- and you have a maaburger.

LETTERS

VCUC

This letter is a reply to the lead Varsity editorial of October 9, 1968. The editorial referred to the erroneous fact that "Victoria College freshmen contributed over one thousand dollars damage to their residences during orientation weekend." Furthermore, this fact was used to support a rather shaky editorial argument that moderate students are more militant and destructive than the student left-wing radicals.

This letter may seem a little long in coming, but a reply, which was drafted and passed unanimously by the Victoria College Union Council the next night, was not printed by the Varsity. The reasons given for this action by the editor were that we did not give the actual figure for the damage and the names of those responsible.

Only today (October 31, 1968) was the bill received and the total amount of damage was exactly $155.21, a far cry from the figure originally quoted.

The editor of the Varsity displayed irresponsibility and non-objectivity in not verifying his sources before printing such a highly-exaggerated figure. All it would have taken was a quick telephone call to any VCUC representative to check the validity of his information.

The Varsity gives shoddy enough treatment to Victoria College as it is, but there is absolutely no excuse for printing unproved facts that are very close to being blatant lies. We respectfully submit that the truth has never done any "damage" to a newspaper's reputation.

VISA

Why has The Varsity printed a full page advertisement for VISA STUDENT SAVINGS? Why after printing an article warning students not to be taken in by this fraud and after announcing that The Varsity would be cancelling their future advertisements, do you do this?

If you are printing the ad because you have found that your expose was unfounded or no longer valid, you owe both the company and your readers a retraction or at least an amendment to that article. Perhaps you should even apologise for sensationalism.

If you are printing the ad for advertising revenue while the facts remain the same, you are an immoral capitalistic bourgeois newspaper.

I would love to know whether you will admit to being sensationalist or bourgeois capitalistic etc. or whether you can find a way out of this trap.

Thomas Schofield
(PHE II)

Easy. We printed a letter from Visa a while ago admitting that their earlier advertisement was misleading. Their new advertisement seems more factual so we decided to run it. Whether you join VISA is still up to you.

Police unfair to VMC

By JOE YOUNG

On Saturday October 26 between 2,500 and 3,000 demonstrators marched under the leadership of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee. The protest was one of many held around the world as part of the International Week of Protest against the War in Vietnam. The marchers attempted to walk down Yonge St., but were prevented from doing so by a marshalling of police power such as this city has never seen before. Despite the vicious police attack against peaceful demonstrators the march maintained its unity and concluded in a successful rally at city hall where Stephen Lewis, NDP MPP, Kay MacPherson of the Voice of Women and Gerry Gallagher of the Labourer's Union spoke.

LEGAL PROCEDURE

The leaders of the Vietnam Mobilization Committee went through a long arduous legal procedure in an attempt to get the same right as other demonstrations have had, the right to walk on Yonge St. We went before Board of Control, we spoke to the mayor, we received the support of the Civil Liberties Association and we attempted to speak before the Police Commission, where we were physically thrown out. All this did not accomplish the aim of the Committee which was to get a permit to walk down Yonge St. The Committee decided unanimously to walk down Yonge St. anyway, within the limit that a violent confrontation with the police would be avoided. The feeling was that one does not have any rights unless one fights for them.

Paul MacRae of The Varsity, the U. of T. Communist club, the Canadians for the National Liberation Front, the Globe and Mail, the Star, the Board of Control and of course the police have all attacked us for attempting to exercise our rights. These strange bedfellows charge that we wanted to provoke police violence and that we acted in an underhanded conspiratorial fashion. Let us look at the facts gentlemen.
